House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Thursday, July 27, 1944

The house met at eleven o'clock.

VACANCY

RESIGNATION OF MEMBER FOR THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF ST. HYACINTHE-BAGOT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the resignation of Th. Adélard Fontaine, Esquire, as member for the electoral district of St. Hyacinthe-Bagot. I have accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Third and final report of special committee on radio broadcasting—Mr. McCann.

First report of the joint committee of both houses on the printing of parliament.—Mr. Ferland.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WINFIELD AND WESTBANK, B.C., INDIAN RESERVES

Mr. STIRLING:

1. What is the total acreage of the Indian reserves at Winfield, B.C., and at Westbank, B.C.?

2. What was the Indian population on each when they were first set aside as reserves?

3. What is the present Indian population on each?

4. What acreage of land in each is, (a) usable; (b) cultivated by Indians; (c) leased by other than Indians; (d) idle?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. Duck Lake Indian Reserve No. 7 (at Winfield, B.C.), 439·64 acres; Tsinstikeptum Indian Reserve No. 9 (at Westbank, B.C.), 1570·17 acres; Tsimstikeptum Indian Reserve No. 10 (at Westbank Wharf, B.C.), 786·90 acres.

2. Duck Lake No. 7—no census figures available but said to have been two and possibly more families. Tsinstikeptum No. 9, Tsimstikeptum No. 10, 34.

3. Duck Lake No. 7, population 19; Tsinstikeptum No. 9, population 83; Tsimstikeptum No. 10, population 21.

4. (a) Usable land: Duck Lake No. 7, 439·64 acres; Tsinstikeptum No. 9, 1,000 acres; Tsimstikeptum No. 10, 360 acres.

(b) Cultivated by Indians: Duck Lake No. 7, 56 acres; Tsinstikeptum No. 9, 187 acres; Tsimstikeptum No. 10, 110 acres.

(c) Leased by other Indians: Duck Lake No. 7, 44 acres; Tsinstikeptum No. 9, 83 acres; Tsimstikeptum No. 10, 50 acres.

(d) Idle: Duck Lake No. 7, 339·64 acres; Tsinstikeptum No. 9 1,300·17 acres; Tsimstikeptum No. 10, 426·90 acres.

CANADIAN FORCES—DISCHARGE PAPERS—VOLUNTEERS AND N.R.M.A.

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is there any difference in the discharge papers of soldiers who volunteer and those of soldiers called under selective service law and regulations?

2. If so, what is it?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. Yes.

2. The same type of form is used but the word "enlisted" appears on the discharge certificate for general service soldiers whereas the word "enrolled" is shown on the certificate for N.R.M.A. soldiers. In addition, the series of N.R.M.A. regimental numbers is distinguishable from General Service numbers. However, if an N.R.M.A. soldier has volunteered for general service, his general service number is used on the discharge certificate and the words, "also served under N.R.M.A. from—to —" are added.

R.C.A.F.—SERVICE STRIPES

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Do personnel of the R.C.A.F. receive service stripes?

2. If not, did they ever receive service stripes?

3. If so, why was the practice discontinued?

REVISED EDITION

Mr. MACMILLAN:

1 and 2. No.

3. Not applicable.

WHEAT—PURCHASES FROM OTHER THAN PRIMARY PRODUCERS

Mr. PERLEY:

How many bushels of wheat of each grade were purchased from grain companies or other interests than the primary producer, during the crop years 1940-1941, 1941-1942, 1942-1943, up to and including July 31, 1943?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

Schedule A—Cash wheat, purchases from grain companies, 189,993·40 bushels; Schedule B—Futures, pit purchase, 51,930,000 bushels. Total 52,119,993·40 bushels.

ENEMY ALIENS—DEPORTATION AT CONCLUSION OF HOSTILITIES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Are all enemy aliens who have been interned during the war subject to deportation at the conclusion of hostilities? If not, in what cases is deportation not applicable?

2. Are all Italian prisoners of war in Canada subject to compulsory return to their homeland after the war?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. No. Interned persons of enemy citizenship who are legal residents of Canada by virtue of having been landed in Canada within the meaning of the Immigration Act are not subject to deportation on the grounds of internment.

2. There are none in Canada.

CANOL PROJECT—HANS WILHELM ROHL

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Have any contracts in connection with the Canol project been awarded to Hans Wilhelm Rohl, or to any firm of which he is the head?

2. If so, when, for what, and in what amounts?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. Not by the dominion government.

2. Answered by No. 1.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—JAMES MCGREGOR

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Has the civil service appointment of James McGregor, an employee of the unemployment insurance commission, been made permanent by the civil service commission?

2. If so, why has this been done in view of the restriction on permanent appointments in the civil service during wartime?

3. Is the said James McGregor a war veteran, and what was the date of his first appointment to the civil service?

Mr. McLARTY: Return tabled.

FREDERICK ROBERT (OR FRITZ) STAMPE

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Is Frederick Robert (or Fritz) Stampe employed, or has he been employed recently, by the unemployment insurance commission or the Department of Labour?

2. Is this man a naturalized Canadian or a British subject, and what is the place of his birth?

3. If employed by the unemployment insurance commission or the Department of Labour, has his appointment been concurred in by the civil service commission?

4. If so, is the civil service commission satisfied that Stampe was legally qualified to sit for the necessary examination?

5. Is the civil service commission aware of any misstatements made by Stampe with regard to the place of his birth and his status as a Canadian or British subject, and, if so, what steps have been taken in connection therewith?

6. Is it proposed to appoint Stampe to any other position within the civil service of Canada?

Mr. McLARTY: Return tabled.

HOUSING—EVICTION OF SOLDIERS AND SOLDIERS' FAMILIES

Mr. CHURCH:

What action is the government taking under the war measures act to prevent families of soldiers and soldiers themselves being evicted from their homes, for the duration of the war and six months after, notwithstanding the provisions of any provincial law, statute, usage or custom to the contrary, and notwithstanding existing overholding tenants acts of the provinces?

CANADIAN FORCES—CASUALTIES

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

What is the number of casualties by provinces in each of the three branches of Canada's armed forces from the commencement of hostilities to July 1, 1944?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Order for return, subject to the reservations I made on July 24.

RELEASE OF AIRCRAFT FROM SERVICE IN CANADA

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. How many aircraft have been released from service in Canada by, (a) the R.C.A.F., and (b) the R.A.F.?
2. How many of these have been sold, (a) for use in Canada; (b) for export; (c) how many have been donated for use in technical schools?
3. How many aircraft have been destroyed in Canada as being obsolete or not airworthy, (a) by the R.C.A.F.; (b) by the R.A.F.?
4. How many aircraft released from service have been reconditioned, (a) by the R.C.A.F.; (b) by the R.A.F., and how have these been disposed of?
5. How many of the above aircraft have been reconditioned for the R.C.A.F. or the R.A.F. in privately owned factories, and how have these been disposed of?
6. Have any aircraft been sold to date to private individuals, (a) by the R.C.A.F. or (b) by the R.A.F.? If so, to whom, how many, and what type?

EXPORT CREDIT INSURANCE

MEASURE TO FACILITATE AND DEVELOP TRADE BETWEEN CANADA AND OTHER COUNTRIES

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient for the purpose of facilitating and developing trade between Canada and any other country to introduce a measure:

1. To incorporate the Export Credit Insurance Corporation for the purpose of entering into contracts of insurance with exporters to insure against the risk of loss involved in contracts for the export of Canadian-produced goods.

The capital stock and the paid in capital surplus of the corporation each amounting to five million dollars shall be subscribed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce from time to time and paid therefor by the Minister of Finance with provision also for loans not to exceed in the aggregate, outstanding at any one time, an amount equal to five times the aggregate of the paid-up capital and surplus of the corporation;

[Mr. Church.]

2. To authorize the Minister of Finance during the three years next ensuing after the coming into force of this act, to—

(a) guarantee the obligations of the government or an agency of the government of any such other country to pay the cost of Canadian produced goods under a contract to purchase such goods from an exporter;

(b) make a loan to the government or any agency of the government of any such other country to enable such government or such agency to purchase from an exporter and to pay the cost of Canadian produced goods; or provided that the government of such other country requests the government of Canada to give such guarantee, make such loan, or purchase, acquire or guarantee such securities and undertakes to indemnify the government of Canada against loss in connection therewith.

(c) purchase, acquire or guarantee any security issued by the government or by the agency of the government of any such other country to any person in Canada in payment of the cost of Canadian produced goods exported or to be exported to such other country;

The aggregate amount of such guarantees outstanding at any time shall not exceed two hundred million dollars and the aggregate of the amount of loans made and outstanding at any time and the value of securities purchased or acquired and held at any one time shall not exceed one hundred million dollars.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

SELECTIVE SERVICE

COMPULSORY TRANSFER ORDERS—REPRESENTATIONS OF VANCOUVER VETERANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I have a question which I would like to address to the Minister of Labour, but in his absence I will address it to the parliamentary assistant. My attention has been called to selective service order 227-58, which requires, as I understand it, all veterans who did not see service outside Canada to be subject to removal from their present occupation to essential industry. They are holding a meeting in Vancouver to-night. They are not objecting to being placed in industry, in fact they are in favour of it, but they do resent being placed in the same category as zombies or those who did not volunteer for service. If what I have said is correct, the order makes a clear distinction between volunteers who were unable to get overseas through no fault of their own and those who did get overseas.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has laid the foundation for his question and I would ask him to put the question now.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but these men are having a meeting to-night.

Mr. GRAYDON: The matter is urgent, Mr. Speaker, and I suggest that the hon. member ought to be able to go on.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I would like to ask the parliamentary assistant this question—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has laid the foundation for his question and he must now ask it. The minister has had notice of it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I was proceeding to do so. I would ask the parliamentary assistant if his department will give further consideration to the matter with a view to separating the two groups.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): The hon. member gave me notice of the question yesterday. The point under discussion is a ruling of the national selective service advisory board having to do with compulsory transfer orders.

For the information of hon. members I might say that under the compulsory transfer order plan civilians who are in certain classes of industry are asked to report to the employment office for interview to ascertain if they are suitable for transfer to work which is more important in the war effort. This plan has proven very successful; I am glad to say that it has actually been necessary to use compulsion in but very few cases. In fact, out of the thousands of cases where transfers have been effected there have been less than fifty who have raised serious objection. Usually it was found that the man is transferred to a position which pays a higher rate owing to the fact that men working in war industries are as a rule on a higher wage level.

Coming to the point of circular No. 227-58, up to July 14, 1944, the instructions issued on authority of the national selective service advisory board were that the compulsory transfer orders were not to be applicable in the case of returned men regardless of the nature of their service in the armed forces.

With the increasingly acute shortage of labour which has developed during this summer the advisory board came to the conclusion that returned men should be interviewed and transferred where feasible but that this rule should not apply to men who had seen service overseas.

I am informed that no objection has been taken by any individual returned men, but I do point out that all individuals ordered to transfer under this compulsory transfer system have a right to appeal to a board of referees.

The hon. member asks if the department will give further consideration to the matter and he can be assured that the matter is being discussed currently with the officials concerned.

QUEBEC ELECTION

PRESS REPORT OF STATEMENT OF JACQUES SAURIOL IN MONTREAL ON JULY 9

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. It is now nearly three weeks since he stated in the house that he had directed the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to make an investigation of the report published in Le Canada of a speech made in Montreal by Jacques Sauriol on July 9. I wonder if the minister is able yet to state whether he has received a report as to the accuracy or otherwise of the newspaper item.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Though I received no notice that it was the hon. gentleman's intention to bring this matter up this morning, and therefore have not brought here the preliminary reports I have received from time to time from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as to the progress being made in their investigation, I can from memory state that there has been found one reporter who claims to have been present at the meeting and to recollect the statements that were made. It was also suggested that notes of what was going to be said had been delivered to the reporter of another newspaper and efforts were made to ascertain whether or not that was so. It so happened that the city editor of that paper and the reporter were not available until last Monday. They were interviewed and they have not yet been able to find those notes. At the present time the situation is that there is one person who claims he could vouch for the accuracy of the statement made in the paper. The matter is being investigated under the supervision of the lawyer who usually acts in Montreal for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and he is receiving daily verbal reports from those who are conducting the investigation.

Mr. BRUCE: As this is the official paper of the government in Quebec, would the minister not admit the accuracy of that report?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would like to have the hon. gentleman restate that. I did not catch it.

Mr. BRUCE: As this paper is supposed to be the official organ of this government in the province of Quebec, would the minister not be willing to accept the report published in it?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The minister knows of no newspaper that is the official organ of the government in the province of Quebec, and the minister will be guided by the advice of counsel who has been retained in Montreal and who is following, with the officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the progress of the investigation being made.

Mr. CHURCH: Is the minister not free now to admit that while the provincial elections are on the regulations that I referred to the other day for the defence of Canada have been in effect suspended?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No.

Mr. CHURCH: Why is there not one law for the whole country? Why single out Mr. Houde for treatment in one way and treat others differently? May I ask also whether the habeas corpus act has been suspended?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I was not able to follow completely what the hon. member said, but I did catch the observation that there should be one law for everybody in Canada. There is one law for everybody in Canada.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I be allowed to point out to the Minister of Justice that it has just come to my attention that the same Jacques Sauriol has now himself stated that he may be in a concentration camp, or that he may be interned, for some of the statements that he has been making. Will the minister look that up in this morning's papers? I have just seen it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I noted that, and there have been others who, being perhaps anxious for the role in which that would place them, have suggested that they might during an election campaign be interned.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SHIPYARD WORKERS—REPORT AS TO STRIKE AT HALIFAX AND DARTMOUTH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Late last night, according to reports, three thousand shipyard workers in Halifax and Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, were likely to strike this morning. I would inquire of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour whether the department has been successful in taking steps to avert a very serious disruption in that area.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): The hon. member gave notice of his question regarding the difficulty between Halifax Shipyards Limited and their employees. As he knows, negotiations have been going on now for some time between the employees and the company in regard to the renewal of the former contract. The department of Labour caused to be set up a board of conciliation which made its report, and since the negotiations commenced, and all through the negotiations and since the receipt of the report, the department has had its senior officer on the spot in contact with both parties in the hope that mutually satisfactory arrangements could be worked out. I regret to say that efforts in this direction have thus far not proved successful, and I can now only say to the hon. member that the department is leaving no stone unturned to resolve the differences and to try and see that the men get back on the fairest possible terms.

LABOUR REQUIREMENTS FOR HARVESTING OF ONTARIO TOBACCO CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour, or in his absence to his parliamentary assistant, notice of which I sent to him last night. At a meeting of tobacco growers from the counties of Norfolk, Oxford, Elgin and Essex held in Simcoe recently a resolution was passed urging the national selective service board to make provision for supplying sufficient labour to harvest the tobacco crop which is now approaching the time when it must be harvested. Has the Department of Labour received this resolution, and if so what action is to be taken?

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): I have no doubt the hon. member did send a letter of notice of his question, but it did not reach me. The minister happens to be absent, and on that account possibly the letter was mislaid. Other hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Taylor) brought this matter to my attention, and it is being discussed by the departmental officials to-day.

REQUEST FOR WESTERN FEMALE LABOUR FOR EASTERN FRUIT AND VEGETABLE CANNING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): I was unable to give the Minister of Labour notice of this question, but I believe that the parliamentary assistant to the minister could give me some indication as to whether there were negotiations going on with regard to it. Following the movement of farm labour from the west representations have been made with respect to getting female labour from that section of the country for processing the large crop of fruit and other vegetables which will be canned. Have any negotiations taken place and has consideration been given to the movement of female labour to eastern Canada for that purpose?

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, consideration is being actively given to that matter.

Mr. LOCKHART: Has any progress been made?

Mr. MARTIN: I am not in a position at the moment to report whether or not progress has been made.

TRANSFER FROM INDUSTRY TO FARMING OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I am informed that some men working in certain industries, particularly in the mining industry, who would like to go west to assist in farming operations on their own fathers' and relatives' farms, are having a little difficulty. While they are being released temporarily by the industry they are having some difficulty with national selective service. They have to appear before the boards in their districts and they are informed that when they go west they will have to appear before the boards there. Would the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour inform the house if there can be any rule or regulations passed which will help to facilitate this situation so that these men will not have to face the difficulties that confront them now?

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): I am sure that having in mind the importance of the work every facility will be used to facilitate the movement of the workers in the circumstances mentioned by the hon. member.

WAR LABOUR BOARD—RAILWAY APPLICATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): May I ask the hon. and genial parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour when we may expect the decision of the war labour board on the submission of railway employees for adjustments of wages?

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): With regard to the decision of the national war labour board concerning the case of the railway workers, as I said last week in answer to a question put to me from the other side of the house, it is a very involved case, as the hon. member will appreciate. The national war labour board is giving the matter active attention. On inquiry this morning I was advised that the board is working on the matter and will give a decision at the earliest possible moment.

INTERNMENTS

CAMILLIEN HOUDE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): May I ask the hon. friendly and genial Minister of Justice if it can be expected that Mr. Houde will be released before Tuesday next, the last day for nominations to a seat in the Quebec legislature?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I must apologize to the hon. member. I did not realize that the question was being addressed to me, and I am afraid I did not follow him very closely.

Mr. POULIOT: I shall repeat the question. From the report on Mr. Houde's case it appears that it is about to be settled. I wonder if he could be released before Tuesday next, the nomination day for all those who run for seats in the Quebec legislature.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Were I to attempt to deal with that report I should have to make a very long statement about all of the details of the Houde case. All I can say at the present time is that the matter is under consideration.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

UKRAINIAN LABOUR FARMER TEMPLE ASSOCIATION —QUESTION AS TO RETURN OF PROPERTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State in his capacity as custodian of enemy property. In view of the interview that took place yesterday between a number of cabinet ministers and a delegation representing the Ukrainian Labour Farmer Temple Association concerning a request for return of certain properties or proper recompense therefor, is the minister able to make a statement on the matter?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): I think the only reply that I can give to the question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is the one that was given to the delegation yesterday, namely, that the government will give consideration to the matter and as soon as it arrives at a decision that decision will be announced. I think the hon. member will realize that the government should not act on any ex parte statement and should consider very carefully all phases of the matter.

VETERANS' INSURANCE

PROVISION OF LIFE INSURANCE FOR VETERANS OF THE PRESENT WAR

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of bill No. 170, to provide for the insurance of veterans by the Dominion of Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Sections 1 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On section 9—Provision by contract for change of beneficiary.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman, these sections are going through rather quickly. Will the minister give some indication of the real purport of section 7, which deals with the designation of contingent beneficiaries?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In general this act has been redrafted for purposes of greater clarity. Sections 6, 7 and 8 taken together refer to beneficiaries. There is no real change from the old act, but the provisions of sections 4, 5, 6, 7 and 9 of the old act have been redrafted for greater clarity and incorporated in these sections. It was found by the officers when they went through the old act that some of the provisions were rather badly drafted. These have been redrawn, without any significant change except the change in principle which I announced in the house the other day when I spoke on the resolution. The significant change is in section 10 of the bill, and when we arrive at that section I shall be very glad to explain the real change which is intended.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Limit of benefits when death attributable to war service.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think I should explain the change here. Under both acts, if a pension is awarded to a person in the insurance beneficiary classes, the commuted value of the pension is deductible from the amount of insurance and an alternative insurance benefit, described below, is payable; but if the beneficiary is the wife or children of the insured, a minimum of $500 is payable plus the alternative insurance benefit, even though the pension is awarded to the wife. If, however, the wife of the insured is the beneficiary of the insurance and the pension is awarded to another person no deduction is made from the insurance money. As to the alternative insurance benefit under the old act it was the premiums paid on the amount of the deduction from the insurance, together with interest at 4 per cent, the total payable under the policy not to exceed the amount of insurance. Under the new act it will be the paid up insurance equity with respect to the amount of the deduction. Where the premium payment under the insurance is completed, as for example aften ten, fifteen or twenty years under ten, fifteen or twenty payment life contracts, the paid up insurance equity is the full amount of the insurance, so the new section 10 is a definite advance in regard to benefits to the beneficiary under the insurance.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the minister gave this information previously but what is the limitation on the amount of insurance a soldier can take out?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Under the old act it was $5,000. Under the present bill it is $10,000, with one limitation; that where an insured person had a policy of $5,000 under the old act, that person is limited to a total of $10,000 under the two acts. As an illustration, a member of the army in the last war might have a policy for $5,000. He cannot take out another policy under this legislation for $10,000, but if he qualifies he can take out $5,000 under this bill and have his $5,000 under the old act.

Mr. GRAYDON: It occurs to me, of course, that this might be applicable to members of the veterans' guard.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Exactly.

Mr. GRAYDON: This would not permit them to take out an additional policy for $10,000, but to have a total of $10,000. May I ask also whether the policies which this bill envisages will be in the nature of straight life policies, or whether there will be some special terms in them about which perhaps the committee should know something?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; there is no provision for a straight life policy. There will be ten, fifteen and twenty payment policies, to the age of sixty-five, and there is an age limitation of eighty-five for the payment of premiums which is in conformity with modern insurance practice, instead of a straight life policy. This would mean that all persons reaching the age of eighty-five would not have to pay further premiums. That is according to modern insurance methods.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are these policies of a standard type, without any options at all in respect to the insurance?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, there are options under certain sections of the bill, but it is in conformity with standard insurance practice except that in most cases, though not in all, the rates here are slightly lower than the rates of the standard insurance companies. Sections 6, 7, and 8 of the bill deal with those points. Perhaps I might give my hon. friend some specimen benefits, and with the consent of the committee I will place this table on Hansard:

Amount and plan of insurance	Duration at death of insured	Ages at Issue 20 Old	20 New	35 Old	35 New Whole Life (Old) Prems to 85 (New)
$1,000	5	$ 536	$ 563	$ 556	$ 582
	10	579	623	625	656
	20	697	732	810	779
$5,000	5	824	1,067	1,008	1,238
	10	1,215	1,607	1,625	1,904
	20	2,273	2,592	3,294	3,015
20 Pay Life
$1,000	5	552	625	575	625
	10	616	750	666	750
	20	788	1,000	912	1,000
$5,000	5	972	1,625	1,175	1,625
	10	1,548	2,750	1,998	2,750
	20	2,096	5,000	4,212	5,000

It will be noted that there are slight increases under the new legislation in most cases but as in the $5,000 policy at age 35, where under the old legislation, after twenty years, the amount payable was $3,294, and under the new legislation it will be $3,015.

Mr. GRAYDON: As I understand the purpose of this legislation it is to give the veterans of this war an opportunity to take out insurance which the ordinary commercial companies do not regard as a favourable risk.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is correct.

Mr. GRAYDON: Following that principle, will there be any limitation upon the insurance a soldier may have on his life? I suppose there will be regulations in that regard concerning what sort of risks even the government are prepared to take. I would hope that the government will not be too picayune in the matter and will make the risks as broad as possible so as to give the greatest possible number of our soldiers an opportunity to take the insurance.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If my hon. friend will look at schedule B of the bill he will find certain regulations which are in exactly the same form as they were in the old Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act. In most cases those regulations are just and also generous. There are certain cases however, in connection with which the minister could not accept applications. I have in mind certain incurable diseases, and I think that a restriction of that kind would be only fair. But in most cases, even where there is serious illness, applications would be accepted.

Mr. McCANN: Is there any physical or medical examination of any kind?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Not as a rule; but there are exceptions to that rule. Look at schedule B at page 9 of the bill, where reference is made to applicants who are not seriously ill. Then, in class II there is reference to applicants who are seriously ill. Class III deals with applications from persons in so serious a condition of health that they have no reasonable expectation of life, and the fourth class is general. So that I take it the minister could call in a medical examiner at any time with respect to a case which was in a doubtful class, and where there might be some doubt as to recovery. That procedure would be taken in respect of applications considered really unjust or in other words in cases where there would be no hope of recovery.

Mr. McCANN: Is that left to the minister, or will there be a medical board to pass upon it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The answer to that question will be found in section 13 of the bill, where it is stated that—

> The minister may refuse to enter into a contract of insurance in any case where there are in his opinion sufficient grounds for so doing but, in the exercise of the powers conferred upon him by this section, the minister shall be governed by the provisions of schedule B to this act and he may require for this purpose that the insured shall submit himself to medical examination or shall furnish such other information as the minister may require.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to occupy only three or four minutes of the committee's time, and in doing so I shall direct my attention particularly to section 7 of the bill. I had intended to ask certain questions on second reading. I might say, however, that the bill now before us is a most commendable one, so far as it goes.

It might be recalled that in January, 1940, I brought this matter of soldiers' insurance to the attention of the house. At that time I placed a resolution on the order paper stating that—

> A system of life insurance on all soldiers be established, to include provision for their dependents, both during and after the war, and to include, for three years after the war, provision for their insurance against unemployment and want and free hospitalization.

When the matter was discussed I pointed out to the Minister of Finance what had been done in Toronto, and also in Washington. At the time of the last war, soldiers in Toronto were insured for $1,000. The beneficiaries, upon the death of those soldiers, received cheques for that amount from the city of Toronto. Then, in Washington they had a soldiers' insurance act. I believe that the Sparkman Act was introduced in Washington about the time they came into the war. Several provinces have aided in this matter by legislation.

The difficulty about this bill is that we are about four years too late.

I made that complaint only a month or two ago on a finance bill. I said at that time that I had known a very fine specialist in Toronto, one who had specialized on diseases of the eye, ear, nose and throat, and who had operated on a former member of the House of Commons and, so far as I could learn at the time, saved his life. That physician went early to the war, having on his life an insurance policy with one of the commercial companies. I will admit that the Canadian insurance companies generally have performed a patriotic duty during the war, but in some cases, owing to the peculiar types of policies, insured persons were faced with the alternative of having to pay additional sums or lose some of the benefits.

So far as this bill is concerned, it is my view that there are very few soldiers who would be able to pay three and a half per cent interest. I was hoping in the last three years that the minister would revive the provision contained in the Pension Act, to which he has made such worth while extensions. We will recall that a bill was before the house only a month or so ago to provide a separate department for soldier problems. It will be my hope that he will accept the same principles I proposed in 1940 as to a system of insurance, and include all other beneficiaries along the lines I have indicated.

I am convinced that many of the wives of soldiers will have great difficulty in carrying out payments on existing policies when their husbands are away. If the husband dies abruptly, it becomes more difficult to prove the claim and to get ready money to pay necessary expenses. This bill extends the policies from $5,000 to $10,000, a feature which I consider most commendable. I am sorry, however, that some provision has not been made for insuring soldiers in other ways, and against certain other difficulties they are bound to have. For instance, it was stated at a civic council meeting in Toronto that 600 soldiers are to be evicted from their homes. They will have nowhere to go. All this is to happen in the city from which I come. Yesterday at Toronto there was a meeting held on this with the Toronto board of control and Ottawa officials.

It would be my proposal that this principle of insurance should have wider scope, so as to include all conditions the families of soldiers might have to face. While the bill is commendable in many respects, yet in my view it does not go far enough, and is not protecting those who are overseas in France and Italy, and who are suffering as they have had to suffer.

As to getting money to protect small businesses they may have, I am afraid that controls of various kinds, and other conditions, will bring about a situation under which some of them may lose those businesses.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am sure the house is greatly indebted to the hon. member for the consistent interest he has taken in this question of insurance protection for our servicemen. I can assure him that the government through its official committees, not only in the Department of Pensions and National Health but also in the services, has given very careful and sustained attention to the very problems he has mentioned. There are great difficulties in the way. I might inform my hon. friend by way of comparison that if he would take the capitalized value of our scale of Canadian pensions and compare it with that of some other nations which have adopted the in-service insurance policy, he would find that there is an increase, on an average, of from $5,000 to $6,000 in the capitalized value of Canadian pensions.

The hon. member mentioned another point which to my mind is far more important—and when I say this I am speaking from a purely personal standpoint, and not for the government. In my view the protection of dependents is more important than in-service insurance. We have in Canada a most comprehensive system for the post-war period to protect returning soldiers, airmen and members of the navy from the hazards the hon. member has mentioned.

I believe the present measure in respect of returned soldiers' insurance is as far advanced as that to be found in any other country. We have raised the amount from $5,000 to $10,000, and under section 10 of the bill we have made provisions which are more generous to the pensionable widow or beneficiary. This is most certainly a definite advance. My personal view is that possibly something more should be done in connection with the protection of premiums. I am not criticizing my hon. friend in respect of the points he has raised. On the contrary I am agreeing with what he has said, and I must also commend him for the stand he has taken in the last three or four years. I can assure him that every possible attention has been paid to this matter.

Mr. CHURCH: Would it not be possible under this bill for the government to consider paying half the new premiums for these soldiers? Would that not be done during the war, and for about a year after? I say that because some of them are pretty hard up.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think my hon. friend is dealing with an entirely different principle. This measure is designed only for those who have been discharged. This is a veterans' insurance bill, and the last one was a returned soldiers' bill. The provisions of this bill extend to those who are pensionable under the various orders in council, such as merchant seamen and members of the auxiliary services.

Mr. GILLIS: Are merchant seamen covered?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Those who are pensionable are covered, that is, those who have suffered disabilities are entitled to the same protection as enlisted men if pensioned under the Pension Act.

Mr. CHURCH: Can a man transfer a policy from a private company to the government insurance?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This is designed principally for the man who cannot get a standard policy from a life insurance company. It enables such a man to obtain insurance with the protection of the state behind it. A man with a disability who cannot obtain insurance in any other way can obtain insurance up to $10,000 under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Is there any provision in this bill to insure men who served in the last war and who did not take out insurance under the old act?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No, there is not. That would mean a reopening of the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act which expired in 1933. If a returned soldier of the last war was insured and has enlisted for duty in 1933, he would be entitled to $5,000 additional to the $5,000 he might have taken out under the old returned soldiers' act.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): It seems to me that provision should be made in this bill for the veterans of the last war. There are many of these men between the ages of forty-five and fifty-five years. When they came back from the last war they were not in a financial position to take out the insurance available to them under the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act. Now that their financial position has improved, why should they be prevented from coming within the provisions of this bill? I know there are quite a few whose finances were not such that they could come under the provisions of the old act and who would like to take advantage of this legislation. I think in that respect I can speak on behalf of some hon. members of this house. I know there are a number who served in the last war who would like to come under the provisions of this bill. To my knowledge some of them were not in position to take out insurance at that time, but they could take out some now. I am speaking not only on behalf of these members of the house but on behalf of a vast number of soldiers of the last war who I feel should come within the provisions of this bill.

Under the provisions of the former act a soldier could take out only $5,000 insurance, while under this bill he can take out up to $10,000. I commend the government for bringing in this bill at this time. I know that the measure which was brought in at the end of the last war helped a great many soldiers. In saying that I speak from personal experience. I know there are other ex-service men in this house who took out policies under the old act. There were men who could not get insurance because of their physical condition and they were able to get this under the provisions of that act. It was a splendid thing for the returned men, because they could look ahead with confidence knowing that they had at least an insurance policy behind them. I hope the government will see its way clear to widen the scope of this bill so that it will cover those who served in the last war.

Mr. GRAY: Before I supplement what the hon. member for Brantford City has said, I should like to ask if there is any date of expiration in this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Three years after discharge. The first bill which was introduced in 1920 extended to only two years after discharge, but this is for three years.

Mr. GRAY: I came under the old act myself, and as I remember there were a number of extensions, I believe three or four at least. I do not think there should be a time limit in connection with this bill. If there had been no time limit on the old act, the soldiers referred to by the hon. member for Brantford City would have been able to take out insurance as they became financially able to do so. I agree with the hon. member for Brantford City that some provision should be made to include the veterans of the last war under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In reply to the hon. members for Brantford City and Lambton West I may say that the provisions of the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act were in existence for practically thirteen years. The hon. member for Brantford City has referred to the limit of $10,000 in this bill as against $5,000 under the former act. I would inform him that the average insurance taken out under that act was slightly over $2,000. I do not think his argument applies with any force at all. There were five different extensions of the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act. To be frank about it, it was not taken advantage of to a very large degree. There were certain rigid features about that act which we have endeavoured to remove in drafting this legislation. We have raised the amount to $10,000 and we have increased the benefits to the widow. If we are to provide benefits for the veterans of our time, it would have to be done by amending the old returned soldiers' act, by providing a further extension of that act. Frankly speaking I do not believe the number of applications made under the provisions of the old act would justify such a course. Let us see to it that this bill, which is for the benefit of the boys who are now overseas in this war and of those who have been discharged, with its more generous terms, is as successful as possible. I think parliament will be doing its duty by seeing to that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I had intended that my remarks should be congratulatory to the Minister of Pensions and National Health. I know he has a great interest, not only in the men who served in the last war but in those who are serving in this war. I commend him most heartily for bringing in this bill with respect to the men who are serving in this war, but I still feel that the men who served in the last war and who were not in a financial position to take out insurance should be able to take advantage of the benefits offered. The minister suggests that the old act would have to be revived. I ask him to give that his most serious consideration. I do not want to confuse the issue by emphasizing this point too strongly. If this bill is for the men who served in the present war then I agree with the minister when he says that it should be put through. I suggest to the government that they review the old act to see whether or not it is possible to revive it in order to give the soldiers who were not in a financial position at that time to take out insurance an opportunity to obtain the benefits granted. They should also be able to increase their insurance to $10,000, as is provided for in this bill. That is another question; and I am merely referring it to the government. I am in complete accord with the provisions of the present bill.

Mr. GILLIS: I am sorry the hon. member for Brantford City has weakened in his argument.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I am not weakening. I am just as strong as ever for reviving the old act, but I do not want to confuse the issue.

Mr. GILLIS: You backed up a little.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I am not backing up at all.

Mr. GILLIS: I think this is a step forward; it is an improvement on the old soldiers' insurance act, but there is much force in the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Brantford City and the hon. member for Lambton West. Opening up the old act is not the solution of the problem raised by the hon. member for Brantford City. As I see it, this measure is merely one part of the scheme of rehabilitation of service personnel returning from the war, and the formation of a department of veterans' affairs was brought about, in my opinion, to consolidate all the machinery for both old and new service personnel so as to make one central administration. In view of the fact that we took the old pension act and opened it up, related the new forces to it, and made the necessary changes to bring it up to date, we should do the same thing with respect to this bill. There is no difference between the old soldier and the new soldier. They fought the same kind of war, against the same enemy, for the same objectives, although we are thirty years late in getting around to this as far as the old soldier is concerned.

In the field of insurance the soldier has a problem all his own. He is not looked upon as a profitable client as far as old line insurance companies are concerned, and if the government is to go into the insurance business—and I think it should in so far as it can thereby protect those who have come out of the service—let them bear in mind that whether a soldier has a hole shot in him or not he suffers a great deal of disability if he has gone through a war, and it is difficult for him to secure insurance.

I think that this bill should be related to the soldiers of the last war. I visualize it in future as a large insurance scheme instituted by the government to protect those who are not able to get protection in the ordinary field of insurance. I believe there is quite a business in this for the government and that sooner or later they will have to come round to it.

I am not in favour of the time limit, because the average soldier coming out of this war, like his predecessor of the last war, is unlikely to appreciate within this period the advantages of this insurance. It will be ten years after he comes out of this conflict that he will recognize the value of this insurance. If the measure is on the statute book to be taken advantage of, and it is not being used, it is not costing anything. At the same time, when those who are intended to benefit by it realize that it means something to them, its benefits should be available to them. In my opinion this time limit is inserted for the purpose of appeasing the old line insurance companies, who may see in this bill a threat of invasion of the field of insurance.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; no. I can assure my hon. friend that that is not correct.

Mr. GILLIS: No, not so far as the minister is concerned; but there are a lot of long-range figures behind the scenes who have something to do with this. I believe that the minister's intentions regarding this measure are absolutely honest. I have merely risen to support the hon. member for Brantford City and the hon. member for Lambton West. I believe that the limit should be removed and the scheme broadened to include the old soldiers. Most of them have no protection; they cannot get insurance to-day, and they should be enabled to take advantage of this particular scheme. This is a 1944 model, and we should let all ex-service men in the country have the benefits of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I tell my hon. friend that we consulted some of the veterans' organizations and there was no request made for what is now being suggested. I should mention one or two other points in this connection. It might be unfair to introduce new principles for those who still survive from the old war. Some of them have gone away for good from this sphere; and the element of discrimination must be considered. But also the rates would be very high, because the average age to-day of veterans of the old war would be fifty-five or fifty-six years.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I would not agree with that. I believe the average is lower than that.

Mr. GRAYDON: Let the minister look at his own birthday, to-day, and see.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In any event the rates would be very high, and I doubt whether more than a few veterans could afford to take the insurance.

Mr. GILLIS: It would be cheaper than private company insurance.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Under what section does schedule A, setting out the rates of premiums to be charged, become a part of the act?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That comes under an amendment which I shall ask one of my colleagues to move:

That clause 12 be amended by adding thereto the following subclause (2):

"(2) The premiums payable under the various plans of contract shall be as provided for in schedule A to this act."

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How were these rates arrived at?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would point out that the committee is now on section 10.

I know that hon. members were satisfied to discuss this subject in the general debate, and it is impossible to discuss the matter now.

Mr. GRAY: I realize that I am out of order in reverting to section 3, but the minister has been very liberal, and we passed these sections rather rapidly. I hope that in spite of the fact that that section has passed, the minister, in the light of what has been said, and in the light of experience under the old act, which was renewed, as he pointed out, for some thirteen years, will remove the time limit under clause 3. I hope there will not be a time limit in this act, and I wish the minister would give the committee the reasons for putting one in. I endorse what has been said by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. It takes members of the armed forces a number of years to get on their feet and become reestablished. The young men who come out of this war, though they may be a little better informed on insurance matters than those who survived the last war, know very little, at the age of eighteen or twenty or twenty-one, about the various types of insurance. I think it is a mistake to have a time limit of three years. The bill would be more generally acceptable to the returned men of this war and to the country generally if that limit were removed, and I urge the minister to remove it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member. The reason for the limitation is obvious; we had it before, in 1920, when it was two years. It is to encourage these boys when they come home to take advantage of the very generous provisions of this legislation while they are still young and the rates are very low. It is that which makes it so difficult to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

In regard to old men like ourselves who were in the last war—

Mr. GRAY: Speak for yourself.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think the limitation is an encouragement to insure. If it should be found necessary or advisable by the parliament and the government of that time to extend the period beyond three years, I am sure that the parliament then, with its usual generous heart, will do it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I support the views just expressed by the hon. member for Lambton West; I had intended to express them myself. From the result of much observation following the last war, I was astonished at the number of the boys who returned who could not make up their minds within three years to do anything, and I have been wondering whether the minister could not see his way clear, if there is to be a time limit, to extend it to five years. Perhaps before the end of that time most men will have realized that they will lose the benefits of the cheaper rate unless they act quickly. In the riding I represent there are a very large number of returned soldiers, and if the minister could see his way clear to set the time limit at five years it would help them very greatly.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I do not think a complete repetition on my part of the remarks of hon. members who have spoken on this matter is necessary, but I entirely endorse—and I think I can speak in this connection for British Columbia soldiers—what they have said. I cannot agree with the minister as to the time limit, nor do I greatly believe in the supposed generosity of governments in the future. The minister will remember that his own department only this year permitted pensions to be paid to those married after a certain period, following a strenuous battle by the Legion throughout Canada. I cannot see why the time limit should be there at all unless it is at the instance of the insurance companies. When young soldiers come back we hope they will not follow the example of the minister in charge. We hope they will get married as soon as they can. But a young soldier is not in a position to take out insurance, to buy furniture, to establish a home for himself and a family. Again, I do not see why there should be a time limit. I agree with the suggestion that it should be extended to all veterans instead of reopening the act. I do not see where it would confuse the issue. It might confuse the insurance companies but I am not in the least bit worried about them. They have been able to look after themselves mighty well for many years and we need not worry about them. I suggest that the time limit be removed and that the act be made applicable to all overseas men. I am not worried about the fellow who served in Canada. As regards the man who was willing to go overseas, that is a different matter, but I am speaking on behalf of all soldiers of the active army both as regards the last war and as applicable to this war.

Mr. FAIR: I commend the government for bringing in this measure but I think it might be improved along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Brantford City, the hon. member for Lambton West, the hon. member for Cape Breton South, and the hon. member for Fraser Valley. The minister realizes that there are in the forces men who joined up immediately after coming out of school. They have had no experience in earning a livelihood and very many of them will not have any money to get married and to do a great many of the other things they would like to do. Insurance is one of the things they will put aside for the time being. I recommend that the time be extended even beyond the five-year period suggested by the hon. member for Davenport. The experience of the last war has taught us that men were in too big a rush to get out of the army and into some form of employment so that they neglected a number of things they found necessary ten or fifteen years later. If it is not possible to have the act extended I suggest that the old act be amended immediately so that the men of the first great war may be given the protection that is being provided for the veterans of this war.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not wish to repeat anything that has already been said by others and I heartily agree with what hon. members have submitted to the minister. Has the minister any figures to show the percentage of veterans under the old act who took out insurance during the first two years as compared with those who took it out later?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The figures are these:

Year	Number	Amount
1920-1921.....	2,371	$ 7,074,000
1921-1922.....	7,456	17,874,500
1922-1923.....	9,725	22,083,500
1923-1924.....	14,025	28,696,500

In 1924-1925, 1925-1926, 1926-1927, 1927-1928, no applications were received.

Year	Number	Amount
1928-1929.....	4,035	$9,869,000
1929-1930.....	3,407	7,967,500
1930-1931.....	1,672	3,801,500
1931-1932.....	1,373	3,210,500
1932-1933.....	1,450	3,116,000
1933-1934.....	2,802	5,598,000
1934-1935.....	4	8,500

That must have been very unusual applications after the act closed.

Mr. WRIGHT: The figures quoted by the minister prove the points of members who have been speaking, that this grew in popularity from year to year as the soldier realized the benefits under the act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In the first five years the total of the members which I read in detail was 33,577, and in the last six years the total was 14,743.

Mr. WRIGHT: But there was a period in between in which it was dropped.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. WRIGHT: And as a result the publicity would naturally be less with regard to the scheme. I really think, after the figures the minister has given, that he should seriously consider lengthening the period, if not eliminating it altogether. Under the scheme, can the beneficiary elect to receive an annuity instead of a cash benefit at the death of the insured?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is all by way of annuity except for the cash amount payable at death.

Mr. KNOWLES: But it is payable only at death.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How many policies have lapsed under the agreement?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I put that on Hansard the other day. My hon. friend asked a question about it and I replied almost immediately, but he had left the chamber in the meantime. It is on Hansard.

Mr. WHITE: I concur in what the various soldier members have said about the period for which the act is set. The minister, replying to one question, stated that it was only for a short period because they wanted the returned veterans to take out insurance while very young. Section 6 sets out who the beneficiaries are to be. The average soldier returning from overseas, if unmarried, is not going to be in very good financial circumstances, and if he can take out only a policy that is payable to his future wife and children he is not going to be very specially interested in insurance. We can take the minister's own example. When he came back from overseas, if he could only take out a policy payable to his future wife and children, he would not have veen very likely to take one. But as the years go by and the financial circumstances of a soldier improve he may want to get married, and one of the first things he will wish to do will be to protect his wife and any children there may be.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): The minister may want to do that yet.

Mr. WHITE: We all hope so. Perhaps the baby bonus will induce him to do so. But the period of time may have lapsed and the soldier will not be entitled to take advantage of the act. The minister says that he wants the returning soldier to take advantage of it as soon as he comes home, and while he is young, but there is no inducement there for him to do so because it is payable only to his future wife and children. I think it should be extended because of that point alone; and when the soldier does marry it is not too late for him to take advantage of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I reply to the hon. member for Yorkton. He asked for the number of policies that had lapsed. Up to March 31, 1943, the number was 53,288, and the amount was $122,016,470.24. The lapses for 1943-44 were 361, the total amount $859,395.48 or a total of 53,589 with a valuation of $122,875,865.72.

Mr. WHITE: When a policy lapsed under the old act after it had been carried on for a number of years what happened?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is a special provision in the old act that deals with that.

Mr. WHITE: Take a policy of $5,000 that a veteran had carried for ten years. Something happened and it lapsed. What benefit would he get out of that? Would he get anything?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): While the minister is looking up that information I should like to give some information from my own experience, because I have had experience of policies lapsing from time to time. If I recall correctly what happens, after my policy lapsed I would receive a notice from the department of insurance advising me that it had lapsed and if I did not pay the premium within a certain time I would get a paid-up policy. If a soldier allowed his policy to lapse and did not pay the premium for a certain number of months—I am not sure of the number—he would have to go to a doctor, if he had been ill, and be examined, or else he would have to make a statement that he had not had any illness.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I understand the practice is that the proportion of the insurance which is covered by the premium actually paid would be payable, but not the whole amount of the policy.

Mr. WHITE: When the policy lapses, does the soldier receive from the department any sum in settlement of that policy?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is a cash surrender value of the policy.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): When a policy lapsed under the old act I believe the soldier had to make a declaration that he had not been ill. If he had been ill he had to go to a doctor and be examined. Does that practice prevail in connection with the present act? If the doctor found that the man had been ill, would the department still continue to insure him?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I cannot answer my hon. friend's question because this has not been administered under my department. As my hon. friend knows, it has been administered by the Department of Finance. I believe that what my hon. friend suggests has been the practice. What the practice will be in the future is a matter for consideration.

Mr. FAIR: How do the rates in schedule A compare with the standard rates of the line insurance companies?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am informed that they are lower than those of most companies. Probaby there are two or three companies that are as low. I do not know of any that are lower than those rates, but these are certainly lower than eighty-five or ninety per cent of the insurance companies.

Mr. WHITE: When the minister was speaking about the policy that had lapsed, was he using the word "lapsed" the same way as it is used with reference to any policy of the standard insurance companies? Those companies give the policyholders thirty days to pay the premium. Is the minister, or whoever will administer this act, to have any discretion in the matter, or is the arbitrary rule to be applied that after thirty days the policy lapses?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, I can assure my hon. friend that there will be definite discretion with regard to the point raised by him. That will be done by regulation.

Mr. KNOWLES: In reply to a question from this corner a while ago the minister admitted that the only kind of insurance provided for under this act is what is known as protection. The veteran has to die to collect, unless he takes the cash surrender value, in which case he is no longer protected. It is well known that this protection form of insurance is a desirable thing to have and it is commendable that it be provided at as low rates as the government can arrange. But I would point out that veterans will also be interested in providing for themselves what is known as endowment insurance, whereby some provision is made for payments to come back to them while they are still alive. I would remind the minister that in the Department of Labour there is an excellent scheme known as Canadian government annuities. Anyone can purchase a Canadian government annuity without medical examination. It is a simple matter to get in touch with the department and find out the rates and other conditions. I have two suggestions to make. The first is that the minister consider publicizing that fact along with any literature that is sent out.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Which fact?

Mr. KNOWLES: The fact that there are government annuities available to all our people, including veterans. I suggest that that be included in any literature that is sent out in connection with this insurance.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): A very good suggestion.

Mr. KNOWLES: My other suggestion is that the minister consult with the Minister of Labour or the Minister of Finance to see whether any special offer might be made by the annuities branch to veterans. There is an element of subsidy which is contained in the annuities set-up, of which I approve. I believe the country generally would approve a little further subsidy to enable veterans to provide annuities for themselves. I should be glad if the minister would consider those suggestions.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Thank you.

Mr. LOCKHART: I have no intention of repeating any arguments, but the minister does not show any indication of deleting the restriction as to time that would be applicable. He says he wants the soldier to take advantage of this at an early date after he is discharged. In looking at schedule A I find that in the age bracket twenty-five to twenty-nine there is a difference of only twenty-cents a month in the premiums on a policy of a thousand dollars on a fifteen-year basis. Therefore I cannot see how the minister can substantiate the argument that the three-year figure should be retained. The suggestion has been made that the period should be five years. I think it should be five, if the limit be not taken off altogether.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is it not $2 a month on a $10,000 policy?

Mr. LOCKHART: This is on the basis of $1,000; why talk of $10,000?

Mr. WHITE: Would the minister explain to the committee how the succession duty act will operate in regard to this insurance, and whether or not the annuities will be subject to income tax?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am informed not, but personally I am not positive on that point.

Mr. WHITE: Which, succession duty, or income?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Succession duty.

Mr. WHITE: Would the minister get a ruling from the department?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, before third reading of the bill. I shall get a ruling on both these points.

Mr. WHITE: Also about succession duty?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be glad to do that before third reading of the bill and inform my hon. friend, or the leader of the opposition if my hon. friend is not in the house.

Mr. WHITE: Will the minister give an opinion as to whether soldiers' insurance such as this should be exempt from succession duty? Would he like to go that far?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is my personal opinion, but I am speaking only for myself.

Mr. WHITE: Would he like to recommend it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall discuss it.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the minister definitely made up his mind that he will not extend the period from three to five years?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Frankly, no; I am not qualified to discuss the actuarial possibilities of such an extension. I shall discuss it with those who are the scientific advisers in this matter before the bill receives third reading. I will see if there is any definite and insuperable objection to the suggestion, which has come from practically all quarters of the house. I shall be very glad to have that taken up.

Mr. MacNICOL: That will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will the same thing apply to my suggestion?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; I am afraid I must take a definite stand in that regard. If we are to extend these benefits to those who served in the previous war but who have not served in this war, we must do it by amending the old act. The whole system of premiums and everything else is based upon scientific actuarial practice, and in the case suggested by the hon. member we would have to amend the other act.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then would the minister consider recommending that the other act be amended?

Mr. MacNICOL: I want to thank the minister for his consideration and his undertaking that between now and third reading he will inquire as to whether it would be actuarially sound to extend the period from three to five years.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I will discuss it with the superintendent of insurance, who of course has been responsible for the financial set-up of this measure.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If the minister has it there would he give us the amount of premium paid in to date and the balance of the fund at the present time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I can give my hon. friend the receipts and expenditures, if that would answer his question.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like to know what has been paid in by way of premiums.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): These are the receipts and expenditures for 1943-44, as furnished by the department of insurance. The amount of the fund was $21,383,159.33.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That represents the total premiums paid in?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, that must be it. Bank interest earned amounted to $850,665.42; interest added, $682.31; premiums, $633,680.60.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Those were the premiums paid for that year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes; this is the account for 1943-44. The complete figures are as follows:

Receipts

Amount of fund	$21,383,159 31
Bank interest earned	850,665 42
Interest added	682 31
Premiums	633,680 60
Recovered death benefits	2,000 00
Recovered cash surrender	2,950 00
Recovered disability benefit	212 41
Recovered annuities	3,482 22
	$22,876,832 27

Expenditures

Payments at death	$ 206,856 11
Annuity payments	247,261 09
Surrender values	226,787 52
Premiums refunded (section 10)	68,593 67
Disability benefits	22,046 83
Excess premiums returned	3,788 90
	$ 775,334 12
Net balance	22,101,498 15
	$22,876,832 27

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That statement shows a credit balance to take care of the claims that will still have to be paid?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is correct.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. CASTLEDEN: According to the figures given by the minister approximately 48,000 policies were issued. Of these some 6,000 have lapsed or been paid up, and 14,647 have been surrendered. That would leave something over 24,000 policies still in effect, and the figure of approximately $22,000,000 is the credit balance in the fund at the present time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): The minister has told the committee that it is impossible to bring veterans of the last war under this legislation. I realize that it would be difficult to do so, and for that reason I did not unduly press my suggestion that they be so treated. However, I am interested in having them protected. I am sure no soldier member of this house would want to weaken the case of the soldier of this war if that would be done by bringing the soldiers of the last war under this legislation. I do think, however, that all soldier members of this house believe the old act should be revived, speaking not for themselves but for the great mass of returned soldiers throughout the country. I am not going over all the arguments that have been advanced, but it is a fact that many veterans of the last war, because of physical incapacity, are not now insurable risks and therefore cannot obtain insurance with the line companies. When they returned from the war they did not have the money with which to take out returned soldier insurance. They are now in a financial position to do so. The minister has said the average age of veterans of the last war is fifty-five years. I know there are many veterans of the last war under fifty-five years of age who are now able and anxious to take out this insurance. I am not going to ask the minister his personal opinion with respect to this matter but I am going to ask if he will not have the government consider reviving the old insurance act in order to permit veterans of the last war to become insurable at the present time. I am making this request in all seriousness, in behalf of the great number of veterans of the last war throughout the country who want this insurance.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Reserve only to estate.

Mr. WHITE: Would the minister give a concrete example of this, showing in dollars and cents how it will work out? What will the estate get under what you call the reserve?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The principle is the same as that contained in section 11 of the old act. It has been reworded to conform to the changed structure of the new legislation. The only difference is that the interest paid is 3½ per cent instead of 4 per cent, as it was under the old act. By this section the estate of the insured receives only the difference between what might be considered the cash surrender value of the policy and the total of the premiums paid, with interest at 3½ per cent per annum thereon.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Terms for payment of premiums.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is an amendment to this section, which I would like my colleague the Minister of Agriculture to move. The amendment is that section 12 be amended by adding thereto the following subclause:

2. Premiums payable under the various plans of contracts shall be as provided for in schedule A to this act.

Mr. GARDINER: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McNIVEN: When this section refers to a ten, fifteen or twenty year term does it mean a ten, fifteen or twenty year term policy, or does it mean that when the premiums have been paid for the period designated the veteran will have a full paid up policy?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The latter is the correct meaning.

Mr. McNIVEN: That is, having paid his premiums for ten years at the rate designated in the schedule, he will receive a fully paid up policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes; of course with heavier premiums.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I wonder how the government has arrived at this schedule. The minister has said the rates are generally lower than are found for ordinary insurance in the life insurance companies.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes. This was compiled by the insurance branch of the government, and it is in conformity with the most modern practice of life insurance companies with, as I said this afternoon, a slightly lower rate than is accorded civilian applicants for ordinary life insurance.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The ordinary life insurance company has heavy expenses in connection with selling the insurance. In this case the government is doing that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There are no administrative charges at all. Those are absorbed by the state.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Then, if the state is carrying all the administrative work, free of charge, it seems to me the rates are rather high. There is no cost of selling and no advertising.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member will realize that in this instance the risks are very much greater than the ordinary life insurance company takes, because there is no medical examination. Honestly I believe that after looking into the matter to some extent the rates will be found to be very fair indeed.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The figures would show that the government has on hand about $22,000,000 from the old fund. They also show that there are about 24,000 policies still in force.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): About 20,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: So that perhaps there would be about $40,000,000 of insurance?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes; but the rate of mortality is increasing every day for those who are insured under the old act.

Mr. MacNICOL: And it will continue to increase.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It would seem therefore that there is about $20,000,000 on hand to meet obligations of about $40,000,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has consideration been given to providing any form of insurance other than the ten, fifteen or twenty-payment life plan? The veteran at the age of thirty-five for example, may take out what is called a 20-pay-life policy under this legislation, for which the premium would be $29.04 per thousand per year. If the veteran desires insurance to provide an adequate amount of protection to meet his increasing family responsibilities it will be difficult to put on sufficient protection at a rate that high. There are other forms of insurance which come at cheaper rates and provide better coverage, such as taking a straight protection policy on the one hand and an annuity contract on the other. Straight protection or, as it is called, term insurance, could be had at a much lower rate per thousand than the figure I have mentioned as an example. Has consideration been given to offering the veteran two or three different types of insurance rather than confining him to this one type? I do not feel that this serves all of the purposes which can be served by insurance, in the light of modern understanding of that subject.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Of course there are two different principles, as my hon. friend must realize. This is really protection for dependents. Annuities are protection for the individuals themselves, during their lifetime. This on the other hand is essentially protection for the dependents of veterans.

Mr. KNOWLES: There are two different forms all right, namely annuities on the one hand and protection on the other. But speaking now of the latter, there are different kinds of protection. One kind is this 20-pay-life policy, where the premium is fairly high, but paid over a relatively short space of time, at the end of which the policy is paid up. The other kind is term insurance, a type of insurance which many insurance agents despise, but which I believe best fills the bill for any man who wishes to provide protection of $10,000 or $15,000 for his family during the years when his children are dependents. It could be done at half or a third of these rates, in ordinary companies, if the medical examinations can be passed. My point is that the government is making this one kind of policy available to veterans, as set out in this bill, whether or not they can pass medical examinations. I am suggesting it should consider making some other types of policies available as well.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 13—Minister may refuse to insure.

Mr. GRAY: I call the minister's attention to class IV in schedule B, where it states:

> In cases where an applicant with or without dependents whose health has become impaired as a result of immoral conduct prior to enlistment, during service or after discharge.
> Applications are to be refused.

We might as well discuss this matter frankly. I presume the thought in connection with this general class has to do with the man who has contracted venereal disease. That is what is aimed at. May I at the outset commend the minister and the Department of Pensions and National Health upon the vigorous campaign waged in the past few months in connection with the elimination of venereal disease. It does seem to me however that this clause, which refers to men who contracted the disease prior to enlistment and afterwards served, and men who contracted it during service, should be limited to men who refused treatment, thereby putting themselves apart and in a situation where they do not deserve to receive insurance. I am not holding any brief for these people, but I am afraid that, worded as it is —"as a result of immoral conduct prior to enlistment, during service or after discharge" —it is too broad, and is subject to the possibility of misinterpretation by returned men. It would also be subject to abuse, if I may say so, either by departmental officers or by a minister who might not see the returned man's point of view in the same way as the present minister might see it.

I am sure the minister must know of cases under the old Pension Act where what I have said would apply. I recall particularly cases in which illegitimate children were involved, and where the chairman of the then pension commission would almost refuse to read the files if anything of that nature was contained in them. My recollection is—and it is quite vivid to-day—that he had a stack of files almost as high as himself sitting in one corner of his room, and he would not even look at them because of the nature of the material they contained. I urge the minister to reconsider this class, or at least to give us some explanation for the present wording.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is a good deal of force in what the hon. member has said. Of course he knows as well as I do that we have provisions in the Pension Act which deal with immoral conduct, and of course pensionability is affected. One could not effect what he has suggested in the period prior to enlistment, because we have no control at that time. But what we could do would be to add the words "or refusing treatment for such", and bring about the desired result.

Mr. GRAY: Yes, that would be satisfactory.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall ask my colleague so to move.

Mr. GARDINER: I move:

> That class IV in schedule B read as follows: "In cases where an applicant with or without dependents whose health has become impaired as a result of immoral conduct prior to enlistment, or as a result of refusal of treatment for such condition during service or after discharge from service.
> Applications are to be refused.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Schedule B, class II, paragraph (b) provides that an application will be refused in the case of an applicant with dependents, seriously ill with a disability that is not pensionable. What about the man who at one time was not pensionable but later became pensionable? He might be refused a pension to start with, but may have been granted it after it had been considered. His insurance would be refused during the period he was not pensionable but during which he might be seriously ill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He could apply when his status had changed.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Supposing the legislation is not in force?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This covers only the tenure of the bill, but during the operation of this legislation anyone whose status had changed could apply.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If he became pensionable three years after discharge, under this bill as it stands to-day he could not obtain insurance?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It would not include any of them.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think the clause should be changed or some regulation should be passed so that such a person could become insurable.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What about I(c)? Does not that cover the point raised by my hon. friend?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is an applicant without dependents; I am referring to II(b), an applicant with dependents.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I(a) should cover it. I may tell my hon. friend that there would have been no difficulty under the old act with that type of case, and I am sure it was intended to cover it in this legislation.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): What would happen to an applicant who is ill on discharge from an illness contracted during service but which was not due to service? He is discharged because of that condition and might be seriously ill when he applies for his insurance. Would he be entitled to insurance?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): 1(b) would cover that.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 14—insurance money unassignable, etc.

Mr. GILLIS: I understand the minister proposed an amendment to schedule B, class IV. What was that amendment?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): To make it apply to those who refuse treatment for conditions arising as a result of immoral conduct.

Mr. MacNICOL: If they accept treatment, they would be insurable?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If they refuse treatment they are not eligible; if they take treatment and still have a disability, they are eligible.

Section 15 agreed to.

On section 16—regulations.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May an applicant have his premium payments deducted from his pension?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I think the application for the payment of insurance should be simplified. We have had several cases in the branch of the Legion to which I belong where widows have almost had to have the deceased fingerprinted and photographed before they could get the insurance. I am not exaggerating, because I still have the correspondence. Surely this procedure could be simplified. It is all right if the widow has some money, but where she has no money to pay for the funeral or feed her children it is a different matter. I know of cases where it has taken five months before the widow could get the insurance. That is altogether too long.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am informed by the officers of the Canadian pension commission that that is being attended to. I may tell my hon. friend that his observations will be carefully followed out.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Did I understand the minister to say to the hon. member for Fraser Valley that premiums could be deducted from pensions?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Without the consent of the insured?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No, with his consent.

Schedule B as amended agreed to.

Mr. GILLIS: The department will take the necessary steps to advertise and publicize this legislation?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think the suggestion is a most excellent one. If this legislation is under my jurisdiction I shall see that it is carried out. If not, I shall see that it is recommended to the particular department.

Bill reported.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

PROVISION FOR PAYMENTS IN RESPECT OF CHILDREN UNDER SIXTEEN

The house resumed from Wednesday, July 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of bill No. 161, to provide for family allowances.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose to deal, I hope in a dispassionate and non-partisan way, with certain phases of the subject of family allowances and the bill which has been introduced; for I believe that no more tremendous or important issue can come before this parliament for the post-war period than the one we are now discussing.

With the objective provided for in this bill there can be no disagreement; for if I understand it aright it means that through this measure an endeavour will be made to achieve equal opportunity, particularly for those in the lower income brackets, and to give many who to-day are denied freedom from fear and freedom from want the hope of something better in the future than this world and this country have seen before. I realize that to achieve these objectives planning must be done now, and with the objectives in mind I agree and in the aim and the purposes that it has, I concur. I realize that plans such as this require a great deal of organization now. If we are to have a dynamic and a workable plan the cooperation of hon. members of all sides is necessary. I repeat that I agree with the objectives of this bill, while criticizing it in some particulars—which I shall deal with in committee—and also raising a question as to the constitutional issue which was dealt with the other day by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent).

The challenge of adventure into new fields of social welfare must not find us discouraged by the difficulties inherent in the British North America Act. We must go forth into new horizons of social justice. To-day the opportunity comes to us as it has come to few men in few generations to take part in the forward march of the common man. I believe that my views and those of most hon. members are to be found in the idealism reflected in a passage of the National Resources Development report for 1943 which was placed before the President of the United States in January of that year. In the words of that report; there must be—> —the fullest possible development of the human personality, in relation to the common good, in a framework of freedoms and rights, of justice, liberty, equality and the consent of the governed.

> As a means of protecting justice, freedom and democracy:
> The three factors—democracy, dynamic economy and peace—never in the history of mankind have been united in a political system.

Changes are taking place and tremendous changes are about to take place. We in the parliaments of the empire to-day must recognize that. The state must guarantee and underwrite equal access to security, to education, to nutrition and to health for all. That assurance is inexorable through the awakening of the spiritual being of man everywhere and the recognition of all men of their responsibilities for the welfare of all other men, not only within their own state but beyond its confines. Too often some of us are afraid to approach new horizons because there has been no experience to guide us. I think it is a significant fact that in 1944 there is not in the governments of Great Britain, of Australia and of Canada and in the cabinet of the United States any man who was born in the present century. In other words there are far too many men in positions of authority without having along with their experience the idealism, the drive, the forcefulness, the initiative and the appreciation of present day conditions which potentially men of the present generation should be able to give to government. My philosophy is that, though I ask no man to follow me in this view, I believe in welcoming change, provided it will be made effective. Too often in this country the dead hand of the past as it is written in the British North America Act has destroyed reforms which ought to have been brought into being for the benefit of the future. The party to which I belong has no reason not to have the reforming dynamic of that of any other party in this house. It was this party which brought in women's suffrage, which coordinated the various railroads under the Canadian National Railways, which brought in the Wheat Board Act of 1935 and the Bank of Canada Act in its inception, and the other legislation of 1935 much of which the government of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) placed before the courts with a view to determining its constitutionality and much of which was declared to be beyond the powers of parliament.

In that connection let me mention that the party led by the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett had the reforming zeal. It brought in the Weekly Day of Rest in Industrial Undertakings Act, the Minimum Wages Act, the Limitations of Hours of Work Act, the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act, the Employment and Social Insurance Act, The Natural Products Marketing Act, and various other measures to which reference need not be made at this time, but many of these acts when submitted to the courts were found to be unconstitutional.

While I have no hesitation in saying that I am going to support the principle of this bill and get behind the carrying into effect of any bill, brought in by any party in this house, which I believe is for the welfare of the people, I reserve to myself the right to place before this house and the people of Canada as a whole my views with respect to this legislation as it is presently constituted. It was said in 1935 by the Prime Minister himself that Mr. Bennett was introducing the legislation that was then brought in for the purpose of getting votes. No one was more persistent in his demand that those acts then brought in should be constitutional than was the Prime Minister of this day. No one spoke in more fulsome tones of the necessity of upholding the constitution of the land than did he. Over and over again, he called upon the government of that day to secure the opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada in respect of that legislation. I am not going to read the provision in question; it is set out in section 55 of the supreme court act, chapter 35, and gives to the government the right to submit questions of law or of fact touching the interpretation of the British North America Act as may be referred by the governor in council to the supreme court for hearing and consideration.

I am going to deal with that phase a little later on because I believe that the Prime Minister, having stated that the operation of the act is not to come in until the 1st of July, 1945, and having denied that there is any ulterior purpose in postponing the date when these payments are to be made, must have some of the fears of the constitutionality of this bill that he expressed in 1935 as to the constitutionality of the measures then introduced. This bill is little different in its operation and effect from and is analogous with the old age pension act. The old age pension act provides for payments to persons of seventy years of age under certain circumstances. This act provides for payments to parents or others having the custody of certain children; the matter of age being of very little importance in the principle at issue. Over and over again the Prime Minister reiterated in this house in 1935, in 1931 and in 1926 that this parliament did not have the power to bring into effect a national old age pension act whereby the dominion would pay total pension without securing an amendment to the British North America Act. My submission is that if the Prime Minister was right then, like principles apply in the interpretation of the present measure.

But before I go on to deal with the constitutional issue, let me refer to one other matter. I want to see this legislation made effective and operative. I want to see brought into parliament legislation that will banish the sense of fear and insecurity among the poor of the country. I want to see legislation when it is introduced which will not only promise a hope on July 1, 1945 but which in 1944 will assure its fulfilment before the election and which will be known to be constitutional and within the powers of parliament.

I do not believe that, because members happen to sit on different sides of the house there is any one of us, regardless of his lifetime of service, who can claim a monopoly of love and affection for the common people. I can look back on my own youth and say that in my opinion most of us can claim to belong to that group honoured by the Prime Minister the other day as the humble poor. We want to see that the standards are elevated. Suggestions have been made by labour that this legislation will be taken advantage of by unfair employers to freeze the level of wages at a low figure by reason of the extra income that will come should this act be put into effect. I believe the parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister said that was not the case in Australia and New Zealand. But the situation there is different from ours. In one case the state is unitary and in the other there is a joint control body over the question of minimum wages. In this country we have nine different minimum boards or controls, wages in one province being lower than in others. I have read a great deal on this subject, and the experience in some countries has been that wages tend to be set at a low level by reason of the fact that a family bonus is in existence. The evidence before the price spreads commission indicated that in this country there is not a fair level of wages from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Nor can there be until the Department of Labour in the federal arena arranges with the provincial departments of labour and cooperates with them to elevate the level right across Canada. My suggestion to the Prime Minister would be that when this conference comes between the government of Canada and the provincial premiers one of the things he should ask for in order to make this act protective of labour is that a common level of wages for like work be established in every province. This matter has been dealt with at considerable length in the province of Quebec where in 1933 a social service commission met and produced one of the best reports on family allowances and the like that can be found anywhere. The findings of the Quebec committee of 1933 indicate that the adoption of family allowances might result in wages being kept down, and it asks in general terms for the adoption of family allowances. Instead of raising the level of wages in that province, which would not permit of competition in industry by that province with other provinces, family allowances, it was suggested, might be the solution. It is a very fair report. What we must insist upon is that while giving an allowance to the individual we must assure him that he receives the same level of wages as others in the dominion who are doing the same type of work, so that he may be enabled to partake of the better things of life.

This report, and I refer particularly to one paragraph, deals clearly with the situation and indicates the reason why various labour leaders have asked for the assurance from the government that family allowances shall not affect wage levels. I am not going to quote what Mr. Buckley or Mr. Millard said, or what Mr. Bengough of the trades and labour congress said, but they indicated the danger that until wages were equalized these bonuses may have the unfair result of freezing wages at a level that would not be sufficient to enable the individual to secure the better things of life. I have no observations to make on this paragraph—it requires none. It places before the country in summarized form the attitude generally by many of the labour leaders of the dominion.

> We may recollect too, that the province of Quebec has an economic system dependent on that of the other provinces, and that an exaggerated rise in salaries would bring local industries into a disadvantageous situation when compared with rival industries in other provinces. The present economic depression has also taught us that the prosperity of nations cannot be contained in watertight compartments and that there is a real interdependence between the economic systems of different countries. If, therefore, on the one hand, the desire is entertained of affording a large family an opportunity of developing according to the will of providence, and if, on the other, it is agreed that our national economic system cannot adjust salaries to fit the needs of a large family the only other choice is to have recourse to the family allowance.

I think that the country as a whole is entitled to have from the Prime Minister the assurance that there will be the establishment of a level of minimum wages across this dominion through cooperation with the provinces to the end that all, regardless of the province from which they come, shall have equal access to that freedom from want which all of us are endeavouring to bring about. I shall deal with that matter later in committee.

I now come to the question of the constitutionality of this measure. Far be it from me to indulge in any argument with so eminent a counsel as the Minister of Justice, but I think it was some years ago that either the Prime Minister or the Leader of the Opposition said that if lawyers did not disagree it would be a strange country in which we live. I am not going to place my humble opinion against that of the Minister of Justice, but I am going to call as my witness the parliamentary assistant to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Claxton) who in 1939 dealt with this problem when he prepared a brief for the dominion government for presentation before the Sirois commission. The question comes up: is this constitutional? I do not think the Prime Minister indicated his view when he introduced the bill; but the mere introduction of the bill suggests his belief in its constitutionality. My leader contended that it was not constitutional, or was doubtful as to whether it was constitutional. I have already referred to the reports regarding old age pensions. Before a committee of parliament in 1925 the whole question of old age pensions was discussed, and the view was expressed following an opinion given by the deputy minister of justice, that old age pensions could not be brought in on a national scale without agreement with the provinces or an amendment to the British North America Act. Then came the case referred to by the Minister of Justice the other evening, the Attorney General of Canada v. Attorney General of Ontario, 1937 Appeal Cases, at page 355. I am going to read one paragraph that the Minister of Justice did not read in its entirety when referring to this case which had to do with the Employment and Social Insurance Act of 1935. Lord Atkin said:

> That the dominion may impose taxation for the purpose of creating a fund for special purposes and may apply that fund for making contributions in the public interest to individuals, corporations or public authorities could not as a general proposition be denied. . . . But, assuming that the dominion has collected by means of taxation a fund, it by no means follows that any legislation which disposes of it is necessarily within dominion competence.

It may still be legislation affecting the classes of subjects enumerated in section 92, and, if so, would be ultra vires. In other words, dominion legislation, even though it deals with dominion property, may yet be so framed as to invade civil rights within the province: or encroach upon the classes of subjects which are reserved to provincial competence.

I am sure that hon. members will respect the opinion of Mr. Cahan, former secretary of state, who gave these ideas on this case on March 1, 1937:

I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether his department, in association with the officials of the Department of Justice, have considered the full bearing of a recent opinion of the judicial committe of the privy council, with regard to a matter such as this. As I read that opinion the privy council have declared it illegal for this parliament to make any appropriation of funds derived from taxation for subject matters over which parliament has not legislative jurisdiction under section 91 of the British North America Act.

All of the matters legislated for in this bill or imposed by it deal with the matter of child welfare, on matters of social service organization and within the competence of the provinces. Then Mr. Cahan says:

That is a wide and sweeping declaration of the judicial committe of the privy council which I believe applies not only to pensions for old age but also to pensions for the blind, and a number of other appropriations aggregating tens of millions of dollars which are annually voted by parliament. In view of that opinion I think the government should take into serious consideration the question whether in voting these tens of millions we are not committing illegal acts which are ultra vires of the parliament of Canada.

That is one opinion. I quote now an opinion from Mr. Brooke Claxton, as he then was, and Mr. L. M. Gouin, as he then was, now a member of the other place. I read from page 20 of the report entitled "Legislative Expedients and Devices Adopted by the Dominion and the Provinces, 1939" I see my time is rapidly coming to an end; therefore I cannot read this quotation at any length. Let me read one portion of it in which Mr. Claxton and Mr. Gouin, dealing with the question of old age pensions, which is analogous to the payment of allowances to children, the only difference being the matter of age, said this:

It can hardly be doubted that the subject of old age pensions falls under the provincial jurisdiction to legislate respecting property and civil rights. That was the opinion given by the Department of Justice and it does not seem to have been challenged.

After quoting from the speech of Lord Atkin before the privy council, they added:

If this is a correct statement of the law, the dominion old age pensions act will be invalid if that act is in itself legislation "affecting the classes of subjects enumerated in section 92" or if the act is "so framed as to invade civil rights within the province; or encroach upon the classes of subjects which are reserved to provincial competence."

Then after dealing with this and others, he said:

For this reason, the holding in the reference justifies Mr. Cahan's apprehension with respect to this act at least, and the act and any similar legislation might be held ultra vires if the question is ever raised.

I cannot go into the various house references of the Prime Minister during the years, particularly in 1926, 1935 and 1936, except to say that on January 21, 1935, at page 49 of Hansard, the right hon. gentleman was explaining why much of the reform legislation which had been referred to in the book "Industry and Humanity" had not been brought in, and went on to use these significant words:

In that view of things will be seen the foundation of Liberal policy on social legislation as well as much else; and if the Liberal party in the federal field, during the time I had the honour to be Prime Minister, did not introduce more in the way of so-called social legislation than it did, it was in the main for two reasons, one of which I have already indicated, namely, that up to the present time, until within the last few weeks, it has been understood that practically all legislation of a social character came exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provinces, the other reason being that we did not know where we should obtain the wherewithal to carry out these policies until we got rid of the cumulative deficits which we had inherited when we assumed office.

The only altered opinion in connection with the legislative competence of parliament was expressed by Mr. Bennett, who said parliament had that power under the treaty obligations of this country.

I should like to give one other reference to support my contention that this legislation should be placed before the supreme court, under the power contained in the Supreme Court Act, before the coming election, so that no one in this country may be deluded by false hopes. In 1935 the Prime Minister made a similar request to mine to-day. He asked that the legislation then introduced be taken before that court, pointing out his reasons for this request; and those reasons apply to-day just as they did then. In stating his reasons for submitting an amendment providing that the question of the validity of the legislation should be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada, at page 1086 of Hansard for 1935 the right hon. gentleman said:

My reason for submitting the amendment is this: While the Prime Minister has intimated that in his own mind he is quite confident the measure is intra vires of this parliament, nevertheless he has come to that opinion only within the last few months. I believe I am right when I state that for years past he has held a different opinion. It is not surprising therefore if many of us are in grave doubt as to the competence of parliament's jurisdiction in the matter, and if we have doubts people throughout the country will have equal doubts. . . . If I thought the suggested amendment would occasion any delay in bringing the legislation into effect, in the event of its being intra vires, I would not suggest the amendment. I am convinced however that my suggestion should not occasion any delay, and I do believe, assuming the legislation to be intra vires, very serious prejudice of its provisions would be thereby prevented. Unquestionably in the minds of the people throughout the country when the measure is assented to there will remain a grave doubt as to its validity. The provinces will have doubts, employers and employees will have doubts and when my right hon. friend proceeds to provide the necessary machinery a critical situation may arise.

I think it is generally conceded that sooner or later this measure will come before the courts for a decision respecting its validity.

The Prime Minister must have had in mind that fine legislation which he drafted in 1907, the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, which did a tremendous lot of good but which, when it finally came before the courts in 1925, was found to be beyond the power of parliament to enact. Then he went on to say:

Should it be declared ultra vires, and the machinery meanwhile were set up with appointments of four or five thousand people made, and all were on a sudden to find themselves without a position, the results would be to say the least unfortunate. It would have, too, a bad effect upon the beneficiaries, the people paying into the fund, and upon the position of industry generally. In these unsettled times, if any further note of uncertainty is thrown into the situation existing between employers and employees, and if any further difficulty is added by way of ascertaining where they stand and what will be expected of them by way of additional taxation and additional burdens to the industries with which they are connected the situation will be made very serious indeed. It is to avoid the possibility of anything of that nature that I offer the amendment in the hope that my right hon. friend will see his way clear to accept it.

I am supporting this legislation because I believe half a loaf is better than no bread; but willing as I am to stand on principle I am asking that he submit this matter to the courts so that sooner or later our people may not find that they have been deceived, if this legislation should be declared to be beyond the powers of parliament. There is nothing unfair in this submission. The supreme court sits here in Ottawa; it is ready to be convened. The Supreme Court Act provides machinery to cover such a contingency. I ask the Prime Minister when he replies to tell us what reason, except the fear that this legislation is unconstitutional, prevents him from submitting this matter at once to the courts of this country. It will not mean holding up the effective date of the legislation, since it does not become effective until July 1, 1945. If the Prime Minister does not do that and this act is found ultra vires after it becomes effective, the reaction throughout this country against those of us who belong to the parties that have existed since confederation will be such as I do not care to envisage. They will contend that when we placed this legislation upon the statute book we knew it was not within the competence of parliament. I ask the Prime Minister what has happened since 1931 to change the opinion he expressed in the House of Commons at that time, which appears at page 750 of Hansard:

I say the British North America Act should be amended so as to make it possible for the federal government to undertake the administration of that scheme. . . .

He was referring to the old age pension scheme. The other day, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice referred to the decision of the privy council, to which I have already made reference. The hon. gentleman was counsel for the Dominion of Canada in connection with that matter, along with the present chief justice of the province of Ontario. And, Mr. Speaker, as I read that judgment, what the Minister of Justice said to the house the other day as to competence of parliament to pass this and like legislation was what he unsuccessfully advocated when he appeared before the privy council.

I am going to support this bill; I care not what others do. I support it because I believe we are living in a changing world. But, with all the sincerity that I can command I am asking the Prime Minister not to deceive these children and parents by allowing parliament to pass an act of which its legislative competence has not been determined.

And I ask this, too: why wait until July 1, 1945? So far as our men in the armed services are concerned, let us immediately, by the necessary amendment to the War Veterans Allowance Act, give to those who have served the additional amount that is promised to them if the act becomes effective on July 1, 1945. We believe that we are approaching the end of this struggle. This bill recognizes that it is necessary that the dependents of service men should receive this extra allowance. Why not now, while they serve? Why a promise of a date so far removed, when we hope, under Providence, that this war will be over?

Supporting the principle of giving aid to those in lower categories, and opportunities which so many of them are denied, I ask that parliament bring into effect—and parliament has the power—a system of scholarships to be effective throughout this whole dominion. Let it be by way of grant, so as to allow young boys and girls of merit and ability to climb the difficult heights so often denied them because of poverty. There are men in this house who came up that way. They are on the government side of the house, and they are on the opposition side of the house. This parliament has an opportunity to do something practical now. Ask for the cooperation of the provinces. Why was this not submitted to the provinces? Why were they not given an opportunity to look into it?—and I speak for no province or no area. All I have said comes as a result of my own personal research. Why the postponement of the conference from week to week and from month to month? Convene it now. Let the provinces see the picture, so that they will realize that unless we lay a foundation now for that new world about which we speak so often, we are going to reap as we have sown, because of our indifference to the problems facing us.

I believe $250,000,000 in all is to be expended. That is $100,000,000 more than is being spent annually throughout the dominion for education, high, intermediate and low. Let nobody say that this bill is something dangled in front of the people, something to be made effective only after an election and in the light of certain eventualities. Make it constitutionally effective now. And if it is not, find out if it is within the competence of this parliament.

We have a terrible responsibility for the post-war period, sir. This parliament should make available moneys by grants to the provinces—and it has the power—to establish health units, hospital units, to set up libraries, to provide for better schools and to establish a system of scholarships. These are things recommended by the committee in Quebec in 1933, a committee with vision. Make it possible to establish low-cost housing. Make it possible, by the expenditure of not much more than this amount, to bring into the homes all across Canada electrical power. Make it possible to establish a new health, educational and general welfare, national and provincial set-up.

That, Mr. Speaker, is all I have to say, with the exception of one concluding quotation from the National Resources Development report, which seems to sum up the whole thing. This report speaks of the change in public opinion during the war. Many social solutions could not have been provided for a few years ago, because people would not have permitted the anticipated expenditures. It is different now.

> This upsurging human personality, even in the terrible grip of war, looks for the new heaven and the new earth within its sight and grasp for the first time. If men of good will cannot unite to find a direction and show the way, men of bad will appear; they will loot the ships of state wrecked by the false lights on the shore.

As a man of good will I appeal to the government to let us know whether or not this measure is constitutional; let us know that it can be carried out and will be carried out. And if it is found ultra vires by the supreme court, then let us by cooperation with the provinces bring in legislation that will elevate the position of the common man.

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, in the first instance may I congratulate the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) upon a portion of his speech. I was impressed, surprised and delighted to hear the commendation which fell from his lips, directed toward the principle and purport of the bill under discussion. In its aims, purpose and objectives the hon. member says he concurs. He agrees that it will open up new horizons of social justice, and that the state must underwrite equal access to nutrition for the people. This and many other statements of the kind are commendation of a kind that is welcomed, both because of its substance, accuracy and truth, and because it reflects the independent stand of the hon. member as compared with that of his leader-at-large and of his leader in the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is no variance in our opinions.

Mr. REID: They are for it and against it.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I will take that up a little later.

Mr. GRAYDON: That will be fine.

Mr. ROEBUCK: It does not make much difference what position the leader of the opposition takes in the house, because if the party ever does take office he will disappear anyway, and somebody else will be in his place.

Mr. REID: And that is a sobering thought.

Mr. ROEBUCK: While I congratulate the hon. member on his freedom of thought, the good will he has expressed, and the commendation he has directed toward the bill, I do not congratulate him upon what he has attempted to do.

May I call attention to the fact that the hon. member for Lake Centre at no time in the full course of his address, mainly on the constitutionality of the measure, had the temerity to state as his own opinion on his responsibility as a lawyer that the measure is unconstitutional. His object throughout was to raise doubt and to ask that this be resolved by some other court than the high court of parliament. Doubts and smokescreens were what he was dealing in, not his own opinion regarding the bill.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What is your opinion?

Mr. ROEBUCK: I will state it before I am through. The hon. gentleman has suggested that this measure which he so highly approves be submitted to the courts, I presume before it is passed by this parliament, or at all events before it is allowed to come into effect. He refers to other legislation passed in 1935 which he thinks is in some way similar and which was referred by the present government to the Supreme Court of Canada. I would like to call his attention to the fact that that legislation was passed in 1935 and the decision of the privy council in England from which he read is dated 1937. In other words, it took two years to obtain a final decision on the legislation to which he referred.

I am wondering whether the real purpose of the suggestion that we refer this matter to the courts is along the line of a number of suggestions I have heard from the other side —something else, some other time; a matter of delay. Two years from now the hon. gentleman may not be a member of this house. No one knows just what two years may accomplish, but I do know that the members on this side believe in this legislation. They are not accepting proposals which defer its operation two, three or more years while the matter is fought out in the courts. The Prime Minister suggested that the legislation of 1935 be submitted to the courts. Why? Because for the main part it was obviously unconstitutional.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If it was obviously unconstitutional how did it come about that the hon. member, representing the province of Ontario on the submission before the privy council, argued that it was not unconstitutional?

Mr. ROEBUCK: The hon. gentleman has asked a very good question. The Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) together with the present chief justice of the supreme court of Ontario, and I all argued in the same direction. We endeavoured to save the Unemployment Insurance Act from a decision of unconstitutionality. Realizing the value of the legislation and the desirability of its immediate enforcement, we put up every argument we knew in order to save the legislation for the people. The fact that we failed resulted in the legislation being deferred for quite a number of years. Our purpose was good, but we were not successful in law. In due season I shall state why we were not successful.

There is nothing mysterious about constitutional questions. They are problems which the ordinary man, untrained in law, can understand. Let it be understood that jurisdiction to pass laws of this or any type lies in one or other of our legislatures, either in the dominion parliament or the provincial legislatures. The authority of these two legislatures in their respective fields is plenary and complete. There is nothing that we cannot pass. The British North America Act exhausts the legislative powers that are possible. Anything that is humanly possible is legally possible in one or other of these legislatures. Lefroy in his "Canada's Federal System", at page 94, said:

> The clauses of the B.N.A. Act relating to the distribution of legislative powers exhaust the whole range of legislative authority, so far, at any rate, as the internal affairs of Canada are concerned, and whatever is not thereby given to the provincial legislatures rests with the dominion parliament.

The inquiry is fairly simple as to whether legislation is within the jurisdictional competence of this house. The first thing that one does is to inquire whether it has been given to the provincial legislatures. If not, then it is within dominion jurisdiction, because of the overriding power of the dominion under the residuary clauses of the British North America Act. It has been argued by my hon. friend that the provisions of this bill may fall within section 92 of the British North America Act, and are therefore within the legislative competence of the provinces. There are only three clauses in the British North America Act which even suggests the possibility that this legislation belongs to the provinces. Subsection 7 of section 92 reads:

> The establishment, maintenance and management of hospitals, asylums, charities, and eleemosynary institutions in and for the province, other than marine hospitals.

The second one is subsection 13:

> Property and civil rights in the province.

The third is subsection 16:

> Generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in the province.

Obviously this legislation is not charity. An eleemosynary institution is defined by Webster as an institution "relating or devoted to charity, to alms, to almsgiving." This legislation is not charity because the payments are of right. Look at section 4 of the bill, which states that the allowance shall be "payable" only after registration of the child, and so on. Section 13, subsection 2 refers to the recovery of undue allowance when an allowance has been paid to a person who was not "entitled" thereto.

One is not "entitled" to charity. Payments are not "payable" to one to whom you are making gifts. That is not charity. This is not an eleemosynary institution, a hospital or anything of the kind. It does not fall within that section of the act.

Then consider property and civil rights—there is no property right and there is no civil right affected in any way by this legislation. The payments are to individuals as of right as between themselves and the Dominion of Canada. No contractual rights are touched, no property rights are in any way interfered with. It does not relate to either. Property and civil rights are for the most part rights of contract, and there are no contractual rights involved in this instance.

My hon. friend has referred to the case of Attorney General of Canada v. the Attorney General of Ontario, which is the last, the most important and the most comprehensive decision on the question of jurisdictional rights in matters of this kind. The case grew out of the legislation brought in by Mr. Bennett's government in 1935. It was referred by a government headed by our present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the Supreme Court of Canada. At that time the dominion was represented in the argument by the late Mr. Justice Rowell, until recently chief justice of Ontario; and for the leading province, the province named in the case, I appeared as the attorney general in person. So that I think I have some right to speak, not authoritatively, but with a certain background of knowledge, in discussing this measure. Few practising lawyers in Canada have had more genuine experience in constitutional matters than have the present Minister of Justice, and may I add in all humility, myself.

Now let us see what Lord Atkin said in the privy council with reference to the unemployment insurance measure:

> There can be no doubt that prima facie, provisions as to insurance of this kind, especially where they affect the contract of employment, fall within the classes of property and civil rights in the province and would be within the exclusive competence of the provincial legislature.

That was the reason that the legislation to which my hon. friend has referred was declared beyond the competence of the dominion parliament. It was because it was insurance legislation and because it interfered with contracts as between employer and employee, adding statutory conditions to the contract of employment. We argued that the matter was of such great general importance that it should be included in the overriding sections of the act, but the court found there was no emergency which took it out of the province's jurisdiction and placed it in that of the dominion. Because it interfered with contracts and insurance, and therefore property and civil rights, it was beyond the competence of this parliament.

What similarity is there between that act, which was declared ultra vires of our parliament, and the one which is before us and which we are now considering? There is no insurance in this bill, none at all. There is no interference as between employer and employee. There is simply a gift by this parliament to some section of its taxpayers. It is not within provincial jurisdiction in any of its aspects.

Is it within the jurisdiction of this parliament? Again, Mr. Speaker, I refer to that very notable decision in England in 1937, Attorney General of Canada v. Attorney General of Ontario. I quote the same great jurist, Lord Atkin, on the subject. He says:

> That the dominion government may impose taxation for the special purpose of creating a fund for special purposes, and may apply that fund for making contributions in the public interests to individuals, corporations or public authorities, could not as a general proposition be denied.

There you have it, appearing in the very decision which counted out Mr. Bennett's legislation because it did infringe provincial jurisdiction. You have the broadest and the clearest statement that legislation such as we have before us to-day and which does none of these things could not as a general proposition be denied.

His lordship pointed out that dominion legislation, although it deals with dominion property, may be so framed—and this is what my hon. friend read—as to invade civil rights within the province. Of course it can. Mr. Bennett did that very thing; but we have not. We have not encroached upon classes of subjects which are reserved to provincial competence. We do none of those things.

It might be held that this legislation is within the competence of this government because of the overriding powers of the dominion for the peace, order and good government of this country. It is not necessary, however, to justify it in that way. If it is not within section 92, the section which gives powers to the provinces, then it does come within the overriding sections, as I have already said.

There are, however, other grounds. Subsection 2 of section 91 gives to the dominion power to raise money by any mode or system of taxation. We are going to do that; we are going to raise money by various modes and systems of taxation and expend it in this way. Then subsection 1 gives to the dominion the power for the disposal of the public debt and property. That is to say, we propose to exercise the right which the act has given to us to dispose of the money which we have raised by any system or method of taxation.

Lefroy, in his work on constitutional law, at page 493, makes this statement:

It would be impossible for parliament to legislate even under its general residuary powers to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada if it was restricted from incidentally affecting property and civil rights in the different provinces.

But we are not even doing that. We have a right to affect property and civil rights, but we have not the right to legislate regarding property and civil rights: I use the language of the act. Take for instance the Canada Temperance Act, which was held within the powers of this legislature. It was because it was in the public interest, and necessary—so they thought at that time—for the peace, order and good government of Canada, to preserve public order and safety.

I could refer to a long list of decisions of the courts, all perfectly clear, all perfectly logical. Let me take a typical one: Workmen's Compensation Board v. the Canadian Pacific Railway. The act was declared to be unconstitutional because it attached terms to contracts of employment and because it sought to impose contractual details as between employers and employees. There is none of that in this act.

I rather regret the position taken by the member for Lake Centre because I have always looked upon him as a good lawyer. In the past there have been some very good lawyers on the Conservative side of the house. I need only mention Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Robert Borden, Hon. C. H. Cahan, to whom my hon. friend has referred, and Lord Bennett. Those of these gentlemen who have passed to their reward, had they heard the Conservative party in this house to-day attacking this bill as unconstitutional, would have turned in their graves. They would have been astonished to find the Conservative party committing itself to legal propositions of that kind.

[Mr. Roebuck.]

My hon. friend quoted Mr. Bennett. Let me do the same. In the House of Commons debates on May 5, 1936, as reported at page 2848 of Hansard, Mr. Bennett said:

It does not require a parliament at Westminster to pass a statute to confer upon this parliament jurisdiction to deal with its own revenue.

Of course it does not. My hon. friend has referred to statements made by the Hon. C. H. Cahan, at one time member for St. Lawrence-St. George. Mr. Cahan was a very good lawyer indeed with a very high standing. It seems remarkable that St. Lawrence-St. George should send so many distinguished representatives to this house. Mr. Cahan, referring to the unemployment insurance case before the privy council in 1937, which we have had under discussion, and at page 2576 of Hansard, on April 5, 1936, questioned the possibly serious effects of a judgment which limited at all the right of this parliament in the expenditure of its own money. The court in England had said that the dominion parliament could not use its money for the purpose of infringing the legislative authority of the provinces, and it was that proposition which the Hon. C. H. Cahan was attacking in this house, because he thought that the jurisdiction of this parliament, under the British North America Act, was wider still than the judgment of the privy council—not narrower, as my hon. friend would have it be. He said:

This opinion, if it is valid, raises grave doubt as to the validity of appropriations by this dominion parliament of current revenues for such objects as old age pensions, unemployment relief, or for giving assistance to provincial undertakings of any description. If these appropriations are illegal and beyond the competence of the dominion, grave consequences may follow.

I join with him in that statement, and much more so were the legal propositions advanced by the opposition in connection with this bill sound law. The gravest consequences might follow. I shudder at the implications of the legal philosophy which we have heard across the floor of the house.

If it is illegal to give money to parents for the benefit of children, as is suggested, then it is unconstitutional also to build houses for families including children, and our whole housing legislation is unconstitutional, beyond the power of this parliament, and may be set aside.

The Old Age Pensions Act is threatened. My hon. friend has had the temerity to link these two acts together and to say that if the Old Age Pensions Act were in some way unconstitutional then so must this be. That is wrong. But if this is unconstitutional, then the Old Age Pensions Act is unconstitutional. The Old Age Pensions Act has features which this does not possess.

Votes for the department of health, for the control of disease, are unconstitutional if this is unconstitutional. What about bonuses to agriculture which we have been giving to individuals all across the Dominion of Canada? Does my hon. friend argue that we have not power in this legislature to grant those bonuses?

Somebody has said that the encroachments of the dominion government upon provincial jurisdiction would reduce the provinces to the status of county councils. Let me tell you, were the legal philosophy that we have heard expressed this day sound, this parliament would have a lame jurisdiction. Parliament would not have the power of a municipal council to expend its own money for the benefit of its own taxpayers.

Mr. MARTIN: Grants in aid of technical education.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Yes, of course—technical education and vocational education.

An hon. MEMBER: And unemployment insurance.

Mr. ROEBUCK: And unemployment insurance, the Canada highway act, whereby we have granted millions; farm and fishery loans; the unemployment relief act, under which we have expended hundreds of millions of dollars—all that falls by the same logic as does the act before the house to-day. The very comparison shows that the contention is absurd.

What a mess my friends have got themselves into constitutionally in this argument! At present we are allowing income tax payers to deduct $108 per child from their taxes as a child allowance. Now the pith and substance of that legislation would not be altered were we to charge these people their full income tax and later return money to them by way of an allowance on behalf of the child. The pith and substance would be exactly the same. The constitution of Canada, Mr. Speaker, does not make a distinction between rich and poor, as apparently does the opposition in the House of Commons. If it is ultra vires to pay children's allowances to parents whose income is below $1,200 per year, then I say it is equally ultra vires to give allowances to parents whose income is over $1,200 per year. And if that is so, then the income tax act of this parliament is unconstitutional, and should be declared so by the courts.

I have not heard the hon. member for Lake Centre proposing that we refer all those acts and all the legislation upon the statute books of Canada which is on a par with this act—I say, I have not heard him proposing that all this legislation be referred to the courts for a decision the tenor of which we know in advance. The courts of this country are busy institutions. We have no right to impose upon them tasks which are not bona fide or to ask them to resolve doubts that do not exist.

It has been suggested by the leader of the opposition—it is so indefinite that it is hard to put your finger on it—that family allowances be geared up in some way to individual needs. Apparently that is the suggestion of a bill which he would like to introduce were he in power, a bill to give children's allowances geared up to individual needs. I suppose he would send thousands of ladies with spectacles and long noses to inquire into the private family affairs of the people of this dominion.

Mr. GRAYDON: Section 5 does that.

Mr. ROEBUCK: No, it does not, not by a good deal. It only prevents abuse of the act; but my hon. friend suggests that he poke his unwelcome nose—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Tory nose.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Tory nose, yes, into ten thousand homes inquiring, as a means test, into how much money they have, or how much salary is earned by the bread-winner. Well, I do not like it. I am sorry to point out to him that if the hon. member for Lake Centre is a good lawyer, then that, too, would be unconstitutional. As a matter of fact there is nothing suggested from the other side of the house that is constitutional if their theory of law is right. It is all unconstitutional, and we had better fold our tent like the Arab and quietly steal away. We are no longer a parliament able to dispose of our own revenue by giving it back to our own taxpayers.

However, there is this to be said—I have already referred to it—it is not to the leader of the opposition that one looks for authoritative statements of policy, but to the leader of the party.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Who is he?

Mr. ROEBUCK: I do not know.

Mr. CASSELMAN: You will when the election comes.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I have read something in the newspapers about it. A convention may lay down general principles with regard to legislation, and from the speeches of leading members of a party you may get the drift of public opinion within that party; but when you want to know what legislation would be introduced by a party in opposition should it take office, you go to the statements of the leader; because it is the leader who has the power, when the party takes office, to implement his promises, not the leader of the opposition. The present leader of the opposition, therefore, does not count. He may look upon himself as a John the Baptist, but as a matter of fact he is a voice in the wilderness, a reed shaken by the wind.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Forty years, too.

Mr. ROEBUCK: A better simile would be the tadpole which disappears when the butterfly appears. Therefore if you would find out what the Conservative party stands for, do not go to John the Baptist—

Mr. MARTIN: He lost his head.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Yes. The analogy is good. No; go to the butterfly who flits about this Dominion of Canada attending afternoon teas, picnics and banquets with a carpet-bag.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Milking cows.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Milking cows, yes, crowding the overcrowded trains, when he is not speculating in farm lands. That is the man to whom you go to find out where the Conservative party stands and what the Conservative party will do should it take office, and should it be so fortunate and should the Dominion of Canada be so unfortunate as to have it take office.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I turn to an amazing statement made by Mr. John Bracken on June 24, 1944. He said:

> The plan has all the earmarks of a political bribe.

Ugly words; very ugly words.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What did McTague say?

Mr. ROEBUCK: McTague does not count. It is the butterfly that decides the policy so far as the party is concerned. Neither McTague, the leader of the opposition nor the hon. member for Lake Centre decides the policy. Mr. John Bracken used these ugly words with reference to this measure. In doing that I suggest to this house that he has definitely and irretrievably set himself in opposition to family allowances; because I take it, Mr. Speaker, that this gentleman would not himself be a self-confessed briber of the public. Therefore it is settled for good and all that the Conservative party under the leadership of Mr. John Bracken is irretrievably opposed to family allowances and will make no promises or approaches to family allowances at least prior to the coming election.

Mr. GRAYDON: You cannot read that into the statement.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Yes, I can.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is your own inference, then.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Let me give you some more of the statement. I again quote from the statement of June 24. Mr. Bracken says:

> It is time we asked ourselves when this—

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say to my hon. friend that he is picking out different points of Mr. Bracken's statement; I ask that he read the whole statement, now that he has commenced to read it. We know that he is setting himself up as a comedian, and we have enjoyed it very much, but I think we should at least get down to business.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman may make his own quotations.

Mr. CASSELMAN: His time is up.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am asking that the full statement be read.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I presume the leader of the opposition knows the statement by rote. He must have memorized it because Mr. John Bracken is his leader. He should not require me to read to him what John Bracken said.

Mr. GRAYDON: I know what it is; I want the house to know. I want my butterfly friend to read it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He is not here.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I would not impose such an injustice on the house as to read the chaff that comes from the gentleman who leads the Conservative party.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are afraid.

Mr. CASSELMAN: You have exceeded your time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ROEBUCK: May I have the time of these interruptions credited to me?

Mr. CASSELMAN: You are past your time already.

Mr. GRAYDON: He thought he was at a garden party; he was being the comedian, that is all.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Let me read—

Mr. GRAYDON: It is time for garden parties anyway.

Mr. ROEBUCK: This is what Mr. Bracken said. I know it hurts hon. members, but let me read it:

> It is time we asked ourselves when this legal bribery of the electorate is going to be stopped.

He is referring to family allowances as legal bribery of the electorate. Therefore I take it that even when this bill passes and becomes law, and administrative machinery is provided by this government, should Mr. Bracken take office, the act will be repealed.

Mr. GRAYDON: We will make a workable act.

Mr. ROEBUCK: There is no doubt about it; that is the assurance—

Mr. GRAYDON: We will make a workable act for the children.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I rise to a point of order. May I ask if the leader of the opposition has any more privileges to interrupt than any other hon. member?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He is the official interrupter.

Mr. GRAYDON: On the point of order, may I say that I think I have the same rights as the hon. member for Brantford City.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I grant that.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member has made many statements in his speech this afternoon upon which I could have raised a question of privilege, but I knew he was attempting to be the comedian of the party on this occasion and I did not want to interrupt him. But I say if he attempts to be provocative in the future as he has been to-day I shall have to rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no point of order. The hon. member's time expired at half past four, but he has been interrupted several times in the last few minutes. I gave the hon. member for Lake Centre at least five minutes extra in order that he might conclude his remarks, and I think it only fair to do the same thing for the hon. member for Trinity.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then let him get down to business.

Mr. ROEBUCK: It is I who should raise the point of order because of the very disrespectful remarks of the leader of the opposition. When I am making the most serious case possible he referred to me as a comedian, and threatened that if I proceeded to make points which he did not like he would do something about it.

Mr. GRAYDON: I wanted you to talk about the children of Canada.

Mr. ROEBUCK: The issue is joined. Those who would confine children's allowances to the children of parents who are well enough off to pay income tax will vote for Mr. Bracken. Those whose sympathies are broad enough to include the children of the poor as well as those of the well-to-do and rich undoubtedly will support the government now in office, which is placing this splendid measure upon the statute book.

Now, have I exceeded my time, Mr. Speaker? I will not proceed unless the house gives me the privilege.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I want to point out that this is not a bribe, because the beneficiaries are children who do not vote, and the fathers and mothers who will have the responsibility of expending the money are promising nothing in return. It is therefore not bribery. Furthermore he would be a bold man indeed, or a very biased partisan, who could find corruption in a bill to supply clothes and shoes and better food to the children of this country.

This bill has been attacked on the floor of this house as a hurried measure, brought in on the spur of the moment, and so forth. To my own knowledge this measure has been in the mind of the Prime Minister for at least twenty-five years.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman says this measure was referred to to-day as hurried, and not properly prepared. Apparently the hon. gentleman is reading from a speech he prepared for delivery some other day, because I made no such statement to-day and I am the only one who has spoken.

Mr. ROEBUCK: If the hon. gentleman denies having made those statements I am very glad to accept his apology, but it has been said by others. Twenty-five years ago on August 7 I was present at a great convention. I have here a report of the statements made on that occasion by the present Prime Minister advocating an adequate system of insurance against unemployment, sickness, dependence in old age and other disabilities, which would include old age pensions, widows' pensions and maternity benefits, all of which he said should be instituted by the federal government together with "effective legislation for the conservation of human life and health." Twenty-five years later, I find the speaker who addressed us so eloquently at the time advocating in almost the same words the same type of legislation, springing from the same principles of humanity, justice and public welfare.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I know my good friend the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) will forgive me if I do not try to follow his argument. He had a very happy time setting up straw men and then knocking them down; but I would point out that he and many of his colleagues are in grave danger of being chased right out of this house by this "Bracken butterfly" of whom he speaks so glibly. That same "Bracken butterfly" has served as a premier in Canada for more years than any other living Canadian, and will be a premier again for many years to come.

I propose to spend my time in dealing with this bill, and at the outset let me say that I intend to support the measure. I do so in the hope that it will benefit Canadian children and Canadian parents, thereby benefiting the Canadian nation as a whole. I think of the hundreds of thousands of young Canadians in the forces, and the other thousands who have served in the forces but have been discharged. I believe the destiny of Canada is in the hands of these young men and women, and it is of vital importance that they be enabled to establish homes and rear families. This bill should help to bring about that result; if it does not do so, I suggest that we must go much farther and enact other measures which will enable our young men and women coming out of the forces to establish homes and bring up families in this land. Perhaps other methods might have been adopted. I am not so sure that the objectives sought to be reached in this bill might not have been attained in other and more practical ways, but that is now beside the point. The bill has been brought down; the ministry stand behind it as their method of meeting the problem, and the house is faced with the acceptance or rejection of this measure.

I propose, however, to suggest certain changes which I think would greatly improve this measure. Many supporters of the government have spoken during this debate, but very few suggestions for improvements have come from them. The tendency has been rather to quote extracts from "Industry and Humanity", that book by a young author, W. L. Mackenzie King, and to sound paeans of praise for what the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his party have done in the way of introducing security measures in Canada.

It is all rather amusing, to see this sudden conversion to the advocacy of reform measures. I was elected to the House of Commons in 1935, and attended my first session in 1936. That, of course, was about a year after Mr. Bennett's government had passed its reform legislation. The first step taken by this government was to scuttle the Bennett reform measures; and it was done most effectively. Then, after much prodding, coaxing and pleading, one step was taken toward social security, and that was the passing in 1940 of the Unemployment Insurance Act. That happened between four and five years after this government took office. And now, after a lapse of another four years, we have another security measure. I hope we shall not have to wait until 1948 for the next one.

In the meantime there has been dismal failure in connection with other measures. Let us, for instance, take the atttiude of the government in regard to old age pensions. We have had to plead with the ministry to take some steps; and even yet very little has been done. The government should have gone much farther in helping the old age pensioners of Canada.

Then, what about health insurance? We were led to believe last year that a health insurance measure was shortly to be placed upon the statute books of Canada. Well, a committee was set up, and a draft health insurance bill was placed before it; not even having the endorsement of the government, but simply presented by a department of the government. That bill was considered all last session, and this year we have had the same procedure. Another bill has been thrown to that special committee—known as the committee on social security—and has been mulled over. But we are to provide for no health insurance in Canada at this session.

Let us see how this social security committee has functioned. It was set up early in the session of 1943. We all had great hopes of what it could accomplish. The resolution appointing the committee was in these words:

> Resolved that a select committee of this house be appointed to examine and report on a national plan of social insurance, which will constitute a charter of social security for the whole of Canada, and to that end, to examine and study the existing social insurance legislation of the parliament of Canada and of the several provincial legislatures; social insurance policies of other countries; the most practicable measure of social insurance for Canada, including health insurance, and the steps which will be required to effect their inclusion in a national plan; the constitutional and financial adjustments which will be required for the achievement of a nationwide plan of social security.

There was a grand plan, and we had reason to expect that something very much worthwhile would result from the sittings of the committee. I believe it has done good work; but there is still no such thing as a charter of social security for Canada. The performance has fallen far short of the promise.

In the speech from the throne this year we find another promise which has not been implemented. This is the paragraph:

When suitable agreements are reached with the provinces, my ministers will be prepared to recommend measures to provide for federal assistance in a nation-wide system of health insurance, and for a national scheme of contributory old age pensions on a more generous basis than that at present in operation.

The session is drawing to an end. There is absolutely no hope now of any such measure being passed, and there have not been any provisions made for a conference between provincial and dominion representatives. I repeat, therefore, that there seems to have been a sudden conversion on the government side of the house to the advocacy of reform measures. I hope the conversion is genuine, and not just an attempt to outbid the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. If it is such an attempt, then I warn the ministry that they are tackling an impossible task.

Mr. GRAYDON: The kiss of death.

Mr. GREEN: I now come to the suggestions in connection with the bill. The first has to do with the men and women in the fighting forces, also those who have been discharged from the forces, and with pensioners of the last war. There is some reference to these Canadians in section 8 of the bill, a section which provides against duplication in allowances, and also for the reduction or withholding of allowances. The provision is that there may be a reduction or withholding of the allowance payable—

. . . to any person receiving aid from the government of Canada or any province for the maintenance of a child in respect of whom the allowance is payable under this act, provided that such reduction or withholding shall not be made by reason of a pension under the Pension Act or dependents' allowance payable in respect of a dependent child of a member of the naval, military or air forces of Canada.

Then section 3 of the bill provides that no allowance shall be paid under the measure until July 1, 1945. I point out to the Prime Minister that these young men who have been serving in our forces, those who have served and have been discharged, and those pensioned from the last war should be paid at once. I can see no reason why they should not receive their allowances, without waiting until July 1, 1945. I realize that in respect of civilians who have not been in the forces it will be necessary to have registration, to set up records and the like. But in all these other cases, those men and women to whom I have referred, the government has full and accurate records including birth certificates for the children, and I can see no reason for the delay.

Further, many of these people are in great need. For instance, the young wife in Vancouver whose husband is overseas now finds it almost impossible to get a home. We hear some talk about the government's building war-time houses for the dependents of men overseas. There is certainly a great need to help soldiers' families in Canada. Provision should be made to let them have their allowances now, without waiting until July 1, 1945.

I was somewhat disturbed by a press dispatch which appeared in the local papers of July 18, and which purported to be the report of an interview with officials in the Prime Minister's office and in the office of the Minister of Finance. What disturbed me most was this reference to the men of the forces:

One of the reasons that payment of the allowances will not start until July of next year is that the government hopes by that time "Canadian soldiers will be home."

That looks as though it is the hope of the government that it will not have to pay these allowances to the dependents, at all. Then the dispatch goes on to say:

The soldier's wife receives the allowance in addition to all other benefits, and if the troops still are overseas next July "she will be very well off financially," said officials.

I hope the government will go right ahead and make these payments now to the dependents of members of the armed forces, to those who have been discharged and to pensioners of the last war.

Another weakness in the act in regard to the men and women of the armed forces is the fact that children of Canadian fighting men living in England receive no allowance. I have not the figures about the number of Canadians who have married overseas, but I believe it is between 20,000 and 25,000.

Mr. CLAXTON: The bill provides for payments to these children on their becoming residents of Canada.

Mr. GREEN: I think that is where the bill is wrong. These children may not be brought to Canada for several years. I suggest that their parents are just as much entitled to the payment of these allowances as are parents in Canada. I ask the Prime Minister to give very careful consideration to this suggestion. Some of our men have been in Great Britain for between four and five years and some of them have two or three children. These soldiers, sailors and airmen have no source of income beyond their pay and allowances, and I see no reason why they should not receive payments in respect of their children even though the children may be in Great Britain.

The second suggestion has to do with the concern of organized labour about this bill. Organized labour fears that the payment of these allowances will tend to keep wages down. Many of the most responsible labour leaders in the country say that the first concern of this nation should be to see that every Canadian who wants to work can get work and at a decent wage, at a wage sufficient to enable him to maintain himself and family in a proper way. Any government of Canada must recognize that that is a statement of actual fact. From now on that is one of the most important objectives that any government can keep before it. There is a fear that this objective may be lost sight of; that the payment of family allowances will detract attention from the main objective of organized labour. I think those fears are well founded. Why would it not be possible to insert a provision in the bill to provide that family allowances are not to be taken into account in the setting of wages? I do not know just how it could be done, but it certainly could be done in the case of dominion government contracts. I suggest to the Prime Minister that he have his officials give consideration to inserting a section in the bill to the effect that these allowances are not to be taken into account in the setting of wages.

The third suggestion has to do with mothers' allowances. At the present time these are paid by the provincial governments. We have had provision in British Columbia for the payment of mothers' allowances for many years. They have proved most helpful but they are pitifully small. As I read section 8 of the bill it gives the government power to refuse to pay these family allowances where a mother's allowance is being paid by the province. That may or may not be the intention of the section, but it is open to that interpretation. I submit that children whose mothers receive mothers' allowances should receive these family allowances just the same as any other children. In our province the mother must be a widow, so that it would mean that there is no bread-winner. Such a family would very clearly be entitled to assistance.

The fourth suggestion has to do with the bill itself. It contains sixteen sections covering about four and a half pages. I must admit that I expected a bill of about one hundred pages and several hundred sections. I think if the proper thing had been done we would have had that kind of bill. This bill gives this house and the Canadian people only half the story. The bill is simply a framework; it is a skeleton bill. Practically all the details are left to regulations. I consider that a bad feature of the bill. I would refer, for example, to section 3, which commences with these words:

> Subject as provided in this act and in regulations.

That is the section covering the payment of the allowances. Surely this house and the country are entitled to know exactly the conditions under which payments are made. The details should be given in this section. We find much the same in section 4, subsection 1, which reads:

> The allowance shall be payable only after registration of the child, and shall commence in the first month after registration, and shall be payable to a parent in accordance with regulations or to such other person as is authorized by or pursuant to the regulations to receive the same.

I think this house is entitled to know to whom and under what conditions the money is to be paid. It is not good legislation to have a blanket provision for regulations. We find the same thing in section 5 which provides:

> The allowance shall be applied by the person receiving the same exclusively towards the maintenance, care, training, education and advancement of the child, and, if the minister or such officer as is authorized by regulations in that behalf is satisfied that the allowance is not being so applied, payment thereof shall be discontinued or made to some other person or agency.

Who is to be given that power? This house should know and the country should know. It should not be left to regulations. We find a similar provision in section 6, which provides for appeal, and which reads:

> If any person is dissatisfied with a decision as to his right to be paid an allowance or as to the amount of an allowance payable to him or as to any other matter arising under this act, he may appeal against such decision to a tribunal to be established and conducted in accordance with regulations, and the decision of the tribunal shall not be subject to appeal or review by any court of law.

In other words, this tribunal has the first and last say; yet we have no idea what type of tribunal it is to be. We do not know whether sittings will be held in British Columbia and in the maritimes or whether they will all be held in Ottawa. We do not know whether it will be a travelling tribunal. We are given absolutely no details in the bill. I suggest to the Prime Minister that that is not right. The house and the country should have these details.

There are several other sections where the same procedure is followed. Perhaps they are not as important as the ones I have quoted, but in section 2, which is the definition section, we find:

(c) "institution" shall have such meaning as may be prescribed in the regulations.

Then the definition of "maintains", which is an important word, is:

(d) "maintains" means maintains wholly or substantially, and "substantially" shall have such meaning as may be prescribed in the regulations.

Registration, which is also important, is defined as follows:

(g) "registration" means registration pursuant to section four of this act and regulations.

Section 8, subsection 2, which I referred to a few minutes ago, deals with the reduction or withholding of the allowance; there, again, provision is made for regulations; and in section 11 we have a whole series of powers which are to be exercised through regulations. Some of these powers should be set out by adding sections to the bill. Take, for example, section 11, paragraph (a) which gives power by regulations to—

Provide generally or in respect of any province or any class of cases that payment shall be made to the parent prescribed in the regulations.

That paragraph is very poorly worded; it is hard to tell what it does mean. It looks as though it might mean that different provisions could be made for different provinces; if that is to be the case it should be set out in the bill and not left to regulations.

The very fact that the bill is so short and that so much is left to the regulations shows that the details of the measure have not been carefully thought out in spite of the delay in introducing it. It was mentioned in the speech from the throne; yet we have had to wait until the dying days of the session to get the bill itself. These details should have been included in the bill and in that way placed before parliament and the public. I suggest to the Prime Minister that at least some of these details may yet be included in the bill. You see, Mr. Speaker, regulations are seldom discussed in parliament. That means that the press and people are given very little chance to study them or to understand what they are, and more important still, are given very little chance to make suggestions for improvements.

I would cite the Old Age Pensions Act and the regulations thereunder. The act, I think, is a very good one; most of the difficulties have arisen because of the regulations; that is where injustices have been done to old age pensioners. Yet those regulations never come before parliament before they are passed; the light of day never gets on to them. As a result, in many cases they do not represent public opinion in Canada.

I suggest also that a small committee of this house be set up to review the proposed regulations before they come into effect. The work might be done during the recess, or it might not be too late if a small committee attended to this matter at the next session of the house.

My fifth suggestion is that conferences should be held about this measure with the provincial governments. Not only with them; some representatives of the dominion should confer also with typical municipal governments and with school boards. It would be impossible of course, to confer with all those minor governmental bodies, but I think some helpful suggestions would be obtained if there were conferences with typical municipal bodies, school boards and also welfare agencies across the country. We have in all parts of Canada some very efficient welfare agencies; in my own province of British Columbia there are many excellent organizations of this kind, and they are full of ideas with regard to such things as family allowances. I am sure the government would get help by conferring with these various bodies. The legislation will prove successful only if there is the closest cooperation with them.

My sixth and final suggestion is that care must be taken that family allowaces are not used as an excuse to keep the income tax exemption figure for a married man down to $1,200. If the exemption is raised it will mean that more families will be eligible for the family allowance, and there may be a tendency on that account to keep the income tax exemption at $1,200. I believe that one of the first steps to be taken by a government should be to raise that exemption. Relief from taxation is one of the most important steps which can be taken to help Canadian people by and large to get and to stay on their feet during the post-war period.

These are the suggestions I make to the Prime Minister and the government, and I hope that some consideration will be given to them before the bill is finally passed.

There has been a good deal of political bickering about this bill. That, of course, is very difficult to avoid in connection with any bill. But if we look at this question in a sensible light, which I am sure all hon. members can do, it cannot be disputed that no one member of this house has a heart which is very much larger or very much smaller than that of any other hon. member, and that no one party or group have more concern for the welfare of the children of Canada than any others. The love of children is one of the strongest and noblest instincts in man or woman. If we keep these facts in mind and cooperate with each other in trying to make this measure a success, I believe we can hope to do what is set out in the resolution with which the bill was introduced, namely:

> . . . ensure a greater measure of well-being to the children of the nation and . . . help gain for them a closer approach to equality of opportunity.

If we keep those words in mind, perhaps we can reach that objective.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My attention has just been called to a statement made by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) last evening in my absence, when he said that I had made a speech which had been written for me. The rules of this house prevent me from castigating the member in the language I would like to use.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BRUCE: I shall have to content myself with saying that the charge as made is malicious and entirely untrue, and—

Mr. CLEAVER: I rise to a point of order—

Mr. BRUCE: —and unworthy of a member of this house, and I ask the hon. member to retract it unequivocally.

Mr. CLEAVER: My point of order is this. As I understand the rules, my hon. friend's sole right is to deny that anyone else wrote his speech; and the word "malicious" is highly unparliamentary.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): So is the word "untrue".

Mr. CLEAVER: I resent it. It was not maliciously said. I believed and honestly believed that somebody else had written the speech. My hon. friend has been in public life for many years. If he wrote it himself, why did he not deliver it himself without—

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Speaker, I am quite capable of writing my own speeches, and I ask the hon. member to retract what he said.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. CLEAVER: The rules say that a member must not read a speech. I refer to rule 293.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, surely the hon. member has done enough harm to the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce), without going farther with it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce), as is his right, has risen on a question of privilege with regard to a statement made by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) last evening. That statement, as I understood it, was that he had read his speech but that it was written by someone else. The hon. member is now denying that it was written by someone else. I do say, though, that he should not use the word "malicious" or impute malice in respect of the statement made by the hon. member for Halton.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Or "untrue".

Mr. CLEAVER: Withdraw.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I also suggest, with deference, that the word "untrue" is unparliamentary. The proper words are, "not in accordance with the facts".

Mr. SPEAKER: That is a matter of words. The intention, I think, is plain. The hon. member says that his speech was not written by anyone else but was written by himself. But the word "malicious" should not have been used.

Mr. CLEAVER: I ask that the word "malicious" be withdrawn.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member for Halton is trying to add insult to injury so far as the member for Parkdale is concerned, and I suggest that the matter ought now to be dropped.

Mr. GOLDING: On a point of order, it is hardly fair that the leader of the opposition should make that statement. You yourself, Mr. Speaker, have stated that the word which was used by the member for Parkdale is unparliamentary and suggested that it be withdrawn. I think it should be withdrawn.

Mr. BRUCE: I think it served my purpose and I withdraw the word "malicious".

I should like to refer, on a question of privilege, to a statement made by the parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister (Mr. Claxton), in which, on page 5395 of Hansard, he challenges the statement that I made in regard to the attitude of the British government toward family allowances. I will not read what he said, but he referred to certain misquotations appearing in some papers, and the inference would be that I had used those misquotations and therefore made a wrong statement. The hon. member in quoting from the British parliamentary debates of February 16, 1943, what Sir John Anderson had said, neglected to read the portion directly preceding the words he read into the record. So that the record may be straight—

Mr. CLAXTON: I never read any words into the record.

Mr. BRUCE: Page 5395, at the bottom of the page.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This was page 1667 of the British Hansard. I have it here.

Mr. BRUCE: I have the British Hansard, but I am speaking of the Canadian Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am asking the hon. member for the reference to the speech of Sir John Anderson in the British Hansard.

Mr. BRUCE: I have here a copy of volume 386, No. 30, for February 16, and I was saying, when interrupted, that the hon. member neglected to read the immediately preceding paragraph which dealt with the subject. I think that in order to keep the matter straight that should be read.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Which paragraph?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This is hardly a question of privilege. The hon. member, as I understand, has not implied that he has charged the hon. member for Parkdale with something which was wrong and improper. I did not gather that from his remarks. There is no question of privilege.

Mr. BRUCE: The inference is that I gave a wrong interpretation of Sir John Anderson's speech. I maintain that I did not give a wrong interpretation of that speech, and in order to prove that, I should like to read a few words from the immediately preceding paragraphs of Sir John Anderson's speech.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has stated his position. He is making a statement that, in my opinion, does not constitute a question of privilege. I have allowed him to make his statement, but I do not think he should go farther.

Mr. BRUCE: Sir John Anderson says: "I come—"

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think the hon. gentleman has stated his position at sufficient length.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Speaker, in the same connection I should like to refer to the statement made by the member for Edmonton East (Mrs. Casselman) when she spoke over the radio two nights ago and used these words—it all has to do with the same thing.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member proposes now, on the floor of the house, to discuss a speech made by another hon. member over the radio, and he cannot do that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I protest that the hon. gentleman is endeavouring to create the impression that the quotation of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) and the quotation of the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mrs. Casselman) are inaccurate. I have in my hands a copy of the British Hansard and every word that they quoted was absolutely accurate—every sentence, every comma, every line.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is not fair either.

Mr. BRUCE: That is true, but they did not read enough. Since the hon. member has referred to the speech made by the hon. member for Edmonton East, I submit that I am in order in referring to what she said.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the incident must be considered closed.

Mr. L. P. PICARD (Bellechasse): We all remember the incident in Roman history when two armies about to engage in battle decided to entrust their fate to the strength and valour of an equal number of men, called respectively the Horatii and the Curatii, rather than have the two armies slaughter one another. At this advanced stage of the session that example might well have been followed by the different parties in this house. As far as I am concerned, I would be willing to let the matter stand for our side on the masterful speech delivered, when he introduced the measure, by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King); the other parties might have selected each a spokesman to present their viewpoint, and after their remarks had been replied to, the debate could have been closed. I would gladly have accepted such a proposal and, I trust, few members would have opposed it; but as things stand at the moment, after the unbridled flow of words we have heard during the past few days, I have fewer scruples as I rise to go on record on such an important measure.

At the outset I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) on the broad outlook he took when he treated the question, and I would direct the same remarks to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). Had the other members of their party adopted the same attitude, perhaps I would not have had to make the remarks I intend to make on this occasion.

To my mind, Tuesday was a very important day in the history of our political parties. The cleavage between the attitude, the mentalities and the tendencies of the parties was shown more clearly than ever. However, I cannot agree entirely with the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) that it was the first time that we had seen the real difference between the two parties, because I cannot see any possibility that the party led and inspired by the Prime Minister could be assimilated to a party characterized by the tendencies and views of Mr. Bennett, of Mr. Manion, of the present hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), of Mr. Meighen, of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), and of the last leader—by the way what is his name, I have forgotten—that is right—the forgotten man. We hear his voice, but it comes from nowhere. You do not see him when you look where he is supposed to be. He is the absent leader, or rather the absentee leader, the worst case of absenteeism we have in Canada; while at the moment we are blaming the war workers for absenteeism, he is giving the worst example of absenteeism from the line of duty.

Like all spirits, he cannot be seen, but sometimes he can be heard. Like spirits he is sometimes heard through a medium. Sometimes it is the medium McTague, another absentee with powerful lungs. Sometimes if we peel the veil from the medium we find it is the body of our hon. friend, the leader in the house, who speaks for the absent leader. The unseen leader speaks oftentimes through the medium of the press, and that is what he did in this particular case. We have his statement and from that statement we can clearly see that he does not approve the measure, although at the end of last year he expressed his views on the policy to be followed if he headed a government of this country. Those views were contained in fourteen points. The attitude of his party in respect of this measure comes in conflict with at least three of those famous points. The third point says that "it is the right of every individual to be rewarded not on the basis of equal pay for all, but on a basis which recognizes the values of the service given." I think that applies to a father of a large family whose work may be the same as that of another man and who may be paid accordingly, but whose services to the nation in providing human capital is not rewarded in any way. They will be rewarded by this measure.

Point 7 of the fourteen points says:

> The right of every child and youth to equal opportunity to the maximum education suited to its capacity that the state can provide.

Here is a measure that will help to reach that point, and it has been opposed by the outside and the inside leader of the Conservative party. Point 12 is:

> The right of future generations to a world of plenty.

This measure will help. The house leader's remarks may be found at page 5339 of Hansard. His nine points may be found at pages 5342-3 of Hansard. Some of them have already been answered by previous speakers. I shall deal later with point 3, since it is directed more particularly at my own province. I know that when the Prime Minister winds up the debate he will satisfy the house and dispose of all the other objections, but I wish to point out that the attitude of the Conservative party—whatever name has been given to it does not matter—is evident again. Whatever new tag is added to the word "Conservative", whatever new denomination is given to it, we have the same attitude throughout our parliamentary life. It is quite evident that the Progressive tag added to the Conservative wagon did not mean that it would give it more speed in the direction of a forward and constructive policy to better the conditions of the common man. This new tag did not even remove the brake that stopped the car on the road to progress generations ago.

According to Conservative speakers Liberal measures are always unconstitutional. I find that in these points of the house leader here. They are always unconstitutional, dangerous, unfair, threatening. They go too far and they do not go far enough. The time is inappropriate. They are costly, wasteful and inefficient. I defy anybody to look at the speeches from that party when any of the important forward measures were introduced into this house, and not find the same words, or the same ideas expressed in different words on each and every occasion. When such a measure was introduced or a new important step was taken in the way of social legislation, we had the same wailings as to their danger and their untimeliness. It is never the right time. Yet the experience of the past has proven that the Liberal party has never been wrong when it has put on the statute books forward measures like this one. I am glad to say that the younger elements of the party have not joined in entirely in the opposition of the older elements, and I congratulate them a second time; but compare the petty objections that have been raised by certain hon. members of the opposition to the general tenor of the Prime Minister's speech, and I think it will stand as an outstanding pronouncement of far-sighted statesmanship.

The attitude of the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party was sound and progressive in so far as this measure is concerned. Although it was introduced by another party, he supported it as a forward move. Apart from some minor criticisms of the technicalities of the bill or with regard to its application, his remarks were to the effect that it should have been done before or that we have stolen part of the plan or programme previously advocated either by him or his predecessor in the same post. We should remember that the measure does not come as a result of pressure from leftist groups. It is the normal sequence of a number of progressive measures foreseen and announced years ago by the Prime Minister as being part of his vast programme for the advancement of the masses. His book "Industry and Humanity", which has been quoted in this debate, foresaw these measures. Only the circumstances of four years of war and political impediments prevented it from being implemented before. This measure is part of a vast programme that this government—and I mean this government—will put into effect for the betterment of post-war conditions as soon as it is returned to power after the next election.

The most interesting appeal in many ways that has been made against this bill was, unfortunately, in the form of an appeal to parochial prejudice and group discrimination. It is contained in item 3 of the statement of the house leader opposing the measure, and in the less diplomatic terms used by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) who did not fail again to take the occasion to exude more venom on the minority in this country, as he has done before. This is not the time or the occasion to refute his insinuations. I will let facts speak for themselves. When our sons are fighting side by side in Italy and Normandy after having shared side by side the glories of the Dieppe adventure; when some of our own members of parliament from this side and my own racial group are in the vanguard of the Canadian army in France, it ill becomes anybody in this house, no matter how distinguished his past career, to come in the late hours of his advanced life and use the prestige of his respectability, of his eighty years and his white hair, to cast aspersions on those of a different racial descent from his own. Both his attack and the more carefully-worded item 3 draw wrong conclusions from right premises, or base their conclusions on entirely wrong premises. The premise partly right is that of item 3. It reads as follows:

> There is but one province which has maintained the high birth rate and large family which was so characteristic of Canada's pioneer strains.

The words are diplomatic. Is there anything wrong with that? Is it not to the honour of these people to have kept the characteristics of Canada's pioneer strains? Yet the item fails to present the facts of demography in their true light. If we look at the figures contained in report 5 of the eighth census of Canada we shall see that there are 589,950 families in Ontario who have 1,370,720 children under the age of twenty-four. Unfortunately, the totals have not been analysed to give for each district the accurate figure of those under the age of sixteen. Quebec with 443,660 families has 1,510,740 children. But I would not say that the discrepancy is such that we should cast upon Ontario the bad name that the hon. member for Parkdale wanted to give it, that of not being able to reproduce children, because in a way many of them will benefit by this measure. It would take too long to go into the details of these figures, but if we could take it for granted that all the Ontario children will come under the measure, if certain material conditions of which I shall speak later were not such that a larger number there than elsewhere will not have the benefit envisaged by the measure because they are more self-sufficient; if all the children of Ontario came under this legislation it has been figured that this province would receive $104,440,000. Of course that is not the amount it is expected will be required to carry out this project, because by no means all those children will benefit under this provision. However, on the same basis, if all the children of Quebec should come under this measure they would receive an aggregate amount of $109,000,000. So that the two amounts would not be so disproportionate as to cause all the wailing we have heard in this house. If all children were in the same social circumstances Ontario's share would be about the same as that of the province of Quebec. However, financial conditions are not the same; opportunities have not been the same, and therein lies the source of the complaints of those who invoke this argument. I also find in item 3:

> That province's contributions to the general revenue will be out of proportion to the heavier deflection of payments that will have to come from other provinces to pay that province's heavier share of these subsidies. A proportionately lower revenue provider receiving a proportionately higher subsidy can scarcely make for greater unity at this stage in our national life.

It is alleged that in Ontario a larger number of families come within the income tax paying group and will, therefore, receive no benefit under this measure. I do not see any injustice there. If these people, as a result of circumstances I shall discuss in a moment, are better off financially and economically, are we to consider it an injustice when some benefit is given others who in the past have not had the same opportunities or enjoyed the same benefits, and who have not attained the same financial security? It has been said that a larger number of Ontario families are in the income tax paying class. Why? Because of super-intellectual and physical gifts? Because of racial superiority? Well, Mr. Speaker, you might believe that to be the case after listening to the hon. member for Parkdale. From his remarks you would almost think the people of this province have some special attributes.

However, if we calmly analyse the situation we see that half the province of Ontario enjoys climatic conditions which make agriculture at least forty per cent more prosperous than in the colder districts of Quebec. But that is not the main reason for the difference. The main reason is the industries which have been established in Ontario; but those industries have not grown out of thin air. They have been built by capital which came from outside this country, from England and the United States. The people of Ontario have benefited; they have found work and a better standard of living. I do not blame them for taking advantage of this outside capital that has been entrusted to their care; I am sufficiently broad-minded to make that statement. We were the vanquished and they were the victors; money came from England and was entrusted to them, and probably I would have done as they did. But no money came to the Franch-Caandians in the province of Quebec; no foreign capital has been entrusted into their care. Where would it come from† For a hundred years after 1759 no French ships could sail the St. Lawrence; no connections could be maintained with the former mother country. In all justice I must add that when connections were reestablished no money came from France. They sent their money where it would earn a greater profit, instead of sending it to this country then under British control. So that we had to live to ourselves. Whatever industries we have established; whatever financial and manufacturing firms we have set up, have been created from the toil and economy of our forefathers, and that point should be taken into account when one is considering the economic situation of Quebec as compared with that of the other provinces. There is no question of inferiority; it was simply the chance that some had to obtain foreign capital, a chance they were sufficiently clever to utilize to their own advantage, and on the other hand the fact that the French Canadian population of Quebec did not have the same chance or the same advantage.

Furthermore, even in those large industries, public utilities, railway companies and so on which have been established in the province of Quebec with capital coming from England or the United States, our people are given minor positions and are prevented from advancing. We do not want to broadcast this situation, as some of the isolationists are doing on the platforms of Quebec at the present time, but we have evidence to that effect. I will admit that for some technical positions our people may not have been qualified, because our province has not had the schools in which people may be trained for these positions, but the progress made during the war is proof of my statement that our people can work as well as any others; that when they are given a chance they can better their conditions, working well for the country and helping themselves at the same time. We did not have that chance previously because capital was not entrusted to our people in our province to the extent that it was sent into the province of Onatrio, out the situation has changed with the setting up of the many war plants that now operate in the province of Quebec. For some time last year I was with the empire parliamentary association, and for another period of time I sat on the war expenditures committee. In both capacities I had an opportunity to visit shipbuilding and muntiion plants in Montreal; big gun factories and shipbuilding plants in Sorel; shipbuilding plants in Levis and in Lauzon; small arms ammunition factories and shipbuilding plants in Quebec, and the aluminum plant at Arvida. All these plants were manned by people of my own racial group. They are doing well, occupying positions of importance and responsibility, and with their increased salaries they have bettered their conditions in every way. Therefore that myth of the superiority of the worker of another province, because he is of another race, has vanished with the improved opportunities that have come to the people of Quebec since the beginning of the war. Give any Canadian equal opportunity in industry anywhere, and very soon there will be no more talk about Quebec having less people in the income tax paying class than any other province. Give them the same opportunities and the same capital Ontario has had, and they will do just as well; there will be no more suggestions that one group is inferior as compared with another.

All right, Mr. Speaker. We are partly responsible for the past, too, in an indirect way; I am one of those quite ready to admit that fact. For a long time we lived in a shell, as it were; but discussing the history of those conditions and of that period would, I am afraid, take me far beyond the scope of the question now under consideration. We have been late in developing proper standards of education for the masses. Not having outside capital, we have progressed more slowly in the economic and financial fields. We have not been helped by the immigration of people of our own stock, as others have been helped. We have had no outside capital. Being less self-sufficient financially, the public treasury of our province could not devote the money that should have been spent on health services and in the advancement of educational facilities. I admit all that, but great improvements have been made in the past fifty years. The days of road and bridge building have gone; the period of the harnessing of our water powers and the exploitation of our resources has paved the way for the developments that have been observed in Quebec during the last few years, including improvements in health services, compulsory education, the expansion of technical and trade education and other measures the ultimate results of which will greatly benefit the whole population. Therefore, if perchance the margin of benefit accruing to one province seems higher in the aggregate than that accruing to another province, it is partly due to the conditions I have described and partly due also to the fact that the average number of children per family is much larger in Quebec than in the other provinces.

Is there anything unjust about this? A country cannot be said to be prosperous when one part of it is not prosperous. The lack of purchasing power of one part of the population reduces the chances of the other part to better its own standards. We are interdependent more than ever. Nations are interdependent; provinces are interdependent; individuals are interdependent. The advocates of immigration say that we need more population to meet our needs. Let us first improve the lot of our own people, and we shall be sufficient unto ourselves.

I do not think the fears of labour that this treasure may adversely affect salaries are substantiated by the facts. Experts on family allowances connected with the French labour unions in France have all been witnesses to the fact that that has not been the result of the granting of such family allowances in France. We have the evidence of the secretary-general of the C.G.T.—that is the federation of workers in France—who has stated repeatedly that this had not been the effect over there. We believe the same thing will happen here.

Some people have said that this is an impracticable adventure, and that many of the countries which had it at one time have had to abandon it. It is to be noted that the eight countries in 1940 which paid family allowances were Belgium, Italy, France, Hungary, Chile, New South Wales, New Zealand and Spain. In addition to these, there are quite a number of countries which paid family allowances on a smaller scale. These were not paid by the government, but rather by the industries themselves. Or, if paid by the government, they are paid solely to the civil service. The civil service, the railway workers, and provincial and municipal employees in Holland receive 2·5 per cent of their salary per child per year with a minimum of 50 and a maximum of 200 florin per head per year.

In Switzerland some industries have instituted family allowances for their own employees. Sixty-five thousand families of employees of the federal administration receive an allowance of 120 Swiss francs per child per year.

In Germany certain industries have had it for a long time, especially the mining industry. Civil servants and day labourers employed on public works, bank and insurance employees have also benefited. The allowances in Germany are uniform for each child.

In Poland the civil servants enjoyed family allowances before the war.

In Czechoslovakia the workers in the coal mining industry received family allowances.

In Austria government employees have benefited from family allowances since 1926. In private industries payment of allowances has been in effect since long before that time. This has applied to mining, steel works, printing establishments, and so on.

In Sweden we find something contrary to what has been said in the house. Sweden never had a government-operated plan of family allowances. Therefore it could not have abandoned such a policy, as has been said. But during the last war the cost of living bonus had taken the shape of subsidies proportionate to the importance of the family. When peace came and normal conditions were restored this cost of living bonus disappeared in 1923.

In Great Britain the greatest objection of the independent labour party is to the fact that unskilled labour with large families would receive from their salaries and the allowances paid to them more than would skilled labourers who are bachelors. This objection fails to take into account the fact that the expenses of the father of a family are such that allowances will mean more in the way of benefit to his family, but not more net income to himself than the bachelor would receive.

Fathers of numerous children create a reservoir of vital energy. They contribute to the nation future producers and future consumers. They contribute workers to develop the nation's resources, and consumers of the products of its industries. Yet the fathers of large families are called upon to make the greatest sacrifices. With the policy of equal work with equal pay, which I approve as the only just approach to fair compensation for work, a condition arises where there is inequality of social standing; then inequality of opportunity develops. That condition is opposed to efficiency of the work of the fathers of families. If those fathers are working for the same salaries, they have to deprive themselves of everything in order to maintain their children. Family allowances will correct that condition.

Salary is compensation for a definite economic service which adds to the value of a given product. Allowances are a compensation for the accomplishment of a social duty, the growth of human capital.

Material difficulties facing families, especially those with numerous children, are such that their number is constantly declining. Yet depletion of human capital and the lowering birth rate have been decried by all economists and sociologists as a major reason for the weakening of many European nations.

I stand by the principle of "equal work—equal salary". The basic salary for work should be enough to provide comfort and decent living to an average family. We were told earlier in the debate that of the workers gainfully employed forty-eight per cent are single, that thirty-nine per cent have no children under sixteen years of age. Therefore the eighty-seven per cent of the gainfully employed are the ones with which we should be concerned in fixing the basic rate. The basic pay should be determined upon decent conditions of living for an average family, and family allowances would then give a supplement to those amounts.

It is understood that the present system as proposed by the government is much more equitable than any other system in operation in Europe before the war. Not only one class of the population, but all of it will be placed on equal terms. When the allowances are paid only to salaried workers it brings about an exodus from rural to urban communities. People want to get the allowances. The contrary will be the effect under the present measure. Families will be kept on the farms and encouraged to carry on tilling the soil, a process which is so necessary. Migration to cities has been the usual procedure in several countries. If we want to stop that, and if we want to keep carrying on in respect of colonization, then here is the measure which will effect that result.

This is a good measure, much better than those which have been in force in Europe, and which I have had occasion to study. I say that because the measure before the house encourages the man, wherever he is, in the work he is doing. It does not bring about an exodus to the cities, as would happen if only the salaried class were to receive the benefits.

It is said that a few will be taxed to protect the others. That statement fails to take into account the fact that families with many dependents are those which are affected to the highest degree by indirect taxation. They are the largest purchasers of quantity-produced goods, which are the key to prosperity of industrial centres. They are the greatest contributors to indirect taxes, through the great number of things they have to buy daily for their families.

Before concluding, may I say that I found it heartening to hear the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) talk about the narrow-mindedness of the observations of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce). I wonder if the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay realizes that the only utterances of that kind made in the house were made by members of the party to which he belonged in 1940, and of which he was organizer in Quebec, at the time of the last general election. Unfortunately the hon. member is not in his seat at the moment. It is a known fact that at the next federal election, whenever that may be, in Quebec these people will come out disguised as independents. Just now we see the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Roy) on the platform in Quebec, supporting Mr. Duplessis. Yet he will pledge himself that he is quite independent, when the election comes along.

In conclusion, let me say this, to all the critics of this measure. There are those in my province who have made charges and who will try to find fault with some of the details in connection with the application of this principle. When the hunter in the forest kills a giant bull moose, he rejoices at his success; he marvels at the size of the animal, and his pleasure is enhanced by the struggle he has had to get it. He does not stoop to see if the animal has fleas in its fur, but that is exactly what these people are doing now, those in my province or elsewhere who criticize details, especially those who are trying to find fault with the scale of payments, or those who claim that some will get more than others. These people are simply trying to find fleas, when they should rejoice that they have received a bull moose as a gift.

They would be contributing more to their own people; they would be contributing more to public life if they tried to realize what the bill really means. We have seen prominent opposition members of this house admit that they agree with the principle of the bill, admit that they are for it but with certain reservations. We have seen certain people in my own province, the people who the hon. member for Parkdale says will benefit most by this bill, finding fault with it. Some people say that this is a political measure, yet we have a group now in Quebec trying to fight it because they do not think it is fair. I think this government has found the proper medium to meet the situation and to provide equal opportunities for our young people. Our political critics will be judged on their merits. As I stated earlier in my remarks, I am ready to let the case stand on the masterful speech delivered by the Prime Minister when he introduced the measure and on the foresightedness he has shown in the past for the advancement and betterment of the fate of the nation.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the opposition has taken up very little time in this debate since the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke the other day. It is the duty and function of the opposition to offer constructive criticism. We have heard a lot to-day about the constitutional question. I come from a city which has been one of the leading cities in America in social reforms of all kinds, and I wish to offer some constructive criticism of the bill. Some of our cities have borne the burden and heat of the day without a great deal of help from the federal authorities.

It is the first duty of the federal government to look after the health, wealth, peace and prosperity of its citizens. Because of our complicated constitution we have had over-government and over-taxation in this country. One result has been that the burden bears heavily on real estate, on the small business man, the manufacturer and others who are trying to earn an honest living.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, a large part of our representation on this side of the chamber is from the province of Ontario, especially the Toronto district, which has had quite a number of these social services for many years past. These social services grew very largely from beginnings in the days before the South African war, in that glorious Victorian era which built up assets for the future, assets which we seem to have squandered in many ways. In those days the people kept the state; to-day the trend seems to be that the state will have to keep the people.

We have heard a good deal on this side and other sides of the house concerning the constitutional question, but it has little or nothing to do with this programme. A committee of which I used to be a member did some very fine work between the two wars, particularly in the years 1926, 1927 and 1928. During those sessions the industrial and international relations committee examined many witnesses, including the deputy minister of justice, who said that under "public debt and property" federal power could vote money for certain social services. The present Attorney General, who is one of Canada's leading counsel, was one of the principal counsel for the government in connection with the Rowell report. The Rowell commission no doubt did good work, but they discovered very little of importance on the constitutional question not known. It was well known that none of the social services such as technical education, grants for pensions and the like could be dealt with by the high court of parliament at Ottawa except under the first five or six words of the first section of the British North America Act, having to do with "public debt and property." The subject was dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada when the government made a reference of then existing 1935 legislation to that court; an appeal was had to the privy council, and Lord Macmillan gave a judgment.

For many years between the two wars I have urged in this house that in view of over-government in this country and over-taxation, our main problems in this country were constitutional reform, parliamentary reform, cabinet reform, and law reform; and it turned out, in view of the decisions which have been given, that what I said on this matter was correct. Between the years 1930 and 1935, while the Conservative government was in office, our leader adopted a socialistic programme. It was copied very largely from the best of many countries. It was patterned according to a recognition of what Canada could afford to pay for, adapted to our local circumstances, and that should be the test of any social system, for the state has no money to provide for all this work except what comes from the taxpayer. I stated in 1927 and 1928 that the only authority in the British North America Act under which the federal government could provide social services was contained in the words " public debt and property." In the result, in 1935 our government was beaten at the polls, and a new government came in. I remember the blazing billboards all over Canada in 1935, with the colours of the magnificent racing stable at Hamilton—gold and black—and the words " End unemployment; vote Liberal." Was unemployment ended? No; but the people voted Liberal; there is no doubt about that. Along came a continuance of the depression and the dole system. I remember that, sitting across the floor on the front government benches was the late Minister of Labour, the Hon. Norman Rogers, who made the statement to me that what I had said about a billion dollars being spent by federal, provincial and municipal authorities on the dole was correct. And what did they get out of it? Nothing.

I remember when alone in this house, seeing two hundred thousand of our youth coming every year, from 1935 to 1937, out of high school, I advocated an apprenticeship system and an advanced social and security policy for the young people of our country. For this proposal I got no support in this house, I am sorry to say, from my hon. friends to the left. It is true that there were hardly any of them in the house at that time, about the only one being the late Mr. Woodsworth. I wanted to see established an apprenticeship system by which these young people would sign up as apprentices for from three to five years and learn one of fifteen trades, and get military and physical clothing, lodging, a per diem allowance and deferred pay. I suggested that this system should extend from three to five years and include military drill and some knowledge of civil aviation, then in its infancy. With such a system we would have produced in three to five years journeymen fit for some twenty to twenty-five skilled callings, comprising the bigger industries of this country, and when the war broke out we would have had 25,000 skilled pilots and air mechanics. But all we got was the dole, and the dole was a complete failure; to a large extent the money was wasted.

[Mr. Church.]

Then came 1935, with the reference of legislation to the privy council. In 1937 I again put forward the apprenticeship proposals for ending unemployment and abolishing the dole. The government of the day appointed the Rowell commission, largely as a consequence of a debate on a motion for parliamentary, constitutional, cabinet and law reform. The late Chief Justice Rowell, who had taken a great interest in the work, headed the commission, and a report was made, but they found out very little except what was known before, namely that under "public debt and property" we could make grants for various social purposes. While I am not speaking for others who live in Ontario, I would state my opinion that the final report of the Sirois commission was unjust and unfair to Ontario, the main taxpaying province of this country. The effect of its recommendations would be to make that province a milch cow for the whole of confederation. However, I do not wish to urge that argument; I never did and I never will, because I believe in the pact of confederation and in the spirit of the old Cornish battle cry, "Each for all and all for each." What is for the benefit of one province should be for the benefit of all the provinces. But from the point of view of social services and the reforms proposed, education and so on, it seems to me that report was unfair to a province like Ontario.

Coming now to the question which has been raised by this bill, No. 161, introduced as a government measure by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who has followed this sort of work for many years past, I think he should be well acquainted with the glorious record in the social services of the city from which I come because he and his family have had an intimate connection with that city. It has led in social reforms and services of one kind and another. It is one of the finest cities on the continent and has done a great deal in public health to spread social reform benefits to all classes. Some people seem to think that by means of these family allowances and social security generally we are going to abolish poverty. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we have always had the poor with us and we shall always have them. Neither planning nor victory, nor social reforms, as President Roosevelt has said, will ever bring about the millennium. All the parties in this house seem to have been competing in a race to see which of them could do the most along these letfist lines and which will first reach the sepulchre of social security.

I submit that if this bill had been referred to a select committee of the house we would have had a far better measure before us now, because such a committee would have studied all the inconsistencies and inequalities inherent in it, removed the duplication of services, and proposed remedies to remove those many difficulties. As matters stand now under it, we are simply going to set up the largest control system of bureaucracy. The government seems to have forgotten all about the public welfare boards that have already been established in all the provinces and in the larger cities in the dominion. Take, for instance, Toronto. In that city we have a large welfare department dealing with all aspects of the social problem affecting the poor, the sick and the suffering. There is a large office open morning, noon and night, Sundays and holidays, twenty-four hours a day. There are district offices to which the poor can apply. There is a division to look after old age pensions, mothers' allowances and so on; there is an accounting division; there is a single men's division as well as a housing division, and we have a placement division. In emergencies there is a large bureau which will give prompt attention providing food and lodging as well as medical services for people in need and taking care of evicted families. I may say that there are 600 soldiers to-night facing eviction orders from their houses. I had a question on the order paper in this connection but it has not yet been answered. We have a department of public welfare to look after all these things, but in this proposed bill the government seem to be altogether unaware of that fact. In one branch of that department in the city of Toronto provision is made for men who are convalescing and there are some per diem patients. Provision is also made for those who are ill and others who are partly employed. There is a physician and there are nurses available. Are we to set up a rival organization in competition with such departments throughout the provinces, ignoring what has been done in the matter for social security? Is the government to overlook all that the city of Toronto has accomplished at great expense, one of the senior municipalities in Canada, which, as I have said, is undoubtedly a leader in social services and has been for many years past?

In another branch of the department to which I have referred provision is made for tubercular cases and there is sanatorium treatment for men who require rest and special food. There is an officer in charge of the placement division which I have mentioned, which works in cooperation with the national selective service to find suitable employment for persons who, by reason of physical disabilities, require public assistance. Everything is done to help people to get a new start, and those who are in receipt of public assistance are brought before the medical board at intervals. The housing division looks after the cases of persons who are faced with eviction orders and endeavours to prevent eviction. Sometimes it is necessary for people to move a little outside the city. Those on unemployment relief are eligible for consideration. There is provision also for hospitalization. There is an officer in charge of old age pensions and there is a means test. I suggest that there is going to be a means test under this legislation as well, and in connection with similar social legislation that has been passed in this country. If an old man is in need of help he writes to his son or daughter or some other relative in the family, and if he has a little estate, however small it may be, an old house perhaps, he is refused assistance.

This bill should have been referred to a select committee first and later to the law courts, and in my opinion it may yet wind up there. We have heard a great deal to-day from various constitutional authorities in this house, including the hon. member who preceded me. He seems to be an expert on all technical questions brought up under the constitution, although he has not had much training in social welfare. Under our constitution the courts are subservient to the legislature and the legislature in turn is subservient to the will of the people.

What do we find under this bill? I have been looking through the bill and, while I am criticizing it, I would give it somewhat qualified support. I wish to offer some constructive suggestions to improve it to the government. The first payments under the bill will not be made before July 1, 1945. They have been postponed until that date. There will have been an election before then. The people will have to decide in the ballot boxes once for all whether we are to have a totalitarian socialist state, whether we are to have the programme that has been proposed by hon. gentlemen to my left, whether we are to see in this country the socialization of all services, and whether the Canadian people are to be called upon to exchange for those social services all the liberties that have been won for them down through the years, and submit to regimentation along various lines.

In a dispatch to all Canadian papers from the external affairs department on July 18, one of the reasons advanced for the postponement of the payment of family allowances until July 1, 1945, is that the government hopes that all Canadian soldiers will be home by that time. That is what is reported to have been said by a government spokesman at a press conference. Well, there is no mandate whatsoever from the people to pass a bill of this kind.

Why have we the right to impose $700,000,000 on the already overburdened taxpayers of this country, with the controls, regimentation, artificial burdens, barriers and restraints of trade that are now placed upon the taxpayers? Real estate in every municipality in Canada is overburdened with federal problems like this. Why should the city of Toronto have to pay millions of dollars and hand out the dole and all that kind of thing for years, when now the federal parliament are bearing the full burden here as this bill promises to do? The government gave only forty per cent for unemployment, after promising to give it all and end it, and saddled forty per cent on the province and twenty per cent on the municipalities. The weakness of this bill is that it sets up a huge bureaucracy control system. There is duplication in it. The bill has the following elaborate definitions: "Allowance, child, institution, maintains, minister, parent, registrations," and so on. How many more registrations are we to have? We have had the census; we have had the unemployment report of the Rowell report; we have had the plebiscite and all these things, and now we shall have a new registration system according to the definition of one section of the bill. Then the bill divides the children into four or five classes. One class is to receive $5 per child per month; another class, $6; another class, $7; another class, $8, and so on.

Instead of having this extensive control board and duplication of services, why do they not make those cash grants direct to the municipalities through the provinces instead of spending two or three hundred millions in the way indicated in this bill? I venture to say they could do the work for one-tenth of the cost if the work were given to the welfare organizations that I have suggested here to-night, the municipalities and the provinces. Much economy could be effected in that way, and only the actual needy provided for.

Under section 9, "powers of minister", they are going to set up a vast body of officials who will make rules and regulations of all kinds. Under section 10 they can arrange with the provinces for the carrying out of the operations of the measure. They make the rules and regulations. There is no definite indication that this $200,000,000 will be well spent. Some get it and some do not. They say that everybody who can qualify under the section will get it.

When you come to the astronomical figures like that $200,000,000, there is less likelihood that it will be well spent. The disposal of that money will no doubt be by the means test. What about the division of powers? They are going to give to those standing bureaucrats and others the responsibility for spending money voted by parliament.

With respect to the extensive social services of the municipality of Toronto that I shall refer to to-night, one of the main ones in our city is a fine medical health department costing millions of dollars in the past twenty-five years. There is a food inspector, nurses' branch, nutrition branch, dental and medical services, a meat inspector, milk inspector, urban electrification and rural electrification, low cost housing, fuel supply, removal of slums, new sewer supply for the large cities and surrounding districts, pure water supply, transportation system that did so much for housing. Gainful employment for all would do more for the benefit of the working classes than anything else in the history of this country in the way of doles and cash allowances. In our city the fine streetcar system, including buses and radials, under the transportation commission transports passengers for one fare that cost five or six fares throughout the city before. Taking over of the radials there and removing the light, power and transportation franchises in the counties of Peel, York and Ontario into a civic and district transportation system built up the suburbs. All these things have assisted in the building up of small homes. The up-to-date administration of the health department made it one of the finest on the continent. Education has been well looked after. The public schools, separate schools, secondary schools have all been looked after. There was medical and dental inspection in the schools, free textbooks and no fees to pay. Some people were thirty years of age before they ever saw a dentist. Child welfare and nutrition were taken care of. Milk and meals were supplied in the schools. I would say to the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mrs. Casselman) that the social services she spoke of have been given the people of Toronto for many years past. In 1910 I became a member and chairman of the board of health, and as alderman, controller and mayor I took a large part in the work of the organization of that department in placing Doctor Hastings in charge. He became one of the greatest medical health officers on the continent.

There is no doubt that had this bill gone to a committee one-third would cover the cost of it as it will be or less after the coming election, and about one-third of its cost will have to be assessed against the provinces and the municipalities. A means test will no doubt have to be provided as with other social bills I have mentioned. In our high schools and other schools for some years they have had free textbooks, no fees in any of those schools, and the boon of all these things has been to the working classes of this country.

I am driven to the conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that we have been overlooking the war altogether. Generals Beveridge and Marsh are the leading generals of this country to-day. We seem to have forgotten the administration of the war altogether, although it is primary and other things secondary. With an election coming on, we seem to have forgotten all about the war and about the young people who are overseas in Italy, Normandy, Flanders and other places. I have received letters from some of these boys and they have been wondering what is to happen to them when they get home from the war, whether they will have not only to serve through the war and suffer over there but also have to pay for it when they come back sick and disabled.

If the bill that is before us is to be supplementary and complementary to the low existing wage scale it might have some merit. The minimum wage rates are under the absolute control of the provinces, and excellent work has been accomplished in that connection. I am sorry that this particular bill did not go to the provinces, because I know for a fact that in so far as the legal aspect of it is concerned the province of Ontario has been asking, as others have, for a conference on this subject since the first of the year. With regard to the low wages and the war, there is no doubt that although the workers' wages have gone up, the cost of living has gone up with them, notwithstanding the index. In this particular bill $480 is the limit for a family. Where are they going to get a house for that to-day? There are no houses no matter what you pay for them. That is one of the main social problems before us, proper housing and fuel. There is more ill-health caused by bad housing, lack of ventilation, lack of fuel for nine months of the year than anything else, as any medical officer of health can tell you. In this country fuel is needed for nearly nine months of the year. People can do without food for a day, but they cannot do without a house to live in and little fuel with the temperature as it is for nearly nine months of the year.

This war is not being fought for certain plans, profiles and blueprints of socialism. That is not what we are fighting for in this war. With regard to those various reports, the Beveridge report is not adapted to this country. It is all very well for us to refer to it, but it is not adapted to this country or to the constitution of this country or to the working classes of this country. Many labour unions have opposed family allowances. They think it will weaken their programme on which they have made progress so far, of better wages and gainful employment with the social services I mentioned and security. Many trades unions take this view which I have supported for many years and some are opposed to family allowances. It will be found that the cost of all those control boards under this bill is going to be fabulous and there will be duplication. With all these controls and boards on all these measures the poor will get very little out of it.

One of the finest institutions in Canada for the care of children is the hospital for sick children in Toronto, which was established by the late John Ross Robertson, and which has become a model for the whole continent. That institution is supported by voluntary subscriptions, and a new building is very badly needed. Eighty per cent of the child patients receive free treatment, while most of the remaining twenty per cent pay very little. I see many of these children, the out-patients, going on the street-car to receive their treatment. I am strongly in favour of helping the families, many of whom are suffering at the present time, but I think considerable economies could be effected in connection with these social measures if we were given a more precise outline of how they are to work. At the present time, of course, there is a great scarcity of domestic help in this country; even those who may be ill and have large families to look after cannot get any assistance, and that situation affects the hospitals and all other social services as well.

The other day the Minister of Finance was refcrring to the housing situation, but little if anything has been done about it. The Prime Minister of Great Britain has proposed to erect 500,000 prefabricated houses there, but our industries are not likely to receive any large orders for materials entering into such houses unless we aid industry, housing and reconstruction. I doubt if we shall get very much out of that Churchill order, owing to the scarcity of labour and material, any more than we received much benefit from the great orders placed in connection with civil aviation before the war commenced. It was said by a great British statesman two years ago that we should exercise a great deal of caution before making far-reaching decisions in time of war, because such decisions are apt to be ill-judged since at a time like this no one is perfectly normal.

The present proposal is fashioned more or less after the Beveridge report, which has been the subject of several debates in the British House of Commons, one of which was referred to by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) the other night. On February 26, 1943, in this connection Sir John Anderson, lord president of the council, had this to say:

> They (the government) had come to one clear and definite conclusion, that whatever might be decided about cash allowances, by far the best and most effective measure within the limit of its possibilities is the fullest development of the various child welfare services which bring the benefits directly to the children.

That statement was confirmed in the British house later on, although different opinions were also expressed. On March 21, 1943, Mr. Churchill had this to say:

> We must beware of trying to build a society in which nobody counts for anything except a politician or an official, a society where enterprise gains no reward and thrift no privileges. I say "trying to build" because of all races in the world our people would be the last to consent to be governed by a bureaucracy. Freedom is their life blood.

That has been the creed of the people of Canada for many years past. Now are we going to give up all our liberties and become a totalitarian state? I say we are not; and it is a case of liberty and freedom on one hand versus state control of our lives on the other. We should restore the right to possess private property, since the real happiness is in gainful work and service to one's fellows, and socialization and the totalitarian state are foreign to our soil and our way of living in Canada.

Mr. W. C. MACDONALD (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) suggest that the constitutional problem does not arise in connection with the measure now under consideration. I quite agree with that statement. I am convinced that the parliament of Canada has full power to legislate in respect of family allowances, and that the bill now before us contains nothing which could be considered in any way an invasion of the provincial field of legislation.

In my remarks this evening I intend to deal with the measure on its merits. At the beginning of the session we were invited to consider a social security and human welfare programme which I think was the finest and most progressive programme ever presented to this house. Some may say that the war is not yet won, and that legislation having to do with social security and human welfare might very well wait until it is over. But while the time of victory is not certain, all signs indicate that victory is now in sight. Moreover, social security and a national minimum of human welfare, together with a closer approach to equality of opportunity, are all part of the new order of which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has spoken and which our men in uniform as well as the civilians of this country will expect to find when the war is over. The Prime Minister has said too that unless the new order is already on its way before the end of the war we may look for it in vain.

Part of the government's great programme of social reform is this provision for family allowances, designed to assist families whose incomes are low. The scheme is comprehensive, as is quite fitting. The bill provides that the allowances will be paid to families irrespective of family income. There is no limit to the number of children in each family for whom provision is made, although the same amount will not necessarily be paid in respect of each child. The allowances must be applied by the parents, or such other person authorized to receive them, for the maintenance, education and advancement of the children. They may be discontinued or paid to some other person if the Minister of National Health and Welfare is satisfied that the children are not receiving the full benefit. Surely there is nothing wrong in that. These payments will be exempt from taxation. They cannot be assigned or given away as security. The allowances will be paid in respect of children of members of the armed forces and will be in addition to dependents' allowances now provided for their families.

I wish now to give briefly some of my reasons for supporting this measure. It will be generally agreed, I think, that whatever will promote the welfare of the Canadian children is for the good of the country. I would submit that one most effective way of promoting the welfare of our children is to increase the incomes of families of low incomes, in which these children are to be found.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is this the best way to do it?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): It is one excellent way to do it. I do not know of any better way, because family allowances will do this, through the increase in the incomes of these low-income families. They will be able to give their children a better deal. They will be able to provide for them better food, better clothing and better housing, and give them better education. All this will mean healthier children. The allowances will permit the children to have a much better chance of success in after years, and to have happier lives.

Family requirements vary according to the number of children, and it is of the utmost importance that provision be made to secure a minimum level of maintenance for the children themselves. An increase in wages of the head of a family will not meet that situation. Wages are based on many factors. They are based on the skill of the workman, the type of work in which he is engaged, and on many other conditions.

It is quite obvious, too, that industry, thrift and self-denial are themselves not sufficient to ensure security. Many people, through no fault of their own, but by reason of illness, unemployment or possibly unlucky investments, find themselves at times in need of assistance. In a household where the head of a family is able to provide for all reasonable requirements, one would expect to find contentment, and a happy environment in which the children might properly be brought up. On the other hand, if the head of that family is unable to make adequate provision for family requirements, the children may grow up in fear, and with a sense of frustration. The formative years of their lives pass quickly, and in after years they may have to overcome a feeling of inferiority.

It is important that the children in their sensitive years should not feel that family allowances are given on compassionate grounds, and that they can know that the allowances are received by their parents as of right. The provision in the bill that allowances are to be paid to families irrespective of income should commend itself to every hon. member.

There is a further consideration. Many heads of families in need of allowances are not wage-earners at all. I have in mind the farmers and the fishermen, and I shall have something more to say about these two classes in a moment or two. Before doing so, however, I wish to suggest, at the risk of repetition, that this legislation will help to create employment in Canada after the war. Our fighting men and women, our war workers and children coming of age will expect, and rightly so, that there will be jobs for them to do. We cannot afford to have it otherwise.

The $200,000,000 a year which it is estimated this programme will cost, will remain in Canada; it will be spent here. That money will be spent on food, clothing and other family necessities, the supplying of which will in turn help our farmers, fishermen, businessmen and manufacturers. Family allowances will increase the purchasing power of the people. If in the process they also assist in bringing about a more even distribution of our national income, so much the better.

There are some who complain about the cost of the programme. But if we are to have this great measure of social reform we must be prepared to pay for it. So that we cannot afford to abandon our efforts to raise the standard of family life for the masses of the people. We are able to say that in proportion to our population we have put forth the greatest war effort of any of the allied countries. Are we to confess that we cannot raise the money necessary to carry out this great social reform? We have been able to find all the money required for the war effort. If we were called upon to-morrow to supply additional tanks and ships we would not throw up our hands, and say that the money was not available.

In this connection I should like to read a passage from a book written by the Right Hon. Winston Churchill in 1921. This is the book entitled "Aftermath." In the second chapter, speaking about the organization and the machinery at the disposal of the British government on Armistice day, he said this:

> There was very little in the productive sphere they could not at this time actually do. A requisition for instance for half a million houses would not have seemed more difficult to comply with than those we were already in process of executing for a hundred thousand aeroplanes, or twenty thousand guns, or the medium artillery of the American army, or two million tons of projectiles. But a new set of conditions began to rule from eleven o'clock onwards. The money-cost, which had never been considered by us to be a factor capable of limiting a supply of the armies, asserted a claim to priority from the moment the fighting stopped.

I suggest it all sums up to this, that if family allowances will ensure a national minimum of welfare for our children we should go forward with our programme, and not abandon it because of monetary consideration.

I would congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the government upon the courage and vision they have shown in introducing this measure, and in taking steps to see that it is put into effect without any delay. I would submit that the programme of family allowances is inherently sound and in the national interest. I should like, however, this evening to consider it for a few minutes more from a provincial point of view. I hold in my hand a very fine book entitled "The Economic Effects of the War on the Maritime Provinces of Canada," by Professor B. S. Kierstead. His study was made at the invitation of the institute of public affairs at Dalhousie university. One of the chapters in the book deals with fisheries, and was written by Professor Stewart Bates, professor of commerce at Dalhousie university, and now economic adviser to the Department of Fisheries in Ottawa. Professor Bates, after referring to the state of the fishing industry at the outbreak of the war, goes on to say:

> The money income derived from catching and processing fish in the shore communities averaged less than $300 per annum per man while that of fishermen in larger centres, like that of Halifax and Lunenburg, although averaging $1,000 on bigger vessels, was still low compared to other trades of comparable skill, risk and hardship.

I have referred to the maritime fishing industry because the fishermen are a class who will benefit greatly by family allowances but whose status would not necessarily be affected by an increase in wage levels. In 1939 there were, in Nova Scotia alone, 17,335 inshore and offshore fishermen. I should mention also our farmers. They are also a class not necessarily benefited by an increase in wage levels but who will be greatly benefited by family allowances.

I should like to refer to the report of the Rowell-Sirois commission on dominion-provincial relations. This report shows that education and welfare expenditures in Nova Scotia are materially below the per capita average for Canada. In the words of the report, "the province shares with New Brunswick the unhappy distinction of having the longest unfavourable economic history of any Canadian province." The per capita wealth of Nova Scotia and the annual income of Nova Scotians are lower than that of most provinces. At the same time living costs are high. In peace time our provincial revenues were insufficient to do more than take care of our normal requirements. They could not possibly support a programme of family allowances such as is proposed. Other provinces with greater resources and more buoyant revenues might be able to do so.

In Nova Scotia where education and welfare expenditures are below the national per capita average, the establishment of a national minimum level of well-being for children would be of tremendous benefit to our people. There is a tendency these days for provinces and municipalities to bring all their problems to Ottawa for solution. Here is a proposal by Ottawa to take care of one of our most pressing and urgent provincial requirements—an improvement in the standard of life of our young children. I welcome and support the splendid programme of family allowances that is proposed.

Let me add one more word. While only 29·63 per cent of the total population of Canada is under sixteen, slightly more than thirty-one per cent of the total population of Nova Scotia is under that age. These figures are based on those given in a return made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) to a question asked by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce), to be found on page 4144 of Hansard of June 26 and on the figures to be found in the official handbook, "Canada, 1944", published under the authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

In conclusion, I would say that when one views this measure from all angles it can be safely said that the family allowance programme will be of great benefit to Nova Scotia, financed as it will be by all the people of Canada.

It is fitting that this bill should be sponsored by our beloved Prime Minister. His whole life has been consecrated to the cause of human welfare. He has given magnificent leadership to his country throughout the war. The people of Canada are happy in the certain knowledge that he will continue to lead them, not only until the end of the war, but also in the task of winning the peace that is sure to come.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a few observations on this bill No. 161, to provide for family allowances. The Atlantic charter and the four freedoms expressed an ideal, and we now have a great opportunity to assist in the progress, achievement and welfare of the common man of our country and his dependents. May I say that I have always favoured some form of family assistance.

As a municipal official I had an experience, which I believe is equalled by few members of the present house, during the great devastation and depression—the greatest since confederation—which prevailed in the southern part of the prairie provinces. As a result of the contact I had with many families I became impressed with the necessity for some assistance along family lines. During the years of the depression this same government headed by the same Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) set up what was known as the Rowell-Sirois commission to study conditions in Canada from coast to coast. They spent a great deal of time in receiving many briefs from leading organizations throughout Canada and they duly made their report to the government. I am sorry to think that the present government have completely ignored that report. They have done worse than that; they have added to the difficulties which that report pointed out, by implementing the recommendations of the social insurance commission of the province of Quebec.

The report of that commission was referred to this afternoon by my colleague, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). At page 70 of the 1933 second edition of the report of that commission it recommended family allowances rather than providing the same standard of industrial wages which prevailed in other provinces of the dominion. It is pointed out that with uniform rates of wages Quebec could not compete in industrial output with the other provinces. That is scarcely in keeping with the argument which was advanced just before the dinner recess by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard).

My chief criticism of this bill is that it does not create a standard of wages throughout the dominion. This is lacking in various provinces at this time. We tried to provide for this in our amendment which was ruled out of order, and our appeal from the Speaker's decision was voted down by this government. We thought these allowances should not be paid until there was full collaboration with the various provinces and then only after the federal Minister of Labour was satisfied that there were uniform standards of wages prevailing in the various provinces.

I am satisfied that there are people in many parts of this country who would raise larger families if they were assured of an adequate income. I remember a by-election in my native province of Manitoba last year when one of the socialist members was campaigning and endeavouring to prevail on the sympathies of a large audience in the southern part of my province. They had not been in the northern part of Manitoba. I have considerable respect for this gentleman, but he was reported in the press as pointing out the medieval conditions existing in Flin Flon in northern Manitoba. I happened to be in that town at the time he made his speech and I made it my business to find out the conditions which prevailed at that time. I was amazed to find just what the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting company, a capitalistic enterprise, had done for the people in that centre.

These people had splendid homes with modern conveniences which they were able to obtain at reasonable rentals. There were also recreational, educational, health and other facilities provided by this company. Most of the young parents were raising fine, healthy families. To me it was an outstanding example of what could be done in a community. It was not in keeping with the thought expressed by that speaker in that by-election who was trying to arouse feeling against capitalism in this country. To me it was evident what could be done in this country if we had a proper standard of wages throughout Canada. The nation would benefit greatly as a result of healthier and larger families.

Again, it was pointed out by my colleague the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) that in 1939 the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister (Mr. Claxton), in a presentation to the Sirois commission, pointed out the unconstitutionality of such a measure as that which is now proposed to this house.

It was also pointed out by my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), who, I think, said he had been elected to parliament in 1935, that the first act of the present Prime Minister and his government after being returned to power in 1935 was to scuttle the reform legislation of the Bennett government, and that on constitutional grounds. I believe that is exactly the situation which prevails with this measure to-day. I listened carefully to the arguments of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) on this subject, and I must confess that they did not impress me. I am still convinced that this measure is unconstitutional. To prove our sincerity in this matter, we proposed an amendment which we thought would make the scheme more workable and which would enable assistance to apply to these people immediately rather than making them wait until July, 1945.

Moreover, I have spoken about my experience during the great devastation and depression in the prairie provinces during the early thirties.

I have been perusing old volumes of Hansard, and I have found a speech by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) under date of February 24, 1930. It is reported in Hansard of that date at page 38. He asserted that relief problems were a matter for the municipalities; if they could not handle the situation, then it was a matter for the provinces; if they could not handle it, then it was a matter for the federal government, and in the meantime people should mind their own business. Those are the words of the present Prime Minister, to whom we listened three days ago proposing this bill and emphasizing his consistent stand for humanity during his career in this country.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): And he is not listening to you now.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Well, I would not suppose that he would be. To me this bill is not realistic. I took some time in the last session of parliament to discuss social security. I pointed out at that time that the present

Prime Minister had then been in public office for approximately twenty-four years—it will be twenty-five years on August 7 next—approximately eighteen of those years as Prime Minister of this country; approximately seven years as leader of the opposition. It is strange, when he had all these proposals in 1919, that we should have to wait until the eve of an election for a bill such as this, and that, moreover, it should not take effect until July 1, 1945. The Prime Minister in some heat, the other day, telling us of all he had done for humanity, took us through his record. He told us that he had served from 1908 to 1911; then there was a lapse until 1919, when he became leader of this great party. I believe that then he wrote this book "Industry and Humanity", and spent some years in the country to the south of us, studying social problems—the years from 1914 to 1918, or something.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt my hon. friend. He is repeating something, whether consciously or not, which is wholly untrue. My hon. friend says that I spent some years, between 1914 and 1918, in another country. I did nothing of the kind. I spent those years for the most part in Canada. The book to which my hon. friend refers was written in Canada—every line of it. It is perfectly true that I did some work pertaining to industrial relations and war industries outside Canada in that period; but at no time since I came to reside in Ottawa in 1900 have I given up my residence in this city; at no time between 1914 and 1918 did I reside anywhere other than Ottawa, except temporarily.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I did not say, or did not intend to say that the book had been written other than in Canada. What the Prime Minister said he did during this period can be found on page 5338 of Hansard. He said he would not go into detail but he had spent considerable time studying social problems, in the nation to the south of us.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says I spent some years.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The right hon. gentleman said he had spent that period in another country. What I said will be found in Hansard to-morrow and can be checked. I said this book was written at this time; I did not say, in the country to the south of us. I said he spent considerable time there, and the Prime Minister's record will be found in the book in the parliamentary library from which I got these facts, and I do not think I went far astray. I am simply going through what he said with considerable heat the other day during the presentation of this bill, "putting my party first and the country second". I have always considered that his loyalty was with party first.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What I said with respect to party first when the Prime Minister interrupted me will be found in Hansard at page 5339.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member said to-night that I spoke "with considerable heat". That is something which hon. gentlemen opposite are seeking to repeat and repeat and repeat.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Part of the propaganda.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Part of their propaganda. I wish to say to my hon. friend that I spoke in no heat whatever in connection with this debate, and when hon. gentlemen seek to convey that impression by their words they are seeking to misrepresent the facts.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am prepared to say, "in a manner of eloquence", if it pleases the right hon. gentleman better. We are entitled to our own interpretation. I spoke on social security some seventeen or eighteen months ago—to be exact, on March 4—when I pointed out the record of the Prime Minister and what he had done for social security during these many years.

I have already referred to the report of the Rowell commission, which points out the great difficulties prevailing in this country and the impossibility of many provinces carrying out their functions in respect of social security as they would like to do; and I say that these difficulties have now been accentuated. I have set forth our proposal for collaboration with these provinces, which I think would be much more satisfactory than the proposed bill.

Other speakers have referred to the lack of nutrition in many families throughout Canada. I believe that the records of the department of the Minister of Pensions and National Health will prove that, for one reason or another, approximately half the families of this country lack adequate nutrition. I realize that some have told us that we have the highest standards in the world.

Mr. GARDINER: That is why the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) looks so well.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In an article sponsored by the government it is stated that, of twenty-six leading countries of the world, only four have a record of maternal deaths worse than Canada's. In four years, 1932 to 1935, Canada lost 70,000 infants under one year of age and another 33,000 mothers and still-born infants. Without going into other details, I think this proves what should be done to create health facilities in this country. Government investigation of Canadian children has shown, as I have already stated, that half of the nation's families are undernourished for one reason or another. It is also pointed out in the same article to which I have referred how much further advanced is the nation to the south of us in these matters than we are in Canada, how little we have done correspondingly and how much less money we have spent in this respect.

I wanted to make my position on this bill quite clear. As I stated at the beginning, I have always been in favour of family assistance. I have been opposed to this bill in detail, but I am going to support it because half a loaf is better than no bread and I am in favour of the objective. Speaking some eighteen months ago, I took exactly the same stand on the constitutional set-up as I am taking at this moment. On that occasion I said:

> I have already indicated, when speaking on the debate in reply to the speech from the throne,—

That is, in 1943.

> —that if social security legislation is to function properly, the British North America Act should be amended. If that is not done, the dominion and the provinces must get together and agree on certain matters—which to date they have not done.

That was some seventeen months ago and it has not yet been done.

> In the programme of the Progressive Conservative party as laid down in Winnipeg in December, 1942, we recognized the obligation of government to make available to every citizen adequate medical, dental, nursing, hospital and pre-natal care, and to further advance public health and nutritional principles so that health may be safeguarded.

I think that makes my stand perfectly clear and shows why I am supporting this bill. If I took up further time at this stage, Mr. Speaker, I would be only repeating many of the arguments that have already been advanced, and I do not care to do that at this time. I shall have some questions to ask when we are considering the bill in detail, but at the moment I would refer to one section to which reference was made by my colleague the member for Vancouver South, relating to the dependents of those now in the services. As he said, the government have all these records, and dependents' allowances are being paid in many cases. If this measure is to be put into effect and made really worth while, these dependents' allowances should be paid immediately. Another point was that the children of Canadian servicemen born in Britain are not entitled to family allowance until they return to Canada. That is unjust, and if this bill is to become law, these provisions should be made at this time.

Mr. M. E. McGARRY (Inverness-Richmond): I have no desire to prolong the debate before the house, but I wish to offer a few brief remarks on what I consider to be the most important measure designed for the social and economic welfare of the nation which probably has even been brought before this house. That Canada is a resourceful country is something that has never been denied and is a matter of world-wide knowledge. There is no doubt about it that nature has been very bountiful in her gifts to this great dominion, but a superabundance of resources, diversified as they may be, will not alone achieve greatness for Canada. In order to exploit these resources we must have a healthy, vigorous, intelligent citizenship. The adage that the health of the nation is the wealth of the nation has never been marred by the ages; it is just as terse a truth to-day as it was 100 years ago, and the greatest student of economics will point out that the most valuable asset that a nation possesses is a healthy, vigorous, intelligent population; while on the other hand a puny, unintelligent population is the nation's greatest liability.

This bill is designed to improve our social and economic conditions, but under present conditions it is very difficult to enlist into this great and noble programme of betterment every person who is interested in this admirable forward movement. It is impossible under our present conditions to afford equality of opportunity for all who I know are willing to enter into this crusade. Our wage regulations to-day are not flexible enough to take care of the wide discrepancy between the cost of living and his income for the man with a family in the low wage scale, because his income cannot be supplemented and he is not on an equality in earning, from the point of view of the cost of living, with the bachelor, with the young man with no dependents, or the married man who has no family. I believe there is no other corrective for this discrepancy than this very measure that has been brought down to-day. We say that the all-important thing is to have a healthy, intelligent nation. Take the father of a family in the low wage category. He has to accept the same income as the young man who has no dependents. How is that father going to carry on his domestic obligations and the charges that fall upon him in supporting his family and educating his children? If we are going to propagate and improve the health of our nation, the greatest requisite of all is proper nutrition of the children when they are in their formative years. This bill makes provision for those who cannot afford to give proper, adequate nutrition to their children.

Let us turn next to the question of education. There are many families who will participate in these allowances who can give adequate and proper nutrition to their children. What happens in those cases? These allowances contribute to the better education of their children. If these families can afford to nourish their children they can set aside this allowance so that it will accumulate into a repository that can be utilized later for the advanced education of their children. Those of us who have had experience in teaching school have often been very sorry when we found young children in the lower grades who demonstrated mental acuteness and gave evidence sometimes of the promise of a worthwhile manhood, and who should have had the advantage of going into advanced education. But what happened when they were through with common school education? They were forced to retire from the field of education, and the result is to-day we have some men who inherently are extremely bright but who have had to retire to the pick-and-shovel class simply because they did not have anything to start them on their way. I myself have known young men who, I believe, if they had had enough money to start in their first collegiate year, would have shown such mental assets that many philanthropists, recognizing their ability, would have carried them right through their collegiate course.

With regard to the health side, those of us who have had the experience of practising medicine, particularly in general practice, have seen hundreds of cases of young men and women who I really think went down to an early death because they did not have the resistance to the disease that laid siege to them on account of the lack of proper nutrition in their formative years. As I said at the beginning, I am absolutely of opinion that there never was a measure brought into this house or any other house of parliament that has the same virtue as this measure with which we are now dealing.

Some mention has been made of the cost. Some raised the objection that we are spending $200,000,000, but we must realize that we are spending almost that amount of money every day on a programme of death and destruction, almost as much in one day on a programme of death and destruction as we are to pay under this measure in a whole year, a measure that is intended to bring about in this Canada of ours what we think is the initiation of a new day and a new heaven and a new earth. When we consider the dividends that will be paid on this small expenditure of money in the way of better health, less hospitalization, less medical costs, less loss of man-power days, I think every hon. member and every individual in Canada will feel that the expenditure is well justified.

Another objection that is advanced against this measure is that there is some fear that the mothers will not make proper use of this money. Having had some experience with mothers in their homes and with their families, I say that I have every confidence in the mothers. I know the solicitude that they have for their children. These mothers who are so tolerant of the restrictions that have been placed upon them during the stress and strain of war, those mothers who have done so much to contribute to this war effort, can be well trusted with every dollar of this money. They will see that it is put aside and used in behalf of the welfare of their children.

We have listened to some other objections. We have heard the constitutional feature of it advanced to-day. I am not a lawyer and I will not enter into that field, but I have confidence in our chief. I do not think he would bring this measure into the house and make the forecast that he made if he did not feel that it was constitutionally operative. I have listened to men on this side of the house who, I think, are just as good authorities as any on the other side of the house. They were supported by the ablest lawyers of the British empire and I am perfectly satisfied that this measure is constitutionally sound.

Then we heard another complaint that this is a matter of bribe. Do you imagine, Mr. Speaker, that our chieftain who has led this great party for twenty-five years would be silly enough on the eve of an election to bribe children who are in the cradle to-day in order to get their votes at the next election? To my mind that is very silly. I will offer this warning to the people who use that as a hurdle to the advancement of this measure, that it is hopeless to expect that when these children come to voting age, which will be twenty-one years from now, they can count on their support for having offered this objection to this great measure which is designed to help the youth of the land.

The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) says that this measure of social welfare should not be brought in at all. He says that in the city of Toronto they have public welfare institutions which are looking after their children. Well, the city of Toronto does not comprise the whole of Canada, and if those philanthropic institutions in Toronto want to carry on with their philanthropy they can do so, despite the fact that this measure comes into effect, a measure in behalf of the youth of the whole of Canada.

The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) suggested that instead of this measure there should be a uniform standard of wages. Well, that will not help the situation of the man who has a large family compared with the man who has no domestic obligations of that kind. What this bill is designed to do is to bring about equality of opportunity and the establishment of a uniform wage rate would leave matters exactly where they are to-day. As I said at the outset, Mr. Speaker, I believe that this is the most important social welfare measure that has ever been brought into this house or into any other house. Despite the criticisms offered and the hurdles that some hon. members have cast in its path, I believe it is so good and popular and so full of virtue that there is not a man or a woman who sits in this house that would dare undertake to vote against it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): On a question of privilege, the last speaker said that I suggested that uniform wages should be instituted rather than any family payments. I said that the measure of family allowances should be used to help create a standard of wages. He misquoted me. I know he does not want to be unfair.

Mr. A. H. BENCE (Saskatoon City): In my opinion the vast resources of this country require a very much greater population than we have at the present time. That increase in population can be obtained only through two means: first of all, through immigration and, second, by raising the birthrate of this country. I believe in the principle of properly selected immigration. At the same time I believe it is essential in the interest of the future of this country that we should give further encouragement to the matter of the production of our children. I want to take this opportunity to point out that in my opinion the birth rate, particularly in the English-speaking sections of this country, is not nearly as high as it should be. At the risk of appearing impertinent I suggest that there are many people in this country who have failed to assume their proper responsibility in regard to the survival of our nation. Many people may suggest that this is none of my business; but in view of the information given to us, which indicates that the birthrate, particularly in the English-speaking sections, is going down considerably, I believe that it is a matter of concern, and that any person who has the future of his country at heart should at least draw to the attention of the people of Canada this alarming situation. I was particularly struck with the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in dealing with this measure at page 5330 of Hansard, when he said:

> I draw attention particularly to the following statement. According to the 1941 census, of the gainfully employed, 48 per cent are single; 39 per cent of the married or widowed have no children under sixteen and 40 per cent of those with children under sixteen have only one child. What this means is that 84 per cent of the children in Canada under sixteen are dependent upon only 19 per cent of the gainfully employed. In other words, the major burden of raising the next generation and perpetuating the Canadian nation falls on less than one-fifth of our working population.

I suggest that this statement should arouse the thinking people of this country. The other day I noticed some figures supplied by the bureau of statistics which indicated that the ratio of children under seventeen per family for the whole of Canada is only 2·06, while in only one province, namely Quebec, is the ratio greater than two per family. No doubt I will invite criticism in making this suggestion to the people of Canada, but I believe they must reconsider their position with respect to whether or not they are going to limit their families to none or one or two children so that they may be able to continue to live in comparative luxury, or whether they are prepared more adequately to discharge their obligation to the nation, even though that may mean a more restricted standard of living as far as they personally are concerned. In offering that suggestion I do not wish to be misunderstood. My criticism is levelled against all of us, not by any means excluding myself.

With respect to the measure now before the house, of course in my opinion it is not a proper solution of the problem with which we are confronted. Obviously a proper solution would be to raise wage levels and incomes of the people of Canada, and bring about a better distribution of the productivity of the country across the various classes. Too many people do not now receive a return in proportion to the efforts they put forth on behalf of this nation. I believe that if we had a proper standard of distribution of the productivity of this nation there would be no necessity for a measure of this kind; but realizing that we have not reached this happy state, that we have not reached the point where there is a proper relationship as between the earners of this country, I am prepared to support a measure which will put the people in the lower income brackets in a position to raise children without materially reducing their standard of living. To the extent that this proposed legislation will assist parents to bring up their children under better conditions, both physically and morally, I am prepared to support it.

Mr. BENCE: I can assure you that my leader will not be left alone. If you want me to go into some of the arguments he placed before this house I shall be glad to do so, because I agree with them. In a few moments I am going to indicate why I believe the proposed legislation was not properly considered before being brought into this house, and if I may I am going to suggest that the Prime Minister and the administration should have gone into the matter much more carefully before introducing it.

In addition to assisting those in the low income groups at least to retain their standard of living when they are prepared to discharge their great obligation by raising children, this legislation does something else for which I am prepared to support it. That is, it endeavours to solve the problem of the distribution of purchasing power in the country. While I believe that the administration should have brought in a measure which would have dealt with that problem directly rather than indirectly, still because in a measure this legislation does help to spread purchasing power across the whole of the people, I am prepared to support it. But I repeat the assertion I made in the first place, that the welfare of our people should be predicated upon a better system of distribution of the wealth of the country, according to the contribution each makes to the production of those things which are required in the life of this nation. I believe also that our success or failure in the reconstruction period will depend upon whether or not we raise the lower wage levels of our people. I agree with the conclusion reached by the chairman of the reconstruction council of my own province, who indicated that if we expect to achieve that measure of prosperity we all anticipate and hope for, we shall have to do something to ensure that the wage levels in the lower brackets of this country are increased.

In that connection I am concerned, as other hon. members have been, with the possible effect of this legislation upon the wage levels of the country. I believe that the fears which have been expressed by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), and by many labour leaders throughout the country are entirely justified. When I began to consider this angle of the matter I wondered what was the position with respect to that application to the national war labour board by the railway employees of Canada, which I believe is causing the administration considerable concern at the present time. I am wondering whether or not there is a possibility that the decision on that matter, which has been held up for some time, was being delayed until this legislation had been adopted by the parliament of Canada. If that is so, I want to protest very strongly against it. I say that because the matter of family allowances, which would not come into effect until a year from now, certainly can have nothing to do with the question as to whether or not a body of men are entitled to an increase in their pay at this time.

I agree with those who have suggested that the whole matter of labour relations and other matters affecting the provinces should have been reviewed with the provinces before this legislation was brought to the House of Commons, in order that some method might have been achieved under which we would have had a minimum standard of wages, and a uniformity of legislation with respect to the many social welfare problems confronting the Canadian people. I believe that those provinces should have been consulted, because they are interested in many angles of the question. Any matter which relates to the social welfare of our people is a matter concerning which, in our opinion, the provinces should have been consulted. Surely the matter of family allowances, which will take such a large portion of the taxpayers' money, should have been considered in relation to all the other social necessities over which the provinces have control and jurisdiction.

The whole matter of this legislation has been approached piecemeal. Why was the subject of family allowances picked out and thrown into the picture? Why at the same time were not some of the other problems with which we are so very much concerned, dealt with? Why was not the matter of finance carefully considered with the provinces? Why were not jurisdictional differences considered? Why were not the peculiar needs of each of the respective provinces gone into carefully before any decision was made to spend $200,000,000 on this scheme? In my opinion it was too bad that a well integrated and cohesive system of social security was not worked out, and a concrete plan presented to parliament before one angle of it was thrown into the legislative sea.

As Mr. Marsh points out in his report on social security for Canada—and this is found at page 88, where he deals with cash allowances as part of a social security system:

> The third method is to recognize children's allowances in forthright fashion, as a specific social security measure justified on its own merits. What is envisaged in this report is a children's allowance system considered as a unit along with unemployment insurance, health insurance, disability insurance, and other measures in the social security system, but geared into them at every point where they belong. Not only is this logical, but it will contribute immensely to administrative simplicity and efficiency if this plan is adopted. This has now been indicated at many points in preceding sections, and requires no further emphasis.

Where in the present system of social welfare measures have we any integration whatsoever, so far as the dominion and the provinces are concerned? I suggest we have none. We just grab here and grab there, do this and do that, without any consideration of the vast, broad picture involved.

I am particularly interested in the implementing of most of the recommendations proposed in the report of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, commonly known as the Sirois report. It is my understanding that this commission studied the whole problem, and made recommendations with respect to the reallocation of responsibilities ,and the sources of revenue of the provinces and the dominion. Those of us who come from the province of Saskatchewan feel keenly about the implementing of that report. We have felt that if many of the recommendations made had been adopted we would have obtained a place in the confederation which would be much fairer than the one we have had heretofore. We have found out that as a result of the peculiar situation in which we are placed, the responsibilities we have been asked to share under confederation are far greater than we are able to discharge in relation to our income.

That report, as I understand it, contemplated a broad approach to the whole question of social security, and, I believe, even had in mind the solution of the type of problems with which we are faced to-day in connection with family allowances. As an indication to the house of the state of mind of those who prepared the report, I should like to quote briefly from the recommendations made in connection with financing provincial and municipal social services. We find this at page 44 of book II of the recommendations:

> Our financial recommendations aim to place every province in a position to finance its own social welfare programme in accordance with average Canadian standards, and to make such adjustments with its municipalities in the financing of this programme as seems to it reasonable. Moreover, provision for periodical revision of adjustment grants and for emergency grants should enable each province not only to protect its standards in social services, but also to improve them at the average pace maintained by the provinces as a whole. This method we believe will ensure to the provinces not only the capacity to provide reasonable welfare services for their people, but complete autonomy in the formulation of their social welfare policies, in the choice between alternative services and between alternative methods, and in the administration of their services.

And then it went on to say:

> This does not rule out the possibility of dominion assistance by grants-in-aid for particular services (e.g. mothers' allowances or special health measures) should the dominion so decide. It is indeed possible that dominion assistance of this sort might be a means of improving, or coordinating, or equalizing particular provincial services, and it is possible that the national interest might on occasion justify such a step.

I suggest it is obvious from that report that the commission had clearly in mind the thought that there would be a getting together of the provinces and the dominion for the purpose of solving these problems as a whole. It is my belief that the Prime Minister would have been far better off in the long run if this plan had come out of a dominion-provincial conference, after the whole matter of social welfare, finance and reallocation of jurisdiction had been carefully gone into, and agreement arrived at.

It seems to me the main premise for the solution of most of our social welfare problems lies in a consideration of the recommendations of that report, and a working out of a scheme which will eradicate the present constitutional difficulties. After all, there are many other things we must consider besides family allowances, important as they are. There is, for instance, the matter of education. There is the matter of a badly needed increase in the payment of old age pensions. There is the matter of blind pensions, and some sort of aid for people who are totally incapacitated and who have no means with which to keep themselves. There are many other social problems which should have been worked out before it was decided to spend $200,000,000 on this particular project.

I should like to know how the expenditure of $200,000,000 will affect these other measures. How will it affect the question of whether or not we shall be able to give the provinces those things which possibly we had in mind in the way of new fields of taxation and that kind of thing? When the provinces come for aid in connection with these various matters will they be told that we are now spending $200,000,000 on family allowances and that, therefore, we have no money for them? When we reiterate our demands for a decent old age pension, shall we be told that the money is not available because $200,000,000 is being spent on family allowances?

If the administration say that they cannot do this, there are one or two questions I wish to ask. First, why not? Second, if you cannot do it, why was that position not considered before you embarked on this very large expenditure? As a matter of fact the old age pensioners of this country cost the dominion government only $31,569,780, or, in round figures, about thirty-one and a half million dollars. When we are going to spend $200,000,000 on our children I can see no reason why we should not spend the money required to assist our older people. In view of the arguments that have been advanced in this house with respect to the constitution and the availability of finances, we should not have to listen to excuses that this matter has to be put off to a future date.

Before I close this particular phase of the matter I should like to ask the administration a further question. Will the cost of the legislation that is now before us prejudice in any way the implementing of the Sirois commission report?

I agree with those who have suggested that this legislation places too much power in the hands of the minister. I concur with those who have advanced arguments that the legislation is too bare, that we should have before us most if not all of the regulations which will affect the lives of the children and the parents to whom these grants will be given. In view of the fact that the minister has the power to withhold payment, if he wants to, from vast numbers of people, it is not too much to ask that this house should have all the information available and all the regulations the administration can place before the country at this time.

Before the bill is finally passed I believe it should go back for redrafting in order that some of these matters may be ironed out, and in order that the regulations which the government has in mind may be presented to this house before the bill is made law.

Before I close I wish to say a word about the constitutional angle. This matter was covered most admirably this afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre, and I do not propose to traverse all the arguments he presented. I know the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) treated the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) with a certain amount of scorn when he suggested that this legislation was not constitutional. I know the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) just brushed aside the possibility of its not being constitutional.

But in view of the position which was advanced this afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre; in view of the stand taken by the Prime Minister in 1931 when the old age pensions legislation was being considered; in view of the statement that he made then to the house to the effect that to be on the safe side the whole matter should be considered from the constitutional angle and if the government was going to pay 100 per cent of the old age pensions then the British North America Act would have to be changed; in view of the statements contained in the report made by Senator Gouin and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George to the government in connection with the Sirois commission report, and further, in view of the grave doubts which have been expressed with respect to the constitutionality of the old age pensions legislation, I suggest that the Prime Minister should have the matter reviewed from a constitutional point of view before this legislation is put into effect.

I say that because it would be a terrible thing if, after the scheme had been put into effect, it was found that it was not constitutional. I suppose any taxpayer who felt aggrieved at the legislation could easily take steps in that regard. If the Prime Minister feels about this legislation as he has felt about similar legislation in the past, then I beileve he will take this step before it is put into effect.

I assert again that if it is definitely clear that the legislation is constitutional, then the Prime Minister should, in conjunction with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), reconsider the position which has been expressed in this house on many occasions during this parliament by the Minister of Finance as to whether or not the administration will take over the old age pensions and pay an amount sufficient for these old people to live on.

I am going to vote for this measure because I believe in the principle of granting assistance to the children of our country. Our children are the greatest asset that this country has. I am going to vote for this measure for the reasons I expressed a short time ago, because I believe it will assist in solving one of our greatest problems, the proper distribution of purchasing power. But I believe it has been hastily put together. I believe it should have been prepared in conjunction and collaboration with the provinces.

I believe the Prime Minister might yet take steps to discuss with the provinces the various problems which I have outlined. Bad as it is in the sense that I have indicated, and containing the loopholes which I believe are there, nevertheless as far as I am concerned I am not prepared to vote against legislation which will in a measure assist our children and our poor people. I believe that it should be part of a properly integrated social security scheme worked out, as I have indicated, in conjunction with the provinces. But as far as the principle that lies behind it is concerned, as far as the intent with respect to the placing of the people of this country in a position where they can have and maintain children decently and adequately is concerned, then I am prepared to support the bill.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I would like first of all to congratulate the ministry upon its courage in introducing this bill at this time. I say that particularly because of the various threats which were made when the bill was first proposed and which have been echoed inside and outside this house. One of the most potent ones that was brought forward and held over the heads of the ministry was that it would affect the unity of Canada. The support which this measure has received from all parts of the house has shown that the decision of the ministry to introduce this bill has been more than vindicated. I am quite sure that if there had been anything vitally wrong with this measure the opposition parties would have screwed up their courage to the point of voting against it. But from what I can see there is not a single party in this house, in spite of all the threats and hints which were made beforehand, that is actually going to oppose the measure when it comes to a vote. So that once more the courage and wisdom of this administration are being vindicated for all the country to see.

With regard to the constitutional argument I believe that a reading of the various decisions made in recent years demonstrates that our dominion can spend its money to promote the welfare of its citizens, under "peace, order and good government", without having to get consent of any Province in the way which is proposed. But the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Bence) has depicted the terrible situation which would develop if these allowances were commenced and later it were found that the bill was unconstitutional. I do not think that situation would be quite so terrible as the hon. member suggests. If this measure gets the strong support of the house and the senate which it appears it is going to get, it will be apparent that the almost unanimous opinion of this parliament, expressed by both houses, is that it should be put through by the dominion parliament; and the ease with which, in a similar case, we got the necessary amendment of the constitution in order to enact the unemployment insurance measure shows that we can easily secure a confirmatory amendment of the British North America Act if there were any question about the constitutionality of this measure. It is strange that under these circumstances, seeing that we have, as a matter of fact, absolute control of our constitution, and when all parties uphold this measure, we should spend hours and hours debating whether we have the right to put it through. A simple resolution of this house and the other house is all that would be required.

Mr. BENCE: There would have to be first the consent of the provinces.

Mr. TUCKER: No. We did not have to get the consent of the provinces with regard to various amendments of the British North America Act which we obtained in past years, and we certainly would not have to get it in regard to this measure. When opposition members are reduced to that argument in order to oppose this bill it shows a bankruptcy of thought and policy.

Mr. BENCE: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. TUCKER: Yes.

Mr. BENCE: If this measure were declared unconstitutional, would the hon. member be in favour of changing the constitution without the consent of the provinces?

Mr. TUCKER: My answer to that is that when the Canadian people want this measure, as will appear from its passing almost unanimously in this house and the other house; when there is apparently no opposition from the provinces to the dominion taking this tremendous responsibility upon itself, I would have no hesitation in upholding, just as I support this bill, the necessary change in the constitution if such were necessary in order to bring the legislation within the powers of this parliament. Why should I not do so? If a bill like this were put before the British parliament, the very fact that people voted for it would indicate that they wanted to have it in force. If I vote for this bill in this parliament it is a sign that I want to have it in force in Canada. If it were necessary to pass a resolution after we pass this bill in order that we may have the power to put it into force, I would just as readily support that resolution as I would support the bill itself. I hope that is an answer to the hon. member's question.

Mr. BENCE: That is not an answer to the question. I asked the hon. member if he would obtain the consent of the provinces before putting through the amendment to the constitution.

Mr. TUCKER: I do not think it is necessary to obtain the consent of the provinces to put into effect a measure such as this. But if there were any doubt about the matter, or if the payment of these allowances were in danger of being interrupted, I do not think any province would stand in the way or ask to be consulted. And if, in a great humanitarian measure like this, any province did stand in the way, I would say that its objection should not prevail against the will of the Canadian people.

An hon. member said something about the birthrate of this country; and what he said applies, I think, not only in Canada but throughout the white world. When I was recently attending the international monetary conference I had occasion at different times to talk to some of the Indian and Chinese delegates. One of the things which both of them emphasized was this, that practically every fourth person in the world is an Indian and every fourth person in the world is a Chinese. That, of course, indicates that one person out of every two in the world is either Chinese or an Indian. These people are basing their claims to certain things upon their share of the earth's population. Their delegates also pointed out to me that it is coming to be realized that the people of these races are not inferior, in ability to fight and defend themselves, to the white races. It was very clear to me that if the white race hopes to maintain its place in the world it must cease its present practice of limiting its families, or the time will come when it will have to yield its present position to the other races.

I agree with the hon. member for Saskatoon City in his suggestion that the implementing of the recommendations in the Sirois report should not be hindered through the passing of this bill, and I do not believe that such is the intention of the government. The whole basis of the recommendations in that report, as I understood it, was to provide the various provinces with the means of doing as well by their citizens in the realm of jurisdiction confided to them as any other part of the dominion is able to do. It is well recognized that, owing to fiscal and tariff arrangements in this country, the tendency is to concentrate great wealth in certain provinces, and if other provinces do not have access to the taxes levied upon those centres of wealth they will not be able to discharge their obligations under the constitution as well as provinces in more favoured areas. But these obligations are among the most important of any which are confided to either the dominion or the provinces. Education and medical attention are obviously among the most important obligations of any government. They are confided to our provinces, and one of the grievances of the western provinces has been that they have not had the means of providing the same standard of education or of medical attention to their children as has been possible in the more wealthy provinces of central Canada.

I said, in one of my first speeches after I had the honour of being elected to this house, and before I realized what was going to be required of some of our western Canadian boys, that I deplored the apparent assumption that there is such a thing as a second-class citizen as well as a first-class citizen in this country, that it was all right for a lad to be brought up and educated in Saskatchewan with not quite so good a chance as a person in the more favoured provinces. I said that if we were to have a united and harmonious confederation we had to treat all parts of our country the same, and do away with the idea that there should be parts of the country where some people were treated better than others.

Nowadays, hardly a week passes without its coming to my attention that some of these young lads who were brought up in Saskatchewan in the depression days, who often did not have enough to eat or the wherewithal to get a decent education, have given their lives for a country which told them and their parents in the days of the depression that they could not find the money to enable their parents to give them enough food and medical attention to bring them up as children should be brought up. That, I hope, and in fact I am sure, has been borne home to every person in the more favoured provinces. Of those lads who were denied those privileges, many are to-day defending this country; many of them have already given their lives in its defence; and never again must it be said to any Canadian family that we have not the money to provide them with the bare necessities of life so that they may have food and clothing, a reasonable education and medical attention in order that they may arrive at complete manhood and womanhood in the full possession of health and strength.

It is something for which I have been thankful ever since I came to this house that we have at the head of this administration a man who felt as our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) does, about the poor of this land. If as many things as we should like to see done for the poor have not been accomplished, I am sure it was not his fault, and to-day I rejoice in this measure and am thankful that he heads this administration, because in a great measure he is responsible for bringing it in at this particular time. I deplore the attitude of those who ask, why the haste? I would say on the contrary, why has there been a delay? I cannot understand the members of the Progressive Conservative party asking, why the haste? I am glad that the measure has now been brought in. I am happy that it is being done now, and I express my humble and deep appreciation of this administration in acknowledging this achievement. I am glad they did not listen to any quibbles about constitutional obstacles.

I remember very well when the same arguments were advanced in connection with old age pensions, that we had not the constitutional power to do such things. If our present leader had not decided to go ahead with the old age pension legislation, regardless of such arguments about jurisdictional problems—and such arguments were advanced then, just as they are being advanced now in connection with this proposed measure—I suppose we would never have had old age pensions to-day. Many times as I talk to old people to-day and see how much better their last days have been because of the old age pension they receive from month to month, I have thanked God that the Prime Minister felt as he does toward the poor of this country, so that he saw to it that the evening of their lives was made happier and more comfortable by reason of old age pensions, and that he had not listened to quibbles and arguments that we had not the constitutional power. I remember it was argued at that time that that legislation might be declared ultra vires, just as it is said that the legislation before us at the moment will be ruled ultra vires. But I have not seen any province object to it, nor have I seen it ruled ultra vires; and certainly if the grant made in connection with old age pensions is not ultra vires, and no attempt has been made to declare it ultra vires, there is even less likelihood of this measure being so ruled.

There is another suggestion, why take up this particular bit of legislation? There are many other problems, it is said. Well, I do not think much attention should be paid to that argument. You cannot make a better beginning than to make sure that the children of the country are well looked after through a minimum measure of well-being. Surely it is not suggested that we should not do anything until we are able to do everything. You have to start somewhere. We have looked after unemployment insurance and old age pensions, and now we are starting to look after the minimum standard of well-being for the children of the nation. In my opinion that is the greatest measure for the good of the nation in the days that lie ahead, greater than any other measure that has been introduced into this parliament since confederation.

I commend the speech of the leader of the government when he introduced the bill, pointing out how an investment in the health of our children, in the food, clothing, shelter, medical attention and so on which they require, would bear rich dividends in the days that lie ahead. Thinking back over the period of depression in Saskatchewan and of some of my neighbours, some of the casual labouring people who were trying to bring up families of five and six, and knowing, as we all do in a small town, pretty intimately the circumstances of everybody, I knew the income of some of those people, and I often wondered how in the world they managed to clothe and feed their children and send them to school as well as they were doing. Some of those children were brought up on incomes which I am sure hon. members would regard as impossible; nevertheless they went to school and did well, and they have gone into the world and become good citizens. Many of them, as I have said, are in the armed forces and some have already been decorated in this war.

When I hear people who are highly placed, enjoying good incomes, saying that we dare not trust such people with the money because they will not use it to help their children, that it will not be properly applied, I should like to have some of these members see what was accomplished by some of those neighbours of mine with the little amount they had from year to year. I know of families during those depression years, the families of returned soldiers who were getting very small pensions, some of them having to live on the war veterans' allowance, which was around $40 a month, and some of the heads of those families could not get other work and had to subsist on that allowance of $40 a month. I have known a family where that was practically the only income for several years and they had five children. Somehow or another, those children were looked after and brought up and to-day two of those boys are overseas fighting for their country.

I do not know of a single pensioner or returned soldier who is in receipt of money from the government in the way of pensions or war veterans' allowance, where practically every bit of money that came into the house did not go to look after the children, to procure food and clothing and provide education and who has not been grateful for that assistance. I think the money paid by this country in pensions to returned soldiers of the last war, apart from the fact that it was an obligation to those men, has already borne fruit in this war in the type of children brought up in those homes, where there was a measure of gratitude to the country for looking after them when they needed looking after.

The Prime Minister dealt eloquently in his speech with this aspect of the matter, and I do not think that people who are in receipt of a good income, or who have confidence in their ability to earn a good income, can have any appreciation of the haunting fear that stalks a household where a man has to live on casual earnings and where very often, if he does not earn even $5, the question presents itself, where will they be able to provide for the children the following day? I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that in a country as rich as Canada that sort of situation is not good enough for the kind of people that we have here, people who have shown themselves to be capable of almost measureless self-sacrifice in connection with this war. Canada owes something better than that to the kind of citizens we have in this country, as they have shown themselves to be in the last war and in this war. I rejoice that now there is going to be given to all citizens of Canada some measure of security such as was given in the war veterans' allowances or to those in receipt of pensions in the past few years.

We see that striving for security on the part of some of the highly placed citizens of our country. We see that on the part of the judges who wanted to see that their families were looked after. This parliament does not hesitate to take steps to see to it that people placed in those positions receive a certain amount of security. We see it with regard to the civil servants who serve their country in the civil service. We do not hesitate to appropriate money to see to it that they are looked after in their old age. Surely the average taxpayer who is not in receipt of an income from the country but who, in fact, helps to build up the nation and contributes toward the income of the country, is entitled to the minimum standard of living.

[Mr. Tucker.]

In addition to the benefit which this will give to the children of the nation, there is that element of the banishing of fear from the homes, the banishing of fear from the hearts and minds of the parents of the children and from the children themselves. That alone is a great step forward. After all, in this country we do not let our people starve to death. I have wondered why it is that we have not before this given them some measure of security by telling them that they can rely upon us, not as a matter of charity, but in this wealthy country of ours where we produce ample food, clothes and shelter for all our people we could tell them that if, through no fault of their own, they are unable to earn these things themselves they are going to have it as a matter of right; and to the extent that this measure does not give that minimum standard of livelihood to the people of this country I would hope that it would be supplemented by other measures which would give that minimum standard of life.

One of the arguments that have been used throughout the country against the present system is that we have want in the midst of plenty; that we produce more food than we can possibly use ourselves, more clothes, more shelter, plenty of doctors to look after the medical needs of our people, plenty of teachers to look after their educational needs, and that if we do not then give a reasonable standard of living to all our people our system is not functioning properly. That is a reasonable argument. The organization of the state exists to serve the people, and it must be so organized as to serve the people. If it is not organized to serve the people and give them what they are able to produce as a people, give them security, give them that minimum standard of living, then they will change the organization of the state. Some people ask "Why was not this done before?" My answer to that is that we live in a democratic state, and while there may be far-sighted people who perhaps many, many years ago would have liked to give this minimum standard of welfare to our people, we know that throughout the country there were the fearful ones who said: "Where is the money to come from?" and all that sort of thing. They thwarted the will of those who realized that these things were possible. I rejoice that at last that bogey has been laid to rest once and for all; that never again will it be used as an argument against giving the standard of living that this nation is able to provide for its people; that we cannot find the money to do it. To those people who worry about the $200,000,000 that is to be spent per year on this measure, I say that the only limitation upon the good things of life that we should provide for our people should be the limitation on what we are able to provide for them by our industry within Canada and our ability to produce here and procure goods from outside the country with our production within the country.

Of course, living in a country such as ours, that means that if we are to have a high standard of living we must have world trade, and I rejoice in the attitude of our party because I realize that it is fundamental, if we are to have a high standard of living, to be able to trade our great surpluses for the surpluses of other countries that produce things we cannot produce. But while we are striving for an increase in world trade to raise the standard of living of all our people we should never lose sight of the fact, as the Prime Minister pointed out, that we produce most of the basic necessities of life in abundance within Canada. I rejoice that by this measure we are now going to help to supply those basic necessaries of life to all of the children of this land of ours. I hope that once and for all that argument is going to be laid to rest, that we are such a stupid people that we permit our children to go in want alongside granaries bursting with grain and other foodstuffs that are spoiling, and that that situation will not prevail in the future.

One argument that has been used against this bill is that it will destroy the self-reliance of our people. I think that was well answered by the Prime Minister. I think, Mr. Speaker, that for one man who has been made strong by adversity there is at least one man who has been broken by adversity.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One? Thousands.

Mr. TUCKER: Perhaps many more than one. It will be found, I think, that it is the strong of this world, those who manage to bend environment to their own advantage, who glory in their strength, who talk about the fact that every man should stand on his own feet, not realizing that people are all different, physically, mentally and otherwise. That some people by their physical ability, their health and strength or by their mental ability are able to build up a competence for themselves is true. Surely the organized state should say to the man who has found it too difficult to look after the family which he has, by his own unaided efforts, "You are making a great contribution to the future of your country; you are doing the best you can; to the extent that you are falling short, the state, which is your fellow-citizens, will come to your rescue and see to it that those future citizens whom you have brought into the world and have in your charge do not come to want." I suggest that if you say to a man, "No matter whether you have health or strength; no matter whether you live or die, your children are assured of enough food, enough clothes and shelter, and their mother will not be in want," that man will face the future in good heart. He will be ready in time of need to go to the defence of his country because he feels that his country has stood by him and has always guaranteed him a living for his loved ones. He will serve his family, his community and his nation with more devotion than one could ever expect of a man who felt that he had to carry the load himself without hope of help from his fellow citizens.

Therefore I say it is entirely fitting, at a time like this, that we should say to the fathers and mothers of this land, "We are going to ensure you a minimum standard of living for your children, no matter whether or not you have health, whether you live or die." I rejoice in this measure for that reason. Not only will it strengthen the future citizens of this country; it will strengthen the present citizens and increase their devotion to their community and their country, and their joy in life. After all, we know that one of the things that detract from the joy of life is worry over what the future may bring, not only to yourself but to your loved ones. If you can be sure that the future has nothing bad in store for your loved ones in the event of anything happening to you, then you can apply yourself to the tasks of the day with a light heart, without being harassed by fear for the future.

I do not say this measure goes as far as I should like to see it go in that regard, but as with other measures I have supported since I have been in this house I realize there has to be a beginning. I have been very happy to support the beginnings of many worthwhile projects since I have had the privilege and honour of sitting in this house under the leadership of the Prime Minister, and I am grateful for that privilege. These measures have not always gone as far as I should like to see them go, but at least they were a start in the right direction, and as they have worked out well they have been extended.

The argument has been advanced that this work could be better done through the social agencies. Some people who live in the larger cities of this country talk about their splendid schools, about the noon lunches that are provided for children, about the medical attention they receive and about all the other things that are provided for children in these larger centres, and then ask why we are going ahead with a measure like this. It must be that they have never left the large cities, or, if they have gone through the country, they have kept their eyes closed. Services such as they describe cannot be provided in the small urban centres or the rural sections of this country. A very large proportion of our people live in those small urban centres and rural areas; and the social agencies built up in the large centres could not begin to take the place of these grants, which will enable parents to provide their children with more of the basic necessities of life.

Mention was made of food and clothing, but other difficulties were experienced in Saskatchewan even before the war. Because of the lack of money and purchasing power in the hands of the farmers in many of the rural areas of Saskatchewan, doctors found that they could not make enough out of their practices to pay expenses, and they had to leave. For distances of perhaps fifty to sixty miles there would be no doctor at all. In the winter time, after the roads were closed, the women in isolated farm homes would be snowbound, with the nearest doctor perhaps fifty miles away, knowing full well that if anything happened to one of the children or to themselves the crisis would have to be faced without medical help. If this purchasing power is placed in the hands of our people it will enable all districts to be better served as far as medical attention goes.

It is well known that there has been great disparity between the income of the rural areas and that of the urban areas. It is also well known that families in rural areas are larger, on the average, than those in urban areas. This measure will tend to overcome that disparity in income, and for that reason also I welcome it. It will help substantially in redressing that balance. In western Canada we experience crop failures from time to time, and our people are most grateful for the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, which gives them a certain amount of security in the event of the occurrence of that disaster. But the payments are not large, and these additional allowances will give them an even greater feeling of security. This will greatly add to the joy of living on our western prairies.

I have been discouraged and surprised by the attitude of a few labour leaders in this country who have opposed this measure. They may feel that by organizing they can drive up wages; but do they not realize that great numbers of people, including the casual wage-earning class, the so-called white collar class, and the people on our farms, cannot be assisted by their organizations? Surely their opposition to this measure, if we look at it purely from their own point of view, should have been tempered by the thought that, after all, the greater part of the population of this country cannot organize in labour unions but is going to receive a tremendous benefit under this legislation. When they study the figures which have been given in this debate I hope they will withdraw the opposition they have expressed toward this most statesmanlike legislation.

In moving the second reading of this bill the Prime Minister referred to the Atlantic charter. I well remember when the Atlantic charter was signed and the suggestion was made that we were going to devote ourselves to bringing about freedom from fear and freedom from want among our people. At that time we felt that if we could bring about some amelioration of those conditions among our people it would be perhaps some compensation for the measureless misery and suffering of this war. If now, having held out those hopes to this nation, we do not follow through with measures which will bring about freedom from fear and freedom from want, we shall create a feeling from one end of this country to the other that our leaders have not been sincere with the people. I rejoice that this spirit of following through in connection with those hopes and promises which were held out to our beleaguered people in the dark days of 1940 has been made manifest as the star guiding this administration in the measures it is now taking looking to the well-being of our people.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. TUCKER: Surely, Mr. Speaker, the sacrifices made by our people at home; their willingness to devote themselves to the welfare of their country; the spirit in which many have left their loved ones, their children and gone forward into the hell of battle; the willingness with which our young people have risked everything they possess, all merit the support of this house and of future houses for all measures which will ensure that this devotion is properly requited by a grateful people.

Mr. G. E. WOOD (Brant): Mr. Speaker, it is with a measure of pride that I take this opportunity of supporting this most humanitarian piece of legislation, and also supporting my distinguished leader in this measure which I believe is dear to his heart. May I congratulate the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) upon the vigorous and splendid manner in which he marshalled his thoughts when speaking on this measure. I must confess some jealousy of his ability along those lines, but I would also say that it was most pleasing to listen to him.

In the short time I have at my disposal I shall endeavour to express my views, the views of a common person, one who has never experienced poverty, who has never enjoyed luxury, who has always had plenty to eat, plenty to wear and plenty to do. I have always, however, understood the positions of those who have not been as fortunate as I have.

I am inclined to the view that our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), my disguished leader, has taken his present attitude because of his memory of things which might have happened in his early family life. Only recently I had occasion to look into the early history of Canada, particularly as it relates to the Indians in my constituency, and the manner in which those who held legislative positions in the country at that time, a time when my leader's grandfather was endeavouring to champion the rights of the common people to responsible government, filched from the Indians $160,000. That was the same group which probably was responsible for the exile of the grandfather of our present leader. Because of that, the birth of his mother took place in poverty-stricken conditions, and under circumstances which almost cost her life. Had that happened we would not have had in Canada to-day this distinguished Prime Minister. I am inclined to the view that the fact we all cherish championing contributions our forefathers have made in the past prompted him to give consideration to that which is so near to him.

I mention this because, in my duty as a member of parliament, I discovered these things. That is what prompted me to think this legislation is the product of that experience, and I believe it is what prompted my leader to advance it. From the point of view of the farmer, as the hon. member for Rosthern has pointed out, this legislation is something which the farmers, and those others who obtain a good share of their living in kind, but not in money, will accept readily. It will enable them to secure for their children some of those better things in life, and possibly make it possible to give a more balanced ration, and thereby to develop healthier children.

I am inclined to think this is one of the first measures in which the farmer has been permitted to share and share alike with urban folk. I was interested in the comment of the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Bence). Had I been a Conservative, myself, I think I would be opposing this legislation, on the grounds of paternalism, charity, and all the things that go with it. Fortunately, however, I do not happen to be a Conservative, and I cannot accept the view of a former speaker to the effect that a division has been closely drawn in orthodox thinking. I still say that Liberalism is a state of mind, and I do not think it can be changed. It is, in fact, a progressive state of mind, one of those things with which we are born. We all have in us the positive and negative sides. At times there are places for Conservatism, times when we must consolidate the ground won by advanced Liberal thought.

But in these times we are looking for further advancement. When the hon. member for Saskatoon City made the claim that the solution of our problems was to be found in increasing wages—

Mr. BENCE: I said one of them.

Mr. WOOD: Well, all right, one of them. I have not been able to accept that view. It would be a very nice one to accept, of course, because everybody likes to have more money either in wages or from the sale of his produce. But we must remember that increased wages increase costs of production and the purchasing power of the dollar is immediately destroyed. There is just so much national wealth, and when one person gets more than his share the other fellow has to do with less. If we are to compete in the open markets of the world in the disposal of our surplus products, we must remember that we have to consider costs of production. People who are buying our produce are not going to consider our standard of living. It will be a clear-cut business proposition, and we would be wise to keep that thought in mind. After all, if the labouring man can buy the necessities of life at a lower price, he is already enjoying an increase in wages by virtue of that increased purchasing power.

Another reason for my acceptance of this legislation is the encouragement it must give to Canadian-born children. It has been my experience that men born and reared in this country generally enjoy a certain standard of living and of ideals. Those who come in through a method of immigration import with them many of those characteristics and ideas which infect the country to-day. It might be wise to make an analysis of our parliamentary guide. I believe, if we did that, it would be found that my statement is borne out to a very great extent.

Those old pioneers, people who thought in the orthodox fashion, came to this country and cut down the stubborn forests. They did not ask for any special privileges; they did not ask to have things other people had. They took over their land, and produced those things which would increase their standard of living. They did not ask for a share of the production, or for a share of what other people had already earned. They did not become socialistic, or place themselves in a position to take what generations had sacrificed to develop.

I believe we can maintain a Canadian standard of ideals by encouraging more Canadian-born children. As the hon. member for Rosthern said, many people ask, How are we going to finance this? Because of advanced systems of transportation and communication we have to-day large companies, some of which have developed on an international scale. Sometimes they corral to themselves a monopoly of business, and by virtue of that fact create great volume of wealth. I take the view that because the law has protected those great companies, and has permitted them to continue in the enjoyment of their great possessions, the same law should enable them to share some of their wealth with those who are less fortunate. It is only just and reasonable to expect that they will take those who are not so fortunate by the hand and help them over the rough places of life. It seems to me that this legislation is visionary in that respect. We have in Canada to-day three thousand more factories than we had when the war broke out. Many of them have developed into large businesses and by virtue of that fact they have been able to get for themselves a great deal of wealth. The weapon of taxation will be used to see that that wealth is redistributed to those who need it most, to the homes with the greatest number of children and where the need is greatest.

Another argument in favour of this bill is that quite often when the family is young the earning power of the father is at its lowest point. He has not yet come to that age in life where he is able to realize upon his efforts and experience, and that is the time when he finds his burden is the greatest.

There is one thing I deplore, the argument that this legislation will create national disunity. It is unfortunate that attention is drawn to people who live within certain boundary lines. After all, the choice of where we are born or who our parents are to be is not our own. I think it is up to us to be broad-minded and fair enough to realize that at least all people are entitled to their share of the good things of life.

The Globe and Mail quite often print a column entitled, "In case you are interested." I do not know whether the local representative of that paper is in his place, but I should like to call his attention to something which possibly he can have printed to-morrow in the Globe and Mail. If there is one column in any paper that has done more to bring about disunity it is that column in that morning paper. Quite often they refer to Quebec in a roundabout way. Here is something I should like to draw to their attention.

Being a farmer I have always been interested in the federal farm loan legislation. I placed a question upon the order paper, and the reply I received indicated that there were 5,527 farm loans in the province of Quebec, and 2,530 in Ontario, less than half. The total amount of the loans in Quebec was $13,500,000, while those in Ontario totalled a little over $6,000,000. Here is the point I want to draw to the attention of the editors of, "In case you are interested." I am bringing this out because I am an Ontario farmer. In spite of the fact that Quebec has twice as many loans totalling more than twice the amount of the Ontario loans, the arrears of payments in 1943 were $70,040 as compared with $164,000 for Ontario.

I do not publish that information with any measure of pride, but when it came to my attention I felt that there must be something about the philosophy of the people of Quebec, something about their family life which made them honest enough to try to pay their debts. That, in my view, is a worth-while object and one which enhances their integrity.

There is another thing I should like to draw to the attention of the Globe and Mail in case they run out of material for the column, "In case you are interested." No nation is particularly great because of its material wealth, a nation's greatness is measured by the quality of its people. I consider that this legislation will enable our people to maintain their families in a standard better than they would otherwise be able to do.

I see my time is limited, but there is one thing I should like to direct attention to which came to my mind recently. It may be considered crude for me to refer to this matter but I think it is quite important. We subsidize many other things, so surely our children are entitled to consideration for they are the most important. In Ontario the farmers receive a subsidy for producing bacon hogs. First we receive $3 from the federal government for producing a grade A hog; we receive $1 from the province; we receive $2.25 in freight on the 1,000 pounds of grain we feed per pig; we receive another $3 for the twenty bushels with the fifteen cent per bushel ceiling price that is granted; this totals to a little over $9 per pig. I always read the Globe and Mail when I have breakfast—

Mr. MAYBANK: The hon. member would not suggest for a moment that there is as much fun in a little pig as there is in a child?

Mr. WOOD: I am just trying to show which is the most important. I noticed on page 19 of the Globe and Mail a little item referring to a prolific sow that produced a litter of eighteen pigs. If that could be duplicated every six months that family of pigs would earn a subsidy of $324 per annum. If we can do that for our swine production, surely there should be no objection to this legislation.

On motion of Mr. Wood the debate was adjourned.

EMBASSIES

ANNOUNCEMENT OF EXCHANGE OF DIPLOMATIC MISSIONS AND APPOINTMENT OF AMBASSADOR TO PERU

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Hon. members will recall that, during the discussion of the Department of External Affairs estimates under the war appropriation bill last year, reference was made to the development of direct diplomatic relations between Canada and certain Latin-American countries, and that I informed the house at that time that we hoped to exchange diplomatic missions with Peru.

I have pleasure in informing the house that Doctor Henry Laureys has been appointed the first Canadian ambassador to Peru.

Doctor Laureys returned in the spring of this year from South Africa where he served as the first High Commissioner for Canada for over four years. Doctor Laureys had a distinguished academic career as dean of the school of higher commercial studies at the university of Montreal before he entered the public service, and has made a wide study of international, economic and commercial problems.

The Peruvian government has appointed Doctor Humberto Fernandez Davila as charge d'affairs ad interim at Ottawa pending the appointment of a Peruvian ambassador.

APPOINTMENT OF MINISTER AT EMBASSY TO UNITED STATES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have also pleasure in announcing that Mr. L. B. Pearson, minister-counsellor at the Canadian embassy in Washington, has been appointed minister at the embassy.

Mr. Pearson has already had a long and distinguished career in the Canadian external affairs service, both in Ottawa and abroad. For the last two years he has been second in command at the embassy in Washington, and charge d'affaires when the ambassador is absent. Since his appointment to Washington he has represented Canada at the first meeting of the council of the united nations relief and rehabilitation administration and has served as chairman of the supplies committee of that organization. He was also a member of the Canadian delegation to the Hot Springs conference on food and agriculture, and has served as chairman of the interim commission set up to complete plans for the establishment of a united nations food and agriculture organization.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Fourth report of standing committee on standing orders.—Mr. Golding.

Fourth report of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Moore.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

POSTHUMOUS AWARD OF VICTORIA CROSS TO FLIGHT LIEUTENANT EDWARD DAVID HORNELL

Hon. CYRUS MACMILLAN (Parliamentary Assistant to Minister of National Defence for Air): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of National Defence for Air it is my proud privilege and honour to inform the house that the highest decoration for valour, the Victoria Cross, has been awarded posthumously Edward David Hornell, of Mimico, Ontario, formerly residing at Harbord street, Toronto.

With the consent of the house I should like to place on Hansard the citation referring to the gallant and distinguished conduct of Flight Lieutenant Hornell, on the night and day of June 24 last.

Flight Lieutenant Hornell was captain and first pilot of a twin-engine amphibian aircraft engaged in anti-submarine patrol over northern waters.

The patrol had lasted some hours when a fully-surfaced U-boat was sighted travelling at high speed on the port beam. Flight Lieutenant Hornell at once turned to the attack. The U-boat altered course. The aircraft had been seen and there could be no surprise. The U-boat opened up with anti-aircraft fire which became increasingly fierce and accurate.

The front guns of the aircraft replied; then its starboard gun jammed, leaving only one gun effective. Hits were obtained on and around the conning tower of the U-boat, but the aircraft was itself hit, two large holes appearing in the starboard wing.

Ignoring the enemy's fire, Flight Lieutenant Hornell carefully manoeuvred for the attack. Oil was pouring from his starboard wing; and his petrol tanks were endangered. Meanwhile the aircraft was hit again and again by the U-boat's guns. Holed in many places, it was vibrating violently and became very difficult to control.

Nevertheless, the captain decided to press home his attack, knowing that with every moment the chances of escape for him and his gallant crew would grow more slender. He brought his aircraft down very low and released his depth charges in a perfect "straddle". The bows of the U-boat were lifted out of the water; it sank, and members of the crew were seen in the sea.

Flight Lieutenant Hornell contrived, by superhuman efforts at the controls, to gain a little height. Fire in the starboard wing had grown more intense and the vibration had increased. Then the burning engine fell off. The plight of aircraft and crew was now desperate. With the utmost coolness, the captain took his aircraft into the wind and, despite manifold dangers, brought it safely down on a heavy swell.

Badly damaged and blazing furiously, the aircraft rapidly settled. After the ordeal by fire came ordeal by water. There was only one serviceable dinghy and this could not hold all the crew, so they took turns in the water holding onto the sides. On one occasion the dinghy capsized in rough seas and was righted only with great difficulty. Two of the crew succumbed from exposure. An airborne lifeboat was dropped to them but it fell some 500 yards down wind.

The airmen struggled vainly to reach it and Flight Lieutenant Hornell, who throughout had encouraged them by his cheerfulness and inspiring leadership, proposed to swim to it, though he was nearly exhausted. He was with difficulty restrained. The survivors were finally rescued after they had been in the water twenty-one hours. By this time Flight Lieutenant Hornell was blinded and completely exhausted. He died shortly after being picked up. Flight Lieutenant Hornell had completed sixty operational missions, involving six hundred hours flying. He well knew the danger and the difficulties attending attacks on submarines. By pressing home a skilful and successful attack against fierce opposition, with his aircraft in precarious condition, and by fortifying and encouraging his comrades in the subsequent ordeal, this officer displayed valour and devotion to duty of the highest order.

The members of the crew who died with him were Donald Stewart Scott of Almonte, Ontario, and Fernand St. Laurent, of Father Point, Quebec. The surviving members of the crew are Bernard Charles Denomy, of Chatham, Ontario, who was awarded the Distinguished Service Order; Graham Campbell, of Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, who was awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross; Sidney Edward Matheson, of Nelson British Columbia, who was awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross; Flight Sergeant Israel Joseph Bodnoff, of Ottawa, who was awarded the Distinguished Flying Medal, and Sidney Reginald Cole, of Long Branch, Ontario, who was awarded the Distinguished Flying Medal.

May I add just one word, Mr. Speaker? We rejoice, I am sure, in the rescue of the living; we deeply sympathize with the kindred of the dead. This story of courage which I have just read is typical of the spirit of Canada. May it live forever as a perpetual inspiration in the heart and memory of the land they loved, Canada, the land they died to save!

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): The announcement of the parliamentary assistant that the highest of all recognitions for gallantry and devotion to duty, the Victoria Cross, had been awarded posthumously to one of Canada's valiant and intrepid young airmen serves to focus attention once more upon what this young generation of Canadians are going through and sacrificing for us all.

To Flight Lieutenant Hornell's parents goes out our genuine sympathy in their tragic loss. Deep as will be their sorrow, they will have the consolation that their boy was not afraid to die that others might live.

At many a remembrance day ceremony across Canada since the last war people with tear-dimmed eyes have sung this hymn, one verse of which seems singularly appropriate in view of Flight Lieutenant Hornell's brave and unselfish service, and I repeat it to this house:

> Proudly you gathered, rank on rank to war,
> As who had heard God's message from afar;
> All you had hoped for, all you had, you gave
> To save mankind—yourself you scorned to save.

SELECTIVE SERVICE

REPORT ON EXECUTION OF WARRANTS BY R.C.M.P. AFTER FUNERAL SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question in regard to the investigation he has conducted into the actions of certain officials of national selective service at Balsam Creek, Ontario, regarding one Morrison, arrested for infractions of national selective service regulations, either during or after performing a funeral service.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): When my estimates were under consideration the hon. member asked me if an investigation had been made of the newspaper report of this incident. I told him then that to my knowledge no investigation had been made but that I would look into it at once. An investigation has now been made and I have received the following report from the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police:

I have had this matter investigated and the following are the circumstances in connection therewith:

On July 7 an obituary item appeared in the North Bay Nugget to the effect that a funeral would take place on July 9 ten miles from North Bay and that the person officiating would be one Donald Morrison for whom a warrant as a delinquent had been received by our North Bay detachment on March 23 last.

The enforcement officer of the national selective service at North Bay, who observed this obituary notice, perceived that the list of those attending included two other persons for whose arrest warrants were held. He communicated with the regional enforcement officer, and was instructed to attend with police officers and check on men of military age in an endeavour to apprehend Morrison and others for whose arrest warrants had been issued. The officer first referred to accordingly approached the Ontario provincial police and the military provost police and our own detachment, with the result that two members of each of the three forces and the enforcement officer, together with the enforcement liaison officer of the selective service, attended the funeral. The funeral proceeded, and it was after the ceremony was over that a check was made as those in attendance were leaving the cemetery. Apparently some of the individuals for whom warrants had been issued got away by crossing the fields, although an effort was made to detain these men. Mr. Morrison was the only one, however, who was arrested.

I may say that at the time the question was asked in the house by Mr. Diefenbaker, particulars regarding this matter had not come to hand.

While I consider the actions of those conducting this check, under the circumstances, to be devoid of all decency and sentiment, I should say that our constable had been criticized by the local selective service officials for alleged neglect in executing the said warrants. This resulted in an inquiry which indicated that the charges were unfounded. However, I consider this no excuse for the actions of the members of this force, as they should have refused flatly, under the circumstances, to carry out the instructions of the selective service officials. I have ordered severe disciplinary measures to be taken against members of the R.C.M. police involved, including the transfer of the personnel to headquarters.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question arising out of a statement he made a few minutes ago about the incident at the funeral at Balsam Creek, Ontario, in which the Royal Canadian Mounted Police took part. I understood him to say, and this is what I would like cleared up, that the police were disciplined for executing a warrant after the funeral. Is that correct? Were they disciplined for executing a warrant for arrest after the funeral?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They were disciplined by the commissioner for executing a warrant in a cemetery after the funeral had taken place.

Mr. HAZEN: Is there anything particularly objectionable about that?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Each one must determine that according to his sense of what is decent.

SOLDIER SETTLERS

REPRESENTATIONS WITH RESPECT TO GRANTING OF CLEAR TITLE TO LANDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): I should like to ask the Minister of Mines and Resources what action has been taken by the government with respect to the brief presented to a committee of the cabinet on May 23 last by a delegation representing the soldier settlers' association of Canada, asking among other things for clear title to their lands.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): The matter is still under consideration. This delegation presented their memorandum to six members of the government on the date mentioned by the hon. member. Unfortunately since then, due to the absence of the director of the Veterans Land Act and my own absence for a week, we have not had an opportunity to meet and consider the representations with a view to making a report to council, but that will be done as soon as it is convenient to do so. The hon. member is aware, as is every other hon. member, that in these closing days of the session we are all working under considerable pressure.

ALASKA HIGHWAY

FURTHER REPORT AS TO DESTRUCTION OR ABANDONMENT OF STORES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): The Minister of Mines and Resources told us, I think, that he would endeavour to obtain some report on the rumours in circulation regarding the disposition of equipment from the Alaska highway. I believe he said he would have something on Thursday. Will he give us any information he has obtained?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): I referred the matter to the Prime Minister's office, because probably it comes more under external affairs than under any other department, and I shall bring it again to the notice of the Prime Minister. He was not in the house yesterday morning when orders were called and is not here this morning, but I have no doubt he has a reply to the query which he may give later to-day or to-morrow.

Mr. GRAYDON: From information I get now it would appear that this matter actually is being held up by some department or departments of this government. Apparently the war assets corporation or some similar body is not allowed to purchase these goods from the United States government and resell them in the usual way. The minister might look into that also.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall be glad to have that matter brought to the attention of those who have to do with it. But, as I stated the other day, this property belongs to the government of the United States.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We all know that.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, then—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But it cannot be disposed of; it is being destroyed, and people think that is wrong.

Mr. CRERAR: That may be, but surely my hon. friend realizes that some aspects of the matter may make it difficult for this government to decisively intervene. What I rather object to is the inference that may be drawn from the remarks of the leader of the opposition that in some way the government here is responsible for this situation.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think that is the case.

Mr. CRERAR: Then all I can say is that the leader of the opposition is making a very considerable assumption.

[Mr. Crerar.]

[Later]:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday last reference was made by the hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) to reports to the effect that certain stores and equipment used in the construction of the Alaska highway by the United States had been destroyed and that residents of the Peace River district were facing threats of prosecution by the United States federal bureau of investigation for having recovered from army dumps goods allegedly discarded.

This matter had also been brought to my attention by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon), in whose constituency these actions are alleged to have occurred.

When these reports were received that useful stores were being destroyed, the special commissioner for defence projects in northwest Canada was asked to investigate and, as I informed the house on July 10, he replied that he had been unable to obtain evidence to substantiate these charges. He has, however, continued his investigations and now reports that United States officers are engaged in closing up one hundred and fifty construction camps, segregating and concentrating all usable material of economic value at thirty collection points for later disposal. When the United States army has completed these operations and has provided lists of surplus equipment which it does not wish to remove to the United States, it may prove practicable for the Canadian government to take custody of this material, dispose of it, and turn over to the United States government the net proceeds of sale, after deducting sales expenses and such duties and taxes as may be assessed. Discussions to this end are now under way between the two governments and it is hoped that an agreement will shortly be reached.

With regard to the specific charges that usable stores have been destroyed, the United States authorities advise that explicit instructions have been issued to their officers in the field that everything of economic value should be salvaged. Infected blankets and clothing and foodstuffs unfit for human consumption are, however, being destroyed. It is, of course, possible that errors of judgment have been made in carrying out these instructions. Officers of the United States northwest service command and representatives of the war department from Washington are now making a complete investigation of charges of improper destruction and waste. Their findings will be communicated to the special commissioner.

As for heavy equipment such as tractors and bulldozers, I may say that a good many of these machines have already been made available to the Canadian government for use on defence projects. I have every confidence that the usable remainder will, in due course, be salvaged and put to profitable employment.

With reference to the allegation that agents of the United States federal bureau of investigation have been examining the situation, and that they have made threats of prosecution against Canadians who have been combing the army dumps in the area concerned, I am informed by the special commissioner that there is no evidence to support these assertions. In any event, as hon. members will understand, officers of the federal bureau of investigation would have no authority in Canada to take such action as has been alleged.

As hon. members know, supplies and equipment for the use of United States armed forces in Canada have been admitted free of all duties and taxes on the express condition that they were required for the exclusive use of those forces. With the gradual completion of the defence programmes in the northwest, there are bound to be surplus items of equipment and supplies left at isolated outposts and construction camps in the north country. These will probably include articles of every sort, some new, some used, some scrap and some repairable. The cost of transporting these articles, frequently by air, to the place they now are has been very high. It may often not be worth while to ship them back to the United States. However, under the law such supplies cannot be disposed of in Canada to other users than the United States army except after appraisal and payment of the usual duties and taxes which they would have had to pay if they had been ordered from the United States for private use in the first instance.

As I have said, the Canadian government has taken the initiative in proposing to the United States an over-all agreement which would provide an orderly procedure for the salvaging of United States surplus stocks in Canada. I am hopeful that definite arrangements may soon be made in this matter. We should recognize, however, that even such an agreement will not fully meet all the difficulties of a complicated and unusual situation. I have, therefore, instructed the departments of government concerned to try to work out some practical and realistic arrangements so that the requirements of the revenue laws do not in any circumstances result in the unnecessary destruction of goods that could be put to useful local purposes.

Mr. GREEN: May I point out to the Prime Minister in connection with his statement that there is a press dispatch in the lower right-hand corner of page 12 of this evening's Ottawa Journal about the same matter. It is headed "Says medical supplies thrown away in Alaska", and the item reads:

> Vancouver, July 27. Large amounts of medical supplies were among material thrown on a big dump of unused United States Army goods near Dawson Creek, B.C.—
> It was not in Alaska at all.
> —Peter H. Schroeder, Dawson Creek trucking contractor, said here to-day.
> "Enough stuff was tossed away to stock a drug store for 10 years," he said.

Perhaps this also might be investigated.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It would come under what I have already suggested.

METHYL ALCOHOL

ALLEGED FAILURE TO HAVE CONTAINERS LABELLED "POISON"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): When my estimates were under consideration the other day the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Hazen) asked if any invesigation had been made into a poisoning incident which arose through the drinking of methyl hydrate, which had been shipped in containers which did not bear the word "poison". I inquired into the matter and found that an investigation had been made and a report submitted to the Department of National Revenue for their consideration. I am told that instructions now have been given by the Department of National Revenue to have a prosecution instituted against the suppliers of this substance.

PROVINCIAL ELECTIONS

STATEMENTS OF MR. DUMOULIN AND MR. SAURIOL —INCIDENT AT LETHBRIDGE MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Is the Minister of Justice yet in a position to give us any report on the investigation he is making with respect to Mr. Jacques Dumoulin?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I think I should endeavour to dispose of this matter definitely, if I can. I find that it was first referred to in the house by the leader of the opposition on Tuesday, July 18, as appears at page 4973 of Hansard. I happened to be away at that time attending the monetary conference at Bretton Woods, and I did not have an opportunity of seeing the Canadian newspapers. I must confess that for some time past I have been devoting very little time to looking at the newspapers. When I returned on Thursday morning the matter was again referred to. My attention had not been called by anyone to what had taken place on the preceding Tuesday. Probably I was at fault, but I must confess again that I did not take time to read Hansard for the three days I was away.

On Thursday that question was coupled by the leader of the opposition with another, concerning an incident which was reported as having occurred at a political meeting in Lethbridge, where another provincial election is to take place, and it was suggested that the Lethbridge incident should be investigated also. I had not seen any Canadian newspapers for four or five days, and though perhaps to a certain extent I was mistaken I took this to be good-natured political raillery and answered that I thought the keeping of peace and order under ordinary circumstances was the responsibility of the attorneys general, and that if I attempted to investigate every brawl that occurred across the country soon I would be charged with meddling in things that were no concern of mine.

The leader of the opposition again referred to the Dumoulin case when my estimates were under consideration on July 21, saying that he asked the question because Mr. Dumoulin was a member or a supporter of the Quebec government; that appears at page 5245 of Hansard. Again I took the statement to be the kind of good-natured political raillery in which we sometimes indulge, and let it pass. Last Monday the leader of the opposition asked if I had an investigation made. I was surprised and said I had never undertaken to have any investigation made, and I had not yet seen what the leader of the opposition had said on the first occasion. But I said I would get the papers; and he having stated that there was something reported which in his opinion should be investigated, I would see if I could agree with the impression he had gathered from the newspaper report. I then got a clipping from the newspaper L'Evenement which was the first report of the incident. I was scandalized at what I saw there, because I know this particular Mr. Dumoulin; I have known him as a lawyer for over twenty-five years and from time to time heard some of his speeches. A few weeks or months ago he was guest speaker at a luncheon at the Empire club of Toronto; and as I say, this report did not sound like something he would say. But of course the island of Orleans is not the Empire club of Toronto.

I do not know positively whether he did say what this newspaper reports, or whether he did not say it. But I had investigations made immediately, and it has been ascertained that there was only one newspaper reporter present at the island of Orleans, and he has unfortunately destroyed his notes. The island of Orleans is a very charming island of four or five agricultural parishes. There is one other industry there—a small wooden-boat shipyard that has been in existence since the very early start of the colony. In that yard lifeboats and boats of the kind—and since the beginning of the war some other boats—have been made and repaired. But essentially it is an agricultural community.

Now, the only reporter at the meeting was a Mr. Clement Brown. Mr. Clement Brown was interviewed. He said that he had made notes while Mr. Dumoulin was speaking, but that he had destroyed his notes immediately after he made his report for his newspaper, and that he could not swear to any verbatim statement attributing it to Mr. Dumoulin. He did remember that Mr. Dumoulin had said:

> I have done everything to help the youths, sons of farmers to be exempted, none of those who called upon me for assistance and who had a right to a postponement, have been mobilized, and they are to-day still on the farms.

Well, that did not seem to be so very bad, because I doubt if there are many hon. members in the house representing rural constituencies who have not from time to time been asked to make representations on behalf of bona fide farmers' sons. The meeting had been attended by, among others, the mayor of the municipality in which it was held, and the mayor of the adjoining municipality. They were interviewed, and they both said that Mr. Dumoulin had not made the other statement attributed to him in the newspaper report. I have a complete report here. Yesterday I showed it to the leader of the opposition. I do not think it is something which should be tabled. But if there is any other hon. member who would like to see it I shall be only too glad to show it to him.

The result is that it certainly could not be established in a court of justice that statements contrary to the defence of Canada regulations were made on that occasion.

May I go one step farther, and in doing so I invoke a question of personal privilege. On Wednesday a newspaper published in my home city of Quebec carried a leading editorial, over half a column, in respect of this incident.

Mr. GRAYDON: Which paper?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The Chronicle-Telegraph. It states:

To hold Mr. St. Laurent responsible for the outcome of legal proceedings would be unreasonable. In the event of an investigation being held, we have perfect confidence in the ability of the defendant who may have been sailing close to the wind to free himself on one technical ground or another. But all the more on this account the minister could afford to make a show of doing his duty by undertaking to consult the officers of his department, instead of curtly snubbing the opposition for doing their duty in questioning him.

I certainly had no intention of snubbing the opposition, or anyone; and I hope that impression was not conveyed to the leader of the opposition with whom I had the exchange in that connection.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the newspaper may have meant, from that, that the minister was pretty quick to say that he was going to make no investigation in respect to it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I did not say I was going to make no investigation. I said I had not undertaken to make any.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is not my recollection, but I shall not quarrel with the minister.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: And the editorial continues:

That the position of Mr. St. Laurent is a difficult one, in view of electoral complications, no one can gainsay. But the obligations of his office are unchanged on that account. And if any man would insist on justice being done "though the heavens fall", that man is he, admiring observers of his previous career would have sworn. That he has not shown himself strong enough to do so is unfortunate for Canada and as already suggested, keenly disappointing to themselves.

I do not mind personal criticism; that is of no real importance. But, Mr. Speaker, even during election time we should maintain some sense of proportion and perspective. And I submit that what is unfortunate is not that Mr. Dumoulin is not prosecuted, but perhaps, that so many of us in Canada appear to be too unwilling to give to matters which are important the whole of our time and attention in the order of their respective importance.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would not be so thin-skinned.

Mr. GRAYDON: With respect to the Dumoulin matter, may I say that the investigation, as I see it, is not very complete, nor is it very conclusive. One thing that strikes me is that Mr. Dumoulin himself has never come out and denied the statement that he is alleged to have made.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am sick and tired of hearing the Quebec election fought every day across the floor of this house.

Mr. CHURCH: I would like to ask the Minister of Justice if he could tell us—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has the floor.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Minister of Justice has raised some question as to the stand I took regarding the Dumoulin matter when it was brought up in the house and about which an editorial appeared in a Quebec newspaper. At page 5252 of Hansard, of July 24, I asked this question:

Has the Minister of Justice any report to make on the progress that has been made in the investigation of statements alleged to have been uttered by Jacques Dumoulin in the Quebec election?

The Minister of Justice replied, and it is upon this reply I think that the editorial was based:

I am not having any investigation made as to the statement alleged to have been made by Jacques Dumoulin in the Quebec election, nor have I ever stated that I was going to.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That was a statement that was absolutely true. There was no investigation being made at that time. That was not a refusal to make an investigation.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say this?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I know, Mr. Speaker, that we have had a long series of questions on the order of the day, but this is extremely important. I just want to say this. The Minister of Justice says that he did not refuse. I would like to know what he meant when he said this:

I am not having any investigation made as to the statement alleged to have been made by Jacques Dumoulin.

That is what I took as a straight refusal.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is quite clear. It is a statement that at that time I was not having any investigation made and was therefore not in a position to be receiving a report.

Mr. GRAYDON: When somebody says he is not going to do something, I take that as a refusal.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I did not say that I was not going to. I said that I was not having any investigation made at that time.

Mr. GRAYDON: And that you were not going to do it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I did not say that.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, since the incident which occurred at Lethbridge has apparently been mentioned in the house, I crave the privilege this morning of saying just a few words. The incident as reported in the newspaper was an entire distortion of that affair. During the course of my speech in Lethbridge I had occasion to refer to the rise of racial animosity in Canada, and the persecution of minorities. I referred specifically to a speech made by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) on July 12, 1943, and reported in Hansard. At that point Mr. Landeryou, Social Credit candidate, said, "That's a lie."

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Wasn't it?

Mr. COLDWELL: No, it was not. And I repeated the reference to the protocols of Zion, which the hon. member had placed upon the record. The interrupter made the same remark. I then said, "You will either withdraw that remark, apologize for that remark, or you will leave the meeting." I then sat down. I waited a full minute or more, during which time some people in the audience were endeavouring to persuade the interrupter either to apologize or leave. Then the chairman rose and said, "The interrupter has had time to consider what he will do. I give him another five seconds to rise and apologize, or be shown out."

Mr. GRAYDON: Was it "shown" or "shoved"?

Mr. COLDWELL: "Shown". Then ushers took him, without undue violence, from the hall. On the outside of the building he became abusive, and accused some of our people there of being fascists. Then I am told a man—

Mr. REID: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. COLDWELL: —who had already had three sons overseas—one killed, one missing, and another who was now serving, struck him. It was on the outside of the hall. That is what occurred.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker is on his feet.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. REID: My point of order is this: can a matter that occurred outside this house be debated in the house?

Mr. GRAYDON: You will be given just five seconds if you are not careful.

Mr. REID: I have another story to tell. If this is going to be a free for all, let us get in on it.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I say that—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question was raised before in the house by the leader of the opposition on a question addressed to the Minister of Justice. It has been raised again to-day, and I thought it was only fair that the hon. member should have an opportunity to speak.

Mr. GARDINER: On the point of order, this incident that is being recited is just typical of dozens of incidents put on by the C.C.F. all over western Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is not true.

Mr. GARDINER: I have been called a liar from the audience by C.C.F. organizers at least twenty times within the last ten years. There is nothing new about that at all. He is simply getting back what he organized in western Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have no knowledge of any such incidents. May I say that if I were the Minister of Agriculture and anyone called me a liar he would not remain in my presence any length of time.

Mr. REID: No; you would get strong-arm men to do it.

Mr. GARDINER: The Liberal party to which I belong has never organized storm troopers in western Canada to throw anybody out. When I want anyone thrown out of my meetings I throw them out myself.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is why no one ever gets flung out.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

INTERNMENT: CAMILLIEN HOUDE—REPORTED STATEMENT OF JACQUES SAURIOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question. Has he come to any decision with regard to the release of ex-Mayor Houde of Montreal before the last day for nominations, next Tuesday, for the Quebec elections? Second, has any action been taken in connection with the press report of a statement of Jacques Sauriol, referred to yesterday? Mr. Houde only said what many others said of the late plebiscite in and out of this house.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): In reply to the first question, I have not arrived at any conclusion as yet. In reply to the second question, I have come to the conclusion that it would not be proper to institute proceedings against Mr. Sauriol. I received a report on this matter from the counsel who is usually employed by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in Montreal which has impressed me with the undesirability of instituting proceedings. I dislike taking up so much time with these matters, but it must be done if they are to be finally disposed of. The counsel considers that it would be doubtful whether or not he could establish his facts upon the reports he has received from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. In addition, he writes:

As to the expediency of taking action, the following comments may be considered by the authorities:

It is a well known rule that under our criminal law, any one, whether the victim or not of an offence, may take action.

This discretionary power brings to the fore the question of the advisability of proceeding in any case.

This discretion is a right vested in any citizen as well as in those who have the responsibility of the admission of justice. It belongs to them all, once satisfied that the evidence justifies them to take action, to decide whether or not such action should be taken.

As far as the authorities are concerned, their decision must not be guided simply by the specific case under consideration, but must be inspired by the broader view of good government. For such decision they are answerable to the people who have entrusted to them the responsibility of governing.

This right to take action has been restricted in a number of offences under the Criminal Code of Canada and under the defence of Canada regulations, in certain matters such as in the present. And for the prosecution of certain offences, consent from the responsible authorities is required.

In confining this discretionary power to the governing authorities in these particular cases, the legislator has given more importance to the feature of expediency, and has left it entirely to the governing authorities to decide whether in any case, taking action would be a remedy worse than the evil.

The occasion which gave rise to the speech referred to is the provincial general election. While the occasion is not a defence for violation of the law, yet, it cannot be denied that on such occasion, it is according to the principles and customs, that greater tolerance be granted to the people to give their views and discuss the status of those who have governed them.

Election time is, in fact, the only time when a free people can discuss public matters for the purpose of the very creation and establishment of the next government.

The occasion becomes the rational foundation of that tolerance. This, again, does not justify the violation of the law, but it increases the degree of wisdom needed for the government, to use adequately the discretionary power given to it to take or not to take action, and it would appear better and more in line with a free constitutional foundation of power to make a mistake in granting too much tolerance, than to make a mistake in restricting it too much.

Furthermore, the action of the authorities will be much more publicized than the speech of one Jacques Sauriol and the speech, by the action of the authorities, will be given the real publicity.

Again, the action of the authorities will have a reaction, and it is logical to expect the general electoral campaign to be a proper occasion, if not the ideal occasion, for further violations.

The effect of the speech of Sauriol is known, and is not, as far as we know, of any importance. The effect of an arrest is not known but can be anticipated as fostering the movement and inflaming declarations to come.

I do not think the attack on the federal police has, in any way, touched the stability of its good character and reputation, and when this temporary situation created by the election will be over, Sauriol's speech will have been forgotten.

May I say, in support of this opinion, that these views on the expediency of proceeding are absolutely in line with the reason of existence of regulation 39 itself.

The purpose of the regulation is definitely to assure the efficient prosecution of the war, and in deciding as to what action can be taken, the same aim has to be kept in mind.

The very question for the authorities to decide is whether taking action, under these circumstances which are temporary in character will not be more harmful than refraining from taking it.

On consideration of that opinion I have come to the conclusion that the taking of action might be more harmful in its result than to refrain from taking it at this time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Whose opinion is that?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is the opinion of Mr. Gerald Fauteux, K.C., Montreal, who for some years past has been the counsel consulted by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Why should not the same principle be applied so far as these simple Jehovah's Witnesses are concerned?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The members of Jehovah's Witneses against whom warrants had been issued were defaulters under the National Resources Mobilization Act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And this is sedition.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is considered by the authorities that those who have been requested to comply with the National Resources Mobilization Act and have failed to do so should be brought to justice.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And sedition should not be prosecuted.

CRIMINAL CODE

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of and concurrence in an amendment made by the senate to bill No. 139, to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: The amendment will be found at page 598 of the Votes and Proceedings of Monday, July 24.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the minister will give us some idea of the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The section amended is one which provided for transferring appeals from summary convictions, which formerly in the province of Quebec went to the court of king's bench, crown side, to the superior court. The court of king's bench, crown side, in the rural districts sometimes does not sit for many months; sometimes more than a year passes without a session of the court. But the superior court, which is the trial court and is presided over by the same justices who sit in the court of king's bench, crown side, has much more frequent sessions. So for the purpose of expediting the disposal of appeals from summary convictions the criminal code was being amended to substitute the superior court as the court to be appealed to for the court of king's bench, crown side. In Montreal and in Quebec the superior court sits from September 10 to December 20 and from January 10 to June 20 without interruption, and our view was that each day was a session. But there was doubt expressed on that point by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion), and to clear up that doubt we are having inserted that the first day of each week will be deemed to be the first day of a session. That will determine when the appeal must come on for hearing.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it that the minister is satisfied with the amendment as passed by the senate?

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. It makes it perfectly clear that the first day of each week will be the beginning of the session, and that will definitely determine without possibility of dispute when the appeals should come on for hearing.

Motion agreed to, amendment read the second time and concurred in.

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE

MEASURE TO FACILITATE AND DEVELOP TRADE BETWEEN CANADA AND OTHER COUNTRIES

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient for the purpose of facilitating and developing trade between Canada and any other country to introduce a measure:

1. To incorporate the Export Credit Insurance Corporation for the purpose of entering into contracts of insurance with exporters to insure against the risk of loss involved in contracts for the export of Canadian-produced goods.

The capital stock and the paid in capital surplus of the corporation each amounting to five million dollars shall be subscribed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce from time to time and paid therefor by the Minister of Finance with provision also for loans not to exceed in the aggregate, outstanding at any one time, an amount equal to five times the aggregate of the paid-up capital and surplus of the corporation;

2. To authorize the Minister of Finance during the three years next ensuing after the coming into force of this act, to—

(a) guarantee the obligations of the government or an agency of the government of any such other country to pay the cost of Canadian produced goods under a contract to purchase such goods from an exporter;

(b) make a loan to the government or any agency of the government of any such other country to enable such government or such agency to purchase from an exporter and to pay the cost of Canadian produced goods; or provided that the government of such other country requests the government of Canada to give such guarantee, make such loan, or purchase, acquire or guarantee such securities and undertakes to indemnify the government of Canada against loss in connection therewith.

(c) purchase, acquire or guarantee any security issued by the government or by the agency of the government of any such other country to any person in Canada in payment of the cost of Canadian produced goods exported or to be exported to such other country;

The aggregate amount of such guarantees outstanding at any time shall not exceed two hundred million dollars and the aggregate of the amount of loans made and outstanding at any time and the value of securities purchased or acquired and held at any one time shall not exceed one hundred million dollars.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this resolution embodies a new principle with respect to facilitating imports from Canada to other countries. I think that most members of the house have been anxiously waiting for the skeleton structure of this legislation to be presented to the house so that we may gain some conception of what the real motive underlying the introduction of this type of legislation is. I think that most members of the house will be anxious that whatever can be done by the government to facilitate our export trade should be done. I do not think there will be any disagreement over that either in this house or in the country. We are anxious, of course, to scrutinize the methods which the government proposes to employ to carry out this very laudable end. I think it will be helpful at this stage if the minister would outline in skeleton form just what the government has in mind with respect to its general policy on export trade.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I think the matter could be more profitably discussed when the bill is before us for second reading. At that time I purpose making a statement outlining the objects of the bill. I hope that that will be satisfactory for the time being.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think it will be, provided we have at the appropriate stage a statement from the minister giving full details in connection with the government policy. I quite appreciate that there is no special reason why there should be a duplicate debate, especially at this stage in the session; but perhaps, if the minister will undertake that when second reading is commenced he will give a full statement, that will be satisfactory.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes; I shall be glad to do that.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. GREEN: I doubt very much if it is wise to have this resolution go through without one or two explanations being given by the minister. I should like to ask him one or two questions in connection with the resolution. The first paragraph reads that it is expedient to introduce a measure—

> To incorporate the export credit insurance corporation for the purpose of entering into contracts of insurance with exporters to insure against the risk of loss involved in contracts for the export of Canadian produced goods.

Will the minister tell us what type of insurance contracts are to be entered into?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The explanation I intended to make on the second reading of the bill will fully cover that; I will go into it thoroughly. I will say—and I do not want this to start a general discussion on the bill, but in answer to the hon. member's question—that it is a proposal to insure contracts for the sale of goods by Canadian exporters to residents of other countries.

Mr. GREEN: The reason I ask this question is that I represent a constituency which is vitally interested in export trade. Our harbour is probably the most important feature, in a business way, about the whole of greater Vancouver, and we are very much interested in this measure. It is all very well to make an explanation on second reading, but it does help one a great deal in studying a bill and preparing to make remarks upon it if some preliminary explanation is given on the resolution stage. I think the minister should make at least some explanation at the present time. He says that the Export Credit Insurance Corporation is to have power to enter into contracts of insurance with exporters. Does that mean, contracts with individual firms, contracts of insurance insuring the transactions of individual firms against loss of any kind, or does it mean insuring the carriage of goods overseas? Just what is meant?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I would be very grateful if the hon. member would let this stand until the second reading, when an explanation will be made and an opportunity for discussion given. The explanation I have already made in reply to the hon. member's question answers, I think, the question he just asked. What is proposed is the insurance of an agreement to sell goods by a Canadian exporter or producer or manufacturer to a customer in another country.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest to the minister that he give us his explanation now. It will make it far easier for us to understand the bill when it comes down; and there is not much time now for studying these bills. Certainly it would facilitate the passage of the bill if an explanation were made at this stage.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am quite ready to go on if it is the wish of the committee that I do so now. I thought it would save double discussion on the points, but if, as the hon. member suggests, it may shorten the later discussion I shall be very glad to make a statement now.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the minister should do so if any members of the committee desire it.

Mr. STIRLING: May I make this point with the minister, as I warmly support the representations of the hon. member for Vancouver South. Both of us come from constituencies far removed from here; and if the minister can give his explanatory notes on the resolution stage, the people we represent here will have some opportunity of seeing what the thing is about before the bill is in their hands.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, the bill covered by this resolution provides the measure that was forecast in the speech from the throne for the purpose of establishing a system of export credits and of export credit insurance. The need for and the purposes of this bill should require very little explanation or justification.

Canada is now the third trading nation of the world. Our export trade is now running at a level considerably in excess of three billion dollars annually. This represents in value more than double the export trade we possessed at any time in the 20 years from 1919 to 1939.

As we approach, and later enter, the post-war period Canada is bound to experience a fall in exports of those kinds of goods that represent purely war-time trade, and every effort must be made, without delay, to see that the volume of our commercial exports increases as rapidly as possible. Every possible support must be given to the enterprise and sales efforts of Canadian exporters.

A considerable number of countries will emerge from this conflict with their financial resources greatly impaired. Particularly during the transition period from war to peace, trade with many countries is likely to be uncertain either because of unsettled internal conditions in those countries, or because of measures taken by them to control trade and exchange. As a result Canadian exporters would be quite justified in being hesitant to offer goods because of the risks involved or because private financial institutions are reluctant to grant the necessary credit facilities. In this way valuable and inherently sound export business may be lost at a time when it may be imperative to develop overseas markets for the output of our greatly expanded productive capacity.

The present measure is intended to meet this situation in two ways. First, it provides the authority to set up an Export Credit Insurance Corporation. Before the war some form of export credit insurance was made available to their exporters by governments in many countries. Our information indicates that there were some 18 or more countries which operated export credit insurance schemes of one type or another. The essence of export credit insurance is that the exporter enters into an export sales contract with an importer in another country and is able to insure himself on a premium basis in respect of the payment risks that are involved. The Export Credit Insurance Corporation that is to be set up in Canada is intended to develop for the assistance of Canadian exporters an insurance business of this kind, and it is the intention that it shall operate on a self-sustaining basis, but that it shall be essentially non-profit-making. After careful consideration it has been decided that the credit insurance business can best be handled by placing the enterprise and responsibility in the hands of the corporation, rather than a board or other form of administration that would be merely a part of one of the government departments.

Mr. GREEN: This is to be a government corporation?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes. Secondly, the bill empowers the governor in council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance and with the concurrence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to give direct credit assistance to the governments of other countries or their agencies for the purpose of facilitating Canadian export trade. The establishment of the Export Credit Insurance Corporation alone is not sufficient to meet the circumstances with which we will be faced. The insurance scheme will assist trade with countries where the importers already have funds with which to make purchases in Canada, but it will probably be the case in many countries that not only will the importers be stripped of their financial resources but, as I have already mentioned, the governments themselves of these countries will emerge from the war period with their financial resources greatly impaired. It is with that condition in mind that it is considered essential to have the power to extend direct credit assistance by loans, guarantees, or by the other methods provided in the bill to enable the governments of other countries or their accepted agencies to place orders with Canadian exporters.

This second part of the bill—under which the provision of direct credit assistance is authorized—is intended to apply only for a three-year period, as it is expected that the main need for direct credits will arise during the unsettled conditions of the transitional post-war years. As conditions become more stabilized greater dependence could be placed upon the export credit insurance provisions alone to provide the main means of maintaining and developing Canadian export trade, in so far as it may prove necessary to continue to give export credit assistance in any form.

Mr. GREEN: The plan is twofold. In the first place this Export Credit Insurance Corporation will insure the business of the exporters, and then for a period of three years the Canadian government will lend money say to the Belgian government or to any other government, with which money the Belgian government can buy goods from Canadian firms.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Quite.

Mr. GREEN: Or it may be done in the way of a guarantee—

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. GREEN: —of the purchases by the Belgian government. Why are those loans and guarantees restricted to governments or governmental agencies. In the normal course of business goods are exported by a Canadian exporter to a Belgian importer. Apparently there is no provision for helping to develop that trade. The loan now goes to the Belgian government.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): My hon. friend has just referred to what is covered in part I of the bill. Part I of the bill provides for the insurance of a contract entered into by a shipper in Canada with an importer or a purchaser in another country. Part II of the bill provides for a loan to the government to enable the purchaser in that country to pay for goods purchased in Canada.

Mr. GREEN: There is no intention of lending to foreign firms?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No.

Mr. GREEN: The loan will be made only to a foreign government?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes, or their agencies.

Mr. GREEN: The second portion of the plan is more or less of a mutual aid proposition?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. GREEN: In effect the Canadian government will buy the goods from the Canadian firms, trusting that the purchase price will eventually be paid by the government of the foreign country. Is not that what it means?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Possibly, in a roundabout way; but actually what will happen is this. The Canadian government purposes making a loan to the foreign government, the proceeds of which will be used for the payment of goods imported from Canada so that the exporter in Canada will be paid.

Mr. GREEN: What supervision will there be over those loans so that we shall be sure that the money is used by the foreign government for the purchase of Canadian goods?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That will all be covered in the bill when I bring it down.

Mr. GREEN: That is covered in the bill?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to ask the minister two or three questions about this proposal. I fail to see how this is going to facilitate trade and exports to these countries at the present time. As you know, Mr. Chairman, they have what they call section 7 of the lend-lease agreement in which Great Britain and the United States are interested. Some of the countries are empire countries and some are other classes of countries. This government is going to guarantee $200,000,000 and the amount outstanding on loans made at any one time is not to exceed $100,000,000. This is the very subject matter that has been covered by the conference going on in the United States on international finance lend-lease matters for the past month.

In this resolution we are dealing with a guarantee of a loan to an export insurance corporation to a great many countries that are within the empire, some of them dominions, crown colonies and dependencies, others invaded countries. The other countries are countries that formerly came under the most favoured nation treaty so far as exports and imports are concerned. Others are in a different class. Many of those countries have been devastated by the axis powers during this war. Some of the countries covered by this proposed export corporation are in the Pacific. I doubt whether New Zealand and Australia have a separate lend-lease agreement as is proposed here. This is distinctly such a separate lend-lease agreement with no guarantee of repayment of loans. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, to be embarking on a separatist policy toward those other countries not within the empire and giving them some special form of treatment under a separate lend-lease arrangement with no chance of any payment back. While we believe in some of the principles of the Atlantic charter it will be left to Britain and the dominions to carry the bag after the elections are held next November in the country of our great ally to the south.

Section 7 of the lend-lease agreement covers the very countries which are named in this resolution; it covers the very same territory. As I said the other night we should first decide—and it has to be decided before this corporation can operate—what the policy of the government regarding empire countries is going to be after the war. What is the policy going to be regarding Russia and the United States? Russia has an agreement with Britain, outside of section 7 of the lend-lease agreement, for trade with Russia, to which the dominions are not yet a party, for twenty years. It was made in Moscow last year. The United States is going to have a similar agreement. I think we should have all the cards laid on the table, because the way we are spending money we are just approaching a totalitarian socialist state in so far as capital and maintenance and everything else is concerned, without proper protection. If this continues, no business man will be able to carry on his business. Who are the exporters of this country? Many of them have been driven to the wall by high taxation. Look over the exports at the present time. I think they have been very well covered by the lend-lease agreement. We had a similar situation after the last war, and some of the money has not been paid back yet.

I do not wish to delay the passage of this resolution, but I hope when the bill is introduced it will give us a little more information than is contained in the resolution. I will tell you this; the way we are doing business at the present time, outside of section 7 of the lend-lease agreement to which the United States is committed, I believe we are going to get into a whole lot of trouble. I doubt whether it is going to mean anything. Take the case of the Pacific. Some of this corporation's work will be in the Pacific. Russia is not at war with Japan, and Russia may be out of it when the time comes to take advantage of this legislation. Are we going to stand all the risk in the Pacific? Are we going to stand behind guarantees to the amount of $200,000,000, with another $100,000,000 in loans? The war with Japan may continue for a year or two after the war with Germany is over, for the situation in the east is very difficult. Japan still has a very powerful fleet. Suppose some of our ships carrying these goods are sunk; is this country going to stand the loss? Or is Canada going to embark upon a lend-lease policy of its own, lending money to all sorts of countries, many of them unfortunately bankrupt? These are some of the questions that will have to be dealt with, and I should like a reply from the minister.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I might reply very briefly at the moment because, as the hon. member has just said, all these matters can be discussed when the bill is in committee. To deal with just a couple of points, this measure is just supplementary to other legislation, and in no way cancels that other legislation. The hon. member suggested that this legislation might be against the best interests of the United Kingdom. I would reply that similar legislation is in effect in the United Kingdom at the present time.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I understand that under this legislation the government will be underwriting risks in the export business which private enterprise will not underwrite. Is that the idea?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That is the intention; not all, but selected contracts. All these matters will be dealt with when the bill itself is brought down.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The purpose of the second part of the bill, then, is to insure against loss by making loans to those countries to which the exports are to be made?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It is anticipated that part 1 of the bill will not become operative to any great extent for the time being.

Mr. GREEN: That is the insurance feature?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes. Part 2 will be operative during the transition period. The first part of the bill is essentially peace-time legislation; the second is not.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister—

The CHAIRMAN: I would refer hon. members to standing order 69 of Beauchesne, citation 740:

> Unless the motion for leave be opposed, this is not the time for a lengthened debate on its merits. When an important measure is offered by a minster or other member, this opportunity is frequently taken for a full exposition of its character and objects; but otherwise, debate should be avoided at this stage, unless it is expected that the motion will be negatived, and that no future occasion will arise for discussion.

The minister distinctly stated his hope that the discussion going on now might take place on second reading of the bill, so I would ask hon. members to avoid any duplication of discussion.

Mr. GREEN: Surely we are not going to be choked off like that. On second reading of a bill there is no opportunity to ask a minister questions, and I submit that we are entirely within our rights in asking such questions at this stage. So far not a question has been asked that does not deal directly with this resolution.

The CHAIRMAN: The bill will be before the committee on second reading.

Mr. GREEN: Questions cannot be asked on second reading. Just because the session is drawing to a close is no reason why these important measures should be rushed through the house. We have taken only a few minutes so far.

The CHAIRMAN: I know that in the mood of hon. members at present they do not want repetition. Sometimes the same discussion is repeated when the bill itself is before the committee.

Mr. GREEN: I have been here from the Pacific coast for six months; I have listened to repetitions lasting not half an hour but two or three weeks. Now when a question comes up which is of vital interest to my whole province and to all the exporting firms of Canada I suggest is a queer time to try to choke off any discussion. I do not care what may be the mood of hon. members—

The CHAIRMAN: I hope the hon. member will withdraw the words "choke off." It is the last thing in the world I would want to do. I simply read citation 740 in connection with the resolution now before the committee.

Mr. GREEN: The chairman said the mood of the house was not in favour of any repetition. The mood of the house does not have very much to do with the rules of debate. Representing constituencies, we have certain rights here, and so far as I am concerned I do not propose to have those rights done away with.

The CHAIRMAN: There is no question of withdrawing any rights. The chair just referred to the standing order; I need not repeat that reference at this time. It is not the intention to take away any of the rights of the members of the committee.

Mr. McILRAITH: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, after you read the relevant paragraph from the rules the hon. member for Vancouver South said, "We are not going to be choked off like that," obviously having direct reference to the chairman. I am sure it was not the intention of the hon. member to make such a reference to the chairman of the committee of the whole of the House of Commons; yet that was the import of his words.

Mr. GREEN: That was exactly what I meant, and I think that would be the effect if we were prevented now from further discussing this resolution. I should like to ask the minister whether or not the new export credit insurance corporation will be able to pick and choose the contracts that it will insure. I take it that the commercial banks will be ready to provide credit for all sales that are reasonably sound and that the insurance provided by the government will be required only in connection with sales that are not so sound. May I ask the minister whether or not that is the case.

Mr. McILRAITH: Before we get away from the point of order, surely there is some obligation on the part of hon. members with respect to the chair in connection with proceedings in committee. It is perhaps quite natural that the chairman would hesitate to ask for the withdrawal of remarks pertaining to himself, but are we to let reflections on this institution pass unnoticed, such as the one uttered a few moments ago, that the chairman of this committee was attempting to choke off discussion by reading a paragraph from the rules of the House of Commons? Is that not a pretty serious thing? I understood you, Mr. Chairman, to read a paragraph from the rules of the house; and for an hon. member to remark that by doing so you are choking off discussion from any section of the house is something which I do not think any hon. member, in any part of the house, can afford to let pass. I am sure that on mature thought the hon. member for Vancouver South will agree that he did not mean it in that way, but when he reads the record he will see how serious it is. I would ask that the words be withdrawn.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I am happy to say that I have not heard you, Mr. Chairman, object to the statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver South, who said that if hon. members could not question the minister bringing in this resolution, whose department it affects, discussion is prevented or in other words choked off. I do not see why the hon. member for Ottawa West should be so exercised over the use of the words "choked off," because in effect that is what the prevention of further discussion of this resolution amounts to. I do not think the chairman could take any offence from the words used by the hon.

member for Vancouver South, notwithstanding the attempt of the hon. member for Ottawa West to make an occasion of it.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Ottawa West, it is not the intention of the chair to press the point, for I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver South realizes that the chairman would be the last person to attempt in any way to curb the deliberations of the committee. However, I believe there are times when it is the duty of the chairman to bring to the attention of the committee certain rules concerning the debates and the subject matter under discussion.

Mr. GREEN: It is interesting to see the hon. member for Ottawa West rise in his seat at this stage of the session and try to correct some of the rest of us.

Mr. McILRAITH: The hon. member for Ottawa West has some rights.

Mr. GREEN: Many of us live thousands of miles away from Ottawa, and attend regularly. But he is not to be seen in the chamber very often.

Mr. McILRAITH: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, there is no member of the House of Commons who has attended the sessions of parliament more regularly than I have. Surely the hon. member's statement is grossly inaccurate. That statement could not be made without being challenged.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I can challenge what the hon. member for Vancouver South says, and I can vouch for what the hon. member for Ottawa West has said. He is in the house nearly all the time.

Mr. GREEN: I am here a good deal of the time, and I am only speaking from my own observations.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): A very unfair statement.

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps the minister would answer the question.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The bill provides for the right of selection of risks.

Mr. GREEN: Is it a fact that the better risks will be handled by the banks?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I think the bank itself might be insured on risks. I am not saying that definitely, but—

Mr. GREEN: The new corporation will be able to insure the commercial banks against loss.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I would think so.

Mr. GREEN: Is that the way an insurance contract would be written, as a general rule?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No. Provision is made for right of selection of risk between the manufacturer or producer in Canada, and his customer in the other countries.

Mr. GREEN: In the case of a loan to a foreign government for the purpose of purchasing Canadian goods, is the Canadian government to be in a position to say from what firm the foreign government will purchase the goods in Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I do not think the Canadian government would interest itself on behalf of any individual firm in Canada. It would be an arrangement with the other country to enable that other country to provide Canadian funds to pay any exporter in Canada.

Mr. GREEN: Will the government have any control over purchases within Canada? That is, will the government have power to say from what firms these purchases are to be made?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I do not think the government would attempt to do that.

Mr. GREEN: Is this loan provision to apply to all foreign governments? For example, is it to apply to the government of a country which is able to pay for the goods, or is it only to apply to the countries which have been bankrupted by the war.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): These loans will all be considered on their merits, by the government. There is no obligation to make any loan. It will all be as a matter of negotiation.

Mr. GREEN: That is, it might apply to France, or to Great Britain or to the United States? At the present time the minister is not in a position to say that there will be any distinction between governments?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No.

Mr. STIRLING: Is this bill to cover manufactured articles as well as natural products and agricultural products? Is it to cover all exports from Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I believe manufactured products.

Mr. STIRLING: Only?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. FAIR: Have losses been sustained by the British government in the operation of legislation similar to this?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I believe I shall be able to make a statement on that. I am not sure, but I think the officials in my department have some information on the point. My understanding is that the losses have been kept down to a very small point.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Would this apply to sales of wheat?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Not at all?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No. I do not think it applies to sales of wheat.

Mr. SENN: Does it apply to any agricultural product, whether manufactured or in its natural state, or is it for other manufactured goods?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): My understanding—and of course I am speaking this morning without having assistants in front of me—is that manufactured products only are to be dealt with.

Mr. SENN: But there are manufactured products such as canned goods. I suppose bacon, when it is cured, would be considered as a manufactured product? Does it apply to that class of goods, or to goods which are not agricultural in any sense of the term?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It applies to products which cannot ordinarily be handled through the regular channels. It applies particularly to countries which are not in a position to pay cash now but which, it is considered, will be in a position within a reasonable length of time.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is not a very clear statement. The statement the minister has just made indicates that probably the greatest requirements of those countries will be for processed agricultural products, such as those mentioned by the hon. member for Haldimand. They will require bacon, processed beef, and various other agricultural products, including canned vegetables.

Mr. SENN: And flour.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It has been made clear for some time that those will be the goods for which those countries will want credits. Surely we are not going to pass a bill of this kind without making provision for goods for which we have been led to believe for years there would be a market. We have understood that goods of this kind would be required for months and years following the cessation of hostilities.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No; it does not necessarily mean that. I might add that we are not asking for the passage of the bill at this time. We are only asking that it be advanced one stage, so that the bill can be dealt wtih.

Mr. GREEN: Does it apply also to purchases by united nations relief agencies? Will the sales to those agencies be supported or guaranteed in any way?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No; it will be entirely supplementary to and outside of that.

Mr. SENN: If the resolution passes the committee stage we will have no other opportunity to get information.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Oh, yes, you will.

Mr. SENN: Not until the principle of the bill has been passed on second reading. We will have to assent to second reading, which adopts the principle of the bill. If I thought for one moment that no class of agricultural products was going to be included in the bill I would be inclined to vote against it. We have been led to believe, as the hon. member for Souris has pointed out, that following the war there would be a great demand for agricultural products of this country from other countries which will be badly in need of them, countries which have been overrun by the enemy. If no provision is made in the bill to support the export of those goods produced by farmers, I would be inclined to vote against it.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, I have before me a certain bill which is supposed partly to deal with the question raised by the hon. member. The present position in connection with bacon, cheese and other farm products of that type is that we enter into agreements with the governments of the countries with which we are dealing. It is assumed that a certain amount of that will be done in the period following the war. The products dealt with in that way do not come under this bill. My understanding is that products, which do come under the bill, are not dealt with that way. The bill providing for the handling of floor prices on farm commodities following the war does touch upon the point which has been discussed.

Mr. PERLEY: Then we may take it from the statement of the Minister of Agriculture that actually there will be three boards marketing agricultural products. First there will be the wheat board, which is not mentioned in either the bill sponsored by the Minister of Agriculture or that sponsored by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Then we have bill 168, which is to be considered next, and which sets up a board to buy and sell farm products. Now we have one suggested by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. We will have three boards marketing agricultural products, and I think we should have a definite statement as to how they will cooperate and what understanding there will be between them.

Mr. GARDINER: My understanding is that the bill to be founded upon this resolution will be a bill to establish credits. It will be recalled that at the end of the last war there were credits arranged with certain countries to which we wanted to send certain products, one of which was wheat. It may be necessary to make certain financial arrangements in order to make it possible for a country to buy our products. As far as the agreements in connection with the products discussed a few moments ago are concerned, that is, bacon, cheese, butter, canned milk and things of that kind, they are made under the boards now set up and they will be continued to be made in that way at least until the end of the war. There is a possibility that may be carried on in the same way from then on, provided that other countries wish to deal in that manner. If Britain still wants to buy surplus products direct from the government, then I suppose we will try to sell to them in that way, and boards may be set up through the agency of the legislation which I am bringing down in connection with floor prices arrangements.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I have just been advised that there is no limitation on the type of products.

Mr. STIRLING: Natural products or anything like that?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No limitation on the products.

Mr. RALSTON: Obviously the resolution does not limit it by its terms; it is Canadian-produced products.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister stated—

Mr. RALSTON: I am simply saying that the resolution does not limit it. The minister said that he was speaking without his assistants before him and without the bill before him, but I am pointing out to the committee that if they pass the resolution its terms are not necessarily limited to manufactured products; it covers Canadian-produced goods.

[Mr. Perley.]

Mr. STIRLING: I agree entirely with what the Minister of National Defence has said, but what he and others do not seem to understand is that some of us come from constituencies far away. We are in the dying days of the session, possibly, and unless we can get some definite information at this stage we will have no opportunity of understanding the bill nor shall we be able to send it out until it has been introduced.

Mr. RALSTON: I am suggesting that the resolution is not restricted to manufactured goods, so that the committee or the house would not be debarred when the minister brings down the bill from pointing out that they have not tied their hands by passing the resolution. The resolution in its terms is wide enough to cover everything, including farm products. I got the impression that the committee felt that in passing the resolution in this form they would debar themselves from asking afterwards that farm products be included. I am pointing out that that is not so, that the wording is wide enough to cover all products.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the intention that all goods, manufactured or otherwise, shall be covered by the bill?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am so informed.

Mr. BURTON: If it is at all possible, we should have this bill in our hands in ample time.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am informed that the bill is printed and will be distributed.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. MacKinnon (Edmonton West) thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 178, to incorporate the Export Credits Insurance Corporation and to promote the revival of trade by the provision of dominion government guarantees to encourage exports from Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

EXTENSION OF OPERATION OF ACT—FURTHER PROVISIONS AS TO CONTRIBUTIONS, ETC.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 171, to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): A reversal of form.

Mr. McILRAITH: It is no reversal of form. I do not quite understand the hon. member's remark, nor do I think it has the merit of brilliance or humour. I suggest it is not of much value, either to the person uttering it or to those listening to it.

No bill that has come before this house this year has given me the personal gratification that this present bill to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act, 1924, has given. It provides for the extension of the principles of that act to a large number of employees of the public service who hitherto were not entitled to contribute to the fund set up under the act. The experience of the last twenty years has shown the value of this, both to employees and employers alike.

Perhaps it is fair to say that because of the location of the constituency which I have the honour to represent I have had more opportunity than most hon. members to see the actual working of this act. That experience has given me a great appreciation of the act. At the time the act was introduced it was the most advanced piece of legislation of its type in existence in the country. While I have no means of obtaining accurate information on the point or proving it, I genuinely believe that the act had a considerable influence upon private industry across Canada and was followed widely by private employers to the benefit of those employers and their employees.

The 1924 act was the result of recommendations contained in the report of a special committee of the House of Commons appointed to inquire into the operation of the Civil Service Act, which committee was headed by the late Hon. James Malcolm. I should like to read two brief paragraphs of the report of that committee which was made in 1923. The first reads:

> It is admitted by all who have investigated civil service conditions, not only in Canada, but in other countries as well, that a superannuation scheme is an essential part of the regulative machinery. This conclusion is in accord with the experience of private corporations in dealing with large groups of employees.

And again:

> The general principles on which modern superannuation schemes are based appear to be fairly definitely agreed upon. The basis most favoured is that under which both the employees and the employer contribute to the support of the scheme, the entire cost as a rule being borne approximately equally by both. The benefits provided for include allowances on retirement after attainment of a stipulated age; allowances to widows and minor children in the event of the death of the employee during service or after retirement, the widow's allowance being usually one-half of the employee's allowance; and allowances to the employees on retirement from disability regardless of age. There is also usually provision made for the return of the employee's contributions without interest in the event of his voluntary retirement after a minimum period of service has been rendered.
> Your committee is of the opinion that the adoption of a superannuation scheme substantially on the lines of that above described would remove one of the greatest deterrents to efficiency and curtailment of staffs in many of the departments of the public service and it therefore recommends that such a scheme be adopted by parliament at the earliest possible date.

That was the purpose of the original superannuation act of 1924. It is not my intention to deal with the history of retirement provisions prior to that time, but if anyone is interested in that matter the various references are well summarized in the speech of Mr. Malcolm on the 1924 bill, and they will be found at page 3977 of the 1924 Hansard.

The twenty years' experience in the administration of the act has shown its absolute soundness in principle, as viewed not only from the standpoint of the employees in relieving them from the worries and fears attendant upon separation from their employment in whatever circumstances, but also from the point of view of the employer in bringing about increased efficiency in the various government departments. I spoke on two previous occasions about some particular classes and some particular aspects of the matter. But particularly was it true that the benefits of the act were not applied to a wide enough number of employees. The existing act, in its definition of "civil servant" to be found in section 2 uses this language referring to employee, "who is in receipt of a stated annual salary." That provision had the effect of excluding large numbers of employees who were paid otherwise than by a stated annual salary, although generally speaking they were in the same position as these receiving a "stated annual salary." That point, I am very happy to say, is adequately dealt with in the new bill.

Another important effect of the bill now before us, is to give opportunity to come under the superannuation act to persons contributing to the old retirement fund, who, although given an opportunity at the time of the passage of the act in 1924 so to elect within a limited period, for some reason or other did not do so—these reasons are many and varied and there is not much point in going into them at the moment. That is adequately dealt with in the new bill.

Then there is the question of the minimum return of contributions. That is a slightly more technical part of the subject. There was considerable difficulty about groups of contributors who were not entitled to receive any benefit from the act after having contributed for great numbers of years. That is well dealt with in the bill, as well as a great number of other matters that experience has shown needed correction.

I do not want to approach this measure in any partisan spirit, but it is a matter of considerable pride to me as a follower of this party to know that the act of 1924 was brought in by a Liberal government under the leadership of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and that this extraordinarily beneficial legislation has been a Liberal measure. I feel that my party can justifiably take pride in that, because the act, with this amending bill, constitutes the most advanced piece of legislation in any country dealing with this aspect of the relationship between government as employer and its employees. That is something I hope Canadians, when they think about other countries, will bear in mind with respect to this legislation.

My only regret about the whole matter is that we have not as yet schemes of this sort in force in all places of employment throughout the country. I for one, and I am sure it is the desire of every hon. member here, wish that all employees wherever they may be found in Canada could have similar rights in their own employment. I think that experience generally has shown that such schemes as are in force in many large companies have been most beneficial. Our Superannuation Act is a perfect example of what can be done by many working together, all contributing their portion to the fund, and the employer doing likewise. The many can do so much that is utterly impossible for any one to do by himself. I appreciate the desire of the house to get on with its other business and I shall not, therefore, further extend my remarks at this time.

On motion of Mr. Boucher the debate was adjourned.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

PROVISION FOR PAYMENTS IN RESPECT OF CHILDREN UNDER SIXTEEN

The house resumed from Thursday, July 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of bill No. 161, to provide for family allowances.

Mr. G. E. WOOD (Brant): Mr. Speaker, last night at the adjournment of the debate I was discussing some of the reasons why I believe that the family allowance legislation would be beneficial, and examining some of the criticisms of those opposed to this bill. If I were inclined to offer a suggestion, it would be that this type of legislation should be extended by associating with it a scheme of contributory old age pensions, the income derived from which might serve in some degree as a revolving fund for payment of children's allowances. In my opinion the fact that the state has undertaken to provide for family allowances obligates those who are to enjoy that privilege to contribute, through some appropriate measure and suitable machinery, towards their own social security at the time when they retire from the activities of life. I have always believed that every man should provide something for his own security, and that it should not be left to the state to bear the cost of old age pensions without the individual making some contribution through his own efforts to reaping this reward when he comes to the time of retirement.

We have heard objections from those who think that this will be an expensive scheme. The important principle is to see that the wealth of our country is well and reasonably spent. The fact that Canada expends $350 million annually on intoxicating liquors is enough to silence those who think we cannot afford to expend $200 million upon the nation's greatest resource, its children. At any rate there cannot be a valid objection to this measure from the people who condone an indulgence which in my belief often impairs natural ability and dethrones the God-given gift of reason.

I remember reading somewhere about a deputation which waited upon Lord John Russell to voice their objections to certain taxation. His reply was, "You may rely upon it that the government of this country does not tax the working classes to anything like the extent to which they tax themselves in their expenditure on intoxicating drink alone."

As regards the element of thrift which is involved in the requirement that people shall do something to provide for their own security, it may be remembered that Richard Cobden once said there were two classes of society; those who have saved and those who have spent, those that are thrifty and those that are extravagant. All our great institutions, all our mills, our factories, our homes, have been founded by those who saved their money and, in building these institutions, provided labour with the means of employment.

There still remains plenty of evidence that thrift and enterprise are useful and commendable. Thrift is still necessary, and, as I have said, if I were to make any suggestion it would be to supplement this measure with a national scheme of contributory old age pensions, to give the people an opportunity to provide for their own security in their declining years.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker I should like my first word in closing this debate on the second reading of the family allowances bill to be one of appreciation of the attitude which the house generally has taken toward the measure. I particularly wish to thank the members of my own party for the united and loyal manner in which they have supported the measure and also for the able way in which, through their speeches, they have explained essential features of the bill itself and the fundamental principles which underlie it. Their addresses reflect credit upon this House of Commons. May I say to the members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, to the Social Credit group and to independent members who have spoken that I am also pleased that they have indicated their intention to support unitedly and unanimously the second reading of this measure.

With regard to my hon. friends of the official opposition I should also like to express my appreciation to those of their number who have supported the measure in principle and have given reasons for that support. I must confess that, in some respects, my feelings have been rather of amusement than surprise at the attitude which as an opposition they have adopted. When I read the statement made by the leader of the Progressive Conservative party, who referred to the measure as a species of political bribe, before there had been any opportunity of discussing it in this parliament, indeed before its terms had been made public, when he said that he hoped the day was coming when there would be an end to this legal bribery of the electorate, I thought that those who profess to be his followers in this house would have championed his position. I thought that if this was a species of political bribery we would have had one gallant gentleman after the other rising in his place and giving reasons to this house why this measure should not be supported. The fact that they did not is, I say, to their credit. Perhaps it was because of the intimation I gave them that what their leader had said was a reflection upon the membership of this house, and would reflect in particular on any hon. member who might take the same attitude. It is quite clear that no hon. member in his place in this house has wished to repeat any such allegation on the floor of parliament.

The members of the official opposition did briefly, in a sort of fashion, indicate that they thought there were better means of dealing with the quesion. I was a little surprised to hear the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) say that this measure was not one of social justice. I hope that will not cause him to refrain from supporting it when it comes to a vote on the second reading. He has probably heard enough in the debate to cause him to change his mind on that score, as a good many others have evidently changed theirs. If this measure is not one of social justice I cannot understand how anyone in this house would desire to support it. But as I say, if the leader of the opposition has changed his mind on that score, as he probably has we shall see definitely when the division takes place.

My hon. friend was followed by one other champion of the point of view of a past age, the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce). I myself think it is fortunate we have the hon. member for Parkdale in this house because he does belong so obviously to a past era. As I listened to him giving his arguments against this particular measure I could not but think of the familiar lines; they appear in Dickens' "The Chimes" of just a century ago:

> Bless the squire and his relations,
> And always know our proper stations.

There is another line or two:

> Oh, let us love our occupations,
> Live upon our daily rations.

In other words, in the hon. member's mind the whole of society is to be classified in strata—those with high sounding titles and many possessions are to be at the top, and those who are unfortunate enough not to possess much of this world's goods are to be classified as belonging to the lower stratum of society. That point of view, which unfortunately is still held by far too many, was clearly set forth in what the hon. member for Parkdale said in the course of his remarks.

However, Mr. Speaker, there ended the brave attack by the opposition on the measure. As I remember it, there was on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite complete silence for a day. Hon. members on this side of the house continued to give reasons why they believed it was in the public interest that this measure should be supported. That period of silence of a day having elapsed, we then had an entirely different attitude assumed by other hon. gentlemen opposite. In the speech of the leader of the opposition there was the old familiar exception taken to the measure as being unconstitutional. As I recollect it, that was the line taken up by the next speaker, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I have already said to my hon. friend that I thought he made out about as good a case as could be made out for the position that he was seeking to put forward; but that obviously it was such a weak position that it was not possible even for him to make a case.

The argument that this measure is unconstitutional, or may be unconstitutional, and for that reason should be referred by the government to the supreme court before it is permitted to find its place on the statutes or to come into force, has been supported by the hon. member for Lake Centre by the statement that a similar course was suggested by myself when I was in opposition with reference to the legislation that was brought forward by the former Prime Minister, now Lord Bennett, with regard to unemployment and social insurance legislation. Well, there is just this difference between the two measures. The legislation that was introduced by Mr. Bennett was obviously unconstitutional. This legislation is obviously constitutional. In order to make apparent to everyone that Mr. Bennett's legislation was ultra vires of this parliament it was necessary to have it referred to the supreme court. The supreme court gave a decision on it—one that I imagine every legal expert knew would be given—that the legislation was ultra vires of this parliament. What was the reason for that decision? The reason, essentially, was that the legislation inserted a condition in agreements between employers and employees in the different provinces to which the legislation was intended to apply. That was an interference with property and civil rights. The insertion of a condition by the federal government which affected the agreements between parties was obviously an invasion of the rights of the provinces in the field in which they had competent and exclusive legislative jurisdiction, and therefore it was ultra vires. But this legislation contains nothing of that kind which would justify any question as to its constitutionality.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the Prime Minister permit just one question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If that be so, why did the Prime Minister submit to the supreme court and to the privy council various other matters of social legislation introduced by the Bennett administration which those courts found to be constitutional?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I cannot recall at the moment, but I am pretty sure it was done in an attempt to clear up the whole situation once and for all. I would hope that my hon. friend would have been the first to profit by the opinion given by the supreme court, and that he would not have found it necessary even to suggest that this particular measure was unconstitutional. The supreme court has made it perfectly clear, and certainly the judicial committee of the privy council, which is the highest court, has made it perfectly clear that this parliament is at all times free to make a grant of its own money in any way that this parliament may determine. This is a free grant. It is a grant made from this parliament by virtue of its control over its own money. There is no court that I know of in the world that has questioned that right so far as this parliament is concerned or were it similarly circumstanced so far as the parliament of the United Kingdom is concerned. So that the raising of a constitutional issue amounts simply to throwing up a sort of smoke-screen, arising out of differences of view in the past, instead of constituting an effort to eliminate smoke-screens altogether in facing the future order, and seeking to find the best way to further that new order for the well-being of the Canadian people.

I need not say more about this matter except to refer to the question of government authority as exercised in the case of old age pensions. That has been quoted against this particular measure. The action of this parliament with respect to old age pensions only confirms what I have said about the right of this parliament to do what it pleases in the way of making grants. In that case parliament made a grant to the provincial governments.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not want to interfere with my right hon. friend—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If you don't, don't speak.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is rather an abrupt reply. I do not want to divert the Prime Minister's attention from his speech, but may I say to him that the grant was made as a grant in aid because of the opinion of the Department of Justice that you could not take the money of the taxpayers and give it to individuals for this purpose. That was why the government of the day adopted the principle of grants in aid. I am sure I am right about that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think my hon. friend is quite right about that. When he said he did not wish to interrupt I was a little doubtful, because I have had so many experiences with him in that regard; if he wishes later on to comment on what I am saying now he will be free to do so. I repeat that this parliament voted the money for old age pensions as a grant to the provinces. They accepted the grant and undertook to administer the old age pension scheme. It was within the competence of this parliament to make that grant, and it is equally within the competence of the present parliament to make grants for the purpose of children's allowances.

I should like to say a word to my hon. friend the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) and some of the members of his party in reference, not so much to any criticism they offered, as to a sort of credit they have been seeking to take unto themselves to which I do not think they are entitled. During the course of the debate one after the other of the members of that party made it a point to say that only since their group came into existence has the public begun to appreciate the importance of human resources as contrasted with natural resources, suggesting that it is they who have been the first to place the emphasis upon human well-being, and that we must be grateful to them for having given the human factor the importance it has assumed to-day.

Well, as a matter of interest I have looked up a debate in this house in which, when I was Minister of Labour, I took a leading part in 1911. I am going to read a paragraph from what I said at that time, in order to let hon. members see for themselves just how long before some of them were born the party on this side of the house was advocating full attention being given to human resources and human problems as contrasted with natural resources and purely material considerations. The debate had to do with the manufacture of matches. It had been discovered that the use of white phosphorus occasioned a frightful disease to the workers in match-making establishments. When I became Minister of Labour, being familiar with action that had been taken at the International Labour Office in Switzerland with respect to a substitute for white phosphorus which would avoid a serious occupational disease, I sought in this parliament to have that substitute used. Under the jurisdiction this parliament had—I need not go into the details at the moment—it was possible to have the measure considered as one concerning trade and commerce. It is of interest to note that at that time the same exception to proceeding was taken by hon. gentlemen opposite as is being taken by their successors to-day, namely, to question its constitutionality; they doubted very much if the ministry had the right to interfere in a matter of the kind. Let me read a paragraph to illustrate the sort of thing the Liberal party was trying to cope with. The condition of the workers in that industry was so horrible that as Minister of Labour I would not believe what my own officers told me as to those conditions, which they themselves had investigated, and before speaking in this house, I personally visited the homes of some of the people who were working in the establishment in which white phosphorus was being used in the manufacture of matches. This is what I said in the house at that time:

> When I read that report I hardly believed the statements that were made in it, and I decided that before I would mention the subject in this house I would verify the statements myself. The two last cases, I think, were about as bad as any reported in the list, so I went to the homes of these people myself and had a conversation with them. I will vouch from personal observation for the truth of every statement that is contained in the account of the two last cases I have read. One of the women I talked with had both of her jaws removed entirely and had the abscesses in her mouth to which I made reference. The bones taken from that woman's face are at the present moment in my office. That woman is supported by a sister who has to earn the food required for each of them, and she has been rendered an invalid for the rest of her life. I went to the other home and I talked with this woman, who had lain in bed for four years. At the present time she is the only support of her mother, and she is able to earn $4 a week. She is without a lower jaw at all and she told me that during her illness she pulled her jaw out with her own hands, such was the condition of the bones at that time.
> It is not a pleasant task to bring facts of this kind before the house, but I must say that when I came back from attending a conference at which this subject was being discussed and these facts were put before me, I felt I would be negligent in the duty I owed this country if I hesitated to bring into parliament for the sake of concealing facts of this kind similar legislation to that which has been enacted in Great Britain.

Now will my hon. friends of the C.C.F. please listen to the next paragraph:

> We talk a great deal in these days about the conservation of natural resources, but I think that more important than the conservation of natural resources is the conservation of human resources, the conservation of human health and of human life. Resources are well enough; our lumber, forests, ore and minerals were given to us for a purpose, but they were given for the preservation and not the destruction of life. So in the Department of Labour we have taken as one of the objects before us, as part of the work which I trust it will be possible to carry on through the years to come, this important question of the preservation of health, the conservation of human life, the protection of the working people, the great mass of the people of this country from occupational or other diseases which help to undermine the strength of the nation. If this country is to be what we wish it to be, a country of happy, contented and prosperous people, it will only be by safeguarding the lives and welfare of the many, and by protecting from injustice and ill the homes of the humble in the land.

More statements were made in this House of Commons on January 19, 1911, and appear at pages 2040 and 2041 of Hansard for that year.

Mr. COLDWELL: Thirty-three years ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, thirty-three years ago. Perhaps hon. members will be surprised when I read the interruption that occurred when I stopped at where I have stopped to-day. Mr. Northrup, who was then occupying a seat opposite, said:

Would the minister be good enough to state to the house on what grounds he claims this house has any jurisdiction to pass such a measure?

That is exactly the same sort of thing we have been listening to from hon. gentlemen opposite when to-day another great social reform is being placed before this parliament for adoption. I was able to cite the opinion of the justice department which was to the effect that the measure in every way was intra vires. Throughout the years, from that time to the present, wherever opportunity has presented itself, the party on this side of the house have sought, to the best of their ability, as occasion has arisen, to further measures with respect to the conservation of human life and welfare. We have time and again proposed and carried measures which to-day are of nation-wide application. I am happy that I have been spared to help to-day to further the enactment of yet another measure which will be one of the most far-reaching ever enacted for the benefit of those in humble circumstances in our land.

My friends of the C.C.F. have also made what I considered extreme and mistaken claims as respects the part they have played in advocating that industry should be made to serve the well-being of society. They have said that they were laughed at when they spoke of industry being carried on for use rather than profit. Well, I do not know who laughed at them.

Mr. COLDWELL: We have been laughed at in this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In this house?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not for that. There have time and again been extravagant statements made by them which have been laughed at, but I can say that when my hon. friend and some of his friends were in the kindergarten hon. members on this side of the house were proclaiming that industry should be considered as in the nature of social service, and its rewards made proportionate to the service rendered by all the parties to industry.

Mr. COLDWELL: What have you done about it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What have we done? More than any parliament in the world has done. And our advocacy of measure after measure of social reform in the house has been because of our having held that very view.

I mention these things because I feel my friends are being carried away by some of their recent provincial successes, which they hope they may be able to repeat in a wider field.

My hon. friends of the C.C.F. party have also said that they would like to see this measure included as part of a general scheme of social security. Well, if they will read the speech from the throne—or re-read the speech from the throne of last year, and read the speech from the throne of this year they will see there emphasis placed upon the necessity for a nation-wide system of social security, also an enumeration of the measures already enacted toward that end. The speech of this year brings out significantly the fact that the family allowances scheme is one of vast importance in the nation-wide scheme, and one which lies at the root of all social security in this country. I believe it is the very foundation of any nation-wide scheme of social security. The advocacy of a national minimum standard of life which would apply to all has been an objective which has been kept before the house in the course of all social legislation we have brought before it; it is something that has been advocated by the Liberal party for many years.

Perhaps I ought to reply to one or two other words of criticism. Some hon. members have taken exception to the fact that this bill is to come into force on July 1, 1945. There are sound reasons for the date that has been fixed. They have already been given. One of those reasons is that time will be required to make the necessary preparations for the carrying out of the provisions of the measure. It is a far-reaching piece of legislation. No greater misfortune could happen, and no greater threat could be made to its ultimate success than that this great plan for the furtherance of human well-being should be entered upon prematurely, and before all essential safeguards have been provided.

I do not believe it would be possible to have all essential preparations made in a lesser time than has been fixed. In the first place we have yet to establish a new department of government. Authority for the setting up of that department has been enacted by this parliament at this session. I refer, of course, to the Department of National Health and Welfare, which will have to do with the administration of this measure. Time will be required to get the department into working order. There will be need for consultation on the part of its officers with the provinces and with many organizations. All this will necessitate a considerable lapse of time. It is now less than a year before the time fixed for this measure to come into force. That is one reason.

Another reason is that, as hon. members know, this measure has a close relationship to the income tax, and the allowances to be made. In making their financial calculations and adjustments the Department of Finance, in adjusting payments under the income tax, must take certain periods as bases. The only periods that seem to be suitable are the beginning or the middle of the year. Obviously January 1, 1945, would have been too short a time within which to have this measure become operative, and January 1, 1946 would have put off the measure too long. July, coming in the middle of the year, and at the time I have mentioned, seemed to be in every respect the most satisfactory date.

What I cannot understand is how hon. members opposite should seek to have it appear that this measure has, in some way, been brought in in relation to the Quebec elections. That is the most unworthy kind of suggestion I have heard made for some time. Hon. members will recall that the proposal to enact family allowances is set forth in the speech from the throne. It will be recalled, too, that the speech from the throne was debated at considerable length in the house and, if I am not mistaken, it was finally passed without division. Why was it, then, that during the course of that debate we had no word about family allowances being in the nature of political bribery, or something intended as a bribe to the electorate? The measure before us is the very measure that was referred to at that time.

All this was back in January—I believe it was January 27—when the government's intention to introduce family allowances was announced in the speech from the throne. This is what was said:

> The family and the home are the foundation of national life. To aid in insuring a minimum of well-being to the children of the nation and to help gain for them a closer approach to equality of opportunity in the battle of life, you will be asked to approve a measure making provision for family allowances.

That, Mr. Speaker, is in the speech from the throne, as it was read and approved on January 27, 1944. I suggest that if hon. members did not raise objection to the measure at that time, they are hardly justified in raising some of the objections they are making at the present time.

After the speech from the throne had been read in parliament and this house proceeded with its business we followed our customary procedure. First of all, we debated the speech from the throne itself. Then we followed the course that has been followed since the beginning of the war, and brought in the appropriation bill. Its provisions were discussed at great length. Following that, as we have at previous sessions, we took up the budget. After the budget was presented we have brought forward, at as early a moment as we could, the other important measures mentioned in the speech from the throne. Every member of the house knows that that is what has taken place this year.

This discourse or the time of its introduction had nothing whatever to do with the Quebec elections. So far as my knowledge of the situation went, I did not know when the Quebec elections were to be held at the time the speech from the Throne was read. As I have said, the measure was brought in in the ordinary sequence. Why speak of Quebec? Why not say that the measure was introduced to help the elections in Alberta? They are on at the present time. Why not say that it was brought in to help the elections in Saskatchewan which took place a short time ago?

I submit that hon. gentlemen, who, whenever the opportunity presents itself, seek to raise a prejudice against any province in this country, are bringing upon themselves a grave responsibility. At a time when young men from the province of Quebec are giving their lives, along with their comrades from other provinces, in the defence of this country and in the defence of freedom, it ill suits any member of this House of Commons to seek to raise, in their absence, prejudice against the province from which they have gone forth to war. There is no greater disservice that any member of parliament can render Canada than to seek to raise in this country any form of prejudice, whether it be racial prejudice, religious prejudice, or prejudice against classes or regions.

Every one knows that Canada is a difficult country to govern. Every one knows that, at a time of war, we should, above all else, be as united as we possibly can. Yet in a period of war, at a most critical time, speakers on the other side of the house, in the official opposition, have repeatedly thrown out words insinuating that, in some way, this measure had been brought in to assist participants in an election in another province. I hope I can leave the matter at that. If what I am saying is not true I hope some one will immediately correct me.

There is another reason why this measure should not go into force before July 1 of next year. I have indicated that it is not my intention if I can possibly prevent it, and I think I may be able to, to deny to the people of Canada the right which is theirs of having an election at least every five years. This parliament is not going to be permitted to continue, whether the war is continuing or not, beyond the five years of its term. As is known, we were returned as a government to carry on the war. And we intend to do that; suffer politically as we may by devoting our entire time to carrying on the war, we intend to pursue that course in the manner that will best help to win the war. There are some hon. gentlemen opposite—and this is not restricted to the official opposition—who have been spending most of their time in trying to win elections and trying to destroy this government charged as it is with the many responsibilities that have been placed upon it by the Canadian people. I think I have some appreciation of the spirit that is in the breasts of the Canadian people. I tell my hon. friends that they will find, when the time comes, that the Canadian people are not going to be indifferent to the action, no matter from what party it originates, of trying to destroy the government that has been sent here to carry on the prosecution of the war, as vigorously as may be possible, and of seeking to destroy and undermine in every possible way its authority in different parts of the country.

I have been amazed—I must say that I speak of these things because I think they ought to be mentioned—at the fact that some men of high position in this country who were brought into the government service to help to carry on the war, knowing what they do about the seriousness of the situation, and how necessary it is that every man of ability who can serve should remain in service to help to win the war, should have left the government service in order, in the crisis of the war, to help organize a political party against the government. That, too, is something that the people of Canada will not forget.

The people of Canada have a moral sense which can be trusted, and I think that some gentlemen will find that out. Speaking of the official opposition, some one said to me, it was true of them, as had been said of an opposition elsewhere perhaps, that they had not enough members to fill an omnibus. He added, the way they are being led at the present time, not in this house but from outside, that when the next election comes they will not have enough to fill a taxicab, let alone an omnibus. I think that is probably correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You had better look after your own fences; do not bother about us.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I know my hon. friend does not want me to worry about him. May I say that I am not worrying about him at all.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think you fellows will be able to walk; you will not need a vehicle at all.

Mr. ADAMSON: The Liberal party will come back on a bicycle built for two.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: However, that is by the way.

I come now to one of the other criticisms which have been made of this measure, that certain labour leaders have objected to it on the score that it might possibly have the effect of keeping down wages which are already too low. If I believed that any such possibility existed, I would be the last person to introduce the measure. But as has been so frequently made clear in this house, the effect of this measure, first of all, is going to be to create a much greater and more certain and constant demand for commodities in the domestic market of Canada than has existed at any time prior to the war. That of itself will keep up the demand for labour. That certainly is not going to make it any easier for employers to keep wages depressed.

The wage system takes no account whatever of family status. This is something that cannot be considered too carefully. The factors that determine the rates of wages must take account of international competition, national competition and local competition. In that process the fixing of the rate of wages is related no more to those who have great obligations than to those who have no family obligations. A man who has a large family gets no consideration in payment for his services as a wage earner because of the size of his family.

Nevertheless, if it were not for large families this country would rapidly lose its whole strength as a nation. It is upon the families of this country, their numbers, the quality of their health, their vitality and strength that the future of Canada depends. Yet, under the wage system as we have it in a world of only partly regulated competition, the tendency has been to destroy family life and to depress the standard of well-being of large classes in the country. I am going to refer to this again a little later on because I think it is a very serious situation.

The fundamental justification of children's allowances is that the wage system takes no account of the family status of the wage earner, and that, in a considerable sector of Canadian industry, the wages being paid are not sufficient to give the worker a family income sufficient to keep his family in health and decency and up to a reasonably current standard. Family income must somehow be supplemented or, alternatively, a substantial portion of the population must be doomed to extreme poverty and its inevitable consequences of disease, crime, illiteracy, inefficiency and other forms of social degeneration. Allowances paid for all children, it is believed, represent by far the simplest and cheapest way of providing a supplementary family income. They avoid discrimination or social stigma and can be administered simply and cheaply. That is my reply to that particular criticism.

I intended to mention, whether I did so or not I am unable at the moment to recollect; if so I shall repeat it, that when the present administration were returned to office by the people of this country, we were continued in office for a particular purpose, namely, to prosecute the war to the utmost on behalf of the nation. We were not elected to office to introduce measures of social reform which will involve large expenditures of public money, without the people of this country having an opportunity, in the first place, to pronounce upon post-war policy. We were not given a mandate to put into effect a programme of social measures. Nor were policies of reconstruction and world rebuilding an issue in the last elections. I like the British parliamentary practice in contrast to that of some other countries, according to which it is understood that, when a ministry has fulfilled its obligations in accordance with the mandate upon which it was appointed to office, and when new questions arise which the public have not had any opportunity to consider, the ministry, in the discharge of the trust which it owes to the people, should go to the people, present the new issue, and give them an opportunity to pass upon it. That is what we intend to do.

Part of our duty has, of course, been to anticipate the difficulties which will arise in the post-war period, and to prepare those measures which will serve to meet the difficult questions which will arise when the war is over. No one can begin to know, except those who have had to do with it—here I refer particularly to many of our public servants, those in the civil service of this country who have been working night and day, giving of their health and strength to help to get into scientific and final shape the measures that should be presented to parliament at this time—I say that no one can know, except those who have had experience of it, what a terrific strain it has been upon the administration to have not only to further the prosecution of the war, but, as well, to have to anticipate and prepare for the problems which are going to arise in the post-war period. But we have assumed that responsibility and we are presenting our measures to this parliament at this session.

When the right moment comes we shall place before the people of this country a programme which we believe will serve the best interests of the people of Canada in the post-war period. It is for that as well as for the other reasons I have mentioned that this measure of family allowances has been fixed to go into effect on the first of July of 1945. Before this measure goes into effect, the people of this country will have an opportunity of expressing their views and their wishes in regard to it. They will have to bear the expense of it. My own belief is that the measure itself is going to create so much in the way of employment that the national income will be so increased that we shall find it possible not only to have this class of social enactment self sustaining but be able as a consequence to have as well a reduction of debt and taxation. As I said the other evening, one other reason why I myself took very strongly the position that this measure should not go into effect before a general election was that I did not wish to give to suspicious minds any occasion to think that the government might be seeking, as one leader already has said, to bribe the people. I wonder what hon. gentlemen opposite would be saying to-day if the date when this measure was to come into effect had been fixed at some time before the close of this year, and if at a time an election was on, be it this year or next, cheques were going into the homes of this country out of the public treasury in payment of family allowances. I think I know what would be said in this house in regard to anything of the kind, and rightly said. I was determined that no stigma of that sort should attach to a great social measure of this kind intended for the continuing well-being of the children of Canada.

What I wish to refer to more particularly, and it is the last subject on which I shall touch, is the justice of this measure. I know that there are people of all classes throughout this country who are much concerned about the significance of this measure, as to what will follow from it, and as to what it may involve by the way of change of many practices and usages to which we have grown accustomed.

I want to speak of the justice of this measure as between man and man in the matter of their posessions, as between those that have and those that have not. Some there are who say that this measure is unjust in that it takes away from him that hath and gives to him that hath not. It all depends on how wealth is created and how it comes to be possessed. I want to make clear the justice of the measure in relation to a more equitable distribution of the wealth of this country. I want to say a word, also, as to the justice of the measure as between parents in this country, as between those who have great responsibilities in the bringing up of families and other members of our society who have not the same obligation.

I want also to say a word as to the justice of the measure in relation to the children of this country, a limited number of whom have the best of opportunities in facing the battle of life, but multitudes of whom have little or no opportunity at all.

I wish to say a few words as to the justice of the measure from the point of view of Canada itself, the preservation of our nation and all that that will mean in the years to come.

First as to the justice of the measure as between man and man. Here may I take occasion to say that this measure grows out of a sincere desire on the part of the administration to meet a new condition of things with which we shall be faced when the war is over. During the last war we heard time and time again: When the war is over we shall have a new social order, things are going to be very much better for all classes of people in this country. We know that anything but that was the case. The years have gone by, we are now going through another war, and the same professions once more are being made. But this time, so far as this administration has power to have it so, we intend to see if we possibly can that the new order expresses a new social concept altogether of industry as being in the nature of social service and the obligations and rewards that grow out of that conception. It is of that concept that I wish to say a word in conclusion this afternoon.

I tried, in the period of the last war, not knowing whether or not I should be in parliament again, to give to my country what I could, as the results of careful research, of the principles on which I believed reconstruction should be attempted after the war. The measure I am advocating to-day is along the lines of the principles that I laid down at that time. But conditions which no man could control and no group of men could control have made it impossible for many of the required measures to be carried out since that time which, when the war was on, people were most anxious to have carried out. But we owe an obligation to our country to-day, and we owe it to the world to-day to see if, in some way, we cannot make a contribution that will prevent a recurrence of situations such as since 1914-18 have brought about another war.

May I by way of prefacing what I have to say read a paragraph from an address I made in Toronto before the Empire club at the King Edward hotel on March 13, 1919? At that time I was seeking to point out the necessity of a new conception of industry, the necessity of being in earnest in the matter of establishing a new world order, of finding the means whereby that new order could be secured. I repeat, as more applicable than ever to the world to-day what I said in the years immediately following the end of the last war:

> Especially in industrial relations have we accepted with complacence an order of things to which we have grown accustomed. The shock of war, stirring the world's soul to its very depths, has brought before our eyes the shattered image of an industrial civilization which is full of injustice. It has left us to decide whether the new order shall be little more than a return to the old, with all its worship of material wealth and material power, and its relative indifference to human worth and human well-being; or whether it will be an order worthy of the sacrifices of the heroic dead, and the services of those who, on land and sea and in the air have endured all manner of hardship and peril to preserve the liberties and freedom that we still enjoy.
> Let us be assured of this: the unrest in the world of industry to-day is no ephemeral and transitory affair; no mere aftermath of the hideous convulsion which has shaken existing society to its very foundations. It is the voice of a grief-stricken humanity crying for justice in the relations of industry.

I repeat what I said at that time is truer than ever to-day. We have before us the knowledge of the fact that because no heed has been paid to the truth of statements such as this, another great world war has come into being, and we must make it our supreme duty, in this generation to do all we possibly can to avert hereafter any calamity of the kind.

To bring that about we must have a wholly new conception of industry as being in the nature of social service for the benefit of all, not as something existing only for the benefit of a favoured few. First of all, let us understand exactly what industry is. Industry is the means by which the material sources of the world are transformed, through human intelligence and human energy, with the aid of natural powers, tools and machines into commodities and services available for human use.

What does that mean? It starts with the natural resources which have been the gift of the Creator to mankind. The natural resources of any country have not been given to individuals; they have been given to the entire community, to the entire people. That, I think, we must realize as a fundamental truth, and all our efforts at the improvement of social and industrial conditions must be based upon that knowledge. But what has come to be the accepted view as we have developed the institution of private property? Not industry as existing for the good of all—but industry as a means of private profit and gain. Are we then to throw aside all belief in the nature of private property to society because of some evils which have grown out of that system? Before we do so we would do well to examine the position of private property as to what it means in the way of initiative, in development of resources and making them available for service and use, what it may also mean in the betterment of masses of men.

Private property, in itself, is in no sense sacred. Private property is justified only in so far as the well-being of society is better served by its preservation as an institution than society would be by some communistic or socialistic plan. We have to ask ourselves, is the system of private property as it works out to-day in industry operating for the well-being of mankind as a whole, or is it operating for the benefit of the very few who are being enabled to reap vast fortunes, and to the detriment of the many who are kept at a margin of subsistence throughout their lives? If the latter, can not the evil be remedied, and the good maintained without throwing over the whole structure for some the merits of which remain to be proved?

Taking industry as we have it to-day, we have grown accustomed to accepting the view it is something which concerns two parties, mainly if not only, namely capital on the one hand, and labour on the other. The argument with respect to industry is, that capital which represents saving is invested and labour does the work; therefore capital should get its reward in the way of profits; labour should get its reward in the way of wages. Both capital and labour are necessary. Nothing can be done in the way of developing resources, except in the most primitive way, without the investment of capital, which is the use of wealth for the production of further wealth; nothing can be done without labour lending its skill, its ability and its muscular strength to help to develop resources. These two are essential—absolutely essential—and should get their reward. But either of them by themselves or both together are incapable of developing resources unless there is yet a third party to assist in the work of production. That third party is managerial ability. The world has come to recognize to-day that there is something wholly different between the function which the manager of a great industry performs and the function which an investor of capital performs. The function performed by a manager of industry is one demanding a high degree of intellectual acumen, demanding knowledge of men and how to coordinate their work, how to relate it to the needs of organized society, and a knowledge of world markets and world affairs. This is a class of ability which is very rare, and it commands—and rightly so—very high rewards in the form of salaries. It is through the skill of management that the two parties to industry, labour and capital, are able to work together. They can work together so long as they are united by mutual confidence, but if that goes they are as helpless as the two blades of a scissors when not firmly bolted together.

But neither capital, nor labour, nor management could do anything in the way of development of natural resources or the furthering of industrial processes without a fourth party —I shall call it the silent partner, if you wish —which is the community, in other words organized society, which makes possible all production that results from the efforts of the other three combined. What could be done in industry without the part which the community plays?

For the sake of brevity I shall repeat here what I have said on more than one previous occasion in regard to the part which the community plays. I wish it to be understood that by "the community" I mean the entire population, every man, woman and child, rich and poor, that goes to make up the community which we know of as the nation:

What is 99 per cent of the expenditure of government in normal times but outlays in the nature of investment in industry: investment in property and services of one kind or another, which alone makes possible the vast cooperation and coordination of effort which is the very life-blood of industry? The vaster industrial organization becomes, the more it depends in a multitude of directions upon the investments, not of capital or labour or management, but of the community.

It is the community which provides the natural resources and powers that underlie all production. Individuals may acquire title by one means or another, but it is from the community, and with the consent of the community that titles are held. It is the community, organized in various ways, which maintains government and foreign relations, secures law and order, fosters the arts and inventions, aids education, breeds opinion, and promotes, through concession or otherwise, the agencies of transportation, communication, credit, banking, and the like, without which any production, save the most primitive, would be impossible. It is the community which creates the demand for commodities and services, through which labour is provided with remunerative employment, and capital with a return upon its investment. Apart from the community, inventive genius, organizing capacity, managerial or other ability would be of little value.

Turn where one may, it is the community that makes possible all the activities of industry, and helps to determine their value and scope.

Community investment is supposed to receive its return in enhanced purchasing power to consumers as respects the number and quality of available services and commodities.

I hope it is clear that in the world as organized industrially to-day all that is received in the way of wages, all that is received in the way of interest on capital, all that is received in the way of salaries for managerial ability, is dependent upon what the community itself does to make possible their cooperation in the work of industry. If that is true, then the question immediately arises, where does the return to the community come in? What is the reward that the community receives? As I have indicated here, the reward that the community gets is the services and commodities which are made available for use as a result of the four parties I have mentioned working together in production. They have worked together so successfully that they have solved the problem of production.

In the early days of the old regime of hand tools it was only a limited production of commodities and services that the parties to industry could make available for use. Production was limited by individual skill; but to-day with the aid of machines, the parties to industry all working together, and with what the state does to keep in working order this great industrial organization, we have been able to produce so much that at times nations have destroyed large parts of what has been produced on the farms and in the fields, and some of the things that have been manufactured, rather than have them equitably distributed. Surely there is evidence of great injustice here—that the resources which were given to man for his enjoyment should actually be destroyed because production has got to the point where not only all that is needed for society is produced, but where it is possible for a large part of total production to be left in the hands of individuals rather than distributed for the well-being of the many, to say nothing of great quantities of wealth being destroyed that a privileged monopoly may be maintained. The community does get its reward in services and commodities, but it does not get a reward which for a large portion of the population begins to be adequate. It gets its reward in services and commodities for a number of individuals. The very well-to-do secure it in abundance. The comparatively well-to-do receive a limited return, but the mass of people do not begin to get from the natural resources of the country which have been given by the Creator for the benefit of all what they should get in the way of services and commodities as a result of those natural resources being transformed in the way which makes them available for human use. And that is what this particular measure, among other social security measures, seeks to bring about in the way of justice where at the present time great injustice exists.

The new conception of industry I wish to place before the house is the following:

> No longer must industry be thought of as a mere revenue producing process, in which capital, labour, management, and the community meet like so many rival and contending factions, each to appropriate to itself by force or might the largest possible share of the fruits of industry. Industry must be thought of, as in reality it is, as in the nature of social service, and participation in industry, whether in the form of labour or capital investment, as social service of the highest kind, since upon its successful accomplishment rest all other forms of human service.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is the right hon. gentleman reading from?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have been reading this afternoon, where I have read, exclusively from an address I made in Toronto in 1919. What I said in that address is based on what I had set forth in the book "Industry and Humanity", which I wrote hoping it might be a contribution to my country and to other countries in the post-war period. That is what I am seeking to accomplish to-day, along with other hon. members of this house, the opportunity being at hand to express now in the form of law upon our statutes means whereby the new order can be brought into being in an effective way.

May I now refer to the effect of the existing order as it relates to justice between those members of society who have families to support and those who have none. As I have said, the wage system takes no account whatever of the family. The wage system recognizes that a certain quantity of work entitles the performer of that work be he single or married to a certain reward, but it does not go beyond that.

As I mentioned at an earlier stage in the debate, the number of families in this country in which there are children under sixteen is approximately 1,500,000. The approximate number of children of these families is 3,500,000. Over half of those families benefit in whole or part from income tax allowances for children. The families with the lowest income do not benefit from the allowance at all. It is estimated that one-third of the 500,000 families in Canada receive the full income tax allowance; that is to say, an allowance for the bringing up of their children. One-third receive a partial benefit; one-third receive nothing. Over half the children get little or no benefit from income tax allowances, and they belong to the families where the need is greatest. I ask hon. members whether that is justice either to parents or to children, having in mind that the parents of families have rendered the state its most necessary of all services, namely, provided it with its citizenry for the years to come. Surely those who have assumed that obligation are entitled to special consideration. The one way in which that consideration can be made certain and effective is to see that those who have families do receive out of the national income some return which would help them to meet the obligations of bringing up their families on at least a minimum standard of life applicable to all. Equally the children in families who constitute the future citizenry of the country are entitled, in the interest of the country itself, to have the assurance that they will have during the early and formative period of their lives a certain minimum of security against lack of nourishment, lack of clothing, lack of shelter, lack of food and lack of adequate education.

I should like to conclude with a reference to the effect upon the nation itself of the efforts of the system as it prevails at the present time. A nation's population is its first asset. If from any cause a country's population be reduced in numbers or vitality, its strength relatively is weakened. If men are drafted for the army they must be taken in large part from industry; if killed, wounded or enfeebled, industry suffers. If, in industry, human life is destroyed or impaired, the nation's manpower is thereby lessened. If unsanitary conditions and congested industrial areas breed disease and spread contagion and infection, no distinction of either person or class is respected. No service to the community or to industry can be greater than that which contributes to the prevention of accident and disease, or any form of impairment of health and efficiency. What physical and mental overstrain, and under-pay and under-feeding are doing for the race in occasioning infant mortality, a low birth rate and race degeneration, in increasing nervous disorders and furthering a general predisposition to disease, is appalling. These are the problems which require first consideration, if decadence is not to be the fate of industrial communities.

The war has postponed, as I have said, the hour of social reform; but it has served to arouse communities to the need of improvement in social conditions. A revitalized citizenry is now seen to be a part of the problem of preparedness and defence. An awakened social conscience demands that conditions which make for ruin and decay in urban or rural communities must be eliminated, that the well-being of society as a whole may be conserved. Standards of living conditions and standards of working conditions are now definitely recognized as wholly essential to community well-being. This above everything else I wish to stress in relation to familes that are in humble circumstances, facing the conditions that must be faced to-day in a world like ours. To save the spirit of men from being crushed is quite as important as to prevent their bodies from being broken or infected. Many a man's spirit fails when, through no fault of his own or of his family, efficiency is permanently impaired through accident or savings become exhausted by unemployment or sickness, or where a new life in the home suggests an additional burden instead of a joy. Much invalidity and penury is due to lack of character and thrift; but much also is evidence of want of effective social control. What society fails effectively to prevent, society is in some measure under obligation to mend. That is what we are seeking to effect by this measure.

Let me give the house a few figures, which I gave before and which I now repeat, hoping they will be weighed carefully in all parts of this country, for they relate to the future of Canada if Canada is to hold her place as a country, strong enough to maintain her position in competition with other nations and in the face of situations which may arise in the course of time, when to see that its rights are fully protected this country will need all the population it can support and all the strong and vital men it can raise. I was pleased to notice that last night the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Bence) referred to this statement, which in its significance I think is as important as any statement made in this house for a long time. According to the 1941 census, of the gainfully employed forty-eight per cent are single, thirty-nine per cent of the married or widowed have no children under sixteen and forty per cent of those with children under sixteen have only one child. What does this mean? It means that eighty-four per cent of the children under sixteen in Canada are dependent upon only nineteen per cent of the gainfully employed. That, I think, makes a case as strong as any that needs to be made for seeing that these children, who are the future men and women of this country, receive adequate care, adequate nourishment, adequate clothing, adequate housing and the meeting of all other essential needs.

Before us at this time, Mr. Speaker, is what is taking place in Europe, and we know something of the future we are about to face. I was inspired to undertake the particular study of social conditions and of industrial relations subsequently published under the title of "Industry and Humanity" by a passage which was brought to my attention by my late brother, Doctor Macdougall King. While writing a book on "The Battle of Tuberculosis and How to Win It," he drew my attention to a profound statement made by Louis Pasteur, to whose great service to mankind I have been pleased to hear so many fine references made in this house in the course of the present debate. I give that statement to hon. members of this house that they reflect upon the significance of its every line.

Pasteur had lived at the time of the Franco-Prussian war and had seen the efforts made by Germany to destroy Europe. He was not living at the time of the last war; he could have known nothing of the present war. But we know of all these wars, and what Pasteur wrote in 1888 is surely seen to be truer than ever to-day. Pasteur required the aid of the microscope to discover the devastating germs within the blood; his finely trained intelligence enabled him to perceive like factors and forces at work in the world. In the light of his previously acquired knowledge, he saw the same conflict between individuals and between nations as he found within the human organism. This is the scientific utterance in relation to man which Pasteur has left to the world:

> Two contrary laws seem to be wrestling with each other nowadays: the one, a law of blood and of death, ever imagining new means of destruction, and forcing nations to be constantly ready for the battlefield—the other, a law of peace, work, and health, ever evolving new means of delivering man from the scourges which beset him. The one seeks violent conquests, the other the relief of humanity. The latter places one human life above any victory; while the former would sacrifice hundreds of thousands of lives to the ambition of one. Which of these two laws shall ultimately prevail, God alone knows.

By the measure on family allowances before this House of Commons to-day, we are seeking to further the law of peace, work and health. Looking to the immediate establishment of a new order, we are giving to-day, by its provisions, a challenge to the law of blood and of death.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Mackenzie King) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. GOLDING: I was paired with the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce). Had I voted, I would have voted for the motion.

Bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Prime Minister if it is his intention to continue discussion of this bill in committee? I understood that we were going on with something else when the second reading had been completed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not have any such understanding. It was my intention to go on in committee, but if my hon. friend desires to wait until to-morrow, very good.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think I have any special preference, but in giving the order of business last night it was indicated that after second reading we were to go on to something else. I have no objection.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I stated last night:

> In the afternoon we shall continue the debate on the family allowances measure, and if we conclude that measure we shall then return to whatever order on the list we may not have completed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In the year 1934 there arose a great figure named William Aberhart who preached the doctrine of $25 a month for everyone. In the year 1935 a number of members were elected to this house who were pledged to that principle. When those members began to speak the opposition to what they had to say was universal. It has been genuinely entertaining to a number of us to hear a great number of those who were most offensive in their sneers and jeers about the "$25 a month," as they said, "something for nothing," rising meekly in their places and supporting this measure. There are only two things I have to say regarding this measure—it does not go nearly far enough; the method of financing these allowances is unsound. Canada will run into bewilderment and frustration and disillusionment if the governments in power persist in trying to finance allowances and other consumer purchasing power distribution measures by means of debt money. I felt it was important to draw the attention of the house and the country to that fact.

The government is feeling its way. It is imitating the motions, but it is without the soul and driving force which is necessary in order to introduce a sound method of distribution. I think the Prime Minister did exceedingly well this afternoon in his speech, but I could not help wondering what Mr. Aberhart would feel if he knew that eight years after he introduced his great movement he would have as a follower the Prime Minister of Canada and the leader of the Liberal party.

As the Prime Minister has indicated, we are entering an age of abundance far greater than has even been hinted at at the present time. Meagre little family allowances will be simply drops in the ocean in effecting the amount of purchasing power that must be put into the hands of the public in order to enable them to consume the plentiful production we are now capable of producing. I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister upon having had the courage to introduce this measure at this time. I wish also to congratulate the members of this house for having had the good sound common sense to support this measure and pass it unanimously.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to say just a word. When I saw the vote this afternoon I wondered just why this parliament had waited such a long time to pass a measure of this description. This afternoon the Prime Minister quoted speeches he made thirty-three years ago and referred to his book "Industry and Humanity," which I had the pleasure of reading a good many years ago. The Prime Minister has been in office for most of twenty-five years and at the end of that time we find a House of Commons unanimously in favour of this great social measure—for I so regard it. That is a satisfaction to everybody. But one wonders why such a measure has been delayed for so long. I look back over the last few years, as I said the other day, and I think of the misery of the ten years between 1929 and 1939. The Prime Minister this afternoon referred to his visits to people in 1911, when I was pretty young. I was glad to note what the Prime Minister said about those people at that time. But let me say to him that I only wish that in the last ten years he might have visited some of the homes in his own constituency. There he would have seen indescribable conditions. I remember being up in that constituency in 1934 and seeing little children with their feet bound up in gunny-sacking because there was no money to buy boots and shoes so that they could attend school or engage in other normal activities. I say this to him too, that I am quite sure that irrespective of what the outcome of the next federal election may be, there is no party in this house which would dare to do anything but implement this piece of legislation. We shall have to extend our social service measures. It is estimated that this measure will cost the country in the neighbourhood of $200,000,000 annually. We have also a health plan which will cost possibly another $200,000,000 annually. We have men and women returning from overseas incapacitated and from other causes, and I hope eventually—I hope, I say—that we shall be spending several hundred millions of dollars to do the right thing by these men and women.

But what I want to point out now is that somehow we have to find the ways and means of providing the necessary revenues for these purposes. My hon. friends to my left a few moments ago spoke of the national dividend. I believe that a national dividend will come when we are able to control the productive resources and the national resources of this country in the public interest. I do not think you can issue national dividends unless they can be transferred into property over which the nation has some financial control.

I believe that this measure which we have adopted unanimously this afternoon is going to force this country along the road towards a new social order which the Prime Minister perhaps did not exactly imply this afternoon, but which is undoubtedly in the making, a new order in which the productive and natural resources of the nation will be operated in the public interest for the benefit not of a few but of the whole people of this country. We are on the threshold of tremendous changes, and we have to prepare the economic base for these social security measures.

If I have one criticism then to make of what the government has proposed and the house supported unanimously this afternoon—and I am glad that it has been unanimous—it is this: we are building the superstructure without providing the necessary foundation. After all, the necessary foundation is the goods which will validate the allowances that are now being provided for. We have reached an age of abundance, but that age of abundance cannot be taken advantage of by the people until the means of production and distribution are in the hands of the people of Canada. The people of Canada themselves hold the key to unlock the closed door.

I am glad that all this has happened this afternoon. We, as the Prime Minister said, have taken a little credit for promoting across this country many of these social measures. We still repeat that we have done a great deal along these lines. I remember a trip that I made to Great Britain in 1924. When I returned I happened to be a political candidate in the city where I lived. At that time I was actively urging old age pensions and unemployment insurance, those two great social measures which we now have on our statute books. I remember very well how my opponents, both Liberal and Conservatives, came back with the statement that I had been over to Great Britain and Europe and copied their ideas and that in this country we did not want to import the dole. I have a vivid recollection of that campaign and of what was said about those two social measures at that time.

This morning in my office upstairs I opened a letter which came from an old pupil of mine, the son of a former Liberal member of one of our legislatures in this country. That boy is now serving in the Royal Canadian Air Force in India. I have not his letter before me but I can quote pretty well what he said. He said: "I spent four years in Great Britain. I went over there with the idea that it was a very backward country, that they heated their homes with fire-grates, that they had no central heating. I understand now what you stood for in the old days in Regina. When I compare conditions in Canada with what I see in the way of cooperative endeavour and of social advancement in that country I realize that in these respects we are still in our infancy." These are not my words. They are the words of a lad whom I taught a good many years ago in Regina.

My predecessor in this movement in this house was the late Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, and I say without fear of contradiction that if anyone ever did anything to popularize these social service measures across Canada it was the late Mr. J. S. Woodsworth. I am glad that we have got this measure at last.

But there is something I must say to the Prime Minister. This afternoon when he said that there were obstacles in the way of bringing down this measure years ago, I wondered what those obstacles were. After all, the government which has proposed this measure has been in power ever since 1921, with the exception of five years. The government has had the power to do things, and if these things were good to advocate twenty-five years ago, they certainly were good to implement long before 1944. I do not want to seem ungrateful or ungenerous, but I do want to point out that we have waited a very long time, and now at last we have a unanimous House of Commons to support the bill that has been read a second time to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I should say a word of thanks to my hon. friend for what he has just said. He spoke of the pleasure it gave him to see this measure carried unanimously. I only wish to say that that shows how effective over recent years has been the educational work that has gone on from this side of the house by the Liberal party. My hon. friend says that we have had the power all along. But to use power without having public opinion with you is to adopt the nazi method of proceeding, which is quite contrary to the spirit of Liberalism. Part of the art of government, if I may be permitted to say so, lies in knowing when it is best to do things and when it is wiser to leave them alone Before the war the country was certainly not in the mood it is in to-day, nor did it have the understanding of social problems that it has to-day.

We have been going through another war. People have had searchings of heart which have caused them to see the necessity for great changes. This is the opportune moment to bring down this measure and we are seizing opportunity by the hand, which may I say I believe is the right way of proceeding. We have now had about five years of war. If I had attempted to bring in a measure of this kind any sooner I believe that it would not only have been fatal to the enactment of the measure itself; the attempt so to do would also have been resented very strongly by the people of Canada. Fortunately, I think, they are now in a mood to support the measure, and I am happy indeed that that support is going to be so generously given in all parts of Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am very glad that the Prime Minister, whom I have known for a long time as an advocate of social legislation, has lived to see so much of what he advocated enacted into law. I am grateful to hon. members on the other side who, when I rose a few moments ago to support this measure—an act for which I make no apology—expressed their appreciation with applause.

I too have been an advocate of social legislation for a long time. I do not know whether my first efforts in that direction antedated those of the Prime Minister, because he has been interested in the subject for a long time; but away back in 1914 I was one of those who advocated what was perhaps about the earliest measure of social legislation in this country, namely workmen's compensation. I did that because in the factory in which I laboured I saw on many occasions men lose a hand or a leg or otherwise become injured, and on two occasions, either because of heat or some other reason, two men fell into a cupola in which about 100 tons of iron were melting, and not even their ashes were found. I realized at that time that the workmen always had a battle to obtain any rights. I am not speaking about inability to obtain compensation from the company with which I was associated, because it was a very human organization and was managed by high-minded men. But in those days the courts were full of cases of men who had been maimed in industry and had to fight for their rights; that is, they did so if they could afford to engage the services of a lawyer or find one generous enough to plead their case for nothing. Too often these humble employees did not get the redress to which they were entitled. So that in those early days I was an advocate of workmen's compensation.

The government of the day in Ontario, which was the Whitney administration, was the first to enact such legislation. I refer to these matters because, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was speaking, I thought

I had better correct a few of his ideas about who has been first or last in the advocacy of social legislation. Also I was one of the early advocates of mothers' allowances. My interest in this reform arose from having lived in a neighborhood in which children blessed almost every home, and from early childhood I saw what it meant to a family if the breadwinner either died or was killed. How long mothers' allowances have been on the statute books I do not know.

Mr. HOWDEN: May I tell my hon. friend that a Liberal government in Manitoba enacted workmen's compensation and mothers' allowances in 1915. Manitoba was the first province in Canada to do so.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is not important which province was the first. I know that Ontario was very early in the field, thirty years ago, and long before the late leader of the C.C.F. —for whom I had high regard and a very friendly feeling—was in this house.

Another early piece of legislation, which was mentioned by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, was unemployment insurance. May I say that I went to Europe and visited several European countries which had unemployment insurance and studied the benefits of their legislation. Perhaps I should yield precedence to the Prime Minister and some others as being ahead of myself in advocating unemployment insurance, but I was very early an advocate of it, because I earnestly believed in it. I did so because in the plant with which I was associated were hundreds of men, the very flower of Canada. There are no finer men than the average industrial worker. No class of men have rendered more service to their country. I might instance the hon. member for Huron-Perth, who was a foreman in a small plant in the town in which he lived, and during that period found time also to serve as mayor of his community, as chairman of the hospital board, and in every worthwhile effort in the town in which he resided. He is but one of thousands; I could name many others. I name him because I see him sitting over there and because we have a certain affinity, having both laboured in businesses associated with iron and steel, his company making steel boilers and other agricultural machinery for farmers, and the large company I was associated with making boilers and radiators and steam equipment of one kind and another.

I advocated unemployment insurance because on so many occasions I saw good honest citizens laid off work through no fault of their own and no fault of their employer, and as their wages were never high they suffered much distress.

Another piece of legislation which I advocated many years ago was the old age pension. Numerous men have supported conscientiously and honestly this social reform. The Prime Minister was an early advocate of it; I heard him speak on the subject many years ago.

Many other pieces of social legislation have been discussed in recent years. Some are federal, some wholly provincial. If all of them are not on the statute books I hope they soon will be. The importance of maternal allowances cannot be disputed. Too often the advent of a little "treasure" into the home is a heavy handicap to the breadwinner, the ordinary humble honest heroic citizen. The allowance should apply at least to every family whose income is not more than $2,500 a year. If this provision is not on our statute book it should be. It is in effect in England. Of course in Canada the present Prime Minister and his predecessors have been faced with the problem of the nine provinces. I hope the time is not far distant—now that space is almost annihilated with the advent of radio and aeroplanes and swift automobiles and fast trains—when the federal government will have much more power than it has to-day, so that it can do what New Zealand has done, what Australia, whose federal constitution permits a little more latitude than ours, has been able to do, and what the British government long ago put into effect.

Mr. Chairman, I was almost going to say I am a worshipper of the old country; they have been so far ahead of us and any other country in social legislation. They have set the way for all of us and they deserve unstinted praise. The reason why they have been able to do it is that they are not circumscribed by nine provincial governments, from whom they had to get permission to do certain things. I am not going to speak on the constitutionality of this measure; it does not interest me. If this government has the power to do it, then I give them all credit for having gone ahead with it. This constitution business is something I am not competent to talk on. Therefore I have no reference to make to it.

Another thing that I have seen in my long association with industry is the terrible hardships that are experienced by the workingman's family when he, the bread-winner, becomes sick or his wife becomes sick. They have no sick benefits. For some years we have had this in some plants. We followed the programme which was adopted in England, away back in the early nineteenth century.

At that time great labour organizations organized, instituted and successfully carried on sick benefits. I am a strong believer in sick benefits. When the bread-winner at the ordinary low salary is taken sick or his wife is taken sick and he is placed in a position where he cannot carry on, why should he not have sick benefits? I do not know where they are to come from, but they should come from somewhere. If we have the authority to do these things I say, go ahead and bring in legislation along that line.

There is another group about whom I have been making a long investigation for quite a period of time, namely, the crippled. I have in mind at the present moment a man who is badly crippled. He is taken around in one of those little four-wheel child's wagons. He is a very fine man, an excellent musician, a man of high character. But as a child I suppose he became afflicted with spinal meningitis or something else that affected his legs so that he could never walk. He has been a cripple all his life. Society did not give him any chance. Our governments have not given him any chance. I hope that if the Prime Minister lives long enough—I cannot hope that he is to be Prime Minister much longer—but if he is—and no one can tell to-day who is to be Prime Minister after the next election—I suggest to him that he consider the cripples. There are many of them. I know a little girl who lives near my home. It would make your heart ache to see her getting around. She sits on the floor and throws one leg in front of her and draws the other behind her. She is unable to get a position anywhere. Society gives her nothing, and so far as I know the government gives her nothing. If the provinces would do it—

Mrs. CASSELMAN: I wonder if the hon. member knows that the social security committee is recommending a grant to the provinces to be used for aid to crippled children under the draft health bill which has been under consideration during the last few years?

Mr. MacNICOL: Let me say that I have studied the matter for quite a number of years, but I have never been able to get anywhere. I brought it up in this house some years ago. All I have to say is that if the provinces will not act, let the federal government act. The crippled child has the right to have a square deal from society and it is not getting a square deal to-day. The crippled child cannot get a position—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he imagine that there is any province that would refuse a grant in aid from the dominion for the purpose of the crippled children?

Mr. MacNICOL: No, I did not say that and I think the government—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Why all the excitement then?

Mr. MacNICOL: Because it is not being done to-day. I am not blaming the federal government.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The federal government is not granting the money. You are starting with the cart before the horse.

Mr. MacNICOL: No, I am not doing any such thing. I am saying that the horse, which in your case I suppose is the provincial government, is balky and will not do anything. If the cart is the federal government, then let the cart commence to take more notice of these things. The blind are being taken care of and have been for some time. I advocated pensions for the blind years ago and we had a committee on it a few years ago. I am glad that the government has granted contributions to the blind. I believe they are on the same basis to-day as the old age pensioners, are they not? That is all to the country's credit. These are four other social situations which I hope will be taken care of. I give the government credit for everything it has done. It deserves credit for what it has done, but we can all go farther.

That, Mr. Chairman, is my own humble contribution, small I know, but I never missed an opportunity to speak on these things, nor have I for the last twenty-five to thirty-five years and more. As one who has had some humble part in advocating and supporting these measures, I am glad to see that in the majority of cases they have come to pass.

I have only two observations to make with reference to the bill now before us. I am not clear on section 2. We have not yet come to it, but I may as well say something about it now. I am not clear about the position of the Canadian soldier who has lived here all his lifetime and had the courage to enlist. I honour those men who have the courage to enlist voluntarily. I know numbers from the riding I have the honour to represent. That riding is composed mostly of old country people, particularly the north end of it, almost solidly, and they have enlisted en masse. I know of one family by the name of David Seggie, of Harvie avenue, Toronto, a Scotsman who came over here from the old country, his blood being of that martial strain of old Scotland; his seven sons enlisted voluntarily. Four of them are in Italy, I believe; two of them in Britain and one here in Canada. That is the whole family. If the Prime Minister still continues as Prime Minister and does not call an election too soon, I hope that he will consider some decoration or consideration for the families who have sent all their sons, either one son or more, because the mother and father who give their only son cannot do any more, and the man who sends all seven sons—oh, I cannot see anything for him but the kindest consideration when he has made a contribution of that magnitude.

I am not clear as to just where the father, a young Canadian who was born and raised here and who went to England and married an English girl, or on old country girl, English, Irish, Scotch or Welsh, or whatever it may be, and has children over there, fits into this picture. I cannot see why his children should not come under this legislation. If they do not I hope the Prime Minister, because he has a big heart, is generous and has as much love for these children as anyone in the country, will look after this matter. I cannot think of him barring a child born of a Canadian father overseas.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no intention that I know of. I do not know whether my hon. friend is referring to cases of children who continue to live abroad indefinitely. That, I think, would have to be provided against. But certainly from the moment a child is back in Canada it will apply.

Mr. MacNICOL: They will be over there for two or three years. Their father is still a Canadian; he cannot come back. I know quite a number of them, the Seggie boys, for instance, who have been over there for four years, one of them for almost five years. If they married and had children over there they would be Canadian children in every sense of the word. Fathers cannot come back. The state does not want them to come back. The state wants them to stay there to do their manly duty in winning this war. They want to stay there to win this war. If the bill is not clear on that I have no doubt that it will be cleared up. I just wished to say a word on that. I did not speak on the second reading of the bill. Had I spoken I would have dealt with that aspect of it. I had no intention of rising to oppose the bill.

One other suggestion was made by my leader, who himself endeavoured to take part in the last war. I do not know whether or not he was overseas, but I do know that he endeavoured to get into the army. In the course of his speech he suggested something with which I am heartily in accord. It may not be possible to accomplish, but I hope the Prime Minister will give it consideration. The suggestion was that this legislation be made applicable at once to the children of the soldiers who are on active service to-day, many of whom have been wounded and gone to hospital, and some of whom have died. I understand that under the dependents' allowance legislation the government has complete power to make this legislation applicable to the families of those soldiers at once, and I do not see why that should not be done. I do hope the Prime Minister will find some way of making this measure operative as soon as possible with respect to the children of soldiers serving in any theatre of war.

I believe that is all I have to say. I had just those two thoughts, in regard to children born to Canadian parents overseas and children of soldiers on active service. If some way could be found to permit them to obtain these benefits immediately, I think that would be a wonderful step in the right direction. I do not see why they should have to wait until next year. Our men overseas are going through what tongue cannot describe. All we see is pictures in our daily press or illustrated magazines. How human hearts and flesh and blood can stand what these men are going through in the front line and on our fighting ships is something I cannot comprehend. God Almighty in his wisdom strengthened the hearts of humans to stand what must be stood, and out of respect for the great contribution these men are making I hope the government will be able to find some way to make this legislation applicable to the children of those men now.

Mr. CHURCH: For five minutes I wish to refer to the first section of the bill only. Last night I gave my views on the totalitarian and socialistic aspects of the matter dealt with in this legislation. I gave qualified support to this measure on second reading because I believe it will help the small wage-earners who have large families and who are suffering at the present time. I have seen the situation as it exists in the Toronto district. The large number of members we have on this side of the house came from the province of Ontario, and mainly the Toronto district which is suffering most at the present time because of a lack of housing accommodation. I urge the government to call a conference immediately with the provinces and the larger municipalities with regard to this bill. The bill was not referred to any committee. I do not want to say anything now that might cause differences of opinion here, because the house has approved the principle of the bill, but I wish now to urge the government to take action along four or five lines.

As you know, Mr. Chairman, up to the present the municipalities have had to do the greatest share of the work in connection with social services to our citizens. Measures of this kind have been loaded upon them after every war. The very same conditions arose in 1803, when the Addington administration came into power, and the same thing has occurred since—a demand for material things of all kinds. The materialism of the age has become apparent; people want the government now to look after all sorts of agencies. As I said last night, prior to the South African war one of the glories of the Victorian era was the belief that the state had no money except what came from the taxpayers. The Victorian era built up assets for the future, which we have squandered on many services, some unnecessary. In those days the people kept the state. To-day, with the teachings of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation we are heading for the time when the state will keep the people. Let us get back to basic principles in connection with this bill. The first thing to be done is to eliminate the duplicate control system and do away with all these big bureaux here in Ottawa. The relief bureaux of our municipalities can do this work. We made a start in 1935, on my select committee, the committee "on housing and reconstruction", which made a report to the previous administration. When the new government came in, it adopted very largely a low cost housing scheme, on which it spent $80,000,000. We should spend $200,000,000 on housing immediately, because under this legislation not one cent will be spent until after the next election. The first payments will not be made until July 1, 1945. In the meantime aid housing and a fuel supply. The interval between now and July 1, 1945, should be devoted to further investigation of all provisions of the bill in the manner I indicated last evening, namely, at a conference with the provinces and larger municipalities.

The burden of debt of these social services of all kinds must be lifted from the municipalities, because the ordinary municipal tax rate contains at least three to five mills for purely social services, and some of the burden of debt must be removed from real estate. We must have low cost housing, cheap light and power, transportation services, hospital accommodation, and so on; and all these matters could be dealt with at a conference such as I have suggested. I do not want the government to consider this matter ended with the hip, hip, hurrah of the vote this afternoon. It takes far more than an act of parliament to secure a cent for the poor from this bill. This is far from the end of it. The government need not go throughout the country and say, "We did it", and all that sort of thing. The whole bill is nothing but a gesture to the left, and I have never yet made any gestures to the left. I can tell you this, that if we adopt the proposals of the C.C.F. we shall have a totalitarian socialist state in which everybody will work for the government and under which all liberty, all freedom, and ownership of private property will go.

We have not a perfect bill here; far from it. As I say, no allowance will be paid until July 1 of next year. In the meantime the government have a chance to do something for the municipalities by assuming the whole cost of all social services, including hospitalization, relief, and the burdens now on the municipalities. One result of the vote to-day will be to dry up all subscriptions to charities, churches and other organizations. I believe we could cut down the cost of this legislation considerably by providing gainful employment, social security and aid along the lines I have indicated. The state has no money for all these ventures, except what it gets from the taxpayers; one of the sections of this bill provides that parliament must vote annually the necessary funds. We should let the federal authority take over the whole cost of these social services from the municipalities. Let the federal authority pay for them and in that way relieve the municipalities and real estate of the cost, and help as a substitute for this bill by extension of these social security measures.

Last evening the junior member for Halifax said I had stated that we had power to make these payments. I did not say anything of the kind. I referred to the various reports that have been made during the last number of years; to the work of the committee on industrial relations in 1926, 1927 and 1928, and to the references to the courts and then to the privy council, to the Rowell report, and so on, and said they all came back to the words "public debt and profit" back to the basic principle of the federal authority to vote all funds they wanted under these words. I discussed the question of whether, by agreement with the provinces, we could vote any sums of money we wished to meet the cost of social services, in connection with technical education, old age pensions and that sort of thing, under the words "public debt and property", feared that, unless improved, the bill would wind up in the law courts.

I am opposed to a socialist, totalitarian state, the doctrines of which would be foreign to the will and soul of Canada, as they are foreign to the will of the mother country. The key to happiness, as it has been in the past, should lie in the ownership of private property, and we must work to relieve private property of the burdens in restraint of trade which have been placed upon it. The key to happiness lies in work and thought for others, and not in the searchings after material things and in gainful employment.

I believe the right to possess private property is derived from nature, and not from man, and that the state has no right to abolish it, but can only regulate its use. This burden of $200,000,000 could be reduced to one-tenth that size, or to $20,000,000, if we were not to have a large administrative set-up in offices all over this country, and only those who need it were to secure it. All this money could be distributed to the municipalities throughout the provinces to administer on a national standard plan. The work could be conducted by the various welfare organizations already established in the provinces, and by the welfare boards in the municipalities. If this were done we would be able to eliminate much of the burden of debt now imposed on real estate by this enlarging of social services across Canada, and save duplication and waste.

I support what the government has done for this city of Ottawa, because it has followed out a policy dear to the Prime Minister's heart. I do not object to the expenditure of money in Ottawa, and other places doing the same should get the same aid, but I think three or four mills of Ottawa's tax rate could be put on driveway widenings and on the parks system, and to improve housing conditions here. Other cities doing like work get no federal aid. Vast improvements could be made in our social security measures. Possibly the improvement of housing is the key to the whole social security system, since it relates to the health and happiness of the masses. The modern, small house is greatly needed.

In Toronto to-day we need 25,000 of those houses. Less than one per cent of houses are vacant, and I am informed that 600 soldiers could be put out of their homes to-morrow. However, a court order has been issued postponing the evictions. We could accomplish much more in respect of social services, as the British government has done, if we had a proper housing system, with proper fuel and proper transportation, light, power and other civic services.

I have made reference before to a hospital of which members and ministers' families are well aware. I have in mind the Sick Children's hospital of Toronto, and the magnificent work it has done for the poor people in that city and in Ontario. That work has been done through public subscription. True, they do receive a per diem allowance; but the work that hospital is doing for children from all parts of Ontario has resulted in saving the lives of many of those children. That work is done solely by private subscription and the aid of a per diem allowance, and with no federal aid whatever. I know the daughter of one hon. member, who sometimes presides in your absence, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding), a former mayor, was a nurse in that hospital, and a very fine nurse, too. In its social services scheme the government could give something toward the upkeep of such wonderful places which have brought such joy and health to the sick children of Ontario.

I know that eighty per cent of the patients at the Sick Children's hospital of Toronto do not pay one cent, and the other twenty per cent pay very little. The out-door patients pay practically nothing. As I travel on the street cars I see them going to the hospital to receive treatment. These are largely poor people who cannot afford to pay for it.

As I have said, I believe we could effect a great economy in the operation of this measure, and that we could do it for possibly only one-tenth of the $200,000,000. I should hope the government would consider these suggestions during the recess of parliament. No doubt the bill will pass, but I have raised these objections because I have all my life supported reasonable, sound services adapted to our circumstances and I have always supported the work of the social services. I am not a mere beginner. I have been in it all my life. I appreciate that much has been done by some of the municipalities and by the provinces along this line. I believe the provinces and municipalities could be linked up into a joint united scheme and could thereby effect great economies, without setting up this great spending department here in Ottawa, and thus remove federal burdens from real estate. We might eliminate some of the abuses in our social system which have crept in during the war, and we would go a long way toward promoting better social conditions for the working classes in this country.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The observations of the hon. member for Davenport and the hon. member for Broadview prompt me to make a few comments. They have referred to the late Mr. Woodsworth, and to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in particular. I have no doubt that the hon. members are most generous in their home communities, but the fact remains that they did happen to be in parliament when their party was in office between 1930 and 1935. I do not think that any government ever received a clearer mandate from the people, or that any government has ever had a worse record in dealing with the problems we have been discussing in the last few days.

The hon. member for North Battleford made some reference to her personal experience during those years. At that time I was in one of the pioneer communities of Canada. I cannot think of any government in any country of the world which was more heartless than the Conservative administrations both provincially and federally during that period of time.

I received a call a few days ago from one of my constituents who has just returned after spending nearly four years overseas. This man was a veteran of the last war, having spent two years in the armed services before he was nineteen. He was unfortunate enough to have to live in northern Saskatchewan and to have to seek help through the Conservative government. The very best he could get was $5 a month for himself and wife, and an extra dollar for his child. Those were the family allowances available in Saskatchewan during that period of time—a dollar a month per child, with $5 for the parents. If there were five children in the family they might look forward to receiving $10 a month, which was the maximum relief allowance in the bush.

I recall looking into the case of a widow with four children. I discussed this matter with the Conservative minister of agriculture of Saskatchewan, who happened to be our local representative at the time. It was this family's misfortune to have lost the father, as a result of impaired health, following a most distinguished career overseas with the Canadian army. He left this small family of four children, two of whom were twins. The mother was English and was not familiar with the problems confronting the pioneer in the north. That family found a home in our community. Their income was slashed from $35 to $24 a month. I remember the figures vividly, because they represented a slash of over thirty per cent.

About that time the provincial treasurer was replaced on orders from Ottawa, because apparently he was too generous with the people's money. Another provincial treasurer took over the strong-box, in order that the money might be spent cautiously. Hon. members will understand that a widow who has to buy everything she eats and all she wears must be even more skilful than the Minister of Finance, if she is to manage a family of five on $24 a month.

I have in mind another case. These people went into the northern country in 1919. The father had served during the Boer war, and again in the great war. His wife looked after the family while he was overseas. When they first went in there they were about fifty-eight miles away from the railway. They managed to give their children a good education, but it was a very hard and long pull. The government of the day gave assistance in that community on the basis I have indicated, but could not see that adequate health and educational services were required. There were those at the time who felt that frontier people did not deserve any more. I should like to remind the committee that the people in those pioneering communities have made a wonderful contribution to the life of this country. Young people from those communities have joined the services.

The family I mentioned that went back fifty-eight miles has had a most unusual record. As I said, the father was a veteran of the Boer war, a veteran of the great war, and joined the veterans' guard of this war. They educated four children. The eldest boy joined the air force before the war started. The younger boy joined since and has been invalided home. Unfortunately the older boy will never return again. The mother, who is also a grandmother, joined the C.W.A.C. and is making an outstanding contribution during the present conflict. I had the pleasure of introducing her to the Minister of National Defence when she was last in Ottawa. Surely such people deserve better than we gave them in the thirties.

I think the Prime Minister is to be commended for introducing legislation of this kind on the assumption that people such as I have mentioned are just as important as people on St. James street, Montreal, or on Bay street, Toronto. When citizens in a community, whether it be Hudson Bay Junction or in the Peace River country, are obliged to live under conditions where $5 a month for the family is the maximum amount available, it is a reflection upon the entire country. I do not feel that the Prime Minister was on strong ground when he intimated that he did not have public sentiment with him previously. I think there have been many occasions during the past twenty-five years when public sentiment would have been with the government had legislation of this kind been proposed.

Mr. MARTIN: Is the hon. member aware that in 1929 a motion was moved in this house by Mr. Letellier, seconded by the former leader of the present C.C.F., Mr. Woodsworth, proposing that the question of family allowances be referred for committee consideration, and the whole question was referred to the committee on industrial and international relations? That committee, of which Mr. Woodsworth was a devoted member, decided to do nothing about the matter. I just mention that as an indication of the sort of thing the Prime Minister had in mind.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have no doubt that what the hon. member says is correct. I am sure that if the late Mr. Woodsworth was a member of that committee he felt that something should be done, but unfortunately he did not have the majority he needed to take action.

Mr. MARTIN: I should like to read from the report of the committee dated Friday, May 31, 1929. The late Mr. Woodsworth was a member of that committee, as was the hon. member for Broadview, who, I believe, is the only member of that committee who is still a member of this house. The report of that committee concludes with this paragraph:

> Your committee begs to submit the evidence of these witnesses on the subject matter of investigation, and recommends that (a) as this proposal is new in Canada and requires more careful consideration, no immediate action shall be taken.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I thank my hon. friend for the information he has given.

In conclusion, I want again to express my personal appreciation of the legislation which has been brought forward. I hope the Prime Minister will continue to bring in the other social legislation he proposed twenty-five years ago.

Mr. BENCE: I should like to refer again to a matter I brought up last night when I was speaking on the second reading. I asked what consideration had been given by the administration to the whole matter of the taxation fields and the question of reallocation of responsibility as between the provinces and the dominion, particularly in view of the fact that the provinces have agreed to give up certain fields of taxation for the duration of the war in order to assist the administration in the prosecution of the war. As I said last night, I am particularly concerned about the eventual implementing of the report of the Sirois commission, and I am concerned that the decision of the administration at this time to bring in this measure, with the tremendous amount of taxes that will have to be levied and the tremendous amount of money that will be paid out, may militate against the future implementing of the report of that commission dealing with the reallocation of responsibilities and the establishment of social services.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The finance department has given careful consideration to the financial implications of this measure as it affects the dominion treasury and the relations between the provinces and the dominion. The view the finance department has taken in a broad way is, as I understand it, that this measure is calculated to assist the revenues of the country, that it will bring about a considerable increase in production and employment which will be a contributing factor toward increasing the national income.

This is a matter exclusively within the jurisdiction of the federal government, but as my hon. friend says there are relations between the provinces and the dominion that apply to all matters that affect finance. Those will be duly considered at the right time. I know the department has explored the aspect to which my hon. friend has referred and it feels that those relations will not be embarrassed by proceeding at this time with this measure.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I believe that this is the time when man's mind must be directed toward the solution and methods and techniques—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend probably heard the conversation that took place between the leader of the opposition and myself when the house went into committee. There seems to be an understanding on the part of some members that my reference of last night to continuing with some other measures after this measure had been disposed of referred to the second reading of the bill and they made their arrangements in the light of that understanding. I think in those circumstances it would be advisable to continue with other measures after eight o'clock and further consideration of this measure can be continued at a later time. In the meantime, I am anxious to make a brief statement to the committee in reply to questions that have been asked in regard to the destruction of United States stores in the northwest, and if my hon. friend will not think I am impolite I should like to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If I could have two minutes—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; if my hon. friend will take two minutes and not more.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Remarks have been made which I believe we should answer. My first remark is a general reference to the statement of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that he has advocated measures of social security. I would draw the attention of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and his followers to the fact that the Social Credit party has advocated measures of social security equal if not superior to those advocated by the

C.C.F. But the C.C.F. party are endeavouring to do their utmost to destroy the Social Credit party.

The Social Credit party has a method of financing which, in my judgment, is of world significance. The Social Credit party has advocated a method of financing which has not been advocated by any other group in Canada. The method is unique and is sound, and it will be proved so by history just as sure as we sit here. But the C.C.F. are trying to destroy that method of financing along with the Social Credit party.

I now turn to the hon. member for Davenport. There is a great tendency on the part of a lot of men to think that you just cannot have social security methods except by setting up some great big unmanageable state. They think you cannot have social security in Canada unless you concentrate all the power in Ottawa and take all the power away from the provinces. They assume that the men in the provinces, Anglo-Saxons, Britishers, intelligent men, do not know how to manage the affairs of a province. That is a stupid idea. If the hon. member for Davenport will remember that if the power to create money in the hands of the dominion government be exercised and the resultant money be distributed equitably among the provinces, all the other matters pertaining to social security and economic well-being can safely be left to the intelligent men of the provinces who have been elected to take care of their affairs.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house met at eight o'clock.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

EXTENSION OF OPERATION OF ACT—FURTHER PROVISIONS AS TO CONTRIBUTIONS, ETC.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of bill No. 171, to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. G. L. BOUCHER (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to rise and give approval to the bill brought before the house by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), through the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). I hope hon. members will give it unanimous approval, because it is another step in ironing out the great number of difficulties of employees of the dominion government. I believe that in these days, when we are all considering changing the old order and thinking more of human beings than of material things, and are facing reconstruction day where changes must be brought about, and, when, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said this afternoon, a new order must be brought into existence, we should first attempt to remove a number of handicaps and the difficulties of the old order.

I approve the provision in this bill allowing many servants of the government who have served for many years to enter the civil service superannuation fund and partake with their fellow servants of the crown in the benefits of superannuation. Superannuation is a matter in which the government should give a lead, and we should extend it so far as we can. I am sure that many hon. members and, indeed, many people in the country at large have little knowledge of the difficulties which arise in the administration of civil service affairs and of the inequities which prevail there, even though it is run by the government of Canada as the employer. The government should be a model employer of labour and of help and set an example for the rest of the employers of the country to follow. I do not think the dominion government should require persons who have served the crown faithfully for from one to forty years to retire at an advanced age without adequate means of support for themselves and their dependents. It would be a black mark upon our national life and our national pride if such conditions were to continue.

I have thought that in this bill we could have gone farther. In various departments of the government there are employees whose status is temporary simply by virtue of statutory enactment and regulation. Some of them —and I could quote statistics from a pamphlet I have received recently from the printing bureau—have been employed by the government for from forty-six to fifty years; yet they may still be temporary employees.

I believe that this bill will go a long way toward remedying another situation, mainly, that of those who are commonly known as prevailing rate employees. A great many civil service employees are engaged through the civil service commission. I think the present state of affairs is fairly satisfactory so far as those receiving appointment through the commission are concerned. The great difficulty arises over those who are not appointed under the Civil Service Act but are prevailing rate employees. I regret that this bill does not go quite far enough in the interests of those who are not permanent but are temporary and may or may not be on prevailing rates. They need not necessarily be permitted to enter the superannuation fund, but will have to contribute under the retirement allowance provision, so much being deducted from their pay, without assistance from the government. There is a provision in the bill in this regard which can be discussed when we come to the relevant sections, whereby, upon recommendation of the treasury board, they may be brought in either individually or as a class to partake of the privileges of the superannuation fund.

I would point out how unfair it is to have employees working side by side under different arrangements, with different rights and different privileges upon retirement. One matter which has come to my attention and to which I should like to refer is an illustration of other conditions of a similar nature. Many of our returned soldiers of the last war were privileged to secure employment under the soldier settlement board in 1919. In that branch of the government they were not entitled to become permanent employees or to partake of the privileges of the civil service superannuation fund, until that privilege was granted to them in 1932. They were then permitted to receive the benefits of the civil service superannuation fund upon the condition that they would pay into that fund what they would have been required to pay if they had been permanently employed since 1919. These sums have been deducted from their salaries since 1932 to meet the total payments which they would have made from 1919.

Another situation with them which I think is particularly undesirable at this time is that, even though they thereby get their superannuation arrears paid up to date, when the time comes for their retirement on superannuation it is governed by the ten-year period preceding their retirement. Yet in the government service at the present time are employees other than these returned soldiers who entered the service of the government prior to 1932—say, in 1923, 1924 or 1925—who were allowed to subscribe to the superannuation fund, and whose retirement allowance is measured on a five-year rather than on a ten-year basis. This means to say that their superannuation allowance is calculated upon an average of the last five years of their service to the crown. So that others who were not returned soldiers and entered the government service in 1923 or 1924 under different conditions have the advantage of the five-year period, whereas returned soldiers who came in in 1919 and were allowed in 1932 to participate in the fund were placed on the ten-year basis. In my humble opinion that is discrimination. I believe it is definitely unjust, because it makes quite a bit of difference, particularly if civil servants earn promotion. If that promotion comes within the last few years, instead of close to ten years from the time of their superannuation, it makes a big difference in the amount of superannuation allowance they can get. I suggest that the government would be well advised to take this matter under review.

There is another matter which perhaps does not come exactly under this bill, but it certainly is pertinent to it, namely, that of temporary employees who remain for many years under the status of temporaries, although to all intents and purposes, other than that of statutory enactment, they are permanent employees, or their jobs are secure to them from year to year, and there is no definite reason to give why they should not be permanent.

The other matter to which I wish to make reference is that of classification. I do not think I should go into the subject of classification to-night, but I feel that it is something that we as a parliament should be very considerate about. The dominion experimental farm is located in my county. There are men working there as temporaries and classified as labourers who have been doing skilled work, even to the tune of building machines for particular purposes, doing particular handicrafts, having worked up a particular skill in these handicrafts in their years of employment. I believe they are still classified as labourers. If they had been working for an industry other than the government they would merit promotion by reason of their skill. They would have served their apprenticeship and would have qualified for that more advantageous classification and higher rank of pay and better benefits under the act. I do not wish to delay the house in giving second reading to the bill, but I felt that I should at least point out the two things in the civil service that should be attended to at this particular time.

In closing, I should like to urge that we as a parliament should clean our own house; we should thoroughly clean our own house by administering our own affairs with our own employees with the utmost fairness to give an example to the whole country to follow. I believe that it would be only a matter of giving the lead and it would help materially to advance a more human era than a material one. I am pleased indeed to give support to this bill in every way I can. I think the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) threw out his chest with pride at the fact that it was the Liberal government that had brought in this measure. I rather bow my head in shame to think it was the government of Canada that has let this thing run for twenty or twenty-five years, knowing that this reform was needed, particularly in view of the fact that the Liberal party of which he is so proud has been in power for so many of the last twenty-five or thirty years.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I am very glad to note that a number of the matters about which I spoke on the resolution preceding this bill have been provided for in the draft now before us. I should say that they are provided for potentially. I dare to believe that under the provisions of section 1 of the bill the treasury board will exercise the powers given to it by that section to bring under the Civil Service Superannuation Act a number of the classes of employees about whom I spoke on Wednesday, July 26. I referred, for example, to the printing and mechanical tradesmen at the printing bureau who have not previously been included under the superannuation act because they were on the basis of a weekly wage rather than on an annual salary. In looking over section 1, I find that power is now given to the treasury board, if they will exercise it, to designate those employees as permanent employees of the government for the purposes of this act. I could wish that the terms of the bill had been such that there would be no doubt about this designation being made.

As I have already said I dare to believe that, because the employees of the printing bureau meet the various conditions set out in paragraphs (b) (i) and (b) (ii) of section 1, the treasury board will take the desired action in their case. I dare to hope, although perhaps I am going a little too far in that, that some of the other classes of employees to whom the previous speaker has just referred might also be covered by the terms of section 1. I refer particularly to the temporary permanents. Thus far they have not been included; yet they meet the specifications set out in section 1 if the treasury board is prepared to designate them under that section as permanent for the purposes of this act. I hope that will be done; and I hope that before this debate is closed the minister who is in charge of the bill may be able to give us some indication as to what is in the mind of the government in giving these powers to the treasury board.

Another class of employee to whom I referred the other day was the employee who has a chance to move to a position of a better grade, but who under present regulations finds that he must resign from the position in which he is now employed and be reappointed to the position of the higher grade. At the present time that employee finds that in doing so he loses the benefits of permanency that he previously enjoyed. Although this bill does not specify this case it gives the treasury board power to classify those people in such a way that they can retain the benefits which they previously enjoyed. I hope that is in the mind of the treasury board and that the minister may give us some indication to that effect.

Another group in behalf of whom I spoke the other day was the many employees who are still under the Retirement Act of 1896 or 1898, and wish to transfer to the superannuation fund. I am very glad to note that their request has been met without any qualifications in section 7 of the bill now before us.

I wish once again to say something further about the men who do char work in this building and the messengers and other employees of the House of Commons, but I shall defer that until we are in committee of the whole on the bill.

While I am on my feet may I say that there is another matter with reference to civil service superannuation to which I should like to draw the attention of the minister. I am pleased that since the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) cannot be here, it is the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) who is piloting this bill through, because I wish to draw to his attention a case in which I feel that injustice has been done. I make an appeal to the minister that justice might yet be done in this case. I may say that while I am going to give the details of a specific case, I have been told by the Minister of Finance that there are hundreds like it and that is my reason for pressing this matter. This is the case of a widow of a former employee of the Department of Public Works. When he was alive his work was that of a cleaner and helper. He died in 1936. A few months after his death his widow received from the Department of Finance a letter, which I have on my desk, dated December 28, 1936, in which she was advised that she was being granted an allowance of $143.56 a year payable during her lifetime or until she remarried. That language in the letter is specific. She was told that this allowance was made on the basis of contributions by her husband to the retirement fund while he was employed in the public service. Thereupon she began to receive her cheques, which were made retroactive to September 12, 1936, in the amount of $11.96 a month. I repeat; she was told that she would receive these cheques monthly during her lifetime or until she remarried.

Obviously the lady could not live on $11.96 a month, so that in November of that same year, the year in which her husband died, she secured char work in the dominion public service. From November 16, 1936, until June 1, 1941, a period of four and a half years, she drew two cheques, her superannuation cheque of $11.96 a month and her wages, which amounted to $55 a month. When it is realized that those two cheques together, prior to the addition of the cost-of-living bonus, totalled only $66.96 a month, no one can complain about the fact that she was receiving two cheques from the federal government, and until December 24, 1940, this was quite in order as far as the laws of the land were concerned. On December 24, 1940, however, the government passed order in council P.C. 21/7609, forbidding—amongst other provisions—widows of civil servants to draw two cheques from the government, in other words to draw a pension such as this widow was receiving and at the same time receive payment for work such as she was doing. However, the case of this widow did not come to the attention of the government until some months later, so that she continued to draw both cheques until June 1, 1941, at which time her superannuation was suddenly cut off. As a matter of fact on June 13, 1941, she received a letter asking for her to refund superannuation payments that had been made to her for the period from December 24, 1940, to June 1, 1941. To the honour of the government on this minor point I must say that a little later they passed another order in council removing the necessity for refunds of that kind. Certainly they could have done nothing less in this case, for this widow was in no position to make any such refund.

I came into the picture, as far as this particular case was concerned, in January, 1943, when I began to write letters and got in touch with the department concerned to see if something could not be done for this lady. It seemed to me that the claim of the widow was based on a definite contract from the government under which she was to receive $11.96 a month as long as she lived. Only one stipulation was made when that superannuation was awarded to her, namely, that she must not remarry, and she had not done so. On February 11, 1943, the government passed another order in council, P.C. 5/1111, in which they reversed the position taken in the order in council passed in December of 1940 and granted permission to the widows of civil servants to draw their pensions and also receive pay from the government for work in the public service, provided that the two together did not total more than $3,000. As soon as I saw that this order in council had been passed I quickened my activities on behalf of this widow, and it was not very long before the superannuation branch restored her pension rights as from February 1, 1943. Since that time she has been drawing her pension of $11.96 as well as the monthly cheque she receives for her char work in the public service. I emphasize the fact that for four and a half years, up to June 1, 1941, this widow drew the two cheques totalling $66.96. Also, since February 1, 1943, she has been drawing the two cheques. But during the interval of twenty months she was denied her superannuation payments. When I read the notice in which employees were advised of the order in council of December 24, 1940, I found in it words to the effect that superannuation payments of this kind were suspended, and would be treated as deferred benefits. The widow in question, and I with her, dared to hope that this meant she would get it again later on. That was what we thought "deferred benefits" meant, namely, that it was money being held to her credit which would be paid to her at a later date. In due course, however, I learned from the superannuation branch and from the Minister of Finance that this was not the case; that by "deferred benefits" in the order in council the government meant that the payment of the superannuation was suspended until such time as it might be restored by another order in council, or until such time as the widow in question might terminate her employment in the public service, but the amount withheld was never paid to her.

I have had a considerable volume of correspondence in connection with this one case, partly because I have felt that this woman has suffered a particular injustice, and also because of the information conveyed to me by the Minister of Finance that there are hundreds like her. It has a particular way of getting under my skin when I find people of this class and this standard of living being taken advantage of in this way. My complaint to the Minister of Finance was to the effect that a contract had been broken. In one of my letters to the minister, dated May 18, 1944, I said:

> May I call your attention, as I have done before, to the terms of the letter which Mrs. . . . received from the Department of Finance, dated December 28, 1936, when she was advised that her allowance of $143.56 per annum had been granted; it included this sentence: "This is payable during your lifetime or until remarriage." I contend that this contract has been broken.

The Minister of Finance replied on May 30; he dealt with other points I raised and then gave attention to the paragraph in which I complained about the breaking of the contract. This is what he had to say:

> On the question of contract, as stated in my letter of May 4, the effect of order in council of December 24, 1940, was to give pensioners the option of continuing to take their pension without working for the government, or entering the public service with a forfeiture of pension while the higher income was being received.

Of course it is a bit risky to paraphrase what someone else has said; I know when people paraphrase my words I am seldom satisfied that they do it right. Nevertheless I am going to paraphrase what the minister has said. It seems to me that in effect his statement, as far as the contract is concerned, was this: "We said to these people with whom we had made a solemn contract for life, 'We now give you the privilege of having that contract suspended in order that you may continue to receive from the government this other cheque, or if you wish the contract kept you will have to cease work'." The Minister of Finance in this and other letters made the point that there would be a good many people like her. I shall quote from his letter of May 4, 1944:

> I am told that in all probability hundreds, possibly thousands of widows joined the civil service after the passage of the order in council of December 24, 1940, preferring to receive the substantially larger income which came to them in the form of pay for their services, than their pensions would have given them.

The minister went on to point out that because there were so many he did not see how he could deal with the case I had referred to him, without dealing with all these cases. My contention is that if contracts have been broken in a good many cases, the request to have one of them corrected should not be met with an answer like that. It should be met with an attempt on the part of the government to correct the situation wherever a wrong has been done, no matter how many instances there may be.

There may be cases where widows have been able to secure employment in the public service at quite high salaries, which would make the continuance of the pension unnecessary. But in cases like this, of widows doing char work, their total remuneration amounting to only $50 or $60 a month, making it difficult for them to get along, it seems to me that the government has gone a little too far in passing an order in council of that kind, and that it should reconsider this whole position.

I point out that by the order in council of February 11, 1943, P.C. 5/1111, the government admitted that it passed an unfair order in council in P.C. 21/7609, on December 24, 1940. I raise this case, following the tremendous amount of correspondence I have already had over eighteen months with respect to this matter, in the hope that further consideration may be given to it. The amount involved in connection with the widow about whom I have written is only $239.20. But that amount means a good deal to a woman in her situation, as it must to many others in similar circumstances.

She still has in her mind the memory of the deductions made from her husband's salary when he was employed in the public service years ago. As a matter of fact I have before me the letter dated July 19, 1922, which he was given, telling him that five per cent of his salary was to be deducted for the purpose of providing a retirement allowance for him, or for his widow if he should die first. She has in addition to that the letter she received after his death telling her that this was her allowance for lifetime, unless she remarried. There was a period of four and a half years when she received both cheques. She is receiving both now; and yet she is told that for that period of twenty months between June, 1941, and February, 1943, the contract was broken, that the money has simply gone back into the consolidated revenue fund and that at no time in the future will she be able to get it.

I earnestly hope the government will give reconsideration to the effect produced by the order in council of December 24, 1940, which was partially corrected by the order in council of February 11, 1943, but which job was not completed.

In closing, may I say, as I said when discussing the same subject two days ago, that in these times when the government is saying so much—and rightly so—about the desirability of establishing social security and fashioning a new order, which needs must come following the suffering and sacrifice our people have gone through, surely the place for the government to begin that sort of thing is right on its own doorstep, and without continuing any cases of injustice, such as the one to which I have referred.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, there are one or two aspects of this bill to which I should like to address myself, and concerning which I would make a few remarks. In the first place I think this is an excellent piece of legislation, and I am pleased indeed to see it introduced at the present time. I should have been glad to see it introduced at any time; in fact it would have pleased me to have seen it introduced some considerable time ago. I am not saying that in any critical spirit, because everyone knows that we have had a very great deal of good legislation in the past couple of years, and particularly in the present session. I know that all things cannot be done at once.

I welcome particularly the additional opportunity being given employees of this government to transfer their superannuation arrangements from the retirement fund to the superannuation fund which, I believe it will be agreed, is one of the best superannuation schemes extant.

It is in that connection, however, I wish to draw one or two matters to the attention of the government. I observe that in the last several years, since the beginning of the war, there are great numbers of civil servants who have not been allowed to receive increases in salaries or promotions. If one pictures the situation in respect of any one of them, as an illustration, he will see that it comes down to this: The civil servant was under contract with the government, expecting to receive certain regular increases or, when opportunity came and he qualified, to get promotions and increases.

For reasons which we shall assume were quite adequate, all of that was discontinued during the war. Certain exceptions have been made since, but in the main that is still the picture. At first sight it would seem that the civil servant about whom I have spoken should make that much contribution to the war, and that it is not too serious a load to put upon him. That might reasonably be the first reaction of anyone who examined the picture. But there is one other serious disqualification which is placed upon this man, one other serious burden resting upon him, and it is this: He draws his superannuation based upon a certain number of years of service. I believe it is the average over five years. At one time it was ten years but, generally speaking, it is now the top five years.

Under the arrangement I have described not only does he suffer the loss of his promotion and increases in salary, but as long as he lives he will be paying a price which quite probably other citizens in the community will not be paying. As long as he lives he is being called upon to take a superannuation which will be less than might reasonably have been expected.

It seems to me there is a chance of correcting that situation. Perhaps it might be done by way of requiring him to put in a larger contribution over the years, the government matching his contribution dollar for dollar, as they do now. I do not know if that is the best way to do it. I think it will be agreed, however, that men of the sort I have mentioned are going to have to pay more than most other citizens in the community, by reason of the fact that as long as they live their incomes will be less than they had a proper right to expect they would be.

Similarly a situation exists with respect to a large number of civil servants who have been receiving a war bonus. Take the man who was a high placed civil servant—it does not really matter where he stood in the list—he could not get a promotion or an increase in salary. However, because of the type of work he was doing or because he had been transferred from one department to another, a war supplement was quite properly granted to him. That is part of his wage upon which he pays income tax, and yet he is not permitted to make a contribution to the superannuation fund on that, nor does the government pay anything into the fund with respect to that war supplement. It seems to me that if that is the man's true wage, as undoubtedly it is according to the tax gatherer, it ought to be taken into consideration in effecting superannuation. If it is not so, then he could well receive a superannuation less than it otherwise would be and less, I submit, than it ought to be. As long as he lives he will be paying more than he should properly be paying, having regard to the situation of all other citizens in the country.

I draw these matters to the attention of the minister in the hope that they will receive consideration. I do not speak critically about these matters. The bill is an endeavour to do justice. It is a very fine bill and it does render a great measure of justice. But such being the case, I feel it is proper to point out any additional feature or item that might have been overlooked because it would be entirely consistent with the government's attitude to take into account matters such as I have mentioned.

I agree with several speakers who have referred to the impropriety of taking superannuation away from any person who has been called back into the government service or who has entered the government service, particularly when they are acting in a low-paid capacity. I have run into many cases where women have had small superannuations coming to them, superannuations which had been earned and paid for. These were not enough to keep them and they had to go to work, sometimes as charwomen and sometimes in some other capacity. In such cases the superannuation was taken away because they had gone to work for the government. I submit that that is not just. A superannuation which a person receives when he is superannuated or, in the case of a woman, when her husband dies, is something which has been earned. It should not be taken away merely because the person in question enters the employ of the government.

That covers the case of the person who goes to work for the government, but everything I have said with reference to that case applies with much greater force to the person already in the employ of the government who has a notice served upon her that she will lose superannuation or be discharged from employment. That is definitely unjust. It is simply a case of a strong employer using economic force upon a weak employee and I cannot condemn that too strongly. I do not think the consequences were adequately observed in such cases. It is wrong to use your strength to effect what you desire to effect because of some general policy.

That is practically all I have to say in this debate. I again say that I welcome this bill most heartily. Every once in a while matters concerning the civil service are up for discussion, and for some members this is of great concern. I believe the best way to keep a satisfied personnel and, what is even more important although it amounts to the same thing, have justice rendered to your personnel, is to encourage active and intelligent trade unionism. I believe if you had a trade union in each department of the government service you would find that the grievances which are always being publicized and made much of in the newspapers, grievances that are lowering the general standard of work in the services, will largely disappear. I have seen trade unions at work for a long time. I have been a member of a trade union for many years and I am still an honorary member of the trade union with which I was associated. I know that in all the intricacies which an employer faces the assistance of a trade union gets him out of trouble and generally keeps him out of trouble. I believe the most salutary thing this or any government could do would be to encourage trade unionism among its employees.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I just want to add a word to what has been said, mostly by way of questions. I have not studied the bill particularly to see whether it covers what I have in mind. In Toronto, and perhaps more so in Montreal, there is a large number of civil servants. Sometimes the local members here in Ottawa get the idea that all the civil servants in Canada are in Ottawa, but that is far from the case because there are a great number in Toronto and Montreal. Civil servants have come to me on several occasions with their troubles and I should like to give one case which illustrates many. This condition may have been changed lately, but I do not know.

Under the civil service regulations pertaining to postal employees an employee may obtain permission to retire on annuity, but that annuity dies with the man. I know of many cases where men have retired and accepted an annuity which was fairly substantial. But after a year or so they died and their widows then received nothing. That certainly is not the intention of the government or any government. If this bill does not cover such cases I hope an amendment will be made or another bill introduced to cover such cases. Men who have served in the civil service for twenty-five, thirty or forty years should not have their widows left destitute merely because their husbands accepted an annuity which died with themselves after a year or two.

Mr. McILRAITH: I did not quite understand why the widow did not receive the superannuation payment.

Mr. MacNICOL: I qualified that by saying that the situation may have been changed. I do not know whether the situation has been changed whereby in the case of a postal employee who had retired on annuity and who, as happens so often in all walks of life, the railways and elsewhere, died shortly after, his widow would be left without an annuity.

Mr. McILRAITH: I am interested in the point raised by the hon. member and I cannot understand from what he has said why the widow would not receive the superannuation benefit.

Mr. MacNICOL: The husband had accepted an annuity. I had these cases up with the postal authorities and they tell me there is nothing they can do about it. The husband, when living, accepted an annuity. He took what he thought was the best at the time. He died and that left the widow without anything, for the annuity expired with the husband.

Mr. McILRAITH: Was that prior to 1927?

Mr. MacNICOL: The cases I am speaking of have come to my attention since I came to Ottawa, so that this case must have been after 1927 because I did not come here until 1930.

Returning to the point brought up by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I know a number of employees in the mechanical branch at the printing bureau.

Mr. McILRAITH: They are covered by the bill.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have known one man in particular for a great number of years. He comes from the same part of the country as I do. He came to see me the other day and brought with him a brief on superannuation submitted by the mechanical employees of the department of public printing. Do I understand that the bill covers these men?

Mr. McILRAITH: It covers their case precisely.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to hear that, and there is no use in my proceeding farther with their case.

There is, however, one other class of employees that I want to bring to the minister's attention. I am speaking of the ordinary postie delivering letters on the street in my own city, or any other city for that matter, but I will confine my remarks to Toronto. He has a very difficult job, particularly during the war because the walks of the posties have been so extended that these men are almost worked off their feet. The result is that many of them have to retire earlier than they otherwise would. I would suggest that the postal employees, particularly the man doing a walk, should be permitted to retire on full pension at least five years earlier than is now permitted, or perhaps even more than five years. I believe that they have to serve to-day for thirty-five years before they can retire on full pension. That is a pretty long time to ask anyone to serve in the government employ before he can be retired on full pension, and that period should be shortened.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Since so many Conservative members will shortly be due to be retired, may I ask if they are protected by any annuity system?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is what you think.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the hon. member is asking me, I can tell him that I will be back here.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must remind hon. members that we are not in committee but on the second reading of the bill.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): I think my hon. friend has confused the superannuation allowance with annuities. When a civil servant who is under the superannuation act dies his widow receives fifty per cent of the pension he would have received, whereas in the case of an annuity, if the husband is the annuitant, and it is not a double annuity, the annuity ceases on the husband's death.

I think the bill before us is a very desirable piece of legislation. It is legislation that many civil servants have been hoping for, I know, for years past. Sections 7 and 9 of the bill will make it possible for civil servants not now under the superannuation act to come in under the act on fair terms.

Other members have spoken of the position of temporary employees. I know a great many cases of government employees who are rated as temporaries when, in fact, they are permanent in every sense of the word, and the heads of their departments and the government intend that they shall be permanent. This bill should contain a clause putting a time limit on the length of time that a government employee or civil servant shall be rated as a temporary. After a certain period he should automatically become permanent.

I am glad that the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) is in charge of the bill to-night because there is something that I wish to bring to his attention which he might find it easier to deal with than the minister in whose name the bill appears. I would call the minister's attention and the attention of the house to the fact that salaries and wages of employees of the federal government are not liable to attachment for debt. They are a favoured class in that respect in this Dominion of Canada. They can go into debt and their earnings cannot be attached to pay their debts. I have known employees on federal construction work to run up bills with merchants in the district and then decline to pay them, and the merchant had no remedy whatsoever. That is not the case with provincial government employees or with territorial employees. Their pay is subject to attachment. This provision would not be needed to be made applicable to federal employees if they were all honest as most of them are, but there are a few who do not pay their way, who run up bills and who do not pay them, and there should be a remedy provided in law so that creditors will have some protection just as they have in the provinces and in the territories. I submit to the minister that before this bill is finally passed he should consider adding a section which will have that effect. I shall have more to say when we are in committee on the bill.

Mr. G. H. ROSS (Calgary East): I have no desire to delay the passing of this bill. So far as I have had a chance to peruse it I am entirely in sympathy with it. The only question in my mind is whether it goes far enough. There are many persons employed by the board of grain commissioners, a number of them in the city of Calgary, in positions known as seasonal temporaries, also labourers who are continuously employed by the board. One of these employees, whom I shall call Mr. A, started work with the board in 1918 and has been steadily employed with the board since 1928. Another, whom I shall call Mr. B, entered the service of the board in 1922 and has been steadily employed since 1924. I could give many other examples. These men receive none of the benefits of a civil servant—no sick leave, no superannuation, and only this year was provision made to grant them vacations. For some unknown reason their vacation leave was limited to one week, whereas civil servants as a general rule receive three weeks vacation leave. I wonder if this amendment provides for these men. From a hurried perusal that I have made of the bill I think it does provide for them to some extent, but I doubt very much if it goes far enough. I wonder if Mr. A, who entered the service in 1918, has been steadily employed since 1928 and is still in the employ of the board of grain commissioners, will benefit under this bill, and the same with Mr. B. If not, I hope that the government will give consideration to cases such as this and make it possible for these men to be confirmed in their positions in a permanent capacity so that they can obtain the benefits to which civil servants are entitled. I submit that after twenty years continuous service they are entitled to some consideration.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—"Civil servant."

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Before hon. members commence a detailed consideration of this bill I should like to state that I intend to ask one of my colleagues to move that, instead of being operative from 1st October, 1944, only, it become operative on the 15th August, 1944. On looking over the bill I noticed that there were provisions which were extending additional privileges to members of the civil service, and it seemed to me that it would be unfortunate if any member of the civil service retired or died before the 1st October, 1944, and did not get the benefit of provisions which parliament had recognized to be proper provisions. I suggest that wherever it is necessary in the bill as we consider the clauses, amendments be made to render it operative from the 15th August, 1944, instead of the 1st October, because I hope that by mid-August it will have received the royal assent and become the law.

Mr. BOUCHER: I am not sure of the actual meaning of section 1. It seems that, as worded, it limits those who can take advantage of the amendments to those who are on a yearly or annual salary. I am not sure if I read the section right, but it seems to me that a person who is not permanent may be granted by the treasury board the privilege of going under the superannuation act, but that it may be possible that even these persons cannot get under the act unless their salary is on a yearly basis. If such is the case I can see no reason why treasury board is authorized to grant special privileges to temporary officials and yet not to permanent officials who are not paid on a yearly basis. I should like the minister to consider that quite carefully and say whether my interpretation is the right one.

The other point which I should like to draw to the attention of the Minister of Justice is, why either temporary employees or those paid on an annual salary must go to the treasury board. We are here setting up a body which really, in law, has no official status, whose personnel at least is but little known to anybody, and giving them authority to exercise their discretion untrammeled and unhindered, with arbitrary power to say, "you shall get certain benefits" and "you shall not". I do not think it inures to the benefit of the government or the people of Canada to endow a board of that kind with such arbitrary power and open up a possibility of so many injustices.

A short time ago an amendment was made that certain civil servants should come under the superannuation act, certain others should get holidays, et cetera, subject only to the approval of the treasury board. I do not wish to give illustrations, although some are in my mind, but one can see where three men working for the same length of time on the same job in the same place could have varying judgments and differing privileges handed out to them by virtue of someone taking their case to the treasury board and getting its approval, where the others could not. If it were a matter wherein the interests of a class, and only a class, could be determined by the treasury board, the decision to give one in a class or to a number would apply to everybody in that class; but to be able to pick John and leave Tom out is not quite fair, and I feel that at this particular time a great deal of resentment is aroused against the treasury board. I believe that the name of one individual figures all too prominently, because the fault is not all his, but that a board that is largely an unknown quantity, who do or do not confer around a table should give judicial decisions which affect the welfare of the people of Canada, is not a very satisfactory state of affairs. I believe, for instance, that if an application is made whereby the discretion of the treasury board is sought, that discretion should be exercised at a hearing open to the public, with full knowledge of whose case has been heard before it. I am one of those who believe that publicity is one of the best assurances of justice; and in matters of this kind, with treasury board being given such absolute power, some measures must be taken to guide the exercise of that power in a better way, by giving it publicity, so that we and any person whose application is handled by the treasury board may know for what reason his request is or is not allowed. I believe also that there should be an appeal of some kind from the treasury board when it is not acting as a responsible government body, and that that appeal should be public.

I suggest that the two points which I have drawn to the minister's attention should receive his most earnest consideration, and I should like to have his explanation as to the first matter I raised.

Mr. NEILL: I endorse what has been said by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I was sorry to read in the bill language which is carried on from previous acts—"stated annual salary." That might be a vehicle of injustice. I recall a case which occurred a number of years ago; there is no reason why I should not give the details. There were telegraph agents some of whom had been working for twenty to twenty-five years, drawing an annual salary payable so much a month. It was thoroughly acknowledged that they were really permanent employees, although they were "permanent temporary" employees; it was reported in the estimates that they should get $1,200, say, a year, and they were paid monthly at that rate; yet by some peculiar quirk of the regulations they were not drawing "a stated annual salary" and therefore were not eligible for superannuation, and I had a great deal of difficulty and had to do a good deal of wirepulling to get that very simple act of justice performed and have these people put on a stated annual salary, so that they would get superannuation. The obstacle was, I think, that the board referred to by my hon. friend would not do it; they said it would require—oh, I forget; a change of the British North America Act or something almost its equivalent. But all of a sudden the justice department or somebody discovered that they did not have to do that, that by a simple resolution, I think of the minister, it could be decided that these people would hereafter be on a stated annual salary and, by virtue of that, enabled to get superannuation. A great many classes were excluded from the benefits of the act by this "stated annual salary" business.

I have in mind the linesman, whose work is very similar to that of the telegraph agent; but the telegraph agent gets superannuation, while the linesman, who may have been on the job for thirty or forty years, has no opportunity at all to be superannuated. I am afraid, the way the section reads, it still requires the person to be on a "stated annual salary" and also to get the consent of the treasury board. What that amounts to is that all the power is put in the hands of one man; the treasury board is only a figure of speech.

I should like an explanation about that "stated annual salary" business, because I am afraid it is going to be a stumbling block in the extension of the principle. I am not suggesting that the person who is hired to do a little carpenter work at intervals of two or three weeks or months should be eligible for superannuation. But when you see people going on for ten, twenty or thirty years, and they form the class known as—and the very language indicates the absurdity of it—permanent temporaries—under what language can you define a person as being a permanent temporary? Some consideration should be given to them.

While I am on my feet I should like to put in a plea for a class of people whose case has not been brought up here to-night. From the remarks that have been made here I gather that this bill is to be widened, and therefore these people may now be eligible. I refer to a class of people who are permanently employed on board the government boats, although they are not paid a stated annual salary. That matter was taken up a number of years ago on the Pacific coast. I am not familiar with the Atlantic coast. It was decided that the officers, the mates and the engineering staff, would be eligible, but not what you would call the technical men of the deck crews, such as stewards or carpenters or, I suppose, the coxswain. They were not eligible because they were not styled officers. Many of these men are just as permanently employed year after year as the officers are, but they are not eligible for superannuation.

Mr. POTTIER: Following the remarks of the last speaker may I say that we have a number of those on the Atlantic coast. I think they are known as prevailing rate employees on the government boats. I think that from the stewards down they were not given the right to come under the superannuation act as amended a few years ago. I believe a number of representations have been made in their behalf, and they may now be given an opportunity of coming in. I gather from paragraph (b) of section 1 that the treasury board will be able to rule, if it wishes, that they be designated as individuals or classes who may be brought under the act. Would the minister when he replies refer to this?

Mr. MAYHEW: I have a case somewhat similar to that which has already been referred to, but it is a recent one. It is that of a gentleman who was an electrician and who retired at the age of sixty-five after having served for thirty years. I brought it to the attention of the department and I received from them the following reply dated the 13th of this month as follows:

I beg to advise you that Mr. Ward, as an electrician, is a temporary employee, and as such he cannot be brought under the superannuation act, there being no provision in the act to cover temporary employees.

This man had been working for the government for thirty years. He was retired at sixty-five. I bring this before the committee as a definite case, but it is by no means a peculiar one or different from many others that we have in the government employ particularly or in the public works department. Then there is one class that is employed at the dry dock in Victoria that I have been trying to get adjusted ever since I became a member. I thought I had become more or less of a nuisance. I have avoided mentioning it in the house before, because I hoped to get it properly adjusted; but a member, when he gets a letter like this saying that apparently because a man is an electrician and doing what might be called manual labour and employed by the month, even though he be employed for thirty years, he is still considered a temporary employee, becomes a little discouraged. I hope that such men will come under the act.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer—I do not know whether it is covered by the bill or not—namely, the adjustments of salaries of post office workers and those in the treasury board, particularly in the customs department. They have not had an adjustment since 1927. There was a commission known as the Beatty commission which sat in 1929 and which recommended certain adjustments. But the hard years came on, 1930 and 1931, and that recommendation was set aside. There has been no adjustment in the salaries of those people since 1927. Is there anything in this bill to indicate that these men are to be taken care of?

Another class of people to which I should like to refer—I do not know whether they are covered in this bill—is that of men who pay into the fund for a certain number of years. I had the case of a man referred to me just last week. He had been in the civil service for six and a half years and had paid into a superannuation fund something like $297 when he was obliged to retire on account of illness. The government refused to acknowledge the $297 he had paid into the fund. Surely he is entitled to at least his money back after paying in for six and a half years.

Mr. McNIVEN: I notice in paragraph (b) of section 1 that there is a reference to a stated annual salary and that in subparagraph (i) of that particular paragraph there is another reference to salary as follows:

(i) is in receipt of salary computed at an annual rate of at least six hundred dollars.

I was wondering whether there was anything contemplated in the different language that is used in these two definitions. Will the minister deal with that angle when he is replying? Along with others may I urge the minister to see to it that the group of permanent temporaries who have been spoken of so frequently here to-night and yesterday shall be taken care of. I do not think we should pass this definition of civil servant until we are absolutely sure that that very large representative group of civil servants who have rendered excellent service over a long period of years are included in the benefits of this act.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It would seem that some hon. members are viewing this bill with a considerable degree of suspicion as to its purpose and what it can do. I can assure the hon. members that it was prepared in a sincere attempt to meet the reasonable representations that had been made by the officers of the various civil servant bodies, and that if it had not been the desire of the government to meet those representations and to give satisfaction to this class of citizens of Canada and to recognize their very efficient and patriotic service to the state, no bill would have been introduced. It was not prepared for the purpose of giving occasion to bring before the house any indefinite number of specific cases; it was intended to meet the situation which had been carefully considered by the officers of these various associations and about which they had made representations to the treasury board, and then to the minister in charge of the civil service commission and afterwards to a special committee of the cabinet appointed to meet them and to discuss with them those representations and the manner in which they could best be met in the interest not only of the personnel of the civil service but of the public, because the members of the special committee—I had the honour to be one of them—felt that it was in the interest of the Canadian public that reasonable satisfaction be given to the thousands who perform such an important function in the life of the nation. Perhaps it will allay some of these suspicions if I place on Hansard an appreciation I received this morning from the president of the civil service federation of Canada; he had gone over the bill very carefully and compared it with the representations that were submitted, and, after doing so, he wrote in the following terms:

May I refer to bill 171, an act to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Our executive realizes that this bill represents a very broad study of the general question of superannuation as well as a study of the present superannuation act, made by the parliamentary committee of 1938 and 1939, by the advisory committee on the Civil Service Superannuation Act, by the treasury board and by the government. We are convinced, not only that the bill represents very careful thought, but that it will make for improved superannuation administration, and in the course of time, for improved administration in the public service generally, while at the same time rectifying several of the shortcomings of the present act to which we have called attention from time to time.

It is our very sincere hope that the amending bill may commend itself to both houses of parliament, and that its enactment into law may be a matter of only a short while.

Taking the bill as a whole, though not all features of it are by any means to the advantage of civil servants, we feel that the measure should be highly satisfactory, both to the government and its employees, and we very much appreciate the fact that the government found it possible to proceed with this matter at this time.

I think the very competent gentleman who is president of the civil service federation of Canada, and who made a careful study of this bill just as soon as it became available to him, was right in the view he took. Just to illustrate, let me answer the point made by several hon. members who have referred to the fact that the words "a stated annual salary" are still used in section 1. If hon. members will take the trouble to read the whole of paragraph (b) down to (i) they will see that it provides for three classes who may be placed under the superannuation act. In the first class are permanent employees with stated annual salaries. As to those nothing further needs to be done. The second class is:

. . . any other officer, clerk or employee in the civil service who is certified or determined pursuant to regulations made under this act, or who is designated individually or as a member of a class by the treasury board under this act, to be for the purpose of this act a permanent officer, clerk or employee, if such permanent or other officer, clerk or employee . . .

Then the other conditions are set out. Therefore those who have stated annual salaries are in. There are regulations which will take in classes. There may be still, then, some individual cases, probably some of those which have been referred to by hon. members this evening or like cases which have merit and which would not fit into a general regulation or classification. For the purpose of the superannuation fund they shall be deemed to be, "for the purposes of this act, a permanent officer, clerk or employee," because of course the principle of superannuation is compensation on retirement from a permanent position. Whatever they may be called for other purposes, any officer of the civil service may, for the purposes of the superannuation act, be treated as a permanent officer; that is to say, may be made a contributor and consequentially a beneficiary under the superannuation act. Evidently the president of the civil service federation, when coming to that conclusion, had looked at a section which will come before hon. members a little later, commencing on page 8 of the bill and going over on page 9. That section authorizes the governor in council to make regulations. For what purpose?

(g) prescribing in respect of officers, positions or employments in the civil service for which salaries other than stated annual salaries are paid, the manner in which such offices, positions or employments shall be certified or otherwise determined to be positions the duties of which are of continuing indeterminate duration.

Then paragraph (h):

(h) prescribing in respect of officers, clerks or employees in the civil service who are in receipt of salary other than a stated annual salary.

(i) the manner in which their appointments shall be certified . . .

And the manner and conditions under which they will be classed, for the purposes of superannuation, as permanent officers, clerks or employees. I think that might well be considered by the committee as a bona fide attempt to meet the situation and to determine those who shall receive the benefits of the superannuation act. Parliament has already said that it should include permanent employees with stated annual salaries, and as to that class there can be no question at all. Others have been designated in practice by those words which are contradictory in terms, "permanent temporaries." That is an absolute contradiction in terms; nevertheless, because of arbitrary usage, those words do designate a certain class. It would hardly be proper to provide in the statute that "permanent temporaries" were to be included under the superannuation act. The regulations will prescribe classifications which will bring them in; they will use language that will be appropriate to include those who are to receive such benefits. Then it may be that there are certain individual cases for which it would be difficult to prescribe by regulation and classification, but which, because of the special circumstances, it would be proper to describe the employees as persons who had been or are to be for a continuing indeterminate duration in the service of the crown. They can be dealt with by a minute of the treasury board.

For a good many months now I have been a member of the treasury board. In my experience it has not been the one-man institution some hon. members seem to believe. My experience has been that decisions are arrived at by the members of the treasury board, which, after all, is nothing other than a committee of the cabinet. Someone has said that the treasury board has no legal existence. It is the only committee of the cabinet that is provided for by statute and is given by statute some special functions. There are officers who attend the meetings of the treasury board, but in my experience the information they supply to the members of treasury board is not as to the merits or demerits of the question that has to be decided, but as to the effect such a decision may have upon other matters that are not immediately involved. That is something for which it is necessary that we have expert advice and recommendations. I would not venture to express an opinion as to whether such a case which is submitted should be dealt with in a certain way, without having information about the class from which that case comes, how large a class will be affected, and in what way it will be affected. From my experience that is the information which is supplied to members of the treasury board by the officials thereof for the purpose of assisting them in coming to their conclusions.

Here, of course, I would not attempt to deal with some of the cases to which hon. members have referred. I have not come prepared to do that. I came prepared to discuss matters which are directly pertinent to the amending legislation. But as to the merits or demerits of the special cases concerning which there has been long correspondence with the Department of Finance, I am sorry I am not in a position to give any opinion. I have not one. I do not know the facts.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South will notice that, while I did not feel at the resolution stage it would have been proper to read the bill, the matter he wished to have included is in this section now under consideration. He will find it at line 5 of page 2.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, I have noticed that, and I am quite satisfied. Will that be retroactive? Will that cover the cases which have been outstanding?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not sure that I can answer in general terms. This will operate from the date which will be set. I shall ask someone to move that it be August 15, 1944. It will not in its present form operate from confederation. It will take care of all cases which have to be decided after it becomes law, but I do not think it would apply to persons who have severed their connections with the civil service in years gone by.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not mean that. I have in mind a case which dates back to 1941. A contributor had a stepmother who inherited his estate. His superannuation should have come to her. Under the old section in the act it could not be paid, because the stepmother was not included. I am wondering if this amendment will enable those administering the act to clean up this case?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; this will not apply to a case of that kind. That type of case would have to be dealt with on compassionate grounds by estimate or by special order in council. This will apply only to situations which arise after it comes into force. But the hon. member need not be told by me that when it is recognized for the future, it makes it easier to argue that it should have been the same in the past, and that there should possibly be some compassionate view taken of a situation which occurred before and which, if it occurred now, would be dealt with in the manner provided by the statute.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): As I understand it, we are now considering paragraph (1) of section 1 which deals with salaries. This paragraph is worded in very clear language:

"Salary" of a contributor means the regular salary or compensation paid in respect of his service—

And I would ask the committee to note these words:

—together with the value of living and residential allowances—

This amended section is the same as the original section passed in 1924, except that it has the underlined words "or compensation" after the word "salary". In effect, the section is just as it was.

I should like to tell you, Mr. Chairman, and I should like particularly to tell the minister just how that section has been administered, because of contradictory opinions given by a former deputy minister in the minister's department. I shall quote first from a letter written by the financial controller of the Department of the Interior on November 21, 1924, to the director of the Department of the Interior:

> Re deduction of 5 per cent from the amount of living allowance paid to Yukon officials who elect to come under the Superannuation Act, 1924.
> In reply to your memorandum of the 27th September last relative to the above subject, I am to advise you that a number of rulings concerning the new act have recently been received from the Department of Justice, and among them there are two touching upon this subject. They are as follows:
> Contributions must include 5 per cent of the value of living and residential allowances, both in respect of past service and in respect of future service.
> The sum of 5 per cent must be deducted monthly from both the salary and the living allowances from the date of election.

Most civil servants in the Yukon are paid what is termed "salary," and in addition to that a living allowance of a fixed sum. For instance, a part of their remuneration termed salary will be $2,000, and the living allowance $1,500, as provided by this paragraph (1) of section 1.

As I have said, the deputy minister of justice said that the five per cent must be deducted not only from the portion of remuneration termed "salary" but that termed "living allowances" which, under the terms of the section, is also salary.

Here is a letter from the same deputy minister referring to one civil servant in the Yukon who was employed by the Department of Justice, notifying the controller of the territory as follows:

> I am therefore to request that monthly deductions of 5 per cent be made from his salary and living allowance, and the amounts be remitted to this department in the form of cheques payable to the receiver general along with your monthly statements of expenditures connected with this department.

That put the deputy minister on record, without doubt.

What happened? Deductions were made from the total amount of the remuneration. Civil servants were retired on superannuation terms based on those contributions. They were superannuated on that basis. Civil servants died and widows were pensioned. Their pensions were computed on that basis. That is commencing in 1924, and continuing that way fairly and properly and legally as fixed by this deputy minister of justice down to 1930.

I would ask the minister to note this: Then a few of the civil servants in the Yukon were transferred to Ottawa, where they no longer were paid living allowances. They conceived the brilliant idea of having returned to them the five per cent that they had paid while in the Yukon on their living allowance. That question was put up to the same deputy minister, and he met their wishes, regardless of the plain meaning of the act. Regardless of the law, he swallowed himself, reversed his decision and said that living allowance was not part of salary. And those men were allowed to draw out of the superannuation fund, illegally and improperly, their payments which had been made into it. I say that that action by the deputy minister of justice and the action of the ministers and deputy ministers of the other departments who acted on that reversed opinion of the deputy minister of justice have been inconsistent and unfair. They have been cruel to those remaining in the civil service and to those who retired subsequently to 1930. Those remaining in the service had their contributions returned and in many cases have been retired on miserably small allowances. The widows of deceased civil servants have been given pensions that are pitifully inadequate. I should like to read a letter written by the widow of one of these deceased civil servants to the public administrator of the Yukon. This reads:

> This will acknowledge receipt of your letter to me of April 14, 1941, which only reached me on June 4, due to its being incorrectly addressed.
> With that letter you sent me Canadian Bank of Commerce cheque payable to me for $400, being the return of the contributions made by my late husband, P. M. Kelly, from his salary as a civil servant, to be applied on his retiring allowance, or on my pension after his death.
> This amount of $400 should not be paid to me but should be applied to the superannuation fund, to which it was paid, to be taken into account in computing the amount of superannuation allowance or pension payable to me as the widow of a contributing civil servant.
> I am aware that the matter has been taken up with the government on several occasions and that the government has refused to do justice to those involved, with the exception of George P. McKenzie, and the late George McLean, but I decline to accept Mr. Jeckell's statement, as quoted to me by you, that there is no chance of getting the government to reverse its decision.
> The cheque for $400 is accepted by me under protest and with the knowledge, which you and

Mr. Jeckell share, as does the government, that it is not legally payable to me, but as above stated, is and should be part of the superannuation fund.

When the matter is justly dealt with and superannuation allowances in proper and increased amounts are paid to those entitled to them, I am willing and will expect this $400 to be debited to such increased superannuation allowance or pension as I may then receive.

Yours truly,

Kathryn V. Kelly.

Referring to McKenzie and McLean, referred to in the letter, under the reversed decision McKenzie was granted a retiring allowance of $2,560 and McLean got $2,773. The minister of the department, knowing how improper and incorrect the ruling of the deputy minister of justice was, was not content to let these men have this miserable retiring allowance. He had orders in council put through giving McKenzie a retiring allowance of $4,000, and McLean, $4,774. Those are the only two civil servants who have retired from the service in the Yukon since the deputy minister of justice reversed that decision who have been fairly dealt with.

On the reversed decision of the deputy minister of justice the value of living allowance of $1,500 is not salary or income for the purposes of superannuation under this act. But if you go to the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue you will find that living allowance is considered as salary and income and an income tax is imposed. Can you imagine such inconsistency between two government departments? In one the living allowance is not income or salary, while in two others it is income and they grab income tax on it. That is difficult to explain.

The civil servants of the Yukon petitioned for a fiat for leave to refer the matter to the exchequer court for an interpretation of the section I have read, subsection (1) of section 2, but the fiat was refused. The wrong was continued and it is continuing to-day. I appeal to the Minister of Justice to right the wrong. This can be done by a proper interpretation of the section. It seems to me that the language of the section is so plain that you do not need a lawyer or a judge to interpret it. The subsection reads:

(1) "salary" of a contributor means the regular salary paid in respect of his service, together with the value of living and residential allowances.

What plainer words do you want than that? Unless the government rights this wrong as a matter of course, I am considering having this widow petition the crown—this would be regulated by the Department of Justice—for leave to submit this question to the exchequer court. I appeal now to the Minister of Justice to grant that leave so that the question may be settled finally and a grave injustice remedied.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am very sorry the hon. member has seen fit to impute the motives he did to the deputy minister of justice who gave this opinion in 1930. He was not deputy minister of justice when I came here, but I have known him for a great many years. From my knowledge of him I am quite satisfied that he was absolutely incapable of making a ruling in his official capacity for the reason suggested by the hon. member. The hon. member has spoken of a wrong, and I think it is a grave wrong to Mr. Edwards to have asserted in this place, after the many years of honoured and valued service he rendered to the country, that he made a ruling for the motives suggested by the hon. member. As to whether or not the decision was correct I have no opinion to express, but I can say to the hon. member that the ruling given in 1930 was not a ruling upon any specific case. It was to this effect:

I am, accordingly of the opinion that the interpretation of the definition of "salary" in sec. 2 (1) of the act which the committee has suggested in its report, is correct, namely, that only such living and residential allowances are to be reckoned as part of the contributor's salary for the purposes of the act as are, in the same sense as the contributor's regular salary, paid or allowed "in respect of his service": in other words, really form part of the compensation or emoluments attached to the position in which the contributor is serving.

Thereupon it was referred to the civil service commission to examine the various positions to determine what were the allowances paid that should be classified as compensation for service. Some of the allowances paid in the Yukon were not classified as compensation for service but as compensation for the hardships of having to fill positions in that remote part of the country. It was considered that that was not compensation for service, that it was compensation for having to live there and that when one retired it need not be continued. A retired civil servant was no longer required to live there, and if he chose to live there he was not entitled to receive additional money because of his own free choice in doing so.

If the hon. gentleman wishes to advise any one to apply for a fiat there will be no fiat refused. But the applicant for the fiat will have to envisage the legal position which results from this act and which makes this a grant or gratuity, and the hon. gentleman will take the responsibility of advising whether or not, whatever be the interpretation that the exchequer court might put on the section, there is any jurisdiction to render judgment.

That is a matter on which I wish to express no opinion, but I can assure the hon. gentleman that if the fiat is applied for it will be granted.

Mr. NEILL: May I go back to what the minister was speaking about before? His remarks were, I am sure, very informative and a revelation to many of us who are not familiar with the new measure. So far as I personally am concerned, if the minister would guarantee that he is going to be on that treasury board, I would have every confidence in his handling of the matter. In explanation of my remark that the treasury board was somewhat of a one-man position I recall that a number of years ago I went to see the then Minister of Finance, not the present one, and made some proposals about some of these matters, and he told me bluntly that he would not grant my request. Then I said: "What about the treasury board? May I submit it to them?" He said, "well, I am the head of the treasury board, and there is your answer." This made me think that the treasury board was more or less of a one-man proposition, but if the minister tells me that the situation is different I can possibly live on hope.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are men sometimes with such strong personalities that they do get their way even with several colleagues.

Mr. NEILL: I will take a chance on the strong personality of the minister if he guarantees that he will look into anything that I bring to his attention.

I want to bring to his attention a weakness of all people who make laws. They introduce a very nice bill, but there is always in it somewhere a joker, and the joker in this bill I find is on the page to which the minister referred where power is given to make regulations. I do not care who makes the act if you will let me draw the regulations. Then it will be my act—especially when the regulations are drawn by civil servants. Further evidence of that is in paragraph (c) which says that the positions will be defined by the governor in council; that means by an official. I have seen instances where the bill said one thing and the regulations said the very opposite, and it was the regulations, made by an official, that counted when we tried to get some justice.

The minister has said that the head of the civil service association has expressed his approval. Yes, but he is a big man and he thinks only in terms of Ottawa or of the big centres and of the civil servants who come more particularly under him. He is a long way from British Columbia. It is not my constituents who are out there that he is thinking of.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think the hon. member will permit me to say that those who are his constituents are also the constituents of the president of the federation, which comprises civil service groups throughout Canada from one ocean to the other.

Mr. NEILL: That may be so, but I would like to bring before the minister the position of the deckhands on the government ships. I have not the act under my hand, but I have a very strong conviction that these men by some provision are kept out of the civil service. I am speaking subject to correction, but I am fairly certain that the men employed on government ships as deck hands are not eligible to come under the act.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think the hon. member's memory is substantially correct, but he has not put it in quite the same form in which it appears in the act. The officers on these ships were affirmatively included. There was no exclusion in terms of other ranks than officers, but that was the result.

Mr. NEILL: The result was that these deck hands were not eligible?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They were not included, but now they will be eligible if they are by the regulations declared to be eligible because of their having served for a long period.

Mr. NEILL: Then you have to trust to the tender mercies of the regulation maker and he cannot do anything wrong. May I impress on the minister that it is only fair and just that these deckhands should come under the act. They work for long hours in all weathers and some of them have long periods of service, five, ten and fifteen years, and they are entitled to superannuation benefits. If the minister gives me the assurance that they will be eligible for superannuation under this bill I will be quite satisfied.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The only assurance I can give is that before they were not eligible; now they will be eligible, and if the regulations do not include them the administration will be subject to the criticism of this house, because if it is a class which the administration should include they will have the power to include them.

Mr. NEILL: And the minister will keep a finger in the pie?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The minister will convey my hon. friend's recommendations to the electors of Quebec East.

Mr. BOUCHER: With reference to the point I raised about annual salary my memory goes back to Rabbie Burns' lines:

> The best laid plans o' mice and men
> Gang aft agley.

The president of the civil service association and the government may have the desire to do the very thing we want, but in paragraph (b) the words used are "annual salary" of any officer and the same paragraph says "permanent officer". If it were to say that for the purposes of this act a permanent officer in receipt of an annual salary would be eligible it would be much clearer. Then (b) (i) says:

> is in receipt of salary computed at an annual rate of at least six hundred dollars.

If it were to say, if he is in receipt of a salary computed annually to the amount of six hundred dollars, it would be much clearer.

I am not impressed with the minister's suggestion that because clause 9 gives certain powers to make regulations, the regulations can go beyond the act itself. If paragraph (b) of clause 1 limits the scope of the application of the act, as I think it does, I submit that no regulation can enlarge it. I believe that the minister's intention is all right, but I think he should reconsider the language, because under the present interpretation the salary must be an annual one to bring the recipient within the confines of the act. I wonder whether the minister would not reconsider it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the hon. gentleman will look at it he will see that it deals first of all with:

> any permanent officer, clerk or employee in the civil service who is in receipt of a stated annual salary—

And,

> —any other officer, clerk or employee in the civil service. . . .

other than those in receipt of an annual salary. What can it mean if that is not what it means?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): In reference to what I said with regard to the ruling on paragraph (l) of this bill, which was given by the deputy minister of justice in 1930, he was not referring to specific cases. Nor was he referring to a specific case when his original ruling or opinion was given in 1924, which opinion I read to the committee and I will read again. He was not referring to any one particular case or any one particular civil servant, but generally; he was interpreting the wording of that section.

Contributions must include 5 per cent of the value of living and residential allowances, both in respect of past service and in respect of future service.

The sum of 5 per cent must be deducted monthly from both the salary and living allowances from the date of election.

Those original decisions and opinions went without question until 1930, until that group came here to try to get their money back out of the superannuation fund; and I did not wait to come into the House of Commons to use such efforts as I could. I said it to the deputy minister personally. If the minister cares to have the files looked up he will find my letters on record. I communicated with the Minister of Finance of that day, the Prime Minister and the chairman of the treasury board.

I will give another instance of how far it went. All the civil servants of the Yukon at that time were not paid salary in two ways, part as salary and part as living allowance; some got a complete salary headed as "salary". One of them getting a salary died. Then came the calculation of what his widow's pension would be. Instead of calculating that on the five per cent which had been paid by that civil servant on his salary they said, "If he was not paid a living allowance, part of what was paid to him as salary should have been living expense; therefore we will pension this widow as if it were part salary and part living allowance", and that went through the treasury board until I showed them what they were doing in robbing that woman. They could not believe it, and asked whose responsibility it was, and I said, "Your secretary". You can find who the secretary was at that time. They righted that wrong; and the wrong which is being done to civil servants and retired civil servants and widows should be righted, and they should not have to go to the exchequer court to get it done.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was very glad that the Minister of Justice placed on record a letter he received from the president of the civil service federation of Canada. I am sure that we are glad to have that statement of their satisfaction as an organization with the bill which has been brought in. I think, however, the members of the civil service federation and civil servants generally would feel that we as members of parliament are not absolved by such a declaration on their part from closely scrutinizing the bill and asking the questions which come to our minds from a study of these various sections.

So far as section 1 is concerned, the wording of it is quite clear to me; I interpreted it along the lines that the minister explained. It takes care of the permanent people on a stated annual salary, as was already the case, and it goes farther in that it gives the treasury board power for purposes of superannuation to designate certain other groups. So far so good. It goes farther: it stipulates conditions which these other groups must meet in order that the treasury board may so designate them. But the thing it does not do is to declare that all groups who meet the specifications set down in subparagraphs (b) (i) and (ii) shall be so designated. That is the reason why some of us are asking questions.

Let me be concrete. Let me name two groups of persons who, I feel, meet the requirements of subparagraphs (b) (i) and (ii). First of all, there are my own colleagues over at the printing bureau to whom I have referred on two or three occasions. They are in receipt of salary or wages which in a year amount to at least $600, so that they meet subparagraph (b) (i). They are also required to devote the whole of their time to that work, and there is not sufficient time left in the year for them to engage in some other remunerative occupation; so that they meet subparagraph (b) (ii). In other words, the treasury board may designate the printing employees as for the purposes of this act entitled to superannuation. Now we would like to know whether they are to be so designated. Maybe the minister can tell us; maybe he will say that we shall have to wait until the treasury board decides, but I hope the former is the case.

Let me refer to another group; I have already referred to them in the course of the debate on this measure—the men doing char work in this building. They receive a salary during the course of the year which is at least $600; therefore they meet subparagraph (b) (i). They also meet—at least some of them do—subparagraph (b) (ii), for they are employed the year round except for two or three weeks' holidays; at any rate they are employed a sufficient part of the year that they cannot go somewhere else and engage in some other remunerative employment. In other words, they meet subparagraphs (b) (i) and (ii) exactly as do the employees over at the printing bureau. Yet, there are rumours around—we do not know where they come from, but they are in circulation—that the treasury board will bring the printers under this legislation, but that the men doing char work in this building are not to be brought under it. I hope the former rumour is true and the latter one false, and that the minister may be able to give us some statement as to what is the likely action with respect to these two groups.

While I am speaking of various groups let me refer also to some that I referred to the other day when the minister, prompted by a minister who was sitting behind him, made the comment that this bill was not designed to bring everybody in Canada under civil service superannuation. I refer to the stenographers who work for members of the House of Commons.

I should like also to refer to another group, the amanuenses who work up on the third floor—those charming young women, if I may say so—who type out the speeches made in this house after they have been taken down in shorthand on the floor of this chamber by the Hansard reporters. Those young ladies, along with the stenographers who work for members of the house, work only the part of the year that the house is in session. Therefore they do not meet subparagraph (b) (ii), although they may meet subparagraph (b) (i). Therefore, even though the treasury board might be interested in these people, under the terms of this act they cannot become eligible; yet I believe that they should.

If I may take a moment on the side, I was interested in learning that when this House of Commons first started, that term, "amanuenses", fitted the employees who bore the name a little better, perhaps, than it does to-day. Seventy years ago the Hansard reporters took down in shorthand the speeches that were made in the House of Commons, and the amanuenses were young men outside the chamber who transcribed those notes into longhand—this was before the days of satisfactory typewriters—and then Hansard was printed from that longhand.

Here is the case. The Hansard reporters—so far as I am concerned, very deservingly so—are put on an annual basis. They are permanent employees; they receive an annual salary, and they are covered under the superannuation act. But since parliament is not sitting the whole year, they have the privilege, when parliament is not sitting, of engaging in some other remunerative employment, such as court reporting, for example. Technically they would not meet subparagraph (b) (ii), and they would be debarred from superannuation if they were not already covered as civil servants in receipt of a stated annual salary. Yet there is this line of distinction between the reporter who takes the shorthand notes here on the floor of the house and the amanuensis who puts them into typescript on the typewriter. I feel that some consideration should be given to them, that they, too, should come under civil service superannuation. We expect them, as we expect the stenographers who work for members, to come back year in and year out. Some of them have been here for a good many years and yet, despite their long term of faithful service, they are not acknowledged as permanent employees and are not covered in the Civil Service Superannuation Act. I am suggesting that these people about whom I am now talking, the stenographers and the amanuenses, are still not covered by this bill, but they should be.

If I may traverse my steps for a moment I am suggesting that so far as the printers and the char men are concerned they may be covered, but it is up to the treasury board. We hear that the treasury board will include the printers, but we have had no assurance that they will include the char men and messengers who are working here in this building. I hope that the minister—I will forgive him for what he said yesterday by way of a crack on this point if he does not do it again—will not make some comment about our interest in making security in this measure widespread being too far-reaching. After all, this sort of thing is becoming quite the concern of the government at the present time, and I feel that some effort should be made to extend coverage to these people.

While I am on my feet, and while I am speaking about the employees of the House of Commons, there is one other suggestion of a more immediate nature that I should like to make. This session of the house has lasted for some considerable time, and it has now been decided to sit right through until eleven o'clock on Saturday nights for the remainder of the session. That may be all right for us. We agreed to it the other day, but it seems to me it is a little too much to ask of these young boys around here, the pages who serve us so faithfully and well and so willingly. It is a little too much to ask them to work the long hours they have been working, from early Monday morning right through until eleven o'clock Saturday night. I hope that someone, the Clerk of the House or His Honour, the Speaker, may be able to make some arrangement whereby a number of them can be let off at one o'clock to-morrow, and others of them next Saturday. Let us have just two or three of them around here for Saturday afternoons for the remainder of the session.

Would the minister answer my question about the likely action of the treasury board with respect to the specific groups I named?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In spite of the blandishments and the inducements of the hon. member and the admiration I have for the amanuenses and all the other charming young ladies one sees about the halls of this building, I cannot undertake to say what regulations will be made and what classes will be included. I cannot go beyond saying, as I said before, that this bill has been brought into the house to provide machinery whereby the representations that have been made and given serious and sympathetic consideration can be met and satisfactorily settled. I cannot go beyond that. I was told that there was one class of employees where the turnover was very, very rapid. There was an average of perhaps not more than three or four months' service. I do not know which one it is, and I am not in a position, without investigation, to express even an opinion for myself and much less am I in a position to express for other members of the treasury board what their judgment would be upon a factual examination with respect to any class.

Mr. EDWARDS: With regard to subparagraph (i) of paragraph (b) of section 1, I submit this case. A man is an employee of the government. He has been paid on an hourly rate; we will say a dollar an hour. He works eight hours a day and six days a week. His pay would amount to $48 a week. Is he in receipt of a salary as contemplated by subparagraph (i); and how would you compute it at an annual rate when he is paid on an hourly rate? Do I understand the subparagraph to mean if he is in receipt of a salary which, computed at an annual rate, would amount to at least $600, or alternatively, is in receipt of an annual remuneration which amounts to at least $600? That is the ambiguity which I think is bothering my hon. friend, and it certainly is puzzling to me.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: When we come to section 4, paragraph (h) subparagraph (ii) my hon. friend will find that the method of computing rates of salary reads:

> The method of computing their rates of salary as annual or monthly rates or as rates in respect of any other period for which it is necessary to compute such rates for the purposes of this act, —will be determined by the regulations.

Mr. ADAMSON: There was a time when the employees of the library, some of whom had been actually working there, I understand, for ten or fifteen years, were classed as temporary employees under the Civil Service Act. Is there a section in this bill that will prevent that? Is there a section that will permit an employee of the library or any other branch of the service who has been employed for a number of years being made a permanent employee? This was brought up in the library committee a year ago. I do not know whether any satisfactory answer has yet been given.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The employees of the library are employees of the House of Commons, I understand, and also civil servants.

Whether they are for other purposes called "temporary" or not, the purpose of this bill is to give authority to the governor in council to take care of the cases of all those who are in the service of the government for a reasonable length of time. I think there was an order in council passed in 1933 which said that the quota of permanent employees must not be more than eighty per cent of the total number of employees, so that the word "temporary" got a meaning somewhat different from its original meaning. Originally it meant someone who was there just provisionally and was not going to stay, but now it means someone who is there and is going to stay, but has not yet got into the eighty per cent quota. Because of the use of the same word in the superannuation act, the order in council and in other acts, such persons were kept out of the superannuation benefits. The purpose here is to give the governor in council the right to make regulations that will take them in. It was not felt possible to put in a bill all the classes to which it would apply, because it requires an examination of fact. You cannot say that every temporary employee will be under the superannuation act. You have to examine the actual situation; but what is meant is to have something that will enable the governor in council to make regulations and the treasury board to apply them in such a way as will enable the government to satisfy the House of Commons that it is doing the right thing.

Mr. ADAMSON: If the governor in council makes a regulation that the employees of the library shall be classed as permanent employees it can be done in that way?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That can be done by regulation. It will mean that they will be permanent officers, clerks or employees for the purposes of the superannuation act, and it will not have any effect with respect to anything else.

Mr. ADAMSON: That was the nub of it; these employees were not under the superannuation act; they were debarred from seniority and the pension to which they were justly entitled.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I should not like my remarks to be taken as dealing with any specific case in which I have not examined the facts, but the legislation is for the purpose of enabling the government to make and apply regulations in such a way that we can come to the House of Commons and say we have done the right thing by all these servants of the crown.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. KNOWLES: I would direct the minister's attention to lines 32, 33 and 34 on page 1, which contain this clause:

. . . but saving all rights and privileges of either house in respect of the control or removal of its officers, clerks and employees;

I should like the minister to give us some explanation as to the meaning of that phrase. I can understand that there may be a few highly placed officers of either house whose removal should lie with the house or the government, but for the most part it seems to me there should be a little more protection than that for the employees of parliament. I have in mind those to whom I referred the other day, the charmen who were dismissed after the election in 1935, although following a fuss in this house they were rehired. It seems to me that people doing this sort of work should have something of the same degree of permanency that civil servants have. Could the minister explain the meaning of that phrase?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is a committee to assist His Honour the Speaker in the administration of this house. So far this house has never consented to submit the exercise of its control over its personnel to any but itself; and for the purposes of superannuation they will be deemed permanent if they are put in that class by the governor in council, but that will not give them any greater tenure of office or any more vested interest in their office than they have under the statutes and rules which apply to the Senate and the House of Commons.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then do I understand that in this building the men who operate the elevators are employed by the Department of Public Works and are permanent, while the charmen are employed by the House of Commons and are subject to removal?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know whether the men who do the char work are employed by the House of Commons. I know there are certain persons, from the Clerk of the house down, who are looked upon as servants of the commons, and who are dealt with by His Honour the Speaker in his capacity as head of a department of government.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Medical certificate where not appointed under Civil Service Act.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): An Amendment has been moved by the Minister of Transport, that section 2 of bill

No. 171 be amended by adding thereto immediately after the word "was" in line 20 the word "not".

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Contributions.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is an amendment to this section, deleting the words "first day of October, 1944" wherever they appear and inserting in lieu thereof the words "fifteenth day of August, 1944," because it is intended that the act shall operate from August 15, 1944.

Mr. MICHAUD: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. KNOWLES: Are we carrying this whole section, which covers several pages, or are we taking it subsection by subsection?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the hon gentleman wishes them carried separately I would have no objection.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wish the minister would point out, so that we may identify it definitely and not miss it, the section which gives those now under the retirement fund the right to transfer.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We have not yet come to that. In these subsections we give those who had service prior to appointment the right to bring in that service by making the appropriate contribution. The transfer from the retirement fund to the superannuation fund is dealt with on page 12 of the bill.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Regulations by governor in council.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister deal with one point; I have no doubt it is just a matter of explanation. I understand that any person who decided to come under the superannuation act when it was introduced originally was permitted to do so by paying the required sum of money, with interest at the rate of four per cent?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: And that later on, around 1939, that rate was increased to five per cent?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; it is still four per cent.

Mr. NEILL: Then the rate of contribution was increased, was it not?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The contributions, as a result of the report of the committee of this house, in 1939, were left at the same rate for male employees earning $1,200 or less, increased to 5½ per cent for male employees earning from $1,200 to $1,500 and to 6 per cent for those earning more than $1,500.

Mr. NEILL: This is the point I wish to make—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: And they were left at 5 per cent for female employees.

Mr. NEILL: It always comes down to an individual case. Supposing the man I am thinking of elects now to come in under the plan. Of course he has a lot of back years. Will he have to pay the original 4 per cent interest on the back money, or will it be increased to 5 per cent—or whatever the rate is?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It will be at the increased rate. We shall come to that section later on.

Mr. NEILL: Not for the whole period?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes; that was the committee's recommendation.

Mr. NEILL: And that is the way it will be?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes; that was the recommendation of the House of Commons' committee. It was found upon investigation that the rates were not sufficient, and in order to make the fund solvent and keep it solvent it was necessary to increase the rate. The committee felt at that time it would be improper to take in any more at a rate that had proved to be insufficient.

Mr. KNOWLES: Was it necessary to change the date October 1 to August 15 everywhere it occurred?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Everywhere they occurred in section 3. There is only one place we shall leave the provision for October, and that is in section 11C at page 10. That is done because there are still two or three provincial employees who have not yet been transferred, and we want to leave that open until October.

Mr. KNOWLES: Was the amendment an omnibus to change them all?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It changed all those in section 3. The hon. member will notice that section 3 changes four sections of the original act.

Mr. KNOWLES: Running from page 2 to page 8.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes; that is correct.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 5—Treasury board direct payment in certain cases.

Mr. MICHAUD: I move:

That section 5 be amended by striking out the words "first day of October, 1944" where they occur and substituting therefore the words "15th day of August, 1944".

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Right to elect to become contributors.

Mr. MICHAUD: I move:

That section 7 be amended by striking out the words "first day of October, 1944" where they occur, and substituting therefor the words "15th day of August, 1944".

Mr. KNOWLES: I take it there are no exceptions at all in the provisions of this section? Any civil servant under the old act may transfer within a year after August 15 without any restriction?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes; that is correct. It is intended to give a full year fom the time the act comes into force, to anyone who is in the retirement fund and who wishes to transfer to the superannuation fund. He transfers automatically what he has in the retirement fund, and that pays his contribution up to date in the superannuation fund.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 8—Funds transferred to superannuation account.

Mr. MICHAUD: I move:

That section 8 be amended by striking out the words "first day of October, 1944." where they occur and substituting therefor the words "15th day of August, 1944."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 9—Right to elect to become a contributor.

Mr. MICHAUD: I move:

That section 9 be amended by striking out the words "first day of October, 1944," where they occur and substituting therefor the words "15th day of August, 1944."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 10 agreed to.

[Mr. Knowles.]

On section 11—Coming into force.

Mr. MICHAUD: I move:

That section 11 be amended by striking out the words "first day of October, 1944," where they occur and substituting therefor the words "15th day of August, 1944."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

357. National research council—salaries and other expenses of the national research council, $920,529.

Mr. KNOWLES: Before we deal with this item, would the Minister of Mines and Resources give consideration to the suggestion I made a moment ago—I do not know whether he was in the house—namely, that so far as possible the page boys be given time off tomorrow afternoon and evening and the remaining Saturdays of the session? I think we could get along with a skeleton staff.

Mr. CRERAR: That is a matter for Mr. Speaker and not for the government. I have no doubt His Honour will take note of my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. NEILL: I suggest that the members be given time off from six o'clock. That is always done, but at the last minute.

Mr. GARDINER: If we get through tonight we may be through at six o'clock.

Mr. PERLEY: Will the minister explain the increase in this item?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The increase in the item is due to increased work and increased staff.

Mr. PERLEY: The details on page 193 of the estimates show a decrease in the staff. In 1943-44 the total was ninety-three; in 1944-45 it is eighty-eight.

Item agreed to.

358. Expanded research on the utilization of farm crops, $325,000.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have always been interested in this particular work and I notice that this is the first time we have had an appropriation for it. When the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture were up I asked him what we were doing in this connection.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw made a fine speech in the house some time ago in connection with this matter. Like other hon. members he had been in the United States and had seen what that country was doing. There are not details for this item, but I do not think enough money is being voted. This work affects not only the people on the farms but those in the city, and it is very important in connection with post-war activities.

In 1938 the United States appropriated a tremendous amount of money, but it was small in comparison for what is appropriated by the chemical industry of that country for research work. That industry appropriates between two and three per cent of its total sales values and there are industries in Great Britain which appropriate like amounts. You have to keep up to date in research. The Minister of Agriculture can correct me if I am wrong, but I understand that in 1938 the United States appropriated about one-seventh of one per cent of the value of their crops. We should have a full statement from the minister so that we shall know just what is to be done.

Mr. PERLEY: I was going to speak along the same line and ask the minister to explain exactly the nature of this expenditure. I should like to know what part of this research work will be carried on in western Canada where many farm products are produced. What staff does he propose to set up?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I do not know just how extensive a statement hon. members would care to have, but I can make a concise statement as to what is proposed. This item is to deal with one particular development that the national research council has under way at the present time. The government considers it essential that there be an expansion of research work for the utilization of agricultural crops including the establishment of a branch laboratory in western Canada to study industrial uses of surplus crops. This will involve the construction and equipping of a laboratory building located in western Canada and the provision of additional staff at Ottawa and at the new laboratory. For 1944-45 it is estimated that work on the erection and equipping of the western laboratory will cost $200.000 and that a further amount of $125.000 will be required for operating supplies and staff.

The need for this expansion was discussed at a recent meeting of representatives of the federal Department of Agriculture, the provincial departments of agriculture and the provincial universities of the three prairie provinces and the national research council. It was recognized, and a resolution was passed recommending that steps be taken immediately to provide for this expansion. It was understood that this expansion programme would not in any way interfere with scientific work now being carried on in the west by the federal or provincial governments.

Mr. PERLEY: Where will the laboratory be located?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I propose recommending that it be located where it can best serve the agricultural research needs of the three western provinces.

Mr. PERLEY: What about the centre of Saskatchewan?

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister did not state the type of research that would be done by this laboratory in western Canada. He said that it was to do research in the utilization of surplus farm products. Can he go farther and state specifically some of the research work that it will do?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am not in a position to go into technical questions, but generally it is for the utilization of surplus farm products of all kinds.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What farm products? I should like to know just what is to be done, and why is it limited to the western provinces? There are so many farm products which industry could use and turn into products for reshipment to the farms. One of our problems to-day, of course, is to get more people back on the farms, and there are a lot of ways in which that can be done. We have, of course, to make the farm more attractive. But then there are products that can be grown on the farm which could be utilized in the factories of Ontario, for instance. Take soya beans in Ontario. Is there a reduction plant for soya beans in Ontario? How many of those reduction plants have we? What other products is it proposed that we should grow on the farms to be utilized in the factories of Ontario? We have a year of sunshine and we should use it to the full. We are using fifty million years of sunshine when we use coal and oil, and it takes comparatively little labour to do that. We should see to it that we utilize to the full the one year of sunshine that we get on the farms, so that we may put as many of our people as possible to work. The minister has enlightened us very little. Skim milk is another product that can be used in factories. Would the minister give us a comparison between what is being done in Canada in research in this direction and what is being done in the United States. We need more information before we can pass this item.

Mr. NEILL: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, you called item 357 and declared it carried before we had a chance to find it in our books and speak on it. Would the minister permit a question now on item 357?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The item is passed, but I do not mind one question.

Mr. NEILL: Thank you. It is so kind of you. I understand that a body in British Columbia interested in research has submitted a long brief to the minister asking for a grant of $400,000 from the dominion to assist them in establishing research facilities in British Columbia. The immediate demand was for $400,000 and a larger sum later. While I do not suggest that we are entitled to that sum now, although we would like to get it if we can, would the minister state whether item 357 will cover any of the demands that were made in that brief?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I spoke on that when my estimates were up a day or two ago. I received a brief from the minister of lands and mines of British Columbia, and I have replied to him to the effect that I propose to submit his request to a meeting of the committee on scientific and industrial research which I have called for Tuesday night. A grant of $400,000 has been asked for, some $300,000 of which would be for the erection of a building. I cannot say anything further about the matter until it has been discussed at the meeting.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on item 358.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The hon. member for Lethbridge has brought up the matter of sugar beets on several occasions. Is any research to be made on that question? When we are asked to pass a vote of $325,000 we want to know what it is for.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The $325,000 is for the establishment of a research unit in western Canada to serve the three western provinces. So far as research for farm crops to be utilized in factories in Ontario is concerned we have the national research council located here in Ontario.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What are we doing about it?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That is a question apart from this item.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not know whether it is apart from this item at all.

[Mr. Douglas G. Ross.]

Mr. PERLEY: The minister stated that more than half of this vote would be used for a laboratory and equipment and he said that it would be established in the central part of western Canada.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I did not say that.

Mr. PERLEY: He said that it would be as nearly as possible in the central part of the three prairie provinces where it would best serve their needs. I think the Minister of Agriculture will bear me out in that.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I would suggest that the hon. member leave that question where it is for the sake of his own province.

Mr. PERLEY: For the sake of his own province? If it is to be established in the central part of the three prairie provinces I am sure that it will be somewhere in Saskatchewan. The three prairie provinces were represented at the meeting where no doubt this question was discussed. Can the minister be a little more definite and say just where the laboratory will be located?

Item stands.

Third report of special committee on social security.—Mr. Macmillan.

Fifth report of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Moore.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ROSS (ST. PAUL'S)—PRESS REPORTS ON FINAL REPORT OF RADIO BROADCASTING COMMITTEE

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I rise to a question of privilege. An article appearing in the Montreal Gazette of Friday, July 28, reported the radio committee on broadcasting as tabling a unanimous final report in the House of Commons. Also, Mr. Speaker, from other reports in the press which have had wide publicity, and from a radio announcement on Thursday night it is made to appear that the report was unanimous. I desire to make it clear that the report was not unanimous.

Certain portions of it were unacceptable to the Progressive Conservative members sitting on the committee, and I desire to make this known both to the house and to the country at this time.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

HALIFAX SHIPYARDS—PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS IN SETTLEMENT OF STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): Has the Minister of Labour any report to make with respect to the progress of negotiations in the settlement of the strike at the Halifax shipyard? I wish to point out that this trouble spreads beyond the Halifax shipyards and is of interest to labour organizations in other parts of the province. I have resolutions from the United Mine Workers Union in my own county who are concerned and ask that the shipyards be compelled to accept the decision of the board. I should like a statement from the minister. I wish to express the hope that progress is being made towards a settlement and that it will soon be arrived at.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I have nothing further to report, except to say that I think my hon. friend is aware that the issue in dispute is the check-off and maintenance of membership in the agreement. This company has had an agreement with the employees for the last three years. I understand they are quite prepared to sign the agreement with the exception of the check-off and maintenance of membership clause insisted on by the organization. That is the only issue in dispute. It is not a question of union recognition. Along with my hon. friend I hope that good sense will prevail on both sides and that the dispute will soon end, in view of the nature of the industry down there.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Is not the check-off a statutory necessity in Nova Scotia?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know. There is a local law down there. I could not answer that. There is a provincial collective bargaining act and I think in some respects in conformity with the act it is mandatory. But there are technicalities in the way. That is my understanding.

CANADIAN FORCES

INTERPRETATION OF PROVISIONS OF REINSTATEMENT IN CIVIL EMPLOYMENT ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): On various occasions in the house I have asked the Minister of Labour if he would be good enough to clarify the intent and purpose of section 3 of the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act. There is much controversy over this matter in connection with the words:

> To reinstate him in employment at the termination of his service in such occupation and position as would be consistent with the true intent and purpose of this act and under conditions not less favourable to him than those which would have been applicable to him had he remained in the employment of that employer.

Would the minister be good enough to make a statement in clarification of this section? If he cannot do so now, he may take this as a notice.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is not a question that should be asked on the orders of the day.

Mr. GRAYDON: As long as it is not lost by the procedure that is now being taken I think the Minister of Labour ought to make a statement in clarification of it later. Perhaps the minister would take the hon. member's question as a notice.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's) I raise this question only because I have had so many letters in connection with the matter. It really should be clarified.

CIVIL SERVICE

ATTACHMENT OF SALARIES FOR DEBT—REFERENCE TO REPORT IN OTTAWA Journal OF JULY 29

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): I should like to direct attention to the fact that in the Ottawa Morning Journal the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) is reported to have referred to the fact that the salary or remuneration of federal civil servants is not subject to attachment for debt. The hon. member has drawn my attention to this report. He did not say anything of the kind; he made no reference at all to the matter. I was the hon. member guilty of making that statement, which is correct, and I am prepared to take the responsibility for it.

FARM PRICES

PROVISION FOR STABILIZATION, PURCHASE OF STAPLE PRODUCTS AT APPROVED PRICES, ETC.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of bill No. 168, for the support of the prices of agricultural products during the transition from war to peace.

He said: At the very beginning I wish to call attention to a mistake which has been made in printing the bill, because it may be in the minds of hon. members as they discuss the matter. It will be noted that at page 5314 of Hansard for July 25 I moved the resolution upon which this bill is based. The second paragraph of that resolution contains this statement:

To provide further that the governor in council may authorize from time to time payments out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, up to an aggregate of two hundred million dollars . . .

I notice that in the printed bill that amount is given as two million dollars. I wanted to indicate that mistake in the very beginning of the discussion. When the bill is in committee it will be amended to read two hundred million dollars.

In moving second reading of this bill I would first of all call attention to its title: an act for the support of the prices of agricultural products during the transition from war to peace. At the same time I should like to call attention to some misunderstandings which I think are in the minds of people generally, unless they have been somewhat recently checking the figures with regard to the transition period following the last war. For example, in going over the records of prices during the last war I find that generally speaking the prices of farm products did not reach the level of the prices of 1941 until the third year of the war. Therefore the years which are comparable as far as prices go during the last war would be 1915-16 with regard to grains and 1916 with regard to other products for which the records are kept on a calendar year basis. Those would be comparable with 1941-42 during this war, so far as grains are concerned, and with 1941 for other products the records of which are kept on the basis of the calendar year. Taking those price levels during the last war and during this war, I should like to make some comments; and with the permission of the house I should like these tables placed upon Hansard in the form in which I have them before me, in order that they may be brought to the attention of hon. members and of the country.

It will be seen that the price of oats, for example, which of course enter into the feeding of live stock, in 1915-16 was 45·6 cents per bushel, basis Fort William, while in 1941-42 the average during the year was 49·1 cents. The price of barley in 1915-16 was 64 cents and in 1941-42 it was 59·8 cents, or almost 60 cents. Then when we come to butcher steers, basis Toronto, the price for good butcher steers in 1916 was 8·4 cents; in 1941 it was 8·7 cents. Bacon hogs sold at Toronto in 1916 for $10.54 and in 1941 for $10.20. The price of cheese at Montreal in 1916 was 19·8 cents; in 1941 it was 18·2 cents.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is without any bonus?

Mr. GARDINER: That is figured with the premiums which then existed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In both cases?

Mr. GARDINER: There were no premiums in the first case; there were premiums in the second. Butter sold in Montreal for 35·1 cents in 1916 and 33·7 cents in 1941. Eggs sold at Montreal for 39·5 cents in 1916 and 34·6 cents in 1941. I would call attention to the fact that in the following year during both the last war and this war, there was a considerable increase in prices generally. For example, in 1916-17 oats went up to 61·9 cents. In 1942-43 they were pegged, of course, at a ceiling of 51½ cents and the average price was 49·2 cents or approximately the same as in 1941. It will be recalled, however, that the following year we added 10 cents a bushel to the ceiling price, which brought the average up to 61·5 cents, so it was not until 1943 that the price of oats was raised to a figure comparable with the price in 1916-17. At the same time I would recall that without any controls during the last war, in the year which is comparable with 1943-44 oats went up to 81·8 cents and the following year dropped back to 78·9 cents. That was the year in which the war ended.

The story with regard to barley is a little different from the story with regard to most of the other products, and I am not sure that I can say why that should be so. The price of barley went up much earlier in the last war than did the prices of most products. Barley in 1915-16 was 64 cents. The next year it was $1.06 and the next year it was $1.37. Then, in the year the war ended, namely 1918-19—and it ended early in that crop year—barley dropped back to $1.07.

There is one point to which I would draw attention in connection with the price of barley in that particular year. There was a variation in the price running from an average of $1.21, low, in one month to $1.81 high in another month. In other words there was a great variation throughout the year in the price of barley during that period of time.

In this war, while barley started at very nearly the same price—approximately 60 cents a bushel as against 64—it was only 59·8 in the year 1941-42. It was pegged at 64⅘ under our ceiling price structure, and it was the same in the next year, 1942-43. It was up to 79·8 after the premium of 15 cents was added in 1943. It is 79·8 at the present time. Perhaps I should use the term "returns" rather than

"prices", because in both those cases it includes premiums or subsidies, or whatever one wishes to call them, which are now paid on barley. Some of this barley is sold in the United States, and we guarantee an additional payment of 15 cents to cover any profit that may be made up to that amount. Then above that there are participation certificates.

With respect to live stock, which to some extent depends upon the cost of the products about which I have been speaking, the price of butcher steers at Toronto in 1917 rose from $8.42 in 1916 to $10.73 in 1917, $13.29 in 1918 and in 1919, the year following the war, $13.66. Then, in this war the price in 1941 was $8.70, in 1942, $10.29, which is comparable with the 1917 figure; and $11.76 in 1943, which is somewhat lower than the 1918 figure. Then, the 1944 price, up to date, is $11.76, which is comparable with the $13.66 in 1919, the year following the war.

Bacon hogs are an outstanding example of where prices were higher during the last war than they have been during this one. The price of bacon hogs during the last war stood at $10.54 in 1916, $15.55 in 1917, $18.16 in 1918 and $18.71 in the year following the war, 1919.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is at Toronto?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was not wheat another example?

Mr. GARDINER: It is not included in this bill, so that I am not now discussing it.

In this war, in 1941-42, the year the ceilings were put on pork, the price of live hogs was $10.20; in 1942 it was $11.97; in 1943, $12.90, and in 1944, $14.10. That is the price including the premium we have now placed on hogs in 1944.

The cheese prices perhaps most nearly approach the same levels in both wars, because we find that the cheese price in Montreal in 1916 was 19·08 cents; in 1917, 22·08; in 1918, 23·02 and in 1919, 28·01. In this war the price was 18·02 cents in 1941; 24·05 cents in 1942; 25·07 in 1943, and in this year, 1944, it is 26·01.

Butter prices in the last war were these: In 1916, 35·1 cents; 1917, 42·2; in 1918, 46·6, and in the year after the war the price was 57·4. In this war these are the butter prices: In 1941, 33·7 cents; in 1942, 39·9; in 1943, 40·9, and in the present year, 1944, 42·5.

Wholesale to retail egg prices at Montreal at the time of the last war were as follows: In 1916, 39·5 cents; in 1917, 51·8; in 1918, 59·5 and in 1919, 63·3. In this war the egg prices have been as follows: in 1941, 34·6; in 1942, 40·6; and in 1943, 44·8. The price this year is running at about the same as it was last year, or about 45 cents a dozen.

I have said I would like to have this table put on Hansard, in the form in which I have it. I believe I have read practically all of it to the house, in order that hon. members may have before them all the figures they would want, when discussing the matter later in the day.

The table in full, therefore, is as follows:

There is another point to which I would call attention at the present time, and it is this. The high price levels resulting from the last war did not come during the war. The figures I have read will show that the prices were considerably higher on most of these products in 1919, the year following the war, than they were during the war years. It might be said that the same condition continued throughout 1920, and on some products even into 1921. But there was a decided reduction in prices, particularly in prices of live stock products, during 1921 and 1922. However there was a considerable revival in the prices of farm products generally throughout the twenties, and more particularly again in the price of live stock products. That revival began about 1922, and continued right up until 1928 and 1930. The real reduction in farm prices came in 1931.

In other words the prices during the later twenties were more nearly comparable with the prices we had during the latter part of the war and immediately following, than were the prices for the first two years of the twenties.

I have another table here I should like to place on Hansard, without reading the whole of it, which demonstrates the point I have been making. However I should like to read a few of the prices which prevailed in 1931, and compare them with the prices in 1919.

This table shows that in 1919 the price of oats was 78·9 cents, and in 1930, 58 cents. It dropped to 29 cents in 1931.

Barley stood at $1.07 in 1919, and at 56 cents in 1930. It dropped to 28 cents in 1931.

Butcher steers stood at 13·66 cents in 1919 and 10·16 in 1929, with a drop to 8·97 in 1930 and to 5·93 in 1931.

Bacon hogs in 1919 stood at 18·7 cents; in 1930, 12·32 and 1931, 7·39.

The cheese price in 1919 was 28·1 cents; in 1929, 18·6; in 1930, 16·4, and in 1931, 11·7.

These were the butter prices: In 1919, 57 cents; in 1930, 30 cents; in 1931, 24 cents.

And for eggs: In 1919, 63 cents; in 1930, 45 cents; in 1931, 34 cents.

The complete table follows:

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Where do those prices prevail?

Mr. GARDINER: Fort William for oats and barley; Toronto for butchers' steers and bacon hogs, and Montreal for cheese, butter and eggs.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister is not giving the all-time low which came a little later.

Mr. GARDINER: No. The prices which I have quoted for 1931 are reasonably comparable with those that prevailed for a continuous period of years following. They were lower in 1932 and 1933 and they were up a little in other years, but there was no consiberable rise in price until we got close to this present war.

Mr. WRIGHT: Are those prices to the consumer?

Mr. GARDINER: They are wholesale prices. I wanted to place these figures before hon. members this morning because some are inclined to think that we went through the last war with rather high prices and then immediately following there was a slump. That was not the case. I recite these facts in order to show that in a bill of this kind it would be impossible to determine at this stage when a slump in farm prices is going to come as a result of our going through a transition period from war to peace. It would be most difficult to put times or dates into this particular legislation. It is phrased in indefinite terms as is indicated by the title, which is, "An act for the support of the prices of agricultural products during the transition from war to peace."

In order that there may be available at all times the statistics and facts which represent the conditions during this war, in order that it may be possible to compare those facts and figures with those prevailing immediately following or for some time following the war, this bill provides for the setting up of a board to be composed of three members. It is my intention to recommend to the government, and I make the suggestion to the house, that we should content ourselves for the time being with the appointment of a permanent chairman and take two officials of the department and make them pro tem members of the board.

Our intention is that the board shall immediately begin to study the relationship of the conditions which now exist to the prices which now exist and that all facts with regard to matters of that kind be made available for use immediately the war is over. If I am the minister at that time it is my intention to appoint two permanent members of the board to act with the chairman when the operative part of section No. 9 is brought into effect.

In this connection there arises the question raised the other day by the hon. member for York-Sunbury with regard to the fisheries board, which applies as well to this board. The question was as to what kind of representation was going to be given the producers in connection with a set-up of this kind. The bill provides for the appointment not only of a board of three but of commodity boards. If the government in its wisdom decides that we are going to have floor prices under dairy products, for example, it would be possible under this bill to appoint a dairy board, just as we have a dairy board to-day, to handle those particular products. If we were going to set floors or certain prices under meat products, then we may have a meat board, as we have a meat board to-day. In connection with these commodity boards there would be an opportunity for regional representation, producer representation and perhaps representation of the business concerns handling the particular product. I suggest that it would be difficult to have the board which is to administer the act sufficiently large in membership to take care of all those who probably should be represented.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister is suggesting that it would be too large or unwieldy.

Mr. GARDINER: And too expensive.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That same argument does not apply to the fisheries board.

Mr. GARDINER: That is a matter which the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand) can discuss.

In addition the bill provides for an advisory committee. I stated on a previous occasion that when appointing an advisory committee to the food board we had left to the agricultural producers or the Canadian farm federation the question whether they would prefer to have one member on a board of three or five or six, or be adequately represented on an advisory committee. After some discussion with their own organizations the president reported to me that they preferred to be represented on the advisory committee. We proceeded to appoint the president of the federation as chairman of the advisory committee, and I referred to the fact the other day that this committee was to meet, as it did during the last two days. We appointed two other representatives who were nominated directly by the federation, and then other members of the federation were selected by provincial governments across Canada. I think it is generally considered that they have adequate representation on this advisory committee of twelve. This bill makes provision for the setting up of an advisory committee of that kind. I think it is possible to have the kind of representation which would be most helpful to the producers on a committee of that kind as well as on some of the commodity boards.

There is an obvious reason—this is one which I suggest myself, and it may not be the reason the federation would suggest—for selecting an advisory committee rather than a permanent administration board to provide representation for the producers. The best reason I can think of is this—and it is sometimes stated by members of the house. When a producer has been on a board or in the department for two or three years he ceases to represent the producers. If you were going to try to satisfy the producers that they are represented on a board of that kind at all times you might be required to change the membership so often that probably it would not function very efficiently.

In addition I do not believe that anyone who is in the pay of the government drawing a salary from the government, is nearly as free to criticize the government as the man who is not paid a salary by the government, and so I believe that the producers are in a much stronger position when they have adequate representation on an advisory committee, where they can give their advice to the government through the minister or through the board, and where the minister or head of the board can sit in with them and give the views of the government with regard to the matter under consideration. While these matters are discussed in a committee which meets behind closed doors, and the advice is given just as the advice of officials is given to the government, yet these men are free to go back and advise their own people and give them the reasons why certain things are not being or are being done, and their own organizations are perfectly free to criticize the government for anything which the government has decided to do after considering the advice given to them by the committee. In other words, we do not always follow the advice that is given by the committee, and we seldom follow their advice one hundred per cent. Sometimes, too, before the committee give their advice they call in the minister or a board to ask them to state why a certain thing has not been done, and in many cases after all the facts have been placed before them they agree that what was proposed is the proper thing to do. In other cases, we agree to disagree on occasions and go on with the task, believing that the responsibility in matters of policy rests with the government and that they must take that responsibility. I believe that a system of that kind works successfully in getting the proper kind of administration. It brings before the government the advice of those immediately concerned and makes it possible for the government to act upon it or give reasons why it should not.

Mr. GRAYDON: I presume that a good deal depends upon how close a liaison there is between the committee, the government and the board which happens to be concerned. I take it that if the advisory committee were meeting only once a year and did not keep in close liaison with the government its value by virtue of that fact would be diminished.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes it would be, but I would suggest that governments in a country like ours are dependent upon public opinion for their existence, and they could not very well stand up against the fact that they had set up an advisory committee which they never called together, or an advisory committee whose advice they did not try to follow where possible. Each time that the chairman of the committee already discussed has suggested that we might have a meeting, we have arranged to have it. I was very agreeably—I will not say surprised, because this is what I expected would happen—affected by the fact that this committee has never asked to be brought together at expense to the government except at times when it was important that they should be here. For example, when this bill was coming up, they thought it was important that they should be here during this week, and they suggested that they would like to convene here around July 26. We said: All right, convene. The committee was called together. That is the basis on which we have been working. It is the basis upon which we can continue to work no matter what government is here, and if that practice is continued the producers will have adequate representation in connection with this kind of legislation.

There is one other thing I would like to call to the attention of the house, and that is the great variations in farm income over a period of years. I have before me a sheet which is got out by the statistics branch from time to time, showing the gross agricultural cash income, that is the receipts from the sale of farm products, over a period of years. I should like to read a few of these figures in order to impress upon the minds of hon. members the great variations that there are in the cash income of farmers in Canada as between one year and another and one period and another.

The average annual gross cash income of farmers all across Canada during 1926 to 1929 was $970·5 million. The highest figure that we have ever reached down to the present war period was $1,063·8 million in 1928. The lowest figure we have ever had during a period extending back over many years beyond what this table shows was $383·5 million in the year 1932. We have gradually come up from that point until in the year just before the war, in 1939, it was $722·3 million. It was not until 1942 that there was a considerable increase above that. It is true that we were up by about $200 million in 1941, but in 1942 the income rose to the highest figure on these records up to that time, $1,114·9 million, or approximately $1,115 million. In 1943 the gross cash farm income was $1,396·6 million. In the present year through which we are now passing the gross cash farm income for the first six months was twenty-five per cent higher right across Canada than it was in the first half of last year. So that if that continues on until the end of the year, and the tendency is for it to run higher during the last half of the year, it would be at least twenty-five per cent higher than that.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: They delivered the grain in the first six months of 1944.

Mr. GARDINER: They will deliver a lot more in the last half of this year than last, because they have a better crop this year than last year. But I was going to refer to that in a moment, in order to deal with something else. I wish hon. members would take these sheets and go back over the years showing the variations in income in the different provinces. It will be found, for example, that one of the reasons why we had a gross cash farm income of $1,063 million in 1928 was that that was the biggest year of wheat production in the history of this country down to 1942, and along with that high production we had high prices. The income that year was higher than in the year before or in the year following. The gross cash farm income in 1927 was $934 million; in 1928, $1,063 million; in 1929, $926 million. It dropped right back in 1929 to about where it was in 1927. The increases shown in this table were due to the fact that there was an increase in Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, where this wheat comes from. But as I said at the beginning, wheat does not come under this bill, and I make that observation in order to point out that if one were going to take the comparable figures in the different provinces over a period of years one would have to allow for the fact that under this bill we are dealing with the other products rather than wheat.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Will those figures be placed on the records by provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: They can be put on just as they are if it is the wish of the house.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I would like to see them put on by provinces.

Mr. GARDINER: They are:

NOTE: Revised figures, Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

22/2/44

What I wish to say in that regard is this. They could be taken without wheat, but at the same time, may I say that this board that is set up will be taking into consideration what is happening in regard to wheat. That is, while they do not control, still, all the facts in relation to wheat will have to be kept in their proper relation to the provinces in which wheat is grown, and in relation to the farm income of Canada. All that will have to be kept on the records of the board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To give effect to a levelling of farm income, to balance things.

Mr. GARDINER: I will give something relating to that in a moment.

Mr. WRIGHT: Why does the government not place wheat under the control of this board?

Mr. GARDINER: That is an old story that dates back to 1897 and I would not care to review it all. We passed a grain act known as the Canada Grain Act, which had its origin in the discussions that took place around the beginning of the century. The bill was introduced in 1901 and was passed in that year, known as the Canada Grain Act, and it was placed under the administration of the Department of Trade and Commerce. It has been under that administration ever since, and under that administration there was, before this war started at all, a board which was doing or attempting to do in effect some of the things which this board may do now. That is to say, they had a floor price, a pegged price or advance payment set, and if wheat went to the wheat board the farmer would receive that minimum price no matter what the price was on the market, and he also had the advantages of participation.

Mr. WRIGHT: Why are not other grains under this board?

Mr. GARDINER: Some years ago it was provided in the act as originally drawn, the wheat board act, that they might handle oats and barley, but that was removed from the act a few years later.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is the minister proposing to have other grains under these boards that he is now setting up?

Mr. GARDINER: In practice what we would do would be this. If the government did find it necessary to put floors under oats and barley after the war, the administration in that connection, the commodity board appointed, would be the wheat board. That would be the natural thing to do.

Mr. WRIGHT: And these boards that the minister is now proposing—

Mr. GARDINER: I wish the hon. member would allow me to finish the statement I am making. He can ask questions afterwards in committee. I would like to get on the record the system as it is intended to operate, and afterwards hon. members can ask any questions they like. I have reviewed shortly the facts which are on this sheet with regard to the gross cash income from farm products but I would call attention to the lower part of the table, which should be published along with the other, which gives the index number, receipts from the sale of farm products, 1926-29 being 100, and it gives the percentage figures. These again are given by provinces and it will be found that for example in the province of Saskatchewan, which produces a greater percentage of grain in relation to all its farm products than any other province, the figure for 1926 is 103, and the figure for 1932, the low year, is 27·5. The figure for 1939, the last year before the war, is 56 and the figure for 1943, which is the last year for which I have figures, is 110·3. In other words, it is back to a little higher level than in 1926. But when you read the table either way from that, you find that is the low point for all the provinces in Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Which is?

Mr. GARDINER: Saskatchewan. That is the low figure. If you go west from Saskatchewan, you find that Alberta is 124·4, which is the second lowest; British Columbia 190·3; and as you go east from Saskatchewan you find that Manitoba is 167; Ontario is 149·5 and Quebec 199·3. You note that the poor crop of last year did seriously affect the province of Ontario. New Brunswick, you find, is 247, Nova Scotia 205 and Prince Edward Island 190·9. That will give some idea of what the relationships are. But while the increase in the first six months of this year of cash income was 25 per cent for all Canada—I understand that the figures are not yet available finally—for western Canada, speaking from memory the figures for Saskatchewan show over 60 per cent of an increase this year as compared with the first six months of last year. That has some relationship to the statement made by the member for Yorkton, namely, that much of our grain, even grain not grown in 1943, was delivered in the early part of this year as a result of the increased quotas. The increase in the west is greater than it was in the other parts of Canada, so that this year our index figure for Saskatchewan and Alberta should be considerably higher than it was in any of the preceding years as compared with the other provinces, and we believe it will be reasonably comparable with those figures during that time.

I recite these figures in order to emphasize one or two points. The first is that we have production variations affecting income and we have price variations affecting income. The production variations are greatest in connection with cereals or grain crops, as has been emphasized by questions that have been asked. The meat variations run in cycles. It takes about three years to increase or decrease the cattle population and about a year and a half to increase or decrease the hog population, and therefore the meat figures or variations in quantity run in cycles. Dairy products are more constant than any others. If one checks the different provinces and finds that the index figures are fairly consant, one can attribute it to the fact that certain of these farm products are produced in a certain area and others such as grain in other areas where there are greater variations. There is another variation that is to be considered in the figures compiled and that is the price variations, and that leads me to say that not only will it be necessary to stabilize prices as between the war period and the post-war period, but it will be, as it has been, necessary to stabilize prices seasonally. That is to say, taking dairy products, butter is produced in the summer months, and so is cheese. It is carried over in storage in the winter months. The consumption is just as high in one part of the year as in another. As a result of that there has been a great deal of speculation by those who have had to store their products in one part of the year and carry them over into another part of the year. Under this bill it is hoped that it will be possible to level out these prices and to stabilize them on some fair level which will make it possible for, let us say, the commodity board handling dairy products to take control of the storages of butter during the months of May, June and July and to carry those storages over into the winter months, and thus have some control over the prices during those periods in case the trade is not prepared to do so on a basis of fair price levels.

That is all I wish to say with regard to the variations in prices. But there is one thing which I think should be dealt with at this stage, and it is the fact that when the war is over we are going to be negotiating with other people for the markets that are going to be necessary to the marketing of our farm products at any prices—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the export trade.

Mr. GARDINER: That is the export trade. I suppose some critics of the present plan would suggest that we may be setting up something to which other countries will object, namely, two price levels, one for our own people and one for the people we are to trade with. In other words, when we have great surpluses here we may sell them cheaper some place else than the price at which we sell them in Canada. I would just like to say in regard to that that we would have a lot of very good company if we did that. Australia and New Zealand were doing that before the war started. The United States did it for a year or two before the war started. One of the chief reasons why we had such low prices on grains particularly was the fact there were great surpluses in the United States and they were prepared to sell them to some other countries at very much lower prices than those at which we could produce wheat. Therefore I call attention to the fact that there may be criticism to the effect that if we went too far in the direction of controlling we might find more difficulty in dealing with others. All the facts in relation to that will again be collected by this board, and will be available to the government to be placed before others when we are negotiating any such contracts or entering into any arrangements as to the exchange of our agricultural products after the war.

I should like to say that there have been a number of announcements made all foretelling this particular legislation. It is not something that has been rushed into the house without the public knowing it was coming. We have not left the public in the dark as to whether we were going to have it or not. There was considerable discussion on the floor of this house from time to time with regard to measures of this kind, and since that is on the record I am not going to attempt to place it there again; but I shall call attention to what has taken place recently with regard to matters of this kind.

There was a convention held in Ottawa—a Liberal convention, incidentally—on September 27 and 28 of last year. That convention placed before the government their views with regard to a number of matters. Among other things they said this:

> We advocate a policy under which Canada will (h) provide security for farmers and fishermen by safeguarding against inflation now and by guaranteeing minimum prices for their products against collapse of prices after the war.

That recommendation was made to the government and was considered by the government. Speaking at London, Ontario, on October 15, I made this statement as Minister of Agriculture when speaking to a group of people, representatives of agriculture in that area, got together by the Kiwanis club, as reported in the Windsor Star of October 16:

> In placing ceilings upon products, with limited subsidies now, the government is assuming responsibility to maintain floors until this country is reestablished after the war. The government owes this to the farmers who have maintained production under ceilings, and also owes it to the men and women who will return from the services to the farms.

On December 2, 1943, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), speaking over the radio said:

> As an essential part of its post-war policy the government intends to ask parliament, at the next session, to place a floor under the prices of the main farm products.

In the speech from the throne this statement was made:

> To ensure economic stability for agriculture, you will be asked to make provision for a price floor for staple farm products.

The bill which is based upon all of these statements is the bill which is now before the house, and I submit it to the house, Mr. Speaker, for second reading, with the suggestion that in the committee stage I shall be prepared to answer any questions I can that may be asked by different members of the committee.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): The minister has given us a lot of information and a very complete statement, so to speak. I wish we had had that statement on the resolution stage. It would have been much easier for us to make our few comments at this time if we had had the figures before us and an opportunity to review them.

The minister has referred to a period mentioned in the title of the bill, the transition period from war to peace. I was going to say that I was not satisfied with the provision with respect to that period because I think the bill should come into force at once. I feel that this board, having had the time to consider all these matters that have been mentioned this session, should be able to operate right away. As I see it, there are actually three periods, the period of the war, the transition period, and the peace-time period, and at the end of that period the section of the bill which brings it into force could contain a paragraph to terminate its operations when that period is over. The operations of this board should commence right away. This war, we regret to say, is not ended, and it will be some time before we reach the transition period.

The minister gave us comparisons of prices during the last war, at the end of the war and in the last year of the war, and then the periods following. The figures were all very interesting, but I would say that he is making a comparison with periods that are not comparable. In a great many respects this war is not at all comparable with the last war. It is not comparable with respect to marketing, and I do not think it will be comparable with the last war with respect to the transition period. Marketing conditions of this war have not so far been comparable with marketing conditions of the last war.

The minister gave us figures with respect to oats, barley and live stock. I am not going to deal with them now, because he read them quite rapidly and it was difficult to take them down as they were given. The barley figures were most interesting, and the wheat figures would have been interesting also, but the minister did not go into that question. But in making these comparisons between prices in 1918 and in 1930 I should like to know what the minister was trying to prove.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the hon. member like an answer now?

Mr. PERLEY: I should like to know also whether the minister will forecast what will happen in the twelve years following this war. He made a comparison between 1918 and 1930, a period of twelve years. What does he forecast will take place with respect to prices between the time this war ends and 1956? It would be interesting if the minister would tell us that.

Mr. GARDINER: I stated my reason when I gave the figures; it was in order to show that it would be impossible to have this bill run for a stated number of years, because the real drop in prices after the last war did not come until 1931. That was true not only in this country but in all other countries.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What does that prove?

Mr. GARDINER: It proves that you cannot say this legislation should last for only three years or only five years. It must be left to the government of the day to determine how long it should be retained. We are not attempting to say now that this legislation will be retained for only three years or five years or any definite period. For the same reason I would not try to prophesy what will happen between now and 1956. We are setting up this board to keep track of what happens.

Mr. PERLEY: That is what I wanted the minister to admit, because I think he was trying to suggest that the previous government was more or less responsible for prices in 1930.

Mr. GARDINER: No. If I had wished to make that suggestion I would have said so. My hon. friend is emphasizing the fact. I did not blame that upon the government, and did not suggest it. I have sent to my office for as many copies of these tables as are available. They are in print; anyone could have them in the same way that I received them. I have put them on record every session since I have been here. Hon. members may see the figures for themselves.

Mr. PERLEY: I just wanted to bring that point to the attention of the house. The government of that period has been greatly criticized in connection with the low prices of farm products, and I have always contended that the government was not responsible, that it was during the years prior to 1930 that conditions arose which brought about that situation. The depression and the low prices did not occur only in Canada; they were all over the world. I just wanted to make that comment in passing.

The minister has said the board will consist of three members, with a permanent chairman. I am quite in agreement with that; we must have a board consisting of at least three. He referred also to the advisory committee, on which he said there would be proper representation. He also pointed out that it would be impossible to have the producers of all commodities represented, and I am in agreement with him there. But I would express the hope that this advisory committee will function more successfully than the advisory committee to the wheat board. In that case we have three members constituting the wheat board, who do not take the advice of the advisory committee. In the present instance the minister says there are to be twelve members of the advisory committee, which is a fairly large number. I hope he will see that the producers of western Canada are properly represented. The board is to consist of two officials, with a permanent chairman. We are not told who is to be the chairman, but some people have surmised who he may be, and if the gentleman I have in mind is appointed I think he can do a good job. I do hope, however, this board will take the advice of the advisory committee. Just in passing, in reading over the bill I see the minister has retained almost complete control himself.

The minister dealt with the question of export trade after the war, and at that point referred to the fact that while this bill was forecast in the speech from the throne in January, a Liberal convention was held in this city last fall at which certain suggestions were made to the government. I believe the minister is trying to take a little credit for the fact that the government has accepted some of those suggestions and is putting them in the form of legislation.

Mr. WARD: Are you opposed to the bill?

Mr. PERLEY: Not at all. If the hon. member will just keep quiet I will tell him my position. I should like to remind the minister that in December of 1942 a convention was held in the city of Winnipeg at which a policy was drawn up dealing among other things with agriculture. If he will look over that policy he will discover that it contains many suggestions which under this legislation the board will have power to carry into effect.

Mr. GARDINER: That is what the Conservative party always do; they finally advocate what the Liberals who bring in these things have been advocating.

Mr. PERLEY: Then the minister will admit that a year before the Liberals met in Ottawa the Conservatives drew up a programme containing nine or ten proposals with respect to agriculture. I commend that policy to the minister, for it also advocates the setting up of a board such as this. That policy will be put into force at the first opportunity, which may come sooner than many of us think. The first item of that agricultural policy is:

> To consult and enlist the assistance of agricultural interests in formulating and putting into effect policies for the promotion of the welfare of agriculture;

That might cover the advisory committee. The next recommendation is that farm prices be maintained which will give farmers a monetary return bearing a fair relationship to the cost of production.

The minister went on to speak of the increased return to the farmers in recent years. There is no particular point to be made there. We have had a war on; the prices of farm products all over the world have been increased, and it is only natural that the incomes of our farmers should have increased considerably in the last year or two. If the minister had accepted the proposals I made on the floor of this house in 1938 we would have had increased returns ever since. Last fall he raised the price of wheat to $1.25. I am not objecting to that; I think it was the right thing to do, but it should have been done a long time ago and the price might have been raised even more.

Coming back to the Progressive Conservative agricultural policy, the next recommendation is:

To promote the efficiency of Canadian agriculture by a comprehensive programme of conservation—

And so on. And again:

To give primary producers adequate representation on all boards set up to market farm products.

That is what we have here, a board to market our products, and we have said that the farmers should have proper representation on it. Again:

To encourage farmers' organizations for co-operative effort in marketing farm products and in the purchase of supplies and obtaining of credit.

So it will be seen that this convention, held a year before the Liberal convention, advocated practically everything the minister suggested or read into the record.

Mr. HENDERSON: We had a Liberal convention in Saskatchewan the year before that suggested these things.

Mr. PERLEY: I am glad the hon. member mentioned that.

Mr. GRAYDON: And we had an election in Saskatchewan a few days ago.

An hon. MEMBER: Were you there?

Mr. PERLEY: I am glad that was mentioned, because while they had a Liberal convention out there which favoured this programme, this government paid no attention to it.

Mr. HENDERSON: And what did your government do about your proposals in 1932?

Mr. GRAYDON: Are these people rising to points of order?

Mr. GOLDING: What about yourself?

Mr. GRAYDON: And you, too.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. PERLEY: Oh, I do not mind the interruptions, so long as they are just talking among themselves.

Coming back to the point I was making, we should have had this measure two or three months ago. It should be in operation now, for the months of July, August and September are important months in connection with the marketing of the grain and live stock products in western Canada. The farmer should have this information; he should know all about it before he starts to market in August.

The minister made it clear, as also does the bill, that wheat does not come under this measure, but that coarse grains may. At the present time operations in connection with coarse grains are under the control of the wheat board. This measure sets up another board and, as I have said, if it is properly organized and operated it may be of great benefit. But in my view it should be set up; and we should have the assurance of certain prices for farm products over a given period, and that period should begin right from this date.

Under the measure the minister has wide powers. I shall not take time now to discuss the details of the bill, but if hon. members will look at it they will find that the decisions of the board have to have the approval of the governor in council—and that is really the minister—from time to time. In this connection I would direct the attention of the house particularly to paragraphs (a), (c), (e) and (f) of section 9, which set out the powers the board is to have. Not only is it to buy, sell and control production, but under paragraph (e) it has power to package, process, store, ship, transport, export or insure any agricultural product.

In my view it should have more control over processing in packing plants. If that is not done, this measure may develop into what may be described as a measure to establish floor prices for packers. If there is not more control over packers than there is at the present time, that may be the development. There may be a certain amount of juggling, but what we want to know and what we want to have is a definite price for a definite period of time. I can well understand that between spring and fall months there might be changes in prices of farm products. But at least a fair price could be set on practically every product of western Canada.

As I have said, this measure could prove to be just the setting up of another board; on the other hand it could be made worth while, and with that end in view I trust there may be proper representation from the producers on the advisory committee.

I have referred to the policy set out in Winnipeg in December, 1942, and I suggest that the minister would do well to look over that policy. On many occasions from the floor of this chamber I have suggested a policy of floor prices on farm products of all kinds, particularly grains. If hon. members will review what I said, even as far back as 1938, they will see that that was my stand at that time.

In conclusion I would say—because I think we would do well to get on with the bill and discuss the sections—that agricultural products are the basis of an expanding national economy. In my view the principle of this bill is right; we must preserve farm prices and see that those prices are maintained at certain standards.

Prices of grain and live stock form a more logical base for the standard of living of all people in Canada than do any other products in any other industry. Therefore, as the minister has said, this measure which sets up a board, the operations of which will be similar to those of the wheat board or the grain commission, is an important one. I wish that contained within the bill there were powers to control processing in packing plants, so that the measure will not result in the establishment of floor prices for packers. It would be my hope that it would result in setting up proper prices for live stock and grain throughout the year.

As I said at the outset, we would have been pleased to have at an earlier stage the figures the minister placed on Hansard. However when the bill comes before the committee we shall have seen them, and at that time we shall have further questions to ask.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, this is another bill which like that providing family allowances, will receive the support of most hon. members. We may feel that certain sections of the bill, or certain methods to be used as set out therein, are not as we might wish to have them. Nevertheless I think all groups in the house will support the principle behind the measure. It is my understanding that that principle is the stabilization of prices on agricultural products. As the minister has shown in the figures he has given the house, there have been tremendous fluctuations in those prices, not only as between different periods, but as between different seasons. I believe that has been brought about, as the minister has said, by differences in production from year to year caused by weather conditions. As everyone knows, we do not control the weather; when a farmer sows he is never sure he will reap. He may reap a good harvest or may reap a very poor one.

Food requirements throughout the world remain fairly constant. They increase in ratio to the improvement in nutritional standards in various countries.

In my view this bill for the stabilization of the prices of farm products is absolutely sound. One feature I do not like in it is that apparently the minister has limited its time of operation to the period of transition between war and peace.

Mr. GARDINER: I did the very opposite. I pointed out that it could not be limited.

Mr. WRIGHT: Well, the title of the bill would leave the impression I have indicated—"an act for the support of the prices of agricultural products during the transition from war to peace." That is a poor title, and I suggest it would have been much better had it been entitled; an act for the maintenance of fair prices for agricultural products. Probably it was the minister's intention that that should be the purpose of the bill, but such purpose certainly is not reflected in its title. Neither is it shown in the last section, which states:

> Section 9 of this act shall come into force on a date to be fixed, and remain in force for such period as may be determined, by proclamation of the governor in council published in the Canada Gazette.

Apparently the government may at any time, simply by passing an order in council, wipe out this measure which we propose to put on the statute book at this session of parliament. I do not like that feature of the bill. In my view when the bill becomes law it should remain in force until such time as parliament decides it should be taken from the statute book. For these reasons I think the minister has not given himself a fair deal, so far as the title of the bill and the section to which I referred are concerned.

The minister has stated that this policy was adopted by the Liberal party, and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle has stated that it was accepted by the Progressive Conservative party. They both gave the times at which it had been adopted by their parties. I should like to read into the record evidence to show that this policy was adopted by the party for which I stand, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. It appears in the Regina manifesto issued when the party was first organized in 1932.

Mr. WARD: Is that the manifesto repudiated the other night by the hon. member?

Mr. WRIGHT: No. I never repudiated the Regina manifesto, nor has it been repudiated by any member of this group at any time or at any place in Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: It just proves that you are all becoming Liberals.

Mr. WRIGHT: The manifesto reads:

Encouragement of producers' and consumers' cooperatives; the restoration and maintenance of an equitable relationship between prices of agricultural products and those of other commodities and services; and improving the efficiency of export trade in farm products.

And later on:

The substitution for the present system of foreign trade, of a system of import and export boards to improve the efficiency of overseas marketing, to control prices, and to integrate the foreign trade policy with the requirements of the national economic plan.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is pretty general; you could drive a coach and four through that.

Mr. WRIGHT: It is not any more general than this bill. Section 9, subsection 1, paragraph (g) reads:

to purchase at market or contract prices and export any agricultural product under any contract between His Majesty in right of Canada and any other government or agency thereof and to do all things necessarily incidental thereto;

I think the principle of export boards for agricultural products is a sound one. It is a principle which will have to be followed if we are to stabilize the prices of agricultural products not only in Canada but throughout the world. As the minister has stated, there have been tremendous fluctuations. These fluctuations have been caused not only by differences in production from year to year but by the results of speculative marketing. When there has been a surplus in a certain season of the year or in certain years these speculators have been able to come in and buy up the surplus at low prices, which forces down the prices, store or process it and then reap the reward later on. I think the government should endeavour to have this board take the place of the speculative markets which have formerly controlled the prices of agricultural products. That should be one of the objectives of this board.

The minister has stated that the board is to consist of three members. He says that he proposes to appoint a chairman immediately and to have two men from the department assist him until the board starts to function. The board in the meantime is to gather statistics. I agree with the minister so far as the immediate appointment of a chairman is concerned, but I believe the other two members should also be appointed immediately. One of these should represent the consumers of Canada and the other the producers. There should be a secretariat set up to gather these facts and figures and place them not only before the chairman of the board but before the consumers and the producers of the country through their representatives. I think the board would be more efficient if that were done than simply to appoint a permanent chairman at this time and appoint the other two members temporarily.

The commodity boards to be set up under this legislation should be controlled by the producers, by the cooperatives which have been set up in various sections. I realize that agriculture is perhaps not sufficiently well organized to be able to appoint all the commodity boards, but it is well enough organized to appoint a great many of them. With proper encouragement and education by the government, these cooperative organizations should handle this phase of the matter for the government. I make this suggestion because I think it is important that these commodity boards should be representative of the producers of Canada. They can be representative of the producers of Canada only if the producers are prepared to get together and organize their own cooperatives. I suggest what I have suggested before, that this be taken into consideration and where cooperative organizations exist, and they do in some cases, they should be used as the commodity boards to handle particular products.

As the minister has stated, the necessity for this bill is due largely to the fact that we have had ceiling prices. The figures placed on the record by the minister show quite clearly that during the last war and eighteen months thereafter, when there were no ceiling prices, the prices of agricultural products rose much higher than they were allowed to rise during this war. Because ceiling prices have been placed on agricultural production it is only fair that there should be floor prices during the transition period.

We all know that when price ceilings were first established in 1941 the ceiling prices of agricultural products were too low. It was only after organized agriculture had made representations to the government time and time again that the ceiling prices were raised to a point where they were on a par with other ceiling prices. Therefore agriculture has something coming to it because of the ceiling prices established in 1941. If this legislation is used properly it should take into consideration some of the differences which existed in the early years of the war.

I do not think this board will be able to operate successfully if we continue to permit speculative markets in Canada. It is only by taking the selling of agricultural products from the speculative markets that we can hope to have the board operate successfully. In one section of the act it is provided that the board may set prescribed prices for agricultural products and may pay to the producers the difference between those prescribed prices and the average prices at which products may have sold during a given period of time. That may mean a different floor price to different people who are selling a particular product.

Mr. WEIR: A different price?

Mr. GARDINER: Depending on where they are living.

Mr. WRIGHT: Depending upon when they sell and where they are living. Take peas in eastern Ontario as an example. When they go to the market in the fall, let us say, they sell for $2 per bushel. Later on they may go to $4 per bushel and the government may prescribe a price which they consider to be fair of $3.50 per bushel. They will take the average price between $2 and $4 and pay to the producer the difference between the prescribed price and the average price, and some producers who have sold these peas for the prescribed price will receive that difference. That is just an illustration. I do not think the act can work in a speculative market. It is only when commodity boards or cooperatives have control of their own product and pay the average price for the whole season that a government board can operate equitably to all who are producing that particular product.

There are other sections of the bill which I believe should be amended, and we of this group propose to move certain amendments as the sections are reached.

With regard to the export of agricultural products, I understand that this board is to take the surplus off the market and that it may export the surplus to any part of the world where it can find a market. The fund that is to be set up will therefore be a fund which will to a certain extent be used to subsidize the export of the surplus products, I am wondering whether it will be used to subsidize not only their export, but also the home market as between different seasons of the year.

A great many questions arise in one's mind as one reads the bill. The bill may mean very much or it may mean very little. Whether it will be successful or not depends entirely on the attitude of the government which may be putting the act into force. I would suggest that in the past the old-line parties in this house have not been any too favourable in their attitude towards agriculture. Otherwise we would not have found agriculture in the position in which it was when the war started. Agriculture was the lowest paid group in the Canadian economy when the war broke out, and nobody denies that. It has only been within the last two years that our farmers, largely through the efforts of their own organizations, have been able to force this government to raise the prices of agricultural products to a point where they are anywhere near to being on an equitable footing with the other economic groups in this country. I suggest that the people of this country take that into consideration so that when they are given an opportunity they take care to see that a government is put into power which will express their viewpoint and see that this act is sympathetically considered and given a sympathetic administration.

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton): Mr. Speaker, the measure we are now discussing is a bill to secure floor prices for farmers during the transition period after the war. While I am not a farmer, I have lived in a farming community all my life and I believe I know quite a bit of the farm problem. I wish to direct the attention of the house in its consideration of this measure to one part of the farm problem which this measure does not directly touch upon, and which is that the over-all picture of the return to the farmer is not directly covered, nor is it intended to be covered, by this measure.

As I understand the measure as it has been explained by the minister, its purpose is to take care of the extraordinary conditions which will arise as to prices of individual farm products in the immediate post-war period, and it does not deal directly with the general farm picture. I want to say at once that the farmers of my riding with whom I have been in contact have been very greatly encouraged by a measure of this kind being introduced in the house because my farmers believe that it indicates that in the future scientific weapons or measures are to be used in facing up to the farm problem. I should like to express the hope that this bill when enacted will work so satisfactorily that we shall carry its principles into our peace-time economy, using it as a permanent instrument or weapon to see that agriculture will secure its fair share of the national income.

I do not want to be considered as a crepe hanger, but to my personal knowledge, looking back over the past forty years, the position of agriculture has been steadily deteriorating until it has now reached the point where you can buy a 100-acre or 200-acre farm in my riding for what it would cost to put up the present buildings on the farm. Less than ten per cent of the farmers in my riding can afford to employ a hired man. Life therefore on the farm has been reduced to what is practically drudgery. We all know that the live stock on the farm have to be fed and watered three times daily. The farmer without a hired man cannot go off with his wife for a holiday for a day or two or anything of that sort. One of them must remain on the farm to look after the chores.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Somebody has to milk the cows. It has been that way since Adam and Eve.

Mr. CLEAVER: Right you are, but my point is that there is no hired man on the farm to take his turn under present conditions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He would not stay there to-day anyway, unless you chained him.

Mr. CLEAVER: I have a suggestion that might keep him there, but I will come back to that.

In addition to the drudgery of farm life as it now is in Ontario—I am speaking only for the part of the province in which I live—we find that the buildings and the fences on the farm are badly out of repair, not because the farmer wants them that way but because he cannot afford to repair them and cannot hire the help to repair them. The weeds are not pulled out when they should be; the fences get out of repair. Drive through Ontario to-day and compare it with what it was forty years ago.

I think that all parties in this house agree that agriculture in Canada generally is in a depressed condition. I believe that there must be a fundamental and continuing and persistent reason why this is so. I suggest the reason is that through the years we have extended protection to industry even during the course of low tariff governments. We have extended protection to industry which has brought about this disparity, with its inequalities, between the income received by agriculture and the income received by the rest of the people. I would like to put on the record, if I may, a statement I have received from the bureau of statistics.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house.

Mr. CLEAVER: Perhaps I should give an outline of the information contained in the statement before asking the consent of the house to put it on. I take the last fifteen years from 1929 to 1943 inclusive. In the first column is given the net farm income, the income originating in agriculture; in the next column the total national income of Canada; in the third column the percentage which the net farm income bears to the total national income of Canada. May I have leave of the house to table this statement without reading it.

	Income originating in agriculture (millions)	Total national income of Canada (millions)	Percentage which farm income bears to total
1929.....	$ 868	$5,273	16
1930.....	575	4,452	13
1931.....	377	3,580	10

Average of 15 years—13·8 per cent

Hon. members looking over this statement will notice, taking the whole fifteen years and adding them up, that the average net income received by Canadian agriculture, though it represents something over thirty per cent of the people employed in Canada, is 13·8 per cent; 13·8 per cent of the national income goes to something over thirty per cent of the workers. I agree at once that you must add to those figures the income in kind which the farmer and his family receive from the farm. He has a part of his living from the farm, and I have obtained from the bureau of statistics the figures with regard to that item. I will not trouble the house to give them all, because I understand that these figures may now be under revision. I have the figures from the bureau from 1929 to 1940 inclusive and they total $1,165·1 million or an average of $150 million a year. When you add that figure to the net farm income which I have already given you will find it brings up the net farm income figure to a point where it is still grossly below the share which this group in our economy should receive.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You should also deduct the depreciation.

Mr. CLEAVER: I am coming to that. I think I know what the hon. gentleman's suggestion is. There is also one other item which should be deducted, not added, when you take the net farm income figure, and that is the figure of wages paid to hired men where they are able to employ them. The bureau tells me that in figuring net farm income it is not net to the farmer, because included in that income is the wage to the hired man. I am told that a statement is now being prepared by the bureau and will be released soon showing the really net farm income figures. I hesitate to put the gross farm income on the record, because it would be only misleading, since the gross farm income includes all costs of production, out-of-pocket costs of production such as taxes, interest on mortgages to corporations, seed and feed, oil and fuel, repairs to equipment, binder twine, fertilizer, spray material, and the thousand and one other costs that are involved. I am pleased to learn that at long last a study is being made of the problem by the bureau and we are to have actual net figures, because I think they will conclusively prove the statement which I made a few moments ago, that Canadian agriculture is not to-day and has not been through the years, irrespective of what government has been in office, receiving its fair share of the national income.

It is only fair that I should comment on the fact that the lot of Canadian agriculture has of course gone up and down depending upon governments, depending upon crops, depending upon world conditions, depending upon trade agreements and tariff barriers. If you will turn to the years 1930 to 1934 inclusive, you will find in this five-year period that while it is true the world was going through a serious depression, it is also true that the government of that day had an unfortunate trade policy.

Mr. MacNICOL: Only in your opinion.

Mr. CLEAVER: I am trying to be frank and to place the facts before the house, and if there is anything wrong with any of my figures I shall be glad to have them corrected. It is only my opinion plus the opinion I have formed during the discussion of this distressing problem with hundreds of my farmer electors. However, if you will take the five-year period from 1930 to 1934 you will find that the average farm income was only $402 million, to at least 30 per cent of the workers of the country. Then if you take the four-year period from 1935 until the outbreak of the war, you will find that during that period there was a very sharp change in our tariff policy. Trade agreements were negotiated, trade started to flow again, and the farmers immediately began to receive the benefit of it, so that during those four years the average farm income increased from $402 million to $600 million. I say that $600 million is not good enough.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair, I wonder if it might be possible for you to consider releasing eight or ten of these page boys on Saturday afternoon in view of the heavy week they have had and the late hours they are compelled to remain here.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have made arrangements.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. CLEAVER: When the house rose at one o'clock I was calling attention to the fact that farm income had dropped very sharply from $868,000,000 in 1927 to less than $300,000,000 in 1932. I should like also to call attention to the fact that the statement which I have already tabled shows that not only did agricultural income drop sharply with all other incomes in the country, but agriculture took a much more severe loss than did other industries of Canada, because the percentage of agricultural income to the total income in Canada in 1929 was sixteen per cent and in 1932 it had dropped to ten per cent.

In my community at one time farming was very prosperous. Our farmers built fine houses and barns. Our farmers were well to do and were able to set up their sons, when they came of age and married, on other farms. But unfortunately that condition has passed, and as I have said once or twice already, agriculture through the years has been steadily and seriously deteriorating. I agree that in time of war it is right to prevent the spiral of inflation which occurred in the last war and which would have been ruinous to our present war effort had it not been controlled; but having done that I do suggest, sir, that this is the logical time, the opportune time, for us to take advantage of the lessons we have learned from war financing, to take advantage of the weapons we have forged out of the necessities of war, to correct this serious inequality.

We all know that productivity in Canada, both industrial and agricultural, has increased very materially as a result of the war. I think that all economists now agree that if any country is to be permanently prosperous through the years the standard of living of the people must be high enough to consume the goods which are produced in the country, plus the imports which are received from exportable surpluses. I believe that to be fundamental. Therefore if this country is to be permanently prosperous in the post-war years we have no option, we simply must raise the standard of living of agriculture to parity with the standard of living of the other groups in this country in order that agriculture may be able to purchase its just share of this country's tremendous production.

As I view the bill now before us it is a scientific measure designed to meet our immediate post-war problems in agriculture. I should like to see it continued as a permanent measure to assure parity to agriculture. Agriculture is quite content to share depression years and prosperous years with other groups in this country, but I do not think it is fair that agriculture should be asked to bear the most serious part of a depression when it comes and then not participate fairly in the prosperous years. We all agree that the problem is there. My suggestion is that we should use the material which we have available to determine just what that problem is. We should compute the proper share of the national income which agriculture should receive annually and then we should set about in a scientific way to see that agriculture does receive annually its fair share of the national income.

As we move toward the end of this war and as we look forward to the post-war period we have not hesitated to profit by the lessons which the war has taught us in other regards. The measure which was passed by this house yesterday to provide for family allowances is to me one of the most heartening things that we have done. In that instance we have not hesitated to profit by the lessons of the past years and to look forward to the future with courage and initiative. We have not hesitated to bring forward an instrument which we hope will bring about the results that we desire. I should like to urge that we use the same courage and initiative in regard to the restoration of agricluture in this country to its proper position with respect to the income of the other groups. I shall go farther and say if agriculture should be restored to that position it would employ at least five hundred thousand of the men from the armed forces and of the men and women now in war-time employment who will be seeking employment when the war is over. Do not think for a moment that the farmer does without a hired man because he wants to. A man carrying on mixed farming in Ontario without the help of a hired man is, as I said a few minutes ago, living a life of drudgery. It is a seven-day week job three hundred and sixty-five days of the year. Just as soon as the Canadian farmer has sufficient income with which to employ a hired man he is going to have one. Some hon. members ask me how he would keep him. Well, I have a suggestion to make in that regard. I think that every hundred-acre farm in this province—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How would he keep him home on Sundays to do the milking?

Mr. CLEAVER: Well, I think the present system, where the odd farmer has a hired man, is a fair one. The hired man is home one Sunday and the farmer is home the next Sunday. They alternate. My suggestion is this. Every farm in Ontario should have a second house on it just as good as the one that is now there. In the early years of married life while the children are young that house could be occupied by the hired man. There would be no difficulty in getting the proper type of hired man on the farm if his wife and family had a good house in which to live. Then as the children grow up and the eldest boy marries he wants a home of his own. That son of the farmer will then live in the second house. I can look back forty years. I well remember forty years ago that wheat and other grains sold at practically the same price as wheat and other grains were bringing in 1939. There has been no substantial change in the selling price of grain in that forty years. But look at the cost of hired help; it has gone up at least three hundred per cent. Look at the cost of farm implements and the cost of everything that the farmer has to buy. All these things have at least doubled and in many instances trebled. The return to the farmer from his basic products has not improved to anything like the same extent. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I urge that we scientifically determine the proper share of the national income that agriculture should receive, and then by way of subsidy, floor prices or in some other way, we should assure to agriculture annually just that amount.

A word in regard to export trade. I have had the thought advanced to me by farmers in my riding many times that in the past we have made mistakes. We have exported grain to other countries at less than the cost of production here, and in that way have permitted other countries to produce finished food products such as bacon to be sold in competition with our own bacon in the markets of the world. My farmers do not approve of that; they think that in future as far as may be humanly possible Canada should export only finished products such as flour, pork, beef, cheese and the like.

I have one word to say to our Minister of Agriculture before closing. When war came in 1939 it was only natural that farmers living in this country who had been farming during the period of the last war should anticipate that they would make very substantial profits out of this war. During the early thirties our farmers took extremely heavy losses, and when war came they thought they would have an opportunity of making good those losses by substantial profits during the present war period. It was only human nature that they should arrive at that conclusion. But this country decided upon an all-out war effort, and the necessities of that war effort precluded anything of this nature taking place. During the last war Canada's main contribution was the men in our armed forces. We did have substantial war production, but it was limited as to type, and any surplus we produced in this country was sold at a profit. When war broke out in 1939 the Canadian people decided that this time we would have an all-out effort; this time we were to mobilize wealth as well as man-power, and that has been done. Our production has not been confined to shells and foodstuffs. We have built and equipped a Canadian navy and a Canadian air force. We have produced not only shells for our army but practically a full range of modern army equipment; tanks, planes, guns and the like. This time we have given to our allies, under mutual aid, all our surplus production. When we planned an all-out war effort it necessarily followed that prices had to be controlled if we were to avoid a spiral of inflation which would be ruinous to that effort. So that instead of allowing agricultural prices to rise as they did in the previous war we have controlled prices, and by the payment of subsidies have tried to give our farmers reasonable prices, and only reasonable prices for their products. But we have treated everyone alike; we have done the same to industry. We have restricted the profits of industry through the excess profits tax. We do not tax the excess profits; we take them all, and that is as it should be.

As a result of the fact that the farmers were denied the prices they expected they would have, some of them in my part of the country are blaming the Minister of Agriculture for letting them down. Nothing could be further from the truth, and nothing could be more unfair. Then, too, some people in Ontario are criticizing the minister because they say he represents western Canada and does not understand the problems of Ontario and eastern Canada. Once again I say nothing could be further from the truth and nothing could be more unfair. It is true that the minister represents a western riding and that for many years he was premier of Saskatchewan, but it is equally true that he was born and brought up in Ontario, and that he is operating a farm in this province. I do not think we could find anywhere in this country a man more conversant with all branches and details of agriculture across the entire country than the present Minister of Agriculture. Fortunately, however, I do not need to rely upon my own opinion; the facts speak for themselves. Notwithstanding the fact that we have recruited something over 500,000 men from agriculture for our armed forces and war industries, our agricultural production since the outbreak of war has gone up and up until to-day it is more than fifty per cent greater than before the war.

As to the charge of favouritism to western Canada, I should like to cite one instance of which I have personal knowledge. As hon. members know, the fruit and vegetable industry has special problems of its own. In this instance I know the facts, because I live in the centre of a fruit and vegetable producing district, and I want to tell the house that the fruit and vegetable growers in my district are truly prosperous to-day. I admit at once that they are well organized, and that from time to time they have given the minister good advice. But that does not detract one whit from the fact that he has taken that advice and that in every instance he has been more than fair to this specialized branch of the industry of agriculture of which I have personal knowledge. It is inevitable that in times of price controls, rationing, and so forth, grievances and emergency conditions should arise from time to time. Individual groups of producers in this country have often been annoyed at the minister and at this government because of some incident that has touched them for the time being. But I would urge that we look at the over-all picture of what this country has done in time of war in the production of foodstuffs; and, looking at that over-all picture, I think we have a right to be very proud of the industry of agriculture in Canada. I think we have a right to be equally proud of our Minister of Agriculture and of the staff which has assisted him to bring about these results in Canadian agriculture. And so I say that so long as the present Minister of Agriculture is in the saddle, to organize that industry properly, I have high hopes for its future.

In the bill before us we have a scientific weapon which will take care of the post-war transition period. I should like to see that measure continue on. I think the rest is up to the producers themselves. Under this bill ample provision has been made for the producers to express their views and to give their advice to the minister and the department.

If the industry organizes and presents to the department the true wishes of the farmers, we can look forward to the future with every confidence. I believe that the farmers themselves can solve many of their problems through self-imposed controls. But I do urge again that in the period following the war we should be bold and courageous in our planning, and take full advantage of the lessons the war has taught us.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with not a little interest to the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. The faith he has expressed in the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is, I fancy, the kind of faith that members of a political party have when a minister makes the kind of remarks he made.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is a lame—

Mr. GRAYDON: Now, I wonder if the official interrupter will kindly keep quiet for a few minutes. I want to bring one or two things to the attention of the house. The first is that I believe the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) perhaps unconsciously expressed a feeling which has been prevalent in his part of Ontario and in other parts of Canada when he attempted in his own way to deal with criticisms which for some considerable time have been directed against government policy. I think however that he did not over-emphasize in any way the criticisms which are abroad—criticisms which I believe any hon. member would be able to describe very freely so far as this government's policy in agriculture is concerned. But when he spoke about the qualifications of the Minister of Agriculture, stating that the minister was a westerner who had been born on an Ontario farm, he unconsciously, again, uttered a small word of recommendation respecting a man in the public life of Canada, who comes within the category my hon. friend has described, a man whom we propose to make the prime minister of this country so that for the first time we would have a farmer prime minister. I refer to the Hon. John Bracken. The qualifications which my hon. friend from Halton unconsciously gave as being very good ones for a man in public life are the ones found in the present national leader of our party.

Mr. MUTCH: He lacks one quality—a seat in the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps you have supported your party so long that you find yourself in a difficult position.

Mr. MUTCH: He was always hard to elect.

[Mr. Cleaver.]

Mr. GRAYDON: In this debate we have heard a good deal about agriculture. There are many farmers throughout Canada to-day —and I think rightly so—who feel that it is time in Canada that we had a farmer prime minister. We are very proud, and perhaps at times we might be given to just a little bit of boasting—because in the midst of what goes on across the way it is not noticed—

Mr. WRIGHT: I would like to ask where he ever farmed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, most of the desk-thumping has been done by lawyers so far as I can see.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): And who is speaking?

Mr. GRAYDON: I would like to be allowed to answer the question, although I know the answer would not be very satisfactory to my hon. friend.

Mr. WRIGHT: I would like—

Mr. GRAYDON: Now you keep quiet. In answer to the hon. member for Melfort, the Hon. John Bracken, unlike so many others who have interrupted from time to time, has never been in any other line of endeavour than agriculture, except while he was premier of Manitoba. John Bracken himself is now an operating farmer in Ontario. He came from an Ontario farm, worked on an Ontario farm, took up farming as a vocation. I fancy there is no one in Canada who has been better schooled in that profession.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): And he will be on the farm a long time, too.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the official interrupter going to have to be silenced again? Because after all there is a limit to usurpation of privileges. Of course he has his eye on the Clerk's job, I know, but for the present I wish he would listen to me.

I would say to the hon. member for Melfort that he has asked a question I am glad to answer. I was hoping someone would give me an opportunity to put upon the record the facts with respect to one man in public life in Canada to-day. He is the man, as I say, thoroughly familiar with farming in Canada—

Mr. WRIGHT: But he never farmed.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I have some order, please?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Why is he not here?

Mr. GRAYDON: The interrupter is busy again.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Why is he not here? Why the remote control?

Mr. GRAYDON: I think I might say that the problem in the future will not be that of having a seat for John Bracken, but that of having a seat for the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, yes? The Prime Minister is here.

Mr. GRAYDON: And let me go further than that. We also hear, through the press, that not only is the Prime Minister in danger, but, as pointed out by the premier of Saskatchewan, the Minister of Agriculture, who has so often been lauded by the hon. member for Halton, will not be here again to represent his present seat at Melville.

Mr. GARDINER: And does my hon. friend accept the evidence of the leader of the government of Saskatchewan?

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, he seemed to be able to take the measure of the present minister a short time ago.

Mr. TUCKER: And what about the Progressive Conservative party?

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say this, in the midst of these stormy interruptions—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Why bring this hash into the debate?

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, is it possible to have order? I have submitted to a good deal of interruption, and while I rather enjoy it, I should like to continue.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is hash.

Mr. GRAYDON: So far as agriculture is concerned, from time to time in this chamber we have heard far too much about rehabilitation and reconstruction of other parts of Canada; we have heard far too much about national endeavour and national enterprise, in comparison with the little about the farming industry in the post-war period. The job of rehabilitation and reconstruction in Canada is not confined to industry alone. It is not confined only to business. I believe I will have support when I say that without prosperity of agriculture in Canada in the post-war period, there cannot be a prosperous Canada. That I believe is one of the prime factors and one of the prime influences which will make for a greater Canada in the new era of a better world.

An attempt has been made by this bill to meet a problem which has been demanding redress for a long time. I am not going to endorse all the details of the bill before the house. I desire only to say that it is a step in the right direction. But there are certain omissions from the bill. One of these was touched upon by one or two speakers who preceded me; I refer to the period which the legislation covers. The problem of agriculture is not a matter only for the transition period. The problem of agriculture is one which will have to be solved by a permanent and long-range plan. If I were to offer any special criticism of this bill it would be that it deals only in a temporary way with what I think is a permanent and long-range problem.

There is a justifiable feeling in the rural parts of Canada that the agricultural income through the years has not been on a fair level, having in mind the returns obtained by other branches of industry. Look over the personnel of this house, if you will. You will see men who came here directly from many professions but who were born and raised and brought up in rural parts. Look at the various professions in Canada, the various industries. You will then see the tremendous contribution which has been made by the men and women who have come off the farms of this land. You will not find the same influx into agriculture from other activities and professions in Canada. Why? It is true that from time to time there are men who have made their money in other businesses and who go into farming in order to lose some of it, but that is not a normal influx into agriculture. I refer to this merely to show that the test as to whether or not agriculture is getting a square deal in Canada is the extent to which people are anxious to leave it, or on the other hand are anxious to go into it. I think that is the best test that should be applied.

Perhaps it is fortunate that agriculture has produced men and women who have entered other forms of industry. Most of these left the farms because they did not like the life, because of the inconveniences, because there was not enough cash return in it. Those of us who came off the farm know what our parents in those early days wanted for their boys and girls. You know it; so do I. Time after time they stated the reasons why they wanted an education for their children. They did not want their boys and girls to go through the drudgery and hard work, to suffer all the inconveniences and uncertainties that they had had to suffer. We may as well face that. Agriculture was left in that position while industry, the professions and so on were returning higher rewards. Some of these men and women I think could have achieved the same success in agriculture as they did in the professions or in industry. The important thing is to have a proper and decent balance in respect to the income received by agriculture and by other parts of our national life.

One of the great difficulties facing agriculture is the fact that when the farmer wants to sell something, somebody else sets the price. That is one of the complaints that was made when I was a boy on the farm, and it is still being made. The law of supply and demand has been allowed to operate with respect to agriculture, but in scarcely no other type of activity in Canada has the law of supply and demand worked unhindered, unprevented and untrammelled. While somebody else sets the price for what the farmer has to sell, somebody also sets the price of what he has to buy. In between those two influences and those two factors the farmer attempts to make his plans, attempts to carry on and do his part in the national life of this dominion.

The farming population of our dominion is one of a few sections of our national economy that is not able to make its plans having regard to the long-range view of the industry. I ask you what industry there is that could survive if it were not able to plan any farther ahead with respect to prices and markets than agriculture. That is what is asked and that is what is done by the farmers of the Dominion of Canada year upon year and decade upon decade.

There are those who are not familiar with farming problems who will say from time to time, "Why should not the farmer have his prices controlled in the war period?" I am not going to go into a discussion with respect to that at the moment, but there is one cardinal factor which always remains in the farmer's mind. In time of peace the farmer has to assume more than a fair share of a lower demand for his products which operates upon the price level. In time of peace the farmer is largely in a depressed condition. In time of war there is a demand for agricultural products, but with man-power at a premium the result is that prices are allowed to rise. In between the depressed period of peace and the more buoyant period of war, provided prices are allowed to fluctuate in an ordinary way, the farmer finds himself on a level which is more in line with the general level than at the present time.

The difficulty we have in this war is that when the basic prices were set the prices of farm commodities were out of line with the price levels of other commodities. In many instances the wartime prices and trade board set prices which actually meant a freezing of a set of unequal circumstances and inequalities. I want to say one thing. We should never again allow agriculture to get into the condition in which it was in the last world-wide depression, when farm income was depressed, I am told, to fifty-five per cent of what it was previously, while at the same time investment income and income from other industries showed no such drop. I think that it is generally accepted that farm prices are always the first to fall and always the last to recover.

There is a problem in connection with farm purchasing power which the government through this legislation must endeavour to meet.

Production on the farm presents other difficulties. Successful production requires planning ahead. The average farmer wants to know ahead of time what markets are going to be available for his products and what prices are going to be for particular farm products. But he is not in that position to-day and has not been up to the present time, and considerable criticism has long been expressed by the farmer over that uncertainty that faces him. The result is that the average farmer who is engaged in mixed farming goes in for one thing this year, and then goes out of it and into other products the next year. It involves considerable cost in changing over from one type of production to another, and this uncertainty which the average farmer feels is reflected by farmers generally throughout the country. I hope that this legislation may have a part in remedying that situation. Undoubtedly this in-and-out-policy of going into one line of production one year, and then out of that and into some other the next year, ought to be replaced by proper planning, and this legislation if it is properly administered can go a long way towards helping the farmer in that respect. The farmer ought to be able to engage in that branch of agriculture in which he wants to engage, instead of being forced to depend upon the uncertainties of the laws of supply and demand to determine what line of production he shall go into this year, and what line next year. He ought to be assured of a market and of reasonable prices for his products so that he can make his plans a long time ahead.

The minister made some reference this morning to the fluctuation of farm prices. It is an old question. No other industry under the sun has suffered so much from the fluctuation of prices as has agriculture. I remember very well that in 1919, on a nine-acre field on our own farm, we took off ninety-nine bushels of cleaned sweet clover, and for that ninety-nine bushels of sweet clover produced on a nine-acre field we took in exactly $2,475 in cash. The demand for sweet clover seed was so great at that time that we had a local market for the whole ninety-nine bushels. We did not even have to carry it out of our barn. Prospective purchasers, I remember very well, would turn the fanning mill in order to make sure that they got their supply at $25 a bushel. Next year the price of sweet clover seed, if my memory serves me correctly, and I am speaking entirely from memory, ran somewhere around $2.50 a bushel, or just about one-tenth of what it was the year before. I mention that only as an illustration of the fluctuation of prices with which the farmer has to contend and of the uncertainty to which it gives rise. Therefore I welcome any measure which will check the rapid and violent fluctuations in prices, which are one of the biggest handicaps of agriculture to-day, because the farmer should know what he will get when he markets his stuff.

The government of Ontario last fall set up an agricultural commission of inquiry to report on floor prices for farm products. That report was adopted on May 16, 1944, and I am sure that the minister has seen and given consideration to this report, which deals in an exploratory way with the whole question of floor prices of farm products. I should like to quote a passage to show what this group of qualified practical farmers placed on record in connection with floor prices for farm products. The report says:

> To establish any sort of a workable base for the actual building of floor price plans, much more specific definitions of their purpose must be devised. The social objectives stated above can with some limitations be all incorporated into one or another of the following definite economic ends:

And this is what I desire particularly to place on the record as the objectives which these practical farmers say are possible:

> (a) To give the farmer cost of production, plus a profit.
> (b) To assure the farmer a financial return comparable with that of producers or workmen on the same general income level.
> (c) To maintain the farmer's income at a level where it will buy as much as it did in some past period when farming was considered profitable.
> (d) To call out the required volume of production of each of the several farm products.

Therefore, sir, I want on the second reading to give my support to the general purposes and objectives of this measure. I think that there will be considerable criticism of certain provisions which the minister has incorporated in the bill, as there may be differences of opinion as to their value. If any general criticism is to be offered it is that we have neglected agriculture for so long that it got into the position where the gross income of the farmers of Canada at one time in recent years amounted only to something like eleven per cent of the entire national income of Canada. That is a national disgrace. It is a national scandal which can never be allowed to recur.

I trust that in considering this measure on behalf of agriculture and other measures that may follow it we shall never forget that agriculture is still the major and perhaps the most important of all the enterprises in which the people of this country are engaged, and from many angles it is by far the most influential and the most valuable. When agriculture goes up, Canada goes up. When agriculture goes down, Canada goes down. The purchasing power of agriculture is great, and when the purchasing power of agriculture is maintained at a proper level, business generally throughout the country will be maintained at its very best levels.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I wish to make just a few brief observations in order to point out certain things in this bill which, in our opinion, instead of leading to an improvement in farm conditions, a betterment of the position of the actual producer and the ultimate consumer, could produce worse conditions than those from which these people are already suffering. Generally speaking, the appointment of an agricultural purchasing and export board is in accordance with the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation programme which has been endorsed by that organization for a good many years.

Like so much important legislation which has been brought before the house in the closing days of the session, this bill, I am afraid, as the previous speaker (Mr. Graydon) has said, comes a little too late. It is too little, and the powers which it confers can be used one way or the other depending upon the personnel of the board and upon the personnel of the government which appoints that board. The need for planning in our agricultural life is evident not only in the farming areas but also in the industrial centres. In fact the records of Canada in the matter of nutrition show that this country has never faced the problems of agriculture or the distribution of the benefits to be derived from agriculture and which the people might enjoy.

It was interesting to most of us to note in the minister's remarks this morning the hint that this board might have the power to set prices in Canada and to control domestic prices. In view of the fact that the country's capacity for production in food very often, indeed in most cases, is from eight to ten times as much as the nation requires, this power is necessary. The governments of this country can never absolve themselves of the guilt of having seen want and privation in the midst of a land which has the potential capacity to produce so much, and which in the past has produced so much. The fact that we could, in wheat alone, produce ten times as much as the Canadian people could consume in a year and still have a large number of young people, of older people, and generally those in the lower income groups actually suffering from want of food, never knowing what it was to have sufficient bread, is something which speaks for itself.

The minister put some valuable figures on the record this morning to show fluctuations in farm prices, but his figures were largely those which revealed wholesale prices. I should like to put on some figures to show exactly what happened to the farmer's income —not wholesale prices, but the farmer's income. His net income for a period of years, as recorded in the national income study prepared by the commission on dominion-provincial relations, and given in appendix 4, table VIII C. at page 86 of the report follows. This relates to our own province of Saskatchewan, for individual enterprises, showing income so far as agriculture was concerned. This is the net income for agriculture after we have taken out cash expenses, income in kind and depreciation on buildings and equipment.

In 1926 Saskatchewan's income was $203·8 million, 1927, 184·2; 1928, 228·4; 1929, 158·1; 1930, 33·9. In 1931 it was minus $8·1 million, which meant that the people engaged in agriculture in that province received $8 million less than operating costs, in other words there was a drop of 104 per cent between 1926 and 1931. It continued in the minus column, so that in 1932 it was minus 7·4; in 1933, 3·5 million; in 1934 it had improved to a net income of 20·1 million; in 1935 it was 35·5; and in 1936 it was 60·2. But even in 1937 it had only reached a net income of 22·7, about ten per cent of what it was in the year 1926, and during that period the depression had continued. The actual living conditions were so bad that the population of Saskatchewan had deteriorated. It was the one province in the whole dominion where the population had actually decreased as shown by the census of 1931 and the census of 1941.

The minister clearly demonstrated to us today that he and his department understand the condtiion of the farmer. They know what the farmer's income is; they understand his cost of production; they know what the plight of the farmer is and apparently they know a very great deal about the causes of that plight. But the people of Canada are asking this question: why has not this been remedied before? One of the Liberal members said to-day that we had learned a great deal during the war about these things. The fact is that we knew these things before the war; and the steps now proposed could have been and should have been taken before the war. We can only regret that these things did not come sooner.

There are many features of the bill which might result in the bill meaning absolutely nothing. In the first place, the board when appointed only sits during the pleasure of the governor in council. On the face of it—

Mr. GARDINER: The appointments are to be at the pleasure of the governor in council. The hon. member said the board only sits.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: They shall hold office only during pleasure of the governor in council. The bill uses a vague phrase when it states that it is for the support of prices during the transition from war to peace. I venture to say that if the act is properly administered in the welfare of producer and ultimate consumer alike, instead of in the interests of those people in between, the processors and the distributors, who have such control over these products, the continuation of this type of thing can well be considered. There is the fact that this board as set up will have only three members on it, so that it must be carefully picked. If the personnel of the board has the attitude that we may support the rights and privileges of so-called private enterprise, which in many cases, so far as food for example is concerned, are monopolies, then we can expect mighty little from this act.

A good many of the boards that have existed heretofore have given the people little cause for hope that there would be anything effective, and the powers of the board are so complete and exclusive that it could actually become a very dangerous weapon in the hands of those who have not at heart the final interests of the producing and consuming public. This board has the power to prescribe prices at which it may purchase products. It has the power to purchase those products. It has power to pay to the producers of an agricultural product directly or through such agent as the board may determine. It has power to sell those prdoucts or otherwise dispose of them. I hope we shall not have any more of that type of disposal that we had in the hungry days of the thirties, with fruit out in the Okanagan valley, and barley in Saskatchewan worth about six cents a bushel on the Winnipeg market and farmers burning it in their furnaces rather than coal because they could not afford to pay for it. The board may package, process, store, ship, transport, export or insure any agricultural product. It may enter into contracts or appoint agents to do anything authorized under this act. Apparently these agents may enter into agreements with other governments and purchase at the request of any department of the government supplies that are required. It has the right to appoint commodity boards or other agents to undertake the purchase and the disposition of agricultural products. In fact the whole agricultural industry, the processing and distribution of goods in this country, comes immediately and completely under the control of this board. They have within their hands the fate of agriculture; they have the fate of the Canadian people in their hands with regard to whether or not the people are to be able to purchase the necessary nutrition. In the hands of the proper people this can be a very valuable board. In the hands of the wrong people it will actually be dangerous.

I am asking everybody to study this bill carefully and notice the powers. It is of most vital importance that the people of Canada see that the right people are in control of the boards that have so much of the welfare of so many people within their power.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): I should like to say a word or two with respect to the present measure, which is an act to provide a revolving fund of two hundred million dollars to assist in the matter of adjusting farm prices through the transition period following the war. I think it is reasonable that the farm people of this country and our general economy should expect to have some governmental assistance where necessary in the interests of this country during that time. I say that particularly for the reason that we as a government and as a country have during the period of the war instituted price ceilings. If the one was necessary for the general interest of the country on the one hand, it is reasonable to suggest that the other is equally necessary in the period during the transition after the war.

The measure provides for the appointment of a board, the functions of which were outlined by the minister this morning. As I understand it, the board is to operate in two ways, one by establishing the price at which the board may take over goods and market them, and the other by establishing a price and letting the market function, and pay the difference between what is deemed to be a fair price, or whatever price is decided upon, and the general price. I have not thought my way through as to exactly how that would work out, but I suggest that here is the place where our cooperative movements can be of real assistance. I hope that their machinery and organization can be brought into play in much of this marketing organization, particularly in carrying out the purposes of this measure. If we are to try to devise a price structure that is to carry on from year to year, the cooperative organizations in themselves will provide a very good type of machinery for doing that very thing. I am not suggesting that the state should enter into the picture in the sense of being similar to a cooperative organization, because I submit that from the point of view of competitive activity, of judging the merits or the demerits of an organization, there is a healthy balance to be achieved between well-established business organizations working in competition with cooperative organizations; and from these types of organizations I think in actual practice we can get the very best possible results.

Many have expressed a great deal of fear with respect to agriculture in this transition period. There is one aspect of the present agricultural situation—which will be of particular importance during the period of transition from war to peace—that is entirely different from the condition that prevailed during the last war. I believe that one of the greatest difficulties that agriculture suffered from in the last war was the inflated prices of land and the creation of debt which many farmers experienced. That situation is now entirely reversed. Farmers generally have been paying off debts to a very creditable degree. That being so, their position is much healthier to meet the period of transition at the close of this war than it was in the last war.

One other aspect of the price situation which should be kept in mind is efficiency of production and of marketing. It is not sound policy for us to devise a price structure in this country which will leave opportunity for careless management or keep sub-marginal lands or units of operation that are not economical in operation. Therefore the board when established must have due regard for efficiency of and economy in operation so far as the production of agricultural products is concerned. I believe that will be kept in mind.

On the question of parity prices which has been urged on many occasions by hon. members in this house, I hope that the idea does not get abroad that we should attempt to maintain throughout what is looked upon as a parity price for individual items of farm products. I do not believe that is sound. I think our objective should be parity of income, taking the general situation rather than the individual situation.

I am pleased to note the general approval that has been given to this measure. I was interested to read only a few days ago the representations that have been made to one of the committees of this house on behalf of the Canadian federation of agriculture, which propounded many of the principles that are contained in the bill that is now before the house.

There is one other thing that I should like to refer to before I sit down. We hear a great deal of discussion in this house, and it has been urged by hon. members from all sides of the house, of the necessity of producer representation on government marketing boards or boards dealing with farm products on behalf of the government or semi-government boards. Before I came into the house this afternoon I happened to pick up the statement of the Canadian federation of agriculture, and I was pleased to note what they have to say with respect to the representation of that organization in government activities at the present time. The heading of this particular paragraph in the report is as follows:

How is the federation given recognition in national affairs?

And this is what follows:

The president and managing director of the federation is chairman of the advisory committee to the agricultural food board and the dominion Minister of Agriculture. This committee, formed in 1943 simultaneously with the formation of the food board, has twelve members. Three of these are nominees of the Canadian federation. Three other members are also federation officers, but were selected as representatives of their respective provincial departments of agriculture at the request of the departments themselves.

The first vice-president of the federation is a member of the board of governors of the Canadian broadcasting corporation as the representative of organized agriculture.

The president of the federation was a member of the advisory committee to the official Canadian delegation to the united nations conference on food and agriculture at Hot Springs, Virginia, in May, 1943, at which forty-four nations were represented.

The federation has been officially represented by its president or secretary at all of the dominion-provincial agricultural conferences during the past three years.

The federation has had a voice in the formation of advisory committees to various government wartime boards, on which organized agriculture is represented either by federation members or federation nominees, and thus, by their presence on these boards, have an active part in the deliberations of these committees.

[Mr. Weir.]

Summarized, the various wartime advisory committees on which organized agriculture is represented in this way, are as follows:

National advisory committee to the agricultural food board and the Minister of Agriculture.
Advisory committee to the meat board.
Advisory committee to the Canadian wheat board.
National employment committee.
Committee on farm income tax.
National war finance committee.
National selective service advisory board.
War assets corporation.
Beef advisory committee to the foods administration W.P.T.B.
Dairy products advisory committee to the foods administration W.P.T.B.
Eggs and poultry advisory committee to the foods administration, W.P.T.B.
Fertilizer advisory committee to the foods administration W.P.T.B.
Fruits and vegetables advisory committee to the foods administration, W.P.T.B.
Honey advisory committee to the foods administration W.P.T.B.
Maple products advisory committee to the foods administration, W.P.T.B.
Seeds advisory committee.

That seems to me a pretty commendable list of boards and committees on which organized agriculture is directly represented, and I think what has been done by these organizations reflects great credit upon them. I commend the Minister of Agriculture and other officials of the government on having recognized the contribution that agriculture can make, through its own organizations, in assisting to carry out the government's programme at this time.

I do not desire to say anything further on this occasion, Mr. Speaker. I am glad this measure has been brought forward, because agriculture has been looking for it. I am satisfied that it is necessary, and I am happy to see that it is receiving general support in the house.

Mr. L. E. CARDIFF (Huron North): It is not very often, Mr. Speaker, that my voice is heard in this chamber, but as one of the farmers elected to this house I thought perhaps I should add something to this debate.

This is a measure to support the prices of agricultural products during the transition from war to peace. If it is being brought in only for election purposes, of course it will do no good. If it is an honest attempt to do what it purports to do, then I support it whole-heartedly. Something of this kind is long past due. Being an agriculturist, and never having made any money in any other way, I know perhaps as well as any hon. member in this house just how much money is being made in agriculture to-day. Of course I am supposed to make more money now because of the indemnity I receive as a member of parliament, but I should like someone to tell me how anyone can live in Ottawa for six months of the year and make anything on $2,857, which is what I have left of my indemnity after the income tax is deducted. It is impossible for a member of parliament to make anything out of his indemnity.

The board to be set up under this bill is to consist of three members, one of whom is to be the permanent chairman. If the right kind of board is set up I believe it can do a great deal of good. Then there is to be an advisory committee of twelve, and in the appointment of these men the minister will have an opportunity to put the right men in the right place. If that is done I have no doubt at all that this legislation will be of great benefit to the country. On the other hand if the wrong men are selected, this legislation will fall short, as other legislation designed to increase the income of the farmer has come to grief.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) a short time ago. This was the first time I ever heard him make a speech in which I thought he really talked sense. As hon. members know, he is one of the lawyer members of this parliament, and he made that speech only because we are on the eve of an election and he realizes that his only possible chance of coming back is to secure the vote of the farmers. I am in a different position myself, since I happen to be a farmer. However, I agree with many of his statements, and I hope they did not fall upon deaf ears.

As the hon. member said, the farms of this country are being depleted because of the lack of labour. That is very true. I can remember very well, years ago, when my grandfather would take the scythe and go out to crop off the weeds that grew up in fence corners and along the fence bottoms. We do not have time to do that now, and that is why when you drive through the country you see a great many farms polluted with weeds. A farmer may be alone on his land, with a dozen cows to look after and his ordinary chores to do. He cannot get his nose off the grindstone long enough to do these odd jobs, and he has not enough money for a hired man. As a result these weeds are allowed to grow unchecked, and everyone knows that when a farm is allowed to go to weeds it is only a very short time until it is not productive at all.

In my opinion this bill, when it becomes operative, will help farmers to obtain the things they need and should have had long ago. Floor prices should have been established when ceiling prices were imposed. I contend that during the period on which the ceiling prices were based, the prices of farm commodities were not high enough. That is one reason why it is more than ever necessary to have floor prices during the transition period. Ceiling prices have not been high enough, but if we are protected by floor prices following the war the agricultural situation may be stabilized.

Everyone says we are entering a new world. Whether we like it or not the boys who are coming on are not going to farm as we did. They are bound to farm with machines, and operate their farms differently from the way we operated ours. For that reason they are not going to be content with the hours we have been compelled to put in from year to year. Their remuneration may be greater, because they intend to farm by machinery. Unless they are paid for the labour they put in, we shall not have any farmers. We might as well make up our minds that farm prices must be stabilized to the point where they will induce the next generation to stick to the farms. Otherwise this country will go down, down, down.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I intend to deal with one or two matters in connection with this bill. One observation I would make at the beginning is that it is passing strange that legislation as important as this should have been brought down so late in the session. When one considers that this bill will empower a board to control $200,000,000, that it is introduced on a Saturday in the dying days of the session when by reason of long hours of sitting during the week members are necessarily tired out and unable to give the bill as much attention as it should receive, it seems only right that protests should be made against this sort of procedure.

The hon member who preceded me in the debate referred to the fact that the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver), a lawyer, had spoken in regard to this matter. Well, I must say that if it were not for the lawyers in the house this afternoon—because they are very much in the majority, when compared with those who follow farming as an occupation—this bill could not possibly be considered in detail.

Mr. MacNICOL: There would not be a quorum.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am in accord with the principle of setting up any scheme whereby, when the war is over, reasonable prices may be assured to farmers. All hon. members realize that in the last two or three years resolutions have been passed calling upon the government to do something in this regard. I believe the Regina board of trade was the first organization in Saskatchewan to place before the government—in December last, I believe it was—a resolution, reasonable in terms and reasoned in attitude, calling upon the government to set up some type of machinery whereby farmers would be assured after the war, and for a reasonable period of time, prices in keeping with costs of production.

All hon. members know that six months after the cessation of hostilities measures which to-day are being utilized to maintain prices, but which are effective only through the operation of the War Measures Act, will be at an end. One hon. member stated that something should be done toward having a definite fixation of prices by the board at this time. While this matter has been referred to on other occasions, the minister has not yet assured the committee that the board would have the power in question. I can understand that it would have power to go into the market and make purchases, as apparently under this bill it is empowered; but I do not believe that it could set prices, for that legislation based upon any scheme such as that would be legally effectual.

This bill seems to follow a definite scheme on the part of the government, that of introducing skeleton bills, bills containing titles and preambles and wide delegations of power, but from which no hon. member can possibly tell in advance the course to be adopted by any board set up, the controls to be put into effect, or the scheme of operation or the philosophy which would control a board operating under such measure.

Against this procedure I protest. The hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) referred to this point in some detail a few moments ago. It is a serious situation when a bill is brought before parliament which does not set forth the basis upon which moneys belonging to Canada are to be expended, or the basis upon which the board for which it provides will operate. In effect it is a blank cheque to the board, the operations under the measure depending upon the circumstances prevailing or the exigencies at the time of its application. In other words some will say that the bill will ensure parity prices, when in fact, there is nothing in the bill to indicate that parity prices will be the aim of the board in the price levels which it will set. This measure sets a floor price by an indirect method, that of permitting the board to go into the market and make purchases, but the level of prices at which the board will make those purchases is not indicated. The farmer understands floor prices to be prices set at a level which will assure him of a reasonable profit over and above his cost of production, although some consider them to be the same as parity prices. Under this measure the board is empowered to make purchases, and to set the level of prices at which it makes purchases, regardless of whether that level may be below the level of the cost of production or not. To be fair to the farmers of Canada, and not hold out to them hopes that may not culminate in action, the minister should set forth in this bill the principle that prices paid in respect of farm commodities shall be based upon costs of production and a reasonable profit. That would not require his setting price levels to-day to be effective in the post-war period. But if this bill is to be anything more than the promise of a hope, there must be something in it to show that the prices farmers are to receive will assure them of reasonable costs plus a fair return.

I realize, of course, that if definite prices were set for a period of years after the war there might be constitutional difficulties in the way. Great Britain is setting prices to-day for agricultural products after the war at a level that will assure a fair and reasonable return. Under this legislation the farmers of Canada may hope that the price they are going to receive will be a fair one. And a year hence or two years hence may realize for the first time that under this legislation there is no mandatory requirement on the board to assure our farm population a fair return for products they produce.

We have had ceilings in war time and the provision of post-war floor prices is to be a corollary of that. If the farmer has been willing to accept price ceilings in time of war he must be assured after the war that there will be price levels which will secure for him a fair and proper return.

I should like to ask the minister some questions. Is it his conception that in the operations of this board, in order to effectuate the various sections of the bill, quota systems will be set up? Will prices be fixed from year to year on a contract price basis, or what in general has the minister in mind as to the means whereby the fixation of prices will take place? Finally, what is the basis upon which these prices are to be fixed? Are they to be fixed upon the basis of farm prices in other countries, or are they to be fixed by negotiation between farm representatives of this country, the Canadian council of agriculture, other farm organizations and the board itself?

I have looked over this bill, and in my opinion it represents a continuance of the trend that has been evident during the past few years, that is, a continuance in peace time of bureaucratic control of this country. Section 4 of the bill provides:

> The board may, with the approval of the governor in council, employ such professional, technical or other officers, clerks and employees, as it may deem necessary for the conduct of its business.

There is control in a board independent of parliament except that it must report to the minister from time to time. Section 9, paragraph (a) reads:

> (a) to prescribe from time to time, with the approval of the governor in council, prices at which the board may purchase agricultural products in the market.

Paragraph (d) provides that the board may have authority to purchase at such prices any agricultural products as meets the standard. Paragraph (c) provides:

> To pay to the producers of an agricultural product directly or through such agent as the board may determine the difference between a price prescribed by the board with the approval of the governor in council for such product and the average price.

The three powers I have mentioned must be given to the board. Then the next paragraph states that the board may sell or "otherwise dispose of" any agricultural products purchased by the board. Why the necessity of empowering the board to give away if necessary the farm products that it has purchased? Why those words, "or otherwise dispose of"? The power that is given under this section permits the board unequivocally to dispose gratis of products that have been secured.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It might burn them.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I think that method of disposing of extra production is a thing of the past, although it prevailed in all parts of the world between 1930 and 1939. The next subsection reads:

> To package, process, store, ship, transport, export or insure any agricultural product.

As a matter of fact what the hon. gentleman said is perfectly true. The board has power to do anything with these products. The statement of the hon. gentleman indicates the width and the amplitude of the board's powers. We have no idea as to how the provisions of this subsection are to be used. We have no indication of the philosophy behind it. Somebody recommended this, some departmental investigation has taken place in regard to this whole question, and I think we should know to what extent the government expects that this board will take over the processing, storage and packing industries of this country. We do not want a repetition of what took place in connection with the rental of our terminal elevators to private companies during the war—government-owned elevators rented to private individuals and in them government wheat stored for the period of the war at a cost three or four times the total amount of the annual rental.

How does the government intend this board to operate? I realize that it is impossible to give every detail, but it is important that any board that is given the power to purchase up to $200,000,000 worth of farm products and to dispose of them in any way, to store them and so on, must have some instructions as to how it will operate under this section.

Not only do we delegate power in that regard, but we delegate to the board the power to redelegate certain powers. Under section 9 (i) this board has the power to appoint commodity boards or other agents to undertake the purchase and the disposition of agricultural products. In other words there is a delegation of power by parliament to a board, with the power being given to that board to redelegate the powers that it has received. I have no objection to paragraph (j), which gives power to appoint a committee or committees to assist the board in an advisory capacity. I believe that is necessary, because it in no way implies the exercise of executive authority.

Then there is the section with regard to the price the farmer is to receive. Is there to be a system of participation certificates? When this board purchases from the farmer at a certain price and sells or otherwise disposes of the product at a profit, will that profit go to the farmer? The reason I ask that is that under section 9 (i) (c)—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I hesitate to interrupt my hon. friend but I want to direct attention to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition, paragraph 759, which reads:

> On the motion for the second reading, it is out of order to discuss the clauses seriatim.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, I am endeavouring to cite particular sections of the bill with a view to ascertaining what the philosophy is going to be in the operations of this board. To discuss the bill in detail is the only way in which I can show, as I am endeavouring to do, that too great power is being placed in the hands of too few without the necessary controls being imposed by parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member knows, of course, that it is the principle of the bill that is discussed on the second reading and that the clauses cannot be discussed seriatim. I am inclined, however, to think that the hon. member is making a general argument with respect to the bill, although he is going into a little more detail than I would want him to do.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I was referring to individual sections, Mr. Speaker, for the sake of clarity so that the minister can follow my argument.

Mr. GARDINER: You have covered all that there are.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There are so few sections dealing with so important a matter that we have to ask these questions for the purpose of ascertaining the philosophy underlying this bill and what is to be the method of operation. There is a title to the bill, a preamble, a delegation of authority—

Mr. GARDINER: There is no preamble.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: As a matter of fact the minister is correct. The government have actually extended themselves and have done away with the preamble, and preambles are usually used by the courts to ascertain the purpose of the legislation and the method of operation. Just in that connection let me say that there is one section, 10 (3), which refers to the possibility of a profit being made. I would like to find out from the minister just how it is expected that this board, if the farmer is to receive fair and proper prices, can possibly expect a profit in its operations. That requires elucidation and, if there is any profit, under this section it is apparent that it goes not to the farmer but into the consolidated revenue fund. One section provides for the possibility of the farmer receiving the highest possible price less the costs of administration, and another section provides for the possibility of there being a profit.

There is one other matter to which I wish to refer, and that is in connection with grain farmers. The grain farmers in western Canada to-day are not as well off proportionately, even taking into consideration present day prices, as other groups of farmers across this dominion. As a matter of fact, the grain farmer has benefited least of all in the period of the war by the prices that are being paid to-day. The prices which the wheat farmer and the other grain farmers are receiving to-day are far below the level of 1926-29.

Mr. GARDINER: The prices for grain to-day are not below the 1926-29 levels.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I always believe in having a witness to call in support of the statements which I make. I am now going to call as my witness the Minister of Agriculture himself. In the Regina Leader-Post—

Mr. GARDINER: That was some months ago.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, but there has been no change in grain prices since last November.

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister will be able to explain afterwards. The farmer is still receiving the initial price of $1.25. There have been slight fluctuations in the prices of certain other grain products, but this is what the minister said when he was speaking in Regina last November—not on a political platform, but addressing a delegation from the Saskatchewan wheat pool, and there of course he was speaking to grain farmers. He is reported in the Regina Leader Post as follows:

> Mr. Gardiner quoted figures compiled by the bureau of statistics to show that the grain farmer had benefited least of all classes of farmers in price advances which had taken place during the war years, and was still well below the average of the 1926-29 period.

Mr. GARDINER: The 1943 prices were not available at that time. I had in mind at that time the 1942 prices. I handed the sheet to my hon. friend a little while ago with the 1943 prices. Put those figures on the record.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The statement of the minister as reported by the Regina Leader Post is scarcely in accord with the statement that he made here to-day. There may be an explanation, but the statement he made to-day had to do with products other than grain products. I am dealing now with grain products. I quote further from the Regina Leader Post. The minister said:

> Taking the 1926-29 price levels as the base and designating this period by the index figure 100, Saskatchewan was the only province that was below that mark—20 points below to be exact after including acreage payments.

Mr. GARDINER: That was for 1942.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister can give the 1943 figures when he comes to reply. Let me finish what he said on that occasion, on November 10, 1943:

> By provinces he quoted the index figures in relation to the 100 representing the 1926-29 average as follows: Prince Edward Island, 124: Nova Scotia, 166: New Brunswick, 170: Quebec, 165: Ontario, 132: Manitoba, 124, Saskatchewan, 80.

In other words, when the minister was speaking, and it was a matter of only a few months ago, the grain farmers of the province of Saskatchewan were receiving prices 20 points below the index figure of 1926-29. I am bringing this up not by way of criticism but for the purpose of showing that something must be done to raise the level of prices for the grain farmers at least to parity; for it seems to be inexcusable that Saskatchewan is the only province in the dominion that is receiving grain prices below the basic price of 1926-29. The minister said:

> It is all very well to say that there are good prices for eggs, cheese, butter and live stock products, but the figures determine one thing, that there is one type of farmer not dealt with on the same level, the grain farmer.

I mention this for the purpose of asking the minister to consider raising the standard level of prices paid to the grain farmers to the end that our farmers in Saskatchewan may attain parity price or a reasonable price above that amount having regard to all the circumstances.

I welcome this bill as a step in the right direction. Its aim and purpose are commendable. The criticism that I offer is designed only to the end that improvements be placed in the bill. Above all, we in this parliament should put a stop to the perpetuation of bureaucratic controls after the war is over. We have accepted war controls. Every one is legislating to-day, controllers, deputy ministers, heads of departments. It got so bad that the government had to appoint a controller to control the controllers; and yet, Mr. Speaker, that trend is being continued into peace time under legislation such as this. Not only is the trend being continued, but we are delegating authority in this case to a board which in turn has the right to redelegate that authority. We have had some experience of boards during the period of the war which indicate the grave danger of placing power in the hands of individuals removed from parliament and from effective control by the representatives of the people. I ask therefore, so far as the powers of redelegation are concerned, that they be not proceeded with. I ask that this legislation, before it is passed, should give in detail an indication of the circumstances and terms under which it will be operative, to the end that we shall not be in a position of promising much to the farmers, who are expecting much from it, without having at the same time something within the terms of the legislation which will ensure that the prices that are set shall be determined upon such a basis that the farmer will receive not only costs but a fair and reasonable profit.

One thing more, and I pass this on to the Minister of Agriculture. In the post-war period, as all of us believe, the demand for agricultural products will be tremendous in volume during the first two years or so in the rehabilitation of the countries of Europe. That was the attitude taken by the conference in Atlantic City. Under the provisions of UNRRA, all the countries of the united nations to-day are contributing to a common pool, in order to make available the resources of our various countries in the rehabilitation of the countries of Europe as they are recovered from the enemy. In Canada's contribution, in my opinion, too small a portion is devoted to agricultural products. The other day I saw figures in connection with the United States contribution to UNRRA, and it would seem that the proportion of agricultural products that Canada is contributing to this fund for the rehabilitation and relief of the conquered countries is made on a basis which does not take into consideration to a proper extent, as has been done in the United States, the necessity of reestablishing in those countries in Europe a potential market for our farm products once those nations find themselves in a position again to become a potential market for Canadian farm products. I would appreciate it if the minister would indicate why it is that in this scheme of UNRRA, Canada's contribution of a greater proportion of farm products is not provided for. During the period of the war we have industrialized the country. We in the west have not benefited to the same extent as industrial eastern Canada by war industry. Little have we in the province of Saskatchewan. Out of a matter of almost a billion dollars in capital assistance, to industry, the capital assistance to industry in Saskatchewan has been less than $2 million. Eastern Canada, and to a lesser extent the Pacific coast, has become greatly industrialized in the period of the war. The central western provinces have not benefited to the same extent. I appeal to the minister to endeavour to secure as large a proportion as possible, and certainly a greater percentage than to-day, of farm products in all future contributions or in all future assignments on the part of Canada to the UNRRA mutual aid and the like so that western agriculture may benefit in the post-war period.

I agree with the principle of the bill, but I do think that certain controls are necessary not only in the interests of the people as a whole but in order to assure the farmer that the hopes being built up by reason of this legislation shall be realized and that after the war the price he will receive will be in keeping with the fact that, through his patriotism in time of war, he has consented to his prices being kept down.

Mr. J. L. DOUGLAS (Queens): Since I represent a constituency in a province which is largely agricultural I am naturally interested in this legislation supporting farm prices. It is essential that the farmer, upon whom we depend to so large an extent, should be protected from any collapse of prices of his marketable products during the readjustment period following the war. Through the wisdom of the government in its price ceiling and other measures during the past few years, farm prices have not become unreasonably high, in fact, scarcely high enough to offset, in some instances, the additional cost of production. In some instances the farmers have paid twenty-five per cent more in wages than in former years; nevertheless, despite ten years of low farm prices which prevailed prior to 1941, the farmers to-day are in better financial circumstances. This measure introduced to support the farmer up to or about the level of production is vital to the welfare of the dominion as a whole. It is a broad one that requires careful consideration, because cost of production varies in the different provinces. In Prince Edward Island we are subject to heavy freight rates and other handicaps not found except in a province separated from the mainland. Our principal marketing crops are potatoes, both seed and table stock; dairy products, hogs, poultry and eggs. Fish, of course, will be dealt with in another important bill.

The knowledge and experience I have gained from both farming and marketing convinces me that there is no other way by which we can protect the producer in the annual outlay of cash necessary to maintain production than by establishing a minimum price under the direction of a board so that he will not be made bankrupt. A board wisely constituted should be able to protect both the farmer and the government, or the consolidated revenue fund. This fund should be sufficient to meet all such needs.

For some time there will be a large demand for most food products. This demand will ensure at least a price equal to any floor that may be set. Other farm products which vary greatly in yield one year with another from the same acreage are, in years of heavy yield, sold at low prices. Take potatoes, for instance, a crop that varies greatly, depending on the weather and the infestation of fungus disease. In Prince Edward Island potatoes constitute our main cash crop. We produce a good quality of both seed and table stock, and without a reasonable revenue from this crop our farmers are not prosperous. Hon. members know that eighty per cent of the certified seed potatoes are produced in Prince Edward Island. The production of those potatoes requires special and scientific methods, which are more expensive than growing ordinary table stock potatoes. Production in Prince Edward Island, as in other provinces, has been increased twenty-five to thirty per cent. This is remarkable, especially in my own province where out of a population of 95,000 people 12,000 of our young men and women have enlisted in the armed forces, probably the highest percentage of all of Canada. The fathers and mothers at home have worked long hours, most of them from daylight to dark, to meet the needs of producing more food.

Since transportation is linked closely with production, we in Prince Edward Island are handicapped by ice conditions in the Northumberland strait in certain months of the year. February and March are the months in which the greatest difficulty is experienced. We hope that when the new car ferry, which is under construction, is brought into service in a few months' time it will improve the service between our province and the mainland. Our twenty-nine year old car ferry, which was built in Newcastle-on-Tyne, where many great ships are built, has done wonderful work. A great deal of credit is due to the crew who in some instances work day and night to keep the freight moving.

The people of my province have faith in the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and in his department, which has dealt fairly with all provinces. We appreciate the relief he has given us in the subventions on fertilizer and feed, the bonuses paid on dairy products, and so on, which, I am sure, all our people in that business appreciate.

It would be foolish for me or for anyone else to attempt to outline what minimum prices should be set for the various products, and as I have already said, a wisely constituted board will arrive at those conclusions. I wish to say, in conclusion, that I most heartily endorse the principles of the bill.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): The principle underlying this bill is apparently the one that it is the duty and responsibility of the federal government of Canada to establish and maintain equitable and stable prices for agricultural products. That principle is sound. Apparently the technique involved in this bill is that of taxing the money from the people of Canada in order to attain the stable and equitable price level. That principle is unsound.

On the whole one must support the bill because the objective of attaining stable and equitable prices is so important that one would be very foolish to oppose it from any consideration whatsoever. It seems that during the debate thus far a good many members have taken pains to point out to the minister how long ago it was that they or their party began to advocate this particular principle. Probably it would be well for me to say just a word on this score also. When social credit proposals were first advocated the great founder of the proposals, Major Douglas, advocated a just price. When the campaign was being waged in Alberta perhaps the most attractive aspect of the campaign was the second principle of social credit, that of the just price. This is exactly the principle which apparently the minister and his department have been aiming to establish in this bill.

There are three principles of social credit. The first one is the free flow of credit; the second one is the just price, and the third one is the issue of consumers' purchasing power in the form of a dividend or in some other form that would increase the purchasing power. This principle was apparently actuating the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he introduced his bill with regard to family allowances.

I do not wish to bore the house or the country by elaborating once more that the objectives which the government is aiming at in most of the legislation which is coming forth now are the objectives which were clearly indicated as desirable objectives by the social credit movement many years ago, as long ago as 1923; and if those objectives had been recognized as sound in those days and had been greeted with any sort of respect instead of universal derision, doubt and disrespect by the Liberal party, conditions in Canada would have been far different from what they have been.

May I now raise one question to which I believe the minister should give a great deal of attention? In his well planned and informative speech this morning he drew to our attention the fact that in 1927 the income of the farm population of Canada was $934 million; in 1929 it was $926·7 million, and in 1932 it was $383·5 million. If he takes the last figure from either of the two other figures he will have a sum in the neighbourhood of $600 million. It will be a most interesting mathematical problem for the minister to give the members of the cabinet, and also his department, as to how the difference between $383·5 million and more than $900 million could be met in any year by the expenditure of $200 million. I think it must be apparent that to deal with a national problem anything like that which confronted Canada in 1932, this figure of $200 million is pathetically inadequate.

Another question which I think needs to be asked right at this point is, where is it proposed to get this money? If we are to have money for family allowances, for reestablishment, for servicing a debt of over fourteen billion dollars, and so on, this is a really serious question to ask. Where is the money to come from?

Another important question is raised by the bill. It may not be exactly involved in the measure, but certainly it is associated with it. Where are the markets to be found for the produce which will be available as a result of these measures which are designed to stimulate the production of agricultural commodities? Are these markets to be found abroad, or are we to depend upon the home population for our market? It seems to me that this matter must be given a great deal of earnest thought. Suppose the foreign market should be found quite inadequate to absorb the generous production of agricultural products which most certainly will result from a sincere application of the principles contained in this bill. What devices would be adopted by the government to deal with a situation which would leave vast surpluses of a wide variety of commodities on the Canadian market, with all the disruptive effects on prices that would naturally result from such surpluses? I think this matter ought to be given a great deal of attention, and no doubt the minister will discuss it in considerable detail when the bill is in committee. We shall be listening to what he has to say. Once more may I suggest that, if foreign markets fail, the home market can be expanded to any degree desirable by the use of a dividend, and I would suggest to the minister that the sooner he gets his colleagues in the cabinet to discuss with him quite earnestly the matter of a dividend and how it can be paid in Canada, the sooner he will be placing the whole economy in Canada on something like a sound foundation.

So far as I have been able to discover in reading the bill, nothing is said as to what is to be done with respect to the cost of production of the various commodities. Very likely provision is being made somewhere else in this regard, but as yet I have not discovered it. The cost of production is a matter that has greatly embarrassed the farmers of western Canada. Anyone who has followed with care the reports of the Searle Grain company and has seen therein the statement of the rising costs of the commodities farmers have to buy, will have been impressed with the fact that between 1914 and 1935 the cost of the 147 commodities western farmers buy increased from 100 to something in the neighbourhood of 133·5 or 134. That increase in the cost of living, and consequently in the cost of production for the western farmer, constituted a great source of irritation and perhaps temporary ruin financially. In reading over the bill I just wondered if the minister had made adequate provision for taking care of the rising cost of production, whether he had any device similar to the social credit compensated discount, by the application of which he could prevent the cost of production from rising. This is another avenue thoroughly worthwhile exploring.

Raising the question of where the money is to come from brings to mind a matter that seemed to be disturbing the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). He was afraid of the increase in centralization and regimentation in this country, of the increase in taxation, of the tendency to level people down, to redistribute poverty or scarcity. He did not use those words but I think those were his ideas. May I point out to the minister that wherever centralization of power takes place, wherever there is a tendency to tax people more and to level down the general income of the country, these tendencies are socialistic and consequently are directly contrary to democracy. The greatest danger that can arise under socialism is the destruction of democracy. I say that in no passionate way whatever; it is a simple, straightforward fact. The hon. member for Lake Centre went into considerable detail to show that there was a tendency toward the destruction of democracy through centralization and greater taxation. I do not know whether the Liberal government feel very happy to think they are lining themselves up with the great socialistic trend in the world, but they must face the fact that to the extent they have shown in this bill what their technique is to be, they are doing that very thing. The people of Canada hardly need to bother about building up and electing a Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party in order to get socialism in this country; they need only to return the Liberals next time and probably they will get all the socialism they can endure. I have no grounds for believing that the people would fare any better under a Conservative administration, either, because apparently the Conservatives think along exactly the same lines. They think there is only one way in the world to get money, namely, by taxing it out of the people. They are obsessed with that foolish notion. According to them, it does not matter what goods and services we have; it does not matter how much the real wealth of the country increases, there is no other way to get money. Apparently they seem to think money is a divine thing which has to rain down from the skies. It cannot be created in accordance with need—impossible, according to their ideas! They will have to outgrow these ideas, or the results of their efforts—both Liberals and Conservatives—will be socialistic, just as definitely as will be those of the C.C.F.

There are one or two other questions which I think should be propounded for consideration at this stage, while we are considering the principle of the bill. Is it the aim of the bill, in a general way, to guarantee the farmers of Canada against loss? Or is it the aim to guarantee them an adequate income? The minister will correct me if I am in error when I say that I assume the object is to guarantee them a good income. And since he does not contradict me—

Mr. GARDINER: I am waiting until you have finished.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am asking the minister a question.

Mr. GARDINER: And I will answer it; but I cannot answer it yes or no.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I assume the minister has answered that the object of the bill is to guarantee the farmer a good income. If that is the object, then, of course, the increase in production in nearly every kind of agricultural product in Canada will be tremendous.

I have no objection to that; I have no fear of abundance. I can see plenty of places in Canada and in other parts of the world where abundance can be used, if the government can discover the proper technique of distributing that abundance. But if the government stupidly persists in being unable to see the method of distributing an abundance of goods, then there is a serious danger arising from that abundance.

When a few minutes ago the hon. member for Lake Centre said that we never again would see destruction of goods he probably was just a little out of contact with realities in his reasoning; because the advocates of scarcity, the men who think scarcity will do anything under the sun, except discover a means of distributing abundance, will do almost anything except use that abundance. They will keep producers so that they cannot deliver more than so much of their goods, and the goods will sit out in the field and spoil. Even the minister, with his enlightenment, has been guilty of that.

Mr. GARDINER: No, no.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Has not the minister paid a wheat acreage reduction bonus?

Mr. GARDINER: Not to reduce production; it was to increase production—and it did increase it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Oh, this is a most interesting kind of reasoning. It must be unique. One ordinarily supposes that if you pay a man to keep a certain area out of production, it would decrease production.

Mr. GARDINER: He was not paid to keep it out of production; he was paid to take it out of wheat, and put it into something else.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What would happen if we had a surplus of everything?

Mr. GARDINER: He would change to something else.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The minister is thinking along a profitable line. If he would keep along that line, I would point out to him in a very few minutes how without any serious effort at all we can produce of most things more than Canadians can consume, and more than we can sell to the peoples of the world. I shall refer, for example, to my favourite subject of sugar.

Mr. GARDINER: Do not start on that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not propose to start on it; but it is a good thing for the minister to bear such things as this in mind. Let him bear in mind that the total consumption of sugar in Canada to-day could be produced in Alberta alone, south of Calgary, without seriously affecting wheat production. That is one of the things we have to face.

I shall just refer to one or two others which occur to me. Take the production of alcohol. Everyone in Canada must have wondered why we have had to have a shortage of gasoline, and why we could not produce alcohol for fuel purposes. Surely everyone has wondered why it is we have been so careful not to produce freely of synthetic rubber, notwithstanding the fact that apparently we have an ideal set-up for such production.

Surely these examples are enough to indicate the potential capacity of Canada in connection with agricultural products. And those potential capacities will be opened up, if this bill is sincerely administered. I am not saying that it will be sincerely administered. I do not know. It may be administered somewhat as the meat board was administered this year in connection with beef in Alberta. That, of course, would be an entirely different matter.

But if it is sincerely administered, as the wording of the bill would suggest, then this bill will stimulate agricultural production from coast to coast in Canada in a way which I believe will constitute a genuine embarrassment to everyone who persists in thinking in terms of scarcity. The question now ought to be raised: What would we do with these surpluses? Would we destroy them, or forbid further production, or give them away? How would we pay for them? All these questions have to be asked.

I am wondering this: As a result of the application of the principles of this bill in maintaining a floor price, are prices to be raised to the consumer? For example, supposing we see fit to pay, we will say, ten cents a dozen on eggs, so as to put a floor under the price of that commodity, would the ten cents be charged to the consumer? If it would not, that would help. But suppose the government raised the price from twenty cents to thirty cents a dozen, paid the difference of ten cents a dozen, and then charged the consumer thirty cents, when the consumer could otherwise have bought them for twenty cents from the producer. The result of this, of course, would be a matter which should be given consideration, before we plunge too far into it.

Another matter which I suggest should be considered at this stage, is this: Is it the intention to make Canada more self-sufficient, or to leave Canada more or less non-self-sufficient, as it is at present? That is, is this bill intended to be applied so as to cause the people of Canada to produce successfully certain agricultural products which at the present time it might appear could more profitably be imported from abroad?

Let us suppose we are dealing with butter. Would the object be to raise the price of butter to producers in Canada, so that it would not be profitable for anyone to import New Zealand butter, thereby tending to shut out the New Zealand product? I give this just as illustration. Would that be the general idea? Would the idea be to raise the price of wool to producers in Canada to the point where it would pay the Canadian wool grower so well to produce wool that the country would produce all our requirements of that commodity? These serve as an illustration of the point I have in mind.

I think the government has to decide definitely, before long, whether it proposes to make Canada a more and more self-sufficient country, or a country more and more dependent upon foreign trade. If it does not make a definite decision in this respect, then its policies will be at variance with each other, and there will be a lack of consistency in the moves the government makes.

I can quite readily understand how a bill like this could be used to make Canada more self-sufficient.

Mr. GARDINER: Is that what you wish to have done?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Perhaps the minister would like me to make a pronouncement so that the Liberals could use it. I know he would. I have propounded certain questions—

Mr. GARDINER: I am not afraid to say what I think about it. What do you think about it?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad the minister is not afraid; and I am not afraid to say what I think about it. But I will say it in a way which cannot be distorted on some remote platform. I am going to say that in a general way it is a dangerous and an uneconomical situation for any country to be dependent upon external sources for the products it needs to support the lives of its people. The minister will readily get that. Time and time again I have advocated a greater beet sugar production in Canada, thereby laying down a principle which I hold to be completely sound. I think I have answered the minister, and he will understand.

Mr. GARDINER: You are in favour of making the country self-sustaining.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am in favour of the principle I have just laid down by implication. If this Bill is sincerely applied it will aid greatly in the attainment of that desire, but we shall have to deal with the serious problem of where the money is to come from. An amount of $200,000,000 will not begin to maintain prices where they ought to be. Prices in 1929 and 1927 were not high enough to give the agricultural population of Canada their fair share of the national income. I think every one in this house will agree that what the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) said this afternoon—I congratulate him upon saying it—is applicable to this situation.

From 1905, when I first began to take an interest in these matters, down to the present time, the farmers of Canada have not had a fair deal. Their situation has been getting worse. Their situation was not happy in 1927, 1928 and 1929 when prices were good. If the government are to undertake to correct a situation similar to that which existed in 1932, if they are to attempt to support prices, they will need much more than $200,000,000. If the country should fall upon evil days, such as we had from 1930 to 1935, the amount of money which the people could pay in taxes would not be very great, and one can imagine the clamour that would be raised against the taxation which would be necessary to supply even $200,000,000.

I believe that all thoughtful members will be impressed with the need of a careful examination of the question of where the money is to come from. It must not be taxed from the Canadian economy because the Canadian economy just will not stand it. If the sponsors and drafters of this bill really mean to put it through, if it is not just a means of deceiving the people, then they must be sure that they have a source of money which will yield much more than $200,000,000 and which will not constitute a tax burden on the Canadian people over and above what they are called upon to endure.

Having said that, I have just one more statement to make. If the object of the bill—I imagine the minister proposes to tell me this in a minute or two—is to grant the Canadian farmer an adequate income, I suggest that it is a matter of considerable importance that the minister define what, in his opinion, constitutes adequate. There are altogether too many wage-earners and income earners in Canada who are getting less than $1,000 a year. There is a scandalously large number of Canadian people receiving less than $500 a year to support their families. The other day the Prime Minister gave us some figures which have an impressing bearing on that statement.

What is adequate to-day? Does it mean that when the average farmer gets done with his year's work he will have a $500 balance in his favour? Does it mean that he will have a $2,500 balance in his favour? What will be in the minds of the men who are to determine what that adequate income shall be and who, therefore, are to determine what the prices shall be which the farmer will receive and what the prices shall be which he must pay for the items that enter into his cost of production?

I think I have indicated the line along which I desire a considerable amount of information. May I say once more that I support the principle of this bill in so far as its objectives are concerned, namely, the introduction and maintenance of equitable and suitable prices for agricultural products throughout this country. I support that principle, but I oppose the principle of the technique or the method by which that objective is to be attained, namely, the levying of a tax burden upon the Canadian people.

The taxation structure upon the Canadian people is altogether too destructive right now and it must be relaxed. Otherwise such a thing as freedom will leave the shores of this country if it has not already done so. To contemplate seriously adding more taxation to the people under a condition like that is simply to contemplate something which borders on lunacy. I repeat that I oppose the principle of the technique, namely, the taxation by which it is apparently proposed to attain the objectives of this bill.

Mr. CLEAVER: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. When taking part in the debate the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Cardiff) threw out the implication that I as the member for Halton had been neglecting the farmers in my riding, and he made the statement that I had made the speech which I made to-day only because we are on the eve of an election. I should like to remind the hon. member and the house that I came here as a new member in 1936 and I made my maiden speech within one month of the convening of the house. At that time I supported agriculture when I spoke on the Canadian-United States trade agreement. From 1937 down to the outbreak of the war, whenever I felt that I could make a constructive suggestion in regard to legislation being dealt with by the house with regard to agriculture, I spoke upon the matter. It is quite true that since the outbreak of war the few speeches I have made have been in regard to the war effort.

If my hon. friend was referring to the fact that I have not participated in the general free-for-all discussion which takes place yearly on the agricultural estimates he is 100 per cent correct, because I have always felt that I could make a more effective contribution to the welfare of the farmers in my riding with respect to departmental matters by making my representations direct to the heads of the different departments rather than by taking up the time of the house. I have consistently followed that practice, I think with only one exception when I made a short speech a year ago in support of an increased grant for research and experimental work.

I considered that I was quite within my rights in rising to-day to present some views which I thought would be helpful to the house and by passing on to the membership of this house the views of the farmers of my riding with respect to the important piece of legislation we are now considering. I ask my hon. friend: Could I have made the speech any sooner than I did? I feel that I was quite within my rights, that I had a right to make that speech without having any slurs cast upon me for making it. I say to my hon. friend that the statement he made that my speech was made only because we are on the eve of an election is untrue.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In answer to my hon. friend on the other side I may say that unfortunately the hon. member he is criticizing is not in the house at the present time because he had to attend an important meeting. I must say this on the question of privilege. It is difficult, Mr. Speaker, to understand the hon. gentleman because nearly every time he speaks in the house he makes a political speech.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak again on the second reading, but a number of questions have been put to me to which I assume the members expect answers before the bill goes to the committee. Most of the questions I think can best be answered when we are dealing with the different sections of the bill in committee, but there were one or two general matters raised to which I think I should make reply at this stage.

In the first place I wish to deal with the statements which were made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) toward the end of his remarks when he referred to a statement which I had made in the city of Regina in the latter part of 1943. It is obvious to anyone who considers that statement that it could be made only with reference to the statistics as they existed at that time, and it is equally obvious that a speech delivered in 1943 could not be based on the final statistics for the year 1943 because they were not issued in final form until after the end of the year.

I have in my hand the revised figures of the dominion bureau of statistics, as of February 22, 1944, giving the final figures for 1943. The statement which I made at the wheat pool meeting in the city of Regina, and a newspaper report of which was read by the hon. member for Lake Centre, referred, as I said across the floor of the house a few minutes ago, to the figures for 1942. The index figure for Saskatchewan at that time was 67. Those figures have been revised up to a later date, and the latest figures that I have in my hand show that the Saskatchewan figure is 69·2 for 1942, which is two points higher than the figure which was contained in the statistics that I had in my hand at the time I was speaking in Regina. In addition, there is paid in western Canada the wheat acreage payment, and this payment at that time increased the returns to the farmers of Saskatchewan to an index figure of 80. I assume that since the basic figure of 67 has since been raised by two points, the new figure will now be 82. But the most important part of my statement made in Regina was that which prophesied that when we had reached the end of the year and had the figures, the index figure for Saskatchewan would be past the 100 mark. I have now the 1943 figures, and they show that the index figure for Saskatchewan is 110·3, as I gave it to the house this morning.

I even went farther when I was speaking in Regina and pointed out that the price of wheat had been increased to $1.25 a bushel on September 28 last, and as I was speaking about two months later that increased price could have had little effect on the index figure of returns to the Saskatchewan farmer. The increased payment of fifteen cents on barley and ten cents on oats had just been established. What I was really saying to the western farmers at that meeting, and I said it at twenty-five different meetings, was that they had not had their proportion of returns during the war down to 1942, and the statistics indicated that, but that the reason why they had not received returns down to that time was that we had not the information with regard to the sales of live stock products generally across Canada, and with regard to the sale of fruits and other products, and, therefore, that we were not in a position to make a proper comparison until we had those figures; and that as soon as the complete figures for 1942 were in our hands we made adjustment of the returns on grain, which, as I stated at that time, would bring the index figure past the 100 mark, and I prophesied that by the end of 1944 Saskatchewan would be on a comparable basis with the other provinces. I repeated that statement this morning; and I am quite sure, knowing as we do now that the income in Saskatchewan is up by over sixty per cent in the first six months of the year, whereas the increase across Canada is up by only twenty-five per cent, that there will be a considerable adjustment of the index figures relating to the grain growing provinces during the year 1944 and in all probability the figures for Saskatchewan will be as good as the figures for most of the other provinces. That is the point I was wishing to make at that time. That is what the hon. member for Lake Centre himself says should be the objective of this government, and since we hope to reach that objective during this year I trust that when the election rolls around he will support the government on that particular matter of policy.

A number of other questions were brought to our attention. One was the question raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre whether this legislation is intra vires. Along with that he quoted at some length the title of the bill, and I am not at all surprised that when he read the title he thought it was a preamble because it takes two lines to recite the title to the bill, which reads: "An act for the support of the prices of agricultural products during the transition from war to peace." The reason why this bill has such a long title, and the reason why the title on the inside page of the bill appeared to the hon. member to be a possible preamble to the bill, is the fact that in order to make the bill intra vires it had to be made absolutely clear that this is not a bill to set prices. This house has not the authority to set prices on goods which are produced within the different provinces and which are consumed in those provinces, and we do not presume under this bill to do anything which we have not the authority to do, which would only result in having the bill thrown out of court before it could come into operation. So that it is made perfectly clear that the bill does not intend to set prices. It does not set prices. It merely places within the power of a board which is to be set up under the bill the authority to prescribe prices which will do certain things. Those are the prices at which we are prepared to purchase products, and the purchasing of the products will do certain things. In this way we are accomplishing what we have stated on previous occasions we would accomplish, namely putting floor prices under the goods which are being produced in the dominion and which have been affected by ceiling prices during the time the war was on.

I have been asked whether this would involve the setting of quotas. I do not know whether the hon. member for Lake Centre had in mind the placing of quotas upon production, but I assume he had that in mind from the references that he made. Or perhaps he had in mind the setting of quotas such as we have put on during the war, whereby after the products have been produced we put a quota on their delivery to the market. That was particularly true of wheat and some other grains. We put a quota on their deliveries during the year. But I think what the hon. member for Lake Centre had in mind was the old question whether we were going to say to the farmers, "This is all you can grow, and if you grow any more you will not get this particular return on it; or if you produce any more the government is not prepared to take it." If that is what he had in mind, that is not what the bill intends to do. We do not intend to say to the farmers, "If your production happens to run high next year, or the first year following the war, only a certain percentage of that production will be taken."

That is one of the reasons why it is not possible in this bill to do some of the things which it has been suggested ought to be done somewhere sometime. It may lay the basis upon which other legislation can be built up later on, or other actions taken later, which may accomplish some of the things that some hon. members have in mind. But this bill is intended to do exactly what the title says it is intended to do—an act for the support of prices of agricultural products during the transition from war to peace. Then, as we read everything which is in the bill, and everything which has been said from time to time, the intention is to take into consideration all the things that have been done in relation to farm products during the period of the war and particularly during the period of price control, and then in any transition period following the war, whenever it is declared that the terms of the bill be applied to a product during that period, we apply the terms of this bill in such a way as to see to it that anything at all that the farmer was denied by way of price through control during the war is made up to him during the period of transition after the war, in order that he may maintain his position among the different producers and consumers. That, in general terms, is the object of the bill and that is what we have in mind doing.

Many questions have been asked with regard to different subsections of section 9, and I think those can be best dealt with in committee. However, it might be necessary to call attention to certain remarks made with reference to paragraph (c) of subsection 1 of section 9. In that there will be found some reference to how certain products may have to be handled, and the question is asked, particularly by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), as to whether under that we are to set a price to consumers in Canada and whether we are to pay subsidies over and above these particular prices, or what is to happen, or what may happen under this legislation.

That clause was intended to deal with products such at cheese. Cheese is handled in a certain way in this country. It is largely produced by the cheese factories which are under control of the farmers who deliver their milk to the cheese factory, and their cheese is marketed before boards. They obtain certain price levels for that cheese. If nothing is done about it at all, cheese will go on to this market at the price level established before these boards, but it is conceivable that a price level of that kind may not be as high as the price level ought to be to take care of the circumstances then existing. In such circumstances the price would be paid by the factory to the farmer, and the factory would be reimbursed by the board.

That is a possibility under that clause of the bill, in which case it would result, to all intents and purposes, in a subsidy being paid to the producer. It has been stated that if that were carried to the extreme, and if the other powers given here were applied in certain ways, one might get certain results. I have no doubt that if the price were retained at too high a level, or the return at too high a level, one might get a greater production of some commodity than was desired; but in placing this bill before the house, I would impress upon hon. members that during the period through which we have been passing, and which we wish to have taken into consideration in deciding what we are to do in the transitional period, no one has been preventing the farmer from producing as much as he possibly can of the products we are discussing in this bill. The reason for that is that there has been a market for all these products. The only one for which we have not had an unlimited market is wheat, and that is not dealt with under this bill. But there has been up to date an unlimited market for all farm products we are discussing under the bill. I submit that it would not be just to the farmers to say to them, "In the first year after the war you must cut ten, twenty or twenty-five per cent off your production, and at the same time not provide that you should obtain a floor price for all the product you do produce, if that floor price may be above cost of production; because there has been a time during this war when some of our products were sold under cost of production. You may have to make an adjustment which is not based on cost of production alone."

That is another reason why the bill is applied to the transitional period. That does not mean that when the transitional period is up, any government which happens to be in power at that time is in duty bound to do away with the legislation in its entirety, that it will have no right to amend that legislation in any way. Of course, any house that may be here at any time after the war has the right to amend the measure in any way it may see fit. But this particular bill is for the purpose of dealing with a situation that does exist, as it exists, during the transitional period between war and peace. I hope that our markets for farm products for a period of years, possibly two or three or more, for most of our products, will be sufficiently good that we shall be able to obtain a price which is comparable with the price we are now obtaining for our farm products of different kinds. If so, the board that is in existence during that period of time will be keeping a check on what is happening during that period, comparing it with what happened during the war period; and immediately there is any necessity for taking action in connection with any farm product, authority is given the board under this legislation to purchase a surplus of that farm product at the floor price which the government of the day considers to be a reasonable floor in the light of all the facts existing in connection with the case.

I am asked, what will they do with all that, will they get rid of it? I can assure hon. members that if I am minister charged with the task, there will not be any of it that will be burned or dumped into the ocean or into the lake. One thing has been demonstrated to us during the war, and as a matter of fact we have always known it. We have always known that there are areas in the world where there are famines from time to time. There are areas where great masses of the population are never properly fed, and there has never been a time when it would not have been possible to take all the food commodities of Canada and send them to some place where someone could have made use of them. Unfortunately, in the past we have kept our actions of that kind limited pretty much to the people that we know most about. But we are entering upon a period when one can leave his home in any part of the world and be in any other part of the world in which he wishes to land sometime within the next twenty-four or forty-eight hours. Therefore the radius of our activities and our friendships and all that kind of thing will be very much wider when this war is over than they have ever been before. I am not worrying about finding some place where we can put the surplus food of a country that has only twelve million people in it to start with.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GARDINER: Before the dinner recess I was dealing with some of the points that were suggested by hon. members opposite, particularly the questions raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). Perhaps I can best sum up the answers I should like to give to those questions by saying that it would not be fair to the farmers of Canada to do certain things in the transition period. First, I should say it would not be fair to order them, immediately the war is over, to reduce production to the level at which it is certain the commodities could be sold at a given price. I was asked what we were going to do, provided that we had great surpluses, and I call attention to what I have just stated as an answer to that question, and to repeat what I said just before the dinner recess. During this war period we have been asked to increase production to the limit in order to provide food to those of our allies who require it, as well as to our own people. I repeat that it would be unfair to the farmers, immediately the war is over, to say they must reduce their production to the point where everything they produce can be disposed of at a given price. And I would state that this bill contains provision for dealing with a situation where a given price is essential for uncontrolled production during the transition period.

Then I should say it would be unfair to the farmer immediately to require him to sell at the cost of production, without considering at all any losses he sustained because of the war or any returns he was denied through the controls established during the war. The suggestion was made that farmers had been denied returns in the earlier part of the war and that just at the time when in the ordinary course of events, according to the experiences of the last war, he would have reaped some returns which would have been helpful to him, ceilings were placed upon prices, as a result of which he was denied as great a return as otherwise he might have received. All those matters would have to be taken into consideration during the transition period along the lines I have suggested.

Then, too, I should say it would be unfair to hold that because a farmer had an exceptionally good crop during the transition period he should be prepared to accept a low return per unit, and I make that statement also based upon what I said a few moments ago. During the period of control, in 1942 the farmers had one of the best crops they ever grew. They had a very fair crop in 1943, and it seems likely that this year they will have one of their very best crops again. During these three years we have had prices controlled. I am not at all sure, and neither is anyone in this house, how many years longer those controls are going to remain in effect, but up to the present the production of field crops has been far beyond what we had any right to expect at the time those controls were established. I make that statement in reply to the suggestion of the hon. member for Lethbridge this afternoon that because we had suggested that wheat acreage be reduced for the time being we were really paying the farmers to decrease production. If he had applied that statement to the efforts of the government in relation to wheat only, it would have been a statement of fact; but when one takes into consideration the further fact that the government made those payments in such a way as to increase the production of feed grains and in turn increase the production of live stock products, it cannot be said that the policy was intended to lower the production of food products. If the policy had been adopted for that purpose it certainly failed, because in 1942, 1943 and, as far as we can tell, in 1944, as was stated this afternoon by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver), our production has increased by at least fifty per cent. While hon. gentlemen opposite may not agree I venture to say that, making allowance for the fact that we had good weather in some of those years, these results have come about almost entirely from the policy that was announced and put into force by this government in relation to agriculture. So that I say the fact that we shall have had two very good crops and one average crop during the period of price ceilings should be taken into consideration in the post-war or transition period, and that farmers who were denied higher returns during war time should not be denied a fair return on their products simply because in some of the years following the war the yields may be very high.

One of the questions asked directly was this: Is this bill intended to make this country self-sustaining? I would put it in a little different form and say, if the question is whether this bill is intended to promote the production of everything we need in this country, or all the food products that we might desire to have in this country, then those of us who had to do with the drafting of the bill had no such idea in mind and did not intend that the legislation should be used for that purpose. The hon. member for Lethbridge was very much concerned as to how we were going to raise the money. He spoke of this $200,000,000 as an amount of money that had to be found somewhere in order to carry on the activities contemplated by this measure. Of course the $200,000,000 is a revolving fund. If a market can be found for all the products over which the government may take control, owing to the fact that they have taken charge of those products at floor prices through some of the organizations provided for in this legislation; if the government can dispose of all those products at floor prices, it will not be necessary to raise any money by taxation or in any other way. In other words, the $200,000,000 is provided in order to have a fund from which to purchase the commodities, or with which the purchase of commodities may be made. Those commodities may be some I mentioned in my speech this morning. One commodity might be butter purchased in the months of May, June and July, put in storage, and put back on this market at possibly the same price in the winter months with the costs added to it.

If the whole $200,000,000 were used for transactions of that kind, then, of course, it would not be necessary to raise money from taxes, or to issue paper money, or to do anything else of that kind, in order to get the money that would be necessary with which to carry on activities under the bill. But if, on the other hand, in dealing with some of these products we were to find it necessary in order to provide floor prices, which we think are essential to give the farmer a proper return, to place the products on this market in Canada, or on any other market at a price lower than that which we had paid under the floor, then it might be necessary to take part of the $200,000,000 in order to make up the difference between the price paid to the farmer for the surplus, and the price received from whatever country we were sending it to. In other words, there might be part of the money which would have to be found by general taxation, or in some other way. But to the extent that products can be disposed of at any price at all, the price received for them, or the money received for them, will go into this revolving fund. And if we make up $200,000,000 through transactions, it would not be necessary to raise anything by taxation.

Mr. STIRLING: In connection with a transaction such as that referred to, would the storage costs be paid for by money provided by parliament, or would they be charged against the $200,000,000?

Mr. GARDINER: I should not like to be too definite in my answer, because this is a matter which would be placed under a board, and which will be dealt with by the governor general in council from time to time. I should judge, however, that if the transactions in the products make it possible to have a balance, the costs would be taken out of the transactions in the products themselves. But if there were a case where a certain amount of money was being paid in order to maintain the price at a certain level, then I would not wish to be too definite as to what the board might decide to do. Just as is being done now, I think different products might be dealt with in different ways. Some products are now bearing all costs; with others some of the costs are being charged.

For example, we took over grass seeds some time ago. In providing for taking them over we took them over at a certain price level, and we are selling them out at a certain price level, in order to have the two balance. But the government is bearing the cost of administration in connection with it, and that means that to the extent of the administration costs there is really a subsidy on the product. There are some other products dealt with in that way, and some dealt with in the other. But they are all dealt with in the light of conditions surrounding the transactions.

The only other point I wish to deal with is a question raised by hon. members who have spoken from the other side of the house, and that is the question as to who is responsible for this kind of legislation. Well, there is only one thing I can say, so far as this piece of legislation is concerned, and it is this: I am absolutely certain as to who is responsible for its drafting. I am also just as certain as to who is responsible for bringing it into this house. I am also absolutely certain, as a matter of fact, that I would not have brought it into the house if it had not had the support of the whole government. So that there can be no question as to who is responsible for having this legislation in the position in which it is at the present time.

I am fairly certain of another thing. I do not recall at this time a single piece of social service legislation that ever got into this house through any other medium than that of the Liberal party.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GARDINER: It is all very well to be able to go back to conventions, to be able to go back to meetings at which people spoke here and there throughout the country, and quote what was said, and what was to be done, as indicated in the form of resolutions. But the fact remains that every piece of important social service legislation that has ever been brought into this house has been brought in by a Liberal government.

The outstanding illustration of that—and I think it is an illustration which demonstrates conclusively what I say—is this: When family allowances were first announced they did not have the outspoken support of any one of the political parties sitting opposite. Every one of them gave support, but with reservations, when those family allowances were first announced.

I have noticed, too, in connection with this legislation, that there has not been a single member on the opposite side of the house—and I am not referring to hon. members sitting in the corner of the chamber to your immediate left, Mr. Speaker—not a single member rising on the opposite side of the house has unreservedly supported the legislation. They have said, "Oh, the principle is good. If you are going to do with this legislation what we think you are going to do, then it is all very fine, and we are all for it. But if you are going to do something else"—and I do not know where they got these other ideas, because certainly they are not in the bill—

Mr. GILLIS: Just from past experience.

Mr. GARDINER: They say, "If you are going to do something else, then we would not be in favour of it." What I point to is this, that they are just hoping that something will develop that they will be able to hang themselves on, when the time comes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: We will hang you with it.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, my hon. friend says they will hang me with it.

Mr. PERLEY: It will hang on your past record.

Mr. GARDINER: I know the record of the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden). He used to live in my town. As a matter of fact he used to support me. And you do not need to take my word for it, because it is on the record. I know some of the reasons why he does not support me to-day, but it certainly was not that he was ever able to hang me anywhere.

The situation in this matter is simply this, that right back through history, as far as you wish to go, it will be found that Liberals advocate a certain policy over a certain period of time. They eventually put it on the statute books, and it works well. Then our Conservative friends agree with it. In other words, right through the history of the development of our democratic institutions within the British empire, the Liberal party has been the leader in reform—and the Conservative party has had to be convinced.

I am pleased to have lived to see the day when all that the leader of the Conservative party can find on which to hang an appeal to the people at the present time is policies which have been advocated and put into effect by the Liberal party over a long period of years. In other words, we have apparently succeeded in doing what was done in Britain about a hundred years ago when the leader of the Conservative party, although he was leading the government, was persuaded for the first time to become an advocate of free trade in commodities being passed to and from Great Britain. While it is true that after that both parties agreed with the policy, that did not alter the fact that those of the Conservative point of view—I have not any great criticism of them for holding that point of view other than to say that it tends to retard reform—have always tended to hold on to the things they have just as long as they possibly can. Then when they find they cannot hold on any longer, and the great majority of the people are in favour of it, they come in and agree. I said the other day when the leader of the socialist party—I say that advisedly—socialist party, not socialistic party—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Cooperative Commonwealth Federation to you.

Mr. GARDINER: I hope my hon. friends are not becoming ashamed of the term "socialism".

Mr. CASTLEDEN: We are not, but you call us national socialists.

Mr. GARDINER: I sometimes believe that they are. Every piece of socialistic or social service legislation which has been brought into this house, and almost every piece of socialistic or social service legislation which has been brought into the provincial legislatures of this country, have been brought in by a Liberal government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not true. What about workmen's compensation?

Mr. GARDINER: You can make a speech some other time. I have listened to you saying a lot of things I thought were not true. The other day I said across the floor of the house that if our hon. friends of the socialist party had joined the Liberal party they would be farther away from Toryism than they are in the socialist party, and they questioned me. Every student of history in this country knows that Conservatism, or to go back beyond Conservatism to Toryism, had its birth in an attempt to hold the land and everything else in Great Britain under the ownership and control of the crown. In other words, the ownership of property and everything else in the original days following Norman rule in Britain was based upon the principle of state ownership. The whole battle between Liberalism and Toryism in Britain was a battle against state ownership and control. For that reason I say that when our hon. friends, in order to obtain what they consider to be reforms, base their ideas upon that of state ownership, it is a retroactive step and not a progressive one that they are attempting to take. I believe that the Progressive Conservatives of to-day are more advanced Tories than are the socialists.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a kind of left-handed compliment.

Mr. GARDINER: That brings me to this. We have only the Liberalism left. These other groups who are claiming credit for everything that has been brought forth in this session under the name of Liberalism either do not know their history or are simply attempting to occupy the position which the Liberal party has occupied throughout the history of this country and throughout a considerable part of the history of Great Britain.

I am quite sure that in spite of the fact that they have had some encouragement—this applies more particularly to our hon. friends opposite to the extreme right—they should again read the history of this country. One has only to look back a few years to find the time when we had only one representative from Saskatchewan; one has only to look back to the same year to find that there was not a single representative of the Conservative party from that province; yet in the intervening period there has not been a member who was associated with the group which at that time swept the province elected to this house. In other words, there are certain principles related to the carrying on of government which abide in spite of all the intervening attacks that are made upon them. One of the principles which have remained in the minds of a great many people in this country is the principle which has established Liberalism, not only in Great Britain, not only in this country, but in the Atlantic charter and every other great charter that has been drawn up as a result of the activities of this war.

When I say that I give answer to the question asked me by the hon. member for Lethbridge, in which he associated himself with the hon. member for Lake Centre. The Liberal party does not believe and never has believed that we could advance the welfare of the human race by producing all the things that are necessary to our existence within the bounds of our own country. We have never believed either that we should produce an economy in this country or in any other country where all the activities should be associated with the production only of things that we ourselves require and want and need.

The hon. member for Lethbridge would like to know why we are not more concerned about the production of rubber, why we are not more concerned about the production of some other commodities. The answer is to be found in the history of the last twenty or twenty-five years. During that time certain nations tried to make themselves self-supporting or self-sustaining, and the penalty was the building up of the greatest war machine the world has ever known. I am not one of those who would associate himself with the idea that appeared to be in the mind of the hon. member for Lethbridge when he suggested that unless we did certain things, unless we provided ourselves with the commodities that we might be able to obtain from some other part of the world, we were going to find ourselves some day in the midst of another war when we would not be able to obtain the things we have not been able to obtain easily during this war.

I want to say that the only principle which will end war is the principle that the people of every country should put all their force to work producing the commodities that they are most suited to produce. They should produce them in abundance and then they should exchange those commodities with the commodities that other people can produce to better advantage than anyone else. If we all do that there will not be any necessity for war. People fight for food; people fight for shelter; people fight for clothing, but give them the things which they desire to have and which they need in order to live, and people cease to fight.

We have proof of that in the history of the British empire, since they adopted the policy of moving commodities as freely as possible. We have proof of that in the United States where forty-eight states have joined together instead of living on half the continent as half a dozen different countries, and where there is the freest movement of their products among the different states that is to be found anywhere in the world. The same principle is being demonstrated again to the peoples of the world through the different conferences and activities that are being carried on in connection with this war. In my opinion, the only principle that is going to establish that period of peace for which we are all hoping is that very principle which is accepted by peoples of liberal minds and people of conservative minds in Britain, by free men generally and by democratic countries the world over. I hope that as a result of this struggle which has brought us all nearer to one another in distance than we ever were before, these principles may be applied to the whole world and, if they are, I am convinced that we shall have the resulting peace that we all desire.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, on this section perhaps I might be permitted to say a word. I refrained from taking part in the discussion on the second reading of the bill because I felt that there were many in this house who were much better qualified than I to discuss the important subject matter of this bill. I am surprised that the minister has just made the type of speech which he has on a bill which, so far as I could observe, had no partisan considerations invested in it.

Mr. GARDINER: You should have been here this afternoon.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): At least I did not approach the consideration of this bill on the theory that it was a partisan bill or that there would be any attempt made to make political capital out of its provisions. I regret that there has been injected into the discussion of the bill a spirit of partisanship which I believe is entirely uncalled for.

It has been urged on many occasions by many bodies, especially those interested in agricultural production and distribution, that having regard to the depressed conditions of agriculture in that great period of depression which began in 1929 and followed on for a period of ten years, and that great period of deflation, some steps should be taken by this legislature to prevent a repetition of that disastrous era. With that theory I was in full accord because I know as a representative of a semi-rural community of the disastrous nature of that period to the whole national economy. I had given some thought to this very problem and I was hopeful that with the staff at the command of the minister, those versed in economic problems and especially the problems of agriculture and the economic aspects of production, and especially of distribution, a scheme would be evolved for the peace-time period to which we are all so devoutly looking forward that would have brought some specific remedy for the situation which may be envisioned as time goes on.

I recall the statements which were made in the speech from the throne. I recall having read the speech of the Minister of Agriculture in London to which he referred this morning; I recall other declarations which have been made from time to time on this subject matter, and recalling these things I thought something affirmative would be produced which would lay down certain principles by which the objectives sought would be attained. And what have we? We have a measure based on the if, as and when principle.

Mr. KINLEY: It is a good principle.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, it is a measure of what it may be expedient to do in a given period of time in a somewhat remote future. It is a matter, therefore, of entire speculation. I must confess that sympathetic as I am to the objective of all of us I am disappointed that no real solution of this problem has been reached. I have reflected on this matter, and I have come to the conclusion, because of the inexorable laws of economics, the principles of supply and demand—and here I find myself in agreement with the minister when he said that we should not do anything to retard production of agricultural products in the post-war period—because of the very nature of the problem from an economic point of view, while I had hoped that a specific remedy would be found, that no formula can be adopted that would be entirely satisfactory or hold out the promise of that which we all desire to attain.

Canada is an agricultural country. We have large surpluses and those surpluses must be exported. They are subject to world competition and world prices, and unless we are prepared to resort tremendously to the principle of subsidies in peace time—and I do not think the minister or anybody else likes that kind of economy—I do not think any real solution of this problem in peace time can be found.

I have always thought that in a peace-time period the best prices that could be obtained for our butter, we will say, were obtained when our domestic consumption of butter just about equalled our production. When we had a surplus there was bound to be a drop in the price of this important farm product. Therefore, so far as my intelligence carries me, I have reached the conclusion that no economic formula can be adopted which will carry with it the objective that every one of us would like to see attained. I daresay that is also the result of the minister's own investigations and the investigations of his advisers. Perforce he has been driven by the old laws of economics, which are in peace time more or less inexorable, to adopt a policy which, after all, in its final analysis means subsidization. I cannot see anything else for it. I must confess, therefore, to a certain degree of disappointment with the measure that has been brought down which is now before us and which we have been debating to-day; yet, to be absolutely fair about the matter, I do not know what else the minister could have done. I am going to pay him that compliment. He may think it is a left-handed compliment, but it is not intended to be. It is intended to show that if this is his considered judgment, that it is the only thing that can be done and that no other legislation is possible, then I think the country ought to accept it. I thought it was in that spirit that we were debating the matter to-day. I am a bit disillusioned by the minister's speech, because I thought he went out of his way to make a political dissertation over a matter that should be far beyond the realm of party politics. I suppose he will not pay much attention to that; he has said that he has not paid much attention to things that I have said in the past with which he has not agreed. Be that as it may—

Mr. GARDINER: I just said that. I did not say they were untrue.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understood the minister did not want to be interrupted; that was his way of settling me for the time being, and I am not disposed to quarrel with the position he has taken.

May I now, having dwelt on the principle of the measure, refer just for a moment to the political aspect of the minister's speech. I know that this is outside the rules, but I ask the Chairman to forgive me. The minister is quite in error when he says that the only social legislation ever introduced into this house was introduced by the Liberal party.

Mr. KINLEY: Passed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; he said "introduced into this house." That, of course, is not a correct reading of history. He was not here between 1930 and 1935—

Mr. GARDINER: I qualified it with the word "important".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not important either. I recall to his mind that a very earnest and sincere attempt was made on the part of the government of that day to introduce social legislation, and I will say this further that we thought it was based on sound, legal, constitutional considerations. The courts declared otherwise, and we have to abide by the result. But the minister must not think, and I do not want anyone in this house to think, nor do I believe the country thinks, that the membership of the Liberal party has a monopoly of all the virtues, that it has a monopoly of all fine feeling for the well-being of the people of the country, for that is not true. He talked about Liberalism as they had it in England, and about reforms instituted in England. I wonder if his reading of the history of England is the same as mine. I recall to him that, nowithstanding the fact that the so-called reform measures were first introduced in England in 1832 by what might now be termed a Liberal government, it was the great Disraeli who really gave reform to the electoral system in England and extended the franchise far beyond anything that was ever thought of by the Whigs of that day. History does not bear out what the hon. gentleman said, and I have read my history too.

Mr. GARDINER: I gave Peel credit.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am reminded that perhaps the greatest reformer of the last century, Lord Shaftesbury, was not a Liberal. He was a son of an old Conservative family, or Tory if you like, in Britain; yet he has to his credit the advocacy of more reforms in the United Kingdom than any Liberal government headed by Gladstone or anyone else.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): That has nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I quite agree that it has not; neither had the minister's remarks. Nearly all the remarks he made to-night were irrelevant to the bill, but he took the opportunity, after the debate had been closed, to chastise and castigate those of us who profess Conservative principles, and to show that we were as dust under the feet of the Liberal party and had no place at all in the sun.

Mr. GARDINER: I was answering what was said when you were not here.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be true, and yet I cannot let these things go unchallenged if I am given an opportunity to reply to them.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You only went back a hundred years; he went back a thousand.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes. He went back to the time of the Norman Conquest and blamed the Tory party of England for the system of land tenure that was set up by William of Normandy.

Mr. GARDINER: No. I blamed them for defending it, not for setting it up.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My recollection of history is that the defence came more from the Whigs of the last century and the eighteenth century than from any other part of the nation.

Mr. GARDINER: You and I have not been reading the same history.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be true, but my recollection is that there was a time when the crown as such was battling manfully against the Tory party of the day for various aspects of land tenure.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right. I have said nearly all I want to say on that.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have the floor on a point of order. I have spent the whole of this Saturday afternoon in the house; I am going to stay here until eleven o'clock on Saturday night; and I say that this bill, one of the greatest on behalf of the farmers of Canada, should be proceeded with. I do not care a hoot what happened a thousand years ago. Let us get on with the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The point of order is well taken. I will not for a moment dispute that. But the minister took time out himself to raise these issues and I am entitled to a little leeway. If the minister is to have that leeway I claim it for this side of the house. I am in the hands of the chairman. If he decides that I may not proceed any longer I certainly will not.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for York-Sunbury qualified his position in this connection before he stated it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He has gone back a thousand years.

The CHAIRMAN: I thought he had the unanimous consent of the committee to make the statement he did, and that was why he was allowed to continue.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have said nearly all I want to say in that regard.

I wish to make just one or two further observations about this bill. The minister has correctly stated that the fund to be set up is to be a revolving fund and that it is to be used in the discretion of the members of the board who are to be appointed under the authority of the measure to buy surplus commodities. I assume that is perfectly practicable in connection with certain commodities, but I assert that with respect to other commodities it will be found wholly impracticable. I am not referring especially to agricultural products at the moment, but more particularly to the products of the fisheries, and perhaps I shall have something to say with respect to that when a similar bill comes down which is being sponsored by the Minister of Fisheries. Yet this whole thing is to be left on the basis of the judgment of the board, advised, if you will, by the advisory council set up under the bill, a board which will have very large powers. It will not be subject to parliamentary control, and not even to ministerial control.

I think that is one of the weaknesses of the bill. What supervision has parliament, which will have to vote the money, over the authority of this board in peace time? I put that query to the minister and he may answer it when he comes to the appropriate section. We have in war time delegated authority to boards and commissions that are not responsible to parliament. We have done so under the theory that this is necessary for the effective prosecution of the war. I suggest that we cannot apply that policy to peace time and vacate the authority of parliament; yet, as I have said perhaps twice before, I have given considerable thought to this bill and to the provisions of it, and having at heart the objective which the bill was intended to reach, I must confess to the minister that I do not know that anything could have been done but to introduce this bill. I do not pretend to be dogmatic about the matter. I do not pretend to know enough about the science of economics to say that another and more complete plan could have been brought before parliament; therefore I did not oppose this bill in any way. I am sympathetic to the bill, and I do not think we ought to be chastised because we are critical of certain specific methods that are to be adopted when we all want to see something accomplished along the lines that have been indicated in the debate.

I was very much interested in the figures which the minister gave this morning. If they showed anything it was this, that in what we call the transitional period there is not going to be very much danger of a sharp decline in agricultural products. That is my recollection of what happened after the last war. What we have to fear in this country more than anything else is that there may be a period of inflation after certain controls are removed which, I think, the people will clamour to have removed; that there will be a period of inflation such as we had from 1925 to 1929, a period of inflation that was absolutely uncontrolled in Canada, and I do not think it could have been controlled, because of conditions in the United States.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not think there was any inflation so far as agricultural products were concerned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; I did not say there was inflation with regard to agricultural products. The inflation I am referring to was inflation in the stock market which had its reflection on every part of the economy of the whole continent. That is the thing that I am afraid of more than anything else, and that is the thing we ought to keep our eye on. I have a feeling that in what we term the transitional period, which will be from the cessation of hostilities until, we will say, demobilization is completed—

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, longer than that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It may be. I hope that demobilization will not be carried out in as hasty a manner as it was after the last war, due, I think, largely to the desire of the men in the armed forces to get out of uniform under any consideration. That, I believe, is quite true—

Mr. MITCHELL: Will they not feel the same way this time?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I daresay they will, and that is the biggest problem that the government will have to meet. There will be, of course, the intense desire on the part of the men who are at present in uniform to get back home and be done with this cruel business once and for all, to return and become reestablished in civil life; and yet I hope that the period will not be rushed. I hope that wise counsel will prevail and that a substantial time will intervene between the cessation of hostilities and total demobilization. I have no idea how long that would be; it may be one year, two years, three years or four years. I do not think it could run beyond two and a half years. When these men get back into civil life and production of consumer goods has been started in a big way, I think this country is going to have good times, and I believe agricultural produce will be in great demand. I fancy, if there is anything in Europe with which to buy our commodities we shall have a fine export market. I am just a little bit afraid that the impoverished nations of Europe will not be able to buy the produce of our farms. I am just afraid that the starving population of Germany that must live if they are to survive at all by producing those goods which they can produce and exporting to this country—

Mr. MITCHELL: The same for Great Britain.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I am just taking Germany as an example because she cannot survive unless she is allowed and encouraged to produce and to export. Those goods that she will produce and export are bound to come into competition with the industrial life of the new world. That is what

I think the leading industrialists in the United States visualize. Therefore, unless the peoples of Europe can find money to buy the products of our farms I have great fears as to our being able to establish and carry out a substantial export trade.

I think the people of this country, notwithstanding the high praises that the minister has tendered to his own party and its political philosophies, will be willing to wait and see how this legislation works out. I think they will be willing to give anything a trial that the best brains of the country say is the best that can be produced. Yet I am not satisfied that it is the best that can be produced. I offer no alternative; I do not know enough about the situation to offer an alternative, and in that I am entirely honest and frank. Therefore, while I think we are 100 per cent behind the objective of this bill, yet I believe that the minister should not have gone out of his way to give us all a lecture at this time in the house, and that is really what I wanted to say.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I believe that our time would be much better spent in looking forward rather than in looking at the history of the past. In order to keep the record straight I should like to say something in regard to the reference that the minister made to myself. He said that I had previously supported the Liberal party. It was 1926 when I first went to his town that I supported the Liberal party.

Mr. GARDINER: I am talking about 1929.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I went to your town in 1926.

Mr. GARDINER: The time I was talking about was 1929.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I supported you in 1929. If proper social legislation had been forthcoming from the Liberal party in this country I might have been supporting it yet.

Mr. MARTIN: You will do it again.

Mr. MITCHELL: You will come back to earth.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It was the failure of the Liberal party which caused us to build this new cooperative party.

Mr. GARDINER: You changed while we were not in power.

Mr. MARTIN: You have a long life ahead of you.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The minister has not been defeated since 1914.

Mr. GARDINER: No.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And you were Premier of Saskatchewan in 1929. It was because of the failure of the Liberal party that we found it necessary to start building a new democratic social party.

Mr. MITCHELL: What is new about socialism?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Now that is straightened out, let us get on with the business.

Mr. BURTON: I did not take part in the debate on second reading of this bill for two reasons. One was that I was in full accord, as were the other members of this group, with the principles contained in the bill. The second was that other members of the group had previously stated our position, and I did not think it necessary to take up any of the time of the house on second reading of the bill. However, I say that while I enjoyed listening to the minister in his first speech on introducing the bill and enjoyed still more his speech when he closed the debate, yet, like the hon. member for York-Sunbury, I feel that it would have been a better speech had he left out some of the things which he felt it was necessary to bring in toward the close of that speech. It seems to me that the minister is not satisfied, even though he has support for his bill from all sides of the house; he must have unqualified, unquestioned support for the dot over every "i" and the cross over every "t". With his experience in the legislature and in parliament he certainly knows it is the duty of those sitting in opposition to help the government to improve legislation that is presented to the house. When we offer criticism in committee of the whole, which is the proper place to deal with the details of a bill, we are not only exercising our right but performing our duty as we should. So that if the minister has not known it up to the present, we are serving notice that we are not sheep in his fold. While we are in agreement with the principles contained in this bill, still we contend that certain parts of it need to be improved if it is to come up to the expectations of those whom it is designed to help.

The minister questioned the wisdom of those who suggested that this legislation should remain in effect beyond merely the transition period, that it should be of a more or less permanent nature. He contended that it would be required only during the period of transition, and that if it were found necessary to extend its life that could be done by the government of the day. I should like to point out to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the members of the committee that this bill contains a provision authorizing the government to bring the legislation to an end by order in council. The hon. member for York-Sunbury dealt briefly with what took place following the last war, and I should like to enlarge on that a little. The transition period then was from 1918 to the early twenties. It is quite true that in the early twenties we had a little slump, but I am sure hon. members will agree that if nothing worse than that had had to be contended with, we would have come through pretty easily. Certainly by 1925 the period of transition from war to peace was ended; and if this legislation had been in effect at that time, and the then government had held the views of this government, an order in council would have been put through suspending the measure. But what happened after that? We all know what took place after the boom period from 1925 to 1929, and that is what may happen again. Therefore I say that in connection with some sections of this bill we consider ourselves justified and, in fact, in duty bound to suggest to the government that it be strengthened in certain details.

I am a new and comparatively young member of this house. The minister went back a very considerable period of time, but he did not quite go the length of trying to tell some of us that he had thought of this kind of legislation while we were in our cradles or in kindergarten, although he got very close to it. I want to tell the minister that we are quite prepared to give him and his government credit for having brought in this bill, but I want to tell him further that the people out in the country have been asking for legislation like this for a long time, and have not had it. I may not be as old and as experienced as the minister, but I have been told many times that it does people good to go through trials and tribulations because it makes them face up to their wrongdoings in the past. Yes, it is very often quite beneficial to face sinners with the consequences of their wrongdoing. The only trouble is that very often the sinners see the error of their ways too late. However, if even at this late date we can help to make their repentance complete and sincere, we shall have performed our duty as an opposition.

The CHAIRMAN: Before we proceed further I must state here that the Chair has a duty to perform. I believe I am voicing the sentiments of the great majority of the members of this committee when I suggest that we should come down to earth now and discuss the bill which is before us.

Mr. PERLEY: I did not intend to say anything at this stage, Mr. Chairman, but I was very much surprised this evening—

Mr. GARDINER: Did you change your mind and decide to make another speech?

Mr. PERLEY: I did not interrupt the minister when he was making his speech, although he had three shots at this measure. I was surprised when the minister took advantage of the opportunity, at this stage of the proceedings, to make what could only be termed a political speech. I should say he made a campaign speech; perhaps it will be the last one he will have a chance to make here.

The CHAIRMAN: I just gave a ruling, by which I would ask the hon. member to abide. The hon. member for York-Sunbury qualified his statement before making it, by saying he knew he was out of order and asking for leave to make a few remarks. However, I would ask hon. members to discuss the bill itself.

Mr. PERLEY: Then I shall refer to the section you have called. The principle underlying this bill is similar to the principle underlying the wheat board act of 1935. Why was that bill brought in? Because we were facing a situation similar to the one we are facing to-day with respect to the marketing of wheat, the chief product of our agriculture.

Mr. HATFIELD: Wheat is not under the bill.

Mr. PERLEY: No; but the underlying principle is the same. On that occasion the measure was brought down early in the session and, as I said this afternoon, this measure should have been brought in much sooner. Then it could have been sent to the committee on agriculture, where it could have been considered section by section. We could have had before that committee men like the present chairman of the bacon board and others who have had something to do with the marketing of these products for the last two or three years. I protest once more against this important measure being brought in at this very late stage of the session. We have to find a solution of this important problem of the marketing of agricultural products. We shall not find it along political lines, or in listening to political speeches. We must work as a united parliament.

I just wanted to make this statement before we went farther. I think it would have been a fine thing if this bill had been referred to the committee on agriculture early in the session, where it could have been thoroughly studied. I am in favour of the principle, but in closing let me say that you will not see the opposition to this bill that we encountered in connection with the wheat board act. At that time an amendment was brought in providing that the measure should not become operative until August 1, 1936, a year later. You will not get that in this case, because we want this bill to operate properly, to take care of the post-war period.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. HATFIELD: I should like to know why all agricultural products in a processed and manufactured state are not included in this bill. In my opinion that is the only way we can take the surplus off the market, namely, by processing and manufacturing agricultural products. In my view all agricultural products should be included in paragraph (a). All that are included are processed meats, and dairy and poultry products. We use the surplus potato crop by manufacturing the potatoes into potato starches and flour.

Mr. GARDINER: It is intended to cover all agricultural products, except wheat.

Mr. MARTIN: Including corn?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, including corn. "Agricultural products" means any products of agriculture, except wheat, designated by the governor in council, and includes processed meat, dairy and poultry products if so designated.

Mr. HATFIELD: Why "meat, dairy and poultry products"?

Mr. GARDINER: There was some question as to whether certain products, when some distance removed from the farm—and we had in mind corn flakes and things of that kind—might properly be included. I wanted to make absolutely certain that there would be no question about dairy products, and products of that kind. Those words were inserted for that reason.

Mr. WRIGHT: When the minister spoke upon introducing the bill I asked some questions as to what was included. I mentioned specifically coarse grains, and the minister then suggested that they were under the control of the wheat board, and would not come under this bill.

Mr. GARDINER: No; I said that wheat was not under the bill at all. But I did say that if it were declared by the government that we required floor prices under coarse grains, in all probability the wheat board would be appointed as the commodity board to handle oats and barley—but after decision had been reached under this bill, and they had been appointed the same as any other board must be appointed.

Mr. BRYCE: Will honey and honey products come under the bill?

Mr. GARDINER: It is possible for any agricultural product, with the exception of wheat.

Mr. HATFIELD: Why does not wheat come under the bill?

Mr. GARDINER: Because there is a wheat board act which involves the same principle, and is applied to wheat now.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have no doubt the answer I shall receive from the minister will be in the affirmative, but I ask the question for clarification. I would assume that horticultural products would be included under "agricultural products". When we refer to horticultural products we generally have in mind all garden and orchard crops.

Mr. GARDINER: It is possible for them to be brought under the bill. They are natural products of agriculture.

Mr. GRAYDON: There has always been some question as to whether the broad word "agriculture" does include "horticulture". My view is the same as that held by the minister, namely, that the word "agriculture" can be interpreted to cover the field of horticulture.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Could we have a more definite statement from the minister with respect to fruits, and certain other agricultural or horticultural products? I have in mind apples, which would be of particular interest to Nova Scotia. In former years prices of strawberries were depressed considerably below the cost of production. What about blueberries, and commodities of that kind? There should be a clear and definite statement from the minister as to whether, under the bill, floor prices will be established to protect the products I have mentioned.

I might refer to peaches as a horticultural product; we should have some statement with respect to them. Some years we have a surplus crop of peaches, and no market for them. The question arises as to whether there will be a guaranteed or protected price on peaches, along with the other commodities I have mentioned.

Mr. GARDINER: The definition is as plain as it can be made. It includes any agricultural product, except wheat. There surely cannot be any doubt about that, because it covers them all. Of course, if I am asked to say to-night that there will be a floor price under any particular product, I could not do so, because I would be going far beyond what it is possible for me to say under the bill. The fact is that we are setting up a board to make recommendations to the government, and decisions, based upon those recommendations, are finally made by the governor in council.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Just to make it definitely sure—and I know the minister has been specific, but what he has said sounds almost too good to be true—I am wondering if this applies to any agricultural product, in either its natural or its processed state. That is, could the bill be used, for example, for the support of sugar, flour, starch, canned vegetables, canned fruits, bran, shorts, flax seed, various kinds of foods for animals, and all that kind of thing? Would they be included, in either their natural or their processed state?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not wish to start limiting the definition. It refers to any natural farm products. I said a few minutes ago that some question had arisen as to whether it would be wise to include products such as corn flakes. I would not like to say that it takes in every possible form of processed products. That is something we must leave to the judgment of the board, the advisory committee, and others, at the time a matter is being dealt with. I would not like to say definitely that it includes everything of that kind. But the intention is that all agricultural products, in all the forms in which they are generally sold, will be included, so long as they can be related to the fact that they were produced on the farm. They will come under this bill.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am particularly concerned about this question, because under section 9 (1) (c) we find this:

> To pay to the producers of an agricultural product directly or through such agent as the board may determine. . . .

We will suppose that the bill applies both to a canning company that is canning beans and peas, and to the people who are producing those beans and peas to be canned. My question arises as to whether the primary producer or the processing producer would be paid.

Mr. GARDINER: There would be no payment made, except under conditions that the money advanced would go to the original producer. Take the case I mentioned this afternoon, the cheese factories. Payment would be made in such a way that any subsidy paid would go to the farmers.

Mr. BLACKMORE: One reason why this will stand out in the minds of my constituents is that it reflects indirectly upon the beef question over which we had trouble in the spring. The producers of beef had the idea that purchases would be made directly from them, but as a matter of fact they were made from the packing companies, the processors of the beef, which was an entirely different matter. There are possibilities of great misunderstanding and unhappiness unless the whole matter is clarified.

Mr. BURTON: The minister stated that if coarse grains were desired the government could declare them as being under this legislation. They could bring butter in for a certain period, or barley, or apples, which the hon. member for Cumberland mentioned. All the commodities would not necessarily be under the bill for the same length of time; it would depend upon what the governor in council set for each commodity.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not catch the last part of the question.

Mr. BURTON: All commodities would not necessarily come under the bill for the same length of time.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think there is any one in the house or any one outside the house who is interested in agriculture who has any intention of doing anything under this bill to bring down prices to the farmers. As long as the price is satisfactory, as long as conditions are such that a floor is not required, I do not think any one is going to suggest that we do something which might suggest to some one else that there should be less paid for that farm product. As has been stated right through, the duty of this board will be to study conditions existing now and conditions that exist during the transitional period. As long as the product is being sold, under whatever is the system of doing business, at a price which is either satisfactory or more than satisfactory to the farming community, there would be no necessity for the government to maintain a floor price. The different commodities will be studied at all times, and it is possible that in some areas there may be only one product under which it is necessary to put a floor, or there may be half a dozen. The recommendation will be made by the board as to the level at which the government should be prepared to take the product, and then that will be established as the floor for whatever season is required.

Mr. BURTON: Would the government intend under this bill to say at the beginning of each season that a particular commodity comes under the bill?

Mr. GARDINER: The board will have authority to act at any time. On any day of the week they can make a recommendation to the government. Take butter, for instance. As I have said on a number of occasions during this discussion, the peak production is in May, June and July. The tendency before the war was for butter to sell at about twenty cents a pound in the summer and at about thirty-five cents a pound in the winter. I would hope that it would not be the intention or desire of anyone who may have control over this legislation to permit that to happen during the transitional period. If there were any chance of it happening, say around May 1 or in the middle of April, the board could make its recommendations to the government and action could be taken. That action might be necessary only down to October and then from October on it might only be a matter of selling the butter or putting it back on the market at whatever price level had been decided upon.

Mr. HATFIELD: My understanding of this bill is that if the price of an agricultural product goes below the cost of production the board immediately takes action to remove the surplus from the market or to bring the market price up to the cost of production, perhaps by taking the commodity off the market, putting it in storage or processing it. Is that right?

Mr. GARDINER: I was careful to see that there was nothing in the bill which said that we were going to base any decision on the cost of production. The cost of production may be only part of the consideration. I think it is possible the board might determine that the farmer should have considerably more than his cost of production because of some other experience he has had in order to get through the transitional period in a proper position.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What we are concerned about is that the time may come when the board may force the farmer to take less than the cost of production.

Mr. GARDINER: I would hope that that time will not come and I do not think it is likely to under this bill.

Mr. BRYCE: The minister has mentioned butter as an example. There is a ten cent subsidy on that and I should like to know if this board will blend that subsidy into the price? The butter producer gets the ten cents a pound because he cannot produce economically without it. Will this board have anything to do with that?

Mr. GARDINER: It is difficult to say what the position will be at the time. The hon. member for York-Sunbury said that he was looking forward to the time when many of these controls will be taken off. He is not looking forward any more anxiously than I am, or than I imagine many members of this house are. I would hope that at some time not too far distant some of the controls we now have will be taken off. It is just possible that some of those we would like to see removed may not be removed for a longer period than others.

The position in relation to butter is a peculiar one. We have never attempted to produce butter for export from this country; we have always tried to produce just enough to supply our own people. We make mistakes in that connection sometimes. It is just possible that if we were trying to control the price level of butter we might find ourselves with a short supply and have to purchase butter from the places other people have had to buy it in the past, namely, New Zealand or Australia. In that situation some money might have to be spent in certain directions, but I would hope that the matter could be regulated in such a way that it would be possible for the people in this country to pay for their butter at what the butter is thought to be worth. The simplest way to carry on the transaction under those circumstances would be to have the butter taken at a certain price and to dispose of it at approximately the same price, with whatever difference is necessary in order to carry the expenses of the transaction.

Then, if we have to deal with cheese, the other dairy product, we find that seventy per cent of the product is sold outside the country and only thirty per cent consumed in the country. The situation is somewhat different and would have to be handled in a different way. There is no possibility of having any price arrangement in Canada which would take care of that product entirely.

Mr. BRYCE: Milk is in the same category because it is something that is used 365 days in a year. Milk is being subsidized so that the consumer will buy more of it. Everybody tells us that we have prosperity to-day, and nobody denies that; I do not deny it myself. But what a price we have to pay for the prosperity we have! In one township in my riding we had nine boys killed at war in the last week alone. Farmers do not want prosperity like that. We want to get back to the basis where we have a square deal and a fair price. No farmer wants to charge extortionate prices. I hope that this bill will result in a square deal and fair prices. Let us make whatever amendments may be necessary to bring that about. If the bill does not do that you are going to come to the end of your tether and we shall be back where we were. I hope the minister will take that into consideration.

Mr. GARDINER: I think the authorities under the bill will have those considerations in mind.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Agricultural prices support board.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It seems to me that subsection 1 is loosely drafted. I should like to know whether or not the meaning of this clause is that the board shall be subject to the direction of the minister, or alternatively, that the board shall only be set up should the minister so direct. If the minister will answer my question I will make my suggestion.

Mr. GARDINER: The meaning is that the board in its operations will be under the direction of the minister, and through him under the direction of the government.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then I suggest that the clause as drafted does not convey that meaning. I suggest that it should read as follows:

> There shall be an agricultural prices support board consisting of three members, including a chairman and a vice-chairman, to be appointed by the governor in council and who shall hold office during pleasure, which board shall be subject to the direction of the minister.

It appears to me that the clause, as drawn, is capable of only one meaning, that the board shall not obligatorily be set up but rather shall be set up only on the direction of the minister.

Mr. GARDINER: The clause was drafted in the justice department. The Minister of Justice is here. The clause reads:

> There shall be, under the direction of the minister, an agricultural prices support board. . . .

It does not give the minister any part in setting up the board.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I think it is loosely drafted.

Mr. GARDINER: I think it means what it is intended to mean, but the other would mean that, too.

Mr. GRAYDON: The change suggested by the hon. member for Lake Centre is a very simple one and would make the clause absolutely clear. I am impressed with his suggestion, which would involve adding no new words but simply be a transposition of one part of the clause. Or you might say: "There shall be an agricultural prices support board under the direction of the minister," and so on. I do not know whether that meets my colleague's suggestion, but I think that the clause is badly drafted. I am quite sure that the Minister of Justice had no personal responsibility for it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, the Minister of Justice had no personal responsibility, but he would not like to admit that it was bad drafting. There can be no serious objection, I think, to adopting either the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lake Centre or the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. GRAYDON: They were both intended to cover the same thing.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: As I listened to them I thought the directions of the minister were not coming in at quite the same place. I am sure that we are all agreed as to what is intended, and if it is felt by any members of the committee that the clause will be clearer by putting the words at the place suggested I would be prepared to move accordingly.

Mr. GARDINER: That would be to insert "under the direction of the minister" directly after "board", so that it would read:

> There shall be an agricultural prices support board under the direction of the minister, consisting of three members. . . .

And so on.

Mr. MICHAUD: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In view of the great responsibility which the board will have and the necessity of assuring the farming population of Canada that the interests of agriculture will be properly looked after by the board, I make the suggestion that one of the appointments to this board should be that of a member of organized agriculture such as the Canadian Council of Agriculture. I know that suggestion has been made in the past and I pass it on to the minister at this time.

With regard to subsection 2 of section 3,

I ask, for information only, why it is stated that the board shall be "a body corporate and politic." What is the reason for the addition of those two words "and politic"?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member has been puzzled by that as I have been. It has been handed down through a great many years and I have found it in the oldest books.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am asking for information.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have never found any good reason given for the necessity of it.

Mr. WRIGHT: When I was speaking on the bill before I said I thought the board should be appointed immediately. The minister has said that the proposal is that the chairman be appointed and that two technical men from the department be appointed pro tempore as the other members of the board to secure the necessary data with respect to agricultural products, which will be necessary before the board can render any decision. I said then that I thought, and I still think, the other two members of the board should be appointed now, and that there should be a secretariat to obtain information; otherwise the chairman, after you have appointed the permanent members, will be the only member of the board who will have all the figures available. I suggest that it would be wise to adopt this proposal because the board, we hope, will be functioning within a short period of time. I would also suggest, along the lines submitted by the hon. member for Lake Centre, that the board should not be entirely composed of technical men. There should be on it a representative from the producers and one from the consumers with a government chairman. That would give better satisfaction than if you appointed three men for their technical ability.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 4 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

On section 8—1931 c. 27 to apply.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. BRYCE: You are going too fast for me, Mr. Chairman. I was waiting until you read the sections. I would like to go back to section 3 if I can have your permission.

An hon. MEMBER: That section was carried.

The CHAIRMAN: With the permission of the committee I will call the section. Section 3, agricultural prices support board.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. BRYCE: I want to ask a question with regard to subsection 9, oath of office. Why is this necessary? We are always asking producers to go on committees. When an organization such as the Canadian Federation of Agriculture or any other producers' organization sends a man to act on such committees the members of that organization want to know what he has been doing and when he comes back, if he has taken an oath of office, he will not tell them what he has been doing. I do not think there is any Canadian sitting on one of these committees who would reveal anything that he should not, but he should be left free to report to the organization that sends him, if the government has sufficient confidence in him to appoint him to the committee.

Mr. GARDINER: Someone says that he might be compelled to make known some things he might not wish to make known. I can assure the hon. member that this is for the direction of the treasury and for some other reasons.

Mr. WRIGHT: This is an important matter. During a war there is excuse for the oath and the promise of secrecy, but during peace time I do not see any reason why a member of an advisory committee appointed to a board should take an oath of secrecy. It is ridiculous in peace time that such a provision should be put in. I can see some sense, in war time under conditions that make it necessary to maintain public morale, that the proceedings of the board should not be made public, but I do not see the force of such a provision in peace time. I think we should have some further explanation.

Mr. GARDINER: This has nothing to do with the members of the advisory committee; it refers to the three members of the board. They are required to take the oath the same as any other employees of the government.

Mr. BRYCE: Advisory committees that have been set up under your department have had to take it.

Mr. GARDINER: They are not compelled to by the passing of this clause, which has reference only to members of the board.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 3 carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on section 8.

Mr. HATFIELD: Will this be a new board, or will there be members of the special products board on it?

Mr. GARDINER: I said this morning in introducing the bill that it was my intention to recommend to the government that we should appoint the chairman immediately, that is, a full-time or permanent chairman, but that for a period at least we should have temporary appointees who are members of the staff of the department. We have two members in that capacity. My reason for so stating was that the period may be very short, as was said by the hon. member for Melfort. If it is quite short it does not make much difference which way it is done. It will be only a short time that there will be officials of the department on the board. If it is a period of considerable length there will be considerable expense which I do not think is absolutely necessary. However, I will take into consideration, and bring before the government, the suggestions made by members of the committee with regard to this point. One or two suggested that a full-time committee should be appointed immediately.

Mr. HATFIELD: I presume, since this does not include wheat, the chairman would be an eastern man.

Mr. GARDINER: We have enough divisions in the country now without putting that in the bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Powers of the board.

Mr. WRIGHT: With regard to paragraph (b) of subsection 1, will the board be empowered to purchase products for which the provinces have set the standards? I believe there are certain products for which the provinces have set the standards. Will the board accept those standards or set their own?

Mr. GARDINER: So far as I can recall at the moment, in connection with most of the products such as live stock, the standards are set by the federal authority. The provincial authorities in some cases are cooperating with us. That is, if the commodity is taken in within the province and sold within the province we have no authority to do anything about it. What happens is that the provinces appoint our officials as their officials and they do work relating to the grading and standardizing of products. I think there will be no difficulty about having it operate in either way. I think in some cases it is done now. Where they are the authority they do the work; where we are the authority we do the work, and there is full cooperation as between ourselves and all the provinces.

Mr. HATFIELD: Will this board have the power to buy and sell, manufacture, export and import?

Mr. GARDINER: It can only purchase Canadian products. It does not import. It deals only with Canadian products, but it can make any kind of arrangement for the disposal of farm products, whether by export—

Mr. PERLEY: There is no provision anywhere in this bill for the purchasing of live stock products.

Mr. GARDINER: While it does not so state, it makes provision to cover every product of every farm.

Mr. PERLEY: I think it would be worth while to have it stated in the bill that there is that power.

Mr. GARDINER: The bill covers every product on every farm.

Mr. PERLEY: Can the minister state that there is power here under certain circumstances for the board to purchase live stock?

Mr. GARDINER: They can, yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In connection with paragraph (c) I asked a question this afternoon whether it was the intention to establish participation certificates. This paragraph provides that the purchaser shall be paid the difference between a price prescribed by the board with the approval of the governor in council for such product and the average price, and a little later on in subsection 3 of section 10 provision is made that if there is a net operating profit to the board in any fiscal year it shall be deposited to the credit of the consolidated revenue fund. In what way would it be possible for a profit to be secured if the price that is being received on the sale of these products, less the administrative expenses, is paid to the producer?

Mr. GARDINER: Well, just reading it hurriedly I do not think the proviso in subsection 3 of section 10 prevents participation certificates from being given. It states:

> Provided that the net operating profit of the board in each fiscal year, as reflected in the said account, shall be deposited to the credit of the consolidated revenue fund as revenue; and provided further that the net operating loss in any fiscal year may be recouped to the said account from moneys appropriated by parliament for the purpose.

I would think, and I am just expressing an opinion—I do not know whether the Minister of Justice will agree with it or not—that, as the thing proceeds, anything that may be done under the other sections they have the power to do. Whether paragraph (c) restricts them or not I would not be certain just offhand.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Can the minister answer this question? Is it the intention to have participation certificates issued in order to assure that the producer will receive the average price that is secured on the sale of his products less the cost of administration as provided for in section 10? For, Mr. Chairman, there can be no net operating profit if the farmer or the producer receives the final return of the profits that are ultimately made on the resale. As I understand these two sections, reading them together, one provides for a price being fixed at the time of the purchase, and later a provision is made that an average shall be arrived at on whatever is secured on resale and that average price shall be paid to the producer for that year; therefore it must be the intention to set up a system of participation certificates. If a system of participation certificates is set up there could be no operating profit.

Mr. GARDINER: That is what I was trying to say in another way. If it is possible under this to set up participation certificates, the fact that the board did decide to do that with the consent of the governor in council would be taken into consideration in determining whether or not there were any profits. If the board has not decided to do that, then, of course, as has been said, there might be profits. Those would go into the account, and I can see some reason for it in some cases. What we are doing is we are guaranteeing the farmer a certain fair price for his products. We say we are going to buy those products. Let us say the product is barley which can be kept for an indefinite period of time. We may find that in 1944, if this measure were in operation, we have a considerable supply of barley, and it is determined that the farmer shall receive a certain floor price on that particular product. We say to him: "You go ahead and sell it if you can at a better price, but if you must take this price for it we are prepared to take it." We take the barley and we put it in storage. We may not sell it for three or four years. In the meantime he has what we guarantee him, the floor price. Our costs of carrying it may run to more than we ultimately get, or they may run to a little less than we ultimately get. I would think in some of those cases it would be considered inadvisable to carry all accounts over that considerable period of time, and if there is a small amount, turn it back to the farmer at the end of the time.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This board is to be under the direction of the minister, Does the minister intend to ask the board to set up a system of participation certificates?

Mr. GARDINER: It cannot be done at this stage.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I understand. That is one of my objections to this entire section. No one in this parliament knows anything about the general method of the operation of the scheme that the government has in mind. That can be ascertained only if the minister is able to advise the committee as to whether the farmer, having received the base price and the board later on selling at a profit, will receive the difference, or whether it is the intention of the government to take all the commodities together, put them all into one account, take the losses of one and balance them against the profits of another, and in the end make no further division, provided that there is a profit, among the vendors or the producers? That is the point I have in mind. Is it the intention of the government to put everything together in one fund? If that is done it would be impossible to set up a system of participation certificates. What in fact the government or this board would be doing would be simply taking all the profits and applying them against all the losses.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course the last statement, that the government intend to put everything into one fund and operate it in that way, is quite wrong; that could not possibly happen as the bill is drawn, because this legislation may operate with regard to a dozen different products in certain years, and may operate in a dozen different ways in regard to those products. That is, we may turn one commodity over to the wheat board and tell them to deal with it. In that case, if we turned oats or barley over to them, under their method of doing business they would require a separate account to be set up by legislation or by order in council. On the other hand we might simply say to a business concern, perhaps the people who export cheese, "We want you to do this job," and indicate what the job is. They will go ahead and do it. In another case we might appoint a commodity board to handle a product. The way a product will be handled will depend very largely on what the product is. For example, if we were handling butter in the way I suggested a few moments ago, simply taking up surplus stores in the summer months and carrying them over into the winter, that transaction would be so different from the handling of oats or barley through the wheat board that there could not possibly be any standard way of carrying on, or any single decision made. It would have to be a matter of coming to a decision with regard to each product as we deal with it.

Mr. POTTIER: I am somewhat concerned about the meaning of "producer" in paragraph (c). I can see that a farmer would get the advantage if he were selling a natural product such as potatoes, carrots or something like that. Under this section the board has power to pay a primary producer the difference between the floor price and the market price. When you come to a manufactured article, however, I am not so sure that under this section as it is drafted the primary producer is going to get any advantage, because here you are only providing that the producer of the manufactured article will be paid the difference between the fixed price and the market price. He might keep that extra amount, and the farmer producer would not get any advantage. I have in mind that after the word "producer" you might add something like this: "On such terms and conditions as may be deemed necessary to ensure that such payment reaches the farmer producer." That may be going too far, but if "producer" means the primary producer and not the person who manufactures the commodity, I am wondering what the effect will be.

Mr. GARDINER: No; "producer" there means the farmer.

Mr. POTTIER: The primary producer?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. POTTIER: This paragraph contains the words "at which such product is sold in the market." You have the word "product" there, and I am wondering if it could not be interpreted as relating to a manufactured product. In the beginning you have the word "producer" which might mean the producer of the manufactured product. I am wondering if that is what it means. In that event it might be interpreted in such a way that the farmer producer would get no advantage in connection with a manufactured product.

Mr. GARDINER: The idea is that the board can package, produce, process, store, ship, transport, export or insure any agricultural product. We may even process it ourselves under that provision. Paragraph (c) was drafted precisely to make sure that the advantage in price would go to the farmer; that was the purpose of it.

Mr. POTTIER: That is clear, then.

Mr. WRIGHT: As yet the minister has not stated whether it will be the policy of the government to issue participation certificates.

Mr. GARDINER: I said that we shall have power to do so under this legislation, and the question will be determined when we decide to deal with any particular product.

Mr. WRIGHT: I wish the minister would explain how this clause can possibly work equitably in connection with any product on which there is a speculative price which varies with the season.

Mr. GARDINER: Which clause is the hon. gentleman dealing with?

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not see how section 9 (1) (c) can work equitably in a case like that. If the product is handled cooperatively by the producers themselves, under some method by which they make an advance payment and a final payment at the close of the season, I see how the clause can operate. I should like the minister to state whether it is the intention to have this clause apply to products which vary in price during the season, or whether it is put in simply to cover such products as cheese, where the producer pretty well controls the product, and where in many cases there is an advance payment and a final payment at the end of the season.

Mr. GARDINER: It is intended to cover producer organizations such as cheese factories and other organizations of that type. The cheese factory organization is a farmers' cooperative in the broadest sense of the term. They do not necessarily call themselves cooperatives in all cases, but in principle that is what they are.

Mr. WRIGHT: Then is it the intention to have this clause apply to other products? I quoted an example this afternoon. I do not want to go all over it again, but I said that a product selling in a speculative market might have one price early in the season, and later on have that price go up by fifty or even one hundred per cent, as we have known prices of agricultural products to vary. Under this provision the government would prescribe a price and would pay the difference between that prescribed price and the average price brought by the product throughout the season. Some people might sell at less than the average price; some might sell at very much above it. All would receive the same payment from the board under this section. I do not see how it can work satisfactorily except where the cooperatives control the product, and where initial and final payments are made.

Mr. GARDINER: I tried to deal with that point in my general remarks this afternoon on second reading. This bill is not intended to cover any products except those we buy ourselves. In other words, we cannot set prices. We have no authority to do so, in the sense referred to; the provinces have that authority. We simply say that we will buy a particular product at a particular price. I take it for granted that no one will sell to anyone else at less than that price; they will sell to us. Once we have bought the product, of course we have control over what is done with it. I should assume that if a cooperative organization were handling the product we would say to that organization, "We guarantee a certain price". Then the cooperative organization would do as the wheat board does now; it would make that the initial payment. If, later on, it should turn out that we did not get that much for the product, we would have to provide the difference. The company paid it out, and we would pay the company the difference. That is the answer to the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton.

Mr. HATFIELD: Is the board going to do this, or is it going to use the machinery already set up?

Mr. GARDINER: I would say that the board can do it in either way. The board has authority to recommend to the government to do it either in one way or the other. In many cases they would handle it through the machinery set up.

Mr. WRIGHT: Mr. Chairman, I have something to say with respect to paragraph (i)—

To appoint commodity boards or other agents to undertake the purchase and the disposition of agricultural products.

When speaking this afternoon I said I believed that so far as possible these commodity boards should be cooperative organizations handling farm products. I said, further, that there are in Canada a considerable number of cooperatives which have practically complete control over the products they are selling. I mentioned particularly the fruit boards and vegetable boards in British Columbia. There has been a great growth in cooperative operations, and a great deal of thought given to this matter by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. They have considered carefully the idea of commodity boards controlling various farm products. I believe that where a vote is taken in connection with the control of a certain product, and where there may be a fifty per cent or sixty per cent vote in favour of complete control, such a product should come under their control, entirely, so far as collections and the selling of their products are concerned.

I suggest that this section can be made into one which will assist the endeavours of agriculture to get control over the sale of their products. Toward that end I am moving an amendment to this paragraph. I move:

That section 9 (1) (i) of Bill No. 169 be amended by striking out all the words after the words "commodity boards" and substituting therefor the following words: "Which shall include representatives of the primary producers to undertake the purchase and disposition of agricultural products."

I believe this amendment will strengthen the bill, and will tend to assist agriculture in its laudable efforts to control its own products, and to see that through its own efforts it is able to obtain a fairer share in the economic structure of Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: Paragraph (i) makes it possible to have the business carried on through organizations of that kind, where they exist, and where it is advisable to have them. It does not compel them—that is all. The suggestion has been made, for example, that apples are handled in a certain way. Well, the government has had more continuous dealings with apples than with any other product since the beginning of the war. In the very first year of the war we made agreements with the apple board to handle apples in Nova Scotia, Ontario and British Columbia, and perhaps one of the most satisfactory arrangements we have had has been with that particular board.

I should think there would be no possibility of any board set up operating in any other way in relation to the product under the control of that board. This simply says that we can appoint commodity boards, which means that they may be boards already in existence, boards in cooperatives, or in any other organizations—"or other agents". That is. we may say, if we are going to handle a particular product produced right across Canada, that this is a fair price. Anyone who takes delivery of that product at that particular price will conduct a transaction which will be recognized by the board. Money will be advanced in connection with it.

It may be that when we have taken products over in that way we may have to dispose of them at prices less than the prices paid for them. But they are guaranteed by us, which means that they can pay the initial price. But to make it compulsory, so that we could only operate through cooperatives, would make it so that it would be impossible to operate at all in some sections of Canada in respect of certain products, unless, of course, we saw to it in the first place that an organization of that kind was set up. It is not the intention behind this bill to insist upon that kind of organization.

Mr. COLDWELL: This amendment, as I see it, does not insist upon that. All it insists upon is that the producer—the primary producer—shall be included on that board, or represented there. It does not necessarily force producers to set up cooperatives. It would encourage them to organize so as to have representation on a board so set up.

Mr. GARDINER: But if we strike out all the words after the word "commodity boards", there are no other organizations than commodity boards which can handle certain products. That would not be the intention of the bill. If there were no other kinds of agencies handling products, it would be all right; but a very considerable part—probably by far the greater part—of farm products produced in Canada are handled in some other way. It is not our intention simply to reconstitute the whole business set up in the country.

The CHAIRMAN: I believe the amendment changes the intention of the bill, because the words "other agents" are excluded.

Mr. PERLEY: In my view this is a good amendment. When we leave the words "or other agents" in there we make the section pretty wide. Agents might be organized by a company to work in cooperation with this commodity board, and it would be giving too much power altogether. I certainly support the amendment, because it gives a chance to have the primary producer represented on commodity boards.

Mr. GARDINER: I am sure if my hon. friend really understood this paragraph he would not be in favour of the amendment. I doubt very much if the greater part of farm produce in any community could be handled at all if we were to follow this amendment. It would mean that before we could take delivery of any farm product, through a commodity board, that board would have to be one on which there is farm representation; that is, a representative of the primary producers. That means that we would have to have primary producer representation on a board before we could take delivery of products. I do not think we want to start out by insisting upon every little community in Canada having an organization of that kind before we could take the products from that community. We should have it open, so that we can say, "Here is the floor price; it does not matter to whom the farmer delivers the products. That organization is in a position to take delivery of those products at a price, and turn it over to the government at that price, or to do what the government says ought to be done with it." They become the agencies of the government to conduct the transaction.

I would quite agree that where there is a considerable cooperative organization of producers, that organization ought to be the agency, and it would be one of the agencies that would do the job. There should be no other representation. The farmer should have the privilege of delivering to the cooperative or to anyone else and getting the same price. He should not be compelled to deliver to some particular agency in order to obtain the price.

Mr. PERLEY: I think this amendment would set up boards which would carry out the principle of the Natural Products Marketing Act. It would give the farmers the power to organize and to have some say.

Mr. GARDINER: They can do that, but we are not compelling them to do it.

Mr. PERLEY: I think that is the principle the hon. member for Melfort wants embodied in this subsection.

Mr. GARDINER: As my hon. friend will recall, the first suggestion in connection with the marketing act was just that. Votes were taken in the provinces and the votes were against it. The votes taken in the three prairie provinces were against being compelled to do that and the compulsory feature was taken out of that act. Under that act the government was not guaranteeing anything, but under this measure we are undertaking to provide floor prices. We guarantee the price to the farmer and we say to him, "In order to get this commodity into the channels of trade or into storage, certain agencies will be appointed or designated in addition to the commodity boards, if we set up commodity boards, in order to carry out the activity.

Mr. PERLEY: I think the minister has put a wrong interpretation upon the Natural Products Marketing Act. They appointed a farmers' committee.

Mr. GARDINER: When the bill was first framed a vote was taken in the three western provinces to see whether they wanted it compulsory or optional, and the vote was that it should be optional. When the bill was brought down it was optional. The suggestion here is that we compel them to market their products through the agencies upon which there is producer representation. I do not think we should go that far.

Mr. REID: The amendment before the committee deals entirely with wheat growing.

It does not deal with agriculture generally. In British Columbia there are two localities where potatoes are grown, one in the interior and the other on the coast. We have never been in agreement with the man on the potato board who comes from the interior. There are only a few men growing onions or onion seed and there are a few growing alsike seed. If you are to have a man representing every little industry you will clutter up the thing so that it will not work.

Mr. GARDINER: I think what the hon. member has in mind is that if we do set up commodity boards, then the boards should have these members, but in order to do that he should strike out all the words after "or other agents." If we put the words he has in mind before "or other agents" I think it would achieve his purpose. It would then read:

To appoint commodity boards which shall include representatives of the primary producers or to appoint other agents to undertake the purchase and disposition of agricultural products.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was trying to draft something along the same line. I think it could be amended by taking the subsection exactly as it is and adding these words, "Provided that any boards appointed under this subsection shall include representatives of the primary producers." That phrase would refer only to the boards and not to the other agents.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister seems inclined to accept the suggestion so why should not this clause be left over for redrafting?

Mr. GARDINER: There will be no difficulty about drafting it because it can be done in a few seconds. There is just the possibility that we may want to appoint a commodity board of one in some case where it is just a matter of dealing with a product for a short period of time. We may want to put on some official and I do not know whether it would be advisable to make it absolutely compulsory. I can say this to the committee that it would be our desire to have representatives of the primary producers.

Mr. COLDWELL: Could not you call such an official an agent, and where you have a commodity board you could include representatives of the primary producers? If you want to appoint one man, appoint him as an agent.

Mr. GARDINER: I think this can be safely left in its present form. I may say again that wherever it is feasible or wherever it is possible to do it we would desire to have primary producers on the board, but I can conceive of cases where it might be rather difficult or where it is possible that they would not desire it.

Mr. COLDWELL: The only thing is that this will be in the statutes, and we do not know who will succeed the minister if there is a sucession, if the government is changed. We have been told so often that it is the written word that prevails in the court of law. I think if we can safeguard the interests of the primary producers we should do so. If it is necessary to appoint one man to deal with an isolated commodity he could be designated an agent.

Mr. GARDINER: If it is desired to make it more certain I think it could be done under paragraph (j) which gives power to appoint a committee or committees to assist the board in an advisory capacity. It could be stated there that there may be representation of the primary producers. I have in mind a matter about which there was some discussion in connection with the food board. We were given the power to put representatives of the producers on the food board and we suggested it to them.

I think it is acknowledged by all of us that the only persons that all parties will agree are producer representatives are officials of an official farm organization. When we go to an official farm organization and say that we want the full time of one of their officers as a member of this board they may say, "When he becomes one of your full-time officers he ceases to be one of our full-time officers." We might find it difficult to get the man that we desired to have or that they would desire us to have on the board, but the same man would act on the advisory committee.

That advisory committee would consider the very question that is in the minds of hon. members. When it was decided to turn a product over to a commodity board they would want to know how it was to be constituted and we would try to satisfy them in the setting up of the board. I do not think there will be any great difficulty, no matter what minister is here. I think under the pressure of public opinion in connection with matters of this kind it would be considered advisable that there should be representatives.

Mr. PERLEY: This is the advisory committee of twelve which the minister referred to this afternoon?

Mr. GARDINER: There are twelve members on the food committee. I do not see how you can have an advisory committee of less than twelve members that would function properly.

Mr. PERLEY: You are suggesting now that when you come to that you would have primary producer representation?

Mr. GARDINER: That we put a provision in the bill that there may be producer representation on that committee.

Mr. WRIGHT: If you amend paragraph (j) that simply has reference to the advisory committee and it would be saying that the primary producers shall be represented on the advisory committee. I think we can all take that for granted. No government would appoint an advisory committee on which the primary producers were not represented. But my amendment was rather designed to see that the primary producers would be represented on the commodity boards.

Mr. GARDINER: We did not take it for granted in connection with the wheat board act. There was quite a battle over it.

Mr. COLDWELL: But is there not a difference here? Paragraph (i) refers to commodity boards and paragraph (j) refers to the board, meaning the agricultural prices support board.

Mr. GARDINER: The advisory committee is adviser to the board and to the minister. The advisory committee is called in to discuss all matters of importance relating to such questions as: Should this product be brought under this bill? That would certainly be discussed with the advisory committee. Then, after they have discussed it, the next question would be: How are we going to handle it? If the board in consultation with the advisory committee says: We will handle it by commodity boards, then the question will arise: How are we going to constitute that board? I would think the representatives of the producers on the advisory committee would hold the view in most cases that there should be a representative of the producers on the commodity boards and would so state. Wherever it would be possible to have the primary producers represented, I think you would get that representation. But there might be a case where the advisory committee and the board and the government would all think: We need only a board of one, and here is the man. It might be a producer or someone else. We should be free to do that; we should not be compelled to do the other.

Mr. WRIGHT: It was not my intention that the government should be restricted to commodity boards, and if my amendment has that meaning I ask leave to withdraw it so that I can move another that expresses my meaning more clearly.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. WRIGHT: I move, Mr. Chairman, that clause 9 be amended by adding the following words to paragraph (i) thereof:

Provided that any board appointed under this subsection shall include representatives of the primary producers.

Mr. GARDINER: I am afraid that if the hon. member presses that amendment I must ask the committee to vote it down. I do not think we should be absolutely compelled to put a man on, no matter what the circumstances may be. If the hon. member withdraws his new amendment and would move an amendment to paragraph (j), it would be just as satisfactory from his point of view, I think, because it would get the same results.

Mr. WRIGHT: I cannot see that because paragraph (j) applies only to the advisory committee and my object is to see that there should be representatives of the primary producers on these commodity boards when they are set up by the government, representatives not only on the advisory committees but on the boards themselves.

Mr. GARDINER: I think there will be in most cases.

Mr. WRIGHT: Then what objection is there to the amendment?

Amendment (Mr. Wright) negatived.

Mr. BRYCE: With regard to paragraph (j) I want to ask about the advisory committee that is to be set up in connection with this board. Will it be like the big committee there is now in connection with the food board, or is it to be like the committee in connection with the bacon board, or will it be like the advisory beef committee to the meat board, between the last two meetings of which there was an interval of twenty months, which was not any good? When that advisory committee did meet, the board had pretty well made up its mind what it was going to do, and it brought the advisory committee here from away across the western provinces and told them what it thought should be done. The trouble we have had in the meat situation in Canada in the last eighteen months has been due to the fact that the advisory beef committee let twenty months pass between meetings. It was no good.

Mr. GARDINER: Which committee is the hon. member speaking of? There are two of them.

Mr. BRYCE: The advisory committee to the meat board.

Mr. GARDINER: I think it met oftener than that.

Mr. BRYCE: Once in twenty months and I can give the minister the exact dates because I was there. The advisory committee to the bacon board was pretty well a farce too. That was the previous one before you set up the meat board which now takes them all in.

Mr. GARDINER: There are two committees; one comes under the prices board and the other under the bacon board.

Mr. BRYCE: The new one that has been set up by the minister meets every two months. It is some good because the people know what is going on, but when a committee meets only once in twenty months you might as well have none.

Mr. WRIGHT: It seems to me that subsection 2 of section 9 is very weak. It states:

(2) In prescribing prices under paragraphs (a) and (c) of subsection one of this section, the board shall endeavour to ensure adequate and stable returns for agriculture by promoting orderly adjustment from war to peace conditions and shall endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other occupations.

It says: "the board shall endeavour." Why do we not say: "the board shall"? As it stands, we are asking the board in a half-hearted way to "try" to do these things. If they succeed, all right. If they do not succeed, all right. It also says: "by promoting orderly adjustment from war to peace conditions." That refers to the transition period following the war. I am going to move an amendment to strengthen the clause. I move:

That subsection 2 be amended by striking out all the words after the words "the board shall" in the second line and substituting therefor the following: "ensure adequate and stable returns for agriculture by promoting orderly marketing and shall secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other economic activities."

Mr. COLDWELL: The subsection as it stands now is merely a pious hope. They shall endeavour to do something, but it does not say that they shall do it. The amendment suggested by the hon. member for Melfort, whether in his wording or not, is one that deserves some consideration. As it stands now, the provision is peculiarly weak.

Mr. GARDINER: It must be read along with paragraphs (a), (b) and (c).

For the purpose of this act, the board shall, subject to and in accordance with regulations made by the governor in council, have authority

(a) to prescribe from time to time, with the approval of the governor in council, prices at which the board may purchase agricultural products in the market.

Then we say that in prescribing prices under paragraphs (a) and (c) of subsection 1 of this section the board shall endeavour to ensure. I do not think we can say that the board shall ensure. They try to ensure that the prices arranged will produce the results suggested here, but to say that they shall produce those results would leave room for a difference of opinion as to whether they had done so or not, no matter what wording might be inserted. Endeavour is as strong as you can put it. After all, what they really do is this. They bring a recommendation to the minister; he has to take responsibility for saying whether they accomplished what they were endeavouring to accomplish; he recommends it to the government, and the government has to consider whether they have accomplished what they endeavoured to accomplish. The government makes the decision; then the matter comes back to the board and they put it into operation. It is about as strong as you can put it.

Amendment (Mr. Wright) negatived.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Expenses.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the system of checking expenses in a case of this kind?

Mr. GARDINER: All these expense accounts are checked by the auditor.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are vouchers submitted?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. They are all checked by the auditor under section 8.

The CHAIRMAN: It has been moved by Mr. St. Laurent that subsection 2 of section 10 be amended by striking out the concluding words of the subsection, "two million dollars," and substituting therefor the words "two hundred million dollars."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. PERLEY: On subsection 3, this is the only provision under which there could be something with regard to participation certificates. As it reads now, there is certainly no provision for distribution of profits. I will not read the whole thing, but take line 35:

. . . provided that the net operating profit of the board in each fiscal year, as reflected in the said account, shall be deposited to the credit of the consolidated revenue fund as revenue.

Then further it is provided:

. . . that the net operating loss in any fiscal year may be recouped to the said account from moneys appropriated by parliament for the purpose.

Any profits that are made go into the consolidated fund. This is the only place where provision could be made for distribution of these profits. I have not prepared an amendment, but I should like to see some provision made for distribution of profits. This means that the profits which the board makes in any one year are not set aside against losses of the board in the next year or in any other year but go into the consolidated revenue. I regret that there is no provision for distribution of profits by way of participation certificates.

Mr. GARDINER: There would seem to be some doubt as to the relationship of paragraph (c) to the latter part of subsection 3 of section 10, as suggested by the hon. member for Lake Centre. I would ask the committee to allow those two sections to stand and we shall take them up before third reading on Monday.

The CHAIRMAN: Paragraph (c) of section 9 and subsection 3 of section 10 stand.

Section stands.

On section 11—Regulations.

Mr. HAZEN: Is there any reason why these regulations should not be published in the Canada Gazette and also be tabled in parliament, if this house is sitting, or within fifteen days after it meets? There should be some way in which the public can be informed of what the regulations are, and I think an additional sentence should be inserted to provide that the regulations be published in the Canada Gazette and also tabled in the house.

I should like to call the attention of the minister to bill No. 134, to encourage the provision of intermediate term and short term credit to farmers which was recently passed in this house. It provided that:

> No regulation shall be effective until published in the Canada Gazette and upon such publication shall be effective and shall have the same force and effect as if it had been enacted in this act.

I should also like to call his attention to Bill No. 88, to establish the Department of Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. GARDINER: There is no objection to that provision. We shall let that section stand along with the others.

Section stands.

On section 12—Coming into force of section 9 by proclamation.

Mr. WRIGHT: Why is authority given to the governor in council to discontinue this measure at any time? Most measures that are passed by this house remain in force until repealed by the house. This measure can be repealed at any time by the governor in council.

Mr. GARDINER: That is really not the meaning of it or the intention of it. It states:

> Section 9 of this act shall come into force on a date to be fixed, and remain in force for such period as may be determined, by proclamation of the governor in council published in the Canada Gazette.

That is, a decision will be reached at the time that section 9 has been brought into effect whether it is possible to put a definite term in the bill or whether it is decided to put no definite term in it. Once that proclamation is issued there is no authority for the governor in council to discontinue it.

Mr. PERLEY: Could it be set aside by an illegal order in council as Doctor Motherwell suggested the wheat board was?

Section agreed to.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, July 31 1944

The house met at eleven o'clock.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (Huron-Perth) moved—

That the fourth report of standing committee on standing orders, presented to the house on July 28, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL REGISTRATION—CHIEF REGISTRAR

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. When was J. K. Houston appointed chief registrar for Canada of national registration?

2. What salary or remuneration is paid him by the government?

3. What are his duties?

4. What was his occupation immediately prior to his appointment as chief registrar for Canada?

5. Is he a civil servant?

6. Did he pass a civil service examination? If so, when and who were his examiners?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. September 1, 1943.

2. $3,600 per annum.

3. As chief registrar his duties are:

(a) to exercise general direction and supervision over the administrative conduct of the registration of all persons of sixteen years of age and over, held under the national registration, 1940, as amended;

(b) to issue to registrars and other persons, employed in respect to said registrations, such instructions as from time to time he may deem necessary;

(c) to execute and perform all other powers and duties imposed upon him by the aforesaid regulations, including the charge and direction of the central registry and staff at Ottawa and the custody, filing, preserving, classifying and otherwise dealing with all official registration records and making available the information therein contained, as directed by the governor in council.

4. Assistant to chief registrar.

5. Yes.

6. Mr. Houston's appointment as assistant to chief registrar was concurred in by the civil service commission. His appointment as chief registrar was by order in council P.C. 23/7430, dated September 22, 1943.

RADIO BROADCASTING—RECOMMENDATION AS TO NEW C.B.C. STATION AT HALIFAX

Mr. GILLIS:

1. Was a decision recently arrived at, or a recommendation made by the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, regarding the establishment of a new C.B.C. radio station at Halifax, Nova Scotia?

2. If so, what was the decision and/or recommendation and when was it made?

3. Has an order in council been passed to ratify or implement the board's decision and/or recommendation?

4. Have any representations been made to the said board to reverse or alter such decision or recommendation? If so, by whom, and to what effect?

5. Have any steps been taken by the C.B.C. toward establishing a new publicly owned station and has a transmitter been installed for that purpose?

Mr. LaFLECHE:

1, 2, 3, and 5: The subject-matter of these questions is under consideration, and no decision has been arrived at.

4. No representations have been made to the board in this matter.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS—WAR RISK INSURANCE

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. Did the Department of Public Works insure its properties against war risk?

2. If so, what was the date of the effecting of this insurance?

3. Was this insurance renewed or replaced on the expiry dates and how often?

4. (a) How many policies were originally effected; (b) how many policies were replaced or renewed on each expiry date?

5. (a) What was the total original amount of the insurance placed and the amount of the premiums thereon; (b) what was the total amount of insurance renewed or replaced on expiry dates, and the amount of the premiums thereon?

6. (a) What was the amount of each policy originally placed, and the premium on each; (b) what was the amount of each policy replaced or renewed on expiry and the premium on each?

7. (a) What company or companies or agents effected each policy of insurance originally placed; (b) what company or companies or agents effected each policy of insurance on renewal or replacement; (c) what commission and to whom was it paid on each of these policies?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull):

1. Yes.

2. September 30, 1942, for one year.

3. Yes; once on September 30, 1943.

4. (a) One; war damage policy No. 270338E. (b) One.

5. (a) Amount of insurance, $179,160,470; amount of premium, $268,740.69. (b) Amount of insurance, $179,160,470; amount of premium, $214,992.56.

6. Answered by Nos. 4 and 5.

7. Cheques for payment of premium were drawn in favour of receiver general of Canada and forwarded to James Matson, supervisor of war damage insurance, Montreal. No insurance agent or company entered into the transaction betweeen this department and the supervisor.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

LEGAL SERVICES—MCCARTHY AND MCCARTHY

Mr. STOKES:

1. Has the firm of McCarthy and McCarthy, barristers, of Toronto, or any member thereof, been employed by the dominion government from 1936 to the present time?

2. If so, in what matters?

3. What fees have been paid in each case?

RADIO BROADCASTING

CHAIRMAN OF CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—PROVISION FOR FULL-TIME SERVICE AND ANNUAL SALARY

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936, to provide that the chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation shall devote the whole of his time to the performance of his duties under the said act, and that he shall be paid such annual salary as may be determined by the governor in council.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSING

PROVISION FOR LOANS FOR CONSTRUCTION, REPAIR, ALTERATION, ETC.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That in order to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses, the improvement of housing and living conditions and the expansion of employment in the post-war period, it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the Minister of Finance:

1. to join with approved lending institutions in the making of loans under certain conditions for the construction of homes for prospective home-owners, and the sharing of losses, if any, in respect of such loans, the aggregate amount of the advances to be made not to exceed one hundred million dollars;

2. to join with approved lending institutions in the making of loans under certain conditions for the construction of houses to be rented to tenants and the sharing of losses, if any, in respect of such loans, and to make loans to limited dividend housing corporations under certain conditions to assist in the financing of low rental housing projects, the aggregate amount of the advances to be made by the minister for the construction of houses for rental purposes not to exceed fifty million dollars; to authorize life insurance companies under the jurisdiction of parliament to purchase land and construct thereon and manage low cost or moderate cost rental housing projects subject to certain conditions and to authorize certain guarantees in respect of such investments, and to authorize the Minister of Finance under certain conditions to make grants to municipalities, up to an aggregate amount not exceeding twenty million dollars, for the purpose of assisting in the clearance of slums or blighted areas;

3. to provide special assistance in the contracts with approved lending institutions to encourage the making of loans in rural areas, and to enter into contracts with manufacturers of building equipment to assure the production of components for rural homes on an economical cost basis, provided that the gross liability of the dominion in respect of such contracts with manufacturers of components for rural homes outstanding at any one time shall not exceed five million dollars;

4. to guarantee under certain conditions loans for the repair, alteration and extension of existing homes to an aggregate amount of one hundred million dollars;

5. to carry on and promote technical research and investigations designed to lower housing costs and promote better housing conditions and the more efficient planning of communities; and further to provide that the moneys required for the making of the said loans and grants and the payment of losses incurred under any guarantee or other contract authorized by the act shall be paid out of any unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund and that all other moneys payable under the act, including the salaries of technical and clerical staffs and all other expenses of administration, shall be paid out of moneys appropriated by parliament for the purposes of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY

ESTABLISHMENT OF TRAINING BASE AT BERMUDA FOR CANADIAN SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services follow up the announcement he made to the press on July 26 last, in which he said:

A training base for ships of the Royal Canadian Navy has been established in Bermuda and will be commissioned August 1, as H.M.C.S. Somers' Isles.

Will the minister indicate to the house why such training base has been chosen outside Canadian territory, and the approximate investment involved in the undertaking so far as Canada is concerned?

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Mr. Speaker, the selection of a training base for Canadian ships in Bermuda was made, in the first place, because Bermuda offers better all-year-round facilities than do our Canadian coasts. In the second place it offers better conditions for the training of ships in the hunting of submarines. My hon. friend will understand that there are certain waters in which the training of ships for submarine hunting can be carried on more advantageously than elsewhere. Bermuda offers excellent conditions in that regard.

As to cost, may I point out that this is a base which was formerly used by the Royal Navy. We are merely taking over their base and making some alterations which, we understand, will not cost more than £10,000, and perhaps considerably less than that.

The practice of training ships outside territorial waters is quite common. Many of our ships have trained in British waters, waters along the coast of England and Scotland, in cooperation with British ships and the ships of other navies. So that there is nothing new or unusual about the practice of sending ships outside our own territorial waters for training purposes.

CANADIAN FORCES

REFERENCE TO PUBLIC ADVERTISEMENTS IN CONNECTION WITH CAMPAIGN FOR RECRUITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I notice in this morning's Globe and Mail an advertisement in both French and English, the gist of which is this: Have I the guts? This appears in connection with a campaign to secure volunteers for overseas service. Was this advertisement paid for by the government? I should also like to know whether it is directed to the government or to the youth of Canada.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the last part of the question needs any answer whatsoever. The answer to the first part is that it is paid for by the government of Canada, and has formed part of a series of advertisements which were published under the direction of a committee composed of men who have to do with and understand the subject, and have been directing publicity in connection with the recruiting campaign. This was part of that series of advertisements.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is this advertisement being published in both languages, and in the newspapers of both languages throughout the country? In the article referred to there is a statement that that is not so, and if it is not, then it seems quite unjustifiable. The minister should clear the matter up.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not understand my hon. friend's question.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is that advertisement being published in both languages, and in newspapers of both languages?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell my hon. friend. As a matter of fact it is not being published; I understand the publication is discontinued. I think it was the last of a series of advertisements which were published as part of that campaign. I cannot tell whether it was published in two languages or not.

Mr. GRAYDON: In view of what the minister has said, may I just indicate to him the information which appeared in the Globe and Mail this morning, to the effect that the language employed in the advertisement so far as the French appeal is concerned is entirely different from and bears no resemblance whatsoever to the statement directed to the English-speaking parts of Canada. I refer to the part where it says, "Have I the guts?" I suggest the minister ought to clarify this matter, because it is considered seriously among English-speaking people, and perhaps requires some explanation from the government.

Mr. RALSTON: I had not heard of that. However, I shall be very glad to look into the matter and ascertain, first, whether it is being published in English and in French, and, secondly, what the connotation of the French version is as compared with the English version.

VETERANS' INSURANCE

PROVISION OF LIFE INSURANCE FOR VETERANS OF THE PRESENT WAR

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of bill No. 170, to provide for the insurance of veterans by the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably absent from the house when this bill was considered in committee and before it is given its third reading, I should like to have from the minister definite answers to three questions.

First, how many types of insurance were considered by the Department of Finance, which nominally is sponsoring this bill? Second, was a national service insurance scheme considered, similar to the United States measure of 1940? If it was rejected, why? Third, what were all the types of insurance considered?—that is, free insurance, cheap insurance for those serving and returned soldiers, and veterans' insurance, which I believe is the only type being considered. Why was only the last type decided upon?

I consider it important that we have answers to these questions. During the course of discussion on Tuesday last the minister contended that the pension benefits in Canada were greater than those in the United States, and that the capitalization of the Canadian benefits amounted to $5,000 or $6,000 more than the capitalization of United States benefits. I have made some examination of the matter, and I do not think that statement is correct. I understand that Canadian insurance companies worked out the amount definitely for the department, and that they did not state that figure, but a smaller figure. The beneficiaries of the Canadian soldier killed on active service overseas are not in nearly as good a position as are the United States soldiers' beneficiaries under their measures. The dependents of the Canadian soldier killed in action get nothing in the way of insurance, but our men do receive a better pension than is paid to the United States soldiers. It has been figured out for me that the dependents of a United States soldier are $7,000 better off than the Canadian soldier. I am told further that the national service life insurance act of the United States, passed in 1940, has been taken advantage of by 95 per cent of those in the army and 98·6 per cent of those who have proceeded overseas. That was a public statement made by the adjutant general of the United States army in April of this year. The average amount taken out by that 95 per cent was $9,600. The insurance provisions we are making for the veterans of this war and for the veterans of the last war who have enlisted are not anything like what the United States congress have done for their soldiers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think I explained the whole situation definitely and explicitly when the measure was before the house. My hon. friend is suffering from the obvious—

Mr. SPEAKER: We are on third reading.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): With the consent of the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I had a right to make the statement I did on the motion for third reading, and I am sure the minister should be allowed to reply.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member was entitled to make his speech, but if the minister wishes to reply to any other statements that are made, he should not speak now.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I just want to add a few words adding to the representations I have made on many occasions during the past four years in regard to the establishment of a system of soldiers' insurance along the line of that in effect in the United States. I think it was three years ago that I brought up the matter, and again last year. The numbers who have taken out insurance under that system runs into several millions. Every man or woman who joins the armed service is permitted within the period named in the statute to make application for an insurance policy up to $10,000. If he or she is killed during service then the amount of the policy is payable to the beneficiaries named, payments being spread over a period of fifteen years in monthly instalments to amortize the total amount of the insurance.

I am giving every support to the present measure, but it does not protect the soldier who has gone overseas to the extent that the United States soldier is protected. Many of these men who are serving have no dependents and when they pass on, their parents, even though they are not dependent upon them during their lifetime, may have been looking forward with anticipation to later years during the soldier's life when they might have been assisted but will receive nothing. As I say, these men are not receiving the consideration they should.

It would not be a costly measure and it would not interfere with civil insurance. It has not in the United States. I brought this up on one occasion when the estimates of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services were before the house, and at that time he stated that the matter would be brought to the attention of the authorities. Even at this late date I am going to ask reconsideration by the minister of the necessity and the need of bringing in such a system of insurance.

The present measure is a proper step. In effect it is bringing into being and extending the legislation that applied after the last war and which was taken advantage of by many veterans. The measure in effect in the United States applies not only to the veteran but it protects the man who serves in the armed forces when he is serving. Should he make the supreme sacrifice, his loved ones, even though not directly dependent upon him, will receive an allowance over a period of years. If the man returns he will have laid the foundation of an estate and he will have available an insurance policy that has been paid up for a number of years.

It may be that this could not be made retroactive, but our casualties are beginning to mount on a scale never before equalled in this war. Even if a measure were brought in at this late date I believe it would result in improving the morale of our men and make them realize that this parliament is doing everything possible. I know that much has been done on behalf of the men who are serving, and I am not one of those who criticizes what has been done, but more remains to be done, and I believe if the government were to accept this suggestion it would receive the support of hon. members on all sides of the house.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), in discussing the third reading of this bill, has confused two entirely different principles, as has the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). The principle of this bill is veterans' insurance; it is a post-discharge measure. However equitable the representations of my hon. friends may be, and they are, they do not apply to the third reading of this bill. The principle of in-service insurance is entirely different from that of post-discharge insurance. The hon. member for York-Sunbury asked how many types of insurance were considered. I can assure him that every possible type of insurance was carefully considered, in regard to both in-service insurance and post-discharge insurance for ex-service men.

The hon. member asked if the principle of national service insurance, as described by the hon. member for Lake Centre as being applied to the United States, was considered. It was considered carefully and extensively for several months. The hon. member for York-Sunbury said that he had heard that the capitalized value of the Canadian pension system was about $5,000 to $6,000 ahead of the United States system. That is true. Those figures were given to us by the experts of a Canadian life insurance company in a conference we had with them.

I must say that the leadership of this thing was not mine; it belongs entirely to my good friend who sits in front of me, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), who spent a long time and gave anxious thought to this whole problem.

It may be necessary yet to develop some other form of insurance, but a discussion of that matter is not germane to the third reading of the present measure. This is an advanced and broadened and widened improvement of the returned soldiers' insurance bill which we had after the last war. The ceiling has been raised from $5,000 to $10,000, and there are definitely improved benefits for the widows. Alhough I do appreciate the spirit in which they were advanced, I suggest that the observations of my hon. friends are not relevant to the third reading of this measure.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

FARM PRICES

PROVISION FOR STABILIZATION, PURCHASE OF STAPLE PRODUCTS AT APPROVED PRICES, ETC.

The house resumed from Saturday, July 29, consideration in committee of bill No. 168, for the support of the prices of agricultural products during the transition from war to peace—Mr. Gardiner—Mr. Bradétte in the chair.

On section 9—Powers of the board.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The question was raised on Saturday afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre and raised again on Saturday night by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle as to whether paragraph (c) of section 9(1), along with subsection 3 of section 10, permitted provision for participation certificates. The hon. member for Lake Centre raised the question whether it was intended to provide for participation certificates and suggested that if that was intended it was not provided for in the bill. I therefore asked that the section stand so that I could give further consideration to it. Since then I have gone through the bill and discussed it fully with the officials. I find that provision is not made for any agency which may be set up by the government to provide for the payment of participation certificates through the use of funds that are provided for in this bill. Provision is made in paragraph (c) for paying any difference between the floor price set by the government and any price actually paid to the producer by any agency of the government. In other words, provision is made for paying a subsidy to the producer above a lower price which may be received by any agency of the government in order to bring the receipts to him up to the floor price.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Under what section is that?

Mr. GARDINER: That is under paragraph (c) of section 9(1). Provision is made there to pay the difference between the actual price paid to a producer of cheese, let us say, and the price at which the cheese is sold to the consumer by the cheese factory; similarly with any other organization of that kind that may be set up. But there is no provision for taking out of the $200,000,000 provided funds with which to make good participation certificates. The reason for that is this. If we appoint an agency, a cooperative agency, let us say, to take delivery of a farm product at a floor price we guarantee that floor price to that agency. The agency in turn may have an undertaking, perhaps under our 1939 cooperative act, whereby they can pay the initial payment which is thereby guaranteed by the government, and then they can go on doing business on that basis and if they themselves make money they pay out the participation. Any dealing which they have with the government would be based on the floor price which we have provided, and they would no doubt provide the same floor price in their dealings with the producers, so that when they make their accounting back to the government, as the agency of the government, there would be no profit involved at all.

There may be a limited number of cases where the government would be taking delivery of the product direct and where there might be the possibility of a small profit, but it is very difficult to conceive of any such cases, because all we do in this bill is to say that if no one else will buy the product at a price higher than the floor price the government will take the product and handle it at that price.

Mr. SENN: Not in all cases.

Mr. GARDINER: That is all we say in this bill, and that is all we can say. We say that if no one else will take the product at a certain price level, whether it be a farmers' cooperative or a private organization, we will arrange for the government by some method to take that product.

Mr. SENN: That is not what paragraph (c) says.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend, if he will read the whole bill, will find that that is exactly what it says. It says that we can take this product over at that floor price. It is not anticipated that there will be any profit in any product which the government handles. We may incidentally make a few thousand dollars out of something we have, and if we do, it would go into the treasury. It is not anticipated, however, that there will be any profit made by the handling of any products by the government.

Mr. WRIGHT: There are participation certificates issued right now in the handling of coarse grains.

Mr. GARDINER: There are right now, but under this legislation what we say in connection with coarse grains is that we are prepared to take the product at such and such a price delivered; let us say it is forty-five cents. If we said that we would take oats at forty-five cents a bushel there would be no possibility of our making any profit because we would not get the oats if anybody else would pay forty-six or forty-seven or forty-eight cents for them and still go on doing business in oats. But immediately the price dropped down to forty-five cents we would get the oats. As soon as the price went up to forty-six cents we would not get the oats. In other words, we would always be getting oats at the floor price and in all probability we would have to dispose of them at the same price, or lower, so that it is not anticipated that we would make a profit.

Mr. WRIGHT: It is probable that you would make a profit because the oats would be held by you until such time as the price came back. You would not immediately try to dispose of them at the floor price. The wheat board has made a profit on grain which it bought at the floor price and then sold for a higher price later, and it is likely to do it again in the future. I see no reason why in such a case the growers should not reap the benefit of that profit.

Mr. GARDINER: I am afraid that my hon. friend has not been following very closely the discussions that have been taking place recently in Saskatchewan. If he has I am sure he would realize that the government would not be permitted to make very much profit out of a transaction of this kind. Take our seed grain, for instance. We distributed oats at a price which gave no profit, and public pressure itself has made it impossible for a settlement to be made even on that basis. You will find pretty much the same here. If we took a product and carried it over as my hon. friend suggests, we would probably be carrying it because we thought that some day the farmer somewhere in Canada would be short of oats. I am assuming that what the hon. member has in mind is that our market for oats generally speaking is in this country.

Mr. WRIGHT: No.

Mr. GARDINER: Generally speaking it is. We happen at the moment to have a market for a part of our oats in the United States, but usually and even now the greater part of our oats is consumed in Canada.

Mr. WRIGHT: What about barley?

Mr. GARDINER: Pretty much the same, except malting barley. Our feed grains are pretty well consumed here. If we are in a position where there is so much feed grain on the market in the transition period that it cannot be sold profitably by the farmer, then we say under this bill that we will set a floor price and take those oats at that price. I assume that in most cases it would be necessary for us to carry the oats over until there was a shortage. Then when there was that shortage we would have to put them back again on the market to the farmer. I am quite sure we would not be permitted to put them on the market in a manner which would result in a profit; we would be expected to do so in a way which would probably keep down the cost to the farmer who has to buy feed at that time, just as is the position now; and that being so, there would not be much opportunity of profit. Also I am afraid we would have to set up so much machinery to handle participation on all products that we would be in exactly the same position as the wheat board got into in connection with Ontario wheat. I believe the year before last only one farmer delivered wheat to the wheat board, and as a result he would have had to bear out of his one little crop of two or three hundred bushels of wheat the expense of the whole machinery of setting up a system of participation. So that the wheat was simply turned back to him and the provision was not made. I think we should run into the same condition here. We would have to establish so much machinery in order to take care of a prospect of the kind that I do not think it could be contemplated under this bill.

Mr. PERLEY: At a few minutes to eleven on Saturday evening I brought up this matter, and it is reported on pages 5634 and 5635 of Hansard. The minister agreed that the question should stand. At that time I tried to point out that there was no provision for participation certificates to producers of any one commodity. The minister has just mentioned oats and coarse grains. As oats are handled at the present time, the price is paid and then an equalization payment is made which is really a participation payment principle. I should like to have embodied in the bill a provision to the effect that if a profit was made on a certain commodity so taken, there would be provision for a participation certificate and a subsequent payment made to the producer. I am not very good at drafting, but I have drawn up an amendment which I am now going to propose:

That section 10, subsection 3, be amended by striking out all the words after "profit" in line 35 and adding thereto the following:

"with respect to the purchasing and marketing of any one commodity the board in that year shall distribute said profit by means of participation certificates,"

Then follows the latter part of the section:

"and provided further that the net operating loss in any fiscal year may be recouped to the said account from moneys appropriated by parliament for the purpose."

Mr. GARDINER: If such an amendment were to be put into the bill, this is not the place to put it. That is, it would come under the powers of the board. If we wish to give the board powers to set up an agency which would be in a position to make participation payments, that would go into section 9. But apart from that, I would call attention to paragraph (g) of subsection 1 of section 9:

to purchase at market or contract prices and export any agricultural product under any contract between His Majesty in right of Canada and any other government or agency thereof and to do all things necessarily incidental thereto.

Our contract on bacon, which was the one mentioned, is one of the contracts which is dealt with under that section. That is, if we were going to go on selling bacon under a contract such as we have to-day, all the provisions which are incidental to that contract are provided for there. The present position in connection with contracts of that kind is that any profits which are made in connection with it in one year are put into the price of the succeeding year, and do go back to the farmer; there never is any accumulation of profits. For example, the bacon board, in handling bacon in the earlier years of the contract, made it possible for a certain fund to be set up to take care of things which might happen, and when those things did not happen, when they set the price for the succeeding year, or just before they set it, for a few weeks the price was advanced beyond what otherwise could be paid. That was done during the season when the greater number of hogs were brought on the market, in the fall, as a part of the provision to prevent hogs going down unnecessarily during the rush period. The methods which do that are pretty well set up under the contracts that are made with the British government, or whatever government it may be made with, so that that is taken care of in so far as that particular kind of transaction is concerned.

Mr. PERLEY: I mentioned bacon as an illustration. I could mention any other commodity—grains, or beef.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, I am mentioning it too just to illustrate the first point. But under the provisions we now have for participation, let us say as regards the wheat board, under the wheat board act we say to the farmers: "If you deliver wheat to the wheat board there is an initial payment"—or there was such a provision—under the present practice farmers are compelled to deliver to the wheat board. "If you deliver to the wheat board there is a certain initial payment, and if that wheat is sold at a profit there will be participation certificates." Now, under this bill all we are saying is that there is a floor payment, and we probably turn the handling of oats and barley or any grain of that kind over to the wheat board and we say: "We authorize you to buy any such grain at a stated price", just as did happen in wheat during free marketing under the wheat board as now constituted; farmers would only sell to the board when they can get as much from it as they can get from anyone else. I would assume that the wheat board under those circumstances would require to have provided to them a special fund in addition to this $200 million we are talking about here. They would have to have an entirely new set-up which would handle oats on much the same basis as wheat is being handled at the present time, and the financing of that would not come out of this money at all, and could not.

As a matter of fact, one of the reasons for some delay in bringing the bill down beyond the delays I have suggested was that we had under consideration the question whether or not we should definitely say now what was going to happen if oats and barley came under the bill, and if we had undertaken to say that, we would have had to make new financial provisions in connection with the handling of that grain. If at any time in the future it is necessary to bring in oats and barley and turn over to the wheat board the handling of those products, we shall have to bring in new financial arrangements which will be altogether outside this $200 million. I am simply pointing out that the $200 million is to take care of the kind of transaction I am speaking of, and that if we are involved in those greater transactions we shall have to provide more money for the purpose of handling it.

Mr. PERLEY: Could not the minister embody here the same principle with respect to bacon, beef and other products as he does now for the handling of coarse grains, where we have the equalization payment? The wheat board takes the oats and barley. It is delivered by the farmer. He receives what is termed an initial payment. There is an equalization payment which is the difference between that payment and what the coarse grains are sold for. Could not the same principle be considered or taken in with a ceiling on the other products?

Mr. GARDINER: The difficulty of doing it is the one I mentioned in connection with wheat. You have to determine in advance of going into the area whether you can do that or not. You have to say to the farmer, "We are prepared to take anything you deliver at a certain price"; and if you pay participation on it you must have a complete record of all deliveries throughout the area you are concerned about. In order to do that you must set up machinery, and that machinery is very costly. If no one delivers, then of course the government, under the principle that has been established in the past, bears the burden of that expense; if anyone delivers at all, then the producer bears the burden of expense, and that expense is taken out of his products. If only a few people deliver, they cannot possibly bear that expense as it will take the whole of their product and more than the whole of it. So that to be informed provided there were deliveries, you must have all the records, and you will run up a high expense on account of every product even if the act is not declared operative on those products.

I brought down the other day an order under the war measures act for the handling of beans in Ontario, under which we propose to pay participation. Beans are grown in a limited area in Ontario and we thought there would be no great difficulty in setting up an organization to take care of them in that very limited area. But we find it is a most difficult thing to do. To try to spread it all over Canada and say we will take any particular product and will be bound to pay participation on it would be to make the bill unworkable.

Mr. PERLEY: But that is what you are doing. You are setting up this board which operates all over Canada, and I cannot see that there would be required any greater number of officials than are engaged now in connection with the commodity marketing board, for example. No more machinery would be required to do what I ask.

Mr. GARDINER: We do not need machinery at all until we act under the terms of this bill, and we need no machinery then if we say to the business agencies that are carrying on business, "Take delivery of any grain that offers at a price." But if we say in advance that we will pay participation provided there is a profit, even if that profit is only $1,000, if we say in advance that there will be participation, then we must set up machinery to have information at the end of the year in order to pay participation, whether anyone delivers or not. For that reason I do not wish to have the amendment incorporated into the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT: On Saturday the minister said that oats and barley were coming under the bill, and now he changes his position. He says it is not intended to do this. If a floor price is set, there will have to be other arrangements than those in the bill. More particularly as regards grains, we are anxious to have participation certificates because it is more likely that there will be exports of a certain amount of coarse grains except in years of short crops. If the board takes over these grains at a floor price certainly they should be in a position, in a great many years, to make a profit on them and to see that the profit goes back to the growers.

Mr. GARDINER: To clear up the point, I am not changing my position at all. What I said at the beginning was that every farm product except wheat may be brought under this bill. There is a possibility of bringing in any farm product under the bill, except wheat, which is already under the wheat board; but there is no farm product under this bill immediately it comes into effect. They are brought in under section 9. The products are brought in under a method set up in the bill. There may be one product in in one year and out in the next, and another product in, or there may be a dozen products in one year, and coarse grains may be among them. So far as I can see, there would be only one practical way of handling coarse grains, and that would be to appoint the wheat board as the agency to handle them, provided that coarse grains are brought in; and if we do appoint the wheat board to handle them they will handle them under the system of financing which they now follow with wheat. But at present they are handling wheat, and if they were required to handle oats and barley as well they would require some additional provisions for financing a product of that kind. It would have to be financed under those circumstances through the wheat board outside this $200 million.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is it not a fact that under this section 10 (3) it would be impossible to have a system of participation certificates set up? Under section 10 (3) provision is made—

Mr. GARDINER: It is intended to be impossible for the board that is created by this bill to set up an organization of its own that can pay participation, but it is not impossible for the board to deal with an agency which does pay participation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Where in this bill does the board get the power to issue participation certificates?

Mr. GARDINER: The board does not get any power to issue participation certificates.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Under the wheat board act is there not provision for participation certificates right in the estate?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: That is a wholly different principle.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Under this bill as at present constituted, any board, the marketing board or any other, which is empowered to operate the act, will have the power to issue participation certificates. If that is the stand taken by the minister, well and good. When I raised the point the other day it was with a view to assuring the farmer of the largest possible share of the ultimate price. If it is intended, as section 10 (3) provides, for a fund to be set up known as the agricultural prices support account, into which all moneys will go from all commodities as they are disposed of, certainly there could be no power of issuing anything in the nature of participation. Would the minister consider adding the suggestion made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle? He could add to section 9 a provision empowering the board to make regulations. If that is not done, by the time the board commences to operate, the power will have gone for any such provision to be initiated by way of order in council. If the minister is serious in his view that it might be possible in so far as certain commodities are concerned that participation should or might be provided for, then I suggest to him that he grant that power now to the board to be used in its discretion. I can understand that if it were made generally applicable to all commodities it would not work out.

The minister has referred to the situation in Ontario as to the power of the wheat board to buy wheat in the province. If I understood him aright he said that one farmer alone had delivered to the board. Naturally no one wishes to build up machinery to cover contingencies such as that. Take any other major product where the deliveries necessarily will be large provided this legislation is to operate as we hope it will. I think provision should be made now for the board either to grant to the agency or to retain the power within its discretion to issue participation certificates. I think that is the most important matter and one which cannot be covered subsequently. We may find ourselves in this position. The war is over and these measures set up under the War Measures Act inoperative after six months. We may find that participation certificates cannot be provided for. Therefore I again suggest to the minister the necessity for that power being contained in section 9.

Mr. WRIGHT: I agree with the hon. member for Lake Centre with respect to this matter. The minister stated that it would be possible under this act to appoint the wheat board as the commodity board to handle coarse grains. I would point out that if that were done it would stop immediately the wheat board having the authority to issue participation certificates so far as coarse grains are concerned. They have that authority now, but once you appoint them as the commodity board under this act you would automatically put an end to that authority. I agree with the minister that we do not want participation certificates issued on every product which may come under the act, but I do think that certain products may come under the act on which the government may wish at times to issue participation certificates. Provision should be made somewhere in the act to cover that.

I would agree with the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle if it contained a provision whereby the authority could be given to any particular commodity board, not necessarily to all, but to any the government wished, to issue participation certificates. We should have authority somewhere in the act for the government to do that. I do not see it in the bill at the present time. In fact it is impossible for them to do it under the present bill. The suggestion of the hon. member for Lake Centre to add another paragraph to section 9 to give the board that authority would meet the desires of hon. members in that regard.

Mr. GARDINER: This bill, of course, is not intended to be a marketing act in the sense that it undertakes to market all farm products at the highest possible price. This is what it says: We undertake to see that the farmer does not require to sell his product at an unduly low price. In order to avoid that, the government is prepared to take the product at a set price. Any of the cooperative organizations set up under the cooperative act of 1939, which handle now practically all the honey of western Canada, and the alfalfa which comes from the north country of Saskatchewan, and which have separate organizations now and make advance payments—any of them could with some justification—if the government sets a floor price under these products—claim that they were taking no risks whatsoever in paying that out as an advance payment and could go ahead and pay on that basis. If they make profits over and above that, they could pay out their participation just as they are paying now; if they did not believe they were able to make profits on that basis, they would no doubt come to the government for an arrangement under (c) of 10 to obtain the difference between the price they had paid out under our guarantee and the price they actually got for the product on the average over that year. They could do that under paragraph (c). Therefore the activities of organizations that are doing that kind of work to-day are safeguarded by this bill so far as their initial payment is concerned; and that is all they would ask for, because if they make a profit they will pay out participation; if they do not, they will come to the government under that paragraph to make arrangements with the government in advance. That is exactly the idea that has been involved in cheese that has been referred to. The producers of cheese have their cheese factories organized. We say that the producer must get a certain price for his cheese, but somebody else says the consumer cannot afford to pay that much. This bill makes it possible for the producer to obtain his price and then for the cheese factory to come back to the government and get the difference between what they sold the product for and what they paid the producer. Now, that operates all the way along the line.

In connection with coarse grains the only argument is that $200 million would not be enough, if you bring coarse grains under it. Then the question immediately comes up as to how you are going to finance, particularly if it is to be financed for two or three years, or if the grain is to be held for some considerable time. Well, it is obvious the only system under which you could finance it is the system that the wheat board is now using. In answer to the suggestion of the hon. member for Lake Centre that we may not have authority to do that when we bring section 9 into force, may I say that section 9 would have to be brought in during the six months' period after the end of the war at the latest, when we still have all the authority under the War Measures Act; and the only addition to this measure which would be required by regulation—and the government has the authority to pass regulations under section 11—would be a regulation to provide for the financing of any products that are not covered by the financing already set up here. That action can be taken if thought advisable during that period of time.

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister mentioned alfalfa seed. Suppose we have a large crop of alfalfa seed in some years. Naturally at that time the price will go down. There may be a large production in other countries as well. The board decide to set a floor under it, and naturally they will get the most of the alfalfa that year, which they will dispose of in the domestic market. What they cannot dispose of in the domestic and foreign markets they will have to carry over another year. The next year there may be a complete alfalfa crop failure and naturally the price will go up. The government, having on hand this additional supply which they had purchased the year before under the floor price legislation, will dispose of it at a good profit. Under this act that profit will go into the consolidated revenue fund and will not come back to the producers. There should be something in this bill which would allow the issuing of participation certificates in such cases, so that adidtional receipts for the products would come back to the producer.

Mr. CRERAR: May I ask my hon. friend a question? His remarks have been quite interesting. He cited a case where the producers of alfalfa seed may have a large crop this year and the board contemplated under this bill may establish a floor price and take it over. He then said there may be a scarcity of alfalfa seed next year, the price may advance sharply, the board make a profit on the seed it held, and his contention is that this profit should be distributed to the growers. Suppose in the second and third year there were large crops of alfalfa seed, and the board had incurred substantial loss on the amount they had taken over; how would he provide for that loss? Does he argue that the taxpayers—and I am only asking for information; I am not expressing an opinion—should put up the difference and provide for the loss? In other words, if the board's operations result in a profit, the profit must be distributed to the producers; but if they result in a loss, the loss must be borne by the taxpayers; is that it?

Mr. SENN: Is that not what they are doing already?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. SENN: Oh, yes.

Mr. CRERAR: That is not quite so. The principle of the wheat board act is that the wheat board will fix an initial advance, and it is regarded as an initial advance. That advance is fixed in the light of conditions as they exist. The initial advance may be $1 in one year and 75 cents in the next, and 50 cents in the next. But under the act it is contemplated that the advance will be fixed on a basis which will enable the wheat board to market the crops without recourse to the treasury.

Mr. SENN: It is not always done.

Mr. CRERAR: That is the principle implicit in the wheat board act; and if my hon. friend will read the speeches made by members of the government of that day, of which he was a supporter—made at the time the measure was passed—I am sure he will find I am correct.

This measure is not based upon that principle. It is based upon another principle, namely that a floor should be established on these agricultural products so that if the price goes down the board will purchase and protect the producers with the floor price; whether a profit or loss results, the government has to carry it.

As my colleague the Minister of Agriculture has said, such powers are broad enough. I am not sure but that recourse could be had to participation payments. And certainly if experience showed that it were desirable and the powers were not there, parliament at a future date could consider it. I think however that my hon. friend should clear up the question I have asked.

Mr. WRIGHT: I will clear it up so far as I am concerned. I think we are establishing a floor on agricultural prices, and that that floor may amount to a loss to the treasury of Canada. I should say that if the government is going to establish floor prices it must accept the principle that the people of Canada as a whole may have to carry a loss in establishing those floor prices.

Mr. CRERAR: This measure accepts that principle.

Mr. WRIGHT: No, it does not accept that principle, according to what the Minister of Mines and Resources has just said. He has just said we must not have a loss under this bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister has said that the wheat board proposes to level out the price.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is quite wrong, and he is also evading the question I asked him. This measure establishes a floor price on a commodity, for instance, such as alfalfa seed. Now, if in taking over that product at the floor price the board incurs a loss in the disposition of the product, such loss, under the principle of this bill, is borne by the treasury. Surely there can be no dispute about that? But my hon. friend's contention goes farther than that. He says that if in a subsequent year a profit results, that is if alfalfa seed is held and a profit results from the sale of it, the additional profit should be paid to the producer. And I am asking him how, if that principle is to be adopted, he can justly argue that the taxpayers shall bear the loss.

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister is trying to argue that the floor price they will establish will be a ceiling price also. That is, he is going to establish a floor price low enough to make sure he is not going to take a loss.

Mr. CRERAR: No; may I correct my hon. friend. I would call his attention to section 9(2) which states:

> In prescribing prices under paragraphs (a) and (c) of subsection one of this section, the board shall endeavour to ensure adequate and stable returns for agriculture by promoting orderly adjustment from war to peace conditions and shall endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other occupations.

That is the principle of the bill, the principle which guides the conduct of the board in establishing prices.

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes; and when I moved an amendment on Saturday night with respect to this matter, leaving out the word "endeavour" and substituting the word "shall", the government refused to accept it. Therefore I say the government, so far as I can see, under this bill intend to establish floor prices at such a low level that they know they are not going to take any loss.

Mr. GARDINER: I cannot let that pass without saying something. The hon. member for Melfort is in the habit of getting up and making statements he knows are not right.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, and I know I am unparliamentary in that statement, and I know I shall have to withdraw it immediately, but I am going to say it.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is not proper procedure for a member in the house, to say something which he knows he will have to withdraw immediately. Surely that reflects very badly upon the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. GARDINER: And at the same time I can ask my hon. friend to withdraw the statement he just made. There is no such intention in the bill. What the bill says, as plainly as it can be said, is that the government is prepared to pay a price that no one else will pay—a price so high that no one else will pay it. That is what the bill says. And that is the only thing it says. It says if no one else will pay a price at a certain level, the government itself will pay it and take the loss. That is what the bill intends to say, and that is all it does say. It stands to reason that the only time the government will get products is when they are going to take a loss. They are not going to get products when a profit can be made. And that is all the more true if the products are of such a class as to require to be marketed within the year they are produced.

Mr. WRIGHT: That is a different thing.

Mr. GARDINER: It is different only with regard to such products as oats and barley; it is not different in regard to anything else.

Mr. WRIGHT: What about alfalfa?

Mr. GARDINER: Any other products we are likely to handle will be products which are perishable within a very short time. I have in mind meat products, dairy products, fruits, vegetables and other products of that kind. There are only two products which have been placed in a position where this does not apply, and those are oats and barley, with the possible exception of a few beans and possibly alfalfa—and they are not produced to such a great extent. But so far as the others are concerned—

An hon. MEMBER: Cheese.

Mr. GARDINER: We will get cheese when no one can make a profit out of it, at the price indicated, whether it be through a co-operative organization or some other. We shall have no profit, because no one else will take it at the price we are paying. So that to say that we are going to set a floor which will lower the ceiling, when no one can get more for the product, is to say what is not so. We are not doing that at all. We are saying to the farmer, "Go ahead and get all you can for your product. You sell it for what you like, and make all the profit you can out of it. But when it gets to the point where you are not being dealt with properly in the light of past and present experiences, the government will take your product at a floor price which has been prescribed." The only sense in which that can be termed a ceiling is that the government has offered a higher price than any other will pay.

Mr. SENN: Would the minister say at what stage in the marketing of any particular product that floor price may be set by the board?

Mr. GARDINER: If the price is being forced down on any farm product to a point below reasonable level—when you compare the post-war conditions with the period through which we are comparing prices—then the government will take action through this board, and we will take that product at a price.

Mr. SENN: That is very important.

Mr. GARDINER: And when we have done that we will take the product as long as no one will pay more. But the minute someone else can pay more, and someone else will buy on the market at a higher price, it will be marketed in the usual way. In other words, it is almost impossible for us to make a profit out of these products. If it did so happen that we had $10, $15, $100 or $1,000 of a profit at the end of our period of transactions under this bill, that would go into the consolidated revenue fund. There is no question about what happens to the losses. We would have already paid them and we would have to collect them from someone, and that would be the people of Canada.

Mr. PERLEY: I think the discussion has shown plainly that as far as grain is concerned we understand the situation and agree that there is no difficulty. As to coarse grains, the minister has stated exactly what he proposes to do. Saturday night I was looking for a section to which I could move an amendment to provide for participation certificates, but I was not sure with just what section I should deal. It would appear that a new paragraph (k) should have been added to subsection 1 of section 9. However, I am going to make a suggestion to the minister. Instead of saying, "with respect to the purchasing and marketing of any one commodity" change "any one commodity" to "any product designated." If those words were changed I think it would cover what I intended to deal with.

Mr. GARDINER: It would not make any difference where the amendment was placed; it would just make the bill unworkable. The amendment suggested is that with respect to the purchasing and marketing of each product in any one year the board shall in that year distribute said profit by means of participation certificates. The amendment would have to be worded much more particularly than that if we were even to contemplate accepting the principle of providing participation certificates. There are a great many products where you could not possibly provide them, where it would be ridiculous to provide them. In addition, the period may not necessarily be a year; it may be three months or it may be more than a year. We may be dealing in a product for a particular period of time.

Following up what we were discussing Saturday night I have had handed to me a measure which was passed in Great Britain in 1535 and which provided for price fixing. They set forth a period of a few months and you can find that kind of provision all the way through this type of legislation. It may not necessarily cover a year, and there is a possibility that the transactions may cover more than a year before the provisions of this subsection would some into effect. There is a possibility of dealing with organizations that can pay participation certificates and our government then would not become involved.

All section 10 provides is that there will be $200,000,000 there and that certain arrangements can be made to get some money out of that fund. Then when the arrangements are completed as between the board and somebody else, the money resulting has to be put back into the fund. Then it says that after the money is back in the fund, if a profit is shown then that profit goes into consolidated revenue fund. It simply says what is to be done with the money when the thing is wound up. If we gave consideration to this I do not think it would be possible to operate this legislation. We would just have to throw it out.

Mr. PERLEY: Will you consider the change in the wording that I suggested to substitute "any product designated?"

Mr. GARDINER : That would limit it to products where participation certificates could be paid, and I do not want to limit it to that extent. I want this bill to be applicable to any farm product, not just those where we can pay participation certificates.

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister made a statement a little while ago that he could appoint as a board a cooperative association which had as its principle the payment of participation certificates.

Mr. GARDINER: Not as a board—as an agent.

Mr. WRIGHT: As an agent under this bill. Would not that preclude the possibility of their using participation certificates? Unless there is some change made in the bill, I think you might find that the organization could not pay participation certificates.

Mr. GARDINER: We would only be asked to take action by any organization set up under the cooperative act of 1939 in cases where they knew they could not possibly make a profit. They come along to us and say, "If we are going to operate as we have been operating you will have to prescribe a price." We say, "All right; under this bill we will appoint you as agent to take delivery of the product for the government at a price higher than you or any one else knows can be secured on the market." They take delivery and pay the farmer that price. There is no necessity for any participation because there is no possibility of a profit. They pay the farmer that price and then come to us and ask us for the difference which we pay to them.

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister knows that in marketing in western Canada there are tremendous variations during the season. It is possible that in the early part of the season the particular organization could pay a price high enough. However, later on in the season the price might drop to below the floor price. The government would then appoint them as agent and they would carry on under this bill. But there might have been a profit made on what they had handled already, and I would say that under this bill they could not distribute that because they were acting as agent of the government.

Mr. GARDINER: They were not acting as agent in the early part of the season when they did make a profit. When the price of a product drops to too low a level they come to the government and say, "Under the bill you have authority to set a floor price." We set a floor price on that product and from then on they do not make a profit. They simply take delivery of a product and pay out the price. Of course, there would be a cut-off at the time they took that action. When they were required to make their distribution to the membership of their organization, the profits to be distributed would be those earned in the first part of the season. In other words, the participation principle that applied to the organization could be carried on. This bill does not interfere with their right to pay participation under those circumstances.

Amendment (Mr. Perley) negatived.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Expenses.

Mr. GARDINER: There is still subsection 3 of section 10.

Mr. SENN: In the discussion this morning the minister referred to paragraph (c) of section 9. As I understand it paragraph (c) provides for the payment of the difference between the prescribed price and the average price when that falls below the price set by the board. The minister suggested a little later on that most of the activities of this board would be carried on in another way, that whenever the price of a product fell below the price set by the board, the board would take over that product. Evidently there are two ways in which this bill may operate. Does paragraph (c) mean that in certain instances we are going to pay what are really subsidies to bring the farmers' prices up to the board levels, and if so, on what commodities will it be considered advisable to do that, and on what not?

Mr. GARDINER: The commodity that I used as an illustration was cheese, and my hon. friend knows probably better than any other member just how that operates. Without that clause I do not think you could get the cheese factories in Ontario and Quebec and elsewhere taken care of properly. The same type of organization exists in connection with some other products, and may exist in connection with a great many more. If this is applied to any product at all, this clause may operate in connection with it. If we limited it to cheese, the clause could operate only with respect to cheese, but we have framed the clause in general terms so that it can operate in connection with any products. In other words, any organization that is taking in the products of the farmers at floor prices and has to sell those products below those prices can make an arrangement under this section and come to the government and get the difference in price. That product may come under this bill, and it does not make any difference what the product is.

Mr. SENN: Then as I understand it, arrangements have to be made by the cooperative organization beforehand or the board would not consent?

Mr. GARDINER: Take for example cheese. If the price is twenty cents and the producers of cheese say that they cannot sell cheese at twenty cents, we say: You are our agents, so go ahead and buy the cheese at twenty cents and sell it for whatever you can get for it. Then at the end of the period, whatever period may be fixed, we shall be required to pay the difference. I would not say definitely that their accounts would be the only thing to be taken into consideration, because the clause says that we must take the average selling price for that period. One organization may have been selling the cheese at fifteen cents and another man may have gone out and sold it at ten cents. We do not say that we will pay the difference between ten cents and the twenty cents, but that we will pay the difference between the average selling price and twenty cents, and if the average selling price was fifteen cents we would pay the five cents difference. He will have to sell his product at whatever the market will bring and the difference will be paid under the arrangement set out here.

Mr. SENN: Just to carry that one step further, $200,000,000 is provided as the fund to be used under this bill. If I remember correctly, $140,000,000 was also voted in the war expenditure estimates this year to subsidize different classes of farm products. Is there any danger that this amount will not be sufficient in case of a real depression where, as subsection 2 says, you are setting floor prices to "ensure adequate and stable returns for agriculture by promoting orderly adjustment from war to peace conditions"? Does the minister think that $200,000,000 will stabilize agricultural income during a depression period? Only last year we had an instance of farm income representing only fifteen per cent of the total national income, even including all the subsidies that were paid on farm products. In a real depression $200,000,000 would be a mere bagatelle in stabilizing farm income to enable the farmer to realize the cost of production, with or without a small profit.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course the $200,000,000 is a revolving fund; money comes back into it as well goes out of it. If we were considering oats and barley along with the other products there would be some justification for doubting whether $200,000,000 would be enough, but as I have stated—it is a matter of record in our discussions, and I want to make it a matter of record on Hansard—special provision would have to be made if we were required to deal with products like oats and barley. If we had been going to deal with wheat, for instance, we would have had to take into consideration what has had to be done in connection with wheat in past years. Twice this amount of money has been involved in the operations of the wheat board in a single year in connection with wheat alone. But as to paying subsidies such as have been paid on other products, even under recent legislation, it would not require anything like this sum. It would probably be something under $100,000,000 that is involved in that kind of thing.

Mr. SENN: That was last year. It will be more this year.

Mr. GARDINER: I am quite sure that anyone associated with government knows that when these difficulties arise, if they do arise, they are generally dealt with, but I doubt if we shall get into these difficulties.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What the minister has just intimated is what I have had in the back of my head in studying this matter. If these boards are forced into the whole field of agricultural production in a time of great depression, $200,000,000 would be just a drop in the bucket. This serves to emphasize the immensity of the field into which we are now entering. I wonder if the public realizes just what the possibilities of this whole thing are. Yet I have no doubt that public opinion wants something like this. I personally do, if it is at all possible; yet I have never been able to think the thing through to a successful conclusion. I am afraid of the whole thing, and yet I want to see something done. I am approaching it as objectively as possible. You know, Mr. Chairman, I am appalled at the extent to which this country is committing itself. Last week we committed ourselves to public expenditures in peace-time activities over and above those which are the ordinary inheritance of parliament to the amount of a billion dollars. That was commitments having nothing to do with the war, though some of the expenditures will possibly arise out of post-war problems, such as the export credit system. I wonder if even the government is impressed by the magnitude of the commitments of this country at this time. I just want to sound this note of warning as to where we are going. Where is it all going to end? There cannot be any relief for the taxpayers with programmes of this kind.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that section 10 has been carried, Mr. Chairman.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 11—Regulations.

Mr. GARDINER: I stated the other night that we would agree to an amendment to section 11. The section now reads:

> The governor in council may make such regulations as may be necessary for the efficient enforcement and operation of this act and for carrying out the provisions thereof according to their true intent and meaning.

It is proposed to amend that by adding thereto the words:

> provided that no such regulations shall be effective until published in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. CRERAR: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. KINLEY: Does the minister anticipate any embarrassment under this legislation by what may be termed the dumping of products into Canada? I ask this question not that I have particularly in mind any article, although butter and eggs and corn comes to one's mind. I had in mind rather the bill to establish floor prices for fisheries, which will come up for consideration immediately after this bill. There will be a certain amount of dumping of fish into Canada from countries with a lower standard of living. The Minister of Agriculture has had much experience in this type of, shall I say, managed legislation. Perhaps he would say something that would give us a lead with regard to the dumping of fish products.

Mr. GARDINER: I said on the second reading that that matter had been considered and that there probably would be some objection to the principle of the bill on the ground that it might have some effect upon our negotiations with other countries immediately following the war. But I pointed out that New Zealand, Australia, Great Britain—I am not sure about legislation, but in their practices, the United States also—have been doing that kind of thing, that is, having different price levels for products bought or sold outside the country as compared with those which are produced and sold inside. So that we are not breaking any new ground in that matter. I suggest that the discussions which have taken place this morning would indicate that the effect would be the opposite of that which is now suggested. We are saying to farmers under this bill that if we did not do anything the price would be down at a certain level and that we are prepared to pay a certain higher price level for their product, but we are not prepared to pay that for the products of New Zealand or any other country; we will pay that price for these products in Canada in order that they may be sold at a lower price to consumers in this country. Under those circumstances it would be very difficult for any foreign exporter to dump here. Supposing we say that the producer is going to be paid 20 cents a pound for cheese, and the consumer can afford to pay only 15 cents —somebody else has decided that some place, or that is the condition—that is what they pay and it is all they can afford to pay. Well then, we say that we pay the difference between 15 cents and 20 cents. That would make it impossible for any other country which produces cheese to put cheese in here at any higher price than 15 cents. I think the same principle would apply in connection with any other product.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister think that that would apply in the case of processed or cured fish? I wondered about that. We are not the only producers, and if a floor is placed under Canadian production, suppose some country contiguous to Canada which is a very large producer of that type of food product were to say, "That price is good for us; we are satisfied with it," a difficult situation would arise. This suggestion is just an indication of a number of difficulties which will arise. Yet, as I have indicated, I do not wish to see the theory frustrated on that account, because I want something done. I am afraid of the post-war period—not necessarily the immediate post-war period but the period of deflation which in my view is bound to come. As I indicated the other day I do not think that any human being can devise a plan or formula which will take care of the position. I am not sure that this is the true way to do it, because in substance, after all, this is a bonus or subsidy.

Mr. SENN: I could give a very good illustration, it seems to me—

The CHAIRMAN: May I be allowed to point out that we are on section 11, and the discussion has to deal with the regulations, so that I think that as regards the last two sections it is out of order.

Mr. KINLEY: I assumed that there would be some regulations, and I thought that I was perfectly in order.

The CHAIRMAN: In these matters I am in the hands of the committee.

Mr. SENN: Take the case of fruit, of early asparagus and other early vegetables coming in from other countries and which, because they arrive at the first of the season, command high prices. By the time our goods are on the market—and this applies especially to berries—we are met with the clean-up of the fields of some other country, which is dumped in here at any price that can be got. How is the minister going to deal with a case of that kind? Is he going to protect our producers under such circumstances?

Mr. GARDINER: We are setting up a board to advise us how to do that. That is what the bill is doing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That, I suppose, is an unfortunate admission. There is only one way to deal with that situation, and it is to prevent the stuff from being dumped on this market. I do not know whether the minister is prepared to go that far. Anti-dumping legislation has a place in the economy of a country, under extreme conditions. You may say what you like, but it is the only method by which you can handle this kind of thing.

Mr. GARDINER: That is what I mean by saying that it is not a question I can deal with. It is not a question that the minister of agriculture, whoever he is, can deal with. It is a question which must be studied by the different departments and a report made as to what it is advisable to do under certain circumstances. The question whether what is spoken of is dumping or is not dumping is one I should not like to enter into this morning.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You have to make some decision.

Mr. GARDINER: It is something which we have been discussing for twenty years or longer, and I do not know that we can get anywhere by discussing it under this bill.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think the discussion this morning arose chiefly out of the desire of hon. members to see that the producer gets a fair share of the selling price of his products.

Mr. GARDINER: That is the principle of the bill. It is not something which hon. members this morning have brought up.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I said that the members have been discussing that this morning, and it appears to me that the matter might be settled to the satisfaction of everyone if, in determining floor prices for this measure the board used parity prices; there could then be no objection from producers. I thought that was the purpose of the whole bill. With a parity price I think the difficulty would be overcome, otherwise the floor price might possibly be set low because of prevailing conditions in the country at one particular time and if, while the government had the commodity in their control or in storage, the price did go up and profit accrued, the producer would then feel he had had his proper share of the selling price taken away from him. On the other hand, if the parity price were set as a floor price I do not think anyone would have any cause for complaint.

Mr. GARDINER: What period would you base parity on?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That would be variable, because it varies each year.

Mr. GARDINER: How would you write it into the bill, then?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what I should like to know.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The government has facilities for determining parity prices. The board sets the floor price under this bill.

Mr. GARDINER: You would have to have a basic period on which to establish it. Would you make that period 1909-1914, 1926-29, or what would you like to make it?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You would have to take into consideration the cost of production, the level of wages, and the price of production in each year.

Mr. GARDINER: And would any of these periods make it high enough for the war period or the post-war period?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Conditions in the post-war period would have to decide that. But it could be set at least a year ahead. For the year 1945, I think, it would be quite possible to establish a floor level.

Mr. GARDINER: But what parity, as I understand it, really means—I am just asking the question— is taking some particular period of time and saying that the prices at which your farm products sold in some other period should purchase the same amount of farm requirements as they would in the previous period. Is that what the hon. member means by it?

Mr. SENN: That is a trick definition.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: My idea of parity is the proper relationship between the cost of production and the price the farmer gets for his commodity at that time. For the year 1944 it will be related to the cost of production in 1944.

Mr. KNOWLES: As compared with other economic activities.

Mr. GARDINER: Would you be satisfied with that? That is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If you establish in this bill floor prices as parity prices, that would be satisfactory, I think.

Mr. GARDINER: Would you be satisfied with that suggested period on the basis of 1926-29?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I suggested a period on the basis of cost of production in 1944, for 1944 prices.

Mr. GARDINER: I take it that politically you would like me to put 1926-29 in this bill and then say that is all they would get.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The minister has not followed what I said, or he does not want to.

Mr. HAZEN: When this matter came before the committee on Saturday evening I suggested that the bill be amended by providing that the regulations be published in the Canada Gazette and also tabled before parliament, if parliament were sitting, or within fifteen days thereafter. I had referred to bill No. 134, in which part of that provision was contained, namely, the part that the regulations be published in the Canada Gazette, and I was about to refer to bill No. 83, to establish a department of veterans affairs, when the Minister of Agriculture said there was no objection to that provision. I thought that the amendment to-day would contain both provisions. The provision in bill 83 reads:

> All regulations made hereunder approved by the governor in council shall be laid before parliament within fifteen days after they are made if parliament is then sitting, and, if not, then within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof.

Does the minister object to having that provision added to the present amendment?

Mr. GARDINER: I have no objection to adding that, but I would point out that in section 7 it is provided that I must lay before parliament all proceedings that have been taken. However, I would ask my colleague to move an amendment in accordance with the terms suggested.

Mr. MICHAUD: I move that the section be amended by adding thereto the following:

> All regulations made hereunder approved by the governor in council shall be laid before parliament within fifteen days after they are made if parliament is then sitting, and, if not, then within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And published in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. GARDINER: That is already provided for in the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

PROVISION FOR PAYMENTS IN RESPECT OF CHILDREN UNDER SIXTEEN

The house resumed from Friday, July 28, consideration in committee of bill No. 161, to provide for family allowances—Mr. Mackenzie King—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before this section of the bill carries I wish to draw the attention of the Prime Minister, if I may, to a portion of his remarks made during second reading of the bill. When he was speaking at the end of the debate he gave expression to certain remarks which I think ought to be corrected. They were remarks about which I feel rather keenly. This is what the Prime Minister said as reported at the bottom of the first column of page 5657 of Hansard:

> I have been amazed—I must say that I speak of these things because I think they ought to be mentioned—at the fact that some men of high position in this country who were brought into the government service to help to carry on the war, knowing what they do about the seriousness of the situation, and how necessary it is that every man of ability who can serve should remain in service to help to win the war, should have left the government service in order, in the crisis of the war, to help organize a political party against the government. That, too, is something that the people of Canada will not forget.

As I see it, that, of course, if I may say so, is a direct reflection upon the patriotism and the motives of the only one to whom it can refer, and that is Mr. Charles P. McTague. Having that in mind I think on reflection that the Prime Minister will want to withdraw any reflection upon the patriotism of Mr. McTague. The reason I raise it is that I think it is a stain and a stigma, particularly coming from the Prime Minister, upon a great Canadian citizen; because I think the Prime Minister would be the first one to agree with me during the last war Mr. McTague served for four years in an active theatre of war, during which time he was gassed and was one of the last to be demobilized after the war was over. He gave three and a half years of his time to government service during this war in connection with wartime activities. Even if Mr. McTague had not done anything in this war he would, I think, have fully discharged any obligations that he had to his country by the splendid service that he gave in the first world struggle. May I go farther than that and say that I do not think it is quite proper for the Prime Minister to reflect—I do not think he surely could have intended it to be a reflection—upon Mr. McTague's patriotism, because at the very moment that the speech was being made, two of Mr. McTague's sons were fighting in the fighting services of Canada. In all fairness to Mr. McTague the Prime Minister should withdraw the statement, because it is definitely a reflection upon a Canadian who has given great army service in one war and whose family is now fighting for Canada again.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not anything to withdraw from what I have said. I was speaking in general terms. My hon. friend has seen clearly to whom the reference is.

Mr. GRAYDON: So did you.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; and may I say that—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Only one of the two.

Mr. CASSELMAN: The other one has three sons in the service.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I should say to my hon. friend that I was told by Mr. Justice McTague his reason for wishing to resign was that he desired to return to the bench, that his services were required on the bench and that they were short of judges, and that he felt it was his duty to resign for that reason.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Have you any reason to doubt that he was sincere at that time?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Actions speak louder than words. May I say to my hon. friend that as the Prime Minister of this country I was entitled to be told, if Mr. McTague wanted to leave the service of the government at time of war to take up the duties of organizer of the Conservative party, that that was his reason for resigning.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say to the Prime Minister that he has not shown the house that Mr. McTague left the government service to go into that job, because he did not go into that job when he left the government service. The Prime Minister knows that full well. In addition to that may I say this. If a man is to be condemned for attempting to build up one of the instruments of the democracy for which this nation is fighting, then I think we are coming to a pretty pass, because we know, and the Prime Minister himself knows, that the man who holds a similar position in his own party is a man who is in the senate of Canada. At the present time he is devoting, I understand, his entire time to the chairmanship or the presidency of the National Liberal Federation. Let us be fair in this matter. Let us not condemn one because he belongs to one political party and not condemn another.

Mr. STIRLING: I wish to make one more attempt to induce the government to meet the contention that if it be not competent for this parliament to pay old age pensions at the age of seventy it cannot be competent for this parliament to pay allowances at the age of ten. The method by which old age pensions are paid was settled at the time of the passing of the old age pension act. That was preceded by the inquiry of a committee which studied the question, to which was rendered the opinion of the Department of Justice by the mouth of the deputy minister who made it quite clear that in the opinion of the Department of Justice it was not competent for this parliament to enact legislation which would enable old age pensions to be paid by this parliament. The result was that the method adopted in the old age pension act was that the provinces should carry out payment to the pensioners and that this parliament should make a grant toward it. In the earlier part of the debate on second reading the Minister of Justice dealt with this constitutional question. But perhaps unfortunately for me his remarks have by no means convinced me. He dealt with what the courts did with another measure altogether which came before them, and he endeavoured to draw the parallel between those decisions and this question. To my mind the parallel does not exist. In the course of the debate the Prime Minister referred to it on two occasions. The first time he referred to it as a smoke-screen. I do not know whether the Prime Minister or I is the better judge of whether or not it is a smoke-screen. But I would make this remark, that so long as we are living under so complicated a constitution as the British North America Act, the question of constitutionality is going to arise year after year. It appears to me that it comes with ill grace to say that the opposition of to-day is guided by the desire of putting up a smoke-screen when the stock in trade of the Liberal party when they were in opposition was that pretty nearly everything brought up was unconstitutional. But whether others may consider it a smoke-screen or not, whether that may be the motive of others, I can assure this committee that it is in no sense of raising a smoke-screen that I raise this question. I ask the government to meet the contention that if it is not possible for parliament to pay a pension at seventy, it cannot be competent for parliament to pay an allowance at ten.

Another word the Prime Minister introduced in connection with this matter is found at page 5653 of Hansard for July 28. He said:

> The action of this parliament with respect to old age pensions only confirms what I have said about the right of this parliament to do what it pleases in the way of making grants.

And he goes on:

> In that case parliament made a grant to the provincial governments.

To me, Mr. Chairman, that remark just does not make sense. The method adopted in respect of old age pensions was that the dominion was ready and willing and anxious to make a grant toward the expenses of old age pensions paid under a scheme of the provinces. That was a view in which my right hon. friend concurred, and I heard him say so several times in this chamber. What he said at one time was quoted by the hon. member for Lake Centre. It was the opinion of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, who in a subsequent session asked parliament to increase the grant that should be paid by the dominion to the cost of old age pensions. But the contention to my mind remains, and it is a contention which I ask the government to meet; for if it is not met to my satisfaction I shall have to continue to look upon this as an unworthy and dangerous method of accomplishing that which we all want to accomplish, namely the granting of assistance to underprivileged children, and in a measure which should not be displayed to the people of Canada at the forthcoming election until the question of constitutionality has been settled.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member's recollection of what took place in connection with the committee, and the opinion given by the Department of Justice, is hardly in conformity with what I have been able to ascertain. I had a thorough search made and I find that on May 12, 1925, Mr. W. Raymond, as chairman of a committee of this house, wrote the following letter to Stuart Edwards, Esquire, Deputy Minister of Justice, at Ottawa. This is the letter:

Dear Sir:

> Yesterday, in the course of the proceedings of our special committee, which is now inquiring into an old age pension system for Canada, the correspondence between the federal government and the government of British Columbia, which has been referred to the committee by parliament, disclosed what the committee believes to be a rather peculiar position on the part of British Columbia.

It is stated therein that the question of establishing an old age pensions system is one wholly pertaining to the federal government. Owing to such decision on the part of the government of British Columbia, I have been requested by resolution of the committee to submit to the Department of Justice the said correspondence, and ask for your information in the matter.

Mr. NEILL: What year was that?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What was the attitude of British Columbia? Read it again.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If my hon. friend will allow me to finish this, I can then table the correspondence which acompanied it, and give the substance of what would be an answer to the hon. member's question.

Mr. NEILL: What year was it?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is dated Ottawa, May 12, 1925. The letter continues:

I am therefore sending to you herewith copy of the said correspondence and copy of the report presented to parliament last year. You will find the report at page 4 of the proceedings, and in its sixth paragraph you will find our recommendation as follows: "That the government communicate with the various provincial governments to ascertain if they are disposed to adopt the above system and enact the necessary legislation."

Please note the letter of February 5, 1925, of the Minister of Labour for British Columbia; also the resolution passed by the legislature on December 18, 1924; also Hon. Mr. Murdoch's reply thereto of February 17, and Mr. Manson's letter of March 5 in reply to Mr. Murdoch's.

Our committee would be interested in knowing if the contention of British Columbia in this matter is correct. Will you therefore kindly favour our committee with an opinion in respect to the following:

1. Having regard to the present provisions made by provincial legislation whereby the provinces aid in the care and maintenance of the aged poor, the insane and the afflicted, in cooperation with the municipalities, can the federal government lawfully enact legislation in the form of an old age pension system to assist the provinces?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To assist the provinces.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. The letter continues:

2. If not, is the question of the care and maintenance of aged indigents by pension or other form of aid wholly within the purview of provincial governments and municipalities and ultra vires of the federal government in view of the recent decisions re the Lemieux Act and the Grain Act?

3. Is the statement made by the government of British Columbia correct, namely, that the matter of old age pensions for indigents is one entirely in the sphere of the federal government?

An early reply to the foregoing would be appreciated by the committee of which I have the honour to be the chairman.

And this is signed by W. Raymond. I wonder if hon. members in the committee would like to hear the enclosures before I read the answer, or if it would be sufficient to table the enclosures, the substance of which is stated in the letter?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Read Mr. Edwards' letter.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Very well. I shall read immediately Mr. Edwards' letter addressed to Mr. Raymond and dated at Ottawa May 23, 1925. It is as follows:

Dear Sir:

Referring to your letter of the 12th instant, asking to be advised with regard to the authority of parliament to legislate on the subject of old age pensions, I may say that this subject does not fall specifically within any of the enumerated subjects given to the dominion under section 91 of the British North America Act, but does in my judgment fall within the subject "property and civil rights in the province" committed to the provinces under section 92. I am of opinion therefore that the subject matter of pensions has been entrusted to the provincial legislatures rather than to parliament. I do not mean to suggest that parliament has not the power to legislate upon the subject so as to assist the provinces or to establish an independent voluntary scheme, provided that in either case the legislation does not trench upon the subject matter of property and civil rights in the provinces, as for example by obligating any province or person to contribute to the scheme.

The enactment of such legislation would, however, involve the assumption by the dominion of obligations involving heavy expenditures with regard to a matter which does not fall specifically within the dominion field of legislation.

This letter is signed by W. Stuart Edwards. That was in May, 1925.

I had the search continued and brought right down to date. I find that in 1930 an opinion was requested by the Hon. Peter Heenan, then minister of labour, in a letter addressed to the Hon. Ernest Lapointe, then minister of justice. This was during the course of investigation by a committee of the house with respect to the proposal of Mr. Letellier to set up family allowances. That gentleman was then the member for the constituency of Compton. The letter is from the Minister of Labour and, under date of Ottawa, January 16, 1930, is as follows:—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Letellier was a supporter of the Liberal administration.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. The letter states:

My dear Colleague:

You will recall that at the last session of parliament Mr. Letellier (Compton) moved a resolution proposing that the subject of family allowance should be referred to the committee on industrial and international relations for examination and report. This resolution passed and the report of the committee was adopted on June 6, submitting the evidence of various witnesses on the subject and recommending that:

"(a) As this proposal is new in Canada, and requires more careful consideration, no immediate action shall be taken; and

(b) that before the next session of parliament the question of jurisdiction in matters of this nature as between the dominion and the provinces be considered by the government;

(c) that 500 copies in English and 500 copies in French of this report and evidence be printed in blue book form and that standing order No. 64 be suspended in relation thereto."

In case the matter might otherwise escape your attention, I thought it well to direct your notice to the paragraph marked "b" in these recommendations.

Yours very truly,

Peter Heenan.

Honourable Ernest Lapointe, K.C., M.P., Minister of Justice,
Ottawa.

The answer from the deputy minister to Mr. Heenan is dated April 23, 1930, and reads:

Dear Mr. Heenan:

I have the honour to refer to your letter of the 16th January last addressed to the Honourable the Minister of Justice calling attention to the report which was made on the 31st May, 1929, by the select standing committee on industrial and international relations (pursuant to resolution of the House of Commons dated 13th February, 1929) and adopted by the house on the 6th June, 1929, upon the question of granting family allowances. The house having approved of the committee's recommendation set out in paragraph (b) of the report "that before the next session of parliament the question of jurisdiction in matters of this nature as between the dominion and the provinces be considered by the government," I have, accordingly, considered the question and now desire to submit my opinion of it.

2. The order of reference required the committee merely to inquire into and report upon "the question of granting family allowances." It was not, accordingly, called upon to consider, and did not consider, any particular system of family allowances but simply received and reported the evidence upon the general subject of the various witnesses who appeared before it. In the circumstances, it is necessary to consider the question of legislative jurisdiction in relation to this subject, as between the dominion and the provinces, with reference to the various systems of family allowances which have been adopted in other countries.

3. While there is considerable diversity in the organization and extent of family allowance systems in different countries, the family allowance may be described generally as a periodical payment to the worker, over and above his ordinary wages, in respect of his family rather than of the work done. It represents an attempt to apply the social principle of "payment according to need" to a certain extent as a corrective of the tendency of ordinary economic laws to favour the principle of "equal pay for equal work", without regard to the family obligation of married, as distinguished from unmarried, workers.

4. Broadly, the various systems of family allowances fall into three categories, viz., (1) voluntary schemes established in industries either (a) on the initiative of the employers alone or (b) by collective agreements between employers' and workers' organizations; (2) voluntary schemes under which the state pays family allowances and bears the whole cost from its ordinary revenues; and (3) compulsory schemes established by law.

5. In the case of voluntary schemes of the first class mentioned above, a common fund is usually instituted by a group of employers and from it allowances are paid at uniform rates and on uniform conditions to all workers with dependent children employed in any of the undertakings attached to the fund. As the establishment of such schemes does not depend on legislative action, no question of legislative jurisdiction arises in relation to them.

6. In the case of a voluntary system of the second class mentioned above, legislative action is, of course, required, but, again, the scheme being voluntary, no question of legislative jurisdiction, as between the dominion and the provinces, arises, each being fully competent to appropriate from its revenues such moneys as it might deem proper for the purpose of paying such allowances and to determine the conditions on which any moneys so appropriated should be expended.

7. In the case of a compulsory system established by law, the allowances are provided out of contributions exacted from employers under regulations sanctioned by the law-making authority. Such laws may apply to particular industries, or even to parts of an industry, or they may, on the other hand, provide for a general scheme applicable to all industries in the state. The imposition upon the employers concerned of an obligation to make contributions to a common fund out of which family allowances should be paid and the definition of conditions under which the employees concerned would be entitled to receive allowances would be essential features of any compulsory system moulded upon the lines of the compulsory systems which have been established elsewhere. It is, therefore, clear that legislation providing for the establishment of a compulsory system of family allowances would be directly concerned with the civil rights of both the employers and the employees affected by it. Legislative jurisdiction with relation to the subject matter is, consequently, vested primarily in the provincial legislatures under the powers conferred by section 92 of the British North America Act, 1867, in relation to either or both of the enumerated heads "Property and civil rights in the province" (head No. 13), and "Generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in the province" (head No. 16).

I am, accordingly, of the opinion that the provincial legislatures are exclusively competent to set up a compulsory system of granting family allowances, subject to the following qualifications, viz:

(1) With regard to commercial or industrial enterprises or undertakings which are subject to the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the dominion parliament, it would, no doubt, be within the competence of the dominion parliament to establish a compulsory system of family allowances for the benefit of persons employed in such enterprises or undertakings by way of legislation which might be regarded as truly ancillary or necessarily incidental to the exercise of the dominion's exclusive legislative authority in relation to them, but until parliament so legislated the primary authority of the provincial legislatures in relation to the subject matter would remain unimpaired and unrestricted.

(2) The parliament of Canada has exclusive legislative jurisdiction to provide for the establishment of any compulsory system of family allowances in favour of the officers, servants or employees of the dominion; and

(3) The parliament of Canada possesses exclusive legislative authority to establish any such system for the benefit of employees employed in those parts of Canada which are not within the boundaries of a province.

Yours faithfully,

W. Stuart Edwards,
Deputy Minister of Justice.

Those are the only opinions on the subject matter that it has been possible to find of record in the department since 1924.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And there is no legal decision.

Mr. St. LAURENT: There is no decision of the courts.

Mr. GRAYDON: If that point of law were to be accepted as the minister has suggested to-day, then that still leaves unanswered the question asked by the hon. member for Yale. His point was that if a person happens to be seventy years of age, you cannot do anything for him without doing it through the province, but if some one is ten years of age you can do it without the consent of the province. I think that leaves the whole matter completely in the air. If my hon. friend's contention about the law is correct, then there does not seem to be any reason why the dominion parliament is not perfectly competent to deal with old age pensions without reference to the provinces at all.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: As appears from the first opinion I read, the Department of Justice said in 1925 in unequivocal terms that if it were to be a voluntary system of old age pensions to be provided out of the revenues of the Dominion of Canada, there could be no constitutional objection to its being done.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think it says that at all.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I will read it again:

I do not mean to suggest that parliament has not the power to legislate upon the subject so as to assist the provinces or to establish an independent voluntary scheme, provided that in either case the legislation does not trench upon the subject matter of property and civil rights in the provinces, for example by obligating any province or person to contribute to the scheme.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was on the basis of that opinion that the federal government had to decide not to have a national scheme. There was no doubt about that in my mind. I wonder if the Minister of Justice has considered the judgment in the appeal case of 1937 that was cited here the other day by the hon. member for Lake Centre, in which Lord Atkin indicated very clearly that while there was no question about the federal authority having complete jurisdiction to raise money for any specific purposes by any form of taxation whatever, direct or indirect, it was quite another question whether the federal authority had the right to apply these moneys in a jurisdiction or field of human endeavour which was, by the terms of section 92, exclusively within the jurisdiction of the province. I do submit that there is nothing in Mr. Stuart Edwards' letter to Mr. Raymond in 1925 that indicated affirmatively that he was of the opinion that the federal authority could set up a national system. All he did say was that he did not want any inference to be drawn to that effect in the course of his giving that opinion, and never affirmatively did he say that in his opinion the federal authority had the right not only to tax but also to spend independently of the province. That was clearly indicated by the hon. member for Yale in the comparison he gave with respect to the failure to grant a pension to a man of seventy because of constitutional difficulties. And now we are giving it to a lad of ten without regard to constitutional difficulties at all.

The constitutional position is not clear; there is no doubt about that, and it ought to be made clear. I believe that the government should take steps to ascertain in the proper way just what the constitutional position is—give the whole story to the courts and let them decide so that the public mind will be reassured one way or the other. That, I think, is the proper course to pursue. That is the course that was urged by gentlemen opposite when they sat here with respect to the very democratic measures brought in by the government after 1930. That is the course that I think the people of Canada will expect this government to pursue, inasmuch as there is, at least in the minds of those who have given some study to the matter, the gravest doubt as to the constitutional authority for the government to set up a national scheme, and that doubt is based, I might say, upon the doubt that existed in the minds of my right hon. friend and his legal advisers when they set up an old age pension system as a contributory system and not as a national system.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not sure whether the hon. gentleman was here on Tuesday last when I cited the opinion of Lord Atkin in the case to which the hon. gentleman has referred, and which was also cited by the hon. member for Lake Centre the following day. If the hon. gentleman will look at page 5350 and following of Hansard of Tuesday, July 25, he will find that I discussed the matter there quite fully. The Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Davis of the supreme court had held that the legislation being considered was in pith and substance taxation and outside the federal authority, but the majority in the supreme court held that though it did provide for the imposition of taxation and provide for the disposal of property, nevertheless in pith and substance it was legislation to insert conditions in contracts of employment between employers and employees and that in that aspect it was an invasion of provincial jurisdiction.

I also cited on Tuesday—Hansard, page 5351—the language of Mr. Justice Kerwin in which he stated:

> As to the latter point, it is evident that the dominion may grant sums of money to individuals or organizations and that the gift may be accompanied by such restrictions and conditions as parliament may see fit to enact. It would then be open to the proposed recipient to decline the gift or to accept it subject to such conditions.

But the supreme court, Mr. Justice Kerwin and three of his colleagues, found that that was not what the legislation did. The legislation purported to impose obligations as a consequence of a contract of employment and because it purported to do that it was an invasion of provincial jurisdiction. It was in dealing with that judgment and in confirming the judgment of the majority of the supreme court that my lord Atkin said:

> That the dominion may impose taxation for the purpose of creating a fund for special purposes and may apply that fund for making contributions in the public interest to individuals, corporations or public authorities could not as a general proposition be denied.

But because that could not as a general proposition be denied, it could not be used as a cloak to do something which involved an invasion of the field of provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was not a parallel case then.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It was not a parallel case because there it was found that the legislation invaded provincial jurisdiction inasmuch as it attached obligations to a contract of employment and created rights within the contract of employment, whilst it was fully recognized that if parliament merely created a fund and applied it for making contributions in the public interest to individuals, corporations or public authorities, that as a general proposition was something which was quite within its jurisdiction. His lordship went on to say:

> But assuming that the dominion has collected by means of taxation a fund, it by no means follows that any legislation which disposes of it is necessarily within dominion competence.

Having created this fund and purporting to apply it in a certain way there is a further fact to be ascertained: Are you doing that as a cloak for the invasion of provincial jurisdiction by dealing with property and civil rights within the province? As to that I must say that there has been no case in which it has been challenged or affirmed or disaffirmed or disallowed—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Or even raised.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: —or even raised. What was raised was that under the pretence of doing that thing, parliament was endeavouring to legislate in respect of the consequences of a contract of employment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In other words, parliament was attempting to do indirectly what it could not do directly?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. As to the measures that have been adopted up to this time, and the comparison between them and the measure before the house, I do not propose to express any opinion. Parliament at one time, when the provinces were asserting that it was their responsibility and their obligation to look after the aged, refused to recognize that it was its obligation. The resolution of the British Columbia legislature had been to the effect, that such was its obligation. The resolution was one adopted on December 18, 1924. Because of the importance of the question it might be as well to have this resolution on Hansard, as the background of the situation upon which Mr. Edwards was then basing his opinion. It was in the following terms:

> Whereas it is the announced policy of the federal Liberal party in Canada that an "adequate system of insurance against dependence in old age be provided in so far as practical and having regard to Canada's financial position";
> And whereas it is accepted as between the dominion and the provincial government that the dominion has jurisdiction in respect of questions having to do with health insurance, unemployment and old age pensions, and the province in respect of such other social legislation as may be in the public interest;
> And whereas the government of the province of British Columbia passed the Mothers' Pension Act in the year 1920, and has since been administering it at a cost of approximately five hundred thousand dollars per annum;

And whereas state responsibility in the matter of the proper maintenance of aged citizens has been recognized by Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, and a number of the nations of the continent of Europe;

Therefore be it resolved that this house puts itself on record as approving the principle of old age pensions and as being favourable to the enactment of legislation by the dominion government bringing the same into effect in Canada at an early date.

And be it further resolved that an humble address be presented to his honour the lieutenant governor praying that he will cause to be conveyed to the Secretary of State for Canada the foregoing preamble and resolutions.

That was forwarded to the Secretary of State for Canada by the minister for labour of British Columbia, Hon. A. M. Manson:

Ministry of Labour,
Victoria,
February 5, 1925.

Honourable James Murdock, Minister of Labour,
Ottawa.

Re: Old Age Pensions

Dear Sir:

Referring to your letter of the 28th of October last, I beg to say that the report of the special committee of the House of Commons which inquired into this matter has been carefully considered by the government and also by the provincial legislature at its last session, and the consensus of opinion is that the matter of old age pensions is one entirely in the sphere of the federal parliament, and this government does not concur in the suggestion made by the committee that a portion of the cost of such pensions be borne by the provincial crown.

A copy of the resolution unanimously approved by the provincial legislature at its last session in this connection is enclosed herewith for the information of yourself and your colleagues.

To that there was a rather long reply by Hon. James Murdock, the minister of labour, and a further rejoinder by Mr. Manson. I do not know that I should take up the time of the committee to read those further communications. They will be available to any hon. gentleman who may be interested in going further into the matter.

Mr. GRAYDON: They are to be tabled, I suppose?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I shall be glad to table them if I have leave of the committee to do so. I will table the whole correspondence and the material attached to it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps I can boil the discussion down, in my own mind at least, to a very narrow compass. In recent years the test of the constitutionality of legislation of either the provinces or the dominion government has been this; what is its pith and substance? That was not always the test which was applied by the privy council. I am reminded of a judgment given by Lord Haldane at one time when, I think, he was Lord Chancellor, in which another test was applied as being fundamental. But in the trend of judicial opinion in recent years, and especially on the so-called "new deal" legislation of 1935, the privy council repudiated the power of parliament to pass certain legislation under the treaty-making provisions of the statute because in substance the legislation was not an exercise of the treaty-making power but was in pith and substance something within the purview of the provincial legislatures, and on that ground they ruled out certain of the legislation. The Minister of Justice argued most manfully against that proposal in 1937—just as manfully as he has argued the same position in this connection on Tuesday last; unsuccessfully in the court and, I should hope, unsuccessfully here. But that is beside the point. The test of this legislation is, not that this legislation is the setting up of a system of taxation to do a certain thing—because this bill is silent as to the system of taxation that is to be set up; the moneys are to be found from the consolidated revenue fund, under other legislation already established—the test is the destination of the fund. The inferences of Lord Atkin's decision are just the reverse of those which the Minister of Justice would have you take, because in the quotation from the judgment which is found on page 5351 of Hansard he says:

> But assuming that the dominion has collected by means of taxation a fund, it by no means follows that any legislation which disposes of it is necessarily within dominion competence.

So that we are left exactly where we were when we come to consider what is the pith and substance of this legislation, and my submission is that there is a fair inference—it does not do to be dogmatic on these things—there is a fair ground for saying that this is a matter of property and civil rights and therefore within the jurisdiction of the provinces, and the matter should be referred to the courts for settlement.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There are few references which I intend to make in answer to the argument that has just been advanced by the minister. In reading over his opinion given in this chamber on July 25 last, it appears to me that the minister himself is not or was not then as certain as to the constitutionality of this measure as he appears to be to-day. As reported at page 5351 of Hansard, he used these words, after referring to the 1937 case between the attorney general of Canada and the provinces:

> If the legislation which disposes of the fund is in reality legislation regulating matters which are within provincial control, then the object of the legislation is not to raise a fund and dispose of it but to impinge upon the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the province. That is the last word we have had from the courts as to the proper construction of this distribution of powers as between the federal parliament and the provincial legislatures.

Then he adds these significant words:

I am not for the moment discussing all the details of this bill, but in principle it is a bill to allocate to every child maintained by a parent, up to the age of sixteen years, a certain monthly benefit, the only condition attached being that the person to whom the money is paid shall apply it for the maintenance and better upbringing of that child.

I should like to ask the minister in that connection whether he is prepared to state that in his opinion two particular sections which I shall refer to him first are within the legislative competence of parliament.

The first is section 5, which reads as follows:

5. The allowance shall be applied by the person receiving the same exclusively towards the maintenance, care, training, education and advancement of the child, and, if the minister or such officer as is authorized by regulations in that behalf is satisfied that the allowance is not being so applied, payment thereof shall be discontinued or made to some other person or agency.

I ask him whether or not this section does not come into conflict with the powers of parliament as determined in the decision on the reference in 1938 to the supreme court with respect to the authority to perform functions vested by the Adoption Act, the Children's Protection Act, the Children of Unmarried Persons Act, and so on.

So far as the next section is concerned, the setting up of a tribunal to adjudicate on this matter, does the minister suggest that this parliament has the power to constitute a tribunal, when the power to do so comes under the provincial powers as set out in section 92? It is of interest that, in spite of the fact that the Prime Minister in 1931 stated in this house that an amendment to the British North America Act would be necessary if there was to be brought into effect a national system of old age pensions whereby the dominion would pay one hundred per cent of the pensions—and in spite of the statements made by the parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister in the brief in connection with the Sirois Commission to which I referred the other day, the government declares that this act is constitutional. Mr. Chairman, where is there any difference between paying individuals under five years of age, between the ages of five and eight, and between eight and eleven, and between eleven and sixteen a certain amount per month and paying an amount to persons of seventy years of age? It is only a matter of age; there is no difference so far as principle is concerned.

I remember hearing the Prime Minister, speaking in Prince Albert in the election of 1930 in regard to this question, point out how impossible it was for the government of Canada to take over the entire old age pension administration and pay one hundred per cent, because, in order to do that, there would have to be an amendment to the British North America Act. Was what the Prime Minister said in 1930, and again in 1935, in this house stated with a full knowledge of all the circumstances, with a full knowledge of the opinion that has now been produced, and which was given by the deputy minister in 1930? In order that there may be no doubt as to what the Prime Minister said, I will refer to Hansard of February 12, 1935, wherein the Prime Minister is reported on this question which was then before the house. He was dealing with some of the Bennett reform legislation, and at page 750 he said:

I pointed out the desirability of a national scheme in dealing with old age pensions as a part of a social insurance scheme . . . we believe old age pensions should be a part of the social insurance scheme of this country, but we think it should be a national scheme; it should be administered nationally, 100 per cent of the money raised, and the entire scheme administered by the federal government.

We as Liberals were not seeking to be rid of an obligation in connection with a national insurance scheme; we were claiming that as with the case of old age pensions this parliament should be placed in a position to take it over.

We say that the present government ought immediately to take steps to have the British North America Act amended so as to make possible federal administration, so that when the time comes to pay the old age pensions 100 per cent, we shall not be met with any constitutional obstacle to the administration of the scheme in its entirety by the federal government.

I pause to say this. The only reason given why it was necessary that the federal government pay only a portion and not the entire pension was the fact that the British North America Act would not permit this parliament to administer a one hundred per cent federal old age pension scheme. In Hansard of June 2, 1931, at page 2266, the Prime Minister is reported as follows:

. . . I say the British North America Act should be amended so as to make it possible for the federal government to undertake the administration of that scheme.

That was the old age pensions scheme. If the act had been amended in that regard an amendment could have been secured easily with regard to unemployment insurance as well.

. . . the time has come when the federal parliament should seek to have the British North America Act amended so as to make it quite clear that it will be within the jurisdiction of this parliament to administer an old age pension act. . . .

That, Mr. Chairman, was in 1931. The Prime Minister had before him at that time, when he made this statement, or his law officers had at any rate, the opinion that was to-day produced by the Minister of Justice, and the very fact that he made the statements he did in 1935 indicates that the interpretation he then gave to the opinion that had been given in 1930 was different from the interpretation that he puts thereon now. I was quite surprised that the Prime Minister should talk about smoke-screens, and that this constitutional issue was raised as a smoke-screen. Let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that unless the government submits this matter to the courts so that there can be a full determination of the question of legislative competence long before July 1, 1945, we on this side of the house need have no fear in asserting that this legislation is a smoke-screen designed to secure support while at the same time realizing that it is not within the constitutional powers of this parliament. If it is constitutional, why not submit it to the supreme court and have its judgment thereon? The act does not have to be delayed in operation and the carrying into effect of this legislation need not be retarded. Let me quote again what the Prime Minister said a little later on. After asking the then Prime Minister, Mr. Bennett, to submit certain social legislation to the courts, he said on February 12, 1935, as reported at page 754:

May I say to the Prime Minister that he knows better than anyone else that the final authority that settles these questions of jurisdiction is the courts, and that he cannot by assertion or by assumption give to this parliament any power to deal with these matters which it does not now possess. That is the reason, and the sole reason, why hon. members on this side bring to the attention of the government, as is their duty—

I point out these words, Mr. Chairman. The Prime Minister indicated the other day when we raised the constitutional issue at this time that it was for the purpose of a smoke-screen. In 1935 he said it was the duty of the opposition to do so.

—and why as leader of the opposition as is my duty I stress the point, that we believe, proceeding as he is, he has adopted a course which will not commend itself to the courts when this legislation comes eventually before them for final decision.

I can do no better than to quote the concluding remarks of the Prime Minister, when after asking the government of the day to submit the legislation to the courts he used words that are as applicable to-day as they were then. In 1935 the then minister of justice, Mr. Guthrie, an outstanding lawyer, was as outspoken in his support of the constitutionality of the measures then before parliament as is the Minister of Justice to-day. The minister of justice of that time advanced as many arguments in support of the constitutionality of the measures that were then before parliament as have been advanced by the present Minister of Justice. Regardless of the opinion of the Minister of Justice or any other hon. member, the Prime Minister averred that those opinions are meaningless, as the final determination must be the courts. Then he used these words—and how applicable they are to-day in view of the fact that we intend to have a general election between now and the time this legislation is to be brought into effect. These are the words as used by the Prime Minister at page 754 of Hansard of February 12, 1935:

In the circumstances, I say to the Prime Minister that in these days of stress and anxiety and suffering for the mass of the people, they are crying for bread and he is giving them a stone.

We do not want, Mr. Chairman, to have the people believe that social legislation within the powers of parliament is to be brought in, only to find out after the election is over that it is beyond the powers of parliament. Why not submit the legislation now? It will not take long. Somebody spoke about two years. Our courts are not overworked. The supreme court can be convened at almost any time, certainly long before July 1, 1945, and can render a decision before that time.

The Prime Minister, the then leader of the opposition, went on to use these words:

They—

That is, the people.

—are crying for fish and he is giving them a serpent; because in addition to their distress and their suffering, when this legislation is found to be ultra vires there will be the sting of bitter disappointment.

These words, sir, are as applicable to-day as they were then—indeed more applicable, for that scheme meant the distribution of a very small amount of money. This scheme means the distribution of $250,000,000, more than fifty per cent of the total amount of all the civilian expenditures of this nation prior to the outbreak of the war.

Is it the proper course to submit this matter to the courts? The supreme court act provides for that. I am not going to quote the section 55, but in 1935 the Prime Minister, who was then leader of the opposition, quoted the section and pointed out that it was meant to cover circumstances such as the present. And what is more, the former distinguished minister of justice, the late Mr. Lapointe, speaking in the house on the 5th of April, 1937, used these words, as they appear at page 2597 of Hansard:

The government of my hon. friend did not wait for parties to institute action. They took the proper steps to refer those two acts to the Supreme Court of Canada.

He was referring to the aeronautics act and the radio act.

The suggestion that we raised a smoke-screen should arouse in us the same feeling of antagonism as that shown by the Prime Minister on the suggestion that this measure was attempted bribery. The suggestion that it was a smoke-screen means that we were endeavouring to do something indirectly that we did not wish to do directly. A similar argument was raised in 1935, and I intend to place on Hansard the statements made with regard thereto by the Prime Minister. At pages 32 and 33 of Hansard of January 21, 1935, the right hon. gentleman used these words:

On occasions in the past the Prime Minister has criticized me and hon. gentlemen on this side for having taken up a considerable amount of the time of the house in discussing constitutional questions. May I say that we have done so because we have looked upon the constitution of our country as the safeguard of its liberties and as the home of its freedom.

Then a little later on he said:

When I have seen steps taken which I have believed were gradually dismantling the constitution, gradually destroying the home of the freedom and liberties of the people, I have opposed them just as strongly as I possibly could, and I shall continue to do so no matter by what name measures of the kind may be designated. I shall continue to look with a great deal of care, not upon the alleged but upon the real purpose lying back of each and every measure as disclosed by some of its provisions.

I suggest to the Prime Minister that if he thought in 1935 and in 1931 that a hundred per cent system of federal old age pensions, could not be brought into effect without an amendment to the British North America Act, and if as he suggested to the government of Mr. Bennett that an amendment to the British North America Act should be secured at one and the same time to cover both unemployment insurance and old age pensions, why in 1940, when he secured the passage in this house of an amendment to the British North America Act to enable the bringing into effect of unemployment insurance, did he not carry out the admonition that he gave to the Bennett government in 1935?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Then he goes on to say, as appears at pages 55 and 56 of Hansard of January 21, 1935:

As a means of expediting and hastening the consideration of these matters, I would ask the Prime Minister when he gets up to speak this evening, as I hope he will, to tell this house whether as leader of the government, knowing that a question will come up immediately as to the jurisdiction of this parliament and of the provincial legislatures in matters of social legislation, he has secured an opinion from the law officers of the crown or from the Supreme Court of Canada which will be a sufficient guarantee to this house to proceed with these measures as being without question within its jurisdiction.

I want to make it perfectly clear that I do not feel that a matter of jurisdiction should be allowed in the last analysis to stand in the way of anything in the nature of a national reform that may be generally recognized as necessary and urgent. If it be found that jurisdiction does interfere, that it is an obstacle, then I think the proper step should be taken to see that the British North America Act is so amended as to make possible the enactment of such legislation. In taking any step of this kind I think we should remember that perhaps the most serious subject with which parliament at any time can be called upon to deal is one which raises a question of the relationship between this dominion and the provinces, and in all such matters we must consider very carefully the views the provinces may hold in regard to what are their rights and the views which this dominion may hold in regard to what are its rights. For my part I believe that through conference and good will it will be possible to obtain by reason and consent—though not by coercion—whatever is needed by way of amendment to the British North America Act.

For weeks we have been expecting the convening of a dominion-provincial conference but for some reason it has been postponed, postponed, postponed. Only in the last few days we find that the hope many people had that Canada was to have a national health scheme is gone with the wind until after the conference. A house committee has been sitting for a period of almost two years on the matter; yet it is necessary that the question of the competence of parliament to institute health insurance is to be submitted to such a conference. Why not this legislation? Why were not the provinces consulted? Why rush this measure, in the dying days of the session?

Some outside the house may criticize the length of discussions which take place in this chamber, particularly in view of the fact that we have been sitting here for a matter of six or seven months. I have no apologies to offer to those who take that stand. In the last days of a session we are being asked to make provision for the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars, arising from new legislation which, because many hon. members wish to go home—fatigued, after a very long session—cannot begin to receive the consideration it should receive. Much legislation is brought in as skeleton legislation, and none of us feels he ought to discuss it at too great length because many people consider that the house has been sitting long enough. But as members of parliament we have a responsibility to the people, that of assuring them that this proposed legislation must receive as careful examination as the exigencies of the moment will permit.

Mr. MARTIN: Why did you vote for it?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And one thing more: in 1935 the Prime Minister moved an amendment indicating how he felt on this subject of social legislation of the type then introduced. This was the amendment:

> That this act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council, after the question of its validity has been submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada on reference by the government, and the act has been declared to be intra vires of the parliament of Canada.

No such amendment is needed in this case. The date the act is to come into effect is so far removed that the government can ascertain long before July 1 of next year the competence of this parliament to enact the legislation.

Why, then, is the government so anxious not to face up to this issue? Is it because there is any doubt? Is it because of the fear that if this bill is submitted to the courts it will be declared beyond the powers of parliament, and it will be declared that it infringes upon "property and civil rights" with regard to child welfare or child control, both matters of provincial jurisdiction?

Just in that connection let me mention that the Sirois commission, referring to the general question of social legislation, and particularly to widows' pensions, mothers' allowances and child welfare in general, used these words:

> These services are, we think, of peculiar interest to the province, since they involve questions of social policy with respect to the preservation of the family unit, and the care and upbringing of children.

That is what this legislation is for, in part—the preservation of the family unit in Canada, and to assure the proper care and upbringing of children. That is indicated in section 5 of the bill where provision is made that unless the money is properly used it shall be turned over to a guardian, who shall have the disposition thereof. To appoint a guardian to collect payments for the children would, I submit, be an interference with the matter of child welfare and the right of guardianship, which is strictly within the power of the provinces.

Then, to continue the quotation from the Sirois report:

> Moreover their administration involves detailed supervision which in many cases must be highly personal and discretionary in character. On both grounds therefore we think that they are primarily provincial services.

The first ground is that they have to do with the preservation of the family unit, and the second ground is that they involve detailed powers of supervision. And on both those grounds the Sirois commission decided that these were matters of purely provincial services.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, no; I think my hon. friend is wrong there. What he read was to the effect that they were matters of special interest to the province. I contend they are matters of special interest to the municipalities and special interest to the home. But there is nothing in the Sirois report which says they are matters coming exclusively within provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the inference.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: They are primarily provincial services.

Mr. CLAXTON: That was not the opinion, if I may correct my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): One can blow hot and cold on these things, I know.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am trying to follow my argument through. And may I say this for the Prime Minister, that when one reads an extract he never misses even a word. The Prime Minister follows the argument closely, and I appreciate that. These are the words I read: "We think that they are primarily provincial services."

Since the days of Elizabeth, down to the present time, under the old poor laws, and on through the reform laws of the 1830's down to the present time, matters dealing with the poor and the afflicted and with children were left either with the municipality, as the Prime Minister has said, or in Canada in the provincial arena, because these matters were primarily concerned with local issues and local supervision.

Now as to legal opinions one can get various opinions in respect of all legislation. One lawyer disagrees with another; someone has said we would not have courts if that were not so. But this bill involves the greatest single expenditure ever made in any part of the empire in connection with one phase of social welfare. I think it was the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister who said the other day that there were systems of family allowances in thirty-five countries. There are in effect family allowances in about thirty-two countries—allowances that are purely local in effect, employer-employee schemes, and the like. But the only ones that I have been able to find that bear any similarity to this are those in effect in Australia and New Zealand, and in neither case does the legislation go as far as this. If this legislation is to be effective, it must be within the jurisdiction of parliament; if it is not within the jurisdiction of parliament and is to be made effective, it will have to be as a result of collaboration with the provinces or amendment to the British North America Act.

The dominion-provincial conference in 1940 fell through; that conference out of which so much good was hoped for ended in disorder. Allow me to say that the man who endeavoured to uphold the Prime Minister in connection with the reallocation of the powers as between the dominion and the provinces, the man who endeavoured to make our constitution work having regard to changing conditions since 1867, was the Hon. John Bracken, now the leader of this party. The ones who destroyed the possibility of the success of that conference, which would have meant so much to Canada, were not of the opposition; they were the poltical friends of the Prime Minister.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Do not forget Mr. Aberhart; all honour to him.

The CHAIRMAN: I believe some of this discussion is a little out of order at the moment.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We believe in the necessity of social legislation being brought in in keeping with changing conditions and the changing world, but legislation without power is meaningless and will be destructive of the morale of this country.

Mr. MITCHELL: Why did you vote for it?

Mr. GRAYDON: How would it get to the courts if we did not?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I would like to say to the Minister of Labour that in 1935, if I remember correctly, he along with all those who sat with him voted for legislation which was unconstitutional.

Mr. MITCHELL: I voted for it because I believed in it.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: You voted for it believing it was constitutional. You followed the leadership of the Prime Minister in doing so because you did not want to be placed in the position of opposing social legislation by raising the constitutional issue. The hon. member asks why we voted for it. Let me say to him that—

Mr. MITCHELL: Why did you vote for it after your leader said it was bribery?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Let me say this to the Minister of Labour: I watched him the other day when we took our stand on this matter and it looked to me as though he was rather disappointed. He thought that advancing the argument of unconstitutionality as we had, we would vote against the measure. Then when the election came along we would be placed in the position all over this country having opposed social change. The government will fight the next election on the basis of its record; it will not fight it on the basis of this party being opposed to social legislation. If in 1815 Napoleon had been able to designate his own battlefield, things might have been different, but Wellington picked the field. We do not intend to have the Prime Minister fix the situs of the battlefield in the next election. The record of the government and nothing else will be the battlefield.

Mr. HOMUTH: And little Napoleon will get his Waterloo.

The CHAIRMAN: I ask that the discussion be kept within the confines of the matter before the committee. We are in committee on this particular bill.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am following the line taken by the Prime Minister in 1935. We believe in social legislation. We believe in ensuring relief for all individuals as against poverty, invalidism and security. We believe in freedom from fear and freedom from want. No political party has a monopoly in that direction. But we do say that as we make advances, let us advance with legislation that is constitutional. There can be no excuse for the government's failing to do what the Prime Minister pressed upon the government of Mr. Bennett to do in 1935, that is, determine whether this legislation is within the law. We have supported the legislation as he did in 1935.

I have not heard any answer yet from the Minister of Justice as to why this should not be done. Some one suggested that it would take two years. Oh, no. The whole matter can be determined by a simple submission to the supreme court, and it could be heard in the October or November sittings.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has just said that I was good enough to follow him very closely when he was speaking and observe the points he brought to the fore. I did notice that he read from a question which I asked the prime minister of the day, Mr. Bennett, as to whether he had had an opinion from the Department of Justice which would bear out the constitutionality of the legislation he was introducing. My hon. friend did not tell us that Mr. Bennett had received any such opinion from the Department of Justice. Has he the opinion that the Department of Justice gave? If he has, I should be very glad to know what it is.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does the Prime Minister say that he never had an opinion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I asked that question and I did not get an answer from Mr. Bennett, and I do not think my hon. friend has an answer or he would have given it to the committee before this. My hon. friend has referred to requests that have been made that legislation should or should not be referred to the supreme court. As I said the other day, in the case of the legislation that Mr. Bennett introduced, it was obviously ultra vires for reasons that have been repeated over and over again this afternoon. Believing that it was obviously ultra vires I used the metaphor that the people were looking for bread and might receive a stone if that question were not settled in advance. I was proved to be right; the supreme court declared the legislation to be ultra vires.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Not with four of the bills.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am speaking the truth. The legislation that was of concern was declared to be ultra vires and I spared the country the disappointment of expecting to get something in the nature of bread and receiving only disappointment in return. The situation is quite different in the present case. There is no doubt in the world about the constitutionality of this legislation. Moreover, the present government, before introducing the legislation was careful to have an opinion from the law officers of the crown to the effect that it was intra vires of this parliament. That opinion was read this afternoon by the Minister of Justice. It shows conclusively that it is unnecessary to refer the legislation to the supreme court to determine the jurisdiction of this parliament.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I apologize for rising again to take part in this debate, but I assure you that I am not going to make my contribution—anything of the dimensions of a "Gone with the Wind" to which the hon. member for Lake Centre referred. In his remarks he put some specific questions to me which I think I should not allow to go unanswered. His first question was whether I would venture an opinion on the validity of clause 5 of the bill; whether or not that would constitute an invasion of provincial rights in providing for the setting up of some guardian for an infant. That is not my opinion. In my view this is merely attaching conditions to the giving of a grant, just as conditions are attached to the payment of dependents' allowances to the wives and children of the gallant men who are serving the country in the armed forces. It will not involve in practice any more difficulties than have been involved in the precautions that have been taken to see that the allowances provided by a grateful country for the maintenance of the wives and other dependents of the gallant men who are fighting its battles are properly applied.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is not that under the War Measures Act?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is under the regulations made for the purpose of providing properly for these dependents. It is possible that it could be argued that even if such provisions were otherwise unconstitutional in normal times they would be justified by a state of war. I would not disagree with my hon. friend there. But they are within the principle that if you do not impose obligations you can at least attach conditions, and if the conditions are not complied with, your grant is not paid.

The next question was whether or not I would venture to say that parliament could provide for the establishment of a tribunal to determine such disputes as might arise in carrying out the act. I am sure that the hon. member for Lake Centre momentarily overlooked section 101 of the British North America Act, which provides:

> The parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this act, from time to time, provide for the constitution, maintenance and organization of a general court of appeal for Canada, and for the establishment of any additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I had not overlooked that. It has nothing to do with this.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If he had not overlooked it I must confess that I do not see the force of his argument. This is a general provision which authorizes the parliament of Canada to establish from time to time, and at any time, other courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada. The measure before us is designed to be a law of Canada, and the tribunal it provides for is a tribunal established by the parliament of Canada for the better administration of that law.

The third point that the hon. member suggested was that what I had argued here on Tuesday last was exactly what I had unsuccessfully argued in 1937 before the privy council. If my learned friend will refer to the report he will see that what I argued in 1937 was summed up in the reply which appears at page 362 of the official report and at page 312 of Plaxton's volume "Canadian Constitutional Decisions of Judicial Committee 1930-1939":

St. Laurent K.C. replied. Is this legislation in relation to property and civil rights in the province within the meaning of those words in head 13 of s. 92, or is it in pith and substance legislation in relation to a problem which did not exist when the British North America Act was framed, and which was not specially provided for in any of the enumerated heads of ss. 91 and 92? It is submitted that it is the latter, and therefore a matter with respect to which legislative jurisdiction must be found in one or other of the residuary classes of ss. 91 and 92.

What I argued was that of course it interfered with property and civil rights because it attached obligations and consequences to a contract of employment, but that in its principal aspect it was not legislation dealing with property and civil rights in their ordinary meaning but legislation dealing with a problem which had arisen since confederation; and the reason that argument was being submitted was that in two previous cases their lordships had been impressed with the fact that because you could show them a machine that did not exist in 1867, that was something new. In radio and aeronautics we had some machines that were the instruments of the services, and they had to recognize that those machines and the use that was made of them was something with which the British North America Act in 1867 did not deal and had not placed within any of the heads of section 92; and if that was the case, in view of the fact that all the residuary power was in the dominion, then the matter had to be one of federal jurisdiction. But when we come to deal with an unemployment situation resulting from the setting up and then the breaking down of an economic system extending across Canada from one ocean to another, that was not something new that you could put before their physical eyes, and I was trying to convince their lordships that though that was not a new physical thing, the situation was no less a new one; that the social system which had come into being since 1867 and which had broken down in 1929 was something that had nothing like it in existence when the British North America Act was enacted, and that the responsibility for dealing with it rested upon those who had the controls by means of which that social system had been erected and under which it operated. But I could not make them agree to that. There were no physical machines that you could put before their eyes. It was just a concept of the mind, but it was as one that was recognized by those in our country who knew the conditions which had arisen and developed and who saw what the situation was, and which only they could properly see. But though their lordships held that the legislation was invalid, they so held because we had to concede that it was an invasion of property and civil rights in some of its aspects. But where is the hon. member of this house who will rise in his place and say that there is anything in this legislation which invades any jurisdiction given to the provinces?

There is just one more point, and that is as to the time required for a reference. The social legislation cases were dealt with with as great dispatch as it was possible to use, but it was not until the spring of 1937 that it was possible to get a decision. The hon. member suggests that this measure be referred to the supreme court, to be dealt with in October. The finality of such a decision still depends on what parliament may do and may have the right to do in the future. But at the present time there is the right of appeal in these cases to His Majesty's privy council, and no judgment of the supreme court would settle anything. If we once asserted to the Canadian people that there was doubt enough about the validity of this legislation to require the intervention of the courts, no one would be satisfied with anything less than a judgment of the court of last resort. If the supreme court held that the legislation was valid, that would not prevent anyone from subsequently challenging its validity and going over from the supreme court to the privy council, and the fact that the supreme court had held that it was valid would be no obstacle to the privy council deciding otherwise if it felt that there were reasons for so doing. So that the only way in which a judicial decision worth anything at all could be obtained would be to get a decision from a court that does not reverse itself, and one that constitutes a decision that no other court could reverse; the only way in which you can do that is to get a decision from the court of last resort. Without that kind of judicial reference, a decision would be absolutely worthless. To get that kind of judicial reference would require, if not two years, nigh on to two years.

I do not think there is anything I need add.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is significant that hon. members who belong to the legal profession differ on the question of the constitutionality of this measure. I believe these differences are honest differences. Those on this side of the house who argue that it may be unconstitutional do so with the honest thought that the people of this country should not be led to suppose that by passing this bill we are going to give them something, if it should be found later that we have not the power to do so.

I want to deal for a few moments with another consideration, the fact that this bill has come in so late in the session that it does not contain many of the provisions which bills of this kind ordinarily should have. I have seen a great many measures dealing with social legislation brought into provincial and federal parliaments, and it has been my observation that these bills usually deal in great detail with the regulations under the particular act. Here we have a bill which simply sets forth that we are going to pay allowances for children up to sixteen years of age, and the regulations are to be left entirely to a board. Parliament will have nothing to do with them; they will not be brought before the house so that hon. members can deal with them. I believe this to be a very grave mistake, because conditions in different parts of this country are such as require differing provisions to be made in the various sections. It is true that a board is to be set up and that it is to draw up the regulations. We find, for instance, that they are to pay allowances in respect of children up to the age of sixteen. In many parts of this country a child can leave school at the age of fourteen. I take it that when a child reaches fourteen years of age and starts to work, automatically the allowance will stop.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is sixteen in Ontario.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is sixteen in Ontario, but in some provinces it is only fourteen. I do not know whether all provinces have a compulsory school age.

The other day one hon. member opposite said that we have always viewed social legislation from pretty much the point of view of the industrial centres, and that it had been drawn up chiefly for the benefit of the industrial workers, but that now we are going to give something to the farmer; at least, the farmer is to get something in the nature of social insurance. I take it that under the bill, when an application is made for money under this family allowance scheme it will have to be accompanied with an income tax return, because certainly no one can receive the allowance and also have a reduction in income tax for children. It is a good way of getting the farmers of this country to make income tax returns.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt my hon. friend? There is nothing in this bill which will make the filing of an income tax return obligatory. Allowances are paid to everyone entitled under the provisions irrespective of whether he makes a return or not.

Mr. HOMUTH: I quite understand that, but it does refer to the fact that regulations can be and undoubtedly will be set up that, where a man is getting a reduction in income tax because he has some children, naturally he is going to lose one end or the other; he cannot have his cake and eat it. That means that under these regulations he will have to file an income tax return in order to get this allowance, and all these farmers whom hon. members were appealing for will have this terrible sheet of paper to fill in before they can get this allowance. Then they may find out that they cannot get it, and that this thing which is said to be done for them is not done for them at all, but that they are subject to income tax, although many of them consider that they are not.

I have a case in mind. The man is general superintendent of a farm. He gets $100 a month; he has two children, and because he gets only $1,200 a year he says, "I am not subject to income tax; I will not make out an income tax return." The fact of the matter is that the man also gets a free house, free fuel, free milk, free butter, a hog every year, and various other things which go along with this kind of employment; and if these are figured in as the income tax act provides that they must be, that man is subject to income tax. If he makes application under this bill for money for his two children he has to fill in an income tax return. He will find out that he owes income tax; that he should have been paying it, and probably the income tax division will say, "Here, what have you been doing the last eight or ten years, that you have not been paying income tax?"

I think the regrettable part of this legislation is that no definite regulations are set out and that the drafting of them is left to a board; that parliament has nothing to say about them and that they will not be subject to the approval of parliament until they have been enacted.

We should be careful not to mislead the people of this country into the notion that they are getting something for nothing. I am sceptical of governments which seem to hand out all the good gifts like a Santa Claus just prior to an election, and I believe the people of Canada should watch legislation such as this very carefully before they get the idea that they are going to receive something for which they will not have to pay.

Mr. KNOWLES: We have listened over a period of several days and for a good many hours to a debate on the constitutional question with respect to this measure. We in this group for the most part have sat silent during this phase of the argument. I suppose that one very good reason for our silence is that none of us is a lawyer. But the very fact that I am not a lawyer is the reason why I rise to say a few words on the constitutional question; in the hope of interjecting a humanitarian viewpoint along with the legal viewpoints which have already been advanced on both sides.

I have always understood that there was in English law and similarly in Canadian law an element of growth. I have always understood that although the high court of parliament and the courts of our land might lag a little behind public opinion, there is a tendency on the part of parliament and of the courts in due course to catch up with public opinion. I have always understood that decisions rendered by the courts on any constitutional question in one era might be quite different from those given at a later period. It has been argued to-day that twenty years ago there were questions as to the constitutionality of old age pensions legislation had it been established on the basis of direct contributions from the federal treasury to individuals. That may have been the case. The courts, if they had been called upon to render a decision in that matter at that time, might have ruled against the power of the federal parliament to enact that kind of legislation. But although I am not speaking as a lawyer but as an ordinary human being—

Mr. MacNICOL: You do not mean that lawyers are not human beings?

Mr. KNOWLES: Take it for what it is worth.

Mr. MARTIN: It is not worth very much.

Mr. KNOWLES: —I am quite satisfied that if the courts were called upon to make a decision on that matter to-day they would sustain the right of the federal parliament to enact old age pensions legislation in which the federal government would pay the entire cost. There may have been in some provinces questions about it twenty years ago but there are no questions to-day. All the provinces are asking the federal government to pay a larger share of old age pensions; in fact, they are asking the federal government to pay the whole cost and they are asking at the same time that the amount be increased. And so it is with the family allowance proposal. We heard some opposition to the measure in this house the first day the bill was called, although when the vote was taken for the second reading and that stage of the proceedings was finally disposed of, the support for it was unanimous, and we are still hearing argument about its constitutionality. But I have not heard of any provincial premier or the leader of any opposition group in any of the provinces expressing opposition to this measure. There are questions such as we have raised, such as with respect to some details of the bill, and also making sure that wage standards are not depressed, and so on, but after you have taken care of such matters, I am quite satisfied that the general opinion throughout the country is in favour of the measure.

What I am saying may not be a legalistic opinion, but I imagine it is pretty close to the facts, namely the developmental kind of law that we have in this country, when I state that if this measure were submitted to the courts I am satisfied that the power of the federal parliament to enact it would be endorsed. I have listened very attentively and with great interest to the arguments that have been advanced from both sides of the house on the constitutional question. I have noted that at one moment the Liberals seem to score a point and a moment later the Progressive Conservatives score. They have a great deal of pleasure in quoting each other's arguments as advanced in years gone by. As a matter of fact, that can be done almost on any subject.

I was interested in a study I made a short time ago with regard to the compulsory retirement of judges to find that in 1927 the Liberals, who were then in power, proposed the compulsory retirement of certain judges and advanced certain arguments. The Conservatitves —I believe they were called Liberal Conservatives at that time—on the opposition side, opposed the measure and advanced their arguments. In 1932 the tables were turned. The Conservatives, whatever their full name was at that time, were on the government side, and they introduced a measure for the compulsory retirement of certain other classes of judges. What arguments did they use? The very arguments the Liberals had used in 1927. The Liberals, on the other hand, opposed the measure, advancing the arguments that the Conservatives had used five years before. In fact they quoted each other from Hansard, and even enjoyed the reverse use they were making of their own arguments. What does it prove? Take your guess. As far as I am concerned, it proves that there is not much difference between them. It is simply a matter of which party is in and which is out.

After you have boiled it all down, I suggest in ordinary language that there is something in what I have tried to say, namely, that our law grows and develops, and that the courts, although they may tend to lag behind public opinion, also tend to catch up with it. I feel that the people of Canada are so thoroughly in favour of taking every possible step in the direction of complete social security and are so fully in support of this measure that there is no question that parliament would be vindicated by the courts and its right to enact this bill established. I suggest that we should not waste undue time in discussing constitutional questions. Rather, the humanitarian point of view should prevail.

Mr. CLAXTON: I want to say a word, since the hon. member for Lake Centre referred to an opinion I gave to the Rowell-Sirois commission. It was a study made for the commission together with the then Mr. L. M. Gouin, now a member of the other house. The parts quoted by my hon. friend from this study are quite accurately quoted. But if hon. members will refer to those parts as quoted by him in his speech the other day they will find that they do not bear out the impression he now wishes to convey by them. After referring to the opinion of Lord Atkin, at page 366 of the report in the employment and insurance reference case, 1937, I say this:

If this is a correct statement of the law, the dominion old age pensions act will be invalid if that act is in itself legislation "affecting the classes of subjects enumerated in section 92", or if the act "is so framed as to invade civil rights within the province or encroach upon the classes of subjects which are reserved to provincial competence."

So that I begin by stating, "If this is a correct statement of the law". I express no opinion myself as to whether it is a correct statement of the law or not. It was my opinion that then, with respect, it was an incorrect statement of the law. I still think so.

But in any event the case to which my hon. friend refers, and which has been so adequately dealt with by the Minister of Justice, the employment and social insurance reference case, is quite distinguishable for the reasons stated by the Minister of Justice. To refer again to this study, the point in issue before the house to-day, raised by members of the Conservative opposition, is dealt with at page 18 of my own study, in which I say:

Since there can be little doubt but that the dominion under its general power to deal with the public debt and property, conferred by section 91 (1), can expend its own money how it wills, even upon provincial objects, it is submitted that all such grants made without special statutory authority are intra vires of the dominion.

And in a footnote I quote Mr. Bennett in support of that assertion, when he said in 1936:

It does not require the parliament of Westminister to pass a statute to confer upon this parliament the jurisdiction to deal with its own revenue.

There you have the whole point in issue between the hon. member for Lake Centre and the Minister of Justice. The point has been admirably stated by the Minister of Justice, and I can only say this: From such reading as I have been able to give the constitutional cases my own view is as stated in this study back in 1938 and it remains the same, namely, that the bill is perfectly constitutional.

Just one word with regard to the question of haste which was also raised by the hon. member. The question of undue haste is always raised by people who really wish to oppose legislation. We always hear, "Why the undue haste?" when any social legislation is put forward. This question was put forward by the Conservative opposition when the unemployment insurance bill was under consideration in 1940. In fact at that time they were on both sides of the question. Speaking on July 16, 1940, as appears at page 1662 of Hansard, the hon. member for Peel said:

While, I confess, I have not had a long experience in public life, one thing which has impressed itself upon me in connection with this particular legislation is the length of time which democracy takes to get needed reforms completed and concluded.

To-day the government is trying to get this badly needed reform concluded and we are asked: Why this haste? That same question was asked by the hon. member for York-Sunbury back in 1941 on July 26, as reported at page 1978 of Hansard:

Mr. Chairman, there seems to be the most indecent haste in getting this measure through parliament.

On the same day at page 1993 of Hansard we had the hon. member for Peel, now the leader of the opposition, saying this:

In my opinion security for our workers, limited though it may be, must not be postponed any longer. On another occasion in the house I have discussed the length of time democracies seem to take to bring about much needed reforms, and to bring necessary legislation into operation. I regret that we in Canada have spent so much time talking about unemployment insurance, and that it has taken so long to implement the principle by legislation.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do you disagree with what I said?

Mr. CLAXTON: There we have two leading members of the Conservative opposition on the same day taking sides that are opposed to each other.

Then on July 27, 1944, at page 5472 of Hansard, the hon. member for Vancouver South said:

> The first step taken by this government was to scuttle the Bennett reform measures; and it was done most effectively. Then, after much prodding, coaxing and pleading, one step was taken toward social security, and that was the passing in 1940 of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

There we have three hon. members at different stages taking views directly in conflict with each other. They differed from each other as to when the Unemployment Insurance Act should be brought in; but to-day they not only differ from each other but they differ from themselves as an entire party. Just last week we had a vote of the whole party present in the house unanimously supporting this legislation, and now they say we should not proceed with it because it is unconstitutional.

Mr. MARTIN: And they differed from their leader, John Bracken.

Mr. CLAXTON: With regard to this question of time, surely hon. members must appreciate that if the Minister of Justice says that a submission to the courts would take two years, that is not the end of the delay required to bring into effect legislation of this kind. After the case was decided the legislation would still have to be brought into effect and the administrative machinery and the machinery for cooperation with the provinces would still have to be set up. It is not only two years' delay that the hon. members of the opposition are pleading for to-day; it would mean three or more years' delay. I submit that the people of Canada do not want to see that kind of delay in this legislation.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I just make one suggestion. The hon. member speaks of delay. I think I made clear in my speech on second reading of this bill that what this party was anxious for was that social reform with respect to the children of Canada should have a very minimum of delay, because of the experience which my right hon. friend across the way had with respect to unemployment insurance where, as he pointed out, it was found to be unconstitutional by the courts and it took not two years as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George now says would be the delay, but from 1935, to July, 1941, before that legislation operated to help the working people of Canada. It was because of that tremendous delay, owing to the experience of the past, that I felt we would make much more time and that we would get relief to the children of Canada much more quickly if we enacted a workable, constitutional measure rather than one that was afterwards found not workable by the courts. I made it very clear, I think, that an act that will not stand up before the courts of Canada is worse than no act at all, and I wish to leave that impression on my hon. friends.

The hon. member for Essex East made some facetious reference, perhaps, with respect to—

Mr. MARTIN: No, very serious.

Mr. GRAYDON: If it was that, it is all the worse for my hon. friend. In any event he made some statement about some division between the national leader of our party and the party in the house. May I say this. I think I made it very clear at the time of the vote that there was no division between the national leader of this party and the group in the house, because actually it was a decision made jointly and a decision to which this party and Mr. Bracken subscribe.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member for Lake Centre seems to take a certain amount of credit to Mr. Bracken, the leader of the Progressive Conservative party, by reason of the fact that he alone was a great advocate of the implementing of the recommendation of the Sirois report. May I say that when history is written this will stand against Mr. Bracken as the greatest single score upon which he will be condemned.

Of course, all these discussions regarding the constitutionality or the unconstitutionality of almost any measure which may be proposed by any government in Canada for the amelioration of conditions among the people causes a great deal of frustration if not almost dismay and despair among the Canadian people. They begin to wonder what can possibly be the matter with a constitution such as the British North America Act which apparently embodied the principles which seemed sound to the best minds of 1867 and which is being used in a country of almost unbounded resources that it should be so often viewed as an impediment to the progress of the country and an excuse for not doing things. That really is creating a dangerous attitude in the minds of a great many Canadian people.

I do not propose to go into the matter at length at this time; I merely wish to point a way out. All this talk about the constitutionality or the unconstitutionality with respect to measures for the financial betterment of the people of Canada has come about because governments in power stubbornly refuse to recognize the power that lies in the hands of the federal government by reason of the fact that the British North America Act gave that government control over banking and currency. Just as soon as the government in power begins to use with intelligence and discernment the tremendous power which was given to it through having control over currency and banking, there will be no further anxiety about the constitutionality. In that portion of the British North America Act the federal government was given power to monetize the productive capacity of the Dominion of Canada. I think one may safely challenge any man to show wherein the British North America Act did not give the Dominion of Canada power to monetize the goods produced anywhere, from the extreme northwest of British Columbia to the extreme southeast of Prince Edward Island, or from the extreme south to the extreme north.

As I have said before, this power is entirely overlooked, and is being disregarded by members on both sides of the house. Even men like the hon. member for Davenport will rise in their places and, at least by implication, propose and advocate that powers be taken away from the provinces and placed in the hands of the federal government, that the object of the fathers of confederation shall be frustrated, and that this country shall lose its freedom. They will advocate even such extreme measures as that, rather than develop a little open-mindedness with respect to the power in the hands of the federal government in connection with currency and banking.

All of this is exceedingly dangerous. When the Sirois commission made its recommendations it recommended the establishment of fascism, if not totalitarianism, in Canada. All measures which tend to centralize power in Ottawa are fascistic, and are the exact opposite of those of a democracy. It is a well known and unchallengeable principle underlying democracy that the further the government is taken away from the people who are being governed, the less real democracy is possible. The result is that if we want to establish democracy in Canada, the power must be placed in the provincial governments, and then again in the county or municipal governments.

Even this measure, to which I have not objected thus far, centralizes a great deal of power in Ottawa. I should have much more readily favoured granting the money to the provinces, as direct grants, to which they would be given a constitutional guarantee, as of right, with the suggestion that the money should be used by the provinces for the payment of family allowances. As I said the other day, when replying to the hon. member for Davenport—and not because I find any fault with that good man, one whom I admire greatly—the people in the provinces know how to govern those provinces. There are no men in the Dominion of Canada who know more about governing Prince Edward Island than do the people in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. MacNICOL: I agree.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They know their local conditions; they know their needs, because they have lived in that province. They live in the province; they have built the province, and their children are going to live in it. Why should the power at Ottawa undertake to tell the people of Prince Edward Island how to manage the affairs of that province? The same applies to every province. Because of the enormous distances involved in the dominion, and the wide variety of geography and climatic conditions, it is all the more important that we guarantee to the local governments in the country a greater and greater measure of unchallengeable autonomy. Many people fail to see how that can be done, and still have efficient government guaranteed in the dominion. The reason why they fail to see it is that they do not see the significance of the power of the federal government over currency and banking.

I believe that is all I wish to say at the present time. I register my protest, which shall be applied on every occasion against any tendency to centralize power. That tendency does not stop with Canada. To-day everywhere we hear the urge for a world government which will take away from Canada as a whole the power to govern her affairs. It will take away from the United States her powers to govern her affairs. We are to have an international monetary stabilization bank—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I wonder if the hon. member would direct his attention to the bill itself?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am dealing entirely with the constitutional aspect. However, Mr. Chairman, if you rule that I am out of order I shall discontinue. But I believe that this is a matter which should be emphasized, and I shall not take very long to complete what I had intended to say.

I was just proceeding to say that there is an urge on the part of a large body of people who, I believe, know not what they do, that the power to control these great nations shall be taken from their own governments and placed in the hands of a board of men over whom each individual nation will have next to no control. There is to be set up an international police force to enforce the mandates of that central junta, wherever and of whomsoever it may be constructed.

All this is exactly the abnegation of democracy . It is an extension of the urge in Canada to take power away from the provinces, and place it in Ottawa. I say that this urge can be overcome entirely by the monetary measures I have suggested. I would agree with those who have said that they are not much concerned about the constitutionality of this bill. In my view a provision for family allowances must be established. Of course, if there must be an argument as to constitutionality, then let that argument be carried on after the establishment of the bill.

I support the bill, just as I did the other night when I voted for it. But I would say with regard to it, as I said the other day in connection with the establishment of floor prices, that I do not agree with the financial technique which it is proposed shall be employed in connection with the bill: I do not believe the money should be taxed from the people to pay family allowances.

I venture to tell the Prime Minister, and to tell anyone and everyone in Canada who has anything to do with the administration of the bill that if we go forward with these social measures on the basis that all the money we are to use to pay for social services must be taxed from the people, then we face only frustation and, ultimately, perhaps even despair. However, I support the principle of family allowances, and I shall support the bill.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity of putting on record something I was prevented from recording when I spoke on a question of privilege. To begin with, I would refer to a statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, as reported at page 5477 of Hansard, in which he said he protested because, as he said, I was endeavouring to create the impression that the quotations by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George and by the hon. member for Edmonton East were inaccurate. I was really doing nothing of the sort. I was attempting to read into the record the whole story with respect to this matter as it was brought out in the British House of Commons and only partly by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. For that purpose I wish to quote a passage immediately preceding the one quoted by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George when he referred to the speech of Sir John Anderson. This will be found at the beginning of page 1665 of the British Hansard, and it reads:

I come to the question of children's allowances. Apart from the Beveridge report, the government have had under consideration for some considerable time this important and somewhat difficult problem. Before the publication of the report, they had come to one clear and definite conclusion: that whatever might be decided about cash allowances, by far the best and the most effective measure, within the limits of its possibilities, is the fullest development of the various child welfare services which bring the benefits directly to the children. It has been, and it will be in future, the aim of the government to develop these services to the fullest possible extent. I may give some figures. Two years ago about 350,000 children were being provided with dinner at school, in England, Scotland, and Wales. Last October the number had increased to 1,000,000, and now it considerably exceeds that figure. Important proposals are being carried out now, which will provide canteens for another 500,000 children, and it is likely that during 1943 a further provision for between 500,000 and 750,000 children will have been approved. On the present showing, therefore, as a matter of current policy, not of future policy, some 2,000,000 out of 5,500,000 children in grant-aided schools will be provided with dinner before very long. It will inevitably be a considerable time before this provision of benefit in kind will reach its maximum. I am afraid it is true that there will always be some measure of inequality, and that there will always be the problem of school holidays. Therefore, the possibilities of the welfare services, which, of course, cover many things besides meals at schools, do not of themselves dispose of the arguments for cash allowances to parents, but it is, in the view of the government, important that such allowances, if granted, should not be at a rate which would in practice prove an obstacle to the fullest development of the welfare services.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What about the next page, 1667?

Mr. BRUCE: I will read that if you wish.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): At the foot of the page. That gives the real policy of the government.

Mr. BRUCE: I am not disputing the quotation made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Does the hon. member realize that immediately after the quotation he just gave, a question was asked of Sir John Anderson if one-half of those one million lunches were not paid for by the recipients? Then on page 1667 is the final declaration of policy by Sir John Anderson.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is an hon. member making a speech, and unless the Minister of Pensions and National Health is rising to a point of order I think he ought to keep quiet. This is a habit which he is getting into and it is likely to spoil the whole position of this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The leader of the opposition has no right and he will not be tolerated in telling me to keep quiet.

Mr. GRAYDON: I will tell you to keep quiet as often as I like, provided I am within the rules of the house, and I am telling you now.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member for Parkdale has the floor.

Mr. BRUCE: The hon. member for Vancouver Centre was one of those who persistently interrupted me the other day and would not allow me to read the passage I have just quoted. Now he wants me to go on and read the whole speech. If he wishes to read the speech I am quite willing to have him do so.

Mr. GRAYDON: It might keep him quiet.

Mr. BRUCE: I should like to refer to a few words of the excellent speech of the hon. member for Edmonton East delivered over a national network on Wednesday, July 19, at 8.30 p.m., and released on Thursday, July 20, by the national Liberal federation. She said:

Great Britain has supported children's cash allowances but has not made up its mind about them yet.

I presume that can be taken as an accurate statement of the government's position in the matter. I should like to refer for a moment to a few of the remarks made by the hon. member for Bellechasse, as reported on page 5479 of Hansard. He made reference to my grey hair. My grey hair did not prevent me from serving three years in the last war as a surgeon overseas. It did not prevent me from operating in casualty clearing stations within a few miles of the front line for periods of eight and ten hours at a time. It did not prevent me from offering my services as consulting surgeon within three days of the declaration of this war to the then Minister of National Defence, now the Minister of Pensions and National Health. My offer was declined and filed. I again offered my services in this war as a consulting surgeon to his successor, the late Hon. Mr. Rogers, thinking that the experience I had had in the last war might be of some help to our soldiers in some field of activity. Again my offer was declined; I had a very courteous letter saying it would be filed. I have not heard from either of those offers since, and I may say my presence in this house is owing to the fact that I hoped to contribute some war service by coming here when I was refused service overseas. I know the hon. member for Bellechasse has a head of hair which is still black, but I venture to say that he cannot show any better record in this or the last war than the one to which I have just referred.

I should like to say a word in regard to the statement made by the Prime Minister. I cannot find the page of Hansard at the moment, but I remember quite well what he said. He referred to me as belonging to another era.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is at page 5527, "champion of the point of view of a past age".

Mr. BRUCE: In view of what he said I challenge the Prime Minister to show that at any time in my life I have spoken for those who believe in a stratified society with the lower classes kept in their places. I have given many years of my life to the service of poor people in this country, more years, I think, than has the Prime Minister. Some years ago, in 1934, I spent a considerable period in studying slum conditions in the city of Toronto. With the assistance of an able committee we wrote a report. That report was published and was brought to the attention of this government in 1936. But in spite of that, this government has made no move to relieve the slum conditions throughout the country or to give better housing accommodation to those very poor who are unable to pay an economic rent.

Mr. Arthur Purvis was head of a commission to write a report on unemployment. While the government brought in legislation dealing with certain features of his recommendations with regard to the provision of housing, they neglected entirely to implement that part of his report which recommended the provision of housing for those in the lowest income group, the poorest people in our community. The government in its legislation provided for people who could afford to pay a certain sum of money down and borrow the rest from some lending company, part of which the government guaranteed, and then the borrowers repaid that money amortized over a period of twenty years. The Prime Minister was not then so solicitous for the humble poor as he seems to be to-day. He has had many years to think about them, and now, just at the end of a session and before an election, he suddenly becomes very solicitous about these poor people. I should like to remind him of the fact that in 1929 when he was Prime Minister, and in 1930 we had the greatest depression that this country has ever seen, when one million men in this country were unemployed and when a great army of young men were riding the rods, sleeping in hovels and in police stations and had very little to eat.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What government was in office then?

Mr. BRUCE: You were in office at that time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, we were not.

Mr. BRUCE: The present Prime Minister was in office at that time, and when the plight of the unemployed was brought to his attention he replied as follows, and as recorded at page 38 of Hansard of 1930, volume 1. When it was suggested that some assistance be given to these unemployed, this was his answer:

My hon. friend said that the present administration had done nothing to relieve unemployment, and he stated that I had said that when the provinces were too poor, then it would be time enough for the dominion to come in and assist. I do not recollect making any statement in those words. What I did say was this, that unemployment was first of all a municipal problem. I might go a step further back and say that it is first of all an individual problem, a problem for the individual and the family, a problem for the community and for societies and groups of societies within the community. Then it certainly becomes a municipal problem. If the municipalities find that they are incapable of dealing with the question of unemployment, it becomes a provincial problem. If the provinces find that they are unable to cope with the problem of unemployment, then I think it very properly becomes a federal problem, but until that stage is reached I think that we may well apply in the matter of unemployment as in all else the old maxim that it is a good thing for everyone to mind his own business. It is a good thing for the municipalities to look after their own business; it is a good thing for the provinces to look after their own business; and it is a good thing for the dominion to look after its own business.

Mr. GRANT: What is wrong with that?

Mr. GRAYDON: That is good advice to you.

Mr. BRUCE: That was on February 24, 1930, when the present Prime Minister was Prime Minister of this country.

Mr. GRANT: I was asking what was wrong with it.

[Mr. Bruce.]

Mr. BRUCE: When these men cried out for help, it was none of the Prime Minister's business; but now, when we are on the eve of an election, he suddenly takes an interest in the poor people of the country, and may I suggest that it may possibly be owing to the fact that these poor people have votes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I remind the hon. member that since these statements that he has just quoted were made we have had two general elections in which all this kind of talk has been gone over time and again before the public, and they have returned this administration with myself at its head with the largest majorities that have ever been given to the leader of a government in Canada.

Mr. BRUCE: That only shows how you can fool the people. Barnum said that you can fool all of the people some of the time, and some of the people all of the time, but that you cannot fool all of the people all of the time, and the Prime Minister will find, the next time he appeals to the people, that he will not be able to fool them again.

In 1939, after war had been declared, the Prime Minister said at page 24 of Hansard of September 8:

I need not tell hon. members that the sense of impending calamity was not something which was realized all of a sudden. Three years ago the government indicated its belief in the necessity for preparedness by asking parliament substantially to increase the amounts required for the defence services of our country. I frankly confess that from that day to this the possibility of a war in which Germany or other nations would be engaged, and which might spread to all parts of the world, has absorbed more of my time and thought than all else combined.

Following that statement, when the Prime Minister was speaking in this house on Tuesday last he gave us certain statistics in regard to the situation that existed among the men who offered themselves as recruits in this war. He spoke as recorded on page 5332 of Hansard about the marks of malnutrition and the importance of a revitalized citizenry. He was speaking on this family allowance bill. He stated:

In the six months from April to September, 1942, in all the military districts in Canada, 31·8 per cent were rejected of those who had enlisted for general service.

And later on he said:

The combined rejections amounted to 52·4 per cent.

I should like to ask, since the Prime Minister knew in 1939—and had known for three years before that, which would put it back to 1936—that we were going to have a war, what did he do to improve the nutrition of these poor people? What did he do to improve the health of the young men of this country, so that when they came up to enlist for service a larger percentage of them would be admitted into category A? I do not think he did very much; nor has he done very much since, because here we are in 1944, and now he tells the people of this country that we must rush in quickly and pass a bill on family allowances so that the nutrition of the poor people will be improved. Yet we know that during these last three or four years these very families have never had as much money before as they now have with which to feed their children. It does not strike me as being particularly logical, nor do I think his position in that respect is sound.

In regard to the subsidizing of large families in Quebec, it is really a matter of subsidizing families where the prevailing rate of pay is lower than prevailing rates in other provinces. I refer particularly to Ontario. In this way it brings about unfair competition between Quebec and Ontario. I remember reading a few years ago in 1941 that a member of the provincial house, Mr. Glass, stated that an industry called the needle trade industry, situated in Toronto, I think in the riding of the hon. member for Spadina—and I believe he can confirm this—was moved to Montreal because of the lower wages which prevailed there. We are asked now to give this subsidy in order to raise these wages to a standard which will enable the families of that province to maintain their children.

I think I said about all I wished to say on July 25, Mr. Chairman, and I shall refer only to one other matter in conclusion. The other day the Prime Minister told us that if John Bracken was in this house he would not dare to make the statement he had made outside this house, when he called this measure a political bribe; otherwise the right hon. gentleman would call the attention of Mr. Speaker to what Mr. Bracken had said and Mr. Speaker would rule him out of order. I am not intimidated by the threat the Prime Minister has made, and I now declare that this measure is a bribe of the most brazen character, made chiefly to one province and paid for by the taxes of the rest.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, I ask that the statement of the hon. member be withdrawn, as contrary to the rules of this house.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I think that statement is out of order, and I hope the hon. member will withdraw it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is that why his party voted for it?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): It is not in order to make a statement like that. I hope the hon. member will withdraw it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before the question of the point of order comes up, I was not quite sure just what the hon. gentleman said, in the exact words, and I wonder if he would mind repeating it, because it did not seem to me to be the kind of statement which is covered by the rules and which has to be withdrawn.

Mr. BRUCE: I said that this measure was a bribe of the most brazen character.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN: That will have to be withdrawn.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before a decision on the point of order is made, surely some other hon. members have the right to say something. In looking through the rules I have never been able to find any rule under which a member of the house can be forced to withdraw a statement made with respect to a measure. The hon. member did not make any statement with respect to any member of this house.

Mr. MARTIN: He certainly did.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am going to ask, Mr. Chairman that from now on these ceaseless interruptions be stopped. After all, it is not quite fair to the committee to have these interruptions.

Mr. CLAXTON: Who does the interrupting?

Mr. GRAYDON: Time after time when one rises in his place in this house there is simply a barrage from the government benches directed against hon. members on this side. Because we have only thirty-seven or thirty-eight members—

An hon. MEMBER: You do much more interrupting than we on this side.

Mr. GRAYDON: —is no reason why 175 members of this house should attempt to bludgeon, browbeat and bully members of the opposition. We have our rights in this house. We are sent here by the electors, just as are hon. members across the floor, and we are going to insist on our rights. Because this is a free parliament we want these rights to be respected.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member is out of order too.

Mr. GRAYDON: I say, in connection with the point of order which has been raised, that the hon. member for Parkdale has not at any time attributed to a single hon. member of this house anything which is unparliamentary in its character or in its import. It is all very well for the Prime Minister to make a great pose in this house as to what he would do with John Bracken if he were here; because the right hon. gentleman has 175 followers, what would happen to the national leader of our party. But let me say this to the Prime Minister and to you, Mr. Chairman, that if the rules are followed in this instance my hon. friend will not have to withdraw the statement as I understood the statement was made.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On a point of order, I desire to call the attention of the committee to what occurred in this house the other day. This measure was submitted to the judgment of this house, and unanimously the house voted in favour of it. Now we have the hon. member for Parkdale, who was conveniently absent on that occasion, accusing this measure of being nothing but bribery.

Mr. HOMUTH: Wait a minute. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. GRAYDON: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Chairman, I am on my feet. I have the floor.

Mr. HOMUTH: I am on a point of order. I have the floor.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have a point of order too.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am speaking on a point of order, and I do not yield.

Mr. GRAYDON: Let the hon. member sit down until I have stated the point of order. Mr. Chairman, are we all to sit down?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: All right.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The leader of the opposition will have an opportunity to speak to his point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am speaking to a point of order, and I say that anybody who terms this measure—

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order with reference to what the hon. member himself has stated in speaking to a point of order. The hon. member referred to the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) being conveniently absent, and he must withdraw that statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I say that when the hon. member for Parkdale calls this measure bribery he is reflecting on every single member who voted for it in this house. It is not a matter of referring to the measure. It is an absolute insult to every member of every party in this house including the leader of the opposition, and the statement should be withdrawn.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member made the statement that the hon. member for Parkdale was conveniently absent the other day. He has to withdraw that statement because it is contrary to the rules of the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is exactly the point. I am speaking to the point of order. After all, the Minister of Pensions and National Health ought to be the last man to attribute motives to another member of this house, and that is exactly what he did with reference to the hon. member for Parkdale. When any member says that another member was conveniently absent there is only one interpretation that can be put on such a statement, and that is that he was absent from some motive which is unworthy. I ask the hon. member to withdraw that statement.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I think the hon. member for Vancouver Centre will withdraw that statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Certainly sir. I withdraw it—either conveniently or inconveniently absent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member for Parkdale has referred to this measure as bribery of the most brazen character. He has done so notwithstanding that some days ago I notified hon. members that any statement of this kind was not parliamentary and would have to be withdrawn, since it would reflect upon every member of the house if it were made. What I wish to call attention to is the fact that all hon. members in this house except the hon. member who has risen at this moment, have supported this measure. They have supported what, according to my hon. friend's statement, is a measure which is bribery of the most brazen character. That is a reflection upon any hon. member who has supported the measure and voted on the second reading. May, at page 27, as cited in Beauchesne, sets forth that reflections upon members have been resented as indignities to the house itself. I say that what the hon. member has stated this afternoon is an indignity which reflects upon the house itself, and I say further that no hon. member in this parliament at any time would have made such a statement except the hon. member for Parkdale.

Mr. BRUCE: When the hon. member for Vancouver Centre said that I was conveniently absent—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): That has been withdrawn.

Mr. BRUCE: Well, I wish to refer to it for a moment—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BRUCE: I wish to inform the committee that I had to return to my farm because of the muddled man-power policy of this government. I am not able to get enough help to take off the crop and that was the reason why I had to return home.

Mr. GRAYDON: There were a lot of Liberals away doing their chores too.

Mr. BRUCE: I noticed a good many Liberals were home for the same reason. If I had been here I would have voted against the measure, since you, Mr. Chairman, know that my whip arranged with you to pair with me.

Mr. MARTIN: The only Conservative who stuck with John Bracken.

Mr. BRUCE: I think it is going a long way to stretch the rules of the house. I have always been willing to abide by the rules of the house. I made no reflection on any member of the house. They are entitled to vote as their conscience dictates. I regarded this measure at the beginning as a bribe and I still regard it as a bribe. I have said so and I will not retract that statement, Mr Chairman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I submit that after the members of this House of Commons have voted on a measure, and have not only given it their unanimous support but given the strongest of reasons why it should be supported, it is intolerable to have an hon. member say he still regards the measure as a bribe. Such a statement is a reflection on every hon. member of this house. I beg you, Mr. Chairman, to see that the hon. member withdraws immediately, or have the matter reported at once to His Honour the Speaker.

Mr. HOMUTH: Speaking to a point of order, may I say that the hon. member did not refer to any member of this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He referred to everyone of them.

Mr. HOMUTH: He referred to a bill; he gave his opinion of a certain bill. He made no reference whatever to the members of the government or anyone else who had voted for the bill, as everyone had done.

Mr. GRANT: You ran away too.

Mr. HOMUTH: Listen. One of these days you are going to talk too loud. I did not run away. I never ran away from you or any other Grit in the country and I will never run away from you. After the next election you will be following—

Mr. GRANT: You won't be in the cabinet.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I must ask the hon. gentleman to keep quiet. The hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) has the floor and must not be interrupted.

Mr. HOMUTH: I understand he will not do badly under the bill anyway. I maintain again, Mr. Chairman, and I think I am right in my contention, that the rule read by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Pensions and National Health refers to a reflection on members of this house. It does not refer to any measure itself. If that were the case, then you would have had the right to say to the Prime Minister that he had to withdraw, and that others had to withdraw, the statement that this was a smoke-screen. The one is as bad as the other. If one is out of order, so is the other. I contend that the hon. member is not out of order.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): There are rules, both written and unwritten, governing the House of Commons. When the hon. member makes the statement that this measure is a bribe it does in my opinion reflect on all hon. members who have supported the motion. I do not think the hon. member wants to cast a reflection and I do hope that he will withdraw that insinuation.

Mr. HOMUTH: No reflection on members at all.

Mr. BRUCE: I have already said that I made no reflection and intend to make no reflection on any hon. member. I can quite understand the sensitivity of the Prime Minister. Perhaps he is thinking back to the Beauharnois scandal.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I think the hon. member has intimated that he does not wish to cast a reflection.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is six o'clock.

Mr. GRAYDON: He is completely within the rules.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No. It is a reflection on every hon. member of the house, definitely.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are not Speaker. You would like to be, but you are not.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock there was a point of order raised on the statement made by the hon. member for Parkdale. The statement is as follows:

I am not intimidated by the threat the Prime Minister has made, and I now declare that this measure is a bribe of the most brazen character, made chiefly to one province and paid for by the taxes of the rest.

Mr. Mackenzie King: Mr. Chairman, I ask that the statement of the hon. member be withdrawn, as contrary to the rules of this house.

Then there was a discussion on the point of order raised, and a ruling made by the acting chairman at the time asking for a withdrawal. I now want to read to the committee citation 234 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Third Edition. It is relevant to the point of order that I have to decide, and will give me the necessary directions:

It is impossible to lay down any specific rules, in regard to injurious reflections uttered in debate against particular members, or to declare beforehand, what expressions are or are not contrary to order; much depends upon the tone and manner, and intention, of the person speaking; sometimes upon the person to whom the words are addressed, as, whether he is a public officer, or a private member not in office, or whether the words are meant to be applied to his public conduct, or to his private character; and sometimes upon the degree of provocation, which the member speaking had received from the person he alludes to; and all these considerations must be attended to at the moment, as they are infinitely various and cannot possibly be foreseen in such a manner, that precise rules can be adopted with respect to them.

When the Speaker observes upon any expression as personal and disorderly, and tending to introduce heat and confusion, and this appears to be the general sense of the house, the member offending ought immediately to make an apology, and to ask pardon of the house of this breach of their order, in as large and liberal expressions as possible, so as in such apology, to comprehend the person of whom the words were used. This is often very difficult to be obtained, especially when the offending person thinks he had sufficient provocation for using the expressions objected to. This consideration ought to be a warning to the house, and particularly to the Chair, to interfere at first; and not to permit any expressions to pass from a member unnoticed, which being applied by any other member as personally offensive to himself, may draw forth further words of heat and contumely, till at last confusion arises—different members take a warm and eager part in the dispute—and, besides the time that is lost in composing these differences, the House of Commons exhibits a scene of indecency and disorder, not very becoming their character as gentlemen, much less as one of the component parts of the great council of the nation assembled in parliament.

[The Acting Chairman.]

Citation 256 reads as follows:

The imputation of bad motives, or motives different from those acknowledged, misrepresenting the language of another, or accusing him, in his turn, of misrepresentation, charging him with falsehood or deceit; or contemptuous or insulting language of any kind; all these are unparliamentary and call for prompt interference.

Then the following words appear in citation 258:

The words "purchased by legislation" applied to a member of the house are unparliamentary.

The import of those citations will, to a large extent, guide me in my ruling. The word "bribe" has been used. This is the definition that the dictionary gives to it:

Money etc. offered to procure (often illegal and dishonest) action in favour of the giver.

Pervert by gifts or other inducements the action or judgment of.

Any gift or emolument use corruptly to influence public or official action.

Anything that seduces or allures.

There is no doubt of the strength of that word and its full meaning. I believe it was the hon. member for Waterloo South who, in making a comparison, said that the words "smoke-screen" had been used and that those words were just as objectionable as the word "bribe". There could be no comparison as to the right with regard to the use of these two words.

It will be noticed that in all the citations I have given it is always the singular that is used, and not the plural. In this case we are dealing with a definite situation. We are now in committee of the whole discussing an item after second reading has been given to the bill. Prior to the bill being given second reading there was a wide discussion, and finally a vote was taken. All hon. members present at that time voted unanimously and collectively for the bill. In this case we have to make a distinction between generalities and particularities, from the general to the particular, and I feel, and I so base my ruling, that in view of what happened before second reading, a unanimous vote on this particular bill, not a single hon. member, either individually or collectively, thought it was a question of bribery or corruption or anything of that kind. For the reasons I have given and the citations I have quoted I am going to ask that the hon. member make a withdrawal of the words he used, realizing that they were unparliamentary.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Chairman, following that order—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Chairman, I must appeal from your ruling. I regret to say that I will not withdraw the statement I made. I made that statement as against this measure and I maintain that I had a perfect right to make it and I stand by it.

Mr. GRAYDON: On a question of privilege—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. CASSELMAN: You are only the minister of pensions.

Mr. GRAYDON: I wonder who is in charge of this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You certainly are not.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I want to ask the Chairman if I have the right to rise on a question of privilege. I am not anxious to have the advice or the opinion of those across the way until I want them. Do I have the right, Mr. Chairman, to rise on a question of privilege?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I think the rules of the house specifically lay down the procedure. Your ruling has been appealed from by the hon. member for Parkdale. I think the procedure is specifically laid down as to what you should do, Mr. Chairman, you should report the matter to the Speaker of the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Chairman has already granted me the right to rise on a question of privilege. My hon. friend ought to know the rules. He ought to know that a point of order does not take precedence over a a question of privilege.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It certainly does.

Mr. GRAYDON: The reason why I rose was this. The Chairman had neglected and omitted to mention that at the close of the proceedings at six o'clock the acting chairman who was then in the Chair gave what I thought was a ruling at that time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No, he did not.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think we ought at least to have the record of Hansard before us to see what the acting chairman actually said at that time before the Chairman attempts to make his ruling at this time.

The CHAIRMAN: I believe the leader of the opposition has the right to call for the record to see what was said by the acting chairman at six o'clock. This is what the record states:

> Mr. Bruce: I have already said that I made no reflection and intend to make no reflection on any hon. member. I can quite understand the sensitivity of the Prime Minister. Perhaps he is thinking back to the Beauharnois scandal.
> Some hon. Members: Withdraw.
> The Acting Chairman (Mr. Golding): I think the hon. member has intimated that he does not wish to cast a reflection.

That is the last statement that was then given.

Mr. GOLDING: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: I must say that we cannot have a discussion now. The hon. member for Parkdale has appealed from my ruling. I cannot do anything but report to the Speaker.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Chairman, wait a minute. On a point of order—we are still discussing the point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is no point of order.

Mr. HOMUTH: The point of order was raised.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order. The Speaker is standing.

Mr. HOMUTH: We are still in committee. We have not gone back to the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order, sit down.

Mr. HOMUTH: We are still in committee of the whole.

The SPEAKER took the Chair and submitted the question to the house in the following terms:

I understand that the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) has refused to accept the ruling of the chairman of the committee and has appealed from it; therefore it is the duty of the Chairman of the committee to report to the house through the Speaker.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, there have been two rulings from the Chairmen. The acting chairman just before six o'clock ruled that the hon. member for Parkdale had said that he had not intended to reflect on the integrity of any hon. member of this house. That, I took, was a ruling. That ruling I believe has been ignored by the present Chairman, and therefore I think the situation is not as reported to you, sir, the Speaker of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just following what my hon. friend has said, he has made a point and has been careful to say that the reflection was not on any hon. member of the house.

Mr. ROWE: And neither was it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a minute. The point I raised was that it was a reflection on every hon. member of the house who was present on the division on the second reading, and was a reflection arising out of a vote that had been taken in the house.

Mr. CASSELMAN: That was your impression.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish to draw Mr. Speaker's attention to standing order 41, which reads as follows:

> No member may reflect upon any vote of the house, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

When the hon. member says that this measure is a bribe of the most brazen character, he is referring to a measure which has been brought down by the government, and is reflecting upon the government, upon hon. members who voted its second reading which carried unanimously; and he certainly is reflecting upon the vote of the house.

May I add this, by way of emphasis: What has been said by the hon. member, comes from one who has held the high position of lieutenant-governor in the province of Ontario, one who has been a representative of the crown. The standing order I have been reading to the house begins as follows:

> No member shall speak disrespectfully of His Majesty, nor of any of the Royal family; nor of the governor or person administering the government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either house, or against any member thereof. No member may reflect upon any vote of the house, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The hon. member has, notwithstanding the position he once held as the representative of the crown in one of the provinces of Canada used offensive remarks in this house, and against the members thereof, and has reflected upon members of the house, and so far as the house itself is concerned has committed an indignity.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker, speaking to a point of order—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GOLDING: On a point of order—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am in this position: I have to receive the report from the chairman of committees with regard to what occurred in the committee. When it is submitted to me, I shall read it to the house, and the house will decide what must follow after. No argument and no debate will take place.

Mr. ROWE: Why has the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) an opportunity, and nobody else?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I answered the hon. member.

Mr. ROWE: You have no more special rights in this house than anybody else.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was not taking special rights.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Bradette, chairman of the committee of the whole, reports that in committee of the whole Mr. Bruce, hon. member for Parkdale, during an address directed to the Prime Minister and the committee, stated that Bill No. 161, an act to provide for family allowances, introduced by the government, was a bribe to the people of Canada. Mr. Bruce was asked by the chairman to withdraw the word "bribe" which he had used. Mr. Bruce refused to withdraw that expression and appealed to the house from the chairman's ruling.

Mr. CASSELMAN: On a question of privilege, may I ask how the chairman made this report, when he was not in the chair at six o'clock? He was not even in the house.

Mr. BRADETTE: I was in the house.

Mr. ROWE: No; you just heard about it during the dinner recess.

Mr. BRADETTE: On a question of privilege, I was in the house when the discussion took place and, more than that, I have read the report of Hansard.

Mr. GOLDING: I should have an opportunity to speak.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ROWE: You have been ignored all through.

Mr. SPEAKER: With regard to the question as to the Chairman of committees making a report when he was not in the Chair, it is the duty of the Clerk to take a note of proceedings in committee, and I now have these notes.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a question of privilege. I say that in the confusion just before six o'clock Hansard did not get everything the Chairman had said, because he did accept the hon. member's word.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He did not.

Mr. SPEAKER: The only matter before the Chair is the report from the Chairman of the committee. It is my duty to remind the house that the question is: Shall the ruling of the Chairman be confirmed?

The house divided on the question: "Shall the ruling of the Chairman be confirmed?" And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

Mr. SENN: I was paired with the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Ross). Had I voted, I would have voted against the ruling of the chairman being confirmed.

Mr. SPEAKER: The decision of the house having been given, I wish to direct a remark to the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce). He is an old member of the house, accustomed to the dignity and decorum of assemblies. Under circumstances which are very painful to the house and to myself I would ask the hon. gentleman if he would withdraw his remark.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Speaker, I regret to say that I cannot and will not withdraw my remark.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must therefore ask the hon. member if he will withdraw from the chamber until the house decides what it will do.

And Mr. Bruce having withdrawn.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I would draw the attention of Your Honour and hon. members of the house to citation 280 of standing order 40 in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, 1927, which reads:

> In case a member persists in using unparliamentary language, the Speaker will be compelled to name him, which is equivalent to submitting his conduct to the judgment of the house. The member should then explain and withdraw and it will be for the house to consider what course to follow in reference to him. If the explanation is deemed sufficient, some member will move that it be accepted. In case the offending member does not explain and persist in remaining in the house, a motion shall forthwith be made, preferably by the leader of the house, "that Mr. . . . member for . . . be suspended from the service of the house."

The hon. member has stated to Your Honour that he will not withdraw the statement which he has made, and I would therefore move:

> That Mr. Bruce, member for Parkdale, be suspended from the service of this house for the remainder of to-day's sitting.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say to the Prime Minister that this pretty well indicates the degree of seriousness of the offence and, I think, shows the ridiculousness of the position which the Prime Minister and the government have taken in connection with it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those in favour of the motion will please say "yea."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yea.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those against the motion will please say "nay."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And five members having risen.

Mr. SPEAKER: Call in the members.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The Tories against family allowances.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Would you not like to get that on the record?

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Mackenzie King) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. SENN: I was paired with the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Ross). Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

And the house having resumed in committee on the bill.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Chairman, I desire to place before the committee my position with respect to this bill. The scene that we have witnessed this evening indicates that the purpose of this bill is for its political effect rather than to assist the homes and families of this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did my hon. friend say that this bill was intended for political effect and not to assist the homes and families of this country?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): That is my interpretation of it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then I would say, Mr. Chairman, that that is out of order and that the hon. member must withdraw the statement. He is not permitted to make any such reflection.

Mr. HOMUTH: Speaking to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I think we are getting a little touchy in this house. I think of some of the days when the present Prime Minister sat in opposition with his chief adviser on the procedure of the house, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, who sits back of him now with the loud voice, which will not be heard when the next election is over—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have never changed my party, but the hon. member has belonged to every party in Canada. I have never been defeated in an election like my hon. friend.

Mr. HOMUTH: You will get it; the fall will be great, and it will be a good thing for the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have seen letters to the effect that the hon. gentleman was supporting the Liberal party.

Mr. HOMUTH: There he is again. To him—that is his opinion—it seems to be rather more from the point of view of political effect. Surely we are getting very tender-skinned and touchy about things when an hon. member cannot rise in his place and say that. Again I refer to what was said by the Prime Minister the other night, when we were told that our attitude on the constitutionality of this bill was simply a smoke screen.

Mr. MARTIN: It was too.

Mr. HOMUTH: There he goes again. There is another voice which won't be heard after the next election.

Mr. ROWE: There is another screen that smokes.

Mr. GRAYDON: The "little smoke" from Windsor.

Mr. HOMUTH: I protest against the Prime Minister being so touchy on this matter, because an hon. member has said that to his mind there is more of a political effect to this than otherwise. Surely neither you, sir, nor anyone else sitting in that Chair could rule that that was out of order.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I say just a word on the point of order? We have just voted to sustain your ruling, Mr. Chairman, when it was charged that a vote of the house was a matter of bribery rather than the public interest, but I believe that the Prime Minister is on very shifty ground in this respect, when he raises—

Mr. HOMUTH: He will tell you that "shifty" is out of order, in a minute.

Mr. COLDWELL: I will say, "shifting" ground, when he argues that to say something has a political effect is out of order. I think it is rather "slim" ground which the Prime Minister is taking.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let us understand what the hon. member said. It was not a question of political effect; it was the intention—the bill was intended for political advantage and not to help the homes of the children of the country.

Mr. HOMUTH: He did not say "political advantage"; he said "political effect". Read Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not so understand him, and I did not so state the case. I said I understood the hon. member to say that the measure was intended for political purposes and not to help the families of the people of this country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He did not put it in quite that way. He said it had more of political effect than to help the people—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say this to hon. members of the house? I have no desire in the world to do in this matter other than protect the privileges of every single hon. member in this house. It is part of my duty as the leader of the house in so far as possible not to allow to pass anything which is contrary to the rules of the house or to the decorum of the house. I have been silent in many cases where perhaps I should have spoken; but after one hon. member has been suspended for reflecting upon a vote of the house, and so reflecting upon the government and hon. members, for another hon. member to endeavour to repeat the same offence is something which cannot be allowed to pass without attention being drawn to it. I have no desire, if there is any doubt as to what the hon. member meant, to press this matter further, but if the hon. gentleman's remark was that this measure was intended for political purposes and not to help the homes and families of Canada, then I say the hon. member should be asked to withdraw the statement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. COLDWELL: I allowed the Prime Minister to interrupt me, but I had the floor. What I suggest is, let us get on with the business, rather than argue—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The Tories have changed their minds; that is all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will you just keep quiet?

Mr. HOMUTH: My hon. friend has not a mind to change.

Mr. COLDWELL: As I heard the remark I thought the hon. member for Cumberland was within the rules of parliament, while I did not think the other remark was within the rules of parliament. I think we should now go on with our job here.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the point of order, may I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that the Prime Minister took from the remarks of the hon. member for Cumberland something which I believe, knowing him as I do, was farthest from his thoughts.

Mr. TUCKER: Speak for yourself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will you be good enough to keep quiet? I am trying to inject a little placidity into these proceedings if I can, and I think it is required, because I never saw such a burlesque in the House of Commons in my life as we witnessed here this afternoon. The dignity of this house is at a pretty low ebb. I suggest that the hon. member for Cumberland had nothing further from his mind than to throw a reflection on the membership of this house. What he was saying was that in this interpretation it had more of political effect than it had for the national good. I think we ought to forget about this incident—

Mr. GARDINER: Let him withdraw, and we will forget it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):—and this House of Commons ought to recover its dignity, something which has been lost this afternoon, and may bring this parliament into public disrepute. I suggest that all of us should be impressed with this idea, and instead of lowering the prestige of the house by promoting the weakest kind of charge against the hon. member for Cumberland, we ought to try to raise its dignity so that it will be strengthened in the estimation of the people. That is a consideration which, I believe, we have lost sight of to-day. This house has developed into a burlesque.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Who started it?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Your party did.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why should you interject anything? You cannot keep your mouth shut.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am a member.

The CHAIRMAN: If I understood the Prime Minister rightly, I believe he has withdrawn his point of order. I appreciate what has been said, and I hope that the committee will abide by the rules and as we proceed, will keep within the ambit of the item then before the committee. I believe that we should follow the rules more closely. If everybody would cooperate with the Chair we would have better order and more relevant discussions.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. ROWE: Try not to say much against the government, and you will "get by".

[Mr. Tucker.]

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I want to place my position before the committee with respect to this bill. As I understand it, the discussion is under two main heads, the principle of the bill—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That has been settled.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): —and the constitutionality of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That has been settled too.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): My position is fairly clear with respect to these matters. I voted for the second reading of the bill; therefore I went on record as being in favour of the principle of the bill. I have favoured such legislation all my life. I had to make a decision some years ago in the provincial legislature, when the revenue of Nova Scotia was only $7,226,000 or thereabouts, while to-day it is about 240 per cent above that, more than $17 million. We had certain social legislation before us for consideration and for enactment, if possible. We had to choose whether we would make a grant for mothers' allowances for the benefit of children, or whether we should adopt old age pensions. The financial position of the taxpayers of Nova Scotia at that time was such that we were not able to adopt both, although we were in principle heartily in favour of doing so. We gave our preference to mothers' allowances, although it did not bring us the political kudos which we would have received if we had enacted old age pensions. It involved an expenditure of about $360,000 a year, which was a very large sum in those days, when our revenues were small and we were operating under a deficit. We passed a mothers' allowances act because it had as its basis the assistance of families, particularly the assistance of children. My record from that day to this has been sympathetic to any measures which have as their purpose the benefit of the children and the family, and that is why on principle I support this measure, although there are many features of it which I do not like.

There is also before the committee the question of the constitutionality of the bill. I have a record with respect to that as well. I am in agreement with the view expressed this afternoon by the hon. member for Yale and several other laymen, also the legal opinions expressed by some members of this house. There is certainly a doubt as to the constitutionality of this bill. I do not see why there should be; I do not see why we should have to give any attention to a discussion as to whether this measure is constitutional or not. I myself have grave doubts how, as the hon. member for Yale expressed it this afternoon, this parliament can vote and administer money for the benefit of children in the home, when we have been told for the last fifteen years that it was unconstitutional to do so for the benefit of the old people in the same home. I am at a loss with respect to that.

Matters of social legislation and unemployment insurance were before our legislature during the time I had a seat in that chamber. I went on record at that time with reference to these questions. The late Hon. Gordon S. Harrington was leader of the party of which I was a member in the house. He proposed an amendment to the speech from the throne, in 1936, placing himself and myself on record. I had the privilege of seconding that resolution. I am going to put it on Hansard to-night. It was opposed by the premier of the province of that day, now the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services and hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Macdonald), the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. McGarry), now in this house, and the members of their party. If that motion had been adopted and made effective at that time there would have been no need for this discussion now with regard to the constitutionality.

I wish to read the amendment that was proposed at that time. While it does not refer in precise words to the measure that is now before the house it does so in effect. On March 12, 1936, the Hon. Mr. Harrington moved and I seconded the following motion:

> This house regrets that the speech from the throne fails to indicate that the government of Nova Scotia has proposed or consented to a precise and specific amendment to be made by the parliament of Great Britain to the British North America Act, to empower the parliament of Canada to proceed at once with a centralized dominion-wide much needed social programme of maternity benefits, unemployment insurance, health insurance, accident insurance, widows' pensions, old age and invalidity pensions.
> Which amendment being seconded by Mr. Black, and a debate arising thereon, after some time spent in such debate, and the amendment being put from the chair, there appeared for the amendment 6 and against the amendment 18.

No action was taken at that time, and in the following year the proposal was made again by the Hon. Mr. Harrington, supported by myself in the provincial legislature. We went farther. We felt that it was most important in the interests of the people of the province that there should be a clear understanding of what our responsibility was. It was clearly recognized that it was not financially possible for Nova Scotia as a province, to undertake these measures which were so urgent and pressing, that we made a proposal to the government of the day that they support such a resolution, make it unanimous, and submit it to the federal government. They refused to do so and there have been years of delay and uncertainty. I will read the resolution which was proposed at that time on March 17, 1937. It was moved by Mr. Harrington as follows:

> Resolved, that the British North America Act should be amended to empower the parliament of Canada to create and administer a social security plan consisting of accident insurance, health insurance, unemployment insurance, widows' and orphans' pensions, old age and invalidity pensions and incidental and allied matters.

Which would include the matter of family allowances now before the house. An amendment was proposed by the attorney general, the Hon. Mr. McQuarrie, a follows:

> Whereas paragraph 12 of the speech with which this session of the general assembly of Nova Scotia was opened reads as follows:
> "My government feels that the recent decisions of the privy council respecting the validity of certain legislation enacted by the federal government in 1935 will necessitate a review of those sections of the British North America Act assigning jurisdiction to the dominion and provinces respectively. In any conference for this purpose my government will ever seek to secure the advancement and promote the welfare of the people who are its immediate care."
> And whereas, while these decisions have declared that the jurisdiction to enact certain types of social legislation resides in the provinces, it is desirable that measures of this nature should be dominion-wide in their application.
> And whereas this house approves of the announcement of the Prime Minister of Canada in the House of Commons on February 16 that the government of Canada proposed to appoint a royal commission of inquiry to investigate the whole system of taxation in the dominion; to study the division of financial powers and financial responsibilities between the dominion and the provinces; and to make recommendations as to what should be done to secure a more equitable and practical division of the burden so as to enable all governments to function more effectively and more independently within the spheres of their respective jurisdictions;
> And whereas this house believes that the scope of social legislation should be extended;
> Be it therefore resolved that this house express its view that the investigation to be undertaken by the said royal commission of inquiry should include the reallocation of the cost of social services, unless in advance of the sittings of the commission an agreement as to these matters shall have been reached between the dominion and the provinces ensuring that measures of social security affecting Canada as a whole shall be adopted at the earliest possible date.

Eight years have now passed, and the members of this house as well as the people of the country do not up to this day know just where we stand. The proposal made at that time was not submitted in any political sense but on its merits, and that proposal was that there should be specific amendments to the British North America Act, which in my opinion every province would have approved, and that those amendments should be enacted in order that the federal government would have the necessary undisputed authority to bring in legislation of this kind, to bring in unemployment insurance and other social measures which it was not within the competence of the provinces to enact and administer or which they were not financially capable of undertaking. If that had been done the people of the country would not have been deceived and much needed social legislation would not have been delayed for years. They have certainly been deceived for years on this question of constitutionality. The question has been thrown back from the federal government to the provinces and from the provinces to the federal government, so that we have not known where we stood.

The hon. member for Lake Centre the other day, in a most admirable speech, one of the ablest speeches I have heard in this house, placed the situation clearly before the house when he asked that, in view of the uncertainty that surrounds the subject, a special case be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada. It is only fair to the members of this house, especially the laymen, and to the Canadian people, that this be done. If that is refused, then I suggest that we go back to our proposal in Nova Scotia of 1936 and 1937 and accept the motion made at that time by the late Mr. Harrington and his associates and have that proposal enacted so that we may have a specific amendment to the British North America Act. If that were done, there would be no doubt in the years that lie ahead as to what our authority is, and we would be able to pass legislation that would be effective and concerning which there would be no shadow of doubt. That is the position I have taken over the years and that is the position I take to-night.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I wish to clear up one question that arose in connection with the second reading of the bill on July 27. The Prime Minister interrupted me and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre said that it was propaganda that I was advocating at that time. It is seldom that I have spoken in this house without having my facts before me and when the Prime Minister interrupted me I said that the facts could be found in a book that could be procured from the parliamentary library. I have checked the facts, and I find that in "Who's Who" for 1943 the statement is made that the right hon. Prime Minister was engaged upon the investigation of industrial relations under the auspices of the Rockefeller foundation from 1914 to 1917 and wrote "Industry and Humanity" in 1918. That was all I said. I did not say that he had given up his residence in this country, because I knew then, as I know now, that many men have been overseas for the last four or five years without having given up their residence in Ottawa or elsewhere in Canada, and the elections act provides that they may vote in their own constituencies. The Prime Minister has told us many times of the confidence that the people of Canada have reposed in him, but I would point out that at times this has been by means of an antiquated electoral system. The Prime Minister like many other hon. members was not elected by the majority of the ballots in his own constituency of Prince Albert. He was short some 1,460 votes.

The CHAIRMAN: Surely the present discussion is not germane to section 1 of this bill. I think hon. members should keep to the bill that is now before the committee.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I was only correcting the impression that took place on second reading of this bill. I have pretty well covered the matter now. I just wish to say that there are some seventy-four members in this house who have been elected to the present house without a majority of votes cast, although in 1919 the Prime Minister's chart, or whatever you wish to call it, did suggest some alterations in our electoral system.

When I spoke on second reading of this bill I said that I did not think it was constitutional. I repeat what I said a year ago, in 1943, in speaking on social security, and as has been well pointed out to-day, it is passing strange to me, if the federal government could not pay old age pensions direct but had to pay them through the provincial governments, how in the world they can profess to pay this grant, family assistance for young children, direct. I do not know. I fail to see where one can differentiate or draw the line between old people and babies in this legislation. As the hon. member for Lake Centre so well argued this afternoon, I think this matter should be referred to the supreme court and there should be a decision, because certainly if it is found to be unconstitutional at a later date, after we have started to put it in operation, it will be very much worse than having the matter cleared up at the beginning. I wish to make that point very clear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member has tried again this evening to leave the same impression he sought to leave the other evening, which was to the effect that I was in another country during the years between 1914 and 1918. He has read from the introduction to the book which I had written entitled "Industry and Humanity", that the work of research was carried out at the instance of the Rockefeller foundation. The hon. member perhaps has not known that the Rockefeller foundation has men carrying on investigations in all parts of the world, and that in many instances there is no obligation on the part of the investigators of the foundation to reside in any one place rather than another. It is true I was retained by the Rockefeller foundation to make certain researches. But the writing of the book which my hon. friend has referred to and the researches I made in connection therewith were for the most part carried on in this very city. I have allowed to pass in previous years this story that I was out of Canada during the last war. It has been repeated—

Mr. CASSELMAN: It was not denied until at the time of the last election.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. It was denied when I became leader of my party and has been denied many times since; but I have made it a general rule on matters of this kind to allow people to say what they please and not to pay any attention to them. But this thing has gone a little bit too far. It has gone to the extent where people of this country have come to have an entirely erroneous impression. I told the hon. member the other night that I had written every line of that book in this city and I wish to repeat that to-night. I want to tell him, if he needs to be told, that if he will go to the city hall here he will find that I have paid my taxes every month in this city from the year 1900 to date. If he will go to the Imperial Realty company he will find that I was living at the Roxborough every month of the years to which he has referred to-night. It is true that my duties took me occasionally to the United States to visit large industries in my endeavours to help in avoiding industrial complications—disputes in war industries and in helping to further a maximum production of munitions of war.

Mr. ROWE: On a point of order—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am going to answer the hon. gentleman; I have a right to answer him.

Mr. ROWE: On a point of order, I have the same rights in this house as the hon. Prime Minister. May I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that you were pretty rigid in your ruling as to our sticking to the issue. What has this to do with the bill we are discussing, whether the right hon. the Prime Minister was living in this country or in the United States during the last war? What has that to do with this particular issue?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Tory propaganda, that is all.

Mr. TAYLOR: There is no point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was replying to my hon. friend and I intend to continue to reply to him. I say to my hon. friend who has just taken his seat I hope that he and a few others will some day discover that there is such a thing as chivalry and decency in public life.

Mr. CASSELMAN: You would never know it from what you said to-night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say further to my hon. friend that during the greater part of the last war I was a member of the executive of the Canadian patriotic fund, and if he or any other hon. members will take the care to look at the record of the patriotic fund they will find I was present at more meetings than any other single member. During that time I was assisting in every possible way I could, having regard to circumstances which I could not avoid.

Just one further word with reference to what the hon. member for Souris said the other evening. He said that I had placed party before country. At that time he was referring to the words with which I concluded the debate an evening or two before, namely, that I hoped to be able to leave to this country, to my party and to my country an honourable name. Because I said party first, then country, he found it necessary to go out of his way to refer to me as "A man who puts party before country." Perhaps my hon. friend might be interested in knowing that where there are two words and one wishes to emphasize one word more than the other, one usually leaves the word to be emphasized to the last, and where there are two words, one of which refers to something which is greater than the other, one usually, if one is complying with the elementary rules of composition, allows the word expressive of the greater entity to follow the lesser. It may be helpful to the hon. member to keep that in mind from now on. That is the reason why I placed the word "country" at the end and the word "party" before it. I regard my country as more important than anything else.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would suggest to the Chairman that these paragraphs of section 2 be taken up one by one.

On section 2 (a)—paragraph agreed to.

On paragraph (b) —" child."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I desire to make an amendment to this paragraph which, I think, will meet what my hon. friends have in mind. I have tried to take note of the points which have been raised earlier in the debate. I shall ask one of my colleagues to move an amendment to paragraph (b) of section 2.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I move that paragraph (b) of section 2 be replaced by:

(b) "child" means any person under the age of sixteen years who is a resident of Canada at the date of registration and—

(i) who was born in Canada and has been a resident of Canada since birth; or

(ii) who has been a resident of Canada for three consecutive years immediately prior to the date of registration; or

(iii) whose father's or mother's domicile at the time of such person's birth and for three years prior thereto was in Canada and has continued to be in Canada up to the date of registration; or

(iv) who was born while his father or mother was a member of the naval, military or air forces of Canada or within twelve months after his father or mother had ceased to be a member of such forces;

but shall not mean any person who is in Canada contrary to the provisions of the Immigration Act.

Mr. GREEN: I take it that the intention of the amendment is to cover the cases of children born overseas whose fathers are in the Canadian forces. Is it the intention that the amendment shall cover the case of a child born to a Canadian soldier who may be in an army of occupation on the continent after the war?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It covers the cases of children born overseas, but while they are resident in Canada, not for the period of time that they are overseas.

Mr. GREEN: Will it not cover the case of a child in Great Britain? I believe there are many thousands of children of Canadian soldiers who have been born in Great Britain. The suggestion made by several other hon. members early in the debate was that the parents of those children should be covered. Canadian troops may be in Great Britain and on the continent for some years to come, and I suggest that the family allowance should be payable in respect of the children of those men.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is aware that, under the dependents' allowance board, at the present time provision is made for children such as those to which he has made reference. In the opinion of the government, if more is needed for their protection the best method in which to provide that protection would be under the act which already exists for that purpose. My hon. friend will see that payments under this measure will be made throughout Canada. It is hoped it will not be necessary to make payments under this measure outside Canada. However, payments under the dependents' allowance measure, already are made outside Canada; and if further payments are needed, in the opinion of the government it would be better if the necessary provision were made under dependents' allowance than to try to make any further amendment to this measure.

Mr. GREEN: In respect of the child of a soldier living in Canada, dependents' allowance is now paid. The same is true of a child in Great Britain. Under this measure a child living in Canada will receive family allowance. The family allowance will not be paid, however, in respect of the child living in Great Britain. As I understand the Prime Minister's present suggestion, it is that the dependents' allowance would be increased in respect of a child living in Great Britain. I should like to know why children are not treated the same in both cases. Why cannot that be done?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This bill does not come into effect until after July of next year. In the interval conditions may arise which, at the moment, cannot be anticipated. But if there is any injustice in any way with respect to any Canadian child born overseas it can readily be met, as I have said, under the dependents' allowance measure, when the time comes; or, if it were preferable, it could be met under some regulations under the present measure.

Mr. COLDWELL: I take it that it is the object of this bill to encourage the rearing of healthy young Canadians. If that is so, then it seems to me that these sections—and I have been able to give them only a cursory reading —are restrictive, and that we are by these sections limiting the children to whom this shall be paid. We are limiting it, because of the changes in residence, in respect of the parents.

Let us take a case in point. This child is born in Canada and has been resident in Canada since birth. Then the parents moved, we will say to the United States, perhaps in search of work. They return a year later and take up their residence in Canada again. Under these regulations would that child not be debarred until it had been here for three consecutive years?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. There is another section—perhaps my hon. friend has not seen it—which states:

. . . whose father's or mother's domicile at the time of such person's birth and for three years prior thereto was in Canada, and has continued to be in Canada up to the date of registration.

Mr. COLDWELL: That does not cover it. I draw attention to the words "has continued to be in Canada up to the date of registration." That is the point I am getting at. It seems to me to deprive the child of the benefits, under those circumstances. It is the child I am thinking about, not the family.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Here there are four classes, under which it has been felt that we would include all the children who were residing in Canada, except those who were born outside Canada, and who would not be included until they had been in Canada for three years. First of all, if they were born in Canada, and have remained here, they are covered. If they are born of persons who were not in Canada, but whose domicile or home is in Canada—but born away from Canada—they can be registered as soon as they get back here. And that, incidentally, would take care of merchant seamen.

It might well happen there would be men in the forces who are not domiciled in Canada. But they are in Canada's fighting forces, and they should have the same privilege as if their domicile were here.

Then there is the class who were not born in Canada, but who have been admitted to Canada, and have been here three years. It was felt, with respect to outsiders, that they should not merely by getting in become entitled to family allowances. A certain period should elapse, which would show that they intend to remain here.

I do not think it would be possible under that provision to exclude any who should be included unless, in the view taken by the hon. member for Vancouver South, it should also be paid outside Canada to children born of members of the forces. But, with respect to that, if anything unfair results from paying the allowances to children of members of the forces in Canada, it can be dealt with more conveniently by increasing the dependents' allowance; because there are boards there to determine overseas who are the persons who can receive dependents' allowances, while if it were left generally payable to any child who could claim that one of his parents was or had been a member of the forces, it would be very difficult to arrive at proper decisions.

There would have to be some controlling agency to determine who are to receive the benefits. That controlling agency exists already in the form of the boards administering dependents' allowances. It would be much simpler for the time the children will remain overseas to arrange for an increase in dependents' allowance than it would be to have another separate agency to distribute the allowance.

Mr. GREEN: Why could not the dependents' allowance committee in Great Britain deal with family allowances as well? I presume they will have to do much the same thing in Canada.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Because this paragraph, as it is, is so broad that it would give rise to claims which the boards administering dependents' allowance would not recognize. They recognize claims for persons who have been living together as man and wife for a period determined by the regulations, but do not recognize other possible situations; whilst this is intended to apply to all children in Canada.

Mr. GREEN: I realize that there might be some administrative difficulties, and there would certainly be some cases in which it would be improper to pay allowances. But I suggest it is unfair to the great majority of men in the forces who are overseas and who have children there. A man who was married in Great Britain and perhaps at the present time has two children—and I believe some of them have two or three—is, in my opinion, entitled to the family allowance. I do not see that there is any reason why there should not be a family allowance paid in respect of his children. They are Canadian children, just as are children here in Canada. I do not think administrative difficulties should deprive that man of the allowance.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It would be unfair only if the amount were not paid. There will not be any unfairness in paying an equivalent amount as an addition under dependents' allowances, if in dollars and cents it is the equivalent. There would not be any unfairness in not calling it by two names.

Mr. GREEN: The dependents' allowance is paid only by order in council.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Which was passed under the War Measures Act.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: But this family allowances measure is primarily a peace-time measure. The man overseas should have the same rights as people in Canada.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: So far it is not intended to provide for children who are going to live abroad. It would be quite proper to provide for them by an increase in dependents' allowances while they are there because of their fathers' connection with the armed forces of Canada. If, after the war is over, they decide to remain abroad it would not be the purpose of this law to provide them with allowances while living abroad.

Mr. GREEN: I agree with that, but there will probably be a Canadian army in Europe after the war. We shall probably have troops in the army of occupation and there will be many Canadian troops remaining in England after the war on military duty. It will take a long time to get even the present families back to Canada and I suggest that allowances should be payable in respect of children of those men.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Dependents' allowances will be paid and will have to be paid so long as the men remain in active service overseas. It will be quite a simple matter to equalize the benefits for them so that they will not be inferior to the state they would be in were they in Canada and receiving money from two different sources.

Mr. GREEN: Then it is plain they are to get a second dependents' allowance, something of that type?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If there are children of Canadians who are still in the forces when this becomes operative they should not be discriminated against; they should get as much money as they would if they were in Canada.

Mr. GREEN: Can the Prime Minister give us an assurance that the children of the men in the armed forces will be paid the same amount of money as the children in Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot say whether I will be in the next parliament or not, and I am therefore not in a position to give any undertaking as to how this measure will be carried out. If I am here to assist in carrying out its provisions, I shall certainly see first and foremost that justice is done to the men of the armed forces.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: Supposing a Canadian woman, for instance, a Canadian nurse marries a man who is not a Canadian. I know of girls who went to South Africa who have married South African men. If they come back to Canada would they have to put in three years residence?

Mr. CLAXTON: No; it is the father or mother.

Mr. GREEN: They would have to wait three years. Paragraph (iv) reads:

> Who was born while his father or mother was a member of the naval, military or air forces of Canada or within twelve months after his father or mother had ceased to be a member of such forces.

In the case of the nurse, she would have to leave the service to be married, and if she did not return within a year then they would have to wait three years.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the child were born more than a year after she had left the army and she then came back to Canada, that child would have to wait three years because she would then come in as an immigrant under the Immigration Act. If the child were born within a year from the time she left the army, that child would come under paragraph (iv) of this section.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have a case upon which I should like a little clarification as to the status of the children of the union. A man and woman were married before war broke out. He enlisted in the first brigade that went overseas and his wife followed him overseas. They have had two children since they arrived there. What would be the status of those children of that soldier?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Just as soon as he got back—

Mr. MacNICOL: When they get back home would their ages start from the registration in Canada or the registration in the old country?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: At the time of the registration in Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: This man is a soldier and he cannot come back, but his wife decides to return to Canada. He is still a Canadian and his children are Canadian, even though born in England. If the children of a soldier, who cannot come back to Canada, who are born in Great Britain, decide to come to Canada, would their ages start from the registration in England?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The ages would start from the time of the registration in England, but the payments would start from the date of the registration in Canada. Until the children get back to Canada their cases should be taken care of under the dependents' allowances, but as soon as they get back they would not have to wait three years before becoming entitled to family allowances.

Mr. MacNICOL: Supposing a child was born in 1941 in England and does not return to Canada with his parents until 1945. Would the age as far as Canada is concerned start from the date of registration in England, where the child must be registered, or from the date of its return to Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are two registrations, one for the purpose of determining the age, and the other, a special registration, to determine whether one is entitled to come under the family allowances measure. When that child would get here he would be four years old and he would receive $5 a month until he had completed his sixth year; that would be for two years after he got back, and then he would draw $6 a month.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am still not clear about one point. Sometimes we have cases under the old age pensions regulations where an old age pensioner goes away, perhaps to Great Britain, thinking he may be able to live there with some relations. He comes back again after breaking his residence for a year and finds that he is no longer eligible for old age pension. I am thinking of a case of this kind. A family may register their children on July 1, 1945, and then, later, because of family necessity or the need of work or something of that sort, they move across the border. They remain there for fifteen or sixteen months and then come back. Would not those children under these four clauses be denied family allowances?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They would if domicile had been abandoned, but if they had merely gone abroad with the intention of returning that would not change their domicile. Had we used "residence" only, the result that the hon. member fears would have happened, and that is why we used both residence and domicile. If one goes away with the intention of coming back, his absence would have no such effect.

Mr. COLDWELL: But they do not always know what they are going to do, whether they will change their residence or domicile. Whenever they come back it may be held that since they had left the country to get work, we will say, they had actually abandoned their domicile. I am asking this question because there will be the odd case and it is the odd cases that cause trouble in the public mind. Somebody says, "I have been a Canadian for three, four or five generations, and just because I happened to be away for a year or so I am denied benefit under this bill." We have had such cases with old age pensioners.

Mr. SLAGHT: Domicile is a question of intention and it can easily be inquired into. If such a one went away with the intention of abandoning his Canadian domicile for good, he would forfeit his right.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to quote an example along that line in connection with old age pensions. I am thinking of a person who came from England and has lived in Canada for a total of forty years. At the age of fifty-five he returned to England for a visit, intending to return to Canada shortly. While in England he became ill and had to remain there for four or five years. Although his intention had not been to stay in England, when he came home it was stated that for the purposes of old age pension his 20-year period between the ages of fifty and seventy years had been broken and that he could not qualify for an old age pension, until some years after the age of seventy. A person in that situation feels it very keenly. He says: "Here I am a British subject and a Canadian citizen and because of this technicality I fail to qualify." If this clause in this bill stands the way it is, it will be only a matter of a few years before we shall have similar cases brought to our attention as members of parliament. Canadians of several generations will come to us and say: "I went away, not intending to stay, but something happened and I had to stay, and now I bring my children back, and although they qualified before I went away I find that now I have to wait three years before they can qualify again." It seems to me that in view of cases such as we have indicated the Prime Minister might reconsider the wording of subparagraph (i) so that it would read "who was born in Canada and is resident in Canada at the time of registration."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The clauses have all been very carefully considered, but there will be cases arise and one cannot see at the moment how they may be interpreted. It depends undoubtedly on what the whole motive of the bill may be and in the carrying of it out in accordance with what would be equitable treatment. I cannot imagine that this measure would be administered in a way that would prejudice any child who has a real ground for receiving benefits under its provisions. But may I direct the attention of hon. members to this point. You can sometimes say too much in acts of parliament and by so doing convey an impression that is far from the one that is intended. My hon. friend the leader of the party has spoken of families that might go to the United States for a short time and then come back. I can conceive of cases where families might leave Canada, for example, if there was a gold strike in California or something of the kind, and the father might wish to go there and take the chances, and might stay there for a couple of years and then come back. If the attempt is made to cover every class of case that may arise, the measure might soon be rendered unworkable. To deal as my hon. friend suggests with cases of the kind might encourage people to leave Canada instead of causing them to remain here, and one of the purposes of this measure is to encourage families to stay in Canada and help build up the country. There is power to make regulations under the bill. The regulations will be submitted to this house and to parliament. The government will have to report on all the regulations that are made. If there are injustices they will be remedied at the right time, but to attempt to anticipate every circumstance would make the legislation unworkable.

Mr. COLDWELL: I realize that there is a great deal in what the Prime Minister says, but the difficulty is that the letter of the law is often adhered to rigidly, and it is because of some of our experiences with old age pension cases that we are anxious about this. I know it was not the intention of parliament to say to an aged person who comes from Alberta to Ontario with a view to being with the only relatives she has—I am dealing with a particular case now—"You cannot get the old age pension unless you go back to Edmonton and apply for it there." I have a case that I have been dealing with for six or seven months, and this old lady telephoned me recently and said, "I suppose I will have to spend part of my last one hundred dollars to go back to Edmonton." That is the kind of case I have in mind where the letter of the law is applied rigidly and leads to difficulties that were never intended. I think the letter of the law in this case is pretty rigid, but I must confess that to widen it to the extent my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggests would be, as the Prime Minister indicates, opening the door very wide indeed. But I should like to see some further consideration given to the phraseology of this clause. I am not suggesting any wording at the moment.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The case suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would qualify a child who was born in Canada while his mother was on a visit to Canada. If she returned to her home in, let us say, the United States and then came back, her child could be registered immediately, whilst if the child had been born at his home and then came to Canada he would have to wait three years. I think that is a distinction which should be made. He should not get any special benefit because of the fact that while his mother was touring Canada he was born. I think it will be found that all the cases that could be covered have been covered. Hon. members will notice that this language is much broader than that used in the Old Age Pensions Act. Some of the difficulties which arose under the old age pensions legislation arose because a portion of the pension is payable by the provinces and each province wants to take care only of its own. Provisions are being made this year to clear up that situation and to remedy many of the difficulties which have arisen in the administration of the Old Age Pensions Act.

Mr. COLDWELL: I hope that that will be done soon because of some cases that I know.

Paragraph (b) agreed to.

On section 2, paragraph (c)—Institution.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: With reference to paragraph (c), is it intended that orphanages, homes for children and the like are to be entitled to this payment? I notice that in section 4 (1) it is provided—I omit the portions that are inapplicable:

> The allowance shall be payable . . . to a parent . . . or to such other person as is authorized by or pursuant to the regulations to receive the same.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is not intended that allowances shall be payable to institutions. It is intended that payments shall be made to a parent. If the hon. member will look at paragraph (f) he will see what parent means:

> "parent" means a father, stepfather, adoptive father, foster father, mother, stepmother, adoptive mother, foster mother or any other person who maintains or has the custody of a child, but does not include an institution.

The intention of the bill as drafted is not to substitute the allowance payable under this bill for the provision that is now being made by the provinces for the care of children in institutions.

Mr. GREEN: Section 5 refers to an agency. It says:

> The allowance shall be applied by the person receiving the same exclusively towards the maintenance, care, training, education and advancement of the child, and, if the minister or such officer as is authorized by regulations in that behalf is satisfied that the allowance is not being so applied, payment thereof shall be discontinued or made to some other person or agency.

What does that mean?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That was intended to cover such welfare organizations as have been rendering so valuable and patriotic a service in the administration of the dependents' allowance. Hon. members know there are some cases where the dependents' allowance, instead of being turned over directly to the person who would normally receive it, is paid to a welfare agency which disburses it and sees that it is used in the manner that was intended.

Mr. GREEN: Then this is not intended to cover an institution?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is not intended to cover an institution. I suppose there might be a case where a parent would be receiving an allowance and would be using an institution as a boarding house where the child was actually living. He would have to show that he was maintaining the child in order to get the allowance. But it is not intended to pay the allowance for the purpose of relieving the provinces of what they are now doing in the institutions for those who are not cared for by their parents.

Mr. GREEN: There really is no definition of "institution" in the bill. It reads:

(c) "institution" shall have such meaning as may be prescribed in the regulations.

I think that is very poor draftsmanship, and I should like to know why "institution" is not defined in the bill.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It was left in this form because it was felt that it would be difficult to make a description which would fit the cases of all the nine provinces. Administrative machinery will have to be set up, and the intention is not to substitute this for the disbursements which are being made by the provinces now, under subsection 7 of section 92, of the British North America Act, for eleemosynary institutions which are within their exclusive jurisdiction; and it was felt that in setting up the machinery it would be possible to ascertain what would be the proper description to fit the various kinds of institutions doing that work in the various provinces. In my province there are institutions of a certain character in some places; there are others of another character, sometimes in the same place. Up to a few months ago my own home was alongside a Protestant orphans' home, which was an organization under the direction of the Church of England. There are institutions in the city of Quebec under the direction of the Roman Catholic church, some under the direction of the Salvation Army, some under the direction of the Independent Order, Daughters of the Empire, and one under the direction of the Ligue des Jeunes Filles—all getting subsidies from the province to assist them in the work they are carrying on; and it was felt that it would be dangerous to attempt by statute, without an investigation over the country at large, to make a definition which would fit them all.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the intention that any of these institutions will get the allowance?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; it is the intention that institutions which are financed by provincial authority will not get the allowance. These institutions, by subsection 7 of section 92 of the British North America Act, are under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. It is intended here that the allowance shall go to the children who are maintained by individuals, those individuals being of a class described in section 2, paragraph (f), as "parents".

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am still in doubt as to just what the minister means. I can understand very well that an institution financed by a province shall not be entitled to any allowance for the maintenance of a child. Do I understand that any organization, orphanage, home for children, and the like, which is maintained by a church organization, is to be entitled to an allowance, when the parent pays any amount to that institution for the maintenance of his children?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The allowance will be paid to the parent and he will make his arrangements with the institution.

Mr. MacNICOL: In case a child is found on the street, it is taken, of course, to whatever institution the police have for taking children to and then is handed into the possession of some organization, the Children's Aid Society, or some such body. I am not very familiar with that part of it, although there is some activity of this kind in Toronto. Then that society hands such children over to people who will adopt them; whoever adopts them gets the money?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: There are other cases—I know of a number—where homes are operated by good, ordinary, humane people, usually motherly women, and they look after, perhaps, three or four of these children and raise them. Would they be entitled to receive the allowance?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If they do so, not as an institution which would come within subsection 7 of section 92 of the British North America Act, but as adoptive parents, they would get it. It is not the intention to insist upon legal adoption. Hon. members will see that the definition is quite wide. It includes adoptive mother, foster mother or any other person who maintains or has custody of a child. It is the fact which is intended to be looked to rather than the legality of the proceedings under which the child has been taken into a private family.

Mr. ADAMSON: What about a child of unknown parentage in an orphanage?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: An orphanage will not receive the allowance, but if a child of unknown parents is adopted by an individual, the individual adopting the child will receive the allowance.

Mr. HOMUTH: In view of the fact that orphanages so often are in charge of provinces, would the provinces benefit to any extent?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No.

Mr. HOMUTH: They would not get anything?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have already had some representations on this very point from the constituency I represent. A number of people whom I know are concerned about the assistance which some of these orphanages and homes may or may not receive. In part their concern will be covered by the minister's statement that where parents or others are paying for the keep of children in homes, they will—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The parents will receive the allowance.

Mr. KNOWLES: Fine. There is another angle to it which, it seems to be, might be investigated further. The aim of this whole measure is to improve the conditions surrounding the children of Canada.

Mr. MITCHELL: To put the children back in the home. That is what I would think it was for—rather than in institutions.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is the proper course to pursue where the parents are living—

Mr. MITCHELL: And where they are not living.

Mr. KNOWLES: —and wherever it is possible for this to be done. The hope of all of us in supporting this measure is that the conditions surrounding all the children of Canada, the houses they live in, the clothing they wear, the food they eat, will be improved. Why should not children in orphanages have the same opportunity of some slight improvement as a result of the money which we are voting under this measure? That is our primary concern, not so much assisting the family budget, although that is the way you achieve the purpose in view. Our primary concern is to improve the conditions of the children. I have already been asked, for example, whether certain orphanages and homes in Winnipeg will receive this benefit so that the children in these homes may have better conditions.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It was felt that these orphanages and like institutions were expressly declared by subsection 7 of section 92 of the British North America Act to be a provincial responsibility, and it is a responsibility which is being discharged by the provinces. I know that in my province these institutions now receive sixty cents per day per infant. I think that amount is paid up to a certain age; I did not inquire as to what the allowance was when children get beyond four or five years old. It used to be forty cents; it was increased to sixty cents because it was found that forty cents a day was not sufficient to provide for them adequately. But the provision which is made is fixed at what is necessary for their upkeep, and we would have no way of saying that the provinces would have to continue to make the same provision as heretofore, or to make such additional provision as the increase in the cost of living might require, and it would be merely taking for the federal exchequer a burden which is already being carried by the public through the provincial exchequers. It was felt that if this were done there would be a much better chance of getting children back into individual homes where the surroundings are perhaps more congenial than they are in the institutions.

Mr. HATFIELD: What about an orphanage in a province that receives no support from the province?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If it receives no support from the province, the province is not discharging the responsibility which the British North America Act has put upon it.

Mr. MacNICOL: What about children whose parents send them to an institution for one reason or another? Would the parents be allowed to turn the money over to the institution?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Certainly. Not only will they be allowed to do so, but the institutions will insist upon their doing so. Institutions, I know, do now accept children of parents who are not providing for them and who are supposed not to be in a position to provide for them. If it is the opinion of the institution that in respect of a child the parent is receiving from the government a certain sum of money, the institution will insist on getting it or will not keep the child. But the money will go from the federal treasury to the parent, who will have to apply it for the children. Under the other provisions the hon. member will see that if the children are in an institution and the parent is receiving money and does not apply it to the maintenance of the children, they will be cut off.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the money is given to the institution by the parent, how does the government know that the money given for a particular child, or for two or three or four children, went to the children's upkeep? How will the inspector know that the money is spent on them?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The government will not know that, but it will know that that money is being used for the benefit of the child. Whether that is the money which is used to buy the milk or the porridge that the child does consume, or whether it is not, the government will know that it is used in the institution for the maintenance of the child. But it will not attempt to identify the commodities bought individually with that money.

Mr. ROWE: Will they be sure of that all the way through?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does that mean that as far as children's aid societies, maintained under provincial laws are concerned, they would not be entitled to any part of this?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Not as against the crown.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Or in any way?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They would be entitled as against the parents whose children are being aided. It would be stipulated that they should receive it, but they will not be entitled as against the crown to receive it direct.

Mr. HOMUTH: But suppose the parents are dead or cannot be found and the institution itself has the responsibility for these children? They would get no assistance under this?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, because they are performing a work specified in subsection 7 of section 92, and it is a provincial responsibility to maintain those institutions. Up to the present they have been maintained. This is a measure for the assistance of children living in individual homes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Having regard to the explanation given by the minister of the reason designated that these institutions shall not receive any payment, which is to prevent any question of constitutionality being raised in this regard—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is not to prevent any question of constitutionality being raised but to prevent any suggestion that the federal government is trying to control the conduct of those directing these institutions. They are not under federal authority but under provincial authority. It is intended under this legislation to see to it that the money which is voted is expended for the purpose for which it was voted, and it was not felt desirable to attempt to exercise any control over the institutions which are expressly put by the constitution under the jurisdiction of the provinces.

Mr. CLAXTON: In further answer to the hon. member for Lake Centre, I may say that both in Ireland and in New Zealand, where no constitutional question could arise, the institutions maintained by the state are not recipients of family allowances.

Mr. GREEN: What administrative organization is planned for checking these cases? There will have to be many investigations and continual checking. What organizations are to be set up to do that work?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: What is planned is to have first of all a registry and the registration will constitute the title until something else is shown. It will operate, I hope, as satisfactorily as the administration of dependents' allowances. There have been enlisted now almost a million persons and a large proportion of them are married. There are a great many family allowances being paid under the name of dependents' allowances, and that has been going on since 1939. It has not required any elaborate machinery. It has operated in a manner that has caused little or no complaint; and it is hoped that there will be, if perhaps not to the same degree, at least to a satisfactory degree, the same willingness on the part of the Canadian public to be of service during peace as there has been manifested during war. There is not a city in Canada where public-spirited citizens have not spent a lot of time to assist in the proper administration of dependents' allowances, and it is hoped that the same public-spiritedness will continue to exist. No doubt there will have to be some machinery, just as has been provided to administer dependents' allowances, but it is not anticipated that there will be anything of a different nature, and this will be spread over the whole country. I cannot say just what organizations will be used, but it is not the intention to set up an entirely new organization which will be giving full time in every little village to the administration of family allowances.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister give an example of the organizations that would be used?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: These matters have not been determined. They have been discussed and are being discussed, and it is because it is felt that it will require a great deal of investigation and consideration that power is being asked to provide all these through regulations. But what I have in mind for the village in which I was born, for example, and where I still have a brother and sister residing, is that the postmaster or the secretary treasurer of the municipality would probably be the local officer attending to it, and it would add very little to the other work which that kind of official is performing. That is the way in which these things are done under the dependents' allowance scheme. The officials available where the work has to be done are those who are looked to to do it.

Mr. GREEN: About what number of people would be required to administer these allowances?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I could not even make an estimate.

Mr. GREEN: The government must have some idea of how many new civil servants will be required.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: From statistics that were given here the other day, at the present time over 600,000 cheques a month are being distributed to dependents of members of the forces. Now, it may be that two or three times that many cheques would have to be distributed. The task will be a little larger. It is not a task of a different kind. A lot of experience has been gained in the administration of payments to be made for children through the operation of dependents' allowances.

Mr. GREEN: The government must have some estimate of the personnel that would be required. About how many civil servants will be required to administer family allowances?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: So far as I know, no estimate has been made of how many civil servants will be engaged in administering this. There are quite a number already in the Department of Finance who will be controlling it, but the details of the machinery required have not been determined; and what was stated to the government was that it was not a problem different in nature or kind but only different in magnitude from that which had to be faced in the distribution of allowances to dependents of men in the forces.

Mr. GREEN: I take it that there has been no estimate of the number required to administer the measure. Has there been any estimate of the cost of administering it?

Mr. CLAXTON: If I may answer my hon. friend as well as I can I should point out, following what the Minister of Justice has said, that there has been a great deal of experience in connection with the administration of dependents' allowances. Under the dependents' allowances regulations 609,854 cheques are issued each month. They are issued from Ottawa. They are issued by the treasury officials, and it is estimated that it takes something like forty officials to issue 100,000 cheques and to keep 100,000 accounts. It is estimated, as the Prime Minister said, that if every family having children entitled to receive family allowances receives an allowance this will mean something like one and a half million cheques. Therefore it is possible to estimate that the treasury officers who will have charge of the bookkeeping and administration from that point of view may total something like nine hundred.

Mr. ROWE: That would be just to write the cheques?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is writing cheques, taking account of changes and also keeping the necessary ledger accounts. But in addition to that there are two other operations which I might mention briefly. The first is registration. It is hoped that registration may be effected entirely through the instrumentality of the post office itself; that registration forms in the first instance would be distributed by letter carriers, collected by letter carriers, mailed by local postmasters to the local office or to the provincial offices of family allowances and there entered on the registers. Therefore that operation will be conducted by an existing agency of the government.

Mr. ROWE: Free?

Mr. ADAMSON: Yes, but what check will you have?

Mr. CLAXTON: I have not come to the question of check. The forms that will be required will be rather simple, probably consisting of not more than seven or eight questions. I would assume that following the practice in other countries they will have the effect of a statutory declaration or affidavit and that ultimately adequate evidence of the birth of a child will have to be furnished. It might put a very heavy strain both upon the organization and upon the provincial authorities to require it right at the outset. Then, the registration forms which have been sent in to the provincial office of family allowances will have to be checked and ultimately investigated, but investigated in the first instance by checking with other existing vital statistics information largely in the hands of the provinces. It will not require a very large staff to deal with that. Why it is impossible to give my hon. friend or the members of the committee an accurate estimate of the number of staff that will be ultimately required is this: it is not known yet how much assistance can be obtained from the agencies that are ordinarily under provincial jurisdiction. It is hoped that there will be the very closest cooperation with the provinces and with those agencies. If there is that cooperation, then the number of federal investigators that it will be necessary to appoint would probably be very small. But if, on the other hand, it is found that it is not possible to use existing agencies to the degree that is hoped, then there will have to be a larger number of federal agents; but the employees—

Mr. GREEN: In that event about what number will be required?

Mr. CLAXTON: It is very hard now to suggest to my hon. friend the number that will actually be required. It would certainly seem that in the field staff something in the neighbourhood of five hundred would probably be more than adequate under any circumstance.

Mr. GREEN: Does that include the staff of the different offices across Canada? The parliamentary assistant said a few minutes ago that there were to be offices in the different centres in the provinces.

Mr. CLAXTON: No; that would be additional, but that would be for field staff, welfare officers. My hon. friend asked for an estimate of the cost of administration. From examining the cost of administering the dependents' allowance legislation and the cost of administering family allowances in New Zealand and Australia it is possible to say that the cost should be less than two per cent and probably closer to one per cent than to two per cent, and if—

Mr. GREEN: What would that work out to in a year?

Mr. CLAXTON: On $200,000,000, from $4,000,000 maximum down to $2,000,000 minimum. That $2,000,000 minimum would be an exceedingly good target to aim at and I do not suppose it could be achieved; but judging from the investigations made by the treasury officers I should think that $4,000,000 a year is quite possible.

Mr. GREEN: There are nine hundred treasury officers? That is the estimate?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Five hundred field staff. What is the estimate of staffs in the different centres out in the province?

Mr. CLAXTON: That would be another five hundred.

Mr. GREEN: That is a total of nineteen hundred.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Will there be any other requirements?

Mr. CLAXTON: Not that anyone can see to-day.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to ask one question that has been confusing me somewhat, but perhaps it is clear to the other hon. members of the committee. Speaking generally, I understand that those allowances are really payable to those who receive less than $1,200 a year actual income; otherwise, as I understand it, they will be paying income tax. For those above the $1,200 level—and that includes everybody in this chamber, for instance—the exemption given is $108 per child under certain ages. I think eighteen is the age limit with respect to income tax. It is not clear to me, under this measure, whether or not cheques are issued to those above the $1,200 level, or whether it is simply a matter of making an adjustment by way of receipt for the exemption in respect of the amount that actually would be payable. If cheques are to be issued to all parents whose children are under sixteen years of age, regardless of their income tax levels, then of course the problem will be very much greater from the point of view of administration, and from that of issuing cheques. I was wondering if the parliamentary assistant would clear up this point, because the question has been asked me on many occasions, and I am sure other hon. members have been asked with respect to the kind of machinery which will be in operation in connection with those above that salary level.

Mr. CLAXTON: If I might make a correction of a figure I gave the hon. member for Vancouver South I would say that the number of treasury officers estimated to be needed is 600—not 900.

This bill does not purport to deal with the income tax situation, as the leader of the opposition no doubt understands. It will be noted that section 8(1) says:

> Nothing in this act shall preclude such adjustment of the deduction on account of a dependent child from tax payable under the Income War Tax Act as may be necessary to avoid duplication of benefits under the Income War Tax Act and this act.

By that provision the legislation aims to warn recipients of cheques that they are not going to get both family allowance and full allowance for their children under the Income War Tax Act. But that is not being dealt with in this bill. I am informed it is the intention of the government that that will be dealt with by way of an amendment to the Income War Tax Act to be introduced at the next session of parliament, which will certainly be held prior to the coming into force of family allowances, on July 1, 1945.

If I might answer my hon. friend briefly on one point, I would say this. Both in his speech the other day and again to-night, he mentioned the figure of $1,200 as being the limit of income above which a person would not benefit from family allowances. I do not know if he was using the figure as an illustration, or if he used it as a definite top level. But from the tables I have seen, some people in peculiar circumstances, getting as much as $5,000 income, will benefit from family allowances. The number of people getting over $1,200 a year of gross income who will benefit from family allowances will be much greater than those above that figure who do not benefit from those allowances. But, as I have said, that is a matter which is not to be dealt with now.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the parliamentary assistant give some further explanation on that? It is important.

Mr. CLAXTON: That is not intended to be dealt with under this legislation. That will be dealt with by an amendment to the Income War Tax Act, and when the amendment is introduced it will be fully explained to the house. I will be quite frank and say it is not easy to explain the operations of family allowances and the income tax deductions in respect of children, so as to avoid duplication. That is not a simple thing to do. It is not a simple thing to work out, in view of the changes made by legislation this year. That is still being worked out.

The purpose, however, is to make it quite clear and that is the intention of this section, —that no one shall benefit both from family allowances and from the Income War Tax Act, and that no one will be worse off than he is to-day. Those people receiving the full allowance for their children, to which they are entitled under the Income War Tax Act, will not receive any allowance by way of family allowances.

In answer to the hon. member who asked whether cheques would be sent out to those people who could not possibly benefit from family allowances, I can say that that is still under discussion with the income tax authorities. It may be easier for all concerned to send cheques out to everyone, and then have a final adjustment on the income tax return, rather than sort out in advance the number of people who could not possibly benefit under the family allowances measure. That number, I might tell the committee, is something under 200,000. There are fewer than 200,000 taxpayers who are in a position where they cannot benefit at all under the measure.

Mr. GRAYDON: Fewer than 200,000?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: I presume the parliamentary assistant means there are fewer than 200,000 who would not benefit to the full extent.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. GRAYDON: But there will be, I suppose, a shading off, as you get into certain income tax brackets?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think that pretty well answers the problem I had in mind. For instance, let me take my own case. I have three children under the age of sixteen. Two of those children would be, I fancy, eight-dollar children, and one would be a six-dollar child. By the way, I hope the Prime Minister is not listening too intently, because these are matters he would not understand. I would expect in those cases that I would not be receiving cheques each month; rather I would presume that my children's allowance against my income tax, which amounts to $324 a year, would be set off against it—and that would be the end of it.

However, I can quite readily see my hon. friend's point, because I suppose it is a question of deciding which is the easier process of administration—as to whether cheques should be sent out, or whether the whole thing should be forgotten, so far as income tax is concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my hon. friend observes, as the part of wisdom on these matters dealing with children, I leave them to my Benedict colleagues.

However my hon. friend has referred to his case, and I might refer to mine. Perhaps this will help to illustrate just how much easier this whole business may be to administer than would at first appear. The provisions of this measure relate only to families. There will be no necessity of keeping track of those individuals who have no families. Where there are families, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the chances are that already registrations will have been made, and those registrations will help to verify other matters of registration, will verify information given as to numbers, and the like. Children must be registered when they are born, and families do not move as readily as individuals. That is an important fact to keep in mind in connection with the administration of this measure, and the difficulties surrounding its administration—or rather the limitation of the extent of those difficulties. I mention this only because it throws some light on that aspect of the matter.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): For the last half hour the discussion has been entirely irrelevant. We are dealing with definitions, and particularly to the definition of "institution". I would ask hon. members to confine their remarks to that.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Before leaving this paragraph I would ask the parliamentary assistant whether or not the decision as to the sending of a cheque to a person who, perhaps, is in a three- or four-thousand-dollar income tax bracket, would not depend upon the person himself. For instance, if I wish family allowances to be paid to my wife, instead of my having the privilege of deducting it from my income tax, I shall make that application. If I do not wish to have it done in that way, I will not make the application. Will not the matter work out through the volition of the taxpayer, rather than through the arrangements made by the department? If I wish my wife to have it, I shall apply for it. If I do not wish her to have it, I shall take my deduction. Is that not the way it will work out?

Mr. GRAYDON: That might be the solution to the problem in my mind. I take it that the application would be made and the cheques issued. Perhaps the suggestion of the hon. member for Trinity would cure the problem. Those of us who would normally be entitled to exemption under the income tax might decide that there is no point in having cheques come in and then having them go right out again. There would thus be duplication and trouble to the taxpayer.

Mr. CLAXTON: The number of taxpayers in Canada is estimated to be 2,000,000. The number of taxpayers who are married with dependents of every kind, some of whom might come under family allowances, is 800,000. The number of income taxpayers who would benefit in part if one dependent is a child under sixteen years is estimated at 521,000. The number who might benefit, depending on a number of the dependents being children under sixteen years, is 98,000. The number who could not benefit at all is 181,000. This makes a total of 800,000. The figure of 181,000 will fluctuate from year to year. Since the income tax is now on a pay-as-you-go basis it might well be that the income tax authorities will advise that the only way in which to handle this is to pay every one the allowance and adjust it at the end of the year. But the suggestion made by the hon. member for Trinity is certainly one that is being considered.

Mr. ADAMSON: It would fluctuate from month to month, too.

Mr. BURTON: I believe we are on the clause giving the definition of "institution." I am disappointed that the government has not found it feasible or possible to arrange that these allowances shall be paid to children in orphanages. Those of us who have had any experience in raising a family know that the allowance which is intended to be paid would in no way provide for the proper upbringing of a child. As has been stated previously, this is considered to be a provincial responsibility.

In the province from which I come there are several orphanages. I believe the oldest and largest is situated in the constituency the Prime Minister represents in this house. I am sorry I have not the amount of assistance the province has given to these institutions, but I know that in years gone by, had it not been for the help received from the district from which I come, the children in this orphanage in the constituency of the right hon. gentleman would have had extremely slim living and a very hard time to get along. In later years a fraternal organization has carried on a province-wide appeal for assistance for this institution.

There is also another institution in the southern part of the province at Indian Head which is sponsored and supported by another fraternal organization. I want to point out to you, Mr. Chairman, and to hon. members of the committee that the small sum being given under this legislation is not going to provide any child with a proper upbringing. This allowance is to be paid to some people who can take it along with other money they have earned and yet place a child in an institution. As the Minister of Justice pointed out, this is properly done if it is to the advantage of the child. By this bill we are attempting to provide for the children of parents in unfortunate circumstances and I submit that there could not be any more unfortunate child in this country than the one who has lost both parents and must of necessity be in an orphanage. Consequently, I say I am disappointed that the government has not seen fit to work out some system whereby it would be possible to give this little bit of assistance to the children in these institutions.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: I think it will be found that in a great number of cases the child who has been left an orphan will be taken by relatives, perhaps a cousin or an uncle or an aunt. When this small assistance is being given, the child would not be placed in an orphanage. It may mean that children will be kept in the homes of relatives who could not otherwise afford to keep them were they not receiving the help to be given under this bill. I look for more children in homes and fewer in orphanages.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the definition of "child" cover an Eskimo or Indian child?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would suggest that if the committee would keep to the particular clause we are on we would make greater headway. There is reference later on to that and I think the question could be asked more appropriately at that time.

Mr. ADAMSON: I understood the Minister of Justice to say some time ago that allowances under this bill would be paid to an adult who sponsored a child in an orphanage. Would that mean legal adoption or could you just sponsor a child?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It would not be sufficient for one to say that he would sponsor any child who came along. He would have to come within the definition of paragraph (f), but if unable to keep the child in his own home, he would have the child maintained in an institution where he would be paying board. In that case he would receive the allowance and make his own arrangement with the institution.

Mr. ADAMSON: He would have to be more than in loco parentis?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There would have to be some sort of factual relationship existing between the child and the adult for the adult to be regarded as his parent.

[Mr. Burton.]

Mr. NEILL: I happened to be out of the chamber, and I am not sure that the question I have in mind has been brought up under this section. Paragraph (c) reads:

"Institution" shall have such meaning as may be prescribed in the regulations.

I do not understand why it is necessary to adopt that form. This is supposed to be an explanation, but it is really no explanation at all. It is simply handing over to the people who will draw up the regulations the power to say what it means. In the other paragraphs of this section we find definitions of "child", "maintains", "minister", "parent", "registration" and so on. There is no attempt made in this section to explain the meaning of "institution". It says:

"institution" shall have such meaning as may be prescribed in the regulations.

Is what we mean by "institution" so complex that it cannot be explained in a paragraph just as "child" is explained in paragraph (b)? This takes the whole power away from parliament to define an institution and gives the power to the person who will draw the regulations. Is this committee incapable of defining "institution", or is there anything improper about it that we cannot deal with it here? Is this one definition out of them all beyond us, that we cannot say what the word means? It is a common thing in this house to say, whichever party is out of power, that the government is governing by order in council, but orders in council are not nearly as bad as the abuse of the power to make regulations. Orders in council, many of them, are just matters of passing a resolution, and they must be passed by thousands in time of war. The real damage, if damage is done, is done by abuse of the power to make regulations. This power to make regulations generally appears at the back of an act where it is scarcely noticed, and it gives the framer of the regulations power almost to make an act that suits him. It is generally provided that the regulations must be laid on the table, but has any hon. gentleman had the experience of trying to get something that has been laid on the table? I was referred to three different people when I tried to get something that had been laid on the table, and finally I was told that I might get it in a few months hence if I am lucky. I would ask whoever is in charge of the bill to explain why it is necessary to take all powers away from this parliament to define such a simple ordinary word as "institution".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend, who mentioned that he was out of the house and did not know what had taken place in his absence, that this matter was discussed and a full explanation was given by the Minister of Justice. He will find it in Hansard to-morrow. In the same connection may I say, and I think the leader of the opposition will agree with me, that paragraph (c) was carried some little time ago and we have since been discussing paragraph (d). I only mention this because I am sure hon. members are anxious to get on with the business of the house and certainly there has been a lot of time wasted to-day.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): If paragraph (c) carried, I did not so understand. Paragraph (d) was not called. Shall paragraph (c) carry?

Paragraph (c) agreed to.

On section 2, paragraph (d)—"maintains".

Mr. GREEN: There is the same difficulty in this paragraph because it says "'substantially' shall have such meaning as may be prescribed in the regulations". There again it does seem to me that we should have the full definition given in the bill and not leave part of it to be done by regulation. Could the Minister of Justice explain why this provision is inserted?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are two parts to the paragraph. It says, first of all:

"maintains" means maintains wholly or substantially.

There was no agreement at the time whether it was 51 per cent or 51½ or 60 or 75 per cent, and so it was said that there may be some other way in which it will be possible to determine who will get the allowance. It is not to be divided, one portion going to one person and another portion going to another. There should be some way to determine in a practical fashion what will appear as to be reasonable as to what "substantially" means. It may not be the same in every locality. Hon. members will see in a later clause that the allowance is paid only while the child is being maintained. It may be that the regulations will have to declare that a male child on a farm, not going to school, is still substantially maintained by his parent, while a male child not going to school and working for somebody else would not be substantially maintained by his parents but would be substantially maintained out of his own earnings. It was because we were not at the time prepared to deal exhaustively with all the cases that may have to be dealt with for the purpose of determining who shall get the allowance and in what cases there should be no allowance paid at all because there would not be substantial maintenance by the parent, that the clause was worded in this way.

Mr. KNOWLES: Am I right in assuming that "maintains" in this paragraph does not require maintenance by a parent of his child in his own home? I have in mind the case of a parent who has an invalid child, we will say a mental case. The parent maintains that child in a private nursing home or in a home where invalids are cared for. He will receive the allowance without question?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the facts are such that the parent is maintaining the child he will be entitled under the bill to the amount. The child might be away from home for a portion of the year. There will be children to whom this measure will apply who will be away from home for several months at a boarding school but who will still be maintained by their parents. A child undergoing treatment in a hospital but still maintained by his parents would be eligible.

Mr. KNOWLES: The particular case I have in mind is that of a parent who maintains a child in a private home but for whom I was not able to secure certain income tax adjustments when I brought the case up in the house a few weeks ago. I am glad to know that this clause will cover that case.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This is intended to allow the drawing of regulations which will provide for the allowance being paid when there is complete maintenance and even when there is what would be regarded as substantial maintenance.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I wonder whether we are using English in its proper meaning, Mr. Chairman. "Substantially" was held by Mr. Justice Riddell, of the supreme court of Ontario, who wrote the judgment, to mean "in substance". What is meant here is not "maintain in substance", but "maintain wholly or in part".

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The provision is that the regulations will determine what "substantially" means and they would not have to rely on Mr. Riddell's judgment for that purpose.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Do I understand that the regulations will be sufficiently broad to give "substantially" a meaning that it has not had before, or some meaning which is in contravention of the meaning of the word? Whether Mr. Justice Riddell wrote the judgment or not, "substantially" means "in substance"; it does not mean "in part".

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It has certainly acquired the meaning "in large part", whether that be correct according to its origin or not.

Mr. ESLING: In British Columbia it sometimes happens that when a parent is incapable of looking after a child the magistrate or some other authority will have the child sent to a home at the coast. Then the city is billed for the expense, which is usually three or four times the amount allowed under this bill. I am just wondering whether the city will be reimbursed in such a case.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No.

Mr. ESLING: I should also like to ask the minister, what about those parents who do not register births with the vital statistics branch? Take, for instance, Doukhobors, who have large families and ignore the registration of the births of their children. It will be necessary, I take it, that they produce a birth certificate.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There will have to be registration, and registration will be in accordance with the formalities prescribed by the regulations; and if they do not register they will not be entitled to any allowance.

Mr. ESLING: What about the municipalities?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: A municipality will not be regarded as a parent.

Mr. GRAYDON: The municipality will not be a parent?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No.

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, we are making some progress on that score, anyway.

Paragraph (d) agreed to.

Section 2, paragraph (e) agreed to.

On section 2, paragraph (f)—"parent".

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to suggest an amendment to this paragraph. I hope that the Prime Minister will give it consideration. Frequently the tendency is to look with suspicion upon amendments from the opposition side, but I would suggest that this paragraph, and also, if I may refer to it at the moment because it is related to it, section 11 (a) of this bill might be amended so as to put the choice of the mother first, as the one to receive the allowance. I would point out that in the two amendments which I intend to propose I leave the governor general in council with the power it has under the sections as they are now worded, to make varying arrangements in different provinces or for different classes of persons. But it seems to me that, in view of the experience of countries where family allowances are in effect, which in most cases is that it has been found desirable to make the payment to the mother, and in view of the considerable feeling here that that should be the case, we should try to word the bill so that the first choice will be the mother. Would you, Mr. Chairman, be lenient with me to the point of letting me read to the committee and particularly to the Prime Minister, the two amendments I would propose? First:

That section 2 (f) of Bill No. 161 be amended by removing the words "father, stepfather, adoptive father, foster father," from their present position and inserting the said words after the words "foster mother" in line 31.

If that were done, the section would then read:

(f) "parent" means a mother, stepmother, adoptive mother, foster mother, father, stepfather, adoptive father, foster father or any other person who maintains or has the custody of a child, but does not include an institution.

Legally that would not change the picture at all, but it would, so far as wording is concerned, put the mother, or the person taking the place of the mother, first, and I think it is more than likely that in the case of most of the provinces and in the case of most classes of persons the desire will be to have the cheque sent to the mother.

Along with that amendment it would be necessary to make a change in section 11 (a), and I hope you, Mr. Chairman, will permit me to read my proposal at this point so that the Prime Minister will have the whole proposal before him. I suggest that when we reach section 11 (a) it be made to read:

(a) provide generally that payment shall be made to the mother, stepmother, adoptive mother or foster mother, without limiting the right of the governor in council to provide in respect of any province or any class of cases that payment shall be made to the parent prescribed in the regulations.

I point out again that legally that does not change the situation. The governor in council might, under the wording which I have laid down, provide that payment would be made right across Canada to the father, but it would put the mother first at least as far as the wording is concerned. I think it might have the effect of encouraging provincial authorities to think in that direction and, I suggest, this would be more desirable. If it were not for the different concept of civil law that we have in the province of Quebec—I am not objecting to that in any way; I am simply stating a fact—I think it would be desirable to follow the practice of other countries where family allowances are in effect, and make it payable only to the mother; but because we have that different concept, which we respect, in one province of this country, I suggest that we should word this bill not in ironclad language, but nevertheless so that the primary emphasis will be placed on the parent to whom I think it is desirable that the allowance be paid in all provinces where it is possible, namely, the mother. I read the second amendment so that the Prime Minister may know just what I have in mind for the later section. At the present time I move, seconded by the hon. member for Melfort, the amendment I have sent to the Chairman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As the hon. member has said, the order does not make the slightest difference in the legal effect. If that is the case it seems to me there is a very strong reason for following in this statute the course followed generally in the statutes of Canada. In looking over the statutes it will be seen that the rule has been to mention the father in the first instance and the mother and child in that order. If it were going to have any real effect in the direction which my hon. friend thinks is desirable, namely, that this government or the provincial governments were more likely to put the emphasis on the mother than on the father, there might be some point to it; but I submit that it is better to hold to what is customary in statutes and allow the arrangement itself to be made in accordance with what may appear to be best in the different localities concerned.

Mr. KNOWLES: I might say to the Prime Minister that I regard the amendment to the later section, to which I have already referred, as the more important one. My reason for introducing this amendment at this point is that if my amendment to section 11 (a) were accepted by the Prime Minister and the government, it would then make the wording of this section seem a bit odd in its present form. Maybe I am counting on too much in hoping that my amendment to section 11 (a) will be accepted, but I dare to hope that. I just want to say to the Prime Minister that I did not feel that his argument that this statute is following other statutes on the law books of this country carries quite the weight he attached to it. This is a different kind of measure. This is a measure such as we have not yet on the books, concerned about improving the conditions of all the children of the country. As he knows, despite his bachelorhood, it is the mother who is closer to the children in their younger days, and I urge there is a real argument for payment being made to the mother. I suggest that this statute should be looked upon as something new and different in Canadian legislation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In connection with that, the Prime Minister has pointed out that it would not make a bit of difference as to the order. I was reading the other day that in New Zealand they found it worked out better in the payment of allowances to make them payable to the mother only and that, as I understand it, is the law in New Zealand to-day. In Australia, as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George said, the payment can be made to institutions but not to institutions that are wholly or mainly maintained either by the national or by the state government. In that connection I would ask the Prime Minister whether consideration has been given the question, whether or not in the interests of the maintenance of the children it be directed that the payments be made to the mother.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, decidedly so, and that is the reason for paragraph (a) of section 11, under which the governor in council may make regulations to give effect to and carry out the objects of this bill and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, to provide generally or in respect of any province or any class of cases, that payment shall be made to the parent prescribed in the regulations. That provision was inserted after very careful consideration of all eventualities as likely best to meet the very purpose which the hon. member who has just spoken and the member who has moved the resolution have had in mind. I think the administration, speaking generally, would favour payment being made to the mother. Speaking generally, we see a great deal to be said for that particular objective; but in bringing it about it has been thought that the end will perhaps be best served by having the regulations made after there has been opportunity of conference between officials administering the federal measure and officials in the different provinces. A good deal has been said about the desirability of conferring with the provinces on matters of the kind, and that end would be well served if this were one of the questions that would come up for consideration between the two.

Amendment (Mr. Knowles) negatived.

Mr. NEILL: I do not say it is very important, but I suggest that it would be advisable to insert the word "grandfather" in (f) giving the definitions. I know several cases where the grandfather is the sole support of the child, and while it may be said that grandfathers come under the term "or any other person" I believe there is some rule of law to the effect that when you once begin defining things you must put in some clause reading something like this, "while not impairing the general application of this regulation", and then go on to state specific cases. That has not been inserted here, and it might be said that as the house went to the trouble of defining all these different people—there are six or seven of them—possibly it intended to leave out grandfathers. It would not do any harm to insert that word.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If you put in grandfather you ought to put in grandmother, and there may be cases where great grandfathers and great grandmothers would have to be considered. "Or any other person" would cover all.

Mr. NEILL: Why insert the word "stepfather"? That is a more remote relation than grandfather.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is one that is not apt otherwise to be noticed.

Mr. GRAYDON: You will be getting mothers-in-law and so on.

Paragraph (d) agreed to.

Paragraphs (e), (f), (g) and (h) agreed to.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Monthly allowance.

Mr. KNOWLES: This is an important section and it is late, almost eleven o'clock. Would the committee not prefer to report progress?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Unless the house prefers to sit an extra hour with a view to getting through with its business this week.

Mr. COLDWELL: It has been a long day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

DEFENCE INSTALLATIONS

CANADA AND LABRADOR — EXCHANGE OF NOTES BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES AS TO PAYMENT OF EXPENDITURES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish to table an exchange of notes between Canada and the United States of America constituting an agreement respecting the payment of expenditures on defence installations in Canada and in Labrador, signed at Washington, June 23 and June 27, 1944; three copies in English and three in French.

The exchange of notes which I have just tabled, dated June 23 and June 27, 1944, between the Canadian ambassador in Washington and the Secretary of State of the United States constitute an agreement under which the Canadian government undertakes to reimburse the United States government for certain works which the latter have constructed in Canada. It covers also certain United States expenditures at the base constructed by Canada at Goose Bay in Labrador.

The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) informed the house in February of the government's decision to reimburse the United States government for permanent improvements which they had made to airfields on the northwest staging route and in the northwest generally. Then in April the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) stated that as part of an understanding which he had reached with the secretary of the treasury of the United States in connection with the Hyde Park declaration, the Canadian government would reimburse the United States government for permanent improvements which they had made to other airfields in Canada and for the telephone line from Edmonton to the Alaska boundary, which was also built by the United States. The exchange of notes which I have tabled is an agreement between the two governments on this subject and, with its appendices, goes into considerable detail as to the amounts spent in various localities.

It has been agreed that Canada will reimburse the United States to the extent of 76·8 million dollars, United States funds. This covers construction costs incurred by the United States government on works of permanent value on the northwest staging route, the flight strips along the Alaska highway, the flight strips along the Mackenzie river, the airfields in northeastern Canada, the airfield at Mingan, Quebec, the airfield at Goose Bay, Labrador, and the telephone line from Edmonton to the Alaska boundary. An additional 13·8 million dollars spent by the United States on these projects is not being repaid by Canada, since, while necessary for the prosecution of the war, it represents wartime expenditure for United States purposes and provides nothing of permanent value; for example, temporary barracks and other housing facilities. However, all these works, whether of permanent or non-permanent value, are relinquished to the Canadian government and it is I am sure a source of satisfaction to both governments that a specific agreement has been reached regarding the disposition of these facilities.

I should also point out that in addition to reimbursing the United States for the outlays under reference Canada has assumed substantial expenditures for the construction of wartime facilities which were originally made on the understanding that we would be reimbursed by the United States. Our expenditures under this head in Canadian funds will total 34·7 million dollars. Thus including our reimbursements to the United States and the expenditures which we are making ourselves the amount expressed in Canadian dollars which the Canadian government is spending on the airfields and related projects mentioned in the exchange of notes is of the order of 120 million dollars.

Hon. members will observe that all of the foregoing expenditures were incurred in connection with defence installations in northwestern and northeastern Canada. Both are vital areas in the joint defence plans of the United States and Canada. Through the permanent joint board on defence far-reaching defence measures have been taken to close these back doors of the continent against attack by Germany and Japan. In concept and in execution the defence plans for these areas represent one of the most effective examples of cooperation among the united nations. At the same time these facilities have become links in the offensive plans of the allies. Planes fly across the northwest to the Pacific theatre of war and across the northeast to Europe.

Considerable information has already been given to the house and to the public about the northwest staging route, but for reasons of security little information about the northeast staging route has so far been made available. The need for a northeast staging route was originally suggested to Canada by the United Kingdom government in August, 1940, with the suggestion that the matter be discussed with the United States. Long-range bombers were already being ferried across the Atlantic through the Newfoundland airport at Gander, but this airport was congested and there were no facilities for ferrying short-range bombers or fighters which were beginning to come off United States assembly lines in considerable volume. Following discussions between Canada and the United States the United States proceeded to investigate the possibilities of establishing airfields in Greenland while Canada proceeded to reconnoitre Labrador. In June, 1941, Mr. Eric Fry of the topographical survey, who had been seconded to the Royal Canadian Air Force, discovered an ideal site at Goose Bay, North West river, and a preliminary survey was made. A United States army air force party subsequently examined and recommended the site. By agreement with the government of Newfoundland construction was begun by Canada almost immediately and the field was in use before winter closed in.

It was subsequently agreed by the governments of Newfoundland and of the United Kingdom that Canada should be given a ninety-nine year lease to Goose air base for defence purposes; that this air base should be available to the Royal Air Force and to the United States air forces for the duration of the war and for such time thereafter as the parties might agree to be necessary or advisable in the interests of common defence; that the question of civil air use should remain over for settlement after the war, but that in any event civil and military aircraft owned by the government of Newfoundland should have rights to use the base on terms not less favourable than aircraft owned by the government of Canada.

In the meantime, the United States, by agreement with the Danish minister at Washington, had in April 1941 assumed responsibility for the defence of Greenland and had begun constructing airfields there which were to be available to other "American nations," which included Canada. Shortly afterwards the United States also made an agreement with Iceland for the defence of that island, and airfields were rapidly constructed there. With the completion of Goose airfield and the Greenland and Iceland fields, a staging route was available for relatively short-range aircraft.

With the entry of the United States into the war on December 7, 1941, the strain on the existing ferry routes became even heavier. In May, 1942 the United States army air force proposed to the permanent joint board on defence the establishment of air routes over northeastern Canada to ferry long, medium and short-range aircraft to Europe. From the factories of the United States Pacific coast aircraft would be ferried across the Canadian prairies to The Pas and Churchill. From this Hudson bay port planes would fly to Southampton island, Frobisher bay, Greenland and Iceland and from there to their destination. Planes from another great focal point of United States aircraft production in the mid-west states would fly across Ontario and Quebec to Fort Chimo on Ungava bay at the northernmost tip of Quebec and from there would link up with the other north-east air route at Frobisher.

These two channels were to be in addition to the ferry route already established to the United Kingdom via Goose bay, Greenland and Iceland.

Another purpose for the speedy construction of the route was to permit forces from interior points to be rushed to the defence of Greenland and Iceland should the occasion arise. While this defensive phase of the war now seems remote, members will recall that in the summer of 1941 the German battleship Bismarck operated in this area, and, as is also well known, the Germans established weather stations on different occasions in Greenland.

On June 9, 1942, the permanent joint board on defence approved of the proposal of the United States army air force. It recommended immediate construction of the proposed airfields on Canadian territory, either by the Canadian government or by the United States government with the approval of the Canadian government. Facilities of the new routes were to be made available to the Royal Air Force.

For several reasons the Hudson bay leg of the northeast route has not been used to the extent anticipated and the original plans were never completely implemented. As the submarine menace was mastered there was a parallel improvement in the shipping situation, permitting the transportation of more aircraft by ship. Increased facilities at Goose air base and at Newfoundland airports permitted a greater flow of aircraft through these fields. Amazing technological advances, which increased the flying range and reliability of aircraft, as well as improved meteorological services, made the route from Goose air base more serviceable for short-range planes. The successful allied landing in North Africa made it possible for aircraft used in this area to be flown over the southern route, thus relieving the pressure on the northern route. As the fortunes of the united nations rose in the north Atlantic theatre the threat of enemy action against the northeastern section of this continent diminished.

In reaching this agreement for repayment for expenditures incurred for these defence facilities in northwestern and northeastern Canada and Labrador, the government had two considerations in mind. In the first place, it is believed that, as part of the Canadian contribution to the war, this country should take general responsibility for the provision of facilities in Canada and in Labrador required for the use of Canadian, United Kingdom and United States forces. In the second place, it was thought that it was undesirable that any other country should have a financial investment in improvements of permanent value, such as civil aviation facilities, for peace-time use in this country. I am happy to say that our views on this subject were understood by the government of the United States and the agreement which I have tabled is the result of this understanding.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. GREEN: Would it be possible to have the exchange of notes printed as an appendix to Votes and Proceedings?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that would be desirable, and I ask that it be done.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

OPINIONS OF DEPUTY MINISTER OF JUSTICE, 1925 AND 1930

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): When the house was in committee yesterday on bill No. 161, to provide for family allowances, I undertook to lay on the table a copy of the opinion given by the deputy minister of justice on old age pensions on May 23, 1925, and a copy of the opinion given by the deputy minister of justice on family allowances on April 23, 1930, with the correspondence requesting those opinions, I now table this correspondence and opinions.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.) moved:

That the first report of the joint committee of both houses on the printing of parliament, presented on July 27, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

HALIFAX SHIPYARDS—PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS IN SETTLEMENT OF STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. On Saturday I directed his attention to the fact that I had received a copy of a resolution passed by the United Mine Workers in my constituency with respect to the strike in the shipyards at Halifax. I would like to ask the minister what progress is being made in the settlement of this strike. Replying to my inquiry on Saturday he stated that the only issue in dispute was "the check-off and maintenance of membership clause" in the agreement. I thought that this was necessary by virtue of legislation passed by the legislature of Nova Scotia. I now wish to bring to his attention a telegram which I have received from Mr. James O'Connell, president, industrial union of marine and shipbuilding workers of Canada, local No. 1. This is addressed to me under date of July 31, 1944, and reads:

Halifax Shipyards Limited now on strike since July twenty-seventh because management refuses to accept majority recommendation of Smiley conciliation board. Membership of union demands that government take necessary steps to see that management accept majority recommendation that government take over plant if necessary so that this vital war industry can be reopened. We appeal to you to use your good office to speed up settlement. Please reply.

Has the minister any statement to make?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I have no further observation to make to that I made on Saturday.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I also have a question to direct to the Minister of Labour, notice of which I have sent to him. I have received telegrams from a large number of organizations in Nova Scotia with regard to the shipyards strike at Halifax. I do not propose to read the telegrams, because I was of the opinion that in asking a question that was not permissible, but I am going to give the names of the organizations that sent them, to indicate to the minister that the shipyard situation in Halifax is serious.

I have one from the secretary of local 8147, United Mine Workers; one from the secretary of local 4529, United Mine Workers; one representing the entire steelworkers' organization in Nova Scotia, signed by the eastern Canada director; one from Industrial Union No. 1 of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of Canada, which is similar to the one read by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black); a telegram from local union 4544, United Mine Workers; also one from the local committee, Canadian Fish Handlers Union. Each one of these telegrams suggests that action should be taken by the government with respect to reopening the yards in Halifax and operating them under a controller until such time as the legal difficulties with respect to implementing the report of the conciliation board are overcome.

My question to the minister is this: Has any discussion taken place between the Department of Labour and the Department of Munitions and Supply with a view to operating the yards as suggested in these telegrams? If not, is any action along this line contemplated by the department?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The answer to the first question is yes, and the answer to the second question is no.

Mr. GILLIS: No action is contemplated? A very intelligent answer to a very serious question.

CANADIAN FORCES

REFERENCE TO PUBLIC ADVERTISEMENTS IN CONNECTION WITH CAMPAIGN FOR RECRUITS

On the orders of the day.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was asked with regard to a couple of recruiting advertisements which had been published, one in English and one in French, and the question was whether the French one was a correct translation of the English one. The answer is no. The situation is that there was no intention that the advertisements in French and in English should necessarily be duplicates, any more than that there was any intention that the advertisement in French should be a translation of the advertisement in English or that the advertisement in English should be a translation of the advertisement in French.

There is a central committee having to do with recruiting publicity and recruiting campaigns generally. That committee has two what might be called subcommittees, consisting of experts in advertising and publicity, one committee to deal with French-speaking areas and the other to deal with English-speaking areas. Each of these committees prepares copy appropriate to the particular area to which the particular advertisement is being addressed and, as I say, there is no attempt to translate one series of advertisements in the one language into the other language.

It happened that eight advertisements were to be selected, and eight advertisements were selected, eight in English by the committee having to do with English-speaking Canada, and eight in French having to do with French-speaking Canada. Three advertisements in French were actual translations of the English advertisements. None of the advertisements in English, so far as I know, was a translation of the French advertisement. I think that that disposes of the question of the advertisements being translations or being uniform. There was no suggestion and no attempt that they should be uniform. They were suggested by committees who know the areas and the conditions which might hinder recruiting and had in mind the matters that could be put before a particular area to deal with those particular conditions.

There was a suggestion in the question that was asked that punches were pulled in connection with the French-speaking advertisements. I can say that no instructions, direct or indirect, by implication or otherwise, were given, nor was there any intention, directly or indirectly, to pull the punches in connection with French-speaking Canada, any more than in connection with English-speaking Canada.

Each set of advertisements was dealt with on its merits by advertising experts who were supposed to know their job.

I want to refer the house to just one advertisement. It is a translation of one advertisement that was published in French Canada. This is it:

Let's Repeat the Heroism of Vimy and Ortona
Let's March to Victory Together!

"Yes, you, chum, come on and join the ranks. If you have blood in your veins, you won't let us down. Do you want us to make you a present of victory without taking any part in it? Surely, you have more pride than that. Surely, you want to do your bit. We must win the war, we have to be in great number, you've got to be there.

"You'll lead a real man's life in the army. Let's march together in the footsteps of the heroes of Vimy, Courcelette, Passchendale, Dieppe and Ortona. Join the infantry. Be a volunteer. Volunteers are the best soldiers.

That was an advertisement that was published in the French language. There is no point whatever in taking No. 8 advertisement which was published in the English language and comparing it with No. 8 in the French language, because there was no intention at all to synchronize them in the matter of tone or in the matter of matter, or in the matter of argument or appeal. The situation is that the matter has been dealt with by publicity experts and the recruiting staff with a view solely to achieving results.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): There is one supplementary question I would like to ask following the minister's statement. He stated that these advertisements are made appropriate to the conditions and the areas in which they are disseminated. By that does the minister imply that the advertisement "Have I the guts?" was appropriate to the areas in which it was distributed? I would also ask whether these advertising committees that he mentioned go ahead without any control from the minister, or are any of these matters submitted to him? Do the men in charge of recruiting submit nothing to the minister in connection with the recruiting campaigns that they are waging? The statement made by the minister that these advertisements are appropriate to the conditions and areas in which they are distributed is a most strange and peculiar statement.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend has ceased wagging his head and delivering his lectures and has asked his question, I will endeavour to answer it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The advertisement was an insult to the English-speaking people.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend's question was whether I considered that the advertisement "Have I the guts?" was appropriate to the English-speaking areas in Canada. I did not say that I considered it appropriate. I said that the series of advertisements was prepared by committees who were supposed to know what was appropriate, what the conditions were, what arguments and appeals it was appropriate to make. I go no further than that in connection with that particular advertisement. I must say to my hon. friend quite frankly that that is not throwing down the committee in any way, because they are advertising experts who are supposed to know what appeals should be made and what appeals would be most effective in the programme which they carried out of making appeals in different parts of the country and to different temperaments. If I had seen that particular advertisement I do not think I would have passed it. I say that quite frankly, but I take full responsibility because it was passed by my department and I must take the responsibility for it. That is all I have to say with regard to that.

The other question was whether these matters are brought before the minister. These matters have never been brought before the minister. We have had a committee which I considered a responsible committee, made up of men from within and without the department who I considered knew a good deal more about publicity than I did, and on whose judgment I felt I could rely as to the matter of appeal. That is an answer to the second question.

On the question as to whether or not each advertisement has to be submitted to the minister, if there is any minister in this country who has been criticized for going into detail, it is the minister who is speaking to the house this morning; and I thought that this might be one thing which I might leave to others.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You find now that you can't do that.

Mr. RALSTON: Well, I find less justification for these criticisms and these indictments about my going into detail.

Mr. ROWE: The minister had better look them over from now on.

Mr. ADAMSON: Would the minister be prepared to say who were the committee who chose the series?

Mr. RALSTON: I would, but as a matter of fact I do not think it is quite fair to the gentlemen. If my hon. friend or anyone else is interested I could give the information to him. I am sure my hon. friend would be impressed by the names. They are men from the advertising agencies who submit copy and who have an idea of what will make a proper appeal. There is a director of promotion, who himself is a newspaper man and is in the department, also on the central committee, though I do not say that they passed this particular advertisement, because I do not think it was passed by the individuals concerned; there was a representative of the wartime information board and the C.B.C.; I cannot find that these two members were present when the advertisement was passed, although I have not checked up on it.

Mr. ADAMSON: They were civilians, though?

Mr. RALSTON: They were civilians, except the director of promotion, who is in Brigadier Mess's branch, and Brigadier Mess is chairman of the committee.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to ask the minister, having in mind the advertisement about which some discussion took place a moment ago, whether he does not think that the government ought here and now to repudiate entirely that advertisement. I do not think he has gone by any means far enough in his statement to-day, having in mind the whole picture, the fact that one section, namely English-speaking Canada—and remembering the contribution to the war which has been made by that section and other sections as well—has been singled out for what is a direct reflection upon it, in an advertisement calling for recruits, saying, "Have I the guts?" I think that calls for a direct repudiation, not simply the explanation which the minister has made.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know how this is in order; I do not think it is in order at all. I have already read the advertisement which was circulated to French-speaking Canada and which, instead of saying, "Have I the guts?" asks, "Have you the blood?" Both are a direct appeal to a man's courage. The advertisement might have said, "Have you the courage?" instead of "Have you the guts?" I have not repudiated either advertisement. I have said what I myself might have done had they been submitted to me. I think I have gone far enough when I have submitted this explanation and read the advertisement to French-speaking Canada.

INQUIRY AS TO POSTAL RATES ON PARCELS FOR OVERSEAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to direct a question to the Postmaster General. I note that the postal rates on certain classes of mail destined for our troops overseas have been cut, but I would ask the Postmaster General if he would consider reducing the postal rates on parcels going to our forces outside Canada. I have had a number of complaints, particularly from service organizations which raise a good deal of money for parcels going overseas, and the percentage of the money raised which has to be paid on postage seems to them to be pretty high.

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): I would advise the leader of the opposition that I received notice of his question at only five minutes to eleven. I am making inquiries and I shall be glad to make a statement to-morrow.

COAL

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ANNOUNCED ON MARCH 27

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): On several occasions the Minister of Munitions and Supply has announced in the house the setting up of a royal commission to inquire into the fuel industry in Canada. I am receiving numerous inquiries as to when we may expect an announcement of the personnel of the commission and the terms of reference. Is the minister in a position to tell the house when we may expect it?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): My hon. friend is making an inquiry which is justified in the circumstances. The fact of the matter is that I have been so occupied with other matters, and as there has been some difference of opinion regarding the agenda for the commission and its personnel, the decision has not been made, but I assure the hon. member that as soon as this session ends action will be taken.

RADIO BROADCASTING

CHAIRMAN OF CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—PROVISION FOR FULL-TIME SERVICE AND ANNUAL SALARY

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936, to provide that the chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation shall devote the whole of his time to the performance of his duties under the said act, and that he shall be paid such annual salary as may be determined by the governor in council.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. GRAYDON: I wanted the minister to make an extended statement as to the purpose of this resolution, and also to give the details, or such details as he can, so that we shall have some idea as to the principles upon which the bill will be founded.

Mr. LaFLECHE: This bill is a result of long observation by myself—if I may mention myself first—and by the chairman and the members of the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. During this long observation and study of what was necessary to better the position of the corporation, it was ascertained by all that perhaps one of the weaknesses of the past was that the organization was not complete, in that the chairman of the board of governors—in other words, the gentleman occupying the top position in the corporation—was a part-time officer only and not at all times available to consider matters and to help arrive at quick decisions. In the setup of the corporation as described in the Canadian Broadcasting Act of 1936 the general manager is chief executive officer of the board; he has to carry out the policies laid down by the board. The general manager has not the power to make or decide policy; only the board of governors may do so. It has been found time after time in the administration of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that questions have come up which required very quick replies and decisions. It was asking too much of the general manager to require that he should, without authority, take it upon himself to make decisions on these points as they came up. In addition to that, the business of the corporation has increased very much. The people of Canada take a much greater interest in radio than ever before. With the years—with the few years, really, since radio broadcasting became popular and a matter of the every-day life of the people of this country—there has grown up in Canada, as in other countries, not only a great use of the radio but a great interest in radio, which means that the business of the corporation has increased a very great deal in volume and importance because of the more vivid interest attached to the matter by the people of Canada.

It has been found by those whom I have already mentioned that the machinery of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation must necessarily be rounded out by giving to the board of governors a full-time chairman so that the nominal head of the corporation shall be the real head and shall be accessible at all times to persons wanting to do business with the corporation. I am of the opinion moreover that some of the troubles in connection with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in the past, those things that have been criticized about the corporation, have been very largely if not solely due to the fact that the top man in the organization, the chairman of the board of governors, has not at all times been accessible both to the public and to the officers of the corporation. It has been manifestly unfair, I believe, to the gentlemen who have held the position of part-time chairmen of the board to demand of them that perfection of administration which all of us without exception have wanted very badly. With this amendment I am very hopeful, I am sanguine, that the business of the corporation can better be attended to, more expeditiously and with a far greater degree of fairness to the officers of the corporation. I submit that it is not fair to demand an immediate decision on policy of a man who is general manager and who has not the power to decide policy. This amendment would rectify that situation and would protect, to that greater extent, a property which has become very valuable to the nation. I think, Mr. Chairman, that this action is quite necessary and in that I am in wide and, I believe, very good company.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have not been on the radio broadcasting comimttee for more than two years, and have missed very greatly the deliberations of the committee during the time that I have not participated in them. I felt, during the committee's deliberations from time to time, that the viewpoint of members of the house was very valuable, and I believe a good deal of advantage was gained by virtue of the meetings that were held. I have followed with some degree of care its deliberations this year as well as last year. One of the things that always struck me, one of the difficulties that radio has faced in the past, and I advance this suggestion to the minister, has been that there have been too many bosses of radio. That was a complaint that I made previously, and I am not sure that this resolution upon which a bill is to be founded cures the situation. This would appear to set up another boss of radio and to put him in the position of a paid boss at that. One of the reasons, of course, why the corporation failed to live up to all the advance notices and expectations that many people had of it was that it was never given a proper chance, during at least a part of its existence, to render the kind of service it should to this country. I know it is being remedied, and for that I commend the minister; but for a long period there were noticeable absentees from among the members of the board of governors. From time to time vacancies were allowed to drift, one of them for eighteen months before it was filled, and in many instances for shorter periods there were important vacancies on the board. I am glad that the government has seen fit to take a step in the right direction with regard to the appointment of representatives of labour and of agriculture on the board. But for a long time the board of governors was not the strong body that radio really needed in Canada to make a success of it. Coupled with that, an unfortunate situation arose with regard to the whole of the corporation's activities, and that has made the task of bringing the corporation back to its proper position not a very easy one.

I am not sure that I agree with the minister—that the appointment of a full-time paid chairman of the board of governors is a step in the right direction. My belief is it is not, but rather that it is a retrograde step, because I do not think that by simply paying the chairman of the board of governors you accomplish the ends which are needed at this time. You have a general manager, and no doubt an assistant general manager will be appointed as well; and then you have a paid chairman on top of that. In radio, as in other things, as I pointed out two years ago, too many cooks spoil the broth. We had an example of what was going on at that time, and I hope the minister will pause and review the position and give careful, thorough and diligent consideration to the question whether or not this step now really achieves the ends which we have in mind. I know that in this session there is not likely to be a motion for concurrence in the report of the broadcasting committee, although it would have been helpful if such concurrence had been moved and we could have discussed at the same time as we are discussing this resolution the provisions and recommendations of that committee. I understand it was not unanimous in its report.

So far as the appointment of a new paid officer in the corporation is concerned, I think the minister ought also to consider something which I brought to his attention in a previous debate in this house, and it is this. With the commercial revenues rising in the corporation, with two networks now in operation across Canada, with the rising revenues everywhere so far as the corporation goes, I think the board of governors and the minister must consider taking one of two courses. First of all consideration should be given to keeping within the ceiling which was set previously by the minister who is now the Minister of Munitions and Supply, namely, a ceiling of one-half million dollars per year of commercial revenue. If the policy of the government is to allow the ceiling to be raised to two or three million dollars, then I believe the radio licence fee, which has always been a difficult fee to collect, should be abolished once and for all. in that connection, if my memory serves me rightly, the cost of raising and collecting the radio licence fee is greater than the cost of collecting any other tax in this country. I believe that it cost something like $536,000 to collect the radio licence fee last year. The collection of that tax does not justify the tremendous expenditure involved. It may be perfectly proper to have a radio licence fee in certain circumstances, but with the mounting revenue and with commercial programmes providing an ever-increasing revenue for the corporation, the time has come when the government must either revert to its previous decision with respect to the ceiling on commercial revenue or abolish once and for all the radio licence fee.

I desire to say no more on the resolution at the moment except to express that very material doubt. I do not think that the move which is now being made to pay a man who is to be the chairman of the board the sum of money which newspapers suggested, $15,000 will meet the difficulties—of course I realize that at odd times their speculation is not correct, although in most circumstances they have the happy faculty of being able to prophesy fairly accurately. I know that the minister will not be able to state the salary this morning because I understand it has not been set; nor has the person who will become the permanent chairman actually been decided upon. I should like the minister to give careful consideration to the position, because I for one am not convinced that the additional expenditure is going to meet the situation as may some alternatives which may be suggested during the discussion on the bill.

Mr. COLDWELL: This is the first opportunity that one has had of expressing an opinion regarding the report of this year. The report of the committee is not under discussion and therefore I do not propose to discuss it in detail, but I wish to say that I am generally in approval of the report that has been presented to this house. My reservation lies exactly in the resolution which is now before the committee. I am not convinced that the appointment of a full-time chairman is going to work out and be of benefit either to the corporation or to the country. I am afraid of this divided authority. We had an unfortunate experience two or three years ago when the corporation, because of the inability of the then general manager to do the job that was expected of him, found it necessary to divide the authority in three ways, and I think the experiment was most unfortunate. I am afraid that this proposal will lead us into difficulties. I realize the necessity, as the minister has said, of having quick decisions made.

The criticism that I have heard of the corporation in the last year is that there seems to be nobody, and quite understandably, who can give a quick decision. After all, the responsibility for the policy of the corporation cannot lie in the hands of one man. It must lie in the board of governors, and we must have a strong board of governors. The board of governors having decided the policy, it seems to me that the official general manager of the corporation ought to be the person to carry out that policy. The government and the corporation will invite criticism in this way; there is no effective governing board, but rather a dictator in the person of a chairman who will make the decisions from time to time. From the point of view of the government I think that is dangerous; from the point of view of the corporation I think more so, because in my opinion the divided authority between the chairman and the general manager will lead us into more difficulties.

I concur in the views expressed in that regard by the leader of the opposition. I am glad that the amendment is only in this one particular. I am glad that the committee of this year, as in former years, expressed its faith in the soundness of the radio act, and that this resolution covers just one detail of the statute; but I am afraid of it. I should be remiss in my duty if I did not rise and say that in my opinion we are apt to run into more difficulties. We have experienced that before. I repeat that I would have preferred to see a strong board of governors with a strong general manager. I believe that the corporation has in its own service one, two or three men any of whom would have made an excellent general manager. I do not think that any prejudice there may be against one or more of these men should stand in the way. We have men in the organization who could have fulfilled this function well, and I am sorry that this alternative has been proposed. A strong board of governors with a general manager is in my opinion preferable to the method suggested by the resolution.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to say a few words on the proposed resolution. If the resolution passes the committee this morning you are going to open up the whole set-up of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation Act of 1936. When that act was passed the regulation of radio was comparatively in its infancy. A commission had been appointed. It went to Japan and other countries and made a report to the government. I am absolutely opposed to the division of authority in connection with this system. While I realize that the present minister has been most active and has made some salutary changes in the short time he has been in office, yet I have noticed in the set-up of any public body, especially a public utility or a public ownership concern like this, that the main point is to have someone as a strong administrator with a free hand to administer the property. In my opinion this board is not necessary at all; this board should never have been appointed in the first place. A strong sole administrator should be appointed to administer the system. He should have a free hand to choose his staff, and over the programmes and everything else. I am opposed to the recommendation of this committee, because I believe it will lead to a lot of complications, duplication and interference by a chairman of the board with the chief executive officer and generally will cost more money. It will lead to jobs and all that kind of thing. I believe it would be far better if the chairman and the board were abolished altogether and the system administered by one responsible head. In the past this system has given the public many headaches. I notice that during the past three months some of the speeches delivered over the radio have been published. Recently one such speech was widely criticized in the press, because it was bound on the most costly paper. Some of the speeches have to do with contentious matters, and are in the nature of propaganda. I do believe it would be far better to do without a chairman so that he will not sit around the establishment all day long, interfering with the heads of departments, because that is all he will be doing. In the past the chairman has been very largely a figurehead, also the governors; they have been providing jobs and interfering with the proper administration of the system.

I am sure this committee did a great deal of good work and gave much time to these matters. However, I should like to refer to one or two points before this amendment is carried. In the first place there should be a consolidation of the act, and it should not be amended piecemeal in this manner. I do not know the present acting general manager personally, but I have had some correspondence both with him and with the minister to which they replied very promptly in the ordinary course of business, and they have both been most attentive to their duties.

The whole system of broadcasting has been changed by the war. When parliament framed the act of 1936 a great deal of it was copied from the B.B.C., though all the British legislation was not adaptable to this country. I do not believe we should have a chairman, drawing a salary of ten or fifteen thousand dollars a year and just sitting around retarding progress. I noticed not long ago it had been recommended by the governors under section 24 of the act that four new French language radio stations be established in Canada. Before this amendment is acted on and carries I should like to find out where those stations are to be located and at what cost. In the beginning of this act we had a system, to which objection was taken by my former leader. I believe that one of these gentlemen at the start said he was going to make this country bilingual by radio, and all that sort of thing. I do not know why bilingualism should enter into the set-up, because this system was supposed to give equality of treatment to all classes of citizens no matter what their nationality.

As I see it, this division and duplication of officials will be a waste of money. If you look at the way a railway or any large corporation is administered, for example, generally it has one man who is responsible for the way that system carries on. I am absolutely opposed to the recommendation of the committee; I believe it is a step in the wrong direction, and that any changes whatever in this act should have awaited the result of a general election.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not going to discuss this resolution. I never had very much faith in part-time employees; that has been my experience. I rise at this time, however, to make a few observations on the report of the committee, and I do so for this reason. There is not very much use appointing officials of any kind unless their decisions are carried out. We in Nova Scotia require improved radio facilities. Not a station in that province is provincial in the sense that it can carry provincial broadcasts, and even the handling of network programmes has been rather poor. For at least the last five or six months I have understood that the corporation has had a plan under way for the setting up in Canada of a second national network, and I felt that to be a move in the right direction. In reading over some of the proceedings of the broadcasting committee I understood that Doctor Frigon, the acting general manager, had told the committee on June 28 that it was the intention of the corporation to set up in the city of Halifax the nucleus of a second network under which improved facilities would be made available in that city. I was also informed from Halifax that a transmitter was installed for that purpose, and that the only thing necessary to make available the facilities already decided upon was the passing of an order in council by the federal government. Evidently this order in council has not been passed. Those of us in that province who are interested in improving radio network facilities thought it would be merely a matter of time, but evidently the matter now is at a standstill.

I endeavoured to obtain some information through questions placed on the order paper a few days ago. The answers to those questions were tabled, but they were anything but satisfactory. I am not going to read the questions at the moment; they are available to hon. members in Hansard. In most cases the minister replied that the subject matter was still under consideration and no decision had been reached, but one question was not answered at all. I asked whether any steps had been taken by the C.B.C. toward the establishment of a new publicly-owned station, and whether a transmitter had been installed for that purpose. The part of the question dealing with the installation of the transmitter at Halifax was not answered at all. The information I was given from Halifax was that a transmitter had been installed and could be put into operation in a matter of three hours. Therefore I am taking this opportunity to obtain information, not because I want to be critical or because I want to hold up the measure but because I am interested in obtaining better radio facilities for the province of Nova Scotia. I am not quarrelling with the service given in the past; it has been as good as could be provided with the facilities at the disposal of the employees of the corporation in that province. I think they are doing an excellent job, but I am concerned about improving it.

We are now asked to approve the appointment of a full-time chairman. I do not quarrel with that. I am quarrelling with the fact that an official like Doctor Frigon should attend a parliamentary committee and definitely state that the nucleus for a second network for the province of Nova Scotia has been decided upon; that some of the equipment should be installed, and then at a moment's notice have the work come to a halt, with nothing more done about it and confusion reigning in regard to that matter as far as my province is concerned. A great many people are writing me in this connection. I do not care whom you appoint; unless the administration making the appointment are prepared to support that man, no matter how capable he may be, if there is machinery behind the scenes holding him back then the net result will be that he will be discredited with the public whom he has tried to serve. It seems to me that any time a man in public life, employed by the government, doing a job for the people of Canada, makes a public statement, he should be supported one hundred per cent by those who have authority to do so.

I should like the minister to elaborate on the answers to the questions I asked in regard to this matter, because I must endeavour to answer them to those in Nova Scotia who want these facilities. I do not want to make trouble; I merely want to satisfy them that this matter is being looked after and that in due course these facilities will be established. I want also very frankly to tell the minister this. In some of the letters that I have received I have been told definitely that political forces in Halifax are endeavouring to set up a privately-owned station to be used exclusively for political purposes, and that that is what is holding up the installation of a publicly-owned and operated second network in Halifax. If the minister can assure me that that is not so, that there is some war-time necessity holding up the necessary equipment, I am prepared to take his word, but as the matter now stands it requires considerable clarification.

Mr. McCANN: Mr. Chairman, this resolution has to do with one of the recommendations made by the committee on radio broadcasting which carried out its investigations this year. Anyone who has been interested in the inquiries carried on during the past three years will readily see that because of the growth of the corporation it has been almost physically impossible for one man as general manager to carry on all the duties expected of him. The legislation to be based upon this resolution will not be very far from that contained in the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936. That act made provision for a chairman of the board of governors, a general manager and an assistant general manager. The only difference I can see in this resolution is that the chairman of the board will be a full-time rather than a part-time officer. The bill to be founded upon the resolution will also fix the salary to be paid to whoever takes the position.

Because of the demand of the public for improvements in radio services there has been a great growth in this corporation since 1936. Men who would be capable of acting as chairman of this board are hard to get. This position requires a man with some imagination as to the possibilities of the development of radio. Partly due to the war many executives are engrossed in their own particular affairs; they find that all their time is necessary to carry on and protect their own businesses during the years of the war.

This country has been fortunate in the men who have acted as chairman of the board of governors, and in the governors themselves. These men have given freely of their time and services. They receive no salary apart from their expenses, although the chairman receives a small honorarium. In my opinion the corporation has reached a position where it needs the full-time services of some one who understands the business.

It is physically impossible for a man like Doctor Frigon, the general manager, to carry out all the duties for which he is responsible. He is one of the best radio technicians in this or any other country, but he also has to carry on the business of an organization with a budget of about $5,500,000. Do the members of this committee realize that there are over 800 people in the employ of the corporation, that there are ten stations that belong to C.B.C.; that there are two short-wave stations, that another short-wave station is to be built, and that the corporation has supervision over 79 private stations? Doctor Frigon has been looking after the technical work of the corporation, and his work has been doubled because he looks after the French programme. It is absolutely impossible for him to carry on. If he attempts to do so, sooner or later he will have a break-down and we shall have no one coming up in the corporation who is in position to do his work.

It is simply a matter of the allocation of the work. Doctor Frigon has stated in evidence that it is necessary to have some one who can give his full time to the corporation. Mr. Morin, who was chairman of the board of governors, has also made this suggestion. I do not need to quote him, because I do not believe I should deal with the report of the committee at this particular time. I am quite prepared to back up the recommendation that there should be a full-time chairman of the board who would be paid a salary commensurate with his ability and the work he has to do. The chairman of this board would occupy a position comparable to that of a supreme court judge or the chairmen of other boards that have to do with public business.

It is not going to be easy to get someone who can carry on this work. With the increased growth of the corporation there will be sufficient work for a full-time chairman of the board and a general manager. The one will have to do with the making of policies. He will call the board together and policies will be determined. He will interpret those policies. It will be the business of the general manager to carry out the policies. I think the division of the work will be quite simple. This is the only extension of the Canadian Broadcasting Act contemplated by this proposed legislation.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the resolution?

Mr. GILLIS: I would like to have a reply to one or two of the questions I posed to the minister.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I shall be very happy to give it on second reading.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the bill been printed, and is it ready for distribution?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I have a proof here before me. I have had it in plenty of time for the bill to be published.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in, on division. Mr. LaFleche thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 179, to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

PROVISION FOR PAYMENTS IN RESPECT OF CHILDREN UNDER SIXTEEN

The house resumed from Monday, July 31, consideration in committee of bill No. 161, to provide for family allowances—Mr. Mackenzie King—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 3—Monthly allowance.

Mr. GRAYDON: I wonder if the Prime Minister would mind giving the committee the underlying reasons for the particular amounts mentioned in this section. On second reading considerable stress was laid on the fact that those in the higher income brackets were already being given what was tantamount to a cash allowance by virtue of the income tax exemptions for children, amounting to $108 per child up to eighteen years of age. I am not suggesting that that should necessarily be the basis, but the Prime Minister did indicate that as one of the arguments he advanced in support of the bill. In view of that $108 income tax exemption which the Prime Minister said was really in the final analysis a cash allowance, may I ask how the amounts mentioned in this section were arrived at as the proper allowances for those in the lower income brackets: $5 per month for a child less than six years of age, and so on up to $8 per month for a child thirteen but less than sixteen years of age. I would also ask about the allowance in the case of larger families. I raise that question only because a different base for allowance is provided for in the income tax exemptions for taxpayers in the higher income tax brackets, where an exemption is provided with respect to children in the family up to eighteen years of age. I think that some reconciliation as to this section's provisions is in order.

There is another matter I might as well mention now while I am on my feet. It seems to me that the most expensive period of a child's maintenance and support is after fourteen years of age and from then on to sixteen and for the next three or four years. At least those of us who are parents realize that when children reach these ages the cost of their maintenance and support mounts rapidly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will realize that the experts in the Department of Finance have very carefully considered the relationship of this measure to the income war tax measure, and some of the figures that have been arrived at have been as a result of considering all the implications and possibilities that may arise in that regard. The point that my hon. friend has stressed has been that under the income tax measure a larger amount is conceded by way of exemption for children over sixteen than is given in the form of allowances under this measure. Not only the finance department but others who have considered this class of measure hold, I believe, the view that there should be some recognition of the fact that something may be owing to those who are paying money into the treasury which would not be owing to a like extent to those who do not contribute to the treasury at all. I would add that this is the first attempt at a measure of this kind. It is based on experience already gained from the dependents' allowance administration, and undoubtedly further experience will go far to show what further readjustments may be advisable.

As to my hon. friend's point about the expenses increasing as the children get older, I am not experienced in these matters and I have to take as correct much that others tell me; but my recollection of my early days was that as one became older one was able to help one's parents by sharing some of the general burden and that might offset what my hon. friend finds is necessary in the way of extra expenditure as the children get older. I do think it is true, as I said on the second reading, that as a family increases in numbers what has served former members of the family can help in part to serve other members and as children get older they in turn are able to help their parents in household ways as they cannot do when they are younger. Did my hon. friend have any other question?

Mr. GRAYDON: I referred to the income tax exemption applying to children up to eighteen years of age while this allowance is payable only up to sixteen.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have answered that point.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In view of what the Prime Minister has just said it might be well to offer an observation. Too many people fail to recognize the changes which have been brought about in our economy by the coming in of an age of abundance Fifty or sixty years ago it was possible for the family to keep cows and supply milk to the neighbours, keep chickens and supply eggs, and do a variety of other things to supplement the family income, and in those days it was in a way an economic asset to have an addition to the family when the child was able and willing. But the coming in of the age of abundance and of the machine age has negatived all that in most cases. For example, in our ordinary towns it is impossible to keep cows and sell milk to the neighbours. In most cases there is a law prohibiting it, and in many other cases, even if the milk were there, the neighbours would not buy it because they would be buying from the dairyman who comes right to their door. A similar changed situation exists with respect to a large number of other economic activities in which boys and girls participated in the days when the Prime Minister was a boy and when I was a boy not so many years ago. I believe that that whole situation should be taken into account. You frequently hear people exclaim quite indignantly against this whole policy of social services and talk about "the time when my grand-dad went out into the woods and threw off his coat and rolled up his sleeves and carved a living". Well now, my old grand-dad could do that, because there were woods then that he could go into, there was free pasture where he could let his cows run, and it was possible for him to go out and catch fish, and shoot game; and many other conditions existed which gave my old grand-dad a chance to do such things. But let my old grand-dad's grandson go out and try to do these things, and see what happens to him. Then there is another simple illustration. My old grand-dad's wife could knit stockings and send the child to school with knitted stockings: you let my old grand-dad's grandson's wife try to do the same thing, and see what happens.

A great variety of changes has come over the world which renders it very necessary that these social services be offered and that they be munificent. I have said once before in connection with this measure that I consider it wholly inadequate. These allowances are not enough. The Prime Minister said, or implied, that the young girl or the young boy could probably help around the home. That is quite true, but by helping around the home that young child can add hardly twenty-five cents to the family income. Many of the things which children used to be able to do and which were a valuable service to the parents, such as running the wringer, the washer and the churn, are now no longer available to them. There are electric washers or some equipment of the sort in the average home which render the services which a child can give its parents of far less direct financial and economic value than in the old days.

Probably there are very few members who are in a better position to speak with authority on the subject of raising children than I am. The Lord blessed me with twelve children—for which I am very thankful—and he also blessed me because of those twelve children with an abundance of experience, and a lot of it in the school of hard knocks. So that speaking from experience I say that we can very profitably make these allowances a great deal larger, and then we would not be doing too much to aid those who are raising a future generation in this country.

Perhaps while I am on my feet I should say a word or two on a subject which hardly seems to be directly in point, but which has a bearing because of changed conditions. Fifty or sixty years ago grand-dad could stay around the home and there were always a lot of things which he could do to help out the family. He could feed the cow, feed the pigs, take care of the chickens, and do a lot of other things to help the family economy along. Because of changed conditions which have been ushered in through the age of abundance, the age of machines, grand-dad can find hardly anything about the place to do which will enable him to make any substantial contribution to the economic well-being of the family. This is hard on grand-dad—it grieves him terribly—it is hard on the family, and it renders essential the payment of more and more generous old age pensions.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We are not discussing old age pensions at the present time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have mentioned it only once, Mr. Chairman. I do not propose to mention it again. I just want to point out that this whole problem is bound up with the development of the age of the machine and the age of abundance. It is not that children are any less ready to take care of their parents, or that the older people are any less ready to support themselves: they are forbidden to offer the support and to give the support, because of changed conditions over which they have no control whatever. If we expanded our pensions to the elderly to $50 per month and brought down the age at which they received the pensions to sixty years, we would still leave plenty of room for actual hardship in Canada among elderly folks. I believe the pension should be raised as high as that and the age brought down to sixty years, as a part of our general scheme to improve the economic conditions of our homes where the children are being raised.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: May I say one word about this scale?—because I have had a lot of correspondence about it and I know that considerable public interest surrounds the scheme. The answer—and it is a complete answer—is that given by the Prime Minister. This bill has been prepared in the light of the experience which the government has gained over a period of nearly five years during which dependents' allowances to the families of the men in the services have been paid. That scale has been a sliding scale, providing $12 per month for the first child and $12 for the second child, $10 per month for the third child, and for the fourth, fifth and sixth, $8 per month each, and no further benefit beyond the sixth child; making a total possible dependents' allowance for children of $58 per month to a man who, in order to have that dependents' allowance for his children, is required to assign fifteen days' pay per month; and hon. members know that the rates of pay to the men in the services are in no wise comparable to the rates of pay which are being received by civilian wage-earners. There is in addition a separation allowance to the wife of $35 per month. The whole of the income available for the family of a service man has been computed and has been compared with the whole of the income which would be available to a like man in a civilian occupation, and it seemed from the experience gained during those five years that it was something which met with satisfactory results to have a diminishing scale as the number of children in a family increased. It was that reason which motivated the setting of these figures in this bill. Now it is intended to improve conditions throughout the land; but to do so in a reasonable fashion, and if the experience which has been acquired over the past five years should prove that it did not provide a satisfactory solution for civilian families, it will be possible to rearrange things.

There is in the dependents' allowance a limitation that does not go beyond the sixth child. While in the service the ordinary man is of an age group that does not go above a certain level, in the civilian population there are heads of families of all age groups, and a limitation on the number of children provided for by allowances would have implied a declaration by parliament that that was the maximum number of children that might be desirable in a Canadian family, and it did not seem that it was a good thing to have that either expressed or implied in any law enacted by the parliament of Canada. The population of Canada is in large part sprung from families in which there was no limitation as to numbers, and there are still, as the hon. member for Lethbridge pointed out a moment ago, a considerable number of families maintaining the traditions of past generations, so that it did not seem that it would be proper for parliament to say that it was not desirable to have a family exceeding so many persons. For the families in civiliain life, the whole available income for expenditure will be comparable to that which is made available to men in the forces by means of pay, separation allowance and the dependents' allowances; and I think it is a reasonable attempt to bring about a situation which will realize the objective expressed in the resolution—a greater degree of equality of opportunity for all the children in Canada.

There is the other point mentioned by the leader of the opposition, that the amount of $108 allowance off the tax is larger than even the twelve monthly payments that would go to a child of fifteen. It is somewhat larger, but it is also a fact that in a family it is a proportion of the revenue that is expended on each member, and prior to the war the situation was such that those with the higher incomes got a greater reduction in income tax than those who were paying tax on a lesser amount. But it was found that there was an amount beyond which, under the stress of war, the tax should not be further reduced, and the $108 was arrived at on a basis of $400 per child with the old rates. That would give an exemption of $80, at an average tax rate of 20 per cent; and that is the portion that is now deductible from the graduated tax. The other $28 is seven per cent of $400 for the national defence or normal tax, and the income tax act is so arranged that it is only when you get into the relatively high brackets that you get the full benefit of the $108. You get $28 per child off your normal or national defence tax, but if you have, say, five children, you should get five times $28, or $140; but you have to have $2,000 income to have a normal tax of $140. If you have only $1,800 you do not get the full $140 but only the amount that is determined by the calculation of your normal tax on what your income is. And it is so with the graduated tax. You take from the graduated tax first of all $150 as an allowance for being a married person, and then if there is enough of the graduated tax left to make up $80 per child you get the benefit of it. But you have to reach a relatively high level of income—and when I say a high level I am speaking of the population at large, a level of income which is more than that of a very substantial portion of the population—before you get the full benefit of $108 exemption per child. It was felt that on the whole the calculations made by the experts of the finance department and the Department of National Revenue showed that these figures were a reasonable attempt to realize the objective of the resolution and to bring about as near an approach to equality of opportunity as past experience justified.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was merely seeking information in regard to what looked like a difference in the treatment of different classes, rather than making any advocacy with respect to amounts, because I had nothing at all to say in that regard. The minister's explanation has cleared up considerably one or two points in my mind with reference to the question. As he points out, the income tax payer in the brackets above $1,200 running to $2,000 does not actually get $108 allowance, which of course brings this much more closely into line, and I hope the minister will realize what my point was. I thought I saw a situation there which was irreconcilable with the other, but I did not rise to advocate any change, because the one thing which of course this bill does not really cover is the point which I rose to make in my speech on the second reading. I realize the difficulties that governments face, but the question of need is not taken into consideration in this matter in the same way that it might normally have been. There are certain families I know of who are almost comparable in point of numbers and ages and because of that they would be entitled to the same kind of consideration under this act. In one particular family I know the cost of raising them has been at least four times the cost of raising another with the same number of children, in the same town and in the same circumstances, the only difference being that in one case the ravages of disease left their impress. In many instances it would be wholly inadequate, a mere drop in the bucket, while in the case of families where health has played a greater part than in others the allowances might be viewed in a different light. That was one of the reasons why it struck me that in the best use to which this public money could be put, greater stress should be laid on the whole question of the need of families that were to be helped. I felt, and I believe many in the chamber felt, that there should have been some reasonable arrangement with the provinces as to where the money could be utilized to the best advantage instead of simply having a general standardized scale such as this, because it might have met the situation better; although I readily realize that situations arise where parents must have some cash. At no time did I advocate that there should not be cash paid in the circumstances where it could be used to best advantage. I think there would be agreement in the committee on this point; in some instances there ought to be supplementary arrangements made in connection with health programmes and so on. However, the question of need is one which is not covered in the bill. The policy which is laid down and the structure of the bill indicate that evidently that is not a possibility at the moment. I do wish to leave this one point with the government. There will be a dominion-provincial conference some time this fall. I am hopeful that this will not be such a rigid system that there will not be some way by which the provinces may play their part, and that underprivileged families will be considered.

May I say this one word in closing? I come back to it again because I feel very keenly about it, and the Prime Minister made some reference to it on second reading of the bill. I do not want to be misunderstood when I say this. There are parts of this country in which the standards of wages are too low. Those parts of the country are making it difficult for industry in other parts to compete successfully on the general market in Canada and elsewhere. I am fearful that this measure will start out to subsidize families before a proper wage level has been actually set across the dominion. It may be that that is an exaggerated position to take; but it seems to me that the family allowances scheme will work only if wage levels across Canada are equalized so that everybody in Canada will be on an equal basis to start with, with the exception of children. It seems to me that that is an almost unanswerable argument. That is one of the reasons why the amendment was framed in the way in which it was by us on second reading. If one part of Canada is to have family allowances they ought to be ready to raise their wage levels so that those allowances could not possibly be a substitute for a higher wage level. I realize the difficulties connected with it, but this is one argument that is very difficult to get around. If wage levels in Canada were brought up to a proper standard, nobody could say with the same force that some form of family allowances should not be recognized.

I was struck by the arguments that were presented on all sides of the house with respect to the question of equal pay for equal work. If we accept that theory, as I think most people do, then as matters stand at the present time a penalty is attached to a man who has a large family. There is an injustice to the parts of Canada that have a high scale when they have to compete with low wage areas. I have not gone into this question very deeply. It may not be confined to one province—I am not sure that it is. Regardless of whether it is confined to one province or not, I think we should have a proper standard of wages in Canada so that even the people without any children may have a decent standard of living and there shall be no sagging below that minimum. Once you have that level, then bring in a proper and workable scheme for family allowances. At the present stage of our history it does work a comparative injustice to other parts of Canada that have a high wage level. I advance that argument without any special feeling in the matter, except that I do say there are arguments there based on premises which are difficult to get around. It has been difficult for me to get a satisfactory answer, and I think that applies generally throughout the country.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I will not surprise the leader of the opposition by saying to him that I have been just as troubled as anyone could be by the apparent discrepancy in some wage levels in civilian industries between my province and the one in which his constituency is located. I have been met with the objection, with research work behind it, that there was a very close approximation to equal pay for equal work, and that the unit cost of labour entering into a commodity was as high in the province of Quebec as in any other province, because of the fact that apparently there was not as efficient work being performed during the same number of hours. I know for a fact that during a certain period that was true in our shipyards, but I am glad to have seen great improvement come about, and I am now in touch with research work that is being done in civilian industries for like improvement of output.

We would certainly be entitled to complain in my province if we were required to do work of the same value for less compensation. In order to justify an increase in the hourly pay for which we are asking we shall have to be able to show that we are capable of giving service for the additional pay. These are subjects that are being carefully examined into to determine the number of man hours that go into a given commodity. I know that the same situation does not exist all over the province. I know of two printing shops. The one that has the best installation does not deliver as much output per man hour as the other that has not as modern an installation. These things are being inquired into now and they are being attended to as well. Therefore I am of the opinion that that is the proper basis. There can be no objection, and should be no obstacle either from labour or from employers, to obtaining for our workers the same hourly rates as elsewhere just as soon as it is satisfactorily shown that their output is equal to that for which these hourly rates are being paid elsewhere.

Mr. GRAYDON: The discussion which has taken place between my hon. friend and myself will go far to bring out into the open one of the real difficulties and criticisms of this measure. We may as well be frank about this thing. People in some parts of Canada complain that other parts of Canada which are paid a lower wage are being paid family allowances before those wage rates are raised to a proper level. I am glad to have this out in the open, because there is not much use in keeping these things hidden. I feel that perhaps I was doing a service, and I am sure my hon. friend is doing a service, by discussing these matters frankly. I did it because the problem is there. It is a problem that we shall have to solve in this country eventually and I do not apologize for bringing it up at this time.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to call the attention of the Prime Minister to one point, and I think this is the only section on which I can mention it, though I have read the bill over eight or ten times. Section 3 has to do with monthly allowances, and provides for the payment of money out of the unappropriated balance in the consolidated revenue fund from July 1, 1945, in respect to children resident in Canada and maintained by their parents, in amounts of $5, $6, $7 and $8 according to age. The point I wish to make would relate also to several other bills of last week amounting to a billion dollars in all, and while perhaps the Prime Minister may not be able to give me an answer to-day he might consider the suggestion. Of late years we have made a practice of drawing upon the unused portion of this consolidated revenue fund, and shortly before the war I introduced a bill which was based largely upon the laws of other countries, embodying a principle which has been in operation in many of our provinces and municipalities since confederation, proposing that on these questions of great national importance the people who pay the taxes should be consulted. That has been found to be a very good principle in votes on money by-laws in the administration of the provinces and municipalities. The explanatory note to bill No. 11 of 1939 contained just two short paragraphs, which I should like to read:

> This bill is enabling legislation similar to that for many years in vogue in democratic countries. It is found to be in the public interest and most useful, permitting the submission of important national questions to the wisdom and judgment of the electors.
> The provinces have used it extensively for years through the municipalities, thus providing an opportunity for giving the public a voice in government policies. It will create a prerogative of checks and balances and make for government "of the people by the people and for the people." The governor in council can be thus enabled to submit to a vote any matter of a national importance.

The bill was read a second time and considered by the election committee who took evidence and heard the clerk of the house and others. I recognize that to adopt this principle the measure now under consideration, the election act, would have to be amended. Everyone agrees that this provision dealing with children, and the other bills that have been brought in, deal with domestic matters of the greatest magnitude, matters which must be dealt with if we are to have a happy people and happy country. Everyone, both inside and outside this house, wants to help our poorer people. I do not know of anyone who does not believe in the Christian doctrine as set out in the tenth chapter of St. Mark, where the Lord referred to children, to the duty of the state toward the children, and all that sort of thing. I believe the adoption of a principle of this kind would be in the interests of the government itself. Some very able men have come up to the government benches from the municipalities; I would mention particularly the hon. member for Huron-Perth, who was a former mayor of his municipality. All those who have been active in municipal affairs realize the salutary effect this provision has had in keeping down the tax rate, and in protecting both the ratepayers and the government. I do not ask the Prime Minister to give a decision on this matter right away. I do not want to act unfairly in bringing up this suggestion at this time, but I believe it would be in the public interest if consideration could be given the matter and a reply made before the bill is given third reading.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can answer my hon. friend at once. The bill already has had second reading, and if it is to come into effect on July 1 of next year I think we should proceed with it without further delay or interruption for other purposes. To adopt in the interval what my hon. friend has suggested, something in the nature of a plebiscite, would, I think, confuse the issue and certainly would delay the enactment of the bill. At the same time I have sympathy with his intentions "and all that sort of thing".

Mr. CHURCH: It could be done by an amendment to the election act, and I think it is in the public interest that this should be done.

Mr. KNOWLES: Unlike the hon. leader of the opposition I am not satisfied with the explanation given by the Minister of Justice for the scaling-off principles included in section 3 of this bill. I feel that the argument advanced by the minister just before the luncheon adjournment to the effect that the scaling-off principle applied in connection with the dependents' allowances to families of service personnel also applies here does not altogether fit the case. In connection with dependents' allowances an attempt is made, whether or not the government measures up to it, to meet the full cost of maintenance of the families of men in the services. As the Minister of Justice pointed out, the amount allowed for a child in the first instance is $12 a month rather than the $8 we are allowing here. There are also the other amounts, such as separation allowance for the mother and the assigned pay which the soldier must send home. I suggest that the situations are not comparable. What we have here is only a token payment toward the extra cost of maintaining children in a family, and because that payment does not meet the additional cost of each additional child it seems to me unwise and unfair to reduce it as the number of children increases.

Another argument that has been used in support of the scaling-off principle was advanced by the Prime Minister when he moved second reading if not also on some other occasion, when he contended that the average cost of maintaining children in a family drops as the number of children increases. While in a sense that is true it does not tell the whole story by any means. Let me illustrate my point by giving some figures by way of example. Let us assume a married couple getting along on the meagre income of $100 a month. When the first child is born it would cost at least $20 a month to maintain it. This allowance will provide only $5 a month for that child when it is born, so the family allowance does not meet the additional cost of maintaining that child but only provides a token payment. Let us go on. The second child is born. Accepting the Prime Minister's argument that the cost of maintaining the second child will not be as great as the first, because there will be some things that can be used again, still it will cost $18 a month to maintain the second child. That brings down the average to $19 each, but I point out to the Prime Minister that the extra $18 it will cost to maintain the second child is not there. The family still has only the $100 a month income it had in the first place, plus the allowances for two children which will total $10. So the deficit in the cost of maintaining the entire family mounts with each child, even though the average cost of maintaining the children in the larger family may drop. It is a case where the average has no practical significance. Suppose, for example, that a family has five children, and that it costs to maintain those children $20, $18, $16, $14 and $12 respectively per month. That makes a total of $80 a month, or an average of $16. But we must remember that the family has only $100 as a basic monthly income, plus such sums as may be received under the family allowance measure. In other words, the deficit grows as the family increases.

Here is the point I have in mind. The fifth child born into a home comes in at a decided disadvantage as compared with the Canadian child who is the first or second child in another home. We should remember all through our consideration of this measure that our concern is with Canadian children as such. If we are concerned with Canadian children, we are concerned with every Canadian child whether he is the only child in a home or whether he is the fifth or tenth. I suggest that with this scaling-off principle included in this section we are penalizing the children who are born into large families wherever they may be.

There is also another scaling-off principle in this section which provides for lesser grants of money for younger children. I am not so sure from such experience as I have had that it can be said that children of tender years cost less to maintain than those who are a little older. I suggest that it is of extreme importance that children in their first two or three years should have everything possible provided for them so that their health will get a good start. It could be argued that there should be extra money the first year or two for this purpose. I speak out of some experience on this matter. It so happens that I was born in the midst of a depression into a home haunted by the spectre of unemployment. That spectre had already taken its toll before I arrived in the loss of two other children from malnutrition. If I may say so wtihout inviting a jibe from some of my political opponents in the chamber, I am told that it almost cost me my life as well.

I want to emphasize the importance of giving every Canadian child the best possible start. Frankly I do not not like the leader of the opposition to be able to say that he has three eight-dollar children whereas other Canadian children will be considered as only five-dollar children. I hope the government will reconsider these two scaling-off principles. I was pleased to note from the remarks last night of the parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister that there are still some matters to be settled about this whole arrangement. He was speaking particularly about the relationship between this measure and the Income War Tax Act, but I took from what he said that study has still to be given to a great many feaures of this plan before it is put into effect.

When I was speaking on the second reading of the bill I suggested that we would probably pass this bill in its present form but that before it came into effect there would be an amending bill to implement some of the results of the study that will still have to be given to the measure. I hope there will be further study given in the interests of the main purpose of this bill which is to provide the best chance possible for Canadian children. In this study I hope it will be decided to revise the scaling-off principles to which I have referred.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend has forgotten altogether the purpose of the bill. My hon. friend said that because of this scaling-off we were penalizing the last child or the younger children in large families. I cannot understand how we are penalizing anyone to benefit under this measure when to-day they receive nothing and when, after this bill comes into effect, there will be allowances for everyone that qualifies. My hon. friend has lost sight of the fundamental feature of this bill, which is to give assistance to every child. We are not penalizing any child when we give it assistance.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am not comparing the condition that will be in effect after this bill is in force with the present condition; I am trying to compare conditions that will exist under this legislation when it has come into force, which is the proper comparison to make. I say that the fifth child born into a home will be discriminated against under this legislation as compared with the child who is born first or second into a Canadian home.

Mr. GREEN: The allowances are to be payable under the provisions of this section 3. The section starts off with these words, "subject as provided in this act and in regulations". I would think that all the provisions under which payments are to be made could be set out in the bill. Could the Prime Minister or his parliamentary assistant give us some idea of what is to be covered by the regulations?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend surely realizes that with legislation of this magnitude there will arise innumerable cases that will have to be met in the light of the circumstances that exist when they come to the notice of the administration. Those cannot all be anticipated at the moment. The bill should not be so encumbered with regulations as to make it almost unintelligible. The power of making regulations is simply to enable the right thing to be done in the circumstances that may eventuate. There is no ulterior motive or sinister motive in—

Mr. GREEN: I did not suggest that there was.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I know that, but I wish to make it clear that there is no ulterior motive or sinister motive in any provision respecting regulations. The need for certain classes of regulations will be disclosed as the act is being administered. Those regulations will be made in the light of the responsibility of the minister to parliament. The regulations will be brought to the attention of the house. For that reason, if for no other, great care will, I am sure, be taken to see that the regulations are entirely in the interests of those for whose benefit this bill is intended.

Mr. GREEN: Could the Prime Minister give us an example of the type of provision that will be made by regulation under this section?

Mr. CLAXTON: In the first place there will have to be provision with regard to registration.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. GREEN: That is under section 4.

Mr. CLAXTON: That is under section 4 and that would be "subject as provided in this act and in regulations". Then in section 8 the governor in council is given the power to withhold the allowance in certain cases to avoid duplication. That will be also "subject also as provided in this act and in regulations." Paragraph (a) of section 11 reads:

> (a) provide generally or in respect of any province or any class of cases that payment shall be made to the parent prescribed in the regulations.

That is the kind of provision that will have to be made.

Mr. GREEN: The words in section 3 "and in regulations" refer only to regulations that will be passed under other sections of the bill?

Mr. CLAXTON: It would not be right to limit it in that sense. At the present time we cannot conceive of any regulation being passed except in accordance with the other provisions of the bill, but on the other hand it would not be fair to prevent the government using that power should some unusual circumstance which cannot now be anticipated arise in the future.

Mr. McIVOR: I am sorry I was unavoidably absent last week, but I want to say that any father or mother looking down on this section could not but say that now the children bring not only their own love but at least part of their living. Therefore the "not wanted" child will be welcomed. The second thing I see here is that when children are at least partly supported it will help to cure one of the worst curses in Canada, namely, the prevalency of divorce. Another thing I see is that when the mothers get this money—surely the fathers will be sensible enough to turn it over to them—it will be put into circulation. Anyone knows that money in circulation means employment. This is a forward step, and even the opposition say it is a good bill. As I say, even the opposition say this is a splendid bill and the fathers all over Canada should support a government that is so progressive in the name of peace, order and good government.

Mr. ADAMSON: I was interested in hearing what the Minister of Justice had to say this morning with respect to the rates. From what I gather, these rates were arranged by the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue and were based on purely financial considerations. The minister went to some pains to say that no consideration had been given to any differential in the standards of living between different parts of Canada. I have been a member of the social security committee of this house which has been sitting for several years and I know that witness after witness has appeared before that committee and said that one of the great drawbacks to family life in Canada was the income differential in different parts of Canada, and the differential even between one family and another living in the same community. But apparently these rates have been based on purely financial considerations and the human side of the thing has not been considered. Perhaps it is impossible to do that; perhaps it is not. But I feel that more consideration should be given before we agree to these rates.

Mr. SLAGHT: What does the hon. member mean by that?

Mr. ADAMSON: I was just going to give an example. In a long brief presented by the United Textile Workers of the American Federation of Labour to the Quebec war labour board they point out that the textile worker in the province of Quebec is receiving an average weekly wage of $20.80, whereas the worker in all industry in the city of Toronto is receiving an average weekly wage of $32. There is a very great discrepancy between rates of pay, and until you lift the pay of the textile worker in the province of Quebec or in the textile industry generally you are going to have a differential between the standard of living of the worker and his family in Toronto and the worker and his family in the province of Quebec. I think that some consideration should be given to that point.

Here is another point. Over and over again witnesses have testified before the social security committee that the infant mortality and maternal mortality rates increase tremendously with the birth of the sixth or seventh child and furthermore that the cost of sickness increases very considerably in the larger families. But this bill by its provisions decreases the allowance to larger families. I do not know whether that is sound or unsound, but if this measure is based on what is likely to be the need, the allowance to the larger family should be increasing rather than decreasing; because witness after witness proved before the social security committee that the larger families have greater need of hospitalization and sickness benefits than the smaller family.

I am not going to go into the question of other services, but it appears on the face of it that these rates were brought about by the Department of Finance without any consideration of the human needs of the families concerned.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member for York West has made what is an attack not so much on sections of this bill but on the whole principle of this legislation. I thought that he and the party to which he belongs had approved the principle of the bill in voting for it on the second reading. Let us look at the illustration which he gives and see what it adds up to.

What he said was this, that the textile worker in the province of Quebec received an average weekly wage of $20.80 and that the average weekly wage in the province of Ontario was $32. Then he argued that it would be unfair that the family allowance should be paid on the same basis in both cases.

Mr. ADAMSON: No; I was arguing that the first thing we should do was to raise the wages where they were low.

Mr. CLAXTON: Let me finish. The first thing the hon. member should do is to compare likes. If he compares the average weekly wage of workers in the province of Quebec with the average weekly wage of workers in the province of Ontario he will find that the differential is not $12 as he seemed to imply, but in the neighbourhood of two or three dollars, and a considerable part of that differential is due to the different classes of industries in which the people of Quebec are engaged as compared with the people of Ontario. Other reasons for the difference were given by the Minister of Justice just before the recess. Although we are wandering a long way from the provisions of clause 3, I thought I should point out the unfairness of the hon. member for York West comparing wages in probably the lowest paid industry, not only in Quebec but right across Canada, with the average wages paid in all industries in Ontario. If he compares like with like he will find that the differential is less than ten per cent in like industries, and there are various reasons for that.

May I deal for just a moment with the suggestion which the hon. member made that the government in arriving at this schedule of allowances has proceeded on the basis of financial rather than human considerations. I do not know just what the hon. member meant by that. I notice that he did not give any explicit answer to the hon. member for Parry Scund who questioned him about it. Does he mean this: that somehow the government of Canada or the administration that is to be set up under this act is to find out what the relative needs of each family are right across Canada and then pay the family allowance on that basis—is that it? If so, then surely, on the illustration he gives, the people of the province of Quebec, having lower wages, should receive more proportionately than the people of the province of Ontario, who have a slightly higher average weekly wage. That is where that argument leads him.

But my suggestion to the committee is this, that you cannot do what is suggested by the hon. member for York West, or what was suggested by the leader of the opposition, except in one of two ways. Either you can try to make provision for a family allowance or children's allowance in kind, or you can do it by the application of a means test. Those are the only possible alternatives to doing it in the way proposed in this bill. Let us look at each one of them. If you want to provide assistance in kind to children, you are going back, I suggest, to some such set-up as was adopted by a former administration during the worst period of the depression. It led to every kind of unfairness and every kind of effort to get around the regulations; it reduced the self-respect of the recipients; it was paternalistic in an extreme form; it was a reversion to the days when the rich man took a basket of necessaries to the poorer people in his community. That would be a retrograde step. What is more, it would be impossible for this parliament to do it, or to approach doing it. When it is suggested that instead of the proposal before the committee we should have some other proposal, we may ask if that is not really a suggestion that we should not do anything at all, because the suggestion is one which can be carried out only by some other agency. Payment in kind will not be accepted by the people of Canada; it would be retrograde in the extreme.

The only other way to relate payment in the way suggested by the opposition is to have a means test, whereunder family allowances will be paid, not on an equal basis for every citizen, varying only with the age and number of his children, but in proportion to the income of the family. That, too, would lead to a kind of policing in connection with the bill, an interference with individual freedom, and a degree of regimentation, which the people of Canada would not stand for.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How is it worked out in New Zealand?

Mr. CLAXTON: If my hon. friend wants me to compare our situation with that in New Zealand I will do it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No; I am just asking.

Mr. CLAXTON: In New Zealand they have a flat-rate wage which runs right across all industry. The differential for skilled workers and unskilled workers is not more than five cents an hour. The average earnings of the people at the top wage level and at the bottom wage level in New Zealand do not vary by much more than ten per cent. The whole economy is on a very level basis. If you have it on that basis it is possible to apply a means test of the kind they have in New Zealand without unfairness and without interference with the liberty of the individual. We have only this test, that the people who get the full benefit from the allowance for chlidren under the Income War Tax Act do not get a duplicate benefit from the family allowances. Apart from that everyone is treated alike.

One word in conclusion. The greatest single factor in creating differences between one family in Montreal and another family in Montreal, or even between one family in Montreal and another family in Toronto—is neither their wages nor their health; it is the number of their children. Taken by and large across the great bulk of the population, nothing so much affects the relative economic position of families as the number of their children. That is why this measure is introduced at this time; it is an endeavour to correct that disparity by attempting, in part of course, to bridge the gap between wages and the number of children. Wages are related, as we know, to work done. This measure is relative to the number of children, and it is in an endeavour to equalize the position of the great mass of the people of Canada that this measure is introduced. When we have an increasing scale for children of higher years, and a reduction for the number of children over five, we are simply trying to make this as scientific as it can be. I share the experience of the leader of the opposition in having three children, but it is within my knowledge, as I think it is within the knowledge of all hon. members who have children, and it is the experience of all social workers, that on the average the cost of caring for, maintaining and educating a child rises fairly steadily from birth until at least the age of fifteen.

Mr. ROWE: Fifteen?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, because that is as far as this bill goes. It does not benefit anybody over fifteen.

Mr. ROWE: It is when children are over fifteen that they are most expensive.

Mr. CLAXTON: That is when this bill stops short. Do you want it to go on?

Mr. ROWE: Yes.

Mr. CLAXTON: And pay in respect of seventeen, eighteen and nineteen years?

Mr. ROWE: Yes.

Mr. DUPUIS: And reduce the old age pension age!

Mr. CLAXTON: I think my hon. friend cannot be serious in that, because that is one thing in respect of which family allowance and children's allowance legislation throughout the world seems to be uniform; that is, it applies in respect of children up to the age of sixteen and not above. I believe that that is so, with the exception of one country where an allowance can be claimed, if the child shows special educational aptitude, for educational purposes.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is in New Zealand.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes; but in every other country as far as I know there is an absolute flat limit; no child gets it above fifteen, because as a rule that is the ordinary top age for compulsory education, and when children attain that age a number of them begin to earn their living.

As I was saying, the leader of the opposition and myself have each three children, but a number of other hon. members—I think of the hon. member for Rosthern, the hon. member for Dorchester, and others—have a very much larger number, and I believe that their experience will be the same as my own in finding that the cost of maintenance rises with the age. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Lethbridge say "hear, hear" to that. The cost of maintaining and educating a child does increase up to the age of fifteen, at least. On the other hand, the cost of caring for and maintaining a child is less with the family above four than it is with respect of the children under four.

So that this provision is scientifically drawn to take account of both factors. I wish to point out to the committee that this provision is far more generous, far wider in application, and covers a much greater range of the population than the provision made by any other country, and even if you take it at the lower level it would still be generous compared with practically every country in the world.

Let me make that clear. In Australia the first child is excepted, the benefit is five shillings per week. The average amount of benefit is about $1.10 per week in Canadian money and that applies only to the child or children after the first. In New Zealand the benefit is seven shillings and sixpence a week; it applies to the first child, but there is a top level, because families in receipt of over five pounds five shillings per week have a reduction for the amount by which their income goes over that level. If hon. members who are interested would look at the number of children receiving benefit in New Zealand compared to the number proportionately that will be benefited under the Canadian scheme, they will see that our scheme will cover a very much wider range of the population and gives much more per child than the New Zealand scheme; and as I have said, it covers a much wider range of the population than other countries. In addition the rates are higher. That is done not purely for financial reasons, not purely for humanitarian reasons, but for a combination of both; and this measure is justified, as I believe it has been justified, on both grounds. On that account I hope that this scale will be accepted by the house and that we shall get the measure working.

Mr. ADAMSON: Just one correction. The textile worker at Toronto is paid $26.20. That is completely comparable to the figure I quoted.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The parliamentary assistant said that under the New Zealand system there was provision for payment beyond the age of fifteen when the child required additional educational facilities. There is another provision, as I understand, that the allowance may be paid beyond fifteen where the child is mentally or physically defective or totally incapacitated. In setting up this bill has consideration been given to the desirability of such a provision? Take a family with one child who unfortunately is unable to carry on by reason of invalidism either physical or mental; is any provision to be made whereby in such a case there will be a continuation beyond the level set in the act? That is one question.

The other has to do with a matter that has not been discussed yet. I would like to understand the plan of the government, for plan it must have, in relation to the question of the securing of the fund from which the payments will be made. I have read the various acts, and if I understand correctly, in Australia a child endowment is financed mainly by payroll tax on employers and other social services are payable out of general revenue. What has been done there is to set up a national welfare scheme fund which is built up by taking each year one quarter of the total collections levied and secured on income tax from individuals, or by annual grant from the general revenue of £30 million, whichever is the lower. The parliamentary assistant has properly stated that there is no scheme anywhere that goes any further than does this. As a matter of fact, of the thirty-four schemes in effect in various nations, with the exception possibly of three, the general plan seems to be one of voluntary schemes whereby employers cooperate, or voluntary schemes assisted by the state. I would like to hear from the parliamentary assistant the general plan that the government has worked out by which this necessary fund will be secured. Is it intended to set aside a portion of income tax each year? Is it intended to bring in other legislation similar to that in certain countries whereby there will be payroll deductions, or what in general is the plan in that regard? In the various countries where similar legislation is in effect there is a very great diversity of schemes and so far we have not been informed as to just what plan the government intends to follow in that regard. We know what the benefits will be as set out by the Prime Minister. There will be $200 million or more put into circulation during the post-war years and it will create greater demand and purchasing power, apart from the beneficial aspect so far as the family is concerned. No doubt there will have been complete consideration of this phase, and I would ask the hon. gentleman to place the matter before the committee in detail.

Mr. MAYBANK: With reference to what the hon. member has said regarding the extension of payments to certain classes of children, just as soon as he begins to take in certain classes such as those who need additional help because of mental instability or for reasons of that sort, just as soon as that sort of thing is attempted, we are running into constitutional difficulties, the very kind of thing respecting which he has spoken at considerable length in the house already. The simpler the scheme is kept the better it will be. He endeavoured to lead us—I do not mean that he was endeavouring to lead us with malice, but he endeavoured to lead us—into other fields than just the one that is covered here, and that is to lead us into danger. We can destroy the whole act by particularizing in one way or another, thus running into the constitutional pitfalls which the hon. member has dealt with already two or three times in the house.

I would add that from such observation as I have been able to make this measure is so far superior to any other extant that there is simply no comparison. I say that having in mind more particularly New Zealand, a country to which we are often having our attention directed these days. Some time ago I had occasion to look with some care into the New Zealand situation with reference to family allowances, and as most members know, the New Zealand plan is all worked in together with other plans. There are family allowances, health insurance benefits, benefits to widows, benefits for weak mentality cases, and unemployment benefits, and a great many other things, all brought together into one law. But the law is sectionalized and there is one which deals particularly with family allowances. In our case we have our legislation in that regard codified partly because of the fact that we are a federal country. I looked into the facts respecting payment and also respecting the obtaining of money in New Zealand, and I should say at once that in any figures which I will give there is some error but that the error is deliberate, and so long as I draw the attention of the committee to that fact there need be no misunderstanding of what I say.

The figures are expressed in pounds and I have translated the New Zealand pound into $3.50. The reason I take $3.50 rather than par is that the New Zealand pound has been selling for a little more than $3.50 for some time—somewhere around $3.56. I use $3.50 because it is easier arithmetically to use that translation figure, and in translating the tax in New Zealand into dollars I translated it by $3.50, and in translating the total I translated it by $3.50 also, so that the payments out translated by $3.50 do not constitute any particular error. There is an error on both sides and they cancel each other. In the first place you will note that in New Zealand there is an income for children only when the salary or income of the recipient is $17.50 or more per week. A person getting $17.50 or one cent less than that per week would be entitled to the allowance. Everything is worked on a weekly basis, and the allowance in such a case as that is eighty-seven cents. Thus a person with an income just a fraction below $17.50 would receive $18.37. If he had ten children he would get ten times the eighty-seven added on to his $17.50, or a total of $26.20 per week. They did not introduce, as we have here, the principle of diminishing returns. There is not a cut at the fourth, fifth, sixth or seventh child. Personally I do not see why we should have done that unless it were for reasons of policy at the moment. I do not like to see the law worded in such a way that when the seventh, eighth and ninth child come along there is not the same allowance paid for them. I cannot speak with any personal knowledge on the cost of the ninth or tenth child. I cannot go beyond three.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You are a young man yet.

Mr. MAYBANK: I am a young man yet; there is plenty of hope, and I should like to see the law changed in time. I have thought that perhaps there were some economists around the Prime Minister talking so much about the law of diminishing returns that they persuaded him to weave that into this measure. When you come to examine the act that I have mentioned and deal with New Zealand you find that the amount of benefits given there is negligible compared with what is contained in this measure. As I have already said, it is only eighty-seven cents per week per child. It might be interesting to note that in the year 1942 the amount paid out was $1,897,130. The total cost of this measure in Canada is going to be $200,000,000, I believe, with about $50,000,000 recovered, or a total of $150,000,000.

Mr. CLAXTON: The estimate is $250,000,000.

Mr. MAYBANK: It is $250,000,000 with $50,000,000 recovered. Of course we are a larger country than New Zealand. One would expect that a scheme of family allowances would cost more in this country; but we are not that much larger either in population or in any other way. It is out of all proportion to New Zealand benefits, out of all proportion on the favourable side. It is good out of all proportion to the New Zealand scheme.

I might add—and I think every person knows this—that in New Zealand there is a special tax for the purpose of paying this; and every man, woman and child over the age of sixteen years pays a proportion of his income into a fund that will pay for it. There is no exemption, not even an exemption if the income is a dollar a year. First of all there is a registration fee, an annual or a quarterly registration fee, and then a percentage of income every year. I think the percentage is five per cent; but at any rate it makes no difference who the person is, how lowly his status in the community, how small his income, it must be paid. I might also add that by reason of the various social security plans in New Zealand they have been running about twenty per cent behind their intake. I do not suppose that even at the level they have, it could be kept up indefinitely. According to the figures that I looked up, in the year 1942 the deficit came to about twenty per cent on this particular account. Fortunately we are proceeding in the way of having surveyed the field carefully. We know what we can do. We are not going to apply to any other country to assist us. There is no need for us to borrow money in the old country in order to carry on social security schemes, yet we are able through the manner in which our economy has been built up to give this over-all benefit to all people in Canada to the amount of $200,000,000, and on a scale which no other country has equalled or is likely to equal, particularly the country which I have mentioned. It has not equalled nor come anywhere equalling this scheme.

While there are certain little points about the measure that one may think could be improved—I have already mentioned that I should like to have seen the reduction in the rate after the fifth child changed—yet on the whole one cannot find anywhere in the world legislation as progressive as this, as generally beneficial to the country as this. I know that this measure together with the various other laws that we have been enacting constitute on the whole about the best social security programme that will be found in any given country, certainly far superior to the country that has been pointed out to us so often, namely, New Zealand, which operates apparently under a socialist plan.

Mr. DUPUIS: I did not intend to speak on this particular section, because I had prepared something to speak on the main motion. If circumstances permit I may have something to say on the place of family allowances in a social security programme; but I think it is an hon. member's duty to relieve the consciences of some hon. members on both sides who represent the extremist views in this country, particularly in Ontario. In order to relieve the conscience of those whose feelings seem to be so much disturbed I thought I should give some statistics. Happily there are only a few hon. members who made a very uncalled-for attack on Quebec, but outsiders, writers in newspapers, have made an unjustified attack on this subject of family allowances. Knowing hon. members from other provinces as I do, I am sure that in a general way they are broad-minded and freedom-loving citizens. After I have given these figures I am sure they will rectify their mistake if they have the chance.

I hold in my hand a leaflet published by the Dominon Bureau of Statistics, eighth census of Canada 1941, sheet No. 5, page 4. The heading is, "Families by children per family at home." I should like my good friend from Lake Centre to try to bring about a little calm on the otherwise tumultuous lake of his constituency, and listen to this. Of families with one child there are in Quebec 123,030 and in Ontario 228,760, or nearly twice as many. Quebec has 92,020 families with two children;

Ontario has 163,610. In Quebec there are 64,630 families with three children and in Ontario 89,910. The difference becomes reversed after the fifth child.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Just go on and read them all.

Mr. DUPUIS: In Quebec 33,340 families have five children, and in Ontario 26,130. Quebec has 25,760 families with six children while Ontario has 13,950, and the proportion decreases right along to families with ten children or more.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the hon. member all the figures?

Mr. DUPUIS: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would you put them on record?

Mr. DUPUIS: I should be pleased to do so. The complete figures are as follows:

Families with—	Ontario	Quebec
1 child	228,760	123,030
2 children	163,610	92,020
3 "	89,910	64,630
4 "	48,330	47,490
5 "	26,130	33,340
6 "	13,950	25,760
7 "	8,040	19,840
8 "	4,380	13,930
9 "	2,380	9,400
10 or more children	2,460	13,220

As hon. members know, under this measure the allowance is $5 for the first child under six years of age, $6 for the child over six and under ten, $7 for the child over ten and under thirteen, and $8 for the child over thirteen and under sixteen, provided that for the fifth child the allowance is decreased by $1, for the sixth and seventh children it is decreased by $2 and for the eighth child by $3. So that small families with less than five children benefit more than the larger families. I have made some computations to illustrate what I understand the law to be. I have taken a family with eight children, with the youngest two years old and the others four, six, eight, ten, twelve, fourteen and fifteen. This family will receive $45 a month. This example will illustrate the fairness of the legislation as it is brought down, not only in relation to those in Ontario who criticize it but also in relation to those in Quebec. We are proud to say that in the past many heads of families all over the country have understood their duty to raise large families as God might decide, without interfering. That is their right. These large families are to be found not only in Quebec but in Ontario and all the other provinces. In these families of eight or more children the example I mentioned is followed more or less commonly; if the youngest child is two years of age, it will receive $5 less $3, so that during the first year this legislation is in force that child will receive $2 a month. When that child reaches the age of six it will receive $6 less $2 or $4 per month, and when it reaches the age of ten it will receive $7. During the years between thirteen and sixteen it will receive $8 per month. So in the years between birth and the age of sixteen this child will have received an average of $5.28 per month.

Mr. GRAYDON: I could not hear that last statement. What is the figure of $5.28 per month?

Mr. DUPUIS: If my calculation is correct, between birth and the sixteenth birthday a child will receive an average of $5.28 per month.

Mr. GRAYDON: That would be the average from the time the child is one year old until it reaches the age of sixteen?

Mr. DUPUIS: Yes, if it is one of a large family, because I am basing those figures on a family of eight children. As this child gets older it receives a greater allowance. According to the census figures, Ontario has almost twice as many families with one, two, three and four children as there are in the province of Quebec; therefore I do not see why some hon. members should complain and say that this legislation is intended to benefit Quebec only. That is not fair. We have heard complaints from the hon. member for Parkdale. I knew him by reputation before he came here and I had regard for his personality when he was representing the king as lieutenant governor of Ontario. When you meet him intimately you realize that it would be hard to find someone more refined than he. I am sure he will admit, when he considers the figures I have just given, that this law is not made for one province only, that it is for the whole country.

Let me say in all sincerity that in bringing down this legislation the Prime Minister is between two fires. There are two sets of critics. One set is illustrated by this newspaper which is distributed among the farmers. Its criticism of this legislation is that it does not go far enough. It states in particular that the legislation is intended to help the well-to-do people. That criticism is insincere, because they ought to know that when the head of a family earns more than $1,200 per year he is subject to income tax. Now he may deduct $108 a year for each child. If he receives $8 a month for a child, that totals $96 for the year and he will have to refund $96 out of the $108. That is the type of criticism the Prime Minister has to face. As a member from that province I receive letters of complaint all the time from people who are not well-informed. I consider it my duty to rectify the mistaken ideas that may exist. As the leader of the opposition has pointed out, there are a good proportion of large families in Ontario. Every one of those families will receive the family allowances.

Every hon. member of the committee knows that the purpose of this bill is not to pay the full expenses of bringing up a child. It is to help, it is a grant to large families. A family of eight children ranging from two to fifteen years will receive $528 per year. That will be a great help to the head of the family. He can use it to build a better home, or if he intends to rent, he can obtain a home possessing more hygienic facilities. If one of his children shows special talents he will be able to keep him in school longer than he otherwise would. There are many things that the fathers of our families will be able to do with this grant.

I talk with knowledge on this matter. I know there are many heads of families in my own district who will be delighted to receive these allowances. It will be just found money: trésor trouvé. Those who understand the laws of psychology and sociology will understand the benefits to be derived. These people understand the danger in the present movement against the capitalists. This dangerous underground movement is going on from the west to the east; it is pervading the whole world. Our legislators should try to prevent this movement from coming to the surface and getting hold of the administration of our country. We should have parties based on sound principles of government. This country should be governed by either the Tories or the Grits. I am frank about that.

Let us be sociologists. Let us work together to try to help the larger families. Let us be willing to take a few pennies out of our pockets to enact this social security measure. The families in Quebec did not expect to get this legislation. If we were not in the midst of such a terrible struggle I think I could say something that would open the ears of my colleagues about the patience of the people of Quebec. We are patient. We did not ask for this legislation. Our sociologists came here and suggested that this would be a good policy, but we never made any threats as to what we would do if we did not get this legislation. It comes as a gratuity and the fathers of our large families will be very much pleased.

I recall the day when I was a young fellow. I was the fourteenth boy in a family of seventeen and I am proud of it. Had my father, who was a very humble farmer, lived to this day I know he would send a letter of thanks to the Prime Minister of this country for giving him help in raising his family. What did he do? At the age of thirteen years he gave me my inheritance. Do hon. members know what it was? It was the king's highway. That farm is very narrow but it is very long and full of hardships. I am glad that I followed that road. When I was passing through those difficult times I said to myself that whatever talents Providence would give me would be used to help relieve the hardships of others. If I am to leave public life, the fact that I have contributed by my vote toward the passage of this measure to help the young children of large families make their way in life, will make me feel that my life will not have been in vain.

Mr. KNOWLES: There was one statement made by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville with which I heartily agree—that as between Grits and Tories there is no real difference and the sooner they get together the better.

Mr. DUPUIS: I would ask the hon. member not to distort my thoughts or my words.

Mr. KNOWLES: If I have distorted either, the hon. member can correct me.

The CHAIRMAN: We have already voted on the second reading and I would ask hon. members to keep to the clause now before the committee. We are on clause 3.

Mr. KNOWLES: Clause 3 deals with the scale of payments to be made under this act. Despite the criticisms that I have offered about the scaling off of these payments and such other comments as we have made, it stands that this is a commendable measure. I rise to express my regret that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre found it necessary, in his effort to endorse this matter, to try to run down what is being done in our sister dominion of New Zealand. I wish to correct some of the statements that he made, but I make these remarks not just for that purpose but so that I may indicate that New Zealand is doing the kind of thing for which we in this group have been arguing all along in the matter of social security.

First of all, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre quoted rates of family allowances in New Zealand which are out of date. I am not going to argue with him as to the value of the pound in dollars and cents, but it would appear from the figures he gave to the committee that he was taking the family allowance rate in New Zealand of four shillings per week, which was in effect in New Zealand up until May 1, 1942, on which date the New Zealand government increased the rate by fifty per cent to six shillings per week; so even on that point the hon. member was out by fifty per cent.

But the main point I wish to make in reply to my fellow member from Winnipeg is that in New Zealand the family allowance payments are only one feature of an all-inclusive social security plan. I would like to take just a moment to give a brief outline of what that plan is in New Zealand, and I do so because we have argued so often here that what we should have as quickly as possible is an all-inclusive social security plan. I hold in my hand an outline of the social security scheme in New Zealand which was prepared by the International Labour Office in Montreal. The document is a very complete and interesting one, but apart from quoting one or two opening sentences all I am going to give the committee at this time is the headings, which will speak for themselves. But first the introductory sentences:

> New Zealand is no longer at the stage of planning: since 1938 this country possesses the most extensive social security scheme ever conceived and put into practice.
> The Social Security Act of 14 September 1938 aims at protecting the citizen against the consequences of loss of adequate means of livelihood, whatever may be the cause of such loss.
> Provision is made, on the one hand, for health services. The expectant mother is afforded medical protection even before confinement; free treatment and maintenance at a maternity hospital during and after confinement are provided for and post-natal medical care is also granted free of charge.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I listened very attentively to the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and I did not think it was his purpose to start a controversy or to raise controversial points. I do not think it is relevant to discuss on this clause the social legislation of a sister dominion not pertaining to family allowances.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, apart from the fact that I would ask you to reconsider your decision in that you permitted the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre to make his remarks but seek to deny the same opportunity to me, may I point out that I am offering this outline because it fills in the claim we make in connection with clause 3, just as we make it with reference to the whole bill, that what Canada should aim at is an all-inclusive social security plan.

[Mr. Knowles.]

The CHAIRMAN: Order. That cannot be relevant to the clause under consideration, which deals with monthly allowances.

Mr. KNOWLES: If I have to bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I shall do so; but first let me make one remark and then I shall sit down. The family allowance payments made in New Zealand are only one element in the whole gamut of social security provisions which they have in New Zealand covering literally all the economic difficulties that might assail the people of that country. When one realizes that there is that complete coverage in New Zealand it puts the amounts that are paid for family allowances in that country in an entirely different perspective. I suggest that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has completely distorted the picture in New Zealand, and that in addition to being false it was unnecessary if his purpose was to approve the measure now before the committee.

Mr. PICARD: Mr. Chairman, I gave this bill my wholehearted support on the second reading, and I do not want to withdraw any of that approval now, but there has been so much talk in certain parts of this country about this clause that I want to say a word about it.

When considering the scale of allowances it is true that we must admit that most countries that have provided family allowances give the allowances on an ascending scale, while a few provide for a fixed amount for each child. The present clause has not been understood correctly by many. It is feared by some that it might be prejudicial to large families. I want to say that the plan proposed here is so generous that even with the ascending scale that is provided for large families in some other countries, the families will receive more in Canada under this measure. In France, where before the war, family allowances were more generous than elsewhere, the allowance to a family of seven children amounted to $432, while here the same-sized family will receive $496, and in other countries with family allowances paid on an ascending scale the amount was considerably less than that, even in countries where the cost of living is on a par with ours. Therefore I say that the people of this country should thank the government for providing this measure rather than find fault with technicalities.

I represent a constituency which has a considerable number of large families and I shall have to answer the question which, as the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville said, has been spread in a farm paper in the province of Quebec in its last issue. Some people try to find fault with every forward movement of this government, but I say that this family allowance movement is a step in the right direction and I stand by it. If this scale of allowance does not work out the way we hope it will, if it does not bring about equality of opportunity, and if the scale of allowances is not proportionate to the cost of providing for a family of more than four children, then it will be time to reconsider the matter.

While I am on my feet I should like to say a word on a question of privilege. On Monday, July 31, the hon. member for Parkdale took me to task for the following words which I had used in the house on July 27, at page 5479 of Hansard:

> It ill becomes anybody in this house, no matter how distinguished his past career, to come in the late hours of his advanced life to use the prestige of his respectability, of his eighty years and his white hair, to cast aspersions on those of a different racial descent from his own.

To this the hon. gentleman objected in the following words, as reported in Hansard, page 5674:

> I should like to refer for a moment to a few of the remarks made by the hon. member for Bellechasse, as reported on page 5479 of Hansard. He made reference to my grey hair. My grey hair did not prevent me from serving three years in the last war as a surgeon overseas.

And the hon. member proceeded to give more details of his work in the field. He did not tell us of what Sir Andrew McPhail calls the "short hours of Doctor Bruce's greatness" in connection with his period of office as inspector general of medical services and director of medical services at headquarters in London.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I rise to a point of order. I do not think we ought to be scattering mud and dirt over the pages of Hansard during this debate. The matter might well rest where it is. I think it was pretty well cleared up, and I do not see much excuse for the hon. member for Bellechasse now attempting to attack the reputation and character of the hon. member for Parkdale. It looks to me to be a little too small, too petty for any hon. member to have a part in at this time. We have gone a long way in this debate; it has been spread out and extended over subjects which I am sure the section was never designed to cover. Surely we have not arrived at the point where we are going to engage in a mud-slinging contest, in which any hon. member who has the last word will perhaps have the best of the argument. I think we ought to call a halt now, because I agree with the hon. member who observed that when this kind of debate has gone on a certain time, parliament will sink to levels from which it will not be able easily to rise. In the interest of all hon. members this ought to be stopped.

Mr. PICARD: Mr. Chairman—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has the floor.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was simply rising to a similar point of order. You ruled me out of order when I was about to deal with a matter which I thought had relevance to the section, and concerning which I was speaking in reply to a previous speaker. I cannot see the relevance of this dispute to the section which is before the committee.

Mr. PICARD: That has nothing to do with it at all. This is a question of privilege, which can be brought up at any moment in a debate; and with the kind permission of the committee I would say that I am not referring to the debate on allowances but to the next sentence in the statement of the hon. member for Parkdale. If I may come to my question of privilege, which I have not yet stated: my own position in the war was attacked by the words of the hon. member for Parkdale, and I want to answer him. Here is the quotation—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): As hon. members realize, we are in committee of the whole house on a particular bill. Questions of privilege should not be brought up in committee of the house; they have to be brought up when the house is sitting, on or before the orders of the day.

Mr. PICARD: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman. But the other day the same question of privilege was brought up by the hon. member for Parkdale and he was allowed to go on. That is why I thought I could go on to-day, but in view of your ruling, I will do so at the next sitting of the house.

Mr. ADAMSON: There is one question I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant, and I think it comes within this clause. He has stated that the cost of this measure will be $200 million. Now Cassidy, in his work on social security and reconstruction in Canada, says that there are according to the 1941 census 3,600,000 children in the country who will be benefited by this act, and, basing his figures on $10 per month, he arrives at the figure of $432 million per annum as the cost of this act. Can the parliamentary assistant explain how the government arrived at the cost of $200 million?

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall be glad to do so. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics took the figures from the 1941 census figures, either from those figures or from the census returns themselves on a test based on a sample of two per cent, arrived at an estimate of the distribution of children aged from birth to sixteen years, and then worked out the reduction which should be made for the children over four in the various groups. On the basis of those calculations, extended up to the first of July, 1945, they arrived at an estimate of the cost of $253,200,000. The last figures, the $3,200,000, are not very significant because of the way in which the estimate was arrived at. The Prime Minister in his opening on the resolution gave the house an estimate of $250 million. That is the estimate of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

Mr. ADAMSON: I believe this matter is of sufficient importance to have the working out of this estimate either tabled or put on record.

Mr. CLAXTON: That has already been done.

Mr. ADAMSON: Has it?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. If my hon. friend will refer to Hansard of July 26 he will find the figures at page 5396.

Mr. LOCKHART: Is there any mention in the calculation made by the bureau of statistics of the cancellation of certain mothers' allowances payments in the provinces? No deduction is made for anything such as that?

Mr. CLAXTON: None at all.

Mr. LOCKHART: This is in addition?

Mr. CLAXTON: Oh, yes. The question of the mothers' allowances which are now paid in eight of the nine provinces is entirely a provincial matter; this is additional. To complete the picture I should refer also to the estimate given by the Prime Minister, that from this total of $253 million should be deducted $50 million to $60 million for duplication of income tax allowances.

Mr. LOCKHART: I want to make it definite in that respect, that in the tabulation made by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics no services rendered by the provinces of any kind, in cash payments to mothers, or otherwise, have been included in arriving at the $253 million.

Mr. CLAXTON: That is correct.

[Mr. Adamson.]

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Chairman, when the parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister was speaking on July 26, page 5398, he stated that he was not able to give certain statistics, that is of family groups in the provinces, because it "would be a very lengthy operation." I have been able to get those figures through the statistical records in the library, and I have them here, if I may be permitted to read them. The population under sixteen years of age by provinces—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. We are now on section 3, which deals with the monthly allowance. I think we had better stay with the section.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I would like the parliamentary secretary to give me an answer in regard to the whole question I raised a while ago. He was prevented from doing so, and I know he is ready now to do so. Possibly that would fit in with what the hon. member for Parkdale has in mind; and then, I submit, the hon. member for Parkdale's figures are of use in connection with the matter which I have raised and upon which I am asking information.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member for Lake Centre asked two questions. One was, had consideration been given to the inclusion in this bill of allowances for children above the age of fifteen in case of their being invalided or otherwise disabled. Consideration was given to that, but it was felt that as the care of such children was now being undertaken by the provinces, whose responsibility is clear under the British North America Act, the provisions of this bill should not be extended. This was a measure for family allowances and aimed to do one specific thing. Moreover, it was desirable, as pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, that the scheme be kept as simple as possible. Therefore that additional group of children over sixteen was not included.

The second question the hon. member for Lake Centre asked was, had any scheme been arrived at for financing this measure? That is made very clear from the provisions of the bill itself. The allowances are to be paid out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, and the moneys necessary are not to be provided by any tax specially earmarked for the purpose. He himself referred to the situation in Australia, where part of the cost of family allowances is raised by tax on payrolls. That is true. In Australia the amount, estimated at two-thirds of the total cost, is raised by a payroll tax on employers of 2½ per cent on all payrolls over £20 per week. I am not too sure that even in Australia that is found a satisfactory way of doing it, but in any event, here it was thought very much fairer and less misleading to have the payment come out of the total tax revenues of the country, borne by all taxpayers, all citizens, in proportion to their payments and carrying out to the fullest possible extent the principle of taxation that payments should be made on the basis of ability to pay.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is comprehensive in its generality, but what I want to find out from the hon. gentleman is this. In order to raise the amount that will be required, has consideration been given as to any increase in taxation that will have to be brought into effect over and above that which was in effect before the war? Naturally the hon. gentleman was not able to give full details, but the fact remains that no matter whether this money comes out of general revenue or out of special tax, it nevertheless will have to be paid through the medium of taxation. What consideration has been given this matter? Apparently very full consideration was given to questions of constitutionality. The hon. gentleman has just said that the reason children over sixteen were not included, children who by reason of invalidism or other condition could not maintain themselves, was that child welfare is a matter of provincial jurisdiction. That indicates that there was some considerable care. The hon. gentleman accepted the explanation that was given by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and he appropriated it as his own. He further said that the reason, as I apprehended what he said, that this bill was in such skeleton form was that it was intended to be so and not to give full details. Mr. Chairman, this particular phase, the expenditure of $250 million, is a very important matter. Whether the money comes out of general revenue or not, whether it is a matter of special tax or not, it must necessarily be raised through the medium of taxation. At the moment I am not complaining about that, but I am asking, what is the plan? Take the situation in 1939, before the war. Taxation was at a certain level. Is it intended that that level shall be returned to or be increased by approximately fifty per cent, as it must be, when this measure is being brought into effect? A matter such as this can scarcely be brushed aside by the general statement that the money is coming out of general revenue. The people have a right to know just what the plan is in so far as this matter is concerned. Skeleton information and skeleton details are insufficient.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member referred to this as a bill which was in skeleton form.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Certainly.

Mr. CLAXTON: He himself seems to have read the acts in force in New Zealand and Australia and, if he has examined them as carefully as he seems to have done, he will admit in all fairness that except in one particular this bill is in greater detail than either of those acts, and that particular is that the recipient of the money, whether it be one parent or the other, is, as was mentioned last night, left to the governor in council. Apart from that, this measure is very detailed and sets out in ample form not only the rights that people will have to allowances but also the actual administrative machinery on which the act will be administered.

With regard to his other question—what is the plan?—his question to me before did not raise the large question of how the budget of Canada for the year beginning April 1, 1945, would be made up, and that is really what he is asking. He cannot expect any member of the government or myself, at this stage, to indicate what the budget of Canada will be or how it will be made up for the period beginning April 1, 1945. But when he says that this measure can be financed only by an addition to income taxation he must admit that he is wrong. The budget of Canada in any ordinary period that we can envisage ahead will take care of this measure and other social security measures of the government and at the same time permit a substantial reduction in taxation. That must be admitted by anyone who looks at the prospects that lie ahead. But to say what the rate of income tax will be this time next year is a matter for the Minister of Finance and the government which will be declared in the budget speech that will be made at the next session.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does that suggest that it is to be taken from income tax—that statement about income tax?

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member should be fair. I have already pointed out that the cost of this is to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund, and he knows that the consolidated revenue fund is made up of all the revenues of the crown. The reason why I mention income tax is that he mentioned it, and he said that this could only be raised by an increase in income tax. He must know that if events move as we hope and expect they will, the government's expenditures on war account will be reduced substantially, beginning, we hope, next year, and it will then be possible to reduce income tax and other taxation and at the same time pay for all social legislation of the government without any great difficulty. He cannot expect the details of that to be disclosed now because we do not know what the state of the war will be. All we can do is to hope and expect that it will be very much farther advanced than it is to-day.

Mr. BRUCE: I shall give these figures as it seems to me they will be useful to the members at this particular time. They are as of June 1, 1941. This is the population under sixteen years by provinces:

Provinces	Population	Per cent
Prince Edward Island..	26,437	0·7
Nova Scotia	208,597	5·7
New Brunswick	161,918	4·4
Quebec	1,258,255	34·0
Ontario	1,118,278	30·0
Manitoba	200,940	5·4
Saskatchewan	232,629	6·0
Alberta	239,375	6·5
British Columbia	269,575	7·0
Total.....	3,716,204

Mr. MacNICOL: Have you the Yukon?

Mr. BRUCE: I have not got the Yukon. Now, children under sixteen years in charitable and benevolent institutions as of June 1, 1941, are as follows:

Province	Orphanages	Homes for adults and children	Children's aid societies	Juvenile immigration societies	Total
Prince Edward Island.....	117	20	129	...	246
Nova Scotia	412	171	1,386	...	1,969

Mr. JACKMAN: In offering one or two criticisms or a request for further information on this section I should like it to be distinctly understood that I am enthusiastically in favour of this measure as a general principle. I think it will do far more good than otherwise. I agree with the quotation used recently by the editor of the Ottawa Journal when he said that we should never let the perfect impede the good. However, the matter of relative wages in Ontario and in Quebec was brought up by my colleague the hon. member for York West. He quoted a figure showing that textile workers in the city of Montreal received $21.41 a week, whereas in the city of Toronto they received $26.40.

Mr. CLAXTON: There are no cotton textile workers in Toronto.

Mr. JACKMAN: Yes, indeed there are textile—

Mr. CLAXTON: Cotton textile workers. You are dealing with two different classes.

[Mr. Claxton.]

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I think we had better stick to the section under discussion, which is the section having to do with monthly allowances.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is correct; but if you will bear with me for a moment I think you will find that I am pretty closely on the section. Certainly there are textile workers; I cannot say whether they are exclusively on cotton or not. There are cotton textile workers in the city of Hamilton, for which I have not the figures at hand, but I think they pretty well bear out the general principle, which is understood by everybody who knows anything whatsoever about industry, that wages are considerably higher in Ontario than in Quebec.

What is feared by some people in regard to these family allowances is that they will tend to crystallize the situation in Quebec, namely, continue the lower wages there which the people in Quebec, the people in Ontario and elsewhere in Canada would like to see raised so that the people in Quebec would have a better standard of living because of what they earn and contribute to industry, and would not compete unfairly with industrial workers in other parts of the country. I understand that in recent years practically the whole cheap furniture business has gone to Quebec, much of it from Ontario, because of the lower wages in the province of Quebec. If these family allowances are to be paid on the rates set forth in the schedule, with which I have no complaint generally, they may nevertheless tend to cause a shift in employment because of certain industries in the lower wage class moving from Ontario to Quebec and thus favouring one province of this great country over another when it comes to employment. Naturally that is something looked at with askance by the people of Ontario, particularly the industrial workers. What is the solution of it? I do not suppose that in a federal state such as Canada we can definitely and clearly rectify the difficulty and make certain that further damage will not be caused by the granting of these family allowances. However, I believe that the government should be cautioned on this point, should be warned, if I may use that expression, that the people in the other sections of Canada will watch to see just what effect these family allowances have on the relative wage scales and the tendency for certain industries to shift to the lower wage scale areas in this country.

The second matter I wish to mention is this. I do not put this forward too seriously in a sense, and yet I think the committee should be apprised of the fact that there is in the minds of many of us, and I hope in the minds of all of us, a very great difference between a man who has earned money being allowed a certain deduction for the maintenance of his children and the man receiving an allowance or what even might be termed a hand-out from the state for the support of his children. In the one case the man has earned the money by the sweat of his brow or the work of his brain in open competition with his fellow Canadians; in the other case the man has not earned the money but is being given it by the state. I see no way of rectifying the situation exactly. One does not ask for greater consideration to be given to children of taxpayers than to children of those who do not pay taxes; yet in this regard I believe it is an integral part of the bill that we should know definitely what the changes in the income tax regulations are to be. What we have been given is the very general statement that a parent will not be allowed to benefit through receiving the income tax deduction or tax credit, as it now is, and certain family allowances. Yet an income tax schedule should be available to all, so that those who receive $1,200 and over, but are not given the full $108 exemption to which a larger income would entitle them, may know exactly what their position is, and so that all may be fairly dealt with. This matter of income tax regulation is just as vital as any other provision in this bill; and while I do not want to use the term "half-baked legislation", it certainly does indicate that the government or the Department of Finance, which is responsible for the income tax act, as yet has not found out exactly how it is to be handled. Otherwise there could be no possible reason why the actual mechanics of it should not be given to the members of this committee, so that we might understand them and be able to answer the many questions which have been addressed to us by our constituents.

The other point is in regard to where the money is to come from. I suppose it is merely going to come from the general pot, but undoubtedly it will prevent certain reductions in taxation which otherwise might have been made. However, we cannot have our cake and eat it at the same time, and we must realize that we are going to pay for these family allowances through taxation. Yet I believe the government should give us a clear indication, perhaps not in percentages but at least in principle, of where the money is to come from; whether it is expected that it will come from income tax directly or from some form of indirect taxation. This statement does not apply only to family allowances; it applies to the whole generality of these appropriation bills which we are putting through the committee at the present time with such abandon. In this committee and this house we have little regard to how much we can raise; we simply go ahead and make our coat with no regard at all to our cloth. We do not know what our total financial requirements are likely to be in the post-war years. This all ties in with a matter which I believe is of first importance; that is, if we are to have full employment after the war we must have incentive for our people. If they are taxed too heavily it means that people will not be given a reasonable reward for the risk and enterprise which they show, and we shall come to the point where the state will be running everything. So that I urge upon the government that they outline to this committee not only where the $200,000,000 or $250,000,000 required for this measure are coming from, but that they give us some idea—it might as well be brought in now as at some later time—where all the money is to come from and approximately what the total budget is likely to be in the year after the war, say, when we shall no longer have direct war expenditures. Otherwise it is impossible to know whether we can with the most complete faith vote for measures which involve hundreds of millions of dollars, without knowing where the money is to come from; whether it will come through a continuance of the printing press methods, or from borrowing from the banks as in the past we have borrowed a certain proportion of our national expenditures.

To give some indication of the lack of information possessed by hon. members in regard to these financial expenditures, as yet we have been given no information whatever with respect to the $848,000,000 which the Minister of Finance announced would be spent on matters of which he could give no details. Perhaps that should be more properly brought up under another bill, but at least it will give hon. members an appreciation of the little or no information we are given by the government in regard to the very important matter of how we are to finance our expenditures or even how we are to spend our money. I would remind hon. members that $848,000,000 is not less than 160 or 170 per cent of the normal pre-war budget; yet we have had only the barest indication that this money will be spent, and we are not told on what it is to be spent. In the same way I believe we should be given full details, at least in principle, as to what our total expenditures will be, so that we may have an over-all picture, before we go at the matter piecemeal, appropriating $200,000,000 here and $200,000,000 there, without knowing whether or not this country can afford to go ahead with these measures.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to refer to just one point asked by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. Several hon. gentlemen on the opposite side have implied that the granting of family allowances is going to have the effect of keeping wages in the province of Quebec at a comparatively lower level than in the province of Ontario. I suppose there is nothing more intricate than an understanding of the factors which enter into the determination of rates of wages; they are in part international, in part national and in part local, and arise from many causes. One thing, however, is apparent or, I believe, has become apparent in recent years, since the prejudice against the organization of labour has begun to disappear and large visioned employers have begun to see the wisdom of such organization. That is, wages have only risen appreciably where labour has been strong enough to organize. In the matter of organization, there is perhaps nothing that enters so effectively to prejudice their position as the obligation the workers have to consider when they are carrying on a struggle to improve their conditions. In a province in which there are small families, where great numbers of those employed are unmarried, it is relatively easy for labour to organize, and, if that should become necessary in order to improve the condition of labour, to strike and refuse to work until wages are more in accordance with the service rendered. But where you have a condition in any part of the country where wages are relatively low and where there are large familes, the wage-earner is confronted with the most difficult situation possible as far as improving his condition is concerned. When he is driven to the point of refusing to work unless he can get better pay he has to consider not himself only, his wife and possibly one child; he has to consider the fate of five, ten or fifteen children, and he finds himself in a position where there is practically no option between allowing some of his family to starve or giving up the struggle to improve his condition altogether.

This allowance to children where there are large families will help remove that impediment. It is going to help place those large families above a bare subsistence level, and often a condition worse than that, because the standard of living frequently degraded because of the small incomes which heads of large families are able to obtain in relation to the obligations they are called upon to meet because of the size of their families. When this law goes into effect the head of a large family will have at least some provision which he can be sure his children will receive if he finds himself driven to that desperate position which labour at one time or another has reached in whole or in part when it has tried to improve its condition, namely, having to choose between starving or working, because that is all what lies at the basis of success or failure in most strikes. I do not for one moment hesitate to say that the effect of this legislation will place those who have large families in a relatively stronger economic position. They will not, because of this legislation, be economically weaker, relatively, than their brothers in other provinces. They will be appreciably stronger than they have been in the past and, as a consequence, will be able to fight for wage standards in their respective provinces comparable with those existing in other provinces. In that way they will help bring about what all hon. members have said is very desirable, and which I personally think most desirable, namely, uniformity of rates of pay for equivalent work in all parts of the dominion. So that my argument is that, far from deploring that this legislation is quite likely to further an inequality in labour rates of pay for all parts of this country, we should view it in entirely the opposite way.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—When and how payable.

Mr. TUSTIN: I believe that certain institutions are to be granted this family bonus?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Institutions do not get it.

Mr. TUSTIN: In many parts of Ontario there are children's aid societies which are maintained by the municipalities and which receive grants from the provincial government. In the community from which I come we do not keep up an institution for these children. Our children are boarded out in private homes which we think gives them a much better chance than they would have in an institution. Will these children receive the allowances when they are under the direction and supervision of families in private homes?

Mr. CLAXTON: Under this bill the allowances are payable to parents with respect to children and to parents who maintain children wholly or in part. The payment is to be made to a parent as defined in the bill and he must maintain the child in order to qualify. Once you have a parent who maintains a child, then he is qualified under the bill. He would receive the allowance and could, I think quite properly, make an arrangement with a boarding school, a child welfare organization or anyone else whereby the child would be boarded and supported. The parent may pay the necessary amount to the institution and still continue to receive benefits under this bill. The allowances to be paid are payable to parents who maintain children.

It is contemplated that in a small number of cases it may be necessary, on the application of a child welfare organization or a provincial or municipal welfare officer, to consider whether or not in the special circumstances of a given case the allowances should not be diverted from the one parent to another or from the parent to a guardian appointed by the court or to some other person. Such other person may conceivably be an agency or organization.

Mr. LOCKHART: Where is that in the bill?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is provided for in section 5 and section 11 (b).

Mr. LOCKHART: Would a child welfare organization get help for an orphan child?

Mr. CLAXTON: I have explained already that if an institution is now supporting a child and there is no parent responsible for the maintenance of that child it would not qualify because it is not a parent maintaining a child, but—

Mr. LOCKHART: Orphan children will not get these allowances?

Mr. CLAXTON: There must be a parent or somebody else responsible for their maintenance. As was pointed out by several hon. members last night, it was expected that the effect of this would be to bring more children into homes. If I may say so, we went over these points at quite considerable length yesterday afternoon. I hope that is clear. The reason why payments are not made to institutions was pointed out by the Minister of Justice and I have nothing to add to what he said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member (Mr. Lockhart) who just spoke left an impression which I think ought to be removed. He left the impression that orphan children are not going to be looked after. That is quite erroneous. As has been pointed out, provision already exists under the constitution whereby, under subsection 7 of section 92 of the British North America Act, an obligation is placed upon the provinces with respect to orphanages. This was brought out earlier in the discussion. Where that particular obligation has been placed and accepted it would be creating a duplication of payments to pay the allowances to an institution which is already carrying out its obligation in accordance with existing legislation.

Mr. TUSTIN: Perhaps I did not make myself clear. As I say, we do not maintain an institution. I would direct the attention of the parliamentary assistant to the fact that many of the children in Ontario being cared for by the children's aid society have parents who are deemed to be not capable of looking after their families. In our particular case we place these children in private homes and the county pays their board. As I said before, the province does make a small gift to the children's aid society. I received a letter to-day asking me about this very point and I should like to get a clear answer. Will any assistance be given to these underprivileged children who are being maintained by the children's aid society in private homes rather than in institutions?

Mr. CLAXTON: It is difficult to give a categorical answer to the hon. member. There are nine provinces and in every province there is a multiplicity of agencies which deal with children. There is a variation in the provincial arrangements and those of the municipalities, and at times there is a variation in the financial arrangements made by a particular institution. As I have said, the bill provides for payment to parents, excluding institutions. Institutions may be defined by regulations under the bill. If there are cases which indicate clearly that it is only right and just and in accordance with the general purpose of this bill that payment should be made, those cases will be taken care of. As I say, it would be difficult to give a categorical answer because that might be taken as indicating a line of policy which might not be susceptible of application in every type of agency.

Mr. TUSTIN: If consideration has not been given to this matter, I trust the government will give some real consideration to it.

Mr. CLAXTON: It has been considered and will be further.

Mr. TUSTIN: It appears to me that this is the class of child that should receive assistance under this bill. He has been removed from his family because the home is not a fit and proper place for him, because his parents are not fit and proper persons to look after him.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): When the time comes to draft the regulations I hope the government will provide that these allowances shall be payable to the mother. She can be depended upon to see to it that the money will be used for the benefit of the children. I have received a letter from one of my constituents for whom I have a very high regard. I should like to read part of this, as follows:

> First, the payments should be made to the mother unless she is dead or is proven to the satisfaction of child welfare authorities to be incapable of using the money properly. The mother is responsible, in spite of a number of asinine laws, for seeing that there is food of adequate quantity and quality on the table. She also is directly responsible for the children's clothing. There are men who would see only a few extra beers in a cheque like that, and there are others who would not mean to use it dishonestly but would spend it on things that looked more necessary. Ask any farmer's wife what the cream cheques and egg money have to buy besides groceries. Let it be understood that these allowances are for the purpose intended, child welfare.

I think the policy advocated by the writer is sound and I hope that it will be followed except in very exceptional cases.

Mr. MacNICOL: Subsection 2 of section 4 refers to the child who fails to attend school. Some children under sixteen in Toronto get permission of the board of education to work in the daytime. There is a regulation that all children must attend school until they are sixteen unless special permission is obtained from the board under certain circumstances to enable the child to work during the daytime, and in that case he must attend school at night. Would that child qualify under this bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where there is a provincial law of the kind, that would be taken into account in administering a measure of this sort. If a province has made certain provisions for children attending night school instead of day school, certainly the administration that was administering this law would take that fact into account in relation to the clause to which my hon. friend referred.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not know that it is a provincial law, but I do know that the board of education permits it under certain conditions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What my hon. friend has mentioned illustrates perhaps better than anything else could, the wisdom of allowing regulations to be made and of not attempting to cover everything by specific enactment at this time. Those who have to do with the administration of the law will look into just such a case as that in order to see that equity is made to prevail.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yesterday I asked about Eskimo and Indian children. Is this the clause under which I can be given an answer as to how they will be taken care of?

Mr. CLAXTON: The clause under which that would come would be clause 8 (2), but I might just as well say now that it is contemplated that if Indians and Eskimos qualify as parents maintaining a child they will be entitled to receive the allowance, but in the case of Indians or Eskimos who are in receipt of other assistance from the government in respect of children, there will be an offset to prevent a duplication of the allowance.

Mr. MacNICOL: The only allowance they receive is five dollars a year, which is a bagatelle.

Mr. CLAXTON: I am informed that the dominion government does give a great deal of other assistance in kind to Indians by way of health assistance, medical assistance and other kinds of assistance, and that does give rise to a question which will have to be considered so as to avoid duplication of assistance in respect of children.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do Eskimos register births?

Mr. CLAXTON: Nobody will receive benefits unless he registers. It will be necessary for any person to register a child in order to qualify for the allowance.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: I suppose that when the regulations are framed they will cover a situation like this, where a child is physically able to attend school but where there are no schools within reach. There are districts like that where there is no school to which the child can go. Will that case be looked after by the regulations?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS: The only comment I wish to make with regard to this bill can be most appropriately made under this clause. I personally am concerned that we give recognition to the people whom next to the children we have uppermost in our minds. It is in recognition of the greatest financier that I have ever known, my sainted mother, that I rise in my place at this time and recall the sacrifices that she made, her industry and the heartaches that she had when I was a boy. I think of the hundreds of mothers, legitimate and others, who have consulted me in my professional capacity during the last twenty years. I am most concerned that this money which is to go to help children shall in very truth and fact go to those who are most anxiously concerned to help children—the mothers of those children. I would feel much happier if it were embodied right in this bill that parliament says that the money shall in the first instance go to the mother of the children, and only to others when it is established by proper authority that the mother is not a fit and proper person to receive the money wherewith to take care of her children. I feel keenly and strongly on that phase of the matter, and I know that many other members of this house and literally thousands of people outside are most anxious and concerned lest the benefits of this legislation be lost by reason of the fact that this government will make it possible for these funds to be diverted by officials or others from what I believe to be and what I believe humanity believes to be the proper and appropriate recipient of the money, the one who cares most for the weal, welfare and happiness of those whom this measure is designed to help—little children.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is a question bearing on this section that I would ask, but before doing so may I say how glad I was to hear the opinion just expressed by the hon. member for Calgary West. I trust that he will support me when I move an amendment to section 11 (a), which I indicated last night that I would propose when we reached that clause.

My question on section 4 is this: Will the allowance be paid at the beginning or at the end of the month for which the payment is being made? I have a reason for asking this question. Personally I feel that the provisions of section 4 are generally quite good, but from our experience with the old age pension measure we know that one unhappy situation arises. A person who qualifies for the old age pension had his seventieth birthday, we will say, the second day of January. Because of the wording of the Old Age Pensions Act he does not draw his first old age pension cheque until the last day of February. There is a lapse of almost two months from the date that he qualifies before he receives his first cheque. That may not seem very much to some people, but it is a source of a good deal of disappointment and feeling to those who are affected. I have run into quite a few cases of that kind. As I see it, the wording of this section will produce the same result if the payment is made at the end of the month. On the other hand, if payment is made on the first day of the month for which the payment is specified, there would not be that two months' lapse.

Let me point to another type of case. Supposing the child is born about the twenty-eighth of the month; the father is excited; it is the first time it has happened, and he neglects to register until the first or second of the next month; then the payment is not made until the end of the following month. It is a pretty long lapse of time between the birth of the child and the receipt of the first cheque. I wonder whether the parliamentary assistant could answer me on that point.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have a statement before me which I think answers my hon. friend. The allowances are payable month by month, and changes in the rate of allowance are similarly to be made month by month, so that broken periods of less than a month will not be included. This is for administrative purposes, and by and large will work out fairly, as children will continue to be eligible until the end of the month, just as they will cease to be eligible at the end of the month.

Mr. KNOWLES: I understand that all right, but the question still remains, are the payments for the month, that is for the full month, made in advance or in arrears?

Mr. CLAXTON: It is contemplated that the payment will be made the first or as near the first of each month as possible. The payment for that month will be made on the first of the month or as near the first of the month as is possible, exactly in the same way as in the way of dependents' allowances; so that payments will not be made in arrears, they will be made in advance.

Mr. KNOWLES: In other words, it is different from old age pensions in that respect. I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. HOWDEN: The trend of the debate lately has made me wonder whether there are adequate safeguards in this bill to ensure the proper maintenance of the children after the allowances are paid. If I may say so, being a medical man I have been in many homes in my life, and I do not think that in every case one can depend on the children being properly maintained unless there is supervision of some kind to see that they are. I can even conceive of a family saving the money and letting the children go wanting to a certain extent. It seems to me there should be adequate safeguards, whether in the bill or somewhere else, which would ensure the proper maintenance of the children as a result of government expenditure on these allowances.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member will, of course, share with all of us the view that the best safeguard for the great majority of cases is the desire of the parent to look after the well-being of the child.

Mr. HOWDEN: That is not entirely dependable in all cases, I am sorry to say.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member is concerned now with a minority, and it is a small minority of cases where the parent does not look after the child properly. This bill has two provisions which expressly deal with that. There is the provision in section 5, under which it is declared:

> 5. The allowance shall be applied by the person receiving the same exclusively towards the maintenance, care, training, education and advancement of the child, and, if the minister or such officer as is authorized by regulations in that behalf is satisfied that the allowance is not being so applied, payment thereof shall be discontinued or made to some other person or agency.

In this, I may say, the bill provides along lines similar to section 20 of the Australian act and section 29 of the New Zealand act. In addition there is this provision in section 11:

> 11. The governor in council may make regulations to . . .
> (b) provide that where, by reason of age, infirmity, ill health, insanity, improvidence or other reasonable cause of disqualification of the person to whom the allowance is payable or in other special circumstances, payment may be made to another suitable person or agency.

There, provision is made for diversion, and I should say, further, that it is contemplated that in the administration of these provisions the provincial child welfare agencies and child welfare officers will play a very big part in drawing to the attention of the family allowance administration any case where there may be either a withholding or a diversion. As I think hon. members know, in every province to-day there is a child welfare act, a child protection act or some other similar legislation. In every province to-day there is a fairly extensive system of administration of these acts. That system is being constantly added to and improved, and it is hoped that this measure will support that improvement so that there will be a very close cooperation between voluntary agencies, provincial agencies and the federal government. The cases which the hon. member has in mind are dealt with in the ways I have mentioned.

Mr. HOWDEN: Will there be any provision for connection between the child welfare organizations under the sections of this bill?

Mr. CLAXTON: There is provision for the working out of close cooperation between the dominion government and the provinces.

Mr. DORION: I understand that these allowances will be paid monthly. There are cases, in some remote areas where children live far from schools, where during a few winter months they are unable to attend school. Will a child in this situation lose the allowance for one, two or three months during which he will be unable to attend school?

Mr. CLAXTON: The Prime Minister has already indicated that, in the administration of the condition that the allowance will be paid while the child continues to attend school, close regard will certainly be had to the provincial laws and provisions regarding education, so that if they cover the case of my hon. friend, one can certainly assume that a federal government will not expect a higher standard than a province does, or that it will not fail to take care of the exceptional case if the province does. But even if the province does not make provision for a very unusual case I should certainly think that should be covered in regulations, so that if it is impossible for anything to be done in order to qualify, a person should not be penalized for not performing the impossible.

Mr. ADAMSON: Last evening the Minister of Justice in answering a question of mine, said that a child in an institution could be adopted—and it is provided for in the bill, in section 2—and thereby receive the benefits of this measure. I bring this up as a matter of clarification of answers given to the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox. Can a child—an orphan or a child in an institution—be adopted only by a male parent, or what are the rules of adoption? Can it be adopted by a woman? What are the regulations in this regard. I think this is quite important, because quite a number of children will be affected.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The laws with respect to adoption are determined by the provinces respectively, and they differ in the several provinces. In my own province, under the laws that exist, a child whose father is living cannot be adopted by some other person even though the father may be consenting. It is looked upon as a matter of public interest that the father of the child should not renounce his quality and the paternal authority which goes with it.

Mr. ADAMSON: The blood line takes precedence over everything?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It does. There are other provinces where, I understand, the system is different. I am not in a position to tell the hon. member what are the legislative provisions in that regard in each of the several provinces. In my province, if there is no obstacle to adoption, the adoption can be made by a female as well as by a male person. There are restrictions with respect to difference in age. An adult male can only adopt a female who is younger than himself by a certain number of years. There are such provisions established by the legislatures of the several provinces. But here the relationship required to be classified as parent under this bill would not necessarily be a full legal adoption relationship according to provincial law.

Mr. ADAMSON: That is the question I want to get at.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The bill provides that the regulations may recognize as parent one who would not have the full legal status of adoptive parent under provincial legislation.

Mr. ADAMSON: In the case I brought up the other night one in loco parentis would qualify under the bill.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It would be possible for the regulations to recognize that kind of relationship, and as a matter of fact the hon. member knows that under the regulations dealing with dependents' allowances de facto situation, whenever they have attained a degree of permanency that shows they were not arranged for the purpose of getting the benefit of the regulations, have been recognized.

Mr. JACKMAN: While there will be a multitude of cases which vary slightly in points, I would ask the parliamentary assistant what would happen under this set of circumstances. In Toronto we have a children's aid society and they have in their custody certain children either because their own parents have not looked after them well or for some other reason. At all events, they have come into the custody of that organization. The feeling is that children are not best looked after in an institution and are given out to inspected, approved homes and so much is paid per month for each child. Two young boys of twelve years of age in my riding are looked after in that way. Who would occupy the position of parent in that case? Would these children be subject to family allowances? The definition of "parent" purposely excludes an institution. It may be that these children are technically in the custody of an institution and are, therefore, not eligible to receive the money. I agree with the Prime Minister that we cannot cover everything in the bill and we cannot discuss all possible cases here. But the experience of many of us with those in the various departments who frame regulations is not always satisfactory, and if the income tax division has anything whatsoever to do with this I can positively assure the Prime Minister that the regulations will be drawn against the subject and in favour of the crown in order that they may have ease of administration.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member for Rosedale has asked a question which I think is similar to one asked by his colleague, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox. The answer was that institutions are not to receive the allowances in the first instance, but if the case as described by the hon. gentleman is a case where payment ought to be made, then there is a provision in the bill for regulations to be adopted under section 11 (b) which declares that the governor in council may:

> provide that where, by reason of age, infirmity, ill health, insanity, improvidence or other reasonable cause of disqualification of the person to whom the allowance is payable or in other special circumstances, payment may be made to another suitable person or agency.

The word "agency" there contemplates some such agency as the hon. member mentions, so that if the case to which he refers is one where payment should be made, provision can be made for meeting it. But it is not possible to describe such cases in detail in the bill because there are nine provinces and there is a great multiplicity of types of agencies and arrangements throughout Canada that cannot be dealt with in detail in the bill.

Mr. JACKMAN: The spirit of the bill is that every child not maintained in an institution shall be the subject of family allowances.

Is that the general principle? If the child is actually in an institution someone on its behalf receives the allowance.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

On section 8—Avoidance of duplication in allowances.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wish to make a few comments on both subsections of this section. In regard to subsection 1, I feel, as I stated when I spoke on the second reading, that there is an inconsistency between section 8 (1) and section 7. Section 7 provides that these allowances shall not be subject to taxation, but subsection 1 of section 8 provides that there may be an off-set against an allowance under the Income War Tax Act, which means in effect that it is taken back in the higher income groups. I do not complain against the taking back or the withholding of the allowance from those in the higher income brackets, but I still feel, as I said before, that further consideration should be given to the whole question of relating this family allowance scheme to the income tax structure, which I feel is wrong. I was glad to hear the parliamentary assistant say last night that this is a phase of the question on which the officials are still doing a great deal of study. I hope their study will not be confined to the various ways of working things out within the provisions of section 8, but that they will give consideration to divorcing the payment of allowances from the income tax structure altogether. That structure is not sacrosanct. It is something of a hodge-podge in the way it has grown up. Certainly it is likely to undergo changes in the post-war years, and the family allowance scheme should stand on its own feet, with a view to its inclusion later in an over-all social security plan. I suggest that the same purpose that is sought by section 8 (1) can be achieved by setting a ceiling on incomes above which the allowance is not paid, a ceiling for the father and mother, plus a certain amount for each child. In other words, let there be a relation between family allowances and the incomes of the people of the country. But that is totally different from tying it in with the income tax structure as it stands at present. I will not press the point further at this time, particularly in view of the statement the parliamentary assistant made last night that the whole question has to be studied further. I anticipate with pleasure that there will be an amending bill next year.

I am deeply worried about some phases of subsection 2 of section 8. I wish to emphasize again what I regard as the basic principle of this whole bill, namely, an endeavour to improve the lot of Canadian children. Despite what I thought I heard the parliamentary assistant say a few minutes ago as to the family allowance being an addition to payments made by provincial governments, as I read subsection 2 of section 8 it makes it very clear that the governor in council may withhold—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt my hon. friend. I think I know what he is coming to. I have in my hand an amendment I intended to move when this section was reached, to subsection 2 of section 8 which strikes out the words "in any province" in the fourth and fifth line thereof. I mention it now because it may anticipate the point the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am glad to hear that. It does take care of a good many cases I was going to mention.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is the amendment that I intended to ask my colleague to move. If my hon. friend will allow me I shall have it submitted to the committee at once. I shall ask my colleague the Minister of Justice to move that subsection 2 of section 8 be amended by deleting from line 5 thereof the words "or any province". The intention, of course, is for the government to leave it for the provinces themselves to decide what they wish to do with respect to any of the social services they are maintaining at the present time, such as mothers' allowances. It will be for the provinces to decide in the light of this legislation.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I so move.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I speak to the amendment, Mr. Chairman. I am glad that the Prime Minister has proposed this change. As he said, it anticipates some of the points I was going to raise, namely, such benefits as mothers' allowances, compensation payments that are made in cases of accident, which at times are based on the number of children in a worker's family, et cetera. As the subsection read, it would have meant that people receiving these payments would not be entitled to this additional benefit.

I am afraid that there are still some classes not covered; for example, persons receiving payments under the Pension Act will be entitled to the family allowances. Am I right in that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If they are otherwise entitled, yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes; that is understood. The distinction I wish to point out now is that some widows are receiving special allowances from the war veterans' allowance board as provided by a special vote last year; and in cases where these widows have children they are receiving an additional amount per month per child if the child is under a certain age. But they would be denied these additional allowances by the wording of the subsection as it now stands. I suggest that it is unfair to those children. It may be an oversight. As a matter of fact there may not be a great many of them. In many cases widows of veterans of the last war have no young children, but I had a case of a widow of a soldier of the last war that came to my desk yesterday. As a matter of fact she herself has died and has left two young children. The married sister who is going to look after them will receive an allowance of $40 a month for a period of a year, beyond which no settlement has yet been made. But suppose the mother were still living. She is not under the Pension Act; she is under the War Veterans' Allowance Act, and there will be other cases like that where children are receiving payments from the government of Canada not under the provisions excepted here; they would be denied this additional payment, which would be most unfair. Perchance this is an oversight.

Mr. CLAXTON: There are a number of measures under which payments are made with respect to children and the circumstances of each of those measures differ. All that this subsection does is to give the governor in council power by regulation to prevent the duplication of allowances in respect of the same children. If in the case mentioned by my hon. friend the allowance where one which was only payable on proof of need, which I think it is, then it might so happen that the need would not exist in view of the family allowance that would be payable under this measure, or it might happen that the need would be very much less, so that the allowance which is only payable on proof of need should be reduced if duplication of allowance is to be avoided. It is to avoid such cases that the governor in council is given power under this subsection to act. I might tell my hon. friend, however, that I think there are quite a number of other cases that he might mention. Each one of those will have to be carefully examined to see the exact terms on which the allowance is made, how many people are affected and so on. That would be a lengthy operation.

Mr. KNOWLES: If I may say so, I think the government is introducing into this subsection a principle which ought not to be there. The only limitation on those people receiving the family allowances should be the limitation on everybody, namely, the limitation imposed either by the income tax tie-up that you have now, or by the ceiling suggestion that I made a moment ago. To pick out these particular children, such as the children of people receiving war veterans' allowances and of widows of soldiers of the last war and hundreds of other cases that my hon. friend mentioned, and establish for them a lower ceiling on their income than is the case with other people is not fair. The fact that they would be receiving two cheques from the government is immaterial. Our interest here is in doing the best we can to provide for the children, and I hope that the parliamentary assistant will see that it is looked into further during the study that is yet to be given to various details.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CLAXTON: I might give my hon. friend the assurance that I am sure the government will consider the classification that he mentioned, and all others. It is to permit of that consideration that this subsection is inserted.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have only one word to say with regard to section 8. The Prime Minister will recall that during the debate on second reading I urged the government that instead of waiting until July 1, 1945, these allowances should be paid at once to the children of those in the armed services; that the children of those coming under the Pension Act, and also the children of those who belong to the naval, military or air forces of Canada, should receive these allowances before July 1, 1945. I offered that suggestion because, as I see it, these children, and particularly those of members of the armed forces, are in a particular category. They are now in receipt of dependents' allowance, and this would be only a matter of increasing the cheques they are already getting. If they do not come under this legislation until July 1, 1945, I am afraid they may be placed at a little disadvantage, because one cannot know whether or not the war will be drawing to a close at that time, or what the military situation will be. This is one class of children in Canada who are already recorded, and I believe the government might very well consider paying them the amount of these allowances now. The constitutionality of this legislation, or any other objections that may arise from time to time with respect to its details, need not enter into the matter with respect to soldiers' dependents because, if I am not mistaken, the dependents' allowance is paid by order in council under the War Measures Act. That being so, these additional payments could be made without difficulty, and it would be a very acceptable gesture on the part of this government and this parliament to those whose fathers or mothers are serving in the forces at the present time. Has the Prime Minister given any consideration to the plea I made at that time, and what might stand in the way of these payments being made now to the dependents of those in the armed forces?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend really is suggesting that there should be family allowances for soldiers at the present time; as I understand it, that is what his suggestion comes down to.

Mr. GRAYDON: Or an increase in the dependents' allowances.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The suggestion is that allowances to children of those in the armed forces should be increased. If this legislation had not been introduced at all and the children of those in the armed forces had not been receiving the consideration they should have received, I believe an amendment would have had to be made to the dependents' allowance act or to the Pension Act to meet that situation. I do not think it would be right to attempt, in any way, to anticipate payments that may be made under this legislation until it is actually in force. Among other reasons, I would mention that provision will have to be made in the estimates of next year to meet the requirements of this measure. The budget will have to take this legislation into account, and I do not think it would be proper for hon. members of this parliament to take any steps that obviously would belong more properly to those who may be in this house at a subsequent session. I should say that would be the view of members of the administration. My hon. friend will recall also that this session we have been considering anew the position of members of the armed forces. There are gratuities to be paid and other matters which the government has been considering but which have not yet come before this house. Until the full extent of what the government is proposing is very clear in the minds of hon. members, I do not think it would be advisable to make any further commitments.

Section as amended agreed to.

[Mr. Graydon.]

On section 9—Powers of minister.

Mr. COLDWELL: I hope great care will be taken to see that people who are trained in public service welfare work will be appointed to these committees. I believe to some extent it would defeat the benefits of the measure if there were too much of the Paul Pry about the committees. Every care should be exercised to see that people really qualified for this type of work are appointed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree entirely.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will they be appointed by the civil service commission?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should not think so; not the committees.

Mr. MacNICOL: No; I mean the 1,600 employees who were mentioned last night by the parliamentary assistant as the number who will probably compose the staff.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The permanent staff will be appointed by the civil service commission. I thought my hon. friend was referring to the committees. We might want him on one of the committees, but the civil service commission might not appoint him.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Cooperation of provinces.

Mr. GRAYDON: This section appears to anticipate some arrangements which will be made between this government and the provincial governments. Would the Prime Minister indicate to the committee why there was no consultation with the provinces before this legislation was brought down? That question has been raised a number of times. I was just wondering what was the real reason for the failure of this government to consult the provinces before bringing down this legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was no failure. The government was anxious to get the legislation down this session; it came completely within the jurisdiction of this parliament, and we saw no necessity for communicating with the provinces in regard to the legislation itself. When it comes to the administration of the measure, of course, we shall hope for the cooperation of the provinces. There was no intention of overlooking the provinces, or to do other than simply to carry out as speedily as might be possible the programme of legislation set forth in the speech from the throne.

Mr. GRAYDON: What sort of transactions with the provincial governments does the government anticipate will be necessary in order to carry out this legislation?

Mr. CLAXTON: We hope a number of arrangements may be made with the provinces. In the first place they keep the vital statistics of their population, the records of births, marriages and deaths. They have already cooperated very fully with the dominion government in making those records available in connection with dependents' allowances, pensions and the like. It is hoped that arrangements may be made under which those records will become available in this regard also, and that there will be cooperation between dominion and provincial officers in connection with them. The hon. member for Rosedale and the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox mentioned one class of agency to-day. There are a number of such agencies, and different kinds of agencies, that exist in the various provinces and municipalities right across Canada. They all have arrangements with the provinces or municipalities and it will be necessary to see how they should be fitted in, if at all, with this measure.

In the third place, as I said before, the provinces all have child protection acts and other similar legislation, and most of them have child welfare officers. In addition there are a great number of children's aid societies and child welfare organizations. It is hoped that there will be complete avoidance of overlapping and duplication, complete avoidance of that Paul Pry attitude which the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party mentioned. It is hoped that there will be genuine cooperation between all agencies, not only to make this legislation work but to make it work in the interests of the children and for their maintenance, education and care. It is the view of the government that this legislation will free the provinces and municipalities of some of the responsibilities that they have with regard to certain families, and that they will use the money saved in one way to extend their services in another so as to make one great cooperative enterprise for the better maintenance, care and education of the people of Canada.

Mr. LOCKHART: Before the old age pension legislation became effective, was a conference held with the provinces in order to work out some of the details of administration?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There were certain obligations imposed on the provinces by that legislation and it was therefore necessary to have a conference in the first instance.

Mr. LOCKHART: There were conferences held before that legislation was definitely put into effect?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There were conferences or meetings because of the financial obligations that the provinces had to assume. Under this measure there are no financial obligations being imposed on the provinces.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Were any representations received from the provinces with regard to this bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not aware of any.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Regulations and penalties.

Mr. KNOWLES: At this point I should like to move the amendment which I suggested last night that I would move when we reached this section. As I indicated at that time, and as other hon. members have indicated since, there is a feeling in many quarters that we should be more specific about our desire to have these payments made to the mother wherever possible. I need not go into the argument again, but I have an amendment to section 11 (a) which I move, seconded by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright):

That section 11 (a) of Bill No. 161 be amended by striking out all the words after the word "generally" in line 8 and substituting the following words therefor:

"that payment shall be made to the mother, stepmother, adoptive mother or foster mother, without limiting the right of the governor in council to provide in respect of any province or any class of cases that payment shall be made to the parent prescribed in the regulations."

As I indicated last night that does not put it in any iron-clad form; it would still be within the power of the governor in council to prescribe that in any province or for any class of case the payment shall be made to the father or any other parent provided for in the regulations. But this puts the mother or the person taking the place of the mother first in the language of this governing section and I consider that that is desirable when we consider the purpose of the bill now before us.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When we were discussing section 2 the hon. member brought up the matter which he now has brought up, and at that time we discussed the wisdom or the reverse of altering the sections as they now stand. The committee decided at the time that section 2 (f) which defines "parent" should remain as it appears in the bill. Under those circumstances I believe this particular section, which is related to the one I have referred to, should be allowed to remain as it is. If it is not, it will change the phraseology of the bill in a manner which would not, I think, accord with proper drafting.

As I have mentioned, there is nothing in the bill which, in any way, will preclude payment from being made to mothers rather than to fathers. I have indicated that, speaking generally, the administration favours payments being made to mothers. Reference has just been made to the wisdom of holding a conference with the provinces. This is one of the matters on which the government would wish to confer with the different provinces before finally arriving at a definite decision. It may be that all the provinces will wish to have the payments made in that way, or it may be that some will wish to have it that way and others may not. We want, if possible, to be perfectly sure that the wishes of the provinces in this regard as well as the wishes of the dominion are met. I think it will make for greater harmony in administration to confer first with the provinces on the matter before making a change in the bill or changing the procedure in a manner which might not be found to be the most satisfactory.

Mr. COLDWELL: The Prime Minister's first point was that in the discussion last night it was decided that the phraseology of section 2 (f) should be allowed to remain. As I remember the discussion last evening, it was that it did not matter just how the order of parentage or guardianship appeared in 2 (f), because the provinces and dominion could vary the form of payment as required. I see no conflict between what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre now proposes and the language of section 2 (f). If there is a conflict, then it would seem that the argument advanced by the Prime Minister last evening was not altogether valid in regard to this section. My reasons for supporting the amendment briefly are that I think, while consultation may be had with the provinces as to the parents that should receive these payments, the bill should specify the preference. I believe that from every point of view the preference should be the mother.

The mother is the housekeeper; she has to provide food and she looks after the clothing of the children. This bill is a children's bill and it should be considered primarily from the point of view of the child. That being the case, I think it should state in the language suggested by my hon. friend that payment should be made to the mother except where the province desires that it should be made to another parent or to some other person. I think we should follow the precedents that have been set in other countries where they have legislation of this description. I am strongly in favour of specifying that the payments should be made to the mother except where a province has a code of civil law or preference for payment to the father.

Mr. MITCHELL: Might not a case arise where the father was better able to protect the children than the mother?

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, yes; there are cases where the father is better able to protect the children than the mother, but in the majority of families it is the mother who spends the money to feed and clothe the children. I would rather that the exception cover payments to the father than leave the matter open as it is now. After all, I think the parliament which appropriates the necessary funds, in this case the parliament of Canada, ought to take the responsibility of laying down certain conditions in the payment of such funds as we appropriate. I feel that we would be doing the right and proper thing to specify the mother as the person who shall receive the payment on behalf of the children.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not want to be misunderstood. I am strongly in agreement with what my hon. friend says about the mother, but I wish to say something in defence of the father. All the angels are not on the mother's side, and it may be that in certain cases the money should be paid to the father. It may be only in isolated cases, but some leeway should be given in the matter.

Mr. COLDWELL: The amendment makes it clear that it shall be paid to the mother, stepmother, adoptive mother or foster mother, without limiting the right of the governor in council to provide in respect of any province or any class of cases that payment shall be made to the parent prescribed in the regulations.

Mr. McLARTY: Is the clause not perfectly clear as it stands?

Mr. COLDWELL: No, I do not think it is.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: Is it contemplated that payment will be made to the mother throughout the whole province or to the father throughout the whole province, that it will not be a matter of individual choice in each case but shall be decided after consultation by the dominion with the provinces?

Mr. COLDWELL: We are not suggesting that.

Mr. KNOWLES: I preserve in my amendment the language of the original clause. The original clause left it to the governor in council to provide generally or in respect of any province or any class of cases to which parent payment should be made. My amendment, using that same language, leaves power to the governor in council to specify some other parent than the mother where the governor in council wishes to do so. The only difference is that my amendment makes the mother the first choice. If I may say so to the Minister of Labour, in reply to his defence of the father, he made a perfectly valid defence, but the same defence can be made for the mother.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have already made it for the mother. My hon. friend must not put me in a false position.

Mr. KNOWLES: The clause as it stands does not specify to which parent the payment shall go. But section 2 (f) names father, stepfather, adoptive father and foster father before it mentions mother. That puts the emphasis on the father as though the mother was not to be depended upon. It works both ways so far as that argument is concerned. I contend from the experience of other countries and from the desire of the members generally that the money should go to the mother, and from the rumours that are around that it probably will go to the mother in the greater portion of the country, I contend that this is a very reasonable amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I draw the attention of the committee to this fact, that the clause as it stands does not say that the money shall be paid to the father, and it does not say it shall be paid to the mother. It says that it shall be paid to the parent that may be decided upon as a result of the regulations which may be made. It is contemplated that in determining to which parent, the father or the mother, it would be preferable to make the payment, those who will have to do with the administration of the measure will discuss the question with the different provinces, with those officials who will be interested in the furthering of child welfare and who have to do with the social legislation of the provinces. I think it is preferable to leave the clause as it stands for that reason, and that before making mandatory the payment of the money to the father or to the mother this House of Commons should have the benefit of the results of conferences that will take place between the dominion officials and provincial officials on this very matter. It is not as though this bill were to go into force before there will be another session of parliament. What will take place before another session of parliament will be that the Department of National Health and Welfare will have been established and the officials who will administer this measure will have been appointed and will have had an opportunity of having conferences with those most concerned with child welfare, and the government of the day will then be in a position to inform the next House of Commons what regulations they regard as most helpful. I say that it is in every way desirable that the matter should first be discussed between the provincial and dominion officials before a final decision is reached.

I want to make it perfectly clear that there is nothing in this legislation as it stands which says that the payment must be made to the father or that it must be made to the mother. It says that the the payment shall be made to the parent, and the parent will be decided upon as the result of conferences which will help to determine what may be advisable in this matter.

Let me add that in deciding upon the parent it does not follow that the decision will be to make the payment either to the father or to the mother from one end of Canada to the other. There will be an effort to have the payment made to the parent in those communities and localities and provinces which desire that payment should be made to the mother, or to the father, as the case may be. I suggest that in legislation as important as this, the less complicated it is made until the whole machinery is set up the more helpful it will be in the administration of the legislation.

Mr. KNOWLES: But this parliament ought to express its preference on this point.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I think I made my position quite clear on this matter when I spoke previously. I am without a shadow of a doubt in favour of the mother being stipulated in the bill as the person who should be responsible for receiving the cheque and spending it on the children's welfare. In what the Prime Minister has just now said I would feel more assured if I thought the people of each province would have an opportunity of deciding this issue through their chosen representatives in the provincial legislature, but I do not feel so much assured if the decision is to be arrived at merely by departmental officials of the federal and provincial governments. If the people of the provinces might decide the matter I would feel more assured about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It must be obvious that whatever government may be administering this measure—and I say "whatever government" because no one knows what government may be occupying the treasury seats before this measure goes into force—will seek to do what the people of Canada wish it to do and what the people of each province may want it to do with respect to this matter. That ought to be sufficient assurance that there is no desire to do other than to make the measure as helpful and as workable as possible when the time comes for putting its provisions into force.

Amendment (Mr. Knowles) negatived: yeas, 15; nays, 72.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: May I make my position clear, Mr. Chairman. It is not that I do not trust the mothers to spend the money just as well as the fathers, but that I do trust the fathers as much as I do the mothers in this case.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I would trust the mother more than anyone else.

Mr. GREEN: Before the section carries—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I just called a paragraph. I believe it is the intention of the committee to follow the different paragraphs of section 11. We are now on paragraph (a). Shall paragraph (a) carry?

Paragraph (a) agreed to.

Paragraph (b) agreed to.

On section 11, paragraph (c).

Mr. GILLIS: Would the Prime Minister or the parliamentary assistant indicate what is meant by the setting up of the tribunal? I am concerned about this tribunal, because the real test of the legislation is going to be in the administration. You may have pretty rotten legislation and if you have a sensible and reasonable administration they can do a fairly good job with it; or you may have good legislation and mess it all up with incompetent administrators.

Under section 6—and this particular paragraph has reference to section 6—the proposal is to set up a tribunal which will decide any question that may be at issue under the regulations if and when they are drafted. I should like to have some idea of what the Prime Minister has in mind by way of a tribunal which in the final analysis will have the determination of all matters pertaining to this bill and the regulations. What will be the composition of this tribunal?

Mr. CLAXTON: As the hon. member for Cape Breton South indicates, this power given to the governor in council to make regulations has relation to section 6 of the bill, which reads:

6. If any person is dissatisfied with a decision as to his right to be paid an allowance or as to the amount of an allowance payable to him or as to any other matter arising under this act, he may appeal against such decision to a tribunal to be established and conducted in accordance with regulations, and the decision of the tribunal shall not be subject to appeal or review by any court of law.

As a matter of administration it will be necessary to decide in some cases whether or not the child is the age his parent claims, whether or not the child has been resident in Canada for three years or was born in Canada, whether or not the child is a child in respect of whom the allowance may be made. Also it may be necessary to decide whether or not the parent is maintaining the child wholly or substantially, and sometimes even which parent is maintaining the child. All these matters will have to be decided as matters of administration, and it was not thought fair that such important matters should be left exclusively to be decided by administrative officials. Consequently provision was made for an appeal, and the word "tribunal" was used, although what was intended was something more in the nature of a committee. As I understand it, it is under contemplation that committees will be established in each province, probably of an honorary nature or at least not of a permanent nature, and not of a purely judicial nature, but committees of people who, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar suggested, would be experienced in welfare matters, and they would have these cases submitted to them for decision, in much the same way as the local committee of the dependents' board of trustees act with respect to the claims for allowances made under that measure. In other words, there would be an appeal from the purely administrative official to a committee of citizens who would be chosen because of their interest in public questions and their knowledge of public welfare matters, who could be trusted to be fair and to make each decision in the light of all the circumstances of the particular case.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What would be the position of this tribunal provided that, under the child welfare laws in any one province, a declaration had been made as to the custody of a child, and yet the dominion tribunal set up under this measure were to decide that the payments should not go to the individual declared under provincial legislation or authority to have the lawful custody of that child? The greater part of this section has been passed, and I realize that no amount of objection may alter the attitude of the government. But I desire to record my protest against almost the entire section, with the exception of paragraphs (e) and (f), for in my opinion it constitutes an abdication on the part of parliament of its rights to legislate in regard to such important matters as child welfare and allowances. I know of no bill which has been brought before parliament affecting the rights of individuals which goes as far as does this section in general in permitting persons removed from the courts to determine the rights of other individuals, and I would ask that this section as a whole be held in abeyance so that it can be redrafted and full details given to parliament with regard to the operation of this measure, in order that parliament and the people in the country as a whole may realize how these powers are going to be used.

It strikes me as passing strange that the Prime Minister, who always averred in times of peace the necessity of there being control over administrative bodies, should bring before this parliament a bill which provides no recourse to the courts, even though tribunals not responsible to the people—and there can be no responsibility to the people where there is no recourse to the courts—have the right to determine the disposition of the moneys which will be in the control of the department under this measure. Looking at these provisions one finds that there is being handed to administrative bodies rights over individuals which, if they are implemented, must entrench in large measure on provincial jurisdiction with respect to children and property and civil rights. Surely we should have the right to know how this measure is to be implemented, what controls there are to be, to the end that caprice shall not be permitted to guide in any way the actions of an administrative body, and caprice inevitably does enter into the decisions of administrative bodies which have the power to determine the rights of individuals when there is no provision of recourse to the courts.

As I asked at the beginning, what would be the situation where in any province a decision is made by the courts determining the custody of a child, and an administrative tribunal under this measure has refused to grant to that individual the rights given by a provincial court with respect to custody?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I just want to say to my hon. friend that from an administrative point of view it would be hopeless to allow appeals to the courts in a multitude of small cases which in the nature of things should be decided administratively. There is even greater justification for excluding references to the courts here than in the case of workmen's compensation allowances, pensions under the Pension Act, dependents' allowances for the dependents of members of the armed forces and other similar payments.

There is no more justification for allowing appeals to the courts in this case than in these others. As my hon. friend knows, in a measure of this kind it would make confusion worse confounded to have that particular procedure adopted. But there is a further fact to be considered. The moneys paid under this bill are in the nature of grants. There is no contractual relationship being established. If there were there might be reasons for appeal to the courts; there might be reasons for having the courts interpret and decide. If my hon. friend wishes to introduce the courts into this legislation, I am afraid he will be only helping to make it anything but agreeable in the eyes of those who may hope to benefit by it, and until it is shown that decisions by a tribunal under this measure would not be as fair as decisions under tribunals such as are established in the case of workmen's compensation and dependents' allowances, we can afford to leave the question of appeal to the courts where it has been left in the bill.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In reply to the Prime Minister, may I say that the argument I have advanced has repeatedly been advanced by the Canadian Bar Association and, I may add, during the period when the Minister of Justice was president of that association. I do not believe there should be appeal on questions of fact, but I believe, when a decision is made by an administrative tribunal which deals with the rights of individuals and which may determine those rights contrary to the law of the province concerned, that in such cases there should be the right of appeal.

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not think this should be allowed to pass without a further word. Here we are passing legislation which is new. We have had an opportunity to examine with the utmost care legislation already adopted in New Zealand, Australia and Ireland, and I think it is interesting to let the committee know the situation with regard to this matter in those three countries. In each of those countries there is no appeal except to an administrative officer, a single administrative officer appointed under the provisions of the act or the appropriate social security measure.

Mr. STIRLING: An appeal from a tribunal to that officer?

Mr. CLAXTON: Not at all; an appeal from an inferior to a superior administrative officer. Here we have gone farther and provided for appeal from an administrative officer to a committee or tribunal of citizens to be appointed and to be independent. I submit that is a fairer provision and it is a provision which goes further than the legislation in the other countries mentioned. It is the kind of provision which will give the citizens of the country the safeguards they should have.

My hon. friend keeps harping on the constitutional question and interference with provincial rights in one respect or another. There is no provision of the bill which interferes in any way with provincial rights, and I cannot conceive of any administration by those responsible which will amount to interference with provincial rights. In the case he mentioned, namely, "where a guardian is appointed by a provincial court to administer the affairs of the child, I cannot conceive of any administrative official paying anyone but that guardian except in the most unusual circumstances. But if by any chance he did, that would not be an interference with provincial rights in any sense whatever." It would be the exercise of powers conferred under this measure. It would not change the position of the guardian in any sense or interfere with the jurisdiction of the provincial court. It would be carrying out the provisions of this legislation which gave the administration power to say to whom the payment should be made.

It is essential that payments be dealt with in this way because here we are dealing with 3,500,000 children, and it is impossible to lay down in this or in any other measure, no matter how long we work at it, the terms and conditions on which the payment should be made so as to cover every special case. It is essential that there should be not only discretion in the individual case but power to pass regulations to deal with classes of cases. In this connection may I mention how far they have gone in Ireland. We have not gone so far, but it does indicate the attitude in their legislature toward this kind of problem. Section 19 of the Irish children's allowance act of 1944 reads:

> If in any respect any difficulty arises in bringing into operation this act the minister, with the consent of the Minister of Finance, may by order do anything which appears to be necessary or expedient for bringing this act into operation and any such order may modify the provisions of this act so far as may appear necessary or expedient for carrying the order into effect.

In this bill we have provided, as has been provided in the case of the Pension Act and every other similar act I have knowledge of, that the governor in council shall have power to pass regulations. It is provided that these regulations shall be laid on the table of the house and shall be published, and that gives hon. members and citizens of the country the safeguard of publicity. But also, as the Prime Minister has indicated, it is contemplated that the regulations will be drafted and laid on the table of the house at the next session before the measure comes into operation, so that hon. members will have an opportunity of seeing them then.

Mr. BRUCE: Which part of Ireland does the parliamentary assistant refer to, the Free State or Northern Ireland?

Mr. CLAXTON: Eire.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend speaks of administrative bodies. I have had some experience in connection with workmen's compensation. Under the old scheme of things, prior to the establishment of workmen's compensation in Ontario in 1914, there was the old common law approach where a man could go to the courts. What were the results? The biggest part of the damages awarded injured workmen went to the legal fraternity for prosecuting the case or conducting it before the courts. I am convinced that since the inception of workmen's compensation with an administrative body, and notwithstanding appeals from other people outside that there should be the right of appeal to the courts, no resolution or demand has come from any responsible labour organization. They have always taken the position that while the number of problem cases is less than a fraction of one per cent, if appeal were allowed to the courts almost every case in the very nature of things would be challenged by the employer. That might be said truthfully also about widows' pensions, if access had been given to the courts in connection with such pensions or soldiers' allowances. I think it is fair to say that all these administrative bodies engaged in connection with social measures, unemployment insurance, for instance, function better and to the advantage of the working man and woman without resort to the courts. They get the money instead of the legal fraternity.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is the usual answer.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is the practical answer.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is a frivolous kind of answer and we are not dealing with frivolous matters now. So far as the parliamentary assistant is concerned he has not covered the situation at all. New Zealand has had a similar act in effect since 1926. I would ask him to point out where there are any similar provisions in the act of New Zealand. Australia has had an act since 1941. I would ask him to point out similar provisions in that act. Let me say to him that the example of Eire is scarcely applicable to the situation in Canada. In Eire there is no divided jurisdiction such as exists in this country as between the dominion and the provinces. There has been little experience in the operation of the act which was passed in Eire during the present year; therefore the argument which the parliamentary assistant advances scarcely covers the point that I endeavoured to make.

Mr. CLAXTON: The regulations are covered in the Australian child endowment act by section 29, and I shall read it:

The governor general may make regulations, not inconsistent with this act, prescribing all matters which are by this act required or permitted to be prescribed, or which are necessary or convenient to be prescribed, for carrying out or giving effect to this act, and in particular for prescribing matters providing for or in relation to—

(a) the manner and form of any claim, the person by whom and to whom and the time within which claims shall be made, and the information and evidence which may be required and accepted in connection with any such claim;

(b) the general conditions governing the grant, payment and administration of endowments;

(c) the manner in which endowments may be paid or applied; and

(d) penalties not exceeding a fine of twenty-five pounds or imprisonment for three months, or both, for any breach of the regulations.

If hon. members will look at the New Zealand act they will find that their social security act deals with the various provisions regarding social security. Only sections 28 to 32 deal specifically with family benefits, as they are called there. In other words, they have only five sections dealing with this whole measure specifically and they are in such terms that almost all of them could be included in two sections of our bill, sections 3 and 4. These, however, are supplemented by general sections applicable to the whole bill, and one of them, namely section 140, gives power to make regulations. It reads:

(1) The governor in council may, from time to time, by order in council, make all such regulations as in his opinion are necessary for the purpose of giving full effect to this act.

(2) All regulations purporting to be made under the authority of this section shall, until revoked, have the force of law as if they were enacted in this act.

(3) All regulations made under the authority of this section shall be laid before parliament within fourteen days after the making thereof if parliament is then in session, and, if not, shall be so laid before parliament within fourteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session.

Paragraph (c) agreed to.

On section 2, paragraph (d).

Mr. BRYCE: I wish to get some explanation about Indians from the parliamentary assistant. Are treaty Indians to participate in family allowances, or is it only non-treaty Indians that are to participate?

Mr. CLAXTON: When that question was asked this afternoon the answer was that in the case of an Indian who qualified as a parent under the bill, those who are maintaining a child and otherwise qualified under the bill, the allowance will be paid to them as in the case of any other parent; but in section 8, subsection 2, discretionary power is given to the governor in council by regulation to avoid duplicating the payment of any allowance to any Indian by the allowance payable under any other provision of law. As I explained then, I understand that in addition to the payment of treaty money to Indians on reservations they receive additional allowances or benefits by way of provision for health or welfare, and in so far as that provision may be for the benefit of children it may be offset so as to avoid any duplication of allowance in this case for children. In the case of Indians who are in full possession of their rights they would be entitled to the benefit on registration like everyone else, and this provision would not apply to them.

Mr. BRYCE: A treaty Indian gets $5 a year, and if any person in the country needs some extra money it is the Indian. If you would only go and see the conditions under which they live you would realize that. We have a lot of non-treaty Indians who fought in the last war and who are fighting in this war; surely you are going to include them?

Mr. CLAXTON: Quite so.

Mr. BRYCE: And their families? Why leave it to the governor in council? If these men are good enough to fight for us they ought to get the money at the post office or wherever you are going to pay it, without having some Indian agent take it out to them. I am sure you understand what I mean. The Indian is a Canadian in every sense of the word. He is the true Canadian. Surely you are not going to ask to have some other body handle the money for him if he is good enough to fight for it?

Mr. CLAXTON: I did endeavour to answer my hon. friend. If the Indian is in full possession of his rights and is in the same position as any other Canadian, then he will be treated like any other Canadian; but if he is in receipt of benefit, there will not be duplication of benefit. In the case of Indians who are on reservations, it may be that under this power the money, instead of being paid to them, may be paid to the agent for them.

Mr. BRYCE: Are you going to give them the same deal that you give the white man?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. BRYCE: You are quite sure about that, now?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, but not a better deal, that is the point.

Mr. BRYCE: They only want a square deal; they do not get it to-day, you know.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. HATFIELD: If the money is paid to the agent they are not on the same terms.

Paragraph (d) agreed to.

On section 2, paragraph (e).

Mr. STIRLING: I should like the committee to be informed rather fully of what is in the government's mind with regard to the holding of this registration, whether it is to be carried out entirely by the officials appointed under this measure, or whether use will be made of officials of the welfare departments of the provinces and other officials of the provinces.

Mr. CLAXTON: The form of registration that is receiving favourable consideration at the present time from governmental officials is this. They hope that it may be possible to use the facilities of the post office and of its employees in order to conduct the registration. It is hoped that it will be done in this way. Forms will be distributed to the letter carriers and deliverers of rural mail. These forms will be made available in sufficient numbers that a form of registration will be left at every house or residence where there is a family that might be entitled to these benefits. At the same time there will be publicity in the press to draw attention to what is being done, and other forms may be obtained at any post office. The forms will be explained; in themselves they will be simple, containing probably not more than seven, eight or nine questions. Probably a statutory declaration or affidavit will be required with some supporting evidence as to the birth of the children. Those forms when completed by the parents will be collected by the postal carriers and sent from the postal headquarters to the local office of the administration. At that local office the registration will be effected; addresses and ledger sheets will be prepared, and all the necessary machinery prepared in order to send out the cheques. At the local office also the registration forms will be checked with vital statistics information from the provinces; spot-checked in other ways; checked with the local welfare officers of the province, if their cooperation can be achieved as it is hoped it will be. Throughout all that operation the only employees it will be necessary to appoint under the measure will be those in the local offices actually charged with registration and administration, together with the treasury officials necessary to make out the cheques, and the officers of the governments necessary to supplement any investigation carried on by provincial or other agencies.

Mr. STIRLING: Will it not be necessary, then, to exhibit birth certificates?

Mr. CLAXTON: Undoubtedly it will be necessary at one stage or another, but the possibility or practicability of requiring birth certificates to be obtained for at least three and a half million children during a short period of time is still under consideration. If that period can be spread out so that the registration can start in March, let us say, then it may be possible that birth certificates will be required to be furnished right from the start. In any event, ultimately birth certificates or the equivalent document, according to the law of the province, will be required.

Mr. STIRLING: Can the parliamentary assistant give the committee any information as to how many local offices there will be?

Mr. CLAXTON: So far it is only contemplated that there will be nine, one in each province.

Mr. STIRLING: I wonder how the local office in a city like Vancouver will be able to deal with the birth certificates of those who live in parts of the province five hundred miles away. Surely they will not have to be sent in by mail.

Mr. CLAXTON: I have a note here, but I do not want to take up the time of the committee in reading it. The note shows the situation in regard to birth certificates in each province, but my understanding is that in most of the provinces there is a central registration from which birth certificates can be obtained.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the province of Quebec?

Mr. CLAXTON: In the case of the province of Quebec there are complete registers of births located at the prothonotary's office of every superior court.

Mr. HATFIELD: But what does it cost to get a birth certificate in that province? About a hundred dollars?

Mr. CLAXTON: In most places they can be obtained from the local minister or priest, who is an officer of civil status, without payment. Where payment is required to be made to the officer of the court who keeps the duplicate register, the fee is fifty cents.

Mr. STIRLING: What will be the process, then? The postman delivers the completed registration form to the local office. Will the local office then endeavour to check it with the birth certificates at the central office to ascertain the correctness or otherwise of the statement contained therein?

Mr. CLAXTON: Whether or not it will be necessary to ask each parent registering a child to furnish a birth certificate with the registration form is not yet decided. In most jurisdictions I think that is ultimately done; that is, the parent registering a child is required as part of the act of registration to attach the birth certificates of all his children. As I explained, it may be placing too great an onus upon the provincial authorities responsible for issuing birth certificates to require them to furnish three and a half million certificates within a short period of time. They may not have the necessary facilities for that, and quite a large percentage of the population do not have their birth certificates, because they have never bothered to obtain copies. That is one thing still to be worked out. If birth certificates are not required at the outset a statutory declaration, perhaps supported by the declaration of some other person, may be required; but ultimately I would think that every parent registering a child would have to furnish a birth certificate. If that is not done before July 1, 1945, then I should suppose that various groups would receive notices with their cheques saying, "You are required to furnish birth certificates within a certain period of time," so as to put the least possible burden on provincial authorities and also on the individuals concerned.

Mr. STIRLING: Has the government arrived at any final decision as to how they will handle the Doukhobor children?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No final decision.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The parliamentary assistant stated that nine offices will be set up. Can he give any indication as to whether they will be set up immediately, or as to when registration is likely to commence?

Mr. CLAXTON: I should not think there would be any need to set up offices before some time around the first of the year. I believe it would be desirable to have them set up then, in order gradually to acquire the personnel, and particularly the leading personnel, who may be needed, to train the staffs and gradually to get the machinery working so that the rather large undertaking of issuing a million and a half cheques on one given day may be carried out smoothly and efficiently, and also so that the necessary co-operation with the provincial authorities and local welfare agencies may be set up. So I should think it would be desirable to open the offices around January 1, and to recruit the staff gradually. It would not be necessary to have a full staff at any place until pretty close to the date of registration. One difficulty about bringing this bill into force before the date mentioned is the lack of the necessary mechanical equipment. That can be obtained only on priorities, and at the present time deliveries are extraordinarily slow. We are informed that it could not be obtained for probably six months from the present date.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Do I understand, then, that registration will not be proceeded with before the beginning of the new year? Is that correct?

Mr .CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that when the dominion-provincial conference is held, consideration be given to requesting the provinces to furnish copies of all birth certificates, or the essential parts thereof, applicable to the children who will be eligible under this measure. That would obviate the necessity of having these hundreds of thousands, if not a million or more, parents writing to their various provincial headquarters, paying a fee of fifty cents or some such sum, and then sending the certificates on to the departments here in Ottawa. Then, if my idea is sound, further to that agreement there should be a clause providing that from year to year the various provinces will forward to the department a list of all births, so that the names may be checked as the applications come in, thus saving the people of Canada a great deal of money, and doing away with a tremendous amount of clerical work.

Mr. CLAXTON: I can assure my hon. friend that every possible means will be taken to save both money and work on the part of the government and the individuals.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is easy for the government to leave this to the individuals and not do it in the way in which a business corporation would handle the work. I think consideration should be given to my suggestion.

Mr. ESLING: What will be the status of Japanese children under this bill?

Mr. CLAXTON: Subsection 2 of section 8 is designed to deal with Japanese who are receiving subsistence in respect of their children because they are interned. Power is given to the governor in council to withhold or reduce any allowance which is paid by the government of Canada and which duplicates the allowances under this bill.

Mr. STIRLING: That does not cover a considerable number of Japanese who are distributed throughout the provinces and those who are resident in British Columbia itself and are not receiving any amounts from the dominion government.

Mr. CLAXTON: They would be in the same position as any other resident of Canada. If they were born in Canada or if they have been resident here for three years or have served overseas and have had children born on service or within twelve months, or if the children come under section 2 (b) they would be entitled to allowances.

Mr. MacNICOL: There have been a number of Japanese children born in Ontario where we have no particular objection to them. Would they not be entitled to this same treatment as white children?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does the hon. gentleman mean that children of parents of Japanese origin but who are Canadian citizens either by birth or naturalization would not be eligible, or would they be eligible?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: This is regardless of race, creed or colour?

Mr. CLAXTON: I have already pointed out the possible application of section 2.

Paragraph (e) agreed to.

Paragraph (f) agreed to.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Regulations to be laid before parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I want to add a subsection to this section. This is the usual provision that regulations must be published in the Canada Gazette or laid before parliament, but in order to provide extra security in the matter I am going to suggest:

That section 12 be amended by adding the following as subsection 2:

"No regulation shall be effective until published in the Canada Gazette and upon such publication shall be effective and shall have the same force and effect as if it had been enacted in this act."

I think the hon. member for St. John-Albert will recognize that section as the one which he wished to have placed in the farm prices bill the other evening.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I move accordingly.

Mr. STIRLING: Does this mean that on the day after publication they would come into effect? Would it not be reasonable to have a certain time elapse after the publication so that the public might be able to study them?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I presume the regulation itself would have some provision where that was desirable. It might easily be stated that the regulation would come into effect on and after March 1, or some other provision.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. GREEN: Has consideration been given to inserting a provision in the bill to the effect that family allowances shall have no effect upon the setting of wages. In the course of my speech on the second reading of the bill I suggested this in order that it might allay the fears of labour organizations in Canada. In any event, it would be helpful because I believe it is the intention that these family allowances should not affect wages.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that has been made clear through the course of the present debate, but the placing of a provision of that kind in this bill might be regarded by some of the provinces as an interference with their rights in the matter of wages. Certainly the declaration of policy on the part of the dominion would be to the effect that these family allowances should not be allowed to influence the fixing of wages.

Mr. GREEN: Could there not be a provision inserted to cover dominion contracts, that family allowances should not be taken into consideration in the setting of wages?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have pointed out several times that family allowances are in the nature of a grant. There is no contractual relationship in the making of this grant by this parliament to those who are entitled to receive it. The whole measure might be rendered ultra vires if this parliament were to make a contractual relationship. It was on that ground that some other legislation was declared unconstitutional, in that it placed in the contract a condition when contractual obligations were matters of property and civil rights in the province.

Mr. GREEN: It could be done in the case of contracts with the dominion government. In the post-war years there will be many contracts made by the dominion government, and surely it would not affect the rights of the provinces if the provision were limited to dominion contracts. It would show what the house had in mind in passing this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the declaration I have made can be taken as a declaration by the government as to what the house had in mind. I notice that every hon. member agrees with me. It would be dangerous, I believe, to run the risk of inserting anything that might be interpreted directly or indirectly as being contractual.

Mr. GREEN: I have another question to ask which may not come under this section. There will be many thousands of young men and women taking training after they are discharged from the forces. As I read section 8, subsection 2, there is no protection against having the amount of their rehabilitation grants taken into consideration with the result that they may not be eligible for the family allowances. I suggest that that section be extended to cover returned men in respect of their rehabilitation grants and to cover any grants made for vocational training of men who are switching over from war to civilian industry. Has consideration been given to that particular type of case?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Broadly speaking, it is the intention of the government that members of the armed forces shall have all benefits granted to them met to the full, apart altogether from family allowances. That is the view taken in regard to the matter. There may be some possible exceptions, but, broadly speaking, the interpretation of this measure should be that so far as the members of the armed forces are concerned it is not going to take away any right which they have because they are members of the armed forces. It will add something to the rights which they have already by giving them what they are entitled to under the provisions of this family allowances measure.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that the Prime Minister give some consideration to the last few lines of subsection 2 of section 8, which read:

Witholding shall not be made by reason of a pension under the Pension Act—

The CHAIRMAN: We discussed section 8 for some length of time and I do not believe the committee would like to revert to that section.

Mr. GREEN: I explained that and the Prime Minister raised a question in answering my question. He said that the intention is to protect those people. I would point out to him that they are no longer members of the military, naval or air forces of Canada when they are taking rehabilitation because they have been discharged. I think the subsection should be extended to cover them.

Section agreed to.

Sections 13 to 15 inclusive agreed to.

On section 16—Payment of expenses.

Mr. STIRLING: Does this imply that the vote will be placed before parliament in the supplementaries to take care of the necessary expenses of administration?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 180, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE

MEASURE TO FACILITATE AND DEVELOP TRADE BETWEEN CANADA AND OTHER COUNTRIES

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of bill No. 178, to incorporate the Export Credits Insurance Corporation and to promote the revival of trade by the provision of dominion government guarantees to encourage exports from Canada.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is an extremely important bill touching an important phase of our national and international life. Despite the fact that it is late in the session and that there is a desire on the part of some hon. members to hasten along with the business I feel that this measure should be given close attention and consideration by the house. The importance of international trade, on which this bill has a definite bearing, is recognized by almost all Canadians. It is of particular importance to us, and as we look forward to the post-war period we cannot but be keenly interested in any measure that proposes to provide for the revival of export trade and the development of our international economic relations.

The purposes of the bill are set out in the preamble and, as I see it, those purposes are really two. The preamble reads:

Whereas it is desirable to promote the revival of trade by establishing a corporation to insure against loss caused by insolvency, delays in collection and transfer difficulties in connection with the export of Canadian-produced goods, and during the period of transition from war to peace by providing for loans or guarantees to governments of other countries or their agencies;

Therefore, His Majesty . . .

And so on.

The two important provisions referred to in that preamble are to be found by referring to sections 13 and 22 of the bill. Section 13 indicates that under the terms of this bill the government will have power to "enter into a contract of insurance with an exporter to insure against the risk of loss involved in a contract for the export of Canadian-produced goods." That is one phase of the machinery proposed under the terms of this bill, that the government shall have power to enter into contracts to assist exporters in the development of foreign trade.

The other important feature of this bill is found in section 22, where we learn that the government may make guarantees to other governments or their agencies to assist them in the purchase of Canadian-produced goods during the three years immediately after the coming into force of part II of the bill. This second feature of the bill is in a partial sense a continuation of the mutual aid principle which we have followed to a considerable extent during the war. That is a principle which has received support from almost all the members of this house, and we welcome the suggestion that that principle is to be carried over in part for at least three years into the post-war period.

The other feature of the bill is also commendable so far as its aim and objective are concerned, namely, the development of foreign trade, but I am not so sure that it is commendable as the best way of achieving that purpose.

I said a moment ago that the importance of international trade can hardly be overemphasized so far as Canada is concerned. I should like to place on the record a statement in this connection which was made by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation at its first annual convention in Regina in 1933. At that time the C.C.F. drew up what is known as the Regina manifesto, clause 5 of which reads as follows:

External Trade

The regulation in accordance with the national plan of external trade through import and export boards.

Canada is dependent on external sources of supply for many of her essential requirements of raw materials and manufactured products. These she can obtain only by large exports of the goods she is best fitted to produce. The strangling of our export trade by insane protectionist policies must be brought to an end. But the old controversies between free traders and protectionists are now largely obsolete. In a world of nationally organized economies Canada must organize the buying and selling of her main imports and exports under public boards, and take steps to regulate the flow of less important commodities by a system of licences. By so doing she will be enabled to make the best trade agreements possible with foreign countries, put a stop to the exploitation of both primary producer and ultimate consumer, make possible the coordination of internal processing, transportation and marketing of farm products, and facilitate the establishment of stable prices for such export commodities.

I remind the house that that is not some statement which was prepared recently in the light of present conditions. That statement was issued by this party at its first national convention, eleven years ago, and I submit that every word of it still stands as a valid and basic statement so far as Canada's foreign trade is concerned.

When we talk about the importance of foreign trade, I think the question should be asked once in a while as to what it is that makes foreign trade so important. As a matter of fact the question has been answered in part during recent debates. The important thing about international commerce, if it is conducted on a basis of freedom of exchange, is that the people in various countries are enabled to produce the things which they are best capable of producing and, by trading those products, achieve mutual gain. That principle is the underlying idea so far as free trade is concerned, and there is no question that the principle itself is still sound. But there are some things which free traders—those who give us the theory behind it and claim that that is the essence of their gospel—seem to have forgotten. One is that it is quite possible even under free trade for cartels and monopolies to be set up and dictate world prices with the result that the advantages of free trade accrue, not as they should, to the people of the countries which enter into free trade, but rather to those who dictate the policy of trade throughout the world.

I should like to have the privilege of quoting briefly from an address which was delivered in Yorkton, Saskatchewan, on May 29, 1944, by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who leads this group. During the course of that address he said this:

The liberal economists, still under the influence of the heady vintages of 1890, continue to debate the dead and varied issue of free trade versus tariff. That issue has long been superseded—

Mr. MacNICOL: Who said it was dead?

Mr. KNOWLES:

—and to-day the issue is planned trade through public agencies on the basis of national needs, or trade planned by the giant cartels for their private advantage.

There is no question about the soundness of the free trade principle. The trouble is that those in this house who claim that they are its only advocates have not thought it through, have not seen to it that along with free trade, policies were established to make sure that its advantages would accrue to the entire people of this country rather than to private monopolies.

Mr. MacNICOL: You only think so. You know nothing about it. How can you know anything about it? May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. KNOWLES: That is the hon. member's favourite interjection.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the hon. member know anything about free trade and protection, never having had any more to do with business than a sick cat?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is a good remark.

Mr. COLDWELL: The voice of John Bracken.

Mr. MacNICOL: I can make these remarks myself.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that Your Honour did not succeed in preventing these interruptions. They were really quite enjoyable.

Mr. MacNICOL: You are a pretty good head, at that. I like you.

Mr. KNOWLES: If by free trade all you mean is the absence of tariffs you soon get into the situation which I have already described, wherein private cartels and monopolies are able to take advantage of free trade itself. We have had the experience in this country, for example, that when tariffs were lowered on farm machinery the prices of farm machinery went up, and the Conservatives—I think that was their name at the time—enjoyed taunting the Liberals with that fact. Well, it is a fact which should be faced, that if we are to get any advantage to the people as a whole out of free trade we have to go farther than that, and plan and organize our national purchases somewhat after the manner which we have followed during the course of the present war. I am going to take the liberty again to quote from my leader, even if he is right here in the house in front of me—which is more than some other hon. members can say about their leader.

Mr. CRERAR: May I ask my hon. friend a question with regard to a statement he made a moment ago? If I understood him aright, he stated that the high prices of farm machinery or the increases in the prices of farm machinery were due to international combinations and cartels. Is that what the hon. member said?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes; they had that effect despite the lowering of tariffs.

Mr. CRERAR: Then how does my hon. friend explain this fact, that in the exhaustive inquiry which was carried on by a committee of this house several years ago into the price of farm machinery it was demonstrated, if my memory serves me aright, that the increased costs of farm machinery were due to increased labour costs, which, as I recall, comprised eighty per cent of those costs?

Mr. COLDWELL: No. I was on the committee. We found that the smaller companies all followed the price leadership of the International Harvester company. You will find that pretty well stated in the report.

Mr. CRERAR: Oh, no.

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Speaker, I—

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not mind a question or two, but if it is to be a free-for-all I think we should wait until we get into committee. As a matter of fact this question which the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) has interjected has been debated a number of times in this chamber fairly recently, and the figures themselves have been put on the record from the committee's report to which the hon. member has referred. Those figures answer the minister.

But I want to get back to what I started to do a moment ago, namely quote further from the speech which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar made at Yorkton on May 29, 1944. He said this:

For years some of us were saying that the buying and selling of our main imports and exports should be organized under public boards. By so doing, we believed advantageous long-term agreements for bulk purchases and sale could be concluded with foreign countries, and a stop could be put to the exploitation of both the primary producer and the ultimate consumer.

You will recognize a reference there to the language of the Regina manifesto of the C.C.F., from which I have already quoted.

For years these ideas were ridiculed and scorned.

Like a good many other ideas of the C.C.F.

But, under the iron compulsion of war, Canada has actually carried out these ideas—the very people who held them in ridicule and scorn are putting them into practice to-day. Because of the war, the government has had to resort to planned trade; it has been done half-heartedly, the planning is makeshift, but it has been done. The normal channels of trade, like business-as-usual, proved to be too inefficient, too tortuous, to meet the war emergency. Canada to-day has an external trade advisory committee, with wide powers to coordinate all trade activities, and to recommend policy. She has also to-day a Canadian export board with essential commodities under its jurisdiction. Incidentally, both of these important bodies were set up by order in council, in spite of the fact that parliament was in session. It is as though the government wanted to be as quiet as possible about the adoption of socialist measures. Canada has concluded long-term contracts for the bulk sale of commodities, such as bacon, dried eggs, cheese and grains. Are similar contracts to be concluded after the war, or are these vital matters to be handed back to the speculator? Canada has concluded long-term contracts for the bulk purchase of commodities, such as wool, silk, rubber, tea, coffee and grapefruit juice—she has done so for the sake of efficiency, and to protect the consumer in regard to both quality and price. Are these contracts to end with the termination of hostilities, regardless of the interests of the consumer?

Our contention is that following the war we should continue some of these very policies which have been found necessary, desirable and efficient during the period of the war years. In other words, we are still advocating the proposal that was set out in plank five of the Regina manifesto, namely, regulation in accordance with a national plan of external trade through import and export boards. It is quite often that we make the statement that I made a while ago to-night, that the issue of free trade versus protection as between Liberals and Progressive Conservatives—

Mr. SPEAKER: May I interrupt the hon. member. At the beginning of his speech he read the preamble of the bill:

Whereas, it is desirable to promote the revival of trade by establishing a corporation to insure against loss caused by insolvency, delays in collection and transfer difficulties in connection with the export of Canadian-produced goods, and during the period of transition from war to peace by providing for loans or guarantees to governments of other countries or their agencies.

I have been searching in my mind to discover wherein the relevancy of the hon. gentleman's argument with regard to the question of free trade as opposed to protection lies in relation to the bill, which is now under consideration. I would ask him to address himself to the bill, which is for the establishment of a corporation with respect to export credits.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, if I may endeavour to answer your inquiry, I broke the preamble into two parts, one dealing with mutual aid and the other dealing with insurance contracts with exporters as a means of reviving trade in the post-war period. I expressed approval of the mutual aid section of the preamble; but I am suggesting that, so far as the other portion is concerned, an alternative is desirable, and the alternative that I suggest is the setting up of import and export boards. I am subject to your ruling, but I believe that it is in order on second reading to propose an alternative method for the achieving of the principle of a bill which is before the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will realize that if a discussion is allowed with regard either to free trade or to protection we shall open up a very broad field and the ensuing debate will not likely be relevant to the bill under consideration. If the hon. member can show the relevancy of his present argument to the bill before us I shall be glad to hear what he has to say, but I doubt that his remarks at the moment are relevant.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I say, Mr. Speaker, that the bill is very wide and deals with the loss that may accrue to an importer by reason of insolvency or otherwise. My hon. friend is arguing that instead of making these guarantees proposed under this bill it would be better to have the bill redrawn to give effect to a proposal for import and export boards. The unfortunate thing about it is that if we were debating this bill earlier in the session we would have moved that it be referred to the banking and commerce committee where all these points raised on the bill could have been discussed adequately. But since it is late in the session we do not wish to delay what may be a useful measure by suggesting a reference to that committee. My hon. friend is trying to place before the government a view that gives an alternative to what is proposed in the bill. That is why we submit that the discussion is in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I appreciate the remarks of the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, but I do not think he is addressing himself to the question of the relevancy of the observations which have been made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with regard to the bill before the house. What may be discussed now is the principle of the bill, and if there were force in the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) it would mean that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would be opposing the principle of the bill. If he is not opposing the principle of the bill, then he is dealing with a matter that is extraneous to the bill and I would ask him to justify the relevancy of his remarks.

Mr. KNOWLES: If I may restate what I said a moment ago, I regard the aim and purpose of the bill as the revival of trade in the immediate post-war period. The preamble states that. To achieve that purpose the bill sets out two proposals. One is dealt with in section 22 along mutual aid lines, and so far as that part of the bill is concerned I express my wholehearted support of it. As a matter of fact, when the bill for mutual aid, and the bill in connection with UNRRA were before the house, I expressed the hope that the principle of mutual aid might be carried into the post-war period. I am glad to find that the principle, at least for three years, is woven in part into the text of the bill that is before us. But with respect to the other provision of the bill, namely, that trade might be revived in the post-war period by the method of insurance contracts with private exporters, under which the government would bear any loss, leaving the exporter the opportunity to enjoy any gains, I am not in agreement. As a matter of fact I do not see how anyone who argues the case for free enterprise and insists upon the fact that free enterprise must be given its rein because it takes the risk can really support this measure. Similarly I would point out that from our viewpoint it is against the best interests of the country as a whole, and because of the importance of trade to Canada I am not satisfied with a Liberal administration, which has had so much to say about the importance of international trade and the principle of free trade, coming in at this stage of the game and giving us only this as a means of reviving so important a phase of our life as international trade.

Your Honour has questioned my right to deal with the other matter and I take it that I must accept your ruling, but may I add this other sentence or two in conclusion to that phase of my remarks. It seems to me that free trade by itself is not enough. It is a good principle. It is as sound to-day as it ever was, but if the people of Canada are to have the things that accrue from free trade we have to take this further step of setting up import and export boards so that we can plan our foreign trade, plan our bulk purchases in such a way as will be to the best interests of the people of Canada as a whole. Along with that we must take steps to see to it that the purchasing power of our people at home is increased and that our people are put in a position to buy the things that can be brought into this country in return for the goods that we sell under the provisions of this bill.

If Your Honour had not restricted me somewhat I would have taken time to read some quotations along this line from the very interesting booklet that I have in my hand entitled, "The Mid-Continent and the Peace". This booklet, as some hon. members may know, was prepared at the request made in 1941 by the then Premier of Manitoba, Hon. John Bracken, and the then governor of Minnesota, the Hon. Harold Stassen, by economists of the universities of Manitoba and Minnesota. The economists who did this piece of research were Professor William J. Waines of the university of Manitoba and Professor Arthur L. Upgren of the university of Minnesota. I could have given half a dozen quotations from this booklet showing how they face the problem of foreign trade, and of western agriculture in particular, in the post-war period. It is their contention that tariffs must be lowered by all means, but it is also their contention that there must be planning of trade as between this country and other countries. First of all I should say that it is their contention that the United States and Canada should be more closely integrated as an economic unit, and that in addition to that there should be planning of trade between this north American economic unit and other countries. They also point out in a definite way that if we are to facilitate the economic rehabilitation of other sections of the world we must improve the standard of living of our industrial communities here at home. We must become an increasingly larger market for the goods that may be purchased from other communities. I notice you are restless, Mr. Speaker, therefore I think I had better not push your patience any farther. I have only continued because I really felt that what I have had to say was relevant to this very important matter of international trade. I am not satisfied that this bill, brought in by a Liberal administration goes far enough in recognizing its importance to Canada in the post-war period.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): May I say just a few words, Mr. Speaker, about some of the remarks made by the hon.

member after I came in. He undertook to analyse the bill as being divided into two parts and as embodying two principles. He took the second part of the bill, the substance of which is found in section 22, first, and he said that that embodied the mutual aid principle. Well, the mutual aid principle is somewhat different from the principle found in section 22 of the bill. Section 22 of the bill authorizes the government to guarantee the obligations of foreign governments which purchase goods in Canada, to make loans to foreign governments which purchase goods in Canada, and to purchase or acquire securities issued by foreign governments for the purchase of goods in Canada. The mutual aid legislation is based on a different principle. Under the mutual aid legislation there is no money obligation whatever on the part of foreign governments, and in that respect it is certainly inaccurate to characterize section 22 of the bill as being based on the mutual aid principle. But what I take particular exception to is his summary of the principle which he alleges is contained in part I of the bill. If I understood him correctly, he said that it contemplates the assumption of losses by the government of Canada, leaving profits, if such are made, to private exporters. That is not so.

The effective section of the bill is section 13. Section 13 provides for the setting up of insurance. It provides for the insuring by the Export Credits Insurance Corporation of private exporters, or, for that matter, it might be public exporters, it might be government boards, although perhaps that would not be entirely appropriate. The main purpose of the bill in part I is to insure private exporters against loss, but on a commercial basis. It is not an assumption by the government of losses, leaving profits to private exporters. May I refer to my colleague's speech made when he introduced the legislation on July 28, at page 5518 of Hansard. He said:

> The Export Credit Insurance Corporation that is to be set up in Canada is intended to develop for the assistance of Canadian exporters an insurance business of this kind, and it is the intention that it shall operate on a self-sustaining basis, but that it shall be essentially non-profit-making.

That is to say, it is not to incur a loss. The Export Credits Insurance Corporation is to be operated on a self-sustaining basis. The private exporter pays for the protection he gets. He does not load his loss on to the government. He pays a premium for the insurance which he is to obtain from this government corporation. I would not like the C.C.F. speakers to make the assertion that this is an instance of the government stepping in and taking the risk of losses away from persons engaged in the export business, leaving it to persons engaged in the export business to get a profit, if a profit is earned. I think it is very important that the point be made clear at the outset. The hon. member has made a study of the bill, but he has certainly misapprehended the essential features of both part I and part II if his remarks to-night are any indication.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I just say a word? I think what my hon. friend (Mr. Knowles) said was that he was glad to see in part II of the bill the principle of mutual aid. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) disagrees that the principle of mutual aid is here. If he is arguing that the principle of mutual aid only involves the making of gifts, then he is right, and that the mutual aid is in that way on a one-way basis.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mutual aid never entails a dollar of obligation.

Mr. COLDWELL: I know, but I am going to say that the principle of guaranteeing to the purchasing country the right to obtain goods by way of loans in this country, setting up credits in this country, while it is not mutual aid in the sense in which the Minister of Finance used the term, nevertheless is a principle which enables a country which otherwise has not a credit, to obtain a credit within Canada, or perhaps within some other country, and to that extent it is a method of aiding another nation to obtain the goods it requires.

Mr. ILSLEY: In that sense.

Mr. COLDWELL: And in that sense I think my hon. friend referred to the principle of mutual aid. It is a good principle, and I am thoroughly in agreement with it in this bill.

With regard to the other point raised by the Minister of Finance, of course I do not know the basis upon which the premiums for this insurance are to be worked out. We have not had experience in regard to insurance of this type; consequently we have no reliable figures which would enable us to fix premiums on an actuarial basis. It may be that in the post-war period the trading relationships of the nations will involve considerable losses, and that the premiums paid will not cover those losses. In that event I take it that under this bill such losses will be made good to the government corporation. The nation will have to meet those losses, and perhaps it was in that sense my hon. friend offered his criticism. I am not arguing that the government is bound to take a loss; I am arguing that the government may take a loss. On the other hand, however, if a profit is made it will accrue to the company or corporation exporting the goods. To that extent, and that extent only, I suggest to the Minister of Finance that my hon. friend was correct in his statement. It is merely a matter of guesswork at the present time as to what premiums will be required and what will be our financial experience in regard to this government corporation.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. gentleman think there would be any more likelihood of a loss under this arrangement than there would be under export boards?

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the question the minister asks can be answered in this way. In the operation of import and export boards it is possible to relate the prices of the commodities imported to the returns from the commodities exported. In other words, experience has shown that the internal price of a commodity may not bear any relationship to the external price of that commodity in the country to which it is exported. On the other hand, imports from the country or group of countries into the country receiving the imports can be related, within the importing country, to its own internal price level. In that way you could even up the losses with the profits that may accrue as between various types of commodities. Consequently, under an import-export system it is possible to escape the kind of loss—although, of course, conceivably you may have another kind of loss—against which this bill is designed to give protection as far as the individual exporter is concerned.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. PERLEY: I was not present when the minister made his statement at the resolution stage, since I had to attend a committee meeting. However, from hurriedly looking over the bill this afternoon, noting that it is in two parts and contains a number of sections, I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that it is a very important measure, perhaps one of the most important to be introduced this session, since it covers the whole field of our export and import trade. I regret that a measure of this kind should be submitted to us at this late stage of the session, when we are trying to get through within the next five or ten days; I think it is hardly fair. This measure should have been brought in two or three months ago and referred either to a special committee or to the banking and commerce committee, as the hon. member suggested. I believe that would have been the proper procedure because, as I have said, it is very important legislation. I do not intend to delay the committee longer, but I wanted to express my view as to what should have been done.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): When the resolution preceding this bill was introduced there appeared to be some difference of opinion as between the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of National Defence, who was then leading the house; certainly they expressed very different opinions on that occasion. As has been pointed out, this is a very important measure. I agree with the last speaker that it is unfortunate this bill should have been introduced so late in the session.

I wish to refer particularly to the definition of Canadian-produced goods, which are defined to mean goods wholly or partly produced or manufactured in Canada. We have had so many bills introduced in the last few days, which sometimes seem to overlap or conflict, that it is a little difficult to be sure one is strictly within the limits of the legislation under discussion. The other day we had the measure establishing floor prices for agricultural products; now we have this bill which the Minister of Agriculture said was closely associated with the measure he put through. There is one point I should like to raise here, because the Minister of Finance is also closely associated with this measure.

Mr. ILSLEY: If I may interrupt for a moment, what section are we on, Mr. Chairman?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): On section 1.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then I think the hon. gentleman's remarks should be addressed to section 2, if he is talking about the definition of Canadian-produced goods.

Mr. GREEN: Will one of the ministers explain why the government has adopted this method instead of the method followed under the mutual aid legislation? Under that bill, as I understand it, a board was set up known as the Canadian mutual aid board. That board buys the goods from the Canadian producer or manufacturer and transfers those goods to other nations. At first blush one would think the new arrangement would be to have the mutual aid board buy the goods from the producer or manufacturer in just the same way, and then sell them to the foreign country. Instead of that, the government makes a loan to the foreign country, or guarantees the purchase of the goods by that country from the Canadian producer. There may be some good reason why that has been done, but I should be glad if one of the ministers would explain the reason for approaching this problem in a different way.

Mr. ILSLEY: In time of peace we think it is best to allow business to be transacted through the usual channels. In time of war that is impossible with mutual aid, because under mutual aid the government of Canada, or a committee or board set up by the government of Canada, distributes munitions and other goods required for the prosecution of the war in accordance with strategic needs, for the most part, if not entirely, without remuneration. There are no sales made by the mutual aid board and there is no dollar obligation resulting from any transaction.

Mr. GREEN: There is no power under this bill for the government to sell to a foreign nation?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, because there seems to be no reason for interrupting trade through the usual channels.

Mr. GREEN: The difficulty is that trade is not going through the usual channels; the purchase is not being made by the importer in the foreign country; it is being made by the foreign government. That is as I read the bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: From the producer in Canada.

Mr. GREEN: The normal course of business would be for the Canadian exporter to sell to the Belgian importer.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not necessarily.

Mr. GREEN: This covers only a purchase by a government and not a purchase by an individual firm.

Mr. ILSLEY: It may not be a foreign government that actually obtains title to the goods. A foreign government may request the government of Canada to make it possible for somebody in the foreign country, either the government or a private importer, to buy goods in Canada. The ordinary trade channels are for a purchaser in the foreign country to go to the manufacturing industry, or to the Canadian wheat board, or to private interests in Canada having agricultural products for sale, or anyone else having things for sale and make his arrangements. It may not be possible in the unsettled conditions arising immediately after the war for the private Canadian exporter to run the risk of loss in the transaction without insuring himself against that loss by getting some kind of insurance.

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not entirely understand the bill partly because I have been so busy on other matters. It seems to me that this is taking the place of the London discount houses where you could take a bill of exchange on some importer in Brazil or Argentina, and they would give you cash in sterling or put their endorsement on it which would make it good at the Bank of England. Is that the principle behind the first part of this bill? Does it mean that you are giving the Canadian exporter immediate money and substituting the credit of the government for the credit of the importer in the foreign country?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not under part I of the bill.

Mr. GREEN: If I may follow up my question with regard to the transaction with a foreign country. There is no provision in part II of the bill for a loan to a foreign importer; the assistance is given to the governments of other countries. I do not understand why it is done in that way because that is not following the normal course of business. Why is not the assistance given to the foreign importer if the idea is to have the business carried on through the regular channels? We may find ourselves in this position under the second part of the bill. A loan may be made to the Belgian government—I use that government merely as an illustration—and purchases made in Canada from a Canadian firm, either by the Belgian government or by a Belgian firm. The purchase price may not be paid, and it seems to me that this does not protect the exporter in Canada. I do not see why the importer in Belgium should be forced to deal through his own government; yet under part II of the bill he must do so. Why is that done? The Canadian exporter does not do business through his government at all; there is no connection between the Canadian exporter and the Canadian government under part II of the bill. On the other hand, the foreign importer has to do business through the foreign government. All the Canadian government does under part II is to hand out money to the Belgian government.

Mr. ILSLEY: And take the indemnity of the foreign government against loss.

Mr. GREEN: Would it not be better during this three-year period to have the Canadian government buy from the Canadian producer and sell to the Belgian government? Then the Belgian government could deal with its own firm as it sees fit. That would be merely carrying on the plan under the mutual aid bill and you could use the mutual aid board. You could transfer to the Belgian government. The only difference would be that, instead of getting back goods or making a gift, you would get back payment or securities for payment. I do not understand why you are trying to go about this thing in a new way during the three-year period after the war. I would like one of the ministers to explain why that has been done.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot see any advantage whatever in the dominion government buying and insisting on selling to a foreign government. No argument has been made by the hon. gentleman in favour of that.

Mr. GREEN: Why make the Belgian importer do business through the Belgian government? Actually you are dealing with the Belgian government.

Mr. ILSLEY: So that the dominion government will have the guarantee of the foreign government.

Mr. GREEN: You would have it anyway if you sold to the foreign government.

Mr. ILSLEY: What advantage is there in doing that?

Mr. GREEN: There is the advantage that the Canadian exporter would get paid and he might not get paid—under this plan, for the money would be turned over to the Belgian government and the order placed by the Belgian government with the Canadian exporter.

Mr. ILSLEY: Under part II the Canadian exporter will get paid.

Mr. GREEN: He will be paid only by the foreign country.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; the dominion government guarantees the obligations of the foreign government in respect of the price of the goods.

Mr. GREEN: Where is that in section 22?

Mr. ILSLEY: Under 22 (1) (a) he would be paid.

An hon. MEMBER: In Canadian funds?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. PERLEY: In answering the hon. member the minister referred to the wheat board. Canadian wheat exporters are selling to foreign countries, to the cereal import committee in Britain, for instance. Will this bill guarantee the Canadian exporter against loss? Every day we see advertisements that Canadian wheat is being sold to other countries, and I should like to know if this bill will insure the Canadian exporter of wheat against loss?

Mr. ILSLEY: Under what part, I or II?

Mr. PERLEY: Under the part you have been speaking of when answering the hon. member.

Mr. ILSLEY: The exporter can take out a policy insuring himself against loss and he pays for it. If it were deemed advisable and if the foreign government would assume the obligation of indemnifying the Canadian government against loss, it would be possible under part II for the Canadian government to purchase securities of the foreign government or guarantee the obligations of the foreign government to the private exporter.

Mr. GREEN: Suppose the Canadian government makes a loan to the Belgian government under paragraph (b) of section 22, how is the Canadian exporter to be assured of getting his purchase price.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be a loan to enable the Belgian government to purchase from the exporter and to pay the cost of the Canadian produced goods. It would be the simplest thing in the world to make sure.

Mr. GREEN: How would you make sure he gets his money?

Mr. ILSLEY: It would presumably credit the account of the Belgian government here, out of which account the exporter would be paid.

Mr. GREEN: Why could not some provision to that effect be put in the bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: Because you must assume that the government has some sense.

Mr. GREEN: We do not, very often.

Mr. PERLEY: Who is to be the final judge of whether there was a loss or not in the deal I mentioned a few minutes ago?

Mr. ILSLEY: "Loss" is defined. There will be an amendment to section 2 and an amendment to section 13 defining "loss".

Mr. GREEN: I take it that the government would prefer to see business develop under the first part of the bill; in other words, that they would prefer to see an individual exporting firm able to do business with an individual importing firm. That would leave nothing for the government to worry about. Yet the Minister of Trade and Commerce said the other day, when the resolution preceding this bill was under discussion, that it was not intended to use part I of the bill in the meantime. I understood that it would not be used until the three-year period after the war had expired. He used these words, at page 5520 of Hansard of July 28 last:

Mr. MacKinnon (Edmonton West): It is anticipated that part I of the bill will not become operative to any great extent for the time being.

Mr. Green: That is the insurance feature?

Mr. MacKinnon (Edmonton West): Yes. Part II will be operative during the transition period. The first part of the bill is essentially peace-time legislation; the second is not.

I suggest that that is putting the cart before the horse. Certainly every encouragement should be given to private firms to develop their own export business, and the insurance provision of this bill should be put into effect right away and should be used just as much as possible. That would be preferable to using the second part of the bill. I would like to know whether the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on that point the other day is correct.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I have not those remarks before me at the moment. I do not think I said that part I of this bill would not be operative until after the three-year period had expired. What I really said was that part I would become operative by proclamation. The corporation has to be set up and organized. But it is the wish and intention of the government to have part I come into effect as soon as possible.

Mr. GREEN: Surely the government hopes that the bulk of the business will be done under part I rather than under part II, which involves the Canadian government making loans to foreign governments. Am I not right?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Not necessarily.

Mr. GREEN: What does the minister mean by that?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It is the intention of the government to have part I become operative as soon as possible. Part I is essentially looking toward the carrying on of this export business in time of peace. I do not think it is necessary to wait until then for it to begin to function, and in the meantime part II will operate. Conditions during the war and possibly immediately after the war will make it difficult for part I to become operative in a very large way during this particular period.

Mr. GREEN: Am I correct in saying that the basic policy of the government for increasing the export trade of Canada is to insure transactions between the Canadian exporter and the foreign importer?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes, that is correct.

Mr. COLDWELL: Transactions as between individuals?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: But is that a realistic way of looking at our future trade relationships? I have been reading a number of reports of committees, even in Great Britain, which would seem to indicate that no major party there at the present time looks to a resumption of that kind of trading. You have a very large group even in the Conservative party in Great Britain which looks forward, as the Labour party does of course, to the buying of basic commodities such as foodstuffs and even basic raw materials through government agencies. It seems to me that it is rather unrealistic to expect that in the future we shall return to the old method of individual traders trading on the open market. That policy is not realistic. So far as the other nations are concerned, I do not know if Russia will set the pattern of trade among the European countries, but we know the type of trading that she was conducting before the war, and we know the type of trading in some of the principal commodities which the more democratic countries of the world were following—New Zealand, for example, with her control of trade through government agencies. It seems to me that it is not realistic to look forward in this bill to the resumption of the old method of individual traders trading on the open market. I do not think we are going to see that any more. We have it now only in part during the war.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I think I can tell the hon. member that this legislation is looked upon with great satisfaction by the exporters and manufacturers of Canada generally. It is exactly what they want to help them in their export business.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not doubt that a bit.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): And the policy is based exactly on what they have been and are doing in the United Kingdom.

Mr. HATFIELD: After I receive an order from an importer in South America, how long will it take before I can get permission and have my insurance adjusted with the board. The trouble to-day in trying to export is that you have to go to two or three boards, to the Canadian export board, to Washington and to an international export board and get all kinds of priorities before you can take an order. All that takes months. How long will it tie up the whole system under this bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: It will not tie it up nearly as badly as the system of export and import boards would. I am going by what the hon. gentleman himself has just said.

Mr. HATFIELD: Before I can get insurance I shall have to get permission from this board. How long is that going to tie up the transaction?

Mr. ILSLEY: I assume that there will not be any undue delay. I should not think that there would be any difficulty about it at all.

Mr. HATFIELD: There are great difficulties to-day.

Mr. ILSLEY: Because, as the hon. gentleman himself says, we are in a time of war and the government is controlling so much of everything everywhere.

Mr. HATFIELD: It is not on account of the war but on account of the boards not knowing their business.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Are we correct in assuming that this is just a way of foreign lending on the part of Canada? It amounts to nothing more or less than foreign lending on the part of Canada, does it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, under part II foreign lending is contemplated.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Or it provides the means whereby the Canadian exporter will, by taking out an insurance policy, aid in the proceedings?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Part I of the act gives the exporter the power to insure his shipment to the foreign importer, and he participates himself in part of that risk.

Mr. HATFIELD: Would not the board have to look up the standing of the foreign importer? How long is it going to take them to get a deal through?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It is anticipated that the structure to be set up will become routine very shortly. There will be a head office, and it is expected that there will be branch offices so that Canada will be covered, which will make it easy for exporters to deal with an office where the insurance policy can be issued.

Mr. JACKMAN: I still fail to understand what the whole purpose of this bill is. At the present time, notwithstanding the various war regulations, there is a certain amount of exporting going on. Let us leave aside the United Kingdom and the United States, and let us take shipments going, say, to Brazil and South Africa, and newsprint, which is still being sold in small quantities to a number of different countries. That is being financed, I take it, through the foreign exchange control board getting the exchange in the first place. Then, if the newsprint companies want their money, a bill is drawn on the foreign importer and taken to the bank, which knows the credit rating of the importer in, say, Brazil, and gives them the money in Canada. What is the need just now for this type of incorporation? Furthermore, as one hon. member brought out a moment ago, how is any agency of government going to know the credit rating of these various foreign importers spread through all the countries of the world? I have always understood, regarding these great discount banks and corporations in London which do a world-wide business, that the partners in their houses learned their business at the breakfast table; they are brought up in the great banking families. How can you learn about the credit rating of these various importers all over the world overnight?

I should like to know more about, in the first place, the need for this type of transaction envisaged by the government, and second, where they are going to get the necessary experience to enable them to avoid serious losses in the carrying on of the business.

Would the minister first of all let us know exactly how the need of this is going to arise? I, of course, read his general remarks about the troubled situation after the war, but why —in answer to our hon. friend the leader of the C.C.F.—cannot the ordinary chartered banks carry on a great deal of this business? Is it intended that this corporation shall supplant some of the commercial activities of our banking system, or is it to step in only when ordinary commercial facilities fail?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I will answer that question by saying that the insurance scheme which is being proposed can be financed by reasonable premiums, and it will be operated along strictly commercial lines.

Mr. JACKMAN: Does insurance mean discount? An exporter wants his money so that he can pay his wage bills, carry on his business and manufacture more stuff. You take the obligation by bill of exchange which the exporter gets and discount it; you put the government of Canada's signature across the back of it so that he can take it to the bank and get his cash, or you discount it yourself. That is what is understood by the ordinary term "discount". You are an endorser. Is that what is meant?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The statement I was just about to make, I think, covers the points raised by the hon. member.

It is intended that the premium income should be sufficient to cover all claims. The premiums will be set in accordance with the risks involved. Some loss may be incurred during the initial stages when experience is being gained, but it is intended that the scheme should stand on its own feet and require no permanent financial assistance from the government.

The insurance scheme will offer no new means of actually financing foreign trade, because it is proposed that the existing facilities of the banks will be used for financing and collecting bills of exchange. It is expected, however, that the insurance scheme will increase the willingness of these private institutions to finance export transactions and thereby place our exporters in a stronger competitive position. Moreover, it is expected that the banks will find it to be in their own interests to assist the administration of the scheme by providing information concerning the standing of foreign importers. This information will be augmented by reports from the various trade commissioners and commercial attaches, the Bank of Canada and other sources.

The risk to be insured is the risk of loss as defined in section 13 of the bill. The details of contracts will be worked out by the directors of the corporation, subject to the conditions imposed including inter alia, adequate premiums to cover probable losses and the acceptance by the exporter of some portion of the risk. The portion to be thus assumed by the exporter will depend upon the nature of the goods, the standing of the importer and other factors.

It is expected that until the corporation gains experience, it will restrict its contracts of insurance to only the better known forms of bills of exchange. The chief risks to be insured will pertain to solvency of the foreign importer, which is the exporter's principal risk, and the transfer of funds. In connection with the latter risk, it would be possible to have a situation where a foreign importer may have discharged his indebtedness to the Canadian exporter by meeting his bills in the local currency of the foreign country but, because of exchange controls or other unforeseen developments, it might not be possible to transfer the local funds to Canadian dollars. The corporation will insure against such risks but not against fluctuations in exchange rates. Except for these general considerations, it is believed to be desirable to leave leeway to the directors of the corporation in order that they may be in a position to relate insurance contracts to the particular risks involved.

Mr. HATFIELD: The insurance could be used the same as a letter of credit, so that the exporter could go to the bank and cash in his insurance policy and get the money to pay for the goods. Is that right?

Mr. ILSLEY: What did the hon. gentleman ask? I thought he had a wrong understanding of the matter altogether.

Mr. HATFIELD: I asked the question whether this insurance policy could be used the same as a letter of credit; an exporter could go to his bank and take his insurance policy and the bank would put up the money to finance the transaction. Is that correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, the fact that he was insured against insolvency or loss owing to the insolvency of the foreign importer would certainly make the bank more willing to finance him.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am endeavouring to get an accurate picture of the whole situation here, but the questions and answers are not indicating very much. I gathered from the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that one of the great difficulties we would have in our international trade after the war would arise from the probable inability of transforming into Canadian funds the money of the nation which may be buying from us.

Mr. ILSLEY: There might be that difficulty.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): One difficulty.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That would be one of the main difficulties?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No; one of the possible difficulties.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let us suppose we sell goods to Belgium. Let us imagine Belgium reestablished as it was before the war. Much will depend upon whether Belgium can send goods to Canada which Canada can accept of sufficient value to pay for the goods which Belgium buys from Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: It may be a matter of multi-angular agreement.

Mr. ILSLEY: We hope to have a multi-angular agreement, not a set of bilateral agreements.

Mr. BLACKMORE: All right; I just gave a simple illustration so that we could get a picture of it. Suppose that Belgium is not able to deliver goods but needs our goods. Before the war we would lend Belgium credit with which she would buy our goods. The nation was doing that on a large scale before the war. Suppose a situation developed in which a nation buying from us could not pay us in goods that we were able to accept; what would be the function of the corporation? What would be the way in which the measure would function in order to expedite and facilitate trade?

Mr. ILSLEY: The corporation would turn the transaction down and the parties would apply to the government under part II of the bill. The government of Canada would then consider whether they would guarantee the obligations of the foreign government or lend money to the foreign government or purchase securities of the foreign government in order to enable exports to go forward.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then it is not in effect a scheme of foreign lending?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are two parts to the bill and they are separate. Under part I there is no foreign lending.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Taking part I and part II together, do they constitute a scheme of facilitating foreign lending?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): You cannot take them together; they are entirely different procedures. As a matter of fact, part I of the bill is a special technique for the purpose of encouraging foreign trade. A manufacturer in an Ontario town, let us say, wants to sell to somebody in Brazil or the Argentine or Peru or some other part of the world. He is a little hesitant about it for various reasons. He may not be sure about conditions; he does not know what they will be; there may be other reasons. Since it is advisable that trade be encouraged and that the producer in Canada be encouraged to export, this measure provides means whereby he can ensure payment of the merchandise he ships.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Where does part II fit into the picture?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have explained that several times. It authorizes lending to the foreign government or guaranteeing the obligations of the foreign government or purchasing the securities of the foreign government to enable the export of Canadian goods to the foreign government or to someone who is sponsored by the foreign government.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And therefore it constitutes purely and simply a scheme of foreign lending—that is, part II.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, pretty much, yes.

Mr. SLAGHT: I have not made a close study of the bill, but I wonder whether the ministers have considered this aspect of it, which goes rather to the whole principle involved. We have new lending organizations coming into being this session very rapidly, involving the lending, as in part II of the bill, of government money. Under our industrial development bank we have set up as a board the governor of the Bank of Canada and his entire staff. They constitute the board of the new industrial development bank. While I have some reservations about the provisions with regard to that bank, I think that is an excellent idea, and in entrusting to the governor and his staff the duties under that measure they are being put in the proper place. Then we have the farm loan bank and that, as will be recalled, is to be administered solely by the Minister of Finance. He administers all the duties under the farm loan bank bill, and that requires the Department of Finance to keep close tab on loans the banks are making under the limited right to lend, and the Minister of Finance there is entrusted with the right of vetoing any class or type of loan which the chartered banks are about to engage in. So that there the Minister of Finance is the hand that controls that type of farm loan.

Now we come to the bill in question, and we are setting up under section 3 an entirely new type of organization to consist of the deputy minister of trade and commerce, the deputy minister of finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada. That is a third composite type of control to look after the banking business that is to be done with the taxpayers' money. I am not for the moment critical, but I am wondering whether the Minister of Finance and his colleague have given thought to whether or not we should spatter out three different types of banks—because this is in part II really a bank lending to foreign governments, a departure indeed—or whether we should not use in the matter of lending, where the taxpayers' money is to be lent, the entire facilities and personnel of the Bank of Canada, who are trained in lending money, taking security and all that. While the present Minister of Finance has displayed great ability in connection with some of the factors that deal with banking and commercial banking, it does seem to me that the true function of the Department of Finance has been in the past, and ought to be maintained in the future, that of controlling perhaps the amount in his budget that we tax the people for, and the amount that we are to borrow, and the various types of loans which have been so successfully handled on the part of the present Minister of Finance—and that is a real man's job by itself. The Minister of Finance should, I think, have full time to spend on that branch of the nation's business, budgeting for taxation, budgeting for borrowing, and he should not begin to assume, as he has done entirely under the farm loan bank, the functions of controlling banking, as he is in part assuming through his deputy minister and bringing in the Department of Trade and Commerce and using as a third the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Glancing at section 22 of part II, which is the lending branch of this departure under this bill, I find that the draftsman has eliminated the governor of the Bank of Canada entirely. Under subsection 1 of section 22 it is provided that "during the three years next ensuing after the coming into force of this part of this act, the governor in council on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce may, if he deems it advisable" and so on, guarantee obligations in foreign countries. Why leave out of that very important task the one man in Canada who ought to be best equipped because of his necessary study of the financial systems of foreign countries? Why drop him?

Mr. JACKMAN: High politics.

Mr. GREEN: Section 24 enables them to use the new corporation as the agency for doing business under part II.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. We are on section 1.

Mr. SLAGHT: That is a query for the minister. It seems to me that we are taking on a great deal of banking business where we are risking the taxpayers' money in new forms of banking. I am not objecting at the moment, but are we not spattering out into these three different types of corporations the important business of the control of lending the money, and if we are should not the whole plan of the administration of this particular bill be reviewed?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is not a new form of banking business; it is not banking at all. Under part II of the bill loans are to be made by the government of Canada to governments of foreign countries, or obligations of foreign governments are to be guaranteed by the government of Canada, or securities of foreign governments are to be purchased by the government of Canada. It would appear to me that the appropriate body to pass upon the advisability or the desirability of entering into transactions of this kind is the body of persons who are responsible to parliament itself, the governor in council. It would be entirely inappropriate to delegate that most important function or set of duties to the Bank of Canada. The Bank of Canada is set up for an entirely different purpose. It was never contemplated for a moment that it should be passing upon the advisability of entering upon this important transaction. Where foreign governments are concerned, matters of the highest policy would be involved on many, many occasions.

Mr. SLAGHT: Would the minister permit an interruption for a moment?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes?

Mr. SLAGHT: How does he differentiate what we are doing under the Industrial Development bank bill? We are placing the entire discretion for lending $250,000,000 under that bill with the governor and with the Bank of Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is within the country. The Industrial Development bank bill will operate on ordinary lending principles, but that may not be the case at all with foreign governments.

Mr. HATFIELD: There will be all kinds of delays under this bill. I have had some experience in that line in the last month. We have an export board in New Brunswick that handles the export of potatoes. It operates under the Special Products Act. The prices board sets the price that we quote to a foreign country, and we have been trying to get the prices board for over a month to quote the Venezuelan government on an order they want shipped out of New York in September. As I understand it, the special products board has been held up here by the wartime prices and trade board. They are afraid, if they allow any potatoes out of the country, that there will not be enough to supply the people and they have held up this order for certified seed. The Venezuelan government is now threatening to go to the western part of the United States, to Minnesota and Idaho, to buy the potatoes and we are likely to lose the trade because of a lot of red tape in Ottawa. They cannot get the sanction of the board. The head office is to be Ottawa. I see all kinds of delay. Unless it is a big corporation and has an agent in Ottawa all the time to deal with this board and get the insurance through, we are going to be tied up and this will delay business. The small exporter will not be in it at all.

Mr. JACKMAN: Before section 1 carries, may I say I still think there is enough doubt in the minds of various members of this committee as to exactly how this proposed corporation is to operate to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Finance to outline just what will happen if one of the paper companies, say the Consolidated Paper Corporation, had a contract to sell ten thousand tons of newsprint at $50 a ton to a publisher in Chile, as may well be the case. What would happen under this new set-up, and why could that transaction not be handled under present banking methods? If that is not the type of case that will come under the new set-up, what type will come under the new set-up? I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that this bill will put Canadian exporters in a stronger competitive position. Well, if we are to export newsprint by giving some of our exporters the benefit, even though it be a financial benefit, through insuring credit of the customer, we are going to have Sweden, Norway and other countries doing the same thing.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): They are already doing that.

Mr. JACKMAN: Then there is going to be a race, and who wins? The only person who wins out of this thing is the person who consumes our product and we are giving away our natural resources for nothing. I think this whole matter requires very careful examination and requires a statement on fundamental policy before we proceed further with the bill.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I have gone over this already. As far as part I of the bill is concerned, let us take the case cited by the hon. member. A firm in Canada is selling paper to an importer in Chile. The purchaser and the vendor in Canada will come together, make an agreement for the sale and for the purchase of this paper. Now that might be handled in the ordinary way through the banks if conditions are satisfactory and the export banker can handle that transaction at the present time. If for any reason he could not—and it is difficult to do it in a great many cases—it then becomes difficult for the exporter to make the shipment; I am not mentioning any particular country now. But in such transactions he can come to this corporation with his contract that he has already arranged, and for a reasonable premium he can get insurance on that contract. It is a simple matter of business. It is being done by all or nearly all exporting countries at the present time.

Mr. GREEN: How many countries have similar arrangements?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Some eighteen countries of which I know.

PRISONERS OF WAR

KILLING OF CANADIAN SOLDIERS AFTER CAPTURE BY GERMANS IN NORMANDY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would ask for the attention of the house to a statement that I am about to make. It is my sad duty this morning to inform hon. members of the circumstances in which nineteen members of the Canadian forces were killed in Normandy. What I have to say is apart altogether from any other matter of a like nature to which I have previously made reference.

In the early days of the invasion it was reported to the supreme commander of the allied expeditionary force that some Canadian soldiers had been shot after capture by the enemy. At the request of the Canadian commander, a court of inquiry composed of officers of the British, United States and Canadian armies was promptly convened. That court has now reported, after most careful investigations, that one Canadian officer and eighteen Canadian other ranks who had been taken prisoner by and were in the custody of the German army were murdered by members of the 12th S.S. reconnaissance battalion of the 12th S.S. panzer division, under the direction of certain of their officers. These Canadian soldiers had the status of prisoners of war and as such were entitled to protection. There is no doubt that they met their deaths in a manner and under circumstances clearly in violation of the well recognized laws and usages of war and of the provisions of the international conventions on the treatment of prisoners of war. In short, they were wilfully murdered by members of the enemy's forces.

The other governments of the commonwealth have joined with the Canadian government in a request to the Swiss government that the results of the inquiry by the court be brought to the attention of the German government, that a demand be made on the German government for an immediate and searching investigation and that the German officers and men responsible be punished. The governments of the commonwealth have also asked the Swiss government to demand that the German government promulgate strict orders to prevent, in future, a repetition of such an occurrence.

As I have said, we have put the findings of the court into the hands of the protecting power. We have asked them to take appropriate action. In the circumstances, this is all that I am able to say on this subject at the moment. There is nothing more that can usefully be said at this time and I hope hon. members will understand the desirability of avoiding unnecessary discussion. I shall conclude simply with the statement that this house humbly pays its sincere tribute to the valour and honour of the dead and expresses its deep and heartfelt sympathy to the families who have been so sadly bereaved. I may say that the next of kin have been notified but that no names are being published.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I bow to the suggestion of the Prime Minister with respect to having no discussion on a matter of this kind. I think he is perfectly right on that, but I may say that it is pretty hard for me to keep quiet in circumstances such as these.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I say just one word in case my silence may be misunderstood, as I believe it has been when some other matters have been brought to the attention of the house. We too join with all others in the house in demanding that when the war is over the people who committed these atrocities shall be suitably punished.

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): May I ask the Postmaster General if there have been any—

Mr. SPEAKER: This question should not be asked on the orders of the day.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I am just following up this matter about prisoners of war in Germany. I understand that for many months there has been an interruption in the mail coming from prisoners of war in Germany. I should like to ask the Prime Minister or the Postmaster General if there is any foundation for this report.

Mr. SPEAKER: That question cannot be asked on the orders of the day.

PRIVILEGE

MR. PICARD—REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MR. BRUCE IN DEBATE ON JULY 31

Mr. L. PHILIPPE PICARD (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. On July 31, the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) referred to me in such words that I feel I must correct the record. I will not repeat all that was said in committee yesterday when I first brought this matter up, but I should like to quote what the hon. member said as reported on page 5674 of Hansard:

> I know the hon. member for Bellechasse has a head of hair which is still black, but I venture to say that he cannot show any better record in this or the last war than the one to which I have just referred.

This, Mr. Speaker, is, in the hon. member for Parkdale's usual manner, an insinuation that I did not perform my duty either in the other war or in this one. I object to that insinuation. I should like to say a word as to my own record and exercise the same right as the hon. member and put it on Hansard. I wish to state, in the same place where the insinuation was made, that in the month of May, 1918, when I was only eighteen years and eight months of age, I enlisted. I have here in my mind a photostatic copy of my enlistment papers on which I find the signature of my father, which authorization was needed as I was still a minor. I have also photostatic copies of my medical papers dated May 20, 1918, on which, after the usual data, is written, "Declared unfit by medical board, mobilization centre M.D. 4—category C3." This photostatic evidence shows that in the last war I did what I thought I should do—I enlisted. I am sorry that systolic murmurs and a mitral lesion were such as to prevent me from joining the service.

At the outbreak of this war I was a few months past forty years of age. I submit that if at the age of eighteen years I was unfit for the reasons I have mentioned, the only contribution I could have made at forty years of age would have been in the nature of administrative work. Instead of that I did what the hon. member said he had done. In the words of the hon member, "my presence in this house is due to the fact that I hope to contribute some war service by being here." The hon. member has put a part of his record on Hansard and I now have explained my own position in the last war. I will consider the incident as closed and forgive the hon. member for the use of such derogatory remarks against my compatriots and myself. "They may be ascribed to inexperience and lack of aptitude," to use the words of a great historian as applied to the hon. member for Parkdale.

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE

MEASURE TO FACILITATE AND DEVELOP TRADE BETWEEN CANADA AND OTHER COUNTRIES

The house resumed from Tuesday, August 1, consideration in committee of bill No. 178, to incorporate the Export Credits Insurance Corporation and to promote the revival of trade by the provision of dominion government guarantees to encourage exports from Canada—Mr. MacKinnon (Edmonton West)—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. JACKMAN: I think the minister was going to give us information as to how the need for this bill arose and some explanation as to the type of transaction which was envisaged by the legislation. Last night he had not finished his explanation, I think, when the eleven o'clock adjournment came.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I do not think that there is anything I can add to what I have already explained on several occasions as to the necessity of the legislation and what it envisages. Without going over the whole ground again, I may say briefly that the purpose of the legislation is to provide assistance to exporters and manufacturers of Canadian products by insuring agreements between the exporter and the importer under part 1.

Mr. JACKMAN: Has there been a demand by exporters for legislation of this type? I think the minister said that the chamber of commerce or some other official organization had approved the plan which had been submitted to them, and I presume that that is the plan which is embodied in this bill. Perhaps the minister would enlighten the committee in that regard so that we may know exactly where the demand has come from and what are the needs which this bill is designed to meet.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): There has been a a very general demand on the part of Canadian producers and exporters and from members of the manufacturers' association for this legislation, and, as I said yesterday, there is a great deal of satisfaction in these quarters that this legislation is being introduced.

Mr. PERLEY: Speaking of the need for this type of legislation, is there similar legislation in Great Britain or the United States? Also I would like to know whether the policies of insurance that may be taken out under this legislation will run for a considerable period, say a year or more. Is there anything in the bill limiting the term of the insurance policy? I have discussed this matter with others and I believe that advantage will be taken of this legislation and that it will be of great assistance to an exporter if he can go to a banker and assure him that he has insurance protection under this legislation for a given period, not just for a month or two, but say six months.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Great Britain has had legislation of this nature—I am referring to part 1—in successful operation for some twenty-six years past and its legislation is still in effect. It is on that legislation that this bill is founded.

As to the length of time the policy will run, the agreements between the exporter and the importer for insurance will be submitted to the corporation. The agreements will be different in different cases, covering different commodities; some may be for a short term and others for a longer term. Every case will be dealt with on its own merits.

Mr. PERLEY: What is the term in Great Britain, and what is the name of their corporation?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The title of the legislation in the United Kingdom is the Overseas Trade Guarantees Act.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister stated that their act had been in operation for twenty-six years. Can he give us any information with respect to the losses which the insurance companies in Great Britain have had to pay?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): There is no detailed information available on the losses on export credits, but any losses which have been suffered by the exceptional conditions of the war have been more than amply met by the reserves which have been built up under the British legislation prior to the war.

Mr. JACKMAN: The hon. member for Qu'Appelle I think had in mind whether there was going to be a contract of insurance issued to a firm covering not just a period of six months, let us say, but two or three years, and whether individual contracts between Canadian exporters and foreign importers were to be guaranteed or whether particular firms would be able to get contracts of insurance that would cover a series of transactions instead of just an individual one, with the insurance running for an extended period. Or is it intended that the insurance will cover just an individual contract which may take three months or so to conclude itself?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It is anticipated that there will be two types of insurance, one covering an individual item of export, and another covering a series of exports which may be handled under one insurance policy. These matters will all be worked out between the exporter and the importer and then be brought to the corporation and be considered on their merits by the corporation.

Mr. WRIGHT: How are the rates on these insurance policies to be determined? It seems to me that there will be a tremendous variation in the risks as between contracts covering different commodities exported to various countries of the world. Is there any actuarial basis on which to assess these risks, or will the insurance cost so much that it will offset any advantage that may be derived from obtaining the insurance?

The CHAIRMAN: We are on the short title, clause 1, and questions are being asked which would more properly be asked under different clauses of the bill. I believe that it is the intention of the committee that we should keep within the ambit of the clause before the committee, so as to have the discussions more relevant. I have made a ruling, and I believe we have to abide by some principle. If we begin now a general discussion, and then go on to the various sections which are to come before the committee, we shall have all kinds of repetition. I do not believe it is the wish of hon. members to have a lot of repetition at the present time, or at any time while in committee on a certain bill.

Mr. PERLEY: We are just getting at the underlying principles of the bill, and this is the section under which that would come.

The CHAIRMAN: I have called section 1, which is "short title". There are times when a certain general discussion takes place; but I do not believe it is the intention of the rule that questions pertaining to different clauses should be asked under the "short title" section.

Mr. PERLEY: If we get a little information now it will facilitate getting through the discussion.

The CHAIRMAN: It will merely mean repetition.

[Mr. Jackman.]

Mr. GRAYDON: I believe there has been a disposition on the part of members of the committee and of the house to facilitate the passage of these measures as much as possible. But there is a minimum amount of discussion of matters of this kind which must be had either on the resolution stage, in committee on the second reading or it finally ends up on third reading. I think some latitude might properly be given by the Chair in this instance, because in this particular bill little discussion took place on the resolution and practically none on the second reading. Perhaps the matter might be left in the good judgment of the Chair.

Mr. WRIGHT: May I ask upon what section of the bill my question might properly be asked, if not on the short title?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I might give the answer now to the hon. member's question. It is the intention that the premium rates shall be adequate to cover the risks. They must be low enough to accomplish this purpose and to encourage exporters to avail themselves of the protection provided by the insurance scheme, but at the same time be not so low as to lay the scheme open to the accusation that it is in any way subsidizing Canada's export trade. Recent international agreements have emphasized the undesirable effects of export subsidies, and it is the intention that this insurance scheme will not depart from that principle. In other words, exporters must compete on the basis of price, quality, service and similar factors and use the insurance scheme merely as a means of protecting themselves from certain risks. To this extent it will place Canadian exporters in a position of competitive equality with the exporters of other countries who are offered similar insurance schemes or who have similar insurance schemes available to them now in successful operation.

Mr. COLDWELL: Can the minister give the committee any information as to the costs in other countries, the premiums, and so on, which would be a guide to the committee?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I have not that before me now. That is something which the corporation when set up will take in hand.

Mr. COLDWELL: What I had in mind was this. We are passing a bill which may involve the country in considerable expense, and while I am not opposing it at all I think the house should have information upon which to base a judgment. We have no information as to the manner in which the costs will be arrived at, what they are likely to be, or what the experience of the corporation may be, and we might be able to get some idea from the experiences of countries which are using this method of export insurance.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The United Kingdom, on whose legislation this is largely based, does not publish any rates, does not give that information; rates are set for each contract. It is a matter which will have to be dealt with by the corporation when it is set up. The general manager of the corporation will have to be carefully selected, will have to be a man of experience in these lines, and his advisers will have to have these qualifications.

Mr. HATFIELD: Will an exporter be able to secure a blanket policy, say for a year, or will he have to take out a policy for each transaction?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I answered that question a moment ago. There may be an individual policy or there may be a blanket policy.

Mr. JACKMAN: What powers will the corporation have under section 1 particularly which the chartered banks do not possess at the present time to aid in the financing of foreign exports?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It is not the thought that the corporation will compete with the banks at all, and I am sure that the banks will welcome this legislation as an assistance to their customers. I cannot understand the attitude of my hon. friends, may I say particularly the hon. member who has just spoken, in connection with this legislation.

Mr. JACKMAN: We do not understand it; that is the only thing.

Mr. COLDWELL: One other point. If a premium is to be set, are all exporters to be brought under the scheme and compelled to pay the premium?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well then, if not, you are only insuring the bad risks and therefore the premium will probably have to be very high. It confirms what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; we are running the risk of the good trades making a good profit for the individuals or corporations that make the trade, and the country is apt to take the loss on the poor risks, unless the premium is very high and perhaps almost prohibitive. I think we should have a clearer picture of what we are undertaking in this bill. I can see some circumstances under which this is a very good measure indeed. On the other hand, I think the committee is entitled to more information than we are getting, regarding the basis of premiums and the method of operation and so on.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I believe all that can be done now is to give in a general way the objectives of the legislation. Details to which my hon. friend has just referred must be worked out by the corporation. Although exporters will not be in any way compelled to come in under this legislation, it is hoped that the legislation will be largely used.

Mr. CRERAR: I think the purpose of this measure is clearly set out in the preamble; that is, that it is desirable to promote the revival of trade and particularly during a period of transition. Before the war Canada traded with a great many countries, including practically every European state. The war has brought about a condition in Europe of complete disorganization, and the problem so far as our external trade is concerned with these countries and their particular problem within their own boundaries is to get their economic life reorganized so that they can proceed on a more secure basis after the war terminates. Years ago I had a good deal of experience, if I may modestly say it, in export business. There were certain places where exporters would not sell grain because of the risk involved; there were other countries with which, by virtue of their reputation for paying their debts and meeting their obligations, business proceeded on a secure basis. Let us picture for a moment the conditions which will exist when the war is terminated and these countries, particularly in Europe and the far east, attempt to get their economic life reestablished. What shall we find? We shall probably find that the old firms, for instance in European countries, with whom Canadian exporters did business year by year, have disappeared.

But individuals of these firms may still be alive. They may endeavour to get their business reestablished and import goods that the people of their country need for the ordinary affairs of life. What will happen? Let me give an illustration: You may have a country like Norway, which has suffered tremendously during the war. Norway may want to import certain types of machines or machine tools or goods of another character to get her own economy reestablished. This measure provides a method of giving encouragement, or getting the wheels going again. It is founded after all on two simple principles, the first principle that of insurance and the second, in part II of the act, the principle of direct government intervention. Let us suppose an exporter in Canada gets an inquiry from a firm in Norway for one hundred thousand dollars' worth of machine tools. He says, "Can I safely take that risk? I know these people; they are honourable, they are good people. But what assurance have I that when I ship the goods with a draft attached to them they will be able to meet the draft on the other side so that I shall be paid for my goods?" That is where this measure steps in, as I understand it. The exporter in this case can take out a policy of insurance that he will receive payment for his goods. A premium is charged to him on the insurance and he doubtless adds to the price of his goods the cost of the premium he pays to the corporation. Well, the goods are shipped. He receives payment. The premium remains in the insurance fund. You can duplicate that scores or hundreds of times with machine tools or grain or pulp and paper or any other commodity we may be selling from Canada.

Mr. SLAGHT: Suppose he does not get paid?

Mr. CRERAR: If he does not get paid, then it is charged against the insurance fund the same as if a man's house burns down the loss is charged against the insurance company to whom he has paid premiums. But in carrying out the transaction you have not only the care taken by the individual himself; it will be the duty and the responsibility of the corporation to see that at any rate the risk is a moderately reasonable one, and if it is, the insurance applies.

There may be other cases. There may be cases where a firm in France, say, wants to buy goods. They say, "We cannot pay cash; we cannot meet sight drafts against these goods because we have first to sell them and get paid for them." That was a common practice years ago in the shipment of grain particularly to southern European countries. This is a case where the insurance principle could apply and the exporter could go ahead with a reasonable sense of security that he would be paid for his goods. You have to depend largely after all, in the final analysis, on the reputation, the character and the integrity of a country and of the people of the country that you are doing business with. Business everywhere has been developed and built largely on that principle, and it is simple. In this way an effort is made to rebuild confidence, to restore an opportunity to these countries to secure things they need on a basis that is reasonably safe. That is what is being sought. It is quite possible that in the carrying out of the transactions envisaged under this bill occasions may arise where losses will occur, and in that case the insurance fund is intended to meet such losses.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar raised a question about the rate of insurance premium. I would think the rates of insurance premiums would vary, perhaps in some cases greatly. It is a sound principle of insurance that the premium rate always bears a relationship to the risk involved, and you might have certain circumstances where the risk was very little, where the premium rate would be low, or other cases where the risk was greater and the premium rate would be higher. That is a sensible arrangement. I think the minister is entitled to a great deal of credit for working out a measure of this kind. There are in this country possibilities of supplying the devastated countries of Europe with much of what they will need. The whole UNRRA organization is based on the principle that in the early months at any rate, or in the early years, if you like, these countries will not be in a position to find exchange or means to pay for the things they require, and so in the UNRRA principle it is intended that they shall be given this help to get them reestablished; and it is good business for Canada to get Europe reestablished, because Europe was one of our best markets before the war. And so we come along with this.

I agree with the leader of the opposition that the discussion, particularly after the bill got into committee the other evening, was pretty much a discussion that should have taken place on the second reading. The discussion now is not dealing with any particular clause. That is why I crave a little freedom in wandering over a part of the bill, as I am doing now. I think you would have the same risks, perhaps in a greater degree, if, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said, this whole business were managed by an export board in Canada. After all, what you get under this bill and by this procedure is the collective judgment—not the collective judgment, perhaps, but the individual judgments of people scattered all over this country, people who have had experience in doing business of this kind. Speaking frankly, I do not think that it could be confined within the narrow compass of an export board and get the experience and judgment that you can by what is proposed here.

The second part of the bill is very simple in its operation. In this part the method of operation is set out clearly in section 22. Perhaps a country like China wishes to deal with us. Our Canadian exporters know nothing about China, and yet anyone who knows anything about the general situation in that country realizes that there is a tremendous work of reconstruction to be done there once peace comes. But suppose the Chinese government or a Chinese business firm should inquire of Canada whether they can buy five hundred thousand dollars' worth of electrical machinery or any kind of goods or equipment. The deal cannot go through because the Canadian exporter does not know a thing about China—or, at best he knows very little—and he does not know whether he will ever get paid for his goods. However the Chinese government comes to the Canadian government, and says, "Will you give us a loan of $100,000,000?", or, "Will you guarantee our bonds for $100,000,000?" And then the proceeds of that loan, or the proceeds of the sale of the bonds, perhaps to Canadian nationals, on a government guarantee, are placed in a bank in Canada, and the goods are delivered say to Vancouver for shipment. But before the goods leave Vancouver the firm supplying those goods is paid from the proceeds from the loan. That was precisely what happened at the time of the last war in connection with a loan negotiated with Roumania. It did not prove a very good risk, I may say. I recall however that at the time that loan was made—and I think it was one for $20,000,000—Roumanian securities were taken in exchange. Then the goods were shipped to Roumania, and the person shipping the goods from Canada was paid from the proceeds of the loan.

Mr. GRAYDON: Did we ever get that money back?

Mr. CRERAR: No, I do not think we did. And I have no hesitation in saying to my hon. friend that, so far as I was personally concerned at the time the loan was made, I thought it was a rotten risk. But countries with which we have done business in the past have not been like that. For instance, one might have in mind the Scandinavian countries, where the sense of business integrity and personal honour is high. The reputation of those countries for meeting their obligations has been good. Obviously the risks in dealing under this measure with nationals of countries of that kind are much less than when dealing with governments or peoples of countries, the standard of business integrity of which might not be nearly as high.

In my view this is a very constructive measure. It is true that in the end we may have some loss. In the meantime, however, it is a mechanism for getting much needed goods and supplies to these devastated countries, for purposes of their reconstruction. I say to the committee—and I am sure every member will agree—that it is of great importance to Canada that countries like Belgium, France, Norway, Denmark and Holland be reestablished and get going again in a normal fashion. Perhaps we are not so greatly concerned with selling goods in the next year or two; but if we have long vision, as we should have, we must be concerned with what our opportunities will be for trading with those countries, not two years from now, but possibly five years, ten years or twenty-five years from now. In my view this measure will help to bring about the desired end.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there any parallel between the principle of mutual aid in war and the principle behind this measure, in peace?

Mr. CRERAR: As was pointed out last night by the Minister of Finance, this is not a mutual aid measure at all, in the sense in which we have been discussing mutual aid in the house in the past two or three years. Mutual aid was simply a provision of goods by the Canadian government to countries which could not otherwise pay for them, so that those countries might wage war more effectively. This measure is on a different basis. For instance, it contemplates, under part II—and reference was made to this last night—that if for example the government of China gets a loan of $100,000,000 from the Canadian government, either directly or through the guarantee of Chinese bonds which may be bought by Canadain nationals, the loan will be paid. That is expected on the part of both parties to the contract. But that is not the condition in connection with the mutual aid bills we have had under consideration. Under part I of this bill the goods are shipped, the insurance premium is paid, and all is done under the expectation that the draft against such goods will be paid. The insurance principle is to provide that if, in any event, something happens as a result of which a particular shipment is not paid for, these funds can be called upon. Precisely the same principle is applied in connection with the insurance of our homes. For instance, for the last forty years I have had my home insured, but I have never had to call upon any insurance fund. During that time however, I have had the protection. Perhaps someone else who carried insurance suffered a fire loss, and collected from the insurance company. The same simple principle is found in this bill.

Mr. PERLEY: I think the minister has laid a pretty good foundation for a number of questions which I should like to ask before leaving to attend a committee sitting. I do not think what he has said will facilitate the passage of the bill, because he has spoken for the last twenty minutes—as a matter of fact I timed him at nineteen minutes. It would have been much better procedure to have let the minister in charge of the bill answer some of the questions which the minister who has just spoken tried to answer.

Mr. CRERAR: I should have kept quiet.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister said yesterday that there was a general request for this measure by exporters. What type of exporters will take advantage of the measure? Will they be exporters of natural products, or exporters of industrial products? To what extent does the minister expect grain exporters to take advantage of the measure?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I can say to the hon. member at the outset that it will be largely the smaller exporters of manufactured goods. But the legislation makes provision to cover any exporter of any line of goods.

Mr. HATFIELD: If all exporters do not come under the regulations set up by the board, then the small exporters will not have a chance in the world of gaining anything from this measure.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): They all come under the board.

Mr. HATFIELD: I understood the minister to say a few moments ago that they did not have to come under the board.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): They do not have to, but they all may come under it.

Mr. HATFIELD: They may; but if they do not all have to come under, the small exporters will not have a chance, because the large exporters, who have branches in foreign countries, will secure this business before the small exporters can get their applications through the board, and get into the business. We had the same experience when dealing with South America. We found that the governments of South American countries furnished so much exchange for the purchase of certain import goods. It was our experience that the automobile manufacturers and the paper manufacturers, with their branches in South American countries, took over all that exchange and got all the business before the small exporters had a chance to get any of the business. The same will happen in this instance. The small exporters will not have a chance.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I believe this corporation will assume the risk in connection with a situation such as my hon. friend has just described.

Mr. HATFIELD: Yes, but the large exporters with branches and salesmen on the ground will have the advantage over the small exporters and they will have all the business before the small exporter can get through all the red tape.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): There is no attempt made to eliminate competition.

Mr. GREEN: It does seem to me that one point about the bill which is most important is the ability of the Canadian government to check the credit rating of the firms or governments abroad. Under part I of the bill the Canadian government, through the new corporation, is going to underwrite risks, is going to stand behind the credit of foreign importers. This means that the Canadian government has a very heavy responsibility for determining whether or not the foreign firm is solvent and likely to pay its bills. In pre-war years the obligation to determine the solvency of a foreign importing firm rested with the Canadian exporter and his bank. It was very much their business to find out whether or not they were likely to be paid. Now that responsibility is being partially shifted to the Canadian government, and I doubt very much whether the Canadian government or this new corporation will have the proper facilities for determining whether or not a firm abroad is apt to pay its bills. In any event it is of vital importance that the government and this corporation should have those facilities. It is even more important in connection with transactions under part II of the bill, because there we are talking about big money. We are not concerned about a deal for $100,000 between a Canadian exporting firm and a Belgian importing firm; we are talking about a loan of $100,000,000 to China. Is the Canadian government equipped at the present time, or will it be equipped in the post-war years, to determine whether or not there is a reasonable chance of a nation repaying the loan? The Minister of Mines and Resources spoke very glibly about the Canadian government lending $100,000,000 to the Chinese government. We may very well find that what we are doing in effect is buying our own goods and giving them to China, just as we are doing at the present time under mutual aid.

The point I want to make is this. What facilities will the Canadian government have to determine whether or not any loans made under part II of the act, and the purchase price set out in the contracts under part I of the act, will be repaid? I should like to have some explanation on that point from one or other of the ministers.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend says I spoke rather glibly about lending $100,000,000 to China. I used that only as an illustration. Then my hon. friend asked what steps the government will take to find out whether or not that $100,000,000 can be safely lent to China. Well, they will find out in the very same way my hon. friend would proceed if he had a factory and someone came along wanting to buy that factory, offering a ten per cent cash payment. My hon. friend would find a way to ascertain whether or not that was a good risk.

Mr. GREEN: What facilities has the Canadian government for getting that information?

Mr. CRERAR: It is true that at the moment we have not very many facilities, but we have had a long experience with China through our trade commissioners. All that organization will have to be rebuilt when peace comes. Probably the corporation will send its own representative to China to study the situation on the ground. The point I am making is that the corporation will take the same steps that would be taken by any ordinary business concern or individual to ascertain the value of the risk. If in this case the Chinese government approached the Canadian government for a loan, the Canadian government has means of finding out—

Mr. GREEN: What are they?

Mr. CRERAR: I will tell you one. We have an ambassador in China, and have had him there for several years.

Mr. GREEN: That is one means.

Mr. CRERAR: Does that not provide a very good basis on which to obtain information about China?

Mr. GREEN: That is a start.

Mr. JACKMAN: No.

Mr. GRAYDON: The external affairs department and the trade and commerce department are not properly linked together, to start with, in order to handle these matters in other countries.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not think that is really a very important criticism.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think you will find that it is pretty important.

Mr. CRERAR: Just a moment; I want to tell my hon. friend that the diplomatic service and our trade and commerce service, through their agents abroad, do work together closely.

Mr. GRAYDON: They do not have a very good chance, when the two departments are not very close together here.

Mr. GREEN: Is that the only means the Canadian government has to determine whether or not this $100,000,000 will be repaid? The minister has said we have an ambassador in China. That is very good; we have a good ambassador there, but it would be placing a very heavy responsibility upon him to say that we depend on him to make sure that this $100,000,000 will be repaid to Canada. I submit there must be some better method worked out for determining the question of repayment in connection with these loans. Otherwise two or three years from now we may wake up and find that we have lost the whole $300,000,000 that can be advanced to foreign governments under this bill, and I would point out to the minister that this amount is almost equal to the peace-time budget of this nation.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Is the hon. member referring particularly now to part II of the bill?

Mr. GREEN: In my original question I referred to both part I and part II. The Canadian government is now going into the credit business; it is going to have to acertain who can pay their bills and who cannot, something the Canadian government really has not had to do hitherto in respect to export trade. What facilities are to be set up for checking credits?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): We are setting up a corporation which will develop the necessary procedure for obtaining credit information, as would be done by any ordinary business organization operating along the same lines.

Mr. MacNICOL: All business organizations did that.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): To start with, from the very nature of this insurance of contracts as between the exporter and the importer, we will have access to the credit information held by the banks at the present time, and will have their close cooperation.

Mr. JACKMAN: Then why not use the banks for this business?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Because this proposal is going to operate in a much larger way than has been the case in the past, and in a way that is very satisfactory not only to the exporters but I am sure to the banks. Then in answer particularly to the comment of the hon. member for Vancouver South, may I say that quite a substantial portion of our mail in the Department of Trade and Commerce is from wholesalers asking for direct credit information on prospective customers in foreign countries. They write us because they know we have a very excellent trade commissioner service under the commercial intelligence branch, with staffs in all these countries, and even without this legislation we are continually obtaining for them credit information which they find most valuable in making shipments to these countries. That trade commissioner organization is being and will be extended, and will be used to secure credit information in connection with these guaranteed risks. Then the corporation itself, as time goes on, will build up its own credit organization in its own ways.

Mr. GREEN: What are some of them?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I just told you some of them.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has mentioned using the credit facilities of the banks in order to obtain information, and he has mentioned the commercial intelligence service of the Department of Trade and Commerce, both of which I agree will be very helpful. What else has the government in mind? Surely it has given some consideration to this question. The minister says the corporation will be set up and will work this all out. There is too much of a tendency to leave everything to the corporation and not work out any of the details beforehand. Surely the government gave this question some consideration before bringing in this bill.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Credit information will be built up on a large scale, just as any business house would build it up. It comes from a variety of sources, and many of these sources develop as the business of the corporation develops. I think anyone who has had direct contact with business of this nature will readily understand what I mean. I am not in position to specify particularly at the present time the type of information that will be required to enable them to handle this.

[Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

Mr. GREEN: Is it not a fact that the great bulk of Canadian exports before, during and after the war have been and will be to the United States, Great Britain and other members of the British commonwealth? I presume that there will not be many government loans to those particular countries, nor will there be a need for insuring the transactions between Canadian exporters and importers in those countries. If I am correct, then the countries that will be helped will be foreign countries such as France, Belgium and China.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): What part of the bill is the hon. member dealing with ?

Mr. GREEN: Both parts. It seems to me that there will have to be quite an expansion of the commercial intelligence service in countries such as France, Belgium and China. Perhaps some other means could be found to check more closely the credit of firms in those particular countries that would be importing from Canada. Could the minister answer my question as to whether there will be a need of either part I or part II in connection with business with the United States, Great Britain and commonwealth countries?

The CHAIRMAN: I know it will not be popular to say this, but I believe a lot of the discussion that has taken place would have been better carried on under part II of the bill. A lot of the present discussion is germane to that section. There is bound to be repetition when we come to part II, and I believe we should avoid that as much as possible.

Mr. GREEN: The Minister of Mines and Resources took up about twenty minutes wandering all over the bill. He gave a very interesting speech and I was glad to hear it. I do not think it is fair now that we should be checked up when the minister was allowed to get away with murder, as it were.

The CHAIRMAN: I am in the hands of the committee, but I am bound to see that the rules are followed. I think the hon. member for Vancouver South will readily realize that when we come to part II there is bound to be a repetition of the discussion we are having at the present time, and surely it is not the intention of members of the committee that that should occur.

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps I could have an answer to my question and then I will not ask any more.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): While it is true that Canada's export trade will be confined largely to the countries mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver South, a portion of the total which is very important to the producers of Canada will be done with the smaller countries on this hemisphere and in other parts of the world.

Mr. GREEN: What percentage of our export trade would that be?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I do not want to make a guess at it, but relatively it would not be over twenty per cent. Anything that will encourage that trade is most important.

Mr. GREEN: Will this measure be needed in connection with trade between Canada, the United States and Great Britain?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Part I will be needed.

Mr. HATFIELD: Is the government going to carry this insurance or will it reinsure with Lloyds?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Oh, no; certainly not with Lloyds. The government will carry it.

Mr. HATFIELD: If I sold a bill of goods on 90 or 120 days time, would this insurance apply?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes, if the risk is acceptable. The corporation will have the right of selection on these risks. Our intention is that the corporation shall operate in a proper and sound business way, charging sufficient premiums to take care of the cost of the operation. The corporation will not be expected to assume all risk, it will have the power of selection. I think that is a very important point.

Mr. HATFIELD: What time is it going to take to find out whether the risk is sound? How long is it going to delay the transaction?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I do not know whether we can get very far with that question. It may take a little longer with some cases than with others, but it is hoped that the operations of the corporation will be brought to a point at the earliest possible date where quick and rapid service can be given to exporters.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask a hypothetical question. If the road machinery corporation received an order for half a million dollars' worth of road machinery from a purchaser in South Africa, could they not sell direct if they wanted to?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Oh, yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: They would not have to go through all this tommyrot that has been talked about this morning. What the XX machinery corporation would do would be to send its own man to South Africa to satisfy itself if the credit of the purchaser was good. If they found that the credit was good they would ship the road machinery to South Africa. If we had to go through all this stuff we have listened to lately there would not be any business carried on between this and any other country.

Mr. WRIGHT: The Minister of Mines and Resources raised an interesting point when he said that where an exporter was shipping to a foreign country which did not have cash available he might accept the bonds of that country in payment for his goods and under this bill the government would guarantee those bonds.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think my colleague said that; I do not think he envisaged the possibility of an exporter taking bonds. There is power given to the government to guarantee securities.

Mr. WRIGHT: If there is power in the bill to do that it raises the possibility of the government guaranteeing bonds of a foreign country which bear a much higher rate of interest than the bonds of this country. In guaranteeing those bonds the government would be providing an investment to the exporter which he could not get in this country.

Mr. ILSLEY: The government certainly would be foolish to guarantee bonds bearing ten per cent interest in payment of goods sold. Something must be left to the judgment of the government. My hon. friend seems to assume that where the bonds of a foreign country are carrying a high rate because they are risky the government of this country would guarantee them and place them in the hands of an exporter to cover the purchase price of goods sold. The bonds would bear a high rate of interest because they are dangerous to hold, and the dominion government would not do that. The object of this bill is to see that the exporter of Canada gets his money, not that he gets a high return on an investment.

Mr. JACKMAN: I wish to confine my remarks to part I of the bill because I think part II has to do with politics and government considerations rather than with strictly business considerations. If the government will admit that under this measure they are endeavouring to stimulate employment or, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar says, create great profits for our people; if the government foresees the possibility of losing a substantial amount of money in carrying out that purpose, then I would understand this bill a little more clearly. However, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has stated that the rates to be charged for the insurance policies issued on these foreign credits will be adequate. That means that taken over the balance there will be a sufficient measure of gain to offset those credit risks which prove faulty. If it is true that this new enterprise is going to run without loss to the taxpayers of Canada, then I see nothing about the nature of the business which cannot be undertaken by the chartered banks under their present set-up.

They have been engaged in foreign trade for a great many years. We have become the fourth or fifth largest trading nation of the world in peace time and we have no such institution as is contemplated by this bill. But the chartered banks were able to carry on their financing with complete satisfaction not only to the country but to the business men and industrial companies and natural products companies, who were able to carry on and meet their bills successfully. If there is to be any substantial loss I do not see what the purpose of the legislation is, and yet, if it is going to be of help to business or in job creation, I want to be among the first to be numbered among the supporters of this measure. We should have more information as to what is contemplated. My own feeling is that some of these measures that are brought down by the government are nothing more than brain waves of civil servants or deputies who think they see a way to be helpful, and they, having the confidence of their ministers, propose a bill and the first thing we know it is brought down, all under the guise of something that is going to be helpful in the post-war period. I characterize the Industrial Development bank as being in that class to some extent, and for all I know this measure may be somewhat the same.

I have no doubt that a good deal of the mail of the Department of Trade and Commerce is from small manufacturers and business men in Canada who would like to get into foreign trade. Everybody is not suited for that trade, even though he may think he would like to get in it and get some gain from it. So that many of these letters have to be discounted as being an impossible situation. One of my friends who is working for the government at the present time told me that a large number of small companies in Canada were thinking of getting together to form an export association in order to take advantage of some of the possibilities which one firm in itself was too small to take advantage of and could not make the necessary contacts, but they felt that if they had an organization in their particular trade or industry they would be able to get somewhere. I dare say that there are many small companies that could better their interests along these lines.

I should like to say a word about the ideas put forward by the Minister of Mines and Resources when he said, and he was backed up by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that this new government corporation would set up facilities for checking the credit risk of these foreign importers. The minister as he pursued his explanation admitted that they would have to use the banks in the foreign countries. All those banks have correspondent relations with our own chartered banks. The managers know each other, and it is not unusual for them to do business together over the telephone because they have complete trust in one another. You have that system already set up and there is no need, as I see it, to set up a duplicatory system. It is quite true that our trade representatives whom we maintain in various countries can be helpful. but their information is also available to the banks. Our trade representatives have a multitude of duties to perform and I do not see how it would be possible for them to have the same intimate contact which the banker in a foreign country can have in regard to the credit standing of a particular importer. The confidential relationship which exists between banks gives to our bankers, and through them to our own exporters, an intimate and accurate knowledge which is not possible under any other system. Certainly we have had no indication to the contrary.

There is also the point about how much staff is going to be required in carrying out the functioning of this corporation, particularly as set forth by the minister, and also what the cost of that will be. May I point out that every time that we set up one of these government corporations or committees we withdraw from productive employment anywhere from one hundred to a thousand people, as we are doing under the family allowance measure. The nation will be that much the poorer. We must economize in the use of our man-power in the post-war period.

Is it the intention of the government to establish the head office of this corporation in Ottawa? If department officials have to be consulted by exporters it would seem to me that Ottawa would be the last possible place where one could get efficiency and promptness of action, and as the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton says, time is of the essence of these contracts. I do not see how any civil servant, even though he be the deputy of a department, could say to an exporter when he comes to see him and lay his plan before him: Yes, that is all right; go ahead—because the deputy has to think of a lot of things, of an opposition that is going to criticize if something goes wrong, and so forth. You just cannot bring business into politics or politics into business and have efficiency and have business function satisfactorily to the people. So that I feel that if we could possibly use the chartered banks we would be much better off than if we were to try to set up this system, which will lead to a lot of duplication. Certainly I would hope that the head office of the corporation would be in Montreal, where most of the exports take place, with branch offices in Vancouver and some other large cities.

Mr. ILSLEY: Assume that there is a risk of insolvency in connection with this trade; in what way would the chartered banks collect anything to cover that risk, their interest rate being limited?

Mr. JACKMAN: If there are any services which this corporation can perform that are outside the scope of the banks there may be some justification for it, but the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that the premiums charged for this insurance would be adequate, and if they are adequate for the government why would they not be adequate for private enterprise?

Mr. ILSLEY: The banks have no power to charge such premiums.

Mr. JACKMAN: We have not passed the Bank Act and we could put through the necessary amendment. It is a little difficult to understand how this house can be asked to allow the government to charge a rate which it will not allow the banks to charge. I think that the suggestion of the minister, while no doubt based on facts, is preposterous. It means that the government is going to be allowed to take more out of the individual, because it is needed, not because they want a profit, than the bankers can charge under the Bank Act, which has the imprimatur of the government. The answer to the whole thing is that the government is hamstringing the banking system of this country so that it cannot engage in the export business because its rate is limited to five per cent, and that is not sufficient, and the minister has just admitted it. The minister has clearly admitted that there should be another amendment to the Bank Act whereby the banks should be allowed to charge an adequate rate for foreign credits.

I should like to know how much staff will be necessary under this measure. There is another small point. If some of these risks go bad, as the Minister of Finance has just suggested they may, the government will no doubt take over the rights of the exporters and sue the importer in a foreign country. Once again we are in danger of getting into international complications. There is another difficulty. No international complications are likely to arise when a private firm in this country sues a private firm in another country. But once you get governments mixed into the thing you have rights and wrongs being decided, and matters of opinion, and of course nationals will always side with their own people; so that while I would not like to go so far as to say that this would be a fruitful source of international discord, I believe that if business can be carried on by private enterprise in one country with private enterprise in another country you are likely to save yourself a great deal of trouble.

I do not think there are any other points which I wish to raise at the present time. If this measure were going to be helpful at all to industry and would assist in creating jobs I should be whole-heartedly for it, but I still feel that the government has made out no case for it, and I suspect that it is the brain-wave of some person who has not had a great deal of practical experience.

Mr. CRERAR: Is my hon. friend opposed to the measure?

Mr. JACKMAN: I believe my position should be very clear to the committee and to the minister, if he was listening.

Mr. GRAHAM: Listening to the hon. member for Rosedale, the hon. member for Vancouver South and other hon. members opposite, one would think that we were living in a perfectly normal world, one which had not been engaged in a war of unprecedented destructiveness for four and a half years, and in which war had not produced chaos both in the form and in the character of government and in the economy of a great many countries engaged in or directly affected by the war.

The present legislation is to assist in recreating a healthy world out of a sick world. When the international household is such that all its members are sick in varying degrees, one must call in doctors, submit to the ministration of nurses, and follow many regulations as to conduct, nutrition and so forth, and if the household submits to the dictates of the doctor and the nurses who are in charge, recovery may come fairly quickly, with the result that normal channels of intercourse between nations can be reestablished. The most desirable state is, of course, a condition of affairs wherein the Canadian exporter can seek the importer in the foreign country who wishes to purchase and pay for the goods which the Canadian has for export. But I would point out something which is occasionally forgotten, that any measure which has for its purpose the encouragement of exports is of necessity also a bill for the encouragement of imports, because the one is a corollary of the other. When one mentions exports and imports it is something like raising the question which came first, the egg or the hen. No one can answer that. But of necessity, when we encourage the export of Canadian goods we—quite properly and in the best interests of this country—are encouraging imports.

Take this bill and consider it. I realize it is a measure which is forced upon this country because of the practical difficulties which Canada and other countries will face in the post-war period.

Mr. JACKMAN: The scheme of the bill is supposed to be self-supporting. What are the difficulties? Anything which is self-supporting does not need to get help of any kind from the government.

Mr. POTTIER: Order.

Mr. GRAHAM: Has the hon. member for Rosedale considered the position of Germany? For instance, what type of government will be in power in Germany after the war?

Mr. JACKMAN: I don't know, and we won't trade unless they are all right.

Mr. GRAHAM: How much reliance shall we be able to place in that government? Who will know the financial position of any German importer after the ravages of four and a half years of war?

Mr. JACKMAN: Well, an exporter will know as much as a government will know.

Mr. GRAHAM: I can name country after country which to the same or a lesser extent will be facing similar problems. Austria, France, Roumania and many other states will have the same difficulties to meet; and, as the Minister of Mines and Resources pointed out, this measure is a sensible recognition by Canada of the need to encourage the recreation of world trade, both exports and imports. The bill will permit the small exporter to export without assuming a risk which, because he has so little knowledge of conditions in the country with which he hopes to trade, might result in his ruin. The large corporations, with their ability to spread the risk because of the volume of their business, can more easily assume in the post-war world the risks in carrying on export business. It seems to me therefor that this bill will enable the small exporter to carry on business with the aid of an agency which for a certain premium and under certain conditions will assume the risk. On the other hand, realizing that in the post-war world it may be quite impossible for the exporter or the corporation under this bill to assume the risk of dealing with some individual importers in foreign countries—

Mr. JACKMAN: He pays for it. He does not get it for nothing.

Mr. GRAHAM: —we set up other remedies. If we have confidence in the integrity of the government in power in the foreign country we ask it to place its guarantee on the standing and financial ability of its importer to pay, and the matter is arranged between governments. But I do urge that the committee consider the purpose and the necessity of the measure in the world in which we are living and in which we shall continue to live for an uncertain number of years. The bill has merit and should be supported if we are sincere in desiring to get export trade back into normal channels, not only in this country but in the other countries with which we hope to trade.

Let me remind hon. members of the opposition that while this measure may present problems as regards accepting the guarantee of a foreign government, we should put ourselves in the position of that foreign government when it in turn is called upon to guarantee on behalf of some private importer in that country payment for the goods which he proposes to import. In my opinion other governments will not continue longer than necessary to pursue that method of doing business, because countries do not like to assume that type of obligation. So that this measure is a stop-gap, based upon realization of the conditions in which we are living and the practical difficulties which Canadian trade will face in the post-war years, and is a very sensible and practical attempt to help solve that problem.

Mr. HATFIELD: I should like to point out that no one who has spoken on this bill has declined to support it; what we want to do is to try to make it better. I would ask the minister if the board which is to be set up will have the power to exchange goods. Suppose an importer in a foreign country has a thousand tons of raw sugar which he wishes to exchange for a thousand tons of Canadian goods; will this board have the power to exchange goods?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): If I understand correctly the hon. member's question, the answer is no. This is an insurance corporation.

Mr. HATFIELD: It cannot be done under the second part of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. ADAMSON: No. Before it carries I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Mines and Resources.

The CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. member for York West that the Department of Trade and Commerce is dealing with this particular bill and the remarks of the hon. gentleman should be applied to the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON: What I desire to say has a definite bearing on the bill. But, I submit, so did the remarks of the Minister of Mines and Resources and of the Minister of Finance. What I want to know is this. While this is an insurance corporation, what liaison is there, what machinery is it proposed to set up between this corporation and the international bank or the organization that will eventually come out of the Bretton Woods conference? No matter what you do in any trade, particularly in international trade, the most important thing you have to make sure of is what you are to be paid in. It is all very well to say that you will be paid in something; but you have to be paid in something that is translatable into something else with which you can pay your costs of operation in Canada. Whether that will be gold or some other currency, I do not know; but it is vitally important that before we can reestablish any degree of international trade some idea of a basis of currency has to be decided upon, and this bill, while I appreciate that it is an insurance measure solely, has as far as I can see no clause in it which effects a liaison with the international bank. I think this is very important, because there will be two sections of the world after the war is over, apart from the north American continent, which will probably be able to pay in a currency that is valid to us, namely gold. South America is building up considerable gold resources, and so is the orient. Now we are going to have to deal in a different way with the oriental and the South American countries from the way in which we shall deal with the European countries, where the ravages of the war have been if anything more thorough than in the orient.

That is one question. The second is this. The Canadian exporter, I think, with all due respect, does know his business. Canadian export trade before the war was built up to such a degree that we had a greater per capita export trade than any other country in the world, and I venture to say that the government will find, and find amazingly soon, that despite the terrific ravages of war, the Canadian exporter will be able to pick up the threads of his business if he gets the support of the government—and I approve the bill. I do not think however that under the bill as I have read it sufficient recognition is taken of the innate ability of the Canadian manufacturer and exporter. I do not think that is sufficiently considered. In my own riding before this major war broke out I was told by several manufacturers that the incident on the Marco Polo bridge, which led to the Sino-Japanese conflict, was eventually the cause of unemployment to nearly 200 persons in that district. I mention that because foreign and external trade is one of the most vital things we have to encourage in Canada. We must oil the wheels and get the machinery working again. That is of prime importance. But we must realize that the men who are in this business will probably be able to pick up the threads of their business again with the support of the government, and we do not want to court the danger of having the individual importer or trader abroad feeling that he is dealing with the Canadian government. We have to make sure that the Canadian exporter believes he has the government behind him, but we must take care that the trader abroad does not feel that he is dealing with the government of Canada, because if he does, then I submit that when the trader feels he is dealing with the government he will take a different attitude, particularly in external trade, than if he felt he was dealing with another trader with whom his good will counts more than anything else.

This bill also appears to overlook the tremendously important work that was done by the Canadian insurance companies, particularly in the orient. They knew the conditions, and while the greater part of the insurance was life, nevertheless our insurance companies carried more business than the insurance companies of both the United Kingdom and the United States combined. Here are these companies who do know the conditions of trade in the orient and of financing in that part of the world, and the orient will be one of our big spheres of trade in the future. A close liaison should be made in this bill between our private insurance companies and this corporation, because if we are to get back to international trade on anything like the scale we had before the war and anything like the scale necessary to maintain our economy on a high level we have to make use of our people who have built up this external trade and use them to the fullest extent possible. This bill omits certain clauses that should be inserted and I have some doubts as to whether it really appreciates the difficulty that lies ahead.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. ADAMSON: Will the minister give an answer with regard to a liaison in this bill between the corporation and the international bank?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would assume that this corporation would take into account any factors that might make a foreign importer either less or more solvent. I assume they would do that. It may be that the existence of an international monetary fund, if one is set up, and an international reconstruction bank, if one is established, may have a bearing on the credit-worthiness of either foreign governments or foreign importers. All these factors will be taken into consideration as far as private importers abroad are concerned. It can be assumed, I think, that the corporation would take steps to possess themselves of all knowledge helpful to them in assessing risks.

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not suppose the minister knows how much it will cost to make the corporation function or what staff it will have.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): From the way the hon. member worded his question it is clear that he understands the difficulty in connection with making an exact answer. It is impossible to say how many will be required, or what the additional expense will be. However we are anxious to proceed as soon as possible with the setting up of the organization.

Mr. GREEN: That is not an answer at all. What is the estimated number to be added to the civil service?

Mr. JACKMAN: An approximation?

Mr. GREEN: And what is the estimated cost? The department must have had some estimates made.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It is difficult to give a definite answer. I would suggest it would require a minimum of sixty

Mr. GREEN: And at what cost?

[Mr. Adamson.]

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I have not those figures.

Mr. GREEN: Has not the department estimated the cost?

Mr. JACKMAN: It is the people's money.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. GREEN: No, it is not. Has not the department estimated the cost?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am advised that it is impossible to give an exact figure on that. It might run up to $100,000 to get the corporation established and under way.

Mr. JACKMAN: It will cost more than that, probably.

Mr. HATFIELD: What is being done to increase trade with Central American and South American countries? In my opinion we are not going to have much European trade after the war. Our trade will be with South America, Central America and the islands of the West Indies.

Mr. ILSLEY: On a point of order, I submit that question is not in order.

Mr. HATFIELD: This is a bill having to do with exports, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN: It is an insurance bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I call the paragraphs?

Mr. GREEN: Yes, I suggest it be called by paragraphs.

On section 2, paragraph (a)—"advisory council."

Mr. GREEN: What is the intention with regard to this advisory council? Are there to be representatives from each of the provinces?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The purpose in setting up this advisory council is to do exactly what was suggested by the opposition, namely, to get the cooperation and assistance of exporters and producers.

Mr. GREEN: Oh, I agree with all that; but the question I asked was whether there will be representatives from the different provinces. We are always very particular about that so far as the Pacific coast is concerned. I think the maritimes feel much the same way too. Are we to have our fair share of members on the advisory council?

Mr. HATFIELD: That is a very important question.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The figure of fifteen has been set for the advisory council, so that the membership can be distributed across the country, particularly in those parts where advantage would be taken of this legislation. It is the intention to have men on the advisory council from the Pacific coast, as well as from other industrial centres in Canada.

Mr. GREEN: How many will there be from British Columbia and how many from the maritime provinces?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I cannot give that information yet.

Mr. HATFIELD: Will they represent different lines of business?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): They will represent different lines of business, certainly.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraphs (b) and (c) agreed to.

On section 2, paragraph (d)—"Canadian-produced goods."

Mr. GREEN: Is it certain that this paragraph is broad enough to cover primary products?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Might it not be worth while to add the word "grown"? I only offer that as a suggestion.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I think "Canadian-produced goods" is wide enough.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraphs (e) and (f) agreed to.

On section 2, paragraph (g)—"cost of Canadian-produced goods."

Mr. ILSLEY: I move:

That section two be amended by striking out paragraph (g) and replacing it by a new paragraph as follows:

"(g) 'Cost of Canadian produced goods' includes the cost of such services or supplementary work done or to be done in connection with the design, inspection, delivery, erection, installation or testing of goods purchased or to be purchased from an exporter, as may be determined by regulation."

and by striking out paragraph (l) and renumbering paragraphs (m), (n) and (o) respectively as paragraphs (l), (m), and (n) respectively.

Mr. GREEN: What is the effect of this amendment?

Mr. ILSLEY: It would take some time to explain it fully. As paragraph (g) was drawn before, the amount to be paid in connection with design, inspection, delivery, erection and installation or testing of goods had to be payable under the contract for the purchase of the goods. Now it might not be payable under that contract. It might be payable as a matter of separate arrangement. It would be payable in connection with a contract, but not under the contract. This new definition broadens the arrangement a little bit. Under the new definition the cost of Canadian-produced goods includes the cost of such services or supplementary work done or to be done in connection with the design, inspection, delivery, erection, installation or testing of goods purchased or to be purchased from an exporter, as may be determined by regulation.

Mr. GREEN: It really strikes out "under a contract of purchase", and substitutes "purchased"?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. Then, there are two or three further slight changes in wording such as "work done or to be done"; but those are small and technical changes.

An hon. member asked whether the cost of shipping was to be included in the services. It may be included. It is included, as a matter of fact, but it would depend upon the contract as to whether or not the exporter would be protected in respect of shipping.

Mr. GREEN: Why is paragraph (l) struck out?

Mr. ILSLEY: Because it is to come back in under section 13. The reason for doing it is that the word "loss" appears in the bill at another place with a different meaning.

Mr. JACKMAN: Section 13 is being amended to explain what "loss" means.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: While I am not critical in respect of paragraph (g) determining what are Canadian-produced goods, still I am thinking of a condition which might arise, for instance, in connection with a pipeline. We might make the pipes in Canada. Those pipes could be laid in a foreign country, and the cost of installation would be much greater than the cost of the original pipeline. I am not suggesting that good faith will not be exercised, but the definition is very broad. The cost of installation is often higher than the cost of the material, as for example in connection with a pipeline, and if the government wishes to tighten it up it might do so.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why would we want to do that?

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not know whether we want to have something like the total cost of installing a pipeline, where the cost of the pipe would be only about ten or fifteen per cent of the total cost, brought under this export credits insurance. In that case ninety per cent of the money would go to pay labour in Arabia, or some place like that. I am only pointing out that this paragraph is very wide.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would apply to a case where Canadian labour was used abroad in connection with the installation. That would be a case where the foreign exporter would be collecting the money, though of course it would not be confined to such cases.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is very wide.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph (g) as amended agreed to.

On section 2, paragraph (h)—"export."

Mr. HATFIELD: This says that "export" means export from Canada. Would that have any effect on goods exported through United States ports?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No; they are being exported from Canada.

Paragraph agreed to.

On section 2, paragraph (i)—"exporter."

Mr. MAYHEW: As I understand it the exporter might be a producer as well. I am thinking particularly of newsprint, because the newsprint people like to do their own exporting.

Mr. ILSLEY: He might be both a producer and an exporter.

Paragraph agreed to.

On section 2, paragraph (j)—"insolvency."

Mr. GREEN: This paragraph says that insolvency means the state or condition of being unable to pay in full when due the purchase price of exported Canadian-produced goods. Would it not be better to make that wider and simply say, "unable to pay in full."

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That would narrow it.

Mr. GREEN: No, that extends it, that is the ordinary test of insolvency. In this case it is only when the importer cannot pay for the Canadian goods.

Mr. ILSLEY: Are we not only concerned with his ability to pay for the Canadian goods in full when payment is due? If he is unable to do that he is insolvent for our purposes, and that is the risk that should be insured against.

Mr. GREEN: He may be actually insolvent and still able to pay for one shipment of Canadian goods, but what about the next one?

Mr. ILSLEY: If he is able to pay us I do not think we should worry.

Mr. GREEN: Where is that word used in the act?

Mr. ILSLEY: In the definition of "loss" which will come in section 13.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraph (k) agreed to.

On section 2, paragraph (l)—"minister."

Mr. ILSLEY: The old paragraph was struck out, so that the following paragraphs will have to be given different letters. Instead of paragraphs (l) (m) (n) and (o), we now have paragraphs (l), (m) and (n).

Paragraph agreed to.

On section 2, paragraph (m)—"person".

Mr. GREEN: Why does not this definition include a corporation?

Mr. ILSLEY: Because corporations are included under the Interpretation Act.

Mr. GREEN: So are associations and partnerships, are they not?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so; I would doubt it.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that this should be checked up.

Mr. ILSLEY: An association is not a person unless you say so, but I think a corporation is, by the general Interpretation Act.

Mr. WRIGHT: Does "association or partnership" include a corporation?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraph (n) agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Export Credits Insurance Corporation.

Mr. ADAMSON: This section states, "There shall be a corporation". I should like to move an amendment, that after the words "Bank of Canada" the words be inserted, "and a nominee of the Canadian insurance companies". I do that for this reason. Here we have a corporation dealing wholly and solely with the business of insurance. I think it would be a great help to the three officers named in this section if they could have the advice and assistance of an officer of the Canadian insurance companies which, as I have said, more than any other insurance companies in the world have made a specialty of international risks and international trade. I do not say their volume of business is as great as that of the large insurance companies in the United States and Great Britain, but they are peculiarly equipped to understand this type of business. I believe it would be of considerable help to the minister and to the corporation to have the assistance of a nominee of the Canadian insurance companies.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed that when a corporation is set up its members must be named or described with definiteness; that an unknown person such as the nominee of the Canadian insurance companies could not become a member of a corporation set up by statute. You would not have your corporation; you would not know who were the members of it; you would not know who the nominee was to be. That is on the legal end of it. On the other aspect, I do not see how a knowledge of life insurance would assist any man in making a determination as to commercial risks.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Could I hear the amendment read by the Chair, please?

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved that after "Bank of Canada" the following words be added: "and a nominee of the Canadian insurance companies".

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Then I direct your attention particularly to section 5, subsection 3 at the top of page 3, where you will find the words, "such fees as may be fixed by the by-laws of the corporation". This amendment would impose an additional burden of taxation upon the people, and therefore I suggest it is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment would involve more directors and more fees, and the expenditure of more public funds. Therefore I rule it out of order.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

CITY OF OTTAWA

TABLING OF REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. J. A. GREGORY (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house I wish to lay on the table the report of the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons appointed to review the special problems arising out of the location of the seat of government in the city of Ottawa.

Mr. SPEAKER: A similar report is being laid on the table of the Senate at this time.

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE

MEASURE TO FACILITATE AND DEVELOP TRADE BETWEEN CANADA AND OTHER COUNTRIES

The house resumed consideration in committee of bill No. 178, to incorporate the Export Credits Insurance Corporation and to promote the revival of trade by the provision of dominion government guarantees to encourage exports from Canada—Mr. MacKinnon (Edmonton West)—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Head office.

Mr. JACKMAN: I suggest to the minister that if this corporation is going to operate as a bank and it is necessary for industrialists and farmers who wish to have export credits insured, they will have to have ready access to the offices of the corporation and Ottawa is about the worst possible place to have those offices.

Mr. McILRAITH: I would not say that.

Mr. JACKMAN: While it may be all right for the head office to be located here if it is to be only a nominal head office, I hope that that will not include the chief place of business, which should be located at one of our large export centres. I suggested previously that it should be in Montreal, not Toronto as some might think, or one of the cities on the western coast. I should like to ask the minister once again whether the head office will be simply the place where the books of record will be kept and high policy decided, or is it to be the chief place of business. I suggest it should be located some place more accessible to the taxpayers.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The chief place of business of the corporation may be in any place, but the head office for the records will be in Ottawa. There will be branches in necessary places throughout the country.

Mr. GREEN: How many branches are planned?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I would say at the moment that there will certainly be one at Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, Halifax, Saint John and Winnipeg.

Mr. JACKMAN: That does not really answer my question. Are those to be branch offices with a few clerks? Will the branch managers be limited in the amount of insurance they can issue to $5,000 or $25,000, as is the case with the chartered banks? If that is so, they may be of no use at all. How much authority is likely to be vested in the manager, say at the port of Montreal? If sufficient authority is not delegated it will mean that the head office will be at Ottawa, which is the most inconvenient place for business men to come to.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The branch offices will have the power to carry on the normal operations of the corporation. These may never have to come to the head office of the corporation at all as long as the operations are in accordance with the by-laws.

Mr. JACKMAN: If an exporter wants to get $100,000 worth of grain insured where would he go?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): To his branch office.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Board of directors.

Mr. GREEN: This section provides for the board of directors which is to be made up of the deputy minister of trade and commerce, the deputy minister of finance, the governor of the Bank of Canada and four others. I should like to know if these four other directors are to be chosen from the business world or from the civil service.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Of the other four directors, one would be the general manager of the corporation and the other three may be chosen from either the civil service or the business world. A decision has not been made on that as yet. It is conceivable that the deputy minister of fisheries, the deputy minister of agriculture or some outsider who is prominent and experienced in a particular line would be appointed, or perhaps it would be someone from some other business source.

Mr. GREEN: Will these four other directors be on a full-time basis, or will they just be called in for directors' meetings?

[Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): One would be on a full-time basis and the others would be called in when required.

Mr. ADAMSON: There would be an opportunity under this section to appoint such persons as I mentioned this morning in the amendment?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: Subsection 3 provides that the aggregate amount to be paid to directors shall not exceed $3,000. If they are all civil servants, and I trust they will not be, I presume the $3,000 would be adequate, but it would not be if you are going to take directors from the business world. If men of that type are going to be called in they will have to be given more adequate remuneration. Business executives are willing to come down to Ottawa to spend all their time for a dollar a year because of the war emergency, but a different set of circumstances will obtain after the war. Many of these men will have to return to their private businesses in order to recoup themselves and get reinstated in their own industry. If the government hopes to get men who will be of some real assistance to this corporation there should not be this limit of $3,000. The amount should be large enough to compensate them, because there is not the same honour in serving on a board like this in ordinary times as there is serving the government in war time.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): If a director is a member of the civil service of course he gets no fees. Provision is made for the payment to directors of their expenses; that is specifically set out. The $3,000 might be paid to directors who were not civil servants.

Section agreed to.

Section 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Officers, advisers, employees.

Mr. GREEN: Why is this provision inserted that the Civil Service Act may be overridden? It is another case of weakening the merit system in the civil service. As I read it, this clause gives the corporation power to hire employees without going through the civil service commission.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): This section gives the civil servant protection so far as superannuation is concerned.

Mr. GREEN: The minister is referring to subsection 2, but I am referring to subsection 1, which clearly gives the corporation power to by-pass the civil service commission. In other words, appointments may be made not on the basis of merit at all, without examinations, and they might even be made on a patronage basis. Why is it necessary in setting up this corporation to take this power? Why not get the employees through the civil service commission?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The corporation is being set up as a government corporation separate from the civil service. I quite appreciate the point my hon. friend is making, but in the selection of the personnel it is not proposed to go through the civil service commission. It is proposed that we shall be able to pick the most capable men available, and many of them will be required for only temporary service.

Mr. GREEN: Subsection 4 gives the corporation power to:

> establish offices or employ agents in any part of Canada, and if necessary may employ agents elsewhere than in Canada for purposes of enforcing any right which as a result of a contract of insurance may be vested in the corporation.

I do not understand what type of agency is in contemplation. What type of agency is to be engaged beyond Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): This is to enable the corporation to engage the services of a bank, for instance, outside this country in connection with collections.

Mr. JACKMAN: Subsection 2 requires each officer, adviser or employee to take an oath of fidelity and secrecy. Is it usual in this type of crown corporation to insist upon an oath being taken?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am told that it is the usual custom.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am wondering whether it is, because private business does not find it necessary to swear its officer to secrecy. I have the idea that this is one of the novelties imported by the Minister of Munitions and Supply, who requires of certain dollar-a-year men a vow of secrecy—that without the permission of their superior officer that they will never reveal anything they observed or heard while in the government service. I doubt very much whether this provision, if it is a new idea, should be included.

At line 37 of subsection 2 on page 3 it says "and in the event of his being retired from his office or position with the corporation for any reason other than that of misconduct, he shall be eligible for reappointment". Why is inefficiency left out? Is it a fact that a person once appointed to the civil service can never on earth be removed except for misconduct, and misconduct I presume of a grave nature, no matter how inefficient his work may be. I think you should have "inefficiency" in there as well as misconduct.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): This is the standard clause. An individual might be quite capable of carrying on other work. As to the oath of secrecy, the corporation may receive information from purely confidential sources which it might not be able to secure if an oath of secrecy were not required.

Mr. GREEN: Does not the minister think that he is restricting the powers of the corporation too much by putting in subsection 4 these words, "for purposes of enforcing any right"? Surely this agency abroad will be able to do other things than enforcing rights. For example, the corporation may want to employ an agency abroad to make investigations or to carry on negotiations. I suggest that the minister would be giving the corporation more power, a power which they will probably need, if he struck out those restricting words in the last three lines of subsection 4. I think that they unduly restrict the powers of the corporation.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It is not the intention to establish agencies abroad generally. We do not anticipate using these agents, except in special cases, outside of enforcing collections.

Mr. GREEN: Would they not be useful for other purposes?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): They might be, but that is the purpose.

Mr. GREEN: I made my suggestion to help the minister out; I thought it might help the corporation.

Mr. ADAMSON: Will agents have power to sue in the right of the crown?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Advisory council.

Mr. SENN: When this bill was in the committee stage the question arose whether the legislation included farm products, processed or unprocessed, and finally the minister said that it did.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. SENN: Then certainly the producer should have a representative on the board, or at least on the advisory council. Will the minister give the assurance that when this advisory council is set up the producers of farm products will be represented on it.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That question was dealt with this morning and that assurance was given.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Capital shares.

Mr. JACKMAN: What is the purpose of the provision that whenever the Minister of Finance pays any part of the authorized capital of five million dollars he shall in addition pay an equal amount to capital surplus account? I could understand such a provision in the case of a private bank where you wanted some window dressing, a big show of a strong reserve, but I do not see any necessity of it in the case of a government corporation.

Mr. ILSLEY: It provides a surplus at the beginning out of which amounts can be paid without impairing the capital.

Mr. JACKMAN: What is the difference?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, it may be—

Mr. JACKMAN: You could not pay a dividend if you had a capital impairment; is that the idea?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not desirable to impair the capital.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Sell bonds and debentures.

Mr. ADAMSON: Surely this is a precedent in all government corporations—setting up a corporation with power to issue, presumably in the name of the government, bonds or shares or debentures.

Mr. ILSLEY: No—in the name of the corporation.

Mr. ADAMSON: Well, in the name of the corporation: the corporation is a creature of the government, therefore it is tantamount to the same thing. I should like some explanation of this. Surely it is a radical departure from all previous government practice in financing.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a protection against very serious losses, that is all.

Mr. ADAMSON: But how can the right of a corporation to issue bonds be a provision against serious losses? How are they going to issue and sell bonds and debentures? Presumably to the general public or to corporations.

Mr. ILSLEY: It will be to the government.

[Mr. Senn.]

Mr. ADAMSON: Only to the government?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the intention.

Mr. ADAMSON: I think that should be included in the clause. It might be redrafted. As it reads now there is the possibility of being able to sell bonds to the public.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think there would be any advantage in putting it in. The public will not buy the bonds under these conditions.

Mr. ADAMSON: No, but under the bill this clause would still give the corporation the right to sell bonds to the public if it so desired. I think that is a very radical change in government practice.

Mr. ILSLEY: As a matter of practice the only buyer would be the government, not the public. I should think that could be left to the corporation.

Mr. ADAMSON: If that is clearly understood, yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Should there not be some limit placed on the amount to which bonds and debentures may be issued? There is no limit at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; section 15 limits the amount the government can lend the corporation.

Mr. GREEN: I see. But there is no limit to the amount of the bonds and debentures of the corporation itself.

Mr. ILSLEY: The whole assumption is that they will sell only to the government, and the limit is contained in the loan section, which is 15.

Mr. JACKMAN: In corporations of this type in the United States we find that in many cases the bonds or debentures are sold direct to the public although they may bear a government guarantee. There is nothing in section 11 to proscribe such a course of action, and I think the contention of the hon. member for York West is well taken, and that this section should be more restrictive in its terms. It does not say that the bonds shall be purchased only by the government, and the corporation might be able to dress up its bonds so that they would be marketable. I realize that there may be certain practical difficulties; nevertheless the terms of the section are much too wide to pass without at least strong comment.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think that the fear that the government will—

Mr. JACKMAN: Technically it is out of the hands of the government.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, well, it is, but it is a government corporation. I do not think that the fear that the corporation will sell the public a bad or a dangerous type of security is justified. I do not think it is worth while guarding against.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is not the public alone we are worrying about; it is the fact that the corporation may issue a substantial amount of these bonds.

Mr. ILSLEY: The amount they can borrow from the government is limited in section 15, and there is no intention that they shall borrow from anyone but the government. There is no power in the government to guarantee the bonds with the idea that they will be sold to the public. This is just a simple power to issue bonds, and provision as to where they can get their money is made in section 15. I suppose that technically under this section they might get out a public issue, but I do not know who would buy them.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is not a type of draftsmanship one likes to see in a public statute.

Mr. ADAMSON: Under subsection 2 "the corporation may invest moneys of the corporation"—there is another very wide clause —"in such manner as the board may from time to time determine." If the corporation has money, surely under this provision it can go out and invest it in common stocks. A very wide interpretation can be given to this clause.

Mr. ILSLEY: Legally they would have that power; there is no express safeguard against it; but there is abundant power of regulation in the statute. For instance, section 27 provides for regulations by the governor in council, and the government can pretty well protect itself, I think, in its investing policy.

Mr. ADAMSON: I assume it would, but as the section is written it leaves a large loophole.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, that is right. The safeguarding clauses which we find through the statutes are safeguards against certain types of investments by private corporations or private individuals where parliament must be very careful to prevent trust money from being badly invested, or something of the kind. But here it would be a safeguard against investments by the government corporation, which could hurt nobody but the government itself, and I think it could safely be left to the corporation and to the sense of responsibility which any government would have to parliament and the people.

Section agreed to.

Section 12 agreed to.

On section 13—Contract of insurance.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move that section 13 be amended by adding a subsection 3 thereto to read as follows:

(3) In this section "loss" means a loss accruing to an exporter upon non-payment when due of the purchase price of the goods exported by reason of insolvency or delay of the importer or his inability to secure the currency with which the purchase price is to be paid.

It is exactly the same definition as is found in paragraph 1 of the bill as originally printed.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. KNOWLES: Speaking for a moment to the section as a whole, it is the important clause, I believe, in part I of the bill. The comment I wish to make I can make very briefly, because it is along the lines of what I said when I was speaking on the second reading last night. My principal quarrel with the clause, indeed with part I of the bill, is that it does not go far enough. I agree with hon. members supporting the government, in fact I think I go further than they do, as to the importance of international trade to our Canadian economy in the post-war period. But I emphasize again the importance of our seeing to it that the advantages of our trade really accrue to the people of Canada. I would remind the government that they have found it necessary and desirable during the course of the war to go in for bulk sales and purchases. I would remind the government also that there have been announced already some post-war bulk contracts. They were announced by the Minister of Agriculture and they will extend into the post-war period. I urge that if the advantages of freedom of exchange are to be enjoyed by the people as a whole, rather than by private monopolists, we have to take the further steps involved in the planning of world trade through import and export boards. My contention is that section 13 of part I does not go far enough in that direction to meet the needs of this country in the years immediately ahead.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 14—Liability under contracts outstanding.

Mr. GREEN: As I understand it, this clause would limit the amount of insurance that may be undertaken by the corporation to a total of $100 million. Is that correct?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That is correct, unless there have been accumulated profits which would be added to the surplus.

Mr. GREEN: It is unlikely that the profits will be extensive.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It is possible.

Mr. GREEN: More likely there will be losses. Does the minister believe that $100 million worth of insurance is sufficient to meet the situation?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): We do think so. I am informed that £60 million handles the United Kingdom business under similar legislation.

Mr. GREEN: Before the war?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Before and during the war.

Section agreed to.

Sections 15 to 20 inclusive agreed to.

On section 21—Part I coming into force by proclamation.

Mr. GREEN: When is it intended to proclaim this part of the act? I pointed out last night that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had stated during the discussion on the resolution that it was not the intention of the government to use this part extensively during the war years or during the post-war period. From what the Minister of Finance said last night, the reply which the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave me did not seem to set out the policy of the government. I suggest that this part should be proclaimed as soon as possible and every attempt should be made to get it into operation at an early date.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I believe that in my answer last night or this morning I had in mind the extent of the use that would be made of part I of the bill immediately. It is the wish to have the corporation organized and doing business as soon as possible.

Mr. GREEN: The bill will be proclaimed as quickly as possible?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): As soon as the necessary organization can be completed.

Section agreed to.

On section 22—Assistance to governments of other countries.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move that the section be amended by striking out the word "in" at the end of line 26 and substituting therefor the word "for".

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON: Paragraph (c) of subsection 1 gives power to the corporation to purchase and guarantee the bonds or the government securities of another country.

Mr. ILSLEY: It does not give the corporation any power at all.

Mr. ADAMSON: It says "purchase, acquire or guarantee any security issued by the government or by the agency of the government of any such other country to any person in Canada for payment of the cost of Canadian-produced goods exported or to be exported to such other country". Surely that is a guarantee. We are putting ourselves in the position of guaranteeing the security of another country for the payment of Canadian goods. Let us say a south American country has a bond issue and in order to purchase Canadian goods a portion of that bond issue is guaranteed by the Canadian government. We shall find ourselves in this position, that part of a foreign bond issue is guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada and part of it not guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada, and I think we shall be in a very dangerous position in consequence of this clause. I would rather see it simplified, because I can foresee the danger of doing it as proposed; or else we shall have to have the foreign government issue special debentures for goods purchased in Canada, which will be guaranteed by the dominion government. Let us say there is to be a major development in China. Very well. The Chinese government issue a debenture or bond issue in order to pay for the rolling stock, the locomotives, the rails and other equipment for the railway. We as the Canadian government and people guarantee that loan by guaranteeing that bond, and if the Chinese government defaults then it virtually comes under the principle of lend-lease. I do not say it is a bad principle, but very definitely under this clause that is what we are opening ourselves to. Does not the minister agree with me?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is very much like guaranteeing obligations under 1 (a): "guarantee the obligations of the government or an agency of the government of any such other country". It is not the intention to take part of a bond issue of a foreign country and guarantee it. The term "security" is defined in the interpretation section: "Security includes bills, promissory notes, bonds, debentures, and any other evidences of indebtedness and shares." The ordinary case would be a special debenture issued for that particular purchase.

Mr. GREEN: By the other government.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, by the other government. The Canadian government guarantees payment of that obligation so that the exporter will be sure of his money.

Mr. WRIGHT: I raised a point this morning with respect to the guarantee of these bonds. Supposing an exporter takes, in payment for his goods, bonds of a foreign country, and those bonds are guaranteed through this board. He may take bonds which, on the day the goods are exported, would be selling on the market at $90 instead of $100. If he takes them at $90, he is guaranteed that he will get $90 for them at some future date.

Mr. ILSLEY: These bonds will not be on the market at all.

Mr. WRIGHT: The bonds of the foreign country?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, they will not be on the market at all. These are securities. They are not necessarily bonds; they may be promissory notes. They must be issued for this specific purpose, namely for the payment of the cost of Canadian-produced goods to be exported to such other country. They relate to this specific transaction. They will not be traded in the market, and they will not be previously existing securities. The guarantee is on such terms as the governor in council may determine. The object of the guarantee would be to make sure that the exporter got the purchase price of the goods. And if he has to wait for the purchase price, a further object would be to see that he got a reasonable rate of interest on the purchase price, for the time he had to wait.

Mr. ADAMSON: We are to presume that the foreign country pays the interest.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON: I saw this same thing happen in connection with a railway in South America. In that instance there was a special bond issue, and the money was not properly appropriated. Perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce will know the case I have in mind. I shall not mention any names, because a friendly country was involved. The bond issue there was specifically for the electrification of a railway, and the goods were supposed to be shipped from the United States. Actually the money was used for something else. There was a bond issue issued by a foreign country for a specific purpose, but it was not used for that purpose. I can see a danger under this paragraph (c) that the same might happen here. It is a dangerous principle. In this instance the bond issue is guaranteed by this government; in the instance to which I referred the bond issue was not guaranteed, and the people who bought the bonds were just out of luck; that is the difference.

Mr. GREEN: This section, in effect, gives the government power to advance $300,000,000 —or it may be $400,000,000, I am not quite clear as to which is the proper amount. In any event it gives power to advance at least $300,000,000 to foreign governments about to purchase goods in Canada. Could one or other of the ministers tell us what the previous experience of the Canadian government has been in making advances to foreign governments? This morning the Minister of Mines and Resources mentioned an advance to Roumania, during the last war, which apparently never was repaid. What has been the experience in the making of advances to foreign governments?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot give the experience. There was some experience in 1919 when some of the loans did not turn out well—and I think some did.

Mr. HOMUTH: Some of them never paid back any of it.

Mr. ILSLEY: One of the countries did not pay back anything.

Mr. GREEN: Under this section will advances be made to Great Britain and other commonwealth governments, and to the United States, or is it the intention that advances are to be made only to such nations as France, Belgium, China and Russia?

Mr. ILSLEY: Advances could be made to Great Britain, but I should think it most unlikely that they would ever be required by the United States.

Mr. GREEN: The thought is that there will be no advances under this part of the bill to Great Britain or the United States, or to one of the commonwealth nations?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no; there may be advances to Great Britain. As I say, however, I can hardly envisage a situation in which there would be any to the United States.

Mr. GREEN: And what about enemy countries? There is no provision in this measure which states that money shall not be advanced by the Canadian government to enemy governments—at least, to governments of countries with which we are now at war. This power to advance moneys to foreign governments is to last for three years after the war. If it is the intention to make any advances to governments of countries with which we are now at war, I think the committee should be told that now.

Mr. ILSLEY: If there is an intention, did you say?

Mr. GREEN: Yes; if it is the intention that the power should be that broad, we should be told.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not the intention to make such loans, but I take it the powers do go that far. The three years, by the way, are to run after the passage of the measure—not after the end of the war.

Mr. GREEN: Does not the minister think it would be well to insert a provision under which none of these funds could be used for the making of advances to enemy countries?

Mr. ILSLEY: Does my hon. friend mean former enemy countries?

Mr. GREEN: Yes. We had a very sad experience after the last war. Advances which were of great help to Germany were made by British empire firms, and I think we should take precautions now against anything like that being done in the years immediately following this war.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. GREEN: No, it is not carried.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think there is any necessity for a provision of that kind. I cannot put myself into a situation such as my hon. friend might have in mind. It might be that some different type of government altogether would take office in a country which is now an enemy country, and we might want to assist the people of that country—which we would be doing, by guaranteeing their loans, and exporting to them. The term of the power is to be effective for three years after the passage of this measure, and a situation might arise where the authorities in this country might wish to exercise that power. Because at the present time I do not know that that is just the test to apply as to the propriety or impropriety of the exercise of the power.

Mr. GREEN: Before any step of that kind is taken by any Canadian government, or before any advances are made to the government of a country which is now an enemy country, I think opportunity should be given to the Canadian parliament to approve or otherwise. As the bill reads now, the government could go ahead at any time and make an advance to an enemy country. I do not think such a step should be taken without first securing the approval of the Canadian parliament. That is why I say there should be some provision inserted in the bill prohibiting the making of advances to enemy countries. If the time comes when it is thought desirable to make such advances, then at such time let the government of that day bring forward an amendment to the measure. But it would be wrong to leave open to the government of Canada the power to make advances to the government of a country with which we are now at war.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does my hon. friend expect some further answer?

Mr. GREEN: What would the minister say about it? Does he not think that before such a policy is adopted it should be brought before parliament?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the government could be safely trusted to exercise its judgment in a case of that kind. I do not think that is a proper basis upon which to make a selection. Perhaps it could be provided that no loan could be made to any German government, which would be more defensible than to adopt the wider suggestion.

Mr. GREEN: Or any Japanese government.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, what about Finland? What about Italy? What about Hungary, Bulgaria, Roumania. What about countries that have two governments, one outside and one inside, one friendly and one unfriendly?

Mr. KNOWLES: France, for example.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, France.

Mr. GREEN: I had in mind Germany and Japan.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think there is any necessity for writing the names of any nations into this bill.

Mr. KNOWLES: It seems to me the point being discussed just now indicates a failure to grasp one of the purposes of part II of this bill. As I see it the purpose is not only to provide some assistance to other countries, but also to help ourselves. To the extent that we can rehabilitate some of the countries now torn by war, even some of the countries with which we are at war, we may help to improve our own position, and particularly the position of Canadian agriculture.

I should like to reply to the criticism of my remarks advanced by the Minister of Finance last evening after I had spoken along this line by repeating that I feel there is a strong element of the mutual aid principle in this section. The minister suggested that I was wrong, because in this section of the bill there is not the kind of mutual aid that we have had during the war period. I would point out that it is still mutuality, only of a different kind. During the war period we have aided each other mutually in this respect, that from Canada we have sent goods and materials in return for the greater cost in terms of suffering that some of our allies were paying. In mutual aid during the war we are helping each other by contributing to the common cause things that may be different in kind. As I see it, under part II of this bill in the post-war period we are still going to try to help each other, by contributing to the common cause of rebuilding the world. We in Canada are going to help rehabilitate some of the war-torn countries; in return for the help we give them in that way they are automatically going to help us by providing markets for some of our surplus products; and to the extent they become rehabilitated they will also help us by being able to pay for those products in sending us some of the goods they produce, which will improve the lot of our people. In other words, an element of planning is being injected into world trade under the terms of this section. The government have said, and I congratulate them on it, that it is not their intention simply to sit down and wait for the years to roll by in the hope that things will somehow readjust themselves. The government have said that they are going right to work in an effort to revive our trade with these war-torn countries by lending them money and helping them get rehabilitated, so that we may get affairs back on a more satisfactory basis. Thus I feel there is a strong element of mutuality in this measure, and in what I had to say on that point last evening I was really congratulating the government. I was surprised that the minister was not prepared to accept the compliment.

Mr. ILSLEY: I just wanted my hon. friend to be accurate in his compliment; that was all.

Mr. KNOWLES: It may be that the minister did not interpret my tone of voice as complimentary. I want to say, too—I tried in vain to find an opportunity to do so this morning—that I still have not got over the annoyance I felt at the attitude displayed by the hon. member for Rosedale in connection with this whole matter. It seemed to me that he almost overlooked the fact that we have been at war for four or five years; that the world has been torn to bits and that we really must take very far-reaching measures to move in the direction of the better world that we hope will come out of this sacrifice. His complaint was that the government was going in for this kind of activity. If I understood him aright his feeling was that the government should stay out of the picture and let private exporters try to rehabilitate the world for us. Well, as I say, annoyance is the only word I can use with respect to my feelings, and I was glad the hon. member for Swift Current made the reply he did at that time. I am also amazed at the attitude adopted by hon. gentlemen to my right, in view of the booklet to which I referred last night entitled, "The Mid Continent and the Peace". This booklet was prepared in 1941 at the request of the then governor of the state of Minnesota, a Republican, and Hon. John Bracken, who was then a Liberal Progressive but who is now a Progressive Conservative—there is not a great deal of difference, of course. At any rate it was at the suggestion of these two men that this research was carried on into what might be desirable trade policies in the post-war period particularly with respect to agriculture in the northwest states and the prairie provinces.

Mr. GRAYDON: I did not want to interrupt my hon. friend in the middle of a sentence, but through the conversation that was going on about me I thought I heard the hon. gentleman make a very serious accusation; that is, that the national leader of our party was a Liberal.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is the greatest compliment you could pay him.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is not what the electors think.

Mr. KNOWLES: If you want to call it an accusation, all right. I was simply stating what was the case until one night in December of 1942, when in the Winnipeg auditorium I saw him turn over. Until then he was known as a Liberal Progressive.

Mr. GRAYDON: He was a Progressive in a Liberal-Progressive coalition.

Mr. KNOWLES: He was a supporter of the government opposite.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. If I may be allowed—

Mr. KNOWLES: You are quite right, Mr. Chairman; this is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: We have been long enough on this discussion. We should come down to the section before the committee.

Mr. KNOWLES: Thank you, Mr. Chairman; I will get back to the section.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not want you to slander our leader, that is all.

Mr. KNOWLES: I want to speak in support of the principle of part II, which is contained primarily in section 22, by quoting a paragraph or two, directly on the point, from the booklet to which I have referred. I quote from page 22:

> What is proposed is that Canada, the United States, and Britain, with the cooperation of Russia and in concert with the countries of western Europe, shall make arrangements whereby all of the western European countries, including Britain, will undertake within a specified period, perhaps fifteen years, to receive certain agricultural products, wheat, pork, and lard, for example, from producing countries in specified maximum amounts, thus releasing agricultural resources of western Europe for other more profitable uses. The producing countries will assist—

This is the specific recommendation of these economists:

> —in the reorganization of European agriculture to permit import into Europe of larger than pre-war imports of such agricultural products. The producing countries—

That includes Canada.

> —will also undertake to encourage necessary reductions in their own tariffs to permit the countries of western Europe to pay for the larger quantities of agricultural products which they shall undertake to accept.

Then on page 33 these two economists, Professor Waines and Professor Upgren, say this:

> The question is rightfully asked, how can Europe make repayment for the enlarged purchases it is expected to undertake? The answer on the part of the prairie provinces and the central northwest states is that the prospect of securing such enlarged markets for the farmers of the northwest will win from them their support to assist in the reorganization of European agriculture and, what is certainly more important, will secure from them agreement to help bring about such changes in the trade position of their own countries as will permit increased sale by European countries of their goods to the United States and Canada. In this way European countries can secure the means to pay for products purchased. It will be clearly seen that tariff reduction is a necessary step to secure payment for our exports and can lead to enlarging trade.

In other words these economists who went thoroughly into this matter from the viewpoint of western agriculture have recommended in their worth-while little booklet that steps should be taken by countries such as Canada to do everything possible to help rehabilitate war-torn countries, both for their own good, and also so that there will be a market for our surplus agricultural products. We must also lower our tariffs so that it will be possible for those countries to pay for the goods we ship to them with goods they are able to produce. They point out also—and it is at this point that I turn from addressing my hon. friends to my right and speak to the members on the government benches:

> But it should be reiterated that only by keeping economically strong at home is a foundation provided for building a strong and productive international world.

And they say again:

> But even though a high import volume of such dutiable goods may be prevented by such high tariffs—

The CHAIRMAN: I do not believe this is a debate in which we should discuss policies of tariff reduction and so on; I believe we have passed that stage. We are on a particular section and I do not think that what the hon. member is saying is relevant to that section.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, I think if I were to give you this book and you were to read it you would realize that the entire work is relevant to this section, but I shall accept your ruling and close with just a brief remark. I am glad the government have seen fit, whether they ever saw this book or not, to implement the recommendations of these economists to the extent of bringing in a measure which makes it possible for Canada to help rehabilitate war-torn countries. I hope the government will realize also the importance of the other side of the picture. We must have a high purchasing power and strong industrial communities in our land if we are going to be able to absorb the increased imports that will be necessary to complete the picture. In any case I support the principle of part II of the measure and I deplore some of the unrealistic criticisms that have been made in connection with this section of the bill.

Section 23—Enforcement.

Mr. GREEN: What steps is it proposed to take to enforce the undertaking of indemnities and so on? The burden for taking this step is placed upon the Minister of Finance and I should like to know in what way he is to go about making collections.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be through diplomatic channels. I do not just envisage making war in order to collect.

Mr. GREEN: Why not leave it to the Department of External Affairs instead of making the Minister of Finance responsible?

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be the government that would authorize the collections, and they are above the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. ADAMSON: Your representative in the foreign country would have the right to sue.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

On section 25—Moneys out of consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I have not been able to attend all the discussion on this bill because of committee meetings, will the minister state the total maximum amount that may be provided or guaranteed under this bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: The capital of the coporation is to be $10,000,000 and the government may lend the corporation $50,000,000. That would make $60,000,000 which if everything went by the government would be out. Then the government under part II may enter into obligations or guarantees aggregating $200,000,000, and the aggregate of the amount of loans made and outstanding at any time and the value of securities purchased or acquired and held at any one time shall not exceed $100,000,000.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): That totals $360,000,000.

On section 27—Regulations.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that there should be some provision for the tabling of the regulations, probably along the lines of that put in to the family allowances bill. There is a great deal of money involved in this bill and there will be quite a few regulations issued. They should be tabled.

Mr. ILSLEY: The provision in connection with the family allowances bill will be found on page 5756 of Hansard, and it reads:

No regulation shall be effective until published in the Canada Gazette and upon such publication shall be effective and shall have the same force and effect as if it had been enacted in this act.

Mr. GREEN: Subsection 1 of section 12 of bill No. 161 reads:

Regulations made under this act shall forthwith after approval by the governor in council be published in the Canada Gazette and shall be laid before parliament within fifteen days after they are made if parliament is then sitting, and, if not, then within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing section.

Then subsection 2 provides:

No regulation shall be effective until published in the Canada Gazette and, upon such publication, shall be effective and shall have the same force and effect as if it had been enacted in this act.

I suggest that a similar section should be provided in this bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: I like subsection 1 better than subsection 2.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by Mr. Ilsley that the following be added to section 27:

No regulation shall be effective until published in the Canada Gazette and upon such publication shall be effective and shall have the same force and effect as if it had been enacted in this act.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not intend to move that, Mr. Chairman; I was just reading it to the committee. I would like the committee to consider whether the first provision read by the hon. gentleman would not be sufficient. I think that some care has to be exercised in holding up the effective date of regulations until publication. In some cases it is desirable, and in some cases it is not.

Mr. GREEN: I am not asking that.

Mr. ILSLEY: But the provision originally placed in the Family Allowances Act, which is section 12, is one that I think is suitable. It provides:

Regulations made under this act shall forthwith after approval by the governor in council be published in the Canada Gazette and shall be laid before parliament within fifteen days after they are made if parliament is then sitting, and, if not, then within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session.

Mr. GREEN: That is all I am asking.

Mr. ILSLEY: That gives the information to parliament. That is the amendment I wish to move, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ROWE: It is subsection 1 of section 12 of bill No. 161.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, before the bill was amended.

Mr. ADAMSON: Clause 15 of the same bill deals with expenditures under the act and provides that a report shall be submitted to parliament within fifteen days of the commencement of the first session of parliament in each year.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by Mr. Ilsley to add to clause 27 as subclause 2 the following:

Regulations made under this act shall forthwith after approval by the governor in council be published in the Canada Gazette and shall be laid before parliament within fifteen days after they are made if parliament is then sitting, and, if not, then within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if you would give me the privilege of completing the sentence in the midst of which you interrupted me a minute ago? I accepted your ruling but I should like, if I may, to complete what I thought was a significant sentence from the book to which I was referring. It is as follows:

> But even though a high import volume of such dutiable goods may be prevented by such high tariffs, it is equally important to remember that imports of such goods are also much larger in years of high activity and high incomes, even though the tariff rates continue to remain high. . . .
> Thus it is that the domestic economic policies of Canada and the United States can have international effects of the utmost importance.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS

DECENNIAL REVISION

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee on bill No. 131, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Sections 1 to 21 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FISHERIES PRICES

PROVISION FOR STABILIZATION, PURCHASE OF STAPLE PRODUCTS AT APPROVED PRICES, ETC.

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of bill No. 169, for the support of the prices of fisheries products during the transition from war to peace.

Mr. NEILL: Perhaps the minister wishes to speak first?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes. Mr. Speaker, this is a similar bill to the one passed by this house a few days ago with reference to agricultural products. It differs only in that the word "agricultural" is replaced by the word "fisheries" in all sections of the bill, and there are minor changes in section 9 which are necessary to cope with the fisheries trade as against the agricultural industry. Of course there is also a difference in the amount appropriated, which is $25 million, instead of $200 million for agricultural products.

This legislation is to provide the government with powers to meet a situation which has not yet developed but which may have to be faced later on. Whether the necessity arises will depend upon many factors. First, there are the external trade relationships, which may be very different; there are the international monetary stabilization arrangements, and the level of food requirements throughout the world in the immediate post-war period, as well as other factors which may arise and which I cannot foresee. At the present time we are not in a position to say exactly what trade relationships are going to prevail, nor can we yet foretell what will be agreed upon among the nations as to monetary stabilization, nor do we know what fisheries products will be affected and where the pinch is going to be first felt.

But, Mr. Speaker, although we do not know exactly all that we are going to do, we know exactly what we are not going to do; that is, we are not going to let the prices fall to the low levels to which they fell in 1920, and again in 1932, 1933, 1934 and a few other years.

It follows, then, that it will be impossible to describe the mechanism which will be employed in the application of this measure in any but very general terms. It is important that the underlying principles be elastic enough to cope with the situations as they may arise. Knowing that certain degrees of elasticity are necessary in order to meet the complex situation which may arise, we have been careful to place the significant powers in the hands of the governor in council, so that we may have the benefit of close coordination and cooperation with all the ministers of the government.

Now I come to the bill itself. The main section is, of course, section 9. The devices used to support fisheries in this bill are of two kinds. First there is, under section 9, subsection 1(a) and (b), provision that the fisheries prices support board may prescribe prices at which they will be prepared to purchase such commodities as may be named by the governor general in council. This, while not being exactly a floor price, will have the effect of ensuring to the primary producer the prices which the government is going to set for certain commodities, because if we are ready to pay more than the merchants are going to pay of course we will get the products.

The second device, under section 9, subsection 1(c), is what we call a deficiency payment. The deficiency payment has already been in use under the salt fish board in 1939 and 1940 and was found to be workable. The feature of the deficiency payment is that under this scheme there is no interference with the natural fluctuations of price brought about by the laws of supply and demand. At the end of the year or of the season the board determines what the average price is to the producer of the fish on which a price has been set. If that average price is deemed to be too low to support and reasonably maintain production, the board, with the approval of the governor in council, sets a value on the unit commodity which in its judgment will bring sufficient return at this price to the producer, the difference between the average price and the value which it has set.

Mr. SENN: In other words, it is just a new way of paying a subsidy.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It is not a subsidy, and later on I want to say why it is not, because there is a danger in paying a subsidy. This relates to exactly the policy of this bill. Section 9, subsection 2 is as follows:

(2) In prescribing prices under paragraphs (a) and (c) of subsection one of this section, the board shall endeavour to ensure adequate and stable returns for fisheries by promoting orderly adjustment from war to peace conditions and shall endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from fisheries and those from other occupations.

This is the policy of the bill. At the end of the year, as I said, there would be a calculation made as to the average price, and if the unit commodity has been sold below that average price the difference is paid between the average price and the price at which it should have been to give a fair return to all those who have sold this commodity.

I will give an instance. If A lands fine fresh cod and gets $3 per hundred and B lands stale cod and gets only $1, while C lands medium quality cod for which he receives $2 per hundred, the average price will be $2 per hundred pounds. If the board finds that it takes a price of $3.50 per hundred pounds to support the fishermen properly and to keep them in the fisheries it will pay the difference between the average price, which is $2, and the prescribed value, which is $3.50, which difference would be $1.50, which would go to every individual who had been fishing. This would give an incentive to the fishermen to sell at as high a price as possible and it would deter fishermen or processors or wholesalers, I will not say from cheating but from trying to get more money from the government than they should. This would result in A, who has looked after quality, receiving $4.50 per hundred, B receiving $3.50, which would be the price stipulated by the board, and C, who did not pay any attention to the quality of his fish, receiving $1 plus $1.50, or $2.50. As I say, this would provide an incentive, and, basically this method did work very well. It worked in 1939-40 with the salt fish board. Of course, these two methods cannot be applied at the same time with respect to the same commodity; one or the other will have to operate.

We are told that half the world is underfed to-day and half the world was underfed even in the years preceding the war. If the war brings a new world order, I do not think prices will fluctuate as they did between 1920 and 1939. There is no reason why people should starve in one country while commodities are burned or otherwise destroyed in other countries in order to keep up prices. Through international bodies, such as combined food boards, UNRRA or others which might be established, food could be distributed in the world so as to raise the level of nutrition almost everywhere to a reasonable standard. I do not think we have been producing too much of any kind of food, but I do believe the distribution has been altogether wrong. If it had been done through international arrangements as we are doing to-day, the present war might have lacked one of its pretexts and might even have been avoided. I could give instances of writings which were published a few years before the war but I do not wish to prolong the discussion. However, just to mention one, the French author Claude Farrère, an academician, wrote a book on "The Tragedy of Asia," in which he said that the country which has no commodities necessary for the life of its citizens has the absolute international right to go and take those commodities elsewhere by force if they are not being developed by the nation in whose country they exist. This is quite different from our conception of honesty between nations. The world had reached the stage where great writers were expressing sentiments like this.

I repeat what I said when the resolution was before the house. It is my hope that this legislation may never be necessary. Perhaps I am too optimistic; if so, at any rate the legislation will be a good tool in the hands of the government. The expansion of fisheries has not been great during the years of the war in comparison with agricultural production. Fisheries were handicapped by lack of labour and boats. However, I must pay this compliment to our fishermen. They have done marvelously well with the instrument they had.

I desire to put on Hansard, with the consent of the house, for the information of members, a few statements showing quantities of fish caught between 1939 and 1943, giving both dollar value and quantity.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I will now give the tables to Hansard.

I have here the total market value of all fish products both east and west and I will give a few figures for 1939 and 1942 respectively.

Mr. SENN: Does that include fresh water fish from the great lakes?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes; it includes eastern Canada, inland and west coast. In 1939 eastern Canada produced in value $16,797,306; in 1942 it produced $28,219,379. There is a great difference in prices, which in 1942 were much above those of 1939; but as to volume, the quantities landed, there is not that big difference. For example, on the east coast in 1939 the total volume landed was, in hundredweights, 5,575,824; in 1943 it was 6,173,600. It will be seen that although the value is almost three-quarters above the value of 1939, in volume there is not the same difference. On the west coast in 1939, taking salmon, the volume in hundredweights was 1,476,372 and in 1943, 1,344,037. In other words, there had been a reduction by almost 100,000, although the value of the fisheries was almost twice in 1943 what it was in 1939. I have not the value for all the fish but I will give totals. The west coast total in hundredweights in 1939 was 4,169,624 and in 1943 it was 5,300,321. The value in 1939 was $17,698,989. In 1942 the volume was 5,713,125 hundredweight. The total value for 1942 was $38,059,559. It will be seen that the price increased to such an extent that it reached more than twice the amount in value, between 1939 and 1942. But there was not a difference of 100 per cent between those years, so far as volume was concerned.

I wish now to refer to the inland fisheries, because many people may think they are not as important as they actually are. I know the hon. member for Davenport believes in their importance, and I must admit he is absolutely right. The quantities of fish caught in the last few years in inland fisheries amounts to seven per cent of the total production of fish. The value of fish caught amounts to eleven per cent of the total, which shows that the fishermen and the producers and the merchants are certainly right up to their business. The figures show that with only seven per cent in quantity the value amounts to eleven per cent.

In 1939 the total marketed value of fish from inland fisheries was $5,579,627, whereas in 1942 it was $8,761,981. The catch in 1939 for the whole of Canada amounted to 10,638,535 hundredweight, and in 1943 amounted to 12,373,921 hundredweight. This latter figure is an estimated amount; we have not the exact figure. These figures prove that there is no danger of the markets being glutted, because it has not increased in proportion to the increase in agricultural production—and I am not suggesting at all that the production of agricultural products is sufficient to flood the market. They will certainly dispose of what they produce.

May I also, with the permission of the house, place on Hansard a table showing the prices of fish as landed, for the east coast, west coast and inland fisheries. This table gives prices for east coast cod, lobster, herring and mackerel between 1926 and 1943. All hon. members will know that during that time there was, at the beginning, a very serious decline in the price of fish. For example, in 1926 the price of cod was $1.96 per hundredweight. In 1932 it was $1.01, and in 1942, $2.88. I believe in 1943 it was about $3, although I have not the exact figure.

Mr. SENN: I understand the minister is quoting prices to the producer.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, prices to the primary producer. In 1926 the price of lobster was $12.24. That price went down to as low as $6.12 in 1933. Then it increased to $12.19 in 1936. In 1938 it fell to $9.11, and went up again to $10.47 in 1941 and $13.88 in 1942.

The herring prices have not fallen to as great an extent as have other fish prices. The price went from 54 cents in 1926 to 45 cents in 1936—that is the lowest figure—and 70 cents in 1942.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): What unit is the minister using?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Hundredweights.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Seventy cents per hundredweight.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): What was the lowest figure?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The low figure was 45 cents in 1936.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Per hundred pounds?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes. Salmon, on the west coast, went from $4.03 in 1926 to $2.67 in 1932. Then it went back to $7.89 in 1942. The price of herring remained reasonably constant. It was 77 cents per hundredweight in 1926. Then the price went down to 18 cents in 1932, although in the previous year of 1931 it had been 43 cents, and in 1933 it came back to 44 cents. So that that price of 18 cents is much lower than the price in either the preceding or the following year. In 1942 the price was 54 cents. The price of halibut went from $12.05 in 1926 down to $4.07 in 1933 and $3.17 in 1932. It went up again to $14.44 in 1942.

With respect to inland fisheries, the price of whitefish in 1926 was $8.06. It went down to $5.37 in 1933, and up to $13.99 in 1942. The price of pickerel went from $9.06 in 1926 to $4.11 in 1933, and up to $8.70 in 1942.

The complete table showing the average prices of fish as landed on the east coast and west coast, and from inland fisheries, is as follows:

I believe these figures show that we are wise to set up this machinery, which would become necessary if we were to go through another depression. It is to be hoped, however, that we may escape a condition of that kind.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, in the discussion of this bill, which the minister has so ably explained, we are handicapped because we have not before us—except from memory—the data the minister has placed on the record. We cannot very well work out a reply based upon figures at which we have had only a fleeting glance.

When this matter was before the house on an earlier occasion I expressed some criticism with respect to the conditions under which the bill might operate. At that time it was presented in a somewhat vague form. Now, however, when it is in the shape of a concrete bill, there will probably be no opposition to the passing of it, any more than there was to the passing of the bill dealing with agricultural products. But there probably will be considerable criticism of the method by which it is proposed to carry out the provisions contained in the bill.

No one could reasonably object to the theory—if I may be pardoned for calling it a theory—of putting up the sum of $25,000,000 to help correct a condition of low prices in the fishing industry. Perhaps my calling it a theory could hardly be justified, when the proposal is one of spending $25,000,000 to boost an industry. What I am anxious about is—if, when and how it can be made to work.

At this stage I should like to make a few remarks following what the minister said in connection with the bill itself, because of course I could not anticipate what he was going to tell us. He suggested, and I hope correctly, that we were coming to the beginning of a new era, a new world. I am sorry to have to say so, but experience and history tell us not to be too optimistic. We thought these great thoughts about a brave new world after the last war. Until the millennium comes; until the doctrines laid down by Christ come into practical operation, I am afraid human nature will remain as it is, and human nature has a disposition to endeavour to get ahead t the expense of the other fellow.

The minister made allusion to the way in which a small fish board worked in the east in 1939 and 1940, and said that that legislation had worked well. Quite so; and this bill will work well if we continue on a rising market, or, in other words, if we do not need this measure. But there is a world of difference between setting floor prices on a rising market, which any one can do, and dealing with these prices in a time of depression such as we had in the early thirties. Unless I am grossly mistaken I believe the minister is basing his policy on a wrong premise, although perhaps that is the only one available to him. He uses the word "average," and says that at the end of the year he is going to average prices and find out what has been paid. Then, as I understood, although of course I may be wrong, in some way he is going to pay something additional to those producers who have not received the average price, and in that way make up the difference to them. That word "average" goes to the root and ruination of the whole situation. It is a word beloved of governments. When you are dealing with the government you must almost always do things on an average, but you cannot do them in that way in real life. We cannot all live up to the same ideals; we cannot all live on the same income, and we cannot all produce fish or potatoes or anything else at an average cost. That is humanly impossible. At the end of the year the minister can tell us the average price obtained for cod or salmon or potatoes, but that does not solve the difficulty that one man can produce potatoes at $40 a ton, while another man, working no harder, can produce them for half that cost. The same applies in connection with various fish markets. It might be the wrong average, but let us suppose the average was correct. The average of anything is an exact medium between the highest price or higher prices and the lowest price or lower prices; but you cannot live on an average. You have to live on what you can get. The demand would immediately arise: "You fixed an average on salmon of ten cents," we will say for the sake of argument, "and you cannot produce it in the east or the west for less than fifteen cents." But the government says that the average price was ten cents. Then the fishermen of one district say, "We sold below the average and lost money. We were nearly ruined; we had to scrape very close." I cannot see any virtue at all in dealing with things on an average basis. I would suggest, rather, that you use the best statistics available and say that a certain class of fish is worth perhaps ten cents a pound, that you will keep the price up to that figure and let the man who has been selling for less than that simply drop out. But that makes it pretty tough on him, and the whole purpose of the bill is to protect him.

Then the minister made another point. In dealing with the returns from the fish he said that for various reasons, particularly lack of labour, the production of fish had gone down. It is a little difficult to figure out the relative production when it is expressed in such a low unit as hundredweights, but I woud suggest that there is very little complaint on the score of decreased production. In the east, if I took down the minister's figures correctly, there was actually an increase in quantity. There was a slight reduction in the west, but I suggest that it was not due to lack of labour, because the people out there made a special effort to increase production and in most cases succeeded in doing so. The fact that there was a comparatively small reduction in the quantity of fish caught does not arise at all from lack of labour. People who are familiar with the fishing industry in the west know that the quantity caught depends very largely upon the size of the runs. You might put out a million fishermen and if the run was not there they would not catch any more fish than a couple of hundred fishermen. The famous big run in the Fraser river every four years used to be four and five times the size of the run in other years. No one knew why, but that was the fact; the sockeye run in the Fraser river was enormous every fourth year. Then there is the run of pink salmon. In the majority of places in British Columbia the pink run, which is the second biggest run, occurs only every second year, and as yet no man has discovered the reason for it. So that it would not matter whether you put out a million fishermen; in the off year you would not get any more pinks than what comparatively a few fishermen could handle.

That applies right down the line. I have seen a large fleet go out to catch pilchards, which they use in the reduction plants. Owing to the current, the heat of the water, or some other reason, the catch might be only a fraction of the catch the year before with fewer boats. Sometimes the pilchards will come within gunshot of the refinery door, almost begging to be taken in; at other times you will have to go two or three hundred miles away and then have difficulty in finding them. I remember that on one occasion the government hired an aeroplane to hunt for them, and they were discovered away down the Pacific coast near California, far from where they are ordinarily found. So that the slightly smaller production of fish on the west coast is not due to any lack of fishermen. I emphasize that particularly, because perhaps in months to come this will be trotted forward as a reason for putting the Japs back in the fisheries. I assure the minister that more fishermen took out licences last year, after the Japs were eliminated, than previously. That is a positive statement; more fishing licences were issued in British Columbia after the Japs were eliminated than before, so that any slight decrease in production was not due to the absence of our yellow brethren.

This bill was brought in very hurriedly, as is only natural at the end of the session, and before we had time to consult the people most concerned. In order that I might get the views of those people, immediately the bill appeared I sent copies of it to the three largest unions of fishermen on the west coast, asking their opinion. Yesterday I had a letter from two of the unions; I have not heard from the third. I should like to quote from the joint reply. They wrote sensibly and at some length, and I should like to mention some of the salient points. They said:

> While Minister of Fisheries Bertrand undertook that when the time came to appoint the board, he would recommend that one of the three members of the board would be a fisherman, he refused to commit himself that such would be the case.
>
> Ignoring for the moment the merits of the bill to meet the situation which it is designed to remedy, it is clear that the contemplated composition of the board is hardly adequate.
>
> The stated purpose being to assure the fisherman an adequate return for his labour, surely there can be no reasonable objection to stating in the act that some members of the board shall be directly chosen by the fishermen themselves. And since there are so many differences in conditions between the Atlantic and Pacific fisheries it would seem, too, that either there should be two boards—eastern and western—or a larger board to provide adequate representation for both coasts.
>
> A board of five members, consisting of representatives of fishermen and the trade from each coast with a chairman representing the Department of Fisheries would seem the most practical solution. A quorum could consist of three meeting at either coast, and we hope that the bill will be amended along these lines in committee before it is passed.

And later on:

> We see no harm, in the principle of the bill. It represents at any rate a recognition that some protection must be provided the fisherman against the vagaries of unregulated economic conditions. We share the hope expressed by the minister that it will not be needed but we would emphasize that hopes alone are insufficient. . . .
> Legislation to meet post-war conditions in the fishing industry will need to include measures for conservation of fisheries, marketing of products and regulation of fishing including licence limitation, on all of which matters the fishermen's organizations are now in the process of preparing a considered programme.

That is a very moderate presentation. I wish to make some comments of my own. I do not see why there should not be some provision in this bill for something like the participation certificates in the wheat business. If the government is to take over large quantities of fish and there is a change in the market conditions or what-not and they reap a substantial profit, I think the fishermen would be entitled to participate by means of participation certificates.

The second matter which I should like to mention has not been referred to by the fishermen. The government is not going to fix a price for fish; it is going to fix a minimum price, and I am afraid that there will be a dangerous trend on the part of the trade to accept the minimum price as the basic price. They will say, "You want ten cents but the minimum is five cents a pound; I tell you what we will do; we will give you five cents, the government price." I am afraid an attempt will be made, unfairly I grant, by those in the market to buy fish cheaply. They will say, "Well, the government have put a price of five cents on fish which is equivalent to saying that you can produce it at that; we will give you that and no more." I think the government should take cognizance of that fact. It is not as though they were fixing the price of fish right on up the line; they are simply fixing a minimum, and the trade may say, "The government experts have said that you can produce fish at five cents a pound, and we will pay no more."

My idea would be not to have a minimum but to fix a price for each grade of fish. That could be fixed according to what experience and statistics showed was a reasonable level. Then the government could supplement it by subsidies. It could subsidize, as my hon. friend said, up to that amount. You would then get away from the danger of having the minimum price regarded as the basic price.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): A subsidy would only make things more difficult.

Mr. NEILL: That would be the minister's funeral; not his funeral, but his problem. I am a great believer in letting people run their own affairs. When it is necessary to finance them, do it in such a way that they will not be interfered with. We should not set, say $100 as a reasonable wage for a fisherman because some are liable to sit down and not do anything. I would not let the government run anything. I would not let them run even a funeral because they would be liable to bury the wrong man. Let the people run their own business because they are familiar with it. The greatest incentive in the mind of man is the profit motive. If I hustle out at two o'clock in the morning and attend to my job of fishing, I will make a success of it. But if I can sit down and whistle and say that the government has to take care of me, the whole thing will be a complete failure. Why should the industrious, hard-working fisherman be penalized directly or indirectly because the other fellow is willing to take advantage of these provisions and have the government take care of him? If you are going to pay a man an income he will not get out and hustle, but if you say that pilchards are guaranteed worth $4 a ton at the wharf he will be encouraged to go out and get all the pilchards he can.

It will be noticed that in this brief of the fishermen's union their primary criticism is that there is to be a board of only three men. I raised this point when the resolution was before the house. This board is to control and set prices in connection with an industry huge in volume and with utterly divergent conditions on the east and west coasts. On the east coast there are fish of which we do not even know the names of. A man named one to me the other day and asked me what I thought it was. I told him I thought it was some kind of a flat fish, but it turned out to be a shell-fish.

The minister has said that it is his intention to recommend that one of these men shall be, not a fisherman but a man representing the fishermen. That recommendation will be subject to the governor in council; they may turn him down. I know of one man who was selected to represent the fishermen whose financial interests were absolutely opposed to the interests of the fishermen. However, he was said to represent the fishermen because he knew of their situation.

Men should be appointed who are practical fishermen. They should be appointed by the government, but selected by the fishermen. The fishermen's unions are well organized and they are in position to be responsible for these appointments. The man selected by the government may be a funeral director. He will be appointed because the government thinks he is a suitable man to represent the fishermen. He may have the brains of a Churchill, but how can he deal with such different conditions as exist on the east and west coasts. Not only are conditions different, but the seasons, the runs and the fish themselves are different.

I think the suggestion put forward by the fishermen is a reasonable one, that the board should consist of five members. There would be one man from the trade and one from the fishermen on each coast, and then the chairman could represent the Department of Fisheries, making a total of five. I think that is a moderate request and one which I hope the government will heed. The last day this matter was being discussed the minister said that he would recommend that one of these three members should represent the fishermen. But he did not say that it would be a man nominated by the fishermen; he said that it would be a man to represent them. That man might be a college professor, and in any event the provision would have to be put into the bill before it would count.

I can remember a former Minister of Mines and Resources telling me that a certain thing meant so-and-so when I asked about it in the house. But six months afterwards when I went to the officials and told them they were not carrying out the promise made to me by the minister, they replied that he was not bound by what he said in the house, that he was bound only by the act.

A further criticism I have to make is in connection with section 9 (i), which gives the board power to appoint commodity boards or other agents to undertake the purchase and the disposition of fisheries products. That is a large order. There is no restriction. A tailor may be sent out to handle crabs or lobsters. God help him and God help the people who will be under his control. Who are these men to be and how are they to be appointed? They are to have unrestricted powers. There should be some restriction or at least some qualification for the men who are to run these boards. They should know something about what they are doing.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It is going to be our responsibility; we are going to see they are good men, otherwise it will be our funeral as the hon. member has said. We do not expect to die this year.

Mr. GRAYDON: You may die politically.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I have my doubts. I am an optimist.

Mr. NEILL: If this private conversation is finished I can go on. If the minister can guarantee that he will be running this bill, then I shall be perfectly satisfied because I know he will run it wisely and well. But there are always doubts about human actions. A man may die, or he passes on, and it is possible that this might be enforced by somebody who had not his policy or his determination to look into everything.

Paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of section 9 give the board very wide powers to prescribe prices, to purchase directly by means of agents, to pay to the producer the difference between the price prescribed by the board and the average price. Prescribed by the board? Who is going to prescribe it? The board consists of three men, only one potentially a fisherman. Who is going to fix the prices and give the difference to the fishermen? The board have also power to purchase the fish directly. What are they going to do with it when they purchase it? You have to store it somewhere. Suppose somebody wires to Ottawa, "We have two thousand tons of pilchards on the Pacific coast and the reduction plant will not take in any more." What are you going to do? The government cannot store them in the fisheries offices. Yet you have to do something about it and you have to act quick, or the industry will come to a deadlock while people are sending wires back and forth between Ottawa and the Pacific coast.

Section 11 gives the governor in council power to make regulations. That means this three-man board, which includes a representative of the processors and a representative of the government, who by and large is generally more or less favourable to the processors. Anyway those two would be a majority of the board and they would have power to make the regulations. I submit that this is absolutely unfair. We are not passing a bill if we do that, but an enabling bill to allow these two men to make an act to suit themselves because the regulations will be the whole crux of the bill. This bill does not even contain a clause that has been put in several other bills, notably the one we passed yesterday about agriculture, providing that the regulations must be advertised. No publication of these regulations is provided for, and the consequence is that no man will know the regulations until they are applied. Then you ask, what about it? And the answer you will get is: It is done by regulation. It will take two weeks to find out who passed the regulations, what they mean and where they are. It is hard to get copies of regulations. The regulations which are to be made under bill No. 168, for the support of the prices of agricultural products, provided by section 12, under pressure from farm members in the house, would not become law until published in the Canada Gazette. If you cannot handle things in a democratic way but must handle them in a bureaucratic way, at least we must have publicity so that we can know what the conditions are. Eventually we do get the Canada Gazette out there, but if the regulations are not published we would have to trust to some typewritten document or to something we saw in the newspapers which does not give a correct picture of the facts. But if the regulations are advertised in the Canada Gazette, at least we shall know where we are at.

It comes back to what I said before and to what the unions advocate, that the board should consist of five members, and I would add on my own that the regulations should be advertised in the Canada Gazette as soon as they are arrived at.

Then as to the title of this bill, on the outside page these words appear: "An Act for the support of the prices of fisheries products during the transition from war to peace." But those words are not put in the title of the bill on the inside page, where it says, "This act may be cited as the Fisheries Prices Support Act, 1944". Which is to govern? Perhaps what is printed on the outside of the bill may govern; I do not know. But the words outside most certainly do not appear in the title. This measure might be terminated overnight by order in council. Most of the other bills of this kind that we have been passing, under which regulations are to be made, have said that they should continue in force during the conduct of the war and for six months thereafter, or something of that kind. Here is a man, we will say, who has spent a lot of money equipping himself for some phase of the fish business. He has bought nets, and you cannot get a net for much less than a thousand dollars. Perhaps he has bought a reduction plant. He has been benefited by these subsidies, for that is what the payments under this bill amount to, and perhaps he has been kept alive by them, for sometimes they make the whole difference between a man staying in business or going out. Then all of a sudden he gets a notice, not even by air mail, saying, "This thing ends next Monday and you can do what you think best." He is left to do what he thinks best about his investment. There should be some protection given. They should get at least a season's notice, perhaps one year's notice from the time that that decision is made. You cannot expect men to spend a lot of money on equipment when there is no certainty that they will ever get their money back again. At the beginning of this war we know how manufacturers were reluctant to invest capital in new plants to produce munitions so long as their profits were limited to five per cent. They would not spend a couple of million dollars to get the machinery that was required to make guns unless they had some protection, because at any moment the war might come to an end when they had turned out only one gun, and they would be ruined with all their money tied up in this machinery and plant which was left on their hands. Accordingly provision was made for them.

One other point on which I hope the minister will elaborate is this. The success of the bill will depend in part upon what is done with regard to the export trade. That is a very important element. He does not mention that in the bill. But I do not see how you can coordinate prices suitable for Canadians and possible outside markets which may disappear at any time. That is why I suggested the use of participation certificates. There might be a boom in prices in Europe or elsewhere and the government might come out and say: We will take over this product, and afterwards make good money. Some cognizance ought to be given to the export trade.

It does not seem clear to me from section 9 whether the government will allow the fishermen to run their own business or whether the government in order to keep prices up to a reasonable level will decide to take over the business and run it themselves. That opens up possibilities of enormous expense and losses. Suppose somebody at Ottawa says to these so-called ignorant fishermen on the Pacific coast, "I know your business better than you do and I will take over and run the whole thing. I will take over the whole salmon run." The first thing he would need would be a cannery. Would he build more canneries, or would he buy out existing canneries? The cost of that would be enormous. The same is true of reduction plants. They cost a lot of money and you have to have, not one, but half a dozen. If you go into that business it opens up possibilities of enormous loss, and I warn the government against it because the local people, the men in the business, are the ones best able to handle it. Someone at Ottawa may decide that he will go into the whaling business. Does anybody in Ottawa know how to catch whales off the Pacific coast? He may know something about catching a whale on the Labrador coast, but not on the Pacific coast, where I have seen a large fishing boat come in towing five and six whales. You have no time to write to Ottawa for instructions how to handle them because they have to be handled right away. Similarly, if you get a man from the Pacific coast, his knowledge of lobsters, for instance, would not be very great.

Suppose this three-man board took the notion to take over the whole salmon run, what would it mean? It might be done for a year or two, and with apparent—I say "apparent"—profit; and then the government, having found they had made a complete mess, and that they could not run it so competently with government officials as it could be run by the experience and incentive of personal ownership, would do—what? They would hand it back to these people. Whether they rented the premises or put up competing establishments, they would hand the business back to the people from whom they took it and say "go to it", possibly with the market gone and with the reputation of the product also gone. Of course the government says, "The department won't do foolish things like that." But I know a department not a hundred miles from here that allowed processors to put up a product marked "canned finnan haddie" and put in it hake and pollock and another inferior fish called cusk, and it has ruined the market for canned finnan haddie. If they are capable of doing that they are liable to put up something marked "canned salmon" and have cusk in that as well. Do not let the government go into large business of which they are ignorant. The government's job is to regulate and control; let the people who know best, run their business. If I were a member of one of these fishermen's unions—one branch of them is the cooperatives, and it is the very finest type of organization—I would certainly hate to see the whole control and organization of markets, perhaps in the United States and elsewhere, taken over by the government and handled, possibly by a gentleman of the highest intelligence and honesty, but whose whole experience may have arisen from running some other branch of industry, perhaps fishing in the Atlantic. It would be the greatest mistake to put in such a man to run this business on the Pacific coast, and remember there is not only one; there are eight or nine different phases of the industry.

I said, when we were discussing the resolution on this subject, that it seemed a rather poor reason why we should endorse the legislation when it was hoped it would never be used. Now I understand from what the minister said that perhaps it would never be necessary to use it, and I quite agree; but if it should be necessary I submit that this bill is not definite enough in its proposals, and above all it is just asking for trouble when you appoint a board to run an industry with about ten different branches, duplicated sometimes on each coast, and sometimes not, and it is problematical whether the board will include even one practical fisherman. There is no question about this, because the minister is on record in Hansard of July 25, at page 5315, as saying that he would not commit himself to it, but that his intentions were to recommend that one member should represent the fishermen. The government will pick out men—it might be one of us—and say, "You are competent to represent the fishermen." But he does not guarantee even that.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Officials of the government are appointed by the government. These officials are going to be on full time.

Mr. NEILL: Did I understand the minister to say he was going to appoint five?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): "By the government."

Mr. NEILL: Five of a board?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No; "full time", he said.

Mr. NEILL: I contend that three men are not enough. What is the total output of the industry? I do not know what it is in money, but it is a very big business, and three men are not competent to run an industry so diverse as this is and located so far apart. I beg the minister to consider this point, that the board should have a membership of at least five, with not less than two nominated by the working fishermen on the Pacific and, of course, the same on the Atlantic.

I should like to take the opportunity here, which I did not get when the minister's estimates were before us, of complimenting him upon the attention he has paid to the duties of his position. He has been out to the Pacific coast twice in less than three years; when he was out there the fishermen—and he got in touch with them, that is the working fishermen—and the business men with whom he came into contact, at least those whom I have had anything to do with, appreciated his businesslike grasp of everything he handled, and he took a keen interest in every proposal put before him. If he wants to wind up his political or his fisheries career by putting himself on a pedestal for all times among the fishermen of the Pacific coast, an action which perhaps might do the fishermen more good than this bill, with all its potential trouble and expense, would be for him to use his influence with his colleagues to prohibit the return of the Japanese to the fishing industry on the Pacific coast. If his colleagues prove obdurate he may then do it himself, by a very simple regulation, not requiring any appeal to the senate or anybody else. I assure him that it can be done by a stroke of the pen.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Might I say that if the Japs were fish I could do it right away; but they are not.

Mr. NEILL: Well, at any rate they are queer fish. I saw only this morning in the newspaper—and I hope you like it—that 2,000 Japanese will vote in Alberta at this provincial election. Every man Jap and woman Jap will vote for their friends of the C.C.F. I repeat, I hope you like it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. NEILL: However, I have got off my line, of course, and I apologize.

In the meantime I hope the minister will correct or amend this bill to provide a membership of five. The fishermen feel keenly on this. They do not ask a great deal. They have expressed their views clearly and temperately, and it is my conviction that the government should appoint five men and also that they should gazette the regulations before those regulations are given the force of law.

Mr. J. J. KINLEY (Queens-Lunenburg): I want to express first a word of commendation to the minister for bringing forward this bill. I should also like to congratulate him on the concise and brief way in which he explained it to the house. It was very clear, and I believe we all agree that it is a step forward for the security of the fishing industry. The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Neill), in his inimitable way, and rather facetiously, criticized the bill. Perhaps some of his criticisms will have a salutary effect, but I have come to the conclusion from the numerous criticisms he has made that he is "seeing ghosts." However, it is a matter of providing for the future, and there is always some uncertainty about that.

This bill is similar to the farmers' bill which was put through this house a few days ago. That measure was not intended to interfere with free enterprise. One hon. member, I believe, referred to it as the "if, as and when" bill. I believe that that is a good description of both measures. It means that if the occasion arises we shall have legislation which we can invoke for the purpose of keeping up the standard of living of the fishermen, so that they will not suffer as they did in the past, owing to depressions and absence of markets. It will put the resources of the nation behind the fishing industry in times of peril.

The fishermen are doing very well now. I do not think there was ever a time when our fishermen received better returns than they do at present. I might add that in so far as the run of fish is concerned, of which mention was made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, fish are extraordinarily plentiful on the Atlantic coast, and this, added to the price, means that fishing is now in a really buoyant state.

I do not think we should interfere with the fisheries so long as the prices are fair. We must realize that fish is a very perishable product; it must be handled quickly, and marketing organizations, transportation and equipment are essential in this industry. The firms who are handling the business on the Atlantic coast, at least in some of the centres, are well equipped for these purposes. I must say, however, that there are parts of Nova Scotia where equipment is not so good and transportation is slow, where entrance to the markets is such that there is danger of deterioration in the quality of the fish before they can be put into the proper storage. This organization is wanting in many parts of the coast. In my county it is well developed, especially in the towns of Lunenburg, Liverpool, also in Halifax and some parts of Cape Breton. I know it will be difficult to put a floor price under fish. Seventy per cent of the fish is exported to foreign countries, and anyone who is acquainted with foreign trade knows that the price in the foreign market will largely determine the price of fish, so that a floor price is something that might not work to the advantage of the fishermen. But this bill does not fix a floor price. In effect the government says, "We stand by, and if the price received is not sufficient to give the fishermen a decent living we will supplement that price. Furthermore, if there is not a sufficient market we will buy the fish ourselves and use the resources of the country in order to stabilize the situation and sell the fish to the best advantage of the industry."

It will be recalled that some years ago we had a price spreads committee, which developed afterwards into a royal commission, and that commission investigated price spreads in Canada. Fish was in the forefront, from the point of view of the price paid by the consumer and the price paid to the primary producer. There was a wide spread, and people expressed concern in many places over the difference between what they paid for the fish that appeared on their tables and what the fishermen received on the coasts of Canada. That is something that is not well understood by the uninformed. The price paid the primary producers is paid for an article that is different from that for which the price is paid by the person using the fish. For instance, fish must be processed, and in the processing a great deal of it becomes offal; also, in the drying of fish a great deal of the weight is lost by the elimination of water. To the uninformed a picture is presented which is not quite intelligible, so that a wrong impression may be created.

However, one thing that this board might do, and in my opinion can do, is to see to it that this vexed question of price as between producer and consumer shall receive its attention, and the board can deal with it in a definite way and for a specific situation. This feature will always be a factor and, in my opinion, one of the factors that will operate not only for the benefit of the fishermen, and the industry generally, but also in the interests of the country. It will create an intelligent idea of what price spreads mean in connection with fishery products. When you set a floor price the dealer might go to the fisherman and say, "I will give you so much for your fish." The fisherman says that the fish is worth more than he is offered, and the other replies, "That is the government price and I am giving you the government price." A floor price is, therefore, apt to be regarded as the price that should be paid. That, I think, is something that is carefully guarded against in this bill because it is not intended to set a floor price. What is said to the fisherman is this: "If you do not get enough we will buy the product or make up the loss to you, and in that way we will see that your price is brought up to the level at which it should be in a fair economy." That shows a scientific approach to the question and in my opinion it is an admirable feature of the bill. For that reason I think it should receive the enthusiastic support of all elements in the industry and of people generally.

There will be difficulties of course. I suggested to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) the other day that he might anticipate embarrassment from other countries dumping products into Canada if we had this sustained price. There has been considerable criticism in Nova Scotia about the dumping of fish from Newfoundland. Fish comes from Newfoundland into Nova Scotia, and they have a lower standard of living there in Newfoundland than we have. One of the difficulties of the fishing industry in our province is that we are in competition with countries where there are lower economic standards—such countries as Iceland, Norway and Newfoundland. All these countries, the European countries especially, are economical in their living and in their work, and they seem to be able to enter these foreign markets and in the past have done so perhaps more advantageously than Canada was able to do.

There is another thing to be considered. In our reciprocity agreements there is a paragraph that provides that if you stimulate industries in certain ways so as to disarrange the exchange, or if you try to stimulate your business in an artificial way, the result may be a cancellation of the agreement. But there is also a clause that provides that anything that is done for the social or physical welfare of the people in the way of social security or health shall not be regarded as a subsidy. For this reason I was enthusiastic about family allowances, because I can see among the fishermen along the coast of Nova Scotia that the man with a large family who has been unsuccessful in his industry will have something coming from his country to sustain his family. It will not become a part of any countervailing trouble with another country so far as trade arrangements are concerned. Family allowances will be especially good for the fisherman because they will make him more secure and place him in a better position with regard to export trade. Suppose some year world prices fall very low—and we must remember that we market our fish in the world market. The fisherman has his backlog of family allowances, and he will be in a much better position to stand the strain of some of those prices than he otherwise would be. And so, above everything I can see, there is nothing to compare with family allowances, so far as the fishermen along the coast of Nova Scotia are concerned. It is a floor under the family.

There is another feature of the bill which I think is important. It does not fix things in a static way. It is flexible, so that it can be used if, as and when it is needed, in order to stimulate the trade in the country. In my view this is a step forward.

The fishing industry in my county has been cooperative for many years. I believe the success of the fishing industry in the county of Lunenburg, which I have the honour to represent, has been for years a romance in industry. I say that because it has been outstanding in its success, it has been outstanding in the community it has built up, and it has been outstanding in that it has survived the depression of other years. To-day it is growing in a way which bids well for the future.

[Mr. Kinley.]

I do not quite agree with the minister in his statement of the production theory. There was a time when it was hard to find a market for fish, and I think that day will come again. I do not believe in immense production, just for production's sake. Industry is for a purpose, that purpose being to sustain the people of one's country. In so far as it sustains the people of the country it should be promoted. And, so far as I can, I wish to keep it that way.

Many Lunenburg fishermen, operating in a cooperative industry, own shares in vessels. That was done in this way: The vessel is divided into sixty-four shares. A young man might want to have a vessel. He might consider himself equipped to be a skipper of a schooner, and if he felt that way he would go around to get people to take shares with him. If they had confidence they would take shares; he would then go to his crew, and his crew would take shares. And if one man did not have the money he would say to another man, "Let us join notes in the bank; you take part and I will take part and we will put it into the vessel."

I attribute the success of the Lunenburg fisheries to that cooperative effort. That was cooperation between capital and labour; it was not a class movement. It was a movement where each shared in the industry, where each had an incentive to work, and where each and everyone had a stake in the success of what was going on.

This went on until the depression. Then, when the depression came along, the fisherman who did not have very big resources, did not as a rule retain his share in the vessel. He took an opportunity to sell. When the vessel lost money he was even more anxious to sell, because he could not afford to bear the loss. As a result, the merchants got control of most of the vessels. I think that was to the detriment of the fishing industry, and I hope that the industry will be developed in the future so that, so far as possible, the men will have a stake not only in the production, but in the venture as well. In that way we would have the cooperation in a healthy form, and one which gives the best results.

In connection with the production of fish let me remind the house that in the last three years we have tried to build fishing vessels. However, the navy, the air force or the army have come along and said, "We would like to have this vessel"—and they would simply say, "We will simply change her over, to suit our requirements." For that reason there has been no opportunity to build vessels for fishing purposes along the coast of Nova Scotia, because to a great extent the shipyards were engaged in the war effort. That, of course, is the way it should be. Furthermore, if one looks up the records he will find that men along our coast are either in the army, the navy, the air force or the merchant marine. There are very few men left—certainly there are no young men. It is nothing short of phenomenal that we have kept up our production, in view of the conditions we have had to face.

Mr. NEILL: We have exceeded it.

Mr. KINLEY: Yes, production has really increased. As my hon. friend has pointed out, there are some years when there are no fish, and in those years you cannot get production. That is true on the Atlantic coast, as well as on the Pacific coast. Some years there are lots of fish, and other years the fishermen have to go further to sea to get their catch.

Taking it by and large, the activities of fishermen in the last few years have been most commendable. And let us remember this, that the fishermen who go out along the coast of my province are fishing in dangerous waters. While the merchant marine and other vessels sailing the Atlantic are subjected to the dangers of submarines, and that sort of thing, the fishermen must be there like sitting ducks, fearing at any time to be destroyed. While I am pleased to say that none of them has been destroyed by submarines, at least two of our vessels were run down by convoys on their way to Europe, resulting in a loss of a number of men from my home town.

I cannot let this opportunity pass without adding a few words about the beam trawler. The beam trawler is an efficient machine; there is no doubt about it. But do not forget it is centralized control. Fishermen cannot own beam trawlers. Beam trawlers will be controlled and managed by the big fish corporations, and we have facilities in both Lunenburg and Halifax. And on the score of beam trawlers, so far as my county is concerned, I can say that we will be in the vanguard of progress at any time.

But there is the human element to consider, and I think one of the great purposes of the beam trawler is to get clear of that human element. While there is a scarcity of fishermen at the present time, it is a war condition I have been in public life and associated with fisheries and fishermen all my life, and my chief concern has been to get a place at the table where those fishermen can get food and employment. For that reason I do not want anything to happen that would make less labour in the fisheries along the coasts of Nova Scotia, or otherwise be a detriment to supply and demand.

Another matter Mr. Speaker.

It seems to me we have arrived at a time in Canada where we will have to make a decision. The fishing schooners along our coast are paying enormous amounts in income tax to the exchequer of this country. The fishing industry in Lunenburg is a cooperative industry. The set-up, however, is not quite in conformity with the act of parliament which permits cooperatives to function without taxation, and also allows the setting up of reserves so that they by statute pay nothing to the war-time exchequer. Government ownership also is in this class.

In Ontario they have their hydro system, which pays no federal tax—and naturally so. It is a provincial concern. The other day we heard that Quebec was to take over a power company—and I am not complaining about or criticizing that. But about $8,000,000 in taxation which formerly came to the federal treasury will not now be paid. In fact, we are told that similarly Saskatchewan is taking over the hydro there, and in that way they will get clear of income tax. Then, the wheat pools in the west can have their reserves.

Furthermore, the companies which finance them are free of taxes. But the fishermen in Nova Scotia, who are really cooperative, must pay the government thousands of dollars in income and excess profits taxes. The country cannot continue in that way, in the interests of either private or cooperative industry. A country cannot be half slave and half free. If some of us must pay taxes while others go free, we are working for the people who operate businesses and do not pay taxes. Therefore, if the revenues of this country are to be protected; if business is to be kept stable and free and to be judged upon its merits, the government must come to some decision as to whether some industries in this country shall pay no taxes while others pay the shot for running the country's affairs. I do not believe industry should be free of taxation, unless it needs stimulation. I have no objection to this kind of assistance being given the small cooperatives, where a few people try to get together and get ahead. I am all for some concession to them. But when they get into the realm of big business, when they go into pool insurance, pool wheat marketing, pool elevators and all that sort of thing, then I say the position should be reviewed. If we are to judge business on its merits; if we are in favour of free enterprise, then let it be free. If it is free, then let us have a free field and no favour. That is my doctrine and philosophy. I believe the time has come when we should seriously review the conditions that exist throughout Canada, with regard to the activities of provincial governments and other activities in various parts of the country that at present are tax free.

May I refer to export trade? We hear a great deal about export trade, Mr. Speaker. Of what does it consist? We sent to other countries food and materials for their people. Those people feed on and use our products; then they say that in order to have a balanced economy they must send back to us goods which will be sold in our country, and by this circulation we are supposed to bring about a healthy economy. Well, the thought occurs to me that if this be so, and it is, why not bring many of these people to our country, feed them at our own table here in Canada, and let them work with us? If we had twice as many people in this country we would not need as much export trade. I think the immediate problem of the future is immigration; I believe we must have selected immigration in order to have a population large enough to sustain our economy and carry our overhead. Mark you, I am not against export trade; I am all for it, but we should have both. In the United States they have 130,000,000 people, who provide a great home market. They also have a great export trade, and the home market and the export trade work together. It seems to me that in the immediate future we in this country must give consideration to that matter.

I am afraid I have gone a little far afield, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to say that I like this bill because it is flexible; I like it because it is not a frozen statute that contains great detail but because it provides a stand-by that can be used as a lifeline in time of peril. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni does not like a board of only three members. Well, we have a supreme court in Canada that has only a small personnel, and its decisions affect the whole country. The Minister of Agriculture said the other day that there would be advisory boards all over the country. We must have orderly control if these things are to operate properly. They cannot be let go haphazard; there must be some supreme authority. That supreme authority is the government, and they appoint a board. It seems to me the government can control a board of three much better than they can control a board of, say fifteen. I want the government to be in control. These advisory boards all over the country will bring various matters to the attention of the central board, where I hope they will be intelligently dealt with. I will say that the fishermen must be represented on all these boards.

[Mr. Kinley.]

I want to tell you that down in my county we have fishing skippers who can take their place anywhere, who know the fishing game and who know all about business. I could name many men who would adorn this board and bring to it practical experience that would have a salutary effect, giving it balance and helping it work for the good of the fishermen. I have faith that this will be done; I am sure that will be so if we who represent the maritimes can exert any influence in the matter.

This measure is intended to prevent disaster to the industry and poverty to the fishermen in times of financial peril. If it accomplishes that purpose it will be a good measure. I say we should try it out; put it through, and we will not have the fishermen coming to us later on saying, "We get poverty prices for our fish, while other people in this country are prosperous."

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. V. J. POTTIER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take my stand beside those who favour this legislation. Representing as I do a constituency where a large number of the people depend upon the fishing industry, it gives me great pleasure to support this measure. I support the principle of this bill on its second reading on two grounds. First, I favour the recognition of federal responsibility in the matter of fisheries and, second, I favour this immediate measure for the benefits that the fishermen will derive from the legislation.

I should like to refer briefly to the history of government responsibility from confederation on and indicate the difficulties that have been experienced because of the attitude taken by both federal and provincial governments. These difficulties end to-day in this measure which indicates a breaking of new ground, so to speak, by the federal government. The British North America Act gave jurisdiction over the seacoast and inland fisheries to the federal government. Immediately a bouncing procedure began where this jurisdiction was tossed back and forth between the federal government and the provinces. We find the federal government saying, "True, we have jurisdiction in so far as seacoast and inland fisheries are concerned, but that means only jurisdiction with regard to regulation and control; the responsibility for the individual fisherman, to see whether he is prosperous is not ours; that is for the provinces under property and civil rights and the general responsibility of taking care of the individual."

In the midst of that argument the British Columbia fisheries case was decided by the privy council. Under that case the rights to fish in tidal waters were decided as belonging to the Dominion of Canada, not to the federal or provincial governments. In other words, fisheries in tidal waters were considered to be the right of the people of Canada as a whole, not of the dominion or provincial governments. That simply complicated the matter a little further, and the bouncing procedure between the federal and provincial governments continued until 1935. I do not want to make this a political speech because the matter is more serious than that.

In that year we were in a great depression. From 1930 on, the responsibility had not been recognized by either the provinces or the federal government, and nothing had been done to take care of the fishermen while they were going through the depression. On October 3, 1935, we find Mr. Bennett, then Prime Minister of Canada, addressing a public meeting in Bridgewater, in the constituency of the then Minister of Fisheries. Mr. Bennett made this terrible admission, according to a report in the Halifax Herald of October 4, 1935:

> Turning his attention to fisheries policies of the Conservative party, the Prime Minister declared an immediate survey of the entire industry was essential, to spur the industry along a forward march of progress. The remedies he suggested, were: first, we must have better knowledge of the requirements of the people who buy our fish. . . . Second, trade commissioners should have complete knowledge of the fisheries. . . . Third, we must find out how we can assist the fishermen. I confess I do not know. I tell you, frankly. . . . Fourth, we shall continue extensive advertising to make your fish better known.

I think he was telling the truth. Because of this lack of responsibility by any government the Department of Fisheries at Ottawa had become nothing more than an unwanted child thrown from one minister to another. Sometimes a real minister was in charge of the department; sometimes only an acting minister was at its head. The result was that we had Mr. Bennett saying that he did not know how to assist the fishermen. The department had been unable to deal with the situation, to find out what the remedies should be. The same thing can be said of the previous administration.

In March, 1937, when I spoke in this house I referred to what I thought was the first thing that had to be settled, namely, the responsibility for the industry, whether it belonged to this government or to the provincial governments. I placed the fishing industry in the same category as our agricultural industry and I contended that our fishermen should be treated the same as our farmers. That is now being done by the measure before the house. At that time I said:

> I realize that it would be unreasonable for me to ask for discrimination in his favour. We cannot favour one against the other. I therefore propose, briefly, that we follow the policy adopted to take care of another primary industry in another part of Canada.

Then I went on to refer to the farmer. I felt that the first thing that had to be done in order to take care of the fishing industry was to remedy the terrible conditions existing. This is a great day for the fishing industry when we find a measure of this kind before this house. We have had bill No. 168, providing minimum prices for the farmer, and we now have bill No. 169, making the same provisions for the fishermen. There is some difference in the amounts, but perhaps that should be so. One after the other these industries are coming into their own; measures have been introduced to take care of the primary industries of fishing and farming. I am happy to stand here to-night as a member of this house representing my constituency and support this measure.

This measure is necessary. I should like to indicate the situation that existed in 1935 at the end of the great depression. Let me give again some figures that I gave previously to the house indicating the earnings by different boats:

> The status of a large number of fishermen in the maritimes has become desperate. For example, in one district in my riding, which was once a prosperous and successful fishing district, the catch for 1935 followed the general trend. I want to see it improved. I should like to give some examples of the earnings of some of the fishing boats. I shall not give the names, referring to them only by number.
> Boat number one, with a crew of twenty-two men, fished for fourteen weeks. It stocked $4,000, and the average share per man per week was $4. Boat number two, with a crew of twenty-one men, fished nine weeks. It stocked $2,272 and the average share per man per week was about $2. Boat number three, with a crew of eighteen men, fished twenty-two weeks. It stocked $4,600 and the average share per man per week was about $1. Boat number four, with a crew of twelve men, fished thirteen weeks. It stocked $2,100 and the average share per man per week was $4.50. Boat number five, with a crew of six men, fished thirteen weeks and the average share per man per week was fifty cents.

That was a general picture because those were not isolated cases. They were not the worst cases; they simply showed what was happening in the fishing industry when men were making from fifty cents to $4 a week over a period of ten, fifteen or twenty odd weeks. That was the condition facing the industry. That was the condition after we had had a period of prosperity following the last war.

I should like to indicate further the number of people who will be affected by this measure. We have approximately 80,000 fishermen in Canada, engaged in an industry that produces from $30,000,000 to $75,000,000 of fish each year, depending largely upon the prices at which the fish is selling. There is no great variation in the quantity of fish caught, but there is a great variation in the prices paid for the fish. That is why I support this measure. I think it is necessary.

We have on the Atlantic coast what are known as fishing banks, an area of 75,000 square miles, the greatest cod and haddock fishery in the world, bar none. On the pacific coast we have one of the greatest salmon fisheries in the world. These are assets which the Canadian people have to take care of, and the people engaged in this industry have a right to look to this and other governments for assistance when conditions beyond their control make it impossible for them to gain a decent and proper livelihood.

A word as to Canada's position in world fisheries. Canada exports about seventy per cent of its fish products. Canada produces only about four per cent of the world's production of fish. I am quoting from the 1937 figures which were given by the United States tariff commission and I believe that they are approximately correct. They show that the total world catch of fish in 1937 was approximately twenty-five billion pounds, of which twenty-five per cent was produced by Japan, seventeen per cent by the Soviet Union, ten per cent each by the United States, the United Kingdom and Norway; four per cent by Canada, three per cent each by France, Germany, Spain, Newfoundland and Iceland, and nine per cent by other countries. Norway, Canada, Newfoundland and Iceland were primarily engaged in producing fish for export. So that we are just a part of the world's picture. How can we expect, therefore, that the individual fisherman can stand up by himself without assistance in a competing world when conditions over which he has no control make it impossible for him to carry on?

Let us look for a moment at what happened after the last war, and let me say that I think the same thing is going to happen after this war. Speaking in this house on May 25, 1939, on the bill to establish a salt fish board and giving it my support on these same grounds, I said:

During the period of the war—

I was referring to the war of 1914-18, and it is my considered opinion that in a general way we shall face the same situation after this war, and should be ready to meet it.

—owing to disturbances in Europe interfering both with the fishing grounds and European fishing operations, there was in Canada a favourable reaction upon our fishing industry. There was increased demand and prices went up. After the war, however, and since that time they (other countries) seem constantly to have gained ground to our disadvantage.

I went on to show what the government of Norway had done in voting $3,000,000 as bounties for the three-year period beginning in 1920, and I showed what other countries had done. I summarize the situation in this way.

Bounties for fishing operations were given by Germany and Japan. Bounties on exports were given by France, the Irish Free State, Italy and Newfoundland.

Grants for the construction or repair of vessels were made by Germany, Japan and Newfoundland.

Grants for the construction of freezing establishments were made by Japan and Norway. Government loans and guarantees were made by France, Iceland, the Irish Free State, Italy, Netherlands, Newfoundland, Norway, Portugal, the United Kingdom and Denmark.

One after another these countries were priming their fishing industry, granting assistance of various kinds which made it impossible for the Canadian fisherman who did not have this assistance to carry on.

Promotion of the home market was undertaken by Denmark, France, Germany and Japan.

Other aids by governments of different countries were preferential transportation rates; tax or duty exemptions; emergency relief; other governmental aid such as in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

I am going to take codfish as an illustration of what happened generally in the fishing industry. It will show the trend of what has happened in our fisheries since the last war. I have a table taking five-year periods, showing the weight of the fish caught in pounds, the landed value and what this represented per pound. The table is as follows:

Year	Weight (pounds)	Landed value	Cents per lb.
1919.....	260,677,000	$8,288,243	3·1
1924.....	188,831,600	4,260,882	2·2
1929.....	197,944,000	4,040,562	2·0
1931.....	146,362,600	2,044,371	1·3
1936.....	162,000,000	2,030,779	1·2
1939.....	161,918,300	2,026,607	1·2
1942.....	193,556,700	5,570,400	2·8
1943.....	207,646,800	7,201,570*	3·3

* Estimated.

The table shows that the price of fish to our fishermen to-day is two-tenths of a cent, per pound on the average higher than it was in 1919. Unless something is done, we shall fall back from the 1943 price of 3·3 cents per pound to the prices we had in 1939, 1936 and 1931, when the returns to the fisherman were respectively 1·2 cents per pound, 1·2 cents per pound and 1·3 cents per pound, or approximately one-third of present prices. The house will understand that the prices I have given in the table were average prices, and that in some places the prices were higher and that in other places the prices were lower. But the point I wish to make is that we have gone up from a price of 1·2 cents before the war to 3·3 cents to-day, owing to the war and other causes which I have indicated. I emphasize that point because we do not want to go back to where we were before, and that is why this measure is so necessary to prevent a return to the low prices that we had before the war.

The United Maritime Fishermen had this same thought in their minds in the brief which they submitted to the Minister of Fisheries this year. I should like to quote the following passage from their brief:

> In the past years, especially during the period between 1923 and the beginning of the present war, the fishery of the maritime provinces was in a state of chronic depression. Ample evidence of this is to be found in the fishery statistics. These figures indicate that in 1939, which was not by any means one of the worst years, 30,524 fishermen in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick received for their total landings of fish the sum of $7,467,919 gross, making an average of $244 each.
> Out of this had to come the fisherman's operating expenses.

Just imagine what a terrible situation you have when the average person in an industry gets $244 a year, and out of that has to pay his operating expenses, bring up a family, and carry all the other responsibilities incidental to him as a member of the community!

We cannot allow the fisherman—and a number of these after the war will be returned men—to be left on their own responsibility, having to compete not only with individual fishermen of other countries but with the advantages these other countries will give to their fishermen in turn.

This measure will protect the price to the fishermen to the tune of $25 million. The important powers under the bill itself are contained in section 9, subsection 1, subparagraphs (b), (c), (d) and (e), to which I will briefly refer.

The first power is:

> (b) to purchase directly or by means of agents at such prices any fisheries product if such product on inspection meets standards as to grade and quality prescribed by or under any act of the parliament of Canada.

The second is:

> (c) to pay to the producer of a fisheries product directly or through such agent as the board may determine the difference between a price prescribed by the board with the approval of the governor in council for such fisheries product and the average price as determined by the board at which such product is sold during a specified period if such average price is below such prescribed price.

The third power is:

> (d) to sell or otherwise dispose of, directly or by means of agents any fisheries product purchased by the board.

The fourth power is:

> (e) to package, process, store, ship, transport or export, directly or by means of agents, any fisheries product.

Increase or decrease in the price of fish depends on a number of things; among others, on production, markets, processing methods, marketing and general conditions in the country itself, as well as general world conditions. That is to say, prices tend to increase if there is a decrease in production; further markets are found; improved processing methods are brought into play; orderly marketing is taken advantage of, and there is general prosperity in this and other countries. If, however, there is temporary overproduction, loss of markets, loss to other commodities owing to better processing, disorganized marketing and general depression, then the price of fish will decrease.

Generally speaking, I take it that if there is temporary overproduction or loss of market, the board will purchase to take care of the oversupply. If there is loss to other commodities owing to processing or disorganized marketing, the board has power to process or organize marketing. If a general depression takes place then the board can pay the producer an amount toward assistance to a price to make up for the general depression.

I know some will say that we depend on export markets and ask, how can the government control prices in view of that fact; how are you going to get around the difficulty of placing prices for different areas, different conditions, different qualities of fish, and a hundred other arguments? I am not afraid of these, because I have come to the conclusion that any matters of this kind can be adjusted and expedited if sufficient good will, effort and energy are spent by those who try to put them into effect. If, on the other hand, the people who are affected realize that these conditions and regulations are for their general benefit, you will have no difficulty in bringing such conditions and regulations about and having them put into effect; and I believe that this measure will be worked out with that end in view. I would say this about the officials of the fisheries department, that they know the fishing industry, have the fishermen's problems at heart, and are willing to grapple with them. On the one hand we are going to have officials who are inspired by this resolution, and on the other hand, the people in the fishing industry realize that this measure is being brought about for their benefit. Under these conditions I am convinced that the necessary measures will be made effective and benefit the fishermen. I have no doubt that this measure will prevent prices of fish going for starvation wages or earnings. That is the point in which I am interested. I do not mean that this measure will hold the price of fish on the market; I mean that it will bring about returns to the fisherman which will enable him to carry on.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the inscription over the entrance to these buildings has now a different meaning to me. I have in the past often wondered, when passing under that inscription, "The wholesome sea is at her gates, her gates both east and west", whether one could correctly say that a wholesome sea was one which produced hunger and want to those who went down to it.

This measure, if it is put into effect, will enable those of us who live in our kingdom by the sea to say with the rest of Canada, as in the poem, "There is a Land":

> And O, her skies are bright and blue,
> Her waters bright and pure;
> There's balm within her forest shades
> All world-worn men to cure:
> The wholesome sea is at her gates,
> Her gates both east and west,
> Then is it strange that we should love,
> This land, our land, the best?

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of speaking this evening not only for my own riding but for that of Vancouver North, and this I do with authority. Some fifty-five per cent of the fish produced in Canada are taken in the waters of British Columbia, and the industry directly affects in more or less degree such constituencies as Comox-Alberni, Skeena, Vancouver North, New Westminster and Fraser Valley. I am in a happy position in speaking on this subject because in my entire riding there are approximately only one hundred fishermen. However, as I have remarked, I am privileged in this matter to represent with authority the constituency of Vancouver North, and, indeed, also the riding of New Westminster. In my opinion the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) is a greater authority on fishing than any other hon. member.

Mr. CASSELMAN: How about the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill)?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Present company always excepted. The hon. member for New Westminster is on his way to British Columbia to attend meetings of the international fisheries commission, to let a contract for Hell's Gate, which happens to be within my riding, although there are only a hundred fishermen there. I wish there were two thousand because they would all vote for me. But unfortunately there are only one hundred.

On this subject to-night, I can speak with authority not only for my own riding but for Vancouver North, and I wish to deny something that came to my notice so far as British Columbia is concerned. It was implied that the people of British Columbia were not all in accord on this subject. Let me assure the house that the people of British Columbia, fishermen, merchants and everyone else, are one hundred per cent behind this bill. I have never brought in this subject before as an excuse for making a speech, and in this connection I might say that I should like to borrow some of the clothes, so to speak, of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), because I want to make a hit in another place. If this legislation had been in effect some years ago, in Comox-Alberni, or in any other part of Canada, H. R. MacMillan would have been working for Cruickshank. I am rather proud of that fact, and I want to quote something to the house for the information of those members who do not know all the facts. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson) does not know what I am going to disclose now in the quotation I am about to give, nor does the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) know it. I hope the house will pardon me for introducing a personal note in this, but that cannot be avoided. I wish to quote from the Vancouver

Daily Press, which carried an article discussing Captain George Robertson of Penticton, in the riding represented by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling). Captain Robertson is now eighty-seven years of age. I quote:

In 1887 Robertson and George Cruickshank, father of the present member of parliament, partnered in a halibut fishing venture.

I want the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the hon. member for Skeena to note that. That was in 1887, long before either of them ever heard about fish in Canada. At that time Alexander Cruickshank, senior, was fishing.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Where were you then?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I was not yet born. To continue:

The value of this fish was just being recognized and good prices were obtained, as both the eastern and local markets were clamouring for supplies.

This has a bearing on floor prices because, if this legislation had been in effect then, H. R. MacMillan would have been sweeping my office now, working for me.

They found an abandoned 35-foot schooner on the beach at New Westminster, paid $600 for it and set sail via Cape Scott to the west coast of Vancouver island. They came home with a heavy catch—

This is the point I want to emphasize because British Columbia is emphatically behind this legislation.

—but the day they docked the price dropped to 6 cents a pound from 18 cents the day before.

I quote this, even though I do not like introducing the personal note again, to show that my father and his partner, Captain Robertson, undertook a halibut fishing venture away back in 1887. I want these amateur fishermen to notice that. The second time they had a good trip; on the third trip my father was back in Boston endeavouring to sell the catch when the boat went on the rocks and was sunk and they went broke. These amateur fishermen do not know anything about that.

I quote further:

In 1892 the first shipment of iced halibut was sent out from British Columbia to the eastern markets by the New England Fishing Company.

That was before these people ever saw Canada.

Mr. NEILL: Pardon me. I came to Comox in 1891.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It was one year after you saw Canada then.

Mr. NEILL: Before you were born.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I admit that. It was one year after, in 1892, that the New England Fishing company sent the first shipment of iced halibut and the competition was too keen. My father and Captain Robertson could not compete against such conditions, especially after having their boat go on the rocks.

I speak with authority for the Fraser Valley riding and for that great riding of Vancouver North, the second fishing riding in British Columbia. I know also that I speak with authority for the member for New Westminster, who unfortunately is not able to be here to-night. We are all behind the bill in British Columbia. We appreciate the efforts of the minister, irrespective of party. When we had farm legislation I refrained from discussing it, much as I was interested, and I refrained from speaking on family allowances, because I decided to leave that to my hon. friend the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), who knows more about it than I do. But I want to be emphatic in the statement that in British Columbia we do believe in the new order; we believe in the new idea, and we believe that one way of making that new order possible is to guarantee to the primary producer, whether he be fisherman or farmer, a level that will enable him to make an honest living.

Mr. C. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): I hardly think any member will accuse me of having abused the time of parliament during the present session, and I wish to profit by this opportunity to associate myself with hon. members who have already spoken and expressed their approval and gratification at the introduction of a measure to support the prices of fisheries products. Representing a riding where there existed formerly one of the largest fishing fleets in the maritime provinces, I can do nothing but give my wholehearted support to this bill and to say that ever since coming to this house I have advocated measures which would give the fishermen better prices, better purchasing power and a better means of livelihood.

I was pleased and somewhat surprised to read the remarks made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) when discussing the estimates of fisheries on June 20 last in which he referred to the price of fish, cod and herring, prevailing in the county of Gloucester, the riding I represent. In making his remarks the hon. member desired to bring to the attention of the minister a situation which had arisen in the bay of Chaleur, in the province of New Brunswick, along the Caraquet coast, concerning the price of herring bait and of cod. The hon. member also said, in terminating his remarks, that he would like to be corrected if his information should be wrong. I take this opportunity to make that correction and to say that the information which was given the hon. member either was misinterpreted by himself or was not correct in its fundamentals.

The hon. member said, as reported at page 4396 of Hansard, that he held in his hand two invoices for fish, and that one of those invoices concerned a transaction involving a sale of 150 pounds of fish for $3, or a price of two cents a pound. That is quite correct, so far as the calculation is concerned. The hon. member went on to say that the second invoice involved a transaction of 5,400 pounds of fish which sold for $27. Then the hon. member added these words: "Which works out at exactly five cents a pound." Well, if any hon. member in the committee will take pencil and paper and figure it out he will see that the result is one-half cent a pound, not five cents a pound. That is the correction I wish to make, because it is misleading information. I do not say that the hon. member did it intentionally, but it is information which misleads the house and the country in connection with prices paid for fish in my constituency.

The fact of the matter is that the herring bait to which the hon. member for York-Sunbury referred used to sell for from twenty-five to thirty cents a barrel of 250 pounds. That was eight or ten years ago. This afternoon the minister gave a list of prices, giving the gradual increase in the price of herring and other fish. He showed that at the present time herring is purchased by the Gorton Pew company, and other purchasers for $1.25 a barrel of 250 pounds, or for one-half cent a pound.

The hon. member said that bait herring was resold to fishermen at exorbitant prices. The Gorton Pew company, to which the hon. member refers, and which owns and operates large quick-freezing and storage plants in Caraquet, purchases herring to-day from the fishermen at the different points where the fishermen land after catching their herring. The Gorton Pew company sends its trucks anywhere from Stonehaven to Miscou, a distance of sixty miles, at their own expense, so as to pick up these fish. Therefore the fisherman is not under the obligation of transporting his herring to a fish plant, this being done entirely at the expense of the Gorton Pew company.

On the other hand, as soon as the fish reach the factories they are processed and frozen, and as the fishermen require bait the company delivers the bait to them, again at the company's expense. For instance, on July 17 I was sitting in the company's office, getting some information on this matter, when a telephone message came from Lameque, which is about twenty-five miles from Caraquet, asking for 600 pounds of herring bait for a certain group of fishermen. The manager at the plant immediately told the gentleman who had called by telephone that he would send the herring immediately by truck at the company's expense. So that when a charge of two cents a pound is made for herring bait, one must understand that that charge involves the half-cent original cost paid by the Gorton Pew company to the fishermen, plus expenses incurred by the company for trucking, freezing, and for the delivery of the fish to the fishermen. The entire cost is worked out by the company, and any member of parliament who would examine the books of the company as I did, would see that that cost works out to one and nine-tenths cents a pound.

The hon. member for York-Sunbury also made reference to the cost of codfish. He said that $6.60 per hundred pounds was paid for green cod. He should have said that $6.60 per hundred pounds is paid for pickled cod, or cod kept in barrels or hogsheads, in a pickled state. But this $6.60 is the average price paid at the present time, and it spreads from $9.40 for extra large, to $8.10 for medium-sized, $6.80 for small and $6.10 for extra small cod, making a total average of $6.66. Those are the prices which prevail throughout all the maritime provinces.

The price prevailing at the present time for dried cod is $16.45 per hundred pounds. That is the price for the choice dry cod. Loose cod sells at $14.50 per hundred pounds. Then there is boneless cod, which is considered the highest grade processed in the maritime provinces, and it costs 24¾ cents a pound. The ceiling set is 28 to 29½ cents a pound, according to quality.

This afternoon the minister quoted prices for fresh cod, heads on and offals out, over a period of years. He brought his figures up to 1943. Last year the price paid to fishermen at different points was $3 per hundred pounds. In 1944 the price paid in Caraquet by the Gorton Pew company was $3.50 per hundred pounds, and this is paid at the point where the fisherman lands his catch. The company takes upon itself the obligation of trucking the codfish from the point of landing to the plant.

Having made these corrections, I wish again to express the great pleasure which is mine at seeing on the horizon the realization of the plans and dreams which every member of parliament representing a fishing constituency has had in mind for the past ten or fifteen years. In 1938 I had the honour of making a speech to the house on the question of fisheries, and recommending to the Department of Fisheries that it be developed along the same lines as the Department of Agriculture. I suggested that the department should concern itself with production, freezing, cold storage, different methods of processing, and with distribution and marketing. I also advocated at that time that measures be taken to have adequate prices given to the fishermen for their products.

I am very happy to-day to see the realization of those thoughts which hon. members from different fishing constituencies have expressed so forcibly and so ably at different times. I congratulated the minister and the members of his department upon having brought this measure down, and I shall give it my wholehearted support, and would expect that every member in the house would be only too glad to give to the fishermen the same opportunities as are given to the farmers across the country.

Mr. OLOF HANSON (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, representing a fishing constituency, I should be failing in my duty if I were not to make a few remarks at this time. I shall not quote statistics, which are available to all, but shall be content to place on record a few facts known to me because of my association with the production, processing and marketing branches of the fishing industry since 1912. In my opinion this is the first time legislation which would really help the fishermen has been introduced in this chamber. From time to time regulations have been framed and bills have been put through the house to assist the fishing industry, which no doubt have helped the fishermen to a certain extent, but this is the first legislation to be brought forward to really help the primary producers.

I remember when I started in the fishing game on the Pacific coast. Probably at that time the statistics were not as well kept as they are to-day, but halibut were selling at two to three cents a pound, provided you could find a market; chum salmon, running from six to eight or twelve pounds, sold at from two to five cents per fish, again provided you could find a market; white salmon ranging from twelve to eighty pounds sold at from eight to twelve cents per fish, and so on. Of course since that time the regulations have been changed and certain prices have been fixed for the benefit of the industry, but these regulations really have not helped the fishermen. They are now to be guaranteed certain prices which will enable them to make at least a reasonable living. This benefits not only the fishermen but also the industry, because even those of us connected with the fishing industry do not expect to get our raw materials at below cost. If the fishing industry is valuable to Canada and the world, as I know it is, then we should see to it that those who produce the raw materials have a reasonable chance to make a living.

I congratulate the minister and his staff upon at last waking up to the fact that the fishermen should receive some consideration from this parliament and the Canadian people. Perhaps from time to time the industry has been given a little too much consideration, although of course anything that helps to develop the industry helps the fishermen in a general way. This legislation, however, will stabilize that industry because it will protect those who are the backbone of the industry, the primary producers. I do not see how anyone inside or outside this house could oppose a measure of this kind. The minister has suggested that it may not be necessary to spend any of this $25,000,000 and I hope that may be so. If the law of supply and demand takes care of the situation, well and good; but if not, this government is prepared to safeguard the primary producers. I am very proud of this government and the minister for having seen fit to do so.

I am not going to take up any more time. I am absolutely in favour of this bill which I think benefits both the fishing industry and the primary producer and which is the first legislation to be brought into this house to assist the fishermen on the Pacific coast. I have been in this house long enough to realize, with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), that ever since confederation the maritime provinces have enjoyed certain preferences which have not been extended to the Pacific coast. Perhaps at that time the fisheries of the Pacific coast were not known in Canada. Now I believe the Pacific coast is the mainstay of the fisheries of Canada, so that I am happy to see this legislation introduced, which will help our fishermen remain in that occupation.

Mr. D. K. HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, many hon. members have praised in no uncertain terms, this bill, which is entitled, "An act for the support of the prices of fishery products during the transition from war to peace." The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Pottier), who spoke so earnestly on behalf of the fishermen and so optimistically about the effects of this bill, if I understood him correctly said that this should be a great day for the fishermen of this country. I hope it may be a great day for them, but personally I have some doubt as to whether this bill will have that effect. I think it is a mistake to be over-optimistic about the results of this legislation. This is an experiment, and experiments do not always turn out well. It is said that the proof of the pudding is in the eating. Well, the proof of this legislation will be in the results that are obtained from it. We are governed by many laws not on our statute books. They are economic laws. One of them is the law of supply and demand, a law that it is extremely difficult to circumvent or change.

In the hands of a capable board which approves the provisions of this bill and sympathizes with its objectives, this legislation may be of some assistance to the fishermen of this country, provided that it receives the full support of the government. I do not want to damn the bill with too faint praise. I hope it is a step in the right direction. I am in favour of trying it out, particularly since we have provided similar legislation for the farmers of this country, but just what the result will be I am not prepared to say.

In a brief presented to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand) in the spring of this year the United Maritime Fishermen's association urged that a floor be established under fish prices. I am not going to read the whole brief, but in paragraph 2 they say:

> It is the view of our members that if the fishery is to be reconstructed upon a basis which will provide freedom from want for the fishermen some means must be devised to maintain fish prices on a parity with other commodities.

Then it goes on:

> It is well known that in the past the discrepancy between the prices received by the primary producer and general commodity levels have been greater in the fishery than in any other branch of production.

And it concludes with:

> We urge, therefore, that in order to ensure our fishermen a reasonable measure of security a floor be established under fish prices on a basis that will put them on an equal footing with other producers.

The bill before us will not maintain fish prices on a parity with prices of other commodities. It will not place a floor under fish prices that will put the producers of this industry on an equal footing with other producers. In effect it places a floor under fish prices only for the transition from war to peace. It goes no further than that. As I read the request contained in the second paragraph of this brief, it fails to carry out the request made to this government by the United Maritime Fishermen's association. It may be a step in the right direction but it fails to carry out their request. I point this out to the minister and express the hope that some time legislation will be introduced into this house to safeguard the interests of the fishermen and provide them with a floor under their prices so that they will be able to live under proper conditions.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of holding up the measure and my remarks will be brief and to the point. We welcome this measure to assist the fishing industry. I think the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen) was quite right when he said that we must not be too optimistic and come to the conclusion that this bill will solve completely the problems of the fishing industry. I do not intend to go into prices, markets and that kind of thing; I am going to stick to the bill and make a few remarks with respect to its principles.

First, I do not agree with the title, "An act for the support of the prices of fisheries products during the transition from war to peace." In my opinion that is an escape hatch for those who are to administer this bill. Who is to determine when the transition from war to peace is completed? That may mean a month, a week or ten years, depending upon the opinion of those who are to administer this bill.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That may be a good reason for having it this way.

Mr. GILLIS: I am rather suspicious; I like to be definite and to leave no loopholes or guessing about legislation. To approach the problem of the fisherman on that basis is, in my opinion, wrong. These people have suffered since confederation, they have been the forgotten people of Canada. This has not been an industry in the true sense of the term, it has been simply a relief measure which has kept practically all the fishermen and their families in the breadline since its establishment. To think of reestablishing this industry only during the transition from war to peace means that we are simply going to reestablish it under the conditions that existed prior to the outbreak of war. It cannot mean anything else.

Hundreds of fishermen are in the services and they will be coming back. If it is intended merely to route them back into the industry, then I think the approach is wrong. Anything we do should be definite and permanent with the complete reorganization of the industry as the end in view. Our aim and objective should be the establishment of conditions and income in the industry that will guarantee a decent livelihood for those employed in it. I am not in accord with this term which indicates a makeshift and temporary arrangement pending the reorganization of the industry back to what it was prior to the outbreak of the war. Anyone who considers that Canada's rehabilitation programme is to cover merely the transition from a war economy to a peace economy is thinking in terms of what we had when the war broke out.

Second, we must remember that it is not in the immediate post-war period that the fishing industry will need assistance. There are agencies such as UNRRA which are going to provide markets for the commodities of this country perhaps for three or four years after the war is over. It will be in the period five to ten years after the war that the fishing industry will need the greatest assistance. It was not until the thirties after the last war that we struck the depths of the depression. That was when we required assistance such as this to bolster up our economy and this industry. To think merely in terms of the transition from war to peace is to be short-sighted, either consciously or subconsciously. I am not in accord with that. If we are working out a programme it should be a long range one which will bring about a complete reorganization of the industry to provide a means of livelihood for these people.

I agree with what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) said this afternoon with regard to the setting up of a three-man board. I have said many times in this house that the test of any legislation is in its administration, Those who will administer this legislation are going to have a rather difficult job and they should be people who understand the industry. A three-man board may be made up of persons who do not understand the industry, who know very little about it and care less. No one can make a job of administering any legislation unless he has his heart in what the particular measure is designed to perform. The suggestion made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni was absolutely sound. If this is not just a gesture, then this board should consist of at least five members. There should be one member from the east coast and one from the west coast representing the industry and the primary producers, and the fish companies or their agents could be represented. There should be an independent chairman appointed by the government. I do not think a three-man board is going to do the job this legislation is designed to do. The job of curing the problems of the fishing industry will not be done in this way.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This is not meant to cure the problems of the fishermen for all time. It is just an instrument in the hands of the government to help them if prices go down to the levels of 1932 and 1933.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, I understand that, but I have already made my objections to this transition period proposition. If you are to spend money under this measure, and you are to spend it to maintain prices at a certain level, it will not be the fishermen who will benefit to any great extent but the fish companies. I have no illusions on that score. I have read very carefully the brief which was submitted by the United Maritime Fishermen, which was referred to by the hon. member for St. John-Albert, and I note that the fishermen engaged in the fishing industry make it quite clear in the brief what is required on the east coast. They require fish processing plants; they require bait freezing facilities; they require cold storage facilities along those two thousand miles of coastline. Those are the main considerations with them. The fishermen along that coast are organized along cooperative lines; and if they are given the facilities that the industry requires, as suggested in their brief, I am not afraid about prices because cooperative organizations will take care of the prices. Already they are taking themselves out of the hands of the private fish buyers, those who manipulate the prices, and they are taking care of their foreign markets. But what they do require are the necessary facilities on the coastline to make it possible for them to handle their catch. From the price angle I am reasonably sure that they will be able to take care of themselves through their cooperative organizations. I am not a bit afraid about prices. But this measure in my opinion is going to help the fish companies much more than it will help the primary producer, the fisherman who is catching the fish.

Mr. POTTIER: What provision does the hon. member find in the bill that will bring about the result he indicates, that of benefiting the fish companies more than the fishermen?

Mr. GILLIS: It is the omissions rather than the provisions that I am concerned about, and one omission is in connection with the proposal to establish a three-man board, because no provision is made for representation on the board of the primary producer.

Mr. POTTIER: Is there provision for a company representative?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, because the government in power has always taken very good care of that.

Mr. POTTIER: Where is that in the bill?

Mr. GILLIS: The government has always taken care to appoint those who believe in private enterprise. That is the government's policy, and following out that policy you will find no one representing cooperative organizations heading any board that will administer this bill. Therefore I say it is the omissions that I am thinking about.

Mr. POTTIER: Is there not a representative of the fishermen on the salt fish board?

Mr. GILLIS: I am not talking about the salt fish board, but about this bill.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member was talking about the policy of the government, that it would not appoint to a board anyone representing a cooperative organization. But Mr. McIvor comes from the wheat pool.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not talking about agriculture. I am talking about the policy of the government as announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) a few weeks ago in this house when he stated quite definitely that so far as he was concerned the measures he was bringing down were not designed to change the economy of this country in any way, shape or form, that he believed in private enterprise and that he had a solution of the problem.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend said that following out that policy the government had never appointed a member of a cooperative as head of a board. All the members of the present wheat board except one are from the wheat pool, and the chairman is the most important of them all.

Mr. GILLIS: Provide in the bill that there shall be a representative of the cooperative organizations on the board and then there will not be any argument.

Mr. WRIGHT: Mr. McIvor was never a member of the pool.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: No; he worked for the pool.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member for St. John-Albert a few minutes ago made another important point when he referred to the variations in the earnings of the fishing industry. There is nothing uniform in the earnings of the fishermen. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Pottier) gave the earnings of the fishermen for the year 1942 and I do not think anyone could call those earnings an income. I recall the argument that was made last night by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) on the family allowance measure, when he tried to belittle the efforts of New Zealand. But the family allowance act in New Zealand does exactly what the hon. member for St. John-Albert suggested might be done for the fishing industry; it equalizes the income of all persons in that country. That is what it is designed to do, and that is exactly the function it performs. Some people who speak of these matters do not study them closely enough and know little about them. The purpose of the family allowance is to equalize all income in the country.

I wanted to make these observations, Mr. Speaker, because I am not in agreement with the principle of this bill. The principle of the bill is a temporary expedient to carry the industry through from war to peace, and if that is all that it is designed to do I cannot see very much relief in the measure for the fishermen of this country who are urgently needing relief. I shall reserve what further remarks I have to make on this measure until we are in committee on the bill, when I am going to move to amend these provisions in two respects, to guard against the things I fear, by giving representation to the primary producer on these boards.

Mr. W. C. MACDONALD (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, as has already been pointed out, this bill is, "An act for the support of the prices of fisheries products during the transition from war to peace". The bill makes provision for the establishment of a fisheries prices support board, and provision is also made for a revolving fund of $25,000,000. In effect the bill will establish a floor on the price of fish.

I want at the very outset to congratulate the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand) upon his vision and courage in introducing this legislation. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) said this evening that the minister during his two visits to the west coast created a most favourable impression. I want to assure the minister that he created an equally favourable impression in his visit to the maritime provinces. I have spoken to members of the United Maritime Fishermen, and many of them have assured me that the Minister of Fisheries has shown a strong grasp of the problems that concern his department. They have confidence in his ability, in his capacity and in his industry, and feel that he will surmount the difficulties which may be in the way and that he will go far toward bringing about a permanent solution of their problems.

I have already spoken in favour of the principle of this bill, when the minister's estimates were before the house. My colleague from Halifax (Mr. Isnor) has supported the underlying resolution, on which the bill itself is based. I would merely repeat that I am wholly in agreement with the principle. I believe firmly that if this country is to be prosperous it is essential that our primary industries shall prosper. This measure will go a very considerable distance in accomplishing that much desired result. We have already provided this session for family allowances. Amendments will be made to the Bank Act which will make it easier for fishermen to obtain loans. Here we have another great measure of social reform, namely this measure to establish a floor under the price of fish.

I can assure the minister that there will be many critics, many people ready to tell him that what he seeks to do cannot be done. Already we have heard some criticism. Two hon. members from the maritime provinces have voiced criticism of this bill. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) says that he is not in favour of the principle. The hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen) says that there is an irrevocable law of supply and demand. We in the maritime provinces have heard these same contentions and arguments for the last twenty years. We can find many men to go and tell the fishermen of Nova Scotia that their problems cannot be solved, that any constructive legislation of this kind is bound to fail. But I congratulate the minister upon the bold and courageous effort he has made in this bill to solve some of their problems, and I think he will succeed, although, were he to go out tomorrow, he could find thousands who would tell him that you cannot possibly improve the conditions of the maritime fishermen.

Mr. GILLIS: That can never work in a speculative market.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): What I appreciate about this legislation is that it is constructive; it is direct, and it deals with conditions and with realities. I am quite certain it will succeed. Only a few days ago we discussed a floor under farm prices. I think one can safely say that that measure received general support. Hon. members from western Canada did not take exception to a floor under farm products or to the provisions in the bill which were designed to give effect to that floor. But when a similar or almost identical measure comes before this house, we find it criticized by two hon. members from the maritime provinces who are most directly concerned with the fishing industry. The only difference between the two pieces of legislation is that this measure is applicable to fish and provides for a revolving credit of $25 million, while the other bill related to agricultural products and provided for a very much larger credit.

I did not rise to indulge in any general discussion of the bill, but I say most emphatically that it has my absolute support. I believe it will go a long way towards solving some of the problems of our maritime fishermen.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, I did not take part in the debate on the other bills, Nos. 161 and 168, but I want to say a word on this, because I think that, of the three classes it is the desire to help, fishermen have probably suffered more than any other. They are in a very hazardous occupation. When they leave our shores to go out to fish they do not know what kind of weather they will encounter; they do not know whether they will have a catch or not, and when they come home they do not know what prices they will obtain. Therefore I think this measure is a timely one. It is hardly a coincidence that bills Nos. 168, 169 and 161 come in together and are all, in my opinion, aimed at the relief of the small man, the man who is unable to take care of himself.

I would be remiss in my duty, and I am sure that the fishermen of the district of Nanaimo would be disappointed if I did not speak on their behalf, their own member, Major Alan Chambers, being overseas, and also for the fishermen of my own district.

I am not going to quarrel with the title of the bill, although I did say, when we were discussing the bill on reconstruction, that I thought it would have been better if we had not put in a transition period, and I think the same is true here, on the assumption that this is a good measure and will work satisfactorily. I do not think any government will be able to withdraw it; they will have to improve it and bring it more in line with developing needs, and make it permanent. If it does not work, of course, the more temporary it is the better. So that I welcome the fact that it has been introduced at this time, and I do not deplore so much the shortness of the term, because I am quite sure that once it is in effect it will not be possible to withdraw it.

I could say more, but I merely wish to put myself on record for my own riding and the riding of Nanaimo, as being wholeheartedly in support of the bill, and also to endorse the statements of others as to the impression which the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand) made in the west. The people out there are quite satisfied that the department is in good hands. I would also congratulate the government, and say that I am pleased to be a member of a party which has brought in these three bills, particularly this last one.

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): I desire to support the purpose of this bill, and to try to help our fishermen and the fishing industry. I do not represent a large fishing constituency, although we are the centre of the lobster industry, and we have small shad and smelt fisheries. My county is not concerned in deep-sea fisheries. I come from Nova Scotia, and everybody in that province is interested in the well-being of the fishing industry. It is one of our great natural resources. It has never been as prosperous in normal times as it should be. The people engaged in that industry have received the lowest reward of anyone in any industry in Canada. That condition should not be allowed to continue.

While this bill is not all that I would like it to be, I am going to support it. During the last few days of this session we have been voting money in enormous sums, running to a billion dollars a year, increasing our annual commitments in huge amounts in a steady stream with little consideration in the dying days of this session.

The amount provided under this bill is $25 million, which is only a small sum when we consider the other votes and the production of the fisheries industry in Canada. I agree with some hon. members who have spoken. I do not like the title, from "War to Peace." As I envisage them, our difficulties in the period from war to peace will not be great in the marketing of fish, in comparison with the problems facing that industry when peace is fully established, or in comparison with the years prior to the war. In Nova Scotia we want a floor price for different kinds of fish, which will be known to those engaged in the industry. I should like the minister, before the bill carries, to make a statement as to what will be the floor prices and when they will be put into effect. I should also like to have from him a statement as to whether such floor prices will prevail at the points of landing where the ordinary fishermen along our shores bring their product and desire to market their catch. I have the fear, as others have, that this bill will be more likely to benefit the larger producers and companies than the smaller fishermen, the shore fishermen in Nova Scotia. There should be a declaration from the minister as to what the price will be at points of landing wherever these fish are bought, and an assurance that they will be taken possession of by some agency which will give the producers fair prices. Floor prices should be known now so that fishermen may make their plans, get equipment to pursue their occupation.

The statement has been made by the minister that seven per cent of the fish caught in Canada is taken from inland waters, and that seven per cent provides eleven per cent of the total value. The reason is that the fish caught in inland waters are nearer the markets than the better fish caught in salt waters. They get this increased price of sixty per cent more than is paid to the fishermen in Nova Scotia. That shows the necessity for greater facilities for storage, transportation and marketing of Nova Scotia fish, because there should not be this spread between the amount received by the fishermen in inland waters and the fishermen in Nova Scotia. The government and the Department of Fisheries under section 9, paragraph (e) represent that they are going "to package, process, store, ship, transport, or export directly or by means of agents any fisheries product". I hope there will be an explanation from the minister as to what the department proposes to do under this clause. Are they going to assume this responsibility, or are they not? That should be made known so that the fishermen may have a clear understanding.

There are some features of the bill on which I require further explanation. The minister, I am sure, wishes to improve the fishing industry in Canada. He has some good men in his department—the deputy, the assistant deputy and other experienced men. Members from Nova Scotia are anxious to do something that will benefit our fishing industry, which has fared the worst of any of our primary producers.

Mr. G. B. ISNOR (Halifax): Having already taken part in the discussion of the resolution on July 25, when I supported it on the occasion of its introduction by the Minister of Fisheries, I simply wish to add my support along with that of my colleague for Halifax (Mr. Macdonald), with respect to our general approval of the principle of this bill which we have before us now to make possible support to the fishing industry of Canada. When speaking on the resolution on July 25, I pointed out that the wealth from the fishing industry in 1942 amounted, roughly speaking, to $75 million. Of that $75 million, $38 million was represented by the Pacific coast, while $15 million went to the credit of eastern Canada, more particularly Nova Scotia.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): What date?

Mr. ISNOR: That was 1942. Of the $75 million, something like $51 million was the result of revenue from export business and it is particularly the export business I wish to touch upon. In that connection I would ask the minister at a later stage to enlarge on section 9, paragraph (e), dealing with the transport or export, directly or by means of agents, of fisheries products. I wish he would enlarge on that, because to me that $51 million represents new money, and that is the type of business we should be seeking not only through this particular industry but through all other primary industries of the nation. I think we should pause and pay a tribute of appreciation to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for the splendid work he did in connection with the overseas marketing of our agricultural products, and in doing so I hope the example set by the Minister of Agriculture will be followed by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand) and others in connection with our export business for overseas. I was pleased to note—and I do not think they approached the question from a partisan point of view, that without exception the members supporting this government were in accord with the general principle of the bill. I was disappointed to find that two hon. members, particularly two from the maritime provinces, did not lend their wholehearted support to this bill. I have especially in mind the observations made by the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen) who, until he received some support at a later stage in the debate, was the only fly in the ointment, so far as general accord given to the bill was concerned. I am inclined to think other hon. members representing New Brunswick will receive far more favourable response when they return to that province than will the hon. member for St. John-Albert in respect of the stand he has taken.

I was favourably impressed by the concise manner in which the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) explained clearly and in detail the operating costs which enter into the handling of herring bait, and also explained the difference between the purchase price and the price paid by the fishermen for the frozen herring.

I was also surprised by the attitude adopted by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). He admitted frankly that he was suspicious, and said that he was not in accord with the bill. I was hoping from his remarks on July 25 that he would give his wholehearted support. True, he did give faint praise, but on the general principle he said, "I am not in accord." Well, if he is not in accord with the general principle of the bill I say to him he must be opposed to it. And if he opposes this bill a bill which provides for the first time something of real and direct benefit to the fishermen along the Atlantic coast, then he is not carrying out his duty as a representative of his native province.

I could go on farther and deal in greater detail with his remarks, but I shall not do so. He did say that the bill was framed to assist the large fish companies. I do not hesitate to say that I hope it will. I do not share the fear expressed by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) that this is going to assist the large fish companies, because I believe they are a very important part of the fishing industry, and not only that of Nova Scotia but of all Canada. I say I hope it will assist them, and will be a benefit to them. If it is beneficial to them it will be beneficial to the primary producers, the inshore fishermen, fishermen who fish by schooner or trawler, and who go to the banks at a distance of possibly fifty or ninety miles from our shoreline. I say it is a good thing that it will be of benefit to all classes, and that is why I agree with the general principle.

While I am not critical, yet I join with the hon. member for Cape Breton South and with other hon. members who have advocated a larger board. When expressing myself on previous occasions I have said that in my view the board should be larger, and that we should have at least five members, as was pointed out by hon. members sitting opposite. They have suggested that there should be one from the producers and one from the operators on both the east and the west coasts, making four, and that added to those four should be one from the department. In my view that would make a workable board.

However, there is one other branch of government which I think should be represented, and which has not been mentioned thus far by any hon. member. The Department of Trade and Commerce is vitally interested in the success of the fishing industry, from the point of view of foreign business. As I said a moment ago, it represents a value of about $51 million. It would be worth while for the minister to consider having a representative either on the board or on one of the advisory committees, to act in an advisory capacity.

The group to which the hon. member for Cape Breton South belongs differs from me in its views in respect of free enterprise. Again we differ. In this debate he referred to New Zealand, but he was very careful not to refer to Australia. The hon. member is always ready to quote what New Zealand and Australia are doing, and to pattern the course of his group along the lines followed by those two countries. I would remind him that only to-day the Prime Minister of Australia stated most definitely that in their post-war plans they must take into consideration that free enterprise is absolutely necessary for the progress of that country.

Therefore I say that if this government supports free enterprise, and if free enterprise has proven a good thing for Canada, I can see no objections to this bill, which will benefit both the fishermen and the large companies which make it possible for the smaller fishermen to carry on their daily pursuits of going to the fishing grounds each morning, day in and day out, at heavy risks.

I suggest to the minister that he accept the suggestions made by various members in regard to greater facilities for freezing, processing, transportation and marketing. Each and every one of those services are closely tied in with the success of the fishing industry. There is no use in catching fish unless they can be marketed. There is no use in trying to market them unless they are marketed in proper condition. There is no use in trying to market them unless a market has been created, and a means of transportation has been furnished to carry the fish from the extreme east and the extreme west to the central provinces. These are four very important matters.

I believe I have said more than I intended to say, having already spoken when the resolution was before the house. However, I do wish to join with other hon. members in offering my congratulations to the Minister of Fisheries upon having brought in this very important measure for the benefit of the fishing industry. I am heartily in support of the bill, and I am also in agreement with the expressions of view voiced by my colleague from Halifax.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I shall make only a brief contribution to the debate, but one which I hope will be as much to the point as those which have preceded mine. I rise at this stage to indicate the position our party takes in connection with the bill. Unfortunately I was not in the chamber when some hon. members spoke, but I should be very much surprised if they had not been generally in agreement on the principle and purpose behind the bill. Certainly, so far as this party is concerned, we are prepared to support that principle, believing that when floor prices were applied to agriculture, one of our great industries, that also the fisheries industry, which has gone through so many trials in past years, and which has suffered from depressed conditions, should have assistance from the state in order that its prices may be maintained at a position which at last would allow fishermen to have a reasonable opportunity of subsistence, and a more highly developed standard of living.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, while some improvements may be necessary in the details of this bill to make it more workable, or parliament may desire to amend the bill along certain lines, as a party we support the principle of this measure and will vote for it on second reading.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is gratifying to note that this measure, which is advanced by the government to alleviate the situation of the fishermen during the immediate post-war period, has met with the approval of practically every hon. member who has spoken, and has been endorsed by the official opposition. Criticism was offered in regard to two or three points, but I believe it arose from the fact that those offering it were not fully appreciative of the objects of this measure. The hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen) claimed that this legislation is in direct contradiction to the economic law of supply and demand. Well, that is so. It is purposely designed in that way because of many factors, other than the general law of supply and demand for fisheries products, that come into the picture.

Hon. members must not overlook the fact that until a few years before the war eighty per cent of our fishery products were exported, with only twenty per cent consumed in Canada. Just before the war home consumption increased to thirty per cent and exports dropped to seventy per cent. However, when it is realized that seventy per cent of the products of this industry must be sold in a dozen different markets, under conditions which this country cannot control, it will be seen that some extraordinary artificial measures are required to counteract the workings of the law of supply and demand. We have the factors of restrictions, tariffs, the financial ability of the purchaser to pay or to supply goods in return for the imports of our fish, and other factors over which we have no control but which unfortunately work to the detriment of those engaged in this industry. That is the basic reason why in the past the fishermen, although they had at their disposal an unlimited source of supply and a means of production relatively not too extensive, nevertheless could not realize a sufficient return to enable them to maintain a standard of living in our country comparable with that enjoyed by other classes of industrial workers.

For these reasons governments in the past have tried to find remedial measures. Attempts were made to secure special treatment for our products in certain countries through trade agreements. Other governments tried to compensate the fishermen by means of loans to make up the deficiency in their returns. Other governments established cold storage plants on the Atlantic coast. Finally, just before the war, the government applied to the salt fish industry the principle which, among others, is contained in this legislation. So that we have the benefit of the experience gained through the measure of control and help given the salt fish producers in the east to justify us in continuing that control and assistance and in extending it to the producers of other varieties of fish, provided that certain factors are taken into account and certain conditions met.

It is claimed that this legislation does not comply with the requests made last spring by the united fishermen of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Well, it may not comply with those requests in the terms in which they were presented; but I submit that in preparing for the immediate post-war period we must take into account the factors which may work against the distribution of the products of the fishing industry. We must prepare for the period when world conditions will be unsettled; when we shall not know what will be the trade relationships between the various countries of the world, what will be the tariff situation, what will be the financial position of the countries that may desire to purchase our exports of fish. Therefore we must take the necessary precautions against a recurrence of the conditions which came about immediately following the last war. I grant that this cannot be looked upon as a permanent measure to improve the condition of the fishermen. It is designed to assist them in the period immediately following the war, when we cannot tell what will be the condition under which they will have to sell their products. By this legislation we say, "So far as this country is concerned, we will take care of the products of your industry and will assure you a return which will enable you to continue in that industry and at the same time maintain a decent standard of living." That is what this measure is designed to accomplish, and nothing more.

As to meeting the demands of the fishermen and assuring them a measure of security, I repeat that as far as it is possible to guess what the future may be, this is the only legislation this parliament and this country could devise to take care of the situation, irrespective of the conditions that may exist in other countries or in the markets of the world over which we may not have much control when the war is over. After all, what the fisherman and those engaged in this basic industry want is an assurance that whatever may be the condition outside Canada, this country will see that they get a fair return, no matter if that must be accomplished by a violation of the economic law of supply and demand.

In normal times seventy per cent of the production of this industry cannot be absorbed in the home markets; it must be exported. If that condition were reversed; if seventy per cent of the production could be consumed in this country, then the law of supply and demand could work. The industry would obtain a sufficient return to enable it to take care of the thirty per cent which would have to be exported, either at a loss or at no profit.

I was surprised at the criticism offered by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) that this legislation will provide no benefit for the fisherman and will not help to alleviate his situation in the post-war period. I am afraid the hon. member has not studied this legislation; I am afraid he has not considered the purpose of this bill. This bill has been introduced to meet a situation which should be well known to the hon. member for Cape Breton South. As I say, for many years from seventy to eighty per cent of the production of this industry had to be exported to markets over which we had no control. Only from twenty to thirty per cent was consumed by markets in this country over which we had control.

I submit that the government has tried to find a means of relieving that situation. As I said previously, the government extended loans to fishermen and built some cold storages. Those may not have been sufficient to meet present-day conditions, but they were sufficient to meet the conditions which prevailed in those days when seventy per cent of the fish produced on the Atlantic coast had to be exported. Only a small quantity was exported in fresh or semi-fresh state; most of it had to be processed, dried, cured, salted or canned in order to meet the requirements of the export markets. It is true that we have since opened up and developed markets for fresh fish in Great Britain and the United States. It is hoped that we shall be able to keep those markets and, if that is so, this legislation will not be required to maintain the price of fish. This legislation is found necessary in anticipation of losing those markets or of their demands being decreased.

Section 9 (c) of the bill maintains the principle which was established by the salt fish board. During its operation that board worked to the advantage and benefit of the fishermen, because the great bulk of the exports could not be exported at a profit or even at the cost of production. I submit that the criticism of this legislation advanced by the hon. member for Cape Breton South was not to the point. This legislation being a measure temporarily to relieve a situation cannot be construed and looked upon as a measure permanently to establish prices in markets over which we have no control and which are quite uncertain at the present time.

I submit that this measure will go a long way toward relieving a situation which has been deplorable and which has concerned all governments for many years. They had tried to solve this problem but unfortunately have been unable to do so, owing partly to public opinion and partly to conditions over which they had no control. Now, however, we are establishing a principle whereby those who are willing to help themselves will be helped, and I am sure that this measure will be of great assistance to the fishing industry.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. NEILL: There seems to be something in the air. I do not know whether it is the heat, whether it is the closing of the session, whether it is the nearness of what I could call the ides of August; I do not know. I can almost smell it. There appears to be an idea gathering force in this house that when the government brings in a bill it is lèse-majesté or treason to express the slightest criticism. Time was when if you did not vote for a bill, that was bad, but if you went out and got your hair cut you were a hero. But if you did come into your place and vote, you were a colossal hero. But now we are not permitted to have even the crumbling dregs of independent thought. If a man rises in his place and says, "I do not altogether approve of this bill but I am going to vote for it," that is not permitted. You must express what has been so often repeated this afternoon, a wholehearted decision in approval of the measure. It is quite possible for a member to vote for the second reading of a bill and yet have some criticism to offer of it. There may be criticism of details. It is peculiar legislation that does not lend itself to criticism on some points by certain interests in the country.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We are all in favour of constructive criticism.

Mr. NEILL: Then I suggest that the minister should tell that to some of his followers, who, I hope, will act upon it. In fact, I think more of the minister than I do of the bill, and if the minister were hitched up to the bill forever I would give more support to it. The best thing that can be said for the bill is that it may do good, that it may serve a good purpose. But it is not the Book of Revelations. It is not the last thought on the subject for all time to come. It is only a possible solution of a possible difficulty that has not yet come upon us.

One of the hon. members—I speak subject to correction because my hearing is only fair and the acoustics are rotten—suggested that this was the greatest bill that had ever been introduced for the benefit of the fishermen, I presume since confederation.

Mr. POTTIER: I repeat it.

Mr. NEILL: That makes it almost unanimous because it was an hon. gentleman over on the other side that I heard saying that it was the greatest bill ever introduced. That makes, I think, three members who are of that same mind. Let me dwell for a moment on that—the greatest bill ever brought down in the interests of the fishermen.

My memory goes back to some legislation that was brought in even by those evil people, the Tory party, which was of great value to fishermen. The ancestor or father of the present hon. member for St. John-Albert was at one time Minister of Marine and Fisheries, as the portfolio was then called. His party was in power and he came out to British Columbia to look over the fishing industry. The member representing the district which I now represent was a supporter of the minister, and the minister looked upon the work of that gentleman and said that it did not look good to him. He said: "There will be no more of this system." Most of the cannery men there then belonged to the same party as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries of that day. They had a perfect cinch. The law then was such that they could build a cannery, and then see somebody and get a licence for the cannery. But they got more than that. They got a complete guardianship, so to speak, or control over a large area of water, water which belongs to the people of Canada, or to the people of the world if it is outside the three-mile limit, and not a fisherman could put a net into the waters allotted to the person who got the licence without his permission. The result was that since the fishermen had to live they went to the cannery man and got put on his list. There were so many licences to a cannery, perhaps twenty or thirty, and one of the first conditions imposed before a fisherman could get a licence was that he had to sell all the fish he caught in that water to the cannery and at the price fixed by the cannery man. You could not sell it to anyone else or you would not get on the list the next year. The licences were handed out, not to individual fishermen, but to the cannery man or to the man who had been successful in obtaining a licence covering a large area of water, and he farmed out these licences to the fishermen under the conditions I have mentioned. Mr. Hazen saw that that was not good, that it was not democratic, and that it was leading to a lot of graft. You can see all the implications possible. He said: "I am going to stop this." And in defiance of his own supporters and the opposition of a great many of his friends out there he said: "Hereafter anyone can get a fishing licence and the fisherman can fish anywhere in Canadian waters and sell his fish to anyone he likes." If that were not the greatest boon that was ever enacted for the benefit of the fishermen on the Pacific coast, I will tell you of another.

This was a boon also, and incidentally it was also a product of the Conservative party. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), who at one time was minister in connection with military matters, was, at the time I am speaking of, Minister of Fisheries. A condition existed in British Columbia which I had been trying to remedy for years and years, but I never got anywhere because the parties who were behind this custom were strongly entrenched here. Then new circumstances arose and it struck me that the time was right to try once more to get the situation remedied. There was a law at that time that any man catching sockeye salmon, the most valuable and expensive salmon in British Columbia waters, from a certain area down near the Fraser river had to sell the fish to the local canneries at the price fixed by the local cannery men. There was a gentleman's agreement that the price should not be lower than seventy-five cents below the price obtainable in Seattle. They could always have got a much better price in Seattle. But that was the law. You could not sell the sockeye salmon where you could get the best price. I thought that was rotten. Finally the present hon. member for Yale became head of the fisheries department and I said to him, "If I bring this matter up in the fisheries committee, what about it? Are you going to put your brute majority on and kill it?" He said, "If you can get the committee to approve your suggestion, I will not interfere." I put it to the members of the committee who were representing the fishing districts, and they could not believe it. They said, "Is it true that a man can catch fish legally and must sell it to a particular person?" I said, "Yes." They voted for the remedy and the thing went flying through the committee. Again I approached the hon. member for Yale and said, "The committee has approved. Now what about you? Will you damn it when it comes up for concurrence in the house?" He said, "No, I will not interfere if you can get the house to support it." And the house did support it, and that was the biggest boon the fishermen ever got. It must have meant hundreds of thousands of dollars in the pockets of the fishermen because they could then sell their fish in the open market and get six bits for a fish that they formerly sold for thirty-five cents.

Those were two boons for the fishermen that were obtained through Conservative governments. But Liberal governments have also been responsible for legislation favourable to the fishermen. In 1922 I had not been here for three months before the Liberal government passed a measure cutting the number of licences issued to Japanese down by forty per cent and later by further cuts. That was a very big thing for the white fishermen. Then there was a reduction of customs duty on fishermen's nets and gasoline engines. Then the Minister of Customs of that day arranged that the fishermen could get their gas two cents cheaper per gallon than anyone else. All those things are to the credit of the Liberal government. The Liberal government also inaugurated, after spending money in investigating, the building of reduction plants, which has been the means of employing many people and of bringing in thousands of dollars of revenue to the country. They also provided that no reduction plant could be started unless a guarantee was given that it would be staffed entirely by white men. That was another great advantage to our white men on the coast. Again, in the east, the government put up cold storages in the maritimes and paid for a collecting boat so that the fishermen could get their fish quickly together. The salt fish board of a year ago is another case in point. I do not think it is fair to say that this bill is a bolt out of a blue sky, and the first and only benefit to the fishermen. I suggest that any one of these things would have been of far greater importance than the best that can be hoped for from this legislation, which, as we are told, is to meet a need which has not yet arisen, and which we hope will not arise.

It has been said that many hon. members have spoken wholeheartedly in favour of the bill, but I noticed some said that there were improvements they would like to see. I hope the minister will take notice of these suggestions, more particularly the suggestion made by one of the hon. members for Halifax when he took his courage in both hands and said that he thought there should be a board of five. I believe the hon. member for Cape Breton South said something along the same lines. The minister cannot possibly be wrong if he raises the number to five. He will get the hearty appreciation—shall I call it the heartfelt approval?—of the people in western Canada, and apparently it will also meet with credit in the east; and with these changes, and one or two others which may be suggested as we go along, I think he will get a very feasible bill. Almost the whole benefit will depend upon the way in which it is handled and carried out, and as long as the present minister holds this office I am satisfied that it will be done in a reasonable and businesslike way.

On section 3—Fisheries prices support board.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Mr. Chairman, I wish an amendment to be made to this section. I understand the point of view which some hon. members have been putting forward, that the board should consist of five members, and I am content to accept an amendment which would say that the board would be of not more than five.

Mr. MICHAUD moved:

That section 3, subsection (1) be amended by striking out the word "three" in line 16 and inserting in the same line the following, "not more than five."

The CHAIRMAN: Shall this amendment carry?

Mr. MacNICOL: Will this likely include the nomination of someone representing that eleven per cent of production or of value contained in the inland waters?

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It is possible. The hon. member will understand that we shall have to choose the best men from where they are, and that we want the primary producers to be represented. We cannot now say who the members are to be. This bill will come into force as soon as it is passed. Some of the sections will come in force by proclamation, and we have some preliminary work to do. It is my intention, as represented to me by my officials, that the chairman of the board shall be appointed now and shall make a survey of the field, and that as soon as this is done the other members will be appointed, and I intend to have representatives from primary producers and from the trade.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the minister any prospective chairman in mind?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): No, I have not. Members of the board may give their full time, or some of them may not give their full time. We have not yet decided. But we are going to have the trade represented, and also the primary producers.

Mr. MacNICOL: I quite appreciate what the minister has said, and when this afternoon he kindly referred to my own interest in the fisheries in inland lakes all over Canada I said to myself that perhaps when this section came up he would get out of a jam of giving two representatives to the west coast and one to the east coast, or vice versa, by increasing the number to five so that he could give each coast two, and escape the further dilemma by giving one representative to the inland lakes fish producers.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The hon. member may be sure that there will be a man on the board who knows very well the problems of the inland fisheries.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MICHAUD: There is a consequential amendment required to paragraph 5 of section 3, in order to make a quorum of the board three instead of two. I move:

That in paragraph (5) the word "two" be struck out and the word "three" be substituted therefor.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Officers, clerks and employees.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have been following fairly closely the bill which was introduced with respect to the support of agricultural prices and the bill which is now before the committee with respect to the support of the prices of fisheries products, and I should like to know from the minister in what respects or in what sections the two bills do not follow each other closely. Do the terms and provisions of this legislation differ from those of the measure in support of agricultural prices? I might say that in most instances I have found them similar, but in case there is some difference I think the committee ought to know what it is.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I explained, when I made a general exposé of the principles, that it is absolutely similar to the agricultural bill except that the word "fisheries" replaces the word "agriculture", and that in section 9 certain paragraphs had to be modified in order to meet the exigencies of the fisheries trade instead of those relating to agricultural products.

Mr. NEILL: Should there not be a consequential amendment to subsection 5 of section 3

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes. That was made.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On section 9—Powers of the board.

Mr. GRAYDON: This, I believe, is the section where there are the dissimilarities from the bill which relates to agricultural prices. Would the minister indicate the changes in this bill as compared with the agricultural bill?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Well, I should have to read both. I know that wherever in the agricultural bill the word "agriculture" occurs, in the present bill "fisheries" is substituted.

Mr. GRAYDON: I understood the minister to say that there was some more important change than that.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, in subsection 1 (a), which reads:

(a) to prescribe from time to time with the approval of the governor in council prices at which the board may purchase fisheries products;

The similar subsection in bill No. 168 reads as follows:

(a) to prescribe from time to time, with the approval of the governor in council, prices at which the board may purchase agricultural products in the market.

It was found necessary, I suppose, to put "in the market" in the agricultural products bill because they are bought in the market instead of being bought from the primary producer. In the bill we left it to be purchased wherever it was found to be convenient. The other differences have references to replacing the word "agriculture" by "fisheries".

Mr. GILLIS: Is it intended to read each of these paragraphs of subsection 1 and to take them paragraph by paragraph?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): That can be done if it is so desired.

Mr. GILLIS: I think it should be done, because this is really the meat of the whole bill.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South; it is the meat of the whole bill.

Paragraph (a) agreed to.

On section 9, subsection 1, paragraph (b).

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): What does the minister propose to do with respect to deciding upon quality? There is no food product that is more perishable or that more quickly deteriorates than fish if it is not properly caught, processed, preserved, looked after, shipped and put on the market. It quickly becomes worthless. I should like to know what standard the minister is setting and how he proposes to decide on the quality and preservation of the fish to make sure that it is perfectly edible.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): In past years, it has been found that the inspection of fish products should be more stringent than ever and that they should be classified. One of the difficulties is that sometimes the fishermen, owing to their manner of fishing, their engines, which are not very strong, and their boats, which are not properly equipped, cannot land their fish fast enough. I was myself in Halifax last year when a schooner came in with 350,000 pounds of fish. It was a very hot day following other hot days and, although the schooner had gone to sea with a scowload of ice, it had all melted. The catch was very good but the captain stayed too long at sea. He wanted to fill the holds and, when he came to Halifax, although he had 350,000 pounds, it was found on inspection that much of the fish was not first class. We realize that if we are to help the fisheries we must see to it that the fish is landed in the best possible condition, processed immediately and shipped to the centres of consumption in proper edible condition. The problem of the fisheries for me and my officials is to see to it that the fish is landed and placed before the consumer in the best possible condition so that there will be no difficulty in selling it. That is why we have set forth in paragraph

(b) the conditions upon which quality will be established. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman means, how we are going to do it and how we are going to keep the fish in proper condition. All that will have to be done by the agents, most of the time, because the government has no refrigeration plant of its own. However, we shall see to it that the agents who are appointed will take the necessary steps to ensure that the product is in first-class condition.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister consider an alteration in the words dealing with the matter to which reference has now been made? Where standards have not been established, fish may be purchased "by the board or its agents on such basis of quality as the board may designate." That is putting far too much power in the hands of officials. I have supreme suspicion of official-made regulations, because they are far too often made for the convenience of those who carry them out rather than for the practical benefit that is to be derived from them. I cannot give the exact legal words, but it is customary in a case like this to use language of this kind: "may be purchased by the board or its agents on such basis of quality as the custom of the trade and/or the board may designate." That would give power to the minister after all. It would help him, or whoever makes the regulation, to take notice of the custom of the trade. It might be that an inferior class of fish, which has been well known and has always had a certain grade attached to it, or which has been designated by some name, could be sold in bulk without being put up in boxes. Certainly, at any rate, the custom of the trade would be a protection against any bureaucratic rule being passed which would make the bill unworkable. It might read: "by the board or its agents on such basis of quality as the custom of the trade and the board may designate", or it might be made to read "as the board may designate after taking into consideration the custom of the trade". If you include the words "custom of the trade" you give that added protection, and you may be sure that the custom of the trade will be a wise and reasonable one.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I do not think we can accept the suggestion, because we want the fishermen to land their fish in the best possible condition and we want the board to help the fishermen to raise the standard of the fisheries. As to the custom of the trade, the board will consist of men who will know it perfectly. I do not think we can accept the suggestion. There would be room for a good deal of litigation if the custom of the trade happened to admit of a quality inferior to the standard which the board would require.

Mr. NEILL: Suppose the regulations set a standard that cannot be lived up to.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We cannot suppose that the extremes are going to happen. The men on the board will be reasonable men and I am sure that they will pass regulations that will be reasonable.

Paragraph agreed to.

On section 9, subsection 1, paragraph (c).

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to ask two questions. First, what is meant by producers of fisheries products? A fisheries product is defined. Then, what is a producer of fisheries products?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The man who catches the fish.

Mr. COLDWELL: The fisherman?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, the fisherman, the primary producer.

Mr. COLDWELL: What does the paragraph mean?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The hon. member was not here when I gave my explanation on second reading?

Mr. COLDWELL: If the explanation was given then, I shall read it in Hansard.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The same principle is applied here as was applied by the salt fish board in 1939-40, and which worked out very satisfactorily for the fishermen. This is a paragraph which gives to the fishermen an inducement to produce fish and sell it at as high a price as possible. There is always danger of collusion between fishermen and purchasing agents or processors. Under this paragraph the average price of a unit commodity is made after the season is over. If we find that the price is not sufficient to give the fishermen a fair and decent living we will fix the same price at a certain amount, and the difference between the average price and that amount will be distributed to all the fishermen. If a fisherman has produced very good fish and has sold them at a higher price than the one which we believe would give the fisherman a fair and decent living, he will receive the difference, and have the higher price.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): It has been my experience that the small producer is the one who usually suffers. What would the minister do in this case? Two fishermen catch smelts at the same time, box them in the same way and ship them through the same express company to the Boston market. One of those shippers received the highest price, and the other received a notification that his fish were worthless, with the result that he got no returns.

Mr. MICHAUD: Was it the same grade of fish?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Yes, the same fish, caught at the same tide and shipped at the same time.

Mr. MICHAUD: And the same grade?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Yes. One man was paid the highest price, and the other received nothing, because it was reported to him that the fish were not marketable. Under those circumstances would both shippers be protected by this measure?

Mr. KINLEY: And shipped to the same dealer in the United States?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I could not say positively about that.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I would suggest to the man whose fish were said to be no good to prove that they were good, if they were absolutely the same as those shipped by his neighbour who received the high price. However, I do not think a single instance like that can be set up as a guide. If one of the fishermen had supplied smelts which were not as good, he would have to suffer, because we do not want to subsidize fishermen who are not careful. That would be an inducement for them not to be careful about their fish. The essence of good fishing business is to be careful in handling the products.

Mr. HAZEN: Let us suppose there are two open seasons for a certain kind of fish. How does the minister arrive at an average price?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): If there are different seasons, and the fish are not sold at the same price in both seasons, we take the average.

Mr. HAZEN: You have an average price for each season, at the end of each season.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: The prescribed price, as I understand it, is not set at the begining of the season.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): No.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is at the end of the season.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): If the hon. member will look at section 9 he will see that we have the power to buy at a set price. We go on the market and we say that we will buy at that price. Therefore fish are going to be thrown on us if the market does down. That is one way of protecting the fishermen. The other way is by the deficiency payment, which I explained a moment ago, and which was tried by the salt fish board. However, we are not going to use the two tools, if they may be so described, at the same time for the same commodity. We have to use one or the other.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraph (d) agreed to.

On section 9, subsection 1, paragraph (e).

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Does the department propose to have paragraph (e) made effective; if so, how is it to be carried out? In the speech to-night by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare this was represented as being a very important feature in the bill, the government having authority to do the things set out in this paragraph. Is it the intention of the department to have the board exercise the authority given under this paragraph?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Paragraph (e) is consequential to paragraphs (a) and (b). The board, having the right to purchase, has the right to package, process, store, and do everything that shall be found necessary, either through agents or directly. When section 9 comes into force it might be that the government at that time would have more than one refrigeration plant. It might have a number of them.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraphs (f) to (h) inclusive agreed to.

On section 9, subsection 1, paragraph (i).

Mr. GILLIS: I have an amendment to paragraph (i) and, without any preliminary discussion, I move, for the purpose of guaranteeing representation on the board by the producer:

That section 9, subsection 1 (i), of Bill No. 169 be amended by adding thereto the following words: "provided that any boards appointed under this subsection shall include representatives of the primary producers."

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I may tell the hon. gentleman that this will be done with or without the amendment, so that I am not even going to object to the amendment moved by my hon. friend. I accept it.

Mr. GRAYDON: As I understand it, the amendment refers to "representatives of the primary producers." I was somewhat impressed with the argument along this line by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, as I am always greatly impressed with the arguments advanced by that hon. gentleman. He pointed out that this really does not mean very much. Actually the government can put in anyone, even someone in the department, to represent the producers, so that this looks like a pretty hollow sort of amendment. I should like to have seen it with a few more teeth. As it stands now, the producers can be represented by anyone. Perhaps it is the intention of my hon. friend that the producers themselves should have some say as to who will represent them, but, as I see it, the amendment does not go that far. I believe it lets the government out entirely.

Mr. GILLIS: I have in mind that the fishing industry of eastern Canada, at least, is an organized industry.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is quite clear in the amendment.

Mr. GILLIS: My conception of this amend- is that it would refer to someone from the maritime fishermen's union, for example.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Of course the government will have to choose the members of the board, but this representative will be a man from the primary producers. No doubt we might accept suggestions as to whom he should be, because we want good men, but we must retain the power of appointment.

Mr. NEILL: At least the minister will agree to consider suggestions put forward by fishermen's unions as to who should represent them.

Amendment (Mr. Gillis) agreed to.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

Paragraph (j) agreed to.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

On section 9, subsection (2)—To maintain returns from fisheries.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to ask the minister for a further statement with respect to the marketing of fish products. I understand that some seventy per cent of our fish products are sold in foreign markets. Has the minister fully canvassed the effect of government bonuses and assistance in regard to fish that will have to be marketed in other countries, in competition with the products of those countries or other imports? This is an important matter, on which I think we should have a definite statement from the minister.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I do not think that question is relevant to this subsection, which contains a direction to the board to see that these prices are set in such a way that a fair relationship will exist between the returns from fisheries and those from other occupations. It has nothing to do with exports, although I suppose prices might be set for fish that we would have to export. I do not quite understand the question my hon. friend has put to me.

Under this bill the government is going to spend a certain amount of money in order to help the fisheries. I have no doubt that most of the time, if we have to use this legislation, we shall lose money on the resale of the fish we have to buy. According to the law we shall be buying it because prices are too low, and by purchasing it we shall necessarily increase the return to the fishermen. So that when we sell it we shall lose. We might accidentally make a little profit, but the $25,000,000 is to be there to enable us to help the fishermen if prices go too low.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will you not have cold storages?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We will use agents, and they will be the people in the business.

Mr. MacNICOL: And they have cold storage facilities?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The minister has hardly answered my question. I want to know if he has investigated the effect of this bonusing or assistance by the government on the marketing of these fish products in foreign countries. Some seventy per cent of our fish products are marketed in that way, and I want to know if the minister has considered whether we would be prevented from selling in such markets by virtue of the fact that we are bonusing the production or subsidizing the sale of these fish products?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Well, it is not a subsidy. This has been done under the salt fish board, after the season is over, through the deficiency payments. A subsidy is a payment to all members of a certain class at the same rate, and it is decided in advance. Here the payment is decided after the season is over, and it has not been considered as a subsidy in carrying on the affairs of the salt fish board.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Would that apply only to the West Indies market, or has it direct application to the marketing of fish products in the United States? I understood that the United States had stringent laws and regulations with respect to the importation of subsidized commodities.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The United States does not apply any such regulations against our salt fish.

Mr. NEILL: I suggest that the last two lines in this subsection are pure window-dressing and do not mean anything. The subsection reads:

. . . the board shall endeavour to ensure adequate and stable returns for fisheries by promoting orderly adjustment from war to peace conditions—

That is fine; that is what they are to do. The rest of it is just pure moonshine:

—and shall endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from fisheries and those from other occupations.

Take a bishop, for instance; how are you going to compare the two, or a blacksmith?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): You have to take people on the same level.

Mr. NEILL: It does not say so.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I might tell the hon. gentleman that the idea behind those words may be found in the brief of the United Maritime Fishermen which the hon. member for Cape Breton South read a few moments ago.

Mr. KINLEY: I think the idea is that if a fisherman has to pay $10 for a barrel of flour while he only gets a couple of dollars for his fish, the board will take that into consideration.

Mr. GILLIS: What I am concerned about is making this board permanent. I am not satisfied with this from war to peace arrangement and I am going to move the following amendment:

That section 9, clause 2, of Bill No. 169 be amended by striking out all words after the words "board shall" in line ten and substituting therefore the following words:

"ensure adequate and stable returns for fisheries by promoting orderly marketing and shall secure a fair relationship between the returns from fisheries and those from other economic activities.

Rather than a temporary measure, I would like to see it made permanent.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, August 3, 1944

The house met at eleven o'clock.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Sixth, seventh and eighth reports of standing committee on banking and commerce—Mr. Moore.

CONCURRENCE IN EIGHTH REPORT

Mr. W. H. MOORE (Ontario) moved that the eighth report of standing committee on banking and commerce be concurred in.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is this the report that proposes that the quorum be reduced from fifteen to ten members?

Mr. MOORE: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask my hon. friend what is the purpose behind that?

Mr. MOORE: The purpose behind it is to have a quorum.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there any sign yet of the final report?

Mr. MOORE: We have hopes.

Motion agreed to.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 182, to amend the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940.

He said: I am introducing this bill, which is based on the resolution already passed by the house, so that the bill may be printed and distributed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MUSKRAT DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMME

Mr. DECHENE:

1. Has the government investigated the proposed two hundred thousand acre muskrat development programme in the delta of the Athabaska river south of lake Athabaska, in the Fort Chipewyan area, as outlined by Mr. D. J. Allan, superintendent of reserves and trust services, Indian Affairs branch, Department of Mines and Resources, to the committee on reconstruction and reestablishment on May 24, 1942?

2. If so, will work be started on this project at an early date?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. The portion of the 200,000 acre development outlined by Mr. D. J. Allan, which lies within the boundaries of Indian reserve No. 201, has been fully investigated by technical officers employed by the government. The 200,000 acres referred to includes marsh lands owned and controlled by the provincial government which have been only superficially examined. The most efficient development of the project necessitates a cooperative arrangement with the province which has not yet been concluded.

2. It is not proposed to make an immediate start on the development owing to the shortage of technical men and skilled labour, the difficulty of acquiring suitable heavy machinery and equipment and the necessity of concluding a satisfactory agreement with the Alberta administration.

AMGOT SERVICE—WAR VETERANS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

Of the officers and men chosen for "AMGOT" service, how many are veterans, (a) of world war I; (b) of the present war?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Of the officers and men chosen for employment in civil affairs from units of the Canadian Army both overseas and in Canada:

(a) 129 officers and 25 other ranks;

(b) 232 officers and 251 other ranks. (Includes officers and other ranks who are veterans of world war I and who also have had overseas service in the present war.)

SHORTAGE OF DOMESTIC HELP FOR MOTHERS AND IN HOSPITALS

Mr. CHURCH:

What action is the Minister of Labour now taking regarding the serious lack of domestic help in Canada, (a) for women who are sick, with large families and young children; (b) for hospitals and other charitable institutions?

Mr. MITCHELL:

(a) Every effort is made in the local employment and selective service offices to supply domestic help or a practical nurse to those homes where a mother is ill and children are dependent upon her care. It has been arranged to have orders for domestic help in such instances endorsed by a doctor, social agency, or health service, and the urgent necessity of filling orders which have been endorsed in this way has been impressed upon the local offices.

(b) Hospitals have been given highest labour priority, and in every instance, are on an equal basis with war industry. Hospitals have been given the privilege of advertising for, interviewing, and employing their staff personnel without reference to the local selective service and employment office except to send a report of placements by mail to the offices. A directive sent to the local employment and selective service offices emphasizes the following points:

1. A conference should be held with the hospitals and institutions in your district to determine the maximum labour requirements to provide a full complement of non-professional employees. Such an estimate should include both men and women employees and care should be exercised to make use of women in any capacity where their services would be adequate.

2. At the time of the conference the hospitals should be informed that it might take a little time to meet the full requirements. The attention of the hospital representatives should be drawn to any major difficulties the office has experienced in securing employees, such as transportation, differentiation of wage rates within the same district, hours of work which prevent the referral of numbers of women applying at the office, etc., in order that the hospitals will fully understand the situation and possibly make the adjustment which would place them on an equal basis with other hospitals or other service occupations.

3. If, in the opinion of the local office, it is impossible to meet maximum demands, the local office manager should consult with the regional office, relative to the advisability of making special plans for intensive recruiting. Any proposed plans may be used only with the approval and under the direction of the regional office. The regional superintendent will arrange for discussions with the provincial department of health, hospital associations, provincial secretaries of the various women's institutes or other organizations with a view to seeking their cooperation in the recruiting campaign for additional hospital workers.

4. Following are suggestions which may be followed by local offices in arranging a campaign for the workers required. It is not intended that local offices should confine themselves to the suggestions listed below but rather it is expected that local offices will develop additional plans particularly suited to the local area:

In any centre where there is a list of unemployed women, whether housewives or not, a group should be selected by the local office and a representative of the hospital should be asked to address them on the nature of the work required;

Any persons registered in the women's registration of September, 1942, particularly those in the rural areas who might be considered suitable, should be informed of definite positions in hospitals;

If required, at a particular time, definite publicity should be given out through the newspapers and an appeal made by radio;

Representatives of hospitals should be asked to secure publicity and necessary advertising in such a manner and at such times as will aid in the recruitment of the required employees;

A statement on the hours of work, wages and perquisites should be drawn up and provided to any group cooperating in the campaign. This information should be distributed through the urban and rural areas as may be considered advisable;

Particular emphasis should be given to the fact that many of the shortages can be overcome by the use of part-time help. Revisions can be made in the hours of employment and the adoption of short shifts can help overcome labour shortages. The hospital should be requested to designate some person on their staff as the "contact" with the selective service office;

The local office should thoroughly comb the list of unemployed men, particularly those in the old age brackets some of whom might be suitable for this type of work, either on a part-time or full-time basis;

The cooperation of the urban and rural women's organizations and churches should be secured to carry out the recruiting programme;

Men's organizations interested in employment of their members should also be asked for assistance. This is particularly true of veterans' organizations who are anxious to place their men;

The veterans' welfare officer should also be interested in this campaign as many of the men coming to him for assistance may be suitable for hospital employment.

It is desirable that in each local and regional office one or more persons as required should be assigned to deal particularly with hospital requirements.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CANADIAN FORCES—CASUALTIES

Mr. BRUCE:

By provinces, what is the total number of casualties, killed, wounded and missing, for each of the three services, army, navy, air force, since the beginning of the war to date?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, so far as the army is concerned the casualty figures can be given up to the date they are cleared by security authorities. Subject to this reservation the question may be passed as an order for return.

RADIO BROADCASTING—"WALKIE TALKIE"—ADDISON INDUSTRIES LIMITED

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. What was the price paid to Addison Industries Limited per unit of the radio device known as the Walkie Talkie, on the first order given to that company?

2. Have any treasury audits been made of the accounts of this company since the first contract was awarded to it? If so, how many, and when was each such audit made ?

3. Did any of the reports following such audits, if any, recommend a lower price? If so, in which reports and on what date or dates were such reports given, and what changes in price, if any, were made as a result thereof?

4. What plant did the said company have for the manufacture of Walkie Talkies at the time the first order was given?

5. Have any capital or other advances been made to the said company? If so, how much and when?

6. What other companies had the necessary facilities to manufacture Walkie Talkies at the time the first contract was awarded?

7. When was the first delivery of the said devices made?

8. How many were delivered, (a) by January 1, 1942; (b) by June 1, 1942; (c) by January 1, 1943; (d) by June 1, 1943; (e) by January 1, 1944; (f) by June 1, 1944?

9. With the exception of labour and material costs, what other items, if any, was the said company allowed to include in arriving at cost price?

10. What company or companies in Canada make or supply parts that go into the manufacture of the said device?

11. In the treasury audits that have been made, has or has not Addison Industries Limited been allowed to include any costs and expenses of the firm or firms making or supplying parts that go into the construction of Walkie Talkie for the said Addison Industries Limited?

12. What are the names and addresses of the directors of Addison Industries Limited?

13. What salary and expenses has each of the said persons been allowed as director, executive or in any other capacity, during each of the years 1942, 1943 and 1944, to date?

CANADIAN FORCES—TRANSPORTATION OF WIVES AND CHILDREN OF MARRIED MEN OVERSEAS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What is being done to transport to Canada the wives and children of soldiers who have married in Britain or other places, while on active service overseas?

2. How many such cases are there and what are the provisions made in such cases?

3. Is free transportation given them and travelling expenses to their homes?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MONTREAL TRAMWAYS STRIKE—CAUSES AND MEASURES FOR SETTLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the serious labour situation existing in Montreal at the present moment, will the Minister of Labour give full details as to the causes of the dispute which led to the present transportation tie-up, and the efforts which have been made or are now in contemplation by the government to settle it?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The hon. member gave me notice of this question. It will be recalled that this is the third walk-out of Montreal tramways employees in recent months.

The differences have developed mainly because of union jurisdictional disputes by reason of the fact that some of the employees belong to any one of three different unions, and also due to differences of opinion between the company and its employees in respect to payment of a bonus based on revenue. That is a short and broad history of the dispute.

Since the wartime labour relations board was created the matter of union jurisdiction has been clarified, and the representatives of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees and Other Transport Workers have been certified as the proper bargaining agency for all operational employees.

Since the decision was given by the labour relations board in April of this year, negotiations have been going on between the union and the company with the object of agreeing on the terms of a new contract to replace one made with a committee of employees some years ago. Negotiations in the first instance were direct between the company and the union and at this stage agreements were reached on a number of points.

There had been previously a discussion in regard to payment of a bonus based on earnings of the company, to which I referred a moment ago. The matter was submitted to the national war labour board and the decision of the board was that the bonus was to be paid. Early this week approximately $1,800,000 was paid by the company to the employees in respect of the decision of the national war labour board.

There is also outstanding a question of rates of wages, although it does not enter into the present dispute, which under the law has to be submitted to the regional war labour board of the province of Quebec, with the right of appeal, of course, to the national war labour board by either party.

There exists to-day the matter of approval of proposed rates of wages, which matter is before the regional war labour board.

The present situation is that agreement has been reached or directions have been given on all the outstanding matters except rate of wages and some of the terms of the agreement.

While all of the details of the terms of the agreement have not been ironed out, the matter which caused the strike is that the union demands that the company require all new employees to join the union within thirty days of the date of employment. This the company refuses to do, giving as its reason, first, the belief that it is the duty of the company to see that men employed by them have freedom of choice as to what union they join, and, secondly, because of the legal advice given to the company that a contract requiring men to join a particular union would be contrary to the laws of Canada and the province of Quebec.

Agreement has been reached on many of the points as a result of a recommendation made by a board of conciliation set up by the Department of Labour under the wartime labour relations regulations in connection with the voluntary check-off, which was further agreed to yesterday at a conference at which I was present between the company and the employees.

On the point which has created the strike, the members of the board of conciliation were divided, each one of the three members expressing a different point of view. The report of the board of conciliation was given publicity by the department, and when it became clear that no agreement was in sight, I wired the two parties as follows:

> Regarding the matter of the Montreal Tramways and the position taken by the solicitors for the company. My understanding of the matter is that differences between the company and the men could be cleared up except on the question of one point and in this connection on behalf of the men you are asking that new employees be required to join and remain members of the union during the life of the contract. The position taken by the company in this respect being that this would involve the company in an act which was contrary to the laws of the province of Quebec. I have consulted with the Minister of Justice and after doing so am proposing to you that the department appoint a superior court judge as a commissioner to bring in a report on the matter which would constitute advice among other things as to the legal status I respectfully urge your consideration of this suggestion and that you request your committee to accept the proposal as one which would be of definite assistance in helping to bring about a settlement of the dispute. If the foregoing is acceptable I will appoint commissioner immediately. If the proposal is not acceptable I would suggest that you and two or three others representing the men come to Ottawa together with representatives of the company to discuss the situation with me. Kindly advise.

In response to this wire I was advised by the company that it would accept the proposal for the appointment of a commission and I was advised by the union that the proposal was not accepted.

Arrangements were made for representatives of the company and the men to see me and officers of my department and a lengthy conference was held with them yesterday. At the conference yesterday some points of difference were cleared up—that is the check-off I mentioned a moment ago—but on the main point as to whether or not new men would be required to join the union within thirty days of the date of their employment, agreement was not reached.

In addition to the proposal that I appoint a commissioner, two other proposals to settle the dispute were made. The first was that the matter be arbitrated by a board of three men, one to be appointed by the company, one to be appointed by the men, with an independent chairman on the understanding that the decision would be binding on both parties. The company offered to agree to this proposal, but representatives of the union stated that the proposal would not be acceptable to the men. The second proposal made yesterday was that the company sign the agreement with the disputed clause included but with a rider that the clause would not come into effect until it was stated by the Supreme Court of Canada that it would be proper and legal for the company to enter into this agreement.

I promised on behalf of the government that if this proposal was accepted the government would refer the matter to the supreme court for a decision on two points: (a) whether or not the dominion wartime labour relations regulations superseded the Public Employees' Dispute Act of the province of Quebec, and (b) whether or not the company could legally enter into the contract asked for by the union. This latter proposal was acceptable to the company and was in part acceptable to the union. However, the negotiations broke down because the union demanded that the terms of the paragraph go into effect immediately and if found illegal by the court would be cancelled, whereas the company took the position that they could not put the paragraph into force until the matter had been clarified by the court.

The department has been giving a great deal of attention to the whole case. I would say that I do not know of any labour dispute within my memory in which greater efforts have been put forth with a view to settlement. In saying this I have in mind all governments, and I have some knowledge of different governments which have been in power—and I am not speaking in a personal sense. We went through the normal procedure of certification and established a conciliation board, and when the men could not agree to the terms of the recommendation of that board we sent a judge who tried to compose the differences. In addition to that, we sent the chairman of the wartime labour relations board last week to try to compose this difference, and of course there was the long conference I had yesterday in the final stage. The officials of the department have been in constant touch with the situation. I think that about covers the ground.

Mr. GILLIS: The minister referred to a certain paragraph. I wonder if he would put that on the record. He referred to some paragraph as the basis of dispute.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is in the record. The basis of dispute is this, whether the men, that is new employees, shall be compelled to join the union within thirty days after employment.

Mr. DUPUIS: What is the name of the union?

Mr. MITCHELL: The Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees and Other Transport Workers. I think I should say this. When the big national and international picture is taken into consideration, I do not think a strike is warranted over an issue of this description. I know that industrial disputes are difficult; no one knows that better than myself. A question has been raised in this morning's newspapers, or it has been suggested or hinted that the government should tell an individual what trade union he should belong to. I speak as an individual, but that is a peculiar and an entirely radical departure in a democratic form of government as we understand it. That is my own view. It may be that I shall live to see the day when a situation of that kind develops, but when it does, democracy goes out of the window and we are in for another form of government. I am stating my personal point of view. I wish to pay a tribute to the officers of my department and to the three judges who took part in the attempts to settle the dispute, but the final responsibility is mine and I have to accept it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Was not this union duly certified as the bargaining agency for the employees? Do not the men agree that the position of old employees belonging to other unions shall not be prejudiced but that only new employees shall be required to join the recognized union?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have mentioned that. Mind you, the opinion has been expressed in this country that there is a movement going on to protect the rights of people who are already there. It is a difficult problem and I am frank to admit that. We owe some obligation to the men who are fighting in Normandy and Italy, on the sea and in the air force. I leave it at that and say no more.

Mr. JEAN: May I ask the minister whether any arrangements have been made for the transportation of workers in war industries and in other industries during the strike?

Mr. HOWE: There is a plan, called the industrial transit plan, which has been in force for some time in connection with war industry, by which certain cars, allocated to move workers, are given special privileges in the matter of gasoline and tires. That plan now is being expanded to the point which we hope will be sufficient to move war workers. Other steps will be taken in case the present arrangements prove inadequate.

REQUEST FOR WESTERN FEMALE LABOUR FOR EASTERN FRUIT AND VEGETABLES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): On July 27 I asked a question of the Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour with reference to the possibility of obtaining help from the west to process the very large crop in my particular area and in other parts of Canada. The parliamentary assistant indicated that the matter was under consideration and that the possible movement of special help from the west was being considered. Has anything further developed? Is there a possibility that this serious situation will be met?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The hon. member did not give me notice of this question—I am not complaining about that.

Mr. LOCKHART: It was brought up a week ago.

Mr. MITCHELL: I was away. In the meantime I think the parliamentary assistant was prepared to give an answer to my hon. friend, but he was not here the day after he asked the question. This is only one of the many man-power problems before the department. We went through the same thing last year, and at the end of the year, through the administrative offices and the organization, we took off the crop in western Canada and we took off the crop in Ontario. When I say "we" I am speaking in the broad sense. The farmers, along with selective service, faced up to this problem that my hon. friend is referring to. We have a special officer who is charged with the responsibility in connection with canning. I feel sure that when the end of this year rolls around we shall have accomplished just as good a job as we did last year.

Mr. SENN: Who is the special officer to whom the minister refers? I have had similar representations. I know that the position is difficult.

Mr. MITCHELL: His name is Bell. I cannot give his initials at the moment.

Mr. LOCKHART: Where is he located?

Mr. MITCHELL: In the Motor building.

Mr. PERLEY: On this question of labour, I have had requests in writing and otherwise, from the western farmers, who are getting anxious. They are going to have an early harvest. They are already harvesting coarse grains. One man from Indian Head said that a great many men had been brought down from the west to Ontario in the last two months to assist in the harvest here, and they are wondering if they will be back in time to help. I should like to bring this to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture as well, because the inspector of crops in western Canada, who knows the situation, said that he thought it ought to be brought to the minister's attention. It will be a serious situation if those men do not get back in time.

CANADIAN FORCES

INQUIRY AS TO POSTAL RATES ON PARCELS FOR OVERSEAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): The day before yesterday I inquired of the Postmaster General in connection with the possibility of reducing postal rates on parcels and mail going overseas. Is he in a position yet to give an answer to the question?

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): There was no opportunity yesterday to reply to the leader of the opposition.

It is quite true there have been recent reductions in airgraph postage rates from ten to five cents, and the air-letter form for prisoners in Germany has been reduced from ten cents to five cents, while the air-letter form to prisoners of war and internees in the far east has also been reduced from ten cents to five cents. The leader of the opposition asked, in view of these reductions, whether it would be possible to reduce the parcel postage rate. I would advise him that the ordinary civilian rate before the war to the United Kingdom was 24 cents for the first pound and 18 cents for each subsequent pound. To Italy and Sicily the rate was 60 cents for the first pound and $1.10 for three pounds and following pounds much higher than our rate. However, the rate has been set at 12 cents per pound up to 11 pounds in a theatre of war whether in Africa or India or the United Kingdom. Out of that 12 cents the department must make payments to the United Kingdom or in some cases to the United States. The actual cost of handling these parcels in Canada, paying cost of transportation overseas, and land charges, exceeds 12 cents. We are actually handling these parcels at less than cost at the present time. In view of the fact that any reduction would cost approximately a quarter of a million a year for every cent of reduction, it is not felt that a reduction can be made at this time unless more favourable rates can be negotiated.

DOMINION ELECTION

SPECIAL RETURNING OFFICERS FOR OVERSEAS DIVISIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State. I note that the overseas returning officers have been appointed in connection with the coming dominion election. Will the minister state when it is expected that these returning officers will be leaving Canada for their respective duties?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): The leader of the opposition was kind enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question. As the house is aware, there are seven overseas divisions, as a result of the recommendation of the chief electoral officer: the United Kingdom, France, Italy, the near east, the far east, Newfoundland and the British West Indies. Special returning officers have already been appointed and two have now left—the special returning officers for the United Kingdom and France. The special returning officer for Italy, the far east and the near east require certain inoculations, but as soon as these are received they too will leave. No provision has been made for Newfoundland or the British West Indies as yet, as to when they will leave.

Some inference has been drawn that this indicates the date of the election. I think the inference is entirely unwarranted. In, for example, shifting fronts such as France and Italy, every precaution should be taken and every arrangement made. The only inference that can be drawn is this: when the election is held every war service elector who wishes to vote will be afforded every possible facility to do so.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

INQUIRY AS TO CONVERSATIONS WITH PREMIER OF QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister or any member of his cabinet had a conversation with the premier of Quebec or any member of his government on the question of family allowances? Secondly, have similar conversations taken place between him and the premiers of other provinces in Canada on the same subject?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It is obvious that I cannot say what conversations have taken place on the part of my colleagues with premiers of the different provinces. I can, however, speak for myself and would say that I have not had one word with the premier of Quebec with respect to family allowances. I make that statement so as to have my position in the matter perfectly clear. But I would say to the hon. member that I can see nothing improper in any respect in the prime minister of a country having a word with the premier of any province—

Mr. BRUCE: Neither do I.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —and I have frequently heard hon. gentlemen on the other side suggest that there should be more in the way of conference between ministers of the federal government and ministers of the provinces. I have tried to further that end myself where I thought it would serve a useful purpose. But in regard to this matter, if the hon. member has nothing more than an insinuation in his remark, I see nothing to answer beyond the point I have.

Mr. BRUCE: I base my question on the newspaper report of a speech made by Mr. Godbout in which he said that the family allowances legislation has been partly the fruit of his government's collaboration with Ottawa.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question has been asked and the answer given.

Mr. GRAYDON: My hon. friend, I think, asked the Prime Minister a further question with respect to the statement alleged to have been made by the premier of Quebec, that the family allowances were the fruits of collaboration between him and the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member for Parkdale has violated more rules than any other hon. member of this house. When he rises and asks a question which he knows and the house knows is contrary to the rules of the house, I am not obliged to answer it, and I do not intend to. His Honour the Speaker has made it quite clear that the question which was asked by the hon. member for Parkdale on the orders of the day and his attempting to read newspaper reports are entirely out of order. I do not intend to lend myself to having the rules of this house violated to any extent that can be avoided.

Mr. BRUCE: I understood the Prime Minister to ask—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BRUCE: Surely I am entitled to the privilege of a word in reply. I understood the Prime Minister to ask me to indicate the basis of my question.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I have already said, the question has been asked and the answer given.

DEFENCE INSTALLATIONS

REPORT AS TO INSPECTION OF NORTHERN AIR BASES—REQUEST OF MAYOR OF WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Munitions and Supply based on a telegram I received from the mayor of Winnipeg. I sent a copy of the telegram to the minister, therefore it will not be necessary for me to read it. Has the minister received a request from Mayor Coulter of Winnipeg to the effect that a representative either of Winnipeg or of Manitoba be included in a group of government officials who plan to visit the United States air bases in northern Manitoba and in the Hudson Bay area? According to a press report the purpose of the visit is to study possible post-war civil aviation uses of those bases. If the minister has received this request will he state whether it will be granted?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I did receive a telegram under date of August 1 from the mayor of Winnipeg asking that a representative of the city accompany the group. I replied to the telegram on August 2 as follows:

Mayor Garnet Coulter,
Winnipeg, Manitoba.

Reference your telegram August first as party making trip over northeast route consists of military and technical men only and route is still of military character greatly regret that representative as you propose cannot be accommodated. Your interest is however greatly appreciated and you may be assured that we are fully aware of the possible significance of this route to the people of western Canada and that their interests are being kept fully in mind.

C. D. Howe,
Minister of Munitions and Supply.

I may say that the suggestion made by my hon. friend that the purpose of the trip is to plan overseas routes is not correct. We have taken over the routes from the United States. No Canadian has seen certain airports. This is simply a joint inspection trip made by the United States and Canadian military and technical officers so that there will be an agreement on what is being turned over.

WESTERN BEEF PRODUCERS

CONDITIONS RESULTING FROM DRY WEATHER IN SOUTHERN ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question of which I have not given him previous notice. I think the wording is sufficient to describe the situation. Will the Minister of Agriculture, either to-morrow or at an earlier time if he sees fit, tell the house whether or not he has received representations from beef producers in southern Alberta respecting the difficult situation facing them by reason of the very dry weather prevailing in that area? What steps, if any, is his department taking to meet the situation?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): So far as I know, speaking from memory, no representations have come from southern Alberta recently with regard to the matter. There were representations a month or two ago suggesting that there might be difficulty. I have had some representation from the western part of the province of Saskatchewan. Representations may come in; if so, they will be considered immediately.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendment made by the senate to bill No. 163, to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the minister if the government is satisfied with this amendment, and what was the reason for the change?

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): The government is satisfied with the amendment. The change is a minor one, having to do with the drafting of the bill. The section in question is section 113 of the Special War Revenue Act, relating to the requirement with respect to the keeping of records and books by persons who are collectors of taxes or who are required to affix or cancel stamps. The section as originally drafted read:

> Every person required, by or pursuant to this act, to pay or collect taxes or other sums or to affix or cancel stamps shall keep records and books of account in English or French at his place of business in Canada in such form and containing such information as, in the opinion of the minister, will enable an audit to be made to establish the amount of taxes or other sums that should have been paid or collected or the amount of stamps that should have been affixed or cancelled.

The senate amendment has taken out the words "as in the opinion of the minister will enable an audit to be made" and substituted the words, "as will enable the amount of taxes or other sums that should have been paid or collected, or the amount of stamps that should have been affixed or cancelled, to be determined." It is a minor amendment, and is entirely satisfactory.

Motion agreed to, amendment read the second time and concurred in.

AERONAUTICS ACT

CIVIL AVIATION AND COMMERCIAL AIR SERVICES—AIR TRANSPORT BOARD—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendment made by the senate to bill No. 133, to amend the Aeronautics Act.

He said: The amendment referred to is simply a clarification of the wording of the clause relating to penalties for violations of the act. It is a wholly technical amendment proposed by the law clerk and parliamentary counsel of the senate, and I have no hesitation in asking the house to concur in it.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is an amendment to section 11?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

TAX CONVENTION ACT, 1944

CANADA-UNITED STATES OF AMERICA—RATIFICATION OF CONVENTION SIGNED AT OTTAWA, JUNE 8, 1944—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendment made by the senate to bill No. 159, respecting a certain tax convention between Canada and the United States of America.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): After looking at the amendment I think we should have some explanation from the minister as to its meaning.

Mr. GIBSON: When this bill was before the committee the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) made the suggestion that the convention should become operative on a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council. That suggestion was supported by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). At that time I was assured that there was no such clause in a similar act dealing with the income tax convention between Canada and the United States, and so stated in the house. I said this bill was in exactly the same form as the previous bill. Later I found that I had been misinformed. There is in the income tax convention act a clause stating that it shall come into force when proclaimed by the governor in council. The effect of this amendment is to add a similar clause to this bill dealing with succession duties.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the minister satisfied that the amendment improves the bill?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes, I am.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

FISHERIES PRICES

PROVISION FOR STABILIZATION, PURCHASE OF STAPLE PRODUCTS AT APPROVED PRICES, ETC.

The house resumed from Wednesday, August 2, consideration in committee of bill No. 169, for the support of the prices of fisheries products during the transition from war to peace—Mr. Bertrand (Laurier)—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Last evening we were on subsection 2 of section 9, and an amendment moved by the hon. member for Cape Breton South was before the committee. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Would you read the amendment, please?

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment is as follows:

That section 9, clause 2 of Bill No. 169 be amended by striking out all the words after the words "board shall" in line ten and substituting therefor the following words:

"ensure adequate and stable returns for fisheries by promoting orderly marketing and shall secure a fair relationship between the returns from fisheries and those from other economic activities."

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I do not think we can accept this amendment. We cannot say that the board "shall ensure." This clause expresses the policy of the government, and it says we shall endeavour to do something. To say we "shall do" something when it relates to the future might mean that we would undertake to do something absolutely impossible. We intend to do the best we can. You might just as well have us say we shall make the fishermen happy, or rich, or something like that. I am sorry I cannot accept this amendment, and must ask the committee to vote against it.

Amendment negatived on division.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall subsection 2 carry? Carried. Shall the clause carry? Carried.

Mr. GILLIS: Might I be permitted to say a few words on this?

The CHAIRMAN: On the amendment?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment was defeated; I put it to the committee.

Mr. GILLIS: I did not hear what the minister had to say. I think any minister piloting a bill through this house would be well advised to take a seat in the centre of the chamber, because we cannot hear down at this end.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Perhaps I had my head turned away from the hon. member.

Mr. GILLIS: It is the same with all the ministers.

[Mr. Gibson.]

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I said this clause expressed the policy of the government; it is the law we are setting up to meet future events. We cannot say the board shall do certain things; we can only say that they shall endeavour to do them. If we are to say they "shall ensure" something we might as well say they shall make the fishermen rich and happy, something we might not be able to do even with the best intentions. The wording in the clause is "shall endeavour", and that is the intention of the government.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not quarrelling with the point raised by the minister; it is immaterial as far as I am concerned. What I am concerned about is that I interpret the bill as it now stands to be merely a temporary measure, because it definitely states that these functions are to be carried on only during the period of transition from war to peace. That is the part with which I am quarrelling. The amendment I propose would strike out the words dealing with the transition from war to peace conditions, and make at least this part of the bill a permanent set-up that can be carried forward into the peace. As I see it, the operation of this measure could be terminated at any time, or at least this feature of it, if someone should determine that we had made the transition from war to peace, which might merely mean that when the war is over, when demobilization is complete and all the soldiers are back in this country, we shall have made the transition from war to peace without the necessary adjustments in our economy to take care of the measures which this bill is designed to meet, namely the reestablishment and organization of the fishing industry, and the endeavour to establish parity prices for the fishermen. This measure, as provided under the present section, can be terminated at any time. The minister's statement that the department would "endeavour" to ensure is immaterial. I thought it was better to say "ensure" than "endeavour". Some very weak endeavours can be made, and they do not accomplish much. But if the language in the bill is emphatic, and gives instructions to those who will be administering it, then there is a greater pressure on the administration to do something about the provisions contained in the bill. They would do more in that way than if they were just weakly told that they should endeavour. The purpose of my amendment is to give permanency to this provision rather than just to make it a transitional provision to be effective in the period between war and peace—a period which could be defined as concluded when demobilization is completed.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This bill is passed to meet the transition period. That period might last five or six years—I do not know. It may last ten years. But after that time there will be plenty of opportunity to pass any other legislation that is found necessary. This is the same bill for the fisheries as was passed for agriculture, and I am quite confident that it will meet the immediate situation after the war. If later on it is found necessary to do anything further, legislation to that end can be passed. But we cannot pass legislation five or ten years in advance. We have to wait until we can see what happens, and until we know what conditions are.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not quarrelling with the minister, but I am anticipating the difficulty we may run into in the future. If the present minister were administering the bill, and we had a guarantee from him, I would be quite satisfied.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): You might have a better minister then.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member for Cape Breton South, for instance.

Mr. GILLIS: For instance, some people I know on this side of the house, to my immediate right—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They have not a chance.

Mr. GILLIS: With their ability to juggle the English language, the transition from war to peace, as they might understand it, would be complete when the army is demobilized. This bill says that it is designed to function in that period. Only yesterday I think it was the hon. member for York-Sunbury who said that while endeavouring to define the terms in a bill a minister had said to him that what the minister had said in the house did not mean a thing. Regardless of the present intentions of the minister, and regardless of the statements he may make to us now, it is the legislation as written which will determine its functions in the future. As I see the bill, it does not amount to anything, once demobilization is completed. The definition as to the limit of the period of transition is the feature which will count.. In my amendment I have sought to strike out certain words, and to have at least one permanent set-up to which fishermen can look in the future, something which would be of a permanent nature to establish floor prices.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

The CHAIRMAN: The question was put and the amendment was defeated. I could put it again, if necessary.

Subsection 2 of section 9 agreed to.

Section 9 agreed to.

Section 10 agreed to.

On section 11—Regulations.

Mr. NEILL: I have an amendment to this section, as follows:

That section 11 be amended by adding thereto as subsection 2 the following:

"Such regulations shall forthwith after approval by the governor in council be published in the Canada Gazette and shall be laid before parliament within fifteen days after they are made if parliament is then sitting, and, if not, then within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session."
