I plead with the hon. member for New Westminster to understand that in 1974 parliament, conscious of the civil rights of Canadians, endeavoured to word a section so that electronic surveillance could be used against organized crime.

Mr. Rodriguez: It was a minority government.

Mr. Basford: The evidence we have had since is that that section is not working. Therefore, surely it should be amended. I plead with the hon. member for New Westminster to consider carefully that in 1974 parliament endeavoured to deal with organized crime. We have been advised year after year by officials that that section is not working. Therefore, we should deal with the section in committee this week and amend it in accordance with the advice we are receiving from attorneys general, from police authorities and from the advice contained in the brief of the Canadian police chiefs.

The other aspect of this is the notification which can be limited to 90 days. Apparently, the CBC took 2½ years to make a program, most of which was public information which did not have to stand up in court and which did not have to be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. The CBC took 2½ years, yet the parliament of Canada, in its law, says to the police that in investigating organized crime they can be limited to 90 days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: Surely, as law enforcement officers, we have a responsibility to this parliament and to the people of Canada to put that on the record. As I have said a number of times in the committee and in this chamber, parliament has a duty to deal with this matter without rhetoric, without emotion and without politics.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: But the hon. member for New Westminster, who I think is opposed to wiretapping of any kind, says that it would be good for the police to go out on the beat and to do some police work. That will catch ordinary house and garden criminals but it will not catch the godfathers of organized crime. Surely, the suggestion of the NDP that that is how we are going to investigate, charge and prosecute the godfathers of organized crime in this country shows that the NDP does not know what it is talking about.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would accept a question at this time.

Mr. Basford: No, Mr. Speaker, but I will at the end of my remarks. My time is very limited. The hon. member for New Westminster, for whom I have an immense amount of respect, called upon us to appoint an inquiry into organized crime in the hope that it would recommend some new form of co-ordinated law enforcement in Canada. Are we to deal with organized crime by ignoring and acting contrary to the recommendations of the principal police authorities of this country? That does not seem to me to be co-ordinated law enforcement.

Mr. Leggatt: There are judicial authorities, too, and you are the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Basford: Should we, as parliamentarians, close our minds and our ears to what the police forces of this country are telling us as to what we need in terms of legislation?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Who is running this country, anyhow?

Mr. Basford: The issue raised by the hon. member for New Westminster is important. We have, and need, co-ordinated law enforcement. The Solicitor General spoke in detail and in specifics about joint force operations. I have indicated, however, that the enforcement of the Criminal Code is a provincial responsibility. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) asked me a very pertinent question the other day about narcotics, immigration and other matters which clearly are within federal authority and control. However, the great bulk of the criminal law of this country is enforced by provincial attorneys general and provincial police forces.

On Monday I undertook to consult provincial attorneys general. I have talked with the attorneys general of British Columbia and Ontario, and I had communication through my office with the minister of justice of the province of Quebec. All the attorneys general of Canada and all the solicitors general of Canada and I will be meeting in Ottawa during the last week in June. However, I spoke with the attorneys general of the largest provinces in the country—certainly, by all indications, the three provinces in which there is the most organized crime—and they said they do not want to see some unilateral federal action without consultation with them. Of course, they will have to speak for themselves. We have agreed that there should be such consultation during our conference at the end of June. However, here we have the NDP and the official opposition saying that we should make some easy, political decision. They claim we should have better co-ordinated law enforcement and that we should make some unilateral decision, without proper consultation and co-ordination with provincial attorneys general who are responsible for the administration of the Criminal Code.

Surely, if we are to be effective in dealing with organized crime in Canada, we cannot make these kinds of unilateral decisions. In the search for the most effective way of dealing with organized crime these decisions should only be made after the closest possible consultation and co-ordination with provincial attorneys general and law enforcement officials. I, therefore, think it would be silly to accept this motion today when there has not been an opportunity for that kind of consultation and when the attorneys general of three provinces have told me they do not want me to make a decision until they have had a chance to discuss the matter with me further.

There has been a great deal of reference to the United States in the course of debate, with the suggestion that there is better control of organized crime there. I disagree with that. I think it is an irresponsible reflection on the police forces and law enforcement authorities of this country. There has been the inference that the United States deals with organized crime better than we do, but I suspect if that were so we would not be encountering the problem we have in Canada today. Organized crime is not a domestic Canadian industry; it is being imported.

In British Columbia, through a law enforcement unit comprised of the RCMP and others, we have upgraded law enforcement in the area of narcotics. It costs $8,000 to hire a courier to carry heroin from the golden triangle of Southeast Asia to Canada, while in the United States it only costs $2,000. The substantial difference is caused by the effectiveness of law enforcement in this country, where couriers are being apprehended at a far more effective rate than in the United States. So I want to resist and reject the inference of some hon. members that law enforcement authorities in the United States do a better job than our own.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue, however, if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Basford: I am grateful for that co-operation, Mr. Speaker. I want to conclude by referring to British Columbia, because in moving the motion the hon. member for New Westminster referred to the co-ordinated law enforcement unit that operates in the province. Either this afternoon or tomorrow a proposal will be published in Victoria by that unit which was discussed with the attorney general of British Columbia and myself, as well as the Solicitor General and the health ministers of both governments, regarding the heroin trade. On March 24 we issued a joint statement on behalf of both governments, assigning the most senior law enforcement officers with experience in the area of drugs to examine the question of supply and demand. The work of that task force is almost completed and I expect to have a report very shortly. Both governments will then be able to ensure the best possible co-ordination to tackle the hard drug trade in Canada.

The hon. member calls for an inquiry because he claims we need greater co-ordination of police efforts. One need only look at what is going on to realize the degree of co-ordination that exists. The police forces and governments are continually working to improve that co-ordination, and I know we are not going to get it by making unilateral and immensely important decisions on a crime inquiry contrary to the advice of every senior police officer in the country.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) that I wholeheartedly support the motion he brought before the House today. I would like to commence my few remarks by reminding the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) that he exhibits an obvious double standard when he speaks of the weight he wants the House to place on the advice of police officers with respect to increasing the powers for wiretapping. He admonishes us not to go against the advice of the police. But, Mr. Speaker, what group was more vocal in opposition to capital punishment than the police forces of this country? Did the Minister of Justice give them any more than lip service at that time? What the minister and the government wish to do obviously depends on their interpretation, not what the police wish to do.

It is also obvious that the minister's opposition to a royal commission inquiry on crime is based on equally tenuous logic. He argues that it is not a suitable forum, and the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) indicated that the police would have to divulge sources of information and that all this would set back crime prevention in this country. I do not think that would stand the test of logic, either. There is a provision in the Federal Court Act that the Solicitor General never fails to utilize when it suits him, and perhaps when it is necessary as well. I will not comment on that. Section 41(2) permits essential information in the eyes of the government—without the supervision of a judge, incidentally—to be withheld. I am certain that a royal commission with proper terms of reference could ensure that equal precautions could be taken so that if it appeared that the cause of the police in any particular area was menaced, the very capable people in charge of a royal commission of this magnitude would take equal precautions to keep that type of evidence from being introduced.

A royal commission could do something that the CBC tried and failed to do, namely, it could bring to the attention of the people of Canada, in the best possible way, the need for the maximum amount of effort to combat the encroachment of organized crime in this country. It would provide a forum where everyone who had anything to contribute and wished to do so, could appear without fear, favour, suspicion of collusion or any other unworthy motive. People could come and tell what they know, and make recommendations. All Canadians from coast to coast, and all law enforcement agencies could join in a crusade against organized crime. That is what it is going to take at this time to stop the ever-increasing encroachment of crime in all areas of society in this country.

Everyone who has studied the subject knows that the main targets of organized crime at this time are legitimate businesses. If you look beneath the surface you find their initiatives in industries such as trucking, waste disposal, real estate, construction, money lending—even the banks are not immune. As a senior official of the state of Michigan pointed out recently, the Americans are finding out there is a tendency for loansharking to be integrated in some banks. There have not been any prosecutions yet in the state of Michigan, but it has been indicated that there is evidence of mob influence pervading some banking institutions. In any event, banks are being victimized by bad loans and are being ripped off by various confidence schemes.

[Mr. MacKay.]

If we are to improve our capacity to combat organized crime, we have to look at various initiatives and at the very structure of our institutions. It is interesting that the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice both had to take some responsibility for this situation, in effect. That used not to be the case. As no other speaker has dealt with this particular topic, it seems to me it would be useful to look back and see the way things used to be when the RCMP only had to report to the minister of justice, which was one of the senior portfolios in parliament at an earlier time but which has lost some of its clout.

● (1730)

In this regard, it is interesting to see what the opinion was at the time the portfolio of solicitor general was created. It is also interesting to recall some of the predictions made at that time. I wish to read briefly from an article in the December 22, 1965, edition of the Toronto Star by a reporter who wrote this fairly comprehensive article. He wrote:

> Prime Minister Pearson's cabinet reorganization last week contained a "sleeper" which attracted less attention than it deserved. This was the proposed splitting up of the functions of the Department of Justice.
> Under this arrangement, the justice department will continue to administer the federal courts, draft legislation, and conduct litigation and prosecutions for the government. But a new department, headed by the Solicitor General, will administer the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the penitentiaries and the parole board.
> It, is difficult to see any advantage in this change under Canadian conditions. The great problem in this country, in matters of justice and law enforcement, has always been the complicated and awkward division of responsibility between the federal government and the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, we see that that still continues to be the case. The article continues:

> The confusion that already exists could be aggravated further by dividing the federal jurisdiction between two departments.

I will not read the entire article. One very relevant and somehow familiar passage is as follows:

> It is not at all clear, in fact, what the government has in mind in proposing the change. At his press conference last Friday, Mr. Pearson spoke rather vaguely of the need for a more vigorous fight against organized crime.

Doesn't that have a funny ring over ten years later?

> It is probable that the poor showing the department made in the Rivard affair contributed to the decision that a change was necessary.
> But here again the remedy may only aggravate the disease. As former justice minister Davie Fulton put it this week, "It would be far more likely under the new setup that an RCMP report would never get to the Department of Justice."

It would appear the Solicitor General may have some problems there as well.

> What the department needs, in fact—

That is, the Department of Justice.

> —is not a hasty amputation but a careful reorganization to improve co-ordination between its various branches.

There is something to be gained by pondering the import of that brief excerpt from a 1965 newspaper. In the over ten years that have since elapsed we have not seen much of a national effort nor many results in combatting organized crime. True, the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice have read into the record some impressive accomplishments. I am sure that all members of this House applaud those accomplishments. We only wish they were even more significant. I agree with the hon. gentlemen in those two portfolios that there is not a member of the House of Commons who does not wholeheartedly support the efforts of the RCMP. Indeed, I suspect there is not one of us who would not willingly support greater appropriations, budgetary and in every other way, to facilitate their efforts against organized crime.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: We are not here to venerate nor denigrate the RCMP. We are here to improve the conditions under which they work. We would also like to make some constructive suggestions to the government to expedite their work.

The point made by the Minister of Justice that somehow we have a better record in Canada at the present time than the United States does not stand the test of logic. Certainly, anyone who has looked at any of the publications or programs lately realizes that organized crime has the same capacity as any multinational corporation. Meyer Lansky has just as much organizational ability as anybody who runs any multinational corporation in legitimate society. If the pickings in Canada are attractive, it will not take very long for organized crime to move their operations here, which according to the evidence we have seen lately is exactly what they are doing.

There is another problem. It has to do with the RCMP in the sense that if we are to expect the RCMP to fulfil their difficult and demanding role, we must take a look at the conditions under which they work and the attitude and relationship that exists between the RCMP and the Solicitor General to whom they report. I have been advocating, as have other hon. members, for a long time some needed changes to facilitate a better recourse to natural justice within the RCMP for members of the force. I see the previous solicitor general in the chamber at the present time. He made an effort to do that, but unfortunately during the time he was in the portfolio there were not many tangible results to change the poor treatment, in some cases, of RCMP officers which were brought to his attention. I wholeheartedly support the RCMP. Indeed, in many cases I have acted for individual officers. However, I was somewhat disturbed about the attitude exhibited by certain RCMP officers high up in the hierarchy toward the Solicitor General.

A most flagrant example to illustrate this, and which still causes me some concern for the relationship at times between the Solicitor General and the force for which he is responsible is contained in a report which I was able to get. I have a portion of it here. I have the whole document, if anybody wants to see it. A high ranking inspector, an officer in charge of the legal branch, said this about the then solicitor general:

It is not surprising either that there is at least the allegation, if not the fact, of influence peddling between the lawyer and the Solicitor General.

The background of this was simply that the solicitor general, to his credit, had been in touch with a lawyer in the Ogilvy Cope firm in Montreal named Arthur Campeau, who was trying to get a little bit of justice for some RCMP officers, Don McCleery and Gilles Brunet, who had been summarily discharged under section 173 without a smidgeon of a hearing. He was entering into some sort of dialogue with the lawyer to see what could be done to mitigate the circumstances if that were justified. It was absolutely unforgivable for a high-ranking RCMP officer to make that kind of allegation against the then solicitor general, under the circumstances. That is the type of thing that worries me about the relationship between the solicitor general and the force. It makes me think that the force should still be reporting to a more senior minister, the minister of justice, and it would resolve some of this bifurcated responsibility that exists between these two ministers vis-à-vis our national police force.

Another incident that shook my confidence about the type of information that we as members of the House of Commons get in these matters was the response I got to questions concerning information that I had elicited about the RCMP being in danger of being sued by a Montreal businessman as a result of some unfortunate things that the force had said about him. I raised this in the House of Commons and got very little response. I finally put it down for the adjournment debate. I then had the solicitor general's parliamentary secretary of the day, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin), practically tell me—and it is in Hansard—that I was crazy to suggest such a thing; that the RCMP would ever negotiate with anyone as to whether they would be sued or not.

I did not put it on the record. I can, because I have those documents as well. But I have a report signed by a former RCMP inspector saying precisely the opposite; that he went to that businessman's office, Mr. Bronfman, twice for the express purpose of negotiating with that man in order that he would not sue the force for defamation or libel. The information I got in the House of Commons about this matter was directly contrary to the facts, and misleading. I only mention it again to show that the information members of parliament get in this place from those on the other side is either the result of poor information gathered by the force—and I prefer to think that is the case—or reluctance to come clean by the government with their parliamentary colleagues. This is the type of thing that is worrisome. It affects the perception of both the force and the minister.

I raise that at this time in the context of this debate in the hope that some of these things will be looked into and studied. Most of all, I do it in the hope that the Solicitor General, who in my opinion is doing a good job and appears to be very cognizant about the need to do something about these conditions and to improve the communication and relationship between himself and the force, will look into some of these past injustices which he knows exist regarding McCleery, Brunet, Primeau, and others.

He has said he has already some indication that some of the recommendations of Judge Rene Marin are being brought in. I accept his word. I hope some day he will make the House aware of precisely what changes have been brought in as a result of Judge Marin's recommendations. He has also given us an undertaking that he will be bringing in legislation, possibly in the fall, to implement in a more formal way parts of Judge Marin's report. I trust that he will do that.

As far as the fight against crime in concerned, everyone must surely realize that if we are to assist the police there has to be a change in public attitude. There has to be greater utilization of specialized law enforcement personnel for the purpose of fighting organized crime with every weapon available. This does not mean we must resort to unrestricted wiretapping, or that we should forget the very important criteria of civil rights in our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: It seems to me that a substantial body of opinion in this country reflects the view of the editorial in today's Ottawa Citizen which says, in part, when referring to this matter, that it is before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and that somebody, if an open society is to be preserved, must reject the frightening proposals of the Minister of Justice.

None of us here in this chamber wants to inhibit the police, but for the Minister of Justice to say that at the same time we must give them carte blanche as far as wiretapping is concerned, just because they want it, whilst ignoring the fact that they wanted just as much to retain capital punishment and their advice was there disregarded, is expecting members of the House of Commons to be extremely gullible. Just as justice is sometimes too important to be left to lawyers, I think that civil rights are too important to be left to police officers.

Mr. Allmand: Very good.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that as far as the more intelligent use of law enforcement aids is concerned, there is much room for the better private security agencies to play a role in this country. At the present time there are many.

Mr. Fox: Which ones?

Mr. MacKay: I am pleased the Solicitor General asked the question, because if he had been on the ball he would have had someone down to the national convention of the Canadian Society for Industrial Security which took place in Halifax and which was attended, incidentally, by the commanding officer of H Division of the RCMP. Modesty will not permit me to tell hon. members who was the keynote speaker on that occasion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Go on, tell us.

Mr. MacKay: Well then, it was I. And nobody followed me when I left. Mr. Speaker, the fact that people today are very willing, in many cases, to deal with those who are fences, who deal in illicit goods, and who at the same time profess themselves to be respectable citizens, makes the task of law enforcement a lot more difficult. A reporter for one of Canada's great newspapers, the Halifax Herald, wrote:

> If Mr. Joe Citizen stopped purchasing stolen goods from thieves, thieving would not be a worth-while practice.

Also, Mr. Speaker, if merchants who operate large business concerns while using mass displays in a self-service format would take better security precautions and hire worth-while private security people to protect their property—something which cannot be done to the same extent as used to be the case—if they would do this and free the resources of regular police forces for the fight against organized crime, that in itself would be a very useful initiative. It is very clear that in the circumstances of today the public of Canada must be mobilized and made aware of what is happening to our country as far as the progression of organized crime is concerned. The Solicitor General—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue only with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacKay: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will not continue for long. I would just like to say, in conclusion, that as far as the basis for a national inquiry, a royal commission on organized crime, is concerned in this country, never before has there been a time when it would be more appropriate to establish one than at the present. The various attorneys general in this country, law enforcement agencies and, more important, the public at large could use this proposed royal commission to consider collective measures and draw up a master plan to combat organized crime.

The very publicity that in some cases can be so harmful to members such as my hon. friend from Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) could, in a judicial and directed forum, focus on the need for an organized fight against crime without the unfortunate fall-out and needless harm done to reputations like his when the CBC attempts to bring to the Canadian people some realization of the problem. It may have been with the best of motives but surely the national broadcasting corporation, commendable as its attempts may have been to bring home to the Canadian people the need for an inquiry, can never serve as a substitute for a royal commission to inquire into something as important as this. That is why I think the hon. member for New Westminster has done parliament and the country a valuable service by moving this motion at this particular time.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to congratulate the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) for bringing in his motion, although I do not necessarily agree that a royal commission should be set up at this time. It is a very timely issue—the kind of thing the hon. member always does. I know of his hard work as a member of the committee on justice and legal affairs. I know he takes this work seriously and that he means it when he says a royal commission to investigate organized crime ought to be appointed. I also wish to congratulate the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) whose speech was so persuasive that I almost changed my mind and decided I had better not make a speech on the subject at all. But this having been said, I should like to offer a few observations on the motion.

Over the past few years, television viewers have been treated to some very spectacular revelations in the Quebec crime probes. The CBC's special crime reports last Sunday and Monday have further fed public interest and concern over organized crime. These programmes have, understandably, mobilized concern about the penetration of organized crime in our society. However, the remedy suggested, that of a royal commission, will in all probability tell us little that we do not already know. Recent news reports and the CBC special have made it very clear who is involved in organized crime. The media have already made public who is connected with whom, and how. I doubt very much that this information is new to the RCMP. These people are well known to police agencies. So what possible practical service could be done by running over the ground again? The sensationalism which usually accompanies public hearings such as the one the hon. member has suggested would, instead of helping our law enforcement agencies, act as a major stumbling block.

If nothing else, the people involved in organized crime are astute. They shun publicity, as was graphically demonstrated by one man who spat at the CBC cameraman filming him as he walked down the street. I am sure that recent publicity has not acted as any kind of deterrent—Increased publicity would not, in my view, act as a deterrent, either. I believe that this kind of exposure will make these people go even further underground. It will make more difficult the already difficult task the police currently face.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) suggested yesterday that many months and years of work are involved in acquiring evidence in some cases. It is difficult to calculate how much of this hard work has been wasted as a result of sensational publicity. However, I am sure that a royal commission would not provide the proper means for the protection of the Canadian people. At best, we could expect these people to lie low and, like a possum, play dead. But I suggest that as soon as the heat is off a miraculous resurrection will occur and we will be back to square one. We will be no further ahead and we will have wasted valuable time and money, time and money that could be better spent by the police in obtaining evidence that would put these people behind bars where they belong.

The police do not want a public inquiry. They think that the job is better handled through law enforcement agencies. I suggest that the people of Canada want to get on with ridding our cities and towns of organized crime. A royal commission would only prolong that elimination. We only have to look at the Quebec crime probe to see the mixed effects that spectacular publicity produces. We have seen dangerous criminals made into cult figures, and unfortunately have not seen many individuals put behind bars for their very real crimes.

Organized crime is an old and sad story in Canada. Criminal mobs and gangland style killings go back many years. Recently these activities have received documentation in a book entitled "The Canadian Connection", by Jean-Pierre Charbonneau. From this book it is apparent our police forces have been waging a constant battle against known criminal elements. For the police it is not a question of who, but how and when and where. The answers must be able to stand up in court and to lead to the conviction of criminal defendants.

Will these answers be available in testimony before a royal commission? I think not, Mr. Speaker. Unfortunately, real life is not like "Kojak" who has a secret witness to tell all. An obstinate criminal refusing to answer legitimate questions before a royal commission is both a forceful moral lesson and good TV, but it does not provide us with the answers we need. The answers to our questions are available from the processes of law enforcement and it is to these processes that we must address ourselves.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) has proposed that Bill C-51 will provide the police with greater powers to attack organized crime, particularly with regard to wiretapping. The provisions of Bill C-51 will extend the time period for a tap and also extend the time by which the person under surveillance has to be informed of the tap. Some have said that recent figures show wiretapping is not very effective because only a few indictments are obtained from hundreds of wiretaps. I submit that this is misleading. The Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police has stated:

> The fact remains that one indictment alone can cover hundreds of accused persons and therefore, the number of indictments is no indication at all of the value of electronic surveillance.

The Minister of Justice stated in the House yesterday:

> Obviously authorizations obtained in one year do not lead to arrests or convictions in that year, but in subsequent years.

Others have suggested that the extensions of time limits involved in wiretapping will broaden police powers to such an extent that they, the police, will casually tap phones without legitimate cause. On this point I would like to say that there are judicial restrictions which preclude this type of illegal use of wiretaps. As well, the police would have to have far greater resources than they do at present to maintain indiscriminate wiretaps. The police are far too busy using their manpower and energies on those criminals involved in serious crimes. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that while the privacy of individuals must be protected, it is also the right of the Canadian people to be protected from those persons who may be suspected of, and in many cases are known to be involved in, criminal activity. Today's Globe and Mail reported that a man was found guilty of conspiring to pass forged cheques for more than $110,000. Several people were involved and the police cracked the ring by using wiretap evidence. Therefore, I believe that the passage of Bill C-51 would be a far more effective measure to get rid of organized crime than a royal commission.

I would like to remind hon. members of other legislation which will also strike a serious blow to organized crime. Bill C-16, the Borrowers and Depositors Protection Act, has provisions which will, if passed, seriously challenge one of organized crime's most profitable ventures—loansharking. I might mention to members of the House that in 1975 I presented a private member's bill on loansharking, but it was talked out. Perhaps if we had not talked it out but had implemented its recommendations, we would not have the loansharking that we have today.

Testimony to the Quebec crime probe has again and again told of the ruthlessness of "Shylocks" and of how lucrative this "business" is. One racketeer told the commission that a man lost his $40,000 clothing store because he owed a loan shark $1,200 and could not meet the weekly payments. Another was reduced from being owner of a dry-cleaning firm to a $100 per week employee in the same business because of loan sharks. Inspector Joe Terdik of the Peel regional police intelligence branch says that loansharking is more than people being sucked into a payment web; it is also a device used to extend organized crime into legitimate businesses.

Bill C-16 has limits concerning interest rates which will provide fines and imprisonment for those lenders convicted of charging exorbitant amounts. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott) stated before the health, welfare and social affairs committee:

> —to enhance the effectiveness of the "criminal rate" provision and to facilitate civil recovery by borrowers who have been subject to such rates it is intended to make a conviction under the "criminal rate" provision conclusive proof that an unwarranted rate was charged. As such not only will the "criminal lender" be subject to fines and imprisonment, but he will also, in effect, be automatically liable to refund all or most of the interest exacted—

Let me reiterate it is not a royal commission that we need. We need enabling legislation and public support for the police forces waging this war which is going on at the present time. Jean-Pierre Charbonneau has stated the case well as follows:

> The battle against drug trafficking is a perpetual recommencement. Those who wage it know that. They wish, however—and they are right to do so—that the public would understand them better and support them a little more. Their use of informers, spies . . . electronic eavesdropping do not meet with general favour. And yet . . . without these methods it would be impossible to carry out an effective battle against those exploiters of human misery.

In a lengthy article from Time magazine of May 16, 1977, it was recommended that more money and manpower must be provided for those agencies fighting organized crime and that easier bugging of known members of organized crime be allowed. Also recommended was tightened legislation to prohibit laundering of money, loansharking and racketeering. I submit we have two of these recommendations before us now in Bill C-51 and Bill C-16. Moreover, the Solicitor General has said new provisions to help the RCMP combat organized crime will be brought forward shortly.

The Minister of Justice also said in his speech this afternoon that he will be meeting with the attorneys general of the various provinces on this very matter of organized crime. What we must do is get on with it and not languish by holding royal commissions which will bear little fruit.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. With the conclusion of this debate, proceedings on the motion before the House have expired pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 58. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned till tomorrow at 11 o'clock a.m., pursuant to an order made Monday, May 30, 1977.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the following communication has been received:

Government House
Ottawa

June 16, 1977

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Jean Beetz, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 16th of June, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

STATUTE LAW (METRIC CONVERSION) AMENDMENT ACT, 1976

AMENDMENTS TO WHEAT BOARD ACT TO FACILITATE CONVERSION TO METRIC SYSTEM

The House resumed, from Tuesday, June 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Marchand (for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) that Bill C-23, to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement, be read the third time and do pass; and the amendment thereto of Mr. Mazankowski.

● (1110)

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to make a few additional remarks to those I was making the other night when time ran out. Quite frankly, I have lost count of the number of times I have spoken on this bill at its various stages. It has been a big disappointment to me that the government has not listened to the people directly affected by this metric bill. The people have spoken and the minister is aware of the feelings of the farmers of western Canada.

I need not spend time reading into the record the letters which I have received on this bill; to do so would take a good part of the day. As I have said in previous speeches, of all the letters I have received, I believe only one expressed any acceptance of the metric system, and even that was conditional acceptance. As I say, the minister is aware of the feelings of the people, not only from letters which he has received but also from the newspapers of western Canada. I am sure that he or the members of his staff have read those papers and will be aware that over the past few months the editorial pages have been filled with letters to the editor, 95 per cent of which oppose the metric system.

As usual, this government has adopted an arrogant and despotic attitude toward the people directly affected by this piece of legislation. The government seems to have adopted the attitude that it knows what is best for the people. I thought we were living in a democratic country, that I came to Ottawa to express the views of the people in my constituency, and that government members would be doing the same on behalf of the people in their constituencies. I thought they would be representing the views not only of their constituents but of the people of Canada at large. However, I found I was wrong.

Looking back over the record of this government, Mr. Speaker, I recall the capital punishment bill which was put through the House despite the fact that probably 80 per cent or 85 per cent, maybe more, of the people of Canada were opposed to the abolition of capital punishment. I also recall the gun control legislation which was finally dropped as a result of the official opposition taking a stand and carrying on a lengthy debate.

This metric bill is a civil service bill; it is a bureaucrat's piece of legislation. The minister and his colleagues in cabinet, as well as members on the government side, have been prepared to listen to the civil servants and not to the representations of the people affected by this bill. I recall being in committee when the bill was being discussed and we were listening to the evidence given by some of the civil servants who had been involved with this bill. They adopted an attitude, not of belligerency, but they suggested that those who were opposed to the bill were fools. I recall that when the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) closed the meeting one evening he gave quite a dissertation on what he thought of the attitude of the civil servants involved, and he said quite frankly, "If this was a private company and I was the manager, I would fire the lot of you".

During the committee stage of this bill and at report stage we gave the government the opportunity, by way of amendment, to alter the legislation in such a manner as to make it acceptable to the people of western Canada. I say "to the people of western Canada" because they are the ones directly affected, although the effects of the Bill will ultimately be felt throughout the length and breadth of the country as changes begin to take place in our land measurement system. I think we will end up with a situation where, instead of having one method of land measurement, we will have three—acres, hectares and arpents. Eventually people in other parts of the country who at the moment are not directly affected by the bill will begin to realize the effects of the bill.

As I have said, we gave the government the opportunity, through amendments, to bring in a dual system, one that would be satisfactory to older farmers as well as to younger farmers who are more familiar with the metric system, so that ultimately we would convert to the metric system. However, the government was not prepared to accept our amendments. The minister has been asked questions from time to time, and on May 3 the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) put a question to the minister, as reported at page 5526 of Hansard, which I should once again like to place on record. He asked:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State (Small Business). In view of the acceleration of widespread protest emanating from the producers of western Canada against the conversion to metric in the grains industry, is the minister giving any consideration whatsoever to the various representations he and other members have received and has he now reached the conclusion that the producer organizations upon which he relied when considering this particular piece of legislation did not actually reflect the wishes of the producers in western Canada?

The minister replied:

> Mr. Speaker, without accepting all the premises of the question, I want to say to the hon. member that I have been listening to the representations members made to me and the government, and particularly more recently to the representation made to me by the Minister without Portfolio from Crowfoot and—

Then there were some interruptions. The hon. minister continued:

> —and other members of parliament on this side of the House from the prairie region. A decision has been made not to proclaim that section of the bill on metric conversion relating to the grains industry—

Then followed further interruptions, and he continued:

> —until after further consultation—

A little later he went on to say that he would be pleased to have the views of members on this side as to the form that this consultation should take. We on this side of the House told the minister what form the consultations should take. In fact, we moved a motion a short time ago asking that certain sections of the bill be referred back to committee, with the idea that the committee could go out to western Canada and receive representations from the concerned people—the farmers and the grain producers. The hon. minister did not accept the amendment or the motion, neither has he accepted our recommendation.

I assume his intention is to send out representatives of the metric commission who have a vested interest in the bill and want to see it go through. It would not be an open-minded committee prepared to sit down with the farmers and listen to their views. The committee would go out to western Canada and spend its time trying to do a selling job to the farmers and persuade them of the fine system contained in this bill. This is not the type of consultation we feel should take place. I should point out that this is our feeling as to what the minister might do.

He has asked for our recommendations. He has said that he wants to have consultation. Well, he has had plenty of opportunity to stand in this House and make a speech telling us what he plans to do. Despite the length of time this bill has been debated in the House, the minister has not been prepared to stand and tell the House and the western farmers about his plans. Because of the fact that he has been silent on the issue, we in the official opposition have proposed a referral back to committee of certain sections by way of the motion we are debating now, a six months' hoist.

I see my time is running out, but I would like to challenge the minister to stand in this House and tell us what he plans to do as far as the consultative process is concerned. He may have plans which we will find acceptable. If so, we will deal with the bill with dispatch. On the other hand, if he is not prepared to stand and tell us what his plans are, and if he says that he is sending a delegation of public servants out to the west, I can assure him this bill will not be dealt with quickly. The western members on this side feel so strongly about this bill that we are prepared to spend a good portion of the summer debating it in this House.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few additional remarks in this debate because it is a matter of great importance to western Canada and to the farmers in my constituency. What we have here is an example of a Liberal government demonstrating mule-headed stubbornness in the face of widespread opposition to the proposal which it is putting before the people and it is not desired by the people who will be affected. We have a situation where this mule-headed stubbornness of the Liberal party is wasting the time of this institution by debating an issue for so long, the result of which should be obvious to the government.

The Liberal government refuses to pay any attention to the feelings and the representations which have been made by concerned farmers. As I have said, this governmnet is wasting the time of the House of Commons with this bill, which is a very serious breach of its duties to the people of Canada. Everybody in this country will accept and admit that we are faced with many serious and difficult problems which need to be dealt with by the parliament of Canada, yet these problems are not being discussed in this place because we are tied up with a bill which should not have been presented in the first place. The unity of the country is in severe jeopardy. This jeopardy arose during the tenure of this government, and they totally refuses to come to grips with it.

During previous hearings on this bill at committee stage, and indeed in this House, we were told by the minister that the bill was supported by farm organizations—the National Farmers Union, the Federation of Agriculture, and so on. In committee I found that the representatives of these organizations supported the bill, much to my surprise because I have not found any farmers who support it. I see the minister woke up from his nap when I said that the farm organizations are supporting the bill. After consultation with the representatives of the National Farmers Union and other farm organizations, we found that they did not consult with farmers. What happened is that the government bamboozled these organizations into thinking that the content of the bill was actively in effect in this country and that any opposition to it would be totally futile. The government also indicated that it was just a matter of simple housekeeping.

Under these circumstances, the farm organization representatives decided there was no need to consult with the producers and the constituents because the bill was a fait accompli and nothing would be gained by it. That is an example of the government being dishonest with these organizations by telling them there was no use in objecting. The organizations felt that if that was the case they might as well let the thing go and get used to it. Thus, they did not object.

Mr. Marchand: You should tell the farm organizations that.

Mr. Yewchuk: As a matter of fact, I did tell the farm organizations that. They indicated that in response to questions I put to them in committee. I do not think the minister was present at that time, so I would suggest he read the testimony which was put forth. On the same day, the National Federation of Agriculture was meeting in Ottawa and they refused to take a position, in consultation with the delegates there, because they did not want to go against the testimony which had already been given by their representatives. At the same time, they did not want to approve the legislation the minister was putting forward. On that occasion it was decided to simply table the issue and try to make a decision on another day.

If one reviews the correspondence which has been received directly from the producers, it is obvious they are not in favour of the measures in this bill. The producers are not in favour of metrication because there is nothing to be gained. They are not putting forward the argument that in general there might not be benefits for the manufacturing sector which is involved in export, for example. The producers are not necesarily arguing that certain mathematical calculations are not simple when they are carried out in the metric system. The fact is that these things are not all that important in so far as any advantages to the farmer are concerned.

Obviously, the farmers are objecting to this measure on the basis that changing acres to hectares, or bushels to tonnes, is a totally useless and unnecessary change. It will not in any way increase their productivity. It will simply add to the emotional pressure of farming under bad economic conditions which farmers are already facing. Indeed, it will add to the confusion and disorder in their lives which has resulted largely from actions of this government in the past on other issues. If one looks at this objectively and unemotionally, he will easily see that a change in weights and measures in so far as the agricultural producer is concerned is of no value at all.

There are some supporters of metrication. We hear the argument everywhere that it will simplify the life of Canadians. I have stated before that it might do that in some limited areas. However, when we consider the measurement of land and grain, and the fact that people involved in the agricultural industry have their minds and their brains trained and adjusted to thinking in the system used until now, it is almost impossible to justify the additional burden which will result from this change. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) described it well when he said it was simply a bureaucratic attempt to force everyone to conform for no other reason than to have conformity in the world. In my view, conformity is not always the best way to go.

We have a situation where the government has taken the position that it is the master, rather than the servant, of the people. That points out very clearly the difference between Progressive Conservative philosophy and Liberal philosophy. The Liberals always take the position that they know what is best for the people, that they are smartest and that they must impose their views on the people for their own good. The Conservatives believe that a democratically elected representative is sent to Ottawa to speak in the House of Commons on behalf of those who elected him. The Conservative party and Conservative governments in the past have always taken the position that government is the servant of the people and that the master is people themselves. We must always remember that, if democracy is to survive.

The position taken by the Liberal administration, that it is the master, is a grave distortion of a very important democratic principle. It brings into question whether democracy exists at all. When you ignore the views of the majority of people and impose your views upon them, it shows that you are a government too weak-kneed to withstand the bureaucratic pressure to change to conformity in the world. I have already said that conformity is not necessarily the best way.

Mr. Marchand: There are over 1,900 people in the private sector now working on metric conversion.

Mr. Yewchuk: The minister made an interjection which I did not fully hear. I hope that when I resume my seat he will stand and explain why he takes the position that he is the master of the people and does not have to pay any attention to the representations being made to him. Perhaps he has a reason for that, although I doubt whether it would be a logical reason if he believes in democracy.

This is not the only bill wherein the government is intruding more and more into the daily lives of Canadians, creating greater and greater erosion of the democratic principle that government must serve the people. There are other examples where democracy has been severely eroded. One need only look at the rule changes in this House since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came into power. When the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was prime minister, there were happy times in Canada. The economy of this country boomed. Everyone in the country felt they had some sort of a goal toward which they were heading, as opposed to the present, rudderless ship floating in any direction the wind will take it. That is the policy of this government.

Democratic principles have been eroded in so far as the authority of parliament is concerned. During the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert, question period was an occasion when government truly accounted to the representatives of the people in this House for their actions, policies and how they spent Canadians' tax dollars. Question period at that time was an accounting session which went on as long as anyone had any useful questions to ask.

The opposition of that day, which is now the government, used the question period to destroy the government of the day and throw it out of power. When they got into power, they realized what a valuable democratic tool the uncontrolled question period was. They immediately decided to put a limit on the length of the question period, thereby reducing the risk to themselves in so far as concerned being exposed to any meaningful attack in the House.

On the departure of the former prime minister, Mr. Pearson, and the arrival of the present Prime Minister, it was taken a step further. Ministers were removed from the House for two or three days a week, and the ability to call on ministers and the government to account for their actions and policies was curtailed even further. The people of Canada revolted against that and nearly threw them out in 1972. That was the time the Prime Minister decided to bring his ministers back into the House. However, they now follow a policy of not answering or accounting in a meaningful way to the representatives of the people who ask questions of them in this House during question period.

There is another example with regard to accounting to the people as to how their tax dollars are spent. Prior to the rule changes in 1969, parliament had the right to hold up the expenditures of the government if it did not provide proper answers with regard to how the tax money was being spent. That is no longer a right of parliament; that right has perhaps been lost forever. Now, on a certain date the expenditure items, the estimates, go through automatically.

The result of this change has been an accelerated rise in the federal budget and an accompanying rise in the taxation imposed upon the people of Canada. In the short period of eight or nine years there has been an increase from $10.8 billion to some $45 billion. That is one of the largest single contributing factors to the severe inflation in this country. As I said before, it is an erosion of the democratic right of the people to call on this government to account for its actions with regard to how it spends the tax money that it takes from people who work very hard.

This legislation affects the culture of the people of Canada. The system which a society uses to determine its weights and measures is, indeed, one aspect of its culture. If we look at it from that point of view, we have a situation in which this government, through its legislation, is attempting to change the culture of Canada. We know from experiences in Europe and in other places that governments are not to be trusted with trying to change the culture of a country and controlling the development of culture. Culture, to be meaningful, must arise from the people themselves and must evolve and develop in accordance with the natural evolution that takes place in a country, given certain freedoms and rights to which individuals are entitled.

It seems to me that the House, if it is to be representative of the people of this nation, must consider the interests of the farmers in this case above the interests of the grain handling industry. It is much simpler for the conversion to be made by the grain handling industry than for the farmer to make the conversion, because it is only the grain handlers who are involved in international trade and export—so why not let them make the conversion? Why impose the conversion on the producer who is not directly involved in international trade and the exportation of his product?

The other point which I think is very important is that in the measurement of land the minister insists we change from acres to hectares. We will not be exporting land, so we cannot use the export argument to insist on changing land measurements.

Mr. Marchand: This will be done by the provinces.

Mr. Yewchuk: Alberta and Saskatchewan have put forward legislation. The Ontario legislation is of a permissive type. The Alberta legislation was never proclaimed. It is only Saskatchewan, I understand, that has passed, by order in council, and proclaimed legislation which would conform to what the minister is proposing. Nevertheless, if it were not for this bill I doubt very much that the provinces would proceed on their own to make these changes. So if the minister is trying to blame the provinces for making these changes, he is being a little less than honest—and I expect more than that from him.

Mr. Marchand: It is a co-operative effort.

Mr. Yewchuk: I have known the minister for some time. He came to the House at the same time as I did, and I have never known him to be dishonest in the past. Now he is putting the responsibility on the provinces. I am sure he is aware of the heat this legislation is creating. It is uncomfortable for him, so he is attempting to say that the provinces are making these changes. I think that if he wants to take that position there is no point at all in talking to him, because he is missing the whole point of what we are trying to say and is excusing himself completely from playing any serious role in what is happening here.

Mr. Fraser: He has a very low conversion factor.

Mr. Yewchuk: We are also beginning to wonder what the minister's position is in relation to the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) who indicated quite clearly and publicly that one of the things he was going to do was stop metrication in so far as the agricultural producer is concerned.

Mr. Fraser: He hectared the hon. member for Crowfoot.

Mr. Yewchuk: Indeed, the minister himself, when the hon. member for Crowfoot crossed the floor, proclaimed very proudly that he was now consulting closely with the hon. member for Crowfoot in this matter and that his representations would be considered. If the minister is trying to tell us now that the hon. member for Crowfoot has changed his mind about metrication in so far as farmers are concerned, I would be very surprised if that were the case, because that hon. member spoke very vigorously against metrication when he was on this side of the House, and I believe he still feels the same way.

So the question arises as to whether the government will be using the hon. member for Crowfoot for its own purposes, or whether it will be using him for hearing representations from the people of Alberta. We know from past experiences with Bud Olson, for example, the former minister of agriculture who, while sitting in the cabinet of this government must have been a very frustrated man, what happened to him as a result of the fact that the government had used him. We know that he was aware of the views of the people of Alberta, of the views of farmers in Alberta and, perhaps, in western Canada. There is no doubt about that, because I talked to that hon. member on many occasions. But he was not able to convince the Liberal cabinet that the views of the western farmers in Alberta were worth considering. Instead, the Liberal cabinet chose to use the minister as their mouthpiece to impose their views, once again, on the people of the west, and indeed he had to try to explain away policies which were unexplainable and unacceptable to the people in that area. So the people decided to throw him out.

I predict that if this Liberal cabinet attempts to use the hon. member for Crowfoot as a tool for imposing their own views on the people of the west, rather than to use him as a resource person to hear representations from the west, the people will throw him out, too—and any other member who takes the position that he might be able to be effective within the Liberal ranks. So I think the minister should give that some thought. He should put it in his pipe and smoke it.

Mr. Marchand: My peace-pipe.

Mr. Yewchuk: Yes, perhaps if he smoked his peace-pipe he would take a more peaceful approach to the western farmers and try to make peace with them. I suggest that is exactly what he should do during the six months' hoist of this bill. He should meet with the farmers, smoke his pipe with them, find out how they feel, and come back to tell us. I am sure that if he did that he would come back to the House and tell us that this bill is no good, that it should be changed, that it should reflect the desires of the people it will affect. Mind you, I am saying that on the assumption that the minister believes in democratic representation. If the minister believes in democracy and that the representations of people should be considered by the government, he should say that. He has not said it so far.

Mr. Fraser: It is pretty tough stuff to get them to agree to.

Mr. Yewchuk: This bill is being forced upon the western farmers in an attempt by a weak minister—I am not saying he is weak physically, but weak as a minister because he will not stand up for the farmers—to comply with the request of a bureaucracy dedicated to sameness, uniformity, conformity and control, as well as being the master of the people.

Mr. Fraser: How could a British Columbian do such a thing, Len?

Mr. Yewchuk: It is inconceivable, because most British Columbians are dedicated to democratic principles. The minister seems to be the exception to the rule. The scientific superiority of metric weights and measures is not clear in so far as the producer is concerned. It may indeed be visible in so far as manufacturers are concerned, but when you consider the cost of the metrication bill, the financial cost of imposing metrication on the country—which is in the vicinity of $5 billion—you begin to wonder why this government is anxious to spend so much money on this conversion which is undesirable and which will not change anything so far as the producer is concerned.

• (1150)

Mr. Fraser: Things will be the same size, won't they?

Mr. Yewchuk: That is right; the size of farms will not change.

Mr. Fraser: Five billion bucks not to change anything!

Mr. Yewchuk: Which will result in no useful change. It is projected that it will take the manufacturing sector, which is involved in the export business, 15 years to recover these costs if it switches to the metric system.

Mr. Marchand: They will save $1 million a year.

Mr. Yewchuk: Yes, perhaps after 15 years. However, I did some careful research on this subject. Perhaps the minister does not know about this, but reliable sources suggest that it will take 15 years for any manufacturer to recover the cost of his investment in the conversion process before he can even hope to start gaining any kind of economic benefit from the conversion. Even then, it is questionable whether there will be any economic benefit.

Mr. Fraser: The advantages could be measured in millimetres.

Mr. Yewchuk: We are imposing a $5 billion price tag on the people of Canada who are already taxed to death. Everybody in a democratic society will accept the fact that some taxes are necessary because we need an army, highways, airports and services of that kind. But in this country we have a situation where 43 per cent of the gross national product is already in the public domain. Various governments take that percentage of the gross national product for their own purposes. That is already a dangerously high amount. It is much higher than is acceptable in a democratic system based upon private enterprise and individual initiative.

Imposing an additional $5 billion price tag will increase that 43 per cent to a substantially higher amount. We know we cannot go very much higher without stifling individual initiative. People are saying they have to give a lot to the government, anyway, and they are wondering why they should work any harder or increase their productivity or income. So we have inflation in this country. We have a situation in which productivity is already behind other countries. We have almost priced ourselves out of the international markets, and this will only be one step further in that direction. This measure will stifle initiative because increased taxation will be necessary to implement it.

The mental confusion which will result while people are trying to convert in their own minds is bound to result in decreased productivity. Productivity will decrease in two ways as a result of conversion. It will decrease because taxes will go up to pay the bill, and it will decrease because of the mental confusion there will be until conversion is made within the brains of the people of Canada.

I think the government is in a position now where it must rededicate itself to cutting down its own costs and to reducing taxes, rather than continuing to dedicate itself to finding ways of spending more and more money of Canadians, thereby raising taxes to a greater extent when we know that they are already too high. We must be looking for ways to increase productivity so that we can be competitive on international markets. We should not be trying further to reduce our competitiveness in international markets, because we know that if we are going to survive as an industrialized nation in a very competitive industrialized world, we must make ourselves more competitive.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member. I have already given him one extra minute. Unless he gets unanimous consent, I will recognize another hon. member. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, as I prepared for this debate on Bill C-23, I could not help wondering how the more than one million unemployed people in this country must feel about their parliamentarians debating this multi-billion dollar nonsense when we should be discussing ways to put people to work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: I certainly support the amendment of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) to hoist this bill for six months. If it could be done, hoisting it for six years would be even better. It is irresponsible for us to be discussing how soon we will be forcing farmers to adopt a new way of describing an acre of ground or a ton of grain, but we in the opposition have been forced into this debate. We have to try to convince this government that there are many other topics more worthy of our time and effort and we must try to prevent this bill from being passed into law by that passive group of members on the other side of this House.

My colleague, the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil), said recently that a great many communities would refuse to put up signs in the new metric language. Another colleague, the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling), said that commissioner Jake Gaudaur of the Canadian Football League told a luncheon group not long ago that the football league would retain the present size and markings of Canadian football fields, whatever the Canadian government does with respect to forcing the metric system on the country.

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I thought I heard the hon. member say that the commissioner of the Canadian Football League said he would not involve himself in the metric system. Having attended that dinner, I know he said that naturally he would take the option, if conversion is to be voluntary, not to convert; but that if the government instructed that it should be done, he certainly would do so. I thought that correction should be made.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I was at the same dinner, and that is exactly the opposite of what commissioner Gaudaur said. He said he would not convert. He went into all the difficulties the league would face if it went to the metric system. He said the opposite of what the hon. member just said.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The matter raised is not a point of order. It is not even a matter of clarification. These remarks could be made at another time. Therefore, I invite both hon. members to intervene in due course and perhaps enlighten the House with more clarification. However, in the meantime we will leave the floor with the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling).

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, I was not at that dinner. I was merely quoting the very knowledgeable member for Halton-Wentworth.

Mr. MacFarlane: That is completely false, and I will get you a letter to prove it.

Mr. Darling: I suggest that these two illustrious gentlemen get together and get this ironed out. These are not isolated opinions or remarks. These statements are merely a sampling of comments which show the contempt that an increasing number of Canadians feel for the legislative record of the government across the floor. There is a saying to the effect that if you want to generate disrespect for the law, bring in laws which people will not, and cannot, accept. Oppressive laws breed lawbreakers—and we have had enough crime in our country already.

The $4 billion to $10 billion it will cost to initiate the metric system in Canada would go a long way toward refurbishing and modernizing our outdated prison system. It would provide a great deal in the way of additional training for our prison officials and our police officers, and it would buy a great deal of modern crime detection equipment. Some of that money could be put to better use in assisting the private sector to create new jobs for the million plus Canadians who could not care less whether the food they cannot afford is measured in pounds and ounces or in grams and litres.

This government is not governing for the people; it is governing for itself, and nowhere is this more evident than in the fact that it has done too little, too late, with respect to coping with unemployment; and too much, too soon, in trying to ram the metric system down our throats. If this government cared even a little about what the Canadian people really want, it would have gone to the people for a mandate by way of a national referendum. We asked for a referendum on whether the people of Canada want bilingualism, and we asked for a national referendum on the issue of capital punishment. Surely we are justified in expecting the government to ask the people of Canada whether they want to adopt a new system of measurement, something that will change the whole concept of conducting business and commerce and all other aspects of life in their country.

We cannot get a referendum, Mr. Speaker; but the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) invites the government of Quebec to hold a referendum on the question of a province separating from confederation and jeopardizing the future of our entire nation. The Prime Minister plays into the hands of the Quebec separatists by holding our sovereign up to ridicule, at the same time that he is representing our country at the jubilee celebrations of our Queen and representing our country at the commonwealth conference in London.

There is no doubt that we will have to accept the government's whole package of metric, including the imposition of the metric scale on our agricultural community, because those members on the other side of the House close their eyes and vote however their leader orders them to vote. They would vote to instal Idi Amin as their deputy leader if the Prime Minister ordered them to do so. All we can hope for is to convince the government that there are segments of our economy that would suffer to such an extent that they would need government assistance and understanding in order to survive this latest onslaught on their capabilities.

I am thinking in particular of the small business community and of the financial burden being placed on them by the conversion to metric. Small businesses in Canada are caught in a web of circumstances, none of which are due to their actions or their lack of action. They are being subjected to harrassment and hassling from various government agencies and bureaux, with growing demands for reports, fees and charges. The small business community depends on the Post Office to a greater extent than any other single segment of our society, and it is no secret that they are constantly being let down in that quarter. For some businesses, as I pointed out in this House last Monday, the Post Office is a lifeline. When that lifeline is cut, as it so often is these days, many of those businesses go under.

Metric System

We are losing too many small businesses in Canada today because of irregular and unreliable postal service. Those businesses which can afford to have already turned from the Post Office to private courier services. The Postmaster General (Mr. Blais) and the postal unions complain about the business they are losing to the private courier services—but it is their own fault. I can foresee an even greater use of the private courier systems in the future because the Canadian postal service continues to get worse.

Last Monday, when we were debating the amendments to the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, I pointed out that the imposition of the metric system would work a hardship on people involved in those types of activities. The government said at the outset of the metric debate that businesses and industries affected would have to absorb the costs involved in converting to the new system. Later we were told that some adjustments would be made so that small businesses, for example, would be assisted financially in making the conversion.

The fact remains, though, that the greater share of the cost of conversion will fall on the shoulders of small businessmen, fishermen and farmers. In Monday's debate I suggested that many small business people would be hard pressed to come up with the money to pay the cost of conversion, in view of all the other demands on their capital, the ravages of inflation, higher production and labour costs and a multitude of other demands on their resources. I urged the government to take this into consideration and to bring in a more flexible small businesses loans plan. I said that many of these small business people would have to borrow money to pay the cost of converting their equipment to the metric system. But on reflection I wonder whether they should have to borrow money at high rates of interest to pay the cost of something that they did not ask for, something about which they were not even consulted by the government or anyone else.

The small business community in Canada did not ask for the metric system; the fishermen did not ask for it; the farmers did not ask for it. In fact, the Canadian people did not ask for it, nor were they ever consulted about it. It has been imposed upon all of us, and the real reason why it was imposed upon us has never been told. I doubt that it will ever be told.

As far as the cost of converting small businesses is concerned, there are only two acceptable ways this can be dealt with. One is for the federal government to pick up the tab for the conversion costs. After all, it was the federal government's idea in the first place. If they want farmers, fishermen and small business people to play this expensive and ridiculous game, they should be prepared to pay their way into the ball-park.

The other way this might be accomplished at a minimum of direct cost and inconvenience to small businesses is to extend long-term, no-interest loans to defray conversion costs. If we can make long-term loans at little or no interest to countries like Cuba, and if we can make grants to countries on the far side of the earth to improve their farms and businesses, we can surely do as much for our own small businesses, especially when you consider that the government deliberately imposed this extra cost situation without consultation and without bothering about finding out if the Canadian people really wanted to convert our country to the metric system.

I understand that the metric commission has spent about $20 million to date. At first it was said that industry would pay for the conversion, but industry said in no uncertain terms that the consumer must pay. I think we are realistic enough to know that in the end the taxpayer, the consumer, will pay. Industry will make sure it does not lose money on the deal. Indeed, it would seem that big industry is pushing the metric system and is willing to accept it.

The night before last I listened to two eloquent speakers, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), and the "quiet and shy" hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). They both opposed this bill. I hope the House will accept the amendment offered by the hon. member for Vegreville and give the bill a six months' hoist.

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my intervention in this debate will be fairly short, but I want to say something about metric conversion so there will be no question in anyone's mind about where I stand. As an elementary school teacher and as a high school teacher as far back as 1949-50, I and most of my colleagues were very concerned about the transposition of the existing system to the metric system. Those of us involved in chemistry and physics taught our students how to convert from one to the other. Even when I was a student, which was at the time of the Queen's coronation and earlier than that—at the time of the visit of Her Majesty's parents to this country—there was talk of conversion to the metric system. But we never got around to it. We never seemed to have the courage to make the move, but now we do have the courage. It is interesting to note that all the grains agreements are already in the metric system even without the government ordering it.

Mr. Mazankowski: That is what we have said.

Mr. MacFarlane: Motor mechanics who invest as much as $5,000 in tools, even when they do not own their own business and cannot claim a decent income tax credit, buy metric tools because they need them for servicing foreign cars.

As one who has coached football for 30 years, I have been at times involved with Jake Gaudaur, and I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that people concerned with football are very disciplined. Those involved with the CFL have been self-disciplined. The man said at the meeting I attended that he opposed the metric system and would avail himself of the option he would be given because the bill would provide for an option. He said he would not be ordered, and if the government made the metric system part of the law of the land, Canadian football fields could conform to at least 10 or 11 metric designs: the people in football would obey the law. Incidentally, I said something at the meeting which newspapers quoted. I said I did not think football should go to the metric system. I said it, not Mr. Gaudaur. I still do not think football should go to the metric system and I want my attitude to be on the record. This bill will not force football to adopt the metric system.

Mr. Mazankowski: Isn't that interesting. What about the other parts of the metric bill?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) has the floor. Perhaps hon. members would allow him to make his remarks.

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, let me put on record a reasoned argument which I think members of the House and the minister will accept. It is this: under the metric system, the football field would probably be marked every 10.9 yards instead of every ten yards. In Canadian football we only use three downs, instead of the four downs they use in American football.

An hon. Member: What difference does it make? It could be ten downs.

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, I don't mind interruptions, but some of them remind me of the previous hon. member's speech. That hon. member tried to draw Idi Amin into the metric argument. I am shocked at the attempt to bring that man's name into a reasoned argument. I do not appreciate it. Let me continue. Because our football players would have to attain a greater distance on the football field, which could be measured in metres or centimetres, the Canadian game might have to resort to four downs and under present rules, with markings ten yards apart, we are having a difficult enough time achieving three downs. That is why we use the pass so much. But if we went to four downs we would find it relatively easy, under the metric system, to achieve the first down, because under the four downs system a player can usually achieve 11 yards.

If we played the four downs game, which involves some extra distance, it would be said we had too much offence and not enough defence. Therefore, we would have to rule out our motion in the backfield, a unique feature of the Canadian game. In other words, if we make our football game conform to the metric system, we shall need to adopt American rules to offset the disadvantage. That is why we would not go for it. Our Canadian game is unique. Remember, the Americans imported their game from the colony of Canada. They played the first organized game when our team from McGill played an American university team south of the border. Our team played under our rugby rule which allowed for the carrying of the ball. But that rule was not part of the game of rugby which came to their shores from England. The Americans adjusted to the Canadian game. I point out that the Canadian game has a unique history.

The metric system is designed for those with purely technical needs. If we adopt it, we are not going to change some of our idiomatic expressions. A foot will still be a foot, and our numerous remarks which relate to the old measurements will still be part of our culture. Similarly, it would be foolish to say that our great footballers of Edmonton, Calgary and other parts of Canada ran 1,560.78 metres, or some such figure. We would not do it.

I say, let us not be illogical in our opposition. If you have real complaints about the metric system, make them, because I do. I do not find the minister unreasonable. He listens to what I say. The Canadian football commissioner feels this, too. He knows the bill is not asking football to change to the metric system. I do not deny that some say, if the athletes accept the system, others will accept it, too. Mr. Speaker, I do not think athletics exist as a vehicle for doing the bidding of others Sports exist for themselves, and athletes participate. Sports are good vehicles for education and should not be used to sell the metric system. Therefore, I stand here and say the metric system should not be forced upon our game of football. I will not accept it.

Mr. Mazankowski: What about our farmers?

Mr. MacFarlane: Mind you, you can use 11 designs which will fit into our stadiums.

Mr. Mazankowski: What about the farmers?

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, I presume that the hon. member, with his great knowledge, can answer for them. I listened carefully to what hon. members said. I say this bill proposes to bring us into, not the twentieth century but perhaps the eighteenth century. It is not right to say all the time that the Europeans are the only ones out of step. We could well use some of the systems which come from the old country, so to speak, from the other side of the Atlantic, one of them being the metric system. I support that change. I supported it as a young boy, as a student, as an undergraduate in university and as a teacher. But I learned that someone always said, "We cannot do it. We cannot change. We must stop this change".

I stood up, really, to make my position clear on Canadian football, for I have great respect for the Canadian Football League. It is a Canadian enterprise, Canadian-owned, and I say our traditious entitle our game of football to be played on our traditional football fields. Therefore, I see no reason for change. Other members, perhaps with reason, spoke of business matters and great financial hardships the change would cause. But let us not confuse that issue with the issue of Canadian football.

Mr. Mazankowski: You have been talking on a very narrow issue.

Mr. MacFarlane: That is right. But I think other comments in this debate have been very narrow. I do not know how, in a debate on the metric system, one hon. member found it possible to link the Prime Minister's name with that of Idi Amin. It is almost like saying that when Idi Amin wears a kilt, he is in the Black Watch. But mind you, Idi Amin says that himself. He thinks he is going to become king of Scotland. But that has nothing to do with the metric system, surely.

The Canadian football commissioner invited members of parliament, of all parties, to have dinner with him. It was a fine dinner. Incidentally, the whip of the Conservative party handled the arrangements exceptionally well. I was present. I thought the commissioner was honest and frank. He is proud to be Canadian, and will do whatever parliament decides. He will obey the law. I want hon. members to be aware of this.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) told the House exactly where he stands, and his position is diametrically opposed to that of the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling). One can understand why he rose to speak. However, it is fair to say that the remarks of the government side will alienate further the farmers of western Canada, for the western farmer does not want to be used as a football in this game.

Mr. Paproski: Hear, hear!

Mr. Towers: It will be a sad day when the government gives any sport precedence over one of the basic ingredients underpinning our way of life—western grain. I say the government should not do it. This debate is of fundamental importance. If the government's approach were honest it would accept the amendment. If the minister honestly wished to meet with the producers of western Canada he would take the bill back and allow the producers to make their case.

• (1220)

This is where the government is very wrong. Many people in western Canada felt the metric system was already the law of the land until we on this side finally made it clear it was not. Since then the farmers are having their say. Members of the National Farmers Union are right in their disapproval of this measure. They are not requiring that the metric system should be applied to football. If the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain wants to be so dictatorial as to tell the commissioner of the CFL that metric measurements are not to be used on the playing fields, that is his affair. If they were, the western farmer would probably be somewhat disconcerted as he watched a game, but he is not going to fight it. The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain said, "If the government instructed the CFL . . ." and so on. What kind of dictatorship are we getting into here, Mr. Speaker, when the government uses such words. I wonder what kind of democracy we have left in Canada, or whether it has all gone down the drain.

If ever a project has been mishandled, it is the introduction of the metric system. Right from the beginning there was misrepresentation. The western producer believed he had no choice. But when we managed to dig out the legislation which gave rise to this debate, the producer began to present his thinking on the subject. I propose to read into the record an excerpt from Grain News. These are the views of locals of the United Grain Growers, one of the major grain companies in western Canada.

Not unexpectedly, a United Grain Growers local has come out solidly against conversion to metric in the grain business at the farm level. In a resolution to be placed before delegates at the annual meeting of the UGG in early November, members at Nobleport, Alberta, proposed the United Grain Growers press the government of Canada not to convert agriculture to the metric system. The thinking of the local was that the present system of converting to metric at the terminals works well and the farmers state that the change to metric at the farm level will accomplish nothing more than increased costs and confusion.

A similar resolution came from the UGG local at Fahler, Alberta, where members asked that the UGG strongly oppose any metrication at the farm level.

Letter after letter has been put on record in the House in opposition to this proposal, in opposition to what is implied by that phrase of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain, "The government instructs . . ." The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) drew attention to the added burden of cost this measure will impose on small businessmen and farmers. What about the mechanics of this country? No provision whatsoever has been made for them in the income tax legislation. No thought has been given to the extra tools they will have to purchase.

This is where the government has been so wrong from the beginning. No provision has been made for the mechanics of the country; no provision has been made for the farmers; no provision has been made for small business. How can the government ever believe it will get the support of the public and retain respect for parliament? We have depreciated this institution to such an extent that soon no one will care one whit about it: it will have been depreciated to the point at which a great many Canadians will hope it will disappear. They will take this attitude for the very reason it is not reflecting the thinking of the individual or respecting the rights of Canadians.

I could go on and on, Mr. Speaker. I am very disappointed in the government, not only because of the way in which it is handling this business of metric conversion, but what it is doing to parliament. We have given the minister and members on the government side every opportunity to do something about this mistake as far as the producers are concerned. In the subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs we thought we had reached an arrangement we could go along with, namely, that the government would let us keep the "acres" and the "bushels" at the farm gate. As to the rest, we would go along with it.

If that understanding had held good, we would never have got ourselves into this long debate. That was my understanding of what took place in the subcommittee. But when the report came back to the standing committee, on which the government had a majority, they reverted to the old position. There was no give. We fought it. We put forward amendments, but they were not accepted. We brought amendments forward at the report stage, thinking that the government would perhaps agree to fracture the bill as suggested by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton). If the bill were split up, we could decide exactly what the government wanted, what the industry wanted and what the producers wanted, and satisfy their needs as far as possible. I do no think that was too much to ask, if the government honestly wished to respect the views of Canadian producers. If members opposite had any idea about regaining a little support in western Canada, I would have thought this solution would have been acceptable to them. But they would not budge.

[Mr. Towers.]

Last, but not least, Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw attention to exactly what the government has been doing in relation to this legislation. The minister told us he will go back to the people after the bill has been passed. Can you imagine anything so idiotic? If there is to be any dialogue, it ought to take place prior to the passage of the bill—and the time to begin that dialogue is right now, because our amendment would allow the producers to have their say before the committee. I hope the minister, on behalf of the government, will even at this stage repent and recognize he has made a mistake. It is not such a bad thing for a person to admit a mistake, to acknowledge that he has misunderstood a situation. I am sure his reputation would be enhanced if he were to do this.

I realize this is not the end of the debate and that we still have to deal with the motion for third reading. But inasmuch as the minister is present in the House, I hope he will accept the amendment at this point and put an end to the debate for the moment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question? The question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski).

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Mazankowski) which was negatived on the following division:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

UNVEILING OF BRONZE REPRODUCTION OF CANADIAN BILL OF RIGHTS AS TRIBUTE TO RIGHT HON. JOHN DIEFENBAKER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter not only of urgent and pressing necessity but of some pride to all of us in the House of Commons. I move, seconded by the Acting Prime Minister, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald):

That this House notes with pleasure the unveiling of a bronze reproduction of the Canadian Bill of Rights as an appropriate tribute to the efforts of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) to guarantee for all time the rights and freedoms of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the unanimous consent of the House is necessary for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SUGGESTED APPEAL OF SENTENCE IMPOSED ON THREE POLICEMEN IN MONTREAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I can think of no more appropriate forerunner to the motion I seek to move under Standing Order 43 than the motion to which the House just gave its unanimous consent. In view of the decision announced today by sessions Judge Roger Vincent granting an unconditional discharge to RCMP Chief Superintendent Donald Cobb, Montreal Police Inspector Roger Cormier and OPF Inspector Jean Coutellier, and in view of the necessity to encourage public respect for the rule of law to ensure that there is not one law for the police and another one for everyone else, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt):

That this House request the Minister of Justice to contact the Minister of Justice in Quebec to request that an immediate appeal be filed with respect to the sentence imposed in this case.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such motion can only be presented for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

MEASURES TO HELP SHOE MANUFACTURERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an urgent and very important matter. Mr. Speaker, I should like all hon. members to listen very closely to the text of the motion. I am sure, therefore, that the House will grant the attention required to the problems of the shoe industry, and that no hon. member, no matter what his political beliefs may be, will dare oppose the motion.

Whereas the Canadian industry has encountered tremendous problems in the last few months, whereas 21 plants have had to close down in the last ten months or so, and that in Quebec alone; whereas the problem is very complex and involves such matters as imports, the Canadian market, the rationalization of our industries and many other factors; and whereas the Anti-dumping Tribunal is now studying the matter and therefore its report will certainly not be published before the fall, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That the Minister of Trade, Industry and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien), notwithstanding the inquiry now in progress, make a specific statement within the next eight days in the House on the particular means he intends to take to help the shoe industry in Canada and, at the same time, advise all workers in that industry in Canada of his determination not to allow them to become generally unemployed.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Under the terms of Standing Order 43, the motion cannot be put without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PUBLIC SERVICE

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION TO ALLOW THOSE ON BLACKLIST TO CLEAR THEIR NAMES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. In recent days two public servants have launched suits against the present Solicitor General and one of his predecessors, the present Minister of Supply and Services. In view of the cost of court proceedings necessitated by the imbecilic letter written by the Minister of Supply and Services in 1971, and in view of the number of other persons whose reputations were damaged by the Minister's paranoid delusions, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

[Mr. Speaker.]

That the government establish a commission to allow those persons accused of participation in an "extra-parliamentary opposition" to hear the evidence, if any, against them and have an opportunity to publicly clear their names.

Mr. Speaker: Before such a motion can be presented it requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROPOSAL THAT "WILLIAM CARSON" BE REPLACED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the terms of Standing Order 43 to present a motion on an urgent matter of public importance. As a result of the sinking of the C.N. ferry, William Carson, Canadian National has had to cancel many thousands of reservations to and from Newfoundland at the peak of the tourist vacation period. Considering the impact this will have on the 1977 Canada Games to be held in St. John's from August 7-19, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

That this House direct the government to take immediate steps to arrange for the chartering of a ship to replace the William Carson.

Mr. Speaker: The motion can only be presented by unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO OPERATIONS—PERMISSION TO MEMBERS TO TESTIFY BEFORE QUEBEC INQUIRY

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Since a few weeks ago a situation arose in which the police of Metropolitan Toronto were conducting an inquiry into a matter involving, among other things, the role of the RCMP, and since today we hear that the minister of justice in Quebec has announced an inquiry whose terms of reference again involve very directly the role of the RCMP, would the minister, rather than leaving these investigations, which touch the federal force, to provincial and municipal governments, finally grant the request of members on this side that a federal inquiry be held not only into the activities of the RCMP in connection with these matters, but also, and more important, into the degree of political direction under which the RCMP or other federal police agencies acted in these cases?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): As the Leader of the Opposition knows, I shall be making a statement in the House tomorrow concerning the matter which was settled before the courts in Montreal today. I shall be making what I consider to be a fairly complete statement and I shall, of course, take the hon. gentleman's representations into consideration.

Mr. Clark: Would the Solicitor General advise us whether, if there is not to be a federal inquiry—

An hon. Member: Hypothetical.

Mr. Clark: Well, I will remove the hypothesis to satisfy the erudite corporal from Quebec. Let me ask the Solicitor General whether it is the intention of the government of Canada to have officials of the Department of the Solicitor General or officials of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police appear before the inquiry called today by the minister of justice of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, the officials of the RCMP have always co-operated with the officials of the department of the attorney general of the province of Quebec in answering any questions which they wished to ask in connection with the break-in. It would, of course, be our intention to continue to co-operate with the officials of the province of Quebec, particularly the officials of the department of the attorney general who have charge of the administration of justice in that province and who are the proper authorities to lay criminal charges, as happened in the APLQ case.

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DIRECTIONS GIVEN TO FORCE BY MINISTERS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General has now advised us that he is prepared to allow the RCMP to be examined by a provincial inquiry, but he still left hanging the question whether or not he is going to have a federal inquiry into these matters which can look not only into the activities of the RCMP but also, most importantly, into the degree of political direction under which the RCMP acted in this case. Can the minister give us a guarantee that in one form or another, and preferably through a federal inquiry or through absolute and clear statements in this House, there will be a communication to the House of Commons of all of the elements of political direction given to the RCMP by himself, or by any of his predecessors as Solicitor General, or by any of his colleagues in the cabinet of Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has evidently raised a really important question. He is asking me whether I intend to let the RCMP officers testify before the inquiry now under way in Quebec and which will last, I think, till mid-August. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether he is suggesting that I would have some discretion to issue orders to the constables and officers of the RCMP enjoining them to refuse to answer the subpoenas issued by Quebec boards of inquiry. The opposition, Mr. Speaker, has been pestering us for two days with questions on inquiry boards but I would like to point out in that connection that we have co-operated with the provincial authorities responsible for the administration of justice and we also intend to continue to do so.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is asking me to make my statement immediately, but I have the impression that he will have to wait till tomorrow.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should repeat my question. Can the minister now give us a guarantee that there will be clear statements on all implications and all directives given by a cabinet minister, either himself or his predecessor or another minister recommending to members of the RCMP that they take the action they did in this case?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. Leader of the Opposition for having been kind enough to repeat his question, although I had understood it in the other official language.

[English]

In that case I shall repeat—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: You are stonewalling in French.

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: —the hon. member is telling me that I am stonewalling in French, which is obviously not the case, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

The hon. member repeated his question in French so I shall repeat my answer in English.

Mr. Hees: He said that you were stonewalling in French.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It would be the same in Norwegian; it is still a stonewall.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition was courteous enough to repeat his question in French, so I am trying to respond in English at the moment. I will repeat my answer, and that is, he will have to wait until tomorrow to find out what is going to be in the statement.

CONSULTATION WITH QUEBEC OFFICIALS PRIOR TO ESTABLISHMENT OF INQUIRY—SCOPE OF MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. We are very pleased on this side of the House to receive answers from the government in either one of our great official languages. The main thing is that we would like to get answers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, keeping in mind the Solicitor General will be making a statement tomorrow, I should like to ask him in view of this very interesting development of the Quebec inquiry, what meaningful consultations, if any, took place between him and his Quebec counterpart with respect to this inquiry before the appointment of the commissioner and so on was decided? Was there a dialogue before this occurred?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question is no.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I have another brief question. In the statement tomorrow, I wonder if the Solicitor General, without divulging the contents of the statement, could indicate whether he will be confining it solely to the Quebec incident, which has been of such interest, or whether he will be dealing with other incidents which have been receiving publicity such as the one in Toronto—James, Lewis and Samuels and others? Will his statement be confined solely to L'Agence de Presse Libre du Quebec? Is there a possibility that either he or the government House leader can indicate whether his colleague, the former Solicitor General and now the Minister of Supply and Services, will also be making a statement about the time when he was solicitor general which some of these events encompass?

Mr. Paproski: If he ever gets back.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I can only answer for myself as to what my intentions are. The statement I intend to make tomorrow will cover the incident which was before the courts and which was determined today. I do not have any intention, at the moment, of covering the other incidents mentioned by the hon. member, which have been raised in the House. I will be willing in the coming weeks to entertain further questions, if that is the desire of the hon. members opposite.

POSSIBILITY OF STATEMENT BY FORMER SOLICITOR GENERAL ON ALLEGED BREAK-INS BY MEMBERS OF FORCE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the government House leader. May we have an indication whether there is a possibility, or indeed a certainty, as to whether we might expect another statement from the present Minister of Supply and Services, assuming he is able to be here for it?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Acting President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there is no indication that that will be the case.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

SUGGESTED APPEAL OF SENTENCE OF THREE POLICE OFFICERS INVOLVED IN BREAK-IN IN QUEBEC

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I can understand the Solicitor General putting off the answers to certain questions until tommorrow, which pertain to the break-in in Montreal. I have a question I would like to direct to the Minister of Justice which concerns all Canadians who have an interest in civil liberties. Considering an unconditional discharge was granted this morning to the three police officers who were involved in the break-in in Quebec and openly admitted their guilt; and considering this break-in was a clear, flagrant violation of the Criminal Code of Canada, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if in the interests of the rule of law, he will immediately request his counterpart in the province of Quebec to launch an appeal to this incredible sentence?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be improper for me to do that. The administration and the prosecution of offences is clearly the responsibility of provincial attorneys general. In the case of Quebec, it is the responsibility of the provincial minister of justice. The Quebec authorities laid charges, conducted a prosecution and sentence has been given. If there is to be a decision to appeal that sentence, that would be a decision for the authorities in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I expected precisely that copout. The hon. Minister is the leading member of the cabinet responsible for the enforcement of Canada's criminal law. As a lawyer, he knows anyone can launch an appeal. Considering that in the United States the president was almost impeached when people who were not—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: Listen to the question.

Mr. Broadbent: —members of the police force were involved in a break-in, I should like to ask the minister if he considers this to be a very serious question and will he ensure that the law for ordinary citizens holds equally well for the police forces in Canada? Does this not move him to launch such a protest in terms of concern for the rule of law?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I think that any reference to what happened in Washington is purely gratuitous and silly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: The hon. member makes reference to the rule of law. One of the essential foundations of the rule of law is that people usually be tried, convicted and sentenced by judges not by politicians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: What an expert in banal platitudes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Resign like Lewis.

Mr. Broadbent: In view of the fact that the criminal law, which the minister is showing little interest in enforcing, also provides for appeals of sentences, whether from the person prosecuted and convicted or from the Crown, does the minister not realize that the rule of law entails the right and indeed the obligation of the Crown to launch an appeal when the Crown feels the circumstances warrant it? Considering that three police officers who clearly violated the law have been given a sentence which almost amounts to a compliment for their activities, does the minister not think it is appropriate for him to launch an appeal into this totally inappropriate sentence?

Mr. Speaker: With respect, that is a repetition of the original question.

MEASURES TO PROTECT SHOE MANUFACTURERS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, with your permission, let us get out of court and return to earth. My question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Could he indicate immediately to the House whether he is considering taking special steps to save the remains of the shoe industry. I would not want the Minister to hide behind the inquiry being conducted by the Anti-dumping Tribunal in answering my question, because there is a real urgency today since there is an increasing number of shoe plants closing their doors in Quebec.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of hiding behind this inquiry, but I must obey the laws of Parliament which say that the problem must be studied by the commission before the government may take a decision. I am following with interest the development of the shoe industry at the present time. I asked the commission to give me a report as soon as possible, and when it is received we will take the necessary steps.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, that answer is the only one we got from former industry, trade and commerce minister Pepin prior to that day in November 1971. Can the minister tell us whether officials in his department are currently dealing with the problem in the shoe industry so that he could be ready to act as soon as he sees fit to do so, that is in the next few weeks, to avoid any delay in the implementation of actions after we get the decision of the investigation board?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we are watching the situation very closely and hope to be able to act upon the recommendations of the board in the days or weeks following the tabling of the report.

COMMUNICATIONS

REQUEST FOR COMMISSION OF INQUIRY INTO BROADCASTING

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications. It concerns the increasingly confused state of this country's broadcasting system. We now have statements of mea culpa from the president of the CBC, recommendations which border on the extreme from the LaMarsh Commission, an inquisition sponsored by the Liberal party into Radio Canada, and other activities by various and sundry ministers and groups, both provincially and federally, let alone Bill C-43 which is presently in a state of suspended agitation, would the minister consider discussing with the Prime Minister and her cabinet colleagues, the advisability of establishing a royal commission to inquire into the whole area of broadcasting, since there has been no comprehensive study done of this issue since the Fowler Commission of 1955?

• (1430)

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is certainly not aware of what is going on in this House. He should remember that a few months ago the chairman of the CRTC was asked by the Prime Minister to give his opinion about the possibility of having an investigation on broadcasting. The chairman of the CRTC is going to table the report required by the Prime Minister on July 1 and he would probably take this opportunity to express his views on this matter. Following his recommendations, the cabinet will decide whether or not there would be some kind of investigation on broadcasting.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: I thank the minister for part of the answer. I am fully aware of what is going on in the House and I am also fully aware of the invitation of the Prime Minister to the chairman of CRTC to become involved in a most invidious precedent of CRTC investigating the CBC, but would the minister, whenever the interim report of the chairman of CRTC is received—the report is due on July 1, which will be a happy Dominion Day present, I suppose—consider ensuring that a royal commission established to define the role of the CBC does attempt some definition of the regulation of the broadcasting system, some attention to paid television and other modern technology, federal-provincial relations, the cablevision problem, let alone the relationship between the government and independent regulatory agencies, which are not part of the letter from the Prime Minister to the chairman at CRTC? Would those matters be considered and will the minister be able to stand in the House on July 2 or 3, or whenever we might meet in the month of July, to tell us what she intends to do?

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the hon. member, the Prime Minister made a statement following a question he had been asked, whether he was prepared to consider the possibility of an investigation on broadcasting. He also said he could anticipate the need to consider the whole structure of broadcasting in this country, in view of the technological changes which can be expected. I totally agree with him on this point. I think we should have an investigation or a task force, well some kind of an investigation, into all those broadcasting problems in order to consider the reorganization of the industry in the light of the technological changes which are going to take place. Concerning pay TV, the hon. member should know that public hearings are being held here in Ottawa following a request that the public and all involved people may express their points of view on this important technological innovation.

SUGGESTED SUSPENSION OF PROCEEDINGS ON BILL C-43 PENDING RECEIPT OF REPORT OF CHAIRMAN OF CRTC

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): In view of the minister's answer, which I appreciate, can she assure the House that there will be no further progress on Bill C-43 until there is a determination of what the government intends to do with the interim report of the chairman of CRTC and what else the government decides to add to extend the report?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): These are two different things altogether. Bill C-43 which has been brought forward in the House is going to be dealt with according to the order paper of the House. There is nothing in common between these two things. This legislation has been due for a long time. It is important and even necessary to meet our present problems.

TRANSPORT

ALLEGED GAPS IN STUDY ON RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE IN ATLANTIC REGION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Since the minister has indicated that he wishes to place his government's position on rail passenger transportation, particularly in the Atlantic region, before the CTC, and he has done this by tabling the Atlantic regional intermodal transportation study, will the minister heed the advice of the chairman of the rail transport committee of the CTC, who urged the federal Department of Transport to extend the study since there are "gaps" in it, particularly the study's use of outdated rail patronage figures which had been refuted by the CNR in their presentation to the committee?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we will certainly be taking that under consideration. Of course we are all delighted that while the study dealt with figures which were recently available, there are now some indications of very good upturns in the figures on the patronage of passengers rail services throughout the country, and that will certainly be taken into account.

Mr. Forrestall: Do I interpret properly what the Minister of Transport has said just now to be a refutation of his position taken earlier in this chamber that the Atlantic regional intermodal transportation study represented the present position he and the four Atlantic premiers take?

Mr. Lang: No, I think the study has a great deal of valid analysis, and the fact that some current figures changed certain of the factors does not in any way remove its value.

COMMUNICATIONS

MEASURES TO ELIMINATE VIOLENCE ON TELEVISION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that put by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley to the Minister of Communications. In view of the conclusive findings of the LaMarsh Commission that there is a direct causal relationship between violence on television and violence on the streets and the increased rate of crime as well as the effect that this has on children and certain other elements in society, and in view of the findings of the Solicitor General and the U.S. Surgeon General, may I ask the minister what steps she intends to take as the minister responsible for broadcasting to eliminate this serious social threat from television, especially bearing in mind the fact that 95 per cent of it comes from the United States, either by way of the cable system or in canned programs?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): The hon. member knows how preoccupied I am with that problem. I made a speech about a year ago in which I indicated that I felt that broadcasters should look into the question of the kind of programming they were offering their audiences. I never suggested that there should be any kind of censorship of the programming they are offering the population because, of course, such a radical measure would be repugnant to the population, as it would be to the hon. member and myself, despite the fact that I personally feel there is too much violence on television.

Although one cannot establish a direct relationship of cause to effect between what is shown on television and the behaviour of people, one must conclude that violent programs are not one of the most positive aspects of television with regard to the population and especially with regard to children. That is a very important problem. We will have to try to determine for ourselves what kinds of measures we can introduce in order to deal with it. It would not be censorship, but it might be a classification of programs, and certainly, above all, broadcasters should exercise responsibility in programming in view of this situation which has been brought to light in Miss LaMarsh's report.

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION TO PERMIT PUBLIC SERVANTS ON BLACKLIST TO CLEAR THEIR NAMES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, and in doing so I want to remind him of something he said a few moments ago when he said that a man should be tried, convicted and sentenced by judges, not by politicians. That was in answer to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. If the minister really believes that, as Minister of Justice and as Attorney General, as he tells us from time to time he is, would the minister give consideration to setting up a commission or a tribunal to allow those on the infamous extra parliamentary opposition list to publicly clear their names before judges, if no evidence exists, to support the charges made against them by the former solicitor general who, after all, is a man and a politician? Would he give some substance to the words that he uttered a few moments ago to bring justice to those public servants who have been maligned until there is evidence to support the charges made by the former solicitor general?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the case is analogous at all. We were discussing people charged under the Criminal Code in the process of being prosecuted, charged and sentenced. With regard to the other part of the hon. member's question, the letter to which he refers is not a charge. As has been made clear, some on that list have risen to positions of very considerable prominence within the Public Service of Canada.

● (1440)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, if the people on that list were guilty of what they are said to have been guilty of by the then solicitor general, they ought to have been charged under appropriate sections of the Criminal Code. They were not, and that is the problem. Would the minister reconsider his position with respect to the provision of a tribunal so that they can clear their names? If he will not do that, would he consider establishing a fund so that these people can be funded by the government which maligned them for the expensive legal proceedings through which they are now being put as a result of that maligning by the government? If the minister will not do either of those things, would he at least make a statement on motions absolving those accused of treasonable intentions, explain how the Goyer letter came to be written in the first place and assure the House that such internal smear attacks will not again be launched by any minister without precise information or charges? That is the least the minister can do in view of the dreadful situation into which his colleague put those public servants.

Mr. Basford: The circumstances surrounding that letter have been explained.

FINANCE

PROVISION OF BUDGET CONCERNING TAXING OF BENEFITS FROM LIFE INSURANCE POLICIES

Mr. Claude Tessier (Compton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Since most Canadians rely upon life insurance as a major means of financial security in the case of the death of one of the spouses, can the minister tell the House about the reason or reasons justifying provisions 62 and 63 of the new budget, which provide among other things for a tax on widows and children?

If this is the case, does that mean that Loto-Canada winners are exempt while a tax will be levied from those who made their own lottery and paid it completely, not for their own benefit but for that of their families?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I gave such an explanation the night of the budget and I am prepared to give it again when we get to the bill I introduced yesterday for first reading.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

PINE POINT, NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—POSSIBILITY OF FEDERAL AID IN ESTABLISHING NEW SOURCE OF DRINKING WATER

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and it is about the drinking water supply at Pine Point, Northwest Territories. To say the least, the water supply there is very bad. A recent analysis by the government of Alberta found a sample of water from that supply to be chemically unfit for human consumption. This situation has been very serious, especially for newborn babies. The minister is aware that the proposed new source of drinking water for the town will not be available this year unless some $400,000 is made available for this purpose by July 1. Is the minister in a position now to say if his department will commit itself to this expenditure?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of this serious problem. I know that the department is looking at it, but I cannot tell the hon. member today what decision has been made on this matter.

Mr. Firth: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister if he can indicate to the House how soon we will be able to get an answer to that question. If this funding is not made available, will the minister indicate to the residents of Pine Point what source of drinking water he believes they should use over the winter, and will he indicate whether he is willing to fund this alternate source of water supply?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, as a result of the hon. member's question I will check into this right after the question period and report to him.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

MEASURES TO REDUCE RISE IN CONSUMER PRICE INDEX

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. As the consumer price index rose at an annual rate of 9.6 per cent during May and at an annual rate of 10.4 per cent during the last three months, would the minister take the first opportunity on motions or briefly now to outline to the House what steps he intends to take to bring the rise in the consumer price index, the cost of living, more in line with the government's target of 6 per cent this year? When he is answering, would he also advise the House, in view of the very poor start in the first five months of this year, what chances he thinks this country has of achieving a 6 per cent increase this year?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will have a chance to talk about this matter later this day.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, the minister gave a very evasive answer. He said he would have a chance to talk about this later. He has had chances time and time again, but he never answers questions we ask, and he obviously does not intend to answer this very difficult question when he speaks in the debate today.

REQUEST FOR FERRY SERVICE BETWEEN SHELBURNE, NOVA SCOTIA, AND NEW ENGLAND STATES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. In light of the decline in Nova Scotia's tourist industry during 1976 and the continuing decline in secondary industry along the South Shore where in Brooklyn, Nova Scotia Standard Brands has now closed down its yeast plant while industry in Lockeport and Shelburne is seriously affected due to a lack of municipal water supplies, will the minister consider the carrying out by his officials of a survey in this area in the hope that a ferry service could be established between New England and Shelburne, thereby making use of one of the outstanding harbours we have in Nova Scotia and giving the tourist and secondary industry in this area a much needed boost?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I receive that as a representation, and I will be glad to have a look at the question.

EFFECT ON PROFIT POSITION OF ALLEGED OVERSTATEMENT OF REVENUES—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. It arises from the motion under Standing Order 43 which I presented to the House yesterday in connection with the miscalculation of revenues under the provisions of the Railway Act by the CNR. I wonder if the minister is in a position to give an explanation to the House regarding CNR's overstatement of revenues to the extent of an amount in excess of $20 million as a result of a miscalculation in the determination of subsidies received from the Canadian Transport Commission under the provisions of the Railway Act. If so, could he also indicate to the House what impact this would have on the profit and loss picture for 1976 and the profit and loss position and the revenue position in the current fiscal year, 1977?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the revenues stated by the CNR did reflect the payments which were received from the CTC. What has now been determined and reported is that the CN and the CTC joined in an error or made a common error in calculations in arriving at those figures. Subsequent to determining that, the CTC began to take action to recover the amounts out of moneys currently flowing to the CN, and I understand it has now been totally recovered.

I will be glad to get a more detailed analysis of the impact upon the financial statements if the correct figures had been used throughout the period. I understand that the impact would have been most negative in relation to years prior to 1976 rather than to that year. The over-all impact in 1977 may depend upon the action which may logically flow from the fact that in those earlier years what should have shown up as a larger deficit did not do so, and the government will have to take this into consideration.

Mr. Mazankowski: I wonder if, when the minister is looking into this matter and when he is preparing his statement, he could outline to the House precisely when the error occurred and what the amount of the error was. In light of the reference in the Hall report to the effect that there have been a number of unresolved issues between the railways and the CTC, in light of the fact that the Hall report recommends that the CTC report to the Minister of Transport on or before July 31, 1977 in connection with this whole issue and in light of events involving CN will the minister look at that recommendation and act upon it?

Mr. Lang: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am doing so. I understand that the error was an error in calculation and that some items were included twice in the over-all approach, which was not detected by the CTC. As I say, the amount has now been recovered, and I will be glad to get a more detailed statement after we have made an analysis.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

USE OF GOVERNMENT AIRCRAFT BY MINISTERS ATTENDING POLITICAL MEETINGS

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Minister without Portfolio is in Portage la Prairie today, having travelled by government jet for the purpose of attending a political meeting on behalf of the Manitoba Liberal Party, could the Acting Prime Minister tell the House if it is still government policy to allow ministers to attend political rallies at the taxpayers' expense and is it their intention that government aircraft shall now fly under the name Air Horner instead of Air Lang?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to see that my hon. friends opposite do not like to see the Minister without Portfolio in western Canada. Mr. Stewart (Marquette): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, directed to the government House leader. Can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether he was informed on the negotiations with the mediator by the Minister of Labour and can he make a progress report on the negotiations on the future of the port of Montreal?

TELEGLOBE CANADA

ALLEGED REFUSAL OF UNION REQUEST FOR ARBITRATION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications. On Thursday, June 9, my colleague the hon. member for Annapolis Valley asked certain questions relating to the industrial dispute between Teleglobe and the Canadian Overseas Telecommunications Union. Can the minister advise the House why it is, in view of the fact that the union asked for arbitration of this unfortunate dispute, that Teleglobe, which I understand reports directly to the minister, has refused to accept that procedure?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that the hon. member's information is correct in that Teleglobe has refused to see a conciliator. The union came to Ottawa yesterday and they were seen by members of my staff and the department. Before that they had seen officials of the Department of Labour who had suggested that a conciliator be brought into the dispute. Teleglobe has not indicated acceptance but I am not sure they have refused as the hon. member suggested. I will inquire about this, but I just now got the information about the meeting.

Mr. Fraser: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister could clarify the matter for the House. My information is that a request has been made by the union for arbitration, not for a conciliation officer. Could the minister confirm whether that is so and if it is, what the response of Teleglobe has been?

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, my information is that a conciliator has been suggested, not an arbitrator, but I will inquire.

REASON FOR ALLEGED REFUSAL TO BUY LEOPARD II TANK—CO-ORDINATION WITH ARMED FORCES OF WEST GERMANY AND OTHER NATO ALLIES

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the rather surprising revelation on Saturday by Mr. Leber, the West German defence minister that he had tried to sell the Leopard II to Canada and as the publication "NATO'S Fifteen Nations" indicates that the Leopard II will be ready for delivery by late 1979 and since the Leopard I's that the minister has bought will not be completely delivered until at least mid-1979, could the minister explain why he refused to buy the new advanced tank which will have a new engine, new armour and a 120 mm. gun?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, he did not try to sell me the Leopard II, he wanted to sell us the Leopard also.

An hon. Member: Who?

Mr. Danson: He seems to be very pleased that we have purchased these tanks which are available now and with which our troops are pleased. I am surprised at the delivery dates given because it is my understanding that not only will the Leopard II not be ready until perhaps the early 1980's but that their place on the delivery system would be at least the mid-1980's. Certainly there was no attempt by Herr Leber to change my mind on this issue.

Mr. McKinnon: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. There are a lot of marks on the Leopard tank but that is the first time I have heard of the "Leopard also". Has the minister read the report which appeared in the press last month that Mr. Leber said Canada and West Germany would be establishing a committee to study ways of further co-ordinating their armed forces and that a report could be expected in August? Apart from expressing regret that it was Mr. Leber and not our own minister who broke this important piece of news to the Canadian people, I should like to ask the minister what kind of coordination is involved and whether similar co-ordination is being planned with the forces of our other NATO allies?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, there are two aspects to that. One is the coordination of troops working together which has been a continuing policy not only with the troops of the Federal Republic of Germany but with United States troops and other NATO allies, so that there is inter-operability in the field. The new and significant part of our discussions related to the research, development and procurement programs so that we can organize our efforts in these fields, trying to analyze areas in advance of need so that we could have more consistent policies regarding procurement, research and development.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I did not see the hon. member for Shefford, who wants to ask a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. I now recognize him.

HALL REPORT ON RAILWAY PENSION PLANS—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE CONSIDERATION GIVEN TO RETIRED EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport regarding the Hall Report only in this instance it is the report of Dr. Noel

Hall on railway pension plans in Canada. Since referring that report to management and the unions dòes not do a solitary thing for railway workers already retired, both CNR and CPR, will the government take action to make sure those old timers are not forgotten?

● (1500)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my colleague the Minister of Labour is putting what analysis the question may require before the government. In the meantime a good number of matters referred to in the report are, by Dr. Hall's own definition, suitable for negotiation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since every reference the Minister of Labour has made to this matter has been to the effect that it is up to management and the unions, when can we have a statement as to what the government itself will do to improve the pensions of those railway workers who are already retired?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as I said, the whole question of the report is being considered. Obviously, decisions taken as a result of that consideration will be announced.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on my usual Thursday point of order, to ask the deputy government House leader what will be the business for the balance of this week and next week?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, under government orders next week on Monday, between 11 and one o'clock, and Tuesday as well, we shall consider Bill C-27, the unemployment insurance bill, to be followed by the Auditor General's bill, C-20. That ought to carry us through until next Wednesday, or even Thursday, when we might finish, if we have not already done so by then, consideration of the metric bill which hon. members opposite seem reluctant to pass.

Mr. Nowlan: Bring Jack Horner back, and we will vote on it quickly.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Horner) is being helpful to us in Manitoba today.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I thank the deputy House leader for that information. I am sure he will tell the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) when we shall deal with the metric bill next week, and we look forward to seeing him in the House.

An hon. Member: Do not reflect on a vote.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, hon. members know I never reflect on a vote but the fact is, the hon. member for Crowfoot ducked the vote. Also, could the deputy House leader designate an opposition day next week? That is to say, has he been informed of arrangements in this regard by the government House leader?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, there is no indication that there will be an opposition day next week. Usually, opposition days are announced for the following week. They are announced on this day of the week, in the usual way.

ELECTORAL READJUSTMENT

On the Order: Introduction of bills:

The President of the Treasury Board—Bill intituled: 'An Act to readjust the representation of Ontario in the House of Commons and to readjust the electoral districts in Ontario.'

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to this bill. Actually, my point of order does not concern the bill so much as the name of the person who is introducing it. I do not oppose the bill. My colleagues and I are prepared to support it, if it is along the lines indicated. My point of order is this: The responsibility for electoral boundaries belongs to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). Why, then, is this bill being introduced in the name of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras)? I realize he comes from the part of the country affected, but ministers do not have responsibility on a geographic basis. Indeed, if this is a private member's bill it should not have the status of a government bill. It ought to be in the name of the member of cabinet who is responsible for this area of public business.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The point of order the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) raised is noted. Seeing the President of the Treasury Board present in the House I rose, after calling introduction of bills, to announce the bill which stands in his name and is ready for first reading, I think. As the House has just seen, the President of the Treasury Board does not intend to introduce the bill at this time. The hon. member's point of order is well noted, and will give the Chair time, before the bill is introduced, to determine if this is an aberration or a fatal flaw in terms of administrative responsibilities.

QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following question will be answered today: 1956.

CBC'S EXPENDITURES FOR TRAVEL IN 1975 AND 1976

Question No. 1,956—Mr. Huntington:

1. What was CBC's total expenditure for travel in (a) 1975 (b) 1976?

2. For the same years, what was the total expenditure for travel with (a) Air Canada (b) Canadian Pacific Airlines (c) Canadian National Railways (d) Canadian Pacific Railway (e) other modes of transportation and, in each case, what was the total amount placed (a) directly (b) through a travel agent?

3. For the same years, what are the names of travel agencies used and, in each case, what was the gross amount?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. CBC records have not been maintained in a manner which would enable the Corporation to extract from travel records readily and without an inordinate amount of work, time and expense, the cost of transportation for CBC employees who travel on Corporation business.

2. (a), (b), (c), (d) As for the total expenditure for travel with individual transportation companies, either directly or through travel agents, it has not been customary to require the CBC to supply such details of its internal management and administration as the amounts paid to individual firms with which it has business relationships. The background to this custom is explained in detail in the reply to question No. 2,530, May 22, 1975. However, the total amounts paid directly to the transportation companies listed in the question were $948,000 in 1975 and $1,453,000 in 1976. The total amounts spent with the same companies through travel agents were $752,000 in 1975 and $1,043,000 in 1976. (e) Total amounts paid in connection with other modes of transportation were (a) $352,000 (1975), $309,000 (1976), and (b) $34,000 (1975), $71,000 (1976).

3. Montreal: Lawson Travel, N.D.G. Travel, Holiday Travel, Voyages Carina, Dorette Entreprise, Drake Travel, Planet Air, Voyages Mission, BB Travel, Globensky Inc.; Toronto: P. Lawson Travel; Ottawa: Universal Travel; St. John's: Legrows Travel, Mike Martin Travel; Quebec City: Club Automobile; Matane: Agence de Voyages Logan; Winnipeg: Atlas Lance Travel Ltd.; Windsor: Clark Travel; Vancouver: Thos. Cook, Kokanee Travel, TPY Travel Service, Bayshore Travel, Wright's Travel, B.C.A.A., Sky Trail; Frobisher Bay, N.W.T.: Holiday Travel; Yellowknife, N.W.T.: Yellowknife Travel. SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to our revised proceedings, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn)—Conflict of Interest—Knowledge of Minister of Agriculture of Senator Davey's interest in Blue Water Racing Associates Ltd.; the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay)—Conflict of Interest—Activities of Senator Davey respecting certain companies.

I might remind hon. members that as was announced earlier there will be royal assent at 5.45 and therefore the proceedings at six o'clock will be delayed a few minutes. It was felt that it was appropriate to go ahead with them even if they were delayed; hence, only two questions are listed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

PETITION TO END CONTROLS ON JUNE 30, 1977

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe) moved:

That the Anti-Inflation Act being chapter 75, Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76, as amended by chapter 98, Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76 shall expire on the 30th day of June, 1977.

He said: Mr. Speaker, our motion today is prompted by the increasing evidence that the Canadian economy continues to deteriorate at an alarming pace. Real growth is below expectations, inflation and unemployment are above expectations and our competitive position in the world has fallen, as evidenced by a $10 billion end-products trade deficit in each of the last two years, almost triple the 1971 level.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Stevens: We have been lulled into believing that debt is a substitute for real wealth. With our foreign borrowings now at $50 billion, or approximately $5,000 for each of our workers, we have become the world's greatest debtor. Unfortunately, much of this current international borrowing has been to pay for consumer goods and services, creating the illusion we are wealthier than we really are. As a nation we are not on the right course.

This government's budgetary thrusts have misfired. Forecasts have not materialized. In his May 25 budget last year the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) said, "The Canadian economy will generate more than 250,000 new jobs this year." He was referring to 1976. Yet from December, 1975 to December, 1976 only 67,000 jobs were created, a 73 per cent shortfall.

The minister stated further that "Unemployment will gradually decline as cyclical expansion takes hold." Instead, unemployment rose to a 37-year high, while United States unemployment is at a 30-month low.

Mr. Clarke: And the government will not stay to listen.

Mr. Stevens: A factor contributing to this economic malaise is the government's reluctance to drop its wage and price controls which are not only working poorly but which are deterring the formation of investment capital and the creation of jobs. I would say this to whoever might be inclined to vote against our motion and, in effect, for a continuation of controls: He or she should go down to the local unemployment offices and look squarely in the eye the people who are being condemned to further unemployment.

It is no accident that we are now experiencing the highest unemployment rate of any industrialized nation. It is not just happenstance that in each of our five eastern provinces the level of unemployment is higher than that of any state south of the border. It is due to poor economic direction on the part of this administration and its officials, including those at the Bank of Canada. It is time to stop using Canada as a test tube or guinea pig for Galbraithian theories. It is time we put an end to wage and price controls in their present form.

Against this background and with mounting evidence that wage and price controls are not working, the onus is upon the administration, and in particular upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), today, tomorrow and Monday, to justify the continuation of controls. Oddly enough, we have already heard a great deal of evidence from the Prime Minister and his ministers that in today's economic environment controls should be terminated. And there is very little evidence from the same sources that they should be continued. I intend to present some of this evidence and refer to some of those statements later in my remarks. When we compare statements made by the Prime Minister on the subject of controls with those made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) we find that over the years the Prime Minister has tended to say whatever he feels would further his own political interests, irrespective of the facts. Sometimes he has been in favour of controls, sometimes against them. But through it all he has been consistently inconsistent. The Minister of Finance has showed more candour, consistently maintaining that we should be out of controls as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker, the government's wage and price program has been nothing more than a cruel hoax on the Canadian public. Three years ago in the 1974 election, hon. members will recall that the Prime Minister was peddling a beautiful potion called "Trudeau Liberalism". On that occasion, this patent medicine-man described controls as "a disaster looking for a place to happen". Today there can be no confusion as to what controls, as instituted by the government, have and have not done. They have failed effectively to contain inflation which after 20 months is now running at an annual rate of 10.4 per cent, only 2/10ths of one per cent lower than the 10.6 per cent annual rate when controls were first applied. Even the administration admits that this year's target for inflation will not be met and has given up completely on next year's target of 4 per cent. It is becoming just another embarrassing memory.

Controls have, however, been effective in deterring real economic growth and they have stifled the creation of jobs for hundreds of thousands who are out of work. I could read into the record opinions expressed by many of our nation's leading figures, all calling for an end to controls—people like former deputy finance minister Simon Reisman or labour's Ron Lang. "Think tanks" like the Fraser Institute and the C.B. Howe Institute all believe, as we do, that the process of decontrol should begin immediately. But the most appropriate source from which to quote today is the Prime Minister. I do not believe anybody could say it any better than he did when he told a Nova Scotia audience that controls "create far more problems than they solve" or when he said "the economies which have been subjected to this straitjacket of freeze and controls have not performed better on inflation and have themselves been turning in very poor performances".

It is precisely those two effects produced by controls—marginal success in fighting inflation and stifled economic performance—which are the basis of my party's challenge to the government to begin the decontrol process, not next month, not next year, but now. I believe we should take the Prime Minister at his word when he told a St. Catharines audience that "the real way to fight inflation is not to put a straitjacket on the economy; not to throttle the worker or farmer, or the producer or the storekeeper; not to bring in a system of hocus-pocus magical solutions." I hope the Prime Minister will remember his words when he said: "If a government cannot cope with self-induced inflation it deserves to be thrown out."

The plain truth is that whatever marginal success we have had in the battle against soaring costs has been due to the competitive process in the private sector. The Minister of Finance himself made this clear in committee recently. He said, and I quote: "Indeed, prices have been held down as much by the competitive factor as by the anti-inflation program." To make the situation doubly clear, he added: "May I correct that? It was more by competitive factors than by anti-inflation programs."

In the light of the minister's admission that it is the private sector, not the Anti-Inflation Board, which is containing prices, why are we still rigidly locked into wage and price controls? Why is the government not moving quickly to dismantle a system which has created very serious distortions in our economy, distortions which are evident from the flight of investment capital to the United States and our miserable record in job creation? We on this side suspect that the Trudeau administration is playing politics with our nation's economy—that it is abdicating its responsibility for leadership and is once again fashioning another of its great misrepresentations. The government knows that now is the time to get out of controls. The Minister of Finance said in February that the economic situation "would appear to give us the green light for decontrol" and he reaffirmed this view in committee two weeks ago. The government knows this. Yet it is stalling because the Prime Minister does not know how it should be played politically. Such lack of leadership is dangerous. The government realizes that controls should be lifted. The Minister of Finance said he hopes they are lifted sooner rather than later because of the concern he feels might exist regarding distortions which could arise. In short, the government seems to be torn between economic realities and sheer political expediency.

In suggesting today that the decontrol period should commence on June 30, let me make one thing clear. We are not as hard on controls as the Prime Minister was when he chose to be against controls in 1974. We believe that controls can be used for a limited period in connection with proper fiscal restraint, monetary restraint, and above all if there is a disposition on the part of government to deregulate the economy. Such imposition of controls, however, I would emphasize, should be temporary and they must be administered in an equitable fashion. To this end, the controls must have a certainty so that they will be clear to all who wish to abide by them. They must never appear to favour one group or one sector or one person over another group, sector or person.

[Mr. Stevens.]

So far today, Mr. Speaker, I have attempted to establish that Canada's economic realities dictate that decontrol should begin on June 30. Over and above that, it is important to remember that this administration's wage and price controls program has not met the essential ingredients of an effective wage and price controls program. When the administration announced their current wage and price controls, they referred to fiscal restraint and monetary restraint. They said that there was a need to deregulate the economy. This has, in fact, not happened. There has been little restraint on the part of this government, and what restraint we have had has been unintentional.

In recent months the government has had no alternative but to be restrained, because frankly it has run out of revenue. The government's own planning is so far off course that it simply has nothing left to spend. The record budgetary deficit of $7.1 billion this year is a response not to today's problems but to yesterday's mistakes, and the restraint the government talks about is really the result of running out of revenue.

When the minister talks of breaking the inflationary psychology, I suspect he really means that he has at long last discovered the bottom of the taxpayer's pocket. No less than Gerald Bouey, governor of the Bank of Canada, has spelled out the significant role of government in causing inflation in this country. In the November 1975 Bank of Canada Review, Governor Bouey had this to say: "There is no great mystery about the nature and origins of our current economic difficulties." They are, he said, the result of the pursuit of "very expansionary monetary and fiscal policies". "The current wave of inflation", he added, "was not initiated by a marked acceleration of wage and salary increases". Nevertheless the Governor supported wage and price controls provided they were applied in tandem with a policy of monetary and fiscal restraint.

Have we had such restraint? We all know that government spending plans have jumped 28 per cent since the middle of 1975. Such government spending increases are, of course, not reflected in the consumer price index but in the nation's broader index, known as the deflator. There we find that between the third quarter of 1975 and the end of last year, government prices jumped 15.2 per cent in Canada, or about one per cent a month. Some fiscal restraint!

So far as monetary restraint is concerned, perhaps the simplest way to put it is that in September, 1975 just before controls began our banks had total Canadian assets, including Canadian deposits, of $73 billion. By March of this year those assets had exploded to $92 billion, or 25 per cent more than they were 18 months previously. That represents roughly an increase of 1.4 per cent per month. To suggest that that is monetary restraint, with real growth in this country running in the same period at something between 5 and 6 per cent, is ludicrous.

Now let me deal with government rhetoric about deregulating the economy. On October 14, 1975 the minister, when presenting the anti-inflation package, said:

> We propose to scrutinize a wide variety of government policies and programs in an effort to find ways of reducing rigidities and costs that may impose unnecessarily on various sectors of the economy.

In the 20 months which have ensued there has been no meaningful review of government spending programs or of their effect on the regulation of business. Rather than deregulate the government is in fact proposing still greater regulation of industry. In this connection I refer hon. members to two bills both coming out of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Bill C-16, which is now before a committee of this House, proposes to regulate the finance industry in certain ways. Obviously, it has been drafted by a person who does not understand the financial world, so much so that to date the minister has offered 75 amendments to the bill in committee. Yet notwithstanding that bungling, the minister admits that should the bill be passed it will require 25 additional civil servants, at a cost of $500,000, to administer this program of regulation.

The same minister has Bill C-42 before another committee, the so-called competition bill. There we find it is proposed to appoint an "economic czar" to rule on various business matters in this country. We find this project will require the hiring of 80 civil servants further to regulate the industry, at a total cost of $2 million.

I cite those two examples of further proposed regulation because it is of interest to note that when the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was established by the former minister of the department, John Turner, in 1968, he pointed out that the net cost of the department was $2 million and that he did not anticipate this expenditure would rise. Today, we find it has blossomed into a department employing 3,027 civil servants and has a net budget of $61 million. In those few years, Mr. Speaker, the budget has grown from a net of $2 million to $61 million. Where is the deregulation which the government has said is part of its anti-inflation program?

I have cited the example of one department, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs; I could cite many others. I could go through department by department and show the constant intrusion into the business affairs of Canadians which this governent insists upon. This can be seen in the growth of the Anti-Inflation Board itself. It has grown four and a half times from its original size and now costs the taxpayers of Canada $12 million in salaries alone.

Ending the Anti-Inflation Board would be one step, in our opinion, in restoring competition in our economy, in restoring meaningful collective bargaining, in restoring the proper balance between the public and the private sectors. Incidentally, the private sector is the source of wealth and the wellhead of jobs for most people in Canada. The ending of the AIB would also be one step in the deregulation of our economy and the restoring of confidence in the business community of Canada today.

Having said that, I emphasize that our position with respect to the motion today has been consistent. In October, 1975 when the government first proposed the anti-inflation legislation which we are now considering we made it clear that we felt its timing was wrong but that we would go along with the government if it would assure us that the program would be for a relatively short period of time, and in any event for not longer than 18 months. They refused to give us that assurance which caused us to vote against the legislation at every stage. We were frightened they were proposing to bring in controls for a relatively lengthy period of time in Canada. We originally supported 18 months, and now it is 20 months. All the evidence suggests that the country would be better off without the controls in their present form. The experiment is over, if you like, and it is time for the government to retreat from their intervention in the marketplace. The experiment has failed.

As I have said, if you have controls, then the essence of the program must be one which the people feel is equitable. They must feel it applies to the rich, the poor, businessmen, the worker, the farmer and the processor. This program has never had that general confidence which is needed to make a wage and price control program work properly. This program is not a control program. If you analyse it, it is rather like a loose-fitting lid which tends to perpetuate inflation, as much as it tends to control inflation.

In the United States, which has no controls, inflation is currently running at 6.8 per cent. We in Canada face inflation of 7.8 per cent. How could it be otherwise? Once the government suggests that everybody is entitled to an 8 per cent or a 6 per cent increase, plus 2 per cent for productivity and 2 per cent for catch-up—a total increase of 10 per cent or 12 per cent—you have given the negotiators an excuse to say they will accept the 10 per cent or 12 per cent, and then the haggling begins as to how much over those two levels the negotiators can extract from the others. Rather than settling a ceiling, the guidelines have become the floor for such settlements. In this context it may be more appropriate to say that the initials AIB stand for assured inflation base.

Not only is the controls program indefinite in its application, but there are glaring exceptions to the rules. The minister's own economic review, on page 30, vividly outlines the distortions which can be institutionalized in a program of this type. For example, we find that dentists received fees and incomes more than 19 per cent higher than their base periods. Despite the AIB guidelines limiting the increases to $2,400 a year, these and other professionals earned as much as $6,940 more in the reporting period than they did in the year before, almost three times the stated guidelines which others are asked to abide by. On the whole, professional incomes in all categories increased by 12 per cent or $4,890 which was twice the permitted level. The government says that this excessive income is due to the overlap in reporting periods, fiscal year ends and they may have worked harder. It may be, but the minister should tell that to the labourer who has been denied a 50 cent hourly raise on a $4 wage base. Tell that to the man who knows instinctively that AIB can put a much stronger bite on his salary than on the salaries of his dentist, lawyer or doctor. Try to explain to him why he has been singled out to bear the brunt of the fight against inflation when he reads in the papers that the salary of the vice-president of one aluminium company jumped from $147,000 to $162,000 in the first year of the wage and price control program, or that an oil company executive received a $30,000 salary increase in the first year of the program.

Mr. Broadbent: You are going to make me cry.

Mr. Stevens: Try to explain to that man that the pensions of several top executives have risen from $40,000 to $60,000 a year, contrary to the whole spirit of the anti-inflation program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Tell that to a man who is making an hourly wage of $4 and is being denied a 50 cent an hour increase.

Mr. Broadbent: Shame on you for voting for it.

Mr. Stevens: I believe those are some of the inequities which call for this program to be ended soon, namely June 30.

Another point I should like to touch on is the approach of government to their own spending increases. I have referred to salary increases, but it is also important to note what has happened to postal rates which went up 50 per cent. People have written to me, and I presume to other members of this House, concerning the 50 per cent postal rate and how it is justified. They have been told by the government that it is because we are losing too much money and our expenditures have gone up. What businessman could not say his expenditures have gone up if he was guaranteed a price hike of 50 per cent, if he felt that is all it would take to get that new price increase? The reasons for these astronomical increases may be justified, but I ask the government to consider the unmeasured cost of such disillusionment in our entire system. Think of the bitterness which will continue to grow when people sense the distortions being created by this AIB program. Whatever reasons or elaborate justifications the government can give for their own spending hikes or executive salary hikes, the man denied the 50 cent hourly increase will remember that the salaries of 29 top officers of Bell Canada will average $102,000 in 1977, an increase of $13,000 each over 1976.

There are distortions in the government's own spending programs. An example of that is user-pay. I see the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is present in the House. This is a favourite concept which he likes to espouse with respect to covering the deficits which have been run up mainly at Mirabel and in the Toronto airport situation.

I should like to cite one perhaps vivid example of the government practising anything but restraint, in spite of talking about restraint. I refer to the Bank of Canada's own Hall of Mirrors. How can we have faith in the federal government's so-called restraint when the Bank of Canada continues to build the most luxurious central head office that there will be anywhere in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: The cost of this new Palace of Versailles, this new temple to the bureaucracy—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) on a point of order.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I realize there is a difficulty with respect to the rules; but if it would be agreeable to the House, I would ask that the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) be allowed 40 minutes and that the other lead speakers in each of the parties also be allowed to proceed for a period of 40 minutes, and perhaps thereafter the speakers be limited to 30 minute speeches. In advancing this proposition, I hope it will be acceptable to the leader of the government on this occasion and the other leaders of the House.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That certainly suits me, Mr. Speaker. I take it the hon. member means the three opposition parties and the government spokesman.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is right, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this makes sense and we hope the House will agree to it.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): We agree to the proposal, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is there unanimous consent that the first speaker for each party will speak for 40 minutes and all other speakers 30 minutes?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is so ordered.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I thank the members of the House for their co-operation. I will attempt to be reasonably brief. I was referring to what I feel is a rather lavish demonstration of lack of restraint in the continuing construction of the Bank of Canada building on Wellington Street. The last estimate of the cost of that building which we had about a year ago was $55 million. We are currently trying to get new estimates. Apparently spending increases have been so unexpected that we cannot get a current accurate estimate of the total cost of that building.

I am simply saying that in the name of restraint, if nothing else is a symbol of restraint, I would have expected the government to have pulled back on the building of such a lavish financial building as is being built on Wellington Street. In fact, even at $55 million it means that the balance sheet value of the total real estate holdings of the Bank of Canada all across Canada is almost doubled by the cost of that one building.

Before coming to our proposals as to what should happen on June 30, I wish to briefly comment on what we fear may happen if the government continues with their present plan. We have been told by the Minister of Finance that he will announce before August a decontrol date. If you read the green paper, it is fairly clear that the program the government favours as far as decontrols are concerned is the so-called first-in first-out approach. In effect, that means corporations will be decontrolled in accordance with their fiscal year ends and labour contracts will be decontrolled at the date of their expiration.

I believe that if the government were pressed today, we would find that it was their current intention to announce a decontrol date as of January 1. When you think of it, that is a rather clever approach. Seventy per cent of the corporations have their year-end on December 31. This means that 70 per cent of the corporations in Canada will remain controlled until December 31, 1978. Fifty per cent of the labour contracts mature in the final quarter of the year. That means that 50 per cent of those contracts would be caught until virtually the end of 1978. That is one reason why we are pressing this motion today. We believe it is too long a period of time to be tying up the corporate side and the labour side of this country with the disjointed controls program that we now have.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: We realize that there is apprehension among some, that when the present control program is ended and when decontrols become effective, there could be a flare-up with respect to either prices or wage settlements. We do not believe that will happen. However, we believe some mechanism should be put in place to ensure that there will be a minimum risk of that type of bubble flare-up or call it what you wish. To that end, we suggest with the dismantling of the present controls program on June 30 it should be understood that the rulings of the AIB or the administrator will continue to have effect for the term to which they apply. That is the first thing.

Second, we believe that price and wage developments from then on could be monitored by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I have already indicated that they have a staff of some 3,000. Surely they would not have to add to their staff. That monitoring should ensure that if there are excessive price increases or wage settlements, public attention will be drawn to them.

We would suggest also that for the first six to 12 month period following decontrol day the largest corporations, the top 200 which represent approximately 54 per cent of the total production in this country, should be monitored by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In addition, there should be a 30 day advance notice given with respect to any price increase by those companies.

Likewise for the six to 12 months following decontrol day, June 30, we feel that unions representing workers in those largest corporations should be subject to a 30 day delay after settlement before the contract becomes effective. We feel this would allow for a public review of whatever the price or wage settlement might be. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) would then be able to draw public attention to anything he thought was excessive. If necessary, we suggest he should make a reference to the cabinet and, if necessary, the cabinet should accept the responsibility of rolling back either the price or wage settlement if they thought it was unduly excessive.

We emphasize that we believe this mechanism will at least ensure that there will not be the explosion in prices or wages that some fear, but which we do not fear, will occur after decontrols begin. However, should there be some kind of explosion, I believe it is right for the government to reserve the ultimate weapon of wage and price controls.

If for some reason the marketplace that has worked well in this country, certainly for decades, does not in the future work as well, government can reserve the right to impose wage and price controls at least for a temporary period. However, we believe that period is long gone as far as existing controls are concerned and they should be ended. We are stating the caution, if you like, that such a wage and price control program could be reimposed. That is the ultimate weapon the government should hold in order to ensure that there will not be unfair price or wage increases during the decontrol period.

That is our position. We urge hon. members to support the motion now before the House. We believe that with such a decontrol program, with meaningful fiscal restraint, monetary restraint and more deregulation rather than further regulation of Canadian industry that we can restore this country to a real growth of five or six per cent per year with a minimum of inflation and a minimum of unemployment. Canadians deserve it.

This can be one of the wealthiest nations in the world on a per capita basis. We as a nation, a government and a parliament must accept the challenge of delivering the real wealth that Canadians should have, not detracting from it as has happened to date.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I cannot resist beginning my remarks today without commenting—

Some hon. Members: Try.

Mr. Broadbent: My friends to my right have guessed the preamble. As I said, I cannot resist beginning my remarks without commenting on the virtual Alice in Wonderland atmosphere that has set the stage for this afternoon's debate. Notwithstanding the remarkable dialectical processes of the mind that we just saw displayed by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), the financial spokesman for the Conservative Party, the very system of wage and price controls we are now questioning as a result of the motion brought before the House by the Official Opposition was first introduced by the Conservative Party during the 1974 election.

Mr. Fraser: That is not intellectually honest.

Mr. Broadbent: The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), an esteemed—and I mean that most sincerely—and honourable leader, as leader of his party at that time lost the election to the Liberals in 1974 on precisely this issue when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stumped the country swearing to the heavens that his government would never introduce so perverse a piece of legislation. My party, the only party I would suggest by its very nature committed to a planned and controlled economy, opposed this Conservative aberration because we saw it, in our judgment in any case, as being both unfair and unworkable.

An hon. Member: What controls would you have?

Mr. Broadbent: I will come to that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby has the floor. We have three days in which to complete this debate and everyone will get his turn.

Mr. Broadbent: My colleagues, literally and figuratively to the right, are a little sensitive on the issue. As I was saying, this program was first advocated by the Conservatives in 1974 and attacked by the Liberals in the same election campaign. After that election, as we all know, with the deftness and shiftiness worthy of Mackenzie King, the present Prime Minister introduced the Tory set of wage and price controls which he had so successfully campaigned against. The NDP continued its opposition because the Conservative system as proposed remained equally unfair and unworkable when implemented by the Liberals.

I was interested to hear the speech of the hon. member who preceded me. Like the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), the Tories, whether in the House or out of it, are never quite sure in what corner they belong. At one stage they voted for these controls, and at another they opposed them. I take it that the position just outlined by the Conservative Party will last at least 48 hours. They are now opposed to the controls. However, having said that, the plum for sheer and utter political opportunism, the credit for reaching new heights in this kind of political activity, has to go the Prime Minister and the Liberal Party.

Mr. Stanfield: No question about that.

Mr. Broadbent: As the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) said, there is no question about that. When it comes to duplicity, no political party in the country, living or dead, can compete with the Liberal Party.

An hon. Member: Some dead ones can.

Mr. Broadbent: Having said that as a polite preamble, I think it is important to underline that the majority of Canadians, both among organized and unorganized workers, despite the present inequity and distortions of the anti-inflation program, are prepared to support some form of incomes policy. I do not think there is any doubt about that at all. But they want a fair program, not one which largely ignores prices and profits while permitting executives to get a $60,000 a year increase. Surely it must now be evident, even to the present government, that in the Canadian case—and that is the one we are talking about—salaries and wages were not the cause of the rampant inflation which led to the imposition of these controls in the fall of 1975. The evidence before 1975 clearly demonstrates this, and since that time inflation continues, while wages are the only element or our economy that is effectively controlled.

The AIB states that inflation will average over 7 per cent this year. Indeed, for the last four months inflation has increased at a rate exceeding 10 per cent. Who knows if it is going to stay at the 7 per cent level. There is very good reason to believe that the 10 per cent experience of the past few months can remain the common experience throughout the rest of this year. Food, oil and mortgage prices either remain high or continue to rocket upward. The real purchasing power of Canadian farmers is lower today than it was five years ago. These are the affects of the controls. Through the entire control period, when food is excluded from the consumer price index, the rate of inflation for every other element than food has continued to rise between 9 per cent and 11 per cent. In short, the program has simply not worked in terms of curtailing price increases. Canadian workers, I add immediately, have paid the price not once but twice over with this set of controls. Their incomes have been held down while the prices they pay increase. Any way you work the equation, ordinary Canadians, whether they are in the east or in the west or in southern Ontario, have been unfairly treated by this program.

Without spending much time today enumerating the many obvious inequities that are so evident in the program currently in place, I simply remind the House of the example I raised with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) in the question period yesterday. I refer, of course, to the executive salary increases which, as I just indicated, are permitted to rise at the rate of $60,000 a year while ordinary Canadians, more than two million of whom live at the poverty level, are restricted to increases that cannot exceed $2,400. Such is the rough justice bestowed on the people of Canada by the Minister of Finance. Indeed, Canadians would have been unaware of the increases had I not drawn them to the attention of the Minister of Finance yesterday—our House leader referred a similar batch to the government's attention not long ago. Also, the Canadian people would not be aware of these horrendous increases had it not been for the American Securities and Exchange Commission which files reports on their firms' operations here in our country. Incredible? While incredible for normal people, it is not at all incredible in terms of the way the Liberal Party has governed this country.

The other example of unfairness, besides the obvious one in terms of salaries and wages, is the added penalty that Canadian women in particular have had to pay with this program, despite the platitudinous statements and provisions in the AIB regulations which permit increases designated to eliminate discriminatory pay practices. The board, in its first test on this question, shamelessly rolled back just such an award for Canadian women in the case of the Winnipeg Health Sciences Centre—surely a disgusting example of unfairness. The board not only ignores workers and women's rights, but has also ignored its own published regulations.

As I said, I see no great need this afternoon to detail the program of obvious inequities. Rather we in the NDP feel it a responsibility upon us, in opposing this set of controls, this unfair AIB program, to provide some counter suggestions as to what should be put in its place. Despite the collective desire of the majority of Canadians to support government action in implementing an effective and fair form of incomes policy, this government in its green paper has clearly chosen to return to the status quo, to return to the same so-called free market system which has repeatedly led to either rampant inflation or unacceptable unemployment or, as the present situation sadly illustrates, to both high unemployment and high inflation.

When this government says, and I quote, "The market system is an efficient mechanism for allocating resources and it has great advantages in terms of the freedom of choice and scope for initiative that it offers," it is either being dishonest or, probably, hopelessly foolish. To claim that a forum for consultative action is going to change Canada's economic system one iota—as does the green paper—has the same truth value as the claim that inflation has been wrestled to the ground, or that separatism as a political movement in Quebec is dead. These are two equally "profound" observations which have been made by this government in the past.

It is important to note at this point in my argument that our economic system, in its essentials—I want to stress that—has remained unaltered by the controls. This controls program simply made a bad economic situation worse. It is clear both from the reiterated faith in the free market of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the green paper that the government plans simply to return to that status quo, as I said. But what is that status quo which in its essentials before the controls program, and after, has remained the same? Under controls, investment and pricing decisions are still made by the same people and largely in the same manner.

Under controls, unemployment continues to worsen and our national income remains grossly maldistributed. The situation has become marginally worse. Under controls, regional disparities still tear at the fabric of the nation and many of our natural resources continue to be misallocated, if they are not exported out of the country entirely. In short, Canadians find themselves in basically the same unfair economic circumstances today with these controls as they did without them. The prime difference is that with the controls the rhetoric justifying inequality has become even more hypocritical and offensive. My guess is that Canadians, at long last, have acquired a very healthy skepticism concerning the Prime Minister's shifting concepts of society. In 1968, we all remember with chagrin the "just society". Then we were launched on the search for the Prime Minister's new society. Before we could locate that, we were reintroduced to Mackenzie King's middle society in the throne speech. With the green paper, we will now return to the status quo. Such is the dialectical process of Canadian liberalism.

Mr. Fraser: Why did you support them? Why did you keep them alive for two years?

Mr. Broadbent: I remind the hon. member that it was his party, not ours, which supported controls.

Mr. Fraser: You supported the Liberal party. You could have destroyed it.

Mr. Broadbent: Perceiving business unrest, and talk of a new society by the Prime Minister, the government sounded a thorough-going retreat from government planning by asserting its intention to allow free market forces to once again guide our economic destiny. Whether the Liberals can reassure the business community by retreating from suggestions of economic decision-making by the government remains to be seen. What is clear, however, is that the majority of Canadians want positive economic reform and positive economic leadership on the part of their governments. They want solutions, particularly to rampant inflation and to disturbing and sad unemployment. Our history clearly demonstrates that the so-called free market forces—contrary to what the Prime Minister has said, and contrary to what has been argued in the House this afternoon—have not, and cannot, solve Canada's economic difficulties. This wisdom has been learned even by middle-of-the-road parties all over the western world, except by such parties here in Canada.

Such forces, the so-called free market forces, will continue to fail in the future as they have failed in the past, and the Conservative promise of returning trust and confidence to a government where leadership will replace controls should be seen for what it is, a political assertion that a Conservative government would have precisely the same faith in free market forces as do the Liberals. The Conservative rhetoric differs; the substance, however, remains the same. The speech we heard from the Conservative party this afternoon confirms that in every detail.

Having made those observations, I want now to outline the New Democratic Party alternatives to our economic condition. In doing so, I want to make a couple of preliminary, straightforward and honest comments about the nature of inflation in Canada. First, because of the deep intermingling of our economy with that of the United States, much of our inflation in this country—I am tempted to say, most of it—is beyond our control. We trade in it by necessity, import it by proximity, and pay for it as the price of maintaining throughout our years a branch plant 17°conomy. Pretending to control inflation of this sort is to deny our existence, to deny our geography and to deny our past entrepreneurial inadequacies. It is simply to be dishonest to claim we can control that kind of inflation which we import.

The second point I want to make is that if we are to contend seriously and honestly with the effects of inflation, our government can, and should, provide some cushioning by ensuring that those unable to cope with inflation can at least be compensated. In this connection I think particularly of those unfortunate Canadians living on welfare, and our pensioners. Most important of all are the steps the government can take to ensure that the Canadian economy is strong, resilient and able to continue functioning at full capacity without reflecting every twitch of the Dow Jones index on the New York stock exchange.

It is the position of the New Democratic Party that we should be looking to the establishment of a national incomes policy in the very near future. I want to stress in this context that a consciously pursued national incomes policy is inextricably linked with economic planning, as virtually every government in western Europe has discovered and, indeed, as the government of Japan has discovered. We cannot isolate ourselves from the rest of the world; but we can insulate our economy and make it more equitable with permanent economic planning at the national level. The national debate we should be having here this afternoon is one that should focus upon requesting the government of the day to take the lead in establishing the means by which Canadians can consciously seek to establish national planning and implement an effective incomes policy.

The fact is that we already have planning, we already have a controls system in the country, and they both work in a most haphazard and inequitable fashion shaped by a corporate dominated market economy. That is not simply left-wing political rhetoric; it is an economic description of the facts.

Mr. Fraser: It is simple left-wing rhetoric.

Mr. Broadbent: I wish the hon. member would read a few elementary economics textbooks. Even right-wing textbooks acknowledge these elementary facts. They draw different conclusions, but they acknowledge the facts. The Conservatives obviously are not even up to the task of recognizing facts. The purpose of a national incomes policy, in our view, should be to determine consciously how large the national income will be, at what rate it will increase and how, and in what proportion, it should be shared out to the various sectors of the economy. That is what it should all be about. That is what has been done in other countries.

Mr. Fraser: Have you ever been to Poland?

Mr. Broadbent: The Polish joke which was just made does not even merit comment. As I said, Mr. Speaker, no elaborate bureaucracy is required to implement the program. The mechanisms by which such a policy could be determined already exist in many government institutions. Every tax change or tax concession, each new tariff, a major subsidy or new transfer payment, every government decision affecting a commodity like oil, is part of an incomes policy. Change any of these elements and you change the size of the income, the rate of growth and the way it is shared among the people of Canada.

As I have said, the question before us, then, is not whether we should have planning and an incomes policy, but what kind of planning and incomes policy we should have, and who should do the planning. The NDP, from its inception, has believed in the necessity of national planning in the economy. To assume that market forces would inherently achieve the common good is to believe that in a stampede mice need have no fear of elephants. It is as simple as that.

For the New Democratic Party there are three main ingredients in determining such a long-term policy in Canada. The first is the subject of investment allocation. Investment allocation obviously affects inflation and unemployment, as well as the rate and kinds of incomes growth in regions and for individuals. It is essential, therefore, that the national government play a leading role in investment policy. I reject the approach taken by the Conservative spokesman who categorically rejected government involvement in this regard.

I want to stress and to make clear that we do not want a cumbersome, inefficient, stultifying, centralized bureaucracy making all of our economic decisions. That is not how it works. While recognizing the authority and propriety of the national government to take decisive action in the economy for the public good, what is required is simply a planning authority in the Department of Finance. Such an authority, under government control, would interact with the private sector to ensure entrepreneurial efficiency and decentralized decision-making. Simply stated, what we require in Canada is a new national instrument to effect investment timing and priorities of the kind which have worked with great success for a number of years in Sweden. It would work in the following manner—

An hon. Member: You sound like Ed Schreyer.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, Conservatives have difficulty learning not only from books, but from other countries. Under such a proposal, each major firm would be required to deposit a portion of its profits in special firm-specific accounts with the government. Firms could spend the moneys in these accounts only at the times and for the purposes approved by the government. Thus, the government would not assume direct control over these funds. What is important is that it would have a significant means to directly influence the timing and direction of private sector investments. This is essential if we are to deal seriously with the inflation and unemployment which flow automatically from a market economy. I am talking about direct intervention in a mixed economy to reach the goals that the majority of the people desire—minimum levels of inflation and maximum levels of employment. That is how it can work.

Funds would be accumulated in periods of full employment and excess demand. They would be released in recessionary periods, to state the obvious. Thus, the cyclical nature and impact of the market economy could be significantly changed. Investment in regions of high unemployment would be given preference. Investment in housing would be encouraged. Investment in inventories could also be allowed in periods of slack demand. The business sector would accept that. In short, inflation and unemployment could be dealt with from within the framework of a set of national priorities established by the national government. I repeat, in countries like Sweden we have seen this investment system work, and work well, both for the majority of the people and for the industry in the country. To a considerable degree, the private sector in Sweden supports and maintains precisely this kind of economic planning because they know it leads to an efficient, productive economy. It is time we tried it here.

The other two elements for the NDP in determining a Canadian planning and incomes policy are to be found in employment and taxation programs. Today, both are high among the pressing issues of Canadian politics. We have a tragic unemployment problem and, with our existing tax laws, a hidden welfare system for the rich. I want to show how both are relevant to an incomes policy and to dealing in a serious way with a post-control society. By dealing with the unemployment problem, and by replacing the welfare system for the rich with a policy of taxation reform, we would be taking the necessary first steps toward a national incomes policy. The human consequence of unemployment is clear to all who want to look at the problem. I have no intention of repeating in today's debate the points I have made on other occasions about the human degradation that is involved when we have a system that allows 1½ million Canadians to remain unemployed.

Apart from the human condition, the government has deflected our attention from the serious economic consequences of the unemployment problem in part by creating the economic myth that high rates of unemployment are inevitable and, therefore, the loss must be written off. The West Germans have not written them off, and the Japanese have not written them off. Only according to the Canadian government is high unemployment inevitable. We have been ignoring the fact that more than one million Canadians are not producing goods and services, nor are they receiving adequate incomes, and we have been ignoring the economic implications of this. Canada's unemployed are poorer for lack of work, poorer for lack of dignity that comes from work; so are we economically poorer as a nation because of this high level of unemployment.

The Liberals took from social democracy the idea and philosophy that our unemployed needed care; and I give the government credit for establishing a good unemployment insurance scheme. But, Mr. Speaker, they have ignored the even more basic social democratic requirement, namely, that we need an economic program of full employment. Social democrats in this country and elsewhere have always maintained that a fully employed, fully productive economy is a prerequisite of social and economic justice as a whole. You cannot have one without the other, in our view.

After 19 months of unemployment at rates over 7 per cent, the government can no longer hide the terrible drain on the economy—$6 billion annually in lost production of goods and services, $2 billion annually in unemployment insurance and welfare costs, and at least $1 billion in lost tax revenue. This level of unemployment and this lost production of goods and services has a direct and negative effect on levels of inflation. That is the point I want to make this afternoon. I have already put before parliament in this session detailed proposals for setting targets and timetables to achieve full employment over a three-year or four-year period. It cannot be done in a month. It cannot be done in a year or two. To achieve full employment would take three or four years. We have made serious suggestions on how to achieve this objective.

The point I am making now is that there is a connection between increased production of goods and services, and inflation. The higher the production, the greater the likelihood of prices going down. More jobs, in short, with planning and other measures lead to less inflation. The other important element in sensible national planning that I want to talk about this afternoon is tax policy. Central to any incomes policy is a country's tax law. Our income tax system is in greater need of overhaul today than it was ten years ago when the Carter commission called for major reforms. The tax reform called for at that time has not only been ignored but has been reversed in application.

Corporate tax concessions unrelated to any specific economic benefit have continued in recent years in spite of criticism not only from those who believe in fairness but from those who believe in economic efficiency. I remind the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) this his predecessor commissioned his department to do a study. It concluded that special corporate tax concessions this government had introduced had not led to any positive net economic benefit for Canada. Social democratic governments of western Europe believe in a private sector, as does the New Democratic Party. But those governments do not give away billions of dollars to corporations as do the Canadian Liberals. A corporate tax concession in Sweden or West Germany depends on specific economic benefits. We need that system in Canada today.

The even more disturbing tax development of recent years is the extension of unjustified loopholes to personal income. This development has directly affected our ability to obtain support for an incomes policy. Every loophole, dodge or deferral accountants can think of has been written into the personal tax system, with the result that more than $6.4 billion is lost to the federal treasury every year, according to the National Welfare Council whose report published not long ago spells out in horrible detail how this system works. The report noted some 17 varieties of tax exemption open to and used by the rich in Canada.

Mr. Breau: They are not loopholes.

Mr. Broadbent: Our tax system is regressive, not progressive. I urge the hon. member opposite to read the report.

Mr. Breau: I have read it.

Mr. Broadbent: I want to stress something in this debate. I am talking about tax reform, not simply because we need to end inequities in our system which have been with us for a long time, but because we must make our tax system fair and so make it an important foundation for an incomes policy. In my view, major tax reform is the first essential step to effecting improvements in collective bargaining in Canada. There is not a trade union in this country which would not welcome a reduction of the pressure-cooker atmosphere in which every round of bargaining is conducted at present. Union members would demand less wages if we had a fair and progressive tax system and the prospect of real growth in their income. The evidence in other countries shows that the idea works there. I am sure it would work here.

Canada can look forward to a stronger, more just economy in future only if we are prepared to acknowledge the need for the government to set national priorities which the majority of Canadians consider fair. If Canadian workers see fair taxes, lower mortgage rates and controlled energy prices, as they have them in other countries, they will co-operate with the government on an incomes policy. Unless the government embarks on the kind of planning I have suggested, in principle if not in detail, after our present controls come off we shall see a return in this country of the free market system which created precisely the difficulties from which we are trying to extricate ourselves.

Unless the government plans as I suggest, we shall revert to the boom and bust cycle which has plagued not only our market economy but that of every other developed country of the world. It will happen if the Liberals want to go back to those conditions. Let them not think they can deal with unemployment for a couple of years, drop that issue, deal with inflation for another couple of years, and so on, ad infinitum, ad nauseam; for I tell the Minister of Finance the people of Canada are tired of it. I say, on behalf of my party, a mixed economy can be made to work. We can deal with both unemployment and inflation simultaneously, as other countries have. But we cannot do it by burying our heads in the outdated thinking of the past, by allowing an unregulated economy to create problems for us in the future as it has in the past. We need sensible, tough-minded government planning. That is precisely what we say should take the place of the present controls.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the added opportunity to rise this afternoon, on behalf of my constituents in Richmond, to comment on the motion before us and the current government's anti-inflation program. Since the government launched that program, the economic situation of Canadians has remained on the same general course, that is on a steady decline. We will be told today, tomorrow and Monday that such unencouraging results are due to global economic conditions, that things are not so bad as the opposition would have it, that a five, ten or fifteen per cent increase in food costs is not too much because things would be worse had we not the Anti-Inflation Act.

The government side certainly will use the same statistics we have on this subject, but both sides will be making totally opposite points. We suggest that those figures, including those referred to by the sponsor of the motion, clearly point to the dangerous path Canada has been following. The government in turn will use the same figures to indicate how lucky we are to get away at such little cost. Inflation certainly is bad in itself, but we must be weary of the opposite pitfall, letting things worsen by importing or letting big or multinational corporations import cheaper products from abroad, which would be importing unemployment. This would not abate inflation because the importing monopoly that buys cheaper abroad increases its profits rather than passing the saving on to the Canadian consumer.

So the one making the profit is the importer who can do as he pleases. I think the controls that were set up under the Anti-Inflation Act did not entirely manage to control importations. Here, I am placing myself in the boots of a guy in Richmond, for example, who will be asking himself when he reads about us—because we will be read tomorrow or this afternoon—if we really thought about him. I am wondering what the guy who was just laid off at Duchesse Shoe in Richmond, for example, is thinking, what the guy who was just laid off or is about to be laid off at Brown Shoe Co. (Canada) Ltd. in Richmond is thinking? I am wondering also what the copper mine worker in Stratford thinks of the effect of that anti-inflation law when there was an attempt to control the price of the metal. It was so much controlled that over 360 miners were laid off in the past year and a half. What was done to help them? Absolutely nothing, apart from giving a little bit of money to those who went to Canada Manpower Centres so they could move where there is another mine. Those 40 years of age and over were allowed to have a little unemployment under certain conditions, namely, that they report to two or three employers a week and be always asked the same question—are you looking for work?

Mr. Speaker, I think that all those questions are negative and do not lead anywhere. If the Anti-Inflation Act as set up by this government did not give better results, then it must absolutely be abolished. That Anti-Inflation Act must be repealed as soon as possible. In any case, we did not apply it to those who lend money, such as banks, to those who are already too rich. Banks are now richer than they ever were. They are making more money than they ever did. Money lenders before 1969 were getting 5½ per cent interest on first mortgages. That is the ordinary money lender. Last year, the same lender was getting 12½ per cent on first mortages for 75 per cent assessment, meaning he was lending 75 per cent of the actual value at 12½ per cent. That Anti-Inflation Act did not affect him at all. It affected the worker, of course, but it did not affect trusts at all.

Here I want to be direct, but not too harsh, because there is no point in it. I think suggestions must be constructive. I find that perhaps the Anti-Inflation Act affected dividends, perhaps certain areas of the stock market but did not go far enough as far as those who profit from little people, particularly little people who are exploited in an extraordinary way by any inflation, as the hon. member who spoke before me, the leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent), suggested earlier. I think the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) also said the same thing. I think there is an attempt to extend the market to form some sort of common import-export market without being too sharp on those controls. So they say that if we let footwear from Taiwan or elsewhere into Canada it is because that imported footwear costs 32, 33, 35 per cent less than the same footwear manufactured in this country. We are going to get it cheaper. That is wrong, wrong! As consumers we just have to go in any store—which I refrain from naming not to give them free advertising—in big anonymous chain stores which are the prime importers of footwear import in Canada and we will realize that shoes are becoming ever more expensive. Let us see what we were paying three years ago. For a pair of shoes manufactured outside this country and which comes from Taiwan, Japan, Czechoslovakia or elsewhere, and I have bills to prove it, we had to pay $33 and a few cents. Today that same pair of shoes imported from the very same places costs $54 in big chain stores. The government lets footwear enter the country in a flood as if there were no controls at all. It controls inflation because it is risky but it does not control the profits of the guy of the anonymous trust which makes a place for himself and against everybody. We dare not touch him.

An hon. Member: That one is not in the boat!

Mr. Beaudoin: He is not in the boat of course! He is being controlled in a strange manner; perhaps he can be controlled by taxing profits. If it is a multinational corporation, it is very well controlled because one area of its activities is controlled, mostly if it goes through two or three countries before getting there: I will prove it to you in a few moments.

I should like to point out that subject to the House because that legislation affected everybody. Above all, there is one area which was not affected. The government made a large contribution to help the textile industry through that Anti-dumping Act and others—and it gets my admiration for that—because that was not an act but a regulation: that was a dumping measure.

The government took positive action, and again today one minister stood up to talk about that matter. I think that in textiles, in Quebec at least, things are improving and I commend the government for it. But in the shoe industry things have been going very badly for the last six or seven years. More specifically, June 4, 1970, as reported on page 7711 of Hansard, I was asking for the adjournment of the House precisely because the shoe industry was in dire straits. Mr. Speaker refused that motion because, though the matter was very important, it was not that urgent, and I quote:

> The problem brought up by the hon. member for Richmond is certainly of national importance and worries several of his colleagues as well who have already shown, by means of repeated representations during the last weeks and months, that they are equally interested in this matter.
> However, it seems to me that this very important problem drawn to our attention by the hon. member for Richmond does not have the urgency and immediacy required under Standing Order 26.
> With the hon. member for Richmond and his colleagues, we must admit it is a problem national in scope, but it is important that a matter brought up under the provisions of Standing Order 26. . .

. . .and so on, be of a new, urgent and sudden nature. The Chair was perfectly right, it was not a matter of sudden urgency, the footwear manufacturing industry had been in a poor situation for such a long time.

> Under the circumstances, while acknowledging again the immediate and national importance of the problem raised by the hon. member, I respectfully suggest to him that it is not possible today to propose a motion asking for the adjournment of the House to discuss the problem which he pointed out.

Therefore, I followed the advice of the Chair and brought this matter up again and again during the next days and months.

On June 16, 1970, I asked under Standing Order 43 that a debate be held on the matter, but it was not allowed by a few members of the House. If I may I would like to quote an excerpt of my intervention as reported on page 8154 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I feel that the study of the question justifies an emergency debate considering that since January 1, 1970 shoe factories have been closing down at the fantastic rate of nearly one a week and, considering that between 1956 and 1969, Canada's footwear production has decreased by 1 per cent whereas imports have jumped by 568 per cent, considering that the industry now employs 3,260 fewer workers than in 1966 and considering also that the government seems to have lost control of footwear imports into Canada.

And I added:

> On June 2, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) announced to the House that talks were under way about restrictions of footwear imports and I believe the same measure is urgently needed regarding the footwear industry.

As can be found at page 9009 of Hansard for November 13, 1975, I continued in that sense. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up the time of the House with this, but I find that we have to repeat the same things over and over again in here, without any benefit for the producers or the workers in the shoe industry; that is unbelievable. That is why I want to say to hon. members that I know they are in good faith. But, again, this good faith should be continued and stressed in this matter. As recorded in Hansard at page 9009, I moved another motion requesting the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson), to do something urgently before it was too late, and as can be expected, my motion was once again rejected.

On November 24, 1975, I outlined once more the real situation in that industry in Canada. As usual the government answered that it was taking the matter into serious consideration. And I want to quote the words used by the then parliamentary secretary to the minister of industry, trade and commerce, a Liberal member sitting opposite me, and I quote:

> In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to note that while this sectorial strategy applied only to the leather footwear and tanning industries in the beginning, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is now considering extending its advantages to the rubber footwear subsector. This action follows the annulment, on August 28 of this year, of the general preferential tariff for rubber footwear and the reinstatement of the most favoured nation 20 per cent tariff.
> As the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce stated on November 20 of this year, the government will continue to examine periodically the status of the footwear industry and to determine if other action is required in the future.

I therefore congratulate the hon. member for the interest that he has shown in this important industry. Moreover, as other members also said during the Liberal party caucus, we should continue to review regularly the situation of the footwear industry in Canada.

And I quite agree with those remarks, as I said earlier. I believe that if the Liberal caucus enforced more strictly the anti-inflation legislation which was introduced at the beginning of the anti-inflation program, we should have gone further and therefore should have been more efficient. Considering the situation is getting worse, I suggest we should precisely repeal this Anti-Inflation Act.

An inquiry was set up, and special reports on footwear are now before the House, dated February 24, 1972, June 29, 1973, December 21, 1973 respectively and so on. In 1971, the Anti-dumping tribunal set up an inquiry on footwear and when the report was made public in 1973, special measures were taken. What has happened? Let us look at today's situation. Between 1968 and 1975, the share of the Canadian market held by imports has increased from 38.3 to 50 per cent. If we compare the figures of 1976 and 1977 for the month of January, imports have increased by 47 per cent in these areas.

From 1975 to 1976 alone South Korea raised its shoe exports to Canada by 119.2 per cent. These are official figures recently released by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. For Greece, the raise was 137.6 per cent, for Taiwan, 84.9 per cent. The share of the Canadian market in 1977 was 32 per cent. We started with 58 per cent in 1970 and we went down to 32 per cent in 1977. And then we would like to protect the jobs of people who work and try to be more efficient in the shoe manufacturing industry. Many industries operate now at 65 and 70 per cent of their capacity. I have consulted with great care the briefs which have been presented recently to the Anti-dumping Tribunal by the Shoe Manufacturers' Association and other briefs from companies of my riding. The unions involved have presented a very consistent and very well structured memorandum to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) in January this year about this question. And now, Mr. Speaker, a well established company which has worked for 60 years in our area, Duchesse Shoe, closed its plant ten days ago. H. H. Brown Shoe Co. (Canada) Ltd., from Richmond, which had nearly 800 employees now employs about 650. Since its inception in 1953 this company was a very sound business until 1974. Since then, its sales are constantly going down, with 225,000 fewer pairs of shoes each year, a situation which brings more unemployment. Orders are at their lowest level for a seven-day cutting period while at the same time last year this period was of 27 days and so on.

In Acton Vale for example Acton Shoe Co. Limited reduced the number of its employees from 240 to 190 these last few months. In Sherbrooke, in the riding of my hon. friend and colleague, the member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier), who spoke to the House not long ago—and I commend him for trying to smarten up the government—Igloo Felt closed its doors at the beginning of May and locked out, very unwillingly, 80 of its employees. I could carry on like this for hours, Mr. Speaker. What can I say to these people? Things are bad, it is true, no questions about that. I can not even tell them that everything is going wrong, everybody knows it. But what can we do to improve things? I do not believe we should accept being swamped under imports in Canada just to maintain good business relations with other countries. Mr. Speaker, what those people in the shoe industry want is a decent job that would allow them to consider the future with serenity. I am speaking about workers who want to succeed in their business and who want to live with optimism.

Things were a little better in 1973 because the government was more attentive, it was a minority government and at that time the situation was better. It was not ideal but we could live with it. We had a minority government and it was very effective. I think it was the only time where they had a specific action program about that issue. The results were not all good but they were encouraging nonetheless. In 1974 we dropped back to the same point, especially since the anti-dumping legislation was adopted, and in the last six or twelve months it has been horrible, it is simply discouraging.

I believe the government should consider a more effective and immediate control on imports, not next year or in two years but right now.

The government should consider that issue so essential in my riding and in the surrounding area.

The government does not seem to see it that way, but I still believe is is better to feed our own children rather than the others and it is better to provide work for Canadians and help them keep their jobs rather than for friends we do not know; I mean the "anonymous importers" who are making money by the bagful—they do not even know what to do with it—through exploitation of the Canadian workers.

I do not have anything against developing countries like Taiwan, Korea or China, I do not have anything against those developing countries, but I think we should think more positively, think about our own people first. We must, as soon as possible, start an intensive campaign in Canada to provide incentives for Canadians to buy in the country. I know Canadians, especially Quebecers. They will do so, Mr. Speaker, and Canadian industries will have a better market and future in Canada.

In concluding, with your permission I would like to quote the evidence submitted by H. H. Brown Shoe Canada Ltd., from Richmond, to the anti-dumping tribunal, which is a good summary of the thinking of all the shoe industry, of all the workers in this industry and which illustrates my opinion on this situation. I hope you will excuse my English, I am not all that bilingual. The report is in English. It was submitted by H. H. Brown Shoe Canada Ltd. where everybody is perfectly bilingual. But since it was submitted in Toronto, it was drafted in English and I respect the other official language of the country.

[English]

My name is Claude Brouillette, executive vice-president of the H. H. Brown Shoe Co. (Canada) Ltd., of Richmond, Quebec.

We are a manufacturer of men's shoes, work boots, dress shoes, cowboy boots and skates.

Our daily production which was 7,000 pairs in 1973 and 1974, has presently dropped to 5,500 pairs, a drop of 22 per cent.

In 1973, we had 769 employees, whereas in 1977 we now have 656 employees, a drop of 113 employees.

A lot of these employees had been loyal employees working for our company for many years.

We are the principal employer in Richmond and have always had peaceful, pleasant labour relations.

Our company has enjoyed a successful operation, since it started in 1953 up until 1974. Since then we have lost 225,000 pairs a year.

There is no doubt that the sales we lost are due to imports coming mainly from South Korea, Taiwan, Poland, United States, Czechoslovakia, Romania and Brazil. These goods are the exact copy of our shoes, as I will demonstrate later on and are offered to our customers at prices 30 per cent below our quotations.

The situation is one of urgency and action must be taken at once. A submission that was presented to your tribunal, suggests that a committee be formed. I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, that by the time the committee is formed, there will not be enough manufacturers left to form a committee.

Our designer has just spent three weeks in Europe to collect new ideas on styling, lasts, colours, etc. He also attends most of the shoe shows in Europe and America.

Our equipment and buildings are as up to date, if not better, as any of our overseas competitors.

Even if we consider the many styles and mixed sizes that we have to deal with every day, the constant loss of production during the last years, the loss to the imports in volume numbers creating a large increase in short runs, having to operate at 65 per cent of our capacity, our productivity is better than any of our operations in U.S.A. and also of any men's shoe manufacturer in America that I know.

What else can we do?

Our company is 25 years old and it is an established, respected member of the shoe industry of Canada.

We believe we have made every effort to compete with imports but without a market we cannot survive.

We want to keep supplying our customers with merchandise backed up with quality, comfort and delivery.

Mr. Chairman, we can survive only if we are provided with a decent share of the market.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I say it again, it is urgent. One needs only read carefully the submissions I read, these and others, to know it is urgent. The fate of thousands of families and workers is in the hands of the present government. Will it deceive them once again? I hope, like one government member said the other night in answer to a question I asked on the shoe situation, that the Liberal caucus will consider that question. For me, I shall return to it later so that something can be done and that shoe workers can be satisfied with an economy and a trade that expand instead of shrinking. That trade must expand above all for the benefit of Canadian workers and manufacturers. To conclude, I would ask the government to abolish as soon as possible, if it is still possible in a reasonable delay so as not to create too many problems, this Anti-Inflation Act which, in my opinion, has not got to the core of the problem, that is those who really profit by inflation in the country.

[English]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the debate today provides us with an opportunity not only to discuss the impact and the progress under the present program, but also some opportunities to review the choices for the future when the program will be at an end. It poses for members a number of questions upon which I think it would be reasonable for the government, and indeed the country, to expect some responses. For example, how do members propose to deal with the challenges of an economic nature in the future, particularly in regard to inflation? How are we to avoid, for example, the threat of a renewed spiral of inflation in Canada? The government has set out its analysis on these particular questions in the green paper "Agenda for Co-operation" and has elaborated a course of action for the post-control period. These three days of debate will have been usefully spent if they can provide a full canvas of possible approaches for the future and we can have a clear statement on the part of each of the parties in the House as to where they stand.

I would intend to focus in my participation on four points: first, to review the experience under the program comparing the situation in October, 1975, to the one in which we find ourselves at the present time; second, to set out the government's approach to decontrol; third, to talk about post-control environment as we see it, and also to talk about some the proposals which we have set out in the document entitled "Agenda for Co-operation"; and fourth, to take the opportunity to comment on some of the opposition arguments which we have heard this afternoon.

As well as my own participation in the debate, several of our ministerial colleagues will be speaking on some of the structural changes which are set out in the "Agenda for Co-operation". A number of my colleagues will be commenting on their own particular perspectives on the inflation problem and the anti-inflation program as we have experienced it.

I am not clear on the procedure this evening as to whether or not there is a private members' hour at this point.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yes, there is.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): In that case, I would like to call it five o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being five o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills, notices of motions, and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

[English]

BELL CANADA

The House resumed, from Thursday, June 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. O'Connell that Bill S-2, respecting Bell

Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, there is an objection by a number of members to the passage of this bill. The parliament of Canada is being asked to water down the stock by increasing the number of shares. This company deals primarily in the public utilities field. It has a monopoly. It should be paying attention to the needs of its subscribers and the Canadian public, as well as giving some protection to the shareholders who are now involved in the ownership of Bell Canada.

Bell Canada operates in a vacuum. This may now be changing slightly. For many years the Canadian Transport Commission was the only regulatory body, other than parliament, that had any control over that company. It has recently been controlled to some degree by the CRTC. The CRTC is asking a number of questions that were never asked before on behalf of subscribers.

It is interesting to read in various articles the two different aspects of the problem we face. The CRTC had a hearing in northern Canada in March of this year, as reported in the Citizen. It was indicated at those hearings that Bell was applying for a general rate increase, the fourth in four years. They apply for one every year. This increase would have added $172 million to its annual revenue. Last year Bell took in $1.9 billion. The article states that the Inuit Association in northern Quebec has been frustrated waiting for approval from Bell to set up Taquamiut Napingat, their telephone exchange, for two years in order to provide telephone service to the residents in that area.

The CRTC has given some consideration to the public. No longer are they satisfied with the 20 cent pay telephone charge. They have given Bell six months to revert to providing ten-cent service to the public. The employees are unhappy, as are the subscribers. This government gives that company immense assistance in the satellite program.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have followed this debate as it has meandered through the pages of Hansard. It is an interesting debate, indeed. I read with some interest the speech made by the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) when introducing the bill for debate in this House. He moved that the bill be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. Like that hon. member, I wish to make a declaration with regard to shareholders.

At one time I owned some shares in Bell Canada. They treated me reasonably well during the period I held them. Because of the policies of this government the whole market was affected somehow or another. Those shares suffered just a wee bit in terms of value. Last November, because I am a member of the House of Commons, I sold all the shares that I own. I decided to invest in Canada, and I invested in Canada Savings Bonds. I wanted to make that declaration because the hon. member for Scarborough East made a similar declaration. The hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) also made a declaration when he spoke.

There has been a rather interesting course of events. The debate began on May 27, 1977, when the hon. member for Scarborough East outlined the general provisions of the bill. His outline of the bill was satisfactory. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) also spoke in the debate on May 27 and advanced his point of view. The debate carried on. It seems to have gone on and on.

It is interesting to note that in a debate like this on March 10, 1977, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), and the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) made a speech. I think that was on the main motion. On June 2 the hon. member for Timiskaming began a speech on the motion for a six months' hoist. That is the second speech which he finished just a few minutes ago when Your Honour called him to order because his time had expired. We have had in this House a long list of NDP speeches attacking Bell Canada. As far as I am concerned, the NDP can attack whomever they like—and I do not stand particularly as an advocate for Bell Canada.

The problem with this bill is that it is highly technical. It involves an expansion of the capital stock of the company. It involves some changes in the financial provisions of the company's charter. The changes would not affect the regulatory aspects of the company. I understand the company would continue to be regulated in the same way as the British Columbia Telephone Company. This bill would give them similar powers to those granted to the British Columbia Telephone Company about two years ago.

The company says they need some improvements in terms of their financial flexibility, their powers to issue capital stock without CRTC approval. That is something that exercises my friends to the left because they are very much concerned about any move in this country to do away with the regulation of anything. If you turn over a stone somewhere and you find a member of the New Democratic Party, you will find him clutching to his breast a package of orders in council. They love orders in council. They think regulations are marvellous. Their philosophical bent is regulation of everything. However, we are all subject to redemption, and the Good Lord is prepared to forgive almost everything in all of us, even members of the NDP from time to time. I do not deny them their philosophy. Regulation by an extension of the tentacles of government into business is part of their philosophy. We respect them for that, even though from time to time we may disagree with them. They are entitled to it, and we are entitled to make a judgment on it. I know they would not deny us that privilege.

As I understand these highly technical provisions, an attempt is being made to incorporate some sections into the statute law affecting Bell Canada that are involved in other Canadian corporations. As I understand it, the intention of the bill is to authorize the company to alter its objectives, powers and share capital by applying to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott), and there is some attempt—I do not know whether it is a good attempt or not, and I do not know how we could find that out on second reading—to provide, by way of a negative resolution, the cancellation of the powers by either House of parliament. That, by the way, is provided, I understand, in the Telesat Canada Act. It is not a new procedure.

The reason I rose to take part in the debate is that I have followed it since the outset. I do not agree with all the arguments that have been advanced by those who oppose the bill. I do not think Bell Canada is saintly, by any means. I do not stand as an advocate of Bell Canada, but I am very much concerned that the affairs of the company, which says it has problems, be tested in the House of Commons in a debate on second reading. There is now an amendment for a six months' hoist. I do not know how any member of the House can examine the officials of Bell Canada to see whether or not they need those powers, whether they need the changes that they ask for, unless this bill goes to committee.

Because of its nature, Bell Canada, being incorporated by public act, comes to this parliament to ask for a change in certain things. Once that has happened with a company providing a public service, whether that service is good or bad—that can be examined, too, in context of the bill—I think this parliament owes that company some attention, whether it is Bell Canada or any other public utility that is incorporated, or any company or organization providing a service subject to the jurisdiction of parliament. We owe it not just attention in a repetitive way—and unfortunately that has been the thrust of the debate, a repetition of the same old arguments—but a minute examination of the officers of the company, the requirements of the company, the changes they propose, their effect upon shareholders and subscribers, and a whole host of other things. In other words, this is not an ordinary private bill, it is a bill involving a company that, for better or worse, provides a service to a number of Canadians.

I think we ought to move reasonably quickly to send this bill to the committee. I am satisfied that if Bell Canada were found wanting in the ways that have been described with eloquence by the hon. member for Timiskaming and other members who spoke in the debate, there is no member of the House who would be prepared to grant them those powers. Bell Canada may not get them anyway because of some of the provisions which, upon examination, may be found wanting in terms of the ability of Bell Canada to make a case when they come before the committee.

However, I think it is fair and reasonable for some assumptions to be made. One of those assumptions is that Bell Canada's presently authorized maximum capital of $1.7 billion is expected to be exhausted in 1978. That is an assertion by the company. If that assertion is wrong, if the company has misled parliament with respect to the bill, then they ought to be pitched out of court. But I say to you that they have to get to the courtroom before we can know. That is the real issue, and that is the reason I was moved to take part in the debate.

I have sat here through all but one of the speeches that have been made, and I would not say it is an unreasonable use of the rules of the House to carry on the debate. But I think there comes a time in matters of such a technical nature when the debate should end and we should get the issue into the commitee where witnesses can be called, technical people from within government can be called, perhaps people from CRTC, and a host of others can be called and the question looked at. I base that on the assertion that has been made by the company that they require it. They would be fools to come to parliamnt if they didn't require it. Let us find out if they are fools or not, and let us find out in the committee what the facts are. We cannot do so on second reading; we can merely assert certain things. That is one of the difficulties with second reading debate.

Therefore, I hope that for the purposes of that examination, the NDP will reconsider its motion to hoist the bill for six months and will allow the officials of the company and parliamentarians to examine the bill to see if the case can be made but if parliament does not give them a chance to present it, we would be denying the company their day in court. They cannot get their day in court on second reading debate. They get their day in court in a committee of the House. I will conclude by saying that I think we should allow them to get to the committee where this parliament should take this bill apart and demand all the information. It has more power than any other group to demand information, because it can deny ultimate approval if the information is not forthcoming. We should make the company prove their case and we should not use this amendment procedure, having regard to the purposes of the company which were established by statute of parliament and should be regulated reasonably by parliament.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that not one of my colleagues was shocked by the fact that I supported a motion of an NDP member to postpone the study of this important bill for six months. I did so quite freely and with a full awareness of my responsibilities because I consider communications an extremely important area. I have no animosity towards Bell Canada, but I would not want it to become a monopoly in the field of communications in our country. First, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about a famous Canadian who gave man this great invention that we call the telephone.

Mr. Speaker, I believe we do not say as often as we should all that Canada has given man through its citizens. When we travel throughout the world, when we are in European or Asian countries, we have to place our calls 24, 48 and even 60 hours in advance to communicate with our families in Canada, while in our own country, we have the advantage of being able to place our calls very quickly. This is a great service, but it is also very costly.

If Graham Bell had waited, as certain people want us to do today when we suggest something new in any area, in the area of finance, for instance, as I have done very often, he would have been told, like certain members tell us: Has this been done elsewhere?

Mr. Speaker, if Graham Bell had waited to invent the telephone, if he had wondered if it had been done elsewhere, if the Chinese had done it or if the Russians had done it, today, in 1977, man could still be waiting for this great means of communication. Mr. Speaker, as I have said already, we must not ape others, we must not wait for others to try something so that we may imitate them. Canadians can innovate in any area. Graham Bell understood this. I want to recall his memory because he was a great Canadian who rendered a great service, not only to Canada, but to the whole world. Today, we are studying Bill S-2 which concerns communications.

And in the communications field in Canada we almost have a monopoly in the hands of Bell Canada. We have cooperatives throughout the country who operate and offer services in areas where Bell Canada is not able to make profits. I know what I am talking about, Mr. Speaker. I have spent 20 years in the communication field. I was living in a settlement area where there was no telephone service. When we asked the Bell Company which was located 30 miles from our place in the city of Quebec to give us communication and telephone services they answered they could not do it because it was not profitable for them.

However, we had in the vicinity a company called Quebec Telephone owned by a great Liberal senator who has been in the Senate for several years, Mr. Jules Brillant, who made every effort to develop in the area a telephone service to meet the needs of the population. At that time, Quebec Telephone had jurisdiction over the area but it did not have the financial means to meet the needs of the population. So we called upon Bell Telephone, but they did not agree to give us a service for which we were ready to pay saying it would not be profitable.

Then, Mr. Speaker, we decided to organize with the cooperation of people of goodwill what we called a cooperative network. We founded telephone cooperatives based on the Cooperative unions legislation of the province of Quebec and we succeeded in offering to the people of the areas not served by Bell Telephone the communications means they needed. We had, in the circumstances, to buy all the equipment needed from the Northern Electric Company, a subsidiary of Bell Telephone, and to accept the price set by them as they had no competition. Then, the only company that could supply the equipment for those new communication services to those Cooperative unions was the Northern Electric, a subsidiary of Bell Telephone. Mr. Speaker, later when it became profitable we saw that monopoly establish itself in those areas and today, like in the rest of the country, the telephone service there is very costly because of the lack of competition.

I am a member of the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services and I am sometimes shocked by the fact that the Canadian Parliament has to give in to the will of Bell Canada to ensure the members of the House of Commons are granted a vital service that enables them to serve the Canadian people, be it from Ottawa, or from the office that each of them maintains in his riding. We feel as if we were caught in a vise. We have become the slaves of a monopoly in communications. And today, through Bill S-2 the House is again being asked to make more concessions and grant Bell Canada additional powers.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot do this inconsiderately. We must come to a halt and consider objectively whether the demands contained in Bill S-2 are really grounded. This is one of the reasons that compelled me to back the motion presented by the member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), without considering which party we respectively belong to. For me, it does not matter, Mr. Speaker. What matters are our duties as members of this House. I would have done the very same thing for a Liberal member such as the one sitting in front of me, the member for Rivière-du-Loup-Témiscouata (Mr. Gendron), or even the one who represents the official opposition as parliamentary leader in the House. I would have done it the same way. Why so? Because I look at our responsibilities not from a partisan's angle, but from the viewpoint of the interests that have to be served by this Parliament which is accountable to the Canadian people for a service given to this very people and to prevent a further growth of this monopoly in communications.

Mr. Speaker, let us read the explanatory notes to that bill:

> The said Company shall have power to manufacture telephones and other apparatus connected therewith, and their appurtenances and other instruments, used in connection with the business of a telegraph or telephone company, and also such other electrical instruments and plant as the said Company may deem advisable, and to purchase, sell or lease the same and rights relating thereto, and to build, establish, construct, purchase, acquire or lease, and maintain and operate, or sell or let any line or lines for the transmission of messages by telephone, in Canada or elsewhere, and to make connection, for the purpose of telephone business, with the line or lines of any telegraph or telephone company in Canada or elsewhere, and to aid or advance money to build or work any such line to be used for telephone purposes:

This occurred in 1949, Mr. Speaker. We are now in 1977. Parliament has been unable to progress in this respect. I know it, Mr. Speaker, and I can say so very strongly, although at a certain time Mr. Louis-Philippe Lacroix, the former member for Îles-de-la-Madeleine in the Quebec National Assembly, made false statements against yours truly while he was acting as the manager of a telephone co-operative.

Mr. Speaker, I can prove on the basis of my past experience that the area of communications is highly profitable. Because I should like to prove it, I suggest that we should not, without serious reason, grant new privileges to a company which is something of a monopoly, judging from official data. I still have all these documents. They were given to me as a gift by a grateful board of directors as a reward for the great services I have rendered the Canadian people. Not only do I have them, but I have them here, in my Ottawa office, where I keep them as a precious heirloom.

Mr. Speaker, I will give an example to the House to show that the field of communications is profitable and that we must not extend to Bell Canada new privileges which will enable it to create an even more powerful monopoly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): On January 28, 1949, the closest doctor lived nine miles from my home, and we could reach him only with snow shoes, or on foot, or with a carriage pulled by a horse or an ox, or else with an old 1929 Ford like the one I had at that time. However, I was often called to help my fellow citizens, I had to make three trips in one night to get a doctor whose care was required by mothers. At that time, they accepted maternity without condition, and that is why French Canada still remains the same today. But I worry about the future. So one day I said to myself: "It is ridiculous not to have communication means in 1949, not to be able to call a doctor to attend a mother who had the courage to give a child to her nation."

So I studied about telephone service, and at that time, in Canada, it was not possible to find any textbook in French. All the textbooks dealing with the telephone were written only in English. Although I was not very well versed in English, I managed as best I could and understood what communications by telephone are all about. It's very simple, it's only a matter of two wires, and all you have to do is to arrange them so that they connect with the homes . . .

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

[English]

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect not only to Bill S-2, which is a private bill, but with respect to the procedures of this House regarding private bills.

This is a major Canadian corporation supplying important public services as a public utility, and parliament obliges it to come to this House to seek changes in its charter and its capitalization. The only way this corporation, in contrast to others, can make these changes is to come here. Therefore the procedures we put it through should have relevance to the public interest of the company.

This is the point I am trying to raise because I am going to ask you, as guardian of our interests as private members, if there is a way we could seek a change in the rules. This company must come through a private member. I sponsored the bill in the House. It must be a private bill debated in private members' hour, which in the normal course arises on Thursdays every two weeks. If there is another private bill it arises once every four weeks, and if there are three, it is every six weeks, and many of those occasions do not take place for reasons with which we are all familiar.

That means we oblige the corporation to enter into a procedure which may have no result, with no decision, and in fact there may well be no decision in this session or in the next session. Indeed, there may be no decision at all because this bill may not proceed beyond second reading stage. The company may never get its day in court. I would therefore like to ask whether we are not making a farce of our own institution by the way we proceed.

I should like to suggest that we make some proceeding available through either Standing Order 75A or 75B to cover circumstances such as these.

This whole procedure is divorced from the government; it is divorced from the minister. Are we to be helpless and make a farce of our own institution because we can be held up, session after session after session, when a major corporation is told to come here and we can offer it no result? Mr. Speaker, I think you are the guardian of our interests as private members. We cannot turn to the House leader or to the government; we turn to ourselves. I ask if you, Mr. Speaker, as our guardian, could refer this matter of private bills, and the procedure for dealing with them, to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. I suggest specifically that the chairman of the committee should have the right to seek the kind of all-party, or majority party agreement, which will enable us to consider this kind of bill under a time allocation.

Let us give ourselves some rules which will prevent our running into these impasses, which surely are an affront to the nearly quarter of a million Canadians who own this company, and to the millions of Canadians served by it. We shall deny those Canadians proper service if we deny this company the financing and corporate strength it needs to do its job. We make a farce of ourselves and I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, to do something about it.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom).

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I think the point of order the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) raised is but another stalling tactic in this debate.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Don't be ridiculous.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, we respect the rules of the House and are doing as we should as members of parliament: examining the merits of the case brought forward. The hon. member for Scarborough East suggests we are not getting results. So far as we are concerned we are getting good results, for we are stopping Bell Canada—one of my purposes for participating in the debate. I want to smarten up that large corporation which is milking the ordinary people of this country. I think the hon. member for Scarborough East does not like the rules because they do not favour his big business colleagues. I think he raised a facetious point of order, a non-point of order. I remember, when we dealt with IAC some months ago, hon. members used similar arguments. They alleged we were stopping that poor little corporation which needed our help in the House. That bill was eventually sent to committee, there to be considered, and this bill will probably end up in the same place, although not until 1978, I hope. Eventually it will reach the committee.

I have no sympathy for the viewpoint of the hon. member for Scarborough East who is an apologist for this huge corporation which is inflicting a great deal of harm on the ordinary Canadian citizen. I hope you ignore his point of order.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. The private members' hour is set aside for the consideration of bills private members bring forward. We are doing exactly that with regard to this particular bill which was brought forward by the hon. member for Scarborough East. When you consider that the Senate considered this bill in one day, one can hardly say the bill was properly examined in principle in the other place. I am not suspicious by nature, but I suspect any bill which originates in the other place. I took the opportunity to read in Senate Hansard what was said in the debate on bill S-2.

I suggest the government is always prepared to use Standing Order 75A and B. That is always its answer to a proper examination of legislation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: Look, you are caught on the horns of your own dilemma and blaming the opposition for doing what it ought to do. There is no reason to look at the private members' hour, with respect to the hon. member's private bill to do with Bell Canada. We have tried consistently to deal with that corporation before the CTC and CRTC. It provides no proper rural service in northern Ontario and I, as a member from northern Ontario, am going to sit in my seat and not do anything at all until it accounts for its actions in northern Ontario with respect to service. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, the private members' hour is the best check and balance we have with respect to private members' bills.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Bellechasse, on a point of order.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to express, very calmly and objectively my opinion on the matter.

I am convinced that my good friend, the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell), when he said that Parliament looks ridiculous to the people, did not mean to tell the House that what I have just said was ridiculous. If that is what the hon. member meant, then I fail to see what we are doing here.

Mr. O'Connell: Not at all.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Thank you. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to take part in the debate, very objectively, and so fulfil my duty as a parliamentarian and consider very objectively the purpose of the bill. Even though the Senate passed it in the space of a single day, that does not mean that we are sheep here in the House of Commons and that we have to do the same. I don't agree with that at all. We have responsibility. We, in this House, were elected by the people. We were not appointed. We are answerable to the Canadian people, to Bell Canada's subscribers, to those of Quebec Telephone and every other company in Canada. We have a responsibility which we must discharge. We are dutybound to study all the clauses of this bill; that is why a motion for a six months' hoist was put. I feel that in six months we shall have had time to think things over; by then, we will be able—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The Chair has heard the comments of hon. members on the point of order the hon. member for Scarborough East raised. That hon. member asked the Chair to intervene and proposed a certain course of action, but we have no Standing Orders allowing such a thing. Hon. members expressed their viewpoints. One of them is in favour of changing some of our rules; other hon. members are not in favour. However, I do not think the hon. member raised a point of order; therefore the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) has the floor.

[Translation]

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, first I must congratulate the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) for his fine speech which was very much to the point this afternoon. He said the truth about Bell Canada.

[English]

Perhaps I could call it six o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST—ACTIVITIES OF SENATOR DAVEY RESPECTING CERTAIN COMPANIES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I want to pursue the question I took up with the government House leader in his capacity as Acting Prime Minister last Monday, when I questioned the role of Senator Keith Davey, if in fact he had any role, in other enterprises in addition to the one which received so much prominence in the Toronto Sun, for which he used to be an eminent correspondent, that is to say, Blue Water Racing Associates Ltd.

I am interested in this matter for several reasons, Mr. Speaker. I was less than impressed with the government House leader's response which he made on the subject of conflict of interest a few days earlier, I think on June 10, when he referred to a green paper and made mention of a bill which was coming along on the subject of conflict of interest.

Over the years there has been a gradual improvement, I suggest, in the general atmosphere. One of the most important steps was taken by a former prime minister, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), when he discouraged, if not outrightly prohibited, as I recall, cabinet ministers from holding directorships or taking part in business while they were members of cabinet.

To some extent the Canadian people are now convinced that the Senate is nothing more than a repository for people using their substantial Senate salaries to provide themselves with a secure income which allows them to participate in commercial ventures for their own benefit. When they are not doing that, they are perceived to be paid organizers, in effect, for their parties. This is not being fair to most of the Senators, but even if only a few of them are actually carrying on this type of lifestyle, it does reflect badly on the many conscientious Senators who are doing the best they can to discharge their responsibilities.

I became very interested in a company called Hydroculture Luwasa Limited which participates in the esoteric business of growing plants by the addition of nutrients, a very interesting process. When I noted that this particular company, which was incorporated on July 12, 1975, under the corporate name of Hydoculture Luwasa Limited, had as a director none other than Senator Keith Davey, I asked myself what in the world would he be doing, involved in an enterprise like this? Then I began to think: "Well, there is enough greenery and foliage around some of these government offices to make a Tarzan movie", and one almost expect to see a cheetah peeking through some of the foliage in some government buildings. So I obtained a list of the directors and officers. I should like the government House leader to take it as notice to supplement some of the information which I have.

I am interested to know, for example, whether the Senator is still a director in this company. Is he now a shareholder? I want to know to what extent the company does business with the federal government or Crown agencies. I should like to know some other information to supplement my own. I should like to know, if it is relevant, why this company was negotiating to sell itself to another company in a highly regulated but unrelated field, Canadian Cable Systems, Ltd. Senator Davey has been mentioned in other matters, for example, Blue Water Racing Associates Ltd.

The whole situation seems to be something which is not in the best interests of the parliamentary system. I do not want to sound sanctimonious about this, but at this particular point in time it seems unfortunate that a man such as Senator Davey, who is a key campaign adviser, a political strategist in government and a man of prominence, is perceived to be in a position such as was indicated by the Toronto Sun. That newspaper said that his assistance in licensing involves setting up meetings with federal and provincial officials in charge of licensing. That is worrisome. It is very interesting why he would receive a 50 per cent equity in a company in which he did not invest any cash, if there was not some valuable emphasis placed on the type of assistance he would be providing in this regard.

When we take this and equate it with the rather interesting situation involved in this other company, there may or may not be a pattern emerging here. I would like the government, in connection with its study of conflicts of interest, green papers, and proposed legislation, to consider this particular item. In due course I would appreciate having a bit more information on Senator Davey's equity, his present position in Hydroculture Luwasa Canada, Ltd., and also whether there may be other shareholders, who are in a prominent position in the government service or elsewhere, who ought to reconsider their positions with respect to the type of business this company is doing or proposes to do with the Government of Canada.

Mr. Rod Blaker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I am answering on behalf of the minister and of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Pelletier). I must apologize to you, Mr. Speaker, and to members for arriving late; but I understood that there was Royal Assent involved and there might be a couple of extra minutes.

I should like to begin by noting to the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay), that I am not familiar with the company whose name seems to be Hydroculture, if I understood him correctly. Because no reference was made to that particular corporate name, I am not prepared to give him any details. However, I am prepared to answer a question posed on June 10 by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn), which was pursued on June 13 by the hon. member for Central Nova. I see a nod from the hon. member opposite, so I will give him the details I have from the Department of Agriculture. They relate to the press reports of Senator Davey's interest in Blue Water Racing Associates Ltd.

While the hon. member did not identify any particular press article, Blue Water Racing Associates is a properly incorporated private company, established under the Canada Corporations Act. That company applied for 23 racing dates in 1974 and the application was denied because incorporation documents were not complete at that time and the facilities were not suitable for winter racing. At that time there was no indication that Senator Davey was involved with the company.

In 1975 Blue Water Racing Associates Ltd. applied for 91 racing dates. Nineteen days were approved. The first racing date was held on May 20, 1975. On or about May 15, 1975, the company submitted a standard departmental form disclosing that Senator Davey and York Sports Investments owned more than 10 per cent of the voting rights attached to all equity shares of the associates. The department understands that Senator Davey actually has 50 of 100 shares of Blue Water Racing Associates Ltd. that were issued at that time, which appeared to meet an Ontario Racing Commission requirement that Senator Davey own 50 per cent of the company before they would issue a license.

Senator Davey has had discussion with Mr. S. B. Pratt, the former chief supervisor, who retired in June of 1975, and the present chief supervisor, Mr. B. Toews, and Senator Davey made no representation to them in his capacity of a Senator. Discussions were on the operational aspects of race tracks, which is a normal occurrence. Discussions respecting dates were also held with Mr. L. J. Cassina, president of the company.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST—KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE OF SENATOR DAVEY'S INTEREST IN BLUE WATER RACING ASSOCIATION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the limited information given by the parliamentary secretary answering on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). The parliamentary secretary has attempted to answer these questions according to the technical information available to them.

There are some very fundamental questions raised by virtue of the interest which Senator Davey apparently has in Blue Water Racing Associates Ltd. The whole question arises because of the relationship which Blue Water Racing Associates necessarily has to the Department of Agriculture.

At the time I originally raised this question, I wanted to find out precisely the knowledge of the department and of departmental officials with respect to Senator Davey's interest in this company. The parliamentary secretary indicated that Senator Davey did in fact disclose that he owned 50 per cent of this company which had dealings with the federal government. He confirmed that not only did he have a contact with the official dealing with parimutuel matters, racing matters and racing dates, Mr. S. B. Pratt, but also with his successor in office.

The reason I asked about the knowledge was because of the rather peculiar corporate structure in which there was no apparent reference to Senator Davey on the face of the corporate document. It is reported that Senator Davey did it on the advice of the lawyers, but his involvement in the company in question was through another corporation and his name did not appear.

Also, if the department was going to be dealing with these companies, in view of the relationship between Senator Davey and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), as a close confidant, adviser, and Liberal campaign director, I would have thought the Department of Agriculture would have inquired as to what kind of consideration was paid by Senator Davey with respect to his interest in this company running racing dates in Canada, whether it was in fact, as alleged in press reports, a consideration for him for making representation for licensing and similar kinds of activities which would involve his name and where his influence in these events would be beneficial to the company, and whether or not he received any compensation other than for that particular service to the company.

The point I tried to make in the course of my remarks is that Senator Davey is a powerful man in relation to the Government of Canada, more powerful than most of the ministers in cabinet. The Prime Minister listens to him more than to the ministers in his cabinet.

If Senator Keith Davey does not disclose the fact that he is using a senatorial office, still the fact that he identifies himself as Senator Keith Davey will make any person in any federal department in this country stand up and take notice that a very powerful man is interested in whether or not a departmental official will meet with representatives of this company and in whether or not the company receives satisfactory treatment.

The only response I got from the minister, unfortunately, was that somehow it was all right because the company apparently lost $70,000 in one year. That is a peculiar attitude for the minister to take, to slough off the issue by making this reference. In other words, according to the minister it is all right if somebody knocks over a little old lady or steals a dime—he is an honest man; but if a man robs a bank and takes a lot of money, this is considered to be a dishonest act.

The other point is that in terms of a man of substantial means, I suggest that the tax laws might be of some benefit to him. It is not enough that the Senate of Canada now contains, by virtue of the appointments of the Prime Minister, enough Liberal campaign organizers paid from the public purse, but we now have another instance of Senators involved in companies doing business with the Government of Canada. What are the government's guidelines on this? Will the government allow this to carry on without any restriction?

We already have the case brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) with respect to the Sky Shops situation. The first appointment the Prime Minister made to the Senate of Canada was that of Senator Giguère, and where is he now? I ask you, Sir, is this a pattern that is unfolding? Are we finding that friends of the Liberal party are now in the Senate at public expense and receiving that free ride, while they go out and campaign for the Liberal party, and are also involved in companies doing business with government departments? I think that is a conflict of interest situation to which I referred in my question to the Minister of Agriculture when I raised it on June 10.

I think the government owes us, as members of parliament, some explanation of the guidelines that it proposes to recommend to parliament on the kinds of activities the government feels Liberal Senators should engage in with respect to companies that do business with the Government of Canada. This raises the whole question of possible conflict of interest, and I think the minister does not do us any service by trying to slough off this question or joke it off. No one is laughing about this matter. According to the minister, it is not what you know but who you know that counts, because you lose a little money in one year.

We expect the fullest possible explanation of the number of occasions on which representations were made by Senator Davey. I have asked for this information; it is not yet forthcoming. I and my colleague, the hon. member for Central Nova, would like to know what other involvements Senator Davey has in other companies, who of the confidants and friends of the Prime Minister is involved in these companies, what exactly is happening so far as government contacts are concerned and government connections with companies in which Senators appointed by the Prime Minister are involved.

Mr. Rod Blaker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked at least a dozen different questions and I do not know if I can answer them all in the time I am given.

First, he intimated that the Senator did not disclose his interests, which is not correct at all. Senator Davey did disclose his interests in a most official way on May 15 when that company made application for racing dates. He has contacted the Department of Agriculture, but the senior people whom I named in my earlier answer indicated that no representations were made as to the Senator's role in the Senate.

With respect to York Sports, the hon. member suggests that the Senator's name did not appear. That is not correct. It appeared on the application form; it was quite open. As to the price paid for the senator's interest in that company, perhaps that is a matter for further questions if the hon. member wishes to pursue this. It is getting a little deep for this type of questioning.

I happened to be in the House when the question was asked of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and I can say that he did not slough it off. He gave the answer in which he indicated that the information he had was that the company had lost $70,000, and he undertook to give an answer, which I am giving tonight.

As to doing business with the government, this is becoming a massive problem. It is almost impossible these days to avoid running into regulations, federal, provincial or municipal. The question becomes whether, in the face of various regulations of Crown agencies and departments, members of parliament and Senators are expected to have no business interests whatsoever. I am not making any comment on the validity or otherwise of that. I am simply saying that our regulated lifestyle is becoming such that it is hard to avoid bumping into some level of government somewhere.

I remember very recently in the case of the department of which I was parliamentary secretary that that department purchased an airplane for the use of the RCMP from a member of parliament. That can be said to be doing business with the Government of Canada. I think we could get to the stage where we could find some fault or issue of morality in that type of transaction, and then all of us will have to live in some kind of state that is not natural to the human being.

Again, I do not indicate that the greatest of care is not necessary. It certainly is, and I am not commenting on the issue raised by the hon. member. I am simply trying to answer some of the observations made with respect to conflicts of interest, in some measure because I used to be the chairman of the committee responsible for the green paper. I have given the hon. member as much information as I can. If he wants to pursue his questions, I would be glad to co-operate in every way.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

PETITION TO END CONTROLS ON JUNE 30, 1977

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Stevens:

That the Anti-Inflation Act being chapter 75, Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76, as amended by chapter 98, Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76 shall expire on the 30th day of June, 1977.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I mentioned that I should like to talk about the resolution in four perspectives, the first with regard to the program itself.

Obviously the best way to consider the program is to cast it against the backdrop of the experience that Canada was going through in the late summer and fall of 1975 when it was first put into effect. While at that time some of the costs, which over the previous two years we and other world economies had been absorbing, had peaked and we had seen some reductions, the atmosphere in Canada was one of expectation of ever-increasing inflation. There were those who were seeking price or income increases not just to recover the percentage increase in the consumer price index in the previous period but in many cases to anticipate even further rates of inflation which they expected to come. It was an atmosphere of a certain kind of envy, of competitive claims based as much on comparison with the percentage increases of others as on actual need.

The inflation rate at that time was 10.6 per cent, the rate of settlements in the first year was an annual rate of 20 per cent, and unit labour costs were at 15.2 per cent. The initial claims of collective bargaining in the last weeks of September and in early October were in the skyrocketing 50 to 60 per cent range. The consensus discussions which had been carried on in the previous winter and spring by my predecessor and other colleagues with some of the major economic decision makers in Canada had disclosed the difficulty of obtaining voluntary agreements to restrain against inflationary increases.

The major groups which had been consulted evidenced a substantial distrust of voluntary restraint and, in particular, a certain suspicion that even if they restrained themselves some of the other major groups might not agree.

Under the circumstances it was clear that only a mandatory program imposing legal restraints on the great economic powers—large firms, major union groups, the public sector, professionals—could bring about a restraint on the frenzy of the inflationary spiral then under way.

I think it is fair to say that the program has succeeded in reducing the spiral of expectation. Early in the program it was clear that certain commodities such as food, energy or imported goods could not be effectively controlled. The United States had attempted to control food in their program and it only brought about higher prices and diminution of supply.

It was recognized that certain economic factors, such as the change in the external value of the Canadian dollar, or interest rates, could not be controlled. Subject to these limitations we set out to restrain the powerful in the community, and it can be said that the program succeeded in doing that. The rate of inflation has come down from 10.6 per cent to 6.2 per cent in October, 1976. Using the same index—not switching the index as the hon. member might—it came down to a current rate of 7.6 per cent. Aided by reductions in food prices at first, and the food price reduction was important and significant, the rate of price increase has come down.

It is fair to point out in connection with food prices that 60 per cent of the cost of the food going through to the consumer at the retail level is made up of the cost of processing, packaging, transporting and retailing, and the anti-inflation program was effective in restraining those cost increases so that the real cuts in prices were passed along to consumers. Food prices have risen again, principally because of shortages arising from crop conditions abroad, but we have some reason to hope that, with favourable conditions in Canada, some of these increases will be reversed.

The critical element to be understood, both in relation to the program and in relation to inflation generally in the years to come, is that not all elements of the cost-price chain can be subjected to control. Real cost increases in some commodities are unavoidable, commodities such as energy, or food when it is in short supply, or, as the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) mentioned this afternoon, imports, these being all cases in which the community has no choice but to meet the higher costs. But we can modify our own wage and salary increases, or modify, in the case of the business sector, the additional claims for profit.

Mr. Clarke: But that does not apply to the government.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The program has not meant hardship for the working man; I think this is an important element to underline. For example, average wage rates increased in 1976 at the rate of 10 per cent, and the consumer price index through that year increased at a rate of 6.5 per cent; therefore, there were real increases for the average working man of between 3 per cent and 4 per cent in the year. Hence the moderation in the cost of living has yielded real benefits for the community as a whole. But it must be understood at the same time that some factors, for example the increase in food prices, will mean additional costs for the community. I do not think we can undertake to assure the community that they can enjoy all the benefits of a drop in costs, for example the drop in food prices to a certain extent, and at the same time be cushioned against any increases which might take place. There are going to be flows and ebbs in take-home pay. But the critical thing is to maintain a reasonable balance over a period of time with respect to costs people will have to meet.

I now come to the question of prices. There has been a significant drop in the rate of increase, particularly on the non-food side of price increases. For many firms market conditions have operated to hold down price increases, but for other firms the restraint on profits and profit margins has provided a check.

Close to 300 firms must notify the Anti-Inflation Board in advance of their intention to increase prices, and the results of this process give one indication of future consumer price performance. In 1976, for example, pre-notified price increases averaged 6.8 per cent. In the first four months of this year the rate was 4.1 per cent, and in April alone it was down to 3 per cent. The fact is, we are bringing costs under control in Canada.

Unit labour costs, as I mentioned before, increased in 1975 at an annual rate of 15.2 per cent. First year wage settlements, after increasing by 20 per cent in 1975, had dropped progressively, to 9.9 per cent by the fourth quarter of last year, and to 8.8 per cent by the first quarter of 1977. Month by month the compensation plans filed with the Anti-Inflation Board have moved closer to the anti-inflation guidelines, an indication of acceptance and compliance by workers and employers.

The strike record in Canada now is vastly better than it has been in recent years. In January and February of this current year, the number of man-days lost nationally through labour disputes was 70 per cent below the number lost in the same months of 1976. More agreements are being signed by employers and unions without the need of arbitration or mediation. I think some credit is due to both sides of the bargaining table for the sense of responsibility which has activated the trends I indicated in those figures.

One industry in particular deserves credit, the construction industry. I refer now to an article which appeared in the Financial Times under the byline of Mr. Clayton Sinclair, who refers to the fact that in the construction industry there has been a dramatic drop in wage increases. He wrote, and I quote:

> Construction industry wage settlements, for years the bane of inflation fighters, are rolling in this spring at levels so low management and even some government officials find them hard to believe . . .
> This year, instead of getting 17 per cent pay increases as they did back in 1975, 200,000 tradesmen and labourers who have been negotiating in Ontario and farther west since early April will wind up, according to reports from the Anti-Inflation Board, with something closer to 7 per cent—fringe benefits included.
> More than 250 contracts covering the bulk of organized construction workers in British Columbia, Ontario and on the Prairies opened this spring. By last week close to 85 per cent had either been renewed or were awaiting ratification.

He gave some examples, and perhaps I may be forgiven for being parochial in quoting the following example:

> Ontario's workforce is now settling for increases worth 90 cents an hour or close to 7 per cent after signing two years ago for raises worth $3.50 an hour. In Toronto, plumbers who were getting $13.66 hourly settled for $14.56 when their agreement was signed last month.

Clearly, there is evidence of a new sense of responsibility on both sides of the bargaining table, a responsibility which has been effective as well at the national leadership level, both on the business and labour side.

I have mentioned some of the immediate benefits of a lower rate of inflation in Canada and the impact on our industrial costs.

One of the points which has been made, validly I think, is this: while controls have provided a temporary relief, if they are to be of long-lasting value they have to bring about some substantial change, perhaps of a structural nature, perhaps of a psychological nature. In any event, there must be some change in the approach which all those involved in economic decision-making bring to bear on the decisions they have to take.

I suppose the question is, what was changed as a result of the 20-month experience? I think the leaders of the big battalions at least have learned something from the experience. I think they have learned, for example, that notwithstanding their claims as economic decision-makers to be able to make some decisions and pass them freely on to the public, the public remains very skeptical. Indeed, the fact that many ordinary Canadians have a great deal of hesitation about the government taking off controls reflects their skepticism. Nor do they have enormous confidence that their leaders' decisions will necessarily be in the best interests of all.

We have had in Canada the phenomenon of rising popularity of the controls program, especially on the part of those who do not now have collective power. This fact shows up in the polls, it shows up in the personal contacts I have, and I know it is showing up in the contacts my colleagues have had as well in their own constituencies and throughout the country.

Mr. Clarke: Not many of you are back there. Is that not correct?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I never made any secret of the fact that I, for one, never greatly favoured the controls program from the start. Therefore one of the difficulties is that of persuading this particular constituency within Canada, which is a substantial one, that in the long-run interests of the economy controls do have to come off, that we cannot cling to the protective blanket of the anti-inflation program, but that we must find some way to bring the controls program to an end in a way which will not bring about a fresh outburst of inflation.

Mr. Stevens: Let's do it.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, who wants an early end to controls?

Mr. Stevens: Everybody.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I think one can say, from one's experience of talking to the public, that there is scarcely a general demand for that. For example, among provincial governments—

Mr. Fraser: What is the right thing to do—do what the mob wants, or what should be done?

• (2020)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): If the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) has anything to say, perhaps he will take part in the debate. I listened attentively to his colleague and I trust he will do the same while I speak.

What of the provinces? Where do they stand? Of the ten, seven favour continuation for most of 1977, and one of these, the province of British Columbia from which the hon. member for Vancouver South comes, wants us to keep the program on until the expiry of the legislation in 1978. Take a look at my own province of Ontario.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is three.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Seven. Take a look at Ontario under a Conservative government where there was recently an opportunity to test the feelings of the community at the polls. One would think that if there were a widespread demand for removal of the controls this would have been a primary issue for either the government or for the opposition parties. For example, I am confident that had Mr. Stephen Lewis felt that continuation of controls was a great social injustice this would have been one of the cannons in his campaign and we would have heard a great deal about it. But this was not the case. None of the party leaders raised this as a campaign issue—recognition on their part that the public was very wary about any proposal to end the controls program. While all three leaders addressed themselves firmly to the questions of job creation and economic expansion in the province, and talked a good deal about obstacles in the way of expansion of employment opportunities, not one of them suggested, as was done in the House this afternoon, that the removal of the controls program would in any way enhance job opportunities in Ontario. Obviously, it was not an issue in the campaign, because studies have shown—

Mr. Fraser: Your job is not to do what the polls say but to decide what is the best thing to be done.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Oh, that empty head is rattling again.

Indeed, widespread acceptance and support are something of an embarrassment. The political problem is not to take them off but rather to persuade constituents that it is in their interests in the long run that they be removed. Of all the possible arguments for ending controls, that of popular demand is not one.

An hon. Member: What about a federal election?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would point out to the hon. member that he had one and he was wiped out.

Let us turn, now, to the next question, the question of decontrol itself. There are really two principal choices involved. The first is the immediate and simultaneous withdrawal of controls, the so-called "lights out" method set out in the green paper. The second choice is the phased withdrawal of controls. That choice, called the third option, is outlined in some detail in the green paper.

The government favours the second approach, for two reasons. First, it avoids the risk of a sudden and simultaneous outburst of price and income increases, or at least it minimizes that risk to the extent it can be minimized—what the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) called the "springback"—when controls are lifted as people seek to recover some part of their loss of income. Second, it would make for increased fairness as between different bargaining groups. If the House were to accept this motion on Monday evening, the situation would be that controls would have been applied to those who had voluntarily complied with the guidelines and stayed within them, while those who had held out against controls, those who had not supported the program, those who had delayed collective bargaining or failed to enter into an agreement, would benefit by the fact that controls had come off.

One thing is clear. Whatever method is chosen for decontrol, we would invite both unfairness and a wage-price explosion unless we deal with the problem of unamended agreements under the anti-inflation program. Let me explain. In the course of the program many collective agreements have been reached at rates of interest substantially higher than the anti-inflation guidelines. Some of these increases have been rolled back by recommendation of the Anti-Inflation Board. Others have been reduced by order of the Administrator. As long as the controls are in force, compensation is being paid to employees at the rates established by the Board or by the Administrator. However, many of the contracts have not actually been rewritten to reflect rulings by the Anti-Inflation Board or by the Administrator, and still provide for the rates originally negotiated.

There is some uncertainty about the legal situation once the controls are removed and the agreements cease to be subject to mandatory restraint. Employees might be able to demand as a matter of right that their compensation be increased to the levels provided by the letter of unamended contracts. Employers might be legally obliged to pay the negotiated rates. in addition, employees might be able to make up their so-called past losses, that is, the difference between the negotiated rates and the allowable rates for the period during which their agreements were under controls. Obviously this situation would be highly unfair to those who have complied with the program by negotiating agreements within the guidelines in the first place or who amended their contracts to conform with the rulings. Furthermore, if these agreements were allowed to stand and if the negotiated rates were paid, the consequences for the economy could be serious.

With "lights out" decontrol there could be a large, immediate jump in wages, combined with big lump-sum payments immediately following the decontrols date. This could at once place severe pressure on prices and drive up inflationary expectations as other groups sought instant catch-up. Down the road, it would cost the economy a lot of jobs. Even if a phased decontrol were adopted, pressure would mount steadily and much of the benefit of the program would be seen to be thrown away. A substantial number of large increases over time would still provide a powerful demonstration effect to other groups.

To provide for greater certainty with the approach of decontrol, the government has therefore decided to propose amendments to the Anti-Inflation Act to deem these agreements to be amended in line with the AIB recommendation or order of the Administrator. An amending bill would be introduced to deal with this. In the same way, the law will make sure that profit restraints imposed, for example, by excess revenue orders, will be effective.

Mr. Gillies: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Mr. Speaker. I do not have unlimited time. I think I should be able to make my speech without interruption.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): One important question which has been put to me and to other members of the government is this: what are we seeking in our discussions with representatives of the various interest groups in this country? While the leaders of the Canadian Labour Congress and of employer groups in Canada have said they will advocate restraint—

Mr. Fraser: They have not!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —can we be sure that their counsel will be followed? There are obvious limitations existing on both sides. The leaders of the CLC, for example, speak only for their own membership, and the congress does not purport to represent the whole of Canadian labour. Representatives of business are quick to point out that they can speak only for their own companies and that, while they are prepared to advocate restraint, they cannot be sure that others will follow. We shall be seeking further assurance as to the active advocacy of policies of restraint we can expect from these groups.

As well we are seeking from these groups a commitment to their participation in the two institutional changes we have proposed in the white paper, in the Agenda for Co-operation. We have proposed these two institutions, a consultative forum and a monitoring agency, and it is critical that they both have the support of business and labour in Canada.

Will they participate? In light of the experience with the Economic Council, will they even attend? I do not think we know yet. Although we have made the green paper available for their examination and study of these particular questions, we have no clear indication at the moment that they are prepared to participate in these organizations. We have put the questions to them and, if they are not prepared to participate in this kind of consultation as such, what changes or what methods would they propose to try to achieve better restraint in the post-controls period? This is obviously a role to be defined in consultation with the group. We have been seeking a meeting just as soon as they are ready for the purpose of talking on this question, and once we have had their reaction it will fall back on the government to make a final decision as to the date and the method of decontrol.

On the question of the forum, I should like to turn for a moment from purely Canadian sources to an international report, one that I can recommend to hon. members. It is the recent report of the secretary of the OECD entitled "Toward Full Employment and Price Stability". It is a penetrating examination of the problems of economic management in a modern economy and is prepared by a group of independent experts under the leadership of Mr. Paul McCracken, former chairman of the United States council of economic advisers. I should just like to quote briefly a section from the heart of that report:

> We support the idea that governments should discuss regularly with the organizations representing business and labour the general evolution of prices and wages which should be aimed at over the coming year or so, consistant with achieving or maintaining high employment levels.

The report goes on:

> Five years ago, it was understandable that representatives of business and labour might take it for granted that governments had it in their power to ensure high levels of sales and employment. They may well have felt that the warnings against the dire consequences of irresponsible behaviour on their part need not be taken seriously. All this has now changed.

I have spoken of the consultative forum. I will make reference only to the monitoring agency briefly because the agency and its function are fully described in the Agenda for Co-Operation. Its function is to follow economic developments, to comment on specific price or wage changes which could have an adverse impact on inflation in Canada, and to comment as well on trends in the economy which would have the same direction. It would be an agency which is consistent with the free choice option which we have taken in the post-controls period. Its responsibility would be limited to requiring information from the major economic decision makers and to public reporting. It would not have responsibility for mandatory control of either prices or wages.

This is a concept that has been not unknown to us in this country in the last several years. I refer by way of comparison to the Estey commission which examined the steel industry and steel prices in Canada, or to the better known work of the food prices review commission which examined the food industry in the same context.

With respect to the consultative forum, I stress two of the underlying objectives. There are really two elements involved in it. There is the concept of responsibility and that of co-operation.

Responsibility assumes that the private sector will have freedom to come to decisions, but that in doing so there is the expectation that it will take into account the wider impact in the community and the longer term impact on either the union or the company in question if a reasonable balance is upset in economic decision making.

Co-operation assumes a substantial departure from the atmosphere of adversary negotiation in the private sector or from arm's length dealing between the parties. It assumes that there will be a meeting at which the economic aspirations of each particular group can be represented, the group being either union members or shareholders. It will also be assumed that it is not inconsistent with looking after the interests of a particular group that it should meet with others in the community, and that the wider objectives of the community should be taken into account.

Both institutions which are proposed are intended to provide better information in regard to trends in the economy and an understanding of those trends, and also better communication between the major decision makers.

Finally, I turn to comments made by other members in this debate. In addition to the remarks of the hon. member for York-Simcoe we have the advantage of the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in Montreal last week end. I think it is fair to characterize their approach to this particular motion as being that we should bring about an end to controls in the form in which they exist at the present time, but that they should be re-established, albeit for a brief period, in some other form.

I think the shortcomings that I find with that proposal would be both administrative and legal. There is also some question whether the proposed reinstallation of controls, as set out by the Leader of the Opposition last weekend, could be effective.

One of the elements that I did find rather puzzling was the notion in both statements that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs should become the recipient of these activities. Indeed, the hon. member for York-Simcoe said this afternoon that some of the activities of that department would have to be discontinued so that the staff in the department could attend to the monitoring procedures which are now carried out by the Anti-Inflation Board.

Mr. Stevens: Not true.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Well, that is what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. Stevens: No; you were not listening.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): One would have to ask which of the activities of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs would the hon. member cut out. Would it be surveillance over false advertising? Or would it be better and safer labelling on consumer products? Or it could be—and perhaps this is not too far away—easing up on competition and combines investigation. We do not know exactly what activities in consumer and corporate affairs would be eased off; but what we do know is that the task being undertaken by the Anti-Inflation Board would be discontinued suddenly, that the data that the board has and the experience that the board staff have would not be available, or would only be available over time, to the new group, and that there would not be an effective carry-over of administration.

One interesting comment made by the hon. member for York-Simcoe was that the cabinet was to have responsibility in certain cases for rolling back either settlements or wage increases which, after monitoring by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, are found to be beyond acceptable limits, though we do not know from the hon. member what the acceptable limits are.

I think one would have to ask the question: by what law would cabinet roll back wages or price arrangements which were beyond those standards? Not by this law. As a result of adopting this motion, this law would cease to be effective in restraining price and income increases in Canada. One can even raise the question: if you wanted to get back into this parliament under those particular circumstances, how would you get back jurisdiction over the private sector which, in normal circumstances, is a provincial responsibility?

Mr. Fraser: Amend the bill.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member has obviously forgotten that the Supreme Court of Canada has set very narrow limits on Parliament to—

Mr. Fraser: That is your problem. You did not put in a declaration which was effective.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member says that that is my problem if their proposal is not workable. I must say that that is not a very bright comment, but nevertheless it was the comment of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser).

Mr. Fraser: I practised law longer than you did.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member for York-Simcoe, however, introduced a very interesting concept. He said that controls will just be in the background, that the ultimate weapon would be held just in behind, and that we could expect controls to come again. That is a very interesting suggestion. The gentlemen who at this moment are inviting us to take off the controls program are saying that it should be kept back as the ultimate weapon. We know what that is like. President Carter had some experience with that during the election campaign. The prospect of having an ultimate weapon in the background is that there are anticipatory wage and price increases. There was a very kind suggestion from the hon. member for York-Simcoe in that regard.

● (2040)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): There was a very, very interesting suggestion from the hon. members, who were so indignant at the suggestions of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) from time to time, that we may have to look at controls continuing beyond the beginning of this coming year.

The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby provided a broader philosophical base as far as approach is concerned. He will not be surprised if I say that I do not share common ground with him with respect to that philosophical background.

Mr. Stevens: You are both socialists.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I do not share common ground with him with respect to the comment that the free market is an inferior mechanism for effectively allocating benefits in our community and that some kind of a national incomes policy is a more effective method for improving the affairs of Canadians. I respect the fact he may have those different views, but I do not share them with him. This is the hon. member who has been insisting, since the beginning of the program, on free collective bargaining. He told us this afternoon that he and his party would favour a centralized bureaucracy in Ottawa setting a national incomes policy for Canadians. Whatever happened to free collective bargaining which he talked about so much? Whatever happened to the free choice of individual unions and locals for people to negotiate the levels of their incomes?

The hon. member said that there should be a substantial central planning mechanism in Canada. This is not a new concept for him and his colleagues. I disagree with that. It is all very well for him to cite the example of Sweden; but in a federal state what role do provincial governments have in a national planning mechanism founded here in Ottawa and run by the federal bureaucracy? I disagreed with this particular approach to the post-control period. It is a socialist approach, but I have to disagree.

I also have to disagree with the stand taken by the hon. Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues to take off this particular program of controls. This program has substantially public support in Canada. From the figures which I have cited, the program has had a substantial effect in reducing inflation. They want to put in place some kind of vague, ill-defined system of controls for six or 12 months for which there may not be any legislative base. May I suggest to hon. members that that kind of invitation should be turned down, and I look forward to your support in voting with me on Monday night against the proposition which has been put forward.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKenzie: Now we will hear the truth.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Part of it, anyway.

Mr. Speaker, when I listened to the minister defending income and price controls this afternoon and this evening, and when I contrast what he has been saying with the sorts of things he said through 1973 and 1974, as well as the things which his leader said, a rather rough old saying came to mind which I will not use.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Please do.

Mr. Stanfield: Let me simply say that it has often been said that nobody is as fervent as the converted. The minister and all his gang were bitterly opposed to even a short term control. After hearing him tonight, it is quite apparent that he may be in favour of even quite long term controls.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Before interrupting the conversation of the minister and his parliamentary secretary, I should like to refer briefly to some comments made this afternoon by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). He said the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had introduced the program I had advocated in 1974. I should just like to make it very clear that that is not so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: That is not so, particularly in terms of the duration of the program. The Leader of the New Democratic Party referred to the rough justice involved in even a short-term program of controls, and I agree. A program of 18 to 20 months does involve a lot of injustice. I felt strongly that the inevitable injustice involved in that kind of a program was a much better choice than the kind of injustice being perpetrated on millions of Canadians every day by rapid inflation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: In other words, the inflation, and the theft which was taking place through inflation back in 1974, were rougher justice than a short-term program of controls.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party also spoke of planning. I do not share his confidence in the wisdom of government planners.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: He spoke of Sweden and West Germany. There may well be things to be learned from them. When comparing what has been going on in those countries with what has been going on and might go on here, it is important to bear in mind something which the Leader of the New Democratic Party did not mention, and that is the vast difference which exists in the organization of labour and the organization of business in Sweden and West Germany as compared to Canada. In those countries it is possible to have indicative planning indicating what the economy is likely to do during the year and what is most appropriate. You have every available structure, and they are structures to make decisions involving commitments by labour and by business. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has been skating around that here tonight, and that is the root of the problem. He is very busy carrying on a conversation right now.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He does not care.

Mr. Stanfield: I am sure he is involved in a very interesting conversation and a very urgent conversation.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He does not have any royal jelly.

Mr. Stanfield: However, that is his problem and that is the problem of anyone talking about a post-control policy. The minister can read Hansard if he does not want to listen to me tonight, but I should like to indicate to him that it is very difficult to take him and the government seriously on this question of controls or post-controls in view of the contradictory positions and comments made by the Prime Minister over a period of years.

It is generally accepted by everyone that price and income controls can work at best for only a short time. Some deny that they work even for a short time. The minister mentioned the McCracken Committee. As I understand it, that committee, working in connection with the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, recommended that controls should be used only in emergencies, for short terms and not for long terms. What the minister really believes about the duration of controls was not apparent in what he said tonight. What the Prime Minister believes, nobody knows if he even knows himself. Prior to 1975, especially during the election campaign of 1974, he insisted time after time, as did the present Minister of Finance and his colleagues, that controls, even for a short term, had been proven everywhere to be failures. Indeed the Prime Minister, for some reason best known to himself, went to my native town of Truro where he described, and I quote, "controls as a disaster looking for a place to happen".

I do not know why prominent Liberals choose Truro to make silly, categorical, unqualified declarations—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: —which they dishonour within a matter of a few months. The former minister of finance made a pilgrimage to that town and said some very categorical things which he disavowed very quickly. Is there something about my home town that drives Grits like the Prime Minister and Mr. Turner berserk? As far as I know, the present Minister of Finance has not made a fool of himself in Truro. He seems to prefer Toronto.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: It is pretty well agreed by virtually everybody, except the Prime Minister and possibly the Minister of Finance, that the longer controls remain in place, the greater distortions they create, the more they interfere with the evolution of our economy, the more they get in the way of the natural development of our economy, the rougher becomes the justice, and the greater become the injustices these controls create. During the last election campaign and before that I thought this was the Prime Minister's view. I thought it was the view of the Minister of Finance as well.

I know I do not have too much time to take hon. members back through history. However, they will remember that period during the last election, the epoch of the anti-profiteering bill. That was to be the solution to the problems of inflation.

An hon. Member: Where is it now?

Mr. Stanfield: It is not only proper to ask where it is, but where is the minister responsible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Judging from what the Prime Minister is saying and the answers he is giving to questions, he believes that controls are not only appropriate but possible for quite a long period of time. Obviously he believes in them very strongly. He is a very strong convert to controls. For a while the Prime Minister seemed so enamoured with controls that he favoured some permanent apparatus, some permanent intervention in the economy. I am thinking in terms of Christmas, 1975. He got such a reaction from that that he backed away from it, at least verbally.

Who knows what the Prime Minister really believes on this subject? I do not mean any disrespect to the Minister of Finance, but even if I knew his views on this question I would not pay too much attention to them because the views of the Prime Minister will prevail. The former minister of consumer and corporate affairs had some views and we know what happened to him. The immediate predecessor to the Minister of Finance had some views, and we know whose views ultimately prevailed.

I ask myself again, what does the Prime Minister now believe about the role of controls? He said in an interview with Le Monde recently, a very distinguished daily in France, that it would be foolish to remove controls until after an election. The right hon. member has never explained the significance of this mysterious new economic doctrine. I am sure he did not get that idea from Galbraith. You would have to describe it as some kind of post-Galbraithian school.

When the Prime Minister was asked in the House by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) what he meant by that, he chose not to answer the question. Instead he chose to say it would be foolish to remove controls until there is agreement among the principal decision makers to exercise restraint. He said he wanted the firmest possible agreement from these people to exercise voluntary restraint. That answer shows the height of the Prime Minister's cynicism on that subject.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: It might be possible to develop a more ludicrous concept than agreement to exercise voluntary restraint, but one would have to work pretty hard to do it.

A few days later the Minister of Finance, in response to questioning, admitted that it might not be possible to reach such an agreement with the principal decision makers, whoever they are, and a decision to lift controls might have to be made without a firm commitment from the principal decision makers. We all heard the minister tonight. Where do we stand now? Are we really waiting for such an agreement, or is it possible the Minister of Finance or the government will go ahead with decontrol in the absence of such an agreement if they cannot get it? The Minister of Finance certainly did not clarify that tonight.

Did you hear the nature of the commitment the Minister of Finance is demanding from these principal decision makers? If they cannot commit themselves to restraint, whatever that may happen to mean, they will at least commit themselves to urge other people to be restrained.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I want to be fair to the hon. gentleman. I do not blame him for trying to fudge this thing, sending up as much fog as he can, because I do not think that he knows the views of the Prime Minister. I suspect that if the Minister of Finance had his own way these controls would come off, and come off quickly. He probably has some conception of the complexity of this economy and the damage controls are starting to do in Canada.

The Prime Minister, and I say this without offence, has a very strong authoritarian streak. He gives me the impression that he is damn well going to push capital, management and labour in line. He is going to make them behave the way he thinks they ought to behave. That is his position, really tough; unless of course it turns out to be politically expedient to do otherwise.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Hence all the twisting, turning, and double-talk. I might as well be frank. I distrust the Prime Minister very fundamentally, particularly on this subject. He was dishonest in imposing controls. I expected him to be dishonest about removing controls, and I find that is exactly what is happening. Who can have any confidence in what this government will do on this subject?

● (2100)

Then there is the question of the timing of the decontrols. The Prime Minister emphasized this a couple of weeks ago when he was explaining his election stand back in 1974. There is no perfect time for decontrol. This time is as good as any time that the government is likely to have for the purposes of decontrol. There is a slack in the economy, and if the government sits back for reasons of its own and waits until the economic pick up comes along, as the government hopes it will, decontrol will become more and more difficult to achieve because of the prospect of a post-control inflationary bulge. In the meantime, of course, the existence of the controls will deter the pick up in the economy.

Lifting controls now with the safeguards of the sort described by my leader and by the hon. member for York-Simcoe will lead to little significant bulging. That would occur anyway and, as the minister admits, it will be probably in the area of food and certainly in the area of energy and contracts which were rolled back for the period of controls, but not modified, or it is not certain they were modified. The hon. member for York-Simcoe suggested this afternoon how they can be handled, and I judge from what the minister said this evening that he is about to introduce an amendment to do exactly that. So they will not constitute a problem. That problem can be dealt with and there is no need to keep the economy under control for a substantial period to deal with that problem.

In my judgment, price and income controls should be preserved only for those situations in which they are useful, such as emergencies. We had one back in 1973 and 1974 and if, as a general system of controls, even the much less perfect one which I had proposed had been adopted in that period, it would have headed off much of the trouble which our economy has experienced and much of the difficulty that the Minister of Finance and the Canadian people are so concerned about today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The government would not act then for purely political reasons, just as it introduced controls in 1975 for purely political reasons. The government introduced controls in 1975 when the horse was just about all the way out of the door. The only thing they were able to catch was his tail.

The minister talks about the success of the program to date. I can argue about that. Some of my colleagues will argue about that. In my opinion that is not the issue in this motion. To me the issue is whether the controls should stay on or come off. However, I cannot help quoting the minister. There are a couple of things he said in the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs on May 26, 1977. He said:

> . . . indeed prices have been held down as much by the competitive factor as by the anti-inflation program.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I said that again here.

Mr. Stanfield: I listened very carefully to the minister and he did not say that.

At the same meeting of the committee he said:

> May I correct that? It was more by competitive factors than by the anti-inflation program.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: I have limited time and I am not interested in arguing to what extent the policy and the program have been successful thus far. I am concerned about the future. What I do insist on is what I insisted on in 1973, 1974 and 1975, that is, that a policy of controls play a role for only a short time. I think I have been consistent and, if I may say so with my usual modesty, I think I have been consistently right on this issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It must be very comforting personally.

Mr. Mazankowski: A lot more comfortable than you are.

Mr. Stanfield: The minister objects to interruptions on his side. Let him heed his own advice.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Quite right.

Mr. Stanfield: Again we have a double standard being applied.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is listening to you now.

Mr. Stanfield: Throughout 1973, 1974, 1975, 1976 and 1977 the government has been playing games with the people of Canada on this subject, and it is still doing so.

I think controls should be held in reserve to meet future emergencies. I do not object to the government, my own party or some other party, coming back to the House at some point and saying that we need short term controls to deal with a runaway inflationary psychology in this country. I am concerned about other things, that is, that by keeping these controls on the whole approach will become discredited and we will lose a valuable weapon for dealing with emergency inflationary situations.

Canada has serious economic problems today, but they are not problems that price and incomes controls can solve, or aid in solving. There are certain vested interests in the continuation of controls. It is pretty inevitable that this sort of thing will develop. I dare say there are some provincial governments that find it easy to deal with problems of their public servants, for example, or their pay problems, under a national program of controls. It may suit certain captains of industry to have this kind of program continue. It may be more convenient for them in terms of solving some of what they consider to be their labour problems. On the other hand, it may very well be that there are a good many small businessmen who are not controlled and who quite enjoy seeing some other people under controls. That is a pretty common attitude. It is often pleasant to see other people controlled when you are quite free yourself to act according to your own free judgment.

I do not think I am exaggerating when I quote the minister as having said that the real problem with getting rid of controls is to persuade the Canadian people that they should be taken off. I would be quite prepared to admit that if you have controls for a substantial period of time, they are difficult to get rid of. For example, you get more and more people with a vested interest in their continuance. But for the minister to suggest that there is any real problem in getting rid of controls because of the views of the Canadian people is pretty ridiculous.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I would think also that the minister might like to expunge some of the guilt on his conscience for his past behaviour, that of his leader and his colleagues, by proposing for once something that they would consider to be in the interests of the people of Canada rather than to their own political advantage.

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The minister is smiling. He does not mind losing debates; it is only elections he minds losing.

• (2110)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I haven't had any experience at that.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is coming for you.

Mr. Stanfield: May I just close on this note: this economy is very complex. I do not think anybody understands how complex it is until he finds himself in the position of dealing with something like general tax reform, or in the position Jean-Luc Pepin has been in. I am sure Jean-Luc Pepin fully understands the complexity of this economy. I think perhaps he does have sufficient experience, but I do not think I have heard him advocate the continuance of the controls since he left his position.

We ought not to hobble our economy to make it a little easier for a relatively few people to discharge their responsibilities. It does not impress me very much that some provincial governments, for example, may be advocating the continuation of controls, because I think they have special interests in this situation. It does not impress me that certain captains of industry may be advocating it because they may have special interests too. We ought not to hobble our economy to make it easier, as I said, for a relatively few people to discharge their responsibilities or to permit the Prime Minister to force the economy of this country into a mold of his making. The controls should come off on the terms outlined by my leader and by the hon. member for York-Simcoe.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, so far this has been a fascinating debate. It is indeed an honour to be able to participate in it. In a way it could be said that the prophet from Halifax may always have been right, but it can also be said, after listening carefully to his disciple from York-Simcoe, that his disciple is pretty weak. I will explain later.

I recall very clearly in the question periods and in other circumstances in early 1974 when the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) and the prophet from Halifax were asking this government whether it had any emergency plans vis-à-vis inflation. They asked what the government would do if inflation got out of hand. All that is in Hansard, and it can be found in many press reports. The answer from the government was to the effect that, if inflation became an emergency, this government did have plans and would introduce them.

Mr. Fraser: You denied that during the election, Charles.

Mr. Caccia: We never denied that, even during the election.

Mr. Fraser: Basford did in Vancouver.

Mr. Caccia: We did say that if there was an emergency, we would put our plans into effect. The difference between the Tories and the Liberals was a matter of judgment as to when to bring in controls and as to when they were necessary.

In 1974 we said that we would not fight inflation on the backs of wage and salary earners. That is what the Tories were prepared to do. In 1975 we saw rents and prices getting out of hand. We saw wage settlements of up to 60 per cent and 70 per cent. At that time it was evident that there was an emergency. For the very reasons mentioned by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) earlier we were reluctant in bringing in controls because we knew, as—the hon. member quite rightly said—that once we were into controls it would be very difficult to come out. I agree with the hon. member on that.

Mr. Fraser: Remember "Zap, you're frozen"?

Mr. Caccia: Let me deal for a moment with the disciple from York-Simcoe and the policy he put to us this afternoon. He said in essence that controls are not working and wondered what would happen after June 30, and so do I. I listened to the hon. member very carefully, and the essence of his speech centered around the typical Tory philosophy that the market place will take care of inflation: on this he is hinging his policy. That is his answer as to what would happen if we were to vote for the motion before us tonight. However, did he tell us what the inflation rate might be if we had not introduced the controls? None of the opposition speakers have addressed themselves to that.

What kind of inflation rate would we have had during the past 20 months or so if controls had not been introduced, despite the distortions in the economy? If we were to remove controls on June 30, what kinds of institutions would the Progressive Conservative party bring in to replace what we have now?

Mr. Stevens: Read the speech.

Mr. Caccia: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has already dealt with this. How many jobs would be created by the removal of controls?

Mr. Stevens: More than you are creating.

Mr. Caccia: We have not heard anything. All we have heard is that so many jobs were created in the past so many months under the controls, but we don't know what the alternative would be if controls were removed. If controls were to be removed, what levels of inflation would we be heading for? It was staggering to me to hear the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) suggest that a good reason for removing controls is the explosion in the growth of bank assets. He told us how much they have been growing in the past so many months or so many years, and he told us that this is one of the reasons we should remove controls. The logic of that baffles me.

Mr. Stevens: We'll explain it to you sometime.

Mr. Caccia: Before analyzing other recommendations made by Tory spokesmen let me say that I agree with one thing which was said this afternoon, namely, that professional and executive incomes have not been controlled adequately. On that he was dead on, and I share his view.

However, the first recommendation put forward by the hon. member for York-Simcoe was that the orders of the Anti-Inflation Board should last for the period for which they were proclaimed, beyond June 30. The logic of the hon. member is that we should remove the law but retain the orders. Well, it does not take a legislative genius to realize that once you remove a law, the orders which were proclaimed under that law also go by the wayside.

Mr. Stevens: What do you think the minister is proposing to do?

Mr. Caccia: Certain Anti-Inflation Board orders cannot exist in a vacuum. We cannot have those orders if we remove the legislative powers from which they flow.

Mr. Stevens: You didn't listen to your own minister.

Mr. Caccia: I listened to the hon. member for York-Simcoe, and I am replying to him. If that was not the case, we would not have so many so-called bubble clauses which have been agreed upon in various collective agreements which exist right now. Those clauses would come into force immediately upon the removal of this legislation and the dismantling of the board. That is point number one.

• (2120)

As his second point he would have the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs do some kind of monitoring. Unfortunately the department would not have the legislative power to do that if the controls are removed by June 30. Then, the hon. member for York-Simcoe would subject union contracts and collective agreements to a 30-day delay and have cabinet consider them and roll back excessive settlements. If he had wanted to devise a system to tie up cabinet and make it totally impotent he could not have found a better scheme.

The ultimate weapon would be that, having started with a measure enforcing orders by the Anti-Inflation Board, the legislative carpet would then be pulled from under them.

And finally with point number four he offers a return to wage and price controls. He indeed demonstrates how to go around in circles without even trying hard. That is the only way I can describe the effort of the disciple, the hon. member for York-Simcoe. That is the essence of his exercise in policy making in the late 1970's—economics of perhaps 20 or 30 or 50 years ago. What a disaster, Mr. Speaker! I could not believe my ears. The Conservative party missed an opportunity to offer alternatives when, as persons interested in the well-being of this economy, we were looking forward to hearing their alternatives.

Mr. Stevens: Let us hear yours.

Mr. Caccia: Ours may not be perfect and we admit that, but at least it works and has been accepted by Canadians. At least the NDP offered a basic definition of principles typical of that party, although we do not share them. I was puzzled by the idea of a national incomes policy because, as I understand the meaning of the phrase, it would mean interfering with the collective bargaining process and then having to come back to something similar to what is already in place now. In essence it would mean that by June 30 we should do away with something that has proven itself and which we are trying to improve—and replace it with something that requires a fundamental change in our economic and social structures, structures that we are far from having reached, as the hon. member for Halifax said. The alternative put forward by the NDP was a nice exercise in theoretical analysis of what could be done in outer space, but it is something that cannot be done in Canada in 1977 A.D.

I am tempted to think that if the NDP were not so strongly supported by strong organizations they would freely and happily support the policy we now have through the Anti-Inflation Board. This is really a form of economic controls and economic planning that they would otherwise be quite happy to endorse, but which they apparently cannot for reasons of their own.

I have already outlined briefly why we adopted controls and what we said in 1974. It can be claimed that controls have served Canadians well, otherwise they would not have the support of the population which the hon. member for Halifax referred to when he spoke of political convenience on our part. Instead, from our point of view, from the rough beginnings in October and November of 1975 we have come a long way in developing a consensus and acceptance of these measures across the country, when at that time it almost seemed as if we were reaching for the impossible and when we were very unpopular for doing so.

The opposition seems to forget that this government had the courage and determination needed to introduce a measure which it knew would be highly unpopular in the beginning. It was very hot in the kitchen at that time, being criticized here everyday and every weekend in the riding, but 20 months later we are reaping the benefits of that approach.

It seems to me that we should not end controls at this point. They were introduced because we had an emergency in inflation. When inflation hovers around 6 per cent or 7 per cent and is accompanied by high levels of unemployment, the emergency continues to exist as long as we have high levels of unemployment. There is therefore good reason for continuing the controls, not only until the end of 1978 but beyond that if unemployment remains high.

It begins to be quite clear that inflation at the rate we know it is standing in the way of the creation of new jobs and the reduction of unemployment. There is a link between the two—a necessity to bring down inflation in order to bring down unemployment. Anyone in this House who urges the government to do something about unemployment but who does not support its policies to bring down inflation is forgetting this essential link in the economic conditions of the seventies which are different from the economic conditions and symptoms of previous years.

.I would urge the Anti-Inflation Board to be more conscious of fees and executive salaries, however. This is an area in which we seem to have failed, at least partially, to exert the controls that have been exerted on other sectors of the population. The Anti-Inflation Board must do a better job in this area.

I also think we must have a program of income support for the low income earners. They get the short end of the stick and are more intensely affected in inflationary times. There are the groups that suffer during a prolonged period of inflation both in rural Canada and the industrial areas. An income support program would help them make ends meet.

Controls are a measure that result from a new set of economic conditions in the world, not only in Canada. We see the controls as a bridge to a new approach to the solution of economic problems. We are searching for the answers and, in doing so, have put in place this policy which will provide us with breathing space and permit us to devise the new levers we shall need to deal with a new economic order.

The Conservatives will continue to speak of our free market place, and God bless them for it! That is the kind of dinosaur approach we shall gladly leave with them. I say to them, have a good trip. So long as the Conservatives believe in the free market place they will remain in opposition.

As for the NDP, it continues to speak of a fully planned economy. We, as Liberals, believe in a flexible approach. We like to find an answer which comes between those two extremes. Though it may be difficult to find, I am confident that, given time and the opportunity, we shall find it.

The emergency which existed in late 1975 led to the introduction of this program, which has had an impact on inflation. The emergency exists so long as we have high unemployment. How are we to bring down unemployment? We can do it, I suggest, by introducing policies which will lead to a disciplined economy, to confidence in the economy, to a stable economy, and therefore to a climate of confidence which will induce investment in the economy. That is where we differ from the Progressive Conservatives.

We believe that if we have a smoothly working system of controls we will have discipline in the economy, and that entrepreneurs will be ready to expand their operations. They will have confidence in the future of our economy and so will provide the investment we need in order to create new jobs. If we do as the Conservatives say, our future will be uncertain, for no one will know what the inflation rate will be in three months, or six months. If we adopt the kind of scheme the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) proposes, we would give the private sector the excuse not to invest and to expand this economy, an expansion we need to create new employment.

We all know the effects of inflation. They make us less competitive with other countries. Therefore inflation endangers our jobs at home and makes us less able to sell our products at home and abroad. Second, inflation shifts purchasing power from low to high income groups. That is why I spoke earlier about the necessity of income support programs, or a guaranteed income for lower income groups such as the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has advocated in recent years.

If we adopted the proposal of the hon. member for York-Simcoe, within a short time the official opposition would scream about high wage settlements. They would raise hell about it. They would be the first to complain of high wage settlements. As for the NDP, if we do what they suggest, what would happen? They would scream about high profits and high prices. Mr. Speaker, the reaction would come from the other side of the House. The opposition would criticize, and within a short time would ask the government to enact corrective measures.

We Liberals will stand up and vote against this proposal because we want to protect unorganized workers, to protect pensioners and all those not represented by strong groups in society, those who are hardest hit and most devastatingly affected by the evils of inflation. We believe that the government's policy and program, imperfect though they may be because of shortcomings, are by far the better approach, and serve the interests of Canadians better than would the adoption of the proposal the Conservatives have put forward today for debate.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member who just resumed his seat intends to vote against the motion. I would not want to be on his side, for I do not agree with his arguments on this important subject.

I wish to lend my support to this motion because I do not believe there is a legitimate reason for retaining controls, with the possible exception of standby controls which may be needed if something unusual happens in the economy. Any value the controls may have had initially is now exhausted. I myself did not feel controls should ever have been instituted, and certainly not in the present situation. We were not at war, as we were in the 1940's. In the war years controls were necessary, I feel, though experience then indicated that disparities and inequities were the result.

There are many reasons for lifting these controls. Some suspect the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government of wanting ever-increasing controls to remain part of our economic and social future. The Prime Minister's statement, in his now famous speech delivered before Christmas, 1975, to the effect that the free market is no longer operating and could not be allowed to function has been received unfavourably almost by everyone. It must have been a severe blow to the Prime Minister when the federal green paper on decontrol said, "It is the wish of most Canadians to maintain and strengthen this mixed economy with the great preponderance of economic decisions taking place within the private sector." That statement was supposed to reassure those who were afraid controls would be made permanent. Nevertheless, many in this country are growing increasingly afraid that the government will so like controls it will keep them in place indefinitely.

Again, the green paper on decontrols had this to say: "The challenges of operating a healthy and stable economy without mandatory controls must be met."

Canada is not only in serious economic difficulty but in serious political difficulty. Yesterday I noticed a newspaper report saying that Mr. Laurin, the Quebec minister in charge of Bill C-1, suggested that even if 23,000 jobs are lost in the province of Quebec, it is the risk the province may just have to take if it is to realize the broader social goals of its language bill. It shows how sincere is the desire for political independence in Quebec, and how sincerely the present government of that province is willing to pursue it.

Once more we confront the serious problem of unemployment. The headlines in yesterday's Montreal Gazette note that the jobless gap is growing wider between Quebec and the rest of the nation. One article said 274,000 people in Quebec are without a job now, as compared to 215,000 one year ago. There are in Canada, according to the last statistics published in May, 824,000 Canadians out of work, something like 116,000 more than one year ago—and this despite the substantial numbers of people who have dropped out of the labour force and are not even counted.

According to yesterday's newspaper, Mr. Parizeau, the Quebec minister of finance, said his government will seek a simple and elementary economic association with the rest of Canada if Quebec secedes. He told a group of economists at Fredericton that the Quebec and federal governments are like two boxers dancing round each other in the ring without striking any blow. He is quoted as saying, "We do not know how long this circling will continue but at some point confrontation will appear and, Mr. Speaker, it will not just be politics or your political institutions that will be affected. It will also be our economy and our whole ability to carry on the economic base on which the money services of our country is set." He went on to list some of the great problems at the federal-provincial level which Ottawa causes, because of a lack of consultation. He remarked on the problem of Hydro Quebec trying to set income projections for that utility, and he noted that Ottawa's regional development policies in Quebec have left a general impression of failures. So much for the DREE efforts of Mr. Marchand, who boasted of the many millions of dollars his department had put into areas around his riding.

Then there are the pronouncements of senior civil servants who are getting into the act on what is good for the country. We find Mr. Johnson of the CBC stating that only massive expenditures through the CBC can keep the country together. He wants to make it the principal cultural force in the battle for Canadianism. He is quoted as saying: "I am going to be as fighting, aggressive, bold, loud and as honestly nationalistic as I am capable of being." But his main contentions, if followed, would mean an enormous increase in the amount of money that the taxpayers spend on their CBC. If anything can be called a failure in Canadian institutions, surely it is the CBC. Are we going to follow this route and further enormously expand a government body that is obviously a failure?

Senior civil servants also seem to be getting into the act in an unprecedented way. Mr. Gordon Robertson, in a memorable speech in Halifax on Canadian unity, has been fashioning a hair shirt for the Anglophones in this country and accusing them of being the cause of Canadian disunity, and Mr. Shoyama has taken to the public media to denounce politicians in Alberta and Quebec for speaking out on the oil issue. These are statements from powerful civil servants such as we have never heard before in our country.

Now for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). I do feel a little sorry for him. Mr. McGillivray, writing in the Gazette of June 3, said that if the minister quits this year he will have made less of a mark on Canadian fiscal history than any other finance minister since Mr. Nowlan, who didn't even have time to present a budget. Why has he been destined to get a footnote instead of a chapter in the history of Canada? Well, he has had his problems. There is a mood of public pessimism and a loss of confidence in the government. There is a demand for restraint in government spending and we are faced with a huge budget deficit. With unemployment at about 8 per cent and with a huge balance of payments deficit the minister does have his problems. But he seems to have been only a caretaker finance minister, a reluctant dragon acting as a temporary incumbent who has not had the time or opportunity to launch new policies or initiate new strategies. Certainly his role has seemed to be to defend policies rather than make them.

The wage and price controls program has been the policy of the Prime Minister yet it is for this that the time spent by the minister in the finance department will be remembered. It was the Prime Minister who said that controls should stay on until the next election, and the minister stated he was just a simple soldier, implying that he took orders rather than gave them. When the minister goes this year his successor will inherit a $7.2 billion budget deficit, a dismal combination of high unemployment, high inflation, and a bureaucracy which has run out of ideas. It is obvious there are severe constraints on the government's ability to manage the economy and that it is time for changes and for bold action.

And what about the record of inflation? The primary cause of a reduction in inflation has been the reduction in the price of food at the farm gate brought about by bountiful harvests and a readjustment of the commodities markets around the world. The government can take no credit for this and, furthermore, prices of imported goods receded.

There is growing up a widespread feeling that anti-inflation measures tend to favour one group over another. The idea that some can receive much more than others does not sit well with the public. The fact is that more capital investment is leaving Canada than is entering after decades the other way around. Wage and price controls can only be a short term thing, supplementary at best. John K. Galbraith, for example, makes it clear that an income and price policy does not replace a monetary and fiscal policy. He states:

> It supplements it in that part of the modern economy where market control of prices and incomes has given way to private administration and where restraint on aggregate demand brings not lower prices but brings unemployment.

Our own Simon Reisman has stated:

> Controls can provide time in which to re-establish sound monetary and fiscal policies. They establish a political framework in which governments can constrain wage pressures from their own large and growing public service unions.

Milton Friedman states:

> There is no problem about how to stop inflation. We know how to do it. Every economist knows how to do it. I can specify it very simply. The only way to cure inflation is for the government to spend less and print less. The only way to cure inflation is to hold down the growth in the quantity of money. There is no other way to do it. There is no other device which will enable us to slow down inflation. The problem, however, is not how to stop inflation. The problem is to have the political will to do so.

We are faced with a sluggish economy. We are faced with the fact that we can become addicted to controls and use them as a convenient crutch, as an excuse in handling tough business decisions. We have become uncompetitive in world markets in fields in which we have traditionally been effective participants. A continuing control program can only heighten inefficencies and make them even less competitive.

It is now agreed by all, even by those who support controls, that in the long run the retention of controls will seriously reduce the investment necessary to produce the new jobs down the road.

The stock market has not responded to the budget as it should have done, partly because profit margins are being contained by the AIB investment rules. There are many disadvantages to the AIB operations. It has to use rollback power. It has to give the impression that it is controlling wages. But it is very difficult to be fair in all aspects. The long Thompson dispute showed the difficulty of equating increases in wages in the historic wage pattern enjoyed by workers in Thompson as compared to those in Sudbury. The longer the anti-inflation controls remain, the more distorted our economy will become. Mr. Earle McLaughlin, ex president of the Royal Bank of Canada, said in January: "Let the government declare the war won and jettison the entire AIB apparatus, and, the sooner the better."

There is little convincing evidence that prices and costs are very much different now than they would have been in the absence of the control program. Government policy may have helped to sustain economic activity in Canada during the past two or three years but the United States far outpaced Canadian growth in 1976 and probably will have a considerably better economic performance this year. The United States does not have a control program at this time but the recession was much more effective in reducing inflationary expectations than was Canada's anti-inflation program. Consumer prices, including food, rose in 1976 by 9.5 per cent in Canada compared with 6.6 per cent in the United States. Wage settlements rose by about half of the Canadian increases in the past four years. So there is grave doubt as to whether the action of the government has materially helped to reduce inflation in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, it was our party only which voted against the government on third reading of both Bill C-73 and Bill C-89 and I am happy it has taken advantage of the procedure which provides for this motion to be debated. There has been a significant deterioration in the inflation picture. The consumer price index is rising at a higher rate now than at Christmas, and other price indices show that controls no longer contain inflation. Mr. Turner, the previous finance minister, announced that there was a restraint program in effect since June of 1975, but the main federal spending estimates have increased by 28 per cent. Since that time the narrow measures of money supply increased by 16 per cent while wider measures record increases of 31 per cent; that is M1 and M2. Controls no longer work, and federal restraint is non-existent.

If the federal government and the provincial governments control the money supply in a reasonable way, increases in the public sector will be dampened by the high degree of slack in the economy. This should result in a slowing of wage and price demands and accordingly a lower risk of a renewed wage and price problem. Certainly we need business recovery and business investment, and to ensure this the administration must adopt a proper fiscal stance. There is no doubt about it that the AIB must be regarded as of importance in assessing one's business decisions.

As a professional myself who has had to report to the Anti-Inflation Board, I can vouch for the complexity of the forms that have to be filled out to meet even minimum compliance. They were so complicated I could not even begin to fill them out. It cost $1,000 to fill them out to comply with the so-called protected category. The professionals and self-employed have a so-called ceiling of $2,400 which may be exceeded if there is more productivity—again something very difficult to prove but one which annoys very hard working people who find themselves held to a much smaller rate of increase. This ceiling has created a great deal of unhappiness and a feeling of frustration among working people.

My colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), has put forward suggestions by which our party might establish a reasonable decontrol program and which would, I think, be an improvement on what the green paper has suggested. The Prime Minister has mentioned the need for business and labour to meet and to reach decisions that will decrease the inflation process and deal with price problems. But this consultation process should be much larger than just large labour and large business. It must include consumers and producers and more junior governments, both provincial and municipal. I will not dwell on these suggestions which I think bear merit and might well be incorporated into government measures. But, Mr. Speaker, all will come to naught unless the governments make fundamental changes as compared to what they have done in the past.

Someone has said that since the era of Alexander the Great wars always created inflation. The one thing they have in common is massive intervention in the economy by the government. Up until recent years, inflation occurred in western nations whenever wars existed and it was necessary for governments to take into the economy many hundreds of thousands of soldiers and those who worked in the munitions factories, whether they made guns or swords.

But in recent years in western democracy there has grown up a new phenomenon—the massive transfer of funds to government agencies for our many welfare and socially oriented programs. These programs are obviously very acceptable and do a great deal to alleviate harsh social conditions, but they also seem, when carried to extreme, to be a potent factor for increasing the inflation rate in the economy. The last ten years have seen a massive increase in these social programs as they rush toward maturity. It is probably safe to say that many of these programs were not seen to be expensive when they were put into effect. Introduction of the old age pension and Canada pension along with the rapid increase in inflation made the value of savings extremely doubtful, at least for bonds, trusts, and the usual form of savings instruments.

The government has just recently brought into the House a measure to tax savings in insurance companies. Although the tax may not be retroactive, it already shows how government action can interfere with the long term plans of the individual and erase much of the savings that he might have expected to accrue. On strictly ethical grounds it probably can be justified but it makes reliance on long term savings more doubtful. It becomes obvious to the individual that he cannot plan ahead. If he does, almost certainly the government will change the rules of the game and he will find he is quite severely penalized. The inflation rate increases the doubtful value of savings and hence makes us a consumer group of citizens—better to take a foreign trip than to save money which steadily loses its value. This probably is one of the reasons why our foreign trade deficit in tourism is so high. Therefore the percentage of the GNP which the government takes must be carefully regulated. Obviously, if it takes too much, productivity will decrease because the worker will work less and less.

Recent figures indicate that the government's share of the GNP may have stabilized. It is to be hoped that this is so. I think one of the most important weapons in the fight against inflation is that governments not take more than they have from the GNP. Otherwise we will be in trouble.

There are a good many obvious causes of inflation, but the prime one is government policy and government practices, either directly by spending, borrowing or control of the money supply. There are also myriad government rules on business operations and the cost of complying, as well as indirectly by nudging up pay scales, such as minimum wages, and finally if wages rise faster than the value of goods and services produced.

While I have said that in the past wars took most of our money, today our welfare and social programs are taking up the slack. We are enjoying many of the things we have promised ourselves such as medicare. These social programs are very good, but when their cost exceeds production it can only aggravate inflation. The most important factor in controlling inflation is obviously control of government expenditure, and it must be controlled at a reasonable rate or the GNP will be exceeded and inflation will result.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Ten o'clock.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Earlier there were discussions with the government House leader and the House leader of the New Democratic Party, and again tonight with the hon. member opposite, with respect to the hours of sitting during the course of this debate on the statutory order, and it has been agreed that on days when the House sits in the evening the debate will end at ten o'clock. I think my colleagues will confirm that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is the understanding we reached, namely, that we would adjourn tonight at ten o'clock and that we will do the same on Monday night.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, that is the situation as explained to me by the parliamentary secretary to the House leader, and I am in agreement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed that the House adjourn this debate at ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is agreed and so ordered.

It being ten o'clock this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 10.01 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Special Order.

DOMINION DAY

PROPOSAL THAT POLITICAL LEADERS PARTICIPATE IN CELEBRATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. One year ago in this House I objected to the cancellation of the festivities on Parliament Hill which normally took place on Dominion Day. In light of the recent recognition by the government of Canada that a display of "flag waving patriotism" is not such a bad idea, and in view of the fact that a vast majority of Canadians want an opportunity to display their love and pride of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Minister of State responsible for the Dominion Day Parliament Hill activities incorporate in a prominent way the man who refers to himself as the only living Father of Confederation, Joseph R. Smallwood, and the only living former prime minister, the distinguished right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), and indeed the national leaders of the other political parties so that a national perspective and non-partisan spirit would prevail in the celebration on Parliament Hill in this first decade of our century.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTION SOVIET UNION LIVE UP TO TERMS OF HELSINKI AGREEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 seeking unanimous consent on an urgent and pressing matter. In the spirit of the motion moved by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz), and agreed to by the House unanimously on Wednesday, June 15, in connection with the Belgrade Conference on the Helsinki Final Act, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House call on the representatives of Canada at the conference to make it clear to the delegates from the Soviet Union that the people of Canada expect the Soviet Union to live up to the promises made by all the countries which signed the Helsinki Charter, and to permit Soviet citizens who wish to leave that country to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

HEALTH

REASON FOR PERMITTING ALLEGEDLY INADEQUATE MEDICAL DEVICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43. In view of the statement made by the assistant deputy minister in the Department of National Health and Welfare recently that as a result of faulty testing devices, a large number of the abortion procedures initiated in this country are performed on women who are not in fact pregnant, and in view of the minister's reported characterization of a number of medical devices, such as anaesthetic machines, incubators and heart pacers, as being as inadequate as they were "frightening", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday):

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare make a statement on motions explaining why he has allowed an intolerable threat to the health of Canadians to develop in the form of inadequately regulated medical devices.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

APPROVAL OF ACTION OF GOVERNMENT IN SUPPORTING PRICE OF URANIUM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Whereas in the early 1970's the United States government saw fit to close its borders to foreign uranium; and whereas other producing countries, including Canada, could no longer compete for that large market; and whereas it was in the national interest of Canada to maintain a uranium industry for the ongoing health of communities such as Elliot Lake; and whereas United States companies continued to compete aggressively in other world markets during this period; and whereas the Canadian government was a member of a producers group which maintained a base export price; and whereas a committee of the U.S. Congress has, over Canadian objections, released confidential Canadian government documents and is thereby determining what is in the Canadian public interest, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac):

That this House support the action the Canadian government took in belonging to a producers group which was necessary for the economic survival of the Canadian uranium industry and that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should make a strong official protest to the American government in this matter of extra territorial application of American law in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Before such a motion can be presented the unanimous consent of the House must be obtained. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: No!

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ENDORSATION OF CITIZENS' RIGHT TO COMPLAIN ABOUT SITUATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43. My motion is prompted by recent statements by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) to the effect that Canadians are a society of bitchers. In the light of the mess Canada is in, with an all-time high of over one million unemployed, record inflation due to excessive printing of money, uncontrolled government spending, a record debt and record borrowing—to name just a few problems caused by the Liberal government, which has proven to be the most irresponsible group of elected officials in Canadian history—and since it is the democractic right of every citizen to complain about such problems, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That this House endorse the right of every citizen to complain about the disastrous economic state of the nation and that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce publicly apologize to all Canadians for his statement that we are a society of bitchers.

Mr. Chrétien: I just have to listen to you to be convinced!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE—POSSIBILITY COMMERCIAL SANCTIONS AGAINST UGANDA DISCUSSED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by welcoming back to Canada and the House of Commons the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I want to say that we on this side of the House are particularly pleased that on the question of Uganda the Prime Minister has now moved toward the position which he and his colleagues rejected in a Standing Order 43 moved by my colleague, the right hon. member for Prince Albert, four months ago tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether the Commonwealth conference discussed the possibility, in addition to their statement of condemnation, of undertaking commercial sanctions against Uganda.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the question was discussed. In writing the final communiqué a decision was taken not to take any step in that direction. There was not enough preparation of the step and not enough consensus concerning the step.

Mr. Clark: That speaks of the consensus among all the members of the Commonwealth. We would like to know what the position of the government of Canada is on that question. As the Prime Minister knows, the United Nations Security Council resolutions now in effect call for a complete interdiction of trade against countries such as Rhodesia, except for humanitarian and medical needs. I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether Canada will apply the same kind of economic sanctions against Uganda.

Mr. Trudeau: No doubt, Mr. Speaker, if the United Nations Security Council and the United Nations itself decided to extend the boycott to Uganda as it does to Rhodesia, we would support it.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see that the Prime Minister in his absence has lost nothing of the fealty of the Liberal party to the policy of waiting for somebody else to initiate action.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Minister of Justice waits for the city of Toronto and the province of Quebec to start inquiries that he should start. I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he will show some leadership here and not wait for other agencies, nations or groups to act, and will tell us now whether the government of Canada, acting on its own, making its own decisions, will apply those kinds of sanctions against Uganda?

Mr. Trudeau: When the hon. member says "those kinds of sanctions against Uganda" I would really like to know what he has in mind. If he wants us to do towards Uganda what we are doing towards Rhodesia, the answer is no, but if the hon. member has a list of countries of whose policies he disapproves and with which he wants us to interrupt commercial relations, I would be happy to have it.

REASON FOR TREATING UGANDA DIFFERENTLY FROM RHODESIA

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): What we would like to know, so that we might have some idea as to whether there is any substance or just public relations to what went on in London, is why the government of Canada is going to treat Uganda in a different way from the way it is treating Rhodesia.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Very rarely do the nations of the world and the United Nations decide collectively to extend sanctions to one country. They have done this for Rhodesia but for no other country, and that is the reason.

COMMONWEALTH GAMES

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON BARRING UGANDA AND PRESIDENT AMIN FROM PARTICIPATION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question about Uganda's participation in the Commonwealth Games. Last week in London the Prime Minister stated that if Idi Amin uses the Ugandan team to glorify his name or his regime, it would be barred from the games. Of course, that ignores the question of how we would tell if the Ugandan team were glorifying the president until it actually arrived on the scene. I want to report to the Prime Minister that while he was away the Secretary of State for External Affairs told the House that it would be highly unlikely that Amin would be invited in any event. There seems to be some equivocation in the position stated by a minister of the Crown, whom I heard whisper to the Prime Minister that he was only expressing a personal opinion. I think this cloud of equivocation should be cleared up. Can the Prime Minister tell the House whether it is the government's intention that Uganda be barred from the Commonwealth Games this year?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not see the contradiction that the hon. member is pointing out between what the minister said and what I said. If President Amin comes as a weightlifter or a javelin thrower, as a sportsman, then I would consider the matter. However, we do not know that he is a member of any athletic team, and therefore the question is hypothetical.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister knows that Amin is a grand basketball player. Perhaps the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain could be used as the ball. But the Prime Minister did not answer my question. It was a very clear one. Would the Prime Minister tell the House whether it is the intention of the government that Uganda be barred from the games? That is a pretty straightforward question.

While he is dealing with that, would he also be prepared to deal with the statement made by the Ugandan High Commissioner to Canada, who stated that it would be a good idea for Amin to visit Canada. I do not believe the Canadian people would agree with what the High Commissioner said, and I hope the Prime Minister would not agree. Would the Prime Minister make it clear that President Amin is barred from this country?

So there are two questions: What is the intention of the government with respect to barring Uganda from participating in the games, and what is the position of the government with respect to allowing Amin to come into this country?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if Uganda plans to send a team of athletes to the games. This is what I answered in London. As far as I can see, the question is hypothetical. If Uganda decides to send a team, including its leader, we will then study the circumstances of that. I would not say in advance that we would automatically bar Uganda. That would very much depend on whether they were planning to come and on the circumstances under which they would come. As far as the leader is concerned, the question is completely hypothetical. There has been no invitation extended to General Amin to come to Canada, and therefore I do not see what the hon. member wants me to answer. I just remind the hon. member that there are 60 Canadians in Uganda, and we do not want their lives to be jeopardized.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SUGGESTED APPEAL OF SENTENCE IMPOSED ON THREE POLICEMEN IN QUEBEC

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister on a different subject. In the past the Prime Minister has shown deep and genuine concern about civil liberties and the principle of the rule of law. On June 10 in this House the Minister of Justice said, and I quote: "The police forces of this country, including the RCMP, are as subject to the criminal law of the country as any other citizen". The Minister of Justice went on to say in the same statement in this House on that date that if a violation of the law took place by the RCMP, "the proper action will be taken". Considering that the three policemen, including one senior RCMP officer, who admitted their guilt in taking part in an illegal break-in in Montreal have been given an unconditional pardon, will the Prime Minister request the minister of justice in Quebec to appeal this decision?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will consider the suggestion. I do not know what intention the minister of justice of Quebec has in this regard. I understand he has announced the institution of an inquiry. I do not know if he wants to pursue the judicial matter any further. The hon. member realizes that the administration of justice in this case comes under the jurisdiction of the attorney general of the province of Quebec. However, I will try to find out what his intentions are.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that answer. It is remarkably different in substance and tone from the answer given in the House yesterday by the Minister of Justice. However, considering that the inquiry which has been launched by the government of Quebec into this incident may go on for some weeks, and indeed, some months, considering the very important principle of the rule of law that the same law must be seen to apply to the police forces of Canada as it does to ordinary citizens, and if the inquiry which is now under way produces no early recommendation on this specific decision—let us say in the next couple of weeks—would the Prime Minister undertake, as the leading citizen of Canada, to request the minister of justice of Quebec to appeal this particular decision?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will consult with the Minister of Justice on this matter.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR TARIFF PROTECTION FOR BROILER CHICKENS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

Since I gave him notice of my question, I hope that he will be in a position to give me a clear answer. In view of the fact that a press release from the office of the Minister of Agriculture mentions that the cabinet has approved as a matter of policy a marketing board for broiler chickens, and since the setting up of such a board is a rather long process, could the minister assure the poultry producers that steps will be taken to protect them against massive imports until that board is set up and fully operational?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member again for giving me notice of his question. I had the opportunity to discuss this matter with the officials and I believe that, according to the procedure to be followed, the Minister of Agriculture will be consulting his provincial counterparts about a marketing system. After having obtained the consent of provincial governments for setting up such a system, he will report to cabinet, and then, in co-operation with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, it will be possible to implement the provisions of the exports and imports legislation in order to regulate the international poultry trade. As for the time required, in reply to the question put by the hon. member a few days ago, I would say that this depends on the progress of the consultations with provincial governments.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN POSITION ON CARTEL ARRANGEMENTS TO SUPPORT COMMODITY PRICES

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs arises out of reports emanating from Washington of alleged operations in Canada of a cartel to fix uranium prices. First of all, may I ask the minister if it is part of our foreign policy to believe in and support commodity agreements such as OPEC and others; second, have we made it clear to all our trading partners that Canada was in favour of commodity agreements as a way of supporting world prices; third, was this made specifically clear at the UNCTAD conference with Third World countries where I understand they were very much in favour of commodity agreements but Canada took the position that we were not in favour of these cartels and finally, have the negotiators for Canada at GATT been instructed to make very clear to other countries that Canada does in fact believe in cartel arrangements to support commodity prices?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there were about five questions in one there. On the specifics of the uranium arrangement, I would ask Your Honour to permit my colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to reply. On the question of commodity agreements I think the Canadian position, briefly stated, although there are of course many additional comments that I could make, is that we have said we are not opposed in principle to commodity arrangements; indeed, at the north-south conference we indicated support in principle, as did most developed countries. We have said, however, that this must be considered on a commodity by commodity basis and that it should involve both supplying and consuming countries. I will be glad to give the text of the Canadian position to the hon. member. Perhaps Your Honour might allow the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to reply on the uranium question.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there were two specific points I think the hon. member was concerned about. He mentioned the question of secrecy; there was no secrecy with respect to the producers' group arrangement at all. This was made clear right from the start. The second point which I think is important is that Canada, given the circumstances—and I think the hon. member should understand that when 70 per cent of the world market is closed to Canadian producers and others, action has to be taken to protect Canadian industries and Canadian jobs. We tried to get a producer and consumer arrangement but unfortunately we were not able to get consumers alongside at that time so the arrangement became a producers' arrangement. Subsequently, that is to say in 1975, it was possible to disband the producers' arrangement and substituted a producer-consumer dialogue through the formation of the Uranium Institute. The Canadian position, which has always been to have producers and consumers part of these arrangements, has now been brought around again through the formation of the Uranium Institute.

COMBINES

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON CARTELS

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs? Is it the government's policy to have two laws applying to cartel arrangements, one law saying that cartels are appropriate if the Canadian government has a participatory interest in a firm involved in the cartel, another saying cartels are not in the public interest if the Canadian government does not have a participatory interest?

Mr. Fraser: Yes or no.

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is not my normal practice to comment on how the director of combines may interpret the law, whether he may commence an investigation in any case or whether such investigation is in progress. I shall neither confirm nor deny the existence of any investigation in this particular case.

Mr. Clark: It is a question of policy.

Mr. Abbott: I assure the House that the director has been following the situation closely for evidence of violation of the act, including any indication that the Canadian consumer has been adversely affected by the cartel arrangement which I understand was designed to exclude price fixing in the Canadian market.

With respect to the effect of the cartel on foreign customers and our country's image abroad, the cartel arrangement was implemented to hold the uranium industry over a particularly difficult period, and I am pleased that the government withdrew its support of the arrangement as soon as possible, shortly after prices began to rise in 1974.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, a final supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I am not remotely interested in whether the director of the program is making an investigation. My question is specific and I wonder if the minister could direct his mind to it.

Mr. Clark: It is a question of policy.

Mr. Gillies: My question is, what is the policy of the government? Is it the policy of the federal government of Canada to allow cartels to be formed when the government has a participatory interest in one of the organizations, but not to allow the formation of cartels if there is no governmental participation? It is a simple question of policy and has nothing to do with an investigation.

Mr. Clark: Do you have a piece of paper on that, Tony?

Mr. Abbott: No, I do not have a piece of paper on that, Mr. Speaker. I simply say, the law is there, and it is the duty of the director to investigate and inquire under the law. Beyond that I shall not comment on what government policy might be.

Mr. Clark: Do you know.

Mr. Abbott: It would be quite outside my jurisdiction to do so.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—POSSIBILITY URANIUM CARTEL CONTRIBUTING FACTOR

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Since the minister has made many statements concerning OPEC-type pricing as being one cause of inflation, does he feel that the cartel with respect to uranium to which we are referring was possibly another cause of inflation?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I point out to the hon. gentleman that the arrangement in this case was to provide for the protection of a significant Canadian industry which was operating at that point below the costs of production, principally because of the misguided actions of the United States government. I think one can say accurately that uranium utilities and therefore consumers in Canada, the United States and elsewhere have been protected from inflation by keeping the additional Canadian production in uranium in force through the difficult years of the early 1970's. In this respect I think one of the best prospects we have for protecting ourselves against further OPEC-type increases lies in having further uranium production.

Mr. Gillies: In other words, another OPEC arrangement.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I point out to the hon. member for Don Valley that at all times the government of Canada made it clear that consuming and producing countries should participate in this and that the United States in particular could have participated if it had not been following such an exclusionary policy itself.

REASON FOR ALLEGED ATTEMPT TO KEEP URANIUM PRICING ARRANGEMENT SECRET

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the minister last night on national television seemed to take great exception to the fact that a friendly nation, as he called it, would allow these types of facts to be revealed, and in view of the answer he gave just now, would he say why he feels it is so desirable to keep this type of agreement or, as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources calls it, producers club secret? Why did he feel it so desirable to keep it secret?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it was far from being kept secret, for, as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said, press releases were issued at the particular time announcing the formation of the arrangement. The objection I raised on television last night was that the United States would seek to apply its laws in Canada, against the laws of the government of Canada, and I do not regard that as a friendly act.

INQUIRY WHETHER OPEC COUNTRIES TOOK URANIUM PRICING ARRANGEMENT AS PRECEDENT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: Big brother is listening.

Mr. Stevens: Since the producers club, as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources calls it, was established before the formation of OPEC, will the minister say to what extent he feels the OPEC nations took this as a legitimate precedent they could follow?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I point out to the hon. member that OPEC was formed some seven or eight years before this.

Mr. Stevens: I am talking about the cartels' formation.

HISTORIC SITES

ACCESS TO PLAINS OF ABRAHAM FOR CELEBRATION OF SAINT-JEAN FEAST

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Is it true that the National Battlefields Commission denied access to the Plains of Abraham to those organizations wishing to use the site for the Saint-Jean celebrations. If so, for what reasons, and does he intend to answer the telegram sent by Mrs. Maltais in that connection?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the decision to which the hon. member refers was made by the Commission des champs de bataille nationaux, which is an independent body established by an act of parliament. All members of that commission are from Quebec city. I was not aware of the request to use the Plains of Abraham; I was not aware of the decision, nor involved in it in any way. I only learned about it yesterday when it was brought to my attention by the press. Immediately afterwards I sought the reasons from the commission for its refusal. The reasons given to me were that in the past the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste had co-operated with the Corporation des fêtes de la Saint-Jean and they had put on one celebration together. But this year, for some reason, they had divided and there were two requests, the request of the Saint-Jean-Baptiste Société was granted and they will be given the use of the field. The other request was turned down because there had been many complaints made against the Corporation des fêtes, and also because there was some evidence of unreliability. However, I have asked the commission to re-examine the question and I expect they will do that.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF NATIONAL FOOD POLICY— REQUEST FOR TABLING OF BACKGROUND PAPERS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has to do with the government's announcement last week on food policy. In view of the minister's assertion that the establishment of a national food policy will remain a high government priority, and since the food strategy for Canada, as demonstrated last week, is only in the discussion stage, in fact there is only a discussion paper on it, when can consumers of Canada expect to have in place a well defined, co-ordinated and comprehensive national food policy? What are the time parameters the minister has in mind for announcing such a comprehensive food policy?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the announcement was of a food strategy, the outlines of which will be continually filled with ongoing programs. For instance, one of the benefits we hope to provide consumers is improved price information. I am working vigorously to produce such a response to that strategy point, and hope to do it early. We are also following other areas, including a study of various sectors of the food industry, to see that they are competitive and I shall be announcing developments in this regard promptly.

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would ask my question again, Mr. Speaker. When can all these ad hoc actions be accomplished and put in place, so that the government can announce at one time a national, comprehensive food policy? In view of the government's quest for public discussion of a national food policy, will the government table the DM-10 draft of a possible national food policy and other relevant discussion material, so that the public can react to concrete suggestions rather than to the vague declarations of last week? Will the minister publish these documents, and when can all these ad hoc programs be put together, in order that the Canadian people can have that comprehensive package?

● (1140)

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I do not share the hon. member's view as to the quality of the food strategy paper. The whole purpose of such a broad strategy is that as policies are developed and initiatives are taken, they will fit within the umbrella of this strategy. As to the question of studies related to the preparation, or what the hon. member refers to as DM-10, I do not know what exists in that area but I doubt if it would be very useful to introduce it into the discussion.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTION SOVIET UNION LIVE UP TO COMMITMENTS IN HELSINKI AGREEMENT

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the Soviet Union despite having agreed at Helsinki, along with many other countries, to the principle that citizens should have the right to leave the country in which they live if they so wish, and since the Soviet Union is refusing to issue exit permits to some of its citizens who wish to leave, will Canada's representative at the conference now being held in Belgrade make it clear to the Soviet delegates publicly that the Canadian people hope that the Soviet government will honour the commitments it made at Helsinki with regard to the human rights of its citizens?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have answered this on several previous occasions. I welcome the chance to do it once again. Yes, we will make such representations in the kind of language that the hon. member has used and our delegation has been so instructed. I should, however, re-emphasize for the House a problem which seems to have arisen in terms of understanding what this conference is about. The meetings now underway are for the purpose of setting an agenda for September. There will not be any public declarations or statements. It is an official level meeting designed to set up the planning for the September meeting. At the appropriate time we will make the public declaration.

DOMINION DAY

PROPOSED PARTICIPATION OF POLITICAL LEADERS IN CELEBRATIONS

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. It has to do with the celebrations that will be taking place on Parliament Hill. This will be a welcome reversal from last year when the celebrations were abandoned. Will the Prime Minister tell the House in what way he intends to use the man who considers himself to be the only living Father of Confederation, the Hon. Joseph R. Smallwood, the right hon. member for Prince Albert, a former Prime Minister, and other leaders of the official national parties in those celebrations on Parliament Hill in order to remove any non-partisan spirit and make a clear demonstration of unity and the love that all of us have for this country.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know the details of the celebration. We will keep in mind the personalities the hon. member mentioned. We might ask them to start the fireworks. I will see what is being done.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

PROPOSAL TO SUBSIDIZE COST OF FOOD IN NORTHERN COMMUNITIES

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It arises out of recent comments made by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion regarding the high cost of food in the north. Is the minister aware of a resolution that was passed at a consumer workshop in Pangnirtung in March of this year which states, and I quote "Only that food should be subsidized by boat and air rates as liquor now is and the savings passed on in total to the consumer."

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): No, Mr. Speaker. I am not aware of that resolution. It sounds like a very interesting one and I will have it studied.

Mr. Holmes: In view of the fact the government of Canada is responsible for health programs in the north, and in view of the fact that alcohol is recognized as being related to serious health problems in the north, can the minister indicate how the government can justify a cost of over $2 a quart for milk in many communities in the north and yet a bottle of beer can be purchased for less than 50 cents because of government subsidization? Also, will the minister take action to correct that deplorable situation.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, it does sound deplorable and I would not want to justify it. I will see what we can do about it.

INDUSTRY

POSSIBILITY OF RESTRICTING IMPORTS OF SHOES TO PREVENT UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In view of the tremendous hardships experienced by the Canadian footwear industry and the fact that an inquiry pointed to imports as one of the major causes of plant shutdowns, since the Anti-Dumping Tribunal is to submit a final report on that matter by September 15 next, and in view of the strong possibility that 1,500 to 2,000 workers will be laid off by the end of July, would the minister be prepared to restrict imports immediately pending the recommendations of the report expected next September?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am extremely concerned about the developments in the footwear industry in Canada. Of course, I am subject to the existing laws of Parliament which restrict my activities. The Anti-Dumping Tribunal is now reviewing the situation in order to determine whether this situation is due to a fair or unfair competition. I asked my officials to conduct a more specific study in order to ascertain if interim restrictions might not be warranted, but I have received no final report as yet regarding that possibility.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary.

In view of the fact that, following its meeting, the Canadian Manufacturers Association made a recommendation to the effect that the department should earmark 60 per cent of the home market for Canadian production, would the minister indicate whether he is prepared to support this recommendation or goal of the Canadian Manufacturers Association so that at least 60 per cent of all products consumed in Canada are manufactured in this country?

[Mr. Holmes.]

Mr. Chrétien: Well, Mr. Speaker, we are presently considering several possibilities, but before asking the Anti-Dumping Commission to investigate the matter, I had discussions on a number of occasions with the Canadian footwear industry and they seem to agree with our decision to ask the Commission to report on this matter as soon as possible and I am keeping a very close look on further developments in this respect. The hon. member's intentions are of course quite commendable, as long as we are sure that the Canadian public will not have to pay too high a price for these protective measures.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

DATE OF PUBLICATION OF REGULATIONS FOR OIL AND GAS EXPLORATION IN NORTH

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It arises out of a news report in the Globe and Mail. It appears that after seven long years the government is now prepared to table in this House the rules and regulations concerning oil and gas exploration and development in the north. Will the minister advise whether we will receive that before the end of this session? Also, has he consulted with not only Petro-Can officials but other corporations involved in oil and gas exploration, particularly in the Calgary area?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, certain interim regulations will be tabled by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Consultations have taken place. Perhaps more details can be given by that minister.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, many on this side of the House have been pressing to find out when these will be tabled. We have been promised this for seven long years. Can the minister state a time limit as to when this will be tabled in the House?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we are still working toward being able to provide them in this session. I cannot be sure we will be able to do so. Anything in the form of new legislation may have to await the next session. Because of that situation, we have been working on a contingency plan. I hope to be able to announce the details of that contingency plan early next week.

ELECTION EXPENSES ACT

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the government House leader. When does the government House leader expect to introduce into the House an amendment to the legislation affecting the Election Expenses Act?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I understand the hon. member is asking about the Election Expenses Act. I have a draft bill waiting in the wings. Any time the parties of the House are ready to pass it, I will bring it in. I understand the contents have been agreed to by an all-party committee in order not to cause any difficulties.

Mr. Scott: My impression is that cabinet is either making or studying amendments to the Election Expenses Act.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, there are certain amendments that have been recommended by the Chief Electoral Officer. The cabinet on its own has not proposed amendments apart from those that have been proposed by the all-party committee dealing with election expenses, the standing committee and the Chief Electoral Officer.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF REFERENCE TO "A FORUM" IN CONNECTION WITH DISCUSSIONS ON RESTRAINT

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It arises out of comments which the minister made in his contribution to the debate last night. As reported at page 6769 of Hansard the minister referred to future discussions with—and he used the words "a forum". Is the minister referring to the so-called national forum which was advanced and advocated by his colleague the Minister of Labour and which is not yet established but which again is advocated in the green paper; or is the minister referring to some future discussions with the ad hoc group from the business community and representatives from the Canadian Labour Congress? Would the minister just clarify that?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there will be a meeting, the date of which has not yet been set, with what the hon. member refers to as the ad hoc group, namely the representatives of the Canadian Labour Congress and certain representatives of Canadian business. There will be a meeting within the next several weeks for the purpose of discussing the recommendations of the green paper, the Agenda for Co-Operation. That meeting will take place, I expect, in the near future. One of the purposes of the meeting will be to seek the support of labour and business for the creation of the consultative forum which is referred to at some length in the Agenda for Co-Operation.

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT ON DECONTROL

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the position of the government that as a result of these discussions, which hopefully will take place in a couple of weeks, agreement in principle will be achieved as to the government's proposal for decontrol, and that the government will then—and that means a few weeks from now—clarify the situation so far as its own policy is concerned; or do we have to wait for the establishment of a national forum before the government is going to be able to make up its mind as to the form of decontrol and the date of decontrol?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer would be no. I would expect to be able to indicate to the House, if it is sitting, and the country some time in July the timing and method of decontrol.

POST OFFICE

CALGARY—EFFECT OF REFUSAL TO RENEW SUBSIDY FOR BUS SERVICE FOR EMPLOYEES

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General, who will be aware of the relocation of the Calgary plant outside the city limits of Calgary some three years ago, a move which required a subsidy to provide bus service for the employees. Is the Postmaster General aware that Treasury Board is refusing to renew that subsidy after June 30, thereby reducing this bus service for evening and weekend shift workers and creating undue hardships which will further lower employee morale and affect the efficient operation of this plant?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of that refusal. I will look at the information which the hon. gentleman has provided, and I take it that his question is in the nature of a representation which I will take very seriously indeed.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister meet with his colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, to try to get some uniformity of policy in this regard? It is these niggling little issues which have such a devastating effect on the morale of the postal employees.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is aware that during the mediation over the Christmas period which received wide publicity the question of relocation was brought in issue by the union. It is one that they wanted to have referred over for negotiations, which hopefully will be renewed in the near future if CUPW wants to come back to the negotiating table, and undoubtedly the decision of Treasury Board was involved in the context of having to negotiate relocation and any compensation therefor.

Oral Questions

FUGITIVE OFFENDERS ACT

REASON FOR FAILURE TO INTRODUCE AMENDMENTS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice and it relates to statements which the minister made in recent days in which he has made much of the fact that, rather than a national inquiry, the fight against organized crime depended upon passing government legislation. Since improved legislation seems to be the minister's answer to organized crime, I should like to ask the minister why he has not seen fit during his tenure to introduce amendments to the Fugitive Offenders Act, which deals with extradition in Commonwealth countries, since loopholes in the current legislation have in fact enabled one of the so-called five dragons, namely Mr. Hon Kwing Shum, to avoid extradition to this point, as will the others who are found in Canada, if they are?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we have been working with other Commonwealth countries on the development of a new Fugitives Offenders Act. The drafting is well advanced and I would hope that it would be part of the legislative program for the next session.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister knows that the United Kingdom has had this act in place since 1948. The Fugitive Offenders Act was enacted in 1880. The Commonwealth law conference, in fact, dealt with this matter in 1966 and Canada is the only exception. Can the minister let the House know how he is going to maintain his credibility when he permits legislation to remain without amendment which allows individuals to avoid charges and escape justice, while claiming that organized crime can be fought by amending legislation? The minister stands indicted by his own words.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

DEMANDS OF MÉTIS AND NON-STATUS INDIANS OF MANITOBA FOR SETTLEMENT OF LAND CLAIMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the minister of Indian affairs. Since Manitoba's 100,000 Métis, non-status Indians and other groups have asked the federal government for an incredible $1 billion to settle their land claims and get recognition of their aboriginal rights, has the minister responded to what must be an outrageous request, and what has his reply been to the Manitoba group?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am not responsible for Métis and non-status Indians. Their relationship with the federal government is through a joint committee composed of cabinet and the Native Council of Canada, of which the President of the Privy Council is chairman and is their direct contact with the government. Although I am a member of that committee, the President of the Privy Council is the minister responsible for direct relations with them.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION TO PRESERVE LAND FOR FOOD PRODUCTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and deals with food strategy. Since the Department of Agriculture has stated that we lose about 250 acres of good food growing land every day which cannot be recovered, and that our food deficit if you exclude food grains and oil seeds was about $1.9 billion last year, can the minister tell the House what legislation we can soon expect to preserve food lands for the production of food and increase self-sufficiency in food in Canada?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will appreciate, food strategy involves the responsibility of several departments and ministers, and his question certainly has no relevance to my responsibilities.

CONSTITUTIONAL BASIS FOR POST-CONTROL LEGISLATION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the elimination of controls involves an admission that an emergency no longer exists, which formed the basis for the Supreme Court decision, has the minister given consideration to the constitutional position on which some post-controls legislative sanctions would be based in the period following the ending of controls? What would be the constitutional basis for continuing some form of post-controls intervention in the economy?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that question has been considered and I would have to acknowledge that it is one of difficulty. The legislative change which I referred to in my statement last evening related to amendment of contracts which are already in existence for the period covered by the controls. Probably I should hesitate to advance a legal opinion to the House, but I think that the hon. gentleman would agree with me that, following the termination of the controls program, it would be very difficult to have any comprehensive legislation. I think that by then possibly the House would have lost the jurisdiction which has been recognized by the Supreme Court.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UGANDA—POSSIBILITY OF CANADIAN INITIATIVE IN IMPOSING ECONOMIC SANCTIONS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and it follows the first question by my leader today about the Commonwealth Conference. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he intends to take any initiatives on the Ugandan situation, and specifically, has he given any instructions to our ambassador in New York and the United Nations to see if that ambassador can develop the consensus about the Ugandan situation so that there will be a situation on economic sanctions against Uganda, comparable to the Rhodesian situation? Does the Prime Minister think he has discharged his commitment to human rights by making a statement in one case with other Commonwealth leaders and yet has taken action in the other case?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must point out to the hon. member that if we were to get any support for the sanctions against Uganda he must realize that we have to have sanctions against South Africa also. This may not be possible to obtain from the present membership of the Security Council. He cannot reasonably argue that there should be sanctions against Uganda for one form of violation of human rights and not against South Africa which we have consistently condemned as being in very severe breach of human rights.

Mr. Clark: What instructions are you giving the ambassador?

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is very short and simple. With all the problems connected with trying to develop a consensus for sanctions at any time and since as the Prime Minister said, it only happened once in the United Nations, is the Prime Minister going to take any initiatives in this field?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should realize that when the question of sanctions against South Africa was raised, Canada said that it did not want to go that far. I will discuss it with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but my first answer would be that we would not want to behave differently for Uganda than we have for South Africa.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I hear that J.-P. Goyer thinks you should not.

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I shall now make a statement on all circumstances regarding and surrounding the matter popularly known as the APLQ affair in Montreal, as requested by members of the House. I shall try to the best of my knowledge and ability to state all related facts.

As we all know, Mr. Speaker, the court proceedings initiated by the Minister of Justice of Quebec, after the illegal search of the premises occupied by l'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec, le Mouvement pour la défense des prisonniers politiques du Québec and la Coopérative des déménageurs du 1er mai, in October 1972, have now been completed. This illegal search has raised a number of questions in the minds of many people. Questions have been asked, particularly in the House, as to whether the Solicitor General of the time had approved of the search prior to its taking place and, if not, at what point in time this search was brought to his attention or that of his successor and whether appropriate action was taken at that time. Many questions also have been raised about the role of the RCMP Security Service in this matter and about its methods of operation. These questions are legitimate and require clear answers. This is what I propose to do today.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I cannot stress too highly that in a democratic society like ours, the rule of law is and must be paramount. It is the vital force without which our basic liberties run the risk of becoming empty slogans. No threat to such liberties can justify, in any way, and even with the best of intentions, the use of illegal means to protect these basic rights. Clearly, there can be no compromise in this regard; it is upon this premise that the integrity and survival of our democratic institutions and our fundamental liberties are based. If the law is not adequate to handle such dangers as threaten our liberties and our institutions, then the answer does not lie in breaking the law, but rather in changing it.

[English]

During the night of October 6-7, 1972, police officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, acting together with officers of the Sûreté du Québec and la Police de Montréal, carried out a search of the premises occupied by L'Agence de Presse libre du Québec, le Mouvement pour la défense des prisonniers politiques du Québec and la Co-opérative des Déménageurs du 1er mai. Documents were seized on the premises. The carrying out of this search had not received prior authorization by the court and, therefore, was illegal.

On May 26 of this year, the three officers of the RCMP, Sûreté du Québec and la Police de Montréal, respectively, who had authorized this operation, entered a plea of guilty to a charge brought against them under section 115 of the Criminal Code by the authorities of the province of Quebec for having neglected to obtain a search warrant in connection with the incident that took place on October 6-7, 1972. The police offiers were yesterday granted an absolute discharge by the court.

Neither the RCMP headquarters in Ottawa, nor the commanding officer of C Division in Montreal, nor the solicitor general at the time, the present Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), had been told of the search and seizure of documents on the premises occupied by the APLQ prior to the operation being carried out.

Mr. Woolliams: That sounds like Nixon.

Mr. Fox: I do not think Nixon made any statements in the House like we are. The conversations which I have had personally with the present Minister of Supply and Services, the then commissioner of the RCMP, Mr. W. L. Higgitt, and the then director general of the security service, Mr. John Starnes, and the examination of relevant files clearly support these facts. It was only on October 10, 1972, four days later, that C Division of the RCMP in Montreal informed the RCMP headquarters in Ottawa of the search and seizure on the premises of the APLQ.

Following the search and seizure of the documents, the groups affected by these events sent telegrams or letters to a number of people. Thus, on Monday, October 9, 1972, only a few hours after the incident, the APLQ sent a telegram to the assistant commissioner of the RCMP in Montreal, to the director of la Police de Montréal and to the director of the Sûreté du Québec, inquiring if their respective organizations had been responsible for the theft of documents. This telegram asked for an immediate reply. The RCMP did not provide a response to it.

On Monday, October 9, 1972, the three groups which had been the subject of the search and seizure, inquired, through letters sent to the Minister of Justice of Quebec and to the Solicitor General of Canada, if the RCMP, the Sûreté du Québec and the Montreal police were involved in the break-in into their premises and the theft of documents. This registered letter, to which was attached a copy of the telegram addressed to the Assistant Commissioner of the RCMP in Montreal, requested that a reply be given before 11 a.m., Friday, October 13, 1972.

On Thursday, October 12, 1972, the Minister of Justice of Quebec, the Hon. Jérôme Choquette, stated publicly that he had been informed that none of the three police forces, the RCMP, the Sûreté du Québec and the Montreal police, had been involved in the break-in and the theft of documents on the premises occupied by the APLQ during the night of 6/7 October, 1972, adding that the appropriate authorities, namely the Montreal police, were investigating the matter. There is nothing in our files to indicate that the Quebec provincial authorities had communicated with the RCMP in Ottawa, or the Solicitor General of Canada or his office, before Mr. Choquette made his statement.

On Friday, October 13, 1972, spokesmen for the three groups that had written to the Solicitor General of Canada and to the Minister of Justice of Quebec held a press conference, during which they indicated they had come to the conclusion that the theft of documents was the result of a police search under the provincial Law 51. These groups took the opportunity to launch an opposition campaign against Law 51, which granted special powers of search to the police, under the control of the Police Commission of Quebec, in the fight against organized crime, terrorism and subversion.

Concerning the letter sent to the Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer, it was received in the Ministry of the Solicitor General on October 11, 1972, and brought to the attention of the RCMP by the assistant to the minister, Lieutenant Colonel John R. Cameron, in order that a reply could be prepared for the Solicitor General's signature. This was done without the minister being informed. In referring the letter directly to the RCMP for reply, without bringing it to the minister's personal attention first, Lieutenant Colonel Cameron was following the usual practice in handling such letters, addressed to the Solicitor General of Canada. This practice was meant to enable the RCMP to launch an investigation forthwith even if it meant that the letter of inquiry would be brought to the minister's attention at a later date. In fact, letters are, from time to time, addressed to the Solicitor General enquiring or complaining about the conduct of the RCMP or of one of its members in the performance of their duties as the national police force or as provincial police under arrangements that exist in eight Canadian provinces, hence the need for such a system. On October 26, 1972, the RCMP wrote to the minister's assistant, recommending that no acknowledgement be made, without providing the reason for their recommendation.

The Solicitor General of the time remembers having seen the letter of October 9, 1972, at a later date, and having asked the RCMP why they recommended that there be no acknowledgement. The Solicitor General recalls that the RCMP response to his question was that the theft of documents, about which the APLQ had complained, fell under the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities, more particularly, the Minister of Justice of Quebec, and that the Montreal police was investigating the incident. Moreover, the minister considered it hard to believe that the RCMP would have participated in a theft of documents, as the letter of October 9, 1972, had implied. Accordingly, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), the former Solicitor General, categorically states that he was not informed that the theft of documents was the result of an unlawful entry in which the RCMP had participated.

The Minister of Supply and Services does not recall the exact date upon which the letter of October 9, 1972, was discussed with the RCMP. It would seem, from the agenda of the minister, that the letter would have been discussed with the RCMP on November 6, 1972, just a few days after the federal general election of October 30, 1972. It is at this point that the minister would personally have seen the letter for the first time.

[English]

Commissioner Higgitt and Mr. John Starnes also recall having discussed the October 9 letter with the solicitor general on a date they cannot now precisely establish. They state that they do not remember having briefed the solicitor general of the RCMP's participation in the unlawful entry of the APLQ premises. They add that they would be surprised if they had not verbally advised the solicitor general in this regard. The former commissioner and the former director general agree that in most cases information of importance was brought to the minister's attention in writing. Our files and those of the RCMP contain no written report on the unlawful entry to the solicitor general.

The Quebec justice minister's statement of October 12, denying that any of the three police forces were involved in the October 6-7 theft of documents, was obviously not consistent with the facts. The RCMP did not notify the solicitor general of the fact that the Quebec justice minister's statement was erroneous, but left the matter for attention in Quebec, in the knowledge that the police authorities concerned, to wit, la Police de Montréal, had already instituted an investigation into the case. Both the former commissioner and the former director general told me of the good faith that had prompted their decision under the circumstances, convinced that this matter came directly under the police authorities concerned who had instituted an investigation, as they had indicated to the solicitor general.

On November 27, 1972, the hon. member for Dollard (Mr. Goyer) was appointed Minister of Supply and Services and was succeeded by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) as solicitor general. The very first time the October, 1972, break-in was brought to the latter's attention was in March, 1976. Further to disclosures by a former RCMP member, who had actually taken part in the unlawful entry, the solicitor general was notified by the commissioner, Mr. Nadon, and the director general of the security service, Mr. Dare, of the participation of the RCMP in the unlawful entry, for the first time, on March 16, 1976. It was the first time, as well, on that same day, that the deputy solicitor general and the assistant deputy solicitor general (police and security) were made aware of the participation of the RCMP in this operation.

The solicitor general immediately made sure that the Quebec authorities were aware of the matter. In actual fact, he was informed that Quebec had already undertaken an inquiry. The Quebec authorities in particular, on April 30, 1976, during a meeting in Ottawa between the solicitor general of Quebec, the Hon. Fernand Lalonde, and the Hon. Warren Allmand were assured of the complete co-operation of the RCMP in the inquiry which they had undertaken. The commissioner of the RCMP himself met with the representative of the solicitor general of Quebec in August of 1976 and provided him with relevant information. I have no reason to think that the co-operation of the RCMP with the Quebec authorities throughout their inquiry was anything but full and complete.

In the days which followed March 16, 1976, the solicitor general of Canada inquired as to the disciplinary action taken by the RCMP after the October 6-7, 1972, operation. Commissioner Nadon then informed the solicitor general that the former director general of the security service had, at the time of the incident, expressed his dissatisfaction to those responsible for the operation and had reprimanded them. The commissioner added that his predecessor, W. L. Higgitt, had not taken any other disciplinary action.

Commissioner Nadon further specified that, since it seemed apparent that the Quebec authorities would shortly institute court proceedings against those responsible for the incident, it would not be advisable to reopen the question of internal discipline at that time. The officer of the RCMP who entered a plea of guilty on May 26, 1977, to the charge brought against him by the Quebec authorities in relation to the October, 1972, incident was, on that same day, suspended from the force.

The former solicitor general undertook in the days immediately following March 16, 1976, to discuss the matter with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who was told for the first time of the RCMP participation in the unlawful entry. The government seriously considered the creation of a royal commission of inquiry at that time. The government received, however, repeated and unequivocal assurances from the RCMP that the APLQ incident was exceptional and isolated and that the directives of the RCMP to its members clearly require that all of their actions take place within the law.

It was essential that justice take its normal course. The creation of a royal commission of inquiry would have risked interference in the normal course of the investigation initiated by Quebec and in the prosecutions which could have resulted from them. The right of a possible accused to a fair and just trial could also have been compromised seriously by the work of such a royal commission. The government decided, therefore, not to establish a royal commission, but remained firmly committed to re-examining the matter once the judicial process had run its normal course.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we all know what events have followed. The investigation by the Quebec police authorities into the matter led to a pré-enquête before a judge; this pré-enquête resulted in the laying of criminal charges against members of the three police forces involved. In addition, the government of Quebec announced yesterday the setting up of a commission of inquiry. This commission of inquiry into the circumstances of the unlawful entry of October 1972 will specifically inquire into four points:

(a) The closing of the investigation files that had been opened by the Montreal police after the incident;

(b) The different versions which were given in regard to the unlawful entry;

(c) The disposal of the documents that were seized at the time; and

(d) The cooperation extended by the RCMP, the Sûreté du Québec and the Montreal Urban Community police force to the Quebec Department of Justice in the investigation launched after the unlawful operation was made public.

We are assuring Quebec authorities of our cooperation and that of the RCMP in the work of their commission of inquiry, in line with our legal and constitutional responsibilities. Justice is thus following its course. As we have done so far, we intend to continue providing our best cooperation to those responsible for its administration in the province, namely the Quebec Department of Justice. I trust, for my part, that the commission set up by Quebec will shed the light on those aspects of the affair that have been referred to it.

In so far as federal responsibilities are concerned, the information I have given the House today raises a number of questions about the way in which complaints about the conduct of members of the RCMP are handled.

In particular, Mr. Speaker, doubts can arise as to the value of a system of investigating and handling complaints which is exclusively administered by those against who the complaints are made.

On June 6, 1974, the government, on the initiative of my predecessor, set up a commission of inquiry under Judge René Marin to review the whole question of citizen complaints against members of the RCMP and the system of discipline within the force. The Marin Commission reported in January of 1976. As I have already indicated to the House, a number of the commission's recommendations, which did not imply legislative change, have already been implemented. In the fall of this year, I intend to present to Parliament a bill which will deal with many of the recommendations of the commission, particularly those which concern the handling of citizen complaints against the RCMP in an objective and independent manner.

The facts, which I have related today, raise other questions concerning the methods of operation of the RCMP and of the Security Service. Some may ask if illegal entry into premises is a normal or even an exceptional procedure of the RCMP. In the event doubts persist, Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I said earlier: an illegal entry into any premises, whatever the intention or purpose, is completely unacceptable to me and to the government and is not, under any circumstances, to be tolerated. The commitment to this view is one that is shared by the Commissioner of the RCMP and by the Director General of the Security Service and will be the basis upon which any allegations of illegal conduct, either on the part of members of the RCMP, whether of the Security Service or those involved in regular police activities, will be viewed. Members are aware that this is force policy.

[English]

Finally, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Peters: I could tell you that from my own experience with the security staff over here.

[Mr. Fox.]

Mr. Fox: The hon. member opposite is very knowledgeable in that area. Finally, the information I have given the House today will have dispelled, I trust, any doubt that might have arisen regarding the conduct of my predecessors in the matter.

Mr. Clark: Not at all. We would like to have him under oath somewhere.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Where is he—with Idi?

Mr. Clark: You had better keep him in Africa.

An hon. Member: The "plumbers" would have had a field day up here.

Mr. Fox: The judicial process, with the unconditional discharges granted by the court yesterday seems, at least for the time being, to have completed its course. The setting up of a commission of inquiry by Quebec will ensure that all relevant aspects of the affair that have been referred to it are examined in an independent fashion.

An hon. Member: Just incredible.

Mr. Fox: The facts and details which I have provided today explain the circumstances of the affair in so far as federal responsibilities are concerned.

An hon. Member: No, they don't.

Mr. Baldwin: Even Idi Amin would not try this.

Mr. Fox: The process of handling the complaints of citizens—certainly in 1972—was not adequate. The legislative changes which I propose to bring before parliament in the fall flowing from the recommendations of the Marin report will bring corrective measures to bear on this process as well as on the system of internal discipline. In addition, I trust that my statement today will have dispelled all possible doubt concerning our commitment to ensure that the operations of the RCMP take place within the constraints of the law.

An hon. Member: You are covering up for Goyer.

Mr. Fox: In addition, the commissioner of the RCMP and the director general of the security service fully recognize the need to bring to my attention, clearly and unequivocally, any breach on the part of their members of the clear directives of the RCMP in that regard. Regarding the conduct of the government, its ministers and the RCMP authorities, I trust, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members will agree with me that the information I have provided today answers adequately the questions that could have arisen in connection with this matter.

Mr. Clark: Not at all.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You are not very happy with it either, "Foxy".

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: In a democratic society, Mr. Speaker, it is essential that those on whom, like the RCMP and the Security Service falls the task of enforcing the law and protecting our basic liberties, can count upon the complete support of the people. This support, in return, must be based on the faith that those protecting these rights do themselves feel bound and indeed are bound by our laws in fulfilling their duties.

The RCMP and the Security Service are doing their best in the discharge of responsibilities that rapid social and other changes, both internally and externally, have made increasingly more complex. I dare say that their record thus far ranks as one of the best, both in this country and outside. Obviously, mistakes can be made and indeed are made. The determination of the government and the top management of the RCMP—which I cannot over-emphasize—to deal with these mistakes whenever they arise, with force and vigour, but also with fairness, will ensure, I trust, that despite these mistakes, Canadians will continue to provide the members of our national police force with the respect and support they need in their difficult tasks. Mr. Speaker, I had promised to give facts to the House in answer to the many questions raised these last few weeks and I think my statement fulfilled that commitment towards the House.

[English]

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of our party I should like to say to the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) that obviously his very carefully detailed statement contains some good news and some bad news. The good news is that there is a recognition that there have been some serious deficiencies in the way certain aspects of RCMP and ministerial staff work have been carried on. The bad news is that the statement really raises more questions than it answers. In that regard, it would have been helpful if we in the opposition had had a bit more notice of this long and carefully detailed statement. However, without being unfair, in a sense it is characteristic of the way this whole affair has been handled—maximum non-disclosure up to the last minute.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. MacKay: There is one thing which is very clear, and that is that a great many people do not remember an awful lot of details. These are interesting people. They include the former commissioner, Commissioner Higgitt, John Starnes, and the present Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer).

There are very many circumstances which are very contradictory on their face. For example, it is stated on page 5 of the minister's statement that there is no written report on the unlawful entry to the solicitor general on file, yet on May 18, 1976, the then solicitor general told the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal) that he had a complete report from the RCMP in his hands. This report has never been tabled. It would be helpful if it were tabled.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: The Quebec minister of justice has been accused in the minister's statement of saying things which were obviously not consistent with the facts.

Mr. Stanfield: He is expendable.

Mr. MacKay: Apparently he is, but I believe he deserves an opportunity to say something in this regard. I am going to come to that in a little while. There are many contradictions, but of particular concern to me, as someone who is reasonably skeptical—but, I hope, not unfairly so—is the role of Inspector Cobb when he was in the then solicitor general's office. As I understand it, his role and the role of officers like him was to provide some sort of facilitation and communication of important matters of concern to the government and to the RCMP. Here was a man, who has now pleaded guilty for his activities in this very incident, working with the then solicitor general in his own office shortly thereafter, yet apparently there was no communication. That, to me, is incredible. There are many things which simply cry out for explanation, and it is hard to know where to start with this particular statement.

If this matter were not so serious, it could be considered a tragic comedy of errors. The then solicitor general, who is now the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand) and who was under some pressure in this House, claimed that it was in March of 1976, I believe, that this matter was first brought to his attention. The matter was investigated with some vigour after that. Yet I had to report to him in the House some weeks later that there was a man investigating the matter, the man who has now pleaded guilty to burglary. Is that not a very strange set of circumstances? I said at the time that it was a startling departure from investigating techniques. The old adage that you should use a thief to catch a thief must have been used. In any event, this matter is not funny: it is a serious matter, because if handled badly it could impugn one institution which many Canadians regard as their absolute guarantee of law enforcement and integrity, namely, the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: This whole matter brings back memories of a rather incredible committee meeting held on Monday, March 17, 1975, when the present Minister of Supply and Services and the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, two former solicitors general, flanked by the commissioner of the RCMP, attempted to resolve some very interesting contradictions involving the knowledge of the former solicitor general, now the Minister of Supply and Services, with regard to the Hamilton harbour matter.

This whole thing brings back memories of that matter and raises questions about apparent lack of efficiency, lack of communication and lack of guidance and direction given by ministers responsible for the RCMP. The whole matter is just beyond belief—and here we go again. Five years after a complaint involving a break-in at the premises of a Montreal news agency, the House of Commons finally receives an accounting from our current Solicitor General after a game of musical chairs which has gone on in the meantime. I think all of us in this House do not hold our colleague, the present Solicitor General, responsible for this. In fact, I would like to go on record as commending the Solicitor General for the way he has discharged the responsibilities of his portfolio.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: Any remarks I make about the office should not be taken personally by him. But I do want to say to him that he knows as well as I do that this is a shocking example of lack of acccountability and efficiency on the part of his predecessors to hold out to the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: The matter has attracted a tremendous amount of attention simply because of this government's failure and obvious reluctance to deal with it as it should have been dealt with in the beginning. Anyone who has perused the questions in Hansard over the last year cannot help but see that this matter has been bungled; and there is no way that the government, despite its carefully contrived statement, can convince hon. members of this House or the public of Canada otherwise.

Mr. Woolliams: No wonder Goyer is in Africa.

Mr. MacKay: How can we, as members of the House of Commons, accept an explanation as being reasonable when a solicitor general takes the word of those against whom a complaint was made without checking with the complainant? This was a matter of public knowledge. Telegrams were sent. We now know when the former solicitor general received notice. It was even published by the news agency whose premises were burglarized. That is another thing which should be on the record. If those officers had gone into that news agency without a search warrant and had carried out an illegal search, that would have been operating without a search warrant. However, the way it was done was nothing less than break and entry. It was not simply operating without a search warrant.

Another unfortunate thing and another reason we must have an inquiry is that the explanations given by the Solicitor General, despite the fact that he is a minister of the Crown and we accept his word on these things without reservation, are really hearsay evidence, and the best evidence has got to come from the incumbent of the office at the time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: Another matter which is worrisome is the obvious disposition of this government, through its solicitors general, to have left not only the primary responsibility but almost the entire responsibility in the hands of Quebec authorities. The government has constantly refused to allow a series of solicitors general to take their responsibilities to the RCMP and to the House of Commons seriously, proposing instead to leave it to the authorities in Quebec. What has the government received for its disposition to do this? The minister had to admit yesterday that he had absolutely no dialogue, no notice and no consultations with his Quebec counterparts as to the fact that they were going to call an inquiry. I think that, again, indicates the need for the Solicitor General and for the government to exercise their responsibility in this matter.

I do not want to go on at length because I realize that the leader of the New Democratic Party wishes to reply, and also that someone from the Creditiste party does as well. However, it is obvious that an inquiry should have been ordered when the then solicitor general, now the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, found out about this RCMP involvement and about all the circumstances surrounding this illegal break-in. Such an inquiry at the federal level is now absolutely essential, because only such an objective inquiry with terms of reference enabling it to pursue the chain of evidence in the solicitor general's office—not to smear the RCMP—can find out exactly who is responsible for this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: Only such an inquiry can properly uncover that type of evidence which the public and the members of the House of Commons could be asked to accept as the absolute truth. And we must have nothing less than the absolute truth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: With the distinguished attorney general from the United States in this House, this would be a good time for the Solicitor General to take the kind of extraordinary initiative which our friends in America took to uncover and to rectify a far more serious situation, but a situation which had some of the elements of what we are seeing here today. Mr. Speaker, I am going to conclude with a quotation that I think sums this matter up. In 1831, Dr. Wolfred Nelson, a political associate of Papineau, said:

● (1240)

The laws must be observed as much by those who govern as by those who are governed.

I think this is the proper note on which to leave this matter, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the questions we are dealing with in the House today are among the most serious that any democratic legislative body can confront at any time. What is at stake in this issue, and what has not been adequately dealt with in the minister's statement, are the following: Do we, or do we not, in Canada act according to the principle of the rule of law? Do we have a situation in Canada in which the national police force, the RCMP, are actively involved in making policy decisions, deciding on their own what is, or is not, in the public interest? Finally, do we have a case of at least one minister who has not only been involved in serious bungling of his responsibilities but quite clearly, from the statement made today, was possibly involved in lying as well. I want to deal with all these matters in the most serious way, Mr. Speaker.

What do we know of the facts that have been brought forward today in the minister's statement? We know that an illegal break-in took place in Montreal on October 6, and that the Montreal detachment of the RCMP was informed on October 9. The RCMP headquarters in Ottawa was informed on October 10. We know that a registered letter outlining the matter was received by the former solicitor general on October 11 which had been sent prior to that. We know that on the following day, October 12, the former minister of justice for the province of Quebec issued a categorical denial of police involvement in this break-in. Finally, we know that the RCMP, in an incredible letter to the former solicitor general dated October 26, said that no acknowledgement should be made to a registered letter which had been sent to him outlining the break-in that had taken place early that month. As far as I can determine, those are all the facts that were asserted and that we can claim to know in this situation.

In dealing with this issue this morning, I want to comment on two aspects only: the role of the RCMP and the questions that have been raised not only about its administrative competence in this matter but, more basically, whether or not it consciously adheres to the principle of the rule of law itself. I want also to deal with the performance of the former solicitor general. I regret that we did not have more time to peruse the statement, Mr. Speaker. As the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) has indicated, we did not receive copies until halfway through the question period.

An hon. Member: The press gallery got it.

Mr. Broadbent: The matter is very complex and there are obviously many other questions that can be raised and which I am sure will be brought to the attention of the minister at another time. I want to turn immediately to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. In my view, the RCMP have behaved badly. They did not inform the minister, to whom they were responsible, of illegal activity.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That is what the minister says. You are not sure about that.

Mr. Broadbent: Well, that is my judgment from what the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) tells us. It may turn out not to be the case, but on the face of the evidence so far I am prepared to accept it. In addressing the matter of a response to the letter that arrived in the minister's office on October 11 outlining the break-in, they recommended that the minister should not even acknowledge the receipt of a letter which, if accurate, points out that the RCMP was involved in a clear and unequivocal violation of the law. According to the statement of the Solicitor General today, this matter was not brought to the attention of the then minister until October 26, and then only indirectly by a letter to an assistant in his office. It was brought to his attention about two weeks after the national headquarters of the RCMP in Ottawa knew all about it. They did not recommend that the minister investigate more thoroughly or take some other specific action, but recommended that he not even acknowledge receipt of the letter sent to him by the group in Montreal which was affected.

We are told that the matter was finally discussed—and this is a very intriguing point—perhaps on November 6. I find it strange that neither the then solicitor general nor the RCMP can confirm the date of such an important meeting. Mr. Goyer apparently indicates that the meeting probably took place on that date, and in his statement today the Solicitor General, if I recall correctly, indicated that the RCMP have no precise date for the meeting. We are told that Commissioner Higgitt does not even recall briefing the then solicitor general on the RCMP involvement in the break-in, but the statement of the Solicitor General today points out that Commissioner Higgitt said he would be "surprised if they had not verbally advised" the then minister of what had taken place. I will come back to that in a minute, Mr. Speaker.

Concerning the lie of the former minister of justice of Quebec, Mr. Choquette—that is what it was, when he denied involvement on October 12 more correctly—it might not be a lie, because he may not have been informed by October 12, but it was an incredible statement to make October 12 if he had not got the necessary information from the police forces involved. But at least, concerning that public denial of police involvement by Mr. Choquette on October 12, according to the minister's statement today, the RCMP, by their own admission, did not even inform the then solicitor general at the time of the November 6 meeting of the events that took place in the break-in. If that is accurate, I think it is a shocking illustration of irresponsibility.

This is truly incredible, Mr. Speaker. At the time of the meeting with the then minister, the RCMP headquarters knew of their own involvement. They knew at that time of Mr. Choquette's statement, and they knew at that time that it was false. Surely, they ought to have said something to the minister. Surely, in terms of their responsibility to a minister of the Crown in the government, they ought to have told the then solicitor general that what Mr. Choquette had told the people of Canada was false, and that the RCMP as well as other police forces had been involved in the illegal break-in.

I have no reason to question the integrity of the present minister. On the whole, up to this point he has behaved admirably, with commendable frankness. Therefore, what he has told us today clearly constitutes, if it is accurate as he thinks it is, a shocking indictment of senior representatives of the RCMP in terms of their responsibility to the minister.

Now I shift my attention to the former solicitor general. The present Solicitor General tells us that Mr. Goyer "appears" to have discussed the October 9 registered letter for the first time on November 6. I repeat, in this context, that I personally find it surprising and disturbing that there was not an accurate record kept in the minister's office of such a clearly important meeting which took place to discuss the possibility of a clear violation of the Criminal Code by the RCMP. Apparently no precise record was kept, according to Mr. Goyer's information as he provided it to the present minister. The Solicitor General now tells us Mr. Goyer says he was not informed of the break-in by the RCMP at the meeting which took place on November 6. The RCMP, about the same meeting stated that they would be "surprised" if they had not told the minister, at least verbally, about the RCMP's involvement.

All this suggests to me some obvious questions. Having had the October 9 letter brought to his attention, what did Mr. Goyer ask the RCMP at that November 6 meeting? Did he ask explicitly about RCMP involvement in the raid? Did he put the question directly? This is not cleared up in the present minister's statement. Surely, Mr. Speaker, it was his basic obligation to put that question to senior representatives of the RCMP. I, for one, cannot believe the question was not put. And if the answer to the question was in the affirmative, Mr. Goyer should have taken immediate action. If, however, there was a denial, then, to put it bluntly, the RCMP lied because we have it on record that the RCMP in Ottawa by this time clearly knew of their own policemen's involvement. We must learn the precise nature of this conversation, this important meeting which took place between Mr. Goyer and senior representatives of the RCMP. That is elementary.

At that meeting, in discussing the October 26 letter to his assistant recommending that no acknowledgement should be made, surely Mr. Goyer must have asked explicitly about RCMP involvement. I repeat, I cannot conceive of a conversation between two normally intelligent men on such a serious matter in which such a question would not be raised. The conclusion which follows my basic assumption that this question must have been put is as follows: either he was lied to by the RCMP, or he is lying in his report to the minister about what the RCMP told him. Or the third possibility is that Mr. Goyer is so incompetent and so foolish as not to have asked this elementary question—

Mr. Stanfield: What about a selective memory?

Mr. Broadbent: —and I, for one, simply cannot believe that. As to the question of responsibility to the minister, bungling and the possible involvement of dishonesty, and the question of the RCMP's violation of the principle of the rule of law, a violation clearly demonstrated by its failure to inform the minister of illegal acts taken by representatives of the force in the city of Montreal, I say the force has demonstrated clear irresponsibility in terms of its past traditions in this country. This question must surely be in the minds of Canadians and in the minds of members of this House: Is this an isolated incident involving the RCMP?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Broadbent: Is it?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Broadbent: Surely, we need more information about the Praxis break-in in Toronto. We have had questions raised about inappropriate activity possibly involving the RCMP in New Brunswick, Alberta, Toronto and Montreal.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Mr. MacKay: And Nova Scotia.

Mr. Broadbent: Surely, Mr. Speaker, in order to get to the root of this matter, to get to the root of the RCMP's responsibility, to determine if they were exercising their responsibility and whether the former solicitor general was simply incompetent or dishonest, we need a comprehensive public inquiry.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief in reply to those disclosures made today by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) whom I want to congratulate on his courage, his explanations and his statement this afternoon which was quite long and rather thorough. Along with my party, I do not agree that the former Quebec Minister of Justice (Mr. Choquette) answered that neither of the three police forces had been involved whatsoever in such an illegal matter. I think that the former Solicitor General should surely have done something or he should have known there was something fishy going on when, on October 26, 1972, it was suggested to his assistant by the RCMP that no acknowledgement be made, as reported on page 4. I therefore think that the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin) could indicate now if he needs five or ten minutes more, because I am sure it would be possible to go on until 1.05 or 1.10 p.m. to hear him through. Then, we could call it one o'clock and return at 2.10 p.m. to begin with the questions to be put to the Solicitor General. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin).

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, would it be possible to ask for the unanimous consent of the House in order to proceed until 1.30 p.m. with this discussion and then come back at 2.30 p.m. after lunch?

● (1300)

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I gather from what the hon. member is saying that he intends to take an additional half hour to reply. Frankly, I think that is a little long. I say that with respect. If he could cut it down to 1.15 p.m. I would certainly have no objection to carrying on that way. In any event, because of the staff, and for a number of other reasons, if it is the intention of the House to proceed beyond one o'clock we ought not to come back any earlier than an hour after we adjourn. I hope that will be agreeable to our colleagues. Thereafter we could carry on with the question period.

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: It would require unanimous consent to change the arrangement. Therefore, it being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock to hear the balance of the hon. member's statement.

At 1.03 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Order. At one o'clock the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin) was speaking. However, we missed during the calling of committee reports the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) who I believe has a committee report to table. Perhaps we could revert, with the consent of the House, to the tabling of reports.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, before lunch I had started a few remarks which I now continue. I wish to remind the House that in his statement on this whole matter, the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) has shown a lot of courage; nevertheless I still suggest that he has not entirely satisfied our hunger to know all there is to know about the case of the APLQ. Our main concern, and a very serious one, has to do with the rule of law which must remain supreme. I recall that a couple of weeks ago I was greatly disturbed about this rule as it is applied in our penitentiaries. I trust the recommendations made to the Canadian Penitentiary Service will be applied de facto to the RCMP. The Solicitor General no doubt recognizes that the RCMP behaved in a very curious manner to say the least. First Division "C" of Montreal moved into action without informing anybody until four days later, when it did inform Ottawa. By this time, the matter was publicly known, telegrams asking for replies had been sent to the Montreal division which was waiting, nobody knows why, to inform Ottawa about this whole matter.

I sincerely believe the Royal Canadian Mounted Police failed in one of its great responsibilities toward the Solicitor General of Canada. Moreover, the then solicitor general was informed of the whole matter only on October 30, that is three weeks after the documents were stolen. The allegation made in the document that was handed to us also troubles me. I am talking about the allegation that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) apparently received from the RCMP clear and repeated assurances that this matter was exceptional and isolated. Normally, I think we would take the word of the RCMP without a blink. However, following all this, I am wondering if I should not change a little my judgment on that police force, if such actions could remain hidden and confused for years, I repeat for years, for we are in 1977 and this matter goes back to 1972, and if such things can come to the surface afterwards, following the somewhat forced testimony of a former RCMP agent.

Mr. Speaker, I really wonder now whether other RCMP officials would not have some evidence to give about other cases which took place a few months or a few years ago. I am sure this would be of considerable interest to members of the House, in particular the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox). This whole matter casts a serious doubt on this police force and on communications between the various divisions of the RCMP and the Solicitor General, and this is very unfortunate, I suggest.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a brief comment about the legal and constitutional framework of the investigation under way. If the RCMP intervene in Quebec as they have done on that occasion, they should at the present time, I suggest, participate actively and fully in the investigation in conjunction with the Quebec Justice Department. Therefore, members of this House would be more aware of this whole matter and the federal police force would have the opportunity to know every new development which occurs in this case.

I look forward to the legislation which will be introduced next fall to correct shortcomings in the law as a result of citizens' complaints. Mr. Speaker, I therefore urge the Solicitor General to consider carefully the consultation and communication formula between the various divisions of the RCMP, and between the Solicitor General, hence Parliament, and this police force. The RCMP have always been very respected by all Canadians and it would be unfortunate for this situation to change and for actions such as those we have just dealt to be accepted in any way.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, there are a couple of questions which I would like to direct to the Solicitor General, just to start. I am sure other of my colleagues will have questions. One of my questions relates to the rather curious reference on page 5 of the English language version of the statement, which indicates that the then commissioner and the then director general said they would be surprised if they had not verbally advised the solicitor general, now the Minister of Supply and Services, regarding the contents of the October 9 letter and all matters relating thereto. There is another degree of vagueness in that the Minister of Supply and Services does not recall the exact date upon which he became apprised of all the circumstances.

I should like to ask the Solicitor General what procedures he followed to ascertain this information from his predecessor, the Minister of Supply and Services, from the former commissioner of the RCMP and the director general. Specifically, was this information taken in the form of a formal deposition? Was it taken under oath? Or is there some other means by which the minister can now persuade the House of Commons that we can take the word of one of the persons involved, the Minister of Supply and Services?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I have before me the page the hon. member referred to. This statement was made after I had the opportunity of personally speaking with and interviewing the Minister of Supply and Services, the then commissioner of the RCMP and the then director general of the security service. When I say I was apprised of this statement, it was not from a written statement which was given to me; it was directly from a conversation. My understanding of the conversation is that they agreed this was a factual statement of the situation.

Also, the Leader of the Opposition asked me a question as to the date on which the meeting was held at which point the Minister of Supply and Services would have been apprised of the contents of the October 9 letter. That date was taken after verification was made of the agenda kept by the RCMP and by the Minister of Supply and Services. It was brought to my attention that there was a general election in the month of October and that the normal meetings, which were held on a weekly basis, between members of the force and the then solicitor general were postponed. The first meeting anyone has in their agenda following the general election was the meeting held on November 6, 1972.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, just so that I am clear on this: the fact is that there were no sworn statements? In particular, there was no sworn statement from the Minister of Supply and Services relative to this matter? The Solicitor General has nothing under oath; no sworn statement or deposition?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite right; I do not have any sworn statement as such. What I have is a clear affirmation by a minister of the Crown stating that these are the facts as far as he is concerned, and telling me that that is exactly what he would say if he were in a court of law. These facts were also brought to light in the presence of Commissioner Higgitt and Mr. John Starnes, and there was no denial of any of those facts. The facts, as indicated there, are entirely corroborated by the people I have interviewed.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, without pursuing this line, I should like to make it clear to the Solicitor General that at least I will not be satisfied as to the veracity of these statements, particularly those of the Minister of Supply and Services, until we have them under oath or in some other form upon which we can clearly rely.

I should like to turn now to a question of timing, and particularly to a representation given inside this House by the Prime Minister on June 2 and repeated more explicity in a press conference given by the Prime Minister on May 26. At that time the Prime Minister said he could say without equivocation that as soon as the then minister knew about it, he made sure that the proper authorities were made aware of those who would be entrusted and charged with prosecuting any possible offences. There is some question as to when the then minister, the present Minister of Supply and Services, became aware of this matter, but it appears now that it might have been at least November 6. It might have been earlier, but it was at least November 6.

On November 27, 21 days later, the then solicitor general, to the relief of the RCMP, left his portfolio and went on to another portfolio. That means there were 21 days in which he knew of the matter, yet it was not pursued and no action was taken by any incumbent of the office of the solicitor general until March 16, 1976—nearly four years later. How does that square with the statement given by the Prime Minister in his press conference, and repeated in another version in this House of Commons, that there was action taken as soon as the minister knew about it? The evidence given by the Solicitor General stands in direct contradiction of the statement given in this House and the statement given at the press conference by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is any contradiction whatsoever, if the hon. member will give me time to spell it out. As I understand the information given by the Prime Minister in the House and during the course of his press conference, the then solicitor general, the commissioner of the RCMP and the director general of the security service, had no knowledge prior to the break-in. That much was extremely clear. When the hon. Leader of the Opposition refers to the statement of the Prime Minister that action was taken as soon as it was brought to the attention of the responsible minister, I take it he is referring to action taken by the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Looking back at the citations that the hon. Leader of the Opposition is bringing forward, I think there is a distinction, as is pointed out in my text. No one denies, least of all the Minister of Supply and Services, that he had the letter of October 9 on November 6. However, there is a difference between having a letter before you and being informed of the fact that there had been an illegal break-in.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, perhaps that would be the case only with a most uninquisitive minister. The fact remains that that minister, the present Minister of Supply and Services, was seized of the information and at least had cause to raise questions—and memories are unclear as to what else he knew—for 21 days while he was solicitor general of this country; and he also knew of these matters for at least another 3½ years while he was not the solicitor general but, nonetheless, was a minister of the Crown.

The minister's statement today stated very clearly that neither the RCMP headquarters in Ottawa, nor the solicitor general had been told of the search and seizure of documents prior to the operation being carried out. Did the solicitor general, the RCMP or anyone associated with the solicitor general have any knowledge of any activity taking place regarding L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec, le Mouvement pour la défense des prisonniers politiques du Québec and la Co-opérative des Déménageurs du 1er mai, prior to the event in question? Was there any knowledge at all on the part of the then solicitor general, any of his officials or anyone in Ottawa and the RCMP as to any investigation into these groups prior to the offence?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the relevant question before the House is whether anyone was advised or had prior knowledge, either before or after the fact, of any illegal activities, or whether anyone had knowledge of any general surveillance activities which may have been going on in the Montreal area by certain groups. I do not think I would be prepared to answer that type of question.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I want an answer to that question either now or at some other time. It is highly germane to know precisely the state of knowledge of the solicitor general of Canada or of his advisers relative to investigations into those groups before the break-in occurred.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, there was an understanding that the security service of the RCMP is supposed to carry out its duties. That is the understanding, and the direct orders are that those duties are to be accomplished according to the law.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I have three questions to ask in connection with the important statement made today by the minister. The first concerns the meeting which took place, presumably on November 6, between the former solicitor general and senior officers of the RCMP. I find it very strange that the subject matter referred to at that meeting was not whether the RCMP took part in the break-in or not, but what was discussed, according to the beginning of the paragraph at the bottom of page 4 of the statement, was why the former solicitor general received a recommendation that he not acknowledge the letter. I should like to ask the Solicitor General if he ever directly asked the former solicitor general whether at that meeting he inquired of the senior officials of the RCMP whether the RCMP took part in an illegal break-in. If the present Solicitor General did not ask his predecessor that question, why did he not do so?

Mr. Fox: The question the hon. member has suggested was one which I put to the former solicitor general. The answer I received was that the direct question the hon. member has mentioned was not put to the RCMP and that the only question asked was why they had thought it was not necessary to reply to the letter. The answer to that, as indicated in the statement I made, was that the Montreal urban community police were investigating the matter. I think that is the complete answer to the hon. member's question.

Mr. Broadbent: The answer may be complete, but does the minister find it acceptable or reasonable that in a discussion involving the allegation that the RCMP consciously violated the Criminal Code his predecessor would not have asked directly whether the senior officials here in Ottawa had information with respect to such an allegation?

Mr. Fox: In the course of my statement I tried to bring out all the facts that were brought to my knowledge. The statement to which the hon. member refers goes on to say the explanation given to me by the then solicitor general was that he immediately found it, and there is a word of French there, "invraisemblable", I am not sure of the translation—perhaps it is "unbelievable"—that the RCMP could possibly have participated in an illegal break-in, and therefore he dismissed the letter, having been reassured by the RCMP that the whole matter was being investigated by the Montreal urban police. This is one subject which has been inquired into by the commission which the minister of justice in Quebec has set up, as to why that part of the inquiry of the Montreal urban community police was brought to an end.

Mr. Broadbent: I find the attitude taken by the minister's predecessor absolutely "unbelievable", to use the same term. I should like to ask the minister two concluding questions. At the bottom of page 5 of the statement there is a discussion as to whether or not senior RCMP officers, including the former commissioner, took action following Mr. Choquette's denial of police involvement in the break-in. I, at any rate, reach the inescapable conclusion that what is said here would lead any reasonable person to the conclusion that the RCMP was directly involved in a cover-up.

I want to ask the minister why he believes the former director general of the RCMP and the former commissioner were acting in good faith when they knew at the time that the RCMP had broken the law and had taken part in the break-in, and when they learned the then minister of justice in the province of Quebec, possibly in good faith, had said publicly that there was no involvement on the part of the RCMP. Can the minister explain to the House how he interprets his own words in the statement, that they were acting in good faith, when what is at least directly involved, among other things, is cover-up action on their part by not revealing to the public their knowledge of a violation of the law?

Mr. Fox: It was made very clear to me by the then commissioner, Mr. Higgett, and the then director general that there was absolutely no cover-up within the force. They had been informed at RCMP headquarters in Ottawa within four days of the break-in. They tell me that the statement made by the minister of justice on October 12 was not brought to the attention of the minister by them, of course, and as far as they were concerned they thought the matter was being properly investigated by the police force in the province which, under the general rules of the Criminal Code, was charged with investigating all such criminal matters.

Mr. Broadbent: We find one question has not been dealt with in all that has been said by the minister today, both in his statement and in reply to questions. It is: Who ordered the break-in? Has the minister asked the RCMP whether they have determined who ordered the break-in?

Mr. Fox: The whole question of the break-in itself—there is no doubt whatsoever about that—was handed over to the provincial authorities in the province of Quebec and to the attorney general of that province, who launched an investigation to look into that matter. The RCMP co-operated, as of 1976, very closely with the investigation, as my statement indicates. Commissioner Nadon met with the investigator appointed by the province and any information requested was given by him. The result of that inquiry, as I understand it, was the laying of charges against the senior police officers in the three forces who authorized the break-in. In the case of the RCMP, the officer who authorized the break-in made on the Friday afternoon in Montreal was Chief Superintendent Cobb.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) a couple of questions in view of the fact that under the circumstances, RCMP members have been operating in Quebec for many years and one of them is involved, along with the Quebec police, in this recent case, would the hon. minister tell the House if he really intends to cooperate and participate in the investigation that his Quebec counterpart is about to hold, in order to protect his rear guard and eventually let the cat out of the bag, if necessary?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier in my statement of which the hon. member may unfortunately not have received a copy yet, I have assured Quebec officials of our intention to participate as much as possible in the inquiry which has been ordered by the Quebec Justice Minister.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, would the Solicitor General indicate to the House if Jacques Keable who is in charge now of this inquiry is the same lawyer as the journalist who worked for CBC over the last few years?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, if he is, I am not aware of it. I have very few details about the background of the person who has been chosen by the Quebec government in connection with the inquiry into this matter.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, would the Solicitor General tell the House if he will inquire or if he will seek some information about the quality of this lawyer-inquirer and his prejudices that we have known for a long time, and does he intend to inform the House about the character of this individual?

Mr. Fox: I think that if there are questions raised about this, I am certain that there will always be members of the Press Gallery only too glad to make them known to the Canadian public.

[English]

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General about something that appears at page 10 of the statement. It reads:

> The process of handling complaints of citizens—certainly in 1972—was not adequate.

He says he will correct this in the fall. Surely some improvements must be made in his office at present, compared with the way things used to be. I want to ask whether he endorses the way in which his colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, handled this affair. Could this happen in his office now?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, perhaps just before answering the specific question which the hon. member has raised he will allow me to respond briefly to two points he made this morning in the course of his reply to the statement. The hon. member referred to a complete report which would have been given to the solicitor general of the day. My understanding is that the report to which he referred would have been made in 1976 to my immediate predecessor, rather than to the Minister of Supply and Services. I think the hon. member would be interested in knowing that some of the facts he stated this morning are not completely correct.

An hon. Member: Table it.

Mr. Fox: I would like to speak, also, of the role of Mr. Cobb. I think the hon. member indicated that he would have been in the office of the solicitor general. That is not quite correct. He was appointed executive assistant to the deputy solicitor general. Of course, the facts that are known now were not known to the senior officers in the minister's office at the time of his appointment.

As to whether this could have occurred today, I hope that that would not be possible. But I recognize there is still need, in spite of the improved procedures in my own office, for improvement, such as that all letters be acknowledged or replied to. In so far as police complaints are concerned, there is need for an impartial, independent body or agency which would look at them.

Mr. MacKay: I gather from the minister's answers that he does not unequivocally endorse the way things were done in the old days and that he is making improvements. I hope he will table the report he mentioned because his predecessor said on various occasions that he would make a full report to the House, which he never did. I want to ask the Solicitor General whether he would not concede that an impartial inquiry into this matter would be better than leaving the force, for which he is responsible at present, to the tender mercies of the Parti Québécois and the government of Quebec and allowing the situation to become a possible element of confrontation, another item of confrontation between that government and this government. Would he not agree that he could protect the force and discharge his responsibilities better if he instituted an inquiry, particularly in view of the admission he made yesterday that there was no consultation on the terms of reference or anything else before the government of Quebec set up this inquiry?

Mr. Fox: I thank the hon. member for this question. I sometimes think that no matter what my answer would be, he would have difficulty with it. At the moment he is saying that it is unfortunate there were no consultations with the government of Quebec, but I sometimes wonder what his question would have been had I said there had been consultations. If that had been the answer, there would have been some idea of a Machiavellian plot to cover up.

Mr. Clark: Just answer the question, Francis.

Mr. Fox: I thank the Leader of the Opposition for his suggestion. I have tried to answer all questions which have been put to me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: There is, however, one point. There is no question arising as to whether there ought to be an inquiry.

Mr. Fraser: Has everybody answered your question?

Mr. Fox: I am sorry, I do not understand the question. There is no question as to whether there ought to be an inquiry. There is an inquiry going on in the province of Quebec at the moment, and I suppose if hon. members decide, or have some feelings that there have been cover-ups, surely they cannot believe, by any stretch of the imagination, that there could possibly be a cover-up between this government and the government of Quebec at the moment. So there is, of course, an inquiry. The question that arises is whether there should be a second inquiry. As far as I am concerned, I try to fulfil my undertaking to parliament today by bringing all the facts as I know them to the attention of the House of Commons, and I am pleased to listen to the suggestions hon. members are trying to make in this regard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: I thank the minister for his answer and I trust, since he is relying so heavily on the authorities in Quebec, that there will also be an inquiry into the matter of the Minister of Supply and Services, so as to do a complete job. I hope he likes his testimony better. But I would like to ask him more about the role of Inspector Donald Cobb. How is it that he happened to become attached to the office of the then solicitor general? Was it just a remarkable coincidence, or at whose instigation was it? Who made the appointment?

Mr. Fox: I am informed that at the time the deputy solicitor general was in search of an executive assistant. The recommendation about Mr. Cobb would have come from the force. Mr. Cobb, of course, had an excellent background, was a very valued member of the force, and it was thought that members of the force would benefit from having exposure in different areas in government. The fact that he was chosen was simply a reflection of his capacity and the high regard that people have for Mr. Cobb. As a matter of fact, according to what the deputy solicitor general tells me, Mr. Cobb fulfilled his duties with the deputy solicitor general with a very high degree of competence.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Solicitor General. Given the statement made in connection with a recent trial at which the judge and others commended these three police officials for their alertness in averting what might have been another apprehended insurrection, given the fact that it was public knowledge that the Prime Minister and other members of his cabinet were very concerned about possible insurrections, and having in mind the ingenuity they showed in imposing the War Measures Act in 1970, has the minister made any attempt to poll his colleagues, from the Prime Minister down—and this is a most likely assumption—to find out whether or not the Prime Minister and others in the cabinet were acquainted with the fact that three police officers had evidence of another apprehended insurrection and had averted it by their intelligent and prompt actions? Has the Solicitor General polled members of the cabinet, or will he do so, to find out if any of them, from the Prime Minister down, were not made aware of that fact back in 1972 after this event took place, as we would assume they would have been advised?

Mr. Fox: I realize the nexus the hon. member would like to deduct from both instances. There is no doubt that in 1972, as is the case today, reports were given to ministers of the Crown regarding possible security problems arising in the country. That is partly the role of the RCMP. However, as indicated in my statement, the RCMP have clear direction that both on the security side, as in police work, all their operations must be conducted in complete compliance with the laws of this land, which is the case.

Mr. Baldwin: I quote what appears at page 4 of the very excellent report which the minister has given. He says at the bottom of the page:

> Accordingly, the Minister of Supply and Services categorically states that he was not informed that the theft of documents was the result of an unlawful entry in which the RCMP has participated.

I take it that when making that statement, the Solicitor General is not making a judicial finding on his own that the Minister of Supply and Services was not informed, but is telling the House that the Minister of Supply and Services has so informed him. That being the case, I assume the Solicitor General is very careful, by using that language, not to put himself in the position of guaranteeing that the Minister of Supply and Services was, or was not, aware.

● (1440)

Can the Solicitor General tell us the terms of reference of the Quebec inquiry and how far they will permit intervention or co-operation? What will be the extent of the co-operation? I will come to that later, if I am allowed. Is the minister able to tell us in very concise terms the terms of reference of the Quebec inquiry?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would refer to my statement, he would find that the terms of reference are included on page 8. I do not know if the hon. member wants me to reread them. Perhaps he will have a look at them.

Mr. Baldwin: That is one question which perhaps I need not have asked. I have only just had a chance to read the statement. Having now examined it, and having heard what the minister has said, can the minister now advise us if under the terms of reference as he reads them, the Minister of Supply and Services will be giving evidence? Will he be appearing before this inquiry? Has the Solicitor General explored that avenue, and is there any good reason, in his judicious opinion, why the Minister of Supply and Services should not appear before that inquiry along with other people, including perhaps the executive assistant to the Minister of Supply and Services at the time he was solicitor general, so that the inquiry can explore for the satisfaction of the people of Canada one of the real issues, the issue of the accountability of the government as to whether there was, could have been or likely was, any delay, cover-up or obstruction of justice at the federal government level?

Mr. Fox: With respect to the last part of the hon. member's question, I think the facts as stated in my statement would tend to indicate that they will not. In answer to the more general question, I only learned of the terms of reference of the inquiry last evening. It is unclear to me whether the people mentioned by the hon. member could actually be called by the inquiry. I have asked my deputy minister to get in touch with the minister of justice of Quebec to see exactly what is the basis of those terms of reference.

Mr. Baldwin: Would you encourage the minister to appear as a witness?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. On page 1 of his statement he referred to this whole matter as an "illegal search", and then he said in the second paragraph that "no threat to such liberties can justify the use of illegal means to protect these basic rights". Regardless of the judgment of the court, regardless whether there may be an appeal against the decision, or anything else, and since the minister and the government believe that the search in which a senior officer of the RCMP was involved was illegal and improper, I would like to ask the minister whether this senior officer will be disciplined or reprimanded; or will he, according to the commissioner of the RCMP as reported in the press, simply be returned to the position he held?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises an important question. The RCMP officer who authorized the raid, as the hon. member knows, has been the subject of serious accusations before the criminal courts. He has been brought before the criminal courts. He was tried by a judge who heard all the relevant evidence. That judge came to a number of conclusions which were published in the press yesterday. I know some hon. members do not agree with the sentence which was imposed by the judge, but perhaps the fact that the judge had all the facts before him might lead hon. members to a different conclusion.

The commissioner of the RCMP informed me this morning that when Mr. Cobb pleaded guilty to the accusations brought against him under section 115 of the Criminal Code, he was suspended and that that suspension has now been lifted by the RCMP in view of the sentence handed down by the judge. The RCMP has taken cognizance of that judgment. The commissioner feels that a suspension is perhpas the most extreme sanction available. He has told me that he wishes to review the circumstances of other people involved, to see whether additional disciplinary action ought to be taken. As hon. members know, under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act which was passed by parliament, questions of discipline within the force are the exclusive prerogative of the commissioner.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago when this matter was being pursued, the Solicitor General indicated that he was certainly not putting himself in the position of in any way guaranteeing the whole truth of what he put forward relating to the involvement of the then solicitor general of Canada. That was the whole thrust of his stance today, and I cannot really blame him because everything with respect to the involvement of the then solicitor general is based upon the word of the then solicitor general to the present Solicitor General. There is not one deposition or sworn statement indicating that the Minister of Supply and Services is telling the truth.

Will the Solicitor General undertake to have his colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, make depositions under oath setting out all the information that is necessary and relevant to buttress the case which the Solicitor General, under instructions from somewhere, has tried to make? Is this the whole of the case? As a solicitor, the Solicitor General knows that the case is shot full of holes because he relies on hearsay evidence.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the word "hearsay" means the same in English as it does in the French law schools of the country. Hearsay is normally something told to somebody by somebody else, which is second-hand. The information I have laid before the House is the result of personal conversations I have had with the Minister of Supply and Services and with the commissioner.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is still hearsay.

Mr. Fox: Perhaps that is hearsay to the hon. member, but it is not hearsay to me. It is not based on someone else's conversations. As far as the question of sworn depositions is concerned, I have spoken to the people involved, who are no doubt honourable men, including the minister, the commissioner of the RCMP and the deputy director of security services at that time. I believe it is contrary to the procedures of this House to ask for a sworn statement from a minister of the Crown. The minister has told me quite clearly that what he told me is exactly what he would say in a court of law. That means that he was speaking under his own promise.

An hon. Member: You have never had a tougher client to defend.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, any statement by the former solicitor general to the present Solicitor General does not have the effect of a statement made in this House, in a courtroom or under oath. My question to the Solicitor General is a simple one, and my reason for asking it is obvious. Will the Solicitor General go to his colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, who was solicitor general when all this is supposed to have taken place, and obtain from him, and table in this House, a sworn statement as to his involvement in this affair?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, as I understand the rules of this House, if the Minister of Supply and Services feels that his integrity has been impugned, he can certainly rise on a question of privilege and indicate that everything he has told me and everything indicated in my statement is true.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Has the Solicitor General been in touch with the Minister of Supply and Services in the course of the preparation of this statement? Has he been in touch by telephone or otherwise to read the statement to him, or to let him know what was to be placed in this statement today and delivered to the House through the mouth of the Solicitor General? Has that happened? Can the Solicitor General tell us whether it is the intention of the Minister of Supply and Services, when he returns to this House, to make the statement which the Solicitor General has indicated could be made and which, with respect, I think should be made?

Mr. Fox: On the question of whether the Minister of Supply and Services will make a statement to the House, I am not in a position to respond to that because I have not asked him. On the question of whether I have been in touch with the former solicitor general to show him the statement, he has not seen the statement I made in the House today. It is quite clear that I have spoken to him about parts of the statement which relate to what he sees as being the facts of the matter to which I have referred.

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

PETITION TO END CONTROLS OF JUNE 30, 1977

The House resumed from Thursday, June 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Stevens:

That the Anti-Inflation Act being chapter 75, Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76, as amended by chapter 98, Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76, shall expire on the 30th day of June, 1977.

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, for a few minutes this afternoon I want to address my remarks to the motion brought by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) which was debated yesterday. I think certain things ought to be said bluntly on this second day of debate. The first is that we on this side are getting a little tired of suggestions that we do not have a position on the economic problems of the country, and that we do not have a position on what should, or should not, be done with respect to controls. The fact is, we have had a position on controls and the economic difficulties of this country for a long time. Not only that, but if the positions we have taken, going back some three or four years, had been accepted by the House at the time, we would not have anything like the difficulties we face today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: I want to add something to that, Mr. Speaker. The fact of the matter is that under our former leader, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), this party had the guts to tell the Canadian people what no other party in this House had the guts to tell them. We were the first to suggest that something had to be done to break inflation expectations, and if it had been done at the time we were saying it we would have finished with controls a long time ago.

I have said in this House before, and apparently I have to say it again, that there was nothing in recent history more deliberately dishonest than the 1974 election campaign of the government when they had their own contingency plan for controls and yet went through the election campaign leaving the impression, especially with labour, that they would not bring in a controls system. We put forward these ideas in 1973 and campaigned in 1974 knowing perfectly well that we did not have all segments of public opinion on our side. We knew we were in a battle against public opinion, but we were prepared to fight that battle because it was time politicians had the guts to put their ideas forward and persuade the public to adopt them—not just wait to see in what way the public would go.

[Mr. Goodale.]

In defence of the fact that he cannot find a way, if he wants to get out of controls, stay in controls for a long time, or stay in controls permanently, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) said, in effect, last night, "You cannot assail me. The polls in Canada show that the public does not want to get out of controls." I interjected, "What are you doing, making economic decisions by taking polls of what people think they like or do not like?"

The public is sick and tired of a government and of politicians who have forgotten the one fundamental obligation of a politician in Canada, and that is to decide what is the right thing to do and then persuade the public to go along with it: not the opposite. As I said, I am fed up listening to hon. members on the other side, from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Finance, down through the treasury benches, asking what we would do. I can see them sitting there twisting their limp wrists and saying, "Tell us what you would do." We told them many months ago, and we are telling them again.

Hon. members are smiling, but maybe that is the last thing they have to smile about. Now they are in the crunch. If they do not want to accept our point of view, they should say so. But they should go one step further and tell us what they are going to do. For 20 months this government has not known what to do. First of all, they got into this program on the wrong foot. Second, instead of starting with a freeze which would have affected everybody equally, they started with utter confusion. Third, they have not decided things amongst themselves. Now they wonder why they have problems with labour in this country: labour thinks the government has double-crossed them. We can tell the government what we would do. They should not accuse us of having no ideas. We know what we would do, and we have put it clearly to them. It is up to the government to respond; that is what this debate is all about.

This party has done a service to the country by bringing this motion forward, because the country does not know what the government has in mind in terms of a decontrols period. In all sincerity I ask the government not to leave the country in doubt very much longer. It is doubt and uncertainty that is causing as much trouble now as the inflationary expectations caused a couple of years ago. I do not have to remind anybody in this House that there are about one million people unemployed in this country. The government certainly knows that. Many members on that side understand, as we do, that the problem of unemployment will only be solved if we get the economy going, get productivity going and create a climate for the private sector in which it can do some planning and accumulate plant and equipment. It cannot do that until it knows what the government's plans are.

That being the case, I say there is a direct, blunt, real and urgent obligation on the government to tell the House today what they are going to do. I do not want to hear any more talk from the government side—or from the media—to the effect that we cannot ask the government what they will do unless we have a plan ourselves. Mr. Speaker, we have offered a blueprint already, but the government does not want to accept it, according to the speech made by the Minister of Finance last night. The Minister of Finance said nothing.

• (1500)

Mr. Clarke: Apparently he doesn't know anything.

Mr. Fraser: That is true. Last night he said nothing. I will not deal with any question of semantics, that is to say, whether it is possible for someone to speak and at the same time say nothing, but if you examine his speech you will see little that is new in it. It does not tell this country's business community where the government wants to go, does not tell labour, our working men and women, where the government intends to go, and does not tell old age pensioners, people on fixed incomes, people outside the trade union movement, ordinary entrepreneurs and small businessmen, what the government intends to do. That speech contains not one single direction post. It gives no sign of what the government intends to do.

Mr. Clarke: If you read it twice, it still amounts to a double zero.

Mr. Fraser: What does it mean for the country? It means this: the longer the government delays making up its own mind, making a decision, the longer the country will be left in uncertainty.

Last night the hon. member for Halifax, my former leader, made a fine speech in which he quoted the Prime Minister as saying that it is the duty of the government to decide. The Prime Minister was not the first politician to say it, but it is signicant that he, this country's most prominent politician, does not abide by those words, because the government has not decided. It is one thing to say these things, quite another to act.

I have been interested to note that for some months colleagues in this House, honourable men and women all of them, have read into the record columns printed in the press, and quoted especially the results of seminars and gatherings of this country's business and labour people; and it is apparent that those who have a direct interest in the economy are unable to make up their minds on what to do. I do not say these decisions are easy; I do not pretend they are, even though I castigated the government. However, my castigation will be to some purpose if the government listens. My point is this: we must find a way out, but the final decision under our parliamentary system must be made by the government. You see, it is curious—I suppose it is one of the peccadilloes of human nature—that when we advocated controls in 1973 and 1974, people opposed us, saying we should not do it. It is somewhat ironic that today some of those very people say, "We do not want controls, but for goodness sake do not get out of them now."

There is no good time for removing controls, but this may be the best opportunity we shall have for a long time. As others have said, our production is at 80 per cent of potential, one million are unemployed, but many forces at work in the economy militate against another wage and price explosion. On page 2 of the government document "Highlights of the Discussion Paper on Decontrol and Post-Control Issues" the following words appear:

> The time is approaching to remove the temporary control over prices and incomes, and there are favourable conditions for doing so. It seems unlikely that excess demand will lead to a renewed acceleration of inflation when controls are removed. There should be no shortages of food, industrial materials or energy. Controls do not seem to have distorted Canadian labour or product markets, or wage or price structures.

I am not sure I agree with that last sentence. I continue quoting:

> Most important, inflationary expectations have changed significantly since October 1975. Canadians no longer expect wages and prices to rise at double-digit rates. Business and consumers do not foresee substantial price increases.

Ironically, the document says that in other areas there may be pressures on prices, possibly causing them to rise. I say to hon. members on the government side, these words are contained in the government's own document. You know, it is getting late in the day to have it both ways.

Mr. Gillies: Not if you are Liberal.

Mr. Fraser: I say to the government, you had better act on this document, or tell us why you will not act.

I now come to an important point which all Canadians must face. I know the Minister of Finance would like to end controls; I know it, not because he sent me a letter, but from paying attention to what he has said. He repeated this sentiment again in last night's speech. I happen to know that a good many members on the government side would like controls to end, and I also know that a good many on the government side, although not all of them, think that long-term or permanent controls will do this country a lot of harm. That is my party's position, and it is the view of most people who are prepared to accept the responsibilities and risks which go with a free system. But the Prime Minister has said we must not get out of controls until we have a commitment from various sectors of the economy that they will restrain their demands, that demands will not get out of hand. It is fine to say that in the classroom. That is great in theory. The trouble is, the world does not work that way. It is like saying to Canadians, "We are not going to give you the freedom to make mistakes until we are absolutely sure you will not make a mistake." Such thinking applies to a world which does not exist.

This country is made up of men and women brought up in the tradition that our institutions are free. And they are free to make mistakes. Surely the government need only intervene when those mistakes are so serious as to hurt the welfare of the entire community, that is to say, when they are clearly against the public interest. My friends opposite may say, "You are being philosophical." Perhaps it is a philosophical point. The fundamental question is, are we to be a free country, or is the government to intrude on our freedoms by insisting that the state has the right to intrude in every facet of our lives?

Mr. Clarke: That is what they want.

Mr. Fraser: You see, it does not do for businessmen to say, "We do not think we should have controls, but if you get out of them those trade union fellows will get out of line." It will not do for people involved with civil rights, or for ordinary citizens to say, "We do not think we should have controls, but, my goodness, somebody must do something about prices." The fact is that labour and management which, with the government, make up the most important sectors of the economy, must make up their minds. Do they have the guts to accept responsibility and do they want freedom badly enough? Do they want to return to conditions where the government does not make decisions for them, where they will have to exercise responsibility and common sense?

Mr. McIsaac: They have not made it so far.

Mr. Fraser: My hon. friend opposite, for whom I have high regard says, "You have not made it so far." Do you think, if you remove people from the atmosphere in which they can make their own decisions, they will be better able to make those decisions later? That is a contradiction of human nature. The more you shelter people, taking away from them the responsibility to exercise their rights within some kind of sense of self-discipline and common sense, the harder it will be for them to do it when you move them back into a free atmosphere. That is fundamental.

I say to my friends on the government side that they have not done it yet. They have not done it if they are trying to have heaven this side of the grave. However, we cannot do that. As a Conservative, I do not think the world is necessarily perfectable this side of heaven. We are in an imperfect world and we have to do the best we can with it.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): An imperfect government, too.

Mr. Fraser: My friend says we have an imperfect government. It is not necessary for me to debate that issue. There is no argument there.

Mr. Kaplan: We admit it.

Mr. Fraser: What I am saying is that there will be no perfect time to say to people that they have to be responsible, that if they want their freedom they will have to exercise it responsibly. There will be excesses. Some people will not be able to accept that. However, that is something we will have to work out as time goes on. There is not a person here with any maturity who thinks he or she lives in a perfect world or thinks he or she will ever accomplish it.

One of the things we have fought for in our community, both politically and economically, is a reasonable degree of freedom. That results in having to be responsible. There are labour leaders today who can tell you that when controls come off the thing they fear the most is the first management group in a major sector in industry that gives way to a ridiculous demand. That will put terrible pressure on the rest of the labour leaders. They may not tell you that publicly, but they will say it privately. That means management has a responsibility. They cannot just decide that every time they go to the bargaining table they will give in and just pass it on to the consumer. There is a growing awareness in this Chamber that governments have to be responsible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: For those who say that government cannot contain its own expenditures, costs and growth, I say it cannot do that unless those people who are directing government have the will to do it. Just in case anybody tries to take my words out of context, let me say this: I am not one who believes for one minute that you can solve the country's ills by suddenly moving in with a bulldozer and destroying every particle of government that we have in this country. That is inane. There are people with that view and they are foolish or worse. We need to have a handle on government like we need to have a handle on everything else.

Mr. Gillies: But do we need to have this government?

Mr. Kaplan: That is up to the voters to decide.

Mr. Fraser: We have this government at least for a while. I have to do the best I can on a Friday afternoon to persuade the government to amend its ways.

I want to turn to another matter, the documents and speeches of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro). I am sorry he is not here this afternoon. He is representing our country at the International Labour Organization in Geneva and cannot be here for this debate. I know he would want to be here. I understand why he cannot.

Since the fall the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Finance and others, including the Prime Minister, have been talking about the establishment of a national forum to discuss the big economic issues of the day. I am very intrigued that although I have been asking questions since the end of October through November, December, January, February and on, and I made reference to it in a speech to this House on April 21, the government is no closer to establishing this national forum.

The national forum that the government has in mind to discuss the "big economic issues of the day" is a multipartite forum which will include representatives from just about every segment of society that you can imagine. Interestingly enough, in the "Agenda for Co-operation" and in the summary of the "Agenda for Co-operation", that is the green paper, once again this multipartite national forum is put out as being the consultative mechanism by which we are going to conduct to quite a degree on an advisory or consultative basis, our affairs.

The Minister of Finance very appropriately and kindly today in question period straightened out one thing, that is, that the discussions going on now which will help him to make up his mind when controls will end and which of the three options the minister put forward will be followed—those discussions will take place with labour representatives and management representatives, not the multipartite national forum.

I am sorry I have to keep repeating in this Chamber to those on the government side that there is no use advocating this multipartite national forum unless you have labour's agreement to go in it. I pointed out in the past that they do not have labour's agreement to go into it.

Labour says it will not go in it because it will be outnumbered. It wants to deal with management and government but it does not want to deal with the entire community. It says it would be outnumbered and would not have significance in a tripartite consultative body. If there is any doubt about that, I remind the government that on May 30 in the Gazette, Mrs. Shirley Carr, vice-president of the Canadian Labour Congress, made a statement. The article reads, and I quote:

> The Canadian Labour Congress has rejected any role in the body that will likely be set up to advise the federal government on economic affairs when wage and price controls end, Vice-President Shirley Carr said in an interview. She said the body would be too large to function effectively.

That does not come as any surprise to anyone who has been paying attention to what labour leaders have been saying, because they have said it before. Mr. Morris said it many weeks ago. Now Mrs. Carr is saying it.

If you look at the Canadian Labour Comment, which is the publication of the Canadian Labour Congress, for June 10, 1977, you find these words:

> We agree with the government's proposal for a consultative assembly to assist in future government planning, but disagree with the government's suggestion that such an assembly be open to a multitude of groups. Such an assembly would be unwieldy and its effectiveness would be diluted to such an extent that it would be of no practical use. We therefore urge the government to return to the format which has recently had some success: a body made up of the three major partners in the economy: government, labour and business.

I am not arguing now about the rightness or wrongness of the CLC position, although I will say that I very much tend to agree with the concept.

What is the use of advocating a multipartite 50 member national forum, the object of which will be to have more discussion of the economic situation, when you have a very clear statement from one of the most important groups that would have to be represented there that it will not take part? After having said this many times and pleaded with members of the government side, I hope they will go to the Minister of Labour and say that maybe the labour critic on the other side does have a point. There is no use advocating something that does not meet with the approval of one absolutely essential group you need to have there.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): They are not saying that in private.

Mr. Fraser: The Minister of Finance says they are not saying that in private. That is very interesting. They have said it to me in private.

• (1520)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Not in the consultations.

Mr. Fraser: My hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, says not on the principle of consultation.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I said, not in the consultation, they have not refused participation.

Mr. Fraser: My hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, says they have not refused participation in this multipartite body in consultations that he has had with them recently. I did not know that. But I do know that privately I have been told they are not going to go along with it, and publicly they are saying that they will not go along.

Perhaps we have a difficulty here. These discussions which have been taking place between labour, government and management are to some degree confidential at this time, and I can understand that. However, I am glad the Minister of Finance is in the Chamber today because he now says that, whatever are the public utterances of the CLC, that is not what they are saying privately. That is a little dangerous situation to have arise because the Minister of Finance was in some difficulty some weeks ago—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Alexander: Bob Kaplan, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, said no.

Mr. Kaplan: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, which is not to do with withholding consent since I understand there was general agreement among all parties that we would confine our speeches to 30 minutes. I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, to draw to your attention that, perhaps through inadvertence, two Conservative members in a row have been recognized. The hon. member for Dauphin concluded the debate last night, and then this afternoon the first speaker recognized was from the Conservative party. I know it is a matter of the Speaker's judgment, but—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member may not have to pursue this matter. The Chair recognizes this and we are prepared to recognize two members from the government side.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), last night, and reviewed his comments, along with those of others, in Hansard this morning. He has already examined the state of the economy in the context of the anti-inflation program and dealt with some of the important matters relating to the decontrol process. I assure the House that I concur with his assessment and the conclusions he drew in his review, as well as the caution that he expressed as we view decontrol and the post-controls period.

Nobody would claim that we are out of the inflation woods yet, but I believe that we are making progress and that there are encouraging signs. The Minister of Finance mentioned some last night. I want to deal with others which directly affect my portfolio because I think they do demonstrate in a tangible way that the government has been providing leadership in the conduct of its own operations during this somewhat difficult time. I might add, Mr. Speaker, that we are fully determined to continue to provide that leadership in the equally difficult days ahead.

Let me try to review some of these encouraging signs, Mr. Speaker. The percentage increase in government spending this year is the smallest in more than a decade. I have already given a commitment to the House, which is backed up by cabinet, that fiscal restraint will continue in fiscal year 1978-1979. The increase in public service man years, the growth of the public service, which has been of some concern both substantively and symbolically, has been virtually halted this year, and again I have given the commitment to this House that that rigid control of manpower resources is going to continue in 1978-79.

Wage settlements negotiated with the public service unions have remained in the main in keeping with the Anti-Inflation Board guidelines. Again I can make a commitment to members of the House that, within the framework of comparability with the private sector, we will continue to offer fair but measured settlements with the federal public service, settlements that will follow and not lead the private sector.

So to the skeptics, Mr. Speaker, I would say look at the record. We were challenged to show leadership in the area of restraint and we accepted that challenge. Indeed we have met it with more than a modest measure of success. What is more, Mr. Speaker, this was accomplished without an economic distortion in the federal realm which would trigger a reaction to bounce back as soon as the controls are removed.

Therefore I think these accomplishments, together with the commitment to continue to be vigilant at the federal level in fiscal affairs, have paved the way, if and when the decision is taken, for relaxing the legislated price and income controls as they apply to federal government activity. But having said that, Mr. Speaker, I want to reiterate the caution that applies equally to the federal government as it does to all other segments of society.

We will continue to hold the upper hand with inflation only through a high level of co-operation between management and labour, between producer and manufacturer, and between government and the private sector. It is this continuing need that makes the concept of a forum for consultation as proposed in the green paper, which seems to be coming under some fire, so attractive. We simply have to face the fact that governments cannot do it all; we will have to continue to work together. Let us make no mistake about it; the road ahead will not be as easy, nor can the controls period end as easily as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) appears to think. I noted a recent public comment which was attributed to him to the effect that it would be a good way to celebrate July 1 by simply turning out the lights and lifting the controls.

Mr. Stevens: He did not say that.

Mr. Andras: Well, that is the report that I have noted.

Mr. Stevens: He did not say turn the lights out.

Mr. Andras: He said we should lift the controls. He said it would be a great thing to lift the controls suddenly on July 1. If I said turn the lights out, then that is my description of it. Anyway, apparently he sees the whole program being suddenly dropped on June 30, that this would be a good idea, with the cabinet apparently arbitrarily dealing with the leftovers on the advice of a department that has the monitoring of salary and price increases suddenly added to its responsibilities simply as "other related duties".

I do not think it is a time for grandstanding, Mr. Speaker. I think it is a time for co-operation of the very highest order. I think that is as fundamental to the decontrol process as it has been during the life of the anti-inflation program.

As President of the Treasury Board representing in the government sense the employer, and having to apply the controls to our general expenditure restraint program, I can tell hon. members that we have had widespread and substantial support in making the restraint program work in what we call the bureaucratic system. Without that I do not think the progress that we have made could have been made, nor could it have been made so quickly. My cabinet colleagues and their departmental staffs certainly have not been happy from time to time at the many occasions when they have had to modify their submissions, but they have co-operated in an effort to trim government spending.

It has to be said in all fairness that the public service unions too have, with very few exceptions, tempered their demands in a way that underscores the observation in the green paper that inflationary expectations have decreased in Canada since 1975. This apparent change of attitudes and expectations by many segments of our society, coupled with our continuing commitment to keep inflation in check, bodes well for the immediate future.

In the area of fiscal matters I have already reminded members of my commitment, which has been stated several times, that the federal government will restrain its spending in line with relative growth in the gross national product. The record shows that in fiscal 1976-77 the GNP increased by 13.5 per cent and that our expenditure increase was held to 11 per cent.

During fiscal year 1977-78 the forecasters are looking for an 11 per cent increase in the gross national product. I have already told the House that we expect a federal expenditure increase over 1976 in the area of 7 per cent. That translates into a total expenditure for this fiscal year of $44,450 million, budgetary and non-budgetary, including all supplementary estimates through to March 31, 1978.

To emphasize the degree of restraint, that total figure of $44,450 million includes only $1,550 million reserve for all supplementary estimates for the whole of the fiscal year of which, by past experience, $850 million will probably be absorbed by unavoidable adjustments to existing programs, statutory and others. That will leave only $700 million for emergencies or new programs requiring new expenditures. Well, $700 million in absolute figures is a very, very sizeable amount. Relative to the total expenditures, however, it amounts to 1½ per cent. Relative to reserves after the main estimates within expenditure ceilings for any given year or relative to the cumulative supplementary estimates of previous years, that is very tight indeed. I doubt that any fortnight of debates in this House of Commons goes by without there being suggestions for spending from all sides in excess of that reserve.

I have said that I did not get into politics to balance books or to be a bookkeeper, but in the face of the continuing need to combat inflation, and recognizing that the entire public sector—all governments in Canada—is now eating up more than 40 per cent of the GNP, up about 12 per cent from just over a decade ago, the bulk of which is at the provincial and municipal level, all of us in public office have got to maintain a determined effort and leave no stone unturned collectively in an attempt to keep our total public spending in line with the kind of commitments we have been making.

Mr. Stanfield: I think you should roll a few stones over and see what is under them.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, we are doing that. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) has made a rather gratuitous but useful comment about rolling stones over to see what is under them. We are finding a few things we hope to eliminate. I am sure the hon. member had to do that on occasion himself.

I make the statement that we have to maintain and meet our commitment to restrain our spending within the pattern of the gross national product. I make that statement with the full knowledge that emergencies and extraordinary situations may require extraordinary measures from time to time. However, our goal must be to keep federal spending growth in step with the GNP.

I heard the economist, Douglas Peters, comment the other day in Montreal at the CMA meeting. He suggested that we need major new incentives for manufacturing. I should like to ask him what he is willing to trade off in exchange. By the same token we, as members of parliament and politicians, must be prepared to cut back in established and existing programs if unavoidable new demands arise and have to be met. We cannot add new ideas requiring new expenditures on top of existing commitments without blowing the lid off.

I should like to comment for a few minutes on another important aspect which is very directly related to my portfolio, and that is the matter of public service compensation and collective bargaining. I do so in light of the anti-inflation program and the decontrol process.

At the outset I should like to state the obvious, and that is, we believe that collective bargaining is the fairest and most acceptable method of determining wages and working conditions for the federal public servant. We also believe in the principle of comparability of compensation wherever possible. It is very much more possible quantitatively than generally thought. I am referring to the comparability of compensation between the public servant and the employee in the private sector—between private industry and government.

There are those who feel that in this field of wage, salary and collective bargaining settlements that the federal government is a pacesetter, forcing wages and salaries up in the market place. The facts deny that allegation. Labour Canada provides a general picture by showing rates of increase in base wage rates for new settlements covering 500 employees. This is a matter of public information and public record. I should like to refer to that report which covers the period from 1968 to 1976. It excludes the construction industry.

That report indicates that for municipal public servants the base wage rate increase was 132 per cent; for provincial public servants that wage increase was 129 per cent; for the public sector as a whole the increase was 124 per cent; for all industries, both private and public, the increase was 123 per cent; for the private sector alone the increase was 120 per cent; and at the very bottom of the list the federal public servant wage increase was 113 per cent. Those numbers clearly indicate that the increase in base rates for federal public servants has been less than any other sector, including the private sector. It is equally clear that if the increases in the public sector as a whole are slightly higher than the average, that is due to increases at other than federal government levels.

I have read those statistics into the record because they set the stage for some of the information I would like to give hon. members now. It will add credence and emphasis to what I said at the outset—we are showing leadership during this period of the anti-inflation program.

The AIB summary of public service settlements submitted for review called for an average increase of 10½ per cent, which had been the first year guideline established by the regulations. In fact, just over 80 per cent of the compensation settlements or arbitral awards were at or under the guidelines. That should be compared to other settlements in other sectors of the economy. Outside the public service, the average increase submitted for review was slightly higher than the federal public service and nearly a full percentage point above the guidelines. Thus, even though the federal public service record of base rate increases since 1968 was the lowest on the list, it did not prevent us from meeting the same AIB guidelines which others apparently could not meet. And while I am told the anti-inflation program has not yet had a discernible impact on the number of strikes in the federal public service, I am heartened by the dramatic reversal in this kind of activity.

In 1974 one strike was recorded in the federal public service, involving 17,300 employees. The following year, 1975, there were 12 strikes, either illegal or legal, involving about 43,400 employees. And in 1976, the most recent year for which statistics are available, there were six strikes involving only 9,000 employees. During the same three-year period the number of workers involved in strikes in all sectors across Canada almost tripled to a high in 1976 of just under 1.6 million.

While the statistics I have quoted demonstrate the effectiveness of the AIB program, hon. members may wonder about its effect upon the employee. Did he suffer? Did he lose financial ground? Mr. Speaker, workers in this country have experienced a real annual increase in wage rates which, for some, was higher than in previous years. The federal public servant got a real increase of 4.9 per cent, the highest real gain for him since 1971, while in manufacturing average hourly earnings showed a real increase of 6.7 per cent, well above the real gain recorded in any of the previous five years.

So it is not a bad record. What this tells me is that even within the restraint program, even within the constraint of the guidelines, there was room for significant growth in real purchasing power for both the public servant and his counterpart in private industry.

In looking to the decontrol period, the government has already stated its belief that the process and timing for the ending of controls should be the same in both the public and the private sectors. We reject the recommendation which has come from some sources that arbitrary controls should continue to apply to public servants after they have been removed in the private sector. We feel that would be unfair and unworkable. Nevertheless, we feel improvements must be made in the system of public service compensation.

What we are talking about now, and have begun to discuss with the public service unions, is the idea that in the pursuit of the principle of average comparability with the private sector, collective bargaining in the public service must reflect total compensation. In other words, we must give full recognition to the value of wages, benefits and working conditions as part of the compensation package. In other words, we have to give full recognition not only to the wages paid but also to other benefits and working conditions when assessing the total compensation package. Having shown leadership in this area, we are in consultation with the provinces and we hope that they, too, will attempt to bargain on a similar basis of average comparability with the private sector taking total compensation into account.

Implementation of these policies requires the development of improved methods and more detailed data, along with continued consultation with bargaining agents, the pay research bureau and others. The Treasury Board is now in the process of developing detailed work plans which include provision for consultation with all interested parties; I am hopeful that these consultations, which will occur within the context of the green paper, will help clarify the approach to be taken in connection with the achievement of our compensation goals.

I note that the other day the columnist, Maurice Western, writing in the Winnipeg Free Press, said that the controls program has very wide support and that it was the prospect of decontrols which had aroused apprehension. Well, Mr. Speaker, I outlined a few moments ago the way in which the Treasury Board proposes to proceed with regard to the public service. The green paper sets out the method by which we may proceed in relation to a wider spectrum. I guess that in the end the key word is co-operation. I do not think any one sector can do it alone. I also believe that, given this co-operation, there is no need for much of the apprehension which has been expressed.

I may say I am encouraged by various comments which have come to my attention such as statements made this week at the Canadian Gas Association meeting in Jasper which call into question some of the gloomy views expressed by hon. members opposite in this debate. At that meeting the President of the Conference Board of Canada is quoted as saying:

> There is a new attitude developing in Canada today that the gloom and doom of the last few years has passed its peak.

I was encouraged, also, to hear of a comment at the same meeting by Mr. Stevens, who has just taken over as head of the Manufacturers Association of Canada. He said:

> It appears that Canada is making the right economic and political decisions and will emerge from this period of adjustment as a stronger nation.

So in spite of the bombast and rhetoric of this debate there is support for the policies of the government, and I think it is a great deal more general than some of our critics in the last day or so would like to admit.

Mr. Stanfield: Would the minister permit a question? I do not think his time has expired. He has told us there has been a net gain of 5 per cent, on an average, in the real purchasing power of public servants. As well, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) indicated last night there had been a substantial improvement in the position of working people across this country—he mentioned a similar figure. I should like to ask the minister where this improvement could have come from—how it could have been absorbed by the economy when the increase in productivity on a per capita basis was obviously far less?

Mr. Andras: The figures, of course, are a result of a calculation taking into account the cost of living and the wage settlements; the result is significantly more to the advantage of the workers to whom I have referred than previous and apparently higher increases in wages accompanied by a much lesser increase in the cost of living.

Mr. Stanfield: Might I ask the minister how he expects us to accept his suggestion that there has been a 5 per cent improvement in the position of the working man when there has been a far smaller increase in productivity on a per capita basis? Can he or the Minister of Finance explain how this could be possible?

Mr. Andras: I think it is obvious that if inflation climbs at a faster rate than wages there is constant chase and the reinjection of inflation, but if both taper down and there is a greater gain in wages than the increase in the inflation rate, the worker gains. I agree that the whole question of national productivity is relevant to this aspect but it does not necessarily form part of that calculation.

Mr. Antonio Yanakis (Berthier-Maskinongé): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in this three-day debate brought about by the Conservative motion that the anti-inflation controls be ended at the end of June 1977. It is a privilege for me to bring my modest contribution to this debate which is very important for consumers and specially for those who are least able to defend themselves against inflationary pressures, such as the aged, the retired, the non-unionized wage-earners who receive only the minimum wage and others in similar circumstances.

It is difficult for me to understand why the opposition leader introduced such a motion at the present time when statistics show that the anti-inflation program, after 18 months of existence, has proven to be one of the most positive factors to check the price and wage increase rises we have experienced in the years 1974-75. What a strange attitude for the Progressive Conservatives to take by introducing this motion when a recent Gallup poll taken on May 4 last was showing that 70 per cent of Canadians support controls and 60 per cent of independent business concerns are against the removal of salary and price controls in 1977.

Mr. Speaker, it would be interesting to examine the attitude of the opposition these days, since it is neglecting an important legislative program now before the House to tackle a program which has already proved its efficiency and which has received the approval of the Canadian people. Does it want to divert public attention from recent Gallup polls on the popularity of political parties? Do they want us to forget the results of the recent by-elections? It could not be done better. Perhaps they want to forget the two last defections from their party, that is the members for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) and for Hochelaga (Mr. Lavoie) who have joined the Liberal party. Without trying to be clever, I could add that before long, other members of the Progressive Conservative Party in Quebec and elsewhere will join this side of the House or will leave political life. It is unfortunate that he is not here, but I noted yesterday the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) who was not very successful during the recent by-elections when he bit the dust. Fortunately the party held him back, because he too would have resigned—something he is well known for.

Finally, there seem to be various reasons and since the motion must be discussed, let us consider the facts. The Canadian people must not think that the fight against inflation is over, according to Mr. Gerald Bouey, Governor of the Bank of Canada. In the 1976 annual report of the Bank of Canada released last March 21, Mr. Bouey expresses the opinion that 1976 must be considered as the first episode of Canada's fight to get rid of inflationary attitudes and behaviour and to restore the internal economic balance necessary to our future wealth. The report reminds us that the relatively high inflation rate of costs and prices continues to be very dangerous for the health of our economy.

Over the last years, the average nominal income increase of employed people was much higher than in the United States and too high compared to Canada's wealth. Mr. Bouey finds that Canada has become a high production cost country. As long as this situation lasts, he adds, we cannot hope to establish the solid foundations which are essential to the creation of jobs on which our future wealth will rely. On the other hand, the high rate of inflation has seriously affected our competitive position on international markets, which has been reflected in considerable deficits in our foreign trade. As a matter of fact, the average hourly wages for workers in the manufacturing sector of the economy, as of January 1976, were: Canada: $5.03; U.S.A.: $4.80; Sweden: $4.67; West Germany: $3.72; Japan: $3.13; Great Britain: $2.84; and France: $2.19.

Over the nearly one and a half year the anti-inflation program has been in effect, inflation has regressed in Canada. Although we could argue endlessly about the relative part played by the anti-inflation guidelines and other factors, such as the stagnation of the economy, on the control of price increases up to now, the fact remains that all relevant guidelines indicate that the pressures exerted by wage and price increases have been reduced. One year after the introduction of this program, that is, from October 1975 to October 1976, the rise in the consumer price index was 6.2 per cent, which is clearly lower than the 10.6 per cent for the year before. We were very much encouraged by these results when we compared them with the rise of 8 per cent in CPI which we had forecast for October 1976.

What matters more is the fact that the rate of price increases for goods other than food and energy has clearly started slowing down. However, the last CPI report indicates that prices had increased by 6.7 per cent in February compared with a year ago, for food prices had been greatly affected by adverse weather conditions in southern United States. The anti-inflation program objective for the second year, a 6 per cent increase in the CPI until October 1977, remains a challenge. In 1975, according to Labour Canada, wage settlements have averaged an annual increase of more than 20 per cent during their first year of implementation. During the four quarters of 1976, the increase rate has fallen respectively to 16, 12.8, 13.1 and 9.9 per cent. Because of an even lower rate of increase in the consumer price index, the net income increase for Canadians has kept on.

The report on the first year of the Anti-Inflation Board, published in October 1976, pointed out in its survey of remuneration indicators that the transitional problems faced during the first months of the program had been dealt with and that the program was achieving its objective. The objective is to slow down the rate of wage increases while allowing for a real purchasing power increase for the average employee. Now, in the middle of the program's second year of operation, new progress has been realized to attain that objective.

Since the first months of operation of the program, the wage settlements submitted to the board came progressively nearer anti-inflation indicators, which shows public acceptance and compliance with them. It is obvious that the largest gap in relation to the indicators was found in the remuneration systems which have been substituted for those that came to an end before the implementation of the program on October 14, 1975, but were still under negotiation on that date.

The progress made so far through the AIB's income program are encouraging. The program's real rate of wage increases takes into account both the increases in line with the directives and automatically approved—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that there have been discussions and that there would be agreement to suspending private members' hour today so that this debate can continue until five o'clock.

Mr. Kaplan: That is agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There is agreement on our side, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): There is a suggestion that private members' hour be waived and that we continue the discussion on the present motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is so ordered.

[Translation]

Mr. Yanakis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I resume:

—automatically approved by the AIB staff and the increases reflecting the decisions of the board as regard increases exceeding the directives. Those real increase rates, which started at an average of 13.4 per cent for cases settled before the program, then went down to 9.4 per cent during the first year of the program, and to 7 and 5.8 per cent for cases considered up to now during the second and third years of the program. As we are preparing to eliminate the controls and as we are getting closer to the 1980's, it is essential to assess our situation and our economic prospects.

As all other industrialized countries, Canada recently had to face the combined problems of inflation, unemployment and low growth. However we must not forget that Canadians did benefit from a significant increase, up to 5 per cent certain years, in their real per capita income. This increase was more rapid than that of any major accidental industrialized countries, and twice the average annual increase in the productivity per employee. That period witnessed a number of factors which were exceptionally favourable to Canada. First of all, while external influences added to our inflation problems, Canadians benefitted from a considerable improvement in the foreign exchange situation, the average price of their exports increasing much more rapidly than that of their imports. Secondly, Canada, over the whole period, was a major net exporter of energy, conditions being relatively favourable. Thirdly, thanks to a swifter increase in employment as compared with the population growth, and therefore a much higher proportion of Canadian families receiving two or three or even more pay cheques, the real income per capita increased significantly. Canada created employment for the major part of the labour force at an increasing rate, because of the considerable growth both in the population and the proportion of new workers.

Those favourable conditions could not last. There are limits to the amounts we can borrow abroad to sustain our present level of consumption. Since the international exchange profile is changing and developing countries keep on asking for a better distribution of the world wealth, we might have some problems to maintain favourable exchange conditions. Canada is definitively an importer of oil and in the short term may find itself in the same situation on the whole energy market. In order to realize our potential, we will have to adapt our economic structure. We should not expect too much from the economy either. Inflation is still a major impediment to the achievement of our collective and individual objectives.

Statistics show beyond any doubt that most Canadian workers are reasonably well off after the first year of the program. In spite of a definite slowdown, salaries and wages went up 10 per cent on average. At the same time, the consumer index increase was maintained below 6¼ per cent. The unprecedented low level of food prices, the positive effect of prices of the Canadian currency which did resist during most of 1976 and margin benefits being exceptionally low due to the net decline in commercial activities in Canada and in the world, have allowed for a real increase in family income, salaries and wages of some 3½ to 4½ per cent, which is much above the 2 per cent of the labour productivity increase.

Mr. Speaker, the first duty of the government is to create an atmosphere which will enable private industry to develop in all confidence and to create lasting and satisfactory employment for workers. The present policy tries to establish this atmosphere. The government knows also that specific action is necessary in some areas and among certain categories because of unemployment rates. Therefore they changed their priorities in a federal policy providing for budgetary restrictions in an endeavour to increase support to direct employment programs.

There are signs in the present situation and in the economic prospects in Canada that the next twelve months or so should be a proper time for decontrol. First, given the present underuse of material and human resources in Canada, and in industrialized nations in general, there is little danger of having a new inflationary explosion because of decontrol.

Second, although we cannot put aside the possibility of stock shortages, for instance because of generally poor crops, an oil embargo or a serious breakdown in the trade of a number of basic products, the general conditions of food, industrial raw materials and energy resources supply do not allow us to foresee any major shortage during the next two years. World prices for food, industrial raw materials and energy will probably go up, but at best at a slow pace. It is hardly likely, however, that these products, within the next two years, will be the cause of a price surge similar to that experienced recently.

What is more important is that the inflationary psychosis seems to have been going down considerably since October 1975. The man in the street no longer expects two-digit price or wage increases. Newspapers do not report any more astronomical wage increases which were an invitation to other workers to do the same. According to surveys among industries and consumers, no more rapid price hike is expected. The reduction of the spiral of expectations can be explained by the recent improvements in the control of prices, as well as by the government undertaking to avoid a major increase in the cost of living, through the anti-inflation program.

Therefore, there is a need for a decontrol process which will ensure a steady decrease in the inflation rates and contribute to restore confidence in the future of our economy. This means that we must assess our economic prospects on a realistic basis and take our share of responsibility in the Canadian economic performance. The government has considered the part it could play during the post-control period and set a number of principles to establish the future direction of federal policies. Here are some of these principles: the best way to achieve the Canadian economic potentialities is to ensure a more efficient market economy.

In line with society's expectations, the government is firmly committed to the safeguard of personal freedom, equal opportunities and social fairness. Social policy must protect and improve our evolutive society built up by Canadians without leading to continued government expansion and ongoing erosion of personal freedom.

Our national potential cannot be developed without healthy, dynamic regions. Confederation benefited all Canadians, because the advantages of a larger nation promoted the growth of each and every region. However, remaining regional disparities are a major challenge to our political institutions. Canadians cannot accept those disparities. Federal and provincial authorities have taken a number of significant initiatives. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion is supporting long-term development efforts by the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to providing a consultation forum, an organization that would monitor economic conditions in respect of their impact on prices and costs would make a major contribution to the improvement of our economic performance. This view is shared both by provincial governments, and certain groups in the private sector, as evidenced by preliminary consultations. In time, the supervising body could exert a significant, positive influence on prices and revenues, provided its organizational features and objectivity maintained the required level of credibility.

In ending controls, our foremost consideration should be to prevent soaring prices and incomes, which would signal a return to the previous situation. The tangible results of the controls program, namely a much less rapid increase in costs and prices, must absolutely be preserved and reinforced. Finally, the de-control plan must take place in an orderly fashion. An important area in which the public and private sectors both carry the responsibility of economic performance is labour and management relations. If, indeed, it is the government's role to define the legislative and institutional framework in which labour and management may bargain, both sides must ensure that the system is allowed to work. However, in the last few years the level of confidence in labour-management relationship has constantly deteriorated. The degree of acceptance by public opinion of the increased frequency of strikes and lockouts as well as the various inconveniences and costs that go along with these, is on the wane.

Mr. Speaker, the government expects to raise a public debate on these issues and get some feedback. The increasing uncertainty regarding the date set for de-controls has made it necessary to come to a decision as soon as possible. Therefore, one should consider the possibility of releasing the timing set for de-control by the middle of this coming summer. This decision would take into account the debate and the various reactions generated by this document. Without further delay, the issues at stake should become the subject of a public debate where various comments could be made. Consultations will take place with businesses, workers and other interest groups. The government will also consult the provinces to find out whether during that period it would be necessary to call a new federal-provincial conference of finance ministers. The government is counting on the general participation of Canadians in this debate and will try to devise some ways to achieve that. The government plans on holding a meeting to set a multipartite panel of discussion so as to further the debate on more precise matters, such as the nature of those future mechanisms of consultation and to debate on what the post-control period will be before taking a decision on the timing that will be chosen for de-control.

Once the process and the timing of the de-control plan will have been announced, it will be necessary to resume our studies on the various measures to be taken in the post-control era. We hope that the study of the various consultation mechanisms will be sufficiently advanced to allow those mechanisms to play an important part in the preparation of the decisions to be taken and as to the very precise shape that will have such institutions as the monitoring body and the consultation panel that have been proposed as well as the way they will work during the post-control period.

Mr. Speaker, contrary to the expressed views of the opposition, the Liberal government was not afraid through this difficult period in our economy to face up to its responsibilities and to adopt policies that will enable us to solve our problems.

During the de-control and post-control period, we shall invite all Canadians to become involved in the shaping-up of the economic decisions upon which our progress will depend.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, it is probably no surprise that this motion has come before the House at this time. The only surprise might be that, having 15 sitting days before it was necessary to debate it, the government scheduled the motion rather more quickly than we expected. Of course that was provided for in the bill which introduced the controls program.

It should also come as no surprise that it was the official opposition that presented the motion yesterday since only this party has consistently voted against the government's controls program. It is true there were other proposals for controls, but it is this party that consistently said a long-term program of controls would be ineffective in curbing inflation.

It was the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who said we had wrestled inflation to the ground, and we know what happened to inflation rates after he said that. It was the government and the Prime Minister who said controls per se would not work. It was the official opposition that in 1973 perceived the great concern of Canadians at the rate of inflation that the country was subjected to because of the government's programs. In 1974 it was the official opposition that campaigned honestly on a program of controls, pointing out to the Canadian people where the government was taking them with its profligate spending and lack of restraint.

History has shown that the people were not ready for the program of controls that the then Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) proposed. There were areas such as British Columbia, however, where people were willing to listen to the official opposition and take their medicine. They elected a majority of members to the House who explained why controls were necessary and why it was important for the government to take the responsible attitude on controls. But the Liberals said no. Then we had to wait for 14 months after the last election until changes began to manifest themselves.

While we cannot be sure, because it has never been said, we can ask ourselves where the former minister of finance and his leader differed on policy so greatly that the former minister was forced by his conscience to terminate not only his career as a minister but his career as a politician. We can blame him or we can blame the Prime Minister. Certainly we can blame the present government because it has had power in this country for too long. The Prime Minister has been in office for nine years, pulling the strings and trying to lay the blame on others because he has been unable to act.

It was the government that said in 1974 that controls would not work. It pointed to countries around the world and said controls did not work in the United States, the United Kingdom and a few other places. Just yesterday the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) said controls would be completely ineffective in controlling the price of imports. Certainly his kind of controls would be, because they have been ineffective in controlling inflation.

The latest figures, published on the day the petition of the official opposition was filed, show that for 1977 inflation has been running at an annual rate of 10½ per cent. That is a little lower than it was earlier, but still a long way from control of inflation. If we had adopted a short-term freeze in 1974, as the official opposition proposed in order to break the inflationary expectations, then we could have controlled the prices of imports. Importers are businessmen and planners; they do not buy for tomorrow at today's prices. It would have been easy to control the price of imports with a three-month freeze.

It is now a fact that the controls program itself has become inflationary. No longer does labour begin to bargain around a rate of 15 per cent expecting to settle for something below 10 per cent. The floor of labour negotiations is now at least 8 per cent. In the controls legislation 8 per cent was only the base; it could have been 10 per cent in certain circumstances, and even 12 per cent if a historical relationship could be shown.

We never had a freeze so we never had an opportunity to find out what short-term controls would have done. All the government has shown us is that long-term controls have not controlled inflation and have not operated to the benefit of the Canadian economy.

I want to refer to an article which appeared in a recent issue of the magazine Business Week regarding the Canadian economy. I shall quote a paragraph or so. Referring to the Canadian dollar and the troubles of the Canadian economy, it says:

● (1620)

Inflation, averaging more than 9 per cent annually in the past four years and still running at a 7.5 per cent annual rate, has pushed Canadian costs above those of the U.S. and other industrial countries. As a result, Canadian products are being priced out of international markets, Canadians are crossing the border to shop in the U.S., and the nation's balance of payments is plunging deeply into deficit . . .

Business investment, meanwhile, is being discouraged by shrinking profits and worries among businessmen about future growth prospects. And business and labour unions alike are chafing under federal wage and price controls.

The article goes on to say that in 1972 Canada ran a trade deficit of $4.8 billion in manufactured goods, but by last year the deficit had more than doubled, to $10.2 billion.

What has happened under our controls program? Canada is no longer capable of attracting the investment of Canadians or the investment of foreigners. Many of us can point to instances of Canadians investing in the United States, particularly in housing. Perhaps one cannot blame the Minister of Finance on this score directly. The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) complains about the lack of housing in Canada, but what does one find? One finds entrepreneurs, who would be willing in normal circumstances to provide housing for Canadians, taking their capital and expertise to the United States, there to build houses for Americans.

The article continues a little further along with these words:

Coiled around these problems—

Namely, the deficit and continued inflation.

—is a political crisis, the deepest in its 110 years of confederation, that is shaking the unity of Canada to its foundations. The ties that bind the 12 vast and disparate provinces and territories are being severely strained by French-speaking Quebec's drive for greater political and cultural autonomy and by demands of other provinces, especially Alberta, for greater decentralization of decision making.

We can lay the blame for every one of these difficulties at the feet of the present administration, if not at the feet of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Johnston: Clay feet.

Mr. Clarke: In the nine years of the Trudeau administration we have seen developed the worst economic crisis we have undergone for decades, if not ever, the worst unemployment Canada has ever known, and the most divisive feelings this country has experienced in its 110-year history. As I say, these difficulties can be laid at the feet of the government and its leader, the Prime Minister.

Last night the minister said inflation was under control and not rising greatly. He said last evening, as reported at page 6766 of Hansard:

. . . we can modify our own wage and salary increases, or modify, in the case of the business sector, the additional claims for profit.

Of course we can do that, but the government has not modified or restrained its own demands on the economy, and I wish it would. I do not have all the pertinent figures before me for bygone years but recall, according to the last table I saw, that government expenditures increased 16 per cent year over year in at least one instance. Every year, for the last four or five years, government expenditures have increases by at least that figure. In some years expenditure increases were up in the 23 per cent range. Mr. Speaker, we cannot expect people to restrain themselves, modify their wage or salary increases or modify their demand for profits, if the government will not restrain its own demands. Oh, it says it is doing it. But it has a way of modifying the figures to make it seem as if it is doing something in this regard.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): If we listened to you fellows, there would be no restraint at all, because you ask for a new program almost every day.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, I heard the hon. member's remarks.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Such as they are.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Such as they are—that comment applies to the hon. member's remarks.

Mr. Clarke: I shall try to put on record some ideas the opposition has put forward for solving the country's difficulties.

People see the government doing nothing and wonder what the opposition has to offer. During my past five years in the opposition, the opposition has offered a great deal, although sometimes it is hard to put the message across. Sometimes we have trouble making the government listen to us, or pay attention to our sound ideas. One need only remember the ideas the former leader of the opposition put forth—

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): And what happened to him?

Mr. Clarke: —and how long it took the government to appropriate the germ of the idea and distort it into its own so-called program to control inflation.

Yesterday evening the Minister of Finance said in his speech, as reported on that same page of Hansard:

. . . average wage rates increased in 1976 at the rate of 10 per cent, and the consumer price index through that year increased at a rate of 6.5 per cent; therefore, there were real increases for the average working man of between 3 per cent and 4 per cent in the year.

The minister also referred to public opinion and what it thinks of the controls. I conclude that, obviously, the minister has not asked the average wage earner if he thinks his average increase of 10 per cent was able to keep up with the average increase in costs of 6.5 per cent. Obviously, wage rate increases have been somewhat depressed, and the floor put under wage increases by the government's controls program had to rise 10 per cent. The admission the other day of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott) implied that a large measure of the reduction in costs, or reduction in the escalation rate of costs, was attributable to a lowering of food prices. Mr. Speaker, in no way has labour been catching up, and in no way have those on fixed incomes, or those with indexed pensions, been catching up with wage rates which have been paid in Canada recently.

The minister yesterday said that public opinion had said, "No, there is no demand in Canada for the removal of controls." He said, as reported in Hansard, page 6767:

We have had in Canada the phenomenon of rising popularity of the controls program, especially on the part of those who do not now have collective power. This fact shows up in the polls, it shows up in the personal contacts I have, and I know it is showing up in the contacts my colleagues have had as well in their own constituencies and throughout the country.

Obviously, the government has not been talking to the same people the opposition talk to—

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): How do you know? You have not talked to our constituents.

Mr. Clarke: —in the constituencies, as I would point out to the noisy hon. member opposite. I submit that most Canadians want an end to contols. It is worth noting that at a worth-while conference in Toronto about one month ago business representatives of the investment community and labour, submitted their opinions on the controls program. There was no doubt that the controls program was unanimously disliked. The unanimous opinion of that group was that controls should end. Even the Minister of Finance has agreed in his more lucid moments that controls must end. It is simply a matter of when and how they should end.

The government has been unable to determine how and when it would like controls to end. It is true the legislation was written to continue until the end of December, 1978, but the minister has said perhaps they should be removed sooner than that.

The government suggested three ways of approaching decontrols. Yesterday in the minister's remarks he referred to two principal choices involved in the removal of controls. I do not know what happened to the third one between the time the paper was written and the speech was made. The first he said was the immediate simultaneous withdrawal of controls. The second was to phase out withdrawal of controls.

We on this side have always maintained that a sudden withdrawal is best because, after all, that is what is contained in the legislation. We have proposed an end at an earlier date than the end of December, 1978. However, the government has now decided that a sudden withdrawal of controls is not a desirable method of doing the job, even though it has been unable to explain how a delay in the removal of the controls until 16 or 18 months from now would be any easier than at this particular stage.

It was agreed by everyone at this conference that I attended and referred to earlier that controls should be removed, the sooner the better and the more suddenly the better. I should like to refer to some of the reasons why the different groups said that. Perhaps I should start with labour because that is the group whose opinion is most often tossed around.

Labour probably wants higher wages. After all, that is the duty of labour leaders. They are in a job for the same reason as business leaders, to increase the returns to that sector. Labour leaders understand that controls are damaging the economy of Canada. They understand that controls are hurting their own constituency, labour. They understand there will be no more jobs because there will be no more investment in Canada as long as we have controls.

I already referred to the investors who are seeking foreign fields for their capital. Investors can work with any set of rules any kind of government wants to give them. However, investors and business people must know what the rules are. They cannot go into a game, to quote what my leader said at that conference, not knowing what changes in the rules are going to happen overnight. They need to have something to go on, some confidence. The last thing this government has given them over the past nine years is confidence.

Confidence is necessary. Otherwise there would not be any investment. If there is not any investment, there will not be any new jobs. That is a simple equation. That is the way the economy works. It may be that the Prime Minister wants the economy to work in that way. From remarks he has made, one may have reason to doubt what his real objectives are.

I think that covers the reasons why business wants controls removed. I dealt with the labour unions. I think of the white collar worker. We have had complaints in the House this week about the ineffective application of the executive compensation aspects of the anti-inflation rules. It seems all right for the top executives to get huge increases as long as the white collar workers do not get any. It is obvious the white collar worker wants a bite at the increasing apple, but he is not getting it under the present rules.

It might be worth while to look at who does not want controls removed. The minister talked about provincial governments. I think they are the only ones he referred to that do not want the controls program removed. Even my own province of British Columbia has said that it would institute a program of controls if the federal government got out of it. The federal government, with all respect, has not shown any sign of getting out of it. The only reason the provincial government in British Columbia said it would institute its own program is that it has a terribly serious labour problem in that province. Finally, yesterday the Minister of Finance made a proposal to enter into one step of decontrol. I will be very interested in hearing what the provincial government has to say when it hears about that step. It will probably agree with it.

Before I come back to that decontrol step, I want to talk about pensioners. The Minister of Finance very neatly neglected to talk about pensioners yesterday, and what they think about controls. It is true that some pensioners in Canada get an indexed pension. It can hardly be said that the indexing of the Canada Pension Plan, the old age pension, or even the guaranteed income supplement will be a joy to pensioners whose rents or taxes are going up at great rates and whose other costs are going up at rates faster than their pensions.

Coffee prices may be an example of something that has gone up by 300 per cent. Rents, because they are controlled in many provinces, now have a floor. Therefore they are guaranteed an increase of 8 per cent, 10 per cent, or whatever the floor happens to be. There is not a maximum but a minimum on rent controls.

What about pensioners who are on private pension plans or, worse still, invested in Government of Canada bonds to provide for their old age? Look at the return value on that notorious set of 3 per cent perpetual bonds in 1936 which have been extended and will now be called in 1996. That makes them a 60 year bond. The people will be long gone before their bonds are redeemed.

Mr. Johnston: It is known as Liberal bondage.

Mr. Clarke: Yesterday in his remarks the minister appeared as though he were reaching for manna from heaven. I want to quote the remarks of the Minister of Finance:

> To provide for greater certainty with the approach of decontrol, the government has therefore decided to propose amendments to the Anti-Inflation Act to deem these agreements to be amended in line with the AIB recommendation or order of the Administrator. An amending bill would be introduced to deal with this. In the same way, the law will make sure that profit restraints imposed, for example, by excess revenue orders, will be effective.

Second thoughts again. I am reminded of the initial imposition of the program where dividends were frozen, to the complete ignoring of the dependence of pensioners who had no other means than dividends to keep abreast of inflation. That provision was later amended after second thoughts by this second thoughts government.

Hon. members opposite say that the opposition has not had any ideas or recommendations to put forward. We are the ones who had the policy and have been pushing the policy of controls and decontrols. Days before the Minister of Finance stood up in the House yesterday and announced what he was going to introduce by way of amendments to deal with agreements which had been amended in line with the AIB recommendations, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), in a speech in Toronto, as well as in a speech in Montreal reported on Monday, June 13, which I am going to refer to, had stated what our policy was. He said that there were at least five items which his party would put into the decontrols program. The very first one is to respect judgments which have already been made by the Anti-Inflation Board limiting excessive wage or price increases. You can read that anyway you want, Mr. Speaker, but it comes to exactly what the minister said, namely, that agreements made outside the Anti-Inflation Board regulations would be required to be respected.

I cannot always expect the public to recognize what it is that the Leader of the Opposition says, particularly in my riding in British Columbia, because the article I am referring to was reported in the Vancouver Sun last Monday, June 13, on page 60. How can we expect anyone to undersand what it is that the official opposition, which is trying in spite of the efforts of the government to save the economy of Canada—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I thank the House for the enthusiastic applause.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We are unanimous.

Mr. Nystrom: We are a party which is solidly unified.

I rise to participate in this debate in support of the motion put forward by the Conservative party to end this particular controls program on June 30 of this year. I happen to think that it should have been ended earlier. The reason I say that is that I am not opposed to controls per se but I am opposed to the very unfair and inequitable program brought down by the government.

I want to spend my few moments today talking about some of this unfairness in very specific terms. The leader of my party mentioned in his remarks yesterday some of the aspects of the controls program and some of the options that we would rather see. Hopefully on Monday someone else will deal with other aspects of the program. I want to deal with some of the specific unfairness of the program which is before us, particularly as it concerns increases in executive compensation or salaries.

One executive received an increase in his salary last year of 70 per cent namely $60,363. It is an increase of that sort, Mr. Speaker, that makes this program very unfair. The same thing applies to company profits. We know that the salaries of workers have been held to increases of 8 per cent or 6 per cent. I have a list of about 50 companies with profit increases all higher than those allowed to the workers, the highest being 215 per cent. It is for reasons like that I oppose the anti-inflation legislation.

In commencing my remarks today I want to make it very clear that I am for controls, for a planned economy. But I am for one which is fair to everyone—workers, salary earners, profits, prices, bank interest and so on, one which will equally control all aspects of the economy. Unless we have that there should be no program at all. It must be fair to each and every one of us in society.

I should like to put on record some of the very unfair things which have been happening in this country since the controls program came into effect on October 15, 1975. First of all, ordinary working citizens are permitted a maximum salary increase of $2,400 a year. I have a list here of 51 executives in 26 companies who have received salary increases higher than the $2,400 limit and I think it would be worth-while to put some of these on the record.

The first company is McIntyre Mines Limited of Toronto. Mr. P. A. Crain their vice-president of operations, received a salary increase of $25,488 in 1976—

An hon. Member: That is more than you made.

Mr. Nystrom: That is right. That represents an increase of 51.3 per cent. I am excluding the expense allowance and so on that other MP's get.

The second company is Bow Valley Industries Limited of Calgary, in beautiful Tory Alberta. The president of the company, D. K. Seaman, had a salary increase last year of $35,000, or 70 per cent. B. J. Seaman, the vice-president, received a salary increase of $26,000, or 51.9 per cent. Let us not forget that ordinary workers are held to an increase of $2,400 under the law. Many of them cannot even get that. They have had their salary increases rolled back. Another vice-president of this company, D. R. Seaman, received a salary increase of $19,000, or 46.3 per cent. Then a guy named J. R. Harris, senior vice-president in the same company, had a salary increase of $20,000 last year, or 35.7 per cent. H. D. Binney, another senior vice-president, was treated really roughly; this guy only got a salary increase of $9,333 or 22.4 per cent.

I now move on to the third company—and here I move out of Tory Alberta into Tory Ontario—the Van Der Hout Associates Limited of Toronto. John B. Van Der Hout, an officer of the company, last year received a salary increase of $30,233, or 42.9 per cent.

The fourth company, also in Toronto, Rio Algom Mines Limited, gave the chairman of the company, Robert D. Armstrong, only a very small percentage increase, 3.5 per cent, but you will see in a moment, Mr. Speaker, why it was so small. His salary in 1975 was $223,566. It went up to $231,400, an increase of $7,834, roughly triple what is supposed to be the maximum increase under the guidelines. As if that were not enough, the president of the company, George R. Albino, had a salary increase of 18 per cent; his salary was increased by $27,467. I get very angry when I go over these figures, Mr. Speaker, and know that the government expects the ordinary workers to tighten their belts. Here are company executives abusing and getting around the controls program through loopholes in the law.

The fifth company is Ashland Oil Canada Limited of Calgary. The chairman of the company, H. Earl Joudrie, received a salary increase of 10.5 per cent, or $12,450. The president of that company, Vernon Van Sant, Jr., had a salary increase of 8.2 per cent, or $8,700.

Turning to the sixth company, Pacific Petroleum Ltd. of Calgary, the president, L. M. Rasmussen, had a salary increase of $21,455, which is 13.6 per cent; the executive vice-president, A. M. McIntosh, had a salary increase of $30,372 which is 42.8 per cent. That was an increase for a man who was already receiving a salary of $71,030 before it was increased to $101,402 last year under the program of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). Next is the senior vice-president, W. H. Tye, who had a salary increase of $8,533, which is 9.2 per cent, bringing his salary up to $100,578; and then Kelly H. Gibson, a director of the company, had an increase of $14,227, which is 11.1 per cent. He was a very poor man who only earned $127,917, and his salary for last year was $142,144. Those salary increases are a lot higher than the wages of my constituents, which is not just, as far as I am concerned.

The seventh company I should like to refer to is Aquitaine Co. of Canada in Calgary. The president of that company is Mr. Jacques Payah. His salary increase was $15,570, which is 20.2 per cent, bringing his salary from $76,946 to $92,516.

Quebecor Inc. of Montreal is the eighth company. The executive vice-president is Pierre Gauvreau. He had an increase of $10,110 in his salary, which is 18.9 per cent.

The ninth company is Dome Petroleum Ltd. of Calgary. The president, W. E. Richards, had a salary increase of $5,757, which is 6 per cent, bringing his salary from $95,169 up to $100,926.

The tenth company is Home Oil Co. Ltd. The president is R. F. Phillips. His salary increase last year was $3,608, which is 4.2 per cent. He is a poor fellow whose salary was increased from $85,250 to $88,858. The executive vice-president of that company, M. P. Paulson, had a salary increase of $3,400, which is 4.9 per cent.

Chieftain Development Co. Ltd. of Edmonton is the eleventh company. The president is Stanley A. Milner. He received a salary increase of $5,593, which is 8.5 per cent. The vice-president is Gerald W. Youell. He received a salary increase of $3,598, which is 8.7 per cent.

The twelfth company is Ranger Oil (Canada) Ltd. whose president is John Pierce—

An hon. Member: He is reading the phone book.

Mr. Nystrom: For the hon. member's information, I am reading a list of people who had salary increases last year of over $2,400 despite the controls program of the Government of Canada.

Mr. Stevens: We have already made that point twice.

Mr. Nystrom: The controls program limited salaries of Canadians to an increase under $2,400.

Mr. Stevens: You are going to vote with us, then?

Mr. Nystrom: Yes, I will.

Mr. Stevens: Good.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: I think it is useful to put on the record some concrete evidence of the inequities in the program brought down by the Minister of Finance.

When the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) interrupted me, I was referring to Ranger Oil (Canada) Ltd. The president of that company is John Pierce who had a salary increase of $6,252, which is 6.6 per cent. That increased his salary from $94,748 to $101,000.

The thirteenth company is Sun Lite Oil Co. Ltd. The president, Edwin C. James, had a salary increase last year of $5,000, which is 9.7 per cent; and the vice-president, Donald E. Hockaday, had a salary increase of $5,000, which is also 9.7 per cent.

Scurry-Rainbow Oil Ltd. of Calgary is the fourteenth company. F. C. Finn, the vice-president of that company, had a salary increase of $3,050, which is 7.5 per cent.

The fifteenth company is Westburne Petroleum Services Ltd. The president, Walter S. Zaruby, had a salary increase of $12,000, which is 17.2 per cent.

We see no justice whatsoever between the wealthy in our society and the ordinary citizen. That reflects the priorities of the Liberal government sitting across the way.

To continue on, the sixteenth company is Placer Developments Ltd. of Vancouver. The chairman of that company, Ross G. Duthie, had a salary increase of $12,458, which is 14.5 per cent. Most of my old age pensioners do not receive that in two years.

The seventeenth company is Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. in Toronto. The president is Edward Battle. He received a salary increase of $3,100, which is 2.6 per cent.

Now I would like to turn to some of the large ones. The eighteenth company is Imperial Oil Ltd. of Toronto. The president and chairman of that company, John Armstrong, had a salary in 1975 of $234,333. To be fair his salary should be rolled back, but instead it was increased to $251,600, which was an increase of $17,267 or 7.4 per cent.

Mr. Johnston: Where was the AIB?

Mr. Nystrom: As the hon. member says, where were they? Where was the Minister of Finance when John Armstrong, the president of Imperial Oil, had his salary go up to over one quarter of a million dollars? As if that was not good enough, the executive vice-president, James G. Livingstone, had his salary increased to $145,000, which is an increase of $17,967, or 14 per cent.

An hon. Member: Are you against the amount or the money?

Mr. Nystrom: I am against the increase. It is interesting to note that one Liberal does not seem to get the point. It is very unfair that these corporate executives have received huge salary increases while ordinary Canadians have had their salaries rolled back.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The original amounts were too large, in the first place.

Mr. Nystrom: If the hon. member from southern Ontario wants me to reread the list, I can. I would be willing to do that in order to make my point clearer. I really do not think I have the time, but I was dealing with Imperial Oil—

An hon. Member: What have you got against the size?

Mr. Nystrom: I am against the size. I do not think the president of Imperial Oil is worth $251,600. Does the hon. member really think the president of that company is worth that amount of money? If that is the case, I invite that member to get up on his feet and say so. I am sure his constituents would be interested to know that. Is he in favour of that man receiving an increase of $17,267 in 1976, despite his huge salary?

Returning to the eighteenth company, the executive vice-president of Imperial Oil is a man by the name of Donald K. McIvor. He received a salary increase of $18,013, which is 16 per cent. Perhaps all these gentlemen have Liberal memberships. His increase brought his salary up from $112,987 to $131,000 per annum. This is under controls. What is going to happen when the controls program ends?

The nineteenth company is Kaiser Resources Ltd. The executive vice-president, Robert McPhail, received an increase of $22,059, which is 21.4 per cent. I should like to finish dealing with this company, if I may. The vice-president, Howard Cadinha—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday, June 20, 1977, at 11 o'clock a.m.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, June 20, 1977

The House met at 11 a.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION REORGANIZATION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION, ETC.

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-27, to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker: There are some 33 report stage motions, and it has not been possible for me to survey all of them to determine whether or not there are any procedural concerns or, in any case, to attempt to group them for debate. For the moment, I have examined six such motions which I anticipated would keep the House busy long enough to give me an opportunity to examine the other 27 motions.

Of the first six motions, motion No. 1 gives me some concern about introducing into the clause which it seeks to amend a concept which is somewhat in respect of provincial consultation and, therefore, may be going beyond the scope of the clause which the motion seeks to amend. In a moment I will hear argument from the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) in whose name that motion stands, and any other hon. member who wants to argue the procedural question.

Motions Nos. 2 to 6 appear to be procedurally acceptable. Motions Nos. 2 and 3 could be grouped for discussion but would have to be voted separately. Motion No. 4 would be debated and voted on and separately. Motions Nos. 5 and 6 would be grouped for debate and voted on separately. If there is no comment or discussion on that, I would hope that that business would keep the House occupied for a short time.

In respect to the procedural questions on motion No. 1, I recognize the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander).

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West) moved motion No. 1:

That Bill C-27, An act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 5 by adding immediately after line 42 at page 2, the following new subclauses:

"(3) the minister shall consult with the provinces respecting the measures to be undertaken to facilitate the formulation, coordination and implementation of unemployment insurance and manpower policies and programs.

(4) The minister, with the approval of the governor in council may enter into an agreement with any province or group of provinces for the purpose of facilitating the formulation, coordination and implementation of unemployment insurance and manpower policies and programs."

He said: Mr. Speaker, one now realizes how difficult it is for members of the opposition to become involved in significant debate. As I understand it, Bill C-27, which comprises amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, was reported back to the House on Wednesday last. At that time one had no idea when the bill would be debated. Of course, it was up to our House leader on this side to ask the government House leader of the day, being the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais), what was the business for the following week. Lo and behold, we find the bill being debated this morning at 11 o'clock.

That is fine, Mr. Speaker, provided report stage reveals no amendments. But the minister himself has tabled at least ten amendments, some of them calling upon the Governor General since the expenditure of money is involved vis-à-vis the extended benefit period of from ten to 14 weeks. In addition to that, we in the Progressive Conservative caucus wanted to put down some amendments, and so did members of the NDP and the Social Credit party.

We now find ourselves in this difficult situation. We had to run like the very devil on Friday, firstly to acquire a copy of Bill C-27 as reported. I believe the bill itself as amended was not available to members until Friday. I know my hon. friends in the NDP will check me if I am wrong on that. Then, when we received the bill as amended, we had to gather our wits together and run helter-skelter around the place to get the necessary material and background to bring in some necessary amendments. We all scratched our heads and were able to do so, but the unfortunate thing, Mr. Speaker, is that you, yourself, on your own admission, did not have enough time to look at the amendments to see whether they were procedurally correct.

I am not blaming you for that, sir, because you have to follow the procedure that we set down for you. I blame the minister who wants to ram this bill through without giving proper opportunity to members to know what the bill is all about. Now that we are coming closer to the end of the month there is one thing that we on this side will not accept, and that is any ramrodding of bills.

So there is the difficulty, Mr. Speaker. We do not know what the amendments are all about. We see them all in package form this morning on the order paper. It was only because we had some extra staff, for which we extend some little thanks to the government, that we could put these people to work for us and ask them to find out what the NDP and the Social Credit party were doing. We had some idea of what the government was doing, thank goodness, or we would have been in an awful state this morning. I want to put this matter on the record because I feel it is extremely important. Your Honour is embarrassed—I can say that on your behalf—because we are now faced with 33 amendments.

Mr. MacFarlane: He does not look embarrassed.

Mr. Alexander: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, you are embarrassed. Never mind what the dumb-dumbs on the other side say; they have no idea what this bill is all about. They just like to put a few words in because it is almost time to go home for the summer recess so they can start mending their own fences. As I was saying, there are 33 amendments placed before the House, if I am not mistaken, by the combined parties, together with six or seven recommendations under Standing Order 75(6) since the government wants to spend money. Having said that, my amendment No. 1 is extremely simple.

Mr. MacFarlane: Now you are embarrassed.

Mr. Alexander: Let me read it so that my hon. friend from Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane), who is government whip and a member of parliament temporarily, will understand what is going on around here. My amendment is in line with the new Unemployment Insurance Act which indicates the powers, duties and functions of the minister which are extended to include matters over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction, not by law assigned to any other department, branch or agency of the government of Canada relating to the development and utilization of labour market resources in Canada, employment services, unemployment insurance and immigration.

Under clause 109 of the new Immigration Act, which is Bill C-24, the minister introduces a new procedure whereby he is prepared to consult with the provinces on immigration. I have questioned the minister and written to all the provincial labour ministers involved, and all I have done is try to bring some credibility to the measure in terms of government plans in regard to unemployment insurance and manpower. My amendment adds two clauses, the first of which is:

(3) the minister shall consult with the provinces respecting the measures to be undertaken to facilitate the formulation, co-ordination and implementation of unemployment insurance and manpower policies and programs.

The second provides:

(4) the minister, with the approval of the governor in council may enter into an agreement with any province or group of provinces for the purpose of facilitating the formulation, co-ordination and implementation of unemployment insurance and manpower policies and programs.

If the minister had any gumption he would say yes, the hon. member for Hamilton West has a point. The point that I am making is that this party will not accept any approach that brings about confrontation with the provinces. We want a policy of consultation and co-operation; that is the essence of the matter. The minister said in committee that that is what we have now. I want to tell him that the letters which have been written and the replies received indicate there is something to be desired in the approach taken by the federal government to the provinces. Consultation is limited, if it exists at all. There is limited co-operation. This is why we have a terrible problem in regard to national unity at the present time. There has been no concrete evidence of any meaningful consultation or co-operation with the provinces. As a result of the tunnel-vision of this government, one province has now elected a separatist government.

Your Honour may think this amendment goes beyond the scope of this bill, but if Your Honour reads the bill in its entirety, as I know you have, it speaks of consultation with the provinces by implication. The minister even adopted a flexible approach to unemployment insurance benefits because we were concerned about the disparities which exist between the various regions of this country. But we are sick and tired of the approach taken by the government which leads to confrontation rather than consultation and co-operation.

The minister will say that we already have consultation, Mr. Speaker, but his consultation goes something like this: there will be option one, option two and option three. The minister will say, "We are going to support option one. What do you think?" I say that is not consultation or co-operation; it is blackmail. The government tells the provinces what it is going to do, that of the three options, option one is the most feasible, viable and acceptable; but given the fact that the provinces are part of this great confederation, they are occasionally given the opportunity to have a little chat with the government. He has never given them any credit whatsoever in terms of bringing the provinces into the consultative process.

In short, all I am doing is putting in writing the legislative authority, something which the minister is doing right now. The amendment is not taking away anything. It says that he shall consult. If one wanted to be really smart around here, one could say that to consult means very little. But at least it is a step in the right direction. They are consulting now. Also, they are entering into agreements with the provinces regarding unemployment insurance and manpower.

Let me explain what I put in this amendment. Under clause 41, the government is bringing in three different processes entitled developmental use of unemployment insurance fund, job training, job creation and work sharing. The provinces are extremely concerned that the government will bring in these ad hoc approaches to unemployment without thorough and reasonable consultation with them. I am registering their concern in this amendment. I am registering the fact that the provinces make up a part of the whole. I am registering concern about the fact that, as I have been hearing throughout my short tenure in office here, the provinces have been shafted by the government regarding federalism. I want to come to grips with this matter. We are not spending money here, and we are not doing anything that the minister has not done before.

I see you are about to rise, Mr. Speaker. Let me just say that I hope I have convinced the minister, and that he, in his wisdom and knowledge that this is the proper and correct motion in terms of trying to put in writing what he is already doing, will come to that conclusion and say that he is thankful to the opposition for having the forthrightness, wisdom and experience to bring in an amendment such as this one for the edification of hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) was allowed some leeway with regard to his general observations on the intent of the proposed motion. The question before the House is, of course, a procedural one as to whether or not the introduction into clause 5, which gives the minister the authority which he requires to operate in the capacities anticipated in the statute, of an obligation upon the minister to consult with the provinces before the establishment of programs is procedurally correct. I see the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) is seeking the floor. If it is on the procedural question, I will hear him.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): In your original remarks when you dealt with this amendment, Mr. Speaker, you said you felt it introduced something new that was not already there in the clause. Indeed, we were well aware of the fact that there was nothing in effect with respect to consultation with the provinces. The government was very well aware of it when we dealt with the bill in committee and when it introduced in the House an amendment changing the minimum attachment period from 8 weeks to 12 weeks. Then the government grabbed its skirts, ran out and brought in its original approach to the minimum attachment period.

In effect, there was no consultation with the provinces when the government decided to change the attachment period from 8 weeks to 12 weeks. There was a hurried consultation after the fact so as to get the government off the horns of the dilemma when Liberal backbenchers from Atlantic Canada started their revolt against the change from 8 weeks to 12 weeks. I think there was more consultation with the Liberal backbench members from Atlantic Canada than meaningful consultation with the provinces regarding the effect on their welfare programs of the change from an 8 weeks to 12 weeks minimum attachment period.

Quite frankly, the amendments themselves are quite meaningless. Who is not in favour of consultation? Surely it is only logical that there should be consultation. Our party has no objection to consulting. One of the things we hear today in Canada with regard to the unity question is that we should have a closer relationship with the provinces, that we should draw them in and have meaningful consultations with them. As I say, we have no objection to that. The amendment proposes consultation, and if there is one thing the government needs, it is to consult more with those who will be affected by the legislation which they intend to bring before the House.

The minister consistently told us in committee that he had been consulting and these amendments were the result of his consultations. So in effect he has admitted that there is nothing wrong with the amendment proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). Therefore, I see the amendment as being germane. It puts into writing what the minister said in committee and outside committee with regard to the close relationship with the provinces respecting manpower training centres.

The minister was telling us how much consultation, cohesion and interaction there is between manpower training programs and provincial programs for unemployment. So, in effect, I see this amendment as being very germane to the whole question. If the federal government intends to implement manpower programs, there should be meaningful consultation. Indeed, it is only common sense that the government should consult with the provinces and their educational authorities. Right now there is consultation with the provincial departments of education and local government authorities with respect to manpower programs so far as community colleges are concerned and the kinds of programs that are being offered by those institutions. So there is consultation. I do not see anything new about this. I think there is certainly a place in this clause for such an amendment calling on the minister to put his action where his mouth is.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak briefly on the procedural aspect. I cannot add to the eloquence of my friend, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) with respect to the purpose of the amendment. I gather there is some question in your mind as to the scope of the amendment and whether, having regard to the nature of the bill and the parameters set forth by the legislation, the amendment is in order. Bearing in mind that the amendment puts a requirement on the minister to consult with the provinces and to enter into agreements with any province or group, and the fact that it is widely assumed in the country that all the bill does is to deal with the rights of people and methods by which they may acquire certain rights to unemployment insurance, I think it should be pointed out that the bill goes far beyond that.

The essence of the bill, as set forth in its preamble, is to establish a department of employment and immigration, the Canada employment and immigration commission and the Canada employment and immigration advisory council, and to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. The main purpose is the establishment of a department of government and agencies within the department. Clause 3 establishes that. Clause 4 sets up the appointment of a deputy minister and an associate deputy minister. Clause 5 sets out the powers, duties and functions of the minister.

Clause 5(1)(a) establishes the function of developing and utilizing labour market resources in Canada. These are not unusual things. But there is power in the statute to delegate certain of the functions of the minister in order to operate the department, whether that is done here or somewhere else. There is no geographical limitation in the bill. In fact, the indication is that the bill will operate across the country. The thrust of the bill and the government's approach to this matter, after some changes of heart, is that it is conceivable there will be districts established where certain rules will apply, at least for a temporary period, and these rules might be different in district A, for instance, as opposed to district B. The fact that the bill establishes differences based upon areas of the country designated in the method that the minister has indicated, to my mind leaves open, in a procedural sense at least, the implication—and I suggest it is stronger than that—of consultation between the department, other levels of government and other bodies and agencies concerned with employment.

The amendments which have been put down at report stage by the hon. member for Hamilton West deal explicitly with what is already, by the nature and scope of the bill, implicit in the bill. For that reason—and that is the only contribution I have to make, at least on amendment No. 1—I ask, Mr. Speaker, that you look at this from a procedural point of view, and with respect I say that this amendment ought to be found in order. Certainly it is not—and this is beyond the mere procedural point—out of order in terms of the present method and scope of the operations of the department in any event if we are to believe what the department tells us about the way it operates. That merely buttresses the procedural point. We want to express explicitly what is implicit in the bill. That is true of the clauses I have read into the record, and if we go further the same implications apply. On that ground, I submit that the amendment is in order.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add a few comments on some of the procedural aspects of this amendment. It ought to be very clear that all the amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) does is enshrine in legislation the intent of the government as it was expressed in the committee. When we consider this matter in the context of federal-provincial relationships, one distinguishing fact is that there are areas of co-operation and areas of separation of power. For example, if this amendment dealt with national defence, external affairs or something relating to CIDA, it might be out of order because those matters are dealt with specifically by the federal government. However, in every province of Canada there are departments of labour or departments dealing with matters related to employment.

Traditionally, there have been interrelationships between federal and provincial governments. While we have had federal departments of manpower and labour, there have also been provincial departments and the level of consultation has not been as satisfactory as we would have liked it to be. Therefore, this amendment is being proposed. I could read into the record letters from various provincial ministers and groups which state that consultation is unsatisfactory at the present time, but I will not take the time to do so.

I just point out that the provinces of Alberta, New Brunswick and Saskatchewan claim that while there may be some attempt at consultation, the fact is that the level of consultation is unsatisfactory and the provinces require more. I have detailed information before me setting this out. We have a situation where both the federal government and the provincial governments are involved in implementing manpower and labour programs and for seeing to the maintenance of those programs. But it is requested that more consultation take place. This amendment simply enshrines in legislation that which the minister says he wants to do and which the department says it is already doing. But the provincial governments say that the level of consultation is not adequate.

Surely, if the minister is going to stand on the kind of verbiage he gave us in committee, he himself should want to support the kind of recommendation that is being put forward by the hon. member for Hamilton West, because the amendment sets forth a position the minister took in committee. If he wants to be consistent, he might as well indicate that, here, in this House. We object to trapdoor legislation which has some 33 amendments. Those amendments were not brought about by full consultation between parliament and the government, and all we are indicating is that if the government cannot consult with parliament, it is certainly not capable of consulting with the provinces.

We hope this amendment goes through. We hope it is found procedurally acceptable so that we can enshrine in legislation something which would be acceptable not only to the federal government of the day but also to all the provinces, because a number of them are on record as saying that the situation at present is unsatisfactory.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, bearing in mind the many letters received from our electors dealing with this bill, which to our mind is clearly detrimental to Canadian workers, specially during the high unemployment period we are now going through, the like of which we have not seen since 1930, and here I am thinking specially of the province of Quebec where unemployment is rather endemic and where employment lasts for about six to ten weeks, which of course places that category of workers at a disadvantage, on behalf of my party and all Canadian workers, we support the motion of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) to the effect that amendment No. 30 should be discussed further to allow every group to express itself more freely and pass that bill, though we are against changes which would allow each and everyone to say what he thinks.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Of course, the question—

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as you have indicated, the comments have gone a little beyond the procedural aspects of this particular clause, and I think it is appropriate that we deal primarily with procedural aspects since we have asked the Chair for guidance. I think, Mr. Speaker, that you are right on, and that this amendment goes beyond the scope of what is provided in clause 5. This clause spells out in clear terms that the powers and duties of the minister extend to and include all matters over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction not by law assigned to any other department. I think subclauses (3) and (4) of this amendment go beyond the scope of the section. I shall not go into the merits of them at the present time except to say that as far as subclause (4) is concerned, I have no particular difficulty. If Your Honour should find that it does go beyond the scope, and is prepared to accept subclause (4), I would have no problem. Later, if Your Honour should decide it is within the scope, I shall argue the merits of the section.

I think it is fair to comment that although we are in a position where we have many amendments, almost without exception the amendments before the House, and certainly the government's amendments, were known to the opposition. I tabled the actual wording of them so that this information would be available to members of the opposition. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) is prepared to concede that. I do not think we on the government side are unduly surprised by most of the amendments moved by the opposition, because they indicated during debate what they would be proposing. I think, rather than being embarrassed, that through the kind of competence Your Honour has displayed, what needs to be done has been done in that we will deal with five or six sections at the beginning and there will be time later to deal with the remainder.

There is no intention on the part of the government to ram these amendments through the House. Given the fact that members on both sides of the House hope not to sit throughout the summer, it seems to me that the earlier we could get through report stage of the bill and deal with the amendments, the better we would serve the people who are meant to be served by the legislation.

I have one other comment regarding consultation, Mr. Speaker. Even the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone), who spoke last, indicated that the letters he receives show there has been consultation. I hardly think there is any government that would not like more consultation. But it is a two-way street. I have never received a letter from that particular hon. member or any other asking me about the consultation provided by the provinces when they initiate new programs dealing with manpower. To be fair, I think we should look into that area, too. The co-operation I have had from the provinces has been excellent, but that is not to say it could not have been better, as no doubt our own could. It does not make the case, however, that there has been no consultation other than to say that more could have been done.

In so far as the amendment is concerned, on a procedural basis I think it goes beyond the scope. In the interests of compromise, however, I would be prepared to accept subclause (4), which I assume in redoing it would read as subclause (3):

the minister, with the approval of the governor in council may enter—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister has put forward the suggestion that hon. members might have time to explore this matter as the debate unfolds. I seek only to make a ruling with respect to the amendment as it is presented to me. If there is some agreement that might be explored, it could be presented to the Chair later. At the moment I have regard to the text of motion No. 1 as I have it before me, and the clear and well-established rule cited in May's nineteenth edition at page 521. It is well known of course, as indicated there, that an amendment is out of order if it goes beyond the scope of the clause which it seeks to amend. It is not even a question of its going beyond the scope of the general intent of the bill. That is another problem. An amendment to a particular clause must have relevance to the clause it seeks to amend, as well as to the bill in general. It, therefore, does not become a question of whether consultation—which is the basic thrust of the motion—is a good or bad idea within the framework of the piece of legislation with which we are dealing.

What the Chair has to decide is whether mandatory consultation by the minister with the provinces before implementation of a program is a new concept in respect of this particular clause. Reading the clause, one would have to come to the conclusion that the clause itself sets out the general powers the minister must have in order to assure responsibility under the legislation. The amendment would seek to introduce into that clause, not the powers of the minister but an obligation to consult with the provinces prior to the implementation of any program, according to subclause (3) of the amendment. I cannot help but feel that this amendment introduces into the general authority section of the minister an entirely new concept that was not contained or envisaged in the original. The idea of consultation, voluntary or mandatory, or consultation after authority from the governor in council, the power of the minister to enter into agreements which is envisaged in another section of the amendment, is one which I am sure will surface again in another part of the act and can be explored at that time in the way suggested by the minister.

I must find on technical grounds that motion No. 1 goes beyond the scope of clause 5 and, therefore, is out of order.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House are prepared to accept half a loaf rather than no loaf at all. I can now say that I appreciate the position the minister has put forward. At the same time, however, I would ask that the necessary consultations take place between the House leaders to see that the suggestion is discussed. With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, this House is its own master. I accept Your Honour's ruling, but the minister indicated to the Chair and to the House that he has some reservations with respect to the first part of motion No. 1. In keeping with the spirit of co-operation that usually exists in this House, however, he has indicated he is prepared to accept or to find no fault with the last part of the motion, so I hope the House leaders can get together on the suggestion of the minister. Mr. Speaker, you have indicated that my motion No. 2—

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The motion has not been formally called.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West) moved motion No 2:

That Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 21 by striking out line 35 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

"ister extend and the minister shall cause any reports related thereto to be laid before parliament within 30 days after the receipt thereof or if parliament is not then sitting on any of the first 30 days next thereafter that parliament is sitting."

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have indicated that motions Nos. 2 and 3 would be grouped together for debate, but would be voted on separately. Therefore, perhaps I can simply call motion No. 3 at the same time and direct comment to be made on both motions at the same time, with the understanding that they will be voted on separately.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West) moved motion No. 3:

That Bill C-27, and act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 23 by striking out line 9 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"necessary to carry out its duties provided that without restricting the generality of the foregoing it shall meet at least once a year and minutes shall be recorded of all formal meetings."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I will speak on motions Nos. 2 and 3 at the same time. Through motion No. 2 we are now setting up what is called the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council. The clause to which my motion refers is very simple. It reads as follows:

21(1) It is the function of the council to advise the minister on all to which the powers, duties and functions of the minister extend.

At this time I want to refer to the CMA brief only. What I am attempting to do with this particular amendment is set out as follows:

—and the minister shall cause any reports related thereto to be laid before parliament within 30 days after the receipt thereof or if parliament is not then sitting on any of the first 30 days next thereafter that parliament is sitting.

As I said, all we are talking about is freedom of information. We must give credit to our good friend, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) who has been a champion in this regard. As the hon. member has so often said, governments do not want the public to know how public money is spent.

An advisory council is to be set up. Actually, it is a somewhat expanded council. Mr. Speaker, really I am not speaking about the report the council must file at the end of the year. That is a statutory matter. It must advise the minister on certain statutory matters. I am not talking about that. I am talking about the public's right to know: the public's right to information. Suppose some questions concerning harassment, overzealousness, abuse, etc., arise; or suppose the minister wants to know if certain provisions of the act are a disincentive to work, or an incentive. Then the council would be asked to give its advice and report to the minister. Such questions have nothing to do with national security, subversive activity or civil rights. Such questions, basically, relate to how well the legislation is working, and the council reports to the minister on these matters. As I say, really, we are talking about freedom of information and the public's right to know.

The Canadian Manufacturers' Association submitted a brief in February 1977, to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. As you know, sir, the CMA had representation on the former council and unquestionably will be included on the one to be established. Labour representatives will also be on the council, as will government appointees. When the CMA is concerned about the public's right to know, I understand it speaks both for labour and management. In this regard I shall read section 53 of the brief entitled "The Public's Right to Know". The section reads:

If the advisory council is to have an effective involvement in policy-making, beyond acting as a sounding board but short of assuming decision-making powers which can only reside in the government itself, one key to effectiveness lies in the right of the public to know what the advisory council recommends from time to time and how the government has responded to those recommendations.

As I said, the CMA had representations on the advisory council. In making this representation concerning the public's right to know, I understand the association is speaking on its own behalf and that of labour. I continue quoting from the brief. Section 54 reads:

The council should have considerable latitude in determining its own procedures and methods of operating in relation to such matters as when or if it conducts public hearings, the use of outside expert advice and venue of meetings beyond those required by the act. We note with satisfaction that an annual report of the council's activities will be tabled by the minister in the House of Commons and therefore become a matter of public knowledge and record.

Section 55 reads:

However, the association believes we should have more ambitious hopes for the role which the council could play and for the example it could set for other advisory or consultative bodies in assisting in the development of social policy for Canada's benefit.

Section 56 of the brief is entitled "The Council's 'Right to Know' ". It reads:

The public's right to know about the council's activities and recommendations would be of little value if the council itself were not to have reasonable access to information from the government and in particular from the department of employment and immigration and the minister. Bill C-27 provides the minister with discretionary authority in this regard. This right of the council should not extend to draft legislation or other information which could jeopardize Canada's national security.

Those parts of the brief contain the gist of motion No. 2 which has to do with freedom of information and the public's right to know. Canadians are becoming ever more concerned about the way governments act and spend money, most of the time in secret. I suggest it is time to include in all legislation some provision saying that unless there is good reason to keep government action secret, governments should work in the open without the secrecy which is detrimental to the Canadian people.

May I now turn the attention of the House to motion No. 3, which says, in so many words, that the council shall meet at least once a year and that minutes shall be recorded of all formal meetings. I was pleased to note that when we discussed another portion of the bill in committee the minister was ready to accept a similar amendment to the one now before us. In essence, motion No. 3 says that the council shall do everything "necessary to carry out its duties provided that without restricting the generality of the foregoing it shall meet at least once a year and minutes shall be recorded of all formal meetings." Notice, I do not say that such minutes shall be available: I do not go that far. I only say that minutes shall be recorded of all formal meetings so that they are available, say, in respect of a legal action. The point is that they ought to be available, and it will be enough if minutes are recorded. Also, the council ought to be required to meet at least once a year. For all I know, it may meet once a month or more often. However, a minimum number of meetings should be stipulated.

Nothing in motion No. 3 or motion No. 2 will hamper the effectiveness of the council. We are saying that when the council reports to the minister on how effectively the UIC program is working, the public has the right to know what it says. Further, the legislation should stipulate that the council shall meet at least once a year and that a record, or minutes, shall be kept of all formal meetings.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak briefly on motions 2 and 3 proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). As the committee examined Bill C-27 it learned several things about the advisory council. Mr. Speaker, it has always been my impression that an advisory council is appointed to give advice. In this case it will give advice concerning the UIC. If we exclude the question of making such advice public and the question of whether there ought to be a free flow of information with respect to government reports, what bothers me is the ad hoc way the advisory council operates. Its operations, it seems to me, are part and parcel of the way the bureaucracy operates. They fit into the scheme of things. I have observed, in my own innocence, that there seems to be a war going on in the bosom of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen).

The bureaucrats wish to have the only direct line to the ear of the minister. They would never allow an advisory council to advise with regard to the operation of the whole structure of unemployment insurance. It is only natural that they want the minister's ear to themselves, and maybe other parts as well.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: They want his ear in order to have direct input to the minister. Indeed, in committee we discovered that any kind of role that the advisory council played was on an ad hoc basis—behind the chesterfield, in the cupboard, or on the telephone. I asked the chairman what he thought of that. We asked for the minutes, but we did not get them. We were told there was a sort of buddy-buddy, ad hoc, off-the-cuff kind of advisory role which the council was condemned to play. We asked what role the advisory council played in the comprehensive review of the Unemployment Insurance Act on which Bill C-27 is based. It is an important review because of the way in which the Unemployment Insurance Act is operating in this country. We asked whether it was serving the purpose for which it was set up.

An hon. Member: It is outdated.

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, it is outdated. Apart from that, one would think an advisory council made up of employee representatives, employer representatives, government people and bureaucrats would have some direct input. With regard to any meaningful role that the advisory council ought to play, we found that their participation amounted to as much as you could put into a thimble.

Freedom of information is paramount in motions Nos. 2 and 3 moved by the hon. member for Hamilton West. I support them wholeheartedly. They tend to give importance to the advisory council; in other words, to give it status. It says to the minister, in spite of all we have been saying about an advisory council, that parliament expects some effects from it.

I have been here since 1972. I have seen the unemployment insurance representatives come before the committee on estimates, on Bill C-69, and the present bill. I have never seen anyone from the advisory council before this committee. They are well hidden. We have never heard their views as to how the Unemployment Insurance Act is being administered. We have never been told whether what was implemented in 1971 is doing the job it was designed to do.

I repeat, we have not seen a copy of the minutes. I do not think they exist. If they do exist, it is only in the minister's imagination. There may be something on paper which says the minister shall establish an advisory council. I am not crazy about the way in which the advisory council to the Unemployment Insurance Commission has performed. If these amendments will in any way upgrade the role of the advisory council, any time debating them will be well spent by this parliament.

One would hope that the advisory council would meet more than once a year. The committee heard a lot of witnesses when considering Bill C-27—witnesses for the employers and for the employees. By and large, their views looked at opposite sides. Indeed, there was only one area where employees and employers seemed to concur. That was with regard to the approach to make work programs and having shared-work programs using UIC funds. There seemed to be a meeting of minds on that particular issue—opposing it.

It would have been of benefit to members of parliament to have had the view of the advisory council with regard to Bill C-27 and the effects envisaged by proponents and opponents of it. It would have been of benefit to have the input of that advisory council.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): It might embarrass the minister.

Mr. Rodriguez: I agree. It would have embarrassed the bureaucrats. That is why the advisory council is shunted off to the side, treated like the ugly stepdaughter who is hidden from public view.

Mr. Nystrom: Chauvinist! It is the ugly stepson.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Step-person!

Mr. Rodriguez: All right, ugly step-person. We have to put it in the correct context. When we asked in committee to see copies of the minutes and the agenda of the advisory council, I never saw more pussy-footing and dipsy-doodling. There were glances back and forth along the wide wall of bureaucrats. We could not see the agenda or the minutes. We doubted whether they even existed. If these two motions will in any way enhance the role of the advisory council, so be it.

In committee we also asked about the possibility of local councils or regional councils which would have direct input to the minister. We were assured that the councils would have the ear of the minister and direct input. If they had direct input to the minister, members of parliament studying the legislation brought in by the minister should have the same evaluation reports, the same material presented to the minister with regard to unemployment insurance and, if this bill goes through, the new structure. One would hope to have that kind of information when studying government legislation.

Do the advisory councils, indeed, advise? If they do so advise, does that advice go directly to the minister and not via the bureaucracy which can phase out anything they do not want the minister to hear, and then pass on nice, bland statements to him? We have been trying to avoid that sort of thing, and if these two motions can get around that and make the advisory council meaningful and give it a role to play, we are in favour of it. We would much prefer to see the emphasis on the regional advisory councils rather than on a national advisory council. Why should everything in this country have to be centralized? Why should national bodies be mandatory, and regional bodies optional? Why does everything have to operate under a veil of secrecy? Why cannot the government be open in its approach to the way to administer programs in which members of parliament have participated in putting into law?

We in this party support the motions of the hon. member for Hamilton West and urge the government to accept those two motions and make them part of the legislation.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I think there is little of substance that can be said in relation to the amendments before us, but I think there are some examples which could be given to illustrate how dangerous it would be not to adopt the amendments put forward by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). Specifically stated, the hon. member's amendment reads:

> The minister shall cause any reports related thereto to be laid before parliament within 30 days after the receipt thereof or, if parliament is not then sitting, on any of the first 30 days next thereafter that parliament is sitting.

All we are really asking the government to do in relation to Bill C-27 is to get out from under the criticism that this government has been under since its existence, and to give, as a right to the Canadian people, freedom of information. In other words, we take the view that what is happening in Canada today is that the government is taxing the citizens of our country, taking their money, conducting surveys and collecting information to use in research, and then turning around to the people and telling them they have no business to know anything about it.

What has happened is that the government has drifted away from the concept of government by the people, of the people and for the people that was enunciated by a democratic leader of another country. Today, what we really have was stated in the House of Commons in May, 1975, by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). He said, "What we have today is government of the bureaucrats, by the bureaucrats and for the bureaucrats". That comes about because of the situation of a high degree of secrecy which takes place within our government institutions. This amendment would, in one piece of legislation, say that the kind of information gathered from the council of people that is important to Canada, to Canadians, in relation to manpower and immigration would be knowledge that is accessible and available not just to the government, not just to some council, but to the Canadian people who should have the right, whatever kinds of important pieces of knowledge are put forward, to know what that information is.

I think it is important to underscore that when we talk about freedom of information we are not necessarily saying that that needs to take place in all stratas or layers of government.

I think there is just reason that within the Department of National Defence or some of the sensitive areas of external relations with other countries the government, in its judgment and wisdom, ought to have the right to refrain from releasing certain bits of information that could endanger our national security. That is not the situation at the present time. I would like to put forward an example that happened in my old office on Parliament Hill this past year which I think shows the state of the shambles we are in in terms of lack of the government releasing information that ought to be available to the Canadian people.

I have, Mr. Speaker, a very fine researcher. His name is Bing Ho. I asked him this year, because I was doing a study on Canadian-American relations prior to going to Washington, D.C., on a sub-committee, if he could investigate some information dealing with the Canadian-American beef trade and find it out for us and put together a booklet, a package. He phoned the civil service here in Ottawa, the Department of Agriculture, and day after day I heard him on the telephone going through the same sequence of questions such as: "Who are you? What do you want to know for? Who else will know this information? Where will it be used? When will it be used? How many other people are going to know?" All this before he could get the information.

Do you know what happened, Mr. Speaker? One day, perhaps through a slip of one of the civil servants, he found out that much of the information was shared with the American department of agriculture. So we decided to try another route. We bypassed the Canadian Department of Agriculture, phoned through to the embassy in Washington, D.C., and found a most helpful, co-operative, cordial group of people who not only gave us the information but said, "Look; what's your name and telephone number up there in Canada, because we know of other people who can phone you and give you further information?" Within moments we found that phone calls were coming in from the department of agriculture in the United States to give us information that is to be found in Canadian bureau of bureaucracy.

I simply say that this kind of example is one which should scare the living daylights out of Canadians. The fact is that we have in this country a shroud of secrecy over information that is paid for by the taxpayers but which the taxpayer cannot find out about. Like I say, there would be no problem if this related only to the Department of National Defence or sensitive areas of external affairs, but it exists in virtually every department of this government.

What my good friend from Hamilton West is saying is that the crisis of lack of freedom of information in Canada today has become so serious that at least let us enshrine in Bill C-27 that the public has a right to know what the council is doing. We have got to know, and we have the right to know, because we are supposedly a democratic country where people elect representatives to govern for them. The government of the day takes the attitude that once it has been elected it, alone, has the right to make decisions, instead of decision-sharing or taking the approach that the public has something to offer. It takes the position that it is wholly above reproach and has the right and the power to impose its wishes without the release of information so that its judgment could be "critiqued"—I do not say "criticized", but "critiqued"—and analysed by the public.

What we really need is a new understanding of the words "public servant". The public servant today has come to the view that somehow he is in this domain of perpetuating his own security. What we have to underscore is that he is, in fact, the literal part of the words "public servant" or "servant of the public". In other words, the whole concept of democracy hinges upon this amendment; that is, we should begin to recognize that freedom of information is something for which provision should be made in the bill before us, and it ought to have been guaranteed before this.

At this stage in our history it is a shame that we still have to be clamouring, as an opposition party, on each and every bill, for the inclusion of a section which would ensure that the knowledge gathered through research is known to the Canadian people, and not only to the people who have been hired with taxpayers' dollars. I should like to deal with motion No. 3, which reads as follows:

—necessary to carry out its duties provided that without restricting the generality of the foregoing it shall meet at least once a year and minutes shall be recorded of all formal meetings.

If we look at Bill C-27 we see that the government has put forward the concept that there should be an advisory council with no obligations or requirements attached thereto. The amendment indicates that the minister's concept is good but can be made better by the addition of the observations of that group. It could be improved, also, by ensuring that the council has some specific obligations. To do otherwise allows the minister to have a cosmetic appearance. He has put forward the idea that there will be a council—with no assurance that it will ever meet, with no guarantee of minutes being kept, and no availability to what that council discussed.

The hon. member for Hamilton West said that we appreciate the fact the minister has come forward with a group of people who will be advisers. We should like to know what they are going to say or how they will have the privilege to find out what they have said. There should be a minimum requirement as to how often they meet. This minister cannot duck and dodge by simply putting on paper that there is one in existence, and then never call it into being.

Those are straightforward amendments, and I am sure the minister will not find them difficult to accept. From one side of his mouth, in standing committees, he told us that they were reasonable requests. He has also talked about consultation and the situation allowing more freedom of information. If he took that position at committee stage, he should have no difficulty taking it in the House of Commons. I should like to hear the minister tell this House that he finds motions Nos. 2 and 3 palatable. I should like to go along with the hon. member for Hamilton West and ensure that these motions be included in Bill C-27 when it is passed.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, a lot has been said so far on motions Nos. 2 and 3. I do not want to duplicate what has been said already, but I should like to read into the record a few excerpts from a letter which was addressed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), dated April 18, 1977. The letter was sent by Dr. Freida Hawkins of the University of Toronto, the department of political economy. It is my understanding that Dr. Hawkins is well known to the minister and his department. Probably she has written to him on previous occasions, offering constructive criticisms of the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Did she send you a copy?

Mr. Blackburn: I have a copy of the letter. I am sure I am not the only one who has a copy of it. On page 3, under the heading "Public Image and Responsibilities", she refers to the advisory committees which are supposed to function. As other hon. members have pointed out, these committees are not functioning and are seldom ever called. That is the reason I am speaking on behalf of motion No. 2 put forward by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). I can assure him that our party supports his motion. Let me get to the meat of the criticisms of Dr. Hawkins by quoting from the letter, which reads as follows:

> There are important lessons to be learned from the operations of these advisory bodies, from the way in which they have been used by the department and from the kind of advice which they have been able to give to the minister. First of all, they have been a totally in-house operation and the public has been completely unaware of their existence. Their role has never been referred to in the department's annual reports or in the speeches of successive ministers. None of the work they have done has ever been published. Parliament and the provinces have remained as much in the dark about their activities as the general public itself.

That is a very severe condemnation of these advisory committees, and that is why I implore the minister to accept motion No. 2. Then these advisory committees would have teeth and some input. They would have to report regularly and, as the previous speaker stressed in his remarks, they would be open to criticism, which is one of the most important aspects of government today. Government departments should be opened up for people to see what is being written and said, with the exception of what would fall under the heading of national security. This has nothing to do with national security. Bill C-27 has nothing to do with national security vis-à-vis the advisory committees . The letter continues:

> In the author's view, this has been a serious mistake, particularly in a field where public knowledge and understanding has been and continues to be weak, and where the sources of information available to the general public are still very limited.

That is another serious condemnation. It is also a very valid criticism of the lack of information in that department as far as the bureaucracy itself is concerned. I suggest that is overloaded, to begin with. A couple of years ago I can recall sitting in the committee room surrounded by many bureaucrats and only two or three of them had anything to say instead of their doing what they are paid to do.

An. hon. Member: That was too many.

Mr. Blackburn: I think the hon. member should tell them. Returning to the letter, on page 4 it continues as follows:

> It is worth noting here also that the chairman and members of the Canada Manpower and Immigration Council were not called as witnesses before the senate standing committee, nor were they part of the minister's group of officials which appeared before the committee on several occasions.

Those advisory committees were set up for a specific task: to advise the minister. Obviously, they have been ignored. It is my impression that the bureaucrats are afraid of these advisory committees and what they may advise the minister. This would embarrass them and might even lead to a few promotions out of a particular department into another.

Mr. Symes: There is never a demotion.

Mr. Backburn: As the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) says, "There is never a demotion". To get rid of unwanted bureaucrats you simply promote them to another department. At this point that is all I have to say with respect to motion No. 2. Of course, the House is aware of what has been said by other hon. members who have spoken in this regard. We must have greater freedom of information. The minister has a wonderful opportunity here to provide this information through the advisory councils, with regular reports made public either through the House or directly through the press. I think this would also stimulate greater activity and confidence within the minister's department and the bureaucracy. This is why I commend motion No. 2, and also No. 3, to the minister for very serious reconsideration for inclusion in the statute when Bill C-27 is finally passed.

● (1230)

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I feel moved to add a few comments on the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). I want to say how much I support motions Nos. 2 and 3, the basic objective of which is to provide more openness in the work of government and some input into how regulations are made and executed. An advisory committee which is more than just a title on paper is long overdue. We need a committee that is active, one that we, as parliamentarians, as representatives of the people of this country, are confident will indeed do the job it is required to do by statute. Therefore, it seems to me that motions Nos. 2 and 3 are most appropriate since they provide for some kind of reporting system so we can examine how these advisory councils are functioning.

The government likes to talk very much about participatory democracy and how the government is reacting to people's needs. Yet how strange it is—perhaps it is not strange in view of the history of the Liberal government—that when we get down to the fine details in terms of legislation and the bureaucracy being open and receptive to new ideas, in reality these provisions are not written into the law. Or if they are, they are worded so perfunctorily that they have no real meaning.

This is why the two amendments before the House seem to me so sensible. We want the advisory councils to make sure that they keep minutes of their meetings, and report. I think the minister will find it very difficult to argue against these two motions. If we are to believe in openness in government and that the Liberal government is not the fount of all wisdom, that there are others who can provide information as to the proper functioning of the Unemployment Insurance Act, then surely it would be hard for the minister to reject these two amendments.

I have talked off the record to officials in the unemployment insurance office in my constituency and have noted some very positive suggestions on their part. They are the people who deal with the legislation and the regulations on a day to day basis, and they have a lot of good ideas. I have also talked to people in the labour movement and others who have served on boards of referees. They, too, know where improvements can be made in the regulations and in the system as a whole.

Mr. Blackburn: But they are afraid to talk.

Mr. Symes: As my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Blackburn) says, these people are often afraid to make suggestions for fear they may be interpreted by those in the higher echelons as speaking in criticism of the way the system works. Therefore, it seems to me that if we had these advisory councils functioning in the proper way, this would provide the opportunity to those not directly involved with the system to relay their points of view to the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Hopefully, in this way we could iron out some of the difficulties and have the legislation applied in such a way that it did not discriminate against or penalize certain people. Surely, the aim of any piece of legislation is not to penalize or hinder in undue fashion those who benefit from the legislation but, rather, to expedite such benefits. Accepting these two amendments would be a positive step in that direction.

I should like the minister to tell the House, either at this point or later on in the debate, how the personnel of these advisory committees are to be appointed. My fear is that very often representation to various committees appointed by the government consists of—

Mr. Rodriguez: Liberal flunkies.

Mr. Symes: My hon. friend from Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) says "Liberal flunkies", but I will be a little more charitable and say that often these appointees are not as representative as one might hope. I should like to know who actually appoints representatives to these advisory councils, and what the criteria are. Are they people from interested groups in the community who have something to do with unemployment insurance, such as employers or people from labour unions, or are they people who at one time worked within the bureaucracy but are now retired? Are these advisory committees representative, or are they—dare I use the word—partisan appointments?

Mr. Blackburn: Go ahead and dare.

Mr. Symes: Do they have some kind of expertise in dealing with unemployment insurance or employment generally? I would hope so. I would be very interested to know what is the selection process. Perhaps we should think of future improvements along that line.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, I agree with the main thrust of these two motions. They provide for openness in the functioning of government, and also for some input into the operation of government. I think this openness and input could be increased even further if there were a broader basis for selecting people appointed to these advisory committees. I am not by nature a suspicious person, but judging from the kind of Liberal appointments made in the past I fear that patronage is moving in in regard to this kind of appointment as well. Perhaps the minister would enlighten the House on the actual selection process.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, having listened very carefully to the comments on motions Nos. 2 and 3, may I at the outset remind the House that this is an advisory council to the minister which we are talking about. It is a council which gives advice and from which advice will be sought by the minister. As I said in committee when I went through the bill, having taken on this particular portfolio I asked the same questions hon. members might ask. I ask whether we really need a council, whether it is effective, whether it has a role to play, and I am satisfied in my own mind that the answer is yes. It is for this reason that this provision is still in the bill. I wanted it to be a committee that had a real role to play.

I wanted the committee to have access to the minister and access to such information as is available from the department, given the restriction that the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) would be concerned about, namely, that there are areas here where individual human rights must be protected, and the information may be very sensitive to some individuals in the department.

If all this information were made available to the advisory council and then became public, the fact that we would have to table all reports would have an inhibiting effect on the kinds of information that would be made available from the department. I would be concerned about tabling all reports. However, as I indicated in the committee, I have read many of the reports in the past and have found that a large majority of them—I believe the chairmen of both councils would concede that this is so—contain nothing sensitive or secretive in them. It would be my policy and my role to table a large percentage of the reports that are made available to me. But when I receive information I do not want a watered-down version of what the council thinks, because the council might be concerned that the information will be automatically made public. I want hard information, I want information that is going to be useful to the department and to the individual whom we are trying to serve. It is for that reason, and that reason alone, that I am reluctant to accept motion No. 2 put forward by the hon. member for Hamilton West.

I have no concern about the second motion. I will not oppose it, and the government is prepared to accept it. However, I might say that I think it is somewhat redundant. The hon. member himself, in introducing his motion, indicated that he knows the council meets more than once a year and he is satisfied that the council keeps minutes. So I have no concern with that, other than I feel it might very well be redundant. The hon. member used some poetic licence in saying that I was "pleased" to accept the motion in committee. That is a loose use of the word "pleased". I accepted the motion, recognizing that it was somewhat redundant, but in the interests of being co-operative, as we on this side, try to be, I went along with it.

I take exception to some of the comments made by the NDP, who spoke about the wall of bureaucrats, the army of bureaucrats sitting at meetings of the committee. From time to time in committee we ask hon. members who ask questions if we could have some of those questions in advance so we could put them to members of the bureaucracy who could give us the answers that are required. We could then have a full and open discussion. Unfortunately, we have no way of predicting what is in the minds of the members of the NDP, so we must have available the various experts from the departments just in case a particular question is asked.

From time to time we did, in fact, try to cut down the number of civil servants present because, frankly, they would be much happier back in the departments doing what they are being paid to do. But then we had members opposite saying, "You have all the experts. We should have the answers today. But if you want the answers, you will have to have the bureaucrats there with the knowledge and the expertise." A little co-operation from the other side would go a long way toward saving the taxpayers some money.

Mr. Blais: Yes, and a little bit of preparation.

Mr. Cullen: I was interested to find that the correspondence between my good friend, Freida, and myself had gone astray to some extent. That it is now in the hands of members of the NDP.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is why I asked you the question.

Mr. Cullen: It is an excellent letter, with excellent recommendations and suggestions, but it seems to me that what the hon. lady was talking about was the situation in the past as she saw it—and these were the concerns I expressed. I met on two occasions with Dr. Hawkins about what we could do to improve the role of the advisory council to give it a meaningful role and let it know that it does have the ear of the minister and will be able to meet from time to time, either informally or formally, with the minister so that we can have a full and frank discussion. I will make no further comment on Dr. Hawkin's letter other than to say that these are areas which were of concern to me even before I received the letter from Dr. Hawkins in areas that we discussed.

The last item which should be commented on is the comments of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) on the input from the front-line troops. I tell you candidly that it is welcome. It is a role that a member of parliament should play. He should go to the Manpower and UI offices to raise those questions either for political purposes in the House or for whatever reason, or with the minister to see if something can be done and that it can be, as we say in press terms, not attributable to anyone. I hope that no one in this department would have any concern about making good suggestions or recommendations to this minister about ways in which we might go about improving the department and in which we can serve the general public. I thank hon. members for their comments. For the reasons given, I cannot accept motion No. 2. I am prepared to accept motion No. 3 although, as I indicated, I feel it is redundant.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, at times it is like pulling teeth to get the minister to agree, but I would say that since the minister has accepted a portion of the first amendment, does he not want the second amendment but is prepared to accept the third amendment? We are making some progress in this place.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my understanding that motions No. 2 and No. 3 are grouped together for the purpose of debate, but that they will have two separate votes. The question is on motion No. 2 in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on motion No. 2 stands deferred. The question is now on motion No. 3, in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved motion No. 4:

That Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 26 by adding immediately after line 23 at page 11, the following new subclause:

"(9) Section 2 of the said act is further amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

"(3) Where, for any purposes, the use of rate of unemployment produced by Statistics Canada is required under this act or the regulations, the rates used by the commission shall be those most recently produced at the time it is appropriate or necessary for the commission to make a final determination in respect of or involving the use of those rates."

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion I am proposing, motion No. 4, is that we amend clause 26 of Bill C-27 for the purpose of clarifying the rates of unemployment to be used by the commission in determining the entrance requirement, regional extended benefit entitlement under the UI program and the threshold formula for allocating costs to the government and the private sector. The rates of unemployment used by the commission in a number of provisions in the Unemployment Insurance Act and the regulations are the rates provided by Statistics Canada from its monthly labour force survey. At present, however, there is no provision in the Unemployment Insurance Act stipulating which official Statistics Canada rates of unemployment are to be used in cases where the basis for determining those rates has been revised by Statistics Canada.

This proposed motion to amend Bill C-27 would provide that the rates to be used by the commission would be those most recently available. It would be consistent with the methodologies provided by Statistics Canada whereby revised rates of unemployment are released from time to time and officially replace material previously provided.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the amendment, which would allow the minister to use Statistics Canada figures with respect to rates of unemployment, but we think the minister ought to have gone further and committed himself and his department to using information with respect to all figures put out by Statistics Canada which are relevant to the Unemployment Insurance Commission. For example, I refer to Statistics Canada catalogue No. 73-001. It is not enough just to take the most up to date rates of unemployment from Statistics Canada to establish benefits under the plan. It appears that we have to use the statistical information put out by Statistics Canada, and trust it.

At the moment, far too many decisions are made within the UIC on interpretations of data received from Statistics Canada. Many interpretations are put on material based on views held by the UIC. For example, comprehensive review of the unemployment insurance plan in Canada was done, and it is on that basis that Bill C-27 comes before parliament. There are several aspects of that comprehensive review which are based upon UIC interpretations. For example, the UIC does not recognize alcoholism as a disease when considering voluntary quits. Imagine that, in 1977! A person who is let go from his employment or leaves his employment because of alcoholism is considered a voluntary quit!

Mr. Breau: What if he goes for treatment?

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member opposite asks, "What if he goes for treatment?" I have never heard anything more silly. That is something which takes place after a person has applied for unemployment insurance and after interviews, and so forth. How do we know that an applicant was prepared to go for treatment after he quit voluntarily and after he was included in the statistics? We do not know. Such information is not provided. Quitting voluntarily, so-called, is not unknown in this country. It is very prevalent. It does not take an employer very long to fire a person for trying to organize a union in a workplace. We know that banks are famous for that.

Mr. Blackburn: Infamous.

Mr. Rodriguez: As the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) says, they are infamous. UIC statistics would consider that a voluntary quit. Those statistics imply that that person put himself into a position to be fired. With respect to voluntary quits, the UIC does not take into account the fact that the environment in a workplace may be such that a particular worker might be allergic to it. That is not considered to be a legitimate reason for quitting a job.

These statistics are interpreted by bureaucrats in the UIC and they find their way into comprehensive reviews. On the basis of those comprehensive reviews, recommendations are made which result in bills like Bill C-27. The UIC is shot through with bureaucratic interpretations of data which may have to be obtained from Statistics Canada. The program is not necessarily implemented according to information received. Bureaucrats in the UIC receive information and then project their own interpretations. For example, in the comprehensive review on page C-5 it is noted that 47.2 per cent of those who supposedly left their jobs voluntarily were not entitled to unemployment insurance benefits. That, then, becomes a statistic within the UIC. That statistic is now being used to beat the unemployed across the country over the head, and it has resulted in this particular bill.

We would have been very pleased if the minister had extended the amendment a lot further by saying that other statistical data could be used for purposes of computing the benefits to be paid or the length of time benefits were to be paid in a region—which is what the minister is going to come up with later on in this debate—and that other information with respect to the number of people, for example, who have quit their jobs could be used. Using those statistics provided by Statistics Canada would give those of us who deal with the act on a day to day basis with respect to our constituents when they deal with UIC confidence that this policy decision was not concocted in some ivory tower in Ottawa.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgency and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. Due to the dangers and inadequacies of a provincial inquiry into events involving the national police force and the conduct of a federal cabinet minister, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That, in the opinion of this House, the federal government should establish an inquiry to investigate all aspects of the break-in at offices of L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec, including the circumstances leading to it, subsequent actions to cover up its occurrence, and the nature of the liaison and communication between the Solicitor General and senior officials in his department.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to the standing order such motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO PREVENT LAY-OFFS OF EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter which is particularly urgent to a large number of workers in Moncton, Montreal and Winnipeg and I hope no one on the government side will say no to the request for the right to present this motion. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House calls on the government to make immediate representations to the Canadian National Railways to the effect that the callous decision to lay off nearly 5,000 employees, 1,950 at Winnipeg, 2,000 at Montreal and 950 at Moncton, for the period from August 8 to September 6, should be rescinded forthwith, and that the government report back to the House on this urgent matter within 48 hours.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such motion can only be presented for debate pursuant to the standing order, with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Alexander: Goodale said no.

FINANCE

REQUEST FINANCING OF PROVINCES BE STUDIED BY COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 seeking unanimous consent of the House on an urgent and pressing matter.

Considering that the funds lent by the federal government to the provinces through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the construction of housing for senior citizens and low-income earners bear an overly high interest rate which, moreover, is computed every six months, which results in a considerable increase in the real rate of interest, and bearing in mind that the provinces borrowing from Ottawa under that program undertake to reimburse $5 for each dollar borrowed on a long term basis, which makes Canadians from every province question the efficiency, equitability and profitability of the present Constitution, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin):

That this House recommend that the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs review that question and that program as a whole with a view to promoting that program so as to reduce the debts of the provinces towards the federal government and to spur construction in order to alleviate unemployment.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion by the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTION MINISTER OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES BE PERMITTED TO ANSWER QUESTIONS ABOUT BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that only the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) can supply all the details concerning official knowledge of the 1972 break-in at the offices of L'Agence de Presse Libre, in view of the practices of this House which might be construed as barring questions to a minister with respect to former responsibilities and in view of the importance which this House must hold for the truth, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the Minister of Supply and Services be permitted to answer questions about his activities as Solicitor General in relation to the break-in at the offices of L'Agence de Presse Libre du Quebec on October 6, 1972.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate in the House pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—SUGGESTION MINISTER OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES RESIGN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion concerns the new theory of ministerial responsibility which, briefly put, postulates that a minister's constitutional responsibility lies with his ministerial assistants. In light of the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) use of this new prerogative in three successive scandals, namely Hamilton Harbour, the Lougheed procurement, the Larry Stopforth affair, and now the APLQ break-in, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Huron-Middlesex (Mr. McKinley):

That this House, recognizing that the minister refuses ministerial responsibility for the actions of his staff and in light of the minister's press release of June, 1977 in which he stated that he would resign if he were guilty of any acts of commission or omission, direct that the minister now resign.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Noting that this motion requires unanimous consent, may I ask if there is unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It pertains directly to the motion under Standing Order 43 moved by the House leader of the Conservative party, with the sentiments of which we agree entirely.

In raising my point of order, I want to indicate that I was going to do it just prior to the opening of the question period and ask the House to consider the principle involved in the motion moved by the House leader of the Conservative party.

I understand the clear possibility that members on the government side might have said no to the motion that was moved because they might have thought it would lead directly to debate on that motion. I have no doubt that that was not the intention of the House leader of the Conservative party when he moved that motion.

With unanimous agreement, it would be possible for the present Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) to answer questions pertaining to the very important and murky affair, the break-in of a publishing house in Montreal in the fall of 1972. I appeal to the members of this House, particularly the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), to give approval to the idea that the present Minister of Supply and Services be permitted in this question period to answer very important and very pressing questions on this matter, precisely because there is no other forum open to us at this point.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member seeks, by way of a point of order, to make what might be a suggestion. In any case, it is not being used to draw attention to disorder in this House which is about the limit permitted under the rules at this particular juncture.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF DELEGATION FROM EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT

Mr. Speaker: May I borrow just one minute from the oral question period in which to invite hon. members to join with me in recognizing the presence in our galley of a very distinguished delegation, which is here for a few days of what we are sure will be very cordial and successful exchanges as they have always been in the past—a delegation from the European parliament headed by the very distinguished British parliamentarian, Mr. James Scott Hopkins.

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before beginning, I should like to make it clear that the purpose of the intervention of the House leader for the Official Opposition by way of a motion under Standing Order 43 was not to generate a debate but to get the right to put questions to the only minister who is able to answer them.

I begin by directing a question to the Prime Minister. In the statement of the Solicitor General last Friday, a categoric statement was attributed to the former solicitor general, the present Minister of Supply and Services, that that minister was not informed that the theft of documents was the result of an unlawful entry in which the RCMP had actually participated. However, the former commissioner of the RCMP and the former director general of the RCMP security service have stated, and I quote, that "they would be surprised if they had not verbally advised the solicitor general in this regard."

There is a clear and alarming contradiction here, a situation in which the minister states he was not informed of the break-in and in which the former commissioner and director general state, as diplomatically as they can, that they would be surprised if they had not informed him. In the light of this contradiction, I ask the Prime Minister whether he would consider launching a federal public inquiry into this matter since it could possibly involve a conspiracy to conceal evidence at the most senior levels of his government.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I take exception to the allegation by the Leader of the Opposition that the former commissioner was "being diplomatic" in his answer. I am sure he gave an answer to the best of his knowledge. He was not attempting to cover up anything; he was stating he did not remember giving information but he would be surprised if he had not given information. And it was established by the present solicitor general that information of this nature—

An hon. Member: Cover up!

Mr. Trudeau: It seems to me that the present Minister of Supply and Services, the former solicitor general, is stating a fact. He was not informed. The others cannot say they informed him but they say they would be surprised if they had not. The words speak for themselves and the Leader of the Opposition should draw his own conclusions.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I missed the end of the Prime Minister's response, except it is clear he continued to refuse to have all the evidence made public so that the light of day can be cast upon precisely what that minister was doing at the time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: This matter involves a minister of the Crown, now Minister of Supply and Services, and former solicitor general, whose reaction to public embarrassment, as one of my hon. friends has said, has simply been to blame public servants. We are now asked to believe that the minister was not aware of participation in the break-in by the RCMP under his authority and that in fact he did not even ask about RCMP involvement. The statement on Friday indicates only that the Minister of Supply and Services is either incompetent or that he cannot be believed. I ask the Prime Minister whether he will order the Minister of Supply and Services to make a full statement of his involvement in this matter, preferably before a federal public inquiry or at least somewhere under oath.

● (1420)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have the statement of the former solicitor general to the effect that he did not know of the break-in by the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Clark.]

Mr. Trudeau: I, for one, am prepared to accept the word of a colleague who is a member of the Privy Council and a minister of the Crown.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. members opposite have cause to doubt his word, of course, they can always challenge it in a way which is well known by this House.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, we in this House of Commons, and the people of Canada, are not prepared to accept the information which was conveyed through another minister by a minister who refuses—which would have been the honourable thing to do—to seek the unanimous agreement of this House so that he might make a statement which would be subject to questioning.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—REASON FOR REFUSAL TO CONDUCT PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): The suspicions which arise here will never be put to rest until the Prime Minister is prepared to let this man be questioned in a way in which the answers can be accepted.

My final supplementary to the Prime Minister relates to the very serious fact that the only official investigation which is under way in respect to l'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec break-in is a provincial inquiry. In effect, we have the Parti Québécois government investigating the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I should like to ask the Prime Minister why he will not call his own investigation and why he is leaving an investigation of the federal police force to the separatist government of the province of Quebec?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. Leader of the Opposition should know, under our constitution and under our Criminal Code, as it is written, the administration of justice comes under the attorneys general of the provinces. In the province of Quebec we have a government which was lawfully elected by the people of Quebec. If the hon. member disagrees with the procedure followed by that government, of course he can make his views known to it. There is a long established law and tradition in this country that justice be administered by the province. Because of the circumstances mentioned by the hon. Leader of the Opposition, one would think that the Parti Québécois government would make very sure, in this particular case, that the facts are brought to light. This is what we hope will be the case.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister of Canada trying to seriously suggest to this House of Commons that he has no jurisdiction to look into this matter, or is it simply that he will not?

Mr. Paproski: No-guts Pierre.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I thought it was quite clear from the statement made by the Solicitor General on Friday that of course the government has jurisdiction to look into the matter. The Solicitor General looked into it and I looked into it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The Solicitor General made a statement on Friday which conveys our knowledge of the facts in every detail that we can muster. If the opposition has some questions to ask, then let them ask the Solicitor General or myself, and we will endeavour to do the best we can.

ALLEGED DESTRUCTION OF DOCUMENTS—POSSIBILITY OF PRIOR CONSULTATION WITH MINISTER

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Solicitor General. Could the minister confirm reports, which I have received, that up to two tons of confidential files and data were destroyed by the RCMP in Montreal on June 2 and June 3, 1977; and could he confirm further that this action, involving the destruction of probably hundreds of man-years of work by the force, was initiated because of the implications of an inquiry being conducted by the government of the Parti québécois, rather than under federal auspices? Finally, will the minister tell us whether he or the Minister of Justice were consulted before this action was taken, and did he approve of it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Shrug that one off, if you can.

Mr. Hees: Is it shrugging or shredding this time?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the hon. member is referring to the destruction of documents which would have taken place during the course of the past month. As far as I am concerned, I am not aware of any destruction of documents whatsoever. If the hon. member is aware of the destruction of documents in the furtherance of a possible cover-up of an illegal action, it is incumbent on him to give me the evidence so that appropriate action can be taken by this government.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He just did so.

Mr. Paproski: How many shredders did you buy, Mr. Goyer?

PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—POSSIBILITY OF CONSULTATION WITH MINISTER PRIOR TO QUEBEC INQUIRY

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time that the opposition have had to bring facts before the Solicitor General.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: Surely the Solicitor General must realize that there is fault, not just in the upper echelons of the RCMP but as well in the way the Solicitor General's own office has been handling any RCMP initiatives so far as concealment or cover-up is concerned, which should have been made abundantly clear to the Solicitor General in the past. Will he not reconsider and recommend to the Prime Minister that an impartial jurist or some outstanding person be put in charge of looking into this whole matter, so that we will not be leaving the RCMP to the mercy of an inquiry by a provincial government? Would the Solicitor General also tell us whether in the meantime, although he had no previous advance warning, on his own admission, of this inquiry to be called by the government of Quebec, there has been any constructive dialogue?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I already find at the moment that the RCMP is not left to the mercy of an inquiry by a public body or by somebody appointed under the jurisdiction of the department of justice or attorney general of the province of Quebec. In view of the type of fatuous allegations which have been made this afternoon, if they are left to the mercy of questions which really raise innuendos and allegations, and if the hon. member really has at heart the reputation of the force, as I think all Canadians have, then instead of making generalized allegations which bear on the reputation on the force, if he had brought the specifics of the allegations, which I have heard for the first time this afternoon, to my personal attention, I may have been able to verify them, before the hon. member raised them in a public manner and cast aspersions on the force.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that all members of this House have an obligation, if they have this kind of information, to get to the bottom of it and to bring it to the attention of the responsible authorities before—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: What is parliament for?

Mr. Paproski: Just answer the question.

Mr. Fox: As to the second part of the hon. member's question, my deputy minister has today communicated to me that he is getting in touch with the deputy minister of justice of the province of Quebec in order to ascertain answers to some of the questions the hon. member raised on Friday afternoon.

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—CONSULTATION BY PRIME MINISTER WITH MINISTER OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES ON ACTION TAKEN

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I should like to preface it with an expression of serious dismay that he would not have made it clear to the Minister of Supply and Services that he expected him to clear his name and the government's name in this important matter in the House this afternoon. According to the statement made by the present Solicitor General, when the former solicitor general, the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, informed the Prime Minister a year ago March about the RCMP break-in in Montreal and also about the decision which was made presumably not to acknowledge the letter which was sent to the present Minister of Supply and Service at about the time of the break-in, did the Prime Minister have a conversation with the present Minister of Supply and Services to determine what kind of specific action he took at that time and to give a full explanation for his behaviour?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my dismay in March of last year was that indeed the RCMP had been involved in an illegal break-in. It was at that time that the former solicitor general, the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and myself discussed the possibility of an inquiry. At that time we recognized that the matter had been stated publicly in Montreal and that the attorney general of the province of Quebec was on the eve of launching an inquiry. Because of that, Mr. Speaker, the former solicitor general, the present minister of Indian affairs and myself, decided, in the presence of our senior advisers including the RCMP, to wait until the judicial process had followed its course before going into the matter any further.

As to the precise date at which I asked the then Solicitor General, the present Minister of Supply and Services, the details about which the hon. member asks, I cannot give the answer to that. I will try to refresh my memory as to the time at which I spoke to the former solicitor general.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, since it is a clear possibility even now, I understand, that a federal cabinet minister might not appear before such an inquiry as is now underway in the province of Quebec, and since certainly the kind of inquiry which the government of Quebec might initiate into this process was clear even last year, does the Prime Minister not think that his own responsibilities were not lived up to by relying on the strict application in this case of the due process of law when, instead, he should have gone to the man who was the solicitor general at the time to find out from him if he had inquired of the RCMP when he met with the commissioner of the RCMP on November 6 if the RCMP was directly involved? Surely, it was the ministerial responsibility at that time for the minister to have asked that straightforward, and, one is tempted to say, pretty banal question that we know the Minister of Supply and Services did not ask. The question I want to ask the Prime Minister is, why he did not pursue the matter with the former solicitor general a year ago instead of leaving it simply to a legal process in the province of Quebec which might not ever have led to an interrogation of the minister concerned?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I cannot give the exact moment when I spoke to the Minister of Supply and Services, but the relevant fact in the spring of last year was that the RCMP had been involved in an illegal break-in, and that itself was the main object of my concern and that of the Solicitor General. It is on that basis that we discussed whether or not we should have a judicial inquiry. I repeat that we waited until the due process of law would follow its course, at which time we would see if the guilty persons were brought to trial, as they were. That is the essence of my involvement at that time.

Mr. Broadbent: I would say with regret that the Prime Minister is apparently missing the question I am asking. I am not asking about a judicial inquiry. I am asking about the very important matter of ministerial responsibility involving possibly in this case conspiracy to interfere with the due process of law.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister now, in terms of the statement that was made by the present Solicitor General in the House on Friday in which it became clear for the first time that the former solicitor general, the present Minister of Supply and Services, when he was the minister responsible did not at the meeting on November 6, 1972 even ask the commissioner of the RCMP if the RCMP was involved in the break-in, whether the Prime Minister believes that a minister who in such a grave situation does not even ask the most straightforward and relevant questions—perhaps because he does not want to be caught knowing the answer—ought to remain a minister of the Crown?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the minister in question was moved from that portfolio around the time that this knowledge came to his attention.

An hon. Member: After the break-in.

An hon. Member: Now, we know the reason.

Mr. Trudeau: The relevant point, I reassert to the House, is that the then solicitor general was not apprised of the break-in before it happened nor after it happened by the RCMP.

Mr. Broadbent: He did not ask about it.

Mr. Trudeau: The minister did not ask about it. He was moved to another portfolio within weeks after his meeting with the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Trudeau: The serious matter of the RCMP having broken in was not known to him. Friday was not the first time when hon. members heard that. We have been saying in the House for several weeks now that, of course, the former solicitor general knew there was a break-in. There had been a telegram complaining about it. He did not know that his own police force was involved in the break-in, and we have his word that he was not told they were involved in the break-in. A conclusion may be drawn from that, but I suggest it is not the one the hon. member is drawing.

Mr. Broadbent: Why did he not ask?

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, with your leave, I would put my question to the present Minister of Supply and Services.

In view of his responsibilities when he was Solicitor General in 1972, in view also of the serious allegations now made because of this inquiry and the court's decisions, and in view of the importance given by the present Solicitor General in his statement of June 17 as to the role the present Minister of Supply and Services played in this matter, and to clarify and give more dynamism and power to his present position, could the minister tell the House whether he intends to make a statement in the near future on his position as to the conduct of a complete inquiry on this matter, either before the House of Commons or before a parliamentary committee? If so, when?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Standing Order and our precedents clearly indicate that a question may not be put to a minister if it concerns the administrative responsibility that he no longer holds.

Mr. Fortin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière on a point of order.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I was expecting this position as I was sufficiently aware of the rules, but I wanted to demonstrate that the opposition has in fact no chance to cast light on the past activities of solicitors general as they often move to another position and as the present Solicitor General admits on page 4 of his statement, that people in this position do not know anything about their letters and their inquiries from the RCMP. Consequently, I direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Considering the unbelievable recognition by the present Solicitor General that it is customary for ministers not to inquire about investigations or claims made against the RCMP nor about the letters to be signed, can the Prime Minister tell us whether there is any direction from cabinet to put an end to this unusual practice where a responsible minister is eventually irresponsible?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member reads carefully the statement the Solicitor General made last Friday, he will see that the government already took, in fact, such measures more than two years ago. The problem the hon. member raises is real, namely how to take effective disciplinary measures when a citizen complains about the conduct of a member of the police force, while the investigation is made by the force itself? It is because of this difficulty that the Solicitor General reminded the House last Friday that we established the Marin Commission more than two years ago to study this disciplinary problem and that we already took measures to prevent this inconsistency from recurring. Furthermore, the Solicitor General announced that this fall in the next session, we would introduce legislation to further prevent the claimant to be referred to the very police force which is the object of the complaint.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

I am sure the Prime Minister realizes how difficult it is for opposition members to address questions on activities arising from an old responsibility of the former solicitor general. So, given the difficulties that arise from questions which opposition members are entitled to ask on behalf of the Canadian people, would the Prime Minister, since all opposition parties are unanimous, agree to review his decision and allow such an inquiry so we might question the former solicitor general and have the matter cleared up?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, would this mean that the hon. member has no confidence in the inquiry which will be made by the government of the province of Quebec, which he usually defends?

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—DATE MINISTER OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES INFORMED PRIME MINISTER—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. It arises out of answers he has given to the Leader of the New Democratic Party and to my leader. It is evident from the refusal of the Minister of Supply and Services to answer any questions that it is very easy for the Prime Minister to move a minister out of a position when it gets hot, particularly when there is a question of a cover-up.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: In light of the fact that we have been denied any judicial inquiry, and in light of the statement made by the Prime Minister on June 2 last that no minister knew until several years after that the RCMP had been involved in the break-in, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a very definite, particular and concise question. If the Prime Minister does not remember the day, what year did he find out about this break-in, what year did the Minister of Supply and Services tell him about it and how many ministers knew about it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question was somewhat lengthy. I must indicate to the hon. member that the present Minister of Supply and Services has not refused to answer questions. Mr. Speaker has ruled that under our present rules he cannot answer.

An hon. Member: It is a new rule.

Mr. Trudeau: That is a rule of this House. If the hon. member does not agree with it, he can appeal that to Mr. Speaker. However, no question to the present Minister of Supply and Services has been allowed. He has not refused to answer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Eldon, can you get these guys to calm down while I answer your question?

Mr. Woolliams: What have you got to offer today? Please answer the question.

Mr. Trudeau: The second point was by way of an allegation by the hon. member for Calgary North that I moved the Minister of Supply and Services when the going got tough, or something like that. I remind hon. members that during the campaign of 1972, and in the weeks that preceded and followed the campaign, the opposition was complaining that the Minister of Supply and Services was not friendly enough to the RCMP, not that he was trying to protect them too much, which seems to be the position now.

Mr. Clark: Not at all.

Mr. Trudeau: I wish hon. members opposite would remember the attitude they had in those days. Now they are saying he was covering up for the police. In those days they were saying he was not protecting them enough.

Mr. Clark: We are saying he is blaming them for his actions.

Mr. Trudeau: As to the question of the hon. member—

Mr. Clark: Having answered none yet.

Mr. Trudeau: I was coming to that.

Mr. Clark: Fine, go ahead.

Mr. Hees: String it out, Pierre.

Mr. Clark: You've got 15 minutes to fill in.

Mr. Trudeau: If I have 15 minutes, Mr. Speaker, perhaps you could use some of them to get a little silence from the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fraser: It's the silence on your side we are worried about.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It is not our reputation that is on the line; it is yours.

Mr. Trudeau: All right, don't you listen to my answers?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Why don't you give some answers?

Mr. Trudeau: I am sure that at least the hon. member for Calgary North is interested in getting an answer. How many years after the event? That has been made clear before. It was only in the spring of 1976 that we knew that the RCMP was involved in an illegal break-in. Before that no minister nor myself knew about that.

Mr. Woolliams: In light of the fact that it did take sometime after the letter was received by the Minister of Supply and Services, then the Solicitor General—who says he did not get the letter because it was stopped in his office—I would have thought he would have taken some constitutional responsibility for his own staff. I believe the Prime Minister would agree with that. However, after taking several years—I do not know whether it was five or seven for the Prime Minister to find that out—what has the Prime Minister done since besides waiting for the process of law in Quebec, the government of Quebec and the attorney general of Quebec? What has the government done to clean up this mess? What is being hidden today in this conspiracy to cover up?

An hon. Member: Goyer.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in fairness I am sure the opposition would want to call to mind the circumstances of the situation. The present Solicitor General, the former one and solicitors general for many years have frequently received complaints about the RCMP. I am sure we all receive complaints from the public about people in our departments who have given either cause or reason for complaint. As I understand it, the then Solicitor General did what every minister would do. He made sure that every complaint was followed up. In this particular case his officials did as mine would do, and that is to make sure that those involved in some complaint are called to task. The hon. member asks what we have done about that.

Mr. Broadbent: They didn't tell the minister.

Mr. Trudeau: The present Solicitor General gave the answer to that on Friday. I believe it was in 1974 that we appointed the Marin Commission to make sure that the police who were complained about were not being investigated by the police themselves. That is why we set up the Marin Commission, to look into the whole problem of discipline. On Friday the minister indicated what steps had been taken and will be taken to meet this particular difficulty.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I have one supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. Woolliams: In light of the answers, surely, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Woolliams: Surely if the Prime Minister will not answer and leaves us in a vacuum we are entitled to follow up.

Some hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Woolliams: We have been refused a judicial inquiry. I think we are entitled to some answers.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Woolliams: I think you've cut me off at a time when I was asking—

An hon. Member: Eldon, come on.

Mr. Woolliams: I can get louder. You take your own seat. I ask that the hon. member take his seat.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask that the hon. member take his seat.

Mr. Woolliams: I say to you, that I was precluded from asking questions.

Mr. Hees: Eldon, sit down.

Mr. Woolliams: I am entitled to another question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member for Calgary North would resume his seat—

Mr. Woolliams: I have always been polite to every Speaker in this House.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member for Calgary North would resume his seat I would be pleased to tell him that any choice in granting supplementaries is only between him and one of his colleagues, and if he feels that he must have the floor against one of his colleagues, I am perfectly prepared to allow him another supplementary. The hon. member for Calgary North on a final supplementary.

Mr. Woolliams: Thank you very much.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: My question to the Prime Minister is this: In light of the fact that the police went to the former solicitor general's office on November 6, 1972 and gave him certain information at that time, and that the former solicitor general had information about the break-in from the newspaper in question, does the Prime Minister feel that the then solicitor general acted with the kind of responsibility the Prime Minister would expect of any minister in this House under those circumstances?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, I do, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Clark: Good Lord.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Trudeau: The former solicitor general was under severe attack in those days because it was alleged, particularly by Tory members, that he did not respect that great institution called the RCMP. He was the recipient of a complaint from a group, and hon. members can judge whether that group was a very reputable one. He was the recipient of a complaint about an illegal break-in. He did what most of us would do. He referred this to the police and asked them, "Is this a serious complaint?" He behaved as though he trusted the RCMP in asking whether he should answer this letter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: They told him—and it is on record in writing—that he should not answer the letter. Hon. members can decide who is to blame, the former solicitor general or the RCMP, and they can carry on their accusations if they so desire.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: It may well be you.

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—ACTION TAKEN BY MINISTER OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Supply and Services based in part on a statement he made on June 2 also bearing in mind a precedent set by his colleagues, especially the hon. member for Westmount and others during questioning in the House on the judges' affair when ministers were allowed to answer areas of questioning other than their own particular responsibility. My question to the minister based on his statement of June 2 is whether he is in a position to tell the House as a result of his meeting with Commissioner Higgitt and Mr. John Starnes what steps he took when advised of the serious allegations of RCMP involvement in an illegal break-in? What steps did he take when he was given that information following his meeting with Commissioner Higgitt and Mr. Starnes on or about October 9? Who did he did discuss it with and did he discuss it with any of his colleagues in cabinet?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The distinction that the question of the hon. member for St. John's East raises is with respect to questions that are put to ministers during an affair in which ministers, even in their present capacity, had taken some steps—in fact the questions were put to them about actions they had taken as ministers, not necessarily actions which related to their own administrative responsibility but steps which had been taken at the moment of the question in respect of their position as a minister.

Order, please. I think it would have been a totally unfair distinction for the Chair to have attempted to protect a minister with administrative responsibility while the minister was being questioned about steps he had in fact taken which were connected with his capacity as a minister, but not necessarily with his capacity in a particular ministry.

In the present situation the questions which have arisen are questions which are similar to questions which have arisen before but are not connected with actions taken at the moment by a minister, as minister, but connected with actions taken by a minister in a former capacity at a former time in that capacity. That is the distinction that I think must hold at all times; that no questions can be put today to a minister of this House about steps that he has taken in a former capacity. An order to do so surely would permit questions to be put, for example, to the hon. member for Eglinton who is no longer a member of cabinet. That is the distinction, and I think it must be maintained at all times.

The hon. member for St. John's East.

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—CONSULTATION WITH SOLICITOR GENERAL PRIOR TO STATEMENT ISSUED BY MINISTER OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to argue your ruling because the rules do not permit me to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Given the dilemma of the situation arising out of our rules perhaps you might permit me to direct a question to the Minister of Supply and Services based on a statement he made on June 2, issued on his letterhead as Minister of Supply and Services. The minister said:

I can give the assurance, however, that if I felt responsible for any wrongdoing whether by commission or omission I would not wait for his statement—

He was referring to the Solicitor General.

—and all in respect to parliament and to Canadians I would submit my resignation.

A commendable suggestion I may say, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Based on that statement of June 2, I should like to ask the Minister of Supply and Services if he can tell the House whether he consulted with his colleague the Solicitor General prior to making that statement? What was the nature of those discussions? Did they include the very serious allegations contained in the letter and the meeting arising from that letter with Commissioner Higgitt regarding the allegations of the involvement of the RCMP in an illegal break-in?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am prepared to hear argument from the hon. member at three o'clock and from other hon. members—I see there are several. At the moment the connection with the statement is not sufficient in my opinion to permit the question. I will hear argument at three o'clock.

A supplementary, the hon. member for Hamilton West.

[Mr. Speaker.]

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—DESIRE OF MINISTER OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES TO ANSWER QUESTIONS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I think we must get to the nitty-gritty of this matter. In light of the fact that there have been several allegations and innuendos thrown out this afternoon and on other days, and knowing that the Minister of Supply and Services would like to make a statement and would like to answer questions—

An hon. Member: Sure, he would.

Mr. Alexander: —in order to clear up this murkiness, I would ask him one simple question: is he prepared to answer questions directed to him about his actions when he was the solicitor general of Canada in the year in question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I might relieve the hon. member for Hamilton West of that difficulty because even if the minister said he was prepared to answer questions I would not let him.

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—SUGGESTION PRIME MINISTER ASK MINISTER OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES TO MAKE STATEMENT

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take another tack on this whole proposition and let the Prime Minister show what kind of leadership he is prepared to give. In light of the fact that in prior answers to questions he indicated categorically that the then solicitor general, the Minister of Supply and Services, had no knowledge but only had some reference to the police in the correspondence from L'Agence de Presse Libre, and since it now appears that there was a specific telegram attached to that communication and there is an admission in the statement by the Solicitor General to the effect that the matter was considered—in order to put this matter precisely on the record and since according to your ruling we are not able to ask questions at the present time will the Prime Minister, as the leader of this country and this government, direct the Minister of Supply and Services to make a statement on motions or suggest to him at least that he make a statement on privilege so that we may have an opportunity to hear him in this House with respect to this very important matter before any public inquiry is undertaken by the Prime Minister?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it would be up to the hon. member if he felt his privileges were impinged upon by members opposite to ask Your Honour for permission to raise a question of privilege. I guess it is obvious from what has happened this afternoon that the Minister of Supply and Services has not felt his privileges have been seriously impinged upon because hon. members opposite have not brought any accusations forward.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He has condemned himself.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A short supplementary question. I think there are many inconsistencies, one of which I pointed out with respect to the information the Prime Minister received from this minister which would indicate that either he was misinformed or was lied to. I would ask the Minister of Supply and Services whether he will undertake to make a statement on motions regarding his personal involvement with respect to an illegal act, regardless of ministerial responsibility, but simply whether he can clear his name with respect to the whole question of whether he was involved in any illegal act personally?

Mr. Alexander: We gave you a chance and you did not take it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Alexander: Send him out of the country again; give him a Ouellet holiday.

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—ALLEGATION OF CONSPIRACY TO COVER UP—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister about an aspect of the matter that does not seem to be fully explored. As I understand it, the Solicitor General has told us that on November 6 he was advised by the Commissioner and by Mr. Starnes not to answer a letter which he had received complaining about the alleged break-in. What I want to ask is whether this does not seem to smack of a conspiracy to defeat the administration of justice and what, if anything, is being done about that. I am not accusing the Solicitor General of being involved in it, although I would certainly like to know what part he played in it. I am suggesting, however, that at the very top of our national police force there are people who will conspire to suppress evidence or suppress following up matters as important to the administration of justice as this. What is this government going to do about it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is a very serious question and I am presently discussing that with the Solicitor General.

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, and on a little different line. In his speech on Friday the Solicitor General made this commitment or statement: at page 6793 of Hansard:

The government decided, therefore, not to establish a royal commission,—

That is, to go into this whole matter—

—but remained firmly committed to re-examining the matter once the judicial process had run its normal course.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister, at least on one interpretation, after these men had pleaded guilty and received a discharge, whether the judicial process had not in fact run its course? I wonder if the government's undertaking to re-examine the matter with a royal commission is not now operative. If it is not now operative, when will it become operative? Are we to wait indefinitely while various inquiries are made in Quebec? Is it not now time for the government to act on what it promised, on what the Solicitor General says it decided to do and committed itself to doing some time ago?

● (1500)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, that is a rephrasing of the previous question, which I conceded was an important point of view. The only additional aspect to the question is—when, as I indicated to the hon. member, I am discussing that with the present Solicitor General. I think the hon. member asked an important and serious question, and it is causing us great concern.

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—FAILURE OF MINISTER OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES TO TAKE RESPONSIBILITY FOR ACTIONS OF FORCE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As it has always been accepted practice, in every Canadian government, that ministers take full responsibility for the actions of those for whom they have ministerial responsibility, and as the Prime Minister confirmed in this House on May 24 last that that is the case with this government, will he explain to the House why the former solicitor general is being allowed, by him, to claim not to have any ministerial responsibility for the actions of the RCMP officer for whom the minister had ministerial responsibility and who was involved in the 1972 break-in, as the minister did in his press announcement of June 2?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the RCMP officer who committed the illegality has pleaded guilty in front of the courts. I do not think the hon. member is alleging that, unless the minister had knowledge and directed the member of the RCMP to commit that illegality, that he would be bound by any sense of ministerial responsibility. I have the minister's clear statement of the fact that neither he nor the Commissioner of the RCMP knew about the break-in before it took place. This is also confirmed by the Commissioner of the RCMP. Therefore, I do not understand how the hon. member can argue that a minister is responsible for an act which was committed without his knowledge.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister not aware that all ministers who have ever served in Canadian governments have always been willing to accept responsibility for the acts, whatever they were, of those concerned under their jurisdiction, and the former solicitor general is doing something which is completely different from what has been accepted practice? He is trying to duck responsibility, something which no honourable minister has ever done before.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, surely the relevant point is this: While the minister was the minister responsible, he did not know of the illegalities of those under his charge. When the illegalities of those under the charge of the solicitor general became known, they were acted upon by the former solicitor general and the present Solicitor General.

Mr. Hees: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the Prime Minister not aware that it has been the case in the large departments of the government, which have existed for many years and which employ many thousands, that if a departmental employee commits a misdemeanour about which the minister cannot be expected to know at the time of commission, the minister, if he has any guts and sense of responsibility, has always taken responsibility for the mistakes of his employees and not tried to duck them? Does he not know this and does he not agree that this principle should be followed in this case?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree that that would be the principle, because if it were the present member for Prince Edward-Hastings would have to take responsibility for acts which would now be discovered and which were committed in the period 1958-1962, when his party was in power.

Mr. Hees: Which I have always been willing to do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Can you name any one action I have ever tried to duck? Put up or shut up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order which really is separate and apart from issues involving this question period, but which involve ministerial responsibility and a minister choosing to remain silent in the face of questions. I preface my remarks by saying that, like the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), I cannot question the ruling of the Chair. But, Mr. Speaker, I believe the House is entitled to a clarification with respect to the ruling you made regarding the questions of the hon. member for St. John's East and the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). They are entitled to a clarification.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin) would shut his mouth for once, he would hear the argument.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, you made a judgment today which I am not questioning since that would be contrary to the rules. But I ask for clarification, Sir, with respect to those questions. You said, in effect, before the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) had the opportunity to answer, that the two members did not even have the right to put the question. That may be the traditional rule, Mr. Speaker, but in view of a precedent which you, yourself, set I think the House is entitled to a clarification and I rise for that reason.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

On March 14, 1975 the same kind of question arose, involving a series of matters. I shall now refer to page 4105 of Hansard for that day. In the course of your judgment handed down that day, Sir, you said this:

> However, I feel in addition that the Chair does not have the power ever to prevent a minister from answering a question which he wishes to answer.

Mr. Alexander: That is the point.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Your Honour went on to say this:

> It is one thing to suggest that, if a minister raises an objection on technical grounds to answering the question—

I remind you, the minister did not move a muscle when he was asked the question.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, but he looked nervous.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I continue:

> —the question must be examined to see whether the technical grounds are correct. However, if a question is put and the minister wishes to answer it—

I assume he has to give some indication, even to say "no." I continue:

> —I am sure it would be improper for the Chair to try to stop him from doing so.

Sir, with respect, today you intervened. I am not suggesting by any stretch of the imagination that you intervened in bad faith, but you intervened.

An hon. Member: Do not reflect.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, if a member cannot say these things in the House, it is a pretty sorry House. The questions which were to be put by the hon. member for St. John's East related specifically to a statement made with respect to L'Agence de Presse Libre matter, which occurred apparently in 1972; that statement was made on the letterhead of the Minister of Supply and Services on June 2, 1977, and that was the basis of the question. There was absolutely no indication from the minister that he would refuse to answer the question. I do not know what the proper procedure would be, Sir, but there was a clear ruling made by you, in this House, with respect to a matter absolutely on all fours with what happened in this case. The hon. members for St. John's East, Hamilton West, Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) were interested in raising this matter, and that is the position in which we find ourselves.

I happen to believe that you were absolutely right in your ruling of March 14, 1975 with respect to the privileges of this parliament concerning free questioning. You made that ruling on March 14, 1975. I cannot question your ruling of today, Sir, I understand that; but if I could I would have to say, with respect, I believe you are wrong today. I therefore rise to ask for the only thing I can ask. That is for some clarification with respect to the rights of members of this House, not just on this occasion, but on previous occasions and on occasions yet to come, when we must deal with ministers with respect to their former responsibilities, at least while they are still ministers of the Crown. That is the position of the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) today. He should at least be asked whether he is prepared to answer questions if they are put to him. If not that, he should be asked whether he is prepared to make statements on motions and have questions thereon. If he does not at least raise a question of privilege on what has been said about him today, he is not much of a man.

● (1510)

Mr. Paproski: And he should resign.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I was very careful on my supplementary question, anticipating what Your Honour's ruling might be, to base my supplementary question on a statement issued by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) on June 2, 1977, on his letterhead, in relation to the matter which is under discussion in the House at the present time.

I would like to submit in argument that, notwithstanding the citation in Beauchesne 171(X), which I know Your Honour will cite, I would draw Your Honour's attention to our own Standing Order 39(5) which states that oral questions may be directed to ministers of the Crown.

In reading the spirit if not the letter of the standing order, I would hold respectfully that a minister making a statement outside the House on his authority as a minister, in this case on his authority as Minister of Supply and Services, on his official letterhead, is under our rules accountable for that statement in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Your Honour shakes his head skeptically. I would submit that if the Minister of Supply and Services had not made that statement on June 2, I would be on very weak ground indeed. If Your Honour rules today that ministers who make official statements outside the House on their official letterhead are not to be held accountable to the House for those statements, that ruling will go a long way toward destroying what little accountability there is left in this House.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I will not be very long. As I listened to the House leader, I thought he brought home the point I tried to make in terms of questions I tried to ask the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer). I recall very distinctly Your Honour's ruling on March 14, 1975. I recall you stating that if a minister were asked a question about a former responsibility, he did not have to answer that question. However, if he were asked a question regarding his former responsibilities, and if he wanted to answer that question, Your Honour would not prevent him from doing so.

I prefaced my remarks extremely carefully because I know this has been a very heated afternoon. There have been many innuendos and aspersions cast. Following Your Honour's ruling, I put the question to the minister. I thought he would say either yes or no. I was not going to get into anything substantive, just give him the privilege or the right to have something to say, whether it be yes or no.

What disturbs me is when I asked the minister that question, I did not know whether he was going to answer or not. I did not know whether the minister was going to say yes, he would be prepared to answer questions with respect to his former responsibility as Solicitor General of Canada. When Your Honour stood up, there was great laughter from my friends on the other side, as usual when we are hitting home. We got the usual red herring.

With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, you must not only clear the right of hon. members to ask a similar question of ministers when they no longer hold portfolios for which they were responsible, but as well the question raised by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), another very delicate one. That question was based on the fact that the Minister of Supply and Services wanted to become involved as a former solicitor general, using his own letterhead in order to bring about this particular scenario.

With all due respect—and Your Honour knows how well we get along together, I always try my best to abide by the rules of the House—these two questions as well as the question by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) must be addressed by Your Honour. I hope that you do not intend to answer those questions this afternoon because what you decide will determine whether in fact this place can function as it should.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, in rising on this point of order I preface my comments by stating that I agree in substance with what has been said by the member who just resumed his seat. If we cannot get a clarification of this issue involving the integrity of a minister of the Crown with regard to very clear, explicit charges made both inside the House and out about conspiracy by leading officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, then parliamentary democracy in Canada is in a very bad state. I say that in all seriousness.

I appeal through you, Mr. Speaker, to the government House leader and Acting Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is absent, that in the event Your Honour's ruling should be negative that we hear the House leader's view on that before Your Honour makes the ruling. I appeal to the Acting Prime Minister to confer with the Prime Minister, who just left the chamber, to recognize the seriousness of the situation.

We have no opportunity of questioning the former solicitor general, the present Minister of Supply and Services, on a matter that involves conspiratorial accusations against the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and against the minister himself. The evidence does not warrant charges at this point of conspiracy of the minister. The evidence is unclear on that.

A lot of us are reluctant to impugn directly the integrity of the minister by saying there has been a conspiracy. That would be one way to get him to his feet, denouncing him and saying openly that he conspired. He would then have to justify it.

However, I, and I suspect other members of the House, do not make such charges lightly.

We rely on the evidence. We are serious about the evidence. However, we want the truth of the matter. That is why it is so profoundly important that this minister in some way have an opportunity to clarify the record. His integrity and that of the government is on the line. The whole question of conspiracy in the RCMP is on the line.

It is a shocking act of irresponsibility for the Prime Minister not to have indicated that he wants this minister to answer in the House today. I appeal to the Acting Prime Minister not to sit out this procedural debate in a cynical fashion leaving the impression that the government is going to sit behind the rules of the House and hide the truth. I appeal directly to the Acting Prime Minister through you, Mr. Speaker, that if they are not going to rely on the rules whereby the minister is not obligated to answer, to do something about insisting that the Minister of Supply and Services get to his feet, either later today or tomorrow, to make a statement on this important matter.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to the same point of order. What happened during the question period will surely not be the best in our parliamentary records.

As a preliminary comment, the Prime Minister in reply to one of my questions asked me a question and accused me of upholding provincial rights. Mr. Speaker, I think that the Prime Minister, the champion of the constitutional statu quo and excessive centralization in Ottawa, did not accuse me but he paid me one of the nicest compliments which a Prime Minister can pay to a member of the opposition, that is of upholding provincial rights in this parliament since the provinces hold and must hold effective powers in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I put a question to the former solicitor general but you ruled that I could not direct it to him since he has changed his portfolio to become the Minister of Supply and Services. Mr. Speaker, there are precedents in this House where a minister has been called upon to answer questions about his activities in a former portfolio, thus enabling us to clarify a given situation. If the Minister of Supply and Services is so pure, so perfect, if he did not make any mistakes, if he is not involved in any conspiracy, why then does he refuse to take part in an inquiry and, second, why does he refuse to answer questions put to him in the House? I say that moving ministers from one portfolio to another enables the government to keep its secrets and hide the truth on such important matters. At the very moment we are making a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the minister is leaving the House. He does not care one bit about Parliament, he also refuses to answer questions put to him in the House by members of parliament, he is hiding behind the rules of the House.

Mr. Speaker, the ruling you will have to give is a very serious one. The minister involved is still a cabinet member. This minister is taking part in cabinet discussions, he is aware of what cabinet does to try and get out of this dilemma. Doubtless, the press release of the present Solicitor General was discussed, wholly or partly, in cabinet before being read here.

Mr. Speaker, the minister hides behind the Standing Orders of the House, knowing that light cannot be cast on the matter.

As you can realize, with all due respect, Mr. Speaker, we are unanimous on this side of the House in wanting to know the truth of the matter on behalf of the Canadian people and we beg of the Prime Minister the cabinet and that minister, if he is truly responsible, to reconsider this decision and to grant that inquiry, and specially, Mr. Speaker, we ask you, unanimously, that the minister rise in the House and answer our questions. Otherwise, Mr. Speaker, not only ministerial solidarity but the tradition whereby a minister, when he changes position, is no longer responsible, will prove to what extent the system is vicious, to what extent it protects the ministers regardless of the democratic rights of hon. members of this House.

Mr. Speaker, the House is being treated in cavalier fashion. It seems to me that if I were concerned, if points of order were brought up, if a whole question period dealt with such requests and the House were unanimous, I would at least have had the decency to stay in my seat and find out what hon. members of the opposition have to say. It shows a total lack of respect, Mr. Speaker, and I join the hon. members of the NDP and those of the Conservative party to prove to you how serious we think the matter is and ask the minister to act responsibly if he really is responsible.

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Just a word or two on the point of order which has been raised, Mr. Speaker. I think it is clear that the ruling Your Honour made consistently, that a minister of the Crown cannot be questioned on his activities in a former portfolio when the minister currently responsible for the portfolio is here in the House to answer questions, is a sound one. I believe this is an old rule, an old practice. It may be a bad one, but I happen to believe it is a good rule.

Its application today has created some difficulty and some frustration for hon. members opposite but I do not think it is fair, because of that, to ask the Speaker to make an entirely new ruling and change the practice of the House; in other words, to press him, as he has been pressed very strongly today, to alter our practice by some obiter dictum.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Obiter?

Mr. MacEachen: It has been said that this is a political matter which should be dealt with by the Speaker. I believe such a course would be a mistake. The rules of the House should be observed and we should support the Speaker by consistently applying the rules.

Mr. Gillies: He ruled on this in March, 1975.

Mr. MacEachen: I listened to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton as carefully as I could, but I believe the application of the ruling for this particular case will depend on the circumstances which prevail at the time it is made. It should also be borne in mind, as the Speaker has pointed out, that the Chair cannot prohibit any minister from answering if the procedure of the House is followed correctly, that is, if the questions are in order, neither can it oblige any minister to answer questions even if they are in order.

Having said this, I wish to express my appreciation to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) for outlining the difficulty the House faces in securing, during the question period, a statement from the Minister of Supply and Services, one which would be of great interest, I am sure, to hon. members. Bear in mind, though, that on Friday the Solicitor General made an extremely long statement on this subject and was subsequently questioned in detail with regard to all the facts which are known to the government.

Mr. Fraser: That was all hearsay, for heaven's sake!

Mr. MacEachen: All that remains—

An hon. Member: —is the truth!

Mr. MacEachen: The truth has been spoken by the Solicitor General and by the Prime Minister. However, I understand what seems to be the complaint. I do not think the way to proceed is through a perversion of the question period. It should be done in another way because hon. members are quite aware that with respect to this incident the universe will unfold in the next few days as it should.

Mr. Hees: Tell us what the other way is.

Mr. MacEachen: I will leave it to your imagination.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The government House leader made a somewhat peculiar reference to the rules of the House. The application of those rules is a matter of precedent and is not determined by our Standing Orders alone. The flim-flam we heard from the government House leader with respect to this course being highly improper is incredible, when we consider that the government has turned around, on at least two occasions, this rule which indicates that only the present minister can be responsible for answering questions.

● (1530)

There were two very noteable occasions in my experience. One was when the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) was involved in blaming someone else for the actions of his department in connection with the Hamilton Harbour matter. The government found it quite appropriate then to have the minister come to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, flanked by the then solicitor general, the now Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and the commissioner of the RCMP, and they stonewalled for about four hours. The second occasion—

Mr. MacEachen: That was a standing committee and the same rules do not prevail, as you know perfectly well.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The committee is an extension of this House, governed by the rules and precedents in the same way as the House is. The second occasion was more recent. The present Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) found it convenient to come forward and answer questions with respect to the whole question of Polysar and activities which took place when he was the minister of energy, mines and resources. The uranium transaction, the Candu transaction, is another example.

The point I should like to underline, which has been raised by my colleague, is with respect to the so-called judges affair when questions are allowed to be put to ministers because the concern was not related to ministerial responsibility. It concerned the broader question of illegality or impropriety. Those are the terms that were used. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) suggested that there was some question of conspiracy. There are allegations and suggestions, which have been raised here that the minister was in fact involved in a possible cover-up of an illegal act.

Mr. MacFarlane: Who raised those?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: These implications were raised in the House of Commons by a member of parliament. We have the right to do that, and we will not be told what to say by the government whip. He is one person who will not tell us what to do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacFarlane: We do not have to accept what you say. No one else is.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The fact of the matter is that these are instances where specific departmental responsibility was not at stake, but the question of parliamentary responsibility and the responsibility of a member of the administration with respect to his action or lack of action was at stake. On the basis of those precedents, envoked by the government when they felt it was appropriate and opposed by the government when they felt it was not appropriate, and in looking at the nature of the questions raised by my colleagues, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), which were carefully worded with respect to matters of ministerial responsibility in the broadest sense, I suggest that Your Honour should allow the minister to answer the questions.

Mr. MacFarlane: Good spelling does not make good composition.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: As Your Honour knows, if the minister refuses to answer, there is no obligation under our rules for the minister to answer. If he refuses to answer, and you allow those questions, the minister will stand indicted by his silence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacFarlane: That is a lot of supposition.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, very briefly, I would like to indicate my support for the observations made by my leader (Mr. Fortin) on the same point of order in the House for very special reasons which concern our democracy. Mr. Speaker, if we believe in this democracy, I think that we shall have to communicate to the whole population of Canada this belief of the parliamentarians, and parliamentarians are certainly entitled to know precisely what were the responsibilities of a minister when he was responsible for the management or the administration of a given department, even if his successor cannot reply to the questions of the parliamentarians or the members of the opposition, according to decisions made at that time by his predecessor.

Mr. Speaker, I think that it is essential for us to know all the details surrounding this search, which has been recognized by its authors as being illegal. Even though this search was illegal and members of parliament know the exact nature of the break-in, this should not humiliate the minister in my opinion, but should make him more responsible and more willing to justify himself in the eyes of the public. But this is what the people want, through their representatives. Today, during whole question period, this very important issue was discussed while there are other questions that are also important and which interest the whole Canadian population. But even though I recognize that your role of Speaker is not always easy, you have to make a ruling and to decide if our rules allow such or such a minister to reply to questions asked by members of parliament during the question period even though he has not held the position involved for two, three, four or five years, as he is still a member of the same cabinet.

In my opinion, if we have to change our rules, we should do so, but we should give the opportunity to someone who is still a minister responsible in the cabinet to reply in this House to the questions asked by members of the opposition during the question period. I am convinced that if we follow this procedure, we shall give the public a better opinion of this institution in which we work.

What I consider above all else is that Parliament is the supreme authority in Canada, and if such supreme authority which we represent cannot obtain information on the activities of the executive power which is called the cabinet, I think it is a breach of democracy, and I fully support the remarks that the leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada has made in the House, absolutely not out of partisanship, something for which I could not care less. What I want to find out is whether, as parliamentarians, we will be able to secure information from the executive members who are in charge of the administration of our country, in whatever department.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The point of order has been raised to which reference was made during the question period.

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

Of course, it was anticipated that this line of questioning would be put forward today and hon. members would endeavour to put questions to the hon. Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) in his former capacity as solicitor general.

There is nothing surprising to me in the presentation of those questions under the circumstances. There is nothing surprising to me in the atmosphere, the very charged atmosphere in the question period, or at the strength of the urgings that were put upon me to change what are well-established practices of the House. Under the circumstances, I do not think any of that is surprising. If we do not have these kinds of discussions in these circumstances in the chamber, then obviously members are not doing their jobs. Therefore, I fully expected all that took place today. That does not make my decision any easier. However, if there are no moments of difficult decisions, then this is not half the job people generally regard it to be. Therefore, I have to be expected to take difficult decisions from time to time. Whether I like the consequences of the decisions or not is really entirely aside. We have to try to maintain some consistency in our practices.

It has been indicated that on a previous occasion a question in these circumstances was permitted by the Speaker. The question was asked by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) and was directed to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro). The minister was asked, having been the minister responsible for health at the time this report was initially produced and tabled, if he could explain why the House study was not initiated at that time. The question was answered by the minister when he said that he could not recall at the moment but would check into it with his colleague. That was the question and answer referred to in the precedent cited by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. In a subsequent ruling on that I indicated that I do not have the power to prevent a minister from getting to his feet to answer a question. I never have that power; nobody has. Physically I have no power to stop a minister from getting to his feet to say something.

There are many, many circumstances which I was describing in the decision which I gave at that time. There are many discretionary rulings which the Chair has to make during the question period. It has happened to be my practice that I have not endeavoured to burden the House with the reasons for these decisions, which are made very quickly and often several times during the question period. Most members know when they have put a question which is largely argumentative, irrelevant, frivolous or which has some other disability. Members may not be as sensitive to that as the Chair, but we all basically know the difficulty when it occurs. If I were to get on my feet every time I ruled a question out of order and simply went on to another member to attempt to justify my reason, I think I could spend most of the question period doing that.

Hon. members know that I have those discretionary rulings to make. On the other hand, it is clear to me, and I think clear to hon. members at all times that the most flagrantly argumentative, irrelevant or frivolous question, disrespectful perhaps, in unparliamentary language can be put by a member, and to leave the situation there, ruling the question out of order and preventing a minister from getting to his feet to at least get off a rejoinder is a little unfair. Often it is impossible to prevent a minister who is quick on the trigger from at least making a rejoinder. The Chair does not have the authority to stop someone engaged in that kind of process. By getting up to rule the question out of order or by going to another member, which I often do, I still cannot physically prevent a minister from getting out of his chair to make some kind of an answer. So whether or not the question is out of order, the Chair, so far as I know, does not have authority to stop a minister from speaking.

In some circumstances, while what I think is an innocuous question to a minister may touch upon the minister's former capacity, if it happens to clarify the situation in the House, the goodwill, good judgment and good sense of the member usually will go along with the situation and indicate that it is not an attempt to subvert the rules and procedures of the House but simply to gain information which might make for a more meaningful question period. In those circumstances it seems to me that any Speaker who did not have discretion to allow that sort of thing to happen would be inviting a very technical House indeed, one which I think would be unhappy and unproductive.

In the situation in which we find ourselves, we fall back upon situations which we have been in many times in the past. The clearest situation here is that the present Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), in his former capacity as solicitor general, did or did not do things which are of vital interest to the House. That is very clear. The House would be delighted to be able to question the minister. If the House could question the present Minister of Supply and Services on what he did or did not do four or five years ago, it could equally question the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray); it could equally question the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp). The counter proposal to that is no, that is not the way it should be; it should only be so if the member is still in the cabinet. That is a distinction which has not been known to me up to this point and I have never previously been invited to make that distinction.

The judges situation has been raised in argument. At that time I was in the situation of attempting to decide how to apply this rule. There one or two ministers of the Crown had taken a step which was the subject of interest to the House. The fact that they had taken that step was directly connected to their capacity as ministers of the Crown. There could be no question in my mind about that. Were they not ministers of the Crown, the step they had taken would not have had the importance that it did.

For the Chair then to attempt to say that simply because the step itself was not connected with the direct administrative responsibility of the cabinet would, I think, have been to apply this rule in a technical fashion which would have tied the hands of opposition members in an unfair way. I therefore concluded that questions to the ministers who had allegedly done those things were permissible. There was no obligation on the ministers to answer, but the questions ought to be put.

That situation, it seems to me, is a long way from covering the one at the present time, which is similar to ones which have arisen many times in the past, namely: Can members ask a question of a minister in that minister's former capacity? The clear answer given time and time again, without any doubt about our practices and precedents, has been no. It is tied very directly to the theory of ministerial responsibility, that the present incumbent of a ministerial office has responsibility which goes back for all time. It does not stop at the time that that incumbent took office. Therefore there cannot be two people responsible to the House in the parliamentary sense for that continuing responsibility.

If one minister who now occupies that position is responsible through all time for answering questions in this House, that responsibility cannot be shared by another minister who is a former occupant. If it is the wish of the House to change its practices to say that the House ought to be able to ask questions of a previous incumbent, then the House must also be prepared to accept the argument that the responsibility of the present incumbent of that office stops retroactively back at the time that he took office.

I am sure that this House would never be prepared to make that trade-off. If the House does want to do so, then I think the proper route would be for the procedure committee or some other body, a debate in the House or some reduction of the House, to tell me or any other incumbent of this office that the procedures of the House have been changed. Unless and until that happens, that is the clearest, most concise and effective rule which in these circumstances is not capable of any misinterpretation of misunderstanding, namely that no such questions can be put in the question period.

Can the minister be brought to account elsewhere, or can other steps be taken, are questions which are irrelevant to this particular procedural debate. Our practice and precedents make it clear that the limit of questions to be put to a minister in the question period in this House must go to the minister's present ministerial responsibility, and clearly not a previous ministerial responsibility. That is exactly the case in point. Therefore I have no choice in the circumstances except to disallow questions to the present Minister of Supply and Services which relate to his capacity as a former minister at a previous time.

QUALIFICATION OF IMMIGRANTS FOR COVERAGE UNDER MEDICARE AND HOSPITAL INSURANCE

Question No. 2,534—Mr. Caccia:

Is there a waiting period in each province for a landed immigrant before he/she qualifies for coverage under medicare and hospital insurance and, if so, what is the period in each case?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): All provinces, except British Columbia, provide first day coverage to immigrants who are bona fide residents. In British Columbia, new residents can obtain coverage from the first day of the third month from the date of assuming residence in the province. A commercial plan offers temporary coverage for landed immigrants residing in British Columbia until they become eligible for coverage under the British Columbia public plans. In the case of most plans, eligibility for coverage is contingent upon registration, and payment of any required premium, within the appropriate grace period.

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: The total cost to Metric Commission Canada of producing literature on the metric system in the fiscal years 1971-1972 to 1975-1976 inclusive was $671,063.

RCMP TUNICS WHILE ON DUTY IN FRONT OF PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

Question No. 2,552—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is June 30 the customary date for members of the RCMP to commence wearing their red tunics while on duty in front of the Parliament Buildings and, if not, what is the date?

2. Is the government aware of complaints by visitors, including tourists to Parliament Hill, prior to the date such tunics are worn and, if so, will the government give consideration to setting an earlier date for what has become a symbol of Canada to many foreign visitors and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): 1. No; this year, 1977, RCMP members in red tunics will be positioned on Parliament Hill from June 15th to September 15th.

2. No; see answer to Part one; not applicable.

PRODUCTION OF FEED GRAINS

Question No. 2,644—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

MOTION TO ADJOURN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

ALLEGED COVER-UP OF BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the appropriateness and the desirability of the motion I am about to move has been made abundantly clear this afternoon. I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the clear possibility of a conspiracy concerning the concealment of evidence or the failure to take appropriate action pertaining to the illegal break-in by three police officers at L'Agence de Presse Libre on the night of October 6-7, 1972.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In accordance with Standing Order 26, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) gave the Chair notice this morning of his intention to seek at this time leave of the House to move the adjournment of the House pursuant to Standing Order 26 for the purpose of considering the matter described by him. I have just indicated that in making rulings during the question period it is not for the Chair to decide on the desirability of a line of questioning or the desirability of the practices that the House follows and that the Chair endeavours to enforce. It is for the Chair to decide whether or not the procedures of the House are being applied and obeyed in certain circumstances. That is the judgment that the Chair always has to make without attempting to evaluate the probity or desirability of certain procedures.

What I have to decide in this instance, which is related to the same subject but in a different way, is, having regard to the subject matter and the circumstances, whether this is a subject which is appropriate to be discussed pursuant to Standing Order 26. Standing Order 26 is a very important part of our Standing Orders and if the Chair were to take the attitude, as has happened frequently in the past, particularly on matters of unemployment when I have had occasion to rule that the questions raised on unemployment are a matter of continuing concern and not a proper subject for debate under Standing Order 26, it would be regrettable.

I must confess to some misgivings and some unhappiness in most of the rulings I have to make under Standing Order 26 because there is an impression that the Chair can be found to be so technical and so difficult in the application of the language of Standing Order 26 that no one can succeed in persuading the House that the Standing Order should be used for debate. That is a regrettable posture because, as we have all heard, many people express concern about the relevancy of discussions in the House, and if there is one thing that can be said about motions pursuant to this Standing Order, it is always that they are on a relevant matter, always on a matter which has the attention of the country at the time, and therefore a matter that can quite appropriately be discussed in general terms.

That does not alter the fact that frequently in the past—and, I suppose, frequently in the future—I have had to and will have to turn down motions because their continuing nature does not fall under the kind of precise and critical aspect of the language of Standing Order 26. The Standing Order clearly defines, not something which will be discussed under a bill, in a throne speech debate or a budget debate and not something which is the subject matter of day to day questioning, a matter of general policy or a matter of concern to the country, but a precise problem which the House will not have an opportunity to discuss at another time or in another way and which, within the language of the Standing Order, is a matter of specific importance requiring urgent consideration.

The question that has been raised here is the result of a statement on Friday by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox). The hon. member's statement in support of his argument for the invocation of this order contains certain allegations and propositions. I think it is not for the Chair to evaluate them but to accept them as part of an argument in favour of the Standing Order. It is not for the Chair to decide what practices may or may not be followed. I am confronted with the Standing Order and the subject matter, and upon reading the Standing Order if I find that this subject matter does not qualify for debate pursuant to the Standing Order, we may as well take the Standing Order off the books. I therefore accept the hon. member's application and order that within the framework of the Standing Order we should provide for a debate on the subject matter raised by the hon. member.

However, I must point out that we are facing some extraordinary difficulties. During this month of June the House is sitting extra hours. It is also at present in the midst of a debate which, as provided by statute, must run for a certain maximum number of days without interruption. Ordinarily the Chair is in a position of setting eight o'clock for the hour at which this debate would commence. I cannot do that without offending the statute which provides that the debate must run without interruption. There is some comment, which is perhaps in the nature of speculation, that the debate on the anti-inflation program may be concluded before it runs its full course. I have no way of knowing that. In the circumstances, I wonder if hon. members would permit me to hold over my decision on the timing of the debate until tomorrow. My thinking of course would be that if the current statutory debate concludes today, tomorrow would be an ordinary day for government business, I presume, and I could then set eight o'clock tomorrow night for this debate. If that is not the case, then I am faced with a different set of circumstances and I would have to attempt to reconcile the statutory order under which we are now debating the anti-inflation program and this motion under Standing Order 26. That may be obviated by events which will take place later today, and if not, I could deal with it when the House assembles for routine proceedings tomorrow.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

PETITION TO END CONTROLS ON JUNE 30, 1977

The House resumed from Friday, June 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Stevens:

That the Anti-Inflation Act being chapter 75, Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76, as amended by chapter 98, Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76, shall expire on the 30th June, 1977.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Last Friday I was some 16 minutes into my remarks on the motion before the House, and I was talking about two aspects of the motion moved by the Conservative Party, namely, the inequity of the AIB program pertaining to salaries of ordinary working people as compared with salaries of executives, and also the inequity of the program when you compare the wages of ordinary working people and the profits of large corporations.

I have before me a list of 51 corporate executives who received salary increases last year of more than $2,400 a year when ordinary working people where told to limit their salary increases to $2,400, and in many cases much less than that. In many cases they were given contracts increasing their salaries up to $2,400, but then those increases were rolled back by the AIB. I put on the record of the House some examples of those huge salary increases and I was speaking about Kaiser Resources Limited and about the vice-president of that company named Howard Cadinha who had a salary increase last year of some $10,415. I was about to go on to Edgar Kaiser, the junior president of Kaiser Resources Limited. He is the one who would really make the hair on the head of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) turn grey. That guy had a salary in 1975 amounting to $206,637 and in 1976, despite the AIB regulations his salary was increased by $60,363, an increase roughly equal to the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) salary. Yet AIB did nothing about it. So now Mr. Edgar Kaiser, junior president, has a salary of $267,000, with a salary increase of some 22.9 per cent.

Now I move on to Massey-Ferguson Limited, a well known company in the prairies. The president of that company, Albert Thornbrough had a salary in 1975 of some $353,833. Last year he had a salary increase of $20,000 a year, to bring his salary up to $373,833. I am sure the hair on the head of the hon. member for Nickel Belt will start to fall off. Also, as the hon. member mentioned, this fellow has not paid anywhere near the tax he should be paying.

J. E. Mitchell, executive vice-president of Massey-Ferguson, received a salary increase of $15,000 last year, raising his to over $230,000. That increase was untouched by the AIB. The senior vice-president of the company, a fellow named J. G. Staiger, received a salary increase of $6,000. He is the pauper of the trio: he makes only $192,836. I now move to Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company, of Calgary. The president of that company is D. C. Jones. His salary increase last year was $12,850, bringing his salary up to $140,750. Then we have Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company, of Toronto. The chairman of that company is H. R. Fraser. His salary increase was $11,900 last year. Smiley Raborn, president of CanDel Oil Limited of Calgary, received a salary increase of $13,250 last year.

Mr. Rodriguez: He is smiling from ear to ear.

Mr. Nystrom: Last year, Mr. Raborn's salary was $155,450.

Mr. Rodriguez: Is Inco listed on there?

Mr. Nystrom: Inco is not on this list, but the list may be incomplete. It is very difficult to get figures like these from the Canadian government. I must say that I am really embarrassed. I obtained the list from which I am reading from the security and exchange commission in Washington. This is not even a Canadian list. The document came from our good friends in the United States. The executive vice-president and treasurer of the CanDel Oil Company in Calgary, Michael A. Williams, received a salary increase or $7,950 last year. Douglas H. Church, senior vice-president and manager of operations, received a salary increase of $6,300.

Now I will move to the twenty-fourth of the 26 companies I am listing. That company is Canadian Homestead Oil Limited, of Calgary. The president of that company is B. W. Watson. His salary increase last year was $22,917, an increase of 71.4 per cent. His original salary was $32,083. Now it is up to $55,000. The deputy chairman of Genstar Limited, of Montreal, Charles deBar, received a salary increase of $8,100 last year, and if we add what is called incentives, his increase was $26,183—an increase of 32.1 per cent.

Angus MacNaughton, vice-chairman and chief executive of Genstar, received an increase, including incentives, of $29,168 an increase of 34.5 per cent. Ross Turner, president and executive officer of Genstar, received a salary increase, including incentives, of $40,594. That is a higher amount that the whole salary of hon. members of this House, including their expenses. That increase was 68.1 per cent. Mr. Turner's salary, including incentives, increased from $59,590 to $100,-184. That was during the year of the AIB. Finally, James Nielson, president and chief executive officer of Husky Oil, of Calgary, received an increase of $10,504, or 9.9 per cent.

As I have said a couple of times already, the source of these statistics is company records received from the security and exchange commission in Washington, D. C. I submit that the list is terribly incomplete. I suppose we could add dozens and dozens of other company executives who received salary increases of well over $2,400. It is a real shame when the government limits the salary increase of ordinary Canadians to $2,400 per year when the largest increase to date is $60,000 for a business executive of a private company. How can ordinary Canadians be expected to trust the government or to support this program when they see this kind of abuse being sanctioned by the government? There is no way ordinary Canadians can support this type of program or see it as fair and just. There is not one Liberal opposite who would go back to his or her constituency and defend this type of inequity.

I would like, now, to move to the second aspect which I think is unfair about the program. Some companies have been treated differently from trade unions and people who work for a living in this country. Many companies have had huge profit increases. They have been able to do that because of various loopholes in the AIB legislation. I will refer to as many companies as I can in the next five or ten minutes I have at my disposal. First, I will deal with development land companies. Genstar had a profit increase last year of 43.5 per cent. Daon Development had a profit increase of 16.1 per cent.

Mr. Breau: Give the absolute figures.

Mr. Francis: Give the losses sometimes, too.

Mr. Nystrom: I will give some absolute figures. There is not time to give them all, but I will go back to Genstar. In 1975 Genstar's net income was $7.266 million. In 1976, its net income was $10.429 million—an increase of some 43.5 per cent.

Mr. Rodriguez: Workers can't get increases like that.

Mr. Nystrom: That is a huge profit increase.

Mr. Francis: Anybody can play with statistics.

Mr. Nystrom: Carma Developers had a profit increase of 43.5 per cent last year. In the three months ending March 31, its profit increase was 92.6 per cent. It is very interesting that when I start talking about huge profit increases and start getting critical about them, all of a sudden the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) and other hon. members start defending their corporate friends. However, when workers are attacked day in and day out, we do not hear any Liberals defending them.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I made no specific references to friends; I merely made reference to the very biased selection of statistics the hon. member is quoting. He is quoting only the companies with profits, and he is distorting the base years on which he is making percentage comparisons.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, in a way, the hon. member is right. I am quoting only certain statistics. I am quoting statistics regarding corporations which had huge profit increases last year. I am doing that because I believe all companies and all individuals should be treated the same under the anti-inflation program. Companies should not have been allowed to make huge profit increases last year when the anti-inflation program was in effect. If we are going to control the salaries of workers and ordinary people in this country, we should control the incomes of corporations and the prices these corporations charge the ordinary consumer in Canada. Abacus Cities net income in 1975 was $1.520 million. That went up to $4.792 million one year later. That was a profit increase of 215.3 per cent. Melcor Development had a profit increase of 23.4 per cent in 1976. Marathon Realty—and I know some of my Liberal friends are interested in Marathon Realty—

Mr. Rodriguez: Concerned.

Mr. Nystrom: —had a profit increase of 36.2 per cent in 1976, over 1975. Nu-West Developers showed a profit increase of 21.8 per cent at the end of last year. Sifton Properties—again, a very well known development corporation—showed a profit increase of 54.1 per cent at the end of last year. These companies are land developers. We should turn our attention to the activities of land developers as well as to the profits they are making.

I move now to trust companies. Montreal Trust had a profit increase of 16.7 per cent in 1976. In the three months ending March 31, the increase was 39.1 per cent. Victoria and Grey Trust Company had a profit increase of 18.4 per cent. Commerce Capital Trust had a profit increase of 31.5 per cent. Fidelity Mortgage and Savings had a profit increase of 46 per cent. Crown Trust had a profit increase of 23.6 per cent. Heritage Savings and Trust had a profit increase of 76.9 per cent. City Savings and Trust had a profit increase of 62.7 per cent. Canada Trustco Mortgage had a profit increase of 25.5 per cent. Central and Eastern Trust had a profit increase of 9.4 per cent.

I now move on to utilities. Calgary Power had a profit increase of 44.4 per cent; Newfoundland Telephone, 31.6 per cent; Island Telephone, 16 per cent; Quebec Telephone, 6.1 per cent; Alberta Gas Trunk Line, 51.3 per cent; Trans-Canada Pipelines, 26.5 per cent; Consolidated Pipelines, 20.1 per cent. Now some of my favourites, the food and beverage industry. In the 12 weeks to March 20, B.C. Packers had a profit increase of 45.1 per cent; Corporate Foods, 13.8 per cent; Borden Foods, 21.5 per cent; Jannock Industries, 48.1 per cent; Ogilvie Mills, 36.9 per cent; Labatt, 17.7 per cent; Seagram, 20.5 per cent—for the first nine months of the year; Royal Oak Dairies, 32.1 per cent; Maple Leaf Mill, 7.1 per cent. Next come the media, broadcasting and cable TV companies. Bushnell Communications, 70.3 per cent; CFCN, 56.2 per cent; Maclean Hunter Cable TV, 37.9 per cent; Maclean Hunter, 21.2 per cent; Baton Broadcasting, 26.4 per cent; Moffatt Communications—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to take part in this debate. I think it entirely appropriate that I begin by expressing my very great appreciation and that of my colleagues for the outstanding work that has been done both in introducing this motion, arguing the motion and fighting the government on it, by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The primary purpose of this debate was to give the government an opportunity to begin moving out of the controls program. Tonight we will see how successful we have been or whether, instead of accepting that opportunity, the government will continue to vote the party line and keep Canadians in controls and suspense. The other purpose was to give the government an opportunity to say, if they are not to end controls, precisely what they intend to do about the economic policy of this country and the termination of the controls program.

Unfortunately, in all speeches by members from the other side, the government has refused to take that opportunity, so Canadians remain in the dark about the government's plans for the termination of controls. That causes particular difficulty to the thousands of millions of Canadians who have to make plans, who have to know with certainty what the government is going to do, and what the shape of policy is going to be. Canadians have received no direction, no leadership at all from this government.

Mr. Roy (Laval): What about the results? You know the results.

An hon. Member: They could not be worse.

Mr. Clark: I am not sure if the hon. member is talking about the results of the economy, about the one million Canadians out of work, or if he is talking about the result of the trip to Africa by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer).

An hon. Member: This is going to put him out of work.

Mr. Roy (Laval): The last Gallup poll is the result.

[Translation]

Mr. Clark: Maybe he is referring to the recent by-elections in Quebec, where the Progressive Conservative party had a larger increase in popular vote than any other party.

[English]

On July 1 this country is going to celebrate its one-hundred and tenth birthday with a program on which the government intends to spend millions of dollars on public relations in the cause of national unity. What they could have done, instead, by accepting this motion, would have been to give some substance to national unity on that day by showing the kind of leadership that the national government should show. I do not begrudge the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) demonstrating his renewed interest in the Crown. I am not surprised that the newest member of cabinet, the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Horner), should rush to make use of government aircraft so that he can be as far away as possible from this House when we vote on the metric bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I can quite understand the Minister of Supply and Services spending so much of his time in Africa. I think if he is going to stay in the cabinet it would be very much in the national interest to keep him as far away as possible for as long as anyone will take him.

Miss MacDonald: Pity the people of Africa.

Mr. Clark: Those are the privileges of office. Sometimes they are properly used but often so abused by this government. But, sir, there is more to office than privilege. There is also responsibility—responsibility to lead; responsibility to do what is right, even if the kind of public opinion polls cited by the minister the other day indicate that what is right might be temporarily unpopular. Nowhere is that kind of leadership more needed now and more absent than on the question of controls and the future direction of the economy of Canada.

This government has already been irresponsible enough on controls. When my predecessor, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), had the courage to propose what was necessary in 1974, the government, and particularly the Prime Minister, responded with the kind of irresponsibility that has lost him forever any trust that he might have enjoyed among members of this House. Many of the people of Canada will not soon forget the Prime Minister pointing his finger and saying, "Zap—you are frozen", condemning the program which a year later he implemented.

That proposal, that discrepancy, that inconsistency, that spending, that foolish wasting of public trust by the Prime Minister, is not at all a joke for Canadians. It is a very serious betrayal of trust. It is one of the reasons Canadians, whether members of organized labour, those who are not members of unions, whether in business or private citizens, do not trust this government now and will not trust this government until we have at least an indication of when and how it intends to end controls and begin to restore growth to the economy.

The major problem in Canada now is a problem of confidence. Instead of confidence we have a con game going: we have hints about when controls might end. We have a number of options that might be considered by the government. But we have seen nothing that the people of Canada can count on when they make the plans they need to make. No leadership has been shown in regard to the future of Canada and the context in which individual decisions must be made.

I do not want to debate what the anti-inflation program has accomplished for Canada. I am quite prepared to be generous and admit that in the early months it may well have helped to reduce inflationary expectations. But that benefit has long since passed. Today we have a program that is full of injustices. The hon. member who spoke before me cited some of these. We have a program that has become a model of bureaucratic empire-building, a program that is seriously undermining investor confidence and planning in this country. That is the program which this government intends to keep in place indefinitely so far as we know—and we have to ask why. The most charitable explanation is that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and his advisers are paralysed. They know they have not dealt with any of the fundamental problems of this country and they do not begin to know how they will deal with them. So they have let controls linger on as a kind of security blanket, in order to hide their own indecision. Sir, we sometimes call the Minister of Finance "Big Mac". A better name would probably be "Linus".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The only other explanation for this government's refusal to end the AIB program is that the government does not want to end controls. This is, after all, the government which loves to meddle in the affairs and individual lives of Canadians, which believes it knows better than anybody else does, and that only it can decide what is in the best interest of all of us. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), who is in this House, participated in the debate the other night and spoke of a disciplined economy. That phrase has the kind of authoritarian ring the Prime Minister finds so attractive, but which most citizens of this country find so alarming or offensive.

We all know, sir, that it is not what the Minister of Finance believes or wants that is important. He concedes, as he has in committee and in this House, that this is the right time for the economy to begin the decontrol process. But in the end it is not the view of the Minister of Finance which counts, but that of the Prime Minister of Canada. And who knows what the Prime Minister believes? Perhaps he will take the opportunity in the remaining hours of this debate to come in and tell the House about the economy of Canada. He has not spoken in the House of Commons in this calendar year. Perhaps he would like to take this opportunity to come in and set forth for Canadians an indication of the goals he is pursuing and the plans he is following for the development of the Canadian economy. Until he does that we only have the record of things he says outside this House.

All of us can remember his statement made in December, 1975, about the failure of the free market system. Last summer, of course, he was reconverted to the free market system. Now we have the interview in Le Monde, quoted the other night by the hon. member for Halifax, in which the Prime Minister said it would be foolish to end controls before an election. My colleague from Halifax called that the teachings of some kind of post-Galbraithian school. It strikes me, sir, as pure Keith Davey, if one can apply that adjective these days.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He is a Poll-horse.

Mr. Clark: The point is, the Prime Minister was dishonest with the country when he introduced controls. We have no reason to believe he will be any more honest in removing controls. Sir, I missed the debate the other day and I regret that. But I read with interest the contribution made by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras). In his contribution, he claimed that the government had achieved what he called "more than a modest measure of success" in restraining its own expenditures. The truth of the matter is that this administration has been on the biggest spending spree in Canadian history. In its first year of office it spent $9 billion.

This year it plans to spend almost $45 billion—an increase of 500 per cent. The minister calls that restraint. The hard reality is that, thanks to a decade of total irresponsibility by the government, the national finances of this country are virtually out of control. One need look no further than the last budget of the Minister of Finance for confirmation of that fact. This government has spent so much and planned so badly that the budget runs a $7 billion deficit and still leaves more than one million Canadians out of work. This government has spent itself right out of any opportunity to exercise a positive influence on the Canadian economy.

Sir, faced even with this dismal record, the most this government is prepared to commit itself to regarding restraint is to hold the line, to hold its spending increase to the rate of increase of the gross national product. Having governed for a decade in which the proportion of gross national product taken by governments has climbed from 29 per cent to 43 per cent, this government now says it is prepared to level off for a while. That is just not good enough. We on this side of the House are committed to reducing the government's take from the economy—not keeping it at a constant level—because that is an essential first step to restoring confidence in the Canadian economy.

We have had controls in this country, sir, for 20 months—20 months during which we might have expected some initiative by this government to deal with some of our more deeply-rooted Canadian economic problems. You will remember, sir, that when this program was introduced in the dark of the night, without any warning, on pre-empted television time—as has become too much of a habit of the government—the government gave us a long litany of commitments, of things they were going to do during the period of controls. We were to get a comprehensive energy policy. Where is that comprehensive energy policy?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We do not even have a comprehensible minister.

Mr. Clark: We do not have a comprehensible minister, and we do not have a comprehensive energy policy which we were promised as a condition for accepting this period of controls. We were told we were going to have a national food policy which would be brought in during the period of controls. We now have a document, introduced the other day by Mutt and Jeff—I do not know which minister is which—and the ministers cannot agree if it is a policy or strategy. They cannot even agree on the semantics, let alone on its substance. That is the second absolute failure to keep a promise which was made as a condition for accepting controls.

We were told we would have an effective housing program. We must admit that the control program has had some effect on housing in this country. It has driven a great deal of the investment which could be made in Canadian housing, south of the border so that there are houses in the United States which could have been built in Canada if it were not for the controls program we have in place right now.

We were told that there would be, as part of the condition for accepting controls, an examination of regulatory policy. We have not had an examination of regulatory policy, but we have had a proliferation of regulations. We were also told that we were to have, if we accepted controls, an improved system of collective bargaining. As my colleague from Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) said the other night when he participated in this debate, we have had nothing of the kind, because the government of Canada has not made any serious effort to use the time we bought with controls to bring about the reforms which Canadians were promised as a condition for accepting controls.

However, we have had one other activity during this period. We have had a multitude of meetings and discussions around a concept called voluntary restraint. This process, as the House recalls, started more than three years ago under the previous minister of finance, and to this day—I am not sure of his name—no one knows exactly what the Government of Canada is expecting from business and labour in the matter of voluntary restraint. But they are asking for changes from meeting to meeting and speech to speech.

In this debate, the Minister of Finance said that he wants "further assurances as to the active advocacy of policies of restraint we can expect from these groups." That means he wants them to get out and actively advocate restraint which, as one must admit, is entirely consistent—because that is all the government has been doing in the name of restraint throughout the controls program. Of course, he asks of business and labour a commitment to participate in his semi-annual talk-in, that process of public education from which, in the best traditions of this government, the public and the House of Commons will be barred. Sir, that is simply a farce. With great respect, the minister knows it is a farce. We accuse the Minister of Finance of a lot of things, but nobody on this side has ever accused him of being stupid. He is not stupid. He knows that the people he is talking to cannot give him any binding commitments on behalf of business or labour.

Mr. Clark: He knows, too, that there is not a room big enough to get into it all the people, the thousands of economic decision-makers in this country, who would have to join in a massive cartel to create any meaningful program of voluntary restraint. The minister knows that, yet he plunges on with the charade. Why? Because it is a convenient substitute for the government accepting its responsibility to lead. Even more seriously, because it is a convenient set-up for this government to play its favourite game of blaming the other guy for all the country's problems. It is a set-up to make the people of Canada believe that only the irresponsibility of the private sector is preventing concrete action in this area. Sir, that is not only dishonest; it is totally unfair to business and labour leaders who have shown more responsibility in this matter than anyone on the government benches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I would be remiss if I did not at least acknowledge the contribution made to this debate by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). He has, to give him credit, a simple and straightforward position. In his view, the major weakness of the present controls program is that it does not control enough. He advocates a national incomes policy which, as I read it, amounts to government assuming the role of national paymaster, deciding how much each sector of our society should get from the economy. As I say, sir, it has at least a certain simplicity to it. I have to ask myself whether the member for Oshawa-Whitby has enunciated that concept to his friends in the labour movement. But, then, I suppose organized labour is prepared to concede the odd aberration to my friends on the left in the practical comfort that they will never have the opportunity to implement this or any other of their unrealistic proposals.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We realize, Mr. Speaker, that there is never an easy way or a right time to get out of controls. However, we submit—and we seem to have the support of the Minister of Finance on this point—that our present economic circumstances, with the large amount of unused capacity we now have in our economy, is as good a setting as any in which to begin the decontrol process. The circumstances now are as good as they are going to get. To wait would be irresponsible. Waiting would mean we would have to face decontrols—if the Prime Minister ever lets us face decontrols—in an atmosphere that is not as effective as the present one.

We accept that, even with a stagnant economy, there could be short-term price and wage pressures, and we have advocated a series of proposals to deal with any such pressures which might arise. I will summarize the proposals made by my colleague. We want legislative action to ensure that rulings by the AIB and the administrator retain their effect even if the AIB is dismantled. I note from his remarks the other night that the Minister of Finance accepts that proposal.

Mr. Fraser: After we put it forward.

Mr. Clark: As my colleague from Vancouver South says, "after we put it forward". We want a monitoring agency established within the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. That is a proposal the minister does not accept, for very good reason. The monitoring agency under Consumer Affairs is too small for him. It is not a big enough bureaucracy. He will not accept anything that will not allow the bureaucracy to grow larger and larger. We believe that a monitoring agency within the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs could do the job that needs to be done to get us out of the controls program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We would, as my colleague said in his remarks, require corporations and unions to provide 30 days' notice of price and wage increases. We want the cabinet to have ultimate power—

Mr. Caccia: Great idea.

Mr. Clark: I am a little suspicious of receiving any support from the auspices of anyone who wants to have so much control over the economy as the hon. member for Davenport. I am pleased, at least, to learn that he is listening. We want the cabinet to have the ultimate power to roll back any such increases which are deemed to be clearly excessive and contrary to the public interest. We recognize that this may require some legislation; but after all, that is what parliament is all about. If we need to have some legislation to build in that power, we will do it.

The Minister of Finance raised a red herring the other night suggesting there would be no authority for the parliament of Canada to do that. I simply make one suggestion which I would have thought would have occurred to the minister. The Supreme Court of Canada has already ceded the roll-back authority to one federal agency, the Anti-Inflation Board. It would be a simple matter to have that extended to another federal agency, the most senior agency, the cabinet of Canada. That, sir, is a concrete program. It is a specific program. It is a workable program. I have no hesitation in offering it as a constructive alternative to the minister's "first in, first out" system which will lead to all kinds of inequities and which, in all likelihood, will stretch out the present program at least to the end of 1978.

As the hon. member for York-Simcoe made clear the other night, one of the things that this government may be considering—we do not know, and this adds to the climate of uncertainty, making it impossible for Canadians to plan—is a date for the beginning of a decontrols regime which would, in effect, mean that controls would stay in place for most of the corporations and large unions in this country until the end of 1978. That is pretty good hocus-pocus, but it is pretty dangerous economics for a country like Canada. This debate has centred on a specific question, the timing and nature of the decontrols process. In a way, it has also focused on some much larger questions and some basic differences among the parties in this House. As I already have indicated, the NDP, to give them credit, operate from the basis of a consistent ideology. They have no faith in the free market system, and they have every faith in the ability of government to plan and to manage society in infinite detail. I totally reject that ideology, but at least I give them credit for having one.

This government, of course, has no ideology at all. To it, principle is something you collect interest on, preferably at elections. There was no more damning evidence of that than the emphasis the Minister of Finance placed in this debate on opinion polls and the short-term politics of decontrols. In place of principle this government is prepared to do literally anything that its backroom manipulators deem to be politically convenient, because the single thing in which this government believes is its own right to direct the lives of Canadians.

Even putting aside principle and morality, the problem with that approach, sir, is that it simply does not work. Having flip-flopped into controls, they have done nothing whatsoever to make constructive use of the time which controls could have bought for them. Faced with a dramatic new challenge to the unity of our country, they have produced not a single positive response except to create two or more new bureaucracies in the Privy Council.

We, on this side of the House, are prepared to exercise the powers of government when we believe it is the responsible thing to do, as witness our proposals for the decontrols period. But we advocate that kind of action only when we feel it is essential, and only because government is the only collective mechanism available to us—most certainly not because we believe we are smarter than Canadians or because we believe we have some right to direct the lives of the private citizens of this country.

There are any number of imperfections in our economy as, indeed, there are in our society. But surely it is time we began to question whether the constant cure of government intervention is not a more serious sickness than the ailments it claims to treat.

Mr. Speaker, the most disturbing thing about Canada right now is that we have lost confidence in ourselves—and this in a country which has more reason to be confident than virtually any other in the world. But how can Canadians have confidence when their national government's every act is to breed suspicion, confrontation and distrust? How can Canadians believe in themselves when their national government doesn't believe in them?

Removing the wage and price controls program will not solve the problem, but perhaps it can be a start. Perhaps it can be at least a beginning in showing some trust and confidence in Canadians. I have that kind of trust and confidence in Canada, and I invite every member of this House to express that same trust and confidence by supporting this motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, in the current context of all those systems maintained and nurtured by the old parties to try and control inflation, one is reminded of the story of that fellow who raised skunks and tried to control the smell. Because at the start, the smell is quite awkward. But after a while, one gets used to it to the point it does not bother too much. So it is with inflation. The first experiences are stifling, but after a while it goes almost unnoticed. Although the smell is there.

While prices and banking and multinational profits are going up through the elevator, wages and small and medium businesses profits have to climb a slow flight of stairs. Inflation is in my view an imaginary "gimmick" thought of by the government and its so-called economists to ignore the fact and entertain the illusion that everything is well, there is nothing to be done, it is a necessary evil, and all that is needed is to tolerate the smell and let the skunk get older, but while the inflationary virus is getting deeper and putting the government to sleep, there are in this country more than 503,000 students and young workers that will be unemployed during the coming season. Labour is facing a number of impossible problems. Farmers are almost to the point of letting everything go, while senior citizens see their savings are being eroded daily.

The Anti-Inflation Board simply permitted that people in the small income group be subjected to controls, while banks and multinational corporations went on scot-free their golden way.

As I said, the first ones hit by that cancer are people in the low income group, non-unionized and even unionized workers. Other victims are non indexed bond holders and small savers. Private sector pensioners and all those living off allowances have lost half the initial value of their money. While inflation is gnawing at small income people, the moneyed classes invest their loot in real estate and, finally, we end up with the situation we see now—the bankruptcy of small- and medium-sized businesses and the growth of large fortunes.

Indeed, chartered banks' assets have increased by $16 billion in 1975-76 and are now showing an annual increase of $25 billion when calculated on the basis of the assets accrued for the five first months of this year, that is $12 billion. What is worse is that people responsible for that state of things have all gone into hiding. Thus unions are blamed for inflation. When workers are not blamed for inflation, industries are. And when individuals are not blamed, consumers are. Everybody has his turn. Of course, we shall not attempt to absolve completely those groups. However, those actions are for the most part defensive reactions rather than initial causes. It is like the individual pushed from the top of a cliff, who grasps a rope and drags someone else down with him. If the first one had not been pushed, the other should not have been dragged.

As we could see, inflation is the major problem in Canada today. We could even say that all other problems would disappear for the most part if we could eliminate inflation. Yes, because inflation steals the savings and revenues from Canadians. This is why we were disappointed when the Speech from the Throne and the subsequent statements by the government did not mention the only measure that really succeeded among all so-called anti-inflationist measures made until now by this government, I mean the subsidy that eliminates directly production costs. The subsidies to dairy producers are the best example. Canadian consumers benefited from lower prices through that program and we deplore its end. Of course, we could still improve the way those subsidies are paid. One of the rare good things said by Mrs. Plumptre, the chairman of the Food Prices Review Board is: This program might become a racket to the advantage of producers. We agree on this. The subsidies should improve the capacity of consumers to express their needs to producers and retailers. For that reason, subsidies should be given at the retailer level when the consumer has really made his choice among the various products. We can only wonder why the government do not continue that experience which demonstrated the efficiency of creating credit to reduce costs rather than increasing production and production costs.

We from the Social Credit Party of Canada want to see an extension of that policy. In fact, a universal discount on retail prices is advisable as we know it is the only means to increase the purchasing power without increasing prices. Unfortunately, this government cut off those efficient subsidies against price increases. But the money now earned by workers in the industry will be spent tomorrow and will leave behind a series of costs which will be felt on the market when people can no longer afford to pay them. The approach chosen by the government does not solve the basic problem, it only delays the inevitable confrontation. And when you delay the time of fighting, it is not a cat you face in the end, but a tiger.

In the present circumstances, it is absolute nonsense to claim that by increasing production we will be able to reduce inflation. This idea has been proven false many times but it is always the last resort of those who cannot understand that our major economic problem is not production, but consuming and distribution. The events we see unfolding before our eyes today are very similar to those of the crisis of the thirties. At that time, surpluses of produce were destroyed, while people were in need of them. We must not produce more eggs in Canada. However, we must see to the distribution of eggs already produced. one year ago, a beef shortage was anticipated, but the picture has changed completely; our beef producers anticipate large surpluses and are developing plans aimed at convincing Canadians to eat more beef.

If there truly are shortages of several products, it is because of problems which did not exist in a healthy monetary system. We have only to recall the famous paper shortage of recent date. Can someone seriously suggest that we have exhausted our forest resources in Canada? No. The shortages are caused by strikes, price inflation and a general economic slowdown. Canada has so much resources that it is nearly unbelievable and, if they are well used, our natural resources and technical capacities can easily meet the material needs of the whole population and even of a much greater population than the present one.

Some people will probably say that the financing of lower prices is another daydream of the Social Crediters, another instance of funny money. Unfortunately for the critics, the federal government has shown the practical and effective nature of this suggestion. Some will say that it is not an orthodox approach to the situation. But since economic orthodoxy created the present problem, it is obvious that we need new ideas. Moreover, in the last 50 years, some professional economists have been great exponents of consumer subsidies through price reductions, and in this regard, I can mention Mr. R. R. Irvine, professor of economics at Sydney University, in Australia, during the crisis in the thirties. Another economist, Mr. J. E. Meade, has written a book entitled Consumers' Credits and Unemployment, published by the Oxford University Press, in which he states his belief—

He has also written:

● (1650)

[English]

This is a subject which has been strangely neglected by professional economists... The subsidization of consumption at certain times and in certain conditions is perfectly sensible. At the risk of being numbered among "the monetary cranks" I submit this book to all who are interested in social and economic problems to persuade them that this is an important method of maintaining prosperity, to my professional colleagues to convince them that they should take the subject much more seriously—

[Translation]

Also, Mr. Speaker, a Mr. Vincent Bladen, currently professor of political economy at the Toronto University, insisted recently on the fact that new measures are necessary to fight inflation. His remarks are reported in last year's March-April issue of The Canadian Chartered Accountant.

[English]

Action is urgently needed. I suggest the government hold down prices by subsidy rather than by ceiling.

[Translation]

And the administrative method he has suggested consists in a negative tax which is applied at the retail level.

Mr. Speaker, we, as members of the Social Credit Party, have been striving for many years for the establishment of the guaranteed annual income. I should like to quote a few remarks from Mr. Erich Fromm:

The guaranteed income, which has become possible in these times of economic wealth, could for the first time liberate mankind from the threat of famine and in a way make it free and independent from any economic threat. Nobody would be forced to accept intolerable working conditions simply because he is afraid of starving to death; a talented or ambitious man or woman could increase his or her qualifications and undergo retraining to take up another kind of job.

The shift from a psychology of scarcity to a psychology of abundance is one of the most important in the history of human development. A psychology of scarcity generates anxiety, envy, selfishness (that can be seen particularly in primitive cultures throughout the world). A pyschology of abundance generates initiative, faith in life and solidarity.

Economic abundance and relief from the fear of starvation will mark the transition from a pre-human to a truly human society.

There it is, Mr. Speaker, as I suggested earlier and have been doing so for many years, I think that the present economy of this country or at least the natural resources of this country allow the government to act and finally decide to give every citizen the guaranteed annual income, an income that would allow him to live beyond the poverty line. I read recently either in a newspaper or a magazine that there are now over half a million workers—workers, not unemployed—who find it absolutely impossible to secure the vital minimum to their subsistence. So, Mr. Speaker, in a country such as ours, with incredible abundance, I ask what is stopping the government from acting and providing each and every citizen of this country with decent and fair comfort in view of the unlimited abundance.

Since the prime purpose of the creation of the Anti-Inflation Board was to control and destroy inflation—which it lamentably failed to do, having overrun the bridge—and since those effects are nil and the board only prevented small wage earners from going up in the wage ladder and allow poor people to breathe, I think that board has no more raison d'être. That is why we of the Social Credit Party are going to support the motion calling for its abolition.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, like most members of parliament, like the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), I have serious misgivings about price and income controls as a means of dealing with inflation in peacetime. As a former member of the government, I was one of those who resisted such controls until I became convinced that there was no alternative. When the decision in principle was taken, I was one of those who shared the view that the program of price and income restraints should be selective, limited as far as possible to the principal decision-makers in the private sector, flexible enough to deal not only with the typical but with the atypical cases, and of sufficiently long duration to have some possibility of changing the inflationary psychology then prevalent. It was the urgent need to try to change the inflationary psychology that, in my opinion, was the main justification for the introduction of price and income restraints in 1975.

Members of the House will recall that wage demands at that time were based on the expectation and the fear of further price increases. Similarly, price increases were being based on the expectation and the fear of further cost increases. The chase of incomes after prices and prices after incomes threatened disaster to all concerned. The managing director of the International Monetary Fund, Mr. Witteveen, put the point, with his customary elegance, in an address just about a month ago on May 17:

> Perhaps the most important lesson of economic policy that has been learned from the events of the past decade is the key role played by expectations in the determination of price movements. When high rates of inflation persist, expectations of continuing price increases are gradually built in to pricing policies, both in the labour market and in the goods market. These expectations can sustain the momentum of inflation even when excess demand pressures have been eliminated. Not only that, but uncertainties concerning the future course of costs and prices undermine the confidence of private business and result in an unwillingness to undertake the investment on which future output and growth depend. This is perhaps one reason for the rather tentative response of fixed investment during the recent cyclical recovery.

That, as I have said, is the view expressed just a month ago by the managing director of the International Monetary Fund. Just why this race got under way no one is quite sure. It was not only a Canadian phenomenon; it occurred throughout the industrialized world. In some places the pace was quicker than in Canada; in others it was slower. But it was universal.

I shall not at this time enter into a debate as to the causes, although there are, without doubt, important lessons to be learned about the inflationary process which will be of value in preventing its recurrence in the future. If I may be permitted a brief comment, it is that it is much easier and much more popular to take measures to stimulate demand than it is to take measures to dampen the economy when inflation threatens—and I speak now from the heart of a former minister of finance. Somehow we shall have to learn that there is a point beyond which measures to stimulate over-all demand are counterproductive in terms of employment.

The trade-off between inflation and unemployment, which may have had some validity in the past, has little meaning today when high inflation and high unemployment exist simultaneously. Until a few years ago the central objective of economic policy in the industrialized world was to prevent the recurrence of a depression such as devastated the western world in the 1930s. On the whole, that objective was reasonably well attained. Looking back over the period one can say it was one of the most successful periods of economic expansion in the whole history of the world. The period from the end of World War II until the early seventies was one of unsurpassed expansion and prosperity.

The problem facing us now is quite different from what it was in those years. The problem is to maintain reasonably steady economic progress, steady progress which is threatened by inflationary tendencies of great tenacity and universality. So I return to the question before us, which is whether or not to disband the present controls at the end of the month, as proposed in the resolution introduced by the financial spokesman for the official opposition and founded, of course, upon the gathering together of a sufficient number of members to justify this debate.

I proceed from the premise that price and income controls are not a desirable solution for inflation in a free society in peacetime, although I know there are some who take a contrary view. I do not think there are many in this House who take the contrary view, but at any rate I know that outside this parliament there are many who do. To me, and I think to most of us, controls are at best a temporary expedient to gain time, and that is the basis upon which they were introduced and approved by this parliament. The legislation that gave sanction to the system that is now in operation had a time limit on it, and it was defended on that basis not as a permanent system of price and wage controls. Nor is anyone, I trust, going to argue that the program of price and income restraint now in effect is ideal and fully equitable. In the very nature of things, price and income restraints are arbitrary and, at best, offer some sort of rough justice.

Mr. Alexander: The Minister of Labour said they wouldn't work, in the last election.

Mr. Sharp: They certainly are not of the kind and nature that one would have entered upon with any great zeal, because in the nature of things they are arbitrary. They are justified only because, although arbitrary, they are to be preferred to the excesses which would have been experienced without them and only if they have beneficial effects on the pattern of human behaviour for the future. No one can know what would have happened without the imposition of controls. All we do know is that price and cost increases prior to the introduction of controls were accelerating at an alarming rate, and that since the application of controls there has been a fairly steady diminution in the rate of increase of both prices and costs.

Hon. members will recall that the period of controls is divided into three parts. During the first year which ended in October, 1976, the objective was an increase in the consumer price index of 8 per cent. In fact, the increase was 6½ per cent, a notable reduction from the 11 per cent increase recorded in the previous 12 months—not all attributable, of course, to the controls program. There was an element of good luck and good fortune as well. In the second year now under way, the objective is a 6 per cent increase in the consumer price index. This may or may not be attained because of price increases in food and imports which are not fully under the control of the program, but it looks as if the target will not be missed by more than about one per cent or so. If this is, in fact, the result, it can be said that over the first two years the control's program did at least achieve, and may better, its consumer price target.

Most independent observers are of the view that this was not a coincidence, that the controls, notwithstanding their limitations, did bring about an immediate and significant reduction in the rate of price and cost increases beyond what would otherwise have occurred by the free play of market forces and collective bargaining. I think it is also fair to say that most independent observers are also of the view that the rate of increase in prices and costs is still excessive, that the controls have been effective all right, but that domestically-generated inflation is still serious.

One valid criticism of any comprehensive system of prices and incomes controls that restrains incomes and prices in accordance with some yardstick is that it results in inequities amongst the various participants in the economic process. Wage earners who have fallen behind feel that controls prevent a full restoration of their relative status. Some professionals may feel they have been unfairly treated. Wage earners may feel that professionals and business executives are not being as closely controlled as they are. Businessmen contend that profits are being held so low as to inhibit investment, and so forth. Every effort should, of course, be made to achieve fairness and equity, but regardless of what form the regulations take, those that are effective are also to some degree arbitrary. This is one of the main reasons why controls should be temporary. They are, in the nature of things, bound to cause distortions.

What can be said about the period since October, 1975, is that on the average wages have risen more quickly than prices, so that for those who are working there has been an improvement in the average standard of living, although not necessarily, of course, in the standard of living of every working Canadian. For example, wage rates on the average rose approximately 10 per cent during the first year of the control period, as against an increase in the consumer price index of 6½ per cent; and while we do not have final figures for the period that is now under way, the second period, I understand that wages are still surpassing prices. If you look at the whole period, whatever else one can say about it, the wage earner has improved his relative position.

What is less satisfactory and a cause for concern is that, notwithstanding controls, wages have risen on the average more quickly than average productivity, which means that there is a continuing upward pressure on costs and prices of domestically produced goods and services.

Mr. Speaker, I trust there is agreement on all sides that it is of the utmost urgency to try by every means to bring an end to the inflationary bias that now seems to permeate the economies of the industralized countries of the world, including Canada. It is no longer a question of choosing between inflation and unemployment, if these ever were valid alternatives. Inflation threatens to undermine the stability of our societies, and by so doing to jeopardize employment opportunities and conceivably to bring about even worse dislocation and social unrest.

No one can be quite sure how this inflationary bias is to be eliminated. I have heard the opposition criticize the government for not having a sure remedy for all these ills. I have greater confidence in the government, because they are not quite sure what should be done. I suspect that there are no simple methods, that the problem has to be tackled on several fronts, by prudent fiscal and monetary policies and, also, I am convinced, by concerted efforts on the part of political, business and labour leaders to achieve consensus as to the price and wage objectives that are in the national interest.

I know that efforts made prior to the imposition of mandatory controls to achieve voluntary restraint were not particularly successful. I was in the government at the time, and I sympathize with the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) and other colleagues who were endeavouring to bring about a program of voluntary restraint and found that it was an extremely difficult exercise. I venture to say, however, that the dangers of persistent inflation were not as well understood two or three years ago as they are today. It also is encouraging that progress has been made recently in working out a format of consultation which could serve to bring together principal decision-makers.

I have been following with great interest the debate on the control of inflation that has been going on around the world, not only in Canada but in Europe and in the United States. I have been listening to the various economists expressing their views on what is the right and perhaps the only way of controlling inflation, and I heard the other day some reference being made to the views of Professor Milton Freidman who said that there was only one way of controlling inflation, and that was by controlling the money supply. He said that you can stop inflation if you stop creating money in order to finance the business of the country. I am skeptical, however, about the acceptability of this remedy as a sovereign cure when the pressure builds up. That is why, it seems to me, some consensus amongst the principal decision-makers as to price and wage objectives would be helpful.

It would be much easier for those who try to exercise some control over the money supply or over fiscal policy if these decisions could be made within the framework in which there was general agreement as to objectives. This happens in other free societies, and while our institutions and conventions are in many ways unique—I regret to say we are one of the most fragmented economies in the world—I suggest that we should at least make the effort.

I hope the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Finance, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), will not be too discouraged by the reaction they may get at this stage to the efforts they are making to try to bring about a greater degree of co-operation between the principal decision-makers, whether in the field of government, labour or business. We might all be pleasantly surprised by the results if we can bring about the desired degree of co-operation.

The issue before the House is a simple one: Should the present system of controls be terminated by the end of the present month? Someone once said that the most important thing to consider when entering on a program of price and wage controls is how to remove them. The government has indicated the alternative methods and has come down, and I think rightly so, in favour of some kind of phased withdrawal.

An abrupt end to controls as proposed in this motion would be irresponsible, would jeopardize the substantial gains that have been achieved during the past 20 months and would, I submit, either create the impression that the program has failed and should be terminated without notice, or that the threat of inflation is over. The program has not been a failure—on the contrary, it has succeeded so well that it has become popular—and the threat of inflation is still very real. The hope is—and one can be more hopeful today because of the restraining effects of controls—that the inflation psychology has been moderated, if not eliminated.

As I have said, however, even though the rates of increases of prices and incomes are much below what they were, they are still excessive and dangerous. In the third year, the objective of the controls system is a 4 per cent increase in the consumer price index. Even if formal controls were to be substantially lifted, that objective, or even a lower figure, is a desirable one. A 4 per cent annual increase in consumer prices may seem small in relation to recent experiences. It is such a reduction from the two-digit figures we had become accustomed to that it looks as if it might be an unattainable figure. I do not know whether it is or not, but in my view we should be striving to get our consumer price index increase down to as low a level as possible, as well as all the other price indices.

A 4 per cent annual increase in consumer prices may seem small in relation to recent experience, but it is not small per se. When I was minister of finance and things throughout the world were quite different from what they are today, a 4 per cent annual increase for the indefinite future had implications which are still here today. If we contemplate that prices are going to rise by 4 per cent annually over the next ten years, we will be less willing to hold money and more anxious to buy goods or property. So I think we still have a serious inflationary problem to which I hope the government is directing its attention.

As hon. members know, I am no longer in the confidence of the ministers. I do not even have anyone to help me write my speeches nowadays. I have to depend upon myself, so I am not informed as to the intentions of the ministers with respect to the timing and process of decontrol apart from what is contained in ministerial announcements and documents. The views I am expressing now are entirely personal. I hope they accord with the views of ministers, but they are my own.

First, although the price and income restraints have been very useful, I trust that the government will resist the temptation to try to extend the term of the legislation beyond its present date because of public support for the program. The government may be tempted to do so. I hope it can resist that and, as the Minister of Finance has indicated, reinforce the price and wage undertakings which have been made while the program has been in effect. Second, I think it would be advisable to begin the process of decontrol before the end of the three-year period, so that the transition is orderly, not abrupt, and is as fair as possible to all concerned.

Third, it is my earnest hope that the government will persist in its efforts to achieve an acceptable means of promoting understanding and co-operation amongst business, labour and government, whatever the discouragements. The traditional adversary attitude amongst these three principal decision-makers must be modified. Otherwise, the pressing of their respective claims will frustate the attainment of the common good.

The end of controls, whenever it comes, will not mean that the threat of inflation has passed. The controls only gained time to effect more fundamental changes in underlying inflationary forces, one of the most powerful of which was the inflation psychology which was so dominant in the immediate precontrol period. The challenge before government, business and labour is to achieve a new equilibrium.

We are at a watershed in the affairs of the people living in industrialized societies. The attitudes suitable to the post-war age of expansion, which was brought to an end by the emergence of the energy crisis and the persistence of inflation, are no longer suitable to the age of uncertainty upon which we are now embarked. We now have to think in terms of conservation. We did not think in those terms before. Our society tended to be very wasteful. It is no longer possible for us to continue that way. There is less margin now for mistakes. As far as governments are concerned, because the level of expenditure and taxation has risen so high—and I speak now of municipal, provincial and federal governments—governments have less room for manoeuvre, whether on the spending side or on the taxation side.

In brief, in my judgment—and I hope it is a judgment which will be shared throughout this house—desirable growth can only be attained by the establishment of stable, underlying conditions which give confidence to the worker, to the consumer and to the investor. I do not think this is a task only for government. This is a task which must be undertaken in a spirit of national endeavour. It is as much in the interests of labour unions as it is in the interests of businessmen or of governments to be able to bring about this new kind of equilibrium.

I was an official and a minister throughout most of the period of post-war growth. I have the great good fortune to have been at the centre of decision-making during that period when the structure of modern government was being put in place, and I say from that vantage point that the things which motivated those of us who had that responsibility at that time were not the things which will motivate those who will have that responsibility from here on in.

We were concerned about preventing another depression. We were concerned that demand might not be sufficient to engage the resources which were available, about keeping everyone working, and so on. The emphasis was on expansion and on the maintenance of and increase in demand, and for a long time it worked very well. However, in the process we not only consumed resources at an enormous rate and ran up against limitations, particularly in the energy field, which we had not anticipated, but I think we also created a kind of bias. That bias is one of the concerns I have, and I think many people who have had the same experience as I have share the concern that we cannot go on thinking in those terms any more. In those days it did not matter how much confrontation there was between the various decision-makers. It matters now, and therefore I hope the government will continue its efforts to try to bring about greater co-operation amongst the decision-makers, in the interests of everyone.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in his speech the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) exemplified the same type of example he set when he was a member of the government. I think all hon. members would agree that his speech was a very thoughtful one and that it contained very worth-while information. I congratulate the hon. member for an excellent contribution to this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: He did not tell the whole story, though. I want to know about the 1974 election.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I thought the hon. member for Eglinton told an exhaustive story, one which would challenge the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) to refute in any detail.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) wants me to refute it, I would like to put on the record that I recall vividly during the 1974 election that the Minister of Labour, other ministers of the Crown and other hon. members of the Liberal party appeared on television, were heard on the radio and were reported in newspapers in effect saying that wage and price controls would not work and that this government would never introduce them because they were not successful in the United States and Great Britain.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Alexander: I remember, in particular, hearing the Minister of Labour say that his government would never introduce controls.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member knows that this is hardly a point of order. It is just an argument he could make in due time if he wishes to do so.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, that was not a point of order. I yielded to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) as a matter of courtesy. I am still basking under the adulation which was bestowed upon him for his long years in public life, but I will not be naive enough to repeat my courtesy in the future.

Mr. Alexander: I remember the 1974 election.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I am prepared to fight that one all over again, with the hon. member, any time. The hon. member for Eglinton presented a very comprehensive review of governmental initiatives and efforts to ease the inflationary process and the rate of inflation. I think the government paper, "Agenda for Co-operation", has also been an invaluable means of promoting the vital participation and debate that the government regards as essential if the right economic and social decisions are to be made. We had a good experience with that this morning when about 20 groups of various kinds with various mandates from across the country came to present their views and briefs to ministers. I think the "Agenda for Co-operation" was a stimulus in this regard and will prove to be one of the more beneficial documents for our guidance.

• (1730)

My own ministry has understandably found itself front and centre in the continuing discussion on the whole issue of control, wages and prices. All of us are aware of the stand taken by the Canadian Labour Congress in particular, but I am confident that we can look forward now to a progressive, co-operative relationship, as and when restraints come off, with the CLC. Great emphasis was placed upon this by the hon. member for Eglinton. The consultative process must be re-established, and I am optimistic that it will.

I do not think any useful purpose can be served by dredging up past confrontations and disagreements with the CLC or any other body, or even with my friend, the hon. member for Hamilton West. Suffice it to recall that when the government introduced its restraints program in October, 1975, our industrial relations system in general, and the collective bargaining process in particular, had become focal points of invective and discontent across Canada.

Certainly there was justification for the general dissatisfaction that had accumulated over a period of approximately a year following the general election of 1974. This showed itself in the months that followed through the unacceptable incidence of strikes that resulted in a record figure of man-days lost, and a record amount of inconvenience and discomfort for the public at large. With issues made more complex by inflation and its erosion of purchasing power, the collective bargaining process was further stressed by increasing demands over and above those concerned with pay for greater job security, improved working conditions, job satisfaction, equal opportunities, and other items.

In retrospect I can say that the imposition of controls, while undoubtedly placing some limits on the free collective bargaining process, also helped to safeguard that process. At that time there were tremendous pressures at work urging the government to take far more drastic action with respect to that process; action that could well spell a more lasting curtailment of collective bargaining.

The advent of controls also enabled the parties in labour affairs, and the public in general, to re-evaluate the workings of Canada's free market system, to re-evaluate it and, perhaps, to rethink the apportionment of responsibility for the results of the system.

In addition there was breathing space in which to consider and weigh those policies, programs, and relationships which might best meet the needs of the post-control era. I can say that the Department of Labour was in a fairly strong position to respond to the new challenges because it had already started a process of self-examination and reassessment. This process resulted in a major reorganization plus decentralization into five regions, both operations reflecting the department's role as a vital partner in labour affairs. And of particular significance, the new order meant the department was well equipped to initiate a range of new programs designed to improve the work environment; to improve the collective bargaining process; and to improve the structure and process of labour-management relations.

Mr. Alexander: Is that what the $10 million is all about?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): It is part of what it is all about. If the hon. member would like to forget some of his intuitive bias and look at it objectively, he would find it a very worth-while measure indeed. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that most hon. members will be aware of the extent of these new programs, which have recently been the subject of a fairly extensive program of public information so I will not reiterate them in detail.

I will, however, refer to those programs that do have a specific bearing on the post-control period, and on the containment of inflation. Six new initiatives are in this area of curtailment of inflation. They involve: a quality of working life centre; a new voluntary code of good practices; amendments to the Canada Labour Code; promotion of broader-based bargaining; the establishment of a collective bargaining information centre; and the establishment of a national consultative forum.

The quality of working life centre will concentrate its efforts in the area of increased job satisfaction, leading to improved organizational effectiveness. As well as initiating its own experiments, the centre will concern itself with the results of European as well as other North American experiments in the humanization of work, and will provide a range of educational, technical, and consulting services.

Second is the voluntary code of good practices. Over the years, employment standards legislation has set basic minimum levels—a "floor of protection" of particular importance to that majority of employees not covered by collective agreements. As a supplement to these legislated standards, the Department of Labour is developing a code to advise employers of prevailing good practices on a range of personnel and industrial relations issues. An obvious benefit should be to reduce the divergence of views on industrial relations matters in general.

Third, broader-based bargaining is one of those initiatives designed to curtail inflation and improve the structure of the system. Of prime importance here is the promotion of broader-based bargaining in order to avoid harmful sequential shutdowns in key public services. Broader-based bargaining can be an important means of increasing public confidence in the industrial relations system; also an example to the private sector. My department is recommending that the parties concerned consider some form of voluntary bargaining coalition as being far preferable to a legislated solution.

Fourth, with regard to the Canada Labour Code we will be introducing a number of amendments to the code so as to improve the bargaining process. Frequently there are delays, sometimes there are burdensome costs, and there are tensions which produce their fall-out long after the formal settlement is concluded. Parliament will be asked to consider a number of amendments to the code to improve the balance of responsibility among government, labour, and management.

Talking about the balance of responsibility, Mr. Speaker, this is an integral feature of the fifth item of major significance in this post-control period. I am referring to the national consultative forum and the collective bargaining information centre. It will be multipartite, not possessing decision-making powers, but it can be expected to have considerable, and hopefully beneficial, influences on policies and programs in both private and public sectors. In general the forum would make for a better common understanding of the economic situation as it really is; what the economy can stand, where it is heading, what its weaknesses and strengths are. I am confident that the forum can be of real value in helping to contain the growth and spread of inflationary pressures, and more generally in its role as a disseminator of information.

The multipartite forum is a positive response to labour's request, at its convention in Quebec as identified in the Quebec manifesto, for a role in influencing the decision makers, fully realizing, I believe, that they are prepared to accept responsibility for some of those decisions providing they are permitted to participate on an equal basis.

As the government's green paper emphasized, the functioning of the market place can be enhanced by increasing the information available to the participants. This is particularly the case with regard to the collective bargaining process. We find, during this period of control, that these were some marked deficiencies in the information dissemination element throughout the system prior to controls.

Some two years ago we set up the Canada Labour Relations Council. When it first met, the need was identified for more objective information on compensation and economic trends. I might indicate that the Canada Labour Relations Council was composed of those who in their daily lives were practitioners in collective bargaining. They were not academic particularly, and not corporate presidents. Some of them were men who, in the corporations, were responsible for the proper functioning of the collective bargaining process in their enterprise. On the labour side there were representatives of unions, including union leaders who, in their daily lives, were concerned with the operation of the collective bargaining process. They identified the need for a collective bargaining data information centre.

It was perceived that existing data was not prepared specifically for collective bargaining, or it was perceived in some cases as having a pro-labour or pro-management bias. As a result the council set up a subcommittee to study the issue, including the possibility of establishing a national data centre.

At the direction of the subcommittee my department conducted a survey of employers and labour organizations. The survey asked questions about the sources of bargaining information then being used, the kind of information needed, how often it was required, and how the existing information could be improved. The subcommittee discovered a wealth of compensation and economic information produced by a variety of government and private sources. The survey also showed that many practitioners in collective bargaining, particularly among trade unions, did not always know what information was available and sometimes had no access to it. What was needed was a single agency to put all the data together and make it available and useful to union and company negotiators. The key elements of this data would be accuracy, adequacy, timeliness and, hence, credibility.

The centre which my department is now in process of establishing would not duplicate existing data collection functions, but rather will act as a clearing house from which existing information can be obtained.

An hon. Member: Big Brother.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Just one minute. Perhaps when the hon. member who just referred to Big Brother sees who will be involved in the centre, it will allay his fears. I propose to set up the centre as a separate departmental agency under a tripartite management board of labour, management and governmental representatives appointed by order in council. Therefore the centre will not come under a government bureaucracy but under the aegis of a tripartite body.

Mr. Paproski: I wish you were looking after multiculturalism.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): We may even have Canadians of Ukrainian descent represented on it.

The centre would respond to requests for information from the parties to collective bargaining, mediators and conciliators, and Labour Canada and provincial officials. Where necessary it would work with clients to identify information needs and collate data and publish regular reports. The setting of priorities and the program direction would remain the responsibility of the centre's own management board. Eventually, I would suspect and expect that the centre will play an active role in promoting data improvement by identifying gaps in existing information and ways in which information can be made relevant for collective bargaining.

With the participation of both labour and management, under whose aegis this centre will be, I anticipate that the development work for establishing the centre can be completed this year and the centre made operational by early 1978.

I suspect that the credibility difficulties which beset other agencies trying to supply information will be overcome when we establish this centre, the findings of which will be under the aegis of labour, management, and government, working together under a tripartite relationship.

Mr. Paproski: You mean a troika.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): The centre can be an invaluable agency for developing an open and creative dialogue among the parties at the national and provincial levels, as well as at the level of the enterprise. It can help to remove some of the negative adversary elements from the collective bargaining process by introducing elements of logic and reason. It's potential as an inflation fighter is, I believe, self-evident.

I have identified the six main initiatives; they relate mainly to the curtailment of inflation during the post-control period and the question with which the hon. member for Eglinton dealt, the absolute necessity of involving labour and management in some type of consultative mechanism. This involvement will come about not only in the multipartite agency, mentioned as one of the six initiatives, but also in the operational aspects of some of the other initiatives I identified. Their involvement in supervising many of these initiatives will be continuing and, hopefully, permanent.

In closing I should briefly like to mention something else. I shall not elaborate on the information, since the hon. member for Eglinton dealt with it adequately. The point concerns collective agreement settlement statistics compiled by my department. These statistics show that for the 12-month period ending March, 1977, the real, base rate rise in earnings was 5.8 per cent, not a bad increase, especially when compared with the figure of 3.9 per cent for the previous 12-month period. That shows that under the controls program we have laid the basis for a re-evaluation or re-assessment of our collective bargaining system.

Mr. Alexander: You should hear what Joe Morris says about it.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Because we laid the basis for re-evaluation and, as a result of the beneficial views expressed by management, labour, and members of this House, we have been able to design these initiatives which we are confident will serve a useful purpose in the post-control period.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, will the minister permit a question? I do not intend to ask a "dirty" question. The minister referred to the involvement of a multipartite council in the operation of the information centre. What is the situation with regard to the Economic Council of Canada and the Canada Labour Relations Council? I ask my question because I cannot read everything, and would like the minister to help me. Are these organizations to return to the fold, as it were, particularly since we were flirting with them, so to speak, with $10 million? Can the minister elaborate on the point? I think the organizations involved—and if I am wrong perhaps the minister will correct me—are the Canada Labour Relations Council and the Economic Council of Canada, on both of which labour had representation?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I think I should deal with the implied derisive comment of the hon. member for Hamilton West with respect to the $10 million.

Mr. Alexander: I did not mean it that way.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): It shows, I think, a dismal lack of appreciation of what has gone wrong in the past in our collective bargaining process. It is far too deeply committed to the adversary approach, to a degree not duplicated in any other industrialized nation of the free world. As many far-seeing members of this House perceive, we must depolarize the situation and try to bring the parties together. They must realize that a well functioning economy is in their own interest, that everyone has a stake in profits and progress. That is what we are endeavouring to do. When we talk about grants to labour organizations to get on with the educational process that is so badly needed in that area, we are only dealing equally with them as we are with the business community.

● (1750)

Perhaps the hon. member for Hamilton West is not aware that the business community can deduct from taxes paid the expense of sending officials of the corporation, businessmen, to seminars and educational courses of all kinds. If you deduct that, it is revenue the government does not receive. Therefore these grants are made to labour organizations so that they can undertake the same process.

If labour can avail themselves of the educational institutions, and many have built careers in the business community through those institutions for which the taxpayer pays, it will make the system work better. The educational system must serve all Canadians. We must work together to achieve the objectives we are desirous of achieving. If they can be achieved, it will be the best $10 million this government has ever spent. I hope it will have the support of the hon. member for Hamilton West.

Mr. Alexander: Now that you have spanked me, will you answer my questions?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): As the hon. member is well aware, the attitude of labour at the moment is that they have adopted a position of opposition to wage and price controls. That has been evident for some time. It must even be evident to the hon. member for Hamilton West. They have been meeting more with government over the last year, as well as with the business community, than in any similar period since Confederation. Obviously discussions are going on. Through that process there is a greater awareness of what the difficulties are on all sides with respect to achieving the purpose of a healthy economy.

Labour's position is that, if we can reach some consensus with respect to the decontrol period, they are willing to participate in mechanisms of various kinds during the decontrol period that ensues thereafter.

Mr. Alexander: But they are not ready yet.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): They indicated a willingness, certainly on the 14 points. We discussed many of those with labour and the business community. We received positive responses to many of the initiatives. Much of the seeking of consensus has been going on unofficially rather than officially through some of the bodies the hon. member has identified. Surely the hon. member's mind is not so inflexible as to think that the only way to achieve consensus is to have somebody with a proper name that calls meetings. One way to achieve consensus and co-operation is to meet the other fellow, talk about common problems, and work out solutions. That is what we have been doing, and probably more so in the last year than ever before.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I think it can be agreed by both sides that this debate has been carried out at a higher level than is often the case with debates in this House. Today we have been fortunate to have two Privy Councillors of Her Majesty's government, one an ex-member of cabinet, address themselves to this issue. I recognize the fact that the debate on what the issues are has been made clear as to the timing of decontrol.

Of all the speeches made today, the most significant one was the speech by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) who is not a Privy Councillor. The hon. member for Rimouski put the debate at the level it should be.

First, this program of price and wage controls is inflationary. It legislates inflation. Just quoting figures of 10 per cent, 8 per cent, 6 per cent or 4 per cent begs the question. This is inflationary legislation that is having disastrous effects now on the people of Canada.

The hon. member for Rimouski talked about how this is affecting the farmers in Quebec, the small businessmen, and those who are not protected by having big companies to do the bargaining for them in this inflationary period. They are not protected by the unions. As a result, he said, many farmers have to leave the business. I am going to put it very simply.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), also a Privy Councillor, spoke in this debate. He put his finger on what he thought was the issue, that the country had lost belief in the credibility of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). When a man of the decency of the hon. member for Halifax stands up and says that he too has lost belief in the credibility of the Prime Minister, that should make sense to the people of Canada.

I want to add something else which is even more profound. I come back again to the hon. member for Rimouski. Let us take one industry that is unprotected and not under these controls. I refer to agriculture. When the figures come out next week for the year 1976, agriculture will show a decline in real income of 25 per cent. There is talk about labour income going up 10 per cent, how other things are going up at a certain rate, how prices are going up, but farming was down 25 per cent for the year 1976.

I support what the hon. member for Rimouski said. This is the human problem that everyone forgets. On the basis of present trends of gross cash receipts, farm income in 1977 will show a further decline of 20 per cent. Taking the two years together, you get a total real income decline in one of the most important segments of our economy of about 40 per cent in two years. How can they talk about rough justice in general economic tones in this House when one large segment of our people has a decline in income in two years, under these so-called price and wage controls, of 40 per cent in real income?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—DISCONTINUATION OF SERVICE TO CHURCHILL BY RADIO STATION CHFC—CORPORATION POLICY

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise this afternoon following up my question of May 13 concerning the discontinuation of service to Churchill by radio station CHFC and the corporation policy of the CBC.

I want to point out today the CBC is running rough-shod over people in isolated parts of Canada. Churchill, Manitoba, is an isolated community located on Hudson Bay. It is serviced by air and rail and, in the summer, by ship. It is a very important seaport.

At the present time the community of Churchill has a population of 1,600. They had the privilege of having a radio station for 25 years. That CBC station was installed so that that community would have some form of media. They were not able to receive other stations that were transmitting in Manitoba.

When the radio station was built 25 years ago, Churchill had an approximate population of 4,500 people. That was because the Department of Public Works operated an armed services camp there. That camp has now been phased out. With the complete phasing out of that operation, it only left the CBC radio station CHFC.

Many people in Churchill were wondering when the CBC would move its facilities into the town of Churchill where the federal and provincial governments had just constructed an $11 million recreational complex known as the Churchill Complex. Nothing came to a head until, talking to the CBC in the early part of May, I found out they were planning to phase out CHFC in Churchill. The community of Churchill was not aware of this plan. People in that corporation who are supposed to be media experts capable of providing information to Canadians in all parts of the country, had failed to consult the local media, the mayor, officials of the local government district, or any of the organizations in Churchill.

Once I found out about it I got in touch with the radio station in Churchill. The manager was not in at the time I called but I did talk to one of the announcers and asked him whether he realized that the station was to be phased out in September. She said; "You are crazy!" However, I was able to make her eat those words a day or so later because a CBC representative called me and set up a community meeting in Churchill on May 12. Approximately 110 people came to that meeting, and it almost ended in a riot for the simple reason that the CBC had made an arbitrary decision to phase out CHFC in Churchill, thus leaving the community with no in-community radio broadcasting station, though they had been accustomed to such a service for 25 years.

Over the next couple of weeks local organizations and individuals sent briefs to the CBC on the subject. Briefs were sent from the local government district, the Manitoba Metis Association, from the Active Youth of Churchill, from the Churchill Volunteer Fire Department, from the Northern Resource Development Centre, by the Churchill Health Centre, by the Churchill Northern Studies Centre, and by individuals such as Lorraine H. Ingebrigtson and Ollie Romanow. They sought a hearing from the CRTC and found out that a hearing had been arranged, either by CRTC or by the CBC, for June 22 in, of all places, Ottawa. Mr. Speaker, it was impossible for people to come all the way from Churchill to present briefs to the CBC at that time. However, the CRTC has now decided to hold the hearing in Winnipeg on December 13.

I just cannot understand why the CBC would be phasing out an English radio production facility in Churchill, Manitoba, when at the same time it seems to be gearing up for a program called the accelerated coverage plan to go right across Canada at a cost of some $150 million. There just is no point in phasing out a radio station which has served the community of Churchill so well over the past 25 years. It appears that by the stroke of a pen it can be eliminated, and that Churchill will no longer have the privilege of enjoying good radio communication within the community.

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I was in the House the day the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith) raised this initially, and from that point forward I have taken an interest in it. As he knows, as well as other hon. members, I have a particular interest in broadcast facilities in remote and northern communities. Therefore it is a pleasure for me to reply on behalf of the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts).

I should like to advise the hon. member of the following. As you are aware, Churchill residents have been advised that CBC will close its radio production facilities at Churchill, leaving a transmitter which will continue to provide the community with CBC national and regional radio service out of Northern Manitoba.

This decision is the result of a review that was made to determine if the funds and resources available to the CBC for use in the north were being allocated to the best advantage, and what changes might be desirable. As a results of the review, CBC Churchill will become administratively part of the corporation's prairie region instead of, as at present, part of the Northern Service, which is focused on the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

It was felt that CBC radio service to northern communities has developed to the point where there is now a need for facilities to serve both the Keewatin region in the Northwest Territories and northern Manitoba. Churchill is not in a good location to do both these jobs and, accordingly, CBC will establish two production centres to replace the Churchill station. One will be in the Keewatin region itself, that is the Northern Service, and the other will be at a location further south than Churchill attached to the prairie region. This latter centre will provide regional service to northern Manitoba.

CBC has undertaken to offer, first, community access to the present Churchill transmitter within the general terms of its community access policy; second, a modest studio facility for use in connection with community access; and third, training of local residents in radio production techniques for a transition period.

Emergency access to the CBC Churchill transmitter will be made available to a government agency in Churchill such as the Department of Transport or the Department of Communications. This access can be used in the case of polar bear sightings and extreme and hazardous weather conditions.

I want to assure the hon. member that both myself and the Department of Communications will continue to take an interest in this. As I said at the beginning, I am very interested.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): We will hear somebody on the radio shouting: "Polar bear, polar bear!"

MANPOWER—UNEMPLOYMENT IN NEW BRUNSWICK—PROPOSED COMPARATIVE STUDY WITH STATE OF MAINE

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, the federal government programs of Canada Works, Young Canada Works, and Local Initiatives, have been important weapons in the Department of Manpower and Immigration's attack on unemployment in New Brunswick, and I want to give them full credit for the jobs they have created and the achievements they have made.

I think the local office Manpower staff have become very knowledgeable in their work and are truly dedicated people who try very hard to bring about results. I should like to see the Manpower staff enabled, in terms of structure and numbers, to develop statistics that would allow us to identify more readily the root causes—and local causes—of unemployment, and the remedies available to us.

I think every federal constituency should have an unemployment profile backed by statistics which show clearly the number of persons in each community who are working and who are not; the type of work they do and are capable of doing; the work potential which is available to them; and the impediments to accepting this work, such as transportation. I think every member of parliament has a very good idea of what this profile would be, but it would be much better if Manpower undertook such a compilation with its professional staff, using the same criteria in every riding, so that from an overview the minister could draw relevant conclusions that would improve our national policy in dealing with the unemployment problem.

I do not think there is any area from which we cannot learn lessons. My suggestion to the minister was that we study the dynamics used in the State of Maine, which is adjacent to New Brunswick, in order to determine what that state does which gives it a better record of performance in dealing with this subject. It brought a rebuttal from the minister which suggested they were using a different basis for arriving at their unemployment statistics, that that state really was not doing all that much better than us, that there was very little we could learn from them, and perhaps they could learn something from us. I prefer to think that we can learn from each other.

So far the federal government's programs in New Brunswick have helped to keep the situation from getting worse, but they have done very little to identify the real causes of unemployment and remedy them. One of the basic causes of chronic unemployment in New Brunswick is the transportation system. Another is the failure to focus the attention of all departments of government on the same problem.

Severe retrenchments in air passenger travel and cargo capacity were announced by our national airline without prior consultation with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard). In fact the concept of using air transportation as a development tool in the Atlantic provinces has never been discussed by our national airline with DREE. I pressed this matter with the president of Air Canada at the transportation committee meeting last Thursday morning, and I invite the minister to read the minutes. Bus transportation has just been cut back in New Brunswick. The main feature of rail passenger service equipment is its age.

In rural areas surrounding our cities there is a great need for a form of public transportation moving people to and from work and to buy goods and services. I would like to see a feasibility study done to determine the viability of a rural-urban bus service performing this function, and to identify possible routes in New Brunswick.

If I had to put my finger on one thing that the Government of Canada could invest in to improve employment opportunities in New Brunswick and the other maritime provinces, I would put my finger on transportation. I would recommend to the minister that transportation be regarded as a development tool in all the Atlantic provinces, and that in applying this principle they look at air transportation, and all weather highways—a comprehensive, modern transportation system that should be put in place in the Atlantic provinces by the Government of Canada as an investment in the economic development of that region. Vast improvements in the quality, scope, and performance of public transportation is essential in all parts of New Brunswick.

The programs of LIP, Canada Works, and Young Canada Works have their functions as labour absorbents for a short term application. They do not and are not intended to go to the root of our economic problems. I suggest, however, that the Department of Manpower might play a great role in identifying—as I have attempted to do in my remarks—the root causes of unemployment, and in recommending to appropriate branches of government at all levels the necessary strategy to deal with these problems.

In my view, the proper vehicle for mounting a meaningful attack on the disparities that exist in the Atlantic provinces is a federal-provincial conference convened by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) and the premiers of the respective provinces, and if we are to carry out the strategy they propose and focus the attention of all departments of government on the problem, the ultimate answer will require the personal direction and dedication of the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have been interested to listen to the observations of the hon. member from Fredericton concerning problems in the economy of his region, and I want to touch on two particular issues. A number of members opposite have lately been comparing statistics from states in the U.S., with statistics in Canada. I think we have to be very cautious in trying to make comparisons on that basis. Since other members have made similar observations, I have taken the trouble to look into the way in which American states arrive at their statistics. Of course I have not looked at all states, but I chose Maine since it is one the hon. member planned to refer to today.

I would argue that no valid comparisons can be made on the basis of statistics gathered in our jurisdiction and those in that state. We have regional statistics which are prepared by Statistics Canada. In the case of unemployment the statistics are prepared by our Department of Labour. These statistics are prepared by a vast household survey which is accurate.

I noted the hon. member's suggestion that statistics be made on a constituency basis as well. Although interesting, it does present problems. The boundaries of constituencies change every few years and comparisons over a period of time would be distorted by that fact. There are rather more constant geographic units which are set regionally, but on balance I think it would be desirable to continue to use the more durable geographic grid than use the constituency basis.

In the State of Maine unemployment statistics are prepared through the unemployment insurance administration. They are generalized from the number of people who apply for unemployment insurance, making some assumptions and using some factors that are obtained from national surveys. In other words, it is a much more indirect and, I would argue, not nearly as accurate a way of making analyses of unemployment in the State of Maine as is used in Canada. Certainly the base is very different, and it has been observed by others more knowledgeable about the two jurisdictions than I that it would be hard to argue which of the two has a higher level of unemployment. One thing that is clear is that the State of Maine has a very different industrial base and structure from New Brunswick.

The hon. member noted a lot of problems and made some suggestions for developing the regional economy of New Brunswick. I know he is aware that DREE is directed toward that, and many of its programs, which he knows better than I, are designed to develop the economy of New Brunswick and to put it on a better footing.

But it is not only DREE that is trying to expand and improve the economy of New Brunswick at the level of the federal government. There are also the budgets of the federal government, in particular the last budget which extended the accelerated capital cost allowance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the parliamentary secretary that the time allotted to him has expired.

FINANCE—PROPOSED FORMATION OF PRIVATE INVESTMENT CORPORATION TO ACQUIRE GOVERNMENT'S INTEREST IN CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I hope that my contributions to the debate today will indicate the lack of true free enterprise thought on the part of the government.

My comments arise out of a question that I asked of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) on June 10. I wanted to know when the Government of Canada might consider following the lead of the government of British Columbia in forming an investment corporation into which it could sell or fold its investments in the Crown enterprises being carried on in Canada today. I submit that the difference is that the government of B.C. inherited the assets it is proposing to put into this corporation from the former socialist government in that province, whereas in the case of the Government of Canada it has made a small attempt at forming such a corporation but it is selling or putting in assets that it acquired or created itself by intrusion into the private sector.

The premier of B.C. said that it was a new corporation which would make share offerings to the public. Shares would be offered through banks, etc., initially to B.C. residents, and later on shares would be sold to the Canadian public. It would not be a Crown corporation but a private corporation working in the private sector. It would have less government ownership than 50 per cent, which is the percentage held by the government in the case of the Alberta Energy Corporation.

The first announcement was that public shareholders would elect the majority of the board of directors and that no government employee would be allowed to serve as an officer, director or employee of the corporation.

The minister gave, as his defence of the government's position, the fact that it had created a few years ago the Canada Development Corporation in which it included some government assets, notably Polysar and its many subsidiaries. Of course it also has in its operations of the CDC, Oil and Gas Limited, Connlab Holdings Limited, Venturetek International Limited, Ventures West Capital Limited, Innocan Investments Limited, Texasgulf Inc., in addition to the one I mentioned, namely, Polysar.

The minister also said that there would be further distributions of shares to the general public. We on this side of the House would like to know when that is likely to happen. We know what the government announced when it founded CDC, but so far the government still owns 65 per cent of the equity in CDC. My information is—and it is hard to tell from the annual report—that the government still owns all the common shares, and that class A preferred shares are held by 21 institutional and industrial enterprises. The class B preferred shares are the only ones which have been offered to the Canadian public, and so far only 17,000 Canadians are shareholders. Of those, some 88 per cent, or 15,000 shareholders, own less than 100 of those shares.

The important thing is to see that a corporation like that gets itself completely separated from the government. The CDC and the minister have failed on that score as well in that the board of directors includes no fewer than three gentlemen who are deputy ministers of this government in Ottawa. It is important that we have corporations like this which are free from government intervention, interference, intrusion or whatever, that they take their task seriously, and that they become independent by having an independent board of directors and by seeing that the public of Canada owns a controlling interest, if not total ownership, so that they can truly be called bodies independent from the government. The minister's answer fails on those three distinct points. It fails on the source of the assets, on the ownership of them, and on the background of the board of directors.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is an interesting question, and the development which has been going on in British Columbia is also interesting.

Speaking for the government I can certainly say that we do not believe in government ownership of enterprises for its own sake. Quite the contrary, this government and the Liberal party stand for the belief that the private sector and the free market are the most efficient means of production. In fact it is the private sector which has been responsible for creating, in countries which have committed themselves to free enterprise and to the free market, the greatest prosperity the world has ever known. Canada, of course, has been a great beneficiary of that approach to economic organization. However, there are times and sectors in which we believe that government ownership is appropriate. In some sectors the enterprises which operate are strategic instruments of government policy, such as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, or one might select some transportation agencies and other companies of the government to make the point. These are agencies which operate and fulfil government or public policies. They are not meant just to be efficient allocators of goods and resources.

In other areas we depart from the principle of the free market and free enterprise because the enterprises are not profitable or because it is in the public interest that we continue. We cannot very well expect the public to be interested in acquiring shares of enterprises which are by their very nature not profitable.

In other cases—and I am thinking particularly of de Havilland Aircraft which is an enterprise in my own riding—there are government acquisitions which are intended to be temporary. Our hope and expectations are that the aerospace industry can be rationalized and that at a certain point down the road Canadian private individuals will become interested in being shareholders of this enterprise.

What about the Canada Development Corporation? It is an excellent idea. It is one of which we are very proud, and its 17,000 shareholders, I observe, are a large number of shareholders. It is not a small number of shareholders, as the hon. member suggested. The purpose in establishing the CDC was to establish a substantial pool of Canadian capital which could be available as a counter-weight to the enormous influence of foreign capital present in Canada.

As the hon. member observed, our intention is that the pool of capital will become privately owned over time and not remain in the control, as a major shareholder, of the federal government. But so long as this is so, I am sure the hon. member will agree there ought to be representatives of the government on the board of directors, and indeed there are, in the form of deputy ministers. He has urged on the government that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary but the time allotted to him has expired. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At 6.27 p.m. the House took recess.

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

PETITION TO END CONTROLS ON JUNE 30, 1977

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Stevens:

That the Anti-Inflation Act being chapter 75, Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76, as amended by chapter 98, Statutes of Canada, 1974-75-76, shall expire on the 30th day of June, 1977.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, before six o'clock, commenting on the quality of the debate, I praised the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) for speaking in human instead of economic and political terms. Now I mention the speech of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) who delivered a written speech. As he admitted, he has not written one for a long time. It came from the soul, was sincere, and set out the history of the last 40 years from a senior civil servant's point of view. The hon. member sounded soothing, just as senior civil servants do when they do not know what to do. At least the hon. member suggested that controls should come off as quickly as possible, but left it at that.

Before six o'clock I also said something which caught the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro). I said that price and wage controls are inflationary, and parliament, by enacting them two years ago, had legislated inflation.

We have heard much talk in this House and across the country these last two years about the rough justice of the controls program, and we have also heard it said that there are distortions in the economy. Such phrases are meaningless unless you understand what they mean in terms of human suffering. I said that in 1976 the farmers of Canada saw a drop in their realized net income of 25 per cent, and it is predicted this year that, because of rising costs, the realized net income of the farmers will drop another 20 per cent. Therefore in two years, under this program, the farmers of Canada, the most efficient people in the whole economy, will lose more than 40 per cent of their realized net income. Their incomes will have declined by that amount.

We heard government spokesmen telling the House today that labour income had gone up some 10 per cent or 13 per cent, that prices had risen only 6.5 per cent, and that labour is ahead of the game. When government spokesmen speak of labour, they mean big labour, not the two thirds of labour which has no powerful union to negotiate a share of the pie.

I am concerned about human values, which is why I speak about the person at the end of the line. How does he feel about inflation? Mr. Speaker, I ask hon. members to think of the plight of those retired on non-indexed pensions. I ask members to think of those who saved their money, those not in a pension plan and seeing the value of their savings dwindle each year. Some sacrificed for a lifetime to secure a pension of $5,000, $6,000 or $7,000 a year. They are the human part of the equation which politicians, economists, and political scientists forget. That is why I praised the remarks of the hon. member for Rimouski. He spoke of what the farmers of Quebec are enduring under price and wage controls. In theory, they are protected by the great minds of this government. In practice, they are being driven out of business. This is the human factor that has to be considered in the decision we are going to make tonight.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner).]

I started out by saying that wage and price controls, dividend controls and all the rest, are inflationary. I will give other examples of what I mean. Think of all the labour unions that knew that the profits were declining, that the best they could expect was 2, 3 or 4 per cent of an increase. How did they feel when wage and price controls were brought in saying that, "Because of the economics of your industry, your increases are limited to 10 per cent"? Naturally they all took the 10 per cent.

I mentioned the case of farmers. I could go on to class after class to demonstrate that price and wage controls have only one raison d'être, one reason for them, that is, to give a temporary shock to the people of the nation to show that we are running downhill in a great hurry. During that time you can freeze, not 6 per cent or 10 per cent, but really freeze. You should use that time to get at the basic causes. I will leave that for a moment and go to another question.

I want to remind parliament, particularly the government, that what we are going through, inflation and employment at the same time, is not a new phenomenon. As the hon. member for Eglinton said today, they now admit that you can have inflation and employment at the same time. Do you know what that means? An ex-senior civil servant has finally convinced himself there may be some reason for doubt. He does not seem to know that for ten or 15 years voices in the wilderness have been raised all over the world, pointing out that the economic theories our leaders were following were not accurate in the quantitative sense.

After the budget of 1976 the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) and myself made back to back speeches, pointing out alternative theories which explained economics in the sense that you can explain it, with unemployment and inflation at the same time. We put forward constructive proposals, both domestically and internationally, showing how we could cope with it. The press paid no attention to us. It was a new subject. We had been told for years by our leaders, and by that I mean the senior civil servants, that we had to trade off unemployment and inflation. I simply point out that what we are suffering here today is not new.

I do not intend to use all my time giving a history lesson to this House. However, just going back 1,000 years, this is the fourth time we have had this situation. Those who even faintly remember their history know that during the period of the dark ages there was almost nil advance. When the dark ages began to lessen, out from the monasteries the monks and priests brought the knowledge and the intelligence of the ancients. They told the people how they could get more production by breeding cattle and breeding grass.

This was the agrarian revolution. It spread throughout Europe, thanks to the knowledge safe for a thousand years in the musty churches. The farmers of the western world used this knowledge. They bred their cattle and bred their grains. A great increase resulted. The result was rising prices. Because there was high production in comparison to previous standards, there was unemployment.

Surely hon. members remember the days of the peasant revolution. Surely they remember the 100 years war. This is all part of our school book history. Some may not remember because they have taken history out of the curriculum for the last number of decades. Prices rose four times during the agrarian revolution. Then they levelled off for 300 years. We learn what to do about this one by looking at our history. There is nothing new in this.

Move ahead 200 or 300 years to what is known as the commercial or banking revolution. That is where somebody discovered that instead of bartering together you use paper money. All over the world things began to flow much more swiftly. All over the world living standards rose. Prices rose as the new phenomenon increased distribution of wealth through paper money and lifted the whole world to new levels. When that was over, once again there was a long period of stability of prices for 100 years.

At the end of the eighteenth century there was the industrial revolution. It was sharp and to the point. Prices doubled again. Then they levelled off for 100 years, and actually went down. At the beginning there was unemployment and higher prices like we have now.

Look at the history of Great Britain, France, and Germany with all its divisions. You will learn the lessons about historic events that every person in this House should know. This particular situation that we face today is not just in Canada. It is all over the world. If one sits down and thinks for a minute, he will know what it is.

When people are short of food, they no longer lie down and die. They stand up and scream for food. People have radio and television. When they have poor living conditions, they no longer accept them like they used to do. They want these material things and want them now, not 100 years from now.

Whether you live in a communist country or in an underdeveloped country in Africa or Asia, the social revolution is here. There are two billion people insisting on enough food to eat, shelter for themselves at night, and a reasonably secure sense of living for the future and their old age. This is the social revolution of our times.

Those who say we need to go to a no growth situation and freeze those people for hundreds and hundreds of years in this poverty stricken situation do not speak with the knowledge of history. Once people get a taste of what it is like to move to a food supply as during the agrarian revolution in the early twelfth, thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, they want to eat. Once they get a taste of trading goods with each other for mutual advantage, they want more of it. Likewise today. It is not only Canadians who want hospitalization, medicare, and a house in which to live. The whole world wants it.

I have not gone back to the decline of the Roman empire because it is identical. I have just taken the last thousand years. We must say to our senior civil servants who have held such a tight grip on western countries these past 30 years, let loose these bonds, let loose this desire to control and restrict us.

Sure, there has to be selective control, because there are some bad apples. The main thing is to let the controls off us. This is not only rough justice, a term originated by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield). It is rough justice. Think of it in terms of the person whose income has gone down 40 per cent in two years. Then you will see what rough justice is.

I appeal not only to the reason but to the heart. Get rid of these controls. Let us get out in a positive constructive way and get at the task we have to face in a world social revolution.

I ask these questions. Can these rising prices and unemployment be stopped? The answer, of course, is yes. How do we adjust to these rising prices and unemployment? That is the question to which we should be putting our minds. How can we make this adjustment equitably so that the burden is borne by all groups and not just a few?

In speeches I have made over the past 12 years I have been trying to put on the record of this House constructive proposals to try to get at these problems, because this is not new. These rising prices did not start in 1973. They just started running away in 1973. They had been with us for years, particularly since 1954.

Take government costs. What do we mean by government costs? Most people think it means the staff employed in the House of Commons or the civil servants employed in Ottawa or in agencies across the country. But that is only a small proportion of government costs. The great proportion of the cost of government today goes to pay for the social services which we all want and which none of us wants to lose. We have never given any attention to the fact that the only way they can be paid for is in price increases. When you face that fact you begin to realize the necessity of delivering social services in a manner which will provide the same social benefits for half the cost.

All the figures are available to the government. Half the costs of our social services today are waste. Half of the costs! We have known this in Saskatchewan for 30 years because we pioneered hospitalization. I have seen the figures produced by the Saskatchewan government—they wanted them kept quiet lest they alarm the people. Consider rising costs in England. Look at the Clark Report of 1958. If people went to the hospital and visited the doctor and were unemployed at the average rate to be expected, the cost would be only half of what it is. All this information has been available for 20 or 30 years, yet parliament goes on and talks about economics, political science. Be cool, they say, and things will be all right.

I belonged to a group of people 30 years ago who put forward a proposal to try to inject a positive incentive into these programs in order to save the social services by delivering them at minimal cost. The services need an individual incentive so that the person who does not abuse them is rewarded for not doing so. Without saying any more about it, let this parliament start getting costs down for the delivery of this fantastic new social revolution in this country. We can well afford them if we get down to paying for what we should be paying for.

I turn now to the money supply. It is very clear that the monetarists, whether it be rightwingers like Friedman or quasi-intellectual leftwingers like Galbraith, are away off in outfield some place. I have a quotation here from an article in Forbes Magazine of last November—the same day as the Quebec election, November 15. It says: "Memo to President Carter: Inflation is now too serious a matter to leave to the economists." If that article had been written 30 years ago we could have made progress by now. The article says:

> Inflation is not—a Maynard Keynes thought and Milton Friedman thinks—a simple matter with social consequences. It is an infinitely complicated business with social causes.

In the great social revolution which is taking place today, there are social forces which cannot be stopped. Who would want to stop the agrarian revolution of the 12th century, with all the increased food it meant to mankind? Who would want to stop the banking revolution of the 17th century with all the great good it did for all the nations on both sides of the Atlantic? Who would want to stop the industrial revolution, with all its high prices and unemployment in the beginning, because it brought so much good to so many millions of people around the world? Nor should we think of stopping this social revolution. That is the crux of my pitch, Mr. Speaker. We have to quit depending on these so-called experts, mostly economists, whose economic theories were obsolete when they were born and are completely suicidal today. This government has to get on with the task.

I want to conclude on this final point about the economists. The exchange value of the dollar is directly related to inflation. But what have we heard from the government? In the words of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) today; nothing. What about interest rates? Today when you buy a house for $50,000 at 12 per cent over 30 years you pay $202,000 for that home. The sum of $152,000 goes into interest. The same figure of 75 per cent of the cost applies in the case of a big oil sands plant in Alberta. Yet these economists continue telling the government it must keep the interest rates high so the people won't spend. How silly, and how wrong they are!

Let us consider living costs around our cities. Can one blame the working man? Twenty years ago a house could be bought in Toronto for $17,000. That home today, with land costs having soared, and construction costs having soared in the last four years, is now worth $65,000 or $75,000. That is a fantastic increase. The problem of land costs around our cities is not an insoluble one, yet the government has done nothing about it.

The Minister of Labour spoke here today about labour confrontation with management. How many hundreds of millions of dollars have the people lost on the working side, on the owners' side and, particularly, on the consumers' side because we have been using obsolete methods of labour-management negotiation? It isn't hopeless, Mr. Speaker. As I have said before, a group of Conservatives went out to the West Coast two years ago and met with labour. We met with management, and on the third day we met with the owners. And today that industry is moving grain to the hungry people of the world and has a no-strike pledge indefinitely because it is based on productivity and because the contract is based on pension portability. That is all it took to give us a no-strike pledge in that industry.

Consider the contract of the miners with Cyprus Anvil in the Yukon. I could cite examples from all across this country. But this is a case where some politicians went out and sat down with labour. They sat down with management and with the owners and came up with a no-strike pledge indefinitely for the movement of food in this country from the West Coast. What the Minister of Labour was talking about this afternoon should have been done 30 years ago. This last two years there has been no action—just talk. Somebody has to face up to these things.

I think that all of these things—cost of government, money supply, exchange value of our dollar, interest rates, land costs around our cities, labour-management confrontation—carry a positive answer. The answer is yes to each one of them—we can do something about them, if we have the will and use basic common sense. But the government does nothing on these economic issues. Faced as we are with a social revolution around the world, our government does nothing. It is too important to leave to the economists. So as we move toward the new economies there are signs of hope.

I now read from an article in the Wall Street Journal of May 9, entitled "Toward a 'New' Economics?" The article mentions that there is a move toward the conservative approach—old-fashioned truths to get at these problems. It mentions the name of a Republican from New York State, speaking in the house. So I got a copy of some of his speeches. Here is a man, Mr. Jack Kemp, saying the same thing in the Congress of the United States as the hon. member for Don Valley and myself have been trying to say around here for the last two or three years. We, of course, have good reason to speak loudly of these new economics because the father of them is a Canadian. We never hear of him in Canada, but his name is Mundell. His American partner is Laffer and, naturally, Mr. Kemp talks about Laffer all the time. But we talk about the father of the idea, Mr. Mundell.

All the subjects I have been reviewing here tonight are mentioned in Mr. Kemp's speeches. A few months ago he was able to get 30 members of the Republican caucus to back him up in Congress. Now, according to the last report I have here, he has all the Republican members coming out solidly for this "new" type of economics which is not really new at all. All it is, is going back to the basic truths which were ignored during our concentration on the theories of Adam Smith, Ricardo, Keynes and Galbraith. Go back to the basic truths, which are very simple—productivity and savings.

● (2030)

I have another article here which casts some light in the darkness. It appeared in the Montreal Gazette on June 15, 1977, under the name of the financial editor, Don McGillivray. The article was entitled "Economists Display Mental Turmoil". Thank God they have enough sense to have turmoil in their minds. For 30 years they have dominated these western countries, and our people are paying a heavy price. I should like to quote some of the words of Don McGillivray as follows:

The tone was set by David Winch of McMaster University who told his fellow economists that they had been too successful in recent decades in selling their version of what human society is all about.

I go further than that and say that they have dominated governments, banks, business, and universities.

The article continues:

For a while their "apparatus of wizardry" seemed to be credible. But now the tricks no longer work.

"When his tricks no longer appear to work," said Winch, "the wise wizard invents new tricks."

That was what John Maynard Keynes, the great British economist, did 40 years ago when he produced the idea that the government should steady the economy by compensating for the ebb and flow of the private sector.

New economists have to escape the "mental shackles" of Keynes who failed to allow that some groups have power—especially corporations and unions—while others have not. Unemployment and stagnation result from this cleavage . . .

But he called on economists to keep watch on the government's proposed watchdog, the post control monitoring agency, because it might well "develop teeth" and grown into the "new, permanent wage and price control agency."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, tonight I am taking this opportunity to take part in a debate which may be of great interest to the House of Commons, but I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, for those who are in the galleries and for the Canadians who will perhaps be reading my comments tomorrow that the debate will the followed by a decision taken in a few minutes as a result of a vote held at about ten o'clock. I think that Canadians will have to realize once again how useless it is to hold such a debate for such a protracted period.

Mr. Speaker, what one might conclude at the end of this three-day debate which began last Thursday is that the opposition knows perfectly well that the government has already decided for all practical purposes, since we have announced it up to a certain extent in a green paper that was tabled recently, that we will indeed get out of controls. The date for the beginning of decontrol has not been announced, of course, but everybody in Canada knows at present that the government, as the result of the experience of the last 20 months, has come during the past few months to the conclusion that they should consider lifting these controls.

Mr. Speaker, tonight's debate, as well as those which took place Thursday and Friday last, as well as today, has been held according to a principle of the House of Commons which enables hon. members or the official opposition to make Canadians aware of specific problems, if that is possible. They have decided, because the legislation allowed them to do so, to have a three-day debate on the controls issue. Mr. Speaker, I have been a member of parliament since 1962, I have been in the opposition for almost four years. I have been on the government side since 1968 and have been a cabinet member for about 21 months.

I would like to relate briefly one of my experiences to my colleagues in the House. When I became a minister and a cabinet member on September 26, 1975, I was given the first formal documents which precisely dealt with the economic situation, its progress during the previous months and prospects for the future. In another paper attached to the same document, some alternatives were offered to me, Mr. Speaker, between status quo, measures that one might have called incentives and measures that one had to recognize as well as slightly coercive.

In the preceding months, the government had had to face the staunch criticism, coming from the opposition on the one hand, but also coming from the media and public opinion in general, to the effect that inflation had become quite unbearable. Inflation had reached a level of 10 or 11 per cent. In the collective agreements in the process of being negotiated, demands were raised for increases of up 15 and 25 per cent and there were even some for up to 50 per cent. A record hike in prices was forthcoming, Mr. Speaker, therefore, the government found itself in a position where it had to intervene.

I remember quite well, because it is still fresh in my memory, that confronted by this situation, my colleagues from the cabinet and myself decided to impose the controls. This decision was reached only after lengthy discussions, extensive analysis of the situation and that was not done easily; this decision was taken as the only means, at that time, to counteract this spiraling inflation which was undermining the economy of our country, causing restriction in the field of investments and thereby diminishing them, and also eroding quite significantly the purchasing power of Canadians.

It is quite obvious that this decision was not taken lightheartedly and one only needs to remember that when the Prime Minister announced it, it was a very difficult decision to make because it would surely be quite unpopular.

Mr. Speaker, being a labour leader, I know quite well that when they saw the inflation situation the workers themselves realized that there must be an authority which would say to businesses and labour unions that they must sit down and keep quiet for a while. That is what this government decided in October 1975. Every individual knew he would be affected by that decision. He hoped he would be affected less than others and he even hoped that he would not be affected at all by that decision. Of course, during the first weeks and months after the announcement of that decision, when control measures were applied, nobody was happy. The workers were concerned but so was the business community. Nobody knew exactly what would be the terms of the controls. Nobody knew what would be the details for every category. Nobody knew how wages and salaries would be controlled in detail. We did not know how profits and prices would be controlled. On the other hand, we all recognized that controlling wages would be relatively easy, but we all admitted that controlling prices and profits in the business sector was much more complex and much more difficult. We, in the government, knew this before making our decision. This is why our decision was hard to make, but we knew that we had to make it. This is why during the last twenty months, we have witnessed a gradual increasing of the support for the government and for these measures.

After two or three months, polls were taken about the degree of support and satisfaction of Canadians concerning this decision of the government. We were not popular. Indeed the degree of support was not very high throughout the Canadian nation, but today when the opposition asks us to eliminate controls abruptly, quickly and suddenly, the polls tell us that more than 60 per cent of Canadians support the controls, and not only support them, but ask us to maintain them because they are aware that they have contributed to bringing back some good sense, some logic, some order in the economy, because thay have contributed to reducing what we can call the excessive expectations that some had these last few years.

We said that we were not happy to implement the control program. We said in October 1975 that these controls would be applied for a maximum of three years. We said recently that we are ready to see, in consultation with the affluent economic groups of our society, how we could put an end logically and in an orderly manner to these controls over Canadian economy. This is what we have been doing for several months. And the opposition is well aware that during these last few months, we have conducted a series of intensive consultations with the private sector, the financial groups, the workers, their representatives, in other words, all the important sectors of our economy. We have sat down, we have discussed with them what would eventually be an ideal formula, the one best suited to bring us to a situation where there would no longer be any controls. We do not want controls, but being realistic, we know very well that there is still a need for certain controls in the Canadian economy.

Last week I was fortunate enough to have the opportunity to travel through this country. For some months I have been pushing aside the kind of commitments I was asked to undertake. I was forced to delay trips in the Atlantic area and in the western provinces. I am a Quebecer and a minister in the Canadian House of Commons, and I knew it would help me a lot if I were exposed to my fellow Canadians in all parts of the country. I knew very well that sitting here is not the best place—it is a good place, but it is obviously not the best place— to assess the mood of the people, what they need and what they want. Of course I admit we need to debate to some extent.

While I was in Cape Breton I did some checking on Devco's activities. I must tell my colleague over there that I travelled through his riding. I was forced to do so because of bad weather; I could not land where I was supposed to, so I had to drive through his riding. I drove through Pictou, and that area is just wonderful. I must say that the kind of reports that we get in this place, the kind of description we have from our colleagues in the opposition, would tend to paint a certain picture. I admit there are difficulties, but the picture is much more beautiful that some people in this House tend to depict. They still have difficulties. We all have difficulties, no matter where we live.

I had the chance to travel last week and the week before in P.E.I., Nova Scotia, and Cape Breton. I have been to Halifax before, and I know my hon. friend will agree with me that Halifax is not Nova Scotia, any more than Paris is France, or Quebec or Montreal is the whole of the province of Quebec. When I was in Cape Breton a few days ago I stayed for 24 hours in a private house and had dinner with a fine family. I slept at the house and breakfasted with this family and talked with them for 12 hours, so I can report to the House that what these members here are saying is not at all the truth. They cut those parts that do not suit their purpose.

I know we have much more support for our policies, which is why tonight I am able to stand in this place and tell my colleagues across the way and my hon. friends on this side—I make that distinction—that things are not exactly what hon. members opposite say.

I was going to fly to the Northern Territories and travel around during the next few days—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Whose jet did you use?

Mr. Lessard: I took a commercial plane and I flew by government plane too. How can you get up there otherwise? There is no way. It is a long road if you want to walk. Obviously I have to respond to those guys over there, Mr. Speaker, and that is what I am doing tonight.

These people who are asking to put an end to the controls on the economy of this country do not represent Canadians at all, absolutely not. Two days ago I met with a group of people in northern B.C. and they told me that we were right. In the Vancouver Sun of Friday there was an editorial which was asking the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) why the hell—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Order.

Mr. Lessard: —he was calling for a three day debate to put an end to controls when he had nothing to suggest except something which was very close to the kind of controls we are proposing we adopt for the remaining period. The people in Canada are not fooled by what is going on, Mr. Speaker. They know that what we have decided to do is the right decision. It was a hard decision to arrive at; they are prepared to recognize that.

Hon. members opposite are in deep trouble, Mr. Speaker, and I will tell you why. They are calling for an end today to the controls on the economy of this country. Some of them pretend that the cost of food is too high. I was quoted as having expressed my disbelief at what I saw in the north a few days ago. When I saw the cost of food and other basic commodities in the northern territories, for instance, it was hard for me to believe that people living up there have to pay that kind of price for a loaf of bread.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: This is all your fault.

• (2050)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The minister has the floor, and I suggest we listen.

Mr. Lessard: So one day we say that the price of food here in the south is much too high. I say that it may be too high.

An hon. Member: Where is the AIB?

Mr. Lessard: But, my God, there is quite a difference with what they have to pay up north. It is a great pity that we, as a group of Canadians sitting here tonight, should consider what these people up north have to pay for food and not find a solution to bring down the price of food to a reasonable level for people in the far north.

Mr. Fraser: I wonder if through you, Mr. Speaker, the minister would accept a question.

Mr. Lessard: Sure, I am not afraid of a question.

Mr. Fraser: The minister talks about the cost of food in the north. Some of us were in the north many years ago and we know that the cost of food there has always been much higher than in the rest of the country. The minister has spent some minutes now putting that up as a straw factor in defending the government's policy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): That is not a point of order; it is a point of debate.

Some hon. Members: It is a question.

Mr. Fraser: It is not true and I suggest, through you, Mr. Speaker, that the minister is picking as an example a situation which has prevailed for the last two and a half decades.

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Paproski: Yes or no?

Mr. Lessard: —I tend to agree with the hon. member that the price of food up north has always been higher than down here.

An hon. Member: What are you going to do about it?

Mr. Lessard: The fact that the cost has been higher does not mean necessarily that it is O.K. for me to accept it. If I stand today in this place to speak about it, it is because I have not heard it being expressed as a major issue in this place. It should be a major issue. When the opposition starts to lash at the government because of the price of food here in Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver, I say to them, that that is not the real issue in this country.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The farmers don't get any of it.

Mr. Lessard: Again I am inclined to agree with that, but what I want to raise here is the fact that tonight we are taking part in the last part of a three day debate on inflation, and I must say, from what I was able to hear and what I was able to read in the notes here on the points made by the opposition, that I have not heard anything new and, what is worse, I have not heard any proposal made—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lessard: —anything that would solve the situation.

An hon. Member: That is nonsense.

Mr. Lessard: I have here a resume of most of the speeches that were made by the major spokesmen of the opposition, and I find nothing in them that would reassure Canadians that there is an opposition on that side. Quite the contrary. They have no solutions to offer, none whatsoever.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate because I think that my colleagues and myself, as a member of the cabinet, would have wished contructive and realistic suggestions from the opposition. Unfortunately those dear friends are very far from reality, as my colleague from Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) has pointed out, they are so far from reality, from Canadian concerns. And several Canadians I met recently in remote areas told me that in Ottawa we spend too much time discussing various subjects and that we have no opportunity to communicate directly with Canadians throughout the country. I recognize those difficulties of our duties here.

The House must necessarily hold debates and pass legislation, budgets and other things but, Mr. Speaker, if we really wish to represent public opinion and meet the interests and the needs of our constituents, we must meet them more regularly and be more aware of their needs. And this is why when we hold that kind of debate, I realize that it would be advisable to have new rules allowing hon. members representing the official opposition in a realistic way to show the bad aspects of our legislation, to show the mistakes we might be doing without extending unduly the debates and doing the contrary of what should be done here, I mean make the best possible decision, with some weaknesses of course. In fact, the situation changes, the needs change and a measure we pass in all objectivity today will not necessarily meet the needs of the situation within one year, within five years. This is why this House and this system should be flexible.

Three days of debate to know if the government should put an immediate end to controls, Mr. Speaker, this is too much. One day would have been enough. Several editorialists, several reports, several people who have been studying that debate already came to the conclusion that it has lasted too long, that one day would have been enough to put the question and present the issue. A speaker from each party would have been enough. It started Wednesday, this is the fourth day. I am wrong, Mr. Speaker. I realize that it really took a long time.

Two or three speakers from the main opposition parties, Mr. Speaker, should normally have been able to present the views of their party. Three or four speakers from the government could also have answered, and then the problem could have been solved. But no, we are in a fourth day of debating if the control measures should be immediately abolished. This debate will not bring much change because the opposition has brought no new idea forward.

This morning the whole cabinet held discussions with 15 groups from all areas across the country which came to sit with us. If that is not consultation, Mr. Speaker, if that is not listening besides what we have to listen to here in the House, what is consultation? I am asking. We are open to suggestions. We are willing to listen to realistic and objective propositions. That is what we did this morning once more when we listened to those organization representatives which presented their views. I realize, Mr. Speaker, that the government can count on the support of a great majority of Canadians, because the population also realizes what we are doing, what we have done, what we want to do in the future, in a few weeks and in a few months, is exactly adapted to the needs and desires of Canadians. That is what this government wants to do. That is also leading the way. Leadership, that is what this country needs and that is what this government, and particularly its leader, wants and shows, and will still show tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the present debate and the vote that will be taken tonight will not accomplish much.

Mr. La Salle: What about the million people unemployed?

Mr. Lessard: The hon. member refers to a million people unemployed in this country—

● (2100)

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Who's fault is it? You did it.

Mr. Neil: Who caused it all?

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Precisely, Mr. Speaker, if we had not brought in those controls, we might have a greater number of unemployed. Businesses want to invest. The cost is too high in this country. They prefer to invest elsewhere, and I know something about that. In my department we are faced with situations and propositions like that every day. Businesses say: it is better to invest in the United States. Labour, installation and construction costs are all too high in Canada. We are told that regularly.

That is where the controls applied last fall are important, that is where it is important to keep them on for a few months, Mr. Speaker, when there will be a consensus, when there will be agreement between governments, private businesses and groups representing workers. And that is the kind of consensus we need. Unless that consensus is there, Mr. Speaker, there is no point in putting an end to controls; quite the contrary, they will have to be further maintained for several years. I am not for that. I am against controls, but unless we can find a way to discipline ourselves as Canadians, as workers, as businesses, if we cannot control ourselves unfortunately someone will have to decide to control us, and that is the predicament we were in exactly 20 months ago, Mr. Speaker, and that is why we are now urging all members of the opposition to lay their short term political concerns aside. Indeed, that is not serving them very well. They would be better off to lay them aside because that does not help them. The polls prove it indeed.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. minister that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, would the minister accept a very short question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I am sorry. The minister's time has expired, and there is a previous ruling limiting speeches to 30 minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I listened very attentively to the comments of the Minister of Regional and Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard). Of course, he praised the good intentions of his government. However, I would like to correct one thing. He talked about the length of this debate. It does seem that the rules of this Parliament allow us to take four days but there was agreement to take three days for this debate and the government representative was in full agreement with that.

From the minister's point of view, this debate is a worthless exercise because his government has already declared its intention to abolish controls! We would like to give our confidence to the government, but thinking back about the 1974 elections and the commitments made by this government, you will understand, Mr. Speaker, that it is difficult to believe them when they say they will remove controls, when we remember how they condemned them in 1974 and the way they reversed their policy in 1975.

The minister is talking about negotiations, the series of consultations going on today. I wonder if it would not be normal to invite this government to ask themselves why these negotiations, these consultations, did not take place before the controls.

Mr. Lessard: We have had a great many.

Mr. Olivier: Is the hon. member for Joliette serious?

Mr. La Salle: Indeed, I am very serious. The hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) knows perfectly well what happened today. Of course the need is now felt to go through those consultations, those important bodies in an economy such as ours did not trust this government, as evidenced by their position during the 1974 election which left a number of interrogation marks. We now see that this government feels the need to get the support of those important organizations.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) in 1970 travelled throughout Canada to warn this government against that calamity, as inflation was already called, because it was recognized as a danger. I do not think any member of this House did so much as the former leader of this party to make Canadians and the government aware of the menacing danger, but he was ridiculed and we are now asked why we wanted this debate. If the government had taken heed when warned by the then opposition leader, we would have been spared the kind of politicking that went on in the 1974 election. If this government had been honest in 1974, it would have recognized, as every Canadian is now aware, that we were right in 1974. Times were right in 1974 to take the initiatives we were urging. But so much time was lost that irreparable harm was done. And now the minister states it was not in good faith and with a happy heart that controls were established in 1975.

The unpalatable thing for the government was not to establish controls, but to know that the people had been willingly misled in 1974. So it was not easy to establish controls on responsible organizations and the Canadian people. This is why the government and especially the cabinet were hesitant. The then leader of the opposition spoke in 1974 of a 90-day freeze as a means of establishing a mechanism to slow down inflation, and nothing else. We were not speaking of continuing controls as the government is now implying in case it does not get the cooperation and support and trust of the provinces, labour unions and the business community. Of course, we admit that it is important, and that it is impossible to implement those measures efficiently without the cooperation of major organizations. We knew it, and that is why we thought that 90 days would be sufficient to set up that mechanism or device which could have enabled the Canadian people to achieve the objective we set at that time. Mr. Speaker, I intend to endorse fully the motion now before the House.

I support this motion with utmost conviction and sincerity, the more so because I feel I am expressing the opinion and the deep feeling not only of my constituents, but also of millions of Quebecers, whatever their political affiliation. But before coming to the object of the debate, I consider useful and even indispensable to remind hon. members of the poor performance of this administration in the area of inflation over the past six or seven years. I feel this is necessary to place in its true historical perspective the major intervention which the official opposition is now trying to make and which I proudly support.

Mr. Speaker, it is easy to say that the Canadian public will be disappointed by our position in this debate. It is also easy to say that the Standing Orders should be amended to gag the opposition, but it would be too easy for the government, by improving or amending these Standing Orders, to prevent us from increasing the people's awareness of this public lie which was told in 1974. I think it is important that all Canadians know the real reasons behind the government's action, its refusal of those measures in 1974 and the reasons why they decided later on to implement those same measures. When the first symptoms appeared, the government thought that it would be enough to pretend fighting inflation for it to disappear. So they established the Prices and Incomes Commission, they willingly neglected to provide it with the needed tools to be efficient and operate a real recovery. Needless to say, the commission could not do anything valid and the problem kept on worsening. During all that time, the government did not take the problem seriously, allowed the situation to deteriorate rather than grapple with it and tried to warrant its inaction with sophisms like "inflation is a world problem" or "if we want imported products we will have to pay the price asked for them".

But the prices were still increasing, not only for imported goods but also for consumer oriented products. Prices were constantly increasing and, consequently, we know the problems facing the public. After some years of efforts and the useless spending of $5 million, the Prices and Incomes Commission came to the conclusion, in a report kept secret by the government, that it would be necessary to control prices and incomes. Was the Prime Minister aware at that time of the inflation threat to Canada? He must have been because he said back in 1970 and I quote:

> Continuous inflation would undermine our economy, dangerously alter the structure and the stability of our society and affect the credibility of our political institutions. In the long run, it would be a threat against our future, both as a society and as a nation. It is obvious that the more inflation rises, the more difficult it will be to control it and the more costly it will be to put an end to it.

The words I have just quoted were not spoken, Mr. Speaker, by the then leader of the opposition, whom, in passing, the government members delighted in calling a prophet of evil; they were spoken by the Prime Minister himself, and not recently, but seven years ago.

That being the situation, and in the face of the failure of the Prices and Incomes Commission to check inflation, one would have thought that the government would have considered it timely to implement immediately the recommendation of the commission by advocating prices and incomes controls. But no, the government was not going to take the chance of losing its popularity by introducing controls. Once again, it chose to spare its popularity with the electors at the expense of the Canadian economy, and to keep up appearances it set up to succeed the commission another invertebrate monster the Food Prices Review Board. Another toothless effort, another adventure for gobbling up public moneys and creating jobs for friends. The board once again, even more so than the commission, revelled in words while inflation continued to ravage the country. And, during those years, Mr. Speaker, going from commission to board, and from board to statements which were meant to be reassuring, the government danced its favorite waltz, that of indecision. Now it would allow unemployment to grow in the hopeless hope of containing inflation, now allow inflation to rise again in the hopeless hope of containing unemployment. Either way it did not settle the matter, and this is a failure for most Canadian people, Mr. Speaker. Inflation has now reached its highest point since the Korean war and it goes on increasing at a tremendous rate while there are one million unemployed in our country and while the situation could become still worse.

At the outset of the election campaign in 1974, our party submitted to the Canadian voters a daring yet sincere and realistic project to reduce inflation. We advocated a freeze on prices and incomes during a 90-day period to give us time to consult the provincial governments, financial circles, business leaders, unions and consumers on the objectives which might be set and which could be adjusted periodically. Government members, led by the Prime Minister, found nothing better than ridiculing our plan in the face of the nation. Do not trust the Conservatives, they said, they are going to freeze everything, from food prices to the wages of newspaper carriers.

They worked so hard at it that inflation was given a free hand to increase more than ever. Yet, the government knew at that time that we were right, that no matter how it went about it, willingly or otherwise it would have to resort to price and income controls. I repeat that the government knew it would have to apply this formula and that is why I repeat before the House that this government did lie on that issue. It would like us now to keep silent, not to say a word about it. I suggest that Canadians need to know exactly why this government condemned measures which it applied eight months later; it was nothing but a vote-catching manoeuvre. Besides, it was so obvious that our former party leader in a speech delivered in Magog towards the end of the election campaign, did not hesitate to declare and I quote:

> If the present government is voted back in power, inflation will go on increasing.

He was not wrong either.

> And then in two months, four months or six months inflation will reach such a level that the government will have no other alternatives and will impose control on prices and incomes.

Our leader made the following statement before the 1974 election:

> But the difference between doing it now and doing it eventually is that, if we wait, it might be too late to stop the damages and we will then find ourselves in an economic depression.

Pronounced three years ago, these words of the ex-leader of my party have turned out to be tragically prophetic. Therefore, this government has been misleading the Canadian people on the matter of inflation for seven years now. We talked about unemployment, we could talk about its just society and its objective of national unity. This government has been constantly cheating the country on the matter of its basic goals and it is going on playing the same game, hiding itself behind the curtain of national unity. It has come to the point where national unity or national harmony is unattainable without first restoring an acceptable economic climate and this is true for all provinces. But above all the Prime Minister and the members of his cabinet have behaved in this shameful and dishonest manner during the 1974 election campaign, because they knew very well, while they were condemning the controls from the electoral platforms, that they were bound to impose them a few months later.

I remember hearing this cynical sentence from the Prime Minister when, during the same campaign, he had to face reporters with the last statistics on the cost of living which was dramatically increasing. He would only say: "Let us take things coolly." But cool or not, he had to impose controls eight months later. We have been living with them for twenty months now. They did not work very well. And this is why we are asking the government to put an end to these controls. They were not a success for many reasons and one of the main ones is that they were imposed without previously consulting the different sectors of our economy. Jean-Luc Pepin, chairman of the board, has admitted in committee that this 90-day freeze period would have been very useful to set out the means to control inflation.

The Chairman of the board recognized it: he resigned, as a matter of fact. He and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) know the real reason for his departure. We advocate—

An hon. Member: What reason?

Mr. La Salle: The Prime Minister and Mr. Pepin know it, but I do not.

An hon. Member: Do not talk of things you know nothing about.

Mr. La Salle: Neither do you, for you hardly know anything about the Prime Minister. We were advocating a 90-day freeze so as to proceed with a consultation which would have allowed us to reach some consensus about the goals to pursue and the means to reach them. The government chose to dictate in its traditional believe-or-die approach. This total lack of consultation made the various sectors of the economy uncomfortable, with no confidence towards controls and government economic policies, especially since the establishment of controls, the federal government did practically nothing to reduce the inflationary spiral; not only did it fail to restrict its own expenditures since then, in spite its pious wishes, but it even found a way to increase them by over 20 per cent and it is a government which was supposed to provide leadership, so that due to the lack of economic confidence, investments are decreasing, small and medium-sized businesses are incurring deficits as a result of an inflation and in some cases must close their doors, unemployment is increasing—

An hon. Member: What about the PQ?

Mr. La Salle: I will come back to that, Mr. Speaker. Unemployment is increasing, the economy is regressing and the government is giving funds right and left, for unemployment insurance or all kinds of subsidies to enable the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to restore a faltering economy.

Quite recently we were still referring to a reduction of 2,000 employees in the footwear industry, Mr. Speaker. I am not lying when I say that those controls have been ineffective and when the minister asks what are our proposals, we are specifically demanding the removal of those measures which did not attain the objectives sought by this Parliament and consequently, those investors, business heads who would be aware of the long-term measures of the government, which they do not know, could be responsible for an economic recovery, because those policies and the government's waiting have stopped the decisions of the business community.

In our view, Mr. Speaker, the only way to stimulate the economy at the present time is to abolish the controls and to replace them by less strict measures which, at the same time as they would curtail inflation, would above all restore an atmosphere of confidence in investment, and would in turn rapidly increase productivity and create employment. It is very possible that the government does not intend to maintain the controls indefinitely, but that is not the question. The question is to suppress them immediately to accelerate economic recovery. The government can and must not make a second mistake with the controls, and delay suppressing them as it delayed introducing them. The Prime Minister likes to talk about crimes against national unity, well I think it would be one, and a serious one, to prolong beyond the next two weeks a system of price and wage control which is dangerously jeopardizing our economy and creating concern and hardship for thousands of people in this country.

But let us not forget that in this House we are probably among the privileged. When we talk about inflation the objectives which we are given are seen with our reason. For those who earn $20,000 and more, it is always possible to make ends meet, and we can accommodate ourselves and pay for our cigarettes or any other products once the price have been raised, but the real victims of inflation are not in this House, Mr. Speaker. These are the workers, men and women who have to bear the real burden of inflation, or those for whom any salary raise is automatically eaten up by a similar raise in prices. The real victims of inflation are above all those who live on a pension or on small savings—

An hon. Member: What about the pensioners?

Mr. La Salle: Someone is talking about pensioners who have been given a 60-cent raise from time to time. Well, if the Liberal members are satisfied and if they can prove that the raise in old age pension payments corresponds to a similar raise in the cost of living, go and tell this to those who have to manage on a miserable old age pension. Or to those who try to survive on a meagre pension and who are unemployed, or to the one million unemployed, who are below the poverty level.

I was going to forget to mention the student population, Mr. Speaker, for whom scholarships have not been increased while educational costs kept rising. This government could not care less about the misery and the problems suffered by people because of a policy which has not been efficient and which, according to many, has been a total failure if we compare ourselves with our neighbour to the south who, without controls, has succeeded better than us in keeping inflation at a reasonable rate.

What all these people are asking, Mr. Speaker, is that Parliament stop playing the game of politics and instead care for their future and their well-being. In a country that can offer so much hope and promises as ours, I cannot accept that for partisan reasons, the social crisis and the economic injustice that prevail are allowed to continue indefinitely. It seems to me that more so than ever time has come to close ranks and work together to correct these problems and put our country back on the track of prosperity. Mr. Speaker, these are our objectives and I would not hide the fact that I am very disappointed to see so many government members taking refuge behind a few ministers who are trying to defend an objective that has been the sorry failure which we know, while others seem to have found an opportunity to play games. I do not mind being told about the government of Quebec, Mr. Speaker, but some find it amusing, as I said not so long ago, to provoke a government that has problems of its own, which is also still part of our country. Sitting opposite are some 60 members coming from that province who are not overly concerned about the problems we are experiencing in Quebec. They feel as if they were here to contend with this government, to stay aloof instead of proving that it is possible to restore a better economic climate in my province, well before the time when separation becomes the prime issue.

I feel as much of a Quebecer as anybody else from that province. I reject as much as anyone else in this House the idea of independence but I think it is most urgent, Mr. Speaker, to prove to Quebecers that by restoring economic progress in our province, it is not necessary to become independent to achieve our legitimate aspirations. But this I do not do in a spirit of partisanship, of political manoeuvering, as my colleagues opposite, and when I say how important it is to help the province of Quebec which is experiencing tremendous difficulties, to bring down the unemployment rate, when I am asking the federal government to cooperate with its Quebec counterpart, there is nothing new in my stand. I did it in the times of Daniel Johnson. I did it in the times of my little cousin Robert Bourassa, and I will do it again today. They accuse us, members of the opposition, of being separatists, because we defend the interests of a province which I call my own: that's the way they are treating us. Well, I want Quebecers to know how these people remain silent during majors debates, how they hide behind scarecrows, or follow too faithfully the instructions of their leaders.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that by repeating these remarks often enough, we shall instill in government members a more positive attitude, and that we shall also find a way to help Quebec and the other provinces which are faced with this record unemployment, and thus, reach the objectives and fulfill the expectations of all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the official opposition has moved a motion saying that the Anti-Inflation Act should expire at the end of June. I point out that the Liberal government introduced controls for limiting wage and salary increases and, supposedly, profit increases.

Before we are called on to vote on the motion, let us examine the history of this policy. The Conservative party proposed, in 1972, 1973 and 1974 a freezing of wages and prices. It said the government should intervene drastically in the process whereby prices and profits in the economy are established. Our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) rejected those proposals, making the point time and again that much of Canadian inflation resulted from the interplay of international forces over which Canada had no control, and that the wage and price freeze would not work.

In the 1974 election campaign the major issue was whether or not to implement wage and price, or wage and profit controls and limitations. The Conservative opposition advocated those controls, or such a policy, but the Prime Minister travelled from one end of the country to the other telling people that no government he led would ever be involved in such a program, that it would not work, would be unfair, and so on. The Prime Minister succeeded. He won the election. In Ontario, Liberal members were elected, defeating sitting Conservative and NDP candidates. And what happened?

In 1975 the Prime Minister, who had promised not to implement controls, did just that. He implemented wage and profit controls. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) told the House on Friday that the Prime Minister had always said that the Liberal government was ready with an alternate program to deal with inflation, if it became an emergency, and tried to convince members and the people of Canada, as the Liberals have been trying since October, 1975, that indeed an emergency existed. The hon. member said, I think, that although he believes in limited controls, so long as we have unemployment we must have controls. He completely ignored the fact that unemployment has risen dramatically since the government implemented the controls program.

● (2130)

Figures can be used to make a point, even if it is not true. On Friday the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) used figures to make a point in that way. On Thursday the minister said that when the government implemented its anti-inflation program, the rate of inflation on an annual basis was 10.6 per cent. Lo and behold, the anti-inflation program has been so successful that, according to the minister, the rate of inflation dropped from 10.6 per cent, the date the program was put into effect, to 6.2 per cent in October, 1976.

Like other members of this House, when I go shopping with my wife I find there is not one item in any supermarket which has not increased substantially in price since October, 1975. When I sign the monthly cheque for heating the house, I see that the cost has gone away up. The cost of oil will probably go up by $2 a barrel by July 1. That will mean another 1 per cent increase in the cost of living.

I looked at the figures for the first five months of 1977 which were put out by Statistics Canada. I did that because I was flabbergasted by the minister's claim that the rate of inflation had been driven down to 6.2 per cent as a result of the anti-inflation program. I found that in February, 1977, the cost of living increased by 9/10 of 1 per cent. In March it increased by 9/10 of 1 per cent, in April by 1 per cent, in May by 6/10 of one per cent, and in June by 8/10 of 1 per cent. Therefore in the first five months of 1977 the cost of living went up by 4.2 per cent.

Taking into account the $2 a barrel price increase there will be in July, we are looking at an increase in the cost of living for the year 1977 of between 9 and 10 per cent. Therefore we are right back to where we were when the government first brought in its anti-inflation program.

The Prime Minister was right in the 1974 election campaign when he said that wage and price controls would not keep the cost of living down, that the cost of living had gone up because of external factors over which we had little or no control. As a result of 18 months of wage and price controls we have a situation where, in 1977, the cost of living will go up by almost the same amount as in the year 1975 when the government brought in this program.

We were told that the program would control wages and salaries on one hand and prices on the other. We know what the program has done in terms of wages and salaries. It is as we in the NDP and most economists predicted when the program was first proposed by the Prime Minister.

It is relatively easy to control wages and salaries. People are paid once or twice a month. It is not difficult through legislation to put a limit of 6, 8 or 10 per cent, or whatever some bureaucrat in the Department of Finance who earns over $60,000 a year believes to be a fair amount. The government has been fairly successful in that regard. The minister pointed out how much lower wage settlements were this year than in 1975. Of course they are lower. Workers and unions know they cannot force their companies to break the law. If the law puts a limit on the amount of increases permitted, the unions and the companies have to live up to that law.

When the minister says that expectations have come down, he is 100 per cent dead wrong. As soon as the controls come off, the workers will ask for wage and salary increases as high as they believe they can get. That will depend on the buoyancy of the economy and the profitability of the company for which they work.

We have been told that the major reason for the anti-inflation program was the exorbitant, unreasonable, pie in the sky demands being made by workers in the private and public sector. Let us look at what is happening in the private sector.

In 1974 wage demands in the private sector were very high. It should not have surprised cabinet ministers and senior officials in the Department of Finance. However, they have tunnel vision. In 1974 they woke up to the fact that workers were demanding large increases. Where were they in 1972, 1973, and the first half of 1974? In those three years profits of major corporations increased by about 35 per cent each year. Therefore profits went up by more than 100 per cent in those three years. The percentage of gross national income which went to corporation profits rose from 10.5 per cent to over 14 per cent.

Anybody who knew anything about how the economy works and the basis on which labour-management negotiations are conducted would have expected high wage demands in 1974, as there were. If the government had wanted to cool that, it should have ensured in 1972, 1973, and the first part of 1974 that profits were not too high. Instead, the government gave more tax cuts to corporations, more concessions to mining and oil companies, and faster write-offs to manufacturing industries. The result was that corporation profits rose again and again. In fact they rose by more than 100 per cent.

It is not surprising that workers in private industry were asking for, and on occasion striking for, very high wage increases. Some of us were told privately by senior public servants that the government was not too worried by wage increases in the private sector. They knew they could only get wages commensurate with the profitability of the companies. The employees could not push their wages to the point that the companies would not make a profit or the companies would cut back and there would be no jobs. What the government was worried about was the exorbitant demands being made by workers in the public sector at the federal, provincial, and municipal levels. We were never given many examples of exorbitant increases, but that was the thinking which supposedly went into making the anti-inflation program a necessity.

I suggest to members on the other side that we did not need an anti-inflation program, that we did not need legislation. If employees in the public sector were demanding too much it was the business of the government to say no. What we have seen is the government saying no to workers in the lower brackets, to workers who are unskilled or semi-skilled. What we have seen is a government willing to give more and more to the people at the top. Let me offer a couple of illustrations.

Hon. members know that senior civil servants at the very top are now getting in the neighbourhood of $65,000 a year. They have received substantial increases. What members may not know, although the former president of the Treasury Board knows it, is that the number of senior executive employees has doubled and redoubled. In a period of about ten years the number of SX employees went from some 380 in 1968 to 1,250 by 1975. That superstructure is tremendously expensive to maintain, and I am not at all convinced it is necessary in terms of getting a better, more efficient, and more humanitarian government.

There has been no evidence to substantiate the growth which has taken place. We were told that we needed the anti-inflation program because Canadian workers were making excessive demands, because Canadian wages were rising at such a rapid rate that Canada was pricing itself out of the market. Well, there is no question that sales of major Canadian companies have been reduced substantially in the last 18 months. But there is no evidence at all that we have priced ourselves out of the market, no evidence at all that the productivity of Canadian workers has declined or, specifically, that it has declined relative to productivity in the United States, our major competitor.

What has happened is that Canadian sales of such major products as metals—one of our major exports—have dropped. This is not because workers in the industry have demanded and received wage increases which have priced the product out of the market. Sales have dropped because of the economic slowdown in the United States, Japan, and the western world generally.

Let me quote from an article I came across in the Winnipeg Tribune of Wednesday, June 15, written by Steven Kelman of the Financial Times Service. The heading is: "Low Demand for Major Metals Decreases Prices and Earnings". The writer says, and I quote:

> Repressed by sluggish world economic recovery, the demand for many metals—copper, zinc, lead and nickel—remains below expectations of investors. Consequently, inventories of these metals are historically high, depressing the earnings of metals and minerals producers. Mining and metals analysts expect prices of most metals to remain at low levels at least until the fall when they might begin to rise if economic recovery leads to some reduction of inventories. Even with this scenario, however, investors can anticipate several quarters before producers report higher earnings.

The article lists some of the reasons why earnings are lower, and then goes on to say:

> Metals overproduction: The late 1960s and early 1970s were a period of major world mine expansion intended to meet a high consumption rate. But the growth rate of metals use diminished with the escalation of energy costs. Metal prices, without a major pickup in demand, will continue to be depressed.

The writer explains that there are high inventories of copper and other metals held around the world. Then he goes on to state:

> High inventories: Manufacturers' fears of labor stoppages among major U.S. copper and zinc producers led to substantial hedge buying in advance of normal needs during the past six months. Adding to this were fears of copper shortages stemming from the political turmoil in Zaire, a major African producer.
> Widespread discounting: With large inventories and little likelihood of a short-term gain in demand, many producers discount posted prices, making a shambles of industry attempts to hold prices. Many analysts expect further weakness in metals prices, at least until the fall.

Hon. members will notice that he does not talk about wages in the industry being a factor at all in the decline of sales, and I suggest that if an analysis is made of the lumber industry or of the pulp and paper industry or, indeed, of any of the major industries which earn dollars for Canada, we would find the same situation existing.

May I point out that the price of wheat has fallen by almost 50 per cent? This has nothing to do with the wage level in Canada; it is based entirely on the demand for the grain in the western world which purchases most of our crop. I contend, therefore, as I believe the facts will prove, that we have not licked inflation and that the program has been a failure, as we in this party predicted and as most economists predicted at the time.

To meet the so-called threat of inflation the government had another program beside the limiting of wage and salary claims and, supposedly, the limiting of prices. Let me remind hon. members of what the Minister of Finance has finally had to admit after a year and a half of prodding from the New Democrats. As we predicted, the controls on wages and salaries has been effective because increases in this sector were easy to identify. But the minister is now admitting that, between the legislation on one hand and lax monitoring by the Anti-Inflation Board on the other, many people at the top of many of the corporations in Canada have been able to secure very substantial increases—not just 6 per cent or 8 per cent, or 10 per cent, but 25 per cent, 50 per cent, and 75 per cent in salaries ranging from $100,000 upward.

As we forecast, no way has been found under this program to limit increases in income enjoyed by self-employed people like doctors, lawyers, engineers, architects. I do not know whether an attempt was really made.

An hon. Member: What about pharmacists?

Mr. Orlikow: And pharmacists, too, I suppose. These people have continued to get whatever the traffic will bear.

● (2150)

Every aspect of the so-called fight against inflation was a call by the federal government for restraint in government spending. All governments got involved in this, regardless of which party was involved—Liberals, Conservatives, Social Credit, and the New Democratic Party. The government was able to go before the people and indicate that it was showing restraint. It was not going to spend $30 million in Manitoba or $50 million in Ontario. Actually, I forget what the saving was by the federal government. But it forgot to tell the people that every time a million dollars is saved fewer people are employed.

Unemployment for every month of this year has been at an all-time high. In April unemployment on a seasonally adjusted basis was 8.3 per cent, or 932,000 people. In May the figure was 7.9 per cent. Newspapers reported that as a victory because it was half a per cent lower than the month before. If one read down to the end of the article, he would realize that 7.9 per cent was almost 1 per cent higher than the month of May in the previous year.

In my city of Winnipeg there is a low rate of unemployment, as there is in the province of Manitoba, as compared to Quebec, the Atlantic provinces, Ontario or British Columbia. I have done some inquiring in my constituency and have found out that graduating classes in faculties such as education, social work, and engineering are having difficulty finding employment. That applies also to the graduating classes of community colleges in our province. The students were encouraged to go to community colleges rather than university, because an arts degree would not give them a job but training in one of the many skills which are provided in our community colleges would give them a job.

The graduating classes of the universities and the community colleges are finding it virtually impossible to get jobs. The best educated young people we have ever had are not able to find jobs in June of 1977. In some of the industrial plants, the steel fabricating plants and the agricultural plants in Manitoba, we are finding that workers with 20 years of seniority with one company, and who have never drawn unemployment insurance benefits, are now unemployed. The situation in Manitoba is far better than it is in Quebec.

In Quebec virtually 10 per cent—one out of every ten people—of the people who want work and are available for work cannot find work. In Nova Scotia it is substantially more than that. On Cape Breton Island the official figure for unemployment is 17 per cent, and the real figure is probably closer to 25 per cent. That is a part of the price we are paying for the government's anti-inflation program and its program of restraint.

As I have indicated, we are fighting inflation unsuccessfully and on the backs of the unemployed. When this program was first proposed we said that it would not work, that it would be inequitable and would result in more unemployment. Unfortunately our fears have proven to be correct. We believe, and we have believed all along, that the anti-inflation program would not work and would be unfair. We continue to call for a national incomes policy which would be fair to all the people of Canada. We call on the Government of Canada to make a major commitment for itself and for the people of Canada to a program of full employment.

We do not accept the arguments being put forth by so-called experts, who are employed at comfortable salaries, that full employment is no longer an unemployment rate of between 3 per cent and 4 per cent, that in fact it is something in the neighbourhood of 5½ per cent or 6 per cent. This country has the resources, the raw materials, the manpower and the skills to put the people of Canada who want to work back to work. This party is committed to that. We call on the government to adopt policies which will put the people of Canada back to work. One of the first steps necessary is to eliminate the anti-inflation program which has been a failure from the day it started.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I certainly wanted to rise and take part in this important debate, for I could not do it last Friday. This is why I have felt it necessary to rise tonight at the very last minute. Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to the order made on Thursday, June 16, 1977, it being ten o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair. The House will resume at eleven o'clock a.m. on Tuesday, June 21, 1977, pursuant to the order dated May 30, 1977.

At 10 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Special Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 21, 1977

The House met at 11 a.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION REORGANIZATION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION, ETC.

The House resumed from Monday, June 20, consideration of Bill C-27, to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) has the floor; but before proceeding I should carry on with the preliminary review I have made of the report stage motions. The House is now considering motion No. 4 and, as I mentioned yesterday, motions Nos. 5 and 6 can be grouped together for debate but voted on separately. It would be my intention to group motions Nos. 7, 8, 9, 10, 15, 22, 29 and 30 together with motion No. 32 which seems to be a consequential amendment.

The question being put on motion No. 7 standing in the name of the minister would dispose of the group of motions except for motions Nos. 8 and 10. The question should be put separately on motion No. 8 standing in the name of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) and, if required, a division on motion No. 8 will also dispose of motion No. 10. Motion No. 11 standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt could be debated and voted upon separately.

When we come to motion No. 12 in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt, I think we should have a discussion on its procedural acceptability, because I have some difficulty regarding the relevance of the motion to clause 38 of the bill which it seeks to amend. I think reference should be made to the citation found in May's at page 521 in respect of going beyond the scope of the clause which the motion seeks to amend.

Motions Nos. 13, 14, 16, and 17 and 18 could be grouped for the purpose of debate, but the question should be put separately on motions Nos. 13, 14 and 18. Then the question will be put on motion No. 17, and an affirmative vote will also dispose of motion No. 16. On the other hand, if motion No. 17 is negatived, it will be necessary to put the question on motion No. 16.

Motions Nos. 19, 27, 28 and 33 standing in the name of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) also cause me some difficulty from a procedural point of view in that they appear to be beyond the scope of Bill C-27. Indeed, the object of those motions is to amend sections 40, 114, and 132 of the parent act which are not mentioned in Bill C-27, as well as sections 7 and 8 of the Adult Occupational Training Act, which are also absent from Bill C-27. There may be some disposition to deal with those motions. But in the interim, in any case, I am prepared to hear arguments on the procedural regularity between now and the calling of those motions.

Motions Nos. 20 and 21 could be debated separately and voted on separately. Motions Nos. 23 and 24 could be grouped for the purpose of debate, but would require separate votes. The remaining motions, Nos. 25, 26 and 31, will be debated separately and voted on separately.

If, of course, as is the usual course, as we progress from motion to motion there are comments that hon. members wish to make in respect of this review, I will be glad to hear them or, if there are any that should be made at this moment, I will hear them. Otherwise, I will recognize the hon. member for Nickel Belt who will continue the debate.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have several comments related to separate motions. Would it be possible for the document which you read to be photostated and distributed so we can determine how we should proceed?

Mr. Speaker: Yes. There are my own notes and I have followed them very closely in the announcement which I just made. I would be more than happy to have them duplicated and distributed to as many hon. members as want them.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we were discussing motion No. 4, which states in part:

"(3) Where for any purposes, the use of rate of unemployment produced by Statistics Canada is required under this act or the regulations, the rates used by the commission shall be those most recently produced at the time it is appropriate or necessary for the commission to make a final determination in respect of or involving the use of those rates."

I expressed the opinion yesterday that basically we had no objection to that at all. We welcome it. I wondered what the UIC had used in the past. I suspect that probably they used outmoded statistics or their own in-house studies. That moved me on to comment on the fact that it is too bad the minister did not widen the scope of his amendment to include that any decisions or proposed decisions, or any policies set within the Unemployment Insurance Commission, would use Statistics Canada figures, or figures from studies which would then be available to persons outside the commission, that is, groups of persons or individuals who have business with the Unemployment Insurance Commission or who wish to take a look at the way in which the commission's policies are administered, particularly members of parliament.

I said that with good reason, with good justification, because in effect the basis for the changes we are now debating to Bill C-27 was in the comprehensive review of the unemployment insurance program which was done in 1973-74. One has to realize that there are some important proposals in Bill C-27. The proposals range from changing the minor attachment period from eight to ten weeks, and after three years it becomes 14 weeks. It also includes some important changes with respect to the length of the benefit period in effect. It was always based on the comprehensive review of the unemployment insurance program which was done in 1973-74, and the only reference to the source of the information on which the comprehensive review was based is listed as the administrative data of the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

So here we have a commission which does its own in-house studies, its own so-called narrative reports which are available only to the commission. We were told that this information was for the commission, that they put it through the process, strained it, and came out with these proposals. Here we have very important changes being contemplated and debated by parliament, yet the source and the basis for these changes are not available to members of parliament and we have no way of examining the veracity of the statements made.

As a matter of fact, I raised this question in committee when we discussed the bill. I wanted to know the basis for the comprehensive review. I read from the proceedings on the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration of April 20, 1977, at which the minister was present with officials from his department. The following statement was made by Mr. Manion:

> Madam Chairman, there have been other studies done in addition to the comprehensive review. I believe Mr. Cullen or Mr. Hodder mentioned the very recent study done on the industrial patterns in the high unemployment areas to see whether there were employers who offered only eight weeks of work, and the result of that study is that there were very, very few such employers. There may be individuals who worked only eight weeks at a stretch, but generally there was employment of longer duration available for them, except in very scattered, isolated instances.

I asked if they had any figures, and Mr. Manion replied:

> No. I believe Mr. Hodder indicated that that was based on a review done recently by our own staff. It is not a statistical review. It is one in which the report is on a narrative basis.

He went on to say:

> That report consists of a narrative report from our own officers. It is not a statistical report and it is not available in a form that is suitable for publication.

That is the point we are making, that we have a review of a very important bureaucracy in the federal government, and we are debating very extensive changes. These changes will have an impact on the lives of many people in this country. The impact will be greater in some parts than it will in others. In particular, Atlantic Canada will be greatly affected by the impact of Bill C-27 which is based on in-house studies and narrative reports. I have in my hand an example of a narrative report which we squeezed out of the bureucracy at the committee hearing. Great insights are found in this. It is called "Employment Patterns in the Atlantic Provinces". This was done by the Unemployment Insurance Commission in May of 1977, and it is entitled "A report on the impact of increasing unemployment insurance minimum entrance requirements in the Atlantic provinces to ten weeks of insured employment". This statement came from a senior assistant deputy minister, Mr. Manion. It reads:

● (1120)

> In the light of the observed employment patterns of most industries in the Atlantic provinces, the majority of workers should have little or no difficulty in meeting the higher minimum entrance requirements—

Here are some of the conclusions in that report:

> 1. Generally speaking, it would appear that there are few industries or firms which are limited to less than ten weeks of operation in any 12-month period. Those which are so constrained, employ few workers.
> 2. Although individual components of the fishing industry may be of very short duration (e.g. lobster, herring) most fishermen have little difficulty in operating for more than ten weeks since they typically engage in more than one component of the industry.

I go to conclusion No. 6:

> 6. Canada Manpower centres have reported instances of potential claimants quitting their jobs at the peak of the season—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Carry on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the hon. member given unanimous consent to carry on?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Rodriguez: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank my colleagues. Conclusion No. 6 continues as follows:

> —so that they will qualify with the highest average insured earnings possible—

That is the kind of value judgment which is being made—potential claimants quitting their jobs at the peak of the season so they will qualify with the highest average insurance possible. In addition, this document goes on to say the following:

> —there are indications that a number of workers arrange to be laid off once qualified for UI so that someone else may obtain eight weeks of insured employment.

Someone should point out that that is called sharing work. Obviously, according to the commission, people were stuck on the concept of sharing work a long time before the minister put this provision into the bill. People do share work and, obviously, the benefits of the Unemployment Insurance Act. However, we would be happy if the department and the minister would extend that amendment to provide that any contemplated changes in policy or in legislation ought to be based on verifiable facts supplied by an agency which is recognized as having some independence, Statistics Canada, and not on in-house studies because, in effect, we are calling on the commission to evaluate its own rules and then to change the rules. The commission is judging its own operations. I think that is very unfair, because in situations I have experienced the commission has set its policies, it has bad examples which could be used to defend those policies, and those who have had cases before the commission have found themselves having to prove that they were not guilty of infractions of policies which were set. That is pretty difficult. Here, in this in-house study, there is a rather enlightening statement about Newfoundland. It says:

> The seasonal inshore fishing, (e.g., lobster fishermen) may have some difficulty in operating for ten weeks in the Stephenville labour market area.

It goes on to say:

> There is an indication that some employers in small or isolated communities deliberately hire seasonal workers in such a way as to provide at least the minimum number of insured weeks to as many persons as possible and thereby ensure an adequate work force at their doorstep when needed.

That is one of the criticisms we have made. This narrative reports on an in-house study of the Unemployment Insurance Commission which really does not serve the needs of those people who have to use the services of the commission. Criticism of this was made in the committee. We were not the only ones to criticize this procedure of the commission. It was criticized in an excellent brief from the Quebec Federation of Labour. That federation appeared before the standing committee in connection with this bill. I would like to quote from that brief. On page 7 of its brief, the Quebec Federation of Labour deals with the comprehensive review. That comprehensive review tells us what an avenue for cheating the minor attachment period is. The review tells us it was so generous that it was a disincentive to work and was abused. That conclusion was arrived at as a result of individual interviews.

We were told in the committee that as a result of interviewing people on an individual basis, the commission came to the conclusion that this was a disincentive. Is it not wonderful that with a million people unemployed in this country, the commission tells us that the minimum attachment period is a disincentive to work? With respect to the way in which the commission gathered the data on which it made suggestions, and based on which we have legislation to change the minimum attachment period, the Quebec Federation of Labour had this to say:

> However, the UIC fails to specify that many illegal dismissals are included among or rather disguised as voluntary departures. We wish to stress the fact that the UIC does not recognize alcoholism as a disease, that the employer has the right to dismiss a worker for wanting to join a union, and that the UIC does not consider industrial allergies, nervous breakdowns or discrimination valid reasons for departure and that is why they are included among voluntary departures.

Hence, these people become subject to a six-week penalty of no benefits. These people are included in the data which resulted in this legislation. It is worthy to mention that the QFL went on to say the following:

> Moreover, the vast majority of statistics quoted in this comprehensive report are based on administrative data of the UIC which is the only reference mentioned. As far as we know, all unemployment insurance statistics should be drawn from the monthly "Statistical Report on the Operation of the Unemployment Insurance Act", Statistics Canada catalogue no. 73-001.

That is, basically, our argument. On the one hand, we say that it is fine to use the most up to date figures of Statistics Canada with respect to setting the rate of unemployment for unemployment insurance purposes, but on the other hand it seems to us that it would have been much more helpful if the minister had extended that and proposed that all policies or proposed legislation would be drawn from what is recognized as being an independent source of statistical data. It seemed to us that we have left this act completely in the hands of the Unemployment Insurance Commission which set up the policy, administered it, looked after setting up the appeal process and then reviewed the appeals to see whether they should go forward. Our simple argument is that it seemed the minister should have at least gone all the way and put this whole operation on a more independent basis.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on motion No. 4 and suggest to the minister that we find nothing particularly objectionable about the fact that the Unemployment Insurance Commission would use up to date information provided by Statistics Canada. That would seem only natural. I have two caveats, however, and I hope the minister will respond to them. The first is that I think when the ministry is using the information provided by Statistics Canada they should attempt to make sure there is some kind of projection of people who are unemployed but are not currently seeking work because they have been seeking it for many months and have finally given up reporting to the Canada Manpower office. I think this would change the statistics. There are many who would like to have work, but after six months or more have given up hunting for a job or reporting at the Manpower offices. If we have seasonally adjusted unemployment, surely we should have an adjustment for those people.

I should particularly like the minister to respond to my second point. In this Canadian democracy in 1977, surely it is a shame that native Indians are not included in the labour force data. I know the minister might argue with that because there is a separate department that looks after Indians—the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. But that argument does not hold up, Mr. Speaker. We have a bilingual policy in this country, for instance, but we do not keep separate data for French-speaking people and English-speaking people who are unemployed. There is also a multiculturalism policy, but separate data is not kept on people of German, Ukrainian or Swedish descent. Yet our Indian people are accounted for by another department.

It is commendable, of course, that the commission will use the most up-to-date information available from Statistics Canada, but it is inexcusable that native Indians, who often have the highest rate of unemployment in winter months—sometimes as much as 95 per cent—are not included in the total unemployment figures just because they are Indians. This is a sham and an act of bigotry, Mr. Speaker. The argument that Indians are taken care of by another department simply means they are not being treated as fully-fledged Canadians. We would not dare do that with any other ethnic group, and we should not do it with the Indians. But the implication is there in motion No. 4.

If we are to use the most up-to-date information issued by Statistics Canada, it must involve all Canadians. I believe the only reason the government is not including the data from native Indian communities in the labour force data is in order to keep the unemployment rata a little lower than it really is. If Indians were included, as in all good conscience they ought to be, the statistics would be considerably higher.

We have these two points, Mr. Speaker. There is the unacceptable, unjustifiable, biased and bigoted information that leads a government to say there is a race of people who will not be counted in the labour force for no other reason than that there is a separate department to look after them. It is high time we stopped having a cover-up and attempting to make the unemployment situation look a little better by not including certain groups.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The question is on the amendment of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 4 (Mr. Cullen) agreed to.

Mr. Alexander: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if it would be in order at this time for me to revert to motion No. 1 on the order paper which I believe was not completely dealt with before. His Honour, Mr. Speaker, had some reservations in terms of the amendment introduced in my name being beyond the scope of the act. The motion calls for provincial consultation. The minister rose at that time and indicated that he found the first part of the amendment unacceptable but was disposed to accept the second part of it. I think Your Honour will find there is all-party agreement at this time, subject to procedural acceptability, that I should move motion No. 1 again, with the unanimous consent of the House. I would, therefore, move:

That Bill C-27, an act to establish the department of employment and immigration et al as amended, be amended by adding immediately after line 42 in clause 5, page 2 thereof, the following subclause:

"(3) The minister, with the approval of the governor in council, may enter into an agreement with any province or group of provinces for the purpose of facilitating the formulation, co-ordination and implementation of unemployment insurance and manpower policies and programs".

For the information of hon. members, Mr. Speaker, this refers to the first motion on the order paper and to the second paragraph only. I understand it is agreeable not only to the minister but to all members of the House. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair needs time to consider the matter, perhaps I could introduce the motion later if necessary.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we do not object to the motion proposed now by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), but I think he is right in anticipating certain procedural difficulties. First, Mr. Speaker ruled motion No. 1 out of order yesterday. Therefore, it is not before the House and the hon. member is now moving a new motion without having given notice. He can only do this with unanimous consent. We are prepared to give that consent.

Second, Mr. Speaker ruled yesterday that it was beyond the scope of the bill, and to get around that point the hon. member would need unanimous consent as well. We are prepared to give him unanimous consent to do this. I think the hon. member's last statement is correct; perhaps the Chair should be given time to sort it out. Even my good friend for Hamilton West should not be allowed to bring forward a motion any time the spirit moves him merely because the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) happens to agree with him. We still have the rules.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Mr. Speaker ruled motion No. 1 out of order yesterday. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) has not asked for unanimous consent to place it before the House. Therefore, unless the hon. member has unanimous consent, the motion is not before the House. I am willing to hear argument on the point.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the NDP House leader put the matter in its proper sequence. Yesterday, Mr. Speaker held the motion as being beyond the scope of the bill and it can be presented again only with the unanimous consent of the House. I would need unanimous consent to move the second portion of the motion. When I introduced the motion, I was seeking the unanimous consent of the House. Since the minister has indicated an interest in my motion, perhaps the comments I have made at this time could be considered as notice of my intention to introduce the motion. I seek unanimous consent to do something the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) is prepared to accept. I ask Your Honour to treat my comments as notice, and perhaps after you have had an opportunity to consult, to tell me when I can move the motion.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, we agreed to accept it yesterday.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Has the hon. member unanimous consent to present his motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Are there any objections? There are no objections.

Motion No. 1 (Mr. Alexander) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Motions 5 and 6 have been grouped for debate. The House will now consider them.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West) moved motion No. 5:

That Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 27 by striking out lines 30 to 32 at page 11 and substituting the following therefor:

"(g) any employment provided under clause 41, section 38 thereof".

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved motion No. 6:

That Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended by deleting clause 27.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It strikes me that motion No. 5 is consequential to motion No. 16, and motion No. 6 to No. 17. I note that Mr. Speaker grouped Nos. 5 and 6 separately and then grouped Nos. 13, 14, 16, 17 and 18 for debate. Perhaps it would be appropriate to consider Nos. 16 and 17 at this stage. That would be an appropriate grouping. Perhaps we could consider those motions together.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Mr. Speaker grouped those motions as a suggestion. If the House wants to change that suggested grouping, the Chair would be willing to go along with it. Do hon. members agree?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): To what?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I suggest the House could consider motions 5 and 6, already put, with motion 16 in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), and 17 in the name of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it agreed that we debate together motions 5, 6, 16 and 17?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I know we are trying to be expeditious. Motions 5 and 6 relate to job-creation and work-sharing. Motion 16 concerns work-sharing, and 17 concerns training, job-creation and work sharing. We could deal with those motions at the same time, although they need to be resolved by separate votes. If the House agrees, perhaps we could consider together motions Nos. 5, 6, 16 and 17.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are becoming confused. Motions 5 and 6 deal with clause 27 of the bill. Motions 16 and 17 deal with clause 41. Perhaps it would be best to agree, tentatively, to consider 5 and 6, and when we reach the other group later we can decide if 16 and 17 have been covered as well. I agree with the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) that they require separate votes. Cannot we go ahead with 5 and 6, as Mr. Speaker suggested yesterday, and decide later if 16 and 17 were covered in the debate?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I have no difficulty with that argument, although it seems to me next to impossible to debate Nos. 5 and 6 without referring to the subject matter of the other clauses.

● (1150)

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the suggestion just placed before the House is certainly acceptable to me.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it agreed that we move on to motions Nos. 5 and 6 for the purpose of debate?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This may be a technicality which we will have to deal with at this time. When I look at motion No. 27, I know what the intent is, but it seems there has been an error in drafting. It becomes very, very confusing. Clause 27 reads as follows:

Subsection 4(3) of the said act—

Right off the bat there is something wrong. I know what they want to refer to. Unless I am wrong, that should read, "Section 4(3) of the said act". The minister, in clause 27, is referring to job-creation and work-sharing in terms of making that employment subject to unemployment insurance. Therefore, it needs to be tidied up in that regard. We cannot pass that clause as it presently stands. I just notice this and, therefore, was unable to give the minister notice. I think it should read, "Section 4(3) of the said act is amended".

At line 30 it also becomes very confusing. What the minister is referring to in clause 27 is actually clause 41 of the bill under discussion. Under clause 41 you have subclauses 34, 35, 36, 37 and 38. The minister's motion under clause 27 really refers to subclauses 37 and 38 under clause 41. I respectfully submit that before we go any further with this matter we should amend the minister's motion so that we will be on target in terms of correctness. I do not have an amendment before me. I want to hear the minister and my friend, the House leader of the New Democratic Party. It should read as follows:

Section 4(3) of the said act is amended by striking out the word "and" at the end of paragraph (e) thereof, by adding the word "and" at the end of paragraph (f) thereof and by adding thereto the following paragraph—

Here is where we run into problems. I think it should read this way:

(g) any employment provided under clause 41, subsection 38, or under regulations made under subsection 37 thereof.

I think that would clarify the matter. At the present time that is not clear. We can debate this clause. I know what the minister wants to do. However, if we pass it, we would certainly be in error by going along without the necessary amendments at this time. Perhaps the minister would like to clarify his position and make comments on my comments. I hope that my good friend, the House leader for the NDP, and the Social Credit party, perhaps, will add something to this very limited point of order.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I have not received notice of this from the hon. member. As he indicated, it occurred to him just now. I thank him for it. What we are referring to under that section is section 38 under No. 41, and similarly under No. 37. However, I have another difficulty with it. Mr. Speaker has indicated that motion No. 27, which stands in my name as Minister of Manpower and Immigration, from a procedural point of view seems to go beyond the scope of Bill C-27.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We are all lost. Let's have the debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Shall we stand the clause, or continue with the debate?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, this is very complicated. I do not mind going on with the debate, but I think we have to address ourselves to this particular matter. If the clause is beyond the competence of the minister to introduce, I am trying to figure out where we are with regard to job training and work sharing as the minister wants the employment thereunder to become involved with unemployment insurance; in other words, employment under job-creation and work-sharing. We are in a sort of mind-boggling mess right now. There is not much point in debating something if we are out of order in terms of the clause upon which the debate ensues.

Mr. Paproski: There are 11 bureaucrats up there; maybe they can can help us.

Mr. Alexander: I do not want to talk about the bureaucrats. I know how hard they work. Many of us work hard with them. As a result of the minister and the bureaucrats bringing forth suggestions, we now have a much better bill. Of course, I do not want to take too much credit regarding the flexibility of it in terms of the 10 to 14 weeks.

I think the clause should be stood. There is no point in our discussing a clause which Mr. Speaker has ruled out of order. This places the minister in a very peculiar situation. If he does not get this clause, the employment which will ensue as a result of job-creation and work-sharing will not be able to be involved in unemployment insurance benefits. I know the minister would be very concerned.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I suggest to the hon. member that the confusion is being compounded. Perhaps I will add more to it. We are having reference made to Bill C-27, clause 27, and to motion No. 27. We are so mixed up that maybe we had better move on to something else. The hon. member talks about something being wrong in the bill because it refers to the wrong section. That, of course, gives us a reference, not to the bill but back to the act itself. I hope I am proving my point that we are so mixed up on the point that we had better move on to something else.

[Mr. Alexander.]

Mr. Cullen: As I said, Mr. Speaker, I had not received notice. I do not blame the hon. member for that. I realize that he is endeavouring to help in this regard. We are not talking about motion No. 27, but clause 27. As I understand it, there is nothing wrong with clause 27 of the bill. Sections 37 and 38 of clause 41 will become sections 37 and 38 in the bill.

Mr. Rodriguez: That's clear.

Mr. Alexander: That may be a fact, Mr. Speaker, but I wish the minister would direct his attention to the very first word in clause 27 of Bill C-27. Clause 27 refers to subsection 4(3)—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Of the act.

Mr. Alexander: Of the act. I say there is no such thing as subsection 4(3) of the act in terms of what the minister wants to do. I say that it is section 4(3) of the act. That is how it should read.

• (1200)

Mr. Cullen: Section 4, subsection 3.

Mr. Alexander: Right. Section 4 of the act does spell out in detail subsection 1 and subsection 2, and then you have subsection 3 and that is under section 4 of the act. That is the amendment that is required.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I like these fine points, Mr. Speaker, and I like clearly to spell out these things. But if we do it in this clause, we shall have to do it in a dozen other places. Right below we find 29(1), "paragraph 16(1)(a) of the said act." Are we to change that to some subparagraph of the section? There is a certain drafting style which has been employed in the drafting of this bill, and if the hon. member wants to change it at one point we shall have to change it at other points as well. I still think we should move on to something else and let the officials look at it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it agreed that we allow motions 5 and 6 to stand and let the table officials go over the amendments?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Then we move on to motions 7, 8, 9, 10, 15, 22, 29 and 30, together with motion 32 which seems to be a consequential amendment. It is my understanding this whole group is now before the House. I will put motion No. 7 in the name of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen).

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moves motion No. 7:

That Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 29 by striking out lines 8 to 10 at page 12 and substituting the following therefor:

"means a claimant who, subject to subsections 17(3) and (4), has been employed in insurable employment for fourteen or more weeks but less than"

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, we are dealing now with the first part of Bill C-27 which attempts to change the minor attachment period. We are opposed to this concept of changing the minor attachment period from eight weeks, eventually in three years' time, to 14 weeks. Members tend to forget that after three years the minor attachment period will be 14 weeks of insured employment. We in the NDP object to this tampering with the minor attachment period.

I have been here only a relatively short period of time compared with others who have a history tied up to the Unemployment Insurance Act going back to the year when it was first put into law; there are still members here who were present when the act came into being in 1971. As I said, I have been here only a relatively short space of time and I must express what concerns me.

What concerns me very much came into focus with respect to the Unemployment Insurance Act and the way in which the unemployed in Canada are used as a means of setting up a scapegoat or strawman within which the public can vent its spleen with respect to their frustrations with a government which does not address itself to the problem of unemployment. So we need a scapegoat in much the same way as we needed a scapegoat with respect to rising inflation. The workers' wages were the reason for rising inflation; so the government, which is very adept at whipping up a scapegoat from time to time, whipping up a spectre and laying it out before the people of Canada and then riding to the rescue as a Sir Galahad to save the people of Canada from inflation, lo and behold presented an anti-inflation program under that guise. In much the same way I have seen those who have been unfortunate enough to become unemployed, and there are more than a million of them across the country.

The Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo) said recently, "Now it is becoming blasé". Ministers troop across the country, are proud and trumpet to the people that they should expect rising unemployment and rising food prices. The idea is to inure the people to the concept that they have to live with high unemployment and rising food prices.

In my short span of time in this House I have observed amendments which were brought in to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I saw the changes brought in with Bill C-69 a year or so ago. I observed, in effect, how the former minister of manpower and immigration, now President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), defended the minor attachment period of eight weeks at that time. He kept saying, "This is a red herring which the official opposition, the Conservative party, represented by the hon. member for Hamilton West, keeps dragging across the committee. What we have to do is tighten the eight weeks qualifying period, move it to 12 weeks or possibly to 20". There were many to my right who suggested moving it to 20 weeks before unemployment insurance payments could be collected. I saw the former minister of manpower defending that concept and this led me to suspect, and I have since confirmed it in my mind, though I have no empirical evidence, that there must be two groups of bureaucrats warring within the breast of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), one arguing that we have to tighten up the act, and the other saying, "Look, this is a red herring. The problem does not lie with the minor attachment period".

I listened to a great defence of the minor attachment period of eight weeks in 1975. I heard it also in 1974 when the estimates were before the committee. I heard a great defence put up by the former minister of manpower and immigration against the suggestions of the Conservative party members sitting on the committee and pushing at that time for a longer minimum attachment period. Mr. Speaker, it is not very often I see eye to eye with the Canadian Association of Mining Companies. Still, this group of associated companies is, I suppose, very conscious of its need to maximize profits and minimize costs. I find this statement in their brief with respect to Bill C-27. It says at page 5:

The association condemns the abuses which some unemployment claimants have made of the eight weeks' qualifying period. It is also aware that this period is shorter than that found in all other foreign jurisdictions, while the maximum level of benefits and the time during which they can be drawn are in excess of those found elsewhere.

Then this is the important statement.

Nevertheless, with close to one million Canadians unemployed, and with most projections, including those issued by the government and its agencies, indicating the situation may worsen, the time is simply inappropriate from almost every perspective to seek a substantial qualifying period.

No one could ever accuse the Canadian Mining Association of being left-wing. Certainly, no one could accuse them of wanting to protect malingerers or of supporting disincentives to the work force of this country. We also discovered that the Manpower department has done some projections on the unemployment rate in this country and on what will be the number of unemployed a few years from now. When we asked for this information in committee, we were told—and maybe there is some justification for this—"We can't tell you this because it might be misinterpreted. We can't give you the background because we might end up with all sorts of problems".

We are experiencing very serious unemployment indeed at the present time. People far more qualified than I project that the present trend of high unemployment will continue possibly into the early 1980s. This government is making changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act which will cause problems. When they first brought in changes they had to do with minor attachment to the work force of eight weeks to 12 weeks, with 20 weeks being major attachment to the work force. If that change was so well thought out, why is the government now coming along with a regional approach to the minor attachment period?

The answer is that the government is responding to the political realities which were trumpeted from the back benches. In effect, the backbench Liberals in Atlantic Canada put pressure on the minister and indicated that they would stall the bill or vote against it if he did not retreat from the position he had taken. In the same way the official opposition was split. There were many Conservatives from eastern Canada, although we did not see much of them in committee.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not mind the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) rehashing the same old nonsense that I have been hearing since 1971, but at that time the NDP opposed an amendment that we moved raising the qualifying period from eight to 12 weeks. I do not mind this old hash about my right-wing philosophy, but what I do mind is when he refers to the activities of members of the standing committee. He most unfairly directs his attention to members who in one way or another have raised their concerns about this whole bill. The hon. member himself did not play such a great role in committee; he was absent many times and I had to bail him out on several occasions. He has no business referring to the activities of members of committees. I hope the hon. member sticks to his usual useless rhetoric and—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's comment could have been made in seeking the floor in due time. The Chair cannot prevent the hon. member who has the floor referring to debates or to procedures in committee after the committee has reported to the House. That is his privilege, as it is the privilege of other members. At the same time, if the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) has a different opinion, he can speak after the hon. member has spoken and express his own view.

Mr. Rodriguez: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will continue where I left off. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) trumpeted what a great thing he had done in getting the minimum attachment period increased. He is so busy patting himself on the back that he will break his wrist. He did a great job. But when the trade unions were before the committee, was he ever quiet on the subject of the minimum attachment period! The UAW took a very firm stand in opposition to it, and so did the CLC. I did not hear great arguments put forward by the critic from the official opposition party on the Manpower committee. I did not hear him saying that it was a disincentive. I did not hear the Conservative party support the tightening up of the qualifying period.

Mr. Paproski: You were not there that day; or if you were, you did not hear.

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member for Edmonton West—

Mr. Paproski: Edmonton Centre.

Mr. Rodriguez: Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski)—is playing right end. I did not see him in committee. When this question of changing or tampering with the minimum attachment period came before the committee, the government received a great deal of flak from backbench Liberals from Atlantic Canada. Those in the official opposition from Atlantic Canada, with one or two exceptions, were absent from committee when this matter was dealt with. The Conservatives were split, as well.

The witnesses who appeared before the committee, especially the trade unions, time and again suggested that the government ought to focus its attention on unemployment in Canada instead of tampering with the minimum attachment period. Just to show the House how the resultant political decision was made, the minister trotted in a regional breakdown. There were to be 54 regions across the country, and then there were to be rates of unemployment with participating weeks of employment attached to those rates in order to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits. It is a bureaucrat's dream. They all have jobs now. This scheme was trotted into the committee ill-prepared, ill-defined, and when we started asking questions as to how it would work we found that they had very little idea how it would operate.

Certainly, the minister cannot stand in this House and tell us that this program is well thought-out. The information on which it was claimed that the minimum attachment period was a disincentive was based on the comprehensive review of the unemployment insurance program in Canada. We had one such example of narrative reports which went into the comprehensive review of unemployment insurance in Canada. That one referred to employment patterns in the Atlantic provinces. The studies, the reports and the data collected were all done by the Unemployment Insurance Commission and a few consultants that they retained for that purpose. They were probably paid excellent salaries to do that. I do not know why they feel they have to undertake solving the unemployment problem in this country themselves.

They referred to personal interviews. The whole study was an internal study done by the Unemployment Insurance Commission. On the basis of that study, a proposal was brought forward indicating a change from eight to 12 weeks which was to reflect the regional rate of unemployment. We have disagreed with that method of establishing the minor attachment period within the Unemployment Insurance Act. If that is what is going to be done, then the premiums paid by people participating in the unemployment insurance program ought to reflect the risk of their becoming unemployed. At that point the entire thing becomes a jungle. In Calgary, where the unemployment rate is low, the rate someone pays in premiums ought to reflect the risk of his becoming unemployed and collecting from the program. If you accept the premise of going to a regional rate of unemployment, persons in areas of high unemployment will participate at a lower rate in terms of number of weeks to collect benefits, and it ought to work the other way with respect to premiums.

I should like to read into this debate some of the comments from the groups who appeared before the committee. For example, I am referring to the United Auto Workers who appeared and said the following:

> We want jobs; we need jobs; the right to a job should be as basic as any civil rights (if not more so). The failure of the government and our social system to guarantee this right forces us to depend on unemployment insurance. The government, in Bill C-27, is attempting to further erode even this secondary right to unemployment insurance, and it offers as compensation for this certain reorganizational changes in the Manpower programs. Below we present our position and comments on both the changes in unemployment insurance and the changes in Manpower policy. We oppose extending the qualifying period for benefits from the present eight weeks of insurable earnings to the proposed 12 weeks.

We in this party have always maintained that we do not support those who take from a program unjustly or illegally or use the program as a rip-off. We have never supported that. We have said the act provides the tools for the commission to enforce the legislation. Therefore, with the tools they have, they are able to select groups if they suspect certain groups are ripping-off the unemployment insurance program. They have the tools, and they certainly have the authority under the act to enforce the legislation. To turn around and say that this is a disincentive, without providing the proof, is certainly a disservice to the unemployed in this country.

There have been suggestions from the government and from the official opposition that the eight to 11-weekers—that is, the eight to 11-week wonders—is the area where there is a disincentive to work. It leaves itself open to cheating by those who are lazy and do not want to work. As recently as May 28, 1975, the former minister of manpower and immigration had this to say:

If you examine where those short-term attachment people are, you will find that they coincide with areas of this country that have the more chronic conditions of high unemployment.

... they occur in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces to a higher degree because the conditions of disparity there are such that people get marginal jobs, which are almost coincidental with short-term attachment jobs ... So I think we have to be extremely careful before we tamper with this (qualifying period).

At that meeting, on the same day, the minister had this to say:

The incidence of disentitlement or disqualification, as an effect of failure to meet one's obligations under the act, is lower amongst the group with a minor attachment to the work force as their proportion of the total claims load than those with a long term attachment to the work force.

As I said before, one wonders what goes on over on the government side of this House. Less than two years ago the former minister said that there was no hanky-panky in the area of minor attachment, and that in effect minor attachment is highly correlated to the areas of seasonal unemployment in Canada. Yet the minister has now come in, armed with a comprehensive review done on in-house studies and reports. That was laid on the people of Canada and it confirms what they have been thinking. They were thinking that these people were collecting unemployment insurance and ripping off the system. That is the conclusion and that is the inference.

We could never accept that in a bill in which the minister talks about work-sharing, job opportunities and job training. How can we take the government seriously in terms of their commitment to eliminate unemployment in this country when it knows, at this particular time in our history, that unemployment is running at about 8 per cent and is talking about cutting back the minor attachment period?

I mentioned the in-house studies on which this proposal was based. I have to be very leery and very suspicious when the Department of Manpower and Immigration does a narrative report on the various areas of Atlantic Canada and refers to Christmas tree harvesting in Nova Scotia. The report reads:

Christmas tree harvesting lasts for about eight to 12 weeks and employs only a few hundred, mostly in the Bridgewater area. The labour force is about 50 per cent men.

Off-Season Employment: In the Bridgewater area Christmas tree harvesting industry, the men would have a fair chance of finding additional work with highways, the town or the municipality.

That is all speculation; there is no statistical information. When one asks for the figures, you find they do not have them. We only have the opinions of our local Manpower officers in these areas. From Nova Scotia they slip over to New Brunswick, and this is what they have to say about agriculture:

● (1230)

In New Brunswick, only a few of the agricultural industries have employment lasting less than ten weeks and relatively small numbers of workers are affected.

Again, we have no statistical information as to how many farms there are, how extensive agriculture is in New Brunswick, and how many people are employed in the industry. We have no idea of the rate of drop or rise in farming in that province. They go on to say:

Food processing firms generally have employment of long duration and only those additional employees required for harvesting may not obtain 12 weeks of employment.

This is really the question. These are the kinds of studies on which this very basic change is being made to the act, tampering with the minor attachment period at a time of high unemployment based on these kinds of narrative reports. This is ridiculous. Here is one that is even more atrocious. It is an overview of Atlantic Canada through the eyes of Manpower officers in that area. It reads:

Canada Manpower centres have reported instances of potential claimants quitting their jobs at the peak of the season so that they will qualify with the highest average insured earnings possible.

Who determines that they are potential claimants quitting their jobs early? Do they give us numbers? Do they give us locations? Do they give us facts on whether they have a legitimate claim or whether, in effect, they were cut off? We have none of these figures, yet the minister says, "Take my word for it; this is a fair thing we are doing". The minister said that this has proven to be a disincentive. How is it a disincentive? He points to the fact that they found out, as stated in the comprehensive review, that young people are moving in and out of jobs. The ILO discovered that it is the nature of young people to have a short attachment period to the work force and that this is a factor with respect to that group of workers until they attach themselves to the work force when a different pattern develops. This report, entitled "Highlights of an Examination of Employment Patterns in Atlantic Canada", states:

Generally speaking, it would appear there are few industries or firms which are limited to less than ten weeks of operation in any 12 months' period. Those which are so constrained employ few workers.

I do not think that bureaucrats at the top have been to Newfoundland and to some of the outports there where you cannot get eight weeks of work, much less ten weeks, and in three years time 14 weeks. You are rising, Mr. Speaker, and I think you are trying to tell me something.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes, I have to tell the hon. member that his time has expired. I have already allowed him to take advantage of the 30-minute allotted time to the mover of a motion. Perhaps the House will permit me at this time to propose to the House motions Nos. 8 and 10 appearing in the name of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn). They were enumerated in the list. Motion No. 7 is in the name of the minister. To proceed in an orderly fashion, motions Nos. 8 and 9 should be put to the House.

Mr. John Rodriguez (for the hon. member for Brant, Mr. Blackburn) moved motion No. 8:

That Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 29 by striking out line 10 at page 12 and substituting the following therefor:

"eight or more weeks but less than".

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved motion No. 9:

That Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended

(a) by renumbering clause 30 as subclause 30(1);

"(a) has, subject to subsections (3) and (4), had fourteen or more weeks of";

(c) by adding immediately after line 23 at page 12, the following new subclause:

"(2) Section 17 of the said act is further amended by adding thereto the following subsections:

"(3) During the period of thirty-six months that begins on the day that this subsection comes into force, the number of weeks of insurable employment that a claimant shall have in order to qualify to receive benefit shall be the number of weeks shown in table 3 of schedule A, based on the regional rate of unemployment that applies to him.

(4) The commission may, with the approval of the governor in council and subject to affirmative resolution of parliament, extend the period of thirty-six months mentioned in subsection (3)."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This also brings motion No. 10 before the House.

Mr. John Rodriguez (for the hon. member for Brant, Mr. Blackburn) moved motion No. 10:

That Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 30 by striking out line 21 at page 12 and substituting the following therefor:

"(a) has had eight or more weeks of"

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I want to supplement some of the comments made by my colleague, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), on the amendments that are before us to the Unemployment Insurance Act, specifically the one that raises the minor attachment period from the existing 8 weeks to a new formula varying between 10 and 14 weeks. I want to say at the outset that I think the intent of the amendment moved by the government is based on the wrong premise. It is based on the assumption that somehow people are taking advantage of the unemployment insurance program, especially young people and women, by getting eight weeks' employment and then collecting unemployment insurance benefits.

The reasoning behind the various amendments we have before us seems to be to end this abuse by designating the minimum qualifying period of work according to the unemployment rate in the region; but the total effect is to raise the minimum number of weeks of work required before one is eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. When we look at the figures and the nature of those who are minor claimants—those who in the past have worked a minimum of eight weeks—we find that the greatest proportion of these people come from areas in the country where unemployment is very severe.

I recall going to Newfoundland and Cape Breton, together with the leader of our party and some of my colleagues, on a fact-finding mission about unemployment and what the federal government agencies, the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Unemployment Insurance Commission, were doing to meet the problem. There we saw the severe unemployment and learned from officials in the federal departments, as well as from employers and people in the labour movement, that for many Newfoundlanders—indeed, it seems to be the case more and more with Cape Bretoners—it is difficult in many cases to find work for periods of eight or ten weeks at a time because much of the work is seasonal.

We were told, for example, that young people and women often sought employment in fish plants, but it was the exception if they could find eight or ten weeks steady employment at a time at the fish plants, because it was a seasonal kind of employment with up and down cycles, so they could probably get work in the fish plant for five or six weeks and then be laid off. There was a built-in disincentive to going to work. If someone was receiving benefits and the job was open at the fish plant, but it was only for six or seven weeks, if that person took the job it would disqualify him, after he was laid off, from getting unemployment insurance because of the lack of qualifying work weeks. So there really was a disincentive to work in that situation.

Raising the minimum work requirement to anywhere from 10 to 14 weeks is not really going to be an incentive for people in high unemployment areas to stay on the job or not to move from one job to another. The plain fact is that job opportunities are just not there. Let us consider, for example, what these changes will do to the Newfoundland economy. It will disqualify people from receiving unemployment insurance benefits. Millions of dollars of funds which would otherwise be in the hands of families and consumers would not be available. That money could work its way through the Newfoundland economy. However, if this bill passes, it will not be available. I am surprised and somewhat appalled that some of the Newfoundland Liberal members are not making a case for their constituents, for the businessmen or for the economy of Newfoundland which will feel a tremendously negative impact once the bill is passed.

The amendments are based on the false premise that somehow people are not looking for work in economically depressed areas. The fact is that permanent work is not available. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) says that most of the people claiming unemployment insurance after working only eight weeks are young people, students and housewives, people whose attachment to the work force is not on any long-term basis. The minister says that these people only work to earn an income supplement, and that if we disqualify them or make it harder for them to collect unemployment insurance there will not be any real suffering because they are not serious workers in the first place.

Besides the fact that that statement is chauvinistic, I do not think statistics bear the minister out. For example, changes in the act even before this bill was brought in assumed an average unemployment rate of 7 per cent, which is lower than we have now. The change to increase the qualifying period of work will mean that some 330,000 workers in Canada who become unemployed will not be able to receive benefits. The minister says the number will be roughly 50,000 because there are only 50,000 affected at any given time. But I look at the total picture. When we have one million unemployed already, it seems a backward approach to throw another 300,000 on to the unemployment rolls and not at the same time provide benefits, because we all know that if people are disqualified from receiving benefits, somebody has to pick up the tab. Unless we have become such a callous society that we throw people out on to the street because they have no income with which to pay rent, unless we let families starve because they have no income, disqualifying them from unemployment insurance benefits only means we move them on to municipal welfare rolls, which means the taxpayers will bear the burden.

At least in the unemployment insurance scheme, workers, employers and the government contribute to the funding of that scheme. When we move people from unemployment insurance to welfare, the burden is borne entirely by the Canadian taxpayer.

Mr. Epp: Who pays for it now?

Mr. Symes: I said that unemployment insurance is funded by workers and employers.

Mr. Epp: Who are they?

Mr. Symes: They are taxpayers.

Mr. Epp: Right.

Mr. Symes: And that is based on their earnings. It is based on a formula. If we take people off unemployment insurance benefits and put them on welfare benefits, there is a different tax formula which applies to Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Epp: But it is still the taxpayer who pays.

Mr. Symes: I do not disagree, but I am talking about fairness in the way the income and property tax system works. It is that system which funds municipal welfare. I think the unemployment insurance method of raising funds to help the unemployed is far superior to the direct taxation system which pays for municipal or provincial welfare. City welfare budgets will have to be increased to handle this. This means that funds will be taken from other municipal projects to pay welfare payments to unemployed people. I think that will be discouraging for any municipal council to have to face in this time of increasing costs.

The minister tries to make out that young people and housewives will be the only ones affected by these changes. However, if we look at those who have been disentitled because of the 8-week to 11-week period, and if we use figures for the first five months of 1976, the latest I have, we find that of those receiving unemployment insurance benefits the people who work between 8 weeks and 11 weeks make up only 15 per cent of all beneficiaries. Let us think for a moment about that proportion. The minister and his officials try to leave the impression that a great proportion of the unemployed work only 8 weeks to 11 weeks and that they are the ones making claims. The figure is only about 15 per cent. If we look again at the first months of 1976, we find that 63.8 per cent of all 8-weekers to 11-weekers were in Quebec and in the Atlantic provinces. It is in those areas that we find the lowest job vacancy levels and histories of seasonal work.

This reinforces my argument that the number of people with minor attachment to the work force is quite small compared with the total number receiving benefits. Second, Quebec and Atlantic Canada, with their high unemployment and seasonal work, are hardest hit. The minister argues that many women have a minor attachment to the labour force, but this change will affect some 214,000 men and 116,000 women. In other words, more men will be affected by this change than women, contrary to the impression the minister tries to leave with us. In the construction industry, where there is already severe unemployment, this change will make it worse for construction workers. We have to emphasize the fallacy of the argument that young people and women will be mainly affected by these changes. All segments of the work force will be affected, Mr. Speaker.

Throughout the past year I have met weekly with constituents on a variety of problems. Each time I hold constituency office hours, invariably a young person comes to me with the problem of finding work. They range from high school students looking for summer work to finance higher education, to university and community college students looking for summer work to finance their further education, but more despondent are the young graduates of community colleges and universities who come looking for job leads. They want to work at anything rather than being on unemployment insurance. I have to be honest and tell them that I am afraid the situation will only get worse.

The government is not serious about restructuring the economy so that there will be job-creation in any meaningful and permanent sense. Rather than getting busy and attacking unemployment, they find it easier to tinker with the unemployment insurance system. When young people are so desperately looking for work, it is wrong for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) to try to give the impression that they are not serious about working but prefer to flit from one job to another and work only the minimum number of weeks required before collecting unemployment insurance.

Various witnesses who appeared before the committee stressed that the amendments to create areas of differing qualifying periods would mean a bureaucratic nightmare. The unemployment insurance system is difficult enough to administer. It makes no sense to have a regional formula whereby a person living in a high unemployment area may need a shorter qualifying period, and a person who lives in a low unemployment area would need a higher qualifying period. This will create all kinds of injustices.

How is it to be administered? Are we to build a sort of Berlin wall between the various regions of Canada in order to restrict workers who move from one area to another in an effort to find jobs because the bureaucrats claim they are trying to circumvent the regulations this way? I do not think this system is workable, Mr. Speaker, and it will not alleviate the needs of the people, which is what the act was designed to do.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member. The time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak as one from an area of low unemployment, namely, Saskatchewan, and support my two colleagues from northern Ontario who have just spoken. The amendment proposed by the government will cause hardship in my area as well because it will probably end up as one where people will have to work 14 weeks in order to qualify for unemployment insurance.

An hon. Member: You never worked 14 weeks in your life.

Mr. Nystrom: In spite of the fact that it is an area of low unemployment, some people are in a similar position to those in other areas. There are seven Indian reservations in my constituency, and there are a lot of Indian people living in Yorkton. The city of Regina is now 15 or 20 per cent Métis or Indian. Indians who live on the reservations are not included in unemployment statistics, while those who live in urban areas often need retraining. An increase in the attachment period from eight weeks to 14 weeks will put more of the Indian and Métis people who live in the cities of Regina, Yorkton and Saskatoon on the welfare rolls. This is a cold, bureaucratic way of tackling the problem, and it is one of the things that angers me about the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Another thing that angers me about the act is that it discriminates against many rural people who are disqualified from benefit because they are not available for work. Indeed, some people who come to my office admit they had lied to the Unemployment Insurance Commission in order to receive benefits, and other people who told the truth did not receive benefits. Often, women in a rural area who do not have a car to drive to the city UIC office are cut off benefits, but those who live in the city and can use public transportation to visit the office or to seek work are not cut off. If the rural people lied and said they were looking for work, they would not be cut off either.

Perhaps I should call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

CONGRATULATIONS TO SPAIN ON RESTORATION OF PARLIAMENTARY DEMOCRACY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, one that even the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) might find acceptable being fresh back from the United Kingdom. At a time when the disappearance of democratic governments is more often noted than their reappearance, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That this parliament join in congratulating the people of Spain on the restoration of parliamentary democracy in that country underlining as it does the role of a constitutional monarchy in facilitating the development and retention of parliamentary democracy in a land with great traditions and deep differences.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF MR. CHOQUETTE'S STATEMENT NO POLICEMEN INVOLVED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter arising out of a statement attributed to the former Minister of Justice for the province of Quebec and quoted in the press yesterday in which Mr. Choquette maintained that he made the statement which he made on October 12, 1972, namely that no policemen were involved in the raid that took place in Montreal. In light of the fact we now know that at the time Mr. Choquette made that statement, RCMP headquarters in Ottawa was well aware that an RCMP officer as well as others were involved, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instructs the Solicitor General to order an investigation into the sources of information which led the former head of the Quebec Provincial Police to inform the former minister of justice of the province of Quebec, Mr. Choquette, that no police officers took part in the break-in at L'Agence de Presse Libre on October 6 and 7, 1972.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE AID REACHES THOSE FOR WHOM IT IS INTENDED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on an urgent and important matter.

Considering that Canada, as a member of the Commonwealth, supplied Mozambique with powdered milk intended for the children of that country, and the fact that this powdered milk never reached the people in need who were dying of hunger, but was distributed instead to the members of Fidel Castro communist guerrillas stationed in Mozambique, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That a committee of the House be requested to study once again Canada's external aid so that we may feed the needy instead of those who want the revolution and our destruction.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

BREAK-IN AT PRAXIS CORPORATION—INVESTIGATION OF PERSONS ALLEGEDLY INVOLVED

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question relates to the whole matter which will be the subject of a debate later this week, namely that of illegal break-ins by certain police agencies, and has regard to a whole range of unanswered questions with respect to the break-in and arson at the office of the Praxis Corporation in Toronto, particularly in light of the fact that the loot which resulted from the theft ended up in the custody of the RCMP and, subsequently, in the Solicitor General's office. Meeting with the Solicitor General yesterday, I informed him of evidence which came into my possession over the weekend with respect to names, places and events in connection with this break-in. Is the Solicitor General prepared to inform the House today what action he has undertaken, or is undertaking, to have this information verified and the persons I have named investigated?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): I wish to thank the hon. member for meeting with me yesterday afternoon and leaving information with me. I thought at the end of our meeting that he would wait some time before bringing the matter up in the House so that I might have had an opportunity to determine whether some of the allegations contained in the hon. member's information were founded or not founded. I have examined the matter with the RCMP and instructed my officials to bring all the information which the hon. member brought to my attention directly to the attorney general of Ontario because the information he did bring to me, while it related to the possible participation of members of other forces in a possible break-in at the Praxis Institute, did not in any way refer to a break-in in which the RCMP would have participated.

I should recall to the hon. member that all documents in the possession of the RCMP were turned over to the Metropolitan Toronto Police Department a few months ago for examination and the matter was inquired into by the Metropolitan Police Department. Also, it was brought to the attention of the Crown attorney under the jurisdiction of the attorney general of Ontario and he concluded that no criminal offence had been committed by any member of the force in connection with the possession of stolen documents.

As to the break-in itself, the information the hon. member passed on to me indicated that it would have been perpetrated by members of another police force and I am getting in touch immediately with the attorney general of Ontario to ensure that this information is brought to his attention in view of the fact, as has been many times stated in the House, that the enforcement of the Criminal Code under the present constitutional set-up, which hon. members on the other side have always said was too centralized in the hands of the federal government, is in the hands of provincial attorneys general. I have brought the information to the attention of the proper law enforcement authorities.

BREAK-IN AT PRAXIS CORPORATION—REASON ALLEGEDLY GUILTY PERSON NOT PROSECUTED

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): I am encouraged by the minister's answer. It is not my intention to release or make public in the House today the names of the persons I discussed at the meeting yesterday. But it is widely reported that Inspector Venner of the RCMP who, on behalf of the force, communicated with officials of Praxis after the exposure of the EPO list, could not reveal the source of the evidence which was used by the former solicitor general as the basis for his EPO letter for the reason that the life of the agent through whom the RCMP obtained the evidence was in danger. Since there is sufficient evidence that this agent was also the thief and arsonist, does the minister intend to investigate this aspect of the case and establish for the public record on what basis this person or group of persons was, and still is, granted total immunity from the law?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): My recollection of the matter, subject to verification, is that the identity of the person who handed over the material to the RCMP and whose life at that point was judged to have been in danger should his name have been publicly revealed was, indeed, brought to the attention of the Metropolitan Toronto Police Department in order to enable them to fulfil their investigation in accordance with the normal course of enforcing the Criminal Code in this country.

ALLEGED BREAK-INS BY MEMBERS OF FORCE—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INVESTIGATION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): A final supplementary question. It is important to the House to know today that the minister is not merely using the information I gave him yesterday to stonewall this matter further. I should like to ask him whether, in light of what he has learned now and the events that have occurred in Montreal, he is reconsidering or recommending to the Prime Minister to reconsider their previous stand as to the initiation of a judicial or federal inquiry into this whole matter.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I think one thing which seems to have escaped the attention of the hon. member and of other hon. members on that side of the House is that, whether there is a judicial inquiry at the federal level, there is nothing to prevent a province fulfilling its responsibilities so far as the administration of justice is concerned and holding its own judicial inquiry.

So far as the break-in in the Toronto area is concerned, I really wonder whether the opposition is now taking the position that the federal government, as a new matter of policy, should pre-empt the provinces in the field of administration and enforcement of the Criminal Code. If this is a new proposition which is being advanced by the opposition in the course of debate, it is an interesting one but one that ought to be rejected. The administration of justice in this country has always been the prerogative of the provincial attorneys general, and it is indeed an outstanding proposition to hear members on the other side say that is ought not to be so.

ALLEGED DESTRUCTION OF FILES—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE ONLY NARCOTICS DESTROYED

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question with respect to the information that I brought to the Solicitor General's attention yesterday. Now it appears that indeed there were materials incinerated, which I understand are now alleged to have been narcotics only. Can the Solicitor General indicate to me whether he has actually seen the documentation authorizing, or the manifest dealing with, this material that was destroyed and whether he is satisfied now that there was nothing else but drugs incinerated in the very impressive looking furnace that we saw last night.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am, of course, delighted to hear the hon. member now qualifying and protecting his position, following the very serious allegations that he made.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Remember he still has a supplementary; you had better be careful.

Mr. Fox: To answer to the hon. member's question, I think he would wish to join me in commending the force on their very successful operations in the drug field. I wish to report that there were indeed two cases of incineration during the course of the month of June. The hon. member referred to one yesterday. There was a case of incineration on June 2 when 800,000 grams of hashish and two pounds of other drugs were destroyed in the Westmount incinerator in the presence of inspectors from national health and welfare. I understand that the market value of those drugs was somewhere in the vicinity of $12 million, which is surely another indication of the high quality of work which the force does offer Canadians right across this land, including the province of Quebec.

I had the matter of the destruction of files investigated and it is reported to me that on June 3, 1977 there was 20 linear feet of files incinerated, also in the Westmount incinerator. All of these files were from the specialized sector of the force.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member raised a very serious question and I would appreciate it if I were given the opportunity to reply to it. The material which was destroyed was strictly on the criminal investigations side. It was destroyed following a report which had been made on May 23 of this year by the divisional audit officer of the RCMP who, having gone through "C" Division in Montreal, made a number of recommendations to the commanding officer of "C" Division. One of the recommendations made was that certain files, which had no value and were no longer active files, be destroyed. That is the policy of all government departments—to destroy material which is no longer relevant.

● (1420)

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF FILES DESTROYED

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the minister for his comprehensive answer. By way of supplementary, I should like to ask him whether any of these documents that were incinerated, or all of them for that matter, were the subject of proper orders? Is there a manifest or a record available of what they contained? Has there been any microfilming done? Have any of these things been preserved? What was the currency of this material? Did it involve any material which has been the subject of investigation since 1971 or 1972? Was there any 1974 material, for example?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the files were incinerated in accordance with the normal policy of the force. This type of destruction of irrelevant material is applied right across the country in the various regions where the force operates. As I indicated before, it was done in the same manner as within government departments. These files dated back to the year 1966. However, I am informed that any information which was pertinent was transferred to the national criminal investigations unit of the RCMP. No information of current value was destroyed.

Since the hon. member raised the question yesterday, I should add that no material was destroyed, which was in the possession of the security service, and no material pertaining to any inquiry presently under way in the province of Quebec was destroyed during the course of that incineration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—DATE MINISTER OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES GAVE INFORMATION TO SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services which pertains to a statement made by the Solicitor General in the House on Friday, based in part on information given to him by the Minister of Supply and Services. The question I have for the minister is: could he tell the House at what time he provided information to the present Solicitor General concerning the meeting which took place between himself, former Commissioner Higgitt and certain other officials on November 6? When did the present Minister of Supply and Services provide that information to the present Solicitor General; and second, does he recall, according to the report made to the House by the present minister, that he at any time during the past year said something which flatly contradicts information provided by the minister in his statement to the House on Friday?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, as I gave notice to the Chair, I intend to rise on a question of privilege at the end of the question period and at that time I shall make the statement I prepared if the Chair accepts my question of privilege. I also want, again if the Chair agrees and if the House gives its unanimous consent, to answer all questions which will be put to me concerning my statement.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. For the sake of clarity, what the minister has told the House is what he already told the Chair, that is, he has the intention of seeking the floor on a question of privilege. If it meets with the wish of the House, he would be prepared to answer questions relating to the statement he makes on the question of privilege. Of course I cannot prejudge the matter until we come to that point. I thought the minister wanted to put that on the record; but it does not alter the basic rule which governs and restricts the question period in respect to responsibilities of ministers.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the announcement made by the minister. I will withhold any questions I have until he makes his statement on privilege.

FINANCE

PROTESTS OF LIFE INSURANCE AGENTS CONCERNING BUDGETARY PROVISIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Considering that the majority of life insurance agents vigourously object to the new budget measures of last March 31 concerning the taxation of the death benefits of life insurance policies, and considering also the impact that legislation will have on life insurance, could the minister tell the House whether he intends to take into consideration the representations of life insurance agents and, if so, how?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not quite accept the preamble of the hon. member's question, but I must point out that we have proposed changes in the taxation of life insurance policies in the bill we introduced a week ago, which I believe will lessen the impact of such taxation on low income earners.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister. Another point on which I want to draw his attention is the following: considering that the budgetary propositions of last March 31 seem very discriminatory towards medium income earners, and considering that people buying life insurance policies do so to provide their families with a protection, could the minister tell the House whether he is considering withdrawing the propositions concerning those groups which he himself announced when he tabled his budget?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, we proposed this change in the budget to avoid discrimination as regards life insurance. The insurance companies themselves suggested that we change our taxation procedure. Thus we believe that since that change was made last week, the situation will be fairer for those who save money through life insurance policies or other similar means.

LIBEL ACTIONS AGAINST MINISTERS—CONSULTATIONS WITH MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister been consulted by his colleagues, the Solicitor General and the Minister of Supply and Services, as to their legal position in respect of several libel actions registered against them in the courts, and is he still of the same opinion as was stated by him in the House last week in respect of this matter that the persons named in the Solicitor General's extra parliamentary opposition letter have not been harmed or injured in any way by this incident? Is it still his opinion, and has he been consulted by his two colleagues in their official capacity?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): No, I have not, Mr. Speaker. I am not sure whether I have read of the summons in the newspapers, and whether the writs in fact have been served I have not been advised. Obviously, when and if they are served, there will be communications either between my colleagues and myself or between my colleagues and my officials.

PROPOSED TRIBUNAL TO ALLOW PUBLIC SERVANTS NAMED ON BLACKLIST TO CLEAR THEIR NAMES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): In view of the fact that writs of summons do reflect on public servants, has the Minister of Justice caused some investigation to be carried out in respect of this? I hope he would have done this at least as Attorney General. Is the minister now prepared to reconsider his refusal to consider a tribunal in which the persons who were named in connection with the extra parliamentary opposition can find access to redress and restitution so that the duty that the government has to all its public servants, but particularly in this case to those who have commenced legal proceedings, can be fulfilled without the necessity of an expensive and long legal process?

● (1430)

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would prefer that the writ or writs which have been issued be served before we deal with them.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENT ON RESTRAINT WHEN CONTROLS END

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Following yesterday's talks with 15 business, labour and public interest groups would the Prime Minister indicate if he is more confident today of securing a binding agreement among economic decision-makers for voluntary restraint when controls end, or, if he is less confident there will be such an agreement, does he still hold to his belief that it would be folly to terminate controls without such an agreement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am somewhat more confident, Mr. Speaker.

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS CONCERNING PAY AGREEMENTS—EFFORTS TO PERSUADE PEOPLE CONTROLS SHOULD BE REMOVED

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Finance. Last Thursday during the debate on the controls question the minister indicated that, and I quote: "The government has decided to propose amendments to the Anti-Inflation Act to deem pay agreements to be amended to be in line with AIB decisions or those of the administrator". Would the minister indicate when he intends to introduce such amendments, and bearing in mind that it is likely the minister would want amendments passed before decontrol begins, would he also indicate the deadline he intends to suggest for the passage of those amendments?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the amendments would be introduced when the House reconvenes in the autumn. As to whether they will have received full parliamentary approval before the process of decontrol starts, that is something over which I do not have control. However, as I indicated in my statement last week, it would be the intention to introduce the amendments and, as with a budget document, they would have the same effectiveness from the introduction date as they would when the bill is ultimately passed.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the minister also said last Thursday that, and I quote: "Widespread acceptance and support of controls are something of an embarrassment. The political problem is not to take them off but rather to persuade constituents that it is in their interests in the long run that they be removed". Would the minister indicate what steps he has taken or intends to take to persuade such constituents that it is in their interests to remove controls?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, that was very much the tenor of discussions between myself and my colleagues and the groups we met yesterday. What was interesting was that the employer groups from British Columbia and Quebec both supported the continuation of controls for some time but indicated that they should be removed by the phased method. I think that is some indication on their part that they expect to see further protection from the controls for some months yet, but they are welcoming the phased decontrol method, which has been the government's preferred option.

FISHERIES

JOINT VENTURES WITH EUROPEAN NATIONS—COUNTRY TO WHOSE QUOTA CATCH ALLOCATED

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. In view of the announcement in Nova Scotia that a two-week fisheries trade mission has laid the groundwork for the establishment of co-operative fishing arrangements with several European fishing nations, both for the short-term and on an on-going basis for several years, would the minister indicate if he has agreed to the establishment of these joint ventures with the Europeans and Soviet bloc countries within Canada's 200-mile economic zone and the number of joint ventures approved? Would he also indicate whether the quotas to be caught will be from the countries involved in the joint ventures, or will they be taken from allocations to Canadian fishermen?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question creates a difficulty because I have seen no details of the proposals which are being discussed. As I have indicated, this has been a matter of at least one year's record. I can see joint arrangements, but I do not see joint ventures because I do not see the need for foreign capital in processing facilities. The need for joint arrangements is to be looked at on an ad hoc basis very carefully, and the principle that where fish can be caught by Canadian fishermen they should not be caught by foreign fishermen should be maintained.

DATE WHEN EXPANSION OF FLEET CAN BE ANNOUNCED

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, since it is obvious that joint fishing ventures can only be considered as stop-gap measures until we develop our own fishing capability—and this was endorsed by the minister's answer—I would like to ask him when we can expect an announcement of proposals which will enable Canadian fishermen and the Canadian shipbuilding industry to expand Canada's deep sea and inshore fishing fleet?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, surely the hon. member is not advocating that we undertake construction of more vessels. That is what we have done in the past, and it has created a very large over-capacity. Our policy is to allow the stocks to recover. Those stocks which we have traditionally been interested in are rather seriously depleted, and recovering those stocks will take some time. Meanwhile, we are looking at the fleet and the need for replacement. However, I am sure the hon. member shares my view, because of his knowledge of the matter, that because we have the economic zone drawn on the map does not automatically multiply the number of fish, which seems to be an attitude which is developing in the Atlantic provinces now.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REASON FOR INADEQUATE COVERAGE BY PROGRAM "NEW BRUNSWICK TODAY"

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. It has to do with the non-action on the part of the CBC regarding radio and television programming in northern New Brunswick in the area of the Bay of Chaleur. In addition to the problems with the radio side of it, I am wondering if the minister would inquire as to why the program "New Brunswick Today" refuses to give appropriate and adequate coverage to that part of the province.

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have received some representations from the hon. member in relation to the broadcasting system in the past, and I am exploring those with the CBC. I am sorry to hear about these latest difficulties. I am glad the hon. member has brought them to my attention, and I shall certainly make representation in an effort to try to have the hon. member's representations dealt with adequately and as quickly as possible.

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—POSSIBILITY OF DEAL FOR LESSER CHARGE THAN BREAK AND ENTER

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General, and it concerns the Montreal break-in. The three police officers charged in that case were charged under section 115 of the Criminal Code, which is a catch-all section to catch any violations of any federal statute. The result is that it was possible for them to get unconditional discharges; whereas if they had been charged with breaking and entering, that disposition would not have been available to the judge.

Has the Solicitor General been able to determine whether the RCMP officer in question made an agreement or a deal with the prosecuting attorney to have a lesser charge than breaking and entering laid in exchange for a plea of guilty?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not been able to ascertain that. I must say once again that the matter of the break-in was inquired into very extensively by the department of the attorney general of the province of Quebec. That department received the full co-operation of the RCMP in that respect. As I indicated in my statement, the Commissioner of the RCMP met with the investigators from the Quebec government in August of 1976. I assume that following the completion of their investigation the attorney general of the province of Quebec decided—which is his sole prerogative—to charge the member of the RCMP, the member of the Sureté du Québec and the member of the Montreal Urban Community Police under section 115 of the Criminal Code.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR ALLEGED DESTRUCTION OF PRAXIS FILES

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General is of course aware of the many allegations which have been made surrounding the Praxis break-in in Toronto. I am sure he is also aware that Assistant Commissioner Vermeer, who is in charge of the Ontario region for the RCMP, has indicated that some files were destroyed. Has the Solicitor General determined who is responsible for the destruction of Praxis files, if that occurred? Can he advise the House why it was necessary to destroy any of those files, and has he determined whether the destruction of private property in that particular instance constituted an offence under the Criminal Code?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I must point out, however, that I have answered that question a number of times in this House. Following the disclosure of the fact that the RCMP still had documents in its possession, the documents were turned over to the Metropolitan Toronto Police Department. An investigation was carried out by that department, and the files were then turned over to a Crown attorney in Ontario. It was the Crown attorney's determination that no subsequent action of a criminal nature against the RCMP was justified.

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—RESPONSIBILITY FOR INFORMING MINISTER—POLICE NOT INVOLVED

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the telegram sent by the minister of justice of the province of Quebec to the then solicitor general indicating that no illegal activity had taken place involving any police force in the Montreal break-in, has the Solicitor General now determined whether the involvement of the RCMP in that case led to that particular telegram? In other words, did the RCMP mislead or lie to the minister of justice of Quebec, which inspired the telegram which was received by the previous solicitor general indicating that there had been no police involvement in the break-in?

● (1440)

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member was not in the House on Friday and he obviously has not had time to read my statement very carefully. I think if he does he will find the answer to his question there.

[Mr. Fox.]

AIRPORTS

CHARLOTTETOWN—REASON FOR INCREASE IN RENTAL FEES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and concerns the recent communications from the Canadian Air Transport Administration to Eastern Provincial Airlines and Air Canada operating in the Atlantic provinces about the significant increase in rental fees for the use of the Department of Transport terminal building, and in particular the unbelievable increase being considered for Charlottetown. This amounts to an increase of more than 750 per cent, using the same square footage but simply increasing it in terms of the new terminal to be provided. In light of the fact that the Prime Minister indicated earlier that guidelines were generally available to various departments keeping in mind regional disparities, can he indicate what kind of agreement exists between his office and the Department of Transport on these unbelievable and unacceptable increases for the provision of new terminal facilities in Charlottetown?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of this particular case but I will be glad to take note of the question on behalf of the Minister of Transport. I can assure the hon. member that he will get an answer.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

IMPACT OF ALLEGEDLY EXCESSIVE INCREASES IN RENTAL FEES AT CHARLOTTETOWN AIRPORT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): While the Prime Minister is investigating the general application of his guidelines perhaps I could ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion whether he was advised or consulted about this 750 per cent increase from an $8,000 rental for Eastern Provincial Airlines this year to $90,000 in future years, with new terminal facilities, and whether his department has analyzed the impact that this kind of increase will have on intraregional transportation and the fastest growing industry in Prince Edward Island, tourism?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I cannot give a detailed answer to the hon. member for the moment. This is a very important point and I will check again what were the consultations between our department officials in Prince Edward Island and Department of Transport officials, and I will then be able to give certain details to the hon. member.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

SUGGESTED WITHHOLDING OF DECISION ON DUMP UNTIL CITIZENS OF BEDFORD AND SACKVILLE COMPLETE COURT CASE

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs or in his absence to his parliamentary secretary. Notice has been given of the question. Would he agree that no final decision should be made by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which reports to this body, regarding the request by the province of Nova Scotia to locate a dump on CMHC owned lands until residents of the future town of Bedford backed by the residents of a future city of Sackville, both in my constituency, have had their day in court and that right has been upheld by the Supreme Court of Canada?

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, without prejudice to the matter in the courts, the minister has written to the minister of provincial affairs in Nova Scotia and told him that, although there would appear to be no impediment to CMHC getting involved in such a project as the land fill project at Jack's Lake, he has reservations about the possibility of CMHC going ahead because of the strong sentiments voiced by the people in the area and also because of the decision that was taken by the provincial government to change the original plans for the dump. We think the Beaverbrook change was the decision of the province and therefore it is up to them to bite the bullet.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FEDERAL JOB CREATION PROGRAMS—MEETING OF FIRST MINISTERS REQUESTED BY PREMIER SCHREYER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Prime Minister and remind him that in his absence the Premier of Manitoba, Edward Schreyer voiced his concern about job creation and said there would probably be a federal program regarding jobs and called for a meeting of first ministers. Now that the Prime Minister has returned, in order to deal with this very serious matter, has such a meeting been requested by the Premier of Manitoba for this fall and if so, has the Prime Minister indicated his intention in this regard?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago the premier wrote to me suggesting a meeting of first ministers on the economic situation in general and the employment situation in particular. I do not recall having answered that letter while I was away in London but I will check if an answer has been sent on my behalf in my absence.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the Prime Minister has made sure that in his absence a reply was sent to this very important letter.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—REPORT OF ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is obviously concerned as well so I will direct a supplementary question to him. On May 31 the hon. member for Halifax asked the minister whether he registered his concern about a recent report by the Economic Council of Canada entitled "Living Together" in which it was indicated a much greater jump takes place in the rate of unemployment in the Atlantic provinces than the rest of Canada during a national recession. He also wanted to know if the minister would study the report and discuss it with the premiers of the Atlantic provinces. Has the minister had an opportunity to look into this report, and in light of the very keen and sincere interest registered by the hon. member for Halifax, is it his intention to meet with his colleagues in the Atlantic provinces to deal with this very serious matter of jobs which is adversely affecting the economic life of the area?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I recently sent a response to the hon. member for Halifax on this particular matter which was prepared by my officials after examining the report. The response is the usual stunning complexity of the Department of Finance. I would be glad to send a copy to the hon. member so that he can study it, however. It would indicate some disagreement with some of the assumptions made by the Economic Council of Canada.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the minister's reply. I think he completely ignored the second part of my question. In light of the serious unemployment situation faced by the Atlantic provinces, and given the fact that the Prime Minister will likely get in touch with the Premier of Manitoba to arrange a first ministers' conference, would the minister without hesitation contact his counterparts in the Atlantic provinces so that a meeting can be arranged to deal with this very serious situation. Can the minister answer that question without giving me all this gobbledygook?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked if I had replied to the question of the hon. member for Halifax. I said yes, and I will be glad to send him a copy of it. I do not know what can be more direct than that.

Mr. Alexander: Are you going to have a meeting or not?

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

POSSIBILITY OF PURCHASING STATION CJBR-TV RIMOUSKI

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State.

On April 29, 1977, the CRTC rendered a decision allowing the purchase by the CBC of Station CJBR-TV in Rimouski. As this decision fully meets the wishes of the people of Gaspé and northwestern New Brunswick, and was endorsed publicly by the hon. members for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine, Gaspé and Madawaska-Victoria, would the minister be in a position to tell the House why the allotment of the credits which are necesary for the concretization of this important project seem to be delayed?

[English]

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, there have been representations on this matter from both sides of the House on both sides of the question. There seems to be a great deal of controversy about whether this should or should not be proceeded with. There is also of course the question of the government's concern about financial restraint and as a result the matter is still under consideration. I am not sure when we will come to a decision about it.

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND UNITED KINGDOM

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Transport. Could the minister tell the House whether the government is monitoring the very, very critical stages of negotiations between the United States and Great Britain with respect to the possible suspension of air services between those two countries and if so could he bring us up-to-date on where they stand, particularly in light of the fact that should negotiations break down and air services be suspended, there could be a need to use Canadian airports to facilitate movement by air between those two countries?

CONTINGENCY PLANS IF TRAVELLERS FROM UNITED KINGDOM TO UNITED STATES DIVERTED TO CANADA

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the impact which the daily diversion of between 2,000 and 3,000 passengers bound from the United Kingdom to the United States will have on the Canadian air system, is the government considering allowing pre-customs clearance at Halifax on a contingency basis? Also, is the government considering easing, at Mirabel and not just Dorval, restrictions on travel between Canada and the United States and, because Malton will be precluded from use, easing such restrictions at airports such as Halifax?

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR MINISTER'S PERMIT FOR THE RAE FAMILY

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration concerns the Ronal Rae case, about which I have given him notice. Since the Raes entered Canada some ten days after the amnesty program came into force, Mr. Rae having been accepted for entry as a landed immigrant shortly after World War II—and I know the minister has received many representations on the Rae case—would the minister now consider granting a minister's permit to the Rae family on humanitarian grounds, especially since 21,000 such landings were granted in 1975?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think that would be a rather loose use of a ministerial permit. It would not be allowed on that particular basis alone. Mr. Rae is a British citizen who claims originally that he applied to come to Canada in 1947. He lived in Brazil until 1971. He claimed that he always intended to come to Canada but was unavoidably detained for 23 years.

Mr. McKenzie: Don't try to be funny.

Mr. Cullen: I am just giving you the facts, Danny baby. A special inquiry was held and he was ordered deported on April 10 of 1975, almost three years ago, on grounds that he had violated his non-immigrant status. He appealed to the Immigration Appeal Board, the federal court and the supreme court, and all his appeals were dismissed. The supreme court decision was handed down as recently as May 18, 1977. Our Winnipeg office is presently determining the appropriate date for the family's departure from Canada.

Mr. Epp: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Am I to understand from the minister's answer that, despite the representations of responsible people in the Manitoba community, he does not intend to intervene?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FISHERIES

CLOSING OF WEST COAST SHRIMP GROUNDS—DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON EXCLUSION OF CANADIAN FISHERMEN

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. I understand that on Friday, June 17, or on Monday, June 20, the government of Canada by order in council closed the west coast shrimp grounds to United States fishermen, in retaliation for the unilateral closure of United States waters to Canadian trawlers. Has the minister entered into discussions with the commerce department of the United States government regarding the cutting off of Canadian fishermen in United States waters, and does the minister know when the United States Senate will consider the Canada-U.S. agreement covering fishing on the east and west coasts?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the order to close the shrimp fishery applies both to Canadian and United States fishermen. In the case of Canadians, it was made in conformity with the representation they made us. They prefer to fish later in the season. We will now have some time to sort out the difficulties we have encountered with the United States in relation to their interpretation of the interim agreement, an interpretation with which we do not agree. The following two months will give us time to sort out the problem. I am afraid I do not remember the third point the hon. member raised.

TOURISM

REASON FOR DEFICIT—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REVERSE TREND

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The minister is aware that the seasonally adjusted deficit on tourism trade increased to $410 million in the first quarter of this year, a quarterly deficit greater than any annual deficit prior to 1975. Considering that the United States economy has recovered and that that country's bi-centennial celebrations have concluded, can the minister explain to the House what factors are causing the current alarming deterioration of our tourism trade position and, noting that his department has reduced the staff for its tourism program, can he say if his department is taking steps to reverse the trend to higher tourism trade deficits?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think it is an important problem. Of course, the legislation that the American government has passed, which imposes a limit on the number of conventions that can be held outside the United States and particularly on the amount of expenses allowed for income tax exemptions, has considerably affected our tourist industry in Canada. We have made representations to the Americans to that effect and we hope that changes will be made next fall. My department is working in cooperation with every provincial department of tourism so as to improve the situation here in Canada and I hope we will come up with some results. But again I have been told that the main problem is that too many Canadians take their holidays abroad rather than visiting our country.

CUSTOMS

EFFECT ON TOURIST TRADE OF ALLEGEDLY UNREASONABLE TAXING OF UNITED STATES CITIZENS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of National Revenue? In view of the seriousness of our deficit position in tourism trade, can the minister explain to the House why her department's excise tax officers seem to have embarked upon a witch hunt against United States tourists, particularly with regard to the assessment of duties and taxes on American groceries purchased by United States citizens for use in Canada, on U.S. manufactured boats used by Americans in Canada and on U.S. registered automobiles leased by Americans for use in Canada? Will she ascertain from her colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, whether such punitive tax enforcement tactics are likely to assist our declining tourism trade?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the question is a bit strange, but I do not know what electors the hon. member represents. Customs duties are unpleasant for everyone because, in a sense, they represent an economic police. As I do not know the specific details of the cases to which the hon. member seems to be referring, I should like to know the details instead of generalities, after which I shall be pleased to look into the matter.

ALLEGATION OF CRIMINAL CONSPIRACY AGAINST ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. No doubt he is aware that the Prime Minister yesterday, speaking on what he said was an important and serious question, namely, if there was some conspiracy against the administration of justice in connection with the break-in by officers of the federal force, said he would discuss it with the present Solicitor General. As a result of that discussion, has the Solicitor General a statement to make about what action is to follow with respect to these officers, apparently officers of the RCMP, and what on the face of it looks like a criminal conspiracy against the administration of justice?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I think I also said in my statement concerning the police officers that RCMP headquarters staunchly believed an inquiry was being conducted at that time by the Montreal urban community police. I note that the Quebec inquiry, appointed by the Attorney General of Quebec, is seeking to determine specifically why that formal inquiry came to an end. As for the hon. member's specific question, I am still pursuing discussions with the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Solicitor General assure the House that as soon as he has come to a conclusion following these discussions with the Prime Minister, he will tell the House what the result is?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, it has always been my custom and habit, as it has of all members of the government, to inform the House of all pertinent and relevant matters. When the question is raised again, I will do that.

HEALTH

ALLEGEDLY DEFECTIVE MEDICAL DEVICES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It is not often that the minister publicly outlines the inadequacy of the policies of his own department. In a speech dealing with medical devices, he did that a few days ago. Will the Minister of National Health and Welfare confirm what he is reported to have said, that he finds the high proportion of defects in medical devices being used in Canada frightening. If so, can he explain to the House why he, as the minister responsible for public health in this country, has allowed such a deplorable situation to develop?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am Minister of National Health and Welfare precisely to ensure that the citizens of Canada will have not only medication, but also medical instruments of all kinds, whose safety is guaranteed. Now, I should like to remind the hon. member that Canada was the first country in the world to adopt rules requiring the Department of Health to check all medical instruments and devices used in treating patients in Canada. Under those regulations, we received hundreds of thousands of applications for approval of various equipment. We started to check that equipment and found out that quite a number of them were defective. I must say to the hon. member that, in that field, Canada leads the way, ahead of most countries in the world. I am very proud of the fact that my officials have done an excellent job in that regard.

[English]

Mr. Yewchuk: The minister has indicated that the number of hazardous products or products of this kind recalled because of defects was as high as 35 per cent in 1976. In his own words, he indicated that we have just barely scratched the surface. Will he now tell us whether we can now look forward to a continuing increase in the number of faulty devices marketed in this country or whether he will now take his responsibility to protect the public interest in this area a little more seriously and take immediate steps to correct this very high proportion of inadequate medical devices.

Mr. Lalonde: As I said before, Mr. Speaker, Canada is a world leader in this regard. We have now received applications for over 100,000 different products manufactured by some 1,500 concerns. We are speeding up the consideration of these various products, but there is no way 100,000 products are going to be verified during the course of this year or even next year. We are concentrating on areas where we are most likely to find deficiencies in order to ensure the protection of the public. Once again, Canada is a leader in this regard and we are proud of it.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GOYER—ALLEGED BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, last Friday the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Fox) made a statement to the House concerning the illegal search of the premises occupied by L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec, le Mouvement pour la défense des prisonniers politiques du Québec and la Coopérative des déménageurs du 1er mai. The Solicitor General's statement was very detailed, clear and precise and as far as I am concerned, I fully agree with its content. Personally, I would have preferred that the House would let it go at that.

Nevertheless, it happens that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) expressed some doubts inside and outside the House about the credibility of my explanations on the role I played in this incident. Therefore, I want to reply to him. The leader of the opposition should take note that I consider this statement as being made under oath, the oath I have taken as a member of parliament and as minister of the Crown. I also add that I am prepared to stake my seat in support of my statement and I trust that if a member questions it, he will have the courage to make precise charges and also stake his own seat.

[English]

Let me first address myself to the question of whether or not I had any prior knowledge of the October 6-7, 1972, break-in at the APLQ. My answer to that question is a flat no. The Solicitor General's statement in the House made it clear that neither the RCMP headquarters in Ottawa nor the commanding officer of "C" Division in Montreal had been told of the search and seizure of documents on the premises occupied by the APLQ prior to the operation being carried out.

I had been briefed several times about certain activities of the APLQ and its alleged links with well known terrorists and convicted criminals. But nothing could have justified illegal acts being carried out by the RCMP or by any Canadian citizen for that matter. Had I had prior knowledge of the operation, I would have intervened to prevent it from happening. The rule of the law is paramount and the police cannot be above the law. No doubt had the former Commissioner or the former Director of Security Services been aware of the plan to illegally break in at the APLQ, they also would have forbidden it. Not once, in my 23 months as Solicitor General, did any RCMP official suggest to me that the RCMP engage in illegal activities in the pursuit of its duties.

About the APLQ letter dated October 9, 1972 and addressed to me; first of all, the letter did not intend to inform me of RCMP involvement in the break-in but rather implied and I quote:

[Translation]

. . . if their respective organizations were responsible for that action . . .

Of course they had in mind the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Sûreté du Québec and the Montreal police.

I continue to quote:

. . . As Solicitor General, we ask you to act as soon as possible to give a clear and precise answer to our question.

[English]

The letter, received October 11, 1972 was not immediately brought to my attention but was referred to the RCMP. This was standard practice. All letters pertaining to the RCMP were immediately referred to them to enable them to proceed forthwith with an investigation themselves and, if the matter was of provincial jurisdiction, to ensure that the provincial authorities were also notified and would investigate. Of course, this method of dealing with complaints about the RCMP was not ideal, but those were the tools available to me at the time. That is why, in the early fall of 1972, I had recommended to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that a commission be instituted to look into disciplinary questions and the manner in which to deal with complaints about RCMP behaviour. The recommendation was not immediately acted upon, but the Prime Minister did establish the commission when my successor was appointed.

● (1510)

On October 26, 1972, the RCMP wrote to my assistant, Colonel Cameron, recommending that no acknowledgment of the letter be sent, without providing the reason for their recommendation. My agenda indicates that I would have raised the matter with the Commissioner and the Director of Security Services of the RCMP on November 6, 1972. Was I then informed of RCMP involvement in the break-in? My answer is unequivocal and categorical: no I was not. I was advised not to acknowledge the letter because the theft of documents referred to in the APLQ letter fell under the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities and I was informed that the Montreal police were investigating the incident.

Neither the Commissioner nor the Director of Security Services of the RCMP remember actually telling me about RCMP involvement in the incident. They do say they would be surprised if they had not done so verbally but both state very clearly that they do not remember doing so. Given that the APLQ incident was an unusual and very serious incident, it is likely that if RCMP involvement had been discussed at least one of them would recall the discussion. It is not as if we discussed such issues every day. Moreover, the RCMP's standard way of dealing with important information was to convey it to me in writing. If I may rapidly outline the procedure, important questions were referred to me in written documents, either directly or via the Deputy Solicitor General or the then Director, Security Planning and Research Group, now the Assistant Deputy Solicitor General (Police and Security), on a regular basis, oftentimes as many as five or six such documents per day. Decisions and policy directives were recorded in writing and such documents were initialled by me.

In other words, the RCMP is very efficient and meticulous in keeping its records of discussions and decisions. The Solicitor General Department's files and those of the RCMP contain no written report to me on the APLQ break-in. Although the RCMP officials claim they would be surprised if they had not told me about RCMP involvement, they specifically state they do not remember doing so and they state that such matters would normally have been dealt with in writing.

As to my asking whether or not the RCMP had actually been involved in the break-in, again the answer is no and I will explain the circumstances. Firstly, given the RCMP's distinguished reputation and past record, I found it hard to believe that the RCMP could have participated in an illegal break-in. Secondly, before my discussions with the RCMP on November 6, 1972, the Quebec justice minister had already stated publicly that no police force—not the RCMP, not La Sûreté Provinciale du Québec, not la Police de Montréal—had been involved in the alleged break-in at the APLQ. I had heard about this in the press. The matter fell under provincial jurisdiction, the minister of justice of Quebec had investigated the APLQ allegations and his conclusions were unequivocal. I had no reason to doubt his conclusions. Thus, when I discussed the APLQ letter with the RCMP it had already been publicly stated by the Quebec justice minister directly responsible for investigating this matter that the RCMP was not involved. There was no apparent reason for me to ask if in fact the RCMP was involved.

It has been alleged that it would have been my duty to put the question directly to the RCMP. But remember, the question had already been answered publicly by the responsible authorities. Bearing in mind my respect for the RCMP, given the Quebec minister of justice's statement, I, as any other member, had no reason to ask the question. When the RCMP told me the whole matter was being further investigated by the Montreal Urban Police, I concluded that the matter raised in the letter had been dealt with. Given the above facts, it is easily understood why I did not ask whether or not the RCMP was involved in the break-in. Any other member would have acted in the same way.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Goyer: The Quebec justice minister's statement denying that any of the three police forces were involved in the theft of documents was never brought to my attention as false. On November 27, 1972, I was appointed Minister of Supply and Services and the very first time I learned of RCMP involvement in the break-in was in March 1976.

I would like to remind the House that neither the deputy solicitor general nor the then Director, Security Planning and Research Group, were made aware of RCMP participation in this operation before March 16, 1976. The established practice called for their being informed of important questions pertaining to the RCMP's activities to allow them to assist me in following up on such matters. Normally, at least one of them attended my meetings with the police. Neither one remembers even hearing about RCMP involvement in the break-in at the APLQ.

I know that I was not informed of the incident. There can be no doubt in the minds of hon. members that I was not informed and moreover that I had no reason to suspect that the RCMP could have participated in the break-in.

There should be no doubt also in the minds of hon. members that this illegal break-in is an isolated incident and is far from reflecting force policy. The RCMP and the security services have an outstanding record in carrying out their duties. They may have made mistakes but on the whole the RCMP deserves the recognition that it has earned both within and outside Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the fact which we must underline at the beginning of our response is that the Minister of Supply and Services declined the opportunity which was available to him on this question of privilege to move a reference of this matter to a committee of the House of Commons for consideration so that he, and others who might be concerned, would have an opportunity to investigate it further, and so that questions might be asked. He had the opportunity, as the matter stands under the rules of the House, to move a motion which would have referred the question of privilege which caused him to rise in the House to a standing committee of the House. This would have given the opportunity for a full investigation. He declined to do that. That is not acceptable to us on this side of the House.

● (1520)

He also declined, Mr. Speaker, to seek an opportunity which again would have allowed some questions in the House; he could have sought permission of the House to make a statement on motions. I make it clear that had that permission been sought from this party in the House—and I am sure I speak for the others—it would have been granted, so that there would have been an opportunity to pose questions directly to the Minister of Supply and Services.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister has, I take it, given an undertaking to answer questions if they are put to him here. There is now no question about resolving the matter by way of a question of privilege. As the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out, there was no motion attached. I simply want to make sure that we know where we are heading from a procedural point of view. I am sure there will be a desire to ask questions of the minister and I think members ought to avail themselves of that opportunity; but I do not know that we ought to avail ourselves of the opportunity both to discuss privilege and to question the minister. I think we should do one or the other and probably the more effective procedure would be to question the minister.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the portion of the minister's remarks in which he undertook to answer questions and I apologize to him for that. I appreciate having the opportunity to pose questions. I should say on the question of privilege generally that we on this side of the House are very troubled, as I would hope members on the other side of the House would be troubled, by the abandonment here of the tradition and principle of ministerial responsibility on the part of the minister, in effect passing the responsibility for his actions to his officials.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Again.

Mr. Clark: My colleague says "again", and that is quite correct. The minister has said that he was briefed about this investigation before the break-in. Can he tell the House of Commons what instructions—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Let me be clear, Mr. Speaker. Did the minister say that he had been briefed by the RCM Police or by any of the security forces, on any matter relating to any of the organizations into whose premises the break-in occurred, before the break-in?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I am nevertheless surprised to see that after insisting so much to have me make a statement under oath today, the Leader of the Opposition is not satisfied and wants to go further and further! He will have to make up his mind one day on what he wants to say and express it.

In answer to his question, I said, and I quote:

[English]

I had been briefed several times about certain activities of the APLQ and its alleged links with well known terrorists and convicted criminals. But nothing could have justified illegal acts being carried out by the RCMP or by any Canadian citizen for that matter.

Mr. Clark: My question to the minister was: When did the briefings begin? Did his briefings begin before the alleged break-in?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I do not remember the dates, but that was certainly before the criminal action took place. I had the opportunity several times to receive documents from the RCMP on the activities of that organization, but not on plans to seize documents illegally.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, now that we have established that the minister was briefed and engaged himself in briefings relative to these organizations prior to the break-in, would the minister tell us, without going into detail but without omitting any central direction, what kind of direction he gave to the security forces, to any of the security forces, relative to the means they should follow and the evidence they should seek to secure concerning any of these organizations?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, directing police operations is not the function of the Solicitor General but that of the police commissioner. Indeed, the responsibility of the police includes briefing the Solicitor General on all matters related to national security and, in this respect, the police has fulfilled its duties.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to keep having to come back to this question. What instructions did the former solicitor general give to the security forces of the RCM Police prior to the break-in?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I have never given illegal instructions to the police force as to the means to secure information. The means have always been legal and in line with what is allowed under the Official Secrets Act.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to impose longer upon the time of the House, but would the minister commit to writing or deposit in the House of Commons, since this is a matter which is now closed, a matter that is no longer under current investigation, or would he make a formal deposition outlining all of the instructions that he gave relative to the organizations whose offices were broken into, what instructions he gave to the RCM Police or other security forces prior to the break-in? He has now admitted that he was briefed before the break-in. We want to know what he told the police forces before they broke into the premises.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I truly believed that the Leader of the Opposition was a responsible man. He certainly does not have the makings of a prime minister. Just the same, I certify to the House that the only instructions which have ever been issued to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are legal ones. I shall certainly act in a responsible fashion and look into the files of the RCMP to ascertain whether I can supply additional information. I have no memory of whatever instruction may have been issued. Although I have no memory of that, I certainly remember that there has been nothing illegal, no matter what the Leader of the Opposition may say. If he has information to the contrary, he should level specific accusations and put his seat on the line.

[English]

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with the minister's question of privilege I too should like a minute to respond, being one of those who raised serious questions and concerns. I want to deal with three important points in the minister's statement. One concerns knowledge, the second concerns ministerial responsibility and the third concerns the very grave implications of the RCMP's behaviour which have been deeply confirmed by the minister's statement today.

Firstly, the minister claims to have had no foreknowledge of the break-in. I think no one at any point, that I am aware of anyway, has questioned his contention on that. I must now confess openly to not having the second question unequivocally resolved. I will give the minister and the House reasons for that. The Solicitor General's statement made in the House concerning the meeting of November 6 indicates that the minister was not informed about the break-in at that meeting, and the former minister has repeated this afternoon that he was not informed. I am still left with some doubt on the issue, and I should like to indicate to the minister why.

● (1530)

In a Vancouver Sun article on December 7, 1976 the minister is quoted. I have ascertained the accuracy from the reporter's point of view—the accuracy of his notes of direct quotations attributed to the minister at that time and printed in the Vancouver Sun. With reference to the minister's knowledge of the break-in after it occurred, presumably arising from discussions he had with Mr. Higgitt and others, he did not know accurately what he recalled. The article quotes the minister as saying the following:

> This was four years ago and I don't remember in precise terms what happened in this particular case.
> I knew about this association (the APLQ) and I know it was of interest to us because of its activities. But this is as far as I can remember.

The question the minister was responding to was: was he informed after the event about the RCMP's role in the break-in? As reported here, the minister said last December that he could not remember because it was some four years ago. He could not remember whether he was told after the event or not. Now it appears, both from the Solicitor General's statement and the minister's statement today, that since last December his memory has tightened up and now recalls with clear and unequivocal precision—

Miss MacDonald: Under hypnosis.

Mr. Broadbent: —that at the meeting of November 6 with Mr. Starnes and Mr. Higgitt he was told of the break-in. I want to be fair to everyone concerned, including the minister, and I would like also to have the truth; but it seems to me there is a pretty clear contradiction between these two assertions. On the one hand, the minister said last December that he could not recall if he learned of the break-in after and today in the House—

Mr. MacFarlane: That is what the article says.

Mr. Broadbent: That is perfectly true, that is what the article says. The reporter, with whom I have checked, said that he has checked his notes.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You are not the minister, Gus.

Mr. Broadbent: I am being serious about the event, and I hope hon. members opposite are being equally serious. I am just putting that on the record—

Mr. MacFarlane: Put the truth on the record, then.

Mr. Broadbent: I have a concern about the truth of the matter. The second point raised by the minister concerns his own responsibility. There is no question of veracity of statement here, but there is a very basic question of exercising his responsibility as a minister at the time. With reference to that meeting of November 6, he said that he did not put the explicit question to Mr. Higgitt or Mr. Starnes—were the RCMP, or were they not, involved in the break-in? He gave two reasons, as I recall. One was that the question had already been dealt with publicly by the former minister of justice, Mr. Choquette, and Mr. Choquette had already denied that there was police involvement. That is not very persuasive, because Mr. Choquette has to get his information from the police force and the police were passing on testimony about their own behaviour. That was not sufficient grounds for not posing the question. Second, he referred to the general respect he had for the RCMP which led him not to pose that question directly. In terms of his exercising his ministerial responsibilities—

Mr. MacEachen: How about some questions, instead of long speeches?

Mr. Clark: You cannot take the heat, Allan.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I brought the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) somewhat to order at the initial stage of this to indicate that we are here on a rather extraordinary procedure. We have a situation where the minister has raised this matter by way of a question of privilege and has agreed to answer some questions. There is no argument about the question of privilege because there is no motion attached to it. I can only allow to a limited extent, as I have tried to do, the hon. Leader of the Opposition to expose very briefly the line of questioning he might follow. I am attempting to do the same thing with the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent).

I do not think we are into a situation where contributions can be made by both sides of the House on the alleged matter of privilege, because there is no matter of privilege. There are questions available, and I should extend to each party what I have extended—an opportunity to make a very brief statement and then get on to the questioning. That is how it should be governed.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I respect that, but I am sure you recognize that the minister has made a statement on this important matter and the rest of us made accusations either directly or indirectly and want to deal directly with the matter now. I do not find the minister's explanation acceptable. I am referring to his explanation for not putting the question directly to Mr. Higgitt and Mr. Starnes at the time. We know from the press at the time that he knew the RCMP was monitoring this group and was watching their activities. In the same newspaper article he is quoted as saying: "We were watching this group". Once the serious accusation had been made by the group, that the police had been involved in the break-in, or queries were put to the minister implying that they were, there was an elementary responsibility on his part to put the question at that meeting before he replied to the letter—did you or did you not take part in the break-in? I conclude that point with that observation. He was negligent in his responsibility.

Finally, my third point is that there was indeed a conspiracy involved in this operation on the side of the RCMP. I do not hesitate in saying that. Mr. Starnes and Mr. Higgitt met with the former minister to discuss a letter which asked questions about RCMP involvement, and they did not have the courtesy or integrity to bring to the minister's attention what they knew at the time. That was a clear neglect of their responsibilities. Any meaning of the word "conspiracy" in this activity applies directly to the top level of the RCMP. That has been confirmed here today in the minister's statement.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I am never very happy to take part in discussions which could create some doubt among the public about the sincerity of a minister or a member of parliament. This is always truly disagreeable, but when you have to do your duty, you must do so with courage and try to throw some light on the matter and give justice to those who deserve it. I recognize that it is impossible from a human point of view to do so because God is the only judge since He knows everything.

In any case, the minister said earlier in his statement that he agreed with the statement made by the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Fox) on Friday, June 17, 1977. He even went further and stated that he was willing to put his seat on the line, which is a formidable challenge to the accuser who provoked him more directly.

Mr. Speaker, I have often witnessed such challenges, but not in the House of Commons. I have seen challenges of this type during the Taschereau administration in the province of Quebec. This was during the debates on public accounts, and three, four or five times a day, someone made this challenge: Put your seat on the line if you want to prove such or such a thing! No member ever lost his seat because of this and no one ever followed up these charges.

I seriously believe that this will not solve the problem. I am greatly concerned about this, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to ask two questions of the minister following his question of privilege. I am especially concerned by the fact that this whole question should come to the surface after five years. Is justice in Canada so slow? Must such convoluted procedures be used to establish the innocence or the guilt of someone? Is this Canadian justice? No wonder so many ordinary citizens in our society do not believe in it anymore. They know where justice courts are located but they are often looking for justice. It is not the same thing.

● (1540)

I was surprised last week when I read in a newspaper that the accused who had pleaded guilty were nonetheless discharged by the judge presiding over the court. I do not intend to comment on the decision of that court but, Mr. Speaker, I can ponder over the content of this report which indicates that these individuals who pleaded guilty ended up by being discharged. Something is not clear in this case or at least in my mind. If it is clear, it has to be clarified to me and I will do my best to understand.

My first question to the minister who just made a statement is the following: could he tell the House what happened to all the documents which were seized by the RCMP and their friends at L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec? What happened to them?

My second question is the following: In view of the very clear statement made by the minister to satisfy both Parliament and the public at large, will the minister tell the House whether he would be prepared to recommend to the cabinet the setting up of an inquiry, given the fact that the RCMP is involved and that this body is placed under federal responsibility?

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I have no authority to recommend anything to the cabinet. It is up to the Solicitor General or the Minister of Justice to make such recommendations. As for me, as Minister of Supply and Services, I do not feel at all entitled to do it.

If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, I would just reply very briefly to an allegation made by the leader of the New Democratic Party regarding an article published in the Vancouver press. I remember quite vividly the event. There was then a public sale by the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and I was also about to announce the introduction of a new coin to commemorate the 25th anniversary of the rule of Her Majesty the Queen. At that time, I did say repeatedly to newsmen that that was the purpose of my visit to Vancouver—Vancouver Island in fact. What happened is that the newsman insisted that we talk about that matter and other issues with respect to the time when I was the Solicitor General. I told him I did not want to make any comments on that subject. As he insisted and was asking if I knew the L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec, I told him that I did know of the activities of that agency and that in so far as I was concerned, it constituted a threat to the security of the state. This was as far as I went because at that time I had neither the desire nor the necessary preparation to discuss this issue. If today my words are interpreted in a different manner, as I do not doubt the good faith of the leader of the New Democratic Party, in those circumstances, I am therefore led to question either the good faith or the accuracy of the recollection of the newsman.

[English]

Mr. Fraser: I wonder if I could put a couple of questions to the minister. As I understand the story from the statement of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) and from the minister today, the position the minister takes is that when the letter of October 9, 1972 came to his attention, it was not so much in the form of a letter informing or assuming that the RCMP, the provincial police of Quebec and the municipal police were involved, but a letter inquiring about it—I think that is the word the minister used. I see him nodding in agreement. At that stage, when the letter was discussed with officials of the RCMP, can the minister remember, to the best of his ability, whether in anything they did or said the RCMP officials who were with him indicated a denial that the break-in about which the letter inquired took place? Was there any suggestion that the minister can remember from any of the RCMP with whom he discussed that letter of denial or was there any implied denial of the suggestion that there had been a break-in by the RCMP?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid this is going very far into details. I recall very well what I had in mind. First of all, the provincial attorney general had denied any involvement of the police of Montreal, Quebec or Canada; second, I found it unlikely that the RCMP could have been involved in any illegal activity and, third, police officers had repeated to me that night, at the meeting, that anyhow the Attorney General was responsible for the inquiry conducted by the Montreal police. Let us wait for the results of that inquiry. That is very simply what happened.

[English]

Mr. Fraser: I accept what the minister says. The question which I think is concerning a great many people is why, in the absence of some denial on the part of the RCMP officials, did the minister not, of his own volition ask point blank of the RCMP—despite whatever the minister had heard from the minister of justice or other press reports—the simple question as to whether there was any truth in this allegation. Why was that question not asked?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, of course, all kinds of scenarios may be imagined after the fact. Some may wonder why I did not call the Quebec Minister of Justice to ask him whether he had told the truth when he said that the police were in no way involved. Of course, I could have called the director of security services and told him that the letter from the APLQ was still an important letter from a respectable organization and asked him whether the contents of that letter were true, and so on. But these are scenarios which are easy to imagine after the fact. The fact remains that considering the circumstances prevailing at that time, I think it was simply showing one's good faith and confidence in the police and in the Quebec Minister of Justice to take their word. If a minister should act otherwise, I think there would have to be inquiry after inquiry on all the briefs he receives from government officials. We cannot operate in this manner.

● (1550)

[English]

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be in the least facetious on this matter. I want to thank the minister for being here to be questioned, but I suggest that he probably now wishes he had asked that question.

I have one further question. Following the letter and after the discussion with the RCMP officials, was there any further discussion between the minister and any other RCMP officials? Between the time he looked at the letter of October 9, 1972 and the time he left his post as solicitor general was there any further discussion with any officials of the RCMP concerning this particular event, or was the discussion we have heard about concerning the letter the last discussion that the minister, as the then solicitor general, had with officials of the RCMP?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Fraser: In view of the minister's answer I wonder if I might be permitted to ask another question. Could the minister advise of what further discussions there were? What was the purport of those discussions, what was the effect of those discussions and were any further questions raised between the minister and the RCMP as to whether the RCMP was involved in the break-in? Can the minister help us in that regard?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, from the time when I discussed the matter with the RCMP, on November 6, until I was appointed Minister of Supply and Services at the end of the same month, I did not have occasion to bring up the matter with the RCMP, nor did they take the opportunity of our meetings to discuss it.

[English]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I feel that it is almost impossible to get the true facts with this system of questioning.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is easy to raise alibis while pretending to praise the RCMP. As a result of the statements made—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the hon. gentleman will rise and make his observations, I will listen to him, but his observations indicate that the hon. gentleman does not want to be identified with the nonsense he is expressing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Olivier: Go back home this time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I listened to the minister, and it surprises me that what he expressed today he did not express when he was leaving for Africa to give the French republics there an idea of true democratic government and how it operates. When he was asked on that occasion, why did he refuse to give any answer? I am sure he will have an alibi for that too, but in order to enable him so to have, I feel that this whole matter should be dealt with by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Trudeau: Make an accusation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the only way in which the views of all parties directly or indirectly involved can be secured and a decision arrived at in justice to the minister and also to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who, unless such an investigation takes place, will be in the position of having been subject to a selective presentation by the minister. While praising the mounted police the minister was actually leaving the impression, strongly worded, that the mounted police are seriously subject to criticism. I am not speaking about the break-in as such. I think serious mistakes were made in connection with the acceptance of the decision of the court that certain wrongdoers should be in a position—whatever their position and however high it may be—of not being subject to the penalties that the average Canadian would be subject to on a plea of guilty.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That the matter of the involvement of the Minister of Supply and Services before and after the break-in into L'Agence de Presse Libre be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I am sure hon. members will anticipate that the Chair would have some grave reservations about the procedural regularity of such a motion. Motions tabled are upon notice. Notice has been given to the Chair of a question of privilege by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), but he has not, in connection with that notice, given the Chair notice of any motion. The right of any other hon. member to move a motion either upon privilege or upon any other subject at any time is described in our Standing Orders. I believe that any other motion tabled at this time would be subject to the same restrictions and requirements as it would be under any other circumstances, that is, that the Chair would first have to have been given notice.

I suppose a question would now arise as to whether notice by the Minister of Supply and Services of his intention to raise a question of privilege constitutes notice that any other hon. member might now move a motion. That is something on which I am prepared to hear discussion, if there is any, and I will withhold my decision until after I have heard some discussion. I noted that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) was seeking the floor. I do not know whether it was for that purpose or not.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, as usual, I think your observations are correct inasmuch as normally if a question of privilege is to be raised and if a motion is to be moved, notice would have to be given in advance of the sitting. We find now that the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) brings himself before this House allegedly on a question of privilege with the idea of giving his version of the situation to this House. When he came before the House on a question of privilege we would have expected that if he were intending to rise on a question of privilege and if he were legitimately concerned about clearing his name and the reputation of the RCMP, he would accompany that statement with a motion to have the matter referred to the appropriate committee. Not having done that, he has abused the procedures of this House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He has abused the procedures of this House by not bringing that forward, and that only shows the speciousness with which he attends this House to make a statement based on his own selective memory. So I think it is very appropriate, in view of the fact that we would have expected a motion to follow a question of privilege which was legitimate, if it was legitimate, for the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) to move his motion on a fresh item of privilege at the first opportunity which arose during the course of debate.

Under those circumstances I think it is quite proper for an hon. member to do so. It is only where a matter is to be brought up at a subsequent sitting and after the event that the requirement is that notice be given with respect to a matter which took place on a preceding day. However, this happened just now. We now find after the minister has spoken that he does not intend to make a reference to a committee, to allow hon. members of this House to investigate any documentation or to examine in the course of committee hearings any people who were involved either as officials or senior officials of the RCMP in order to get a complete story and a proper perspective and, indeed, to have the benefit of the information, advice or testimony of any person who may be able to shed light on this particular matter.

With all due respect, I would think the motion is most appropriate at this time. It highlights and underlines the fact that the Minister of Supply and Services is not the least bit interested in shedding light on the matter.

Mr. Speaker: I think, in the interests of more enlightened discussion, I can expose one or two other problems about the matter. I am afraid it is not just a simple matter of procedure of notice of the motion. I do not think there has been a previous occasion when one member has moved that the conduct of another member be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. What is involved here is procedure, but we have a more detailed and deeper problem than that, namely, whether the matter is one of privilege or one that has to be argued.

Traditionally, when a member of this House seeks to have his own conduct reviewed by a standing committee of the House, obviously the standard of the question of privilege is relaxed somewhat because any member who seeks that is generally granted it. To extend that to a situation in which one member seeks to have the conduct of another member investigated by a committee, however, means that a number of severe standards come into play. It will not fall simply on a matter of notice, but becomes a substantive matter of whether it qualifies as a question of privilege. It would be curious to find that no member could have moved the motion yesterday or a week ago to refer the conduct of the Minister of Supply and Services to the committee on the question of privilege, but that it could be done now after the minister has made a statement. I am not sure about that, but I am prepared to listen to argument.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I find the turn of events rather surprising. Yesterday the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) was almost bullied by members of the opposition who were asking him to get up in the House and clear his name. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), both in the House and outside the House, called upon the minister to make a statement and to subject himself to questioning. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) inferred in their comments yesterday—

Mr. Broadbent: Implied.

Mr. MacEachen: —that there was a matter of privilege at stake and that the minister ought to take advantage of it, in the words of the deputy House leader on the other side, "to clear his name."

Mr. Hnatyshyn: As a minimum.

Mr. MacEachen: Then, the minister having risen and having made a statement—

Mr. Diefenbaker: And having not cleared his name.

Mr. MacEachen: The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) says, "Having not cleared his name". I will return to that a little later. The Minister of Supply and Services made his statement and then opened himself to questions by hon. members opposite. The Leader of the Opposition came to bat, and what happened? He struck out!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: One after the other, all members of the opposition were given the opportunity to question the minister, and he answered their questions. The right hon. member for Prince Albert, realizing that the situation was going so badly and that the minister was doing so well, said, "Let's stop this. Let's go to a standing committee."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: That's right.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Come on, Allan.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We have just begun the battle.

Mr. MacEachen: Obviously, he had no questions to ask the minister. None occurred to him, so in order to put if off for some days he said, "Let's send it to a standing committee."

I find it extraordinary, this development having taken place, that it should be urged that the Minister of Supply and Services, having risen on a question of privilege to clear his name, to defend himself, should then be asked to grant a motion to send his conduct to a parliamentary committee for investigation. If that is the case—when I say this, I do not infer for a moment that the hon. member was not fully entitled to clear his name—but when a member gets up in the House in reply to some charge to clear his name and give an explanation, is he then obliged to send his conduct to a committee for examination? If so, why did the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) not feel obliged to do it? Why did the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) not feel obliged to do it?

An hon. Member: They are going to court.

Mr. MacEachen: They took the honourable course and explained themselves. Their explanation was accepted, certainly on this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Their explanation was accepted, their word was accepted, but if any hon. member on this side of the House had not accepted the word of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe there was a course open to him. Clearly, he could have risen and said, "I do not accept what the hon. member has said. I think he has been guilty and the smear is justified." An hon. member could have done that and, of course, Mr. Speaker would then find a question of privilege because the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe would have been charged with misconduct by a member on this side of the House.

That is the situation we find ourselves in today. Hon. members have heard the minister; they heard him answer the questions. It is open to them to rise on privilege, to make a motion and to define the charge. That is open to them.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. MacEachen: They can do it tomorrow. Any hon. member can do it tomorrow. Mr. Speaker Michener laid out the ground rules. If hon. members opposite do not want to do the library work on that, I will send the reference to the right hon. gentleman opposite and then he is free to make the charge. But as Mr. Speaker Michener said, no hon. member can be investigated by a motion of this House unless there is a charge and an accusation.

The Minister of Supply and Services is confident of his position. He is confident of the truth of what he says. He is not relying on any rule when he says, "I am prepared to put my seat on the line in support of my statement." If a parliamentary committee investigated his conduct and found that he had told a lie, then he would forfeit his seat. Is any hon. gentleman on the other side ready to take the same responsibility?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I shall call on the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), and then the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates).

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, one would think we had the period 1972 to 1974 all over again. We have heard the master of persuasive, synthetic argument at it again. The government House leader will note the reference, I am sure. If the matter we are dealing with were simply of procedural concern, then the kind of rhetorical response that the minister, with his rhetorical statement, has generated would be appropriate. He always manages to shift a matter of substance, by clever argument, to one of procedure and leave the House with the impression that that is what the issue is all about.

Let me say, at the outset, that I agree with the substance of the government House leader's response. I, for one, appreciated the fact that the Minister of Supply and Services came into the House, submitted himself in the normal course to a question of privilege, went beyond that and subjected himself to questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: That is why I disagree with the suggestion put forward by the official opposition. I think what the government House leader has said about the way of dealing with the question of privilege is appropriate, and the minister has dealt with that. That is not to conclude, however, as the government House leader implied in his statement, that somehow when the minister got to his feet he did so well with his explanation that the whole world was persuaded of the legitimacy of his case. The fact is quite to the contrary. Certain questions have been raised, following what the minister said, about the appropriateness of his actions as minister and whether he fulfilled his obligations. Indeed, the question of the accuracy of his memory has been raised.

● (1610)

If I may refer back to the earlier question of privilege, the minister suggested that the newspaper article I was quoting was written by a journalist on the west coast when the minister was out there on another matter. I suggest his memory is failing him. That article was written after a long, detailed interview with the minister here, in his Ottawa office, an interview exclusively dealing with the break-in. I remind the minister of that slight misremembering of a fact.

On procedure, I agree with the substance of the government House leader's argument. This matter should not be referred to a special committee of the House unless a change is made. I categorically disagree, however, with his statement that the minister, in making his statement today, resolved the issue. As we said some days ago, we need a public inquiry. We still need it.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) has not satisfied members of the House with his statement concerning the events of that unfortunate period in 1972. There is a great deal to be said in support of a public inquiry for which members of my party have repeatedly called. But the matter of the inquiry rests in the hands of the government of Canada, which so far has engaged in stonewalling tactics. The leader of the New Democratic Party does not think the committee on privileges and elections would be an appropriate forum in which to examine this question.

Mr. Broadbent: Make a charge.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Let me say, sir, that an examination by that committee, which would treat this matter with the fairness with which it has traditionally treated other matters, would be better than not having any inquiry at all. That is the position in which we are left.

Mr. Broadbent: Make a charge.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Some questions must still be answered—

Mr. Nystrom: Make a charge, Walter.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —with respect to the matter.

Mr. Nystrom: Make a charge, Walter.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I will make a charge. I think the minister is absolutely incompetent, and he demonstrated that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, someone said that I should lay a charge, and I will lay a charge.

Mr. Goyer: You are stupid.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Is it reasonable, sir—

Mr. Nystrom: Walter, that is quite a charge.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not like to be provoked.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) may continue in a moment. We have at present a combination of procedural difficulties confronting us. Before proceeding further we must decide whether it is in order for the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) to move the motion he has proposed. Obviously, we must clear up that procedural difficulty. Perhaps other hon. members wish to contribute to that narrow procedural point which I can dispose of without further argument. Perhaps I could hear the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) on that point. Is the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton continuing on that point?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am continuing with my statement, I hope with the same latitude as you granted the leader of the NDP.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is still open to the House to question the minister on his question of privilege. He has made that offer and it is still open. However, I have a motion before me and I must decide, on a point of order, whether that motion can, in fact, be moved; that is to say, whether it is in order. The decision on that does not affect the continuation of the argument or discussion on which we were embarked previously concerning the minister's statement, but I must decide whether the motion just handed to me which comes from the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), can be moved. Is it in order? If there is further argument on that point, I will hear it, after which I shall return to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton and hear him on the minister's statement.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I have been in this House—

An hon. Member: Too long.

Mr. Coates: It may be too long for you, my friend, but any time you want to run against me we shall see who will win that battle. We are in a most difficult position because we ignored the rules of the House. A member of this House rose on what was to be a question of privilege; it ended up, apparently, as a statement on motions. I have never, in my 20 years as a member, seen another member rise in this House on a question of privilege and end up answering questions about his responsibilities as solicitor general at a previous time under a previous administration. But that is the situation at present. I can appreciate why the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) tried to bring sanity to what has become an insane situation in this House.

The minister rose and made a statement, supposedly on a question of privilege. Then he began answering them. I suggest this should properly be done in the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections where members would have the opportunity not only to examine his words but the words of others who were also involved in decisions concerning the illegal break-in. The committee would learn what advice the minister received, from whom he received it, and so on. For instance, I should like to see the minister's executive assistant take the oath and tell members whether or not the minister was informed, when he was informed, and other such matters concerning the letter in question.

I did not particularly care for the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) standing up and trotting out that old position, "If you want a member to appear before a committee, make a charge." We have heard the government say this time and again when it stonewalls and refuses to answer our legitimate questions on legitimate matters. The President of the Privy Council tried to cast aspersions on the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner). I say to the President of the Privy Council, if the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe had been solicitor general at the pertinent time there would not have been any problem with RCMP, illegal break-ins—and we all know why.

The President of the Privy Council tried to leave the impression that if the Committee on Privileges and Elections dealt with all the charges and countercharges which members level at each other in this House, it would be busy indeed. But this is a different case because we are asking for an accounting. We want the former solicitor general to tell us how the RCMP operated in this country when he was solicitor general. That is not just a simple charge made between members of this House; it is a specific matter. As I say, we want to know how the former solicitor general operated when he was responsible for that portfolio. We cannot deal with the matter in this House. The former solicitor general cannot stand in this House on a question of privilege and think he can clear the matter simply by answering questions, because many of the people involved in the case cannot corroborate the evidence the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) is endeavouring to give this House. That is the crux of the matter.

I support the motion the right hon. member for Prince Albert proposes to move. Though it may seem strange in the circumstances, it would, if accepted, let the people of this country know what the former solicitor general actually did and what activities the RCMP were engaged in. We and the people of the country have a right to know how all this came about. We have not been presented with the facts. No wonder the President of the Privy Council and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) are smiling. They are stonewalling, because the statement on the question of privilege resolved itself into a statement on motions.

● (1620)

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reserve the right you gave me with respect to the broader aspects of this matter. However, I must say that what the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) has said makes eminent good sense from the point of view of this parliament getting at the facts. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) ought to be commended for having raised this matter. I have looked at the Standing Orders of the House of Commons and I see nothing that prohibits a member of this House moving a matter of privilege. I hope the general rule will apply, if there is no prohibition against moving anything in this House of Commons, that a member has the right to move something in this House of Commons.

The one technicality, and I underscore it, against the motion which will put this matter where it belongs, before a body of examination, not an ersatz court such as this, has turned out to be Standing Order 17 which reads:

Unless notice of motion has been given under Standing Order 42—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I interrupt the hon. member to make that clear. That is not the problem. The problem is much more serious than that. The motion proposed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) is one which seeks to have referred to a committee of the House, for examination by that committee, the conduct of another member.

The practices of this House have been described very clearly in the past. When such a motion is offered, whether it is done on proper notice or not—and for the moment we can set that to one side because if it is not proper notice today, it can be done on proper notice tomorrow—the question still remains, fundamentally, when one member seeks to have a committee of the House examine the conduct of another member, that it requires some very rigid restrictions from a procedural point of view. They have been described in the precedent clearly set out by Mr. Speaker Michener when he occupied this chair. For the benefit of hon. members, that reference is to be found at page 582 of Journals of June 19, 1959.

In that ruling the Speaker of the day—and I think we can set this point aside for a moment—clearly sets out that no member is required to have his conduct examined by any committee of this House except upon a motion which has contained in it a substantive charge of misconduct on the part of the member. While the notice provision can be altered today, I can waive the notice or we can wait until tomorrow, I am still stuck with the precedent that any motion which seeks to require the examination of, not the member moving the motion but another member, must be made under very rigid procedural restrictions. They set out that such a motion must contain a specific charge.

Frequently in the past motions of this nature which say, "Resolved that the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization examine into the conduct of another member," have been turned down unless they contain a charge of wrongdoing that is to be examined specifically by the committee. It is not a question of notice or of semantics. It is a question of substance. Traditionally, what we have gone through this afternoon is not just a wrinkle in our procedures. Traditionally, as we did with the four members recently who stood in their place under the umbrella of privilege, the courtesy has always been extended to a member who in these situations has been publicly accused, scorned or attacked, to make a personal statement in the House. That is not technically privilege. It never has been, but it has always been a courtesy extended to members of the House.

The only additional thing that has happened here is that in the circumstances the minister has said, "I will open myself to questions if that is what the House wants." Obviously, that is what the House wanted, and now we have questions. I think we should keep our eye exactly on the way the procedure has unfolded. For the moment, I do no injustice to anyone, I am sure, to follow the very clear and precise Michener precedent and rule that in the circumstances the motion of the right hon. member for Prince Albert is not in order. That, I think, works no prejudice or injustice to anyone. It leaves us in the position we were in a few minutes ago when the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) was putting a question, to be followed by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I was not going to put a question. I did not realize there was a situation that required me to put a question. However, as a member of this House of Commons and as a person who is interested in the proper operation of the parliamentary system and the question of ministerial responsibility, I will have something to say about that. Surely this procedure, which I have described as an ersatz procedure, does not bar me from my right to make a statement on a matter which is so important that the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) decided to make the statement which he did. That is the position I am going to take, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: In fact, that is exactly what the situation is. There really is no provision for a debate. There is no provision for statements by opposition members. At the moment, if the House withdraws its consent to go along with this arrangement of questions to the minister, I am prepared to close down the procedure. If members want to continue to question the minister, that is fine. If they do not, we are left in a situation where we are back to orders of the day and the rest of routine proceedings.

I should also add that I said yesterday that pursuant to Standing Order 26, the application by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), I would order a debate. As soon as I can get to that, which I said I would do at three o'clock today, and which I would have done except for the raising of the question of privilege, I will have to set a time for the commencement of that debate which will give every hon. member of the House an opportunity to make a full statement within the time limits set out in the Standing Orders. That will commence later this day. If there are questions to be put now to the minister, I hope they will be brief and precise and that we can then get on and order the debate under Standing Order 26, which will allow the kind of statements that are sought.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services. I do not know if he has had time to have his office check the record with regard to the interview he gave to a reporter of the Vancouver Sun. If not, I hope he will do so. He will find it was a comprehensive interview given here in Ottawa on the subject of what is described as an RCMP cover-up.

My question pertains directly to the meeting he held with Mr. Higgitt on November 6, at which time, according to what has been said in the House both today and on Friday, the subject under discussion was the RCMP recommendation to the minister not to reply to a letter sent to him on inquiring whether the RCMP and other police forces were involved in the break-in of October 6, 1972. The minister obviously accepted that advice and did not reply to the letter asking about RCMP participation in a break-in.

How did the minister reach the conclusion not to send a reply without putting the question very explicitly to the RCMP: Were you, or were you not, involved? If he did not put that question to them, and he says he did not, why did he reach the decision not to reply to that serious letter when it is obvious that if the answer had been negative it would have been in his interest and that of the RCMP to have the whole matter clarified so that he could reply to such a group and say, "No, there was no RCMP participation"?

● (1630)

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I am going to repeat myself, but that seems to be necessary. First of all, it was not the commissioner himself. I said in my statement that the RCMP recommended that I do not answer the letter, without giving explanations, and it was following the reception of that memorandum sent to my executive assistant that on the first opportunity I raised the issue with the commissioner and the director general of the security service and asked them why they were recommending that the letter not be answered? I gave the reasons for that earlier, namely that the Minister of Justice had made a statement that he was responsible for that matter, that it came necessarily under his jurisdiction in the province of Quebec and second, there was an investigation under way by the Montreal police. So that was not the only issue we had to discuss. Once again, this case is being considered separately, but it was one among other matters we had to discuss, and those circumstances have to be taken into consideration. That is why at that time since there was an investigation under way I said I was satisfied.

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Supply and Services, who was Solicitor General at that time, say to this House whether or not the commissioner of the RCMP told him that one of his men was supposed to carry out a search without warrant in any place for one reason or another?

Mr. Goyer: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the following supplementary. We know that the minister was not informed. Whom did he have conversations with from the RCMP around November 7? Could we have his name? If so, did he say whether one of his men had made a search without warrant?

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, it was a meeting with the commissioner of the RCMP and the director general of the security service, and my answer is "no".

[English]

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I, too, have a question for the minister. Throughout his contribution to the discussion of this question of privilege, and throughout the statement on Friday by the Solicitor General, this situation has been referred to as an isolated incident. However, the House knows that I, myself, along with the hon. member for Central Nova have drawn attention to a number of similar situations.

I am asking the minister whether he is claiming the same innocent ignorance in relation to the break-in at Praxis Corporation, since following that incident the minister, under his own signature, sent out a letter which contained some of the information found in the stolen material. Also, in that case the minister was bound to know the material was stolen since the incident was widely reported in the media at the time. This would make the hon. gentleman at least suspect of taking part in a conspiracy to repress the truth.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Oberle: Can the minister relate to that situation?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, first I do not think it has been demonstrated that the RCMP made an illegal break-in in the Praxis case and, second, the whole Praxis case happened when I was not Solicitor General of Canada. Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the object matter of the question refers to my responsibilities as Solicitor General but only on that part of my responsibilities concerning the APLQ case.

[English]

Mr. Oberle: With all respect, it has not been proven that the RCMP had no part in that break-in. However, it has been proven that there was a break-in, and it has been proven that the former solicitor general sent out a letter over his signature accusing 21 innocent Canadians of conspiring to overthrow the government and replace it with a radical alternative. The minister must have known, when he sent that letter, that the evidence upon which it was based was stolen evidence. Did he ask the people who had provided that information where they obtained that evidence? Did he order an investigation as to who the thieves were, regardless of what we know today? What was the nature of his discussions with those persons who gave him the evidence on the basis of which he signed and sent around a letter to the various departments and agencies of government?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, first, the hon. member tells us a nice story which might satisfy him but which is not consistent with the facts and, second, I do not think that we are now dealing with that matter is the House.

[Mr. Beaudoin.]

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am prepared to allow the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River to ask a further question. Then I think the hon. member for Central Nova should conclude the questioning. After that we should get on with other business.

Mr. Oberle: I must ask the minister this: Is he telling the House that he did not write the letter of June 15, 1971, and that he was not solicitor general at the time of the break-in at Praxis? That is what he has just said. I am suggesting he makes himself suspect to taking part in a conspiracy to obstruct justice and repress the truth.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I have two points to make briefly, and a couple of questions to ask. I think we should remember that the most serious difficulties concerning this matter were raised, not just by opposition parties in this House but by a former commissioner of the RCMP and a former director of police security services. I would also submit that there is a distinct difference between fault and responsibility. The minister's exculpatory statement would have gone down much better in this chamber if he had been prepared to say, in effect, "It was not entirely my fault, but I accept some responsibility for it". That is exactly what any lawyer would do for a law clerk before a colleague. I should like to ask the minister whether it was the usual practice for the RCMP to recommend to him that he not answer letters. Was this something which was done regularly; or was this a particular occasion?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member can say all the nonsense he wants on the matter of ministerial responsibilities, I do not care. I am ready to assume my responsibilities each time I am involved in a decision. However I cannot take any responsibility for something I do not know. Ministerial responsibility as the responsibilities of lawyer are as simple as that. Maybe the hon. member did not learn this in law school. Now I shall answer his question. Mr. Speaker, I do not remember if the RCMP told me not to answer a letter, but as I said, it should be checked. I remember very well that some people asked to meet me and after discussing the matter with the RCMP I met none of its members for obvious reasons that I do not have to explain but I think I acted in a responsible way.

[English]

Mr. MacKay: I thank the minister for his answer and would remind him that whatever his contentions, he was at the time the man responsible for seeing that the federal police force of this country did not break the law. This did not happen, and he will not take any responsibility; that is obvious. I ask the minister this: Has he ever investigated any complaints made against the force over which he had responsibility? Is he telling us he has never done anything personally to verify any complaints made against the force?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I never had any other body than the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to check into complaints about its members. I have always relied upon and trusted the RCMP. I indicated in my statement that this was not an ideal system, that I had suggested myself to the Prime Minister that a commission of inquiry should be set up, first, on the issue of discipline within the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, because that was and still is in my view a major issue, and second, on how to channel and investigate complaints against the force as the federal police force. The Prime Minister later acted on that suggestion when my predecessor the Hon. Warren Allmand became Solicitor General.

[English]

Mr. MacKay: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the minister's successors were coming under question as a result of this matter, did he at any time, either then or before, brief his successor, the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, or indeed the present incumbent, and tell them fully what was going on? Did he, also, recently take the opportunity to meet with former commissioner Higgitt and police director Starnes in order to check the validity of their two impressions, as opposed to his non-recollection, that possibly there was some reason for believing that he had been briefed? How much effort did the minister make to verify his contention that he could never have been briefed, despite the fact that these two eminent gentlemen said they would be surprised if he had not been?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, although a lawyer the hon. member is being quite naïve. I shall draw a parallel. When some member leaves his office, he necessarily hands over his files. If he were to give a briefing on every case he is leaving behind, this would become an unending communication. When a minister leaves his portfolio, he must necessarily rely on his departmental officials to keep his successor informed on the files still pending. That is normal. Of course, I discussed with my successor matters of a general nature involving the orientation of the department. But there was no question that I discussed individual cases, and this includes the one referred to by the hon. member.

Indeed, I met the former RCMP Commissioner, I met the former Director General of Security Services and the current Commissioner of the RCMP, the future Commissioner of the RCMP, the current Director General of Security Services, the assistant Solicitor General and the Solicitor General. This was less than a month ago, and, of course, there was an exchange of views on this whole issue. I understand the statement made June 17 last by the Solicitor General of Canada resulted, in part at least, from that meeting.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DESIGNATION OF ALLOTTED DAY

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I should like, for the convenience of the House, to designate tomorrow, June 22, as an allotted day and to request the House, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order 58(5), to agree that June 22 shall be the final allotted day for the business of supply for the period ending June 30, 1977.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that is agreeable to us and in accordance with some discussions that my colleague and I have had. Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet, may I make an observation with respect to the procedure today, though not in any way to question the Chair. We have had a very interesting two days regarding the right of members to question. Yesterday the Chair ruled that under no circumstances could a minister be questioned as to his responsibilities in a former position. Today, in answer to a statement made by the Minister of Supply and Services who indicated that he would be willing to be questioned, the minister was questioned in extenso with respect to his former duties as a minister of the Crown.

I reread Your Honour's statement of yesterday and I must say that your statement was extremely strong. I would hope that the activities which have occurred today have broken new ground in the House of Commons and that we will now be able to question ministers of the Crown during the course of the regular question period with respect to their former capacities, at least while they are ministers, and perhaps beyond. We would have to explore that. But I would hope we have broken new ground, because there does seem to be some conflict between the two points of view.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has raised an important point. He may recall that yesterday when the point of order was debated I recognized the difficulty which the opposition had, under the rules, to question the Minister of Supply and Services. I said that I hoped a way could be found to overcome this rule which, despite what happened today, is still in effect. It was because of the desire to accommodate the House that the Minister of Supply and Services, when he began his statement on privilege, said that he was ready, if the House wished, and with the consent of the House, to open himself to questions and to give members an opportunity to question him.

Despite what has been said by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, I do not believe that the ruling made yesterday has in any way been affected by an arrangement that was entered into, first of all by the consent of the minister and of all hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suppose it provides fascinating consideration, but I did guard that ground, I thought, today when during the question period, in response to the question put by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, the minister indicated that he would make a statement. I believe I said then that if the minister was prepared to come before the House and make the statement, and intended to permit questions, if that was with the unanimous consent of the House it could be done. But I do not think that in any way altered the basic requirement respecting ministerial responsibility in our question period. However, I am sure that the next time one of these situations arises there will be an argument, and the incumbent of the chair, who I hope will be a successor, will perhaps be able to resolve the problem with a little more lucidity than has been the case over the last couple of days.

Also, in attempting to sort out proceedings for the rest of the day I should indicate now that there is a statement on motions to be made by the Secretary of State. We have not yet launched into routine proceedings. We are facing a statutory order, and when we do get to orders of the day we are compelled to continue until at least ten o'clock the debate on the anti-inflation program.

I indicated to the House that I would announce the time for commencement of the debate under Standing Order 26. I will return to the House after some deliberation on that point, but my intention would be to order that if the debate on the anti-inflation board goes until ten o'clock, the debate under Standing Order 26 will begin at ten o'clock. If, however, there is some disposition during the next hour or so to attempt to resolve the matter in some other way, if members come to some agreement on the possibility of starting the debate under Standing Order 26 earlier, then that is one suggestion that could be made. I will return to the chair perhaps at about five minutes to six to make a definitive announcement. If, in the meantime, there are any discussions which might produce some understanding about starting the debate at eight or nine o'clock, I can hear them in the interim and make some decision at six o'clock.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, if I understood your last observation correctly, you would be willing to listen to some discussion about how we may best proceed procedurally. I should like to indicate, on behalf of our party, our willingness to work out an arrangement, by unanimous consent, since the topic is of such importance, not to have a debate commencing at ten o'clock at night but, if agreeable to the official opposition, for example, to consider this particular topic as their topic, in which case we would be quite happy to abandon the motion which happens to be in my name and to put it in the name of a member of the official opposition. We could then have a full discussion on the topic tomorrow and obviate the need for a late night debate today.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, these are matters that could be looked into.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, is it understood that my proposal respecting an allotted day tomorrow is that it be the final allotted day? I know that agreement was indicated by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, but I should like it made clear that it has been accepted and ordered by the House.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, that was agreed to this morning, and we stand by it.

Mr. Speaker: Then that is agreed and so ordered.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS RESPECTING POLICY ON OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table, in both official languages, the documents entitled "A National Understanding: The Official Languages of Canada" and "Un choix national: Les langues officielles au Canada."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement concerning a document that is being made public today setting forth the government's views about language policy for Canada. The document draws from a review of government experience to date with the official languages policy. As the background of the review is already known to members of this House, I will limit my remarks to mentioning some of the results of the review to which the government attaches importance.

The emphasis of language policy thus far has been on recognition of the equality of status of English and French as the official languages of Canada, both as approved by all parties in parliament, and as used in all the institutions of parliament and the government of Canada. The most important result of our review, as the statement tabled today makes clear, is the conclusion that the federal government cannot by itself ensure that the policy succeeds. The policy must also have the fullest support of the provincial governments.

What the government is saying in this statement is that recognition of the equality of English and French as the official languages of Canada must extend from the federal to the provincial level of government if this country is going to continue to exist as a single and unified country.

[Translation]

To say this will be interpreted by some as trying to tell the provincial governments what to do. But what is really being said is simply that this is one of the major facts evident in our experience with the policy thus far. One of the principles the government advocates, again as the statement makes clear, is that Canadians have a right to have their children educated in the official language of their choice, and the necessary facilities should be provided wherever numbers warrant. In other words, the federal government has concluded from its review of language policy experience thus far that Canadians must have freedom of choice to have their children educated in either of the official languages anywhere in this country, in future, if this country is to survive as a unified Canada.

But the statement also recognizes that there is only one province in Canada at this moment in our history where that freedom of choice can be fully exercised, and that is the province of Quebec. The government is saying in this policy statement that the freedom of choice that the education system of Quebec has always provided, as far as education in either official language is concerned, must now be extended across the other provinces. Our statement recognizes that this cannot be achieved over night, and this is why this principle has the qualifying phrase that the implementation of the principle is subject to circumstances which may make a deferment of application necessary. Bill No. 1, now under debate in Quebec, is a reflection of a twofold apprehension: apprehension about the future security of the French language and culture of Quebec, and apprehension also about the way the rest of Canada will, in future, be prepared to treat the French language.

There would be little ground for the extreme concern over the French culture and linguistic base in Quebec if there was confidence that French would, in fact and not just in law or formal statement, be treated with equality as a language and with respect as both language and culture throughout this country.

The federal government is convinced that this confidence is a vital factor in preserving the unity of Canada. The principle that Canadians have a right to have their children educated in the official language of their choice also recognizes that the people of Quebec might decide that circumstances there could require a determination that full freedom of choice should be deferred until present elements of insecurity for the French language and culture are removed or reduced.

[English]

In view of the considerable insecurity at the moment in Quebec concerning the preservation of French in that province, it is the responsibility of Canadians from all provinces to make the status of the French language more secure in Canada. But as long as the present insecurity persists, the government agrees that the deferment of this principle may be necessary. In the same manner, it is to be hoped that other provinces will strive toward the application of this principle. But practical circumstances of a financial nature, for instance, may sometimes force a deferment of application. In other words, this principle is an objective toward which we should strive.

May I emphasize that this statement on language policy is not intended in any way to be a substitute for discussion of constitutional issues which provincial governments may wish to raise and which the federal government recognizes remain important in relation to all of our problems.

As the statement tabled today points out, the government has never thought of the official languages policy as a cure-all for every problem of national unity. The government recognizes that we have serious economic problems. We must continue to resist inflation. We must improve the employment situation. The feeling of alienation in western Canada, problems of regional disparities, the need to find new sources of energy, to improve our transportation systems—all of these, and many other problems, must also be dealt with. But underlying and overshadowing all of these problems are the continuing problems of national unity, and at the heart of the national unity problem is the problem of languages and the need for the wider application of all that equality of our official languages implies.

As the languages statement points out, the rights provided by the official languages policy are not of benefit to Canadians of British and French origin alone. The acceptance and enjoyment of diversity that is encouraged by the policy is gradually spreading to more and more Canadians. This is steadily improving the climate of understanding in which Canadians of other cultural backgrounds can enjoy their own cultural heritage. The statement goes to some lengths to point out that there is a very important difference between the state's involvement in languages policy and the state's involvement, or attempt to be involved, in cultural policy.

This government believes that attempts to mould people who speak the same language into a homogeneous cultural pattern endanger their very freedom. Canada has two official languages, but is has no official culture, and government efforts to advance the cultural life of English and French speaking Canadians are intended only to promote the cultures of Canadians as individuals, not any culture of the state. The official languages policy, as the statement makes very plain, is intended to be the basis for an everwidening personal freedom in a society that cares profoundly for protection and strengthening of distinctive minority groups that determine the richly varied character of this country. The statement tabled today does not deal with possible changes in the application of the languages policy within the federal public service, as I indicated last week. This will be dealt with in a later statement.

I recommend that all members of this House read the statement with care. May I also emphasize that all references to provincial responsibilities in the statement are intended as statements of belief derived from our experience with the policy to date and its potential for helping to solve some of our current unity problems. These references constitute a plea to the provinces for understanding and support of the official languages policy to a greater extent than ever before.

I would also urge that leaders of business and labour and other community leaders and, indeed, all interested Canadians, read and study this statement so that they all may make a contribution to the solution of our national unity problems, which I personally prefer still to look upon not as problems but as challenges to go on using this policy to widen the dimension of diversity in Canadian democracy which it advocates.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS RESPECTING POLICY ON OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we are pleased to see tabled today the document entitled "A National Understanding" which spells out some of the basic principles and objectives of the national languages policy followed by the Government of Canada. I would say that not only do we welcome the document but we find it an unusually well written document, and I want to extend that compliment to its authors.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: One of the major problems which we find with this document is that in effect it is ten years late. This is the kind of statement of principle, statement of directions, that we should have had when the whole program of official languages began in this country. Unfortunately, because of the absence of such a statement of direction at the beginning, we have had, on the language policy of this country, a decade of national misunderstanding regarding the goals of the government and the application of the national languages policy. I want to make clear that that was not the fault of parliament, and not the fault of members of parliament, because all the parties in the House approved the Official Languages Act when it came in.

The fault lies inescapably with the way in which this government has interpreted and implemented the mandate given it under the Official Languages Act by the House of Commons. That has caused particular concern in the Public Service of Canada. Those are concerns which the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) said he will be addressing later on, and I say to him that we look forward not only to hearing that statement of policy and statement of direction, but we also look forward to substantial reforms being made in the way that the Official Languages Act applies to the public service of the country.

One fundamental weakness that exists in this document—it is a weakness that I think the Secretary of State anticipated when he indicated that as regards the provinces this should be seen only as a statement of belief by the government—is that despite the heavy and direct interest of the provinces in the subject matter of this statement and of this document, there has been no evidence of any consultation with any of the provincial governments of Canada. In fact, if the information available to us is correct, copies of this paper were delivered to the premiers of the various provinces only within the last few days by federal officials who were following not any particular agenda of the government or of the provinces, but who simply dropped in where Air Canada schedules happened to allow them to drop in, and dropped in the laps of the provincial premiers what was, in effect, a fait accompli, and then moved on to some other capital.

It has been a striking fact that since the election of November 15 in the province of Quebec which reawakened the concern in the country about the question of national unity and renewed the concern in the country about our ability to co-operate together, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) has not once called together the premiers of the ten provinces, his principal partners in confederation, to discuss with them and to take them into his confidence as to the directions in which he wants this country to move so that we might better achieve national unity. Clearly, he should have done that. There should have been consultation with the premiers on this document before it came to them as a fait accompli. There should have been consultation with the premiers, and in fact with the parliament of this country, on the question of national unity well before this time.

Instead of coming to parliament—that is being done later this month as a result of pressure brought by this party and others—instead of going to the premiers, and instead of going to the people and seeking solutions on some of the problems that face us, the Prime Minister has been relying, on the whole, broad question of national unity, on establishing little bureaucracies tucked away here in Ottawa and on writing a new national languages policy and sending it out as a fait accompli to the provinces.

That is not simple discourtesy, because I think it is clear that had there been broader consultation in the preparation of this document or the preparation of plans to bring Canadians together again, the Prime Minister and the government which he dominates, on this question would have moved beyond the dangerously simple faith that is expressed in the words of the Secretary of State that "at the heart of the national unity problem is the problem of languages". I note that both in the statement of the Secretary of State and in the preface by the Prime Minister there was reference to the effect that the official languages policy is not, and never was intended to be, a cure-all for the problems of national unity. I think we have to regard that as a ritual disclaimer. The fact remains that in the interpretation of the Prime Minister of this country the central instrument of national unity is the national languages policy, and the central problems relate exclusively to questions relating to language. That is made clear most markedly in paragraph—

[Translation]

—it was read in French by the minister, but I do not have the French copy in hand. The English version was as follows, and I quote:

[English]

There would be little ground for the extreme concern over the French culture and linguistic base in Quebec if there was confidence that French would, in fact and not just in law or formal statement, be treated with equality as a language and with respect as both language and culture throughout this country.

That expresses the Prime Minister's and the government's understanding of the problems in the province of Quebec, and that is the simple premise of this policy. I think, to say the least, it is a highly questionable premise as to whether that kind of confidence will alone diminish the extreme concern regarding the French culture and the Quebecois culture in the province of Quebec.

The document sets forth some very interesting principles. Some of them are not particularly challenging. The first is that every citizen in his or her private capacity has the right to speak any language. That is a relief to all of us and, I think, a self-evident principle. But one of the proposed principles troubles me very much and troubles my colleagues on this side of the House. That is the proposed principle that reads, and it is very carefully phrased, by the way:

Subject to circumstances which may make a deferment of application necessary, Canadians have a right to have their children educated in the official language of their choice, and the necessary facilities should be provided wherever numbers warrant.

Speaking personally, I want my child to be educated in the official language of her choice, and I would imagine that most members of the House, and indeed most people in the country, would want their children educated in the official language of their choice. But that is a desire. This draft principle would make it a right, and since education is in the jurisdiction of the provinces, this draft principle would have parliament declaring a right which we have no authority to guarantee. It would amount, despite the denials of the Secretary of State, to parliament telling the provinces what to do. It may be that the provinces might choose to declare this principle as a right—I emphasize this—which they and they alone have the power now to do. If they accept the concept, the constitution of Canada might be changed. But let us understand that parliament cannot guarantee the proposed right, to use the language of the minister, without amending the constitution.

That being the case, the unilateral declaration of a right we cannot enforce could inflame conflict among the provinces from whom we should be seeking co-operation. For parliament unilaterally to declare this right without consultation with or approval of the provinces, and then to expect the provinces to enforce what they did not agree to, could at the very least invite the interpretation that change was being shoved down the throats of the provinces of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I need not remind members of the House that one of the major problems with the acceptance and application of the Official Languages Act in Canada was the sense that it had been shoved down people's throats, and I say to the government that if they are serious about this change, they will not make that mistake again. There is one final matter which is relevant to this whole question to which I would like to refer in concluding my remarks. It is a matter which falls very directly within the responsibilities of this government; that is the question of a successor to the retiring Commissioner of Official Languages. It is now almost five months since Mr. Keith Spicer submitted his resignation to the Prime Minister and requested an early appointment of his successor in order to provide for a reasonable period of transition, yet there has been to our knowledge absolutely no sign of any action by the government on this appointment. It is an appointment which all hon. members know requires the concurrence of this House.

● (1710)

I think hon. members on both sides of the House still retain the hope that we are going to rise for the summer recess within two or three weeks. It would be unfair to Mr. Spicer, who has other obligations, and a setback in the cause of language equity if we were to rise for the summer without having placed before us a recommendation by the Prime Minister for a new commissioner of official languages. That is a matter of positive action within federal jurisdiction which can contribute to national unity, and I urge the Secretary of State to counsel his Prime Minister to act with some sense of responsibility and urgency on this matter which falls clearly within the domain of this government. This government should not restrict itself to giving advice to the provinces as to actions they should take in areas that lie simply within their jurisdiction.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, we welcome most of the substance of what the minister said today concerning the government's language rights paper and most of the details that I discovered in that paper after looking through it rather quickly. In particular, I want to emphasize three points of agreement. The first is the explanation offered to English-speaking Canadians of the reasons French-speaking Canada has felt threatened by assimilation throughout our history, as it indeed it still does. I think in the main the explanation is sound, cogent and acceptable to anyone with an impartial mind.

The second point of agreement is the reiteration of the importance of protecting minority language rights both in English Canada and in French Canada and the explanation of how the federal government's policy of bilingualism, in principle at least, is intended to protect those rights. We agree in principle. As has been made clear on this side of the House very often, we criticize the application of the principle, but it has been a matter of detail and not one of intent.

The third point I want to make is that we appreciate what I see as the new stress on the need for action in areas outside federal jurisdiction and within the purview of the provinces, such as the language used in our courts and in the legislatures where it is important to extend recognition and protection to minority rights. I think that is a new emphasis and one which is indeed very important to the country.

[Translation]

Our main criticism against this paper is that the government should have moved in that direction ten years ago. They have done very little to explain the importance of bilingualism to the Canadian people since the Official Languages Act was implemented. After the failure of the Victoria conference, the federal government no longer took an interest in the rights of minorities outside federal institutions.

[English]

What concerns me very much about the minister's statement today and the document itself is the "wait and see" attitude which runs through them. I repeat that this is a serious concern. The government, it is indicated, is willing to do this or willing to consider that, but the document, unless I misssed something on first reading it, is completely lacking in a firm commitment to do anything. Apart from some overdue housecleaning measures related to the federal bilingualism program, we have very little indication—in fact, virtually none at all—of a firm course of action in the future. The government is willing to support, for example, funding for education of minority language groups where the numbers might otherwise not justify such facilities in the provinces. The government is willing to support language training costs for provincial civil servants. But where is there an indication that the government is committed—not simply willing to consider something, or willing to co-operate—to going out to the provinces and saying that it has "X" number of dollars for a certain purpose which ought to be spent in "Y" area?

The federal government should be asking the provinces what they think. We would welcome that initiative. We say that in terms of the old motion of co-operative federalism, the federal government should not be hesitating to go to the provinces of Canada, regardless of their governments—and there have been New Democratic governments as well as Liberal and Conservative governments—and telling them that up to the present time they have not done everything they should have been doing within their jurisdiction in dealing with majority and minority language rights. I think it is time we got explicit about it. It is time for the federal government, particularly, to get explicit about it. It is time it went to the provinces suggesting courses of action. It is time the federal government was willing to provide financial assistance, and not simply in principle. It is time the federal government set aside money to be spent in particular provinces if they co-operate in this area. That is my most serious concern about what the minister said today.

We have an indication of some good intentions. There is an indication of recognition of a failure to protect linguistic rights, particularly for minorities, depending on which province we are talking about. However, we did not get what I was hoping we would, and that is a very explicit commitment to act and a very explicit recognition that in a federal state like Canada, with many cultures but two principal official languages, what is required is national leadership. National leadership does not mean simple imposition of detailed programs worked out here in Ottawa. It does require that the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State go to the provinces on issues of national concern suggesting that action should be taken not only at the federal level but also at the provincial level. The Prime Minister and the minister should welcome provincial co-operation in spending in this area, and the federal government should be making specific dollar allocations. I am disappointed that we do not have an indication of greater initiative coming directly from the federal government in this respect.

As important as this issue is, I do not believe that majority and minority language rights are central to the issue of national unity at this time. I think we are kidding ourselves if that is still a central belief, and I say with serious concern to the government of the day and indirectly—because he is not here, for very good reasons, I am sure—to the Prime Minister that if they believed that in 1968, in 1972 and in 1974, I hope they have got over the illusion. The language rights issue is important for its own sake, and all of us who want to show political leadership, and all of our political parties—and I use "leadership" in the broadest sense, meaning every member of parliament showing leadership in his community—must stand 100 per cent behind the principles of the Official Languages Act and behind the thrust of this document.

I believe in the document that much, but I want to stress that if it is seen as a cure for the separatist forces in Quebec, as I read the studies which have been done—and I do not want to appear arrogant and all-knowledgeable as an outsider—and as I speak to my friends and my political opponents in the province of Quebec, the language issue, as a concern now for Quebeckers in dealing with the independence movement, is not an issue. It is important for Francophone Canadians outside Quebec that we do everything we can on that issue. But, Mr. Speaker, we delude ourselves seriously if we think that the thrust indicated in this paper, as desirable and important as it is, will be significant in the national unity debate that has to be fought and won in the province of Quebec.

● (1720)

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the statement made this afternoon by the minister when he tabled his paper on the official languages of Canada. I can assure you that while listening to him, hundreds of questions occurred to me. As French Canadians, whenever we hear this kind of statement made by an English-speaking minister, we should like to go back to 1867, because that is when statements should have been made. Therefore, we are 110 years late.

The minister said, and I quote:

> What the government is saying in this statement is that recognition of the equality of English and French as the official languages of Canada must extend from the federal to the provincial level of government if this country is going to continue to exist as a single and unified country.

As previous speakers said, one wonders whether before preparing this paper the minister or his officials consulted those directly concerned or really responsible, the representatives of every province of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, this government completely disregards the basis of Confederation, namely the respect for the provinces' authority. I feel this is a further terrible encroachment upon provincial jurisdiction without even asking for permission, and we have become used to it because ever since I came to this House, I have seen the government interfere by all possible means in areas under provincial jurisdiction without asking their permission.

I am in favour of the official languages, in particular when the minister says:

> One of the principles the government advocates, again as the statement makes clear, is that Canadians have a right to have their children educated in the official language of their choice . . .

I believe, and indeed the minister states that we have nothing to reproach Quebec with in this instance. But shall we be able to convince, Mr. Minister, the nine English provinces to implement what has just been stated? They have been rejecting the teaching of French and forcing French Canadians to learn English for 110 years. That is the point and let us be realistic. We must stop deceiving ourselves. We must stop making fine speeches and trying to make Quebec believe certain things while patting it on the back. We have been telling Quebec for 110 years: The time will come. Because of what happened on November 15, some people are now afraid. I am also afraid, and I do not say this lightly, but because I ask myself the following question: Shall we finally be able to convince the nine other provinces to do their share? And now I would like to make the following invitation. We are all Canadians, and it therefore seems to me that we should put aside all our old theories and assert that we want a united Canada and that we must work together. We have been waiting for this for 110 years. In the early days of Confederation, French was taught in all the English provinces. It was French Canadians who opened up the western provinces. When the governments of the English provinces simply abolished the right to teach French, the federal government did nothing. Let us be realistic my Anglophone friends! You did nothing to protect our minorities in your English provinces. Let us be honest! I would not want either to treat the Anglophones of my province like you treated Francophones in your provinces. I do not want that. It is essential to co-operate at this time. We are sensible people. It is essential to get together and put an end to our old ideologies and stop saying as some still do today, and as I have heard myself in British Columbia: Speak white! I will never tell an English-speaking Quebecer: Speak French! When he is in Quebec, he is entitled to speak either French or English; he is entitled to go to an English school or a French school. Have no fear, he is happy.

Some people are anxious today and they say: Let us not speak about the future, let us not speak of what happened for 110 years. We do not know what the future will be. I hope progress will continue in Quebec. But I hope also that western provinces will wake up once for all. That is where we find the secret for Canadian unity on the language issue. There is an economic issue but the great issue is language. We should never forget that. We will not have Canadian unity as long as we reject our minorities outside Quebec. It is clear. And I say so as a French Canadian. That is the question. Canadian unity would be impossible if we do not change our minds, if we do not try to do what Quebec did for 110 years, and certainly that is what we have to do. I should think the lesson has been long enough. We took time to learn, 110 years! You must not think I am malicious. I said that because I would like people to think as we do, to recognize the minorities' rights in other provinces, as I always pleaded for the minority's rights in Quebec.

I have good English-speaking friends in Quebec whom I respect as I have in all the other provinces, and I know that if, in each province—and I am talking about the nine other provinces—the members of parliament go out and start convincing the provincial governments to come to their senses and become more humanitarian and actually feel what Canadian unity means, it is then that we will have really started working towards unity. You will see then that we can respect each other. I bear no hard feelings toward English-speaking Canadians nor toward any other ethnic group, but I think that they have been educated in a certain pattern and we have been raised in a different one.

To be more practical, I would like the members of this House to agree on something once and for all: That from now on, as members of this House, we will defend the rights of the minorities and that we recognize that there are two founding people in Canada and that there are two official languages. This has just been reiterated, and I would ask all members, if they want to be honest, if they want to be sincere, if they love their country and if they care for its unity to make this understood by the other governments. And I tell you that if we do not succeed, then I will question the meaning of Canadian unity to which I aspire so wholeheartedly.

That is the appeal which I wanted to make this afternoon. If I have the opportunity of dealing once again with this issue, I will talk about the subject of economic agreements. I recently read a study on all the federal-provincial conferences that have been held since 1867, and all that ever was debated in those meetings boils down to money, and the question to know who would tax whom and who would tax the most? This type of situation has prevailed for the past 110 years. We are going to have to come back to sense, at the grass-roots of our Confederation, and let the provinces have what belongs to them and let the federal government administer in those areas in which it should exercise its authority. When this is done, then, we will start living in a true Confederation.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of questions to ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts). There is one reference in his statement, and I am reading from page 2 of the English language copy, in which the government agrees to something. That is so rare in this House that I want to know precisely to what it is agreeing. The sentence to which I refer on page 2 reads:

> But as long as the present insecurity persists, the government agrees that the deferment of this principle may be necessary.

I am not clear, from the language of this draft, precisely where the government thinks the deferment of that principle may be necessary. Could the Secretary of State elaborate? Is he talking about the deferment of the application of that principle in the province of Quebec, or about the deferment of the application of that principle in other provinces?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the question. I was a bit surprised—and I say this kindly and not contentiously because I am anxious for all parties in the House, to the degree they can, to accept the document—I was a bit surprised at the hon. member's assertion that this should have been done ten years ago and, at the same time, at the indication that he was unhappy, that he doubted or was uncertain about the essential proposition the paper puts forward, which is this: it is essential for the provinces to accept certain responsibilities which fall within provincial jurisdiction and to concentrate particularly on education, that is to say, the provinces should step forward solidly and accept the burden which we think the facts have shown it is essential for them to shoulder, that of accepting the official languages policy in the areas of their jurisdiction.

If I understood the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) correctly, he regards this as an invasion of provincial jurisdiction. Let me make it clear that the government does not consider this document in that light. It considers it, rather, as an invitation to assist in this effort, an invitation to which we will respond if the provinces bring forward proposals as to how they might better do this.

That same point refers to the question of consultation, which the hon. member raised. The paper was not delivered to provincial governments en passant, by a civil servant who happened to be passing through via Air Canada. I, as Secretary of State, made a special effort to see as many provincial governments as I could to discuss with them the contents of the paper. I do not wish to indicate that they were consulted as to its final form, but there was discussion with them.

I point out to the Leader of the Opposition, as I indicated in the House and in the committee of the House, that there has been consultation with the provincial governments in the whole area of education. They date back at least to last January, when I presented the initial propositions on behalf of the government to the council of ministers of education. Those propositions have been discussed with the provincial governments, and I understand that the provincial governments are preparing a response to them, which I expect will be presented to us some time in September. There have been continuing conversations in that area which most concerns the hon. member, if I may judge from his remarks made today. I am not using his words; the hon. member seemed to be concerned about a possible invasion of provincial jurisdiction. On the contrary, we hope, firmly and strongly, that the provinces will welcome this initiative and will see too, as we now do, the necessity of shouldering these burdens in their jurisdiction.

I am tempted to say that the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) regarded the problem somewhat differently. He was asking for greater intervention in the provincial area, while the Leader of the Opposition feared we would interve in that area. I point out to both hon. members that we are involved in this area substantially now, and when the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby complains that so little has been done, the fact is that in this decade alone, that is to say since 1970, over $650 million of federal funds has been directed to these purposes. Virtually two thirds of a billion dollars of federal funds have been directed to these purposes in the area of education.

Mr. Fairweather: This is all very nice, but you are not answering the question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I suggest the hon. member is quite right. The minister should try to answer the question. I do not want to preclude him from giving an answer, but I would not want him to make another statement. If hon. members agree, I think we should end this question period at about ten to six. We should end routine proceedings before six o'clock, after which we can proceed with the adjournment debate. Perhaps the minister will answer the question quickly, after which I shall recognize four or five other hon. members.

Mr. Roberts: I apologize, Mr. Speaker. I was carried away. let me answer the question the hon. member asked. The explicit answer is this: the principle of free choice, both outside the province of Quebec and within the province of Quebec, we accept. It may not be possible to implement it outside Quebec because of lack of facilities, financial constraints, and so on.

As for applying the principle within the province of Quebec, let me say that we understand and sympathize with the public's perception of the insecurity of the French language and French culture. We understand therefore that in that context it may be regrettably necessary not to persist now with the immediate implementation of that principle of free choice for the education of one's children in either official language. We have described that hoice as an essential principle which we hope will be adopted, if not in the immediate future, over the longer term in the Canadian context.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, that makes the situation much clearer. My concern is this, and I hope it is clear, that there seems to be an attempt in this document to declare a right for the federal parliament to declare a right which only the provinces can bring into force. That would cause me, and I think the premiers, great concern. May I, while on that point, ask the minister to assure us that no attempt will be made by the Government of Canada to act in a way which would assume that that right exists, unless the provinces agree.

Mr. Roberts: No, Mr. Speaker. We are asking the provinces themselves to accept that right. However, on page 70 of the document we raise this question: if events crystallize and provinces do not wish to assume that burden, would it be desirable to give the federal government a greater role in this area than it has been given heretofore? But we emphasize it in terms of what the provinces may consider it desirable to do. There is no suggestion by the government that we should act in that matter unilaterally. Indeed it is our strong hope that the provinces will, within the areas falling under their own jurisdiction, accept the principles of the Official Languages Act, principles which they would implement within their own areas of jursidiction.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I recognize I could use some other way to put this question to the Secretary of State, but I chose to ask it publicly for everybody to understand the nature of my question. I want to congratulate him for the scope of his statement, but I would like to know if, in his paper, he should not have included some provision which would ensure a certain quality of French, especially of French as a written, spoken and even sung language. There is a vacuum in this area, at least in the province of Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I should not like to comment about that possible vacuum in Quebec. There is no reference to that question within the paper I tabled today. Perhaps there should be some such reference, and I will be happy to discuss with the hon. member questions about which he is concerned.

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I do not have a copy of the statement the minister tabled today. I do not have a party leader, thank goodness, but I wish to make some comments on this subject.

I am a bit concerned that the minister has spoken about freedom of choice of a parent to educate a child in the language of the parents' choice. I would like to know whether the minister is prepared to carry this freedom a bit further so that a parent can have the freedom of choice to have the child educated in both official languages. That would be true bilingualism.

I am afraid that what the minister has suggested today is going to continue to operate as separatism. I fear the government is encouraging separatism by some of the suggestions that have been made, and we will continue to have ghettos of French and ghettos of English. It is obvious that the government did not want to use the word "language" in the Human Rights Act when it came before the House.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the minister, and his colleagues at the federal level should meet with their counterparts at the provincial level to endeavour to have a uniform, national, integrated, non-separate education system where all youngsters, regardless of their religion, colour, language or ethnic background, can be educated in both languages together. We would then have national unity. We would then have language unity. Is the minister prepared to go that far to indicate freedom of choice in both languages, not just one?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if I exactly understood the nature of the question. It would be the ultimate hope one would be able to choose either official language. Presumably one could alternate them from year to year if one so desired. I do not see how one can be educated in two languages at the same time, unless the hon. member is speaking about the kinds of programs we already have, that is, to give second language courses as well as majority language instruction, which happens in many places in the country at the present time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not want the hon. member to think that he is not entitled to make a comment. If he wants to clarify a question, I will allow it.

Mr. Jones: The simplicity of the question is obvious. The Official Languages Act declared two official languages. Is the government prepared to encourage the education of students in this country in both official languages of this country, and not just one, so that we do not have some children being educated in English schools and some being educated in French?

I will give an example in my home town. My youngster at one time asked me what door he would go into at school, the English door, the French door, or the Catholic door. We have straightened out the religious situation. Surely the government can straighten out the language situation. Is the minister prepared to encourage the provinces to go along with that type of situation rather than separate schools?

Mr. Roberts: If I understood the question correctly, the answer is yes.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say how interesting is the minister's statement. He has emphasized the fact that it was more than an invitation to the provinces, it is a federal government's decision. That rather takes me back to wishful thinking concerning the provinces. I deeply regret, Mr. Speaker, that we were not assured that there would be a genuine consultation with the provinces. I regret that nobody can tell us how many provinces or if all provinces agree on such an objective.

Of course, I would like to be sure the provinces will accept and, taking into account the institutions and the staff training which will be necessary if this objective is ever put forward, I cannot keep from seriously doubting the validity or the efficiency of the statement made today. But I would like to ask the minister if he could provide this House with the assurance that the nine provinces agree completely on this principle which is an ideal, without any doubt, and if it would not be easier with that assurance to see a more positive and more encouraging attitude from Quebec and even see the possibility of amending Bill No. 1 which is presently being debated in Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I of course hope that Bill 1 might be modified to be in accordance with the principles which we have described in the paper. In so far as the other part of the question is concerned, in relation to consultation, there have been consultations with all ten provinces in relation to these programs, at least since January, in terms of educational problems in relation to language.

I would be a bit dismayed at the suggestion that the consultation we should undertake should be undertaken only confidentially between the federal government and the provinces. It is preferable for the federal position to be made public so that discussion of the provincial position can take place as well in public.

Obviously the process of consultation is not simply a consultation between governments, but also involves the citizens of the provinces. They should be aware of the position the federal government is taking and also of the position their provincial governments take. They should be aware of how these positions might accord one with the other. That kind of consultation or exchange is most usefully undertaken within the forum of public awareness. That is why we have presented the federal government's position as clearly as we can today.

I believe, after the very short discussions which I had with the various provincial leaders, that they will be prepared to welcome the document, at least for purposes of discussion and study. We look forward very much to receiving their replies so that we may deal publicly with an issue that is of fundamental importance to this country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will recognize three more members, the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos), the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), and the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz), and then we will try to complete Routine Proceedings.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, could the minister advise the House whether he feels the linguistic equality principle which underlies his policy statement would be as faithfully adhered to if, as regards the language of teaching, all English-speaking provinces agreed to treat their French-speaking minorities just as well as Quebec will treat its English-speaking minority following the adoption of Bill One which, as the Minister very well knows, guarantees access to English schools to all children of English-speaking parents who have received their education in Quebec and which may hopefully be amended in a way that will allow children of English-speaking parents coming from outside Quebec also to attend English schools.

[English]

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be a great step forward if Bill 1 were changed or altered in that direction. It would certainly be a great step forward if the other provinces moved to a system to provide the same opportunity which now exists within the province of Quebec and would indeed exist after the passage of Bill 1 in its present form. As I indicated, it would seem desirable that amendments to it take place.

The difficulty I personally have in relation to Bill 1 is that it accepts a limitation on freedom of choice not simply as a short-term regrettable necessity but as a permanent thread in the fabric of Quebec life. If the provincial government were able, as I hope it would, to say that while it might in the short-term be regrettably necessary to have such limitation on language freedom, it would not be necessary in the longer run, that would be an admirable step forward in the present situation.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I realize the time constraint and I have just a couple of questions. One of them at least will need an answer later. The minister might like to take it under advisement.

• (1750)

The first question concerns the role of which the minister speaks on page 70. Is it the expectation that the government will promote the federal role by a transfer of tax points or direct cash grants? It is ironic that we have just passed the Fiscal Arrangements Act whereby the government transfers tax points and winds down to some extent the federal role, yet here we are happily winding it up. It is a paradox.

Second, my leader spoke of the replacement of the languages commissioner. Surely we are entitled to a date or an expectation in connection with a new appointment. If we leave here early in July, will we know who it is to be before we leave?

Last, would the minister reconsider what I believe to be an unfortunate omission of a reference to my own province of New Brunswick which will celebrate Canada's birthday by proclaiming the last parts of the Official Languages Act, parts which have come into play only with difficulty because of the nature of the arrangements. The minister, in his statement, omitted any mention of New Brunswick though he referred specifically to what is happening in Quebec. I have no anxiety about that, but I do take exception to New Brunswick being omitted. Effective July 1 of this year it will be the only officially bilingual province in Canada.

Mr. Roberts: I must be hesitant in relation to the hon. member's first question. I would be reluctant to say anything which might be interpreted as providing a blank cheque to the provinces in connection with funding. We are anxious, as the paper indicates, to receive proposals for discussion and, indeed, we have been discussing with the provinces, as I indicated earlier possible changes in the present payment system.

In relation to the appointment of a languages commissioner I know there are a number of names under consideration, but the hon. member's question is one which should be directed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). The appointment is one which he should announce to the House rather than myself.

Finally, I understand the minister's concern that I did not, in my statement, refer to New Brunswick. If he looks at page 70 of the paper, however, he will find there a full and strong statement of recognition of the important steps the province of New Brunswick has taken.

Mr. Haidasz: In thanking the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) for this statement on language policy and deploring the restrictive provisions of Bill 22 and of proposed Bill 1 in the Quebec Legislature, I would like to ask the Secretary of State whether in the formulation of this policy and in discussion with the provinces any consideration has been given to the recommendations of the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism in relation to federal support for the teaching of non-official languages in Canada.

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member I would point out that my colleague, the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Guay), this past week end made a statement in Vancouver, a copy of which I am sure he will send to the hon. member, indicating that the federal government is prepared to fund under certain formulae, as a supplement to the ordinary school system, special classes for the maintenance of a variety of languages in the country, as I say, not through funds directed to the normal school system, but to voluntary agencies and other groups who have organized special classes in their language, supplementary to the normal educational system. For further details I would suggest the hon. member read the speech made by the Minister of State for Multiculturalism this past weekend.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS TO PROTECT CHILDREN FROM SEXUAL EXPLOITATION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-425, to amend the Criminal Code (sexual exploitation of children).

He said: Mr. Speaker, members of the House of Commons and Canadians in general are appalled at the rapidly rising incidence of children performing sexual acts for those in society producing pornographic materials.

The purpose of this bill is to protect children under the age of 15 from sexual exploitation in general and in particular, from sexual exploitation in "adult" magazines and films. At the same time the bill would widen the scope of section 166 of the Criminal Code, which presently is limited to parental responsibility for certain acts or omissions in relation to their female children. The bill extends the same prohibitions as provided for female children to male children.

Section 166 of the Criminal Code will be further amended which would outlaw child pornography and allow the courts to dispose of the offensive material.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

[Translation]

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 1,565, 2,334 and 2,407.

[Text]

MINERAL DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT—NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 1,565—Mr. Marshall:

Under the Mineral Development Agreement signed on December 17, 1976 between the government and Newfoundland, what areas are designated for mineral evaluation in the Constituency of Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe under (a) regional mineral potential evaluation (b) mineral resource management (c) mineral development strategies?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: To date, management committee approval for projects under the Regional Mineral Potential Evaluation component of the agreement will result in detailed geological mapping in areas of the Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe Constituency as outlined in Figure 1, following. Specifically, this will include the major part of Sector 1 (a further description of sub-project 1.11 Daniel's Harbour is contained in Figure 2, following) and a smaller portion of Sector 2. It is anticipated that this component of the agreement will account for approximately 70 per cent of the total agreement funds. Work on this project will commence in the coming field season. The Mineral Resource Management Project will be concerned with the province as a whole and not any specific region. The Mineral Development Strategies Project has a number of components, some of which will be province wide and some of which will be concerned with certain areas. The general concepts of the project have been outlined, but the specific work has not yet been decided. Joint public announcements will be made regularly by DREE and the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador regarding progress on the implementation of the Agreement.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES CHARGED WITH POLICY MAKING IN THE ENERGY FIELD

Question No. 2,334—Mr. Stevens:

As of December 31 (a) 1968 (b) 1976, how many federal employees were charged with policy-making, or interpretation of policies, regulating the exploration, production and distribution of energy?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: (a) 25; (b) 215.

National Energy Board reports as follows: (a) 62; (b) 153.

NOTE: These figures include administrative support staff.

QUESTIONS PLACED ON THE ORDER PAPER

Question No. 2,407—Mr. Roy (Laval):

1. Since the opening of the 30th Parliament, how many questions have been placed on the Order Paper?

2. What is the breakdown of these questions by political parties?

3. What Members of Parliament have placed over 300 questions on the Order Paper?

4. What is the number of questions which entailed the (a) greatest (b) least cost?

5. What is the average cost per question answered?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. See Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fourth Edition, Citation 171(ff).

2. See part 1.

3. See part 1.

4. This information is not available.

5. The government's best estimate of the average cost involved in answering a relatively straight-forward ministerial inquiry would be at least $60 per question.

NOTE: A shared question requiring a reply from all departments, agencies and Crown corporations would therefore cost at least $2,760 (46-the number of replies X $60). The latest survey of the estimated cost of answering Order Paper Questions was undertaken in March 1975 (See reply to question No. 1,837 answered May 15, 1975).

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURN

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if question No. 2,365 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

[Mr. Lumley.]

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

IMPORT AND EXPORT OF OIL

Question No. 2,365—Mr. Gauthier (Roberval):

1. Did Canada export oil and natural gas in (a) 1970-71 (b) 1971-72 (c) 1972-73 (d) 1973-74 (e) 1974-75 (f) 1975-76 (g) 1976-77 and, if so, in each case (i) what quantity (ii) to what countries (iii) at what price?

2. Did Canada import oil during those same years and, if so (a) from what countries (b) at what price?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) made an application pursuant to Standing Order 26 to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, and stated the subject to be a clear possibility of a conspiracy concerning the concealment of evidence and the failure to take appropriate action pertaining to the illegal break-in by three police officers at L'Agence de Presse Libre on the night of October 6-7, 1972. I decided, pursuant to Standing Order 26(4), that I was satisfied it was a proper matter to be discussed, and I indicated to the House then that pursuant to the other provisions of the Standing Order I assumed, as I have often done in the past, that the hon. member then had the leave of the House, as was obvious, to move the motion.

That being the case, I have properly assumed that the hon. member does in fact have leave and therefore, leave having been granted, the motion shall stand over until the completion of the debate under the statutory order dated May 30, but in any event no earlier than eight o'clock this evening.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to notice given earlier this day and to revised proceedings during this month, the matters to be raised at this hour are as follows: the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau)—National Defence; the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard)—Health; the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon)—Social Security.

Perhaps to keep our proceedings in order I should call orders of the day before proceeding, and indicate that I have already recognized the hon. member for Shefford.

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—ALLEGED USE OF GANDER AIRPORT TO TRANSPORT CUBAN TROOPS TO ANGOLA

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, it is common knowledge, especially in the last few years, that the Cuban government has taken upon itself a special mission throughout the world. It seems to have become the promoter or the instigator of guerilla warfare in several countries. It is a known fact, among other things, that Castro's troops are in Angola to do the job we suspect and to overthrow the ruling government there. At the present time, Mr. Fidel Castro's troops are also in Mozambique, in Rhodesia and in Tanzania.

A few years ago, the Salazar government in Portugal refused access to the airports in Portugal to the troops of Fidel Castro's government in Cuba for fuelling up on their way to Angola and Mozambique, there to take part in the revolution. I was particularly shocked to learn the other day, through an American television program, that Canada had given Castro's troops authorization to use the military airport in Gander, Newfoundland, and thereby enable Castro and his troops to reach Angola and participate in guerilla warfare.

Now, according to my information, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) gave Fidel Castro that authorization; I found it absolutely shocking. So, under the circumstances, I would like to know whether national defence authorities were consulted before the Prime Minister authorized Fidel Castro's troops to use the airport in Gander, Newfoundland. Mr. Speaker, I would also like to know whether the Prime Minister can give such authorizations to a government such as Fidel Castro's without consulting beforehand our national defence authorities, or whether it is the policy of National Defence to cooperate with any revolutionary government that wants to engage in guerilla warfare in certain countries of the world.

So, Mr. Speaker, that is why I brought up the matter in the House of Commons. I would like to know whether the authorization given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was government policy or whether it was an error on the part of the Prime Minister, or again an authorization that does not reflect government policy. I should very much like the spokesman for National Defence to give me a clear and specific explanation, and more particularly tell me whether the Canadian government is willing to cooperate with any army or group whose special mission is guerilla warfare and revolution in foreign countries.

[English]

Mr. Art Lee (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, further to the minister's reply of June 16, the Canada-Cuba air transport agreement, signed in September, 1975, grants to the Cuban airline overflights of and technical stops in Canada. Therefore no special or prior consultations are required for each flight. Nonetheless, the government has investigated all alleged incidences of this type, and there is no evidence that a Cuban airline has used Gander for troop movements. Furthermore, Cuba operates direct scheduled services between Havana and Luanda, Angola, via Conakry and Freetown. Charter flights receive prior diplomatic clearance through the Department of External Affairs. Each Cuban charter receives a prescribed route from the Department of National Defence. Since January, 1975, there have been only two charter flights into Canada, one to Vancouver for Habitat in June, 1976, and one to Ottawa for an official Cuban state visit in September, 1975.

HEALTH—PRESERVATION OF CONFIDENTIALITY OF DOCTOR-PATIENT RELATIONSHIP—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) a question on June 7 having to do with the growth of socialized medicine requiring identification of the patient and his treatment, information which was inviolate before the introduction of state medicine but which can be and has been used by communist countries against patients in those countries. I asked the minister what protection had been provided to preserve this confidentiality for Canadian patients.

In answering that question the minister went on to say that the civil servants were fully protected. As far as the health of civil servants is concerned, quite specific rules compel medical officers to maintain the confidentiality of the medical information they obtain from their patients. He continued by pointing out a defect, which is the very thing I am pointing out, when he said as follows:

> ... I think the hon. member is concerned about a form which the Ontario department of transport is using to request those who are seeking a driver's permit to have their physicians complete a detailed form to be forwarded later to the Ontario department of transport.

Now he says that they have nothing to do with that. That is correct, but that is not what I was referring to, Mr. Speaker. What I was referring to was the article contained in the Medical Post dated May 24, 1977, which reads as follows:

> Dr. Jack Saunders, OMA director of health services, said the federal government has been collecting data from the provinces for "about two years" now on admissions to psychiatric units in general hospitals, as well as psychiatric hospitals.
> "It just came to our attention a couple of months ago," he said, during a news conference at the OMA annual meeting here.

That is something they did not know we were doing here in Ottawa. The article continues:

> "When we looked into it, we found they were asking for patients' names, social insurance numbers and a lot of private information. Yet they (government) are just supposed to be asking for statistics."

I want an answer to that. This is apparently the second such case involving a question of patient confidentiality and the federal government on which the OMA has taken action.

The article continues:

> Dr. Saunders said that last year it had asked the province to stop giving social insurance numbers and locations to the federal government on therapeutic abortion cases. In that instance, the province agreed to withhold the information from Ottawa.

Then they tell me they do not know anything about this. There is something very radically wrong there. This is very interesting because Ontario is the one cow they are milking. Quebec is a little bit smarter than that because it will not give them that information.

It continues:

. . . the hospitals from other provinces have never provided names or social insurance or hospital insurance numbers. They have scrambled the numbers to provide anonymity, though the scrambled letters are used for the same person. Only Quebec has devised a good method of keeping record reporting confidential outside of the province . . .

This is what I want the federal government to look into. I will not go on at length with that except to say that I should like to give the authority of a man who spoke to committees of both the Senate and the House of Commons. I am referring to Dr. W. G. McClure. At that time he was the Dean of Medicine at the University of Vancouver. He is now the Registrar of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Vancouver. Dr. McClure said the following:

Governments across the country are carelessly passing legislation requiring doctors to report confidential medical information to clerks in various departments and corporations run by the government. We must all protest this to our respective governments.

You get more and more state control, and then you get the state pulling someone into court. They go back and use that information and have lawyers on the other side, as we have seen on so many occasions. As so many legal people have seen, they will take the case on one side and then will get the information which was supposed to be confidential. This may be used by unscrupulous personnel. It may be enough to convict the person involved. That is completely wrong. It is exactly what I asked the minister about. What has he done to stop this nonsense? What has he done to protect this confidentiality? What has he done to keep us from finding ourselves in the same situation as people are in the U.S.S.R. where the state controls the people? Does he want that in Canada?

● (1810)

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am replying to my hon. friend for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. McRae). On June 10 the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) raised a question in the House concerning the possibility of identification of psychiatric patients and their treatment on forms sent to the federal government by the province of Ontario. I wish to provide some additional detail in response to that question, to emphasize our respect for the privacy of the individual, and to offer assurance as to security provisions in the handling of confidential information by federal agencies.

Each year, for purposes of statistics on the health status of Canadians, Statistics Canada and the Department of National Health and Welfare receive extracts from provincial admission and separation forms for patients in general and allied special hospitals, including psychiatric patients in those facilities.

[Mr. Rynard.]

These reports from the provinces contain health insurance numbers, but do not include the names of individuals. Without a complete list of numbers and names, which only the provincial government has, it thus becomes virtually impossible for any federal agency to identify anyone by name.

Mr. Rynard: That is absolutely wrong.

Mr. Milne: I am quoting the minister.

In addition, however, it has now been agreed that, in future, health insurance numbers will be scrambled to provide greater protection to the individual. Under a second system of mental health statistics operated by Statistics Canada, copies are received of reporting forms for patients who are admitted to or separated from psychiatric institutions and psychiatric units of general hospitals. Similar forms have been in use since 1931. The Statistics Canada instruction manual requires only the first three letters of the surname and the initial letter of the given name, as an alphabetic identifier.

I am advised that the essential reason for the use of numeric or alphabetic identifiers for patients in compiling statistics is to distinguish between events and cases. For example, six separate hospital admissions could relate to one person or to as many as six persons.

Co-operation between the professions and federal and provincial agencies in maintaining mental health records and statistics has been carried on for many years. The question of confidentiality of information and provincial statutes and regulations with respect to this is a subject of an ongoing review at the federal-provincial level. I have no doubt that co-operation in the development of these statistics will continue, as it has in the past, with full respect for the dignity and privacy of the individual, whether he be ill or healthy.

SOCIAL SECURITY—NEGOTIATIONS FOR RECIPROCAL AGREEMENTS WITH OTHER COUNTRIES—DATE AGREEMENTS EFFECTIVE

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my reason for speaking in this adjournment debate was the very disappointing answer I received from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) on June 10 concerning the commencement of reciprocal arrangements having to do with old age pensions between Canada and some other countries.

To understand my disappointment I wish to point out the difference between the statements made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare when he was promising this, partly in order to get Bill C-35 through, and his statements up to the present day. Now that the bill has passed, things have become more difficult. You will recall that the bill was in two parts, one dealing with reciprocal pensions and the other dealing with partial pensions, and it should be noted that partial pensions are a money saving device by the government and a piece of legislation which will bring untold trouble to the administration, and guarantee perpetual poverty to the recipients.

On April 14, 1976, as reported at pages 12816 and 12817 of Hansard, the minister, speaking of bringing in this bill, said:

Parliament will be asked to adopt measures . . . to build into our program the possibility of this inclusion in international reciprocal arrangements with other countries, such as Italy, the United States, and the United Kingdom, so that our residents who have earned social, security rights in foreign countries can receive them in Canada.

Later in the same debate on the same day he said:

Mr. Speaker, the countries which have been most persistent and pressing in terms of reaching an agreement are the three countries I have mentioned.

Those countries were Italy, the United States, and the United Kingdom.

After much prodding by hon. members from all opposition parties the minister finally did bring in the bill on March 9. At page 3812 of Hansard for that day the minister is reported to have said:

. . . the provisions of the bill are important for all residents of Canada, especially for those who have earned social security credits in other countries but who are deprived of foreign benefits in the absence of international agreements. Now that a general consensus has been reached concerning these provisions, I trust that hon. members will want to give the bill speedy passage.

He also said:

The primary objectives of Bill C-35 are to permit international agreements . . .

Then he said:

. . . I would urge upon all hon. members the bill's speedy passage.

In reply to that the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) said:

As I understand it, we do not need this bill to start negotiating with countries such as Italy, France, the United Kingdom, Bermuda, Jamaica, etc., but it is the expressed intention of the minister to start, if not continue, discussions with the various countries so that we can be in a position to execute the documents as soon as this bill is proclaimed.

At that same time the minister put out an expensive package of explanatory notes regarding the bill, and I would like to quote to the House from page 5 of the questions and answers as follows:

Q. Have some countries indicated an interest in having reciprocal social security agreements with Canada?

A. Italy, the United States and the United Kingdom have been pressing for an agreement with us. Others—Belgium, Bermuda, Guyana, Jamaica, Malta, Norway, France and Turkey have also expressed such an interest.

Very well. The opposition co-operated. We passed the bill in very short order, nearly as quickly as any I have seen passed through the House. I feel, however, that we did not give sufficient attention to two parts of it. One part was the famouse spouse's regulation, and another part the partial pension which, as I said before, is going to cause us considerable trouble in the future.

However, the bill is now passed, and the minister is authorized to start paying partial pensions instead of full pensions effective July 1. But what about reciprocal arrangements? I would like to quote now from page 5712 of Hansard of May 17. The minister was replying to a question by the hon. member for Hamilton West with regard to when these reciprocal arrangements would be in effect. He said:

Meetings with British officials are scheduled for the week of July 11 and we are to have meetings with French officials in early fall . . . With regard to the British situation, their minister has indicated interest in reaching an agreement but he pointed out that there might he some financial difficulty in Britain in meeting the commitment that could be made under such an agreement. We are going to explore the matter further.

On June 10 I asked the minister if he was making any progress, and at page 6529 of Hansard he is reported to have answered, in effect: "The United Kingdom has informed us that preliminary discussions amongst officials resulted in proposals". He went on further to say that there would be meetings of senior officials in the coming months. He said that he spoke with his British opposite number and obtained an agreement in principle from his British colleague.

However, his British colleague indicated his concern about the availability of funds in England for that purpose. It seems to me that this is an absolutely despicable betrayal of many senior citizens in this country, whom the minister deluded by claiming that other nations were pressing us for an agreement. This pressing for an agreement has somehow now turned into "there will be a meeting of senior officials in the coming months". This is a totally different picture than the one the minister presented to us when he was trying to get speedy passage of the bill through the House. I feel that that is not good enough.

If the minister was pressed to sign agreements before the bill was passed, why is he not able to produce those agreements now or give us an answer which would give us some encouragement? Instead, we hear that his officials are talking.

What particularly concerns me is that a part of the bill which will save the government money, the partial pensions part, has gone forward and will be in effect from July 1. It will be a money-saving device for the government. The thing we were all hoping for, the convertibility of pensions, is going to wait until some far distant—

• (1820)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I reply once again on behalf of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. McRae).

When he raised this question in the House on June 10 the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) phrased it in three parts: will reciprocal social security agreements with France, Italy, the United Kingdom and the United States be effective on the date of entry into force of Bill C-35; if not, why not; and when will the agreements be effective?

The answer to the first part of the question is negative. The minister has already described his recent meetings with the ministers of the countries concerned. The present situation with respect to each of these countries, taking them in the same order, is as follows: a first meeting with French officials is tentatively scheduled for this fall. Technical discussions with Italian experts, which have just been concluded, will be followed by a first round of negotiations at the official level in July. In the same month a first round of negotiations with British officials will also take place. Technical discussions with U.S. officials were held in May of this year and will be followed up this autumn on dates which have not yet been determined.

Turning to the second part of my hon. friend's question, I would remind hon. members of the minister's statement during the debate on Bill C-35 to the effect that it takes two to negotiate. All countries concerned have insisted on the inclusion of the old age security program in an eventual agreement with them. The Canadian side has only recently been in a position to say with certainty that it could in fact include that program.

As we move into the negotiating phase, and bearing in mind the government's commitment to enter into agreements when these are in the interests of Canada and of residents of Canada, it cannot be assumed that the terms which we presently envisage will be immediately acceptable—financially or policy-wise—to each of the other countries concerned, and vice-versa. Furthermore, once common ground has been reached, agreements will in many instances need to be ratified by the legislature of the other contracting party before they can begin to take effect. In the case of the United States, for example, even if we were to sign today, the agreement could not be ratified by the other side until such time as proposed legislation presently before Congress has been passed.

In the light of the foregoing, my answer to the third part of my hon. friend's question must be that it is hoped such agreements will be signed and enter into force at the earliest possible date. It goes without saying that the minister and his officials will spare no effort in attempting to bring this about and, in so doing, will seek those terms which will be most equitable to all concerned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At 6.25 p.m. the House took recess.

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

PETITION TO END CONTROLS ON JUNE 30, 1977

The House resumed from Monday, June 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Stevens:

That the Anti-Inflation Act, being chapter 75, Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76, as amended by chapter 98, Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76, shall expire on the 30th June, 1977.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the motion now under consideration deals with inflation, the Anti-Inflation Board and the abolition of controls anticipated by the Anti-Inflation Board.

The matter which we are discussing today is not a new one but is rather stale. However the solutions to the problem of inflation are not stale, because this government has apparently not yet found them. Yet, the Anti-Inflation Board was set up by the government specifically to jugulate inflation once and for all. But, Mr. Speaker, try to convince of the AIB's efficiency the housekeeper who goes shopping every week, when the notices that prices go up constantly by 5 to 10 per cent, on an average, every week. Often, all she has to do is lift the price sticker to see last week's and realize the price has gone up by 20 cents on a $2 article. Try to talk to her about the value of the AIB and you will soon hear what she thinks of that bureaucracy which floats in the clouds, putters around with papers and has no clue what is going on in the real world, where things happen.

Before going into the essence of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote an article that goes back to December 14, 1974 and appeared in the newspaper Le Soleil, of Quebec City; it shows just how crazy our economic system is. With supporting figures, we are shown how, with an inflation rate of 10 per cent, which we have known for several years already, a bus ticket worth 40 cents in 1974 will cost $1.15 in 1985, $2.95 in 1995 and $4.70 in the year 2000. It is almost inconceivable, Mr. Speaker, just how savings will be gobbled up, will disappear or depreciate over such a short period of time.

Groceries worth $50 in 1974 will cost $142.65 in 1985. Even now, in 1977, we can readily imagine, if nothing changes, that it will cost $142.65 in 1985. And in the year 2000, it will cost $595.95. A house costing $32,000 in 1974 will cost $85,593 in 1985, and $357,545 in the year 2000. Last night, I heard the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) say that a house now worth $30,000, at a 12 per cent rate of interest, will cost, 12 years later, only in interest, the small amount of $152,000. That is, $152,000 for service charges and interest and $50,000 for the purchase of a house of his choice, that is a $30,000 home.

Mr. Speaker, one of the first measures passed by this government when it was first elected in 1968, has been one to raise the ceiling on interest rates. In 1968, the ceiling was 6¼ to 6½ per cent, an average rate in Canada; now, the rate on ordinary loans is 12 per cent. That is why a $30,000 home in 1977 paid off over 30 years will produce an interest of $152,000. To reward financial interests in 1968, we raised the ceiling of interest rates and today, financiers are getting twice as much interest as in 1968. We created inflation, Parliament is responsible and not the provinces, or municipalities or school boards or individuals or unions.

The trade unions fought back because they wanted to survive in that crazy system which was set up by the present government when it suppressed the ceiling on interest rates. Inflation in Canada has been a boon for the present government. Why? Because when a worker earns $200 a week, like we saw last year during the Olympic Games, and when interest rates jump following all those increases in interest rates, to afford a house of his own and all the commodities of life, that worker has to demand twice what he got during the Olympic Games. The federal government, without raising the taxation tables, like the former government of Mr. Bourassa, without raising the taxation tables, increased its budget in ten years from $12 billion to a national budget of almost $50 billion.

That means that inflation has served the present government, because it has worked to its advantage. Without raising taxes, the government has collected more money and taxpayers have paid more tax to the federal and provincial governments. Mr. Speaker, the Anti-Inflation Board was created nearly 24 months ago. During the next few minutes, I should like to emphasize that, firstly, this board has cost a lot of money, secondly, it has hired a great many civil servants and, thirdly, it resulted in a waste of ink and paper by the tons. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, those are the true results of the board's actions. It has spent a lot of money. Some $5,428,000 in 1975-76. Some $12,530,000 in 1976-77. From April to October 1977, it will cost another $7 million. For a grand total of $25 million over a 24-month period, which represents an average of over $1 million a month. Mr. Speaker, the board hired a great many people. In December 1975, it hired 342 employees. In March 1976 and June 1976, it hired 447 and 889 employees respectively.

Between March and June 1976, the Anti-Inflation Board has seen an inflation in the number of its employees which has more than doubled. The number of Anti-Inflation Board employees has reached the imposing figure of 914; but this number does not include the people hired by separate contract. Furthermore, the Anti-Inflation Board has travelled around, since it had to make its presence felt since it could not make its effects felt. That is why it has held hearings in the most expensive hotels in this country while Canadians were faced with prohibitive goods and services costs in Canada because of inflation. My third point, Mr. Speaker, is that the Anti-Inflation Board has produced tons of paper, one of the more concrete results on its part.

Mr. Speaker, I could go on for hours reading releases from the Anti-Inflation Board congratulating itself on its excellent job. In addition to having used a lot of paper, the Anti-Inflation Board achieved the following results: It controlled the wages of small wage earners, who were the first victims of inflation, but it did not control the prices paid by the small wage earners. Moreover, it frightened the investors because when they always have a sword over their head they do not invest, and rightly so, because they do not want to risk their capital to produce goods and services when the interest on capital is more productive on bonds which escape or used to escape the controls, than the interest on production capital which can eventually be subject to controls.

Because the investors were afraid, the Anti-Inflation Board has been one of the main causes of the present unemployment. All these results had been forecast by the Social Crediters because we predicted these economic results while the economists hired by the government were showing off the blown-out lantern of the Anti-Inflation Board, following the warnings given by the Social Crediters to the government before the board was established. Others also warned the government about the future inevitable disaster it would encounter with its miracle answer, the establishment of an Anti-Inflation Board. This experience had been tried in the United States when certain price controls were imposed, and it had ended in disaster. The government wanted Canada to repeat this American disaster. In fact, Mr. Speaker, Canada has become an expert in imported American mechanisms which have already failed and which are expected to do miracles in Canada. I well remember as I was in the House in 1962 and 1963, the American nuclear warheads of 1962-63, which are another example of disasters such as the Anti-Inflation Board of 1975.

The Canada Labour Council has published a yellow pamphlet entitled Why me? to show that it is the weak who suffer from inflation. It seems that wage controls were established to protect us against inflation. In fact this is a measure which will be detrimental to those who are most affected by inflation: Canadian workers and consumers. Why us? We spend almost all our income for housing, mortgages and food. Those spendings went up by 65, 32 and 49 per cent respectively between 1971 and 1974. We had to face increased obligations whereas our wages averaged 25 per cent more during the same period. Meanwhile higher prices yielded corporate profits exceeding by 111 per cent those of 1971, before the crisis. Why are we the only ones to be blamed? What makes us believe that the government can or wants to control those who are benefiting from inflation?

The guidelines set out in the legislation are full of loopholes allowing accountants to get round such guidelines. Real profits will keep soaring and so will prices. All analysts recognize this fact. Professional fees, land speculation and interest rates are only some of the areas neglected by the legislation. Government spokesmen admitted themselves that inflation would pursue its ravages. Wages are conspicuous and easy to restrict. Therefore the government is going to go for us. Our salaries are going to be restricted but our expenses will go on increasing, not to mention those of the low-income people, of those on fixed wages, of retired people and of those on welfare. They are going to be most affected by the government safety measures. We ignored the anti-inflation plan submitted by the Canadian Labour Congress. We substituted to it a program which is both unfair and unworkable. We, as Canadian workers and consumers, are opposed to measures which are directed against us as if we were the source of inflation. Why should we have to pay? Why would we be the only ones to pay the price of inflation?

It was a booklet published by the Labour Council of Canada which demonstrates that, after two years of operation, we were right about the Anti-Inflation Board.

Mr. Speaker, the Anti-Inflation Board has done more harm or bothered more people than it has helped. I wish to give you some examples. In La Presse of January 25, 1977 we can read:

"QUOTIDIEN" REPORTERS PROTEST AGAINST ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

The 25 reporters of the Quotidien of Chicoutimi and Progrès-Dimanche have been slowing down their work during the last week to protest against the decision of the Anti-Inflation Board to reduce their salaries negotiated with the employer.

The collective agreement had been accepted by both parties in November 75. It provided weekly salaries of $320 with an increase of $16 on January 1, 1977. The decision of the board freezes the wages at $292 a week.

The situation is the same at Le Nouvelliste of Trois-Rivières where reporters' salaries have been reduced by $10 to $15 a week and those of publicists by $30 a week.

Mr. Speaker, I have myself known a company in my riding which had reached an agreement with its employees' union but which is still waiting, Mr. Speaker, for a decision by the Anti-Inflation Board allowing the employer to pay the salaries provided in that collective agreement. The employees are still receiving the salaries paid before the collective agreement because the officials of the Anti-Inflation Board have not had time to ratify or study the file of the collective agreement signed by the employer and accepted by the union. That socialist scheme has then been nothing but an impediment to the economic activities in Canada; some press releases of the Anti-Inflation Board were quite ludicrous. On that matter, I wish to refer to the committee sitting of February 8, 1977 when the board announced that 124 Canadian companies had exceeded by $13,055,000 the limit set by the program of the Anti-Inflation Board.

Mr. Speaker, at the time when those 124 companies were blamed for having made a profit of $13 million, they made a big fuss about that discovery, that so-called control. It represents $100,000 per company but if you take into account their gross revenue, their invested capital and their investment needs, an average amount of $100,000 is a real joke.

I will mention only a few of these enterprises which were accused of making profits exceeding $100,000. These are: Alcan Aluminum from Montreal, Canada Cement Lafarge, Quebec Iron and Titanium from Sorel, Avon Products from Dorval, Domtar from Montreal, Northern Telecom from Montreal, Robin Hood Multi-Foods from Montreal, and so on. While 124 Canadian companies had made $13,055,000 in excess profit, 11 Canadian bank institutions were allowed to boost their assets by $30 billion over the last 12 months. If you review the balance sheets of the banks, you will find that the assets of Canadian banks have shot up by $30 billion in the last twelve months, when the gross national product averages $200 billion in Canada.

That means, Mr. Speaker, that the 11 chartered banks in Canada increased their assets by 15 per cent of the value of the GNP. What did the Anti-Inflation Board do against that outrageous situation? Zilch. It did not get involved with the banks because it is afraid of the sovereign power exercised by the banks now, for the banks have power over the governments they are financing, that power being that of creating money, which was conferred by this federal government, as was the case with previous governments. Small enterprises make a few millions in profit which they have to invest so as to keep their facilities and the economy operating. The Anti-Inflation Board did nothing but bother them with its bureaucracy while the banks were not asked any questions, for they have a sovereign power.

In the monetary field, which they were entrusted with by the federal government, they are allowed to lend 16 times their assets for each dollar deposited in a bank bearing 8 per cent interest to the depositor; in other words, the law permits the banks to extend a credit of $16 at 12 per cent interest, which works out to a gross benefit of 184 per cent of their assets. That explains the $30 billion more in banking assets during the last 12 months in a country whose gross national product is only $200 billion.

One the one hand, Mr. Speaker, businesses are being penalized while on the other they are being asked with the help of Department of Regional Economic Expansion subsidies to invest to create more employment and reduce unemployment and to implement new industries or modernize their operations. Benefits coming out of healthy competition are always reinvested and do automatically create employment because they favour production one way or the other. It is economic madness to penalize their benefits on the one hand while asking them on the other to expand and develop our economy and grant them money to encourage them to invest.

Mr. Speaker, I would rather trust statements of experienced businessmen which help out Canada's economic expansion than those of bureaucrat economists who have never run a business. In February 1977, the Chamber of Commerce of London, Ontario, provided the government with an interesting brief based on the following considerations and I quote:

● (2020)

[English]

We consider the chief causes of inflation to be:

Governments at three levels spending increasing percentages of our gross national product. Their spending in total should not exceed 37½ per cent, as stated in our January 1975 statement. Their programs whether statutory (or non-controllable) are not, nor should they be considered to be sacrosanct. They must be limited to come within the 37½ per cent guideline. An individual who spends beyond his or her means enventually goes broke. Likewise our governments, after decades of overspending, are fast going broke.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would only want to point out that in my own riding as well as in others, because it must be the same policy, the federal government raised the cost of certain services in the post office by 66⅔ per cent in January. The rental of post office boxes has gone up by 66⅔ per cent in the towns of Granby and Waterloo. The federal government is asking private businesses to limit their increases between 6 and 10 per cent but with respect to its own spendings, its own rates are going up by 66⅔ per cent. I therefore wrote a letter to the Anti-Inflation Board to bring this fact to their attention and I quote:

The following is to bring to your attention an increase of 66⅔ per cent that has been put into effect regarding the rental cost of the post office boxes—

—in the riding of Shefford.

Private business must limit the increase in its costs, but the federal government should at least set an example. Such a large increase on the part of a governmental service surely does not help the cause of the fight against inflation.

I then received a letter from one of the civil servants, Mr. Harold A. Renouf, from the Anti-Inflation Board, dated June 16, 1977, and I quote:

I regret to have to inform you that the charges levied by government services do not come under the Anti-Inflation Board.

Everybody has been put under control, but the government has been exempted!

Nevertheless, I share your opinion that the government should set a good example when it comes to price restraints and it should at least try to explain in details to the public the reasons for those increases when they eventually become necessary.

Mr. Speaker, we are still waiting for those explanations. I would like to go on quoting the paper of the Chamber of Commerce of London, Ontario. The second point is as follows:

[English]

Money supply increases. Money supply growth must be kept within the inflation rate and productivity increases initially, and gradually reduced to the level of productivity increases.

Wage and salary increases beyond the rate of inflation and productivity growth. Total remuneration packages must not exceed the inflation rate and productivity improvements.

Prices that are undisciplined by competition. We must ensure wherever possible that a healthy level of competition is effective throughout our economy.

[Translation]

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think that this is an extremely important point and the Chamber of Commerce of London, Ontario, states on several occasions that when we have healthy competition in business, we automatically have normal prices on the market. We now have an economy where small people are stifled through the Anti-Inflation Board, whereas the big multinationals are left free to operate on an independent basis, as we have seen during the last months and during the last few years. We have only to consider the Canadian situation regarding oil and gas. When, for example, we were paying 50 cents for a gallon of gasoline, the federal government was collecting a much lower sales tax on this gallon than it is doing now on a gallon for which we must pay $1. The main responsibility for inflation rests on the federal government, since it is in its interest to have prices rise to be able to collect higher taxes, to increase its expenses and also to have more money to meet its obligations, with the help of inflation.

When the Anti-Inflation Board was set up the Social Crediters said that is was going to be a fiasco, that it was going to be a joke, that it would only control little people, that it would not control banks, that it would not control multinational companies. We now know the result of the experiment. In a few days we will be paying at least $1 for a gallon of gas all across Canada. What did the Anti-Inflation Board do? It is all very nice to blame foreign countries, the Arabs, or Canada's oil product suppliers but it is the same thing in all other areas, even products manufactured in Canada because it is in the interest of the government to see salaries rise to produce increased taxes, higher revenues with the deficit budgets that we have had for the past several years.

Mr. Speaker, there would be other extremely interesting remarks to be made about inflation, but as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain suggested earlier, we are relying on the recommendations of economists who propose solutions that were obsolete before they were born. We are still applying solutions, theories that date back over a hundred years. On the one part, we advocate full employment and, on the other hand, we want to increase productivity through modern technology and science, while at the same time seeking to achieve full employment. Those are two contradictory principles in political economy, and there are ministers sitting on the government side who still rely on theories that have been proven to be fiascos. The inflation now was created altogether by an economic system, and particularly a monetary system controlled by multinationals, banks that forced this government and previous governments to give them the exclusive power to control the monetary and financial power in Canada. Wanting to correct inflation in Canada is like flogging a dead horse, unless we deal first with the monetary area, which is the prime cause, particularly since 1968, when this government lifted the interest ceiling on money rates in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to take part in this debate. I am one member who has expressed some very strong opinions on wage and price guidelines. I was one of those members who campaigned most vigorously against the freeze proposed by the Conservatives in the election campaign of 1974. I also supported the introduction of the wage and price guidelines program in 1975. Tonight I take the position that the program should be continued for some time yet. I will be one member who later this evening will vote against the rather superfluous motion put forward by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens).

I opposed introduction of the wage and price freeze as proposed by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) and the Conservative party in 1974, and I thought for good reason. If the same set of conditions prevailed today I would be just as vigorous in my opposition. If you remember, Mr. Speaker, in 1974 economic conditions were substantially different from the present day. The economy was short of goods, it was short of manpower, and it was short of money.

Mr. Gillies: Not true.

Mr. Milne: In terms of wanting to increase supply you had to produce more. If the hon. member for Halifax and the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), who I understand was the author of that program, had had their way certainly it would have been the most devastating thing that could have happened not only to the economy but to the small business community.

Mr. Gillies: How could we be worse off than we are today with one million unemployed?

Mr. Milne: At that time world food prices were rising. The world price for oil was going up by four. Industrial materials were increasing substantially in price. At that point in time a freeze would, in my opinion, have been very wrong. The problem was supply, with too many dollars chasing too few goods.

In 1975 conditions changed. I think hon. members on the other side should open their eyes. If they were in a situation where they went to a doctor with some kind of health problem one year and the doctor prescribed some kind of remedy and they went back a year or so later with a different problem, surely they would expect the doctor to view it differently. Hon. members opposite seem to have a one track mind on this thing; they wanted a solution that would answer all types of situations in the economy. In spite of the reputation of the hon. member for Don Valley as an economist, they are surely not being very realistic.

I supported the program that was introduced in 1975 for a number of reasons. There had been a downturn in the economy of many industrial countries in the world. We were experiencing, as the minister and a number of members on this side have said strongly, a period of inflation resulting from a psychological base where people expected and wanted more in anticipation of the future. But the fundamental reason I supported the program in 1975, and why I am going to vote to continue it tonight, is simply that the country cannot afford to lose its relativity in the export market, particularly the United States.

I think that is extremely important. Many members on both sides of the House have said we need to take a serious look at the structure of our economy, but in my opinion there has not been any meaningful or significant dialogue in that area. Therefore I think controls should remain until we have had the opportunity to do so.

As I have said, I will be voting against the motion. Prior to doing that may I say I have spent a fair amount of time surveying my constituents. The whole purpose of the government's publishing the book "The Way Ahead" was to initiate dialogue, and I chose to use it with various groups in my constituency. I want to put on the public record of this place that the business community, as represented in the city of Brampton by the Board of Trade, took my invitation seriously and held discussions on its contents. They surveyed their entire membership and reported back to me. I met with them to review the results of their survey amongst their membership, and fully two thirds of the business community of Brampton are opposed to the lifting of wage and price guidelines at this time.

As a matter of fact, a good half of the remaining one third said that they were in favour of lifting the program, but they qualified their answers. They said they would be in favour of removing the program at this time if there were a follow up agency which essentially had the same type of power; or that they would be in favour of lifting the program if they could be sure that inflation would not return or if they were satisfied that labour rates would remain more or less constant. If you interpret that as a qualified answer, you could certainly say that well over three quarters of the respondents in the business community of my city want me to stand here and say that they are opposed to the removal of this program at this point in time.

I represent a riding with a high percentage of secondary industry. Many industries in my riding are in the secondary manufacturing sector and rely heavily on exports of their manufactured products, mostly to the United States. Many people charged with the management of these plants have been to see me to express the deep concern they have as to how competitive they are. They realize that some of their customers are not buying as much as they traditionally have but, more important, they are really concerned as to whether or not they can compete in the market.

If we decided to be opportunists like the hon. member for York-Simcoe would like the House to be, and lift the controls immediately perhaps there would be some short term applause. But I will wager a fair amount that members on the opposite side would be on their feet in the question period within a week or two demanding that something be done to improve exports. I cannot think of anything more constructive that we could do in the long term than continue the anti-inflation program.

I have all kinds of representations from the business community I represent. On one hand they indicate we should have a higher tariff structure so that more products are not coming in, and on the other we should be financing and subsidizing industry a good deal more for them to be able to compete in the export market. That is just the same as a dog going around biting its own tail. There is no way to win in a situation like that. While it may be rather unpalatable in the short term, will cause some dislocation and will cause some levelled off expections, to give up our position in the export market is disastrous for the industrial sector of this country and therefore the employment sector. There are certain groups in our society who want us to terminate the program as of now, or very soon. I think it is worth toughing it a bit longer so that we will have that long term gain.

I represent a riding in which there is a high degree of construction. There are few other ridings in Canada where residential construction is as high as it is in the city of Brampton, or indeed, that there is as much commercial and industrial construction as there is in that area. One of the real causes of our inflation two or three years ago was the very high wage settlements that were obtained in the construction industry. The result of this was that in the short construction season builders were almost willing to pay any kind of settlement in order to have some labour peace during the construction season and to get on with their building.

One of the problems we are faced with in this country is the fact that companies are starting to say that they can build their plants in the States rather than in Canada, because they can get lower labour rates down there than they can in Canada. That is of concern because we are already giving up two of the greatest advantages this country has had, a labour rate that has been marginally lower than the United States and the fact that we have had a large quantity of low cost natural resources. Both of those points are not as much in our favour as they used to be.

You cannot expect some person in the labour force to be as happy with the same wage level here in Canada as he might be on the States side. His personal cost of living is higher in this country. One thing which makes it higher is the high cost of housing. It is impossible to buy any type of shelter in Brampton for under $50,000. It is not difficult to have a very modest home and pay $70,000. On the other side of the border, perhaps housing costs are not much more than half or two thirds of that. There is a lot of vested interest in terms of trying to get some of our construction costs down by playing it cool, and doing that by the continuation of the program.

I accepted an invitation from a large labour organization in my riding to go and discuss the whole anti-inflation program with them. It was a most interesting evening. They presented me with a very substantial brief. The content of that brief was similar to that which Mr. Morris presented to the government on behalf of the entire labour movement. Essentially they were making the point in that brief that there were three things they felt were fundamental to improving the economy of the country at this time.

They felt the number one problem we are dealing with is unemployment. The most significant way to deal with unemployment would be to remove the controls immediately. Their second point was that it was of vital concern to them that the housing program should be more vigorous than it is at the present time. Their third point was, rather than the budget giving some assistance to the business community to invest and expand, that those dollars should have gone into direct tax cuts and should have been accompanied by a substantial cut in personal taxes, as well as a government subsidy from the federal level to the municipal and provincial levels so that they in turn could reduce their taxes.

I think that is the fundamental problem facing the country. On the one hand we have the business community saying that the controls should remain. They are concerned about an upsurge in inflation, labour rates, and our role in the export market. The leadership of the labour community feel very strongly that the controls program should be removed immediately to address the problem of unemployment. Certainly the polls and surveys do not indicate that all the people who belong to the labour movement necessarily feel the same. Until we get some kind of a resolution or a meeting of minds, we have no other alternative but to continue the program for a period of time.

I am not sure either group would appreciate me saying this, but in some ways both groups were taking their positions for the wrong reasons. Some of the business community want the controls program to continue for a period of time so that they can have a lever on the labour rates they are obliged to pay. The labour group want the controls program to end, although they were very careful to say they wanted it to continue on the price side and not on the wage side. They wanted that so that they can tackle their unemployment situation and try to gain back those wage gains which they were obligated to give up because of the guidelines set up by the AIB and that part of the increase more particularly that was rolled back by the Anti-Inflation Board.

Yesterday, and a few times previous to that, the leaders of the business community and the leaders of the labour movement met with government, which puts us in an encouraging position. While there has been no meeting of minds on any real, firm commitments, by virtue of the answer given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) today, the dialogue is coming closer and both sides are starting to see they have a mutual interest in solving this problem rather than taking diametrically opposed positions.

I met with the labour organization in Brampton. Obviously all of them did not agree, but I attempted to put the thesis to them that I thought controlling inflation was probably the most effective thing we could do to improve the employment situation. If we were to get out of the program in the short term and ignore inflation, in a year or so there would probably be a substantial lift in the economy; but perhaps four or five years down the road this would not work in their best interests and would not be in the best interests of the labour movement. We cannot continue to price ourselves out of the export market and out of our own domestic market, because one of the difficulties we have in this country is trying to compete for the domestic market against countries which can produce and come in over the top of our rather substantial tariff walls and still compete more than successfully in our domestic markets.

I want to say as sincerely as I can to the people in my constituency who belong to the labour movement that I do not in any way, shape or form downgrade or not take seriously the level of unemployment. Generally speaking, I represent one of the richer areas of Canada. When parliament, the newspapers and others were talking about unemployment, they were generally not talking about the city of Brampton and that part of the Golden Horseshoe surrounding the city of Toronto. This unemployment was generally in the maritimes, part of Quebec, northern Ontario and so on.

At the present time the unemployment rate in Brampton is as high or higher than it has ever been because secondary manufacturing is an area which has been hit. Before it was always a big paper plant that was shut down, but this time it is smaller plants that have difficulties exporting. That is why I make the point that it is very important that we continue the program so that we can solve the problem.

● (2050)

Mr. Gillies: The best solution would be to get rid of the controls.

Mr. Milne: I argue on the opposite side. I presume the hon. member for Don Valley has his name on Mr. Speaker's list. I will listen to his argument in support of lifting the controls, but I sincerely say to him and to the House that I take the opposite point of view because, without them, we would go back to high inflation in short term, and that would be in the worst interests of the people whom we try to help.

In terms of unemployment, we should take a careful look at the situation. It has been announced recently that unemployment is in the order of 8 per cent. That seems very high, and it is high, but when you analyse it further you find that there are some significant facts and figures within that statistic which should go on the record.

First of all, the last Statistics Canada figures indicate that the unemployment rate is now 7.9 per cent, down from 8.3 per cent, a substantial drop of some .6 per cent. I do not hear any members in the House, particularly on the opposition front bench, or the hon. member for York Simcoe, commenting on that. When unemployment goes up .5 per cent he is on his feet shouting what a disaster that is, but when it drops .6 per cent it seems to escape his notice.

When you look at the employment situation you find that the number of households that have no wage earner at all is less than one in four of those listing unemployment. In other words, when there is someone in the household who is unemployed, only one in four of those households does not have at least one or more wage earners earning income for that home. This has helped to soften the situation, making it less drastic than the 8 per cent would indicate.

There has been a very high entry into the work force, in spite of the fact that our economy has increased to provide a substantial increase in the number of job establishments. The problem really is the high entry rate. The high entry rate has been extremely high among females between the ages of 25 and 44. I certainly understand why so many of them are entering the work force. They are simply doing it because the cost of housing, the cost of food, and the cost of so many things that families buy these days has gone up so much that they need more than one income in the home to be able to maintain the standard of living they have, or indeed to begin to approach the standard of living they would like. I cannot think of anything that would help correct that situation any more than to control inflation the best we can.

I want to conclude by making a couple of other points. The point I was trying to make is that while unemployment is high and while, I am sure, every member of the House is concerned about it—I am particularly sensitive to it as it applies to my constituents—we now belong to a society where there is a multiple pay cheque in many households, and three out of four of the households where someone is unemployed do have someone in the labour force, and almost one in three have two or more people in the work force, in spite of the fact they may have one or more who are unemployed.

One of the comments that has been made very often by people discussing the AIB program—certainly to me in letters and conversation—is that the program is not fair on the basis that the cost of many of the things on which money is spent is not controlled. They speak about electrical energy, energy of all types, municipal taxation, and food. I would like to make a few comments on the food industry.

I think it is fair to say—as a matter of fact the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has said it on one or more occasions—that the results of the program have been materially assisted by the fact that last year the price of food came down. One of the reasons that our performance under the AIB is not as good this year as it was last year has been the resurgence in the price of food. I support that resurgence because I have many constituents, friends and acquaintances, who are primary producers, and there are many farmers across this country who have lost thousands and thousands of dollars in the beef business. Unless they have some kind of relief by having the consumer pay a higher price for that product—and we hope there is a flow through to the farmer—we will be in a situation of having many producers out of business and, I venture to say, the price will double in a year or two because there will be a scarcity of beef. The same is true with pork.

I appeal to Canadians to accept the fact that, while they read in the paper of the excess profits that many of the food processors are making, there are substantial number of primary producers, particularly in the beef sector, who have suffered badly.

I want to congratulate the government on some moves it has made in the last little while that have been beneficial to the farm community. I think one of them has been the exemption of family farms from capital gains tax. Along with the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac) I petitioned the Minister of Finance prior to the present budget to have the proceeds from the sale of land that is reinvested in land escape capital gains tax. This view was shared by most members who represent the farming community.

There is one more step that the Minister of Finance should take in this area, that is, that when a farm is incorporated for a variety of reasons, that it be allowed to roll over taxes on the same basis as an a non-incorporated farm. I have argued a number of times that only the land portion of the incorporation should have that advantage—I do not think the associated businesses should have it. Nevertheless, I want to make a couple of comments and to congratulate the government again on publishing a statement on food policy, as it did a few days ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Milne: Hon. members can take it lightly, as does the hon. member for Don Valley, who probably does not have many cows in his region or who has not cleaned many stables.

A proper food policy—I am convinced that the document sets out the basic strategy for it—is in the best interests of both the producer and the consumer. Somehow most hon. members on the other side, and many other people, cannot seem to understand that a good food policy is in the best interests of both producer and consumer. Many people take the point of view that it is either to the advantage of the producer or it is a cheap food policy for the consumer, but in fact it is not. And I endorse the basic principles that are set out that we should support marketing boards, that we should have a good program of income stability, that we need to be sensitive on a short term basis in our tariff policy, and that farmers, because they deal with unpredictable situations such as weather, should have a good program of crop insurance available to them at rates they can afford.

As to marketing boards, they have drawn a lot of comments from many people. There are hon. members on the other side who take the position they want nothing to do with marketing boards, but that the government should be there.

An hon. Member: Talk to your Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Horner) about that.

• (2100)

Mr. Milne: I was on a platform with our new minister last Saturday, and I should point out to the hon. member opposite who is interjecting that the minister stood up and explained this policy. As a matter of fact he enunciated it very well indeed.

Hon. members opposite talk about how bad marketing boards are, but I do not see them standing up and introducing motions saying we should do away with the Canadian Wheat Board.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Don't lecture me. Lecture the Minister without Portfolio.

Mr. Milne: There is a good deal of concern among farmers at the present time as to the future of marketing boards. This is reflected by many of the discussions in this House and in our committees. Whether the government is committed to marketing boards or not is being discussed. I want to tell hon. members that years ago I worked in the agricultural industry. I had a lot to do with the poultry business. I worked with farmers who had very large flocks of laying hens, and with farmers who were involved in the production of meat birds. I have seen some of the best farms in Ontario, which had been owned for two and three generations, turned over to feed companies.

One of the most humiliating things I ever witnessed in my life was to see a once proud farmer working for a feed company on a salaried basis, operating the farm he and his father previously operated.

Mr. Gillies: Look at some of your ministers and you will feel more humiliated.

Mr. Lumley: It's not as bad as looking over there.

Mr. Milne: That was a silly comment coming from a person who is supposed to be one of Canada's outstanding parliamentarians.

Mr. Gillespie: Who said that?

Mr. Milne: That is his opinion of himself.

Mr. Gillies: Would you give me the citation for that, please?

Mr. Milne: Read Hansard tomorrow.

At one time farmers had high volumes of product and extremely low prices. That drove producers out of business. When there was a scarcity prices were high, and it was always the small, genuine farmer who got hurt in that situation. The thing marketing boards have done, particularly in the poultry industry which is easy to get into on a short-term has been to bring stability. As a matter of fundamental policy I think the government should do everything it can to make us as self sufficient in energy, housing and food production as possible, and certainly one of the fundamental—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in the controls debate this evening without any apology for the position of the Conservative party in 1974, and to remind hon. members present that had this party won that election the controls would have ended more than two and a half years ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: This debate would have been history. During that election campaign hon. members opposite tried to make 90 days seem like forever, but 90 days is a far shorter time than the time we have lived through this controls program already. I suppose one of the main reasons I rose tonight is that I was prodded by the remarks of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) the other evening, and again by the remarks made this evening by the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne). Both those hon. members are marvellous revisionists. They are re-writers of history, but I remind them that it takes at least three decades for a revisionist to write with any credibility at all. To try to revise history after less than three years is an exercise, while carried out with a straight face by the hon. members opposite, that is not going to fool the opposition nor the public.

For the hon. member for Davenport to suggest, as he did the other evening, that during that campaign the difference between the Tories and the Liberals was a matter of judgment as to when to bring in controls and as to when they were necessary, is absolutely laughable. When one remembers the ridicule and the scorn which were poured on the policy presented by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), then the leader of this party, on platform after platform across this country, it is difficult to believe that anybody could present such a picture of what it was all about three years ago in this House after such a short time, and claim to have any credibility at all. I remind the hon. member for Davenport that a week and a half ago he was pleading in this House for hon. members to have some faith in what he said and to believe him. For him a week later to make a statement with no shred of truth in it, I find it an amazing thing.

We know that the Liberal opposition to controls at the time of the 1974 election campaign was total. The candidate who ran for the Liberal party against me said that the whole idea of any kind of controls was foreign to his party, that its members could never bring themselves to it and that it was against every principle they upheld. It is astonishing to hear the speeches and the thread of thought of the two hon. members I mentioned, and of many more in the course of this debate.

It was interesting too that we were told in 1974 that any attempt at control, either in Britain or in the United States, had failed. I was sharply reminded of that a few months ago when a constituent sent to me an essay by Robert Lekachman entitled "The Specter of Full Employment", found in Harper's Magazine which described the American attempt at controls. Part of the essay reads as follows:

> Nixon preached the wickedness of interference with private markets, but nevertheless suddenly froze prices August 15, 1971, and followed the ninety-day freeze with a year or so of more flexible but astonishingly successful wage- and price-hike limitations.

Nowhere in 1974 could one find a quote like that in any literature. Oh, to have found that one during that 1974 campaign! It would have been worth a couple of thousand votes to have found somebody with the courage to have made that assessment of a 90-day freeze and then a gradual withdrawal and a phasing out of controls.

We must remember too the embarrassment of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) as he struggles with this method of controlling which has been imposed by the Liberal government. It was not too long ago that the former minister of finance, the former member for Ottawa-Carleton, left this House because he could not bear the thought of having to try to explain away and pilot through a controls program in this House.

The former member for Ottawa-Carleton always wanted to look good, but there is no way to make the government and the Minister of Finance look good in their endeavour to make the controls program work. It does not matter how sweetly they sing the tune. I am reminded of an old folk song that the balladeers sing. Sometimes they do it seriously, and sometimes they do it as a burlesque. I think we have been hearing the burlesque part of it. That old song has in it lines about a cherry that had no stone, a chicken that had no bone, and a story that had no end. That line about the cherry that had no stone is pretty appropriate. I am not really implying that the government is rotten to the core, but I am certainly suggesting that the controls program was not firm at the core and that it ailed from its foundation. The public was very swiftly aware of that. The problem was the exception: the Crown corporations, the Post Office, companies with limited employment, and commercial rents.

Mr. Epp: The government has excepted.

Mr. Johnston: Food prices did not seem to matter at all. I am sure hon. members opposite had constituents, as I did, who did a marvellous job of watch-dogging prices. Some constituents sent me itemized day by day accounts of price increases after the imposition of the controls program. That information was passed on to the AIB. Phone calls were made. These constituents received phone calls, were thanked for their effort, and that was about it. They quickly realized that it did not make any sense to monitor prices like that because there was no way that the Anti-Inflation Board was going to tackle prices with anything like the same vigour it tackled some aspects of wages.

● (2110)

As far as the chicken that had no bone is concerned, the program is firm in all the wrong places and predictably soft in other places. It is an example of gross inequities. In my constituency those inequities were felt very sharply. About a year ago there was a strike by coal miners in the east part of Okanagan-Kootenay against the Anti-Inflation Board because of a settlement that had been mutually worked out with the company. Fortunately the company was in a profitable position because it had renegotiated its prices with Japan. The workers were aware of the change, yet their settlement was rolled back. They sent a delegation to Ottawa. They went on strike. They stayed out far too long, it seems to me, particularly when the jurisdiction of the board was being reconsidered. The board stood firm, however. I will get back to that company, Mr. Speaker, because of another matter which came up recently.

Then we had the example of the B.C. Teachers' Federation. Compulsory abitration, binding on both sides, had been imposed by law many years ago. Those arbitration boards met in the fall of 1975 and there was nothing in the provincial law at all to direct them to the Anti-Inflation Board. There was no clear indication of whether it had jurisdiction over them and their activities proscribed originally by law, so they brought down a legally binding settlement that had to be accepted by the school boards and teachers. Those settlements were eventually referred to the Anti-Inflation Board by the Minister of Education in the province.

I wrote to that minister and advised him that he should not lightly overturn the principle of arbitration under which teachers' salaries had been settled in British Columbia for years and years. However, he did turn them over to the Anti-Inflation Board. At the same time representatives from the government of British Columbia were here in Ottawa arguing against the jurisdiction being extended to the province of British Columbia. The cases in the court are not settled yet.

I do not know why the Anti-Inflation Board, when it received that reference, did not simply quote British Columbia law and say the jurisdiction had not been settled and that it had no power. Instead, it got involved in the game of rollback and again it became fearfully complicated. It is not finished yet. It defies the imagination, Mr. Speaker.

When the minister was asked the question raised so eloquently in the House last week by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) about the very large increases given to company executives, the Minister of Finance, replying on behalf of the AIB and the controls program, said that some of those increases concerned contracts which had been entered into prior to the program. That goes a long way back but increases are only becoming apparent now. One would wonder why the same reasoning has not been applied to the B.C. Teachers' Federation when their increases were rolled back.

An interesting thing about the executive pay increases is that they involve an executive of the coal company which had made a joint presentation with the miners to the Anti-Inflation Board. It would be very difficult now for me to go back to those miners and try to persuade them that this program had worked well and had been equitable. They could hardly see it as anything but the roughest kind of justice. There was no backbone at all in the fight against prices, so the second line of the song is true.

I think one of the lines that should concern us most is "a story that had no end." After listening to the Minister of Finance and hon. members opposite who have had such a change of heart since 1974, it seems that the controls program will "have no end" as long as they are in power.

We must give credit to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) who saw all this so clearly during the original debate on the controls program and voted against the bill on second reading to make the point that he feared the tendency of the government to extend power to the bureaucracy. As we listen to the debate we are reminded of his comments and how accurate they were.

The program has not really worked, Mr. Speaker. It is building in perpetual inflation. It sets limits that are accepted too readily by companies, and probably accepted too readily by workers who joined in this business of destroying the competitive position of industry.

The hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe apologized for the lack of competition in Canada. It is just the result of Liberal policies over the last 20 years, Mr. Speaker,—an astonishing display of crocodile tears as he spoke of how badly the competitive position of Canadian industry has been eroded in recent years.

The governement is still absolutely rapacious in taxation. We have as evidence the new taxes on the life insurance industry. By and large the public is not even aware of what is about to be taken away from them, and still hope to cash in policies they have held for a long time. There is an appalling shift of policy here, Mr. Speaker.

The government has not shown restraint itself. Through a variety of programs it has shown there is almost a limitless fund of money which it has moved around programs like the Local Initiatives Program, Canada Works, Young Canada Works—the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) apparently can always come up with another $100 million for another program.

A year ago we could not even afford a party on July 1. There was such restraint that there was not $500,000—not $100,000—not even ten cents to let off a firecracker. One wonders why suddenly this year there is $3½ million to celebrate Dominion Day, although they do not want to call it that. Most of the $3½ million is not going into fireworks but is going into brainwashing the Canadian people so that the name can be changed to Canada Day. This campaign has been launched under the guise of making a truly great celebration this year. If ever there was need of a celebration it was a year ago, but the government's timing is just as bad on this as on other issues.

The government is faced with an enormous credibility problem. Who can believe it? Who can accept its promises? I know there are some voices in the public saying that controls should remain; that is to be expected. It is a sort of "Prisoner of Chillon" syndrome that eventually the chains and walls become attractive. It means passing the load to the government or the AIB rather than fighting it out at the local level.

There is some fear around, because nobody knows what the government will do next after what it did when the 1974 election was over. Of course the program was ailing from the beginning because there was no mandate. If the Minister of Finance had reported to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that the situation was out of control and the government's methods for combating inflation ineffective, the prime Minister should have announced his resignation and that of his government, because it had no mandate to do what it did on October 15, 1975. By imposing controls, contrary to what it had said in the election campaign, the government betrayed the Canadian people. Every time the hon. member for Halifax rises to speak in this House it reminds me of that day of infamy.

One suspects that the controls program is being maintained because the government is not yet ready to announce that it has made some kind of agreement with the Canadian Labour Congress. Mr. Speaker, the $10 million the government made available in that regard shocked some elements of the business community who know they were treated over the years as a source of revenue and were not considered for subsidies. One need not tell them to what use that fund will be put.

Remember, the Canadian Labour Congress passed a resolution calling for a one day national protest strike. That strike did not give a clear answer, for it neither worked well enough nor failed badly enough. Since that day of protest gave no clear-cut answers, the negotiations continued. At present the government wants to involve labour and business in a tripartite system or council which will advise in the running of the country. The government, or the bureaucracy, prefers that system to returning to the freer exchange of ideas to which we were accustomed before the controls program began, or to adopting what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) proposed the other day in his speech on controls.

If the controls program extends to next spring, some 70 per cent of corporations will be locked into agreements, and some 50 per cent of all pay contracts will also be locked into agreements, and we shall see a period of relative peace between labour and industry. That will enable the government to campaign on the issue of national unity and ignore wage and price controls; for it is the great fear of the government that, if the people remember what happened in the 1974 election campaign, it may have to sell them the controls program. One knows the government would not dare go to the people and attempt to sell this program, not after the way it has worked these many months. Therefore the government will pretend that it has worked out some formula which will buy labour peace, at the price of democracy, particularly parliamentary democracy, and it will proclaim and advertise that program all over the country.

Suddenly those members who rose in their place to defend controls will not find anything good to say about the controls program, will claim it had to end on such and such a date, and will announce in its place the great, shining dream of industrial peace, security and safety. The government will campaign on national unity, and the Prime Minister will conduct a phony compaign along lines developed by himself against the premier of the province of Quebec. When I say this I think of the Prime Minister addressing that audience on the prairies and telling the people they are being "conned" by the premier of Quebec. Mr. Speaker, one thing is certain: If the premier of Quebec conned anybody in Canada, he learned from that consummate master, the Prime Minister.

Therefore I willingly stand up to say it is time controls ended, that unemployment is grim indeed, that business increasingly lacks confidence in the economy, that unemployment is rising ever higher and inflation is far from defeated, as anyone who goes shopping knows. The security the controls program promised is not the security on which one should rely. The government's program is different indeed from the program the Conservatives advocated in 1974.

I know the controls program in force since 1975 is not the program we presented. Ours would have finished by the time this one started, and conditions in this country in terms of inflation and unemployment would have been better than the sorry picture we now see.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, other members have said many of the things I wanted to say, perhaps better than I could have said them. I am pleased to participate briefly in the present debate, which is timely and on a subject which has affected each and every Canadian for the past 20 months, and for some time before that.

[Mr. Johnston.]

Having listened to the financial critic of the opposition, I felt he did not make his case in support of the motion before the House which calls for controls to end at the end of this month. Certainly the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) and other hon. members opposite and on my side of the House made good contributions in a timely debate, conducted at a high level.

I submit the controls program this government introduced some 20 months ago has worked well, and that fact has disturbed hon. members opposite deeply.

Mr. Malone: Tell us, how did it work well?

Mr. McIsaac: The government's program is considerably different—and hon. members are still confused on the point—from the freeze program the Conservative party advocated in the 1974 election campaign. The Canadian electorate, incidentally, rejected their program. The program this government implemented, reluctantly, in October, 1975, was of a different kind and embodied an approach different from that embodied in the program to which the electorate said no in July, 1974.

Mr. Ellis: It is devastatingly different.

Mr. McIssac: That is right, it is devastatingly different. It has succeeded, which disturbs hon. members opposite. Experience has shown that the government's controls program was timely and basically different in concept from the proposal put forward by the Conservatives in the last election campaign.

Mr. Paproski: Yes, it was different, just as the metric system is different.

Mr. McIsaac: Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on behalf of the many people in my province and constituency who are unorganized and, in essence, unprotected from the ravages of inflation. By those two terms I do not mean only the pensioners and those on fixed incomes, what we might call the poor class of society. I certainly include in the unprotected and the unorganized both the small businessman and the farmer. Often they are not necessarily poor. However, they would like to see this control program remain for a period of time until there is greater evidence of responsibility by labour and big business that we will not again be looking at the same kind of inflation balloon.

• (2130)

During this debate someone said that this program legislates inflation by setting out limits, guidelines, and so on. It is true in that sense. The limits become the minimum on one hand and the maximum on the other. In essence we are legislating inflation at a regulated level. Surely that is a good deal better than what we had before the introduction of the program.

The hon. member for Okanagan Kootenay (Mr. Johnston) made a fairly good case, pointing out the many inequities that have come about as a result of the application of this program. The fact is that it did interfere with what had come to be accepted bargaining processes, not only in British Columbia in teacher collective bargaining but in other areas of collective bargaining. Certainly there were rollbacks. In many cases there should have been rollbacks.

There is no doubt that there have been injustices in the application of the program. However, there were greater injustices before the program was introduced. Certainly there are far fewer injustices since the inception of the program than if the government had stood back and done nothing in that period of time. Injustices were rampant before the program was introduced.

I want to review briefly Canada's position in so far as other countries are concerned with regard to its fight against inflation. When you look at the figures for the 24 OECD nations you see that Canada has the eighth lowest rate of inflation. Some members say we should be doing better than that. Our economy is perhaps more sensitive to external fluctuation than most others. Therefore it is indeed a remarkable achievement to be eighth among the 24 member countries.

I do not believe there is any other country similarly tied to world trade that can boast of an inflation rate that is near our present rate of 7.6 per cent. Indeed were it not for price rises in imported goods, mainly food products such as coffee, tea, and vegetables, our rate would be below 7 per cent. The estimate is 6.7 per cent. I am sure hon. members will agree that 6.7 per cent is not very far off the government's second year goal for this program of getting inflation down to about 6 per cent.

There is still a challenge on the part of the government and all Canadians to try to bring the consumer price down further. Leaving the controls on for a longer period will allow this country to realize more quickly our goal, than by throwing out controls at the beginning of next month. The fact that we still face a rising cost of living index is sufficient to warrant a continuation of wage and price controls. There are other reasons for continuing this program for some period of time.

I hope members opposite will realize during the course of this debate that to adopt their approach and throw out controls at this time would be to give up some of the ground that has been gained. I say that not so much in terms of reducing price increases and a levelling of profits and wage increases, but in terms of the realization that seems to be developing, albeit too slowly to suit many of us, that we are getting a more responsible kind of attitude on the part of labour and big business. We have a further distance to go before most Canadians in my part of the country will agree they have learned their lesson and are prepared to follow it as far as open season is concerned for the average Canadian.

One of the major problems that forced the government to implement guidelines was a very rapid rate of inflation fueled by many areas within our economy. Labour costs and prices were running in circles. Prices were rising. There were settlements of 25 and 30 per cent, and demands for a great deal more. Obviously that kind of situation could not continue.

A further indication of the benefit of controls is apparent when one compares the rise in wages to contract settlements over the past couple of years. In 1975 the average settlement by contract was around 20 per cent. Hon. members realize that kind of average level of increase could not continue without repercussions, not only here in Canada but internationally, in so far as trade is such an important part of Canadian life. Already we are paying the price for some of those increases.

Following the introduction of price and wage guidelines in 1975, the situation began to change for the better. By the end of the first quarter of 1976, contract settlements dropped to the area of 15 per cent. As I say, it appears that we are making some progress in that sense.

Canadians deserve some congratulations. Without the support of the great majority of working people and small businessmen in this country over the past year and a half, we would not have had any success with this program. The achievement of bringing down the rate of increase of profits and wages was not secured without considerable restraint on the part of a great number of Canadians.

The achievements of this restraint psychology are also shown in the tremendous improvement in Canada's strike record. A couple of years ago none of us were proud of the number of manhours lost in this country due to strikes. In the first quarter of this year British Columbia was down by about 87 per cent in terms of the number of manhours lost by strikes compared with a couple of years ago.

The advantage of having the country's economy subject to fewer slowdowns and walkouts is obvious to everyone. These important figures indicate that the atmosphere in which labour negotiating is occurring today is a good deal healthier than it was a year ago. I say again that we need to improve that atmosphere considerably before we can afford to let go the wage and price controls.

● (2140)

Members opposite still accuse the government of failing to protect citizens from massive increases in prices. That is not true either, because the Anti-Inflation Board through its recent figures indicates it has forced some 461 firms to return almost $100 million in excess revenues to their customers or clients. In that sense the argument we hear so often from the NDP that business has not been forced to comply with the guidelines and principles is not borne out by the figures. The AIB has made 44 food processing firms give 30 days notice of selected price increases. This requirement to notify of price increases has been another positive feature of the program.

I do not think the country is yet ready for the lifting of controls. I would, of course, like to see us get out of this particular program, as far as that goes. But we did not have any pattern of policies for dealing with a high level of inflation and a high level of unemployment. The construction industry—

Mr. Ellis: The construction industry wants controls lifted right away.

Mr. McIsaac: I have no doubt about that. In that industry, instead of three or four year contracts for which they were bargaining before controls, they are now down to bargaining on a one-year basis, so they will be ready when controls come off to jump in and look for a larger increase. It is very debatable. The hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis) can argue the case if he likes, but suppose controls were to come off tomorrow, how much more activity would take place within that industry? I believe that before we saw an increase in construction we would see a major increase in inflation.

Mr. Epp: How did you campaign in 1974?

Mr. McIsaac: I campaigned in 1974 in opposition to the freeze policy advanced by the former leader of the opposition. I supported wholeheartedly the government's stand in opposing the freeze advocated by the hon. member for Halifax. We were unable at that time to learn of any plans the Conservative party had beyond the 90-day freeze. I have listened to hon. members speak in this debate, as I have listened to them for the past year and a half, and I have yet to hear any concrete suggestion which goes beyond that 90-day freeze. Surely, the experience of the western cattle raisers with respect to the freeze on beef prices is a sufficient lesson. They do not need to be reminded of the effects of a 90-day freeze with no follow-up.

I do not think there is any region in Canada which is more vulnerable to inflation than is western Canada, or, to be more specific, the province of Saskatchewan with its economy based on agriculture. The prices we get for our products are determined primarily by international markets, yet our cost of production is directly affected by the rate of inflation both domestically and outside this country. The people of Saskatchewan want no part of another round of inflation. Indeed they are not happy about the present level of inflation.

The business community does not want controls thrown out of the window, yet that is what the opposition is really proposing today. It is true that some union leaders continue to oppose the program and I am sure they do so sincerely, even though selfishly in my view. They have even convinced the premier of Saskatchewan to reverse his position. The government of Saskatchewan, along with others, was advocating some kind of controls program; it was only a year or so later that the premier of the province, along with the premier of Manitoba, who had urged the federal government to act, reversed their stand on controls. It is my feeling that if you spoke to the premier of Saskatchewan privately he would say, despite the difficulties in his own party, that his first reaction was the right one and that controls ought to be left in place for some time yet.

The great majority of the people of Saskatchewan, regardless of their status in life, do not want controls lifted. Sure, they would like to make changes; they would like to see the economy operating in such a way as to make controls unnecessary. But all working Canadians have pretty well demonstrated their feelings on the issue as can be gathered from the kind of support they have given the program. Without the support of a whole host of people the program would not have worked. Hon. members opposite seem to forget that the Canadian people support controls.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said not long ago in Montreal that although he would scrap the AIB he would give almost identical power to the cabinet or to some agency or department such as the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Well, it is hard, while calling for an end to the Board, to argue in favour of the program in another form. I am not sure whether the hon. gentleman has really thought that one out.

The people in my constituency are not yet convinced that either big business or big labour is really ready to show a more responsible approach to bargaining or to price setting, an approach which balances their own objectives against a measure of public responsibility. Certainly we need changes. We need changes in bargaining legislation. We need changes in the operation of the competition legislation. I was pleased to read the remarks of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) in the debate yesterday spelling out some of the changes which are necessary in these areas.

When we can convince the public that there is a will on the part of organized labour to curb its tendencies to self-interest—some will call it greed—and procedures to accompany it, we shall be in a position to move fairly fast to phase out controls. Parliament itself should be convinced that it will not mean another expensive round of inflation and that the poor and unprotected will not once again be, as it were, in open season for big business and big labour. Further evidence is yet required that there is an adequate change of heart or attitude on the part of those involved. For these reasons I urge the minister to plan the phasing out of controls, but to do so slowly, bearing in mind the considerations I have mentioned.

There has been discussion about a consultative forum involving labour, business, and government. Those discussions have gone on for many years in different forms, with different variations in the concept. I hope that they are successful. I think that the chance of their being successful today is perhaps a bit greater than it has been over the last number of years.

● (2150)

The question then arises as to what kind of authority or what kind of power such a group should have, if any. I would just suggest to the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Labour and others who are working on that kind of an approach, that in all cases the final decisions relative to the Canadian economy should be made by the members of this House of Commons. This parliament should ratify the authority that is being considered for that consultative forum. I hope that when the Minister of Finance does decide to set a definite date to phase out controls he will be in a position to assure Canadians that he does have some measures in place to try to prevent a repetition of the kind of situation we were in as a nation, along with others, in the summer and fall of 1975 when we implemented this program. I, along with many others who have spoken, would be happy to see the end of controls just as soon as possible. However, I do not believe we have arrived at that point yet.

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) stated the clear case for the need for this debate when he very succinctly pointed out, as reported at page 6807 of Hansard:

> There is no good time for removing controls, but this may be the best opportunity we shall have for a long time. As others have said, our production is at 80 per cent of potential, one million are unemployed, but many forces at work in the economy militate against another wage and price explosion.

In addition, it is now clear that controls, far from being the solution, are part of the problem. The government's recent paper "Agenda for Co-operation" acknowledges this situation with its somewhat vague comments on decontrol and post-controls.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) in his remarks in this debate made this specific reference to food prices:

> Aided by reductions in food prices at first, and the food price reduction was important and significant, the rate of price increase has come down.

He added:

> It is fair to point out in connection with food prices that 60 per cent of the cost of the food going through to the consumer, at the retail level, is made up of the cost of processing, packaging, transporting and retailing, and the anti-inflation program was effective in restraining those cost increases so that the real cuts in prices were passed along to consumers.

I wish to deal specifically with those "real cuts in prices", or that other 40 per cent, that the minister suggests is the farmer-producer share of food costs. The minister and his colleagues in cabinet are suggesting the Anti-Inflation Board and the controls policy have been successful in holding down food price increases without the necessity of applying controls to primary agricultural products, which of course were excluded from the first. I suggest, however, that many farm commodity prices were effectively kept down by other means. Cattle and beef are a good example, and are the best indication that if food, notably beef, prices were indeed restrained in 1976 this restraint was at the direct expense of Canada's beef cattle industry. You might say that we, the beef producers of Canada—only about 2 per cent of the total population—gave the party. Today, half way through 1977, our total food cost is the lowest ever in terms of per capita disposable income, and you may be sure beef made a major contribution to the validity of that statement.

Let us examine some 1976 cattle and beef background facts. We reached our Canadian peak cattle population in September, 1975, and then the big cow sell down started, and extended right through all of 1976 and through the first quarter of 1977. This number reduction still continues, but at a reduced rate. It continues due to earlier severe drought conditions and general unprofitability in our cattle industry.

During the first quarter of 1976 there had been clear signs of a modest recovery in our Canadian cattle markets, with price rises of $5 to $7 per hundredweight. But for the remaining three quarters of 1976 disaster was allowed by this government to strike, not by action but by inaction, when a 60 per cent increase in offshore beef imports was allowed over the previous year, for a total of 188.5 million pounds. That is the equivalent of 535,000 live Canadian cows. By comparison we only marketed 600,000 Canadian cows in 1973 and 1974.

But here is the significant fact: that 60 per cent increase in offshore imports was allowed to come on to our markets on top of the largest domestic supply of beef in Canada's history. Furthermore, these imports were allowed to enter Canada at prices discounted 25 cents to 31 cents per pound below similar offshore shipments to the United States. This situation finally resulted in the infamous "six cent under rule" agreed to by industry, trade and commerce, and agriculture. That was a disgraceful sellout by the government of our beef trading rights.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being ten o'clock p.m. it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and to put forthwith the question necessary to dispose of the motion now before the House. The question is on the motion. All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Stevens), which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare the motion lost.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED COVER-UP OF BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Leave having been granted to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) to move the adjournment of the House pursuant to Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the clear possibility of a conspiracy concerning the concealment of evidence or the failure to take appropriate action pertaining to the illegal break-in by three police officers at l'Agence de Presse Libre on the night of October 6-7, 1972, accordingly the motion is as follows: It is moved by Mr. Broadbent, seconded by Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

That this House do now adjourn.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the motion we are debating at this late hour I consider to be, in terms of its subject matter, one of the most serious that has ever been before the House of Commons in the history of our country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Already we are getting howls from the other side, presumably from those who are quite indifferent to the principle of the rule of law. We will see if, after my comments and those of other hon. members on this side of the House, their arrogant dismissal of that concern remains as firmly established as it is now.

The matter has two important aspects directly concerning the illegal break-in that took place at l'Agence de Presse Libre on the night of October 6-7, 1972. First it refers to "the clear possibility of a conspiracy concerning the concealment of evidence" pertaining to that break-in by three police officers. Second, it refers to "the failure to take appropriate action" concerning the same break-in. Each of these is important; each is serious.

A normal break-in in our country, that is, one by ordinary citizens of the land, is serious enough.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If there are hon. members who wish to converse with each other they may want to do so behind the curtain in order to allow the hon. member to be heard.

Mr. Broadbent: When the break-in is the result of deliberate planning and organization by Canada's police forces at every level, however—federal, provincial and municipal—it should cause every Canadian deep concern precisely because it involves the very people we hire to enforce the law, the very people who are there allegedly to protect our persons and property. Therefore my accusation about conspiracy, which was not made lightly, to conceal evidence or to fail to take appropriate action in such a serious situation, is also a matter that ought to be of deep concern to all Canadians devoted to liberty and to the principle of the rule of law in our country.

I regret to say that the statement made today by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) did nothing to cast doubt on the accuracy of the two-part motion which I submitted yesterday. Indeed this afternoon's statement confirmed and underlined its essential truth. I want to deal with that, Mr. Speaker.

The matter refers to the deliberate concealment of information at relevant times by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and the failure to take appropriate action when it was required by the Minister of Supply and Services at the time of the break-in in Montreal when he was solicitor general, by his successor, and by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself. If anything is certain from the minister's speech this afternoon, it is that he has confirmed those conclusions which I originally drew from the statement the present Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) made in this House last Friday. I now want to say precisely why I feel as strongly tonight in reasserting the accuracy of the contents of that motion as I did when I made the motion itself.

First let me deal with the issue of concealment of evidence by the RCMP. Let me outline the scenario of events which make this conclusion inescapable.

We had the break-in on October 6-7, 1972, by three police forces in Canada; a disgraceful act. On October 10, 1972, RCMP headquarters in Ottawa were informed by the RCMP in Montreal that the RCMP had participated in this illegal break-in. Mr. Speaker, it is at this point that we get the first act of irresponsible concealment by the RCMP in Ottawa. Surely when they heard from their own office in Montreal about the violation of the Criminal Code of Canada by the RCMP it should have been brought to the attention of the minister immediately; it was not.

On October 12, 1972, the then minister of justice in Quebec, Mr. Choquette, denied in public that there was any police involvement in the break-in. He categorically said that the three policemen representing the city of Montreal, the province of Quebec and all the people of Canada in the RCMP, were not involved in that break-in. At the very time Mr. Choquette was making that public declaration, RCMP officials in Ottawa knew it was false.

It is therefore at this point that we get the second clear illustration of concealment of relevant information by the RCMP headquarters in Ottawa. They did not inform the then minister of justice of the province of Quebec that what he was saying to the people of our country was false. They did not say that the minister of justice in one of our provinces was misinforming Canadians from coast to coast about the behaviour of three of their police forces. They remained silent. Mr. Speaker, that can only be described as a conspiracy of silence. I say that seriously and, I think, accurately.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Then, when a registered letter from the groups affected by the illegal break-in arrived at the office of the then solicitor general on October 11, it was sent off to the RCMP to be answered. After two weeks, on October 26, the RCMP sent a letter to the then executive assistant of the solicitor general recommending what can only be described as an extraordinarily irresponsible course of action: The recommendation that came to the then Solicitor General of Canada from the RCMP was that an accusation made about illegal involvement, illegal activity of the RCMP, should not even be acknowledged. Surely this is a clear dereliction of responsibility on the part of RCMP headquarters in Ottawa.

Finally at a meeting on November 6, 1972, with the minister, held to discuss the "no acknowledgement" recommendation, if I understand the purpose of that meeting, it appears that once again the RCMP neglected its duty. According to the then minister, and this is not refuted by the RCMP, the past commissioner of the RCMP did not even in the discussion of the letter making the accusation, tell the minister that the RCMP itself had taken part in the break-in and had indeed broken the law. That, surely, is perhaps the most shocking and disturbing culmination of a series of acts of irresponsibility.

● (2240)

There was a meeting with the minister to discuss a recommendation, an irresponsible recommendation which the minister did not even acknowledge. There was a letter sent by innocent Canadians making allegations about a break-in. There was in that meeting no acknowledgement by the minister himself that the RCMP was involved and had broken the law. The only qualification one can make to this last, sad statement is the claim made by Mr. Higgitt and Mr. Starnes, that they "Would be surprised if they had not verbally" advised the then solicitor general of the break-in. In passing, I must say I find it strange that neither Mr. Starnes no Mr. Higgitt can recall with greater precision whether a verbal briefing was made on this point.

Mr. Woolliams: It is a case of bad memories.

Mr. Broadbent: Clearly, there is more than one person around with a bad memory. It seems strange to me that the statement provided by the present Solicitor General should link the two men together with an assertion that they seem to recall that it would have been normal practice for them to have briefed the minister verbally, but neither one of them remembers with a greater degree of precision whether the briefing actually took place. Surely the matter needs further investigation.

In any case, the general picture of RCMP headquarters irresponsibility concerning this break-in ought to be abundantly clear by now. They tried all along the way, from October 10 to November 2—I beg your pardon, I should have said November 6—to conceal the criminal act in which their own members were involved.

I come now to ministerial responsibility, the second part of the matter now before the House.

Mr. Woolliams: You mean ministerial irresponsibility.

Mr. Broadbent: I want, in discussing this point, to refer not only to the present Minister of Supply and Services, the former solicitor general, and to the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand) his successor, but also to the Prime Minister. Both the Prime Minister and the present successor of the Minister of Supply and Services have been neglected in this catalogue of failure up to this point, and something needs to be said about both.

Let me begin with this point. The procedure for dealing with complaints about the RCMP is shockingly disgraceful, as was described by the present minister and his predecessors and documented in the case of the break-in at l'Agence de Presse Libre in October, 1972. The procedure illustrates in the clearest possible way that, when dealing with complaints about the RCMP, we are dealing with a situation in which a person is asked to be judge of his own case, and I want to show precisely what I mean by that. The letter which arrived in the then minister's office in which an allegation was made, even if it was in the form of a question, in October, 1972, was not referred to the senior civil servants of the minister's department to be dealt with, or some other body apart from the RCMP, to be dealt with. No. As soon as the letter arrived it was shuffled off by the minister's executive assistant to the RCMP.

The letter, which was alleging the most serious kind of wrongdoing on the part of the RCMP, was sent off to the RCMP; they were to draft the reply to it. That is the procedure which existed in the then solicitor general's department for dealing with complaints about the RCMP. Surely such a procedure is basically, fundamentally wrong. That, at least, has since been admitted.

Second, I want to say something about the letter dated October 26 and sent to the then minister's executive assistant recommending, incredibly, that the solicitor general should not even acknowledge the letter sent to him by those innocent Canadians inquiring if the RCMP was involved in the break-in. Mr. Speaker, the letter of October 26 sent to the executive assistant of the then solicitor general was discussed at the meeting of November 6; and at that meeting, taking part in the discussion, was the former commissioner of the RCMP, Mr. Higgitt, and Mr. John Starnes, head of security services. Mr. Speaker, outsiders may still have reasonable grounds for doubting if the minister was told by the RCMP of their own involvement.

Unfortunately, there are still reasonable grounds for doubt, and I say this for this reason: Last December, as I said earlier today, during a long interview with a responsible reporter working for a Vancouver newspaper, the minister said he could not remember at all with precision whether he had been told. Since then his memory has sharpened and he now says clearly he remembers that he was not told. And there is some reason for fair-minded persons having doubt. However, both Mr. Starnes and Mr. Higgitt imply that there was a verbal briefing.

Indeed the current issue of Maclean's magazine which went on sale in the streets today contains a statement reportedly made by Mr. Higgitt, in which he refuses to comment on the honesty of the then solicitor general's statement. Mr. Higgitt is quoted in the issue of Maclean's magazine which went on sale in the streets today as saying, "I don't want to deal with that," the "that" referring to the honesty of the former solicitor general's statement that he was not informed at the November 6 meeting of the break-in. I say in all seriousness that there is reason for saying that Canadians, whether in the opposition, on the government side of the House, or outside politics entirely, still have reason to doubt the statement the former solicitor general made in the House this afternoon. In any case what is beyond all doubt, in my view, is that the minister's behaviour at the time was totally inadequate in that he did not ask the perfectly relevant, perfectly sensible question of Mr. Starnes and Mr. Higgitt at the time, namely, "Did you or did you not"—with reference to the RCMP—"take part in the raid in Montreal on the night of October 6-7, 1972?"

Mr. Goyer: It is so easy to say.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid it is an important matter of judgment, and in politics we all make judgments. The minister says it is so easy to say. I am not sure it is easy to say. It is certainly a judgment which I reached. I like to think that if I had been in that position it would have been the most elementary, straightforward question which would have occurred to me.

Mr. Goyer: Tough luck.

Mr. Broadbent: I say this particularly since the minister said this afternoon that when the RCMP recommended that he should not reply to a letter which arrived in his office concerning the break-in, it was the first time he had received such a recommendation from the RCMP. If I heard his answer correctly in the House this afternoon, that is indeed what the minister said. Never before had the RCMP recommended to him that he not reply to a letter. If I got such a recommendation, particularly for the first time, it would occur to me to ask why ought I not to reply to the serious allegations. If nothing else prompted me to ask the question, that would have done it.

● (2250)

I want to go further and talk about other examples of inappropriate action or no action at all. On March 16 of last year as a result of RCMP Constable Samson's testimony, the then solicitor general, the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, learned, he said, of the break-in for the first time. Also, the Minister of Supply and Services learned of the break-in for the first time.

What did the minister of last year do when he heard that the RCMP were involved in an illegal break-in? When he heard on the basis of testimony given by an RCMP constable in court that there was illegal activity by the RCMP, what steps did the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development take?

What the minister did was offer the full co-operation of the RCMP with the Quebec inquiry which was under way into this situation. Second, he spoke to the Prime Minister and informed him of this illegal break-in. Regretfully, neither the minister nor the Prime Minister did anything else at that time of any significance. More specifically, they did not initiate a serious internal inquiry into the whole sorry situation which, as I have shown, reveals at best shocking neglect by the then solicitor general and cover-up action by the RCMP at the highest levels.

A year ago when the Prime Minister and the immediate past solicitor general learned of the illegal activity, they sat down with the present Minister of Supply and Services and had a chat. I am not sure what each said to the other.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The rule states 20 minutes for all speakers. Is it agreed that the hon. member have extra time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is so ordered.

Mr. Broadbent: I appreciate the consideration of hon. members and I shall do my best not to abuse it.

At some point we learned that they had a meeting with each other and with senior officials from the RCMP. However, they did not set up the kind of internal inquiry I would have thought would have been self-evident as being necessary for those who were concerned with the principle that the RCMP should not only enforce the law of Canada but obey the law like everyone else.

Surely the former solicitor general should have made such a proposal at that time to the Prime Minister. If he did not, the Prime Minister on his own initiative last March should have started such an internal inquiry into the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The Prime Minister told me yesterday in the question period that, following the Samson revelations last March, what he did was meet with the present and former Solicitors General and did nothing else. That was as recent as yesterday's question period. Nothing that the present Solicitor General said in his presentation in the House last Friday, or in the statement this afternoon by the Minister of Supply and Services, suggests that the Prime Minister and the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development did anything more than this.

Just in case someone makes an irrelevant point that they considered a public inquiry at that time and dismissed it, I want to say that is not what I am talking about. That would have been necessary and desirable. They should have proceeded with that public inquiry. If they rejected the public inquiry for the spurious reasons given here in the last couple of days, they should have at least had an internal inquiry to find out what was wrong. They should have found out if it was at the level of former Commissioner Higgitt that a cover-up was taking place. Instead they sat out the whole process.

We have here a sad mess indeed. We have law breaking and concealment by the RCMP, an institution which Canadians from coast to coast and of every age have grown up to admire, an institution composed in the main by men and women overwhelmingly committed to honesty and decency.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Unfortunately there is this serious blotch on their record. At the same time we have a government that has at best been incompetent. The minister of the time failed to ask the relevant question. When his successor learned of the criminal activity, he did not initiate an internal inquiry. When the Prime Minister learned last March that something was wrong involving criminal activity in the RCMP, he did nothing about it. It is clear that what we need at this point in the proceedings following the Solicitor General's speech last Friday and the former solicitor general's question of privilege today is a public inquiry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: We need a public inquiry to determine the exact degree of wrongdoing by the RCMP. I am reluctant to have to emphasize this point, but we have had brought before this House, most notably by members in the Conservative party, a number of cases, involving many cities and provinces in this country, of RCMP involvement which clearly suggests the possibility of wrongdoing.

We do not know if the case of the break-in in Montreal is an isolated incident. We need an inquiry to clear up this situation so that Canadians will know whether it is an isolated incident or a general pattern. We need an inquiry to look at the political responsibility at the time to clear up in an unequivocal fashion whether the former solicitor general knew only what he says he knew or if, because of statements made by Mr. Higgitt, Mr. Starnes and others, he knew more and has forgotten in the period that has since elapsed.

On behalf of my party I have called for this inquiry for some time. I regret to say after listening to the ministers that the strong desire of all Canadians to maintain the principles of liberty, and particularly the principle of the rule of law, still makes it absolutely essential that the call for the public inquiry be agreed to by the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (2300)

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is well known to this House that there is not a wide range of questions upon which the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) and I are in complete agreement, or on which both parties are in complete agreement. But we are in complete agreement now with regard to the need for a full public inquiry to remove the stain of suspicion which is creeping over the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, a force which throughout its long history has earned the respect of Canadians, and the stain of self-perpetuating suspicion which spreads over the government not only in this case but in too many cases of this kind where its conduct has been called into question and where the response has been to seek to avoid inquiries and instead settle matters by intimate conversations within the cabinet in an attempt to keep from public view information which the public has a right to know.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I would hope there would be some members on the government side who care enough about the reputation of the police forces of this country, who care enough about the principle of ministerial responsibility, who care enough about the rule of law and about the reputations of their own colleagues, individually and collectively, that they too will put aside partisanship and join us in the demand for a public inquiry which will let the facts of this case be known.

I have to say that one of the most offensive aspects of the statement on privilege made today by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) was the cloying tribute he paid to the RCMP when he said, in effect, that he did not ask the questions he should have asked because he could not believe the RCMP would ever do such a thing. In effect the minister was saying he would speak no evil of the RCMP. He went on, being entirely consistent: he would speak no evil, his actions showed he would hear no evil, and that he would see no evil. He has brought to the House of Commons today, unfortunately supported by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), an entirely new, meaningless, and unacceptable concept of ministerial responsibility. In effect he told the House he is responsible only for what he knows, that he will go to any length at all to know as little as possible. That, Mr. Speaker, flies in the face of the principle of ministerial responsibility. It is unacceptable to the House, and it should be unacceptable to ministers and to members generally of the party opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The leader of the New Democratic Party has reviewed most of the chronology of events but I want to address myself to some of the questions which remain to be asked.

We want to know why the minister was not advised. Was it, and this is a legitimate question, because he arranged not to be advised? Was it because the RCMP did not trust him sufficiently to advise him? Would it be the case that if we had a chance to hear the testimony of Mr. Higgitt and Mr. Starnes we would learn that he was in fact advised to a greater degree than he claims to have been advised? We do not know. We have the word of the minister. But we do not have the word of the others involved and, if the government has its way, we shall be denied the right to hear from the others who were involved and they, in turn, will be denied the right to defend themselves, to defend their reputations, to tell their part of a story which goes to the root of responsible government in this country.

The government House leader is in the Chamber and I want to pay him the tribute of making at least a passing reference to the spurious argument he raised again today, as he does so often with such great vigour whenever the government is in trouble, by suggesting that the only way in which there could be an investigation was if some member of parliament were to lay a charge. The minister well knows that the problem here is precisely that we do not have evidence on which we can lay charges. What we do have here is a situation which, on the face of it, raises questions which any responsible government would wish to be answered privately and publicly.

This matter, as the House knows, was first raised a year or more ago by my friend, the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). The government has tried consistently to cover it up, to push it aside, to avoid inquiries, to put forward its own versions by way of statements by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox), or statements such as we heard today as to what happened. But inconvenient facts still stand out and demand explanation; sometimes taken together and sometimes singly they cry out for an inquiry.

I want to go over some of the problems which remain for all of us who are serious about the reputation of the police, about the reputation of government, about the reputation of our institutions. One of them relates to the remaining contradictions arising from just what was said at that meeting on November 6, 1972, between the then minister of supply and services, Commissioner Higgitt, and Security Services Director Starnes. Today the minister simply repeated the statements made by the Solicitor General on Friday. He categorically—that was his word—denies being told about the illegal break-in at that meeting. Neither Mr. Higgitt nor Mr. Starnes remembers telling the minister about it but, as was made clear by the Solicitor General, they do say they would be surprised if they had not done so verbally. I think it would be very difficult to conceive of a more direct way, in the circumstances, by which these two gentlemen could call into question the testimony of the then solicitor general than to use the language which was quoted by his successor in his statement on Friday.

This was, and still is, centrally, an issue of credibility. Who is right? Is it the minister who flatly denies being told, or two senior public officials who say they would be surprised if they had not told him? I believe this becomes more urgent in the light of the comment by Mr. Higgitt in today's Maclean's magazine that he will not deal with a question related to the veracity of the Minister of Supply and Services. We in the House of Commons, and the people generally, should be in a position to judge these questions, to judge the actions of the police. But we have no way in which to judge even the relative weight we should attach to these contradictory positions. There are no depositions, no sworn statements, no evidence under oath.

What we have is a direct statement from the Minister of Supply and Services which, it is true, is a step forward from the Solicitor General simply reporting what the Minister of Supply and Services told him. But as to Mr. Starnes' and Mr. Higgitt's version of that meeting we still have only the Solicitor General's report of what they had to say.

The Minister of Supply and Services insists, of course, that we accept his version although he and his colleagues seem determined to ensure that we shall have no opportunity to hear directly from Mr. Higgitt or from Mr. Starnes—the only way in which we can hear directly from them is through a public inquiry. By insisting that we accept his version of what took place the minister is, in effect, making very serious charges against Mr. Higgitt and Mr. Starnes. He is casting doubt upon their assertion that they would be surprised if they had not told him and, more seriously, is accusing them of a serious dereliction of duty by failing to tell him about the break-in. They deserve the right to reply so that the whole story of what went on in that conversation and in that relationship might be heard. That is one of the inconsistencies between the positions of Mr. Higgitt and Mr. Starnes and the then solicitor general.

● (2310)

Another very important question which remains wide open has to do with the holes in the explanation of the Minister of Supply and Services as to why he never asked whether the RCMP had in fact engaged in an illegal break-in. By his own statements the Minister of Supply and Services admits he had had several briefings—not one, not a rare briefing, but several briefings—in regard to RCMP surveillance of the APLQ, and that he had had those briefings before the break-in. Therefore he was well aware of the interest of the force in this organization.

He also had a letter from the APLQ asking specifically whether the RCMP had been involved. Despite all that, despite his knowledge that there had been surveillance, and despite the receipt of a letter alleging involvement by the RCMP, he tells us that he never asked the most obvious question of Messrs. Higgitt and Starnes. He never even asked: "Were you gentlemen in fact involved?"

What were his reasons? He said his first reason was: "I found it hard to believe the RCMP could have participated in an illegal break-in". That is one of the most gentle ways of asking the police, of asking the public service, to carry the can for something a minister should have done.

The second reason of this minister interested in evidence was that he had seen in the press the statement by the then minister of justice of the province of Quebec, Mr. Choquette, denying any police involvement. On those very slim grounds the minister now asks us to believe that he was justified in not even asking what the RCMP, whom he knew to be investigating the APLQ, knew about the break-in.

This explanation begs another question. If the minister was so sure that the RCMP were not involved, that he did not feel any need to raise the question, why did he not respond to the letter? Surely, with all the certainty that he felt in the matter, he should have been eager to lift any suspicion from the force by giving the APLQ a flat and inequivocal answer to their inquiry. But he did not do that. What the minister is saying, then, is that he was so sure of the situation that he did not even ask. But he was not sure enough to answer a simple and direct question from the agency whose premises had been broken into.

The other matter brought out under questioning by my colleague from Central Nova this afternoon has to do with the extraordinary fact that the minister himself admitted today that this was the only occasion on which he had received instructions from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police not to answer a letter, not to act in that way. If this was such an extraordinary action, why did he not ask the simple question: "Why are you suggesting that I act in this way?" That is a question which is wide open and which the minister has not addressed. Any minister who honoured his responsibility to the people of Canada would have said: "Gentlemen, you are asking me to deviate from procedure. Why? What is going on here?" But this curiously uncurious minister did not even ask that question.

We have here as well a whole new concept of ministerial responsibility. We witnessed again this week both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Supply and Services asserting a concept of ministerial responsibility which runs completely counter to established practice under our parliamentary system. Put in its simplest form, this Goyer-Trudeau doctrine is that a minister is responsible only for those matters with which he was directly involved or had direct knowledge of. It also appears to be an implicit part of this doctrine that, on potentially embarrassing problems, ministers should go to extraordinary lengths to avoid any direct knowledge.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Bystanders.

Mr. Clark: That is right. They do not want to be responsible ministers; they want to be bystanders so they can get out of the way when the flak comes. That makes a mockery of our parliamentary system. Only this week, in ruling that members could not direct questions on this subject to the Minister of Supply and Services, Mr. Speaker set forth as established practice the doctrine that a minister is answerable for all matters that fall under this portfolio, whether or not he knows directly about them, or indeed whether they occurred before he became the responsible minister. It was on that basis that the present Solicitor General was responsible for answering questions in regard to events which occurred some four years before he assumed that portfolio. Yet the Minister of Supply and Services refuses to accept responsibility for events which occurred while he was solicitor general of Canada and, indeed, about which he had a least partial knowledge, because he admits to having known, in advance of the break-in, about the RCMP surveillance of the APLQ offices.

The fact is that in claiming that he knew nothing of these matters, and in asking no questions about them, the Minister of Supply and Services is as guilty of gross ministerial negligence as he would have been had he counselled and approved of the illegal break-in.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Ministers of the Crown just cannot have it both ways. They are quite prepared to accept responsibility for all of the positive things that government departments do. They will go forward and claim credit at the drop of a hat. But ministerial responsibility applies not just to the popular things that a government does; it applies also to the less popular and less positive things that a government does. It applies to mistakes or to errors by officials who are totally dependent upon their ministers to speak for them in parliament.

It is simply not acceptable under our system for a minister to slough off responsibility to senior officers of the RCMP. To say that he did not know and, even worse, to offer the House the lamest explanation of why he never asked, is no excuse at all. The minister must accept responsibility for the break-in. That is what ministerial responsibility is all about. He must accept responsibility for the cover-up. And he should not, as he has on too many occasions, let senior public servants, in this case police officers, carry the can for his negligence and then deny them a hearing.

Mr. Goyer: Carry the can for their mistake.

Mr. Clark: The minister says "carry the can for their mistake". That is precisely the point. If they made a mistake—and it is not clear whether it was his mistake or their mistake—then under our system of government it is the minister who is responsible. That is what ministerial responsibility means.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Take it like a man, Goyer, not a jellyfish.

Mr. Clark: The minister shakes his head. We can only presume that the reason he was in Africa these last several weeks was not simply to avoid questioning in this House; perhaps there was something going on in his present department that he did not want to know about and for which he does not want to take responsibility.

An hon. Member: Make a charge.

Mr. Clark: The charge I will make is that that is completely consistent with the absolutely inadequate concept of ministerial responsibility which has become the hallmark of this government and, unfortunately, become the hallmark of that particular minister.

Parliament and the people of Canada need a public inquiry into this matter. We need a federal public inquiry. The Prime Minister has argued against a federal inquiry on a variety of grounds which are either irrelevant, invalid, or both.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Mazankowski: Iona Campagnolo said no.

Mr. Railton: I said no.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Is there unanimous consent of the House for the hon. Leader of the Opposition to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Not only do they refuse an inquiry, they refuse debate.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should have preferred to hear the last remarks of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and ascertain also the position of other hon. members of the opposition—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) has the floor. It is a long night, and I am prepared to stay all night.

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: —also the position of other hon. members of the opposition. Mr. Speaker, I should have thought that we were interested, during this special debate in Parliament, in trying to shed as much light as possible on the events which took place in 1972. Last week I made a statement which I felt was quite complete, and the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) made today a statement under his oath of office not only as a member of parliament but also as a minister of the Crown. Following this, there was a question period during which the minister replied to all the questions, although he was under no obligation to do so under our Standing Orders. He made himself willingly available to reply to the questions of the opposition.

Unfortunately, for a reason which I cannot fathom, Mr. Speaker, the opposition decided for a good part of the afternoon to neglect this opportunity, which was ideal in my opinion, to ask the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) all the questions they could have put to him. Instead of asking him specific questions, instead of clarifying the debate, which I would have hoped deeply, and I am convinced that the present Minister of Supply and Services agreed with me, instead of using this time which was made available to them, they decided to resort to procedural arguments and the worst kind of political partisanship.

Mr. Broadbent: Who did?

Mr. Fox: Unfortunately, some members of the opposition. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that my comments do not apply at all to the leader of the New Democratic Party who constantly took advantage of the time at his disposal to ask extremely relevant questions. I do not agree with his conclusions but, obviously, it goes without saying that the leader of the New Democratic Party did use those moments made available to him to get as much information as possible.

Unfortunately the debate is apparently becoming an exercise in political partisanship. We should rather try to determine what really happened a few years ago. Nevertheless I would be remiss if I did not make some remarks on the theory of ministerial responsibility which the Leader of the Opposition has just exposed to the House. I have great respect for the Leader of the Opposition and I know he is a man who really cares for the interests of our parliamentary institutions. Still I think I can disagree with him on his notion of ministerial responsibility. I think the notion he has put forward to the House tonight is a very traditional one, which may be the historical concept enunciated, for instance, in 1867, by Mr. Walter Bagehot. In my opinion, there has nevertheless been a certain evolution in government institutions since 1867. Likewise, there has certainly been some evolution in the concept of ministerial responsibility.

I certainly cannot believe that, for example, were a customs officer caught red-handed driving under the influence, the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin), my colleague in the House, would have to resign immediately. It seems to me that that concept cannot stand analysis.

An hon. Member: You are going a bit too far.

Mr. Fox: I agree with the hon. member that perhaps I have chosen an unusual example, but I am raising the question quite simply and I feel that maybe if the conclusion he wants to draw were carried to extremes, that comparison might be more valid than he is prepared to admit for the moment.

Mr. Speaker, of course I would not want to recapitulate all the facts mentioned in my statement nor the extremely concrete principles I have put forward last Friday regarding the obligation for the police forces in this country to set an extremely straightforward example and to see to it that all their actions be performed within the standards set by the law. But, I would also like to take this opportunity to point out to the House that the work of the RCMP is extremely difficult and that the RCMP absolutely needs to find again the trust of the Canadian public, which it has deserved for a very long time, it must also have again that of hon. members of this House. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, for some time now, and I say it in all sincerity, we have been witnessing far too much, in my opinion, of that process whereby hon. members come to the House with allegations, without having had the time or opportunity to check them, and throw them at us publicly, in the House of Commons. It seems to me all hon. members here take to heart the reputation of the RCMP which is excellent. That does not mean that errors are not made from time to time, but it goes without saying that hon. members have responsibilities towards Canadian institutions, and one of those duties is to avoid coming to this House and flaunting out, in public allegations that are not founded. Mr. Speaker, I quite agree that it is the duty of any member of parliament, if he has information and evidence indicating that illegal actions have been committed, to bring the facts to the attention of those who exercise responsibilities and if the latter do not take the necessary measures, it is their duty, Mr. Speaker, and I would be the first one to agree on that, to raise this issue in public. However, Mr. Speaker, I think that their duty goes beyond mere public disclosing of this kind of information, I should not say information but allegations, because in several instances, as we have witnessed for some time, allegations of illegal actions involving the RCMP have been thrown on the floor of this House and hon. members are quite aware that some of the allegations cannot be sustained and I have submitted reports to the House to that effect. Despite those reports submitted to the House, Mr. Speaker, despite the fact that certain of these allegations have led to inquiry by independent police forces, despite the fact that at least in one case, these allegations have been brought to the attention of a Crown prosecutor in another province, namely the province of Ontario, in which members seem to put their trust even if they do not put much trust in other provinces, despite the fact that the prosecutor from Ontario said there was no ground for suggesting a criminal act had been committed, this kind of allegation is still made in this House, and the integrity of the RCMP is still being attacked without any legitimate grounds, Mr. Speaker. This practice is certainly very serious indeed and hon. members of the opposition must surely bear the blame for it.

● (2330)

I accept the fact Mr. Speaker that hon. members on the other side of this House care to defend the RCMP just like us from the cabinet who believe that we obviously are duty bound not only to see to it that mistakes be corrected but also that the RCMP be defended when groundless allegations are made against this police force. And if they really want, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Clark) was saying and I have no reason to question his good faith, if they really want to make some statements on the RCMP, which is one of the best police forces in the western world, I really agree at this point, Mr. Speaker, that the corollary must surely be that hon. members on the other side also partake in a duty, the responsibility of behaving as responsible citizens and not abusing their privileges as members of parliament.

Well, Mr. Speaker, some parts of the statement have also been used to imply a concealment or, to use the same word as the New Democratic leader (Mr. Broadbent), a cover-up.

I for one think, Mr. Speaker, that the real question is what the inquiry commission of the Quebec government has been ordered to study. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the then RCMP commissioner and the security service director could certainly believe in all good faith that, if the matter was investigated by the Montreal police, the inquiry would proceed and that charges would eventually be made. I think, Mr. Speaker, that by giving an order of reference to its inquiry commission the Quebec justice minister has really determined one of the key points, one of the key questions, which must be determined to know if there really has been conspiracy or not and the question to be answered is why the Montreal police inquiry was ended. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it is a basic point, and on this point as on the others, I firmly intend to cooperate and the RCMP will cooperate with the Quebec justice department in their inquiry to determine this point.

The opposition leader and the New Democratic Party leader have told us of the necessity of a public inquiry. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, we all agree there is now a public inquiry and it is being carried out in the province of Quebec. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear any objections in this House when the province of Alberta, for example, decided to set up an inquiry and to summon the RCMP to appear so as to establish whether there had been illegal action committed in the course of an operation related to the Royal American Road Shows matter. No objections are raised when it is the government of Alberta, Mr. Speaker. Here is another example: When the New Brunswick government decides to open an inquiry and to investigate on the activities of the RCMP in their province, the opposition does not ask for an inquiry at the federal level. But when the province of Quebec makes an inquiry, Mr. Speaker, despite the position always maintained by the opposition leader, a position which seems supported by many provincial premiers to the effect that there should be more decentralization across the country, then he seems to forget his principles to say that the administration of the law in Canada has nothing to do with the provinces, or perhaps that it has nothing to do with the province of Quebec, because in the case of Alberta and New Brunswick I have never heard any opposition to such an inquiry at that level.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to determine whether the minister would give us the guarantee or would accept a question as to whether he or his colleagues in the government will appear before the provincial inquiry in Quebec, the terms of reference of which are so limited as to prohibit them from inquiring into the question which is at issue in the House tonight.

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) for his intervention. I realize, of course, that he did not answer my statement on his position concerning the centralization of justice administration which is obviously an experiment, a very new proposal and undoubtedly a most original contribution to the constitutional debates which are now going on in this country. Needless to say, the Leader of the Opposition has every opportunity in the oral question period to ask questions and nothing prevents him from doing so. He could very well have asked that question this afternoon to the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer). Of course, members opposite understand only "yes" and "no": if I may play on words, there is not enough gray matter in the opposition to see things otherwise than in black and white.

Mr. Speaker, altogether, I hope that the House will come quickly to the facts, to what happened and to actions which should be taken now. The leader of the opposition and the leader of the New Democratic Party have stated that we should have a public inquiry. But, all things considered, there is already a public inquiry under way in the province of Quebec. I pointed out in the statement I made in the House that our intention was to offer our full co-operation to this public inquiry. Some hon. members on the other side said that we must have a federal inquiry because we cannot place the fate of the RCMP in the hands of an inquiry commission established by the government of Quebec. Obviously, they are already making some distinction regarding the government of the province of Quebec which is part of our confederation and enjoy powers under our present constitution. The hon. member is right when he says that I am responsible for the RCMP and I totally agree with that. Both the leader of the opposition and the leader of the New Democratic Party seem to suggest that we should have a federal public inquiry apparently because they think that it would put an end to the Quebec inquiry.

Mr. Speaker, if we establish an inquiry at the federal level this will not have the effect of cancelling the current inquiry in the province of Quebec. Under the present Constitution, they are responsible for the administration of justice in their province; they are responsible for the enforcement and implementation of the Criminal Code in their province and their investigation will obviously be maintained whether the federal government makes an inquiry or not. Furthermore, they will have the right to issue subpoena. I understand the Leader of the Opposition has three frontbenchers who are former provincial attorneys general. I think these attorneys general would agree with me that this commission of inquiry in Quebec would have the jurisdiction to issue subpoena and to summon the people who are necessary to clarify the situation to appear before them.

I fail to see, Mr. Speaker, why that process should be set aside. It goes without saying, Mr. Speaker, as I already said in my statement to the House of Commons last Friday, that we are going to cooperate with that commission. The only thing that I may say to qualify that assertion is that I have no intention of allowing any provincial body, whether it be in New Brunswick, Alberta, British Columbia or Quebec, to take the pretext of a provincial inquiry commission, to make a complete investigation into the activities of the RCMP in Quebec or elsewhere. As to the events surrounding the APLQ, we shall cooperate fully and completely, and I assure the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) of that, but if this is an inquiry that other members and myself would term a fishing expedition, it goes without saying, Mr. Speaker, that there are limits of course to powers of inquiry.

The leader of the New Democratic Party went further and criticized the Prime Minister for certain actions, and I should like to dwell on this matter, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the Opposition suggests that further action should have been taken in 1976. On this point, Mr. Speaker, I gave to the house a detailed explanation about the position taken by Parliament in 1976. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the action taken by the government in 1976 was based on the legal opinion given by the law officers of the Crown who believed that, under the circumstances, the government had to refer the evidence and cooperate with the provincial authorities responsible for criminal law enforcement within their own province. To suggest that something else should have been done, Mr. Speaker, is to suggest that the federal government should ignore the Constitution when it sees fit to do so, that it should completely disregard provincial responsibility as concerns the administration of justice and administer justice itself. Well, the Constitution does not work this way, Mr. Speaker, and I repeat that it is the first time we have heard in this House such an extraordinary suggestion that seems to say that the province of Quebec should not set up an inquiry commission, but that if New Brunswick or Alberta should set up one, nothing will be heard from the other side of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I believe, and my statement is quite explicit on this point, that the government took in 1976 the action required at the time in full cooperating with the Quebec inquiry. The government cooperated fully, no criticism was made about the RCMP, and indeed, the RCMP Commissioner himself met with Quebec authorities in 1976 to reply to all the questions asked by the Quebec investigator. The RCMP always cooperated fully, and the government itself in its instructions to the RCMP, always cooperated fully, Mr. Speaker.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I will merely assure the House, as I have already done in my statement, that we intend to continue to cooperate with provincial authorities so that through the Canadian constitution now in effect, some light may be shed on the matter.

An hon. Member: You are hiding something.

Mr. Fox: An hon. member opposite tells me that we are hiding something. When we say, Mr. Speaker, that we will fully co-operate and that we will see that the RCMP fully cooperates, so that some light may be shed on the four points identified in Mr. Bédard's statement, I think that it is the opposite. Once again, Mr. Speaker, we could hold a board of inquiry—

An hon. Member: What have you got to hide?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Clark: Let him go on.

Some hon. Members: Let him carry on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is there unanimous consent to allow the minister extra time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Epp: Clear the record, Francis.

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for their kindness. Just as the leader of the New Democratic Party, I do not intend to impose on the kindness of hon. members. I should like to say, Mr. Speaker, that most points raised by the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the New Democratic Party have been covered. Those problems were dealt with in the statement I made in the House last Friday.

We were the first ones to admit that the procedure of complaints against the police was inadequate and we have taken the necessary steps to ensure that important changes are made to this system. I believe the leader of the New Democratic Party was perfectly right to say that this procedure was inadequate. The Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) himself has indicated in his statement this afternoon that he felt it was inadequate and that he had made some recommendations which had led to setting up the Marin Commission. I have also clearly stated in my statement in the House that I intended to bring before Parliament during the next session, that is to say this fall, a legislation to implement and put in our statute books the recommendations of the Marin Commission as regards the non-partisan and objective review of complaints lodged against the police.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest those are positive ways to improve the present situation and ensure that this kind of situation does not occur in future. In summary, Mr. Speaker, I think that the statement I made this afternoon and that made by the Minister of Supply and Services himself, under his oath of office, answer all questions which were asked and cast of course a new light over this whole matter. Again, Mr. Speaker, the province which is responsible for the administration of justice, the province of Quebec in this case, has already set up a parliamentary inquiry and we will cooperate in the carrying out of the terms of reference of the commission.

Mr. Speaker, I only want to repeat once more that the steps which are being taken by the government are consistent with their action of 1976 which was to cooperate, to open their files and books to the Quebec investigator, which led to this pre-inquiry, to a conviction and, of course, to the plea of guilty and the sentencing by the judge. In so doing, Mr. Speaker, and here again I emphasize this point, the government was acting pursuant to advice given to them by the law officers of the Crown.

[English]

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, if there is one thing that is obvious today it is that the more the government talks the more everybody in the country realizes that there is only one way to solve the problem which is before us today, and that is with a federal public inquiry where the people who are involved in this affair can face cross-examination and lay all the facts on the table so that the country can judge who is guilty of misconduct, gross inability and negligence as far as the law-abiding citizens of the country are concerned.

No citizen in this country can feel safe as long as this government is allowed to perform the way it has performed today. It is clear that this whole matter is nothing more than a charade, and the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) in his speech moved from the point where no inquiry was required to the point where he is now trying to get the people of this country to settle for the inquiry that the government of the province of Quebec had the good sense to set up because it probably knew that this government would try to stonewall the Canadian people in so far as bringing out the facts of this sordid situation we are discussing here tonight is concerned. It is a national scandal, and the people of this country will settle for nothing less than this government's accepting its responsibilities and setting up an inquiry immediately.

I look to nothing more than the Bible of the Liberal party. There is no paper in this nation which has more consistently supported the Liberal government than the Ottawa Citizen. Its lead editorial tonight is entitled "Cover-up Bomb Ticking". That is the story from the mentors of the Liberal party down the street. This is what that great newspaper says:

> There is, of course, a vast difference between calling for the heads of minor figures in a whitewashed political controversy and getting to the bottom of things.
> NDP Leader Broadbent and Tory Leader Joe Clark have been more than justified in demanding a full-fledged investigation into the activities of the RCMP around the time of the illegal break-in at L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec in 1972.

I will not put the whole editorial on the record, but in conclusion it says the following:

> Francis Fox would be well-advised to disarm this bomb by setting up the necessary investigation.

I want to take hon. members back to the time when this illegal break-in occurred. At that time a general election was in progress. That general election was to be finalized on October 30 of that year. At that time the government across the way saw its majority disappearing quickly. On October 30 the Liberal party dropped from a majority position to 109 seats, and the Progressive Conservative party arrived at the point where it had 107 seats. Let us recall that situation, Mr. Speaker; let us get that atmosphere in place. What was the solicitor general of the day doing at that time? I can tell you one thing: he was probably not around Ottawa very much. More likely he was in the province of Quebec trying to save his seat and the seats of other members in that province.

● (2350)

While the solicitor general of the day, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), had no time to talk to the Commissioner of the RCMP about what was happening in respect of the break-in at the APLQ, it is amazing that he had lots of time to talk to the Commissioner of Penitentiaries who was opposed to certain charges being made by the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack) regarding the situation at Millhaven Penitentiary. As a matter of fact, while the Solicitor General of the day could not talk to the RCMP and could not find out what was going on in a break-in that was news in Quebec where he was at that time, and that was resulting in the press conferences called by the group that was the victim of the illegal break-in, he could go on national television on October 21 and attack the candidate, now the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington. He tried to convince the public that the erosion in the penitentiary service was not as bad as the hon. member had stated in his own press releases, which were in fact confirmed later.

It is amazing that the Minister of Supply and Services could talk to the Commissioner of Penitentiaries without any difficulty but could not find time to talk to the Commissioner of the RCMP about something that was happening in his own province, his own backyard. It was something he knew a great deal about because every day he was listening to what was happening and the way it was being revealed to the people of that province by the people who were the victims of the break-in. It is a strange set of events that was occurring at that time.

This is nothing new or different. We got the same kind of stonewalling and scenario in the judges' affair. If we want to go back further, it is the same story every time in this House. I recall the revelations that led to the Rivard affair. I remember what happened in this House then. I remember very clearly how the minister of justice of that day rejected over and over again every call for an inquiry into that affair. Finally the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) had the courage to stand up in this House and put the facts before the country that resulted in the Dorion inquiry. I would recall to hon. members, in case some of them were not here or some of them cannot remember, some of the results of the Dorion inquiry. An executive assistant had offered a bribe to a lawyer by the name of Lamontagne in the city of Montreal so that bail would not be opposed for a gentleman named Rivard, who was Mafioso all the way, and one of the kings of the drug trade in North America. I remember the results of that. One was the resignation of the minister of justice and another was that the executive assistant in question was jailed for the offence.

Some other things happened that were very important and that apply to what is happening now. I am going to suggest one of them to the present Solicitor General because he seems to be setting up a new set of rules for ministers of the Crown. I am going to refer him to a former Prime Minister who issued a set of rules that members of cabinet should follow and apply in their role as ministers of the Crown. These rules are set out in the book entitled "Vision and Indecision", at page 309 as follows:

> . . . Prime Minister Pearson decided to send every cabinet minister a letter of friendly advice—in which some read an "or else" implication. This letter was leaked to the press and became known as "Pearson's Code of Ethics". It said in part:
> > It is by no means sufficient for a person in the office of a minister—or in any other position in the public service—to act within the law. That goes without saying. Much more is required. There is an obligation not simply to observe the law but to act in a manner so scrupulous that it will bear the closest possible public scrutiny.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: I say to the minister that he cannot stand up to "Pearson's Code of Ethics".

The excerpt continues:

> It has been said that the elementary qualifications demanded of a minister are honesty and incorruptibility. But it is not enough to have those qualities. Our attitudes and conduct must be such as to reflect them.

I say again that the Minister of Supply and Services does not reflect these attitudes in the statement he made in this House today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, the excerpt goes on:

In order that honesty and impartiality may be beyond doubt, members of minister's staffs, equally with ministers themselves, must not place themselves in a position where they are under obligation to any person who might benefit from special consideration or favour on their part . . .

I say to the Minister of Supply and Services that his executive assistant of that day did not meet the qualifications set down by "Pearson's Code of Ethics" either.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I want to put something else on the record. It is very important that we clear the air about certain statements made in relation to questions of privilege, to charges being made, and the sort of gobbledygook that we heard from the government House leader in this Chamber today.

On the occasion of the selective amnesia of the Prime Minister of the day in 1964, when he finally walked into the House of Commons and admitted that he had forgotten that the then minister of justice, Mr. Favreau, had told him on an aircraft of certain revelations, certain things happened. They are set out in the book entitled "Distemper of Our Times" by Peter C. Newman, at page 271 as follows:

● (Midnight)

Asked in the House why he had previously said he had first heard about the case on November 22, Pearson replied lamely, 'I had completely forgotten the earlier conversation.' The opposition moved that the whole matter be sent to the Commons committee on privileges and elections which, in effect, would have constituted a tribunal to determine whether or not the Prime Minister of Canada had lied. The Speaker ruled against this motion and was upheld 122-105.

The point is, no charge was laid. The motion sought to refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. It was not accepted because the government voted against it. But there was none of this phony baloney about charges. It was a matter of straight referral to the committee.

There are 101 questions to be asked, and my leader this evening, in his most responsible, reflective way, placed the issue before the House. He asked for certain answers, but was met with the stonewalling in which the government engages when in trouble. And it is in deep trouble, let there be no doubt about it.

I seldom feel sorry for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), but I felt sorry for the man yesterday when, on coming to this House, he had to defend the Minister of Supply and Services for the third time in a relatively short period. For the third time the Prime Minister had to defend that minister from opposition attacks, and protect his seat. He does not deserve that protection, and this country does not deserve that kind of minister. After the inquiry deals with this matter that minister will not sit on this country's treasury benches. That inquiry will place the blame where it belongs, on the shoulders of the then solicitor general, the present Minister of Supply and Services. That day cannot come too soon.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I will not bore the House by repeating the sad events which followed the disclosure by Corporal Samson of the break-in, but I will deal briefly with the Solicitor General's (Mr. Fox) arguments opposing an inquiry. He said that since a Quebec inquiry is already under way, another inquiry would merely be a duplication. Keep in mind that if this government had done its duty and examined the information available, the Quebec government would not have felt it necessary to call an inquiry. We do not object to the Quebec inquiry, for its calling is entirely consistent with the facts at the disposal of the Quebec government. The real question is, why did this government not call an inquiry before Quebec felt it necessary to call its own inquiry?

Consider what the Quebec inquiry can accomplish. The Solicitor General should have been more forthright in his response to the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). The question is, is Commissioner Higgitt a compellable witness at that hearing? Is the present Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) a compellable witness? Possibly Mr. Starnes is a compellable witness.

The issues which we in this House want to see determined cannot be determined at the Quebec inquiry, which is the biggest red herring anybody has thrown across our path tonight. Its terms of reference would not permit it to inquire into those matters we want clarified. Therefore the inquiry we want would not duplicate the Quebec inquiry.

Second, in this particular case the sentencing judge had access to documents which are probably prohibited under the doctrine of national security, and the Solicitor General has power under section 41(2) to prevent any evidence from being given before any tribunal in this country. In the Quebec case certain matters concerning national security were not made public, and the judge clearly considered them in sentencing. If necessary, at the inquiry we seek, evidence concerning national security could be heard in camera. However, we need an inquiry to examine evidence which, beyond the balance of all probability, shows there has been a cover-up.

I will not repeat past events, but it is clear that the government has abdicated its responsibility to the province of Quebec. The question arises, has it maintained the federal authority in this case? The premier of Quebec has already said he does not want the RCMP in his province, and this government has given him the best opportunity in the world for attacking the RCMP. The Solicitor General suggested that the opposition are attacking the integrity of the RCMP, but I say that this government has given the government of Quebec a terrific political lever with which to destroy the integrity of the RCMP within that province, to its everlasting shame. In the process of doing so it has helped further to fracture Canada's unity. It will have contributed substantially to the separation of that province, because one of the previous ministers concerned was guilty of sheer neglect. Probably both were guilty.

Last Friday the Solicitor General enunciated an important principle of law. Let me read what he said, as reported in Hansard, page 6795:

In a democratic society, Mr. Speaker, it is essential that those on whom, like the RCMP and the Security Service, falls the task of enforcing the law and protecting our basic liberties, can count upon the complete support of the people.

This support, in return, must be based on the faith that those protecting these rights do themselves feel bound and indeed are bound by our laws in fulfilling their duties.

That is an excellent statement of principle, but it is typical of this government that it misses the fundamental point we are arguing. Not only must the public feel that those who enforce the laws are subject to the rule of law; they must be satisfied in a democratic society that those who enforce the laws are their servants, not their masters. We must determine if the Solicitor General maintained control of the force. He suggested we are attacking the integrity of the force, but I say its integrity is attacked every time a minister in this House becomes nothing more than an apologist for the force and does not accept ministerial responsibility for providing leadership with respect to the RCMP. And the government has dismally failed to provide it.

No police force is without its great problems. Being a policeman is a tough job. It is not a popularity contest, and there are bound to be bad policemen in any force. We say that in certain incidents the RCMP appears to have broken the law, and the minister says we are attacking the integrity of the force. But I say that we are trying to protect the integrity of the RCMP and protect the fine record and reputation of the force.

● (0010)

The question that is key in this matter is something else the Solicitor General said in his statement. It was in fact that the incident which occurred was neither unusual nor exceptional. I am paraphrasing. I am not saying it exactly. I point out to the Solicitor General that the evidence has been given over and over again by Corporal Ramsay, an ex-corporal in the RCMP. I want to read some of that from tonight's paper. I hope the minister will take the trouble to have a look at it. The headline in tonight's Toronto Star reads "Break-ins Common—Former Mountie." I quote from the article:

During the last year and a half he was in the force, he said, as an assistant training officer in Saskatchewan, he was in charge of setting up classes for other officers.

Some of the classes dealt with methods of breaking and entering and bugging hotel and motel rooms as well as homes, he said. Lectures included playing tapes that were obtained by bugging... But major installations, which involved breaking into a home or office to install bugging equipment had to be approved by headquarters in Ottawa.

That is Jack Ramsay, an ex-corporal in the RCMP. Surely that evidence alone cries out for someone to take a look at making sure that the force is not engaged in illicit break-in activities in order to set wiretaps. The article continues:

Ramsay said that in his day all divisions of the RCMP had "technical aid sections" with bugging equipment and expert lock-pickers to conduct the break-ins.

I do not want to hear the minister get up in this House tomorrow and apologize again. The hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay), who knows as much about this subject as anyone in this House, has raised these matters since I came here in 1972, over and over and over. The difficulty continues to be that the understanding of the present minister and his two predecessors of the role of Solicitor General is that it is simply to protect and apologize for any activity of those in the force or in the bureaucracy that they represent. The Canadian people are really getting a little tired of it.

There is a rule of political leadership in a democratic society that the RCMP must, above all other people, surely obey the law. However, the Canadian public are in doubt right now that the political authorities are in control of the force. On that point alone I plead with the government to call an inquiry into this specific matter even if it does not wish to expand it into the others I am going to suggest also cry out for an inquiry.

I am not critical of the present Minister of Supply and Services in terms of his handling of the matter in the House this afternoon. I think he made a forthright statement. It was something he was not required to do under the rules. I am not critical of the present minister for the statement that he made in the House. But, as many people have pointed out, that statement raises far more questions than it answers.

However, what is important are two things that the minister, in answer to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), inserted in the record. One of them perhaps goes to the root of the problem. He said "that is easy to say", in response to the question of whether he should have asked the key question following the November 6 meeting.

Hindsight is very easy. The fact that he did not ask the key question goes beyond what was negligence of his part. It goes to the root of the question as to whether he understands the role of Solicitor General to be more than an apologist, to have a positive obligation, to find out whether in fact the force is obeying the law of the country. It is that duty the solicitor general at the time failed to meet.

Sure, hindsight is easy, but it is not just a question of negligence. It is a failure of this government's understanding of its role with respect to the RCMP because it did not occur to the minister to ask a question. He still sees his role as being the protector of the force. He would never believe they would break the law. That is at the root of the minister's failure. I am not challenging the veracity of the statement that the minister made, although it certainly raises some question of judgment.

The other line that the minister threw into debate, and I will be pleased to listen to his further comments, was to call this back-seat driving on the part of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. I say to the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, that it is better to have somebody driving even if it is in the back seat, because what we have had was that no one who had that particular portfolio did any driving. He was being driven by the force and being ignored by the force.

In the United States a president was impeached because three operatives, not police officers, broke into the Watergate complex. The only reason we are debating this in the House today is because an RCMP corporal who was charged in an illegal bombing let slip in the evidence that he participated in a break-in. Otherwise there would never have been this debate in the House of Commons today. This matter would never have come to light.

The facts are obvious about a cover-up. The logic is overwhelming that there was a cover-up. Democracy cannot survive that kind of conduct. We need to have a complete and open society. The only way the government can demonstrate that it is in favour of that, and I plead with it tonight, is to agree to have an inquiry into this matter. It will be the first step back to restoring the integrity of the RCMP and putting ministerial responsibility where it belongs.

This is a serious time. I will not deal with the Praxis question because my time is limited. However, there are some serious questions with regard to that which remain unanswered. I will throw the name of Létourneau into this debate and I will deal more with that. This is another question of illegality on the part of the RCMP in Quebec. There was the Royal American show, the illegal police bugging. The police investigation in that case was simply to call in the officers, ask whether they did it, and when the officers said no, they said that was fine. Can you imagine an ordinary citizen alleged to have committed an offence being treated in that way? No statement was required and there was no investigation. Further evidence has now come out of that.

There is the New Brunswick inquiry, again the question of RCMP responsibility. There is now so much cumulative evidence that we have to start to redress on that balance.

When I began practising law the courts were very scrupulous, very careful that the rule of law was always obeyed. I am afraid there has been a swing in the pendulum. Because of a deep concern about rising crime, we have started to cut corners to control it. That is a great mistake. The kind of civilized and free society that we have cannot exist if we do not have a government which understands that the people are the masters of the RCMP and must remain so.

● (0020)

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the discussion of the APLQ incident for the past two days and I am shocked by the lack of rigour, discipline and the degree of irresponsibility with which opposition members have carried on, making gratuitous allegations and insinuations.

What is the opposition after—the truth or sensationalized press reports? The opposition parties are so miserably lacking in creative ideas and policy proposals that I can understand this might be the only way for them to obtain press coverage. However, parliamentary tradition suggests that if any member chooses to argue on the basis of allegations and insinuations he should have enough courage, enough guts, to specify his accusations and to put his job on the line to prove them. I have already said I would put my seat on the line to support my statements.

For example, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has insinuated that I may have misled the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) in my account of the facts concerning my involvement in this incident. If he wants to accuse me of concealing evidence, let him be specific about it and let him pay the price if he fails to prove his accusation. If he chooses not to put up, he should shut up. The Leader of the Opposition is of course hesitant to stake his seat, because he knows very well that these allegations are unfounded.

As for some other members of the opposition, unfortunately they have not behaved very responsibly, either. Their tactics were clear: insinuation and innuendo. They obviously did not pay attention to the Solicitor General's statement. They chose to extract only those parts of the statement which suited their purpose. They chose to conveniently overlook important pieces of information.

One member was unethical and irresponsible enough to accuse me of having been involved in three "scandals". He should have more respect for the English language and use such words as "scandal" more judiciously. He should have enough respect for individual rights and reputations to use such words more carefully. First, though the purchase of aircraft from the Lockheed Corporation did give rise to serious problems, in no way could the negotiations be qualified as scandalous. We all know how hard the opposition tried to uncover a scandal, to no avail.

The second incident referred to by the member is the Hamilton dredging incident. I would like to correct an erroneous news report published as a result of the statement made by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) concerning my alleged involvement in the Hamilton dredging incident.

The members's allegations are false. This incident was dealt with in parliamentary committee which unequivocally concluded that I had acted correctly and responsibly in dealing with this matter. Furthermore I am tabling, with the signator's consent and, I hope, with the consent of the House, a letter sent to me by Mr. James E. Campbell, then Controller, City of Hamilton, dated April 8, 1975, which should erase any doubts which anyone might have concerning my role in this incident. It reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Goyer:

I felt that I should write to you as a result of the vicarious exchanges between us reported by the news media.

The news media and others were quick to seize upon and exploit a statement by me that certain information was handed to you when what was meant was that it was handed to your office.

At any rate the matter was acted upon swiftly as reported in the Globe and Mail on or about December 14, 1972 in a report that the RCMP had commenced an investigation of Hamilton Harbour.

If I can be of any help to correct any statement that may have caused any embarrassment to you or your department, I would be pleased to do so.

Yours truly,

James E. Campbell
Controller

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Goyer: At the risk of repeating my earlier statement, I will explain my role in the APLQ incident once again. The Solicitor General has already tabled a statement; I, myself, have risen on a question of privilege to explain my role in this incident; I trust that, the third time around, opposition members will begin to grasp the facts. I sympathize with the many opposition members who are just plain slow at grasping issues, but those who refuse to grasp the facts, who distort the truth are abusing their position as members of parliament and are abusing the confidence of their electors.

First, I want to state flatly that I had no prior knowledge of the October 6/7 1972 break-in at the APLQ. The Solicitor General has also stated that neither the RCMP Headquarters in Ottawa nor the Commanding Officer of "C" Division in Montreal had been told of the break-in prior to the operation being carried out.

Second, a letter dated October 9 was sent to me by the APLQ. The letter did not state that the RCMP had participated in the break-in, it asked if it had. This letter, received October 11, 1972, was not immediately brought to my attention but was referred to the RCMP. This was standard practice, and this afternoon I explained that practice.

As I mentioned this afternoon, this method of dealing with complaints about the RCMP was not ideal, but those were the tools available to me at the time. And in the early fall of 1972, I had recommended to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that a commission be instituted to look into disciplinary questions and the manner of dealing with complaints about RCMP behaviour. The commission was in fact established by my successor.

On October 26, 1972, the RCMP wrote to my assistant recommending that no acknowledgment of the letter be sent, without providing the reason for their recommendation.

My agenda indicates that I would have raised the matter with the Commissioner and the Director of Security Services of the RCMP on November 6, 1972. I was not informed of RCMP involvement in the break-in at this meeting nor at any subsequent meeting with the police. I was advised not to acknowledge the letter because the theft of documents referred to in the APLQ letter fell under the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities and I was informed that la Police de Montréal was investigating the incident.

I am sure that I was not told of RCMP involvement in the break-in. The former Commissioner and former Director of Security Services claim they would be surprised if they had not told me verbally. But, neither the Commissioner nor the Director of Security Services of the RCMP remember actually telling me about RCMP involvement in the incident. They both state that the matter was a very serious one and very unusual. Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, they would remember discussing it with me? Do you not think that had they wanted to inform me about it they would have done so in writing?

An hon. Member: Perhaps not in this case.

Mr. Goyer: The RCMP's standard way of dealing with important information was to convey it to me in writing. I outlined the procedure this afternoon, but let me repeat that many days I received up to five or six documents on police matters. Decisions and policy directives were recorded in writing and such documents were initialled by me. The RCMP is methodical, efficient, and thorough in keeping its records of discussions and decisions. The Solicitor General Department's files and those of the RCMP contain no written report to me on the APLQ break-in.

• (0030)

Why did I not specifically ask if the RCMP was involved in the break-in? First I received an inquiry about an illegal break-in from a group whose reputation and credibility hon. members can evaluate themselves. I found it hard to believe that the RCMP could have participated in an illegal break-in. I had no knowledge of the RCMP ever having taken part or even having planned to take part in illegal activities. I respected the RCMP's reputation and past record. The opposition is being cynical and opportunistic when they wonder why I trusted the RCMP. They were the ones, especially Tory members, who were attacking me at the time for not showing enough respect for the RCMP.

Secondly, when I discussed the APLQ letter with the RCMP, the Quebec justice minister had already stated publicly that no police force was involved in the break-in. He had prime responsibility for investigating the incident; he had done so and was unequivocal in his conclusion. Was it reasonable for me to doubt his conclusions? The RCMP did not tell me of RCMP involvement in the break-in, the Quebec justice minister stated bluntly that no police force was involved; it was thus clear to me that the RCMP was not involved in the incident. I had no reason to suspect the conclusions of the Quebec minister of justice as false and thus no reason to ask the RCMP if they had been involved in the incident. No member of this House would have reacted differently. When I was also told that the whole matter was being further investigated by the Montreal urban police, I was further reassured that justice would take its course.

The Quebec justice minister's statement denying that any of the three police forces were involved in the theft of documents was never brought to my attention as false.

On November 27, 1972, I was appointed Minister of Supply and Services, and the very first time I learned of RCMP involvement in the break-in was in March 1976.

As I pointed out this afternoon, neither the deputy solicitor general nor the then director, security planning and research group, were made aware of RCMP participation in this operation before March 16, 1976. The established practice called for their being informed of important questions pertaining to the RCMP's activities, to allow them to assist me in following up on such matters. Normally, at least one of them attended my meetings with the police. Neither one remembers even hearing about RCMP involvement in the break-in at the APLQ.

This now brings me to the broader question of the role and duties of a solicitor general as they pertain to responsibility for the RCMP. First of all, in a democratic society, day-to-day police operations should be carried out as independently as possible from the political process and the police should not be used to further political aims. As Solicitor General I was under severe pressure from opposition members not to involve myself in the day-to-day operations of the force; opposition members watched carefully to ensure that I was not interfering with police operations.

I agree that with regard to specific day-to-day police operations the role of the Solicitor General should be non-intrusive unless of course there is proof that police conduct is unworthy or illegal. I can assure the House that when I was Solicitor General, the RCMP was never asked to undertake any activities to further political interests nor was I ever made aware of any illegal police activities, under any circumstances. Thus my actions toward the RCMP were directed at policy matters at finding ways and means to make the RCMP even more effective and efficient.

Let me give the House some examples of how this was done. First of all, the whole recruiting process was reviewed, with special attention being given to upgraded entrance requirements. Bilingualism and multilingualism combined to make the force more representative of Canadian society and more efficient. It was decided that women could become members of the force. A national committee, formed of members of the force, was established to discuss problems and issues relating to improving conditions and relations between the commissioner and members of the force, and thus improving the work environment. I recommended the establishment of a commission to deal with disciplinary questions and the manner in which to deal with complaints about RCMP behaviour. A public relations program focusing on crime prevention was established in numerous schools throughout the country.

Some of the RCMP's methods of operation were reviewed and discontinued. For example, I put an end to the practice of soliciting information from young informers. I encouraged the RCMP to put added emphasis on white collar crime.

Of course, I also paid a great deal of attention to national security problems. That is what a Solicitor General should do. Threats to our national security arise not only from outside our borders but also from within the country itself. We had had bombings; innocent persons had been maimed and killed; political kidnappings and murder had taken place. It is easy for a member of the opposition to accuse me of "paranoia" about terrorist groups, but then what does this member know about national security? In fact, because I knew that members of the opposition parties knew very little about national security matters, I undertook, for the first time, to have the then leader of opposition briefed about security issues.

I repeat what I said this afternoon. No matter what I had been told about the APLQ's activities, under no circumstances would I have authorized an illegal break-in at the premises of the APLQ if I had had any prior knowledge of the operation. Had I been told about RCMP involvement in the break-in, under no circumstances would I have condoned it or covered up for the force. No circumstances can serve as an excuse for illegal behaviour not even with the best of intentions.

I have spent a good part of my life defending individual rights and civil liberties—as a student, as a private citizen, as a politician. If anything, I have been accused of being too staunch a supporter of individual rights. I was not naïve, however, in my support of individual rights and collective freedom; I took national security questions very seriously, seriously enough to show prudence, seriously enough not to condone illegal police activities.

In order to get a better grasp of security matters, I established the Security Planning and Research Group to assist me in analyzing the great volume of material passed on to me by the security services of the RCMP. The SPARG was designed to advise me on policy matters, not to engage in police operations. It is just impossible for the Solicitor General to analyse closely the masses of information conveyed to him by the security services of the RCMP. He does not have the time and all the expertise to do so. The SPARG worked in close co-operation with the security services of the RCMP, and in the final months of my mandate had also begun to link with the Commissioner of the RCMP becoming more involved in studying other types of police information.

When I established the SPARG, however, I was severely attacked by opposition members for setting up a group that would, in effect, review and analyze some of the material provided to me by the RCMP.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the minister, but his allotted time has expired. He could continue past the 20-minute mark only with the consent of the House.

[English]

Is there unanimous consent for the minister to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps at the same time the minister might table the letter he referred to earlier in his remarks, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2)? For this, he does not require the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to table the letter I quoted from.

[English]

The opposition claimed the RCMP was very capable of reviewing its information itself, that no independent analysis was required, that I was threatening the independence of the force. It is ironic that now the opposition is conveniently accusing me of not having intervened enough in police operations.

I feel that I did a good job in dealing with the RCMP—improved recruiting standards, better employer relations mechanisms, a review of disciplinary issues, the abolition of certain questionable operations, namely, those pertaining to young informers, a renewed emphasis on white collar crimes, an increased emphasis on crime prevention, a more effective security service. I did not know that the RCMP was involved in the APLQ incident before, during or after the break-in.

One final comment: some members and journalists have tried to link this incident to the Watergate affair which occured in the United States. I wonder why Canadians are always so eager to emulate slavishly the United States? First of all, any comparison with the Watergate incident is so far-fetched that it is flabbergasting that anyone would waste his time attempting to make such a comparison. The Watergate incident involved the hiring of a group of men to take part in an illegal break-in and bugging of a recognized political party, for political purposes.

Various senior members of the U.S. administration had prior knowledge of the break-in, at least a few days after it had occured; senior members of the administration admitted trying to "pay off" the burglars to buy their silence, and in fact tried to cover up the whole matter. The APLQ incident is very, very different. First, no senior RCMP officers, no federal minister had prior knowledge of the break-in. No one was hired to do the job. The APLQ cannot justly be compared to the Democratic Party and, moreover, no political motive was involved. I was not informed of RCMP involvement in the incident; the Prime Minister was certainly not aware of the matter. No one was paid to keep his mouth shut. No minister was involved in a cover-up; on the contrary, as soon as a minister was in fact informed of RCMP participation in the break-in, an investigation was launched and charges were laid. One would have to have a very vivid and warped imagination to call this a "Watergate".

On the other hand it is obvious, given the nature of the debate which has taken place here, that members of the opposition have relied more on their imagination than on facts. Hopefully, their future statements will reflect more accurately what really happened.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am almost ashamed to take part in this debate following the former solicitor general, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), a man who hears no evil, sees no evil, and speaks no evil. Seldom are we treated to such a sanctimonious performance and contribution as we heard tonight in the House.

The Minister said on several occasions today that he is willing to lay his job on the line if some hon. members made some charges and some accusations. I want to try to oblige this gentleman, who speaks with a squeaky voice, to see if I can arouse the minister's sensivity sufficiently to do what he promised, namely, stand up and resign his seat.

In 1973 the former great prime minister, Lester B. Pearson, said that if our security policy ignored or did not take into account the basic rights of the individual, it could operate not to defend but to destroy the liberties which were our first concern.

In February of 1974 our present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said, making reference to the security service, that the public security service is the custodian of part of the independence which every citizen yields so that the state may act with the necessary authority for the common good. He referred to this assumed mandate as a sacred trust. This was the very language that every despot who wished in the past to curb or destroy the rights of citizens employed. Given the lack of parliamentary control over the nation's security system and the Prime Minister's known predilection for conducting political vendettas for the benefit of Liberals, what assurance is there that the security measures are not simply a political weapon?

The Solicitor General calls his actions or the goings on in connection with the APLQ a very unusual and serious incident. He says the reason no action was taken in the case of Montreal was because it was a very isolated incident. But apart from the break-in at L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec, we have heard about investigations in similar instances in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. There is also the case of Katie Curtin and Sylvia Roche who were fired from their jobs at the Olympic Games in July, 1976, along with many others who were fired for security reasons. The reason I mention that case is that the lieutenant in the cross-examination by the Montreal police which investigated that incident said that Curtin and Roche were on the list of persons who were considered to be security risks. Corp. Gerard Lafond of the Quebec provincial police admitted at the same hearing that hundreds of files are maintained on persons who have never been arrested or charged, on persons who are suspected of being security risks. According to his testimony, duplicate copies were maintained by the RCMP.

I would like to deal first with some of the actors in this drama which is unfolding here tonight and has been unfolding in the last few days. First I will throw out a few names. There is the name of the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), and the name of Lt. Col. Bourne who was involved, as we know, during the war measures crisis, in the Prime Minister's office dealing with some of the troubles in Quebec. There are the names of Starnes, Dabros, Cobb, all people who came from various offices such as the Department of National Defence, the Privy Council office, the Prime Minister's office and the RCMP forces. They brought with them the mentality of the War Measures Act and the October crisis in Quebec. There was a communist behind every tree, there was a leftist everywhere, and we were all nervous. Eyes were looking out of every mail box.

An hon. Member: And bombs were in every other one.

Mr. Oberle: The present Minister of Supply and Services came to his position in the Prime Minister's office after having been parliamentary assistant to the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp). Lt. Col. Robin Bourne was already doing security work in the Privy Council office and he linked up with the Minister of Supply and Services. Col. Walter Dabros was fresh from the battle grounds where he was fighting subversives on the campuses, and he brought his experience to this select group. Insp. Cobb did FLQ work in Quebec from August, 1966, to June, 1970. This group now became the custodians of the independence we had to yield as Canadians to the government so that the state could protect the common good.

Now I want to speak about yet another break-in, another crime that was committed in support of the public good, that is, the crime that was committed during the break-in in the late 1970's in the office of the Praxis Corporation in Toronto. That group could be identified a little better. It was a group of individuals who formed a social action group. They came into this environment in response to the call for a just society, for participatory democracy. They were operating on grants, one particular grant given to them by the National Council on Social Welfare to organize a poor peoples' conference. They played their part in the grant economy of the late 1960's, encouraged of course by the Prime Minister who was going to make everybody equal and everybody happy.

They were called leftist because they were working with the poor people, getting them to participate, which the Prime Minister wanted them to do with the taxpayers' money. This same philosophy gave rise to rifling groups as well, some of them very radical. There were small vigilante groups operating at that time. The police, of course, aligned itself with right wing groups. In the case of Praxis one did not need to be a member of the RCMP to act under the protection of 141(2) which gives the minister the right to withhold evidence from the courts. All one needed to be was to be a member of one of these right wing groups, and as such one was granted immunity from the law. This is what happened in the case of the Praxis break-in.

It would appear that in the Praxis case there might not have been a direct involvement of a police force. In fact the government did not investigate this action as it did the case in Montreal, but our own investigation reveals that the police might have acted through agents, and one agent in particular who is no longer in the country. His life would have been in danger if the police had revealed his identity on January 24 when I introduced the black list in the House. It is now seven years after the event, but this person's life would still be in danger today. I ask myself who would do harm, shoot or kill this person who co-operated with the police at that time? Would it be the RCMP who would do it to conceal their involvement? Would it be a leftist or a rightist group? What kind of a society do we live in today when a person who collaborates with the police is in danger of his life?

Supt. Venner of the RCMP met the people who lost their files in the break-in. When the question of the obstruction of the investigative process of the Metro police by the RCMP was raised, Supt. Venner said:

Yes, we found ourselves in a dilemma of protecting this person. This was unfair to the Metro police but there was nothing we could do. If we gave out names, that would have put this anonymous person in danger.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) knows what happened.

An hon. Member: The sly fox.

Mr. Oberle: When I introduced this matter to the House of Commons in the initial stages, everyone but the Solicitor General knew.

In the case of l'Agence de Presse Libre we are being asked to take the minister's word that there is no involvement. How good is the minister's word? How good has it been on other occasions? When the EPO matter was first raised in the House—that was after I had discussed it with the Solicitor General—he said he had never heard of such a thing. At that time I accused him and several ministers in the House of deliberately misleading the House. If the minister wants to accept that as a charge tonight, there it is. Of course several of his colleagues who were informed of the possible overthrow of the government by radical means were also totally ignorant of the facts until the list was read into the record of the House. This cured the minor cases of selective amnesia.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would the hon. member be kind enough to indicate clearly who has misled the House? It is not too clear to me who he said it was.

An hon. Member: The Liberals.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the question is well asked. I heard the remarks of the hon. member and I hope he will make it clear that he is not charging that the minister deliberately misled the House, which is not permitted under our rules.

● (0100)

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, if the Solicitor General would research the record of that day, he would find where I made the charge. He would see the list of persons against whom I levelled the charge. If the shoe fits, anyone here may wear it.

Mr. Goyer: Come on, explain! Come on, chicken!

Mr. Oberle: If the Minister of Supply and Services would wait a moment, there is more to come.

Mr. Goodale: Hit and run; keep it up.

Mr. Oberle: The Minister of Supply and Services is one of my very special friends. There is more to come. Just hang in there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Goyer: Be specific.

Mr. Oberle: The EPO list was read into the record of the House of Commons.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. gentleman would allow me to come back to his point. I really wonder if he is accusing anybody on this side of the House of misleading the House. I bring the question up because before the parliamentary committee the hon. member said he had made this charge in the House, and that since no one had responded to him, obviously somebody had misled the House.

Would the hon. member please either tell me who on this side misled the House or retract his statement to the effect that someone misled the House?

Mr. Beatty: Give him a chance. Stop interrupting.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I might say to the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) that it is not considered unparliamentary to say that a statement is untrue, but it is unparliamentary to say that it is untrue to the knowledge of the hon. member making it, so I suppose by extension to say that a minister or a member might have misled the House is acceptable. Perhaps it is not recommended, but according to the rules of the House it is acceptable. However, what is not acceptable is to say that a member has misled the House to his own knowledge. This is what the hon. member more or less implied at the beginning. However, his remarks perhaps amounted to nuance. They were general, and in that case I do not think I have to intervene at this time.

Mr. Goyer: Gee whiz.

Mr. Paproski: Why are you so sensitive?

Mr. Oberle: It certainly shows how sensitive our friends over there are when someone refers to the list to which I have made reference.

Mr. Goyer: And how confused you are in your mind.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I hope that you will not deduct from my time the time these gentlemen are abusing by way of interruption.

An hon. Member: We extended their time.

Mr. Oberle: The letter which was read into the record of the House of Commons, which these people did not remember, read in part like this:

> Through such institutions the New Left seeks to organize and radicalize the 'underclasses' of society and mold them into a revolutionary force capable of overthrowing the present socio-political system . . .
>
> The radical EPO program of the Left is, in short, a movement strategy predicated on a total and unequivocal rejection of representative democracy, its destruction and the creation of radical alternatives.

An hon. Member: Who signed that?

Mr. Oberle: That would mean it would have to be more radical than what we have now, and this letter was signed by Jean-Pierre Goyer, Solicitor General of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Oberle: How paranoid can one single person get? In the case of Montreal we do not know what happened to the loot that was stolen. In the Praxis case we do know. The crime was followed by a series of incredible events. There was the illegal possession of the documents that were stolen. The minister's officials, through the RCMP—which had, incidentally, destroyed quite a few of the files that were stolen—compiled the evidence taken in that break-in which was brought to the then solicitor general. Evidence which was compiled and brought together from other police operations formed the basis for the EPO concept. The blacklist practice is, in my opinion, a Star Chamber technique. The Star Chamber, as we all remember, was an ancient English court dispensing justice without a jury, which met in a chamber in Westminster Palace, the ceiling of which was decorated with stars. The only problem is that it was abolished in 1641 to end arbitrary and secret tribunals of the type this government is still carrying on today.

An hon. Member: Goyer brought it back.

Mr. Oberle: It was that minister right there who took the stolen property and converted it into his infamous blacklist, and attached to this list was another list with the names of 21 innocent Canadians who are still today affected by this smear campaign and by the actions of this government. As a matter of fact, there are now several lawsuits against those two ministers over there. Writs have been issued in the courts for libel. That is what these people are—

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) on a question of privilege.

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I should like the hon. member to say who sued me in this case and when?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Solicitor General on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fox: Unless I am mistaken, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member stated, when referring to these two gentlemen and to the commission of a criminal offense, that I was guilty of libel. I therefore request the hon. member to retract immediately what he has just said or explain his statement, for the way I understood it, he said, referring to me, that I was guilty of libel.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must point out to the Solicitor General that if those words were spoken, I did not hear them. I shall have to check Hansard, which I shall do tomorrow. Then, the Solicitor General can use his first privilege, that is rise on a point of order, unless the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) himself, knowing what he said, changes or withdraws his words.

[English]

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I too will examine Hansard tomorrow to see what the Solicitor General has said. If I offended his privilege, I am prepared to withdraw these comments either now or tomorrow. I am not like the government. I think that the judicial action which will be launched against these gentlemen should take its course before we identify them for what they are.

Mr. Malone: He didn't say what you are.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Minister of Supply and Services on a point of order.

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I rose on a question of privilege because the hon. member said that several judicial actions have been taken against me, and also because I support what the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) said, that is, that I protest strongly. I therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his words with regard to the libel he claims I am responsible for against Canadians. I ask the hon. member, if he cannot say who made the accusation against me, to withdraw what he has just said.

● (0110)

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I can understand how the former solicitor general, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), would be quite upset because we are getting awfully close to the truth. I can understand that. Dealing with the question of privilege, however, I can tell him that one of the people who has issued a writ against him is a constituent of mine by the name of Ian Keith Carruthers. It was issued within the last two weeks.

An hon. Member: And what about Stopworth?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It was about the question that I asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford)—asking for some justice—

Mr. Goyer: When was it served?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): With respect I am sure the Solicitor General heard it in the House today. As I understand it the writ has not been served, but I want to say to the House that the writ has been issued. If it has not been issued I will apologize to the Minister of Supply and Services. I suggest that he send one of his gumshoes down to the Supreme Court of Ontario office at the Court House to check the record.

An hon. Member: Go away to Africa for three days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Goyer: And you are a lawyer!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think it is extremely important. The Minister of Supply and Services asked for information. I have given him that information. He can check its veracity, and if I am wrong with respect to the issuance of that writ then I will apologize to the minister. I think that ends the question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has made a point of clarification. I am not in a position to decide whether this corresponds to facts or to court actions, or not.

[Translation]

The Minister of Supply and Services surely made a valid point if he thinks that an hon. member claims a charge was laid against him and that the charge is not substantiated or at least that procedures were not taken. However, I must say that the Chair cannot control the content of the speeches, the truth of all that is said. If the minister feels frustrated and attacked in his integrity, I think he has the right to make a correction, and I hope the hon. member who was had the floor will be able to bring some precision in his remarks and clarify the situation.

[English]

I would hope that these insinuations about law suits or pretented lawsuits could be clarified in a way so that no member would feel his reputation has been attacked.

The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle).

I might say that the hon. member has gone well beyond his time and I have started to allow him extra time. Maybe if we sum up all the time that has been taken on points of order I shall give him an extra five minutes. After that I shall have to tell him that his time has expired.

Mr. Oberle: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You are most generous and most kind.

Mr. O'Sullivan: Especially for a Liberal.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not think that is the kind of remark that should be made in this place.

Mr. O'Sullivan: Mr. Speaker, the comment, of course, was provoked by the rudeness shown the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) tonight by the other side. In so far as Your Honour occupies that position with great dignity, I withdraw the remark completely, having made the point about the rudeness that the other side did not withdraw when they shouted down the Leader of the Opposition as he was stating the truth.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am very grateful to the hon. member.

The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle).

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I will come to the conclusion of my remarks and will not abuse the graciousness of yourself and my colleagues.

I must sum up by saying the fact is that the former solicitor general, the Minister of Supply and Services, knew when he drafted and signed this letter "Jean-Pierre Goyer" that he had in his possession and the possession of his department, stolen materials. There is no way he could not know because it was widely reported, in Toronto and throughout the country. It was on television and in the newspapers that there had been a break-in.

Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but by sheer coincidence while these people were going in there, whoever they were—yesterday I gave the Solicitor General some indication of who it might be and he promised to investigate—I am fair with him;

he says we must give him information and I did. I give him another day or two days if he wants it, but then we need an inquiry. We cannot let it go forever. This man knew he was dealing with stolen material—

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Minister of Supply and Services on a question of privilege.

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must have lost his head. If he wants to lay charges, let him do so with facts and not with innuendoes and let him prove what he just said in a clear and precise manner. Then I will be ready to discuss the question. Otherwise I think the hon. member should have enough respect for this institution to know that when an hon. member speaks, he must state facts and refrain from making false innuendoes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must point out to the minister that in my opinion the hon. member was talking about papers which were stolen one way or another in an illegal break-in and which were in the hands of his department, I guess, through the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I am obliged to give him the benefit of the doubt—

Mr. Goyer: I knew—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair did not understand that the minister himself was accused of having these papers in his possession. It may be because it is getting late but I hope once again that the words and interventions of the hon. member——would be put in perspective as to where these documents were and had been kept.

[English]

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister was lamenting all day that someone should lay a charge. He has put his seat on the line.

Mr. Goyer: Lay one.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, what else can I say? Here in this letter is the information that was stolen at Praxis Corporation in Toronto. It is under the minister's signature. What else do we need?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Oberle: He cannot hide behind the police forces or one of his officials. Jean-Pierre Goyer is the man who signed the letter. He is the man who smeared names and destroyed the careers of innocent Canadians.

Mr. Goyer: What is the accusation? Put it.

An hon. Member: You signed the letter.

Mr. Goodale: You are wearing a wool suit; did you kill the sheep?

[Mr. Oberle.]

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I want to bring this to a conclusion to allow the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) to finish up. I should like to add to a former Prime Minister's words when he said if the government, through it security forces, ignored or did not take into account the basic rights of the individual they could operate not to defend but to destroy the liberties which are our first concern.

The minister said twice or three times that he would put his seat on the line if he were found guilty of some of the allegations that have been made. I invite him now to resign.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I believe my hon. colleague across the Chamber is a counsel. I understand he is, but I do not see why he would be so sensitive about the mention of some of the many people who are widely reported to be suing him. Certainly I have been sued, but I am not particularly sensitive about it. Charges have been made against me by a corporation. As far as I know they are still in effect; it does not bother me, particularly since the corporation suing me was convicted on eight counts of doing what I said it was doing.

● (0120)

I wish the minister well in his defence of those actions brought against him by people like Rudnicki, Stopforth and others. I am sure justice will be done, and I urge my hon. friend not to be too sensitive about these things, particularly in view of the amazing speech he made. After listening to him I expected the grateful members of the RCMP, in recognition of all the wonderful things he said he has done, to take up a collection for a statue, to be erected in his honour in some suitable place. It would commemorate all the wonderful improvements he read into the record this evening. But the improvements have not been so manifestly obvious as to prevent the present Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) from saying, honestly, that things still are not as they should be after five years, and that changes should be made. On this point I do not recall hearing the present Solicitor General tell the House, except generally, by way of reference to the matter, that some of the Marin commission recommendations have been implemented. I stand to be corrected, but I know of no tangible evidence showing that these improvements have been made.

Our solicitors general, present and previous, both know full well that there have been many cases of the most serious injustice affecting members of the RCMP who have been summarily kicked out of the force pursuant to section 173 without the semblance of a hearing. If the former solicitor general were such a compassionate man and so concerned about the force, surely during the past five years he would have done something to bring justice to those RCMP officers, some of whom have been badly treated, and some of whom are still being badly treated.

I associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt). Tonight we are not talking about a matter of provincial jurisdiction. We are talking about the national police force, and we are talking about matters of national security. How you can say that matters of national security involving the national police force fall within provincial jurisdiction, to the extent that there is no need for the federal government to look into them, escapes me.

There are reasons, I hope I am not being cynical, for this government to abandon its responsibilities to the government of Quebec. I have no quarrel with the Quebec government getting no more than any other government, but the government's attitude is strange, if one may judge on the basis of the government's confrontationist attitude which has characterized many of its negotiations. I suggest that, with respect to many areas, this government would not invite the government of Quebec to lunch; but it is prepared to leave an important matter involving our national police force exclusively to the province of Quebec. It knows full well that the terms of reference set out in the Solicitor General's statement do not adequately cover some of the important items about which we are concerned tonight.

Obviously the implications of this matter go beyond the simple break-in at the Quebec news agency premises. Therefore it seems to me ludicrous on the face of it to suggest that the Quebec hearing is adequate and will cover the topics we are discussing tonight. Actually the Solicitor General declined, I suppose for good reasons, to answer my specific question as to whether he would volunteer to appear, or if any of his colleagues would volunteer. He knows full well that, because of the terms of reference of that inquiry, such appearance would not be appropriate, and he probably could not be forced to appear in any event.

Also, in the circumstances, are the documents the Quebec inquiry may require obtainable by way of subpoena? I understand the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) has looked into this and has not yet come to a conclusion. I may be wrong but I think the government should look into whether, in the circumstances, these documents ought to be or indeed are available, in law, to this inquiry.

I was interested to hear the former solicitor general, now the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), refer to the Hamilton Harbour matter. He brought it up, and we should look into it, because sometimes the more things change the more they remain the same. There is a curious air of déjà vu about this whole affair. I happened to look into a press release covering this matter. The then acting prime minister, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp), was questioned by a newspaper reporter. The reporter asked:

> What is the government's disposition regarding the most recent allegations concerning Mr. Goyer and has there been any decision to allow Mr. Goyer or to encourage Mr. Goyer to go before a Commons committee to get this matter out into the open and on the table?

That has a curiously familiar ring. The then acting prime minister was then asked the following question:

> Could you tell us what you discussed with the justice committee members of the Liberal party in the behind-the-scenes room?

To which he gave the following answer:

> I don't think I'm under any obligation. But as the Acting Prime Minister and as the House leader, this is the ordinary thing that happens. When some extraordinary matter arises in a committee they come to me for advice; I think I gave them good advice.

I do not question the procedure of the committee. I was at the committee that night. The present Solicitor General was there; the Minister of Supply and Services was there; the Commissioner of the RCMP was there. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand) was there. It was curious to see two men, one of whom had been the solicitor general and the other of whom was the Solicitor General, sitting side by side, each making statements for the other, each trying to explain who was right at the time. Did Mr. Campbell make a mistake? The present Minister of Supply and Services said he did. Again, we wondered who was telling the truth. It was an unsatisfactory exercise, leaving us frustrated for, as we know, committees are not the best forums for dealing with such matters.

One thing which the Minister of Supply and Services said in that affair ought to be repeated in the context of this debate. He said at the meeting of the justice and legal affairs committee on Monday, March 17, 1975:

> Just take into consideration that it is not my role to make a judgment on each and every bit of information we receive in the department to decide whether or not that information should be transferred to police or the concerned department. It is automatically done. It is then up to the police or the department concerned to decide whether or not that information is valid and if you can base an inquiry on those allegations. We receive hundreds of pieces of information of that sort. When it is a matter—

And I emphasize this point, because this is a security case.

> —of direct concern for my department, like security cases, then, of course, I would put my mind to it and discuss it directly with the head of the Security Services or with the Commissioner himself, generally speaking, with both of them.

I believe Sessions Judge Roger Vincent mentioned that aspects of security were involved in the case he tried. In any event, I do not know if the solicitor general of the day went to the Commissioner of the RCMP. Perhaps he can elaborate later. He does not appear to have paid particular attention to the matter which has been a matter of concern for this House and country for some time. As I say, the more things change the more they remain the same.

Obviously, during the past five years not many improvements were made to the RCMP.

An hon. Member: The present Solicitor General is an improvement over the old one.

Mr. MacKay: I concede that the present incumbent is a vast improvement, and no disrespect is intended; but that is how I feel. Despite the relatively good performance of the present Solicitor General, it is obvious that at least two of his predecessors behaved badly. As the leader of the NDP said, it is a good thing there was a back seat driver, because nobody was out in front.

Mr. Goyer: How about your two tons of accusations? Explain that.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, my learned friend will understand the argument of res ipsa loquitur—the thing speaks for itself.

● (0130)

Mr. Goyer: Two tons of documents. You are quite intelligent. Explain that.

Mr. MacKay: All right. How much does ten lineal feet of files weigh?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: Twenty-five feet, 500 pounds.

Mr. MacKay: Well, that is not bad. Five hundred pounds were destroyed on the day that I said. We will get into those questions later. I remind my learned friend without being objectionable, and I say this to him with the greatest of respect, my track record for providing information in this House is considerably better than his.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: I am just a poor backbench opposition MP while this man is a minister of the Crown with all the resources behind him. Who knows, as the saying goes, what revelations lie ahead when the Hamilton Harbour matter has finally cleared the court, but that is for another day.

There is certainly every reason why we need a federal inquiry into this matter. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said, for example, and I quote:

> Mr. Speaker, I for one, as a Canadian, would not admit that we have lesser rights than the Americans. They may have more abuses there and that is why, perhaps, they have to be corrective measures. I do not think the people suspect the RCMP of conducting themselves as the FBI do.

I suggest that is probably the case. However, if we have further examples of the lack of direction, lack of communication, and lack of responsibility that have been exhibited over the past number of years by solicitors general, the people of Canada will become convinced that no one is giving the RCMP the type of guidance and direction that it requires.

The RCMP, as my friend from New Westminster said, is a fine police force, one of the best in the world. There are 19,000 of these people. They are one of the institutions in this country that Canadians respect and look up to. The very fact that they are such an institution makes this minister, who was responsible for them and who refuses to accept a responsibility, all the more culpable.

I tried to suggest to the minister this afternoon, and I am sorry he is so sensitive about it, that he would have been far better received had he in his exculpatory statement accepted the fact that it was his misfortune to be minister at a time when some of these unsavoury incidents happened. The minister would not necessarily be held in any less repute if he took some of the fault for this, but no, he will not accept any responsibility. He said to me in his reply that a lawyer would be very unlikely to brief his partners if he left a law firm. In other words, he would walk out and leave his files. How ridiculous! Why did he not brief to a greater extent his successor, now the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

When solicitor general, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development was questioned quite regularly in this House, not just by myself but by members of the NDP and the Social Credit. I remember one question by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal). I also remember the then solicitor general saying he now had a complete report from the RCMP, which he has yet to table a year later.

Surely the then solicitor general ought to have briefed his successor fully on matters such as this and, goodness knows, other things, but there is no indication that was done. It makes one wonder how much knowledge this minister had to pass on to his successor. Did he really know what was going on? Did he have anything to tell his poor, unfortunate successor who had to cope with the mess in the department, a mess which the present Solicitor General has conceded still exists? The present Solicitor General apparently, and I accept his word, is working hard to try to correct it and will bring in legislation this fall. That is five years after the date of some of the circumstances that obviously aggravated or prompted the need to make such changes. That is not performance. A five year delay in correcting abuses into justice is not a very good performance. A lot of people have served time since then, got out, and paid their debt.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: There is no doubt that the inquiry going on in la belle province can perform a useful function. But its limitations were starkly outlined in the statement by the present Solicitor General. He recognizes the limitations. He is quite correct to be concerned about a fishing expedition by any province into some of the security matters of the RCMP whereby they have to cope with Russian intelligence, Chinese intelligence, and Cuban intelligence, and the minister knows all about that.

Not to take his responsibility for the federal police force, and not to get a commission or inquiry to allow some needed changes and show how the relationship at the top between the minister's office and the RCMP can be improved, is not in the best interests of the government or the country.

I also put it to the present Solicitor General that if improvements and changes, which he conceded are needed, result from the recommendation of an independent, responsible inquiry or commission comparable to the Marin Commission, which did not have a mandate to discuss this particular aspect, they will be perceived to be far more even-handed and appropriate than arbitrary changes implemented by the two parties whose conduct is under suspicion.

There has to be some sort of an agency, inquiry, commission or something, to put these needed changes forward in such a way that they will have the confidence of everyone, the House of Commons and the people of Canada. This is something to which the Solicitor General ought to address himself.

The hour grows late. There is no need to go over some of the details and indulge in the recriminations, although in many cases what we heard tonight was deserved.

In conclusion, I will just say that the RCMP, like fire, is a good servant but a bad master. No police force can be allowed to operate with impunity, to investigate itself and in some way to make decisions that are the prerogative of the minister to whom the force is responsible. We have seen strong indications that this has taken place in at least one incident, the one we are talking about tonight. We have seen indications in reputable publications in this country. Indeed I have been told, and I suspect the minister has been told, that such operations do go on.

On one occasion I spoke with a man who, when he was the force, was responsible for doing illegal wiretaps. He said to me that he accepted the responsibility, and that he knew that if he was caught he would be burned for it. He said that he managed to get the extra expense on his expense account, although in some cases it cost him money. I am very serious when I say that. I know the Solicitor General has talked to similar people.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacKay: I thank my colleagues. I am about to conclude.

I wish to refer to excellent opinions on this subject from very erudite and dispassionate people who are concerned about it. One is W. A. Wilson, a columnist with whom most of us are familiar. Mr. Wilson makes some very interesting points. For example, he said that a royal commission on security some years ago concluded that security service perhaps should not be part of the RCMP's mandate. Sometimes security measures are so sensitive and require such extraordinary procedures that they should not be a responsibility of the RCMP because, when something goes wrong in the carrying out of this necessary work, the force tends to fall into disrepute.

• (0140)

Mr. Fox: So you condone what happens?

Mr. MacKay: No. You are the one who condones what happens.

Mr. Fox: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MacKay: Certainly, but I am just about to conclude. At that point I will be glad to accept a question.

The other column I have in mind is that of Mr. Richard Gwynne who also had some interesting things to say about this matter. He said some things which are very sarcastic, very harsh, so I will not put them on record, just to show how sensitive I am. But I suggest the former solicitor general, as well as the present one, should read this article, as well as the other, because both columnists have put forward some good thoughts and suggestions.

Mr. Fox: The hon. member has referred to the article by Mr. Wilson. I wonder whether he subscribes to the view that a minister of the Crown should be entitled to give his permission to the carrying out of an illegal or covert operation.

Mr. MacKay: I would say that if such illegal or covert operations are necessary in the interests of national security, it would be much better if a minister of the Crown were aware of them. This is the type of question to which very serious thought should be given.

Mr. Fox: The point is an interesting one. I, for my part, do not believe any minister should ever sanction an illegal operation. Does the hon. member not believe that if certain things have been done in the interests of national security the House of Commons should proceed by authorizing the solicitor general to give consent? The subject of this debate is whether or not a minister of the Crown was aware of an illegal operation, and members opposite are saying that if that was the case he should resign. Now, the suggestion is that in some circumstances it would be appropriate. If it is, we should, through the proper legislation—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I suggest to the minister he is now getting far beyond a question. He is getting into debate.

Mr. MacKay: If it is necessary on the grounds of national security, if it is truly a matter of security—which obviously this tawdry instance is not—it would be far better for the minister to have extra powers and I would not be adverse, personally, to giving the Solicitor General additional powers if he could convince the House, as he might, that this would help him do his job better.

Mr. Art Lee (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I rise to enter this debate because of the seriousness of the matter brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent).

I noted with interest the remarks of the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). He referred to himself as a poor backbencher, but I believe he is very modest in his comments about himself. I noted with interest his remarks on the column written by Mr. Wilson. Although I have not seen the blues of the transcript it seemed to me he said that a minister, if he is aware of an illegal act, or covert action, sanctifies it by that knowledge. This government is on record as saying that the government is not beyond the rule of law. This is certainly the crux of the whole argument.

Other issues were raised in that article by Mr. Wilson. He discussed whether security operations should or should not be conducted by a separate force. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) alleged earlier today that the former solicitor general sanctified the break-in. There was another allegation that he covered up after he had learned of that break-in.

The hon. member for Central Nova put forward an interesting proposition. He stated that maybe parliament should pass an act having to do with federal employees, or employees of federal agencies who commit criminal acts in certain circumstances. I find that interesting, especially as when an offence is committed in a particular province it surely falls, under our constitutional system, within the purview of provincial attorneys general.

I also noted with interest the remarks of the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle). On one hand he alleged that we on this side did not have sufficient control over national security forces. Yet at the same time he alleged we were exercising control in favour of Liberals. Hypocrisy! He cannot have it both ways.

He went on to suggest there was no parliamentary input into the whole question of the national security group which advises the government. I would point out that when this matter was brought up recently in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) requested the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) to arrange a meeting in camera to discuss the whole issue of national security. The minister agreed. Similar in camera meetings have been held in the past, and I find it hard to accept the statement that there has been no parliamentary input with respect to this group.

It goes without saying that the rule of law must be paramount in a democratic society such as ours. The Solicitor General has stated on a number of occasions that if the RCMP break the law they will be held responsible.

An hon. Member: They did break the law.

Mr. Lee: The RCMP are not above the law. There can be no compromise in this regard. It is upon this premise that the integrity of our democracy and its liberties are based. During the past few days in the course of other debates on the subject of alleged cover-ups and conspiracies on the part of the government I have witnessed the methodology used by members opposite, with much dismay. Unquestionably they should be allowed to pursue their inquiries with vigour. That is their proper role. However, I submit they must act responsibly.

● (0150)

Yesterday the hon. member for Central Nova posed the following question to the Solicitor General:

> Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Solicitor General. Could the minister confirm reports, which I have received, that up to two tons of confidential files and data were destroyed by the RCMP in Montreal on June 2 and June 3, 1977; and could he confirm further that this action, involving the destruction of probably hundreds of man-years of work by the force, was initiated because of the implications of an inquiry being conducted by the government of the Parti Quebecois, rather than under federal auspices? Finally, will the minister tell us whether he or the Minister of Justice were consulted before this action was taken, and did he approve of it?

The Solicitor General answered:

> Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the hon. member is referring to the destruction of documents which would have taken place during the course of the past month. As far as I am concerned, I am not aware of any destruction of documents whatsoever. If the hon. member is aware of the destruction of documents in the furtherance of a possible cover-up of an illegal action, it is incumbent on him to give me the evidence so that appropriate action can be taken by this government.

Today the hon. member for Central Nova qualified and limited his question respecting the allegations that he made on Monday, June 20, 1977. If the hon. member had chosen to discuss the matter with the Solicitor General prior to making his allegations, I am confident that the hon. member for Central Nova would have been satisfied. Indeed, it might have saved him embarrassment. Unfortunately this is not the intention of the hon. member. Instead, it is abundantly clear to me that it is his intention to raise fatuous allegations like the destruction of documents, which could have been cleared up with the Solicitor General before going public. Instead, his actions leave me with no conclusion but that it is his intention to denigrate the reputation of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

If the hon. member for Central Nova is truly concerned about the reputation of the force, then I think it is incumbent upon him to act in a responsible manner. Instead, it appears to me that the hon. member is doing the very opposite of what he says his intentions are, namely, he is making fatuous allegations and innuendoes. He is attacking the fine reputation of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Similarly, I submit opposition members have not acted in a responsible manner and have denigrated the reputation of the force. I reiterate that there is no argument that members of the opposition should raise questions about illegalities involving the force; but I submit that these matters should be checked and verified with the Solicitor General first. I submit that this is only fair and reasonable if they really have at heart the reputation of the force, as I think all Canadians have. Instead, they seem to be satisfied in making generalized allegations which bear upon the reputation of the force.

It is very easy to do this. I remember hearing allegations made about the RCMP as a member of a community of Chinese ancestry. These allegations concerned harassment and abuse by the force. Over time I had the opportunity to check and verify these allegations and I found them to be nothing more than allegations. So I can sympathize with hon. members of the opposition and understand how they arrived at some of these allegations.

The other week I was on a radio hotline show in my area. Listeners were questioning me about the force, and one related to me an incident in which he was involved where a member of the force had issued him with a speeding ticket. This listener went on to say some very sour things about the force, and when I queried him about the basis for his remarks the listener said that all RCM Police are crooks. He also said to me: "Haven't you been reading the newspapers, watching television and listening to the radio?"

This clearly indicates to me that when hon. members opposite make generalized allegations and innuendoes, they denigrate the reputation of the force in the result. The Canadian people are fortunate in having one of the finest police forces in the world, a force which is envied by many others.

Mr. O'Sullivan: We have said that.

Mr. Lee: Live up to it, then.

There are approximately 12,000 uniformed members of the force. They are dedicated men and women who, by and large, are beyond reproach. When I was in the Okanagan Valley of British Columbia just recently I had an opportunity to meet some of the members of the force. Among other matters that we discussed they expressed to me real concern about our proposals respecting the young offender. They are involved with youth, volunteering their services to Scouts Canada and other worth-while organizations. They mentioned to me the lack of facilities and resources to look after youth offenders. I mention this because Canadians are aware that they are fortunate in having such dedicated men and women on the force. These are the people we are talking about when we discuss the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I think it is incumbent on opposition members to exercise responsibility in raising questions about illegality in connection with the force. Instead they have raised fatuous, generalized allegations and innuendoes. If they have at heart the reputation of the force, I submit that when they have allegations to make they should be specific in nature and not generalized, as has been the case in the past and again today.

I should also add that I am surpirsed at the remarks of the hon. member for Central Nova in agreeing with the statement of Mr. Wilson in his article that ministers of the Crown should sanction covert and illegal acts. That is what happened in the United States when the Watergate issue was raised.

Mr. O'Sullivan: They also stonewalled in the United States.

Mr. Lee: What kind of stonewalling are you talking about here today? The Solicitor General has given an answer and made a statement in the House. Did the President of the United States have to stand up in Congress and make a statement? Did not the former solicitor general, the Minister of Supply and Services, give a statement? What kind of stonewalling is that?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: There was a statement in the United States too.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Don't defend too hard, Art. You have a bad case.

Mr. Lee: The hon. member says we have a bad case. Let me close by saying I am really surprised at the remarks made by the hon. member for Central Nova. I certainly hope that under this government we would never authorize covert illegal actions.

● (0200)

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I was not going to speak tonight. I told the parliamentary secretary it was not my intention to speak unless he spoke. Since he has taken that option, I thought I might just cap off this debate and make a few remarks with respect to what has transpired. I will do it very quickly.

I want to start off by expressing on behalf of my colleagues our great appreciation to the staff who have stayed here long hours and have worked hard doing so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Regardless of our party, we appreciate their extra endeavour tonight on this very important debate.

The parliamentary secretary makes reference to the fact that somehow the theory of this particular government is that ministers are not responsible, and members of parliament must not ask questions relating to the RCMP and the Solicitor General's functions at any time. That is the only conclusion which comes from the various discussions, representations, and statements made on the part of government spokesmen tonight. It ill behooves the parliamentary secretary, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), and the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) to make any critical remarks with respect to the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) concerning his role in this whole affair. This debate arises by virtue of the initiative and persistence of the hon. member for Central Nova.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The parliamentary secretary said that we should not be asking questions in respect of the RCMP. This is a very interesting proposition. Of course he is going to stand now and make a facetious point of order.

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, I did not say that. I said that they should check and verify things before they ask questions. That is only reasonable. I also said that they should continue to pursue with vigour, but that they should do so reasonably.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: This is precisely the kind of responsible questioning which has led the Speaker of this House to come to the conclusion that this particular matter requires a special debate under Standing Order 26.

As to any particular suggestion on the part of the parliamentary secretary, the Minister of Supply and Services or the Solicitor General that we have not been responsible with respect to questioning in this House, that is unfounded. The New Democratic Party, the Social Credit and one of their own backbenchers have asked questions with respect to this particular break-in. If the parliamentary secretary wants to go to caucus and chastize, as does the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal), then let him do it in private and not waste the time of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The simple conclusion one can reach with respect to this matter has two aspects. First, all along during the course of the questioning there was a resistence and a repugnance on the part of the government with respect to questions raised by opposition members as to the circumstances, the background, and the ministerial involvement concerning the break-in at L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec.

Only this month the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) attempted to split hairs and suggest to the House without equivocation that the Minister of Supply and Services, the then solicitor general, had absolutely no knowledge that the RCMP were involved because the letter which was sent to his office only referred to police. It was subsequently pointed out to the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General that there was no simple deduction which could be made by the Prime Minister on the basis of his discussions with the Minister of Supply and Services. That was because there was a telegram attached to that letter. It was addressed to the Assistant Commissioner of the RCMP in Montreal. It specifically asked about their involvement and thereby implicated the RCMP.

Then we have the Solicitor General telling us in his prepared statement that he is satisfied that the Minister of Supply and Services knew nothing until March of 1976, based on his investigation. In the next paragraph he has the audacity and temerity to point out the fact that there was a discussion and a consideration by the Minister of Supply and Services with respect to the allegation of the illegal break-in of the APLQ directly after that break-in. The Minister of Supply and Services answered tonight that he could not believe this particular proposition. The combination of that peculiar logic and rationale stretches our incredulity. If you combine with that the attempt of everyone in the government to make us believe that there was no knowledge of any RCMP involvement, it cries out for an independent inquiry into this whole proposition. The suggestions made by hon. members on this side are justifiable and should be acted upon.

The Solicitor General has made reference to the Quebec inquiry. He made a suggestion that the Alberta situation was somehow similar. There is a very, very important distinction in that situation because in Alberta there is no involvement of a cabinet minister. In this particular case it is not only a question of RCMP involvement, of wrongdoing, and a possibility of cover-up in the senior echelons after being told of the illegal break-in, but the instance extends directly to the doorstep of the Minister of Supply and Services.

The Minister of Supply and Services takes exception to my statement in this House, which I do not retract one bit. In my experience in this House of Commons since 1974 this man has been involved in three scandalous instances. The word "scandal" covers a wide sector of inappropriate, incompetent, and wrongful acts, in my view. We were involved in an explanation by the Minister of Supply and Services with respect to the Hamilton Harbourgate matter for which he bears no responsibility because his office staff failed to communicate the information received from the Controller in Hamilton. Next we had the Lockheed procurement situation. What is not scandalous about a billion dollar contract which is not reduced to writing in a department responsible for that particular transaction? Probably that was the only thing which preoccupied him in that department. Finally, we have an admitted illegality with respect to the RCMP break-in of the APLQ.

In each case the Minister of Supply and Services has used the same device. He does not accept responsibility for what has transpired. He sloughs off the blame. In this case he blamed the RCMP; he has blamed his executive assistant; and he has fired Larry Stopforth. The same pattern always develops every time this man gets into trouble, and now he is telling us to accept that he was not guilty of any act of commission or omission. As far as our party is concerned, that is not acceptable.

As far as I am concerned, if the government fails to take steps to have an inquiry with respect to this incident, there will be an outcry from the people of Canada that the government will hear for some time to come.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have one or two brief comments to make. I find it somewhat regrettable to have to rise this evening to level accusations having listened to the personal defence statements of prominent members of the government in recent weeks, recent months. I have listened to them trying to rationalize their positions with respect to matters that are of concern to the Canadian public.

I rise to pose at the close of this debate one primary question, and I direct it to the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) who has had the courtesy to remain in his seat after one who used to be a very dear friend, and I hope who is still an honourable friend, has left the Chamber. I hope he left the Chamber because he was tired at 2.15 in the morning. I rise to ask a primary question on the responsibility of the government in using acts of parliament respecting the Canadian military in pursuit of information, the use of the Canadian Armed Forces which, as we all know, is our primary force of security, and the use of the military in terms of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

In recent years we have indirectly done an enormous injustice to the RCMP as a result of the improper use of what the government considers to be its requirements with respect to security and intelligence information.

I had no intention of entering this debate at all. It is outside of my competence, but it is not outside of my knowledge as regards the degree to which the government over the years had used, deliberately and with malicious intent, its powers to affect the reputation of the RCMP and its internal security investigation capacities. It has maligned the reputation of the force in the eyes of the public to such a degree that the press today accuses us of being anti-RCMP.

I am speaking of the degree to which the Solicitor General and his predecessors have acquiesced in the abuse of national trust by directions which have removed cabinet from public responsibility. I think that this is what many of us object to, and if the Solicitor General is not aware of what I am talking about he should apprise himself of the degree to which the military, the PMO and internal security devices have been used to direct the RCMP to do certain work for him. He should apprise himself of the damage that he and his colleagues are doing. I suggest he do that, because only then can we come to some rationalization of what is taking place. So over-zealous is he about the rights of Canadians that he has allowed the abuse to result in accusations. I suggest that the Solicitor General apprise himself of the facts, and if he does know what is going on in terms of his internal security, and I suspect he does not—

Mr. Fox: Make up your mind.

Mr. Forrestall: I suspect he does not. I ask him this because I have some respect for him; at least I have had it up to this point in time. Perhaps after this evening I will have to review that conclusion. I suggest that he apprise himself thoroughly of what went on before he joined the august ranks of the Treasury benches of this government which he supports. Let him find out what has been done in the name of justice as perceived by his leader. Let him find out about the misadventures that have been blamed upon the national police force of this country that have been perpetrated by directions, through other security analysis groups, to the RCMP, the extent to which the RCMP has been used by other forces. I think he has the capacity to apprise himself of these facts, and if he does not he will be a disappointment not only to his own colleagues on the back benches.

I do not know what the Solicitor General's gesture means. If he cares to stand up and tell me, we can go on to discuss it for the next two or three hours. I suggest that the gestures of the Solicitor General are rather meaningless.

• (0220)

The point I am trying to make is that I reject and react against the degree to which the Canadian military has been used to direct our national police force in the types of involvements that it has become engrossed with in recent years. As far as I am concerned successive solicitors general have denied that, for example, the telephones of members of parliament have ever been tapped. It would be a curious spectacle to see the Solicitor General stand in his place now on a question of privilege or on a point of order and deny that that has ever happened, because it would give me great delight to demonstrate to him that he would not know what he was talking about if he were to deny it. It would give me even greater delight to expose the fraud and the nonsense that I have listened to for the last ten or 12 years from successive solicitors general with respect to these questions.

I have been lied to in this House by ministers of the Crown when they, to my knowledge, have had explicit facts in front of them with respect to the truth. Therefore we can hardly be faulted for being skeptical with respect to some of the responses we have received from the other side of the Chamber this evening. The motion, which is in front of us, is a very serious one.

The Solicitor General is still here. I doubt very much that he is still here because of respect for parliament. I suspect, rather, that he is here because the great sacrifice is worth it, because he can sit and laugh at people who rise in their places to express grievous concern about the arrogance of the government and the extent to which the government opposite has gone to subvert rights in this country that many of us hold to be very valid and very true. Without the protection of these rights this country will not survive. I think the minister knows of what I am speaking.

Sometimes we talk at great length and in great circles without bothering to talk about what in fact is bothering us. It has bothered me for many years that the government has deliberately set out to establish a system of virtual espionage. The government condones it and finds ways of removing itself from direct responsibility, and its members sit in their places early in the morning and laugh and chuckle at what are in fact very grave matters with respect to the capacity of Canadians to continue to believe in the proposition that the central government should remain strong in this country, and I wonder sometimes about the smiles and the arrogance of knowing that there are those of us on this side who do know differently and yet who, for a variety of reasons, are not permitted to speak out.

I come back to my essential point. As the new Solicitor General goes forward and becomes well established and well accepted in his position, he should be conscious and continue to be aware of the concerns some Canadians have about the impact that he can have with respect to decisions taken by the government he supports, and with respect to the grave influence that he has on the security and intelligence work of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and of elements of the Canadian Armed Forces today. I reject the minister's smile because I have been one of those who have been subjected to exactly that influence.

If the Solicitor General is curious, I shall give him a hint so that he can narrow his search. This goes back to the days when we were debating in this House a peculiar piece of legislation called the Canadian Forces Reorganization Act in 1965-66. It was not yesterday, but it was not too long ago either. The progressive degree to which the government, for some pathological reason not discernible to most Canadians, bothers to go to the trouble to direct the Canadian military to overtake, I suggest, and direct the security intelligence work of the national police force, is a matter of some concern to at least some of us in this Chamber, and I hope the Solicitor General can suppress his smiles and giggles in this respect.

Mr. Boulanger: Who is smiling anyway?

Mr. Forrestall: Prosper, go out and have another cup of coffee. You will probably need it. It is 2.30 in the morning.

Mr. Boulanger: That's a good idea.

Mr. Forrestall: Sooner or later the government has got to be told to wake up and be aware. There are those of us in this country who reject the presence of the Canadian Armed Forces in our penitentiaries, for example, for the purposes of quelling riots, or for the purpose of serving one social will over another. If that is the acceptable thing, then we should change the role of the Canadian military in our society and our structure. But we should do it openly and do it through dialogue.

I think this is an appropriate time to say these things. It is early in the morning. There is probably nobody in the press gallery. There are certainly very few people in the public galleries.

Obviously there is nobody here of any great consequence. Prosper keeps lecturing us. The Solicitor General keeps smiling. The distinguished sailor from Saskatchewan, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale), for whom I have great personal respect, keeps smiling.

In conclusion, we must be very careful in our inner circles, in our very private circles, in our very inner sanctoriums, or whatever they are called, where we make public decisions, that we do not remove our capacity to get at decisions about the security of our country and the methods by which we continue to ensure that the security of our country is under control or in good hands. We must be very careful about the degree to which we use the Canadian military in that pursuit because, to the degree that we do, we impair national unity in the final analysis. This does not enhance it.

● (0230)

I should like to give a scenario or two for the Solicitor General but might come dangerously close to saying things I should not. However, I am sufficiently concerned about the debates of the last two or three years to say to the minister that I deplore the degree to which he has impaired the reputation and the capacity of our national police force to be an effective security and intelligence group within our nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) on a point of order.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate and understand the very real concern the hon. member has in these areas, and the great expertise he has which has benefited the House over the years particularly in the area of defence. I wish to assure him there is no malicious abuse by the government of the role of the security services. I think a great part of the debate today has centered around some suggestion by members opposite that there was insufficient control. If that is the general view of hon. members opposite I assume there would not be, as a corollary, any wilful abuse.

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might prevail upon my colleagues for two or three minutes to pose a couple of questions to the minister, if he would consent to answer them. I had hoped to have the opportunity to ask them—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The minister has already spoken so he cannot answer questions. The only thing the hon. member can do is contribute to the debate.

Mr. Beatty: Perhaps I could then put two or three rhetorical questions that the minister or any member of the government might answer. They were not answered during the debate.

One of the distressing aspects of this is that so much of the government's case has centered upon the fact that the former solicitor general felt it should be self-evident that it was not necessary to reply to the letter he received requesting information about whether the RCMP had been involved in the break-in. He indicated that any member of the House would have reacted in the same way. According to the statement made by the present Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) last Friday, however, the letter was sent to the former solicitor general on October 11, 1972. It was brought to the attention of the RCMP by the assistant to the minister, Lieutenant Colonel John R. Cameron, in order that a reply could be prepared for the solicitor general's signature.

After that letter was sent to the RCMP on October 26, 1972, the RCMP wrote to the minister's assistant recommending that no acknowledgment be made, without providing reasons for that recommendation. The question I should like to leave in the air this evening, and perhaps pursue at a later date with the minister, is whether he has personally seen that exchange of correspondence between the assistant to the solicitor general and the RCMP. I note that the minister nods his head in assent. If he has seen it, would he be prepared to inform the House who the official was who signed the letter to the then solicitor general on behalf of the RCMP, recommending that no reply be made to the letter to the solicitor general?

Next, I wonder if the Solicitor General would be prepared to bring copies of the correspondence to the House tomorrow to be tabled so that it would be on the public record.

The reason this information is so important is that each of us receives correspondence from individuals and organizations every day. There may be instances when we feel it is improper for us to give a complete reply to questions asked, perhaps because matters are before the courts or we do not have the relevant information. As a matter of procedure, however, virtually any member would at least do any individual or group who wrote the courtesy of explaining why an answer would not be forthcoming.

If, as the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) indicated, the reason he did not write was that the Minister of Justice in Quebec, Mr. Choquette, had stated publicly that the RCMP was not involved and that he accepted Mr. Choquette's statement, I would be curious to know why he did not write back to the organization and say that the Minister of Justice in Quebec had looked into the matter and determined there was no involvement by the federal police force and that he could answer categorically that that was not the case. If his concern was that an investigation was going to take place to determine whether there was any federal involvement, could he not then have written to the group saying it would be improper for him to comment because there was an investigation going on into the allegations they had made?

If the Solicitor General were prepared to table that correspondence we would be able to see at what level within the RCMP a recommendation was made that there be no acknowledgement of that letter. It would also allow us to pursue further questions on what degree of knowledge there was within the RCMP, and what participation there was in suppressing information about the illegal break-in. If the Solicitor General would present that exchange of correspondence tomorrow it would help resolve these unanswered questions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 26(13) I am satisfied that the debate has concluded and I therefore declare the motion carried.

Mr. Prud'homme: On division.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This House stands adjourned until today at two p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 2.39 a.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Special Order.

PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO BACKGROUND OF MINISTER'S STATEMENTS INTO BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in light of the extraordinary debate and statements yesterday which unfortunately raised more questions than they answered about the integrity of Canadian government institutions, I seek the unanimous consent of the House of Commons to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a question of urgent and pressing necessity. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty):

That the committee of the privy council, by order, instruct the Chief Justice of Canada to appoint three justices from among the justices of the provincial superior courts, the Federal Court of Canada and the Supreme Court of Canada, who shall be constituted by the committee of the privy council to be commissioners under Part I of the Inquiries Act to inquire fully into all of the circumstances alluded to in the statement of the Solicitor General to the House of Commons on Friday, June 17, 1977 and in the statements by the Minister of Supply and Services in the House of Commons on Tuesday, June 21, 1977 and the interpretation placed on the doctrine of ministerial responsibility by the Minister of Supply and Services and any matter bearing upon or related thereto, and to consider such other matters as may appear to the commissioners to be relevant and to report fully thereon.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED INQUIRY INTO SECURITY OPERATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, considering that the government has not admitted any political wrongdoing, I am not surprised that it did not agree to that motion. To us it was a completely acceptable motion under Standing Order 43. My motion under Standing Order 43 is not as broad in scope as the one proposed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), and in view of the government's expressed concern about this issue I hope hon. members opposite will agree to my motion.

• (1410)

Considering that the RCMP has taken part in a criminal break-in in Montreal and also that there was a persistent and successful attempt by the RCMP to conceal that fact for many years, and considering furthermore that other incidents involving the RCMP in other parts of Canada raise the question about the possibility of a continuing policy of illegal activity and concealment from political supervision, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instructs the government to establish forthwith a Royal Commission which would investigate security operations procedures of the RCMP and the process of accountability of the RCMP to the office of the Solicitor General.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

GRANT TO NEIL LEDRAY WHILE STILL EMPLOYED BY GOVERNMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that a Mr. Neil Ledray, head of the Federal Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, municipal engineering section in Saskatoon, qualified for a $90,000 DREE grant to establish his own business while still in the employ of the government, and who on previous occasions was instrumental in blocking attempts by a reputable firm in Toronto, C.M.S. Equipment Limited, to obtain similar assistance towards exactly the same type of business operation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the Minister of Regional and Economic Expansion along with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development take all appropriate steps to rectify this unfair practice involving quite obviously a conflict of interest by a government official.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Presentation for debate of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Oral Questions

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR COMPENSATION FOR EMPLOYEES WORKING IN BOTH OFFICIAL LANGUAGES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), I move:

That this House notes that the statement on bilingualism made yesterday by the Secretary of State included nothing to implement the commitment made to federal public servants that by the end of June there would be an announcement concerning adequate compensation for those who work in both official languages, and this House therefore calls on the President of the Treasury Board to keep the government's commitment and make such an announcement not later than June 30, so that this important issue can be resolved without delay.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43 unanimous consent of the House is required for the presentation of such a motion for debate. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE AND MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Leader of the Opposition has moved a motion under Standing Order 43 setting out specific terms for an inquiry into the Montreal break-in at l'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec and related incidents. Given the legislative timetable, the mood of this House and the consensus emerging in the House, does the Prime Minister not think it in the best interests of parliament and the government to call for such an inquiry?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacKay: That is very interesting because on June 15, 1976 at page 14500 of Hansard during the capital punishment debate the Prime Minister said:

It is essential that people have confidence in the law, essential that they have confidence in the ability of the legal process to protect them against the lawless.

I am certain the Prime Minister remembers this quote. Consistent with this statement and the concern expressed by Commissioner Nadon in St. John's yesterday will the Prime Minister not reconsider his approach and have assessed the degree of ministerial and administrative responsibility which is becoming increasingly obvious in this affair and not leave the whole brunt of it to the RCMP as far as accepting blame is concerned.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the intention is not to have the RCMP bear the brunt of the blame. I think that is the effect of the questions of hon. members opposite in the last few days. If the hon. member wants to blame the government he was invited yesterday by the former Solicitor General to make a specific charge against him.

Mr. MacKay: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister takes this doctrine that every time the opposition has to blame the government—and goodness knows there is enough to blame them for—they have to make a specific charge. He is introducing a new doctrine. I want to remind the Prime Minister of another statement he made. I am sure he appreciates being reminded of his deathless quotes. On February 7 this year at page 2777 of Hansard the Prime Minister said:

I do not think the people suspect the RCMP of conducting themselves as the FBI do.

I share his hope and his conviction but is he prepared to help assess some of the political responsibility for this whole unsavoury mess which it is becoming increasingly evident is not an isolated incident and is directly attributable to the incompetence of a succession of Solicitors General? Will the Prime Minister not reconsider and tell the House clearly and unequivocally how he can abandon the responsibility for the federal police force on a matter of national security to a provincial inquiry?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member pinpoints the issue to one of political responsibility. If that is the case surely this is the place, the House of Commons, where political responsibility should be debated, as it was at great length last night, I understand.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: And with great effect. There are lots of sombre faces on the government side.

BREAK-IN AT PRAXIS CORPORATION—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON INFORMATION SUPPLIED BY MEMBER

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. As the House knows, I met with him on Monday to lay before him certain information relating to the extra-parliamentary opposition concept and the related break-in and fire at Praxis Corporation in Toronto. I expressed the hope to the Solicitor General at that time that he would be in a position today to assess the validity of the information I gave him, to tell the House today in general terms what he has done about it, and what the results of his investigation so far have been.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated yesterday during the question period the hon. member met me and gave me some information which he believes tends to indicate the occurrence of an illegal break-in at the premises of Praxis Corporation in Toronto. I have directed my officials to bring all the information brought to my attention to the attention of the attorney general of the province of Ontario, since, if an illegal break-in had taken place it would have been an illegal act committed in Ontario and, in the circumstances, the matter would come under the jurisdiction of the attorney general of Ontario. I have also directed my officials to examine the information, to determine if there are any implications concerning the department of the Solicitor General but have not yet received a report on the matter.

Mr. Oberle: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am concerned about two distinct infractions, one of them, of course, being the crime of breaking and entering which, as the Solicitor General rightly says comes under the jurisdiction of the attorney general of Ontario. However, an investigation was carried out in the interest of national security, which certainly falls under the jurisdiction of the Solicitor General of Canada. I ask the Solicitor General, how much more time does he need in order to make a statement to the House on these allegations, and what will be the nature of his further investigation?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I think I have already indicated to the House a number of times that the RCMP was not involved in any way with the break-in at Praxis—

Mr. Dick: What about the offence of possessing stolen goods?

Mr. Fox: —Corporation. Therefore I do not think the rest of the question follows.

Mr. Broadbent: What about the possession of stolen documents?

Mr. Fox: Perhaps if hon. members would care to refresh their memories by reading what I said yesterday, as reported in Hansard, they would see that the documents in question were turned over to the Metropolitan Toronto police department.

Mr. Broadbent: After seven years.

Mr. Fox: Yes, but no matter what the length of time is they were turned over.

Mr. Broadbent: Come on!

Mr. Dick: It is still possession of stolen property.

Mr. Fox: The Crown attorney in the province of Ontario looked at the documents and concluded that there was no illegal action on the part of the RCMP in that regard. I do not know if hon. members are suggesting—

Mr. Broadbent: Who kept the stolen property for seven years? Was that not an offence?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Why don't you lay an information?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, some hon. members of this House obviously would like to substitute their judgment for that of the Crown attorney. As far as we are concerned on my side of the House, we are willing to take the advice of the law officers of the Crown.

BREAK-IN AT PRAXIS CORPORATION—INVESTIGATION OF THOSE INVOLVED IN DESTRUCTION OF DOCUMENTS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like particularly to ask the Solicitor General if the RCMP officer, whose name I gave him on Monday and who is alleged to have been directly involved in the conversion of the documents, has been investigated. Further, has the minister investigated the already admitted involvement of Inspector Venner in the destruction of the original documents stolen from Praxis Corporation?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not too sure what the hon. member is getting at. At some point he suggested that someone would have been in the Department of the Solicitor General—he mentioned the Solicitor General's office—who would have been involved in some way in the Machiavellian scheme which he described and in which he apparently believes. With respect to the precise names he has given me, no one in the Solicitor General's department at that time bore those names. However, I want to make sure that neither the first name nor the family name is in question. Once I have completed the inquiries, I will be pleased to make a report to the House. If, of course, there is a question concerning an investigation which the attorney general of the province of Ontario ought to be undertaking, the appropriate course would be to have that investigation carried out by the attorney general of the province of Ontario rather than on the floor of the House.

● (1420)

ALLEGATIONS OF ILLEGAL BREAK-INS BY FORCE—REASON FOR REFUSAL TO HOLD INQUIRY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister aware that during the past 24 hours a former RCMP corporal has said that illegal break-ins have been a continuing practice for a number of years by the RCMP. That statement flatly contradicts statements and assurances coming from the top level of the RCMP in recent weeks. Keeping in mind that senior officials in the RCMP and several ministers of the Crown systematically concealed knowledge about a break-in from the government, I would like to ask the Prime Minister what apparently changed his mind in the past 48 hours or overnight about the need for a specific inquiry into the accountability of the RCMP to its political authority?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have constantly taken the view that the break-in in Montreal, which was an illegal act by an RCMP officer, was an aberration, an incident, and an isolated one. I have had repeated assurances from the Commissioner of the RCMP and from the Director General of Security that this was an isolated incident and it was in no way a general or special practice of the RCMP to have break-ins. This was discussed very clearly with them in my office in the spring of last year and with the then Solicitor General, at which time I told the House we had considered an investigation into the kind of matter that the hon. leader of the NDP is talking about. We had these specific assurances. It is these assurances which have been repeated by the present Solicitor General and by myself. This assertion quoted by the leader of the NDP is obviously in contradiction of this.

Apparently there is an allegation by a former RCMP member that there have been generalized illegalities. Naturally, the Solicitor General will look into these allegations and see if there is any truth to them. If so, we will have to take further action. I am still going on the assumption that the RCMP acts constantly within the framework of the law and that the incident in Montreal was an aberration, an exception, which is not excused or condoned, but it was isolated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the recently found faith of the Prime Minister in the RCMP—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: —is a little disturbing in view of the information that we now have. The Prime Minister, the present Solicitor General and the former Solicitor General in statements made within the past three days of sittings of this House have all intimated at various times serious degrees of feeling of unease with regard to the accountability question. Considering that it was the RCMP at the top level in Ottawa some four years ago which refused to tell a series of Solicitors General of their own illegal activity, why is the Prime Minister now prepared to accept from the same sources their testimony only that no systematic wrongdoing has been undertaken in the past or is continuing now?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am not accepting their testimony only. Hon. members opposite have made various allegations. The government, through the Solicitor General, has inquired into them. If the hon. member has other allegations to make, let us hear them from him. He has just quoted a statement made by a former RCMP officer to the press. Naturally we will inquire into that. I am not just taking the RCMP Commissioner's word for it. We are looking into every possible accusation put forth from any source on either side of the House or across the country.

Naturally, we want to make sure that the RCMP act within the law and that when they do not they are properly punished. But we can do no more than accept the word of these people who have dedicated themselves to the public service in the police force of Canada until it is flatly belied by some specific charge. Such charges can be inquired into. The Solicitor General has welcomed information from across the aisle and he will look into any allegations which are made.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

ACCOUNTABILITY OF FORCE TO POLITICAL AUTHORITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): The Prime Minister knows that the method of investigating such allegations in the past has been to require the RCMP to look into the charges made against him. What reason do we have for believing that the investigation will be any more systematic or fair-minded than that? The Prime Minister and other ministers have referred in the last few days to the inquiry which is going on in the province of Quebec, conducted by the government of that province, and the terms of reference of that inquiry do not include the possibility of looking into the question of the accountability of the RCMP to the political authorities in Ottawa. Is the Prime Minister satisfied that this important matter has been adequately dealt with in the last few days and that there is absolutely no need for an inquiry into this aspect?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I cannot say that the question of accountability has been completely settled to the satisfaction of the government. We indicated in the House the other day that certain measures had been taken and that others would be taken in the fall pursuant to Judge Marin's inquiry and recommendations. I am open to suggestions on that matter. I certainly would not expect a commissioner appointed by the government of Quebec, even if it were within his terms of reference, to make recommendations to us as to how we should interface with the RCMP.

Mr. Broadbent: That is exactly why I am suggesting an inquiry.

Mr. Trudeau: Precisely, Mr. Speaker. I do not think an inquiry such as is proposed by the hon. member would be any more enlightening than if members of the House and of the government, in a constructive mood, seek to find ways of increasing accountability. I think this is a political question. I do not see the great advantage—

Mr. Fraser: It is a judicial question.

Mr. Trudeau: The question of accountability is not a judicial question.

Mr. Fraser: The question of how you determine the truth is a judicial question.

Mr. Trudeau: So I understand. The hon. member for Vancouver South wants to follow some other alley. He is, of course, entitled to rise in his place and ask a question—if he can articulate one.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: But if he wants to remain on the subject he must realize that the present question and answer have to do with political accountability of the force to the minister, and not the question of the truth. That is another subject with which the minister is preoccupied. The hon. member should reflect a little more on the question of the truth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

STATUTORY HOLIDAYS

POSSIBILITY FOR EMPLOYEES TO CHOOSE BETWEEN ST. JEAN BAPTISTE DAY AND CIVIC HOLIDAY

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the President of the Treasury Board.

At the beginning of May, the Treasury Board decided that federal civil servants working in Hull would have to take the day off in the province where there was a statutory holiday. The federal civil servants complained that they would rather take the day off on the first Monday of August instead of June 24. The Treasury Board has reconsidered the matter and decided to leave the choice to civil servants working in Hull so that they can take the day off on June 24 or on the first Monday of August. However, Quebec civil servants working in Ottawa were expecting to be dealt with in the same way, that is to have a choice between the two holidays. It now appears that such will not be the case and that they will have to take the day off in August and not on June 24, St. Jean Baptiste Day. Could the President of the Treasury Board tell the House whether the problem has been solved, because it will soon be June 24 and if not will he take some steps to render justice to those employees? I think that such a gesture would be an indication that we really wish to live peacefully in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the most recent decision is based exactly on the final comment made by the hon. member with regard to trying to find a reasonable temporary solution, at least, to celebrate the day in good harmony within the province. Indeed, we have given the option to the federal employees in Hull in the province of Quebec to take June 24. That same option had not existed in Ottawa and is not going to be extended to the Ottawa side. But even that temporary decision of leaving the option open on the Quebec side is intended to apply only to this June 24 and not the following year. This decision has been made in full consultation with the public service union bargaining agents and we hope that we are looking forward to a happy celebration of both holidays when they take place.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, considering that this is an important matter, can the minister tell the House whether during the week he received representations from the union representatives of civil servants for the granting of what I enunciated in my first question, and in the circumstances, could the minister also tell us whether he considers that these representations are fair and whether he will give effect to them for June 24?

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, that is the decision we have taken and it was based on what we considered to be very fair representation by the representatives of the public service bargaining agents.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LETTERS TO SOLICITOR GENERAL AND NAME OF AUTHOR

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General and it is one of a number of questions which were left unanswered from last evening's debate. Last night I asked the Solicitor General whether he would table a copy of the exchange of correspondence between the office of the former solicitor general and the RCMP which led to the extraordinary decision by the solicitor general not to even acknowledge the letter from the APLQ alleging RCMP complicity in the illegal break-in. Is the minister now prepared to table those letters and, if not, why not?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am, of course, willing to take the hon. member's suggestions under consideration but I should point out that I would at that point be revealing the name of a public servant. I would be very pleased to tell the hon. member, in reply to at least part of his question, that the letter was signed by the then deputy director of security intelligence, who held the rank of assistant commissioner in the force.

Mr. Beatty: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. This exchange of correspondence is very germane to this whole question of trying to determine why the former solicitor general did not take the proper course of action. The Solicitor General has given us the rank of the individual within the RCMP who wrote to the former solicitor general. Will he now disclose that individual's name, and would he explain to the House whether or not he has determined whether that individual was aware of the RCMP involvement in the APLQ break-in and, if so, why he withheld this information from the then solicitor general?

Mr. Fox: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I missed the hon. member's question. So far as knowledge within the force of the break-in is concerned, I think my statement in the House on Friday was extremely explicit on that point.

REASON FOR FAILURE TO REPLY TO CHARGE OF ILLEGAL BREAK-IN BY L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The minister did not explain whether he was able to determine if that individual knew about the illegal break-in and, if so, why he withheld the information from the then solicitor general. In view of the fact that the Minister of Supply and Services has stated that the reason he did not even reply to the APLQ's letter alleging RCMP involvement in the illegal break-in was that the matter fell under provincial jurisdiction and that the incident was being investigated by the Montreal police, has the minister had any plausible explanation from his colleague as to why he did not follow the proper course of action by replying to the APLQ's charges with a letter stating that these extremely serious charges were being investigated by the Montreal police?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, once again I believe that if the hon. member goes back to my statement of last Friday he will find that my statement is very explicit indeed in that regard.

Mr. Beatty: It is not at all.

DOMINION DAY

PROPOSAL THAT LEADERS OF POLITICAL PARTIES PARTICIPATE IN CELEBRATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It has to do with the celebration of Dominion Day and—

Some hon. Members: Canada Day!

Mr. Alexander: He said Dominion Day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —it is a very commendable course which has been arranged. We started it in 1957 and this is going to be the greatest on record. So that it will represent all of Canada and not be regarded as in any way partisan, and in view of the fact that the Governor General, under all the circumstances, will not be able to make a speech to the people of Canada on behalf of the Queen, would the Prime Minister consider having, along with himself, the leaders of the other parties speak for a few minutes on a national broadcast so as to bring about a sense of national consciousness and unity?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will gladly look into that suggestion. I confess I am not aware of the program for July 1, but I will look at that. I would also underline to the right hon. gentleman that the House leaders of the various parties are consulting each other as to the possibility of putting two days aside next week to have a debate on national unity.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Have it on Dominion Day?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I stand corrected; the two days would not be a debate, it would be rather a collective contribution on the subject of national unity. The right hon. member talked about a broadcast. I must remind him that we on this side have been trying to get broadcasting of the proceedings of the House for a couple of years, but it is his colleagues who have been opposing that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if evasiveness were a virtue the Prime Minister, in the answer he endeavoured to give me, would be a saint. I am simply asking him not to have it as a partisan thing with him speaking as the leader of this nation, which he is not—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: —either on this occasion or on any occasion. I am simply asking the Prime Minister whether, to make this national event representative of all political parties which are represented in the House, he will have them with him to speak on that occasion—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacFarlane: Who is your leader?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the right hon. member might be permitted to conclude his question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the unanimity with which the orchestrated chorus opposite interrupt indicates that they think the Prime Minister is the leader of this nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1440)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in this great debate—

Mr. Paproski: You are our saviour, Pierre.

Mr. Hees: How was it in that manger?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in this great debate about who is the leader of the nation, I suppose I could do nothing better than take a leaf out of the right hon. gentleman's book and see who on July 1, 1957, 1958, 1959, 1960 and 1961 spoke for the nation on what they had.

An hon. Member: Nobody did.

Mr. Trudeau: If nobody did, I am disappointed. I would have hoped in those days—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I suppose that was the trouble with our history during that period—nobody was leading the nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I see our excellent Secretary of State trying to provide the answer to this question. As he is responsible for the program on July 1, perhaps I could pass the question on to him, with your permission, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to volunteer to undertake to look into the question and particularly to study those precedents from 1957 on to see if the right hon. gentleman was suggesting that procedure at that time, as he is today.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, those were national events, and no leader of the nation in the position of Prime Minister was speaking at all, because it was a national event. What is going to happen on Dominion Day is that it is going to be a kind of political partisan venture.

BILINGUALISM

GOVERNMENT POLICY OF FREEDOM OF CHOICE FOR LANGUAGE OF INSTRUCTION IN SCHOOLS

Mr. Alan Martin (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the varying interpretations that appear to have been given by members of the media to the document entitled: "A National Understanding", tabled in this House yesterday by the Secretary of State, will the Prime Minister reaffirm the commitment of this government to the principle of freedom of choice for all Canadians in selecting the official language of instruction for the education of their children?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for asking me the question because I—

Mr. Hees: Because you set it up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: I have done that sort of thing myself. That is nothing new.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings that I only have one straight man in the House, and that is him.

Mr. Hees: That is your trouble. You are not good enough to operate with just one straight man, Pierre.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure the colloquial expression "straight man" is quite appropriate in this particular case.

Mr. Hees: Stick to the straight stuff.

Mr. Clark: Lay a charge, Pierre.

Mr. Hees: The umpire just called strike three, Pierre.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Sit down, you are hurting the nation.

Mr. Hees: Now, get on with leading the nation, please.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that we are going to have a heck of a good party later today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I was beginning to get a little worried that we would never get to it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Don't you think we are already there?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the question was extremely serious, and I want to emphasize to the House that the paper tabled yesterday by the Secretary of State had as an absolute principle the freedom of choice of parents in selecting the language of instruction of their children.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: That is basic to the philosophy of this party and this government.

Mr. Hees: Of all provinces?

Mr. Trudeau: Of all provinces, Mr. Speaker. It would certainly be a mistake to over-emphasize the fact that in the administrative application of this principle, there are delays which are necessary in some cases. It is obvious the freedom of choice of a French-speaking parent in some parts of Ontario is not absolute. The principle is absolute, but it might take some time to provide the schools and the teachers. The principle remains absolute, and we hope that emphasis on this administrative delay does not deter people from realizing that the principle is and must be absolute.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REASON FOR DELAY IN APPLICATION OF FREEDOM OF CHOICE PRINCIPLE IN QUEBEC

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. Leader of the Opposition has the floor for the purpose of asking a supplementary question.

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My supplementary is to the Prime Minister, but I require a moment to check yesterday's Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister made reference exclusively, when he talked about a delay in the application of that principle which he has just enunciated, to problems relating to facilities. Yesterday in this House the Secretary of State added another reason for a potential delay. Excuse me for a moment. I should like to be courteous to the Secretary of State by citing him precisely, but I cannot find that exact reference. However, the reference was that the delay in the province of Quebec of the application of that principle was due to the sense of insecurity of French-speaking Canadians relative to the future of their language. Will the Prime Minister clarify for the House as to whether there will be delays in the application of the principle, which he has enunciated, in the province of Quebec for that reason?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition is absolutely right. The principle is absolute, but in the administrative application of it there will be some cause for delay in various parts of the country for various reasons. The paper states quite clearly in the case of the province of Quebec that the present government of Quebec has evoked the principle of insecurity of the French-speaking society in Canada, particularly in that province.

If the hon. Leader of the Opposition looks at the white paper, he will see words to the effect that this opinion on the insecurity is not shared by all and is debatable. Indeed I think it is a debatable question. Further facts and figures will be brought to light which show the justification for the delay evoked by some Quebec authorities and will show that perhaps they are not as great statistically as they claim. Those who govern the province today are afraid of this problem of insecurity. That is why there is some provision in the white paper for delay, if it is justifiable, as it has to be in the province of Ontario and other provinces and as it might be in the province of Quebec. With the principle being there, we will make sure no false excuses are brought by anyone, at least to qualify the principles we put forward.

● (1450)

Mr. Clark: The precise language of the Secretary of State yesterday was:

We understand therefore that in that context—

The context of insecurity.

—it may be regrettably necessary not to persist now with the immediate implementation of that principle of free choice for the education of one's children in either official language.

That is the end of the quotation. The minister was speaking of Quebec. Can the Prime Minister, in light of his answer and of that of the Secretary of State yesterday, tell us what timeframe he is thinking of, when, in his view, it might be possible to persist with the immediate implementation of the principle of free choice?

Mr. Trudeau: It is indeed difficult to give a particular timeframe because so much depends on the actions of the provinces in this instance. As in the first example I gave, I suppose it would be the time necessary to build schools and to provide the kind of education to French speaking Canadians in the other provinces that English speaking Canadians in Quebec have enjoyed for the past 150 years. So this catch-up in the other provinces depends a great deal on the will of those provinces to provide this degree of fairness and equal treatment.

In the province of Quebec, the timeframe depends very much on the psychology of those who feel themselves threatened. I, for one, do not think that the majority of Quebecers feel threatened with extinction.

Mr. Fraser: Your paper says they do.

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member reads the paper, which I ask him to do—

Mr. Fraser: Which I did.

Mr. Trudeau: —he would understand what we are talking about, but once again he is following some other alley.

An hon. Member: You are talking from the other side of your mouth.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY BY MR. JUSTICE HALL

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I had intended to address my question to the Solicitor General, but the Prime Minister is in such good form that perhaps he might like to answer the question. I understand that the Solicitor General has received a telegram from the former Supreme Court justice, Mr. Emmet Hall, on behalf of the Canadian Civil Liberties Union urging a full scale public inquiry into what the telegram describes as the break-in and the apparent case of cover-up by the RCMP. It says that such an inquiry is necessary to relieve pressure on the RCMP and to regain public respect for the laws of this country. I ask the Prime Minister and/or the Solicitor General whether, in light of the views of such an eminent jurist and legal authority as Mr. Justice Hall, if they are not impressed by our arguments, they would not be impressed by the request that he has made and change their minds.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Justice Hall is indeed a very respectable and eminent authority in this field. Naturally, I will take note of whatever representations he has made.

An hon. Member: You won't do a thing.

Mr. Trudeau: I am not quite sure exactly what his opinions are, but if he wants to see an over-all investigation of the RCMP, I feel that that might be a repetition of what was done several years ago by a commission of inquiry which recommended certain modifications in the administration of the RCMP.

Mr. Brewin: Perhaps I might inform the Prime Minister that Mr. Justice Hall in his telegram was extremely specific. He referred to the break-in and apparent cover-up of the matter that took place in Montreal. That is what he and the organization referred to want an inquiry into, and that is what they said was necessary to clear the RCMP and bring public respect for the law of this country.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I did not see the telegram, but if it is a specific desire to look at the break-in and "apparent cover-up", the RCMP officer has already pleaded guilty in court, and the break-in has already been recognized as an illegal act committed by an RCMP officer. The cover-up that the hon. member talks about is one which might or might not have taken place by the police themselves. The Solicitor General seems to have dealt with this by indicating that in their answer to the former solicitor general the RCMP relied on the fact that an inquiry by the proper authorities was being made in the city of Montreal. The question remains as to what happened to that inquiry, and that is precisely within the terms of reference of the Quebec commission of inquiry. I take it that this will provide an answer to the question which concerns the hon. member and, presumably, Mr. Justice Hall.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REASON FOR FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN FOREST CASE IN MANITOBA

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Has the government appointed counsel to participate in the judicial proceedings in the courts of the province of Manitoba known as the Forest case and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Yes, we have, Mr. Speaker. The counsel appeared on June 10 representing the Attorney General of Canada. The reason we intervened was explained by me in a statement made at that time. We were served notice of the constitutional issue pursuant to the rules of court in Manitoba, and we replied in the affirmative to that. The reason we have intervened is to argue whether it should come before the court of appeal that the Manitoba language act of 1890 is unconstitutional.

Mr. Dinsdale: Is it not the policy of the government to intervene in all situations of this kind?

Mr. Basford: It is not the policy to automatically intervene when served with a motive of intervention on a constitutional point. We obviously make a judgment as to the constitutional issue involved and its importance. Obviously, we have made a decision that this is an important constitutional issue and that the court of appeal, should it discuss the issue, is entitled to hear the point of view of the Attorney General of Canada.

AIR CANADA

PROPOSED COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGATION LARGE NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES WANT TO LEAVE QUEBEC

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I will direct my question to the government House leader. At the meeting of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications yesterday I presented a motion calling for the committee to investigate the situation in Quebec where 2,600 Air Canada employees are requesting a transfer out of the province. My motion was accepted by the committee and the chairman was to request an order of the House authorizing the committee to launch an investigation. Due to the seriousness of the matter, will the minister issue an order as soon as possible?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): I will consider that situation and see what can be done.

Mr. McKenzie: As the chief executive officer of Air Canada, Mr. Claude Taylor, has been unable to solve the morale problems and employees are organizing to further their requests for transfers and are also challenging statements made by Mr. Taylor who claims that there are no problems, and as an airline cannot function efficiently or safely with these types of labour problems, will the minister take immediate action in granting the order to the committee or appoint some commission of inquiry?

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I took part in the committee meeting yesterday and the hon. member's remarks are not quite exact. The president of Air Canada, Mr. Claude Taylor, mentioned that the morale of the employees was excellent. Therefore the hon. member's remarks are completely untrue, which was recognized at the committee meeting yesterday.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REASON FOR CLOSING ART EXHIBITION AT CANADA HOUSE, LONDON

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, and if the acting minister is the person I think he is, a person of great taste and sophistication, he will be able to answer this question. I will try him out now. I have him ready. What are the circumstances surrounding the embarrassing decision to close an exhibition at Canada House in London, who was the sponsor of the exhibition, who was in charge of such a decision, and will the minister reverse this blot on the Canadian record?

● (1500)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether I could live up to the advance billing of the hon. member, but I am aware that there was an exhibition at Canada House entitled "Room for Self-Explanation". That may be of interest to hon. members. In essence, and without referring to all the phraseology before me, the exhibit was removed as a result of a decision of the Canadian High Commissioner because he thought that certain portrayals—one particular portrayal—might be offensive or unacceptable to certain persons who may be using Canada House for purposes other than purposes of self-explanation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: Would the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs arrange for the Canadian High Commission to visit the Prado in Madrid?

Mr. MacEachen: Well, that work may be equally disturbing.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will realize that since today is the final allotted day, the House will go through the usual procedures pertaining to supply later on this afternoon. In view of recent practices from which we have benefitted whereby hon. members have been provided supply bills as far as possible in advance of their actual consideration, I hope the House will agree, as it has in the past, that the bill be distributed at this moment. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to indicate as well that a number of hon. members have conveyed to me their compliments to the Hansard reporting staff and to all those associated with both French and English Journals and Debates with respect to the very diligent job they did, somewhat above and beyond the call of duty.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: In the spirit of good will which was so evident during the question period I extend the usual invitation to hon. members. I think they have all been invited. The invitation is extended to members of the press gallery as well and, whatever the event of the supply proceedings later on, although the beginning of the festivities for the guests here may be retarded somewhat, I certainly hope that will not in any way detract from the quality of the soirée later on.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It has to do with my question to the House leader and my second question which was answered by the parliamentary secretary. The parliamentary secretary stated that I misinformed the House with regard to Mr. Taylor's remarks in committee yesterday about employee morale. I would like to point out to the House that 1,000 Air Canada employees have formed an organization called "Canadian Aviation Fellowship" because of their concern about conditions at Dorval. I received a telegram from them which states:

Our survey on Air Canada employees at all levels indicates that Air Canada President Taylor totally misinformed . . .

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The point at issue really is not the question of morale, which is obviously an arguable question. It seems to me that, as far as any possible question of privilege is concerned, the point at issue has to do with what the president of Air Canada had to say about that subject last night. I do not think the hon. member can now get into an argument as to who is right or wrong about the morale of the employees of Air Canada.

What could be argued, I suppose, if the hon. member seeks the floor on a question of privilege, is whether he is correct and not the parliamentary secretary in interpreting the words of the president of Air Canada before the committee. However, I do not think that goes directly to the issue. If the answer was that the hon. member did not correctly relate the words of the president of Air Canada to that committee, that would be an issue of privilege.

Mr. McKenzie: Further to that, Mr. Speaker, if 2,600 employees of Air Canada requesting a transfer out of the province of Quebec is not a problem, nothing is a problem. There is a serious problem, and that is why I directed my question to the House leader and that is why my motion was accepted yesterday. There is a very serious morale problem when 2,600 employees are asking to be moved out of the province of Quebec.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to clarify the matter. The hon. member mentioned yesterday what he has just told the House and the president of Air Canada said that this statement was without foundation and that it did not reflect the situation among Air Canada employees. According to him, this resolution has been rejected by the committee. The chairman mentioned that further discussion on this will be put on the agenda of the committee.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order arising out of the oral question period today. The hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty) requested the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) to table certain documents which had been referred to by the Solicitor General and the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), the latter in his statement yesterday and the former in his statement to the House on Friday. Regarding the references of the Minister of Supply and Services I refer Your Honour to page 6968 of Hansard where reference is made to a letter from the RCMP to the minister, and again another reference earlier on where reference is made to the APLQ's letter, again in the same minister's speech of last evening. My reason for bringing this to your attention is the refusal of the minister to comply. I will be very brief, and perhaps Your Honour can take this under advisement after having had a chance to examine the record.

I refer Your Honour to Beauchesne, citation 159(2), which states the following:

A minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the House, unless he is prepared to lay it on the table.

I submit that that citation is quite clear. I hope Your Honour will examine the record and perhaps make a ruling at a later date.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I did not have an opportunity to hear all of the argument made by the hon. member. However, I would like to bring to Your Honour's attention, subject of course to verification in Hansard, the fact that my personal recollection is that I did not cite the letter in any way whatsoever. I did not have the letter with me. I do not know the contents of it by heart, and I did not cite it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would like to be clear. We seem to be talking about two different problems. I take it one relates to the possibility of the use of documents by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) during his statement on Friday, and I am not clear that there was at any time an application that, pursuant to that, any documents referred to by the Solicitor General might be tabled. Yesterday on a question of privilege the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) clearly referred to and quoted from a letter, but I am not aware that there has been an application pursuant to the reference cited by the hon. member that that document be tabled.

At the moment I am not clear whether in either case there has been a formal application to have a document tabled which was resisted, but I will check the record to see whether that has taken place and, if it has, I will consider whether in either case it was proper for the minister to resist the application.

Mr. Blaker: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I was a little confused about whether this matter related to the current Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), but to the extent that I understood Your Honour's remarks, it does. On behalf of the minister I would like to check Hansard and, if necessary, perhaps the minister could be permitted to make representations on this point of order.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, the confusion which has arisen between the parliamentary secretary and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) arising out of proceedings in the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications yesterday afternoon should not be left in the state that it is. There have been accusations of untruths. I think there was some mix up in translation, and the parliamentary secretary did not properly and adequately hear what the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre was saying.

Committee Reports

Yesterday afternoon the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre did present a motion to the standing committee which was properly ruled out of order by the chairman. Later in the day at a later proceeding in committee, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre reintroduced the motion which the Chair ruled to be a proper motion but simply not possible to put in the context of the bill. There was an agreement that the steering committee would seek a remedy with respect to putting the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. The confusion has nothing to do with the denial by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre of the position taken by Mr. Taylor with respect to the morale of Air Canada employees in Montreal and other parts of Quebec. The two issues were quite separate.

● (1510)

I am sure the parliamentary secretary would not want that type of accusation to remain on the record with respect to the member for Winnipeg South Centre. I am sure the distinguished chairman of our committee would concur in that analysis of what took place.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps I could quickly review today's proceedings. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) put two questions, one of which was answered by the acting minister and one by the parliamentary secretary. The answer given by the parliamentary secretary was a rejection of the interpretation put upon the words of the president of Air Canada by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. In his question of privilege the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre went to the heart of the issue as to whether there was poor morale in Air Canada.

That may be an interesting point of argument. The point of privilege, if it did exist, would have had to be that it was the correct interpretation of Mr. Taylor's words by him rather than by the parliamentary secretary. Whether either or any of those statements is accurate or inaccurate is subject to debate. Clearly it constitutes a matter of disagreement or different interpretation between two members and does not constitute a question of privilege.

TABLING OF COPY OF WORKING AGREEMENT BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND CANADA

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table, pursuant to Standing Order 41, and naturally in both official languages copies of the working agreement signed by American Internal Revenue Service Commissioner Jerome Kurtz and myself on a simultaneous examination of the files of taxpayers under the terms of the tax agreement or treaty that exists between our two countries.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

FRANCHISE FOR DND TEACHERS ABROAD

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-426, to amend the Canada Elections Act (teachers voting abroad).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Epp: At the present time teachers under contract with the Department of National Defence, who are teaching at Canadian Forces bases located outside of Canada are not entitled to vote in federal general elections. Armed Forces personnel are enfranchised.

The purpose of this bill is to give the right to vote to Canadian citizens teaching overseas under contract at DND schools. It is a bill which would end the discrimination against Canadian teachers who have volunteered their services to Canada, thus enabling us to fulfil our international obligations.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, as I shall not be in the House tomorrow I should like to advise the House of the order of business for tomorrow and next week. Tomorrow we will continue with report stage of the unemployment insurance bill, and next week we will continue with that bill and a number of other bills which are at report stage. No bill will be called that is not at report stage, which includes the Bretton Woods and currency and exchange bills, and the one affecting the Auditor General. I understand two bills have been reported from committee today.

As a result of informal discussions with my counterparts I have been attempting to arrange a two day debate on national unity. The dates that had originally been proposed, Wednesday and Thursday of next week, are running into difficulties. Unless suitable dates can be found for next week it might be in the interest of the House to defer that debate until the following week. I would appreciate hon. members' comments so that I could prepare for either eventuality.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the difficulties and have considered the possibility of having the debate in the next following week. At first blush that would appear to be the only reasonable solution, but I will check with my colleagues a little later.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I hope the possibility of having this debate on two days the week after next will be considered. As the other two House leaders know, there are problems. We are certainly prepared to enter into discussions so that this may be resolved to the satisfaction of all concerned.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could bring up a matter of House business that relates to private members' hour in the period between now and the end of the month. There has been some difficulty with the days which would normally be scheduled for private members' business in that period—it would of course be only tomorrow and a week from tomorrow. There have been some discussions and there seems to be a disposition to proceed with private members' hour tomorrow, but to change the normal order of business. We would normally deal with motions for the production of papers tomorrow but I understand there is a disposition to deal instead with Bill C-1001 standing in the name of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid). At the conclusion of that item we would move to Bill S-2 standing in the name of the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell), which would probably tend to occupy that hour.

In the following week, instead of calling private members' business at five o'clock on Thursday, there is a disposition to take the hour between five and six p.m. on Tuesday for private members' business and to deal with a number of bills standing in the names of eight members, which affect certain changes in the names of constituencies. For the balance of that hour we would resume debate on the motion for the production of papers standing in the name of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) which otherwise would have been called tomorrow.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I thank the parliamentary secretary for his courtesy in discussing this matter with me in advance. We agree to his suggestion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions and we agree to the first part of what has been suggested. That is satisfactory. We agree that in the private members' hour tomorrow the time shall be devoted to the two private bills mentioned. The rest of the proposed arrangement having to do with next week is related to discussions we have had about the timing of the debate on national unity. I suggest that the House should order today, by unanimous consent, the change for tomorrow but leave the decision as to what we do next week until some of the other questions have been sorted out.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I wish to bring to your attention a matter I raised first in this House on February 27, 1975, as reported in Hansard, page 3625, when I drew attention to the fact that a starred question which had been on the order paper nearly one month had not been answered, and I asked why. You replied at that time, Sir, that there is no rule saying starred questions must be answered within a certain time or, for that matter, answered at all. That opinion was expressed on February 27 as reported in the first and second columns of page 3625 of Hansard. I drew attention to the value of the starred question and wondered what was the value of asking a starred question if it need not be answered at all or if it had no status.

I believe, based on the custom of the House, that the starred question which came into being in 1910 is basically a question not put orally because the answer might require a more thoughtful reply, or some research might be needed in order to answer the question correctly. The answer to the question should contain the information desired and, there must be a certain urgency to the question. I am raising this matter because, for a long time, we have asked the procedure committee to deal with this matter and provide an answer on the point.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, our rules and customs naturally were based on those of the Mother of Parliaments. The practice throughout the British Commonwealth is that a member of parliament can put a question to a minister on a matter concerning his department. The late Sir Herbert Williams, who asked some 4,000 questions during his long parliamentary career, said that questions asked in the House are perhaps one of the most powerful implements of democracy.

As a matter of interest, the first question was asked in 1721 in the House of Lords, over 250 years ago.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that nothing could weaken the control of parliament more, or better destroy it, than the abolition or curtailment of the right of a member of parliament to ask a question in the House of Commons, a question to which he is entitled to expect an answer.

In the Mother of Parliaments all questions are written and the minister has two full days to answer. Those questions marked with an asterisk, the starred questions, require an oral answer. Otherwise, I understand the answers are printed in Hansard.

[Mr. O'Sullivan.]

In Canada we have the oral question. However, I think it would be wise to refer back to the practices which existed even before we were a united country, before Confederation. Let us see what happened when we were the province of Canada. At that time we operated under British rules as practised at Westminster. So far as I know all questions then were written. With the advent of Confederation in 1867, written questions only were allowed. In 1910, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier was Prime Minister, the starred question was introduced, with the hope that it would tend to reduce emphasis on oral questions which, for the first time, were creeping into parliamentary use.

Only in 1964 did the rules of this House give formal recognition to the oral question which had not been formally recognized before then. The oral question has been part of our practice for a number of years and is now firmly established in our procedure. The 1910 rules did not firmly establish the status of the starred question. In fact the private member was never able to enforce the right to ask a starred question, and ministers answered starred questions orally, or in writing, at their own discretion.

In the sessions immediately preceding the 1955 change in the rules, the right to ask a starred question seems briefly to have been regained. In the days of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the starred question had to be answered within one day. I point out that one of our Speakers ruled that starred questions were to be answered orally, and in 1955 five ministers drew attention to the fact that questions were starred when the answers were given orally.

In 1955 a special committee on procedure sought to establish more firmly the status of the starred question. It was then given a special place on the order paper on one day of the week. No member was to be allowed to have more than three starred questions at one time on the order paper. When I first came to the House as a member it was the custom, as it had been earlier, to answer starred questions within seven days. It was our custom to ask starred questions under certain conditions, and I point out that most of our parliamentary procedure has evolved from custom. Obviously, that which is customary and works should become part of the status quo. This applies, I suggest, to the starred question as we know it at present.

It is interesting to note that there were no starred questions in our parliament until 1910 or 1911, as I have already said, although written and oral questions evolved as a customary procedure. That shows what custom has done to our rules. Also, between 1929 and 1955, starred questions were not asked. In 1955 the procedure committee once more recognized the starred question.

I could show you, by referring to Hansard, that the starred question has been part of our procedure at least since 1957, that is to say, such questions could be answered. For example, in 1959 Mr. Chevrier commented on why certain starred questions had not been answered. Michael Starr, a minister at the time, also referred to the starred question, as did the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in 1968. I will not trouble the House with quoting what hon. members said, but what they said is on record.

● (1530)

I am not going to trouble you with all the quotations. They are there. I can give the page numbers if anyone wants to look at them. They are in Hansard at pages 2469, 2470, 1368, and so on. I will not trouble the House with them, but hon. members will find it is very definitely pointed out. For example, when I first came in in 1957, the Hon. Lionel Chevrier stated:

> Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the government through the House leader. I should like to know if the government would not speed up the answers to questions now on the order paper. I am informed that there are some 47 questions that remain unanswered. There are as of today five starred questions that are unanswered, and I am sure there are a number of orders for returns—

He went on to state he believed those starred questions should be answered.

I want to come to my conclusions. It is my belief that the starred question was so designated because of its complexity, and making it short enough to fit in for an oral answer by the minister in the House and to give the minister the necessary time in which to look for information required. In other words, it was an opportunity for the opposition to be a little more dutiful in their work, which is to probe for mistakes. It was also a chance for the government to answer a question in a little better style and not have it repeated over and over again to get to the proper conclusion that was satisfactory to the questioner.

The starred question should be given its rightful place, as was confirmed in 1955. The Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization should deal with this question which it failed to deal with over a period of two years, since there seems to have been a silent erosion and maybe a lassitude on the part of the committee to deal with this matter, and by so doing restore the right of the private member to have a starred question answered within a set limit of time. The status of the starred question should be settled. Either it is a useful tool and should be placed in the status quo position, or it should be removed entirely.

I have brought this up for the sake of parliament and for the sake of the position that Your Honour occupies as the ruler and referee of this House, because leaving a question in that position is hardly fair either for a Speaker or private member, or indeed for the government.

All any minister who fails to answer a question within a fair period of time, if he does not have an answer prepared in a week for reasons beyond his control, would have to do is telephone the hon. member or Mr. Speaker to give his reasons, and nobody would be upset about it, and he would be given further time.

I know I had Your Honour's co-operation in this. The first thing I did after raising this matter which led to your reply was to write a letter, dated February 28, 1975, to the then President of the Queen's Privy Council, the hon. member for Eglington (Mr. Sharp), telling him I would like to appear before the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization in order to bring their attention to a point which I thought should be looked at and cleared up. I went on from there, not only by letter but by conversation, on many occasions. Over two months ago, and again about a month ago, I spoke to the chairman about this. He knew very well that this was coming up.

I then took the trouble to inform the parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale), that this was coming up before the House. I do not think it can be left, not only for Your Honour's sake, but for the sake of every member of this House to be carried on in this fashion. We should be respecting the position of the Right Hon. Wilfrid Laurier and other people who have gone before us.

In the democratic process, erosion should never destroy that which is useful to democracy's survival.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that some days ago the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) gave me notice of his intention to raise this concern which he obviously holds very deeply and has researched very extensively.

I can understand the sincere representations which he has made through the House to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. I hope the members of that committee will take note of his remarks today and take an early opportunity to consider the worthwhile suggestions which he has made.

As he pointed out, at least twice before the hon. member has raised this concern in the House, on February 27, 1975, reported in Hansard at page 3265, and again last summer, July 6, 1976, reported in Hansard at page 15080. In both cases, Mr. Speaker, your response to the point was very clear cut and very clearly in accordance with the established rules and precedents of the House; first, that the star entitles the hon. member to an oral answer, but not the right to demand an answer within a specified period of time; second, that the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization might examine this question in the course of its re-examination of the procedures of this House.

I have looked quickly at that committee's subcommittee report. I believe that report made one reference to questions on the order paper, which appears in volume 30-9-76 at page 30:61. However, that reference deals only with the place of questions in the daily order of business. I do not believe that the committee actually got to the point of considering the status of starred questions. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) was the chairman of that subcommittee. He might well correct my interpretation of the subcommittee's report. However, I do not believe they actually gave their consideration to that point as Your Honour previously invited them to do, and as the hon. member for Simcoe North has obviously done again.

These representations today are very worth-while in the sense that the members of the committee may want to take a look at that issue. However, I think that the rules and precedents on the point are pretty clear that, at this stage, our rules do not require that an answer be provided within any specific period of time.

From a statistical point of view, I should simply note that in this session we have had 29 starred questions on the order paper. Only five of these are still outstanding. Three of the 29 were standing in the name of the hon. member for Simcoe North. At this stage all of those three have, in fact been responded to. Therefore I think that our rate of reply to those questions is an acceptable rate. We always try to do better. I hope the representations the hon. member has made will come to the attention of the committee.

Mr. Speaker: That seems on all sides to be the most effective result, if in fact we can persuade the procedure committee to re-examine this matter to see if it has any recommendations. At the moment I am not able to act on the representations of the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard), but I hope that the procedure committee will do so.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED POLICY FAILURE RESPECTING INDIAN ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT FUND

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent) moved:

That this House condemns the failure of the government to provide economic leadership to Canada's Indians, and in particular its failure to establish and maintain a cohesive and articulate policy on the Indian Economic Development Fund, as revealed and documented by studies, confidential memoranda and other related data.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the importance of the motion before the House of Commons and the issues arising from the motion are recurrent themes that have eroded the credibility of the Government of Canada and its capacity to govern. The absence of financial control since the inception of the Indian Economic Development Fund in 1970 is a dramatic illustration of the Auditor General's oft repeated remark that the Government of Canada has lost control of the public purse.

● (1540)

The absence of policy and the failure of the Government of Canada to adhere to the mandate establishing the program has had a disastrous effect on the Indian Economic Development Fund. The actions of departmental officials, presumably with the minister's knowledge, knowingly making wrong decisions for political purposes, as noted in the Woods, Gordon and Company report, has had a demoralizing effect on the department, has destroyed the credibility of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and unfortunately has tainted the vast majority of the Indian community which has been the innocent victim of this charade.

The Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability is particularly germane to this debate. The unrealistic information provided to members of parliament, the inability of members to obtain information reflecting the realities of programs, have specifically undermined the relevancy of the standing committee to examine effectively the estimates, and is therefore a direct threat to our parliamentary system.

Before proceeding to specifics I must emphasize at the outset that the victims of the government's incompetence in managing the IEDF are the Indian people in Canada. Let there be no doubt in the minds of members in this Chamber that, on examination of the facts presented during this debate, the bottom line of the ledger will reveal the Indians of Canada as having suffered because the minister and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development have failed to provide the necessary leadership to implement and develop an effective program for the administration of the Indian Economic Development Fund.

My colleagues and I are aware of successes attributable to the economic development program, although it should be noted in many instances that this has been achieved by the entrepreneurship of Indians rather than through the efforts of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. We also recognize and are prepared to accept a risk factor does exist in a developmental program. In addition, we believe an economic development program can and should in principle be of value to the Indian community.

However, when we have knowledge that millions of dollars—the estimate is between $50 million and $75 million—have been squandered by the government in its irresponsible administration of the program, and when we have knowledge of innumerable social problems in the Indian community that are crying out for help, I say to you, Sir, in the most generous of parliamentary terms, the Government of Canada's actions border on that of criminal negligence.

During my travels across Canada discussing Indian and Inuit problems at the grass roots level, I have been confronted with a recurrent theme, namely, that the minister and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development are insensitive to local needs and, perhaps most important, the funds appropriated by the department for the benefit of Indians are to a great extent never realized by those in need. The IEDF is a glaring example confirming these views.

The realities are clear. Who can have confidence in a minister and a government which has handled in an irresponsible way nearly $200 million when we are confronted with an Indian unemployment rate which is the highest in Canada, a perennial housing problem of crisis proportions, a lack of infrastructure elements which other Canadians enjoy and assume to be not only essential but a right of every Canadian?

In the Indian community health problems are reflected in an infant mortality rate four times higher than the national average. The average age of death is 24 years younger than that of the general population; an increased incidence of tuberculosis, pneumonia, hepatitis and other infectious diseases exists in that community and, according to the Nutrition Canada Survey, dietary deficiencies are more severe than among other groups of Canadians. Alcohol-related, violent death is four times more common than among white people, and educational problems are reflected in part by the unacceptable drop-out rate.

The list is by no means complete. However, I am aware that the government has literally squandered millions of dollars in one departmental program, and if I have knowledge of a group or an individual deliberately ripping off a program for personal gain, I shall do everything within my power to defend the tens of thousands of Indian men, women and children across Canada shackled with social and economic problems. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I will not be content until I am satisfied that every dollar appropriated by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is maximized and utilized by those most in need.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Holmes: The lack of financial control and fiscal responsibility in the administration of the IEDF is so scandalous that the 1976 report of the Auditor General sounds by comparison like a strawberry social. In his recent annual report the Auditor General stated on page 9:

> Based on the study of the systems of the departments, agencies and Crown corporations audited by the Auditor-General, financial management and control in the Government of Canada is grossly inadequate. Furthermore, it is likely to remain so until the government takes strong, appropriate and effective measures to rectify this critically serious situation.

The financial management provided by the government for the IEDF is not grossly inadequate—it is a total disaster.

What are the facts? Initially I would like to quote from the summary of the findings of Woods, Gordon and Company in their review of the Indian Economic Development Fund. Some of their conclusions are as follows:

> A perceived mandate for the Fund has evolved in an informal manner. Its present state is not clearly defined nor is it consistently perceived by officers of the department.
>
> The status of the Fund portfolio is not sufficiently documented to enable realistic planning by district, region or headquarters staff in terms of funding or manpower requirements.
> There are serious deficiencies in all communications related to the Fund including: management direction and guidance, financial accounting systems, financial and operations reporting systems and planning systems.
>
> Large projects are causing severe strains on the economic delivery system especially in terms of their draw on funds and manpower requirements.
>
> The handling of small accounts is less than adequate. This has mainly been caused by the call on resources—funds, follow-up, and advisory services—by large projects.
>
> Small projects can be handled successfully by the Fund with a modified delivery system and improved communications.
>
> Elements of other Indian Program components (Socio-cultural and education) are appearing in the Economic Development Program—especially in the area of large projects.
>
> Major changes in the delivery system and a clarification of the mandate of the Fund (especially in terms of its relationship to other Indian Program components) are required in order for the program to accommodate and deal with large projects.
> The present level of Fund activity is more than the delivery system can handle.

Perhaps the critical nature of the financial control of the IEDF can best be illustrated by quoting in part from a letter dated July 7, 1976, from the director of economic development to key staff personnel in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, as follows:

> I would like you, in concert with your associates in the regions, to develop a more positive and measurable set of criteria to be used in conjunction with loans and contributions. I will expect to see a gradual release of funds tied to such events as the receipt of acceptable monthly accounting statements, productivity quotas achieved as reported through an agreed-to pre-determined process or the establishment of some kind of sensible target or sub-target for the enterprise. I am sure you will agree that many of our more significant problems seem to come to light later than they should. Our efforts to obtain approval to augment regional economic development strength seem to be well received—so I expect to see tighter criteria associated with project monitoring. I also, of course, expect to see close working relationships with our clients.
> The second aspect of our operations relates to the apparent crisis atmosphere which seems to be associated with the extension of continuation of guaranteed loans. M. Roy has developed, over a painful period of negotiation, the thesis with the Department of Finance that "we" are now competent to look after most of our own guarantee loan processing. By "we" I mean the regions. Our case isn't improved by such events as being "requested" to renew a guarantee for a considerable sum of money with nothing but 24 hours and an emotional telex to support our case. This sort of thing is not really a good way to run a railroad—let alone a development program. The example we set sometimes leaves much to be desired—would you put on your thinking caps and see if there is some easy process of tracking guarantees so that the element of surprise is minimized?

● (1550)

The content of the letter is self-explanatory. Yet this government attempts to deceive the Canadian people, and in this instance the Indian community, that it embraces all that is virtuous in accountability and fiscal responsibility. Let me simply state that after six years of competent administration of a multimillion dollar program, when the director of economic development is limited to the recommendation of "putting on your thinking cap," then quite frankly I think it is time to recommend another type of cap.

Again let me quote in part from a letter dated September 14, 1976, from the assistant deputy minister for Indian and Eskimo affairs to the acting director general of the Alberta region:

It appears that many of the comprehensive undertakings that have been established have created a continuing demand on our cash resources to a point where we may find it difficult to react to new, legitimate and sensible needs of our clients. I have reviewed brief data sheets based upon information provided by your staff and headquarters officials covering some 40 major projects and I must confess that I do not view the future of some of these enterprises with any degree of optimism. Further, I am somewhat dismayed by the apparent initiation of projects which must surely and obviously have inherent in them the requirement for considerable future funding and yet in many cases these projects appear to have enjoyed a somewhat casual start. I suspect that some of our more prominent problem projects started off on too grandiose a scale.

Enclosed with that letter, Mr. Speaker, were a number of examples revealing, in part, the magnitude of the problem. For example, Arcom Systems Manufacturing Limited, total funding $2,630,663, bankrupt and defunct. Arcom Timber Limited, total funding $1,720,000, bankrupt and defunct; Alberta Aspen Board Limited, total funding $9,150,000, with the added note, and I quote: "Flake board plant now shut down due to lack of funds. The future of the plant depends upon receipt of further funds in the form of additional capital involvement. No further funding input from the I.E.D.F." Mis-Tass-Iniy Forest Enterprises Limited, total funding $1,985,858, with the added note: "The plant was destroyed by fire. Some reconstruction commenced. No further funds recommended". Peigan Development Company Limited, total funding $629,565, with a recommendation for no further funding until there is a rationalization of the program. Sawyer Boats with a total funding, as I understand it, of $295,000, with the added note: "The project may well be a candidate for bankruptcy".

This list is by no means complete, and I am certain my colleagues who will be speaking this afternoon will be discussing in greater detail not only other financial disasters but other financial difficulties which have been experienced in the operation of this Indian economic development program from its inception. However, it must be obvious from the examples that I have given that a crisis does exist and that financial responsibility in the department has not existed and does not exist at this time.

What is even more tragic about this situation, Mr. Speaker, is that the perception has been created that the Indians involved in the ventures have failed. Let me simply say that nothing could be further from the truth. Indeed the evidence indicates that the failure of the program is clearly the responsibility of the minister and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I need only refer the House to the report published by Woods, Gordon and Company and to their summary of recommendations which I read into the record at the outset of my comments.

I am tempted to carry on, Mr. Speaker, with the area of fiscal irresponsibility of the government in this regard, but I wish briefly to comment on the other important issues which I referred to at the outset of my remarks. As I indicated previously, the absence of government policy and the failure of the Government of Canada to adhere to the original mandate to fund viable small businesses up to a maximum of $50,000 has been a major factor resulting in the failure of the economic development program.

I have been exposed to bureaucratic rhetoric and their efforts to conceal the facts as to the magnitude of the problems. I can recall the former minister of Indian affairs and northern development, who is with us this afternoon, reporting in glowing terms about the success of the program two years ago. I also recall departmental officials, during examination of the estimates this year, valiantly if not convincingly implying to standing committee members that the problems were a recent revelation to the department and that corrective measures were being taken to establish viable alternatives and policies.

The facts do not support these observations. In the first instance, the problems have been apparent since the inception of the program. In the economic development operations study by the Management Consulting Services they stated on page 92:

Problems with the fund were realized from the start and indicated to management through several sources. One major problem, the conflict between creating viable business operations as opposed to creating employment opportunities, was never resolved.

Again in regard to policies I would like to quote in part from the Woods, Gordon report on page 32:

It is clear that the original mandate has evolved in practice although we could find no evidence that formal recognition had ever been given to such evolution. Thus we conclude that the present mandate is not defined. In fact one gets a different interpretation of the mandate depending upon who is giving it.

The report goes on to say:

This situation occurs with such frequency that one is forced to conclude that the staff of the fund is responding to a revised mandate in raising and approving projects, but is trying to clothe them in the trappings of profitability, viability and commercial success; the elements of the original mandate.

We can find no evidence to indicate that there has been administrative response to the changed mandate by means of revised policies, procedures or guidelines, or through deployment of resources.

Again the report went on to say on page 91:

It would be an overstatement to say that there is explicit policy, defined procedures and prescribed guidelines related to the fund.

Despite the platitudes of the government, Mr. Speaker, let me assure you that there is no evidence to suggest that the problems are resolved or that appropriate policies have been established by the government.

A major issue in the administration of the economic development fund is the knowledge that decisions were made for political purposes. I want to quote part of a document from a regional office which clearly illustrates the problem. The program and the name are not important at this time, but the facts contained in the overview of the project are relevant to this particular issue. The lengthy document was prepared and reviewed by the regional staff and contained, in part, the following information:

Furthermore, the money obtained from this "under the counter" dealing was used as payments on . . . new truck and new $45,000 house. As near as we can determine, in the absence of records or financial statements, $10,000 was spent on the house and $7,000 on the truck, furnishings, etc. Due to lack of investigation on behalf of district staff, this information only came to the regional office staff after we conducted our own investigation.

Later in the document it was stated:

In view of the above, the writer is at a loss to determine how the district arrived at the above proposal or what it was intended to accomplish. We have now reached the point where we are throwing good money after bad and we will get neither back.

● (1600)

The Woods, Gordon report made several references to this critical problem. I should like to quote from page 36 of the report under the heading "Political Relationship", which reads as follows:

A fairly significant number of accounts were reviewed with borrowers who held key positions, at or prior to the time of account development, such as Chief or Band Councillor.

In the next paragraph of the report under the heading "Individual Relationships", the following appears:

A reasonable number of new accounts reviewed included individuals who were, at the time of their application or prior to the application, employed by the department.

At page 63 the report continues:

This type of behaviour is demoralizing for your staff, has long term implications for the credibility of your field people, and is damaging to your entire organization.

The knowledge that decisions were made for political purposes in the handling of funds, which are desperately needed to correct existing social and economic problems in the Indian community, is the most damaging and at the same time most despicable testimony in the chain of events. There is an important difference between incompetence and immorality. Incompetence is unacceptable and yet, not unlike a benign tumor, can be cured if there is the will and determination to do so. Immorality is also unacceptable but differs in that it spreads like a cancerous growth until it has engulfed and destroyed the affected organ. That is the present state of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Holmes: Finally I wish to make a few general comments with respect to the work of the standing committee, which is particularly relevant at the present time since the Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability is studying this particular problem in addition to other areas defined in their mandate. The Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, unlike other committees, has for the greater part of its existence been composed of members from all parties who have been genuinely concerned about the Indian people in Canada. This common bondage has eliminated to a great extent partisan politics.

Unfortunately our collective concerns and predictable actions in the standing committee have been exploited by the minister and senior officials. Our preoccupation with the innumerable social, cultural and economic problems facing the Indian community combined with the presentation of departmental estimates in a form that to a great extent is meaningless, set the stage where members irrespective of party were psychologically prepared to accept answers they had hoped to hear, which inevitably led to the dissemination of unrealistic information.

The department has developed a remarkable capacity to undermine the work of the committee in their unanimity of purpose to assist the Indian community in Canada. The examination of the IEDF and the testimony received this year, and in the past, confirm a growing body of opinion that parliament is less relevant than in previous years. Perhaps it is a slight exaggeration to indicate that senior department officials view members of parliament with contempt. However, I do not believe it is an exaggeration to suggest they view members as pawns to be played with on an annual basis. Their game plan is obvious—self-preservation. Its execution is carried out with precision-like finesse.

On those rare occasions when a ministry perceives they are threatened, a steel curtain descends around the department which becomes the exclusive preserve of the elite. I find it remarkably strange such tactics are viewed with tolerance and an aura of respectability. There are no winners in such gamesmanship; however there is a threat to our institutions and the freedom of all Canadian citizens. It is perfectly clear, intentionally or otherwise, that the standing committee has been repeatedly misinformed about the economic development program, which in principle is supported by all members.

During the examination of the estimates in 1975 the former minister of Indian affairs and northern development gave glowing reports about the program, and yet I have placed before the House today evidence indicating there were serious problems from the outset. The answers I received to questions related to the PE-KUN-NEE Garments Ltd. from departmental officials, and the information I have from a documented regional overview of the project, confirm my skepticism as to the information supplied by the government.

The list is endless, but one final example may assist the House in understanding the seriousness of the situation. On Thursday, March 24, as reported in issue 28-A at page 26, I asked a question with respect to the failure of the IEDF. This was early in the proceedings before the majority of the testimony was received. The question I asked was:

Are you finding any common denominator or denominators other than departmental inefficiency?

The assistant deputy minister for Indian and Eskimo Affairs responded by saying:

Management by projects sponsored by either the Indian people who are engaged in the project or in some cases where it has been a joint venture with non-Indian people including a number of projects that have been in manufacturing, wood products, the whole range of them in which the people who were managing them simply did not have the experience.

That, Sir, was a spurious attempt to deflect the blame from the real villain, the minister and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Although the assistant deputy minister attempted to blame joint-venture projects involving non-Indians, it should be pointed out the Woods, Gordon study blamed the department for getting involved in the grandiose projects which always involved non-Indian personnel.

In conclusion, let me simply state the Government of Canada has not provided economic leadership to Canada's Indians, and it has failed to develop a cohesive and articulate policy on the IEDF. As I tried to stress earlier, it is the Indian community which has suffered because of the interference by the government in administering this fund. I should like to recommend that the Auditor General do an in-depth study and review of this particular program. In addition, it would be available for the Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability to assess this particular program and can make recommendations so that the committee system can be far more effective in the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the essence of the motion placed before the House consists of two charges: one, that the government has failed to provide the Indian community with economic development leadership, and second, that we have failed to enunciate a cohesive and articulate policy on the Indian Economic Development Fund. I reject both charges, and I think the evidence will establish that if there is any criticism to be made in this area, it is not on those points.

Let me review the recent history of Indian economic development. I think it will be recognized that a landmark was the establishment of the Indian Economic Development Fund eight years ago. It formed a financial base for a major departmental mandate to assist Indian people in creating employment and income-producing opportunities. An important feature from the outset was that Indian people be involved in the design and delivery of economic programs. A source of capital was provided to Indian businessmen and businesses, which were helped and encouraged through the provision of access to basic management skills and technical expertise.

After a period of initial hesitation there was a quickening of interest during the early 1970's on the part of the Indian people, and substantial commitments began to be made. This process has continued with a growing recognition by Indian people of the major role that economic development can play in meeting the serious problems which exist on the reserves.

The currently approved ceilings are $70 million for direct loans and $30 million for guaranteed loans. In addition, the main estimates for the current fiscal year have authorized approximately $15 million in grants and contributions. The establishment of this fund, its operation, the review which was undertaken after six years, and equally important, the broader socio-economic study now being done in co-operation with the National Indian Brotherhood, clearly represent government leadership in this field.

● (1610)

In the first six years of operation of the fund, we have estimated that employment arising from fund support represented approximately 8,400 man-years. The financing has gone into enterprises in agriculture, forestry, fishing, and trapping, construction, real estate, manufacturing, transportation, and wholesale and retail trades. The employment content has been concentrated in forestry, agriculture and manufacturing, followed by transportation-communication and wholesale-retail.

Indian people in every region have benefited. Let me mention a few outstanding examples. In British Columbia's Okanagan Valley the Osoyoos Indian Band operates one of the most successful vineyards in Canada. The total grape crop goes to the Andres Wine Company of Lytton, B.C.

In Saskatchewan a $29 million program managed by a board of directors composed of Indian, government and business representatives, aims to raise average gross earnings of Indian farmers as well as train 500 Indian persons for jobs in the agricultural industry. Similar programs are under way in Alberta and Manitoba.

In Quebec the fish processing plant of P.M. Packers of Mingan created 92 new jobs, 80 per cent of them held by Indian people. The plant is processing millions of pounds of raw fish annually.

In northwestern Ontario the people of the Whitefish River Band leased 360 acres of their land to Canada Cement Lafarge for erection of a cement storage and distribution plant at a substantial rental income for the well-being of the band.

Those are some of the noteworthy examples. But as I have already stated, and as the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes) indicated, our examination of the record shows soft spots.

It is important to realize that what was embarked upon eight years ago was very much a new venture. There was little data available and equally little experience in this field. Assessments differed as to the potential for successful ventures being launched. It is fine to look back now with hindsight and with the cold analytical eye of an accountant at the report used by the hon. member, and I heartily concur in these reports being done. In fact, as the hon. member indicated, this review was initiated during the period when I was minister of this department because I had some concern about these projects. I had some concern about their viability. This is particularly true of the larger projects.

I think that, by and large, the smaller projects support the thesis of our friend Schumacher—this is not Stanley—that "Small is Beautiful". Part of the problem we got into is that too many of the programs, as the hon. member indicated, were of too grandiose a nature and beyond the initial capacity or ability of the Indian people involved to handle.

It is easy to express criticism and be wise after the event. It is more difficult to develop constructive and workable solutions. We still face a grim reality of Indian unemployment. Almost half the Indian labour force is currently unemployed.

It is estimated that 45,000 jobs need to be created to bring Indian unemployment down to the national average. Social assistance, which now totals close to $100 million a year, has increased by about 30 per cent a year in the past five years. Subsidized housing, health care and penal costs constitute significant additions.

The alternative to a perpetuation of this situation is to make very sure that whatever employment or earning opportunities can be made available to Indian people are made available on a long-term basis and are in keeping with their life-styles and their pace. This takes time and it takes money. The alternatives of long-term maintenance and continual development of the welfare syndrome are simply unacceptable.

Given these concerns, it has not been enough for us simply to assess the effectiveness of our current programming.

Indian thought and Indian assessment are imperative. This means resources for band level planning immediately. It means more organizations, like the national Indian arts and crafts corporation, that can develop strategies and act on behalf of Indians. And, of course, it places greater importance on the long-term studies towards a socio-economic strategy by the National Indian Brotherhood in which the department is co-operating fully.

We are reviewing our current economic development portfolio to re-capitalize and restructure worth-while projects and eliminate projects that are no longer operating, or would cost too much to continue to support.

Mr. Yewchuk: That will be 75 per cent of them.

Mr. Buchanan: No, that is too high a number. As I said a moment ago, the indication has been that the thrust should be far more toward the smaller projects where one can learn to develop management skills and expertise and to grow, and this is the direction in which we are now moving.

Let me summarize briefly what is proposed in order to stabilize the financial demands upon the Indian Economic Development Fund.

We have proposed that a sum of $31.7 million be devoted over the next three years to liquidate unsuccessful projects and to restructure projects that are improperly capitalized, by writing off loans and providing further support to those projects which will continue in operation.

We anticipate the need to ask parliament for additional funds in supplementary estimates for the current fiscal year to reduce or delete some of the direct loans outstanding and furnish additional funds for continuing economic development. This would be part of the three-year stabilization action.

We are making immediate adjustments to our current program structures to provide for developmental support to projects; to allow the support of differential costs, such as transportation and scale; and to support the development of Indian-operated economic service organizations.

As well, development is going on of improved programs in other areas to support Indian socio-economic development. These include increased emphasis on housing and community services support; increased resources for planning and technical support; improved short-term job creation and employment services programs.

A program review will be undertaken in response to the final report of the socio-economic task force to define a two year program of redevelopment and adjustment to implement agreed aspects of the policy.

Our over-all object will be to make increased resources available for economic development and to increase still further Indian participation in their management and distribution. We know that we will not eliminate all problem projects. We have made mistakes in the past and we will continue to make mistakes in the future. This is inevitable.

Mr. Yewchuk: We should throw you out.

Mr. Buchanan: That would be a bad mistake. We would probably not have enough money to meet all economic development needs—

Mr. Yewchuk: We can't afford to keep you.

Mr. Buchanan: —but these adjustments will allow us to be more efficient, more relevant, and to continue our efforts with the fundamentals of Indian and economic needs.

• (1620)

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I want to state at the outset what is very obvious, and that is that economic development is inseparable from social development and cultural traits. The native people of the north and native people generally throughout Canada have survived for many centuries in spite of harsh living conditions which have prevailed. In more recent times native peoples have been offered some opportunities and facilities for strengthening their capacity to survive, but survival must be more than mere subsistence supplemented by government subsidy. It must, above all, permit the people to make their own choices as to the place they wish to occupy and the part they wish to play in the evolving society of Canada.

Natives must be given every opportunity to become an equal and participating part of this socio-economic evolution, and we want to make it very clear that we want jobs and opportunities for jobs, not welfare. We do not want welfare in any form. We are determined that we shall have real choices while retaining our distinctive identity and taking pride in our cultural heritage. Some native people welcome opportunities to adopt what may be termed the new ways, while others wish to follow traditional pursuits. Thus, the challenge is to diversify the approach to socio-economic development to accommodate all. This is not an easy task, but it is not impossible.

In the Northwest Territories, the part of the country I represent, there have been many very big changes in the lifestyle and the economic situation of the native population. The changes have been drastic. They have taken place over a very short period of time, and there have been casualties along the way. I expect there will be casualties in the future as we try to develop a good economic base on which to make a living.

When I think of the big changes which have taken place I think of my grandfather, Dinji Cho, a name which can be translated to "The Big Man". He was born and raised in the bow-and-arrow age. I do not think he met a white man until he was a grown boy. Today his children and his grandchildren are watching coloured television brought to them by satellite. That is a very big change in a very short period of time. When we try to change a culture and bring in different values, there are bound to be casualties, and I am sorry to say that there have been some.

In 1972 in a statement before the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development the then minister, the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) said, and I quote:

> The fur traders, whalers, miners and fishermen who invaded northern regions in the 19th and early 20th century exploited and sometimes exhausted resources for the benefit of distant, non-resident interests. They often showed little or no thought for the well-being or even the survival of the people already there and no concern for what happened to the environment. All they were interested in was getting in, getting rich and getting out.

And usually getting out very fast. That attitude on the part of big companies has not changed.

I cannot help but wonder if anything has really changed regarding that attitude of, for example, oil companies. When I hear the oil companies promising us northerners that a pipeline will solve all our problems, is it any wonder that I doubt that anything has changed? While I do not argue that a pipeline somewhere in the north may be necessary at some time, can anyone seriously suggest that this will help form a stable economic base in Canada's north? To me it is simply a perfect example of the boom-bust syndrome, and boom-bust is not the way to establish a solid economic base.

A couple of months ago I spoke in the budget debate. At that time I wondered if the government was seriously dedicated to socio-economic development. As I said at that time, all the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) seems to have done is to have fallen into the old trap of giving concessions to the big business community in the hope that it will come through with magical jobs and investment. We have tried that before, and it just does not work well. The Minister of Finance did not seem to understand the unique problems of the north or of natives and other unique groups and regions. If the problems are not recognized in the first place, how, then, can we solve them?

Everyone recognizes that there are basic human needs, included among which is decent housing. Yet many natives are denied that basic human right. They do not have enough houses, and those who do in most cases have houses which are poorly built and crowded. In 1975 only 51.4 per cent of on-reserve Indian housing was considered to be in satisfactory condition. Of the general population 90 per cent of Canadians' houses were in good condition. On the other hand, while almost 21 per cent of housing for Indians was so bad that it needed to be replaced, only 8 per cent of the general population lived in houses which were in extremely poor condition.

I have said many times and in many different places—and I will continue to do so and press for this until I see some results—that there should be a log housing program for the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Hear, hear!

Mr. Firth: I am glad to hear some support coming from that corner over there. Such a program could be started in the western Arctic. Such a program would be very important to the people of the Mackenzie Valley at this time. It would be important to many other areas of Canada as well, I am sure. This program could be truly a joint socio-economic solution to a severe problem. People would end up with good houses which would last a long time. Local labour could be used for this construction rather than having southern manufacturing firms send up pre-fabricated homes which would not stand up to the harsh environment up there. Furthermore, an indigenous renewable natural resource could be used.

To further economic development in the north a program should be initiated whereby people who live in the north could return to the business of harvesting natural renewable resources. A good trapper's assistance program would cost a lot of money, but it would also save a lot of people from the social ills that many in the north suffer.

Many in the north are trying to live in what may be termed the new style. Some become caught in a pay cheque to pay cheque existence, and sometimes it is a no pay cheque to no pay cheque existence for a long time. A self-employed trapper might not see a pay cheque for a few years, but he would be willing to make a living at trapping if he had good equipment, good transportation—whether it be by motorized toboggan or by dogteam—good water transportation equipment and good camping equipment to go out on to the land. If he had all these things, he would be able to take a lot of food supplies from the land by means of harvesting caribou, moose, fish and so on.

After a brief visit to the north one of the ministers across the way mentioned just a few days ago that he found the cost of living up there to be very high. We have to look at northern problems in northern terms and find northern solutions for them. To achieve this, control over economic development must be given to northern people.

● (1630)

My colleagues and I have also spoken out on the AIB, claiming that it does not work. This fact can be no more clearly illustrated than in the north. While the AIB's own figures confirm that nowhere in Canada is it more expensive to live than it is in the north, no special notice is taken of that fact.

In 1971 it was reported that the average family income for Indian people was $4,418, while the figure was $10,368 for the general population. In 1965, it was estimated that over 80 per cent of the native population of Canada was living in poverty, and the trend seems not to have changed appreciably over the past ten years or so.

Perhaps I should correct myself in the use of the word "poverty". I think that what we are talking about here, Mr. Speaker, is closer to what the German economist/philosopher E. F. Schumacher called "misery". He said:

> Misery is not the same as poverty. Poverty prevails when people have enough to keep body and soul together but little to spare, whereas in misery they cannot keep body and soul together and even the soul suffers deprivation. Poverty may have been the general rule in the past, but misery appears to have become widespread only in modern times.

He went on to say:

> Poor peasants and artisans have existed from time immemorial; but miserable and destitute villagers in their thousands and urban pavement dwellers in their hundreds of thousands—not in wartime or as an aftermath of war, but in the midst of peace and as a seemingly permanent feature—that is a monstrous and scandalous thing which is altogether abnormal in the history of mankind.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that you need only look at the statistics for natives with regard to disease, alcoholism, high unemployment, suicide, and mortality rates, to determine where we fit in Mr. Schumacher's description. We may have been poor before, but now we are truly miserable.

So what is to be done? I mentioned earlier that I should like to see a good housing program in my part of the country. The government's own figures indicate that we need at least 500 more units. Once before in this House I described the housing situation in the north as a disaster. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the best step is to give our native people more control over their lives. While not ignoring the good intentions which brought them about, the fact remains that such legislation as the Indian Act is cold, negative and paternalistic. In short, it is stifling. Millions of dollars are spent in various forms of welfare payments but the situation does not seem to really improve. Yet, if a native organization or other body asks for a little money to try to create a different approach that fits the given conditions of a development area, they are accused of wanting to return to the Middle Ages. Here I would refer to the program I mentioned earlier, a trappers' assistance program for people in the north who want to return to living on the land.

We native people are showing new vigour in our desire to grasp opportunities to better our living conditions. The best base for this would seem to be relatively independent groups at the community level pursuing projects that they believe to be the answer, or even the partial answer, to some of their economic problems. These groups are better able to identify problems, and establish projects and priorities which are most urgent at that level.

The brutal truth of the matter appears to be that any supposition that the government agencies can achieve a conceptually coherent and operationally viable program of integrated long-term regional socio-economic development is almost impossible. Past performance will bear this out. The culprit is, quite simply, the whole operational system.

It takes a lot of talent to find an argument that will convince the bureaucrats that a program can be viable. You have to tackle an army of bureaucrats and cut a lot of red tape. In my part of the country it seems we have to cut the red tape lengthwise. That is harder than the traditional way.

Development is acquired by money, diverse work, intelligent long-term sub-regional planning based on confidence, by determination and, above all, by the spirit of a group that knows it has something to contribute and to gain; and is being given a clear, unconstrained open and shut opportunity to prove that.

I know I am repeating myself when I say that a trappers' assistance program and a housing program for the north could work well. I must sound like a broken record, but I have to keep saying this although my words seem to fall on deaf ears.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would encourage the government not to think in conventional, paternalistic terms in its attempts to overcome the socio-economic problems faced by the native people. There is a natural inclination to hesitate and worry about taking the wrong course of action. However, some re-thinking is necessary. We must move boldly ahead. As Sir Wilfred Grenfell said:

> It is courage the world needs, not infallibility. . .courage is always the surest wisdom.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate on the motion condemning the government's policy with respect to the Indian Economic Development Fund.

First of all I think I should put on the record what that program is. In the publication "Indian Economic Development Fund" issued by the department in 1971, it is stated on page 3:

> The Fund, designed to assist Canadian Indians in developing and expanding viable business opportunities will provide job opportunities for Indian people, on and off reserves.
>
> One of the main objectives of the Fund is to ensure that Indian businessmen have access to basic financing and the managerial, professional and technical services necessary for the successful operation of their businesses.
> The Department sees the Fund as an effective link between Indian businessmen and sections of the Canadian business community whose support is required to help Indian people achieve the greatest benefits through economic development. It is a program which can be mutually beneficial to Indian and non-Indian businessmen.

The purpose of the program, based on a 1969 government white paper, was to fund viable small businesses to a maximum of $50,000. It was also to be used as a lever for funds from other agencies such as DREE, manpower and so on.

● (1640)

I came to Ottawa in 1972 and have been a member of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development since then. Each year as the committee dealt with the main estimates of the department we discussed and considered the Indian Economic Development Fund. Each year we read the annual report and listened to presentations made by the minister and various officials. They talked in glowing terms of this program.

The then minister of Indian affairs and northern development, now the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan), appeared before the committee when it considered the estimates in 1975-76. As recorded on page 11, issue No. 18 of the committee's proceedings of March 13, 1975, he said:

> Another area, an area which I regard as highly significant, is the area of economic development . . .
> Here again the results are obvious, whether one looks at the indigenous Crane Cove Oyster operations in Nova Scotia or the suburb developments on the Sechelt Reserve in British Columbia. All across the country one finds budding Indian and Inuit enterprise, such as: a ski resort at Thunder Bay, Inuit hunting and fishing camps in northern Quebec, a furniture factory at Samson, a motel at Sawridge, a cattle ranch at Beardy's, a bee-keeping operation at Roseau River, and a shopping centre at The Pas.

The hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith) will have something to say later about the shopping centre at The Pas.

The minister went on to say:

> They are eloquent testimony that Indian businessmen, given the opportunity of advice and resources, can thrive in this country.

Today the minister spoke about plans and history, still in glowing terms. Of course he is no longer the minister responsible. But he spoke of job opportunities. Mr. Speaker, if one examines the figures and charts given to us in the committee when we considered the miscellaneous estimates earlier this year, one will note that there are at present some 2,577 projects outstanding but that the number of native peoples employed on these projects totals only 4,722. In other words there are fewer than two jobs per project.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Disgraceful!

Mr. Neil: It came as a real surprise to me earlier this year to learn, after members of the official opposition had done some prodding in committee, that the Indian Economic Development Fund was in a terrible, in fact in an absolutely shocking state. I can say in fairness that the officials who appeared before us were relatively frank about the over-all financial condition of the fund, but it was difficult to dig out certain details concerning the fund and details concerning projects.

If one consults the minutes of the committee meeting of March 24, 1977, one learns that since the introduction of the fund in 1970 some $140 million was advanced. At the time of the hearing $105 million was outstanding. That was made up of grants and contributions of $19.9 million, direct loans of $57 million, and guarantees of $28.3 million. In addition to this funding of $105 million, there has been other funding of various projects, by DREE, provincial industrial development agencies, the Department of Manpower, and so on. In the committee meetings I asked some questions about the extra financing figures and was told those figures were unavailable. Why they are not available I do not know. After all, the department supposedly is administering these various projects and loans.

Mr. Knox, the director of the program was asked questions about the additional financing. After I had asked him such a question about additional financing he said, as recorded at page 10 of the committee report, "The statistics on this are not very good as you can see." That was the beginning of the revelation at the committee hearings. Let me refer to issue 28-A of the minutes of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It is the record of the meeting of March 24, 1977. As one will see if one examines pages 21 and 22 of the report, I asked questions. I suggested that although the balance outstanding on that date was $105 million, in order to salvage the program or the $105 million the Government of Canada or the taxpayers of this country will need to put in between $40 million and $50 million by way of grants and contributions. I raised this point as recorded at page 21. On page 22 Mr. Mackie, the assistant deputy minister, replied as follows:

> If I may, Mr. Chairman, the grants and contributions portion of it, of course, is going, for the most part, to viable ongoing projects. In other words, it is a continuing and additional investment in something that is going to continue to earn and be a viable project.

I then went on to say:

> I appreciate that. I mean, you are not throwing it into something which is bankrupt. But what I am trying to determine is how much money has been thrown in to try and salvage. You look here and there is $105,274,000 outstanding, and you are putting in $40,000,000 to protect that.

Mr. Ford replied as follows:

> Yes, that is the cost of the stabilization process, as we have called it. The total cost would be in the area of forty to fifty million dollars.

That extra amount represents almost 50 per cent of the amount outstanding. I then said I was just trying to assess the program. I said:

> . . . it seems to me that it is going to cost an awful lot of money to salvage what we have. Would it be a fair assessment to say that the program really has not worked out too well over the years?

Mr. Kroeger, the deputy minister, replied:

> The program has certainly had its problems. What you have had tonight is an outline of the first truly comprehensive review that has been undertaken of the program's operations since the department got into the Indian economic development business in a substantial way in the early 1970's.

I point out that although the program started in the early 1970's, a comprehensive review of the fund was undertaken only after several years of operation. Mr. Kroeger went on to say:

> There have certainly been problems. It is a difficult environment to operate in. We ourselves as a department, have had to go through a learning process.

The deputy minister's response was the understatement of the year.

The government had set up a good program in 1970, a program which would help the Indian people to begin viable business enterprises. As a result of ineptitude, lack of training and experience, red tape, lack of supervision, which the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes) mentioned, and lack of follow-up, the program is a disaster. Unfortunately the failure of this program has placed many Indian people and Indian Bands in a bad light with their non-native neighbours.

● (1650)

I will admit, as the former minister has said, that a number of the programs have been successful. There is no question about that. However, these are mostly smaller programs, programs which fell within the guidelines initially of being a maximum of $50,000. The major losses are on projects above that maximum.

Just as a matter of interest, some 40 to 50 of the projects included in the $105 million are over $500,000. When I say $500,000, that is the extent of the money that this fund has put into these projects. At the meeting of April 26 I asked the following question:

How many of the 40 to 50 projects over $500,000 looked at by the task force recommended by Knox-Nixon were found to be in financial difficulty?

That is all the projects over $500,000. The response was:

All 40 projects of $500,000 looked at by the task force were found to be in financial difficulty to varying degrees.

In other words all the programs where advances had been made of over $500,000 are, to some degree, in financial difficulty.

I wish to make reference to one project, one of a number on which we have been able to get some information. Other speakers will refer to some of the other projects. I wish to refer to the project known as Sawyer Boat Manufacturing Limited of Gleichen, Alberta. The project was set up to manufacture fiberglass boats. The project was not over the $500,000, but it would have been if the recommendations of the business service manager of economic development, Alberta region, had been followed. The project closed down in October, 1976. I believe it went into bankruptcy.

I have some figures. In fact I have three different sets, all of them government figures. It appears at the time the company closed down in October it had received, by direct loan, some $145,000, and contributions of $46,000, for a total of $191,000 from the fund. In addition it had received $12,757 from the Canada-Alberta Industrial Training Program.

I have some figures which are not in agreement with those I have quoted. Presumably they are all official figures. One set of figures I have totals $245,000 and another about $220,000. Which is correct? They are all official figures. Some are confidential, but if we look at the confidential figures the total is $295,000. That was not the figure given to me in response to a question I put in committee. Anyway, it is well over $200,000.

Just prior to its shutting down, there was a recommendation put forth by the business service manager, economic development, Alberta region, recommending additional advances of $400,000 yet at that point in time, according to the information I have regarding the application, the program was in trouble. It was in trouble for various reasons; insufficient capital, poor management, poor bookkeeping systems, and failure to keep records. This is interesting because on the first page of the application it quotes:

This project was initiated about one year ago, and finally got underway toward the end of the year. This was somewhat later than had been planned. This delay, which can be attributed to our own bureaucracy, had a costly effect on the first year of the enterprise.

I see that I am running out of time very quickly. In questioning in the committee it became apparent that the people from the department who were involved in the loan process really had no knowledge or skill with regard to loaning. They failed to carry out the protections given under the regulations that were promulgated in 1972. If they had followed those regulations there would not be the problems there are today.

The ADM said, and I quoted him a few moments ago, that during that period they were in a learning process. If you are setting up a loan agency you do not have your staff enter into a learning period of six to seven years. That is what has happened under this program.

The program has not been properly supervised. Politics have been involved. There has been carelessness and a lack of direction. The loans and loan applications have been mixed up with red tape. We see the result today. The result is that the taxpayer of Canada is going to have to put up between $40 million and $50 million to salvage an operation of $105 million.

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, as has been indicated during the course of this debate, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has been in the economic development business for a very short period of time, about seven years. We knew when we began this program that there would be some risk and perhaps dangers. We were prepared to take them because we thought that the program was an important and necessary one for Indian people.

We admit that there have been some mistakes. We are not entirely satisfied with the way in which the program has been going and what it has accomplished. At the same time, there have been some success stories which we think ought to be on the record.

Last year the Indian Economic Development Fund and the Indian businesses supported by the fund received a comprehensive performance review to lay the groundwork for more effective Indian economic development. Since its inception in 1970, the Indian Economic Development Fund has encountered a number of serious problems stemming largely from a small business support fund attempting to meet a broad range of developmental objectives.

When the program first came into existence its mandate was directed mainly toward small business, but as it went on during the seven year period a number of larger projects were funded or given loan assistance. It is in this area that some problems developed. So now we are taking a very hard look not only at existing projects but at the economic development program itself. We are involving the Indian people in this review, a review which may result in recapitalization and restructuring of some worth-while projects and, in other cases, the elimination of those which are no longer operating well or which simply cost too much to support.

● (1700)

During the past two years a number of key problem areas have been identified. Some of these have been mentioned in the course of debate, and others have not. Allow me to review these problem areas. Because of the nature of the projects involved the IEDF has been used to an increasing extent to support existing projects. Support for existing projects was often provided in isolation of other priorities. The limited contribution funds and greater flexibility of loan funds available have favoured the use of loans and, as a result, many projects were either too heavily debt-loaded or required significant development-type funding before being capable of normal operation. I might point out, of course, that developmental projects have involved extra risk, incurred heavy start-up costs, and sometimes relied on people who, unfortunately, were inexperienced in management.

I am sure all members are aware that when you become involved in economic development in some of the underdeveloped and needy regions of this country there is certain to be some risk. A great deal has been made about problems encountered by the IEDF in the past seven years, but I should like to remind hon. members that, although these are serious, corrective measures are being undertaken to improve the program so that it can meet its basic objectives. I might say, though, that in contrast with some economic endeavours in other parts of the country, the few failures we have experienced pale by comparison.

It was not long ago that the CBC in its national news drew attention to some economic disasters in the province of Newfoundland. The population of Newfoundland is approximately 522,000, according to the 1971 census, and this is less than double the number of status Indians in Canada—they number about 280,000. The CBC reporter, having considered economic development in that province, spoke about the failure of a linerboard mill at Stephenville as a result of which as much as $200 million might be lost and the town's future placed in jeopardy. He spoke about the shutting down of another industrial monument, a gypsum plant, in Cornerbrook, and about the closing of a massive refinery at Come-By-Chance; the plant, he said, was in receivership and Newfoundland holds the second mortgage of $41 million. He spoke about the failure of a tannery and glove factory, of a chocolate factory, of a woollen mill, of a rubber factory, of a steel plant and so on.

I realize, of course, that reciting a list of these economic reverses in no way justifies weaknesses in the Indian Economic Development Fund program. But I submit that it does underline that in programs of this kind, where a government is concerned and wishes to support economic development in slow-growth regions such as those in which many of the Indian people live, more often than not there is a risk which has to be taken.

To paint the picture fairly, though, reference has to be made to some of the successes. In my view these successes are outstanding and are well worth putting on record. First, though, I should like to refer to the improvement program which is now under way. During the course of the committee hearings it was emphasized, as hon. members have mentioned, that consultative studies have been undertaken to examine the whole range of Indian economic development programs and to suggest improvement and changes.

A comprehensive controls sytem will be introduced. There will be more closely defined planning and project assessment systems. There will be a longer development period applied to projects, with increased use of appropriate advisory and technical services. Emphasis will be given to the encouragement of small projects, and arrangements made for more complete counselling and monitoring as well as for the integration of projects into the developmental context of the Indian community. The hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) referred to this important need.

As mentioned, the mandate of the Fund was initially directed more to small business. However, in the course of time it became involved in larger projects which required a higher degree of management skill. This is where some of the difficulty became apparent. Let me point out, with respect to small businesses within the Indian community which have received government assistance, that a week and a half ago while visiting the regional office in Toronto and discussing the economic development program officials there told me that small businesses among the Indian people in Ontario have a success ratio which was in excess of the national average. Or, to express it in a negative way, the percentage of failures among small Indian businesses supported by government funds in Ontario was significantly less than for the nation as a whole.

I think it is worth while indicating to the House what the objectives of the Indian Economic Development program are. They are as follows: to increase employment and income opportunities for Indian people; to involve Indian people in the design and delivery of economic programs; to provide a source of capital to Indian people for economic development, both on and off reserves; to ensure that Indian people engaged in business have access to basic managerial, professional and technical services; to assist Indian businessmen achieve an effective working relationship with the business community at large.

I said I would talk about some successes. In recent years the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has provided leardership and guidance in developing a range of sectoral programs for Indian people working in specific sectors of the economy. Examples are as follows: British Columbia, Indian Fishermen's Assistance Program; Saskatchewan, Indian Agriculture Program; Manitoba, Indian Agriculture Program; Saskatchewan and Manitoba, Wild Fur Programs; James Bay, Wild Fur Program. So as not to take an excessive amount of time I shall refer to only two of these programs and inform hon. members as to what has been achieved. The Saskatchewan Agriculture Program increased the gross value or primary production of no less than 350 farms. It upgraded 135 farms and created 215 new farms. It improved the average income of these Indian farmers from $3,500 to $15,600. It raised total Indian farm income from $1.25 million to $5 million. Up to 500 Indians were trained for secondary industry, and improved economic conditions increased their social uplift.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what was the cost of such a program which had these benefits? Total federal investment, apart from loans, was $51,428 per farm. Total federal investment, development costs were $36,425 per farm. Total farmer investment was $33,200 per farm. Federal development investment broken down on a per man-year basis was $28,032, and per job $12,142. If you compare that with other job creation programs and I think hon. members will find the comparison not only favourable but probably rather outstanding.

Another program of benefit to Manitoba is the wild fur program. Under this program there are increased returns through improved production and marketing by 3,000 trappers, 1,700 of whom are Indians. The program improved trapper income from $850 per season to $2,850 per season. It raised total trapper income from $1.3 million to $5 million. The investment involved: federal investment per trapper was $820; provincial investment per trapper was the same; and trapper investment was $1,367.

While still on the subject of successes may I take a moment to talk about the Indian arts and crafts industry. In 1969 the Canadian Indian was faced with many difficulties in becoming economically viable. Some of the major areas of concern at that time were the following: firstly, as a result of their remoteness from major markets, poor prices, shortages of raw materials and the lack of working capital, many Indian craftsmen experienced difficulties in marketing their crafts, and many other Indian people who would produce did not do so. Secondly, problems exist with respect to consistency of quality control, product design and style, raw material usage and various forms of production methods. Thirdly, the arts and crafts industry, on a national scale, has just been organized. However, further organizational development was required to provide a broader based marketing and management information system. Lastly, despite their interest and pride in crafts, craftsmen and artists did not receive enough in return for their work.

In 1970 the Indian arts and crafts program was formulated as a result of a departmental review of arts and crafts activities and it began to improve in a significant way. The development of Indian arts and crafts has responded positively to the department's approach of joint participation. Once again, the department did not simply develop a program and impose it upon the people; it came through consultation and many joint discussions. In the spirit of this approach, management of Indian arts and crafts has been progressively transferred to Indian ownership.

Success in the arts and crafts program has been largely the result of the enthusiastic commitment and innovative management of the National Indian Arts and Crafts Corporation and its ten member Indian arts and crafts organizations representing Indian artists and craftsmen across Canada in nine provinces and one territory. In a speech on April 26, 1977, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand) announced that the Indian arts and crafts program will be imminently transferred to the management and operation of the National Indian Arts and Crafts Corporation.

During the course of my brief comments I have made reference to government consultation with Indian people. Hon. members should be advised that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has adopted a joint working relationship with Indian leaders, with Indian organizations, and with Indian people. This has the endorsement of cabinet and it is, at least, a beginning and a recognition of the need to involve Indian people in initiating policies and planning programs which will ultimately affect their lives. At the political level there has been since 1974 a joint National Indian Brotherhood-cabinet committee where Indian people and government can discuss and reach a consensus on problems and solutions.

With regard to today's debate on Indian economic development, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has a number of task forces working with the National Indian Brotherhood in connection with this program. As a result of these consultations, this joint endeavour, there will be some improvements and changes made. In the economic development program there will be better control mechanisms developed, administrative procedures will be improved, and there will be some accepted guidelines established to minimize, though certainly not eliminate, the possibility of failure. I say that because some mistakes will continue to be made in the future. Therefore we know by being courageous enough to carry on with a program like this, by being willing to take the necessary risks we will be opening the door to the kind of excessive criticism of our program which we have heard during the course of today's debate.

There will be other projects which will fail in the future, no doubt, but we will not be deterred from working with the Indian people to create jobs and to help them achieve an economic base which can sustain them at a reasonable standard of living according to the accepted value system in this country.

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, as the member of parliament for the Churchill constituency representing a large Indian population in northern Manitoba you have heard me speak many times of the plight of the Indian people. Being a neighbour to these people for many years, I have witnessed first hand the many hardships that they face.

The 30 Indian bands in the Churchill riding are characteristic of the national Indian scene. Despite great efforts on the part of Indian leaders over the last decade, 1976 Canadian statistics report that the unemployment rate of Indians is 50 per cent to 60 per cent, the welfare rate is over 50 per cent, average income per family is $1,500, and the infant mortality rate is 2.6 times greater than for the general population. With statistics such as these we must question what the Canadian government—or the Trudeau government which espouses a just society—has done for Indian people.

The Indians have made many representations over the last few years for assistance in the area of economic development. I have heard them state many times that they want development that will lead to employment and self-sufficiency.

The hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes) and the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) raised the issue here today of the Indian economic development fund administered by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. This fund, established in 1970 with $50 million in capital to distribute over five years, was to assist in the economic improvement of Indians. It was to support small, viable businesses to a maximum of $50,000. Like my colleagues who spoke before me, I share their concern regarding the administration of the Indian Economic Development Fund. I am deeply distressed about the serious deficiencies which appear to exist in this program.

During our standing committee meetings on the main estimates of Indian affairs, testimony from departmental officials and various studies we have reviewed revealed that there is a multitude of problems surrounding the IEDF program. I am concerned that a program designed to improve the economic situation of Indians has done little more than create situations which reflect badly on the Indian communities involved.

Since the Indian Economic Development Fund was established in 1970 the total investment has been $145 million. Of this amount, several million is being spent either bailing out or writing off a number of the projects. Though the official mandate of the IEDF was to fund small viable projects, we have learned that approximately $45 million is being spent on projects with amounts over $½ million, and another $24 million on projects involving amounts between $100,000 and $500,000. Some $69 million out of $145 million is being used for projects that in fact exceed the mandate of the Indian Economic Development Fund.

This in itself is disturbing, when a department responsible for the administration of such an important program administers millions of dollars without a clear policy. I wonder how many Indian people are aware of the collective negative results of this Economic Development Fund, which is ending up with millions of dollars being foolishly squandered.

My concern relates to the number of projects funded by IEDF which are in trouble. Several of these were identified in the Woods, Gordon study on the Indian Economic Development Fund completed in November, 1976. This study prepared for the government explains the difference in terms of success between the small projects as opposed to the larger projects. In dealing with individuals and small enterprises, the fund has had some measure of success. The large complex projects, with few exceptions, are in serious financial and operating difficulties.

At a standing committee meeting on April 26, 1977, Mr. Neil asked how many of the 40 to 50 projects over $½ million were found to be in trouble. The reply was that all 40 projects of over $½ million were in difficulty to varying degrees. Further to this it was indicated at this meeting that $50 million would be required to put all the various projects in good standing. This referred to write-offs and additional funding. Surely, this is a sign that financial management and control in this program are grossly inadequate. To the general public having some knowledge of these projects, they will no doubt attribute this trouble to poor Indian management. It is, therefore, necessary to enlighten the public by revealing the inadequacies of the program stemming from departmental deficiencies.

I feel that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development must assume a large part of the responsibility for the deficiencies of the program, for it is the department which is operating the Indian Economic Development Fund without a well defined policy. It is the department which has failed to provide proper administrative advice and controls to the enterprises, and it is the department that has allowed the program to operate in this careless haphazard manner for seven years.

As an example of bureaucratic bungling in the case of the IEDF, let me discuss the multi-million dollar shopping complex which was built on The Pas reserve in Northern Manitoba. The shopping complex, known as The Otineka Mall, is owned and operated by The Pas Indian Band. This is one of the projects funded by the Indian Economic Development Fund which exceeded the $50,000 mandate by $8 million. The final cost of the shopping complex was $8.5 million. This complex is the result of a modest request from The Pas Indian Band to develop a small convenience store to serve The Pas Reserve residents and also highway traffic north of The Pas. This request was initially made to the Manitoba government in a letter from the Indian band dated September, 1970.

Today The Pas Indian band is saddled with a shopping complex which encompasses approximately 193,000 square feet of gross leaseable area and approximately 158,000 square feet of net rentable area on three levels. At present there is a significant area of unoccupied space. The complex is having serious financial problems. The director of economic development for the Department of Indian Affairs has indicated that they are trying to work out the kind of financing the centre can support on a long-term basis. The problems facing the shopping complex are attributed by the assistant deputy minister of Indian affairs to government overbuild.

The chief of the economic development branch of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development explained the problem of overbuild as follows:

> The centre was overbuilt—it was built to government specifications through the handling of the construction by the Department of Public Works—and this has been largely responsible for the cost overrun . . . What this really means is that the specifications or the standards of Public Works are very high for public buildings generally, probably higher than you would find in private industry for a similar kind of building, and perhaps arguable too high, or unnecessarily high, for the nature of the building itself.
> A second aspect of overbuild is described as being that the size of the shopping centre relative to the market was too large. In other words, it was overbuilt in terms of size.

I question who is at fault in overbuilding an enterprise such as The Pas shopping complex. It is obvious that at least two departments of government, the Department of Indian Affairs and the Department of Public Works, must take the major responsibility for its present state of affairs.

For the record, I would like to review some of the incidents leading up to the $8.5 million dollar complex at The Pas. As I mentioned earlier, the initiative to develop a small convenience store to serve The Pas Reserve residents and also the highway traffic north of The Pas came from The Pas Indian band in a letter to the Manitoba government in September, 1970. In December, 1970, a Mr. Gordon Fisk was hired as a consultant to the band. In a letter to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Mr. Fisk proposed the development of a modest shopping centre of between 20,000 and 25,000 square feet with a food store, a general store, and space for a bank or drugstore.

A further study commissioned by the band from Damas and Smith Limited was completed in January, 1973. This study indicated the need for limited retail facilities on the reserve to serve the Indian population and tourists travelling along Highway Number 10. This study made specific reference to the fact that there is insufficient market potential to support a large scale development.

On June 29, 1973, in a letter to Mr. Keith Taylor, who was then the member of parliament for the Churchill riding, the late Chief of The Pas Indian band, Mr. Gordon Lathlin, wrote and I quote:

> At one of your visits at the band office I discussed with you our development plans which included construction of a small retail complex.
> We have been dealing extensively with the Department of Indian Affairs and it appears that at least the store complex will become a reality in the near future.
>
> At the moment we are trying to secure tenants for the building.
>
> The purpose of the development is not only to provide jobs for band members and revenue for the band, but also to provide services to residents of The Pas reserve. In this respect we would like to pursue the possibility of locating a sub-branch of the Post Office on the reserve. Having to pick up mail at the Post Office in town creates a hardship for many people who do not own vehicles.
> I am asking for your assistance in pursuing this matter. Please contact the proper authorities to get an indication of what can be done. As we are planning to get construction under way this summer it is important that we get an answer quickly.

At this point, it is evident that the band was still thinking in terms of a small retail complex.

In July, 1973, the assistant deputy minister of Indian affairs invited the property development branch of the Department of Public Works to undertake a re-assessment of the retail and commercial possibilities for The Pas band. They set about their task by way of a Department of Public Works authored department store type of merchandise study. In August, 1973, the DSTM study was completed, identifying the need for additional major commercial facilities in the area of The Pas. In contrast to the Damas and Smith findings, the DPW report concluded that there exists a strong possibility to establish a regular closed shopping mall in The Pas region.

● (1730)

In October, 1973, The Pas Indian band adopted a band council resolution authorizing the Department of Public Works, first, to enter into a contract with an architect to design the shopping centre and, second, to negotiate leases.

The Department of Public Works then had the major role to design, oversee the design and to set up leases and search for tenants.

The townspeople of The Pas expressed a great deal of concern about the proposed regional shopping centre on The Pas reserve. In a letter to the minister on December 18, 1973, Major Jack Kennedy of The Pas questioned, among other items, the justification for the size of the proposed complex which by this time was proposed to be 110,000 square feet. Resource Development Associates Limited prepared a feasibility study for the town of The Pas. This study essentially disagreed with the Department of Public Works study, in regard to, first, size. DPW recommended a complex of well over 100,000 square feet. Research Development Associates recommended a complex no larger than 35,000 square feet. Second, it disagreed in regard to the trade area. DPW stated a 150 mile radius; Research Development Associates stated a 50 mile radius.

Despite conflicting recommendations in various studies; in June 1974, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development attended the sod-turning ceremony marking the official start of construction and the Department of Public Works was granted a mandate from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to construct the shopping centre including the awarding of contracts, construction progress payments, leasing, supervision and the general management of the entire construction phase of the project.

Where were the Indian people in all of this? It would appear that following the adopting of a band council resolution in 1973 authorizing the involvement of the Department of Public Works, it was virtually out of the hands of The Pas Indian band.

Otineka Mall—the Pas Regional Shopping Centre is completed and has been in operation for about one year. It is, indeed, an impressive structure for the area. The end result was 190,000 square feet of retail and office space at a cost of $8.5 million. This is a far cry from the $250,000 complex announced by the minister on July 19, 1973, or even the DPW news release on June 21, 1974, which gave the amount as $4,950,000. Of further interest is the Otineka Mall information sheet which states that the market area covers a 50 mile radius, not 150 miles as stated in the DPW study. Today, the sensible dream of a small shopping complex can be described as turning into somewhat of a nightmare for the Indians of The Pas band. Once again we witness the manipulation of government to the detriment of Indian people.

The financing of The Pas shopping centre complex involved a bank guarantee and a direct loan from the Indian Economic Development Fund. The loan was for $6 million, of which $4 million was guaranteed by the department. There was an over-run. The final cost of the complex is now at $8.5 million. Cost over-run is due to overbuilding.

If DPW's specifications or standards "are very high for public buildings generally", then why was DPW assigned to build a shopping complex in the first place?

The Department of Indian Affairs would have not been involved in such an enterprise if they had followed their own regulations. The regulations state that loan arrangements under the IEDF are basically for a 15-year term. There is no way that $6 million can be paid back to the department in that length of time.

I see that my time is running out, Mr. Speaker, but I would just like to conclude by saying that it is evident and plain that there are serious deficiencies related to all areas of IEDF including management direction and guidance, financial accounting systems, financial and reporting systems, and planning systems.

I feel the program warrants a complete overhaul so that it might properly be put "on track" to do what it was intended to do—which was to improve the economic conditions of Indian people.

Directions from the government have involved the Department of Public Works and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in the construction of showplaces across Canada for political purposes only, with no regard to the disastrous and distasteful end result, and leaving an area with a black eye. Writing off $4.2 million is nothing more than a cover-up by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to protect the bungling of the Department of Public Works in connection with the Otineka shopping mall in The Pas. I believe that the Auditor General should review this program and report his findings to the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the shocking revelations made today by the Conservative members for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes), Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil), and Churchill (Mr. Smith), are a story of corruption, flagrant and patently ugly political patronage, misconduct, mistruths, and mismanagement.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Brisco: Wait till I finish. It is self-evident that the Caspar Milquetoast of the cabinet, the Minister for Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand), has been gulled and misled by his own department. This misguided minister, bumbling along in the sure knowledge that all is well in his ministry, in for a rude awakening on his return to Ottawa, will discover, when he is jerked back into the realm of reality, that his ministry is in disarray and turmoil, that morale is at a low ebb, and that rather than serving the native peoples of Canada they have been used as pawns in a chilling and frightening game of politics—on that I will remark later.

Mr. Speaker, today I am going to review the nauseating account of only five projects funded by this department.

On November 25, 1976, at a meeting of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development I inquired as to the funding of the Ehattesaht Co-op. The funding is as follows: direct loan, $500,000; guarantee $1,800,000; contribution, $110,000; appropriations $25,000; that is a total of $3,035,000. In addition there was a special ARDA grant advance of $1,843,877 and Manpower training contracts of $44,871, bringing it to a grand total of $4,323,748.

Ever naive, or purposely deceptive, the department added:

The Department's regional office has stated that the co-operative had ample support of competent professionals.

That is auditor, forestry engineers, general manager.

Mr. Speaker, those statements do not square with the facts. In addition, correspondence from those firms which sold logging equipment to Ehattesaht Co-op leads me to believe that Indian Affairs deceived the creditors by creating the illusion that all was peaches and cream and that they had nothing to worry about. These unsuspecting businesses were taken for $2,490,382. It is interesting to note, however, that in the list of creditors there is no mention of More Leasing Limited of Chilliwack, B.C. a company that leased equipment to the co-op, mainly in the form of crew buses and pick-up trucks. a one third owner of this liberally supported firm is Mr. Wilmer Stromquist who, from July of 1974 to May of 1975, acted in a consulting capacity to the co-op, and after that acted as general manager under contract to the co-op.

I ask the minister to tell the House what the consulting fee was and what the salary was as general manager. I ask the minister to tell the House what salary Mr. Stromquist received when he was appointed an employee by the receiver-manager when the co-op went into receivership. I ask the minister to tell the House whether or not More Leasing Limited or any of its owners purchased any of the liquidated assets of the company and, if so, at what price. I ask this because the receiver-manager, as the responsible individual for the total operation of the co-op from May, 1976, to the present, designated Mr. Wilmer Stromquist to act as manager for current operations of the co-operative, that is, removal and selling of all remaining inventory under the co-operative's control.

I ask the minister to tell the House how Mr. Stromquist, described by the minister's own officials as a widely experienced manager of logging operations, could not only sanction but also participate in a trip to Hawaii along with his wife and daughter, two members of the board of the co-op, and two non-members of the board, when he knew the untenable condition of the co-op. To set the record straight, let me quote in part from the department's reply to my inquiry as follows:

The portion of the cost of the trip paid by the co-op was approximately $6,000... At present approximately 25 per cent of the trip cost remains uncollected due to the closure of the operations and lay-off of people concerned.

The final sequence to this disaster is that it was not the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development which blew the whistle; it was DREE. It was also a source within DREE who commented that most of Mr. Stromquist's management pronouncements were made from Vancouver and not from the project site.

I would like to turn to Sawyer Boats. This outfit received on November 25, 1975, one loan of $55,000, another on the same day of $19,800, and a third on the same day of $25,200. That was over $99,000 in one day for a company which was, in the opinion of the department, "in a precarious position", and a project that "may well be a candidate for bankruptcy". Mr. Mackie did not consider that that type of funding thrice in one day for a firm already on the verge of bankruptcy unusual.

I turn now to the blatant examples of political patronage at the individual level. I ask why, in the wildest stretch of the imagination, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development would arrange a term loan for Cardinal Family Farms in Alberta for $113,000 with a repayment of $1 a year for the first four years, plus simple interest. I ask how an operating loan for $15,000 under the same terms could be allowed. I ask how it could be done with practically nothing in terms of equity owned by the Cardinal family. The Cardinal family had equity of $10,000 and received $153,000.

I also asked about Chief Norman Yellowbird of Alberta. He received $22,000. He had equity of less than $2,000. This little story is interesting because one of the conditions of the loan was that Yellowbird dispose of unnecessary equipment, machinery and other vehicles. In spite of this, Yellowbird did not sell his car, and when the second loan was authorized on June 6 the loan contained a condition that the car be sold. Yellowbird traded his car in and purchased a new $6,000 pick-up truck. Previous to this he already owned three trucks, one of which was a pick-up truck in relatively good condition. The money obtained from this under-the-counter dealing was used as payments on Yellowbird's new truck and a new $45,000 house. That is political patronage of the worst kind.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Brisco: Let no one doubt or challenge my intentions.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN VOTE 1, PARLIAMENT

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 58(10), to interrupt the proceedings and to put forthwith every question as may be necessary to dispose of any item of business relating to the main estimates and for the passage at all stages of the bill based thereon.

[English]

Mr. Andras, seconded by Mr. MacEachen, moves that Vote 1—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before you put the motion in the name of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) I should like to rise briefly on a point of order. I do not object to the fact that what will be put to the House is the positive motion for this particular item, but I still think, as other hon. members do, that a way should be found for it to show in the record that the reason that positive motion is being put is because a member filed notice of opposition. In this case the notice of opposition happens to be in my name, and I would like it to be clear that the reason we are voting on this one item in the name of the President of the Treasury Board is that we want the opportunity to vote against spending all this money on the Senate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand the preoccupation of the hon. member, but it is difficult for me at this time to satisfy him, except to indicate to him that he should look at this matter for future times. However, at this time I have no alternative. In raising his point of order I think the hon. member has achieved what he wanted to, without too much debate, of course, but everybody knows that the reason we have a separate vote on that first motion is that there is an item which is opposed by the hon. member.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on one other point of order. I think the word "parliament" should be spelled correctly in the English version, not "parliment".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I shall read it correctly!

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That Vote 1, in the amount of $6,925,892 under Parliament for the Senate—Program Expenditures for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978 (less the amount voted in Interim Supply), be concurred in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed of the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion which was agreed to on the following division:

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION REORGANIZATION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION, ETC.

The House resumed, from Tuesday, June 21, consideration of Bill C-27, to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Rodriguez: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. When Your Honour outlined the groupings of motions for debate, it was indicated that members could review the arrangement. Your Honour had indicated that motions Nos. 7, 8, 9, 10, 22, 15, 29, 30 and 32 would be debated together. Upon review, I note that motions Nos. 7, 8, 9, 10 and 22 deal with the subject of the minor attachment period going from the present eight weeks to a range of ten to 14 weeks, while motions Nos. 15, 29, 30 and 32 deal with the length of the benefit period.

I would suggest that motions Nos. 7, 8, 9, 10 and 22 deal with a topic that is separate and apart from the length of the benefit period dealt with in motions Nos. 15, 29, 30 and 32. I would draw to Your Honour's attention the possibility of splitting that grouping and putting motions Nos. 7, 8, 9, 10 and 22 together in one group, and Nos. 15, 29, 30 and 32, and No. 11 which you had indicated to be separate, could be put with the latter group for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are in some difficulty because we are in the midst of debating motion No. 7 under that proposed grouping, and I would not want to do anything that might prejudice the contributions that have already been made to the debate. I do not think, either, that it would be appropriate to give those who have already spoken on motion No. 7 under that grouping a chance to speak again on the second grouping.

On the other hand, it is never the intention of the Chair to attempt to compel members unduly to speak on a subject that might not be convenient to them. Since we are continuing consideration of that motion, I think I would have to give this suggestion some thought. Had we not already launched upon this discussion, my basic inclination would be, of course, to accede to the request of the hon. member. The whole purpose of this is to try to make debate more meaningful for members, certainly not to cut short any contributions to be made by members.

I would want to reflect on whether we might create some difficulty by giving members who have already spoken a chance to speak again and in some way prejudice the contributions that have already been made.

Mr. Symes: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, as I recall, when we last debated this matter the two or three speeches made at that time only dealt with motion No. 7 and not the topics covered in the other motions. I do not think we would have a problem of repetition or prejudicing what has already been said.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would also point out that only two members have spoken thus far, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) and the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes), although the member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) had just started. Since the hon. member for Nickel Belt proposes including motion No. 11 in one of the groups, I think the problem of members speaking again is not a very serious one.

Mr. Speaker: My inclination would always be to accede to the request of hon. members that the grouping proposed by the Chair be adjusted as we go along in order to give effect to the desire of members to debate these motions intelligently. In view of the fact that I had indicated initially that while this rather broad grouping might be taken together for purposes of discussion, even under that arrangement the question would first be put on motion No. 7 and that would dispose of the grouping except for motions Nos. 8 and 10. I have already indicated something close to the division, at least for the purposes of voting, envisaged by the hon. member.

I would think we ought to be able to accede to the hon. member's request, and if there is no objection I propose to go ahead with that grouping and therefore consider that the discussion now continuing on motion No. 7 be considered as discussion on motions Nos. 7, 8, 9, 10 and 22. I did not understand the hon. member for Nickel Belt to include motion No. 11 in that grouping.

Mr. Rodriguez: No.

Mr. Speaker: The second grouping would then be motions Nos. 11, 15, 29, 30 and 32. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us extends the minimum attachment period from eight weeks to ten weeks and as far as 14 weeks, depending upon the region in which the applicant lives. After three years, the minimum attachment period is extended to 14 weeks for all regions. This concerns me despite the fact that I come from the relatively low unemployment area of Saskatchewan, although Manitoba and Alberta are also low.

As the law stands, a worker can qualify for unemployment insurance benefits if he loses his job, or if a job is not available, after being in the labour market for eight weeks, but if this motion is adopted it will mean he would have to be in the labour force for ten to 14 weeks, based on the unemployment rate. I would assume that in a low unemployment area like the prairies it would be at least 14 weeks. Some people may say it is fair to treat high unemployment areas in a more liberal fashion than low unemployment areas, but I suggest that is not necessarily the case. In an area like mine, where the official unemployment rate is only about 4 per cent, there are many people with problems similar to those of people in northern Ontario, northern British Columbia, eastern Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, and they should be able to qualify for UIC benefits in the same way. There are people in my area who do not have the training, job skills or education required and are put into jobs which do not last very long.

It seems to me that this type of bill balkanizes the country and different areas will be treated differently. I do not think this is a very good precedent to set. All Canadians make the same contributions and should be able to draw the same benefits. A worker in my area makes the same contribution as a worker in Sault Ste. Marie, in Cape Breton or in Matane, but in order to draw benefits he has to meet different criteria and that is not really fair. To me, this discriminates against people working in my riding. They make the same contributions as other workers and often do the same job.

• (1120)

For example, in my riding there is large potash mine and a large CNR terminal. There are also large mines and large terminals in the maritimes. Workers in my riding, as in the maritimes, make the same contribution to the unemployment insurance fund, but under the new regulations, if a worker in my riding loses his job after he has worked 12 weeks, he will not qualify for unemployment insurance, whereas workers in the maritimes who have done the same job for the same time and lose their job will qualify for benefits. Clearly, the minister is establishing a bad principle. I point out that both workers pay the same premiums but they will not be treated equally. That shows, I suggest, how unfair is this part of the bill which the minister asks us to support.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It does little for the cause of national unity.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

Mr. Nystrom: As the hon. member sitting in front of me says, it will do little for the cause of national unity. It will make this country's working people cynical. Certainly, if people in my riding lose their jobs, they will look cynically upon how people in other parts of the country are treated. The minister should not do this. The bill should treat the entire country uniformly, instead of attempting to balkanize it. The minister's proposal will do just that.

Apparently, the minister is more concerned about stopping the few people who abuse the plan than about solving the problem of unemployment. Mr. Speaker, this country's problem is not that a few people abuse the unemployment insurance fund; the problem is unemployment, finding jobs for people who want to work. If we had jobs for all Canadians, the vast majority would prefer working to drawing unemployment insurance. The minister seems to be more concerned about stopping a few abuses than solving unemployment, more interested in pumping billions of dollars into the unemployment insurance fund than in using imagination and encouraging the government to promote new policies which would create jobs.

Mr. Speaker, we could do much to create jobs for Canadians. For instance, we could embark upon a national insulation program of the kind my party has advocated since last October, or a housebuilding program which would put people to work quickly, or national winter works programs which could be used to constructive benefit in our communities. Above all, we must bring about long-term economic changes in this country. We must encourage manufacturing and the processing of raw materials in Canada before they are exported. Mr. Speaker, Canada imports more manufactured goods per capita than any other industrialized country, which is a crime. Manufacturing is labour-intensive; resource development is capital-intensive. Therefore, we are exporting our jobs to the United States, Europe, Japan and elsewhere, and importing unemployment from those same areas of the world.

We must change this policy if we want full employment in this country. Instead of embarking upon such imaginative policies, the government should crack down on the few who abuse the unemployment insurance plan, to sue them, as the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) says, as scapegoats. The government is not grappling with the fundamental problem, that of providing jobs for Canadians from coast to coast. The minister bases his proposal strictly on the bureaucracy's nationwide unemployment figures. But in my riding many of the unemployed are not included in official unemployment figures. There are seven Indian reserves in my riding, on some of which unemployment is running at 90 per cent. On the best of them, about half the Indian people are unemployed. So that you can safely say between 60 per cent and 80 per cent of the people on the reserves are unemployed. They are not included in the Statistics Canada figures because they are treaty Indians. If you included them, you would find that the unemployment rate in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta is higher than the official figures show.

Under the new regulations our native and Indian people living in the prairie provinces will not be treated as generously as native peoples living in Ontario, Quebec, the Atlantic provinces and British Columbia. They will be penalized, which is not fair. It is difficult enough for Indians and Metis to find jobs in Saskatchewan. At present, between 15 per cent and 20 per cent of the population of Regina consists of Indian and native people. Many of them are unemployed, many of them are on welfare, and many of them are young, without jobs, skills or trades. This bill will discriminate against them, making it difficult for them to enter the labour force and learn a trade or skill. That shortcoming of the act could lead to all kinds of social problems and crime.

The unemployed want to work; they want to occupy their time. As it is, crime rates per capita in Regina are among the highest in this country, which shows you how serious this problem is. The people of the area want jobs. They do not want hand-outs, welfare or unemployment insurance benefits. They want jobs and opportunities, but they will not get them unless this government changes its policies and makes it possible for all people to work. I wish the minister would reconsider some regulations which discriminate against people living in rural and outlying parts. Ever since I was first elected to this House I have been concerned about people who live in rural or outlying regions and are cut off from unemployment insurance because, according to the government's computer, or in the opinion of bureaucrats, they have not been searching for a job as vigorously as they should.

Our bureaucrats apparently penalize the man who says, "I cannot drive 30 or 40 miles each way to work," and the housewife who says, "I don't drive. Anyway, we do not have a second car and I cannot go to work in the city 30 or 40 miles away." I remember one specific case. A person in Langenburg was cut off because she said she could not drive 50 miles every day to a job in Yorkton. Surely, cutting people off for such reasons is entirely unreasonable. How can you say they abuse the system and therefore should not qualify for UIC? These people want to work and will do everything reasonable in order to find a job. But because they live in some remote town or village, or on the farm, and because the nearest job may happen to be inaccessible in the city many miles away, they are cut off.

The person living in the city can hop on the bus, and search for a job much more easily. A man looking for work in Regina is looking for it in a community of about 165,000 people, and if he refuses a job perhaps there is a case for cutting him off UIC benefits. But it is not fair to apply the same standard to a person who lives in, say, in Esterhazy, Kamsack or Kenora and is told that the nearest job is in the big city many miles away. Because officials insist on applying the regulations so strictly they turn some of the unemployed into liars. People have come to me and said, "If I had told the truth I would have been cut off, so I lied." They say to me, "You are cut off UIC if you are honest. I got my UIC benefit because I lied." Such people take a chance, but they obtain UIC benefits. If they are honest and say no, they cannot do that, they are cut off. I have referred many cases of that sort to the minister's office year in and year out, where rural people have been put in the position of choosing between being honest and being a liar. They have to make that choice. Most people choose to be honest, tell the truth and lose UIC benefits that would rightfully be theirs if they were not living in a rural area, on a farm or in a small community.

This is the type of act the minister perpetuates. This is the type of act he refuses to amend in a positive sense so that rural people are not discriminated against. I have spoken to members of all parties in the House and they have expressed similar problems with people in rural areas trying to find a job. I almost dread some of my office hour tours. Two, three or four times a year I hold office hours in small towns and villages in my constituency. I go to places where there are only a few hundred people and set up an office in a town library or some other place to meet with the people. I advertise when I will be there.

I always dread it when someone comes to me with regard to an unemployment insurance problem. I know what it is. It is usually a rejection because the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the computer say that they are not available to work. They are told they are eliminating themselves in searching for a job and therefore do not qualify. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) knows what it is like to live in a place like Pelly or Churchbridge. There are not many jobs in small villages. If Joe Blow's wife is not able to go into Regina to look for a job, leaving her three or four little kids at home, she is cut off. However, if she lived in Regina, Toronto or Halifax she could qualify for a job or unemployment insurance.

Is the minister going to comment on that problem when he speaks? Is he going to move any amendments to make it more fair for the people who live in my constituency and in other parts of rural Canada? If not, he is going to perpetrate great unfairness and injustice in the Unemployment Insurance Act. It is a real problem. I have seen many people agonize over whether they should be honest with the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue only with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): No.

Mr. Rodriguez: Who said no?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I did.

Mr. Rodriguez: You should be ashamed of yourself.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address myself to motion No. 8 which includes clauses 29 and 30 of Bill C-27. Before doing so, I would like to make some general comments relevant to those two clauses. Bill C-27 symbolizes this government's total inability to deal with the country's most pressing problem, that of one million Canadians out of work. Instead of introducing measures to reduce the staggering number of unemployed persons, this government has turned its attention to cutting back the number now receiving unemployment insurance benefits. At a time when the government should be defending its legislation and protecting those who are jobless, we see measures which will place an added burden on those already out of work.

As the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) said, most of us represent constituencies with a substantial number of rural people. They simply cannot accept a job, even if one is available, because of the problem of transportation. That is the major problem in the rural areas of Canada, not the other restrictive measures that were in the old bill. It is the distance and the cost of travelling back and forth to work. A physician, lawyer or other professional person can deduct the cost of transportation from his income tax. However, very seldom is there a working industrial agreement between a company and its employees whereby the employee who has to drive 25 or 30 miles to and from work every day receives a mileage expense. That is most unfair and only exacerbates the situation.

There are absolutely no logical arguments behind the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act which the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) introduced last December. The minister claims that the proposals in Bill C-27 were made as a result not only of his department's so-called comprehensive review of the program but also as a result of a wide variety of studies carried out by other organizations and individuals. The comprehensive review which the Unemployment Insurance Commission published contains, among other things, what is claimed to be a profile of UI claimants. One of the objects of the profile was to provide the basis for discussion of the amendments in Bill C-27. Let us for a moment examine just how comprehensive the study was.

The profile of UI claimants was based on a sample of 8,521 records of separations from employment during January to June, 1974. The profile starts with a table showing that only 27.7 per cent of these separations were due to lay-off, whereas 41.3 per cent were voluntary quits. As a basis for changes to the UI Act, the profile is nothing but a fraud. As the minister knows full well, Canada was, in the first half of 1974, at the height of an economic boom. This is very cogent to this whole discussion. Unemployment then was 5.2 per cent, compared to nearly 8 per cent now. Furthermore, as the latest unemployment statistics bear out, January to June is the time of year when employment rises, when lay-offs are at a minimum and jobs easier to find.

Between the dates the review was carried out, January to June, employment in Canada increased by over one million. Unemployment went down by 76,000 in those months, and over 900,000 people who had been outside the labour force were drawn in and able to find jobs. We are going back to that time span between January and June of 1974 when there was still a tremendous upswing in the economy and a growing demand for jobs. Had the minister wanted a truly comprehensive report he should have ensured that the next six months be studied as well. During July to August, 1974, to January and February, 1975, employment fell by 833,000. Unemployment increased by 243,000, and 590,000 people who were in the labour force in July and August, 1974, had been forced out by the following January and February. So much for this comprehensive review study which makes no sense whatsoever. It is not at all relevant to the bill we are discussing. It is outdated and archaic.

[Mr. Blackburn.]

The bill is based on a study done during a small time frame when the country was still in a reasonably good economic situation. Employment was high and the demand for jobs was high. To base it on that limited time-span with those limited numbers on the unemployment lists is somewhat of a fraud to perpetrate in this House and push down the throats of members on this side. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the authors of the study were either totally ignorant of how to compile an unbiased report, or they deliberately chose those months so that the minister could stand in the House last December and claim that the amendments to the UI Act were warranted because of comprehensive studies which were undertaken by his department. He was out by about two years.

Probably the latter was in fact the case, from which I can conclude that the minister was misleading the House with erroneous and biased information. The review also dealt with what it calls the "post-claim behaviour of exhaustees observed from April to October 1973". This is based on a special survey of 2,649 individuals who exhausted their claims in April 1973. The survey found that 63 per cent of exhaustees were able to find work within an average period of six weeks. I loathe that word "exhaustees", Mr. Speaker. Are we not dealing with human beings? Here, again, April of 1973 was a convenient year to pick. Canada was then in the upswing cycle of the boom and unemployment was much lower than it is now. As Lukin Robinson, a Toronto economist, pointed out, the 1973 survey——is an irrelevant and wholly unjustified basis for the UI Commission's current punitive policy of disqualifying as many people as they can from benefits, and if the UI Commission and the government do not know this, they can hardly expect others to be blind to the drastic difference between conditions now and in 1973.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration has yet to put forward any logical arguments for introducing certain amendments to the UI Act. The minister, in proposing a variable entrance requirement of ten to 14 weeks, has never made it clear why he felt this was necessary, aside from the fact that a minimum of 226,000 individuals would be disqualified if the amendment were to pass. I say minimum, Mr. Speaker, because the figure of 226,000 assumes that 50 per cent of those who would have worked only eight to 13 weeks will be able to get longer work. This assumption appears to be based on the "comprehensive" study to which I have already made reference. The only logical reason for this move, in my mind, is that the variable entrance requirement will help pay for benefits in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces.

It appears, Mr. Speaker, that this amendment to Bill C-27 reflects the government's continuing policy of placing restrictive measures against the unemployed, instead of pursuing economic measures to create long-term jobs. The unemployed of this country are being used as scapegoats by a government that does not have the guts to deal with our economic problems. Increasing the entry requirement will do little, except to satisfy those in this country who feel that the eight to 11-weekers are bums or cheaters looking for a free ride. Obviously, many of these people who complain about the unemployment insurance system have never experienced unemployment.

An hon. Member: I don't like that phrase.

Mr. Blackburn: Which phrase is the hon. member referring to? I missed it.Most of the people who are searching for work are doing so sincerely. They are not lazy bums. I do not know which member complained about those words, but it has certainly been my experience in my constituency office, when adults come in and weep in front of me. I am not being dramatic when I say this; it is absolutely true. They tell me they keep going back to the same industry week after week until they are told by the personnel manager, "Look, we don't want to see you back here". But the UIC says they have to go back, they have to make a job search. And where are they? The first thing they know, they are cut off. I don't deny that some do abuse the system, but from my experience with countless hundreds of UI cases, the benefit control offices of the Unemployment Insurance Commission do more than an adequate job of ensuring that no one draws benefits when not entitled. Those who are on legitimate claim must go to great lengths to prove their availability, capability, and desire to work. If this is not done, they are automatically subject to disentitlement. In short, Mr. Speaker, it is not nearly as easy to get paid from unemployment insurance as most people think, unless of course the UIC is doing a sloppy job.

I have no doubt that in some cases they are doing a sloppy job. If somebody is drawing unemployment insurance illegally, that person should be charged. I have no objection to that whatever. But there are some people who think there is an unemployed bum under every bed in the nation, to paraphrase an expression which was once used with regard to communists. So, who is going to be most affected by the proposals to increase the entry requirements? I suggest it will be the low income, seasonal or part-time workers who must rely on temporary jobs because there simply are no full-time jobs to be had in the areas where they live. Members from the Atlantic provinces have said in the past that seasonal, short-term and part-time work is a way of life for many. Yet even in our industrial heartland there are relatively few jobs to be had.

In my own constituency of Brant, the latest figure I have from Canada Manpower is that 5,911 persons were unemployed at the end of May, less than a month ago. At the same time, the local Manpower office has a total of 266 jobs available, including both part-time and full-time. So there are 5,911 persons chasing 266 jobs in an area of Canada which is supposed to be highly industrialized, with a great demand for workers. I do not know how the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will sell his arguments in that area when he campaigns there in a few months.

Mr. Symes: Do you know something we don't know?

Mr. Blackburn: I will tell the hon. member later. Given that kind of ratio, it is obvious there are a lot of disgruntled people in an area which has a high standard of living and a high standard of job availability. The variable entrance requirement is another measure which erodes the original universal nature of the UIC program. There is no doubt that should this amendment pass, it will lead to instances where if two men employed in the same industry are hit by industry-wide layoffs, one may qualify for benefits while the other is denied any. I am speaking now of the geographic problem to which the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville referred a few minutes ago.

The New Democratic Party strongly opposes, on behalf of the unemployed of this country—those who are legitimately unemployed; we have no brief for those who try to rip off the system—any increase whatever in the minimum number of weeks to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits. The qualifying period can be altered and probably should be altered from time to time. I am not saying that the minimum qualifying period should be a hard and fast requirement continuing decade after decade, but I am suggesting that during very bad economic times, when hundreds of thousands of Canadians are suffering, as they are today, the eight-week qualifying period should remain as it is. If, in three or four years' time, unemployment decreases considerably, we could take a second look at the qualifying period and extend it to 12 weeks or 14 weeks, whatever is reasonable having regard to the state of the economy.

As far as regional distinctions are concerned, I am not sure what the minister means by "regions". I do not know what the distinction is under the act. If you were to take Atlantic Canada as a region, it would be totally unfair because Cape Breton Island, for example, has a much higher unemployment rate than other parts of Nova Scotia or parts of New Brunswick. Even if you take Nova Scotia as a region, I would point out there is very little relationship between unemployment in the Halifax area and on Cape Breton Island. I wish the minister would explain just how he would set up regions in relation to the qualifying period. As a matter of fact, one could almost establish separate regions in the larger metropolitan cities. If a person lives in east Toronto and cannot get work there and has to go to west Toronto, he has to travel 17 to 20 miles. This regionalism is something which has to be more clearly defined before we vote for or against this bill. Those are my brief remarks about clauses 29 and 30 which are encompassed under my name in motion No. 8. They also include motion No. 10 which is related to the qualifying period of eight or more weeks.

● (1150)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I should like to point out to hon. members the question is on motion No. 7 standing in the name of the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), which will dispose of motions Nos. 7, 9 and 22. The question should be put separately on motion No. 8 standing in the name of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn), and if required a division on motion No. 8 will also dispose of motion No. 10. A separate vote will be required on motion No. 11 standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez).

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to make one comment in respect of motion No. 11 standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). Further comments will have to be made with respect to the debate and the division of votes, but we are ready for the question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The question is on motion No. 7. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

the Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The question now is on motion No. 8. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

[Mr. Blackburn.]

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred. The House will now move to motions Nos. 11 and 15.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

Motion No. 11.

That Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 33 by striking out line 34 at page 14 and substituting the following therefor:

"(c) fifty-one weeks of benefit have been paid".

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved:

Motion No. 15.

That Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 41

(a) by striking out lines 3 to 6 at page 19 and substituting the following therefor:

"under sections 22 and 34, and the regional rate of unemployment, that applies to him in the last week for which benefits";

(b) by striking out line 19 at page 19 and substituting the following therefor:

"(b) ending, subject to subsection (3),";

(c) by adding immediately after line 24 at page 19 the following new subsection:

"(3) The commission may, with the approval of the governor in council, make regulations under which the period determined under subsection (2) may be adjusted if the regional rate of unemployment that applies to the claimant varies during that period.";

(d) by renumbering subsection (3) at page 19 as subsection (4).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question? The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez).

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, this group of amendments which the minister has put forward is designed to vary the length of time—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) on a point of order.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am starting to become a little confused, but of course hon. members will say there is nothing unusual about that.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Alexander: I figured my socialist friends would jump in once I gave them the opportunity. I am prepared to go along with the debate as long as we arrive at a conclusion later on as to what will be the voting in terms of the package. That is somewhat tricky because motion No. 11 is in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), motion No. 15 is in the name of the hon. minister, motion No. 29 is in the name of the hon. minister, motion No. 30 is in the name of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes), and motion No. 32 is in the name of the hon. minister.

I am not asking for a ruling at this particular time, but a little later we should indicate that the vote on motion No. 11 would include motion No. 30, and the vote on motion No. 15 would include motions Nos. 29 and 32. In other words, my suggestion is that we must have two votes in order to clear this up. I am not asking for a ruling at this particular time; I am merely trying to get some indication of what is going on around here. The parliamentary secretary is smiling and nodding, so I think he understands, as he usually does.

An hon. Member: The odd couple.

Mr. Alexander: I hear the hon. member say something but, as always, it was unintelligible. If he would care to stand up and help me out, I should appreciate it. I am not asking for a ruling at this time. That is the point I want to make.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): As was stated before, motion No. 11 standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) will require a separate vote. A separate vote will be held on motion No. 15, which will dispose of motions Nos. 15, 29, 30 and 32. The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez).

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): It seems to me that is what we all understood when Your Honour made an announcement earlier this morning. I suppose some of us are sleepy after last night. As I was saying, the effect of the minister's amendments in motion No. 15 and the other motions standing in his name will be to vary the length of time which claimants will have to be in the work force in order to collect benefits.

At the outset, with respect to Bill C-27, we said the Unemployment Insurance Commission thrust upon the minister this idea of changing the entrance requirements to collect benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act and to vary the length of time in which a claimant would be able to collect benefits. It seems to us those are most inappropriate steps to take at this time when unemployment in this country has been running at 8 per cent. If one looks at the figures, one finds that we have had a consistently high rate of unemployment in Canada, compared with other technologically developed countries in the western world.

• (1200)

We have superimposed, at this time, changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act which were based on a study entitled "The Comprehensive Review of the Unemployment Insurance Program in Canada". The minister's bureaucrats were quite proud of it and they insistently thrust upon the committee the fact that they had the basis for these decisions and recommendations, that they had the facts. Indeed, this replaced the Bible; it became the "word as revealed". But when we looked at it we found it was a review done by the department itself. I have been in education long enough, some 16 years—

Mr. Friesen: Does it show?

Mr. Rodriguez: I hope that the little bit of honesty which I learned in the classrooms and in administering a school comes through in the House, rather than the phony-baloney of hon. members to my right and those who sit across the aisle who really belong to the same club.

An hon. Member: The Rideau Club?

Mr. Rodriguez: No, the parliamentary club. One of the things I have learned, in terms of evaluating educational goals, is that one of the no-no's is never to ask educators to evaluate whether they have achieved their goals, because invariably they will tell you they always achieve their goals. Any evaluation should be done by an independent body, apart and aside from the very people who are given the responsibility for drafting legislation and making recommendations to the minister responsible with respect to the act which they will eventually administer. That seems to be the wrong way around.

I tell members of the House quite frankly that this comprehensive review was done in 1973-74, a period when the unemployment rate in Canada was much lower than it is now. We are experiencing approximately 8 per cent unemployment in this country. Do not forget that 8 per cent now is calculated according to the latest method that StatsCanada brought in some months ago. Back in January, StatsCanada changed its method of calculating the rate of unemployment and magnificently cut Newfoundland's rate in half overnight solely as a result of the way they calculated it. The period 1973-74 was prior to the StatsCanada changes.

An hon. Member: You haven't got your facts right.

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member comes from an area in New Brunswick where the unemployment rate is atrociously high, but he sits here making smart-assed remarks.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): All you do is filibuster.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, we did not hear the hon. member in committee. In the committee he was silent as the dodo, as silent and as extinct as the dodo. He had nothing to say about a piece of legislation that adversely affects his part of the country.

Mr. Nystrom: Disgusting.

Mr. Rodriguez: I wish he would get up in the House and make a speech with respect to this bill.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): You speak too much.

Mr. Rodriguez: It is a shameful performance on the part of the hon. member, to sit in the back benches and make his snarky remarks. He is doing a disservice to his constituents.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Let my constituents decide that.

Mr. Rodriguez: I will not, Mr. Speaker. I will not let the hon. member across the way make his snarky remarks without being identified. I think he deserves to be identified. The study was done in 1973-74 when the unemployment rate, comparatively speaking, was much much lower than it is today. Furthermore, when we asked in committee how the officials went about compiling their information, "Oh" said the deputy minister, "Oh, oh" said the deputy deputy minister, "Oh, oh, oh" said the deputy deputy deputy minister, and "Oh, oh, oh, oh" said the deputy deputy deputy deputy minister. They said, "Mr. Rodriguez, we have the in-house study, we have the outhouse study, we have the round-house study, we have the back-house study, we have the narrative reports, and we have the personal interviews".

An hon. Member: You are a shame to the House.

Mr. Rodriguez: We found out that some of those in-house studies and narrative reports came to some fascinating conclusions. For example, they told us there should be no trouble in Atlantic Canada for any person who wants to find eight weeks of work, no problem at all. Just listen to them say it. They say there are jobs that are scattered all the way from northern New Brunswick, the area of the hon. member across the way who has been throwing in his cheap little remarks—

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): You are the expert on cheap remarks.

Mr. Rodriguez: —up to Newfoundland. They say there are jobs floating around and that, with perhaps a few exceptions, there is no reason in the world why people could not find work. It was as if I were meeting with the St. John's board of trade all over again. So far as they were concerned, if you did away with the Unemployment Insurance Act they could get work for all those people in Newfoundland. For example, studies done by the Canada Manpower centres showed instances of potential claimants quitting their jobs at the peak of the season so as to qualify with the highest average insured earnings possible.

In addition, these Manpower centre studies said there are indications that a number of workers arrange to be laid off once qualified for UI benefits so that someone else may obtain eight weeks of insured employment. I made the comment the other day that these people discovered shared work long before the minister ever thought of putting it into effect. I suggest that members get hold of a copy of "Employment Patterns in the Atlantic Provinces". I intend to send a copy to every provincial member in the Atlantic region and in Newfoundland to show them what Manpower centres think is going on in the maritime provinces. This is a shameful document, shameful in all the insinuations and innuendoes it makes about the work force in Atlantic Canada. I do not see the hon. member across the way standing on his hands and demanding clarification of these statements.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): You are the only one who stands on his hands when he wants to speak.

Mr. Rodriguez: The one conclusion I come to is that the people who designed these studies and who spoke about them in committee have never been unemployed in their lives. They sit there with their $60,000 a year jobs and pontificate on the attitudes of the unfortunate Canadians who want to work and cannot find work in some parts of this country. We see a shameful display by the government when it uses the unemployed as scapegoats and as red herrings, as the former minister of manpower and immigration said. This is a red herring to try to distract people from realizing that this government has failed to deal decisively with unemployment. It is absolutely disgraceful that the minister can stand up in British Columbia and say to the Canadian people that they can look forward to high unemployment and high food prices for the next few years. Since when have admissions of failure become responses to the problems faced by this nation? This is the kind of travesty that is perpetrated by this government, and then it asks members of my party and parliament to participate in this hoax on the Canadian people.

● (1210)

Hon. colleagues to my right have fallen for this, stepped right in and broken their wrists patting themselves on the back, and taken credit for the stiffer requirements and the reduction of the benefit period. They say they have been pushing the government on this since 1971 and that if the government had listened, we would not be in the mess we are in today. Instead of tightening up the Unemployment Insurance Act, I think we should come up with more positive suggestions on creating employment so that every Canadian who wants to work can get a job. We cannot blame the official opposition for not creating jobs, because it has not been sitting on the government benches for years. The government which is proud to tell us that it has been the government for years has the divine power to rule, but I wish it would start using that power so we would not have one million people unemployed. That is the figure given to us by Statistics Canada, but that is not the hidden unemployment figure. When the task force of my party visited Atlantic Canada to discuss unemployment, we discovered that the real unemployment rate in Atlantic Canada is 15 per cent or 20 per cent higher than the figure given by Statistics Canada.

The government proposes to superimpose on the country some 54 regions. After many years, the government has suddenly discovered that there are regional differences in Canada. It took three weeks from the time it tabled Bill C-27 before government backbenchers started flapping and getting on the minister's back. Suddenly, the minister rushed in with a hastily contrived regional approach to unemployment insurance. If it was a well thought-out and valid plan, why was it not introduced originally? According to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), he has always been telling the government to look for a regional approach. Suddenly, the government came into the committee hot and sweaty, and the minister made his big announcement. He rushed to the cameras saying that the government had discovered regional disparities and that it was implementing a program to take into account the differences in the regions.

Mr. Alexander: Don't take my name in vain.

Mr. Rodriguez: I am not taking the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West in vain. If I did, I would expect thunder to clap and lightning to strike around this building, and I would be struck.

Mr. Paproski: Stick to your script, Rodriguez.

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member tells me to stick to my script. Well, what has the government done? It now says there will be 54 regions. In each region the unemployment rate, which is defined in this amendment, will determine the number of weeks a claimant will collect benefits.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: How stupid. The hon. member is flapping his wings. He thinks that is great stuff.

Mr. Nystrom: He was flapping his flippers.

Mr. Rodriguez: Well, throw him a fish. Let me inform the minister and his nabobs, because obviously they did not think this thing through, that this is a very unbalanced program. It was just dashed together. The riding of Nickel Belt is about 150 miles north to south, and another 200 miles—

Mr. Friesen: We will take it next time.

Mr. Rodriguez: The Tories are deader than a dodo in Nickel Belt. Nickel Belt comes into region No. 21, but region No. 21 stretches all the way to Wawa. It includes Blind River, all of Nickel Belt and it goes over to Mattawa. The community of Killarney is 52 miles from the large industrial centre, Sudbury, where unemployment is low, but at certain times of the year the unemployment rate in Killarney is 60 per cent. However, when we consider the total over-all region, we find that we are brought down to the minimum number of weeks in terms of collecting benefits.

Because of the geographical nature of our country, we find that within regions there are pockets of unemployment which exceed national levels and which far exceed the regional levels which have been set by the minister for the number of weeks a person can collect benefits. I am sorry the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) is not here with us today. Blind River suffers gravely and seriously because of unemployment. The rate of unemployment in Blind River is easily over 20 per cent. Also, one only has to consider the LIP grants and the Canada Works grants which have floated into that community, to realize the seriousness of the problem. The people there have been finagled by the Shouldices of Ontario and of this country. The shysters took every DREE grant and every Ontario Development Corporation grant they could get, and then pulled out and left the people without employment. They will be included in a particular region even though parts of that region may be suffering high unemployment. That is one of the fallacies of the amendments the minister has proposed. His amendments tamper with the present act which was incorporated in 1971.

I want to reiterate what the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) has said. We do not support unemployment insurance fund rip-offs. We have always supported a full employment approach in this country. We have always said that there ought to be jobs for those who want to work. Those who are incapable of working because of mental or physical disabilities should have programs which can look after them. The government is responsible for the economic health of the country, but we find that nothing positive or constructive is being done. We are told consistently by this government that we must wait for the cavalry bugles from south of the border before our economy will improve. The government must accept responsibility for the lack of action which has caused high unemployment in this country. Instead, all it does is tamper with the act.

As the hon. member for Brant said, we do not think the length of time a person can collect is carved in stone. We do not think the present period is appropriate. There are very few times that I find myself in agreement with the Canadian Mining Association, given the nature of my riding and our experience with that association. However, the Canadian Mining Association has said this is not the time to be tampering with the Unemployment Insurance Act with respect to the number of weeks of attachment, nor with respect to the length of time a person can collect benefits. That association says the attention of the government ought to be focused on the creation of employment opportunities, and only then should the government make the changes to the act which it thinks are necessary.

The Economic Council of Canada had this to say about the unemployment insurance program:

> We believe that most Canadians affected by unemployment are well served by the unemployment insurance system and use it honestly . . . It would of course be possible to try to eliminate abuses by cutting certain categories of claimants or the duration of benefits or by extending the period of work before claimants could become eligible for benefits. But such recommendations could prove harmful to persons most exposed to periodic and genuinely by involuntary unemployment.

● (1220)

What did the bureaucrats at the Unemployment Insurance Commission do then? They waved them all aside, making them disappear with their in-house, outhouse, around the house, back-house studies. That is what they did with their own interviews and cheap counterfeit reports like the one called "Employment Patterns in the Atlantic Provinces." I suppose the information was obtained by telephone in the way benefit control officers obtain information on claimants by telephone which results in a decision by an insurance officer to cut off benefits.

I see the hon. member for Parry Sound has come into the House. He should join with me in this because for purposes of unemployment insurance benefits his riding will become part of region 21. I am sure he will have something to say.

An hon. Member: Don't hold your breath.

Mr. Rodriguez: Considering where he sits in the House, I will not. One of the facts we were able to obtain from the bureaucrats was that the average number of weeks of unemployment insurance benefits collected last year was 17. Looking at the provincial breakdown, we find a high correlation between those parts of Canada that are consistently plagued by high unemployment. In other words, that average tends to be exceeded in Newfoundland, Atlantic Canada and parts of Quebec where we know already there are regional disparities and high unemployment. In effect, what the Economic Council of Canada said is backed up by statistical information based on those who collected benefits last year in the parts of Canada where records were kept. It seems to me the Economic Council of Canada has said that now is not the time to tamper with the Unemployment Insurance Act as it relates to participation time and the length of time benefits can be collected.

I have suggested a way in which the minister can properly administer the act to ensure that where people are ripping it off, proper controls can be imposed. We suggested that if certain groups were suspected of this, computers could be used to segregate them and subject them to benefit control. People could be referred to jobs. If a Manpower centre maintains that jobs are available in Atlantic Canada, then it should refer people to those jobs, and if they do not take them they should be cut off benefits. Surely, that is the message that comes out of this piece of garbage that was put before members of the committee. Surely, if jobs are available, people should be referred to them.

Now we are putting Humpty-Dumpty together again by putting UIC and Manpower together. It is claimed they had been working closely together before. But why did Manpower officers not refer the unemployed to jobs? If they refuse the jobs, then a report could be made, an investigation launched and a decision made with respect to benefits. But to say there are lots of jobs in Atlantic Canada, and that there is no reason why people cannot get eight weeks of work there, is irresponsible. I can see the picture—two groups of bureaucrats fighting for the minister's head and ear. If we were in Spain, they would get something else as well.

We have pointed out how these proposals will drastically affect parts of Canada where it is difficult to get employment. For example, at the moment, if a worker is on major attachment he must put in 20 weeks or more of work. Then after the twenty-first week there is a two-week waiting period before benefits start. This is to be changed and benefits will be paid after the twenty-sixth week and there will be one week of benefits for every week of work. Twenty weeks' work will produce 20 weeks of benefits. But if a worker qualifies in terms of the national rate, he can draw benefits beyond that period, and after that may be transferred horizontally to the welfare program.

This is going to be discriminatory legislation, Mr. Speaker. I have had a great deal of experience with the unemployment insurance office in my riding and have discovered that those who honestly try to administer the act have difficulty because it is so complicated. Imagine what it will be like when 54 regions are imposed and the phasing-in period begins. I recall when the new act came into effect in 1971. By 1972 my office was handling 30 to 50 cases every day. We sent hundreds of cases to the central office for resolution of local administrative problems. The local officers were not at fault, because the act calls for many subjective decisions and there are no clear guidelines.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member as his allotted time has expired. Is there consent for him to continue?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not know whether the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) received an answer to his question, but there has been some discussion and I believe there is general agreement that a vote on motion No. 15 would deal with motions Nos. 15, 29 and 32, and a vote on motion No. 11 would deal with No. 30 as well.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Mr. Alexander: That is agreeable to us, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is understood and accepted by all hon. members that a vote on motion No. 11 would also dispose of motion No. 30, and a vote on motion No. 15 would also dispose of motions Nos. 20 and 32. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to express to the minister my dismay at the approach he is taking to reduce the number of benefits payable under the unemployment insurance scheme. I always find it difficult to understand why the department advances the theory that if we reduce payable benefits the unemployed somehow will be encouraged to seek work. Would it not be more logical, considering this country's high unemployment levels, levels which persist in Atlantic Canada, Quebec, parts of northern Ontario and elsewhere year after year, to determine first if the jobs are actually available? We should do this first before arguing that you need to tighten the unemployment insurance scheme, reduce benefits and thus give people greater incentive to look for work.

• (1230)

No matter how much you tighten the unemployment insurance plan, if the jobs are not there, people cannot work. I cannot fathom the reasoning behind these amendments which on the face of it are based on the assumption that jobs are available but people are not looking for them. In this country today one million are unemployed. If you include those not included in our official statistics, the figure is closer to 1.5 million. And how many job vacancies do we have in this country? According to the last figures, about 58,000. Therefore, we have one million unemployed and not quite 60,000 job vacancies.

More often than not, existing job vacancies are not available in the areas of highest unemployment. Consequently, the man who lives in Newfoundland, say, is told that because no jobs are available in Newfoundland he should move to Toronto or some other area where jobs are available. The Department of Manpower provides a mobility grant for helping people to move. When you ask a man to move, you ask him to make an onerous decision. He must decide, if he cannot find a job in Newfoundland and does not want to be disqualified from unemployment insurance benefits, to uproot his family, sell his house, if he has one, and move to Toronto or some other large centre for a job for which he may be qualified.

Let us say he does that. What could happen to him? Sure, he can find a job in Toronto or some large centre where there are more opportunities for employment. It could last a few months. The ebb and flow of the economic cycle creates fluctuations in employment levels even in our major centres, and the man who moves may find that because he was the last to join the plant or firm, he is the first to be laid off. He has given up his house in Newfoundland, probably mortgaged himself to the hilt to acquire accommodation in Toronto, and after working a few months finds himself laid off. I say this by way of illustrating that it is totally impractical to suggest that because there are some 60,000 job vacancies in Canada people should move from one end of the country to the other to fill them. The risks are too great.

The majority of people on unemployment insurance do not have long job experience, job skills or a high level of education. Many of them do seasonal work or unskilled work. Their ability to compete on the labour market is severely restricted. Even if they have the wherewithal to move to areas with job vacancies, because they are inadequately educated and trained the cards are stacked against them when they try to compete for jobs. The minister's proposal for tightening the unemployment insurance scheme, his proposal for reducing the benefits paid, will not, I predict, lead in any measurable way to the filling of existing job vacancies in this country. If we could by some magic fill the 60,000-odd job vacancies, we would still be left with more than one million unemployed. Surely, the minister's approach is wrong.

No doubt the minister will argue that if we cut back the number who qualify for unemployment insurance, we will release money for job-creation programs and for training the unemployed in skills which will enable them to find jobs. There is no logic to that argument. The amendments we are considering will deprive at least 100,000 unemployed of between one and 12 weeks of benefits, and the minister calls this a saving. In other words, the money which will not be paid to the unemployed will be used to create jobs for those same unemployed and many hundred thousand other unemployed. That is muddled thinking. We cannot save money by taking it out of unemployment insurance and using it for some kind of job training program.

I suggest there will be little relationship between the amount of money saved and the job training programs the government will bring forward. Indeed, one wonders what will happen to those individuals who will no longer be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. What would have happened if some of this bill's provisions had been implemented last year? If some 300,000 people had been cut off unemployment insurance benefits, the government would have saved probably between $150,000 and $250,000. In other words, it would have deprived the unemployed of around $200,000 in benefits and used the money paid to create jobs for other unemployed. It is like taking one step forward and two back.

It is nothing but a lot of administrative gobbledygook which will not solve the problem, but which makes it look as if the government is doing something constructive. In other words, the government is reacting to the arguments of editorial writers and others who perpetuate the myth that there are hundreds of thousands of jobs out there if only the people would take them, and that the unemployment insurance scheme stops people taking those jobs or discourages them from working. The reality is the opposite; cutting more people off unemployment insurance will be a false saving. It will not work. There is something else I have to keep repeating. The minister will not argue the point; I do not think he has an argument. However, it is important that it be on the record and that the public understand.

The minister has been advancing the phony argument that the reason behind these amendments is that those who will be disqualified will be mostly young people and women who are not serious job-seekers. They are only there to gain a supplemental income; they can still rely on the head of the family to keep body and soul together; their kind of work is not that essential to the economy, and therefore if they become unemployed they should not be allowed to collect unemployment insurance. Let us again look at the statistics. I use the government's own sources. In June last year, a month when many students were on the job market looking for jobs, and unemployed in large numbers, we find that only 12.5 per cent of unemployment insurance recipients were young people under 20 years of age.

The myth that somehow the large proportion of unemployment insurance benefits is going to youngsters who are not really serious about working for any length of time, merely wanting to work a bit to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits and representing a huge percentage of the drain on the unemployment insurance fund, is false. The other argument the minister keeps making is that a great proportion of recipients are women who really do not need the second job and, therefore, really should not qualify for benefits if they become unemployed. According to last year's figures, 41.7 per cent of recipients of unemployment insurance were adult women, and 45.8 per cent were adult men. When we look at the women who were receiving benefits, we see that the argument that they do not need these benefits is false.

In August of last year, Statistics Canada published a study of unemployment in 1973 and 1971. They found that in both years unemployed wives tended to come from families with low incomes. In other words, the wife had to go to work in order that the family could meet its mortgage or rent payments and pay for such items as fuel which has escalated in cost dramatically over the past few years. I understand that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) will today announce another $2 a barrel increase in the price of fuel oil to be phased-in on July 1 and January 1. This will mean anywhere from $25 to $50 will be added to fuel bills over the next few winters.

It is predicted that the cost of food will go up, and that general inflation will continue to rise. Is it any wonder that many wives have to go out and work in order to pay for the essentials of life such as food, shelter and clothing? They are not frivolous attachments to the work force. They are not there just to earn a few extra bucks in order to buy a coloured TV or a snow machine. They are earning essential income for the family. To say they can be disposed of, that it is all right to cut them off unemployment insurance if they become unemployed, is a cruel and callous attitude on the part of the minister and the government toward the hundreds of thousands of dependants of those women and their spouses.

When we look at the statistics compiled by the government's own agency, we find that in 1973 the unemployment rate for all wives was 13.5 per cent, for those from families with incomes between $4,000 and $6,999, 21.4 per cent, and for those from families with incomes over $15,000 a year the unemployment rate was 8.6 per cent. This proves that unemployed wives who are collecting unemployment insurance come from low income families. They are trying to get work. It usually winds up that they get seasonal employment. They are laid off first because they do not have professional training. I am not speaking of those who are nurses, legal secretaries, and so on. I am speaking of the cleaning women in hotels and other establishments, clerks in department stores, and similar jobs. That is a very insecure kind of employment. These are the ones who are laid off and become unemployed. They are the ones who need the income for their families. However, they are the ones this minister wants to disqualify from receiving unemployment insurance benefits for a few weeks, based on the time they have worked.

In light of a worsening employment situation which the minister and the government are predicting, and increasing costs which economists are predicting, to pursue this line of action will create all kinds of hardship. It will come back to haunt this government. The government thinks it can run the next election campaign solely on the issue of national unity. I say now that they are in for a rude shock. If this bill and these amendments pass, it will disqualify more people and reduce their unemployment insurance benefits. Therefore, unemployment will hurt Canadians much more than it has over the past few years. This minister will be held responsible to all the Senator Daveys and others for contributing to a reduction in the number of Liberal members who come back to this House after the next election.

[Mr. Symes.]

The government advances the argument that they need to bring in these various amendments and cut back the benefits because the unemployment insurance fund is breaking the government. They say it is becoming so costly that they cannot fund it any more. Therefore, they have to reduce the number of people on the roles. Let us look at the figures to see whether that kind of argument holds up. In 1975, when unemployment stood at 7.1 per cent, the unemployment insurance account produced a surplus of $321 million after pay-outs of $3.1 billion in benefits. This year, of course, the government has reduced its share of the cost of unemployment insurance from 54 per cent to 38 per cent, thanks to Bill C-69.

We find that the government really will not be suffering. It announced it was suspending the anticipated increase in employee-employer premiums that was set to go into effect on January 1, 1977, with a saving of $250 million to contributors. What was the reason given for the suspension? It was that the money will not be needed, even though unemployment will be as high as it has been in previous times. They know that when they pass this legislation the benefits will be reduced. The reasoning of the government just boggles the mind. It fails to get down to the business of creating jobs. It finds it easier to tinker with the unemployment insurance system and hurt those least able to defend themselves, the unemployed workers in this country. I consider that to be a backward and disastrous move.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): I have only a few minutes left, Mr. Speaker, and I want to make a few brief comments. I hope the minister is listening. It seems to me that some of the most desperate people in the country today are those who have been laid off and are in their fifties or early sixties and may be physically disabled to some extent. I have in mind people who have worked for small companies which do not have sickness or accident benefit schemes or pre-retirement security measures.

Would the minister care to comment on the feasibility of placing such persons, male or female, in a special category within the act so they would not be subjected to the same harsh rules that are applicable to younger workers? I am speaking, now, of men and women who are beyond retraining because of their age, people who are marginally skilled, or unskilled. They may, for example, be suffering from high blood pressure or heart trouble and consequently could not pass a health test or fit into a group insurance plan even if jobs were available to them. Many of them have become welfare cases, which is extremely downgrading for them as individuals.

They have largely given up looking for work. Some of them suffer, for instance, from epilepsy.

When they are laid off, possibly after working 15 or 20 years in a factory, they find it extremely difficult to get new employment. The moment they mention they are epileptic, no work is available to them. These people, like the others I have mentioned, are usually in their fifties or early sixties. I hope the minister will undertake some kind of study as soon as possible to determine whether they cannot be placed in a separate category with respect to the qualifying period or the benefit period. Their position gives rise to some of the saddest stories members hear in their constituency offices Saturday after Saturday. Of course, when people are totally disabled, other avenues of assistance are available to them.

I am hoping we can bring some humanity back into the act by adopting constructive measures of the kind I have suggested. I trust the minister will make a comment, a response or, if necessary from his point of view, a rebuttal of what I have said, because it is important that in bad economic times such as these the plight of these forgotten people should be considered by the department and by the Unemployment Insurance Commission. At the present time they are being badly pushed around. I blame the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I do not know whether they are acting deliberately or not. In any event, the people to whom I have referred are finding things extremely difficult. They are sloughed off from unemployment insurance benefits after 20 weeks and then find they must resort to welfare.

I emphasize that they are not receiving compensation or other benefits from retirement or pre-retirement plans. Changes in the act along the lines I have put forward would make these people feel they are still part of the community and are not being neglected after working so many years and contributing to the fund. I hope the minister will take my suggestion seriously when he replies. May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the House took recess.

ALLEGATION OF ATTEMPT TO DILUTE DOCTRINE OF MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I want to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity arising from the revelation during parliamentary debate on the police break-in at L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec of a new and sinister concept of ministerial responsibility, which is in contradiction with most authorities on the subject of cabinet government and which may dangerously erode the operation of our parliamentary system as we know it. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That this House deplores the attempt by this government to dilute the doctrine of ministerial responsibility, and calls upon the Prime Minister, at the earliest opportunity, to reaffirm the principle that ministers are responsible to this parliament for the actions of their subordinates.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation for debate of any such motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SAINT-JEAN BAPTISTE DAY

CONGRATULATIONS TO FRENCH CANADIANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43 which I genuinely believe will receive the unanimous support of the House.

[Translation]

Considering that a week before the festivities related to Confederation one of the founding cultures of the country celebrates its Saint-Jean Baptiste Day, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House wish a happy celebration to all French Canadians of the country.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, I already refused in the past to put such motions concerning congratulations or messages because I feel it is dangerous to encourage the presentation of such motions pursuant to Standing Order 43.

STATUTORY HOLIDAYS

REQUEST FOR EARLY PASSAGE OF BILL C-30—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In order to encourage the unity of our two founding cultures on this eve of the celebration of Saint-Jean Baptiste Day, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia):

Montreal Break-In

That this House recognize the desirability that Bill C-30, an act respecting certain holidays, complete all stages in both Houses of parliament during the course of next week so that all Canadians can celebrate with pride and joy our country's July 1 birthday as Canada Day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With regard to the message of congratulations or felicitation which was just proposed, this is a motion which relates to some legislative measure. On many occasions in the past, the attempts to use Standing Order 43 to congratulate or express good wishes to a particular group have been resisted by me, because it is not dangerous to encourage such motions or such messages but it is dangerous to encourage the use of Standing Order 43 for the expression of such messages. Therefore, frequently in the past I have failed to put those questions, whether they be in the form of congratulations to one particular community, one particular group in the country, a large group, an entire province or a very important segment of the population. I simply do not think we should follow the practice of making, by way of a motion under Standing Order 43, expressions of some sort of salutation. I do not think that is an urgent matter of pressing necessity as contained in the rules. In this instance the message goes on beyond that and it deals with legislative measures. Therefore, I will indicate that it can only be presented to the House with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion is prompted by the statement last night by the Minister of Supply and Services that he thinks there is a possibility that the Quebec inquiry by the Parti Quebecois government into the circumstances surrounding the break-in at L'Agence de Presse Libre might turn into a political endeavour. This statement appears to contrast with the Prime Minister's assurance to the House that the government of Quebec "would make very sure. . . that the facts are brought to light". In view of the obvious concern of the Minister of Supply and Services about which particular facts are brought to light, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick):

That this House supports the establishment of a federal independent judicial inquiry into the APLQ affair and further directs that there be full government co-operation with the inquiry and, in addition, insists that the Minister of Supply and Services appear before the inquiry.

Mr. Speaker: The motion can be presented to the House only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

[Mr. Herbert.]

DOMINION DAY

PROPOSALS FOR FUTURE CELEBRATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I raise my question under Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity. Considering the extreme haste with which preparations for the Dominion Day party must proceed because of the last minute decision to hold one at all, and because of the great expense of advertising necessary to resuscitate an event that only last year was allowed to lapse, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen):

That this House go on record as favouring an annual celebration on July 1, but that at least 50 per cent of the total annual budget allotted the event in future be distributed to those communities across the country which are also celebrating the event, and that the percentage of the budget to be allotted to television advertising be not more than half of one per cent.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation pursuant to Standing Order 43 of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Oral question period.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have a motion under Standing Order 43—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. member for Prince Albert rises to indicate that it was his intention to present a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43. I learned that only at the conclusion of the motion proposed by the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay at which time it was 2.15. Our Standing Orders clearly indicate that at 2.15 p.m., regardless of outstanding applications under Standing Order 43, the question period shall commence. I have no choice.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will hear the right hon. member at three o'clock.

THE MINISTRY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF POLICY ON MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, without reflecting at all on the Chair, I would make a point that there would be a greater opportunity for more motions to be moved under Standing Order 43 before the expiry of time, if ministers were in their place at two o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: My question is to the Acting Prime Minister, and it arises from statements made by the Prime Minister and other ministers this past week which indicate that this government does not accept the traditional concept of ministerial responsibility by which civil servants have a responsibility to execute cabinet policies and by which ministers have a responsibility in turn for the actions of their subordinates. Will the Acting Prime Minister give us an undertaking now that the Prime Minister will make a clear and comprehensive statement in this House in the very near future of the views of this government with respect to ministerial responsibility?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government policy concerning ministerial responsibility is well known. It was often demonstrated in the House during discussions like those we had this week, and in all circumstances, we admit that ministers are responsible for their administration and, as I said, the House of Commons knows perfectly well the procedure adopted in the past.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—KNOWLEDGE OF POSSIBLE INVOLVEMENT OF ORGANIZATION IN AIRCRAFT HIJACKING

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the concept of ministerial responsibility of this government is to blame its public servants for things that go wrong and to take every opportunity that is available to avoid knowing about matters which might cause embarrassment later on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I want to deal now with one of the questions on which there has been a clear indication of ministerial irresponsibility, and that relates to the actions of a former solicitor general, now the Minister of Supply and Services. This question is directed to his successor, the present Solicitor General. In view of revelations this morning in the press to the effect that the RCMP break-in to the offices of L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec was an anti-terrorist measure designed to avert a possible aircraft hijacking, can the Solicitor General tell the House if this was a reason for the raid, and can he also inform the House if this matter was brought to the attention of the former solicitor general, now the Minister of Supply and Services? The Minister of Supply and Services has claimed he had been briefed on several occasions prior to the break-in by the RCMP with respect to the activities of L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec, and he stated also that his ministerial responsibilities included constant—and I emphasize constant—supervision of national security affairs.

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Leader of the Opposition for his question. I must tell him, naturally, just as the then solicitor general told the House, that he was not aware of the police raid before it took place. The first part of the question concerns whether or not he had authorized the raid. The second part of the question seeks to establish whether the then solicitor general was aware of the activities or rather the police information concerning the possibility of terrorist activities. I already told the House very clearly during the question period last Friday that it goes without saying that from time to time the then solicitor general received information on possible terrorist activities in the Montreal area and, I presume, other parts of the country as well. It is also obvious, Mr. Speaker, on reading the file on that period, that members of the RCMP, and possibly two other police forces were involved, because, as some hon. members seem to forget, there was at that time a joint anti-terrorist team; only two years had elapsed since the October 1970 events. The members of that team, Mr. Speaker, according to the reports I have been given, felt there were indications that perhaps to commemorate the death—I should say the murder—of Pierre Laporte in 1970, other acts of terrorism could take place.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I would like to try to solicit from the Solicitor General—and he might have to consult with his colleague, unless his colleague makes another statement on a question of privilege—whether the former solicitor general of Canada had been briefed regarding the possibility of people associated with the office of L'Agence de Presse Libre being involved in an aircraft hijacking, and whether there had been any suggestion to the then solicitor general prior to the break-in that there would be potential involvement by people in that agency with that kind of terrorist activity or with other kinds of terrorist activities.

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, as the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out, of course I would have to go through each file with a fine tooth comb. Mr. Speaker, I think the only relevant question is not to know what the police said to the government at that time, but whether or not the minister or any members of the RCMP were aware of the raid and if they had authorized an investigation of an illegal nature. Mr. Speaker, we did answer repeatedly in the House that nobody at the ministerial level, or at police headquarters in Ottawa, including the commanding officer of Division "C", were aware before the raid that the proposed operation was of an illegal nature. Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, as the then solicitor general pointed out, no authorization to proceed with an illegal investigation would have been granted. As for us, we believe that any police operations, whatever their purposes and whatever the reasons for them, should comply with the law. That is why, Mr. Speaker, in 1974 this government introduced in Parliament another bill on wiretapping which aimed precisely at obtaining additional control over police forces activities, on the criminal side where permission must now be secured to proceed with wiretapping, and also on the security service side where permission of the Solicitor General is now required under the law approved by Parliament.

• (1420)

[English]

Mr. Clark: A supplementary question. The question here is what the then Solicitor General knew before the raid that should have led him to ask questions of officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that he did not ask. That is the question. Since the Minister of Supply and Services has affirmed in this House that he was briefed extensively on activities of groups relating to matters prior to the raid we want to know what he was briefed about. That speaks directly to the kind of questions a responsible minister would have asked of his officials. We want to know whether he was briefed prior to that raid and if it was suggested to him that there might have been terrorist activities including a possible hijacking or activities of that scope. Did he know of those things prior to the raid?

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I think that the relevant question is whether or not an illegal raid has taken place and who was aware of this raid. Mr. Speaker, the point the hon. Leader of the Opposition wants me to uphold and argue is that files concerning the security of the state should be disclosed to the public. I am not prepared to do that. The relevant question, Mr. Speaker, is to know whether or not the minister involved, the then solicitor general, had authorized in any way such an illegal raid, and I have already answered on this point, Mr. Speaker, throughout the statement I made in the House. As for the minister, he himself made a statement in the House, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members had the opportunity to question him during a long period, on Monday or Tuesday. If they did not take advantage of it, it was their right to do so.

Concerning the precise question of the Leader of the Opposition, as I said before, Mr. Speaker, it has been clearly established in the minister's statement as well as in his answers to the questions of opposition members in the House that he had never allowed any illegal raid; so, Mr. Speaker, the clear and strict rule of the government is never to allow any illegal practice by anybody.

[Mr. Fox.]

BREAK-IN AT PRAXIS CORPORATION AND BLACKLISTING OF PUBLIC SERVANTS—REASON FOR FAILURE TO IDENTIFY S. H. SCHULTZ

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is one that does deserve an answer from the Solicitor General and it is directed to him. It refers to a question I asked yesterday regarding an official in the Solicitor General's office who allegedly may have been involved in the EPO affair of 1971. The Solicitor General answered that he could not identify a person by the name of S. H. Schultz who would have been in the Solicitor General's office at that time. I have here page 253 of the official government phone book and that name appears under the heading of the deputy minister's office—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a supplementary question to put to the Solicitor General?

Mr. Oberle: I should like to ask why it would have been so difficult for the minister to identify this person who was an executive assistant to the deputy minister in 1974? Why would it have been so difficult to identify this man, and why did he give me an evasive answer yesterday?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I object strenuously to the type of language the hon. member is using. I had a letter delivered to his office this morning which gives full information on that question. But the hon. member wishes again to raise names in the House of Commons, to cast aspersions and make allegations against certain people. I never mentioned a name in this House, but said I was willing to investigate and see exactly if that individual was in the office of the Solicitor General. I have ascertained the information which the hon. member has asked of me. I had delivered to him today—perhaps it has not arrived yet, but I understand it was delivered to his office before the question period—information of that nature and, as I indicated in the letter I sent the hon. member, all this information has now been made available to the Attorney General of Ontario for his consideration and necessary action.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, the minister admitted in the secret letter he sent me just before the question period—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Oberle: —that he indeed can read the telephone book and read this man's name in there. The question is, has he asked the senior official in his department as to his previous career and what his involvement was in 1971 with the EPO affair?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, personally, I think it is extraordinary that we should now put people on trial in the House of Commons on those allegations.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We need an inquiry.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I went out of my way during the course of my answer yesterday not to divulge any names publicly, because accusations of this nature have a tendency to tarnish reputations.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Tell Goyer that. Don't lecture us, tell Goyer.

Mr. Basford: Just listen to that party opposite which keeps yapping about the Bill of Rights.

Mr. Fairweather: What about Rudnicki?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, it seems that the opposition believes I should conduct an investigation in public on the floor of the House of Commons.

Mr. Hees: We want you to tell the truth.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, as you know, a number of allegations have been made by hon. members opposite in the past few months, many of which turned out to be completely unfounded. I am not going to bandy around the name of a dedicated Canadian who has spent a good part of his life in the service of his country, just to satisfy the prurient interest of the hon. member opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Why don't you say that to Goyer?

Mr. Oberle: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The person whose name I just mentioned was preceded in his position by Inspector Cobb and Lieutenant Colonel Bourne, all of whom are seriously implicated in this whole affair. The minister has had this name for four days and has not even investigated or questioned his own official in this regard. We have word now from the RCMP that they are seeking themselves—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Oberle: —that they are seeking themselves or looking into—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—INQUIRY CONDUCTED BY SUPERINTENDENT NOLAN

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Solicitor General. Following the revelation last year by Corporal Robert Samson that the RCMP had taken part in the illegal break-in, the then Solicitor General on March 31 said in the House that an investigation into the break-in was under way. That was followed, on June 15, by the assurance given in the House by the then parliamentary secretary, who reported that the investigation into the break-in had been completed. Last Friday outside the House the present Solicitor General said this investigation had been undertaken by Superintendent Nolan. Could the minister confirm in the House what he said outside last week?

● (1430)

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I believe I said also in the House during the course of questions on Friday that the information I received from the force was that Superintendent Nolan was delegated by the Commissioner to conduct an investigation into the matter. Given the fact that Mr. Cobb was involved in the investigation, Superintendent Nolan saw him and asked him to prepare, as I understand it, a resumé of the operation.

Mr. Broadbent: According to a report in today's Vancouver Sun based on an interview with Chief Superintendent Cobb, Chief Superintendent Cobb now denies that an investigation ever took place. He says specifically that no investigation was made by him, by Superintendent Nolan or apparently by anyone else. I quote from what he says in today's paper:

> It was the press that indicated that an investigation was being made. In actual fact what I received was a request to report to the best of my knowledge what occurred.

The House has been left with the impression from the last year's statements made by a variety of Solicitors General and the Prime Minister that this matter was thoroughly investigated. We now have it from Mr. Cobb that there was no investigation. Indeed, we have his word that he, the person who authorized the raid in the first place, was asked to prepare a report on the raid. The person who authorized the raid has denied that there was an investigation. Will the minister clarify for the House whether an investigation was actually made at that time or simply a report prepared by the man who himself authorized the raid?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, no doubt the individual who authorized the raid was subsequently brought before the court, along with the other two officers of the other two police forces, and was asked for all the information he had in his possession concerning the raid. My understanding is that this was done at the request of the force and Superintendent Nolan was charged with that operation. I do not know whether the House wishes to call that an investigation or a question of terminology. I would think it is a question of terminology. The hon. member is overlooking the important fact that from that point on there was continued and full co-operation between the force and the attorney general of the province of Quebec, that the Commissioner of the force indicated he was meeting with the investigator of the Quebec attorney general's department to give him any information requested by the attorney general of the province of Quebec. To my mind, that is complete and full co-operation. At no point during the subsequent hearings has there been any criticism by the attorney general of the province of Quebec, the prosecutor or the courts to the effect that any information did not come forward from the force as and when requested.

Oral Questions

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—DATE MINISTER KNEW FORCE WITHHELD INFORMATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): We have been left with the impression for the past couple of days that the investigation that was so described last year led to the government knowing at that time that the then Commissioner of the RCMP, Mr. Higgitt, had withheld information from the then Solicitor General, the present Minister of Supply and Services. Therefore, the whole question of account ability of the RCMP to the political authority and the problem that existed was known last year. It appeared that the government was unaware of the problem last March. When did the present Solicitor General learn of the withholding of information? Considering the implications of a lot of the uncertainty that arises out of the particular case as to whether an investigation was done, does the Solicitor General now agree that we need a public inquiry into the whole affair?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is once again confusing two things. A public inquiry as he has suggested interfaced between the Department of the Solicitor General and the force could quite properly be within the jurisdiction of the federal government. As to the other part concerning coverups or criminal activities, either during the course of the break-in or following, we have indicated a number of times in the course of the past week it is a matter that ought to be looked at by the appropriate provincial attorney general.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR EASIER LENDING CONDITIONS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Since the federal government through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation lends considerable amounts of money to the provinces for building low-price homes and since the provinces undertake to reimburse the federal government $5 for each dollar borrowed, because of the not only high but compounded interest rate, can the minister tell the House whether he will urge his cabinet colleagues to change that loan policy to the provinces so they may reduce their debt towards Ottawa and accept a greater number of projects so as to spur construction and reduce unemployment?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind the hon. member that in fact the federal government lends at a preferential rate for 50 years, which is already a form of grant. That is why I cannot agree with the hon. member who gives the impression that the rates of interest on housing loans made by the federal government to the provinces are too high. On the contrary, these are preferential loans made at a rate far lower than any on the market. It is obvious that by his question the hon. member again raises, in a disguised form, one of his party's policies, that of advocating interest-free loans to the provinces, but I do not think that suggestion, which was not acceptable in the past, will be so in the future.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the minister is also giving a conventional answer to the effect that this has never been done elsewhere. Why should it be done in Canada? However, as recently as yesterday, the Minister of National Health and Welfare stated that Canada was introducing a new policy that had never been implemented elsewhere.

I would like the minister to answer my question and ask the advice of his colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare to find a new and less burdensome formula for the provinces. I understand that those loans are for a 50-year period, but they become costly when the provinces are compelled to pay them five times over. Does the minister agree about that?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member is working toward a noble purpose when he suggests a new formula. However, instead of encouraging the provinces it might be advisable to encourage the residents of the provinces and in that respect the hon. member could perhaps ask the Quebec government to sign an agreement under section 44(1)b) of the National Housing Act which would allow the payment of a rent subsidy not intended for the province as such but rather for the poorer citizens who have lower incomes in Quebec, so that some accommodation at decent rents is made available to them through federal subsidy.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

INVOLVEMENT OF SENATOR DAVEY WITH BLUE WATER RACING ASSOCIATES AND HYDROCULTURE LUWASA

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, the President of the Privy Council and the Minister of Agriculture, I wish to ask the Minister of Justice a question in relation to the position of Senator Keith Davey, the chief Liberal organizer and confidant of the Prime Minister. It has been confirmed by Senator Davey in connection with his interest in Blue Water Racing Associates Ltd. that he provided assistance and licensing and that he involved himself in representations to government which consisted of setting up meetings with Department of Agriculture officials. More recently, Senator Davey has acknowledged his involvement as a director of Hydroculture Luwasa, a privately-owned company which does business with the federal government. May I ask the Minister of Justice whether he does not feel that these different activities of Senator Davey could result in a possible conflict of interest?

● (1440)

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): This matter has been raised in the House a number of times and I must admit I am not personally familiar with it. I understand the Senator has made a statement with regard to it in the other place and I should like to read that statement.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I might point out that the statement bore striking resemblance to the statement made some time ago by Senator Giguere. I know the minister will read it and make his own interpretation. In a confidential letter dated October 18, 1976, written by the Prime Minister to the President of the Privy Council the Prime Minister included an appendix which laid out principles governing the activities of holders of public office. One of those principles, as stated in appendix one, reads as follows:

> Current and former holders of public office must ensure by their actions that the objectivity and impartiality of government service are not cast in doubt and that the people of Canada are given no cause to believe that preferential treatment is being accorded or will be duly accorded to any person or organization.

Does the Minister of Justice not feel that the fact reported that Senator Davey had set up meetings with Mr. Syd Pratt, the director of parimutuel betting and the federal Department of Agriculture and had also set up other meetings in the department contradicts the principle laid down by the Prime Minister in his letter?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I find the innuendo contained in the beginning of the hon. member's question totally reprehensible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: For a party which does so much prattling about the Bill of Rights, which provides for due process, they are the largest group in the country which consciously every day in this House disobeys and ignores the basic tenets of the Bill of Rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: With regard to the latter part of the question, as I indicated earlier, I should like to read the Senator's statement.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Minister of Justice need not lecture the House in view of the government's failure to provide any sort of inquiry and its ability to stonewall every important issue we have brought up. I think that as a member of parliament I have the right to ask these questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: On two occasions ministers have stressed that the Senator made no money on the Blue Water Racing venture and, to date, the amount of Hydroculture Luwasa's business with the government has been relatively small. Without offending the minister's sensibility, might I ask him this question: Could he tell the House whether we can take it to be the policy of the government that failure to reap large rewards from potential conflict is somehow a defence against the charge of conflict of interest?

Mr. Basford: No, Mr. Speaker.

POSSIBILITY SENATOR DAVEY VIOLATED SECTION 110 OF THE CRIMINAL CODE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): In the absence of the Prime Minister I should like to direct a further question to the Minister of Justice, one which also concerns Senator Keith Davey, Liberal Party campaign director, advisor, and close confidant of the Prime Minister. Has the minister undertaken, or will he undertake, to investigate whether or not Senator Keith Davey has violated section 110 of the Criminal Code of Canada which provides a maximum jail sentence of five years for those who use influence for private benefit on behalf of themselves or of their associates in connection with commercial enterprises?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker, and I will not do so until first reading the statement made in the other place to see whether such action is warranted.

Mr. Cossitt: Will the minister advise the House whether he has received from the RCMP or from the Solicitor General who from time to time seems to accept responsibility for the RCMP, any indication or recommendation that an investigation should be made of any of the activities of Senator Davey and, particularly, whether or not charges should be laid under section 110 or under any other section of the Criminal Code?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, it has been clear in this House for many years that neither the Minister of Justice nor the Solicitor General ever indicated at any time who may or may not be under investigation. That is the essence of the protection of innocent persons. However, in this case, because of the innuendos which have been spread around, I will answer the question and say, no.

Mr. Cossitt: I should like to direct a final supplementary to the Solicitor General. Would the hon. gentleman tell us whether he has had any communication of any kind on this subject with the RCMP, whether or not he has dealt with the Minister of Justice at any time on this same subject and, finally, whether as a result of any investigation which has been completed or which is in process he is considering recommending to the Minister of Justice that charges be laid against Senator Davey?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): The question is exactly the same as that addressed to the Minister of Justice and the answer is exactly the same as the Minister of Justice gave. The answer is, no.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

POSSIBILITY OF TRANSFERRING SHARES OF STATION CJBR-TV TO CORPORATION

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Communications. On several occasions in the last two months I attempted to get an answer in the House. Would the minister say whether the government has adopted or is considering adopting, as a new policy or practice, to re-examine or unduly delay the CRTC's decisions. I am referring more precisely to the CRTC's decision of last April to authorize the transfer of shares of CJBR-TV, of Rimouski, and CJBR-TVA of Edmundston to the CBC. My constituents would very much like to know what is happening and how much longer they will have to wait for the implementation of a French network in New Brunswick?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the government certainly has no intention of adopting a policy to reverse the CRTC's decisions. The one the hon. member is referring to has been taken a few months ago. It is an authorization to purchase the television station at Rimouski. The CBC is now called upon to take action in the light of this decision. In any event, this question should perhaps be addressed to the Secretary of State.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

CONTRACT WITH HYDROCULTURE LUWASA—KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER—SENATOR DAVEY DIRECTOR OF COMPANY

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services. In the course of a statement on privilege made in the other place on Monday, Senator Davey indicated he was a director of Hydroculture Luwasa, a privately-owned Canadian company which grows plants without soil—I presume the rainmaker knows what he is doing—and that his company had done approximately $1,000 worth of business with the federal government. I should like to ask the minister whether he is aware that Senator Davey was a director of Hydroculture Luwasa at the time the contract was awarded.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I do not even know if that contract has been granted by my department and anyway I was absolutely not aware that the senator was one of the directors of that company.

[English]

Mr. Coates: I should like, first of all, to ask the minister to bring himself up to date as to the activities of his department so that we might be aware of what is going on. Inasmuch as the statement of privilege was made earlier this week, the hon. gentleman could have made himself aware of the situation. Since Hydroculture Luwasa has recently opened an Ottawa location in anticipation of securing a substantial contract from the hon. gentleman's department I should like to ask him whether he will determine whether such a contract has already been awarded to this company or whether negotiations are going on with officials of his department at the present time in connection with such a contract.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I do not usually condemn a company beforehand without knowing the facts, and in this case I shall certainly inquire. I am not aware of any negotiation in my department with this company, but I shall inquire.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGATIONS OF CORPORAL RAMSAY CONCERNING BREAK-INS IN 1972—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON INVESTIGATION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Solicitor General. Maclean's magazine of July, 1972 carried very extensive allegations by Corporal Jack Ramsay concerning illegal break-in at that particular time. Subsequently this House debated that question for almost a week and the right hon. member for Prince Albert called in 1972 for a royal commission to examine the allegations of Corporal Jack Ramsay. The minister indicated in his statement that illegal break-in is a rare and exceptional occurrence. Now that he has had a chance to study the matter, can he report to the House what was the investigation that his predecessor carried out in respect to those allegations made by Corporal Jack Ramsay in that Maclean's edition in 1972?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Maclean's edition has just barely hit the streets, that it has just barely been published.

Mr. Leggatt: This was back in 1972.

Mr. Fox: I thought the hon. member was talking about a very recent issue. If the hon. member's question does indeed refer to a magazine article printed in 1972, surely he does not expect me today to have gone over the files for 1972. At the moment we on this side of the House are trying to help the RCMP provide the type of security service that this nation deserves, the type of protection against criminal activity that Canadians deserve. I will, of course, examine the question which has been raised by the hon. member, but I do not believe he should expect me to be able to give him an answer today on what happened in every case in 1972.

PLACING OF BOMB BY CONSTABLE SAMSON—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON INVESTIGATION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the minister well knows, the question directed to him was whether an investigation took place concerning those very serious charges by his predecessor, the present Minister of Supply and Services. That is very apropos of what we are dealing with in the House today in view of the minister's statement that these things are rare and almost never happen. My supplementary question is this. Officer Samson was convicted of illegally placing a bomb, a very serious charge. I am sure that the Solicitor General or his predecessor has now had ample opportunity to study that case because that is what initiated the investigation into the break-in. My question is this. Who was it in the RCMP, if anybody, who authorized that activity by Samson? Was he acting as an individual, and has the Solicitor General completed an inquiry into that particular terrorist act?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, what I indicated in my statement was that the government was assured by the commissioner of the RCMP that the incident with L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec was indeed an exceptional and isolated incident. As to the incident referred to by the hon. member concerning Samson, that matter was handled exclusively in the courts by the attorney general of the province of Quebec. The individual was brought to trial and I believe that the transcript of the trial would provide answers for the hon. member. It is quite possible that nobody has ever found out who authorized it. What is quite clear and certain is that the whole matter was investigated by the attorney general of the province of Quebec and the matter brought to trial. I am not too sure how many investigations hon. members would like to see carried out.

BILINGUALISM

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENT ON FREEDOM OF CHOICE OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGE FOR EDUCATION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State of which notice has been given. On page 70 of the document "A National Understanding" there is the statement: "The federal government accepts that circumstances may make necessary deferment of the application of this important principle". I want to ask the minister what the principle is. Will he clarify the policy implications of the statement so that the objective of ensuring equal rights and dignity for the French and English communities in Canada can be realized? I think the minister will agree there is some unrest about the implications of this statement.

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. gentleman and I am therefore grateful to have the chance to answer the question. There has indeed been some confusion which appears to have been caused by this paragraph. Some have even interpreted the official language policy which I presented to the House as supporting or being capable of supporting bill No. 1 of the province of Quebec. That is entirely not true, for the very fact that bill No. 1 of the province of Quebec contemplates restrictions on freedom of choice as a permanent feature in the Quebec educational system. It is the essential principle of the language paper which the federal government has presented that there should not be restrictions on freedom of choice regarding access by Canadians to either French language education or English language education.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has pointed out, to what does this possibility of deferment to be found on page 70 in the statement that "The federal government accepts that circumstances may make necessary deferment of the application of this important principle", refer?

An hon. Member: No speech.

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but this is a very important point and I will not take much longer. I am answering the hon. member's question specifically. That statement refers to the paragraph which precedes, that is, to the possibility of some deferment in relation to immigrants arriving within the province of Quebec. It does not refer to English speaking Quebecers. Nor does it refer to Canadians who might come into the province of Quebec from outside and wish access to English speaking education.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—REASON FOR FAILURE TO INTERVIEW ASSISTANT COMMISSIONER L. R. PARENT

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General and it also relates to the L'Agence de Presse Libre du Quebec incident. Can the Solicitor General tell the House whether he has interviewed former assistant commissioner L. R. Parent, who was the deputy director of security intelligence reporting to Mr. Starnes at the time of the break-in and who sent the letter to the former solicitor general requesting that no acknowledgement be made to the L'Agence de Presse Libre letter alleging RCMP involvement in the break-in, and who has since left the force, to determine whether or not he knew of the force's participation in the illegal break-in and, if so, why he did not give that information to the Solicitor General in his letter? If the minister has not interviewed Mr. Parent, why has he not done so?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's specific question why I have not interviewed Mr. Parent, it seems quite clear to me that since the matter was brought directly to the attention of the solicitor general at the time and that he, himself, during the course of meeting with the force, as indicated in my statement and as indicated in his statement, asked the force directly why no acknowledgement was necessary, the letter having been brought up to that level I am not interested in all intermediary levels.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, apparently the minister did not understand my question. I was not asking whether or not Mr. Parent had written to the Solicitor General to request that he not acknowledge the letter but rather whether or not the present Solicitor General had interviewed Mr. Parent at the time he wrote that letter to the minister's predecessor to inquire whether Mr. Parent knew of illegal activity by the RCMP, as is alleged in the letter; and if he did know of that, why he did not give that information to the Solicitor General, something which the former solicitor general says was not done by Mr. Parent or by Mr. Starnes or by Mr. Higgitt.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I answered that very categorically at the beginning of my reply.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE CONCERNING REPLY TO ALLEGATION OF L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): The minister did not and he knows he did not. Is the minister at least prepared today to table the exchange of correspondence between the former solicitor general's former executive assistant and Mr. Parent, in which a request was made to the RCMP for advice on how to reply to the letter from L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec and in which Mr. Parent advised that no acknowledgement be made?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): With respect, Mr. Speaker, I answered the hon. member's first question in the negative. I indicated it had been answered in the negative because the matter had gone to the commissioner of the RCMP at that time, and that the solicitor general at that time had the opportunity during the course of the November 6 meeting—

Mr. Beatty: That letter was written before November 6.

Mr. Fox: Of course it was. How else could it be discussed on November 6 if it had not been written before November 6?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Table it.

Mr. Fox: As to the hon. member's second question, I have not had the opportunity of discussing the matter of tabling the letter with my colleague the House leader; I want to discuss it with him to see whether it breaks any precedents of the House.

TRANSPORT

PROPOSED MORATORIUM ON IMPORTATION OF FOREIGN-BUILT SHIPS TO AID CANADIAN SHIPBUILDING INDUSTRY

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief question for the Minister of Transport which has to do with the request of the Canadian shipbuilding industry. I pose the question in light of the very serious situation facing Canadian shipyards and shipbuilders over the next short term period. The request has to do with the seeking of a temporary moratorium on the importation of used foreign-built ships into the Canadian trade, and the request that this practice be halted for a period of time so as to assist in tiding over the Canadian industry during this period of difficulty. I wonder if the minister could indicate what his reaction to that request is. If he has not arrived at a decision, when does he think he will be in a position to indicate to the industry what his decision will be?

• (1500)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have not arrived at a conclusion yet with regard to this question. We are considering it in light of the whole question of the shipbuilding industry in Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, to begin with, I should point out that the House was supposed to convene at two o'clock, at which time there were no ministers in the House. You did not call the House to order for eight minutes, awaiting the arrival of ministers. Under normal circumstances there was ample time available then. Standing Order 15.(2) reads as follows:

> Not more than two minutes after the reading of prayers, the business of the House shall commence.

Then it continues:

> Not later than 2.15 p.m., or 11.15 a.m., as the case may be, oral questions shall be taken up.

Instead of waiting for 15 minutes, you proceeded having waited a period of eight minutes beyond when the House would normally be called to order, and you refused to hear me. It might have been a fault of communication. Those things sometimes happen. I want to be frank about this: apparently you were not informed, as I thought you would be, that I had a question I wished to raise under Standing Order 43. However, having regard to the reaction of the members opposite, it was reminiscent to me of what happened in 1956 when an all-powerful government with vociferous members tried at all times to deny the opposition any expression of their views, whether within or without the rules. I do not want to see a repetition of that.

I should point out that had you asked for consent to permit me to proceed, this group of individuals who sit opposite would not have granted it, in the same way as they regularly deny any discussion of anything under Standing Order 43, simply by one or two saying "no". Parliament cannot live when members do not respect the rights of an opposition.

I was endeavouring to bring a motion before the House in connection with a matter which I raised yesterday, namely that on Dominion Day,—

An hon. Member: Canada Day!

Mr. Diefenbaker: —in a national gathering on Parliament Hill, either Her Majesty the Queen or the Queen's representative in Canada, the Governor General, should speak. According to the arrangements made, and which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) denied having any knowledge of, he alone would speak. He is not the head of state of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I simply ask that parliament be respected and that the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition (Mr. Clark), the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) and the Leader of the Social Credit Party (Mr. Fortin) should have the right to speak. No prime minister has the right, by virtue of his position, to endeavour to convince Canadian people that he, and he alone, has a monopoly over freedom within this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: By way of the point of order raised by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), I should indicate that we are operating under rather extraordinary conditions. Inevitably whenever we go into extra hours we distort the customary habits of the members of the House. Instead of coming in and beginning the session at two o'clock with prayers, as we usually do and as the Standing Order requires, and then giving the Chair some guidance as to how long after that time we might begin the session, we convened this morning at eleven o'clock. We said prayers at the commencement of the session, which we would normally say at two o'clock. Therefore, when that happens and when we come into the Chamber at two o'clock, we simply sit and wait for a quorum, and I wait for some indication from representatives of the House as to the appropriate time to begin. That is not our usual practice, and therefore things can become distorted.

However, there is no discretion in the Chair to extend the time for motions pursuant to Standing Order 43. In fairness the House ought to be cautioned. The failure of members on both sides of the House to respond promptly to the two o'clock bell works to the prejudice of the use of that time prior to 2.15. One point raised by the right hon. member to which we ought to pay attention is that it would serve all purposes of the House better if we could all get here closer to two o'clock every afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONGRATULATIONS TO MEMBER FOR SIMCOE NORTH ON EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I realize Your Honour's concern, which is a proper concern, about the taking of time with regard to congratulations. As for birthdays, there are 264 members in this Chamber and most of us have a birthday every year; but when one of our number reaches the age of 80 all of us would like to extend him our congratulations. According to the Parliamentary Guide, the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) will be 80 on Saturday, and I believe the House would like to extend its congratulations to him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I am overcome. I want to say it has been a great privilege and honour to sit in this House. It has been something I would not have missed for anything, because nature in its various moods is revealed here. It has taught me something about the physical aspect of medicine which I did not know before coming here, so I have had an education. It has indeed been a privilege to meet and sit with people like the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, an outstanding parliamentarian in his day, and the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), another outstanding parliamentarian.

I am grateful to the good Lord for my health, the position I am in today, the facilities and the faculties I have to carry on each year and extend myself a little. I hope to add to that wisdom over the years to come.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1510)

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I must have my supplementary to say how sorry I am that I did not express my gratitude to my good friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), with whom I have sat here for many years, for bringing this to the attention of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Knowing the respect with which this House holds the right hon. gentleman, and given the fact that it is not too often that he rises under Standing Order 43, and also the fact that I notice on a number of occasions the House has shown that it is master of its own destiny, and therefore, having given unanimous consent may circumvent the rules, I wonder whether the House would be disposed now to giving the necessary unanimous consent so that the right hon. gentleman, whom we all hold in the highest respect and who has without question lived among us in such a way that he will go down as one of Canada's leading statesmen, move the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), I know, makes his request in good faith, but it puts the House in a very awkward position. At the time the right hon. gentleman was seeking the floor under Standing Order 43 several of his colleagues were seeking the floor, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) and several others. That happens every day. Surely, if we are to begin now to consider the importance of the subject matter or the importance of the hon. member involved who seeks the floor on one occasion, we will be asked to do it again. Although the best of faith is shown by the hon. member for Hamilton West, I really cannot find a procedure by which we could extend the period for presenting motions under Standing Order 43.

ENERGY

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE WITH ALBERTA AND SASKATCHEWAN CONCERNING OIL AND GAS PRICE INCREASES

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 41(2) I wish to table in both official languages a statement setting forth the details of crude oil and natural gas price increases as agreed by the federal government and the two producing provinces, Alberta and Saskatchewan, and the letters exchanged between the minister of energy of Alberta and myself.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I want to ask Your Honour about the propriety of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) tabling a statement and certain correspondence. No doubt under Standing Order 41(2) the minister is entitled to file copies of correspondence between himself and provincial ministers of energy, but to file also a statement is, in my opinion, not within the ambit of the provision under Standing Order 41(2).

If there is to be a statement—and that is what it is, a statement on oil and natural gas prices by the minister—that statement should be made on motions so that members can ask questions about it. The statement contains reference to a number of things and it is not clear whether they represent the government's intention to introduce measures or whether they are simply matters which were discussed between the minister and the provincial energy ministers. I think that to have a statement like this issued and going out to the press, giving the impression that these are programs which the government is about to institute without any opportunity for members to ask questions and to ascertain what the statement means, is taking advantage of the provisions under Standing Order 41(2). I think Your Honour might take into consideration whether or not this is the proper use of that provision.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There is no doubt at all about the point raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). The procedure that we established under the revised rules with respect to statements, that is something labelled as a statement or something which by its nature is a statement, is that such a statement would be made in the House of Commons orally by a minister, and members of the House particularly interested in the subject matter of the statement would have the opportunity to ask questions about it. As the hon. member said, there is nothing wrong with tabling certain documents, but to adopt the practice of tabling a statement in the House is clearly contrary to the rules.

I am sure that the minister does not want to run counter to the rules and in fact he should not be allowed to do so. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to take that matter into consideration and have the minister withdraw his request. I do not wish to inconvenience the minister but I really think that before he attempted to table the statement he should have accepted some advice from the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) because this is in clear contravention of the standing orders.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I did not get the benefit of the beginning of the hon. gentleman's remarks but, as I read Standing Order 41(2), the minister, as a minister of the Crown is completely entitled to table any documents he wishes to table and there is nothing to prevent him from doing that. Standing Order 41(2) expressly states so. The documents that are sought to be tabled are indicated as being documents and are so identified. That is the choice of the minister. If he wishes to table them, I see nothing to prevent him from doing so.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise in support of the point of order and respectfully submit to Your Honour that you should look at this very carefully because otherwise we could be setting a very dangerous precedent. What the minister seeks to do by this flagrant misuse of Standing Order 41(2) is to circumvent the provisions of Standing Order 15 which specifically makes allowance for ministers to rise and make statements in the House, on which occasion opposition members and other members of the House, are entitled to make adequate responses and ask questions. If the minister is permitted, and if you in fact allow this wide interpretation of Standing Order 41(2) which refers clearly to documents to bootleg in statements to which members of the House will not be given an opportunity to make a response, we would be setting a very dangerous precedent which will considerably weaken the provisions of Standing Order 15 which clearly makes provision for oral statements.

● (1520)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am rising mainly because of a remark made by the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais). He said that the minister is a minister of the Crown, and he can table anything he wants. I remind you, sir, and the Postmaster General, that there is at least one precedent that I recall when Mr. Speaker Lamoureux denied the Hon. E. J. Benson the right to table a document which, when looked at, turned out to be just a press release. I submit that this document is much the same. It starts off by saying "I am today anouncing such and such". Some of the things he says he is announcing are in this four-page statement which he has asked to table, and some of them are not there. As I recall the ruling of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux, it was along the lines just mentioned by two or three speakers, namely, that this is an abuse of the right to table official documents under Standing Order 41(2).

We set up the Standing Order regarding the making of statements so that when statements were to be made, they could be responded to and ministers could be questioned. It is a line which is hard to draw, but I say to the Postmaster General that it is not true to say that because a minister is a minister of the Crown, he can table anything he wants. I think Your Honour ought to have a look at this document and compare it with the one Mr. Speaker Lamoureux refused to let Mr. Benson table.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, my understanding of what the minister is seeking to table is that it is an agreement between the federal and provincial governments written out in letters which are among the tabled documents, that is to say, documents with a statement explaining those documents. If that is the case, it seems to me that the tabling falls within even the narrow construction being put upon it by hon. members opposite and ought not to raise objections even on that score. However, I think the point made by the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais) is the valid one.

Mr. Speaker: Obviously we are hampered to a certain extent by guessing at this stage as to what the document really is. Certainly, the Chair is. I have a copy of the document here and I am perfectly able to read it, but I do not think it would be expected that for the purposes of this rule or this argument the Chair or anyone else would be able to absorb, digest and accurately describe the nature of the document and apply it against the precedents.

On the face of it I must say that the point is well taken. The document certainly seems to be in the nature of a statement by the minister and in fact seems to be more in the nature of perhaps a release, a statement or a speech. I would be terribly concerned, if the document were received pursuant to this Standing Order, about whether a minister could table speech notes. Obviously, this matter falls within the minister's administrative competence and falls very directly within his responsibilities, but I think it might be very dangerous to get into this without knowing exactly where we are going.

On the other hand, it may be important at this moment that the documents be tabled, and I would like to reserve my decision as to whether there is any restriction on the right of a minister to table documents under Standing Order 41(2) with respect to that document which is headed "Statement on Oil and Natural Gas Prices by the Hon. Alastair Gillespie". While I reserve on that, it seems to me that there are other documents which do not fall under—in anyone's opinion—a restriction. I do not know whether the minister would prefer, while I reserve on this, to withhold all documents or to table those which are not objected to and simply withhold the statement.

Mr. Gillespie: I suggest that it is very important that I table the two supporting letters which I placed before the House. One is a letter addressed to Mr. Getty, and the second is from Mr. Getty to me setting forth the essentials of a federal-provincial agreement with respect to oil prices.

I would like to make a further point, a point which was made by my colleague. The additional statement which I placed before the House entitled "Statement on Oil and Natural Gas Prices"—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You could have read it.

Mr. Gillespie: —was offered as an elaboration or as a clarification of the content of and the background to the negotiations themselves which took place over a period of time. They culminated in early May with a federal-provincial minister's conference and subsequent discussions between myself and provincial premiers and provincial ministers. I have tried to put these two letters which set forth a very important federal-provincial agreement in context.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A statement on motions should do that.

Mr. Speaker: Be that as it may, I am sure that the document was proposed by the minister with the best of intentions. I do have to take seriously the point as to whether it is the kind of document envisaged by the rules and whether there is a restriction. Therefore, perhaps the minister could be deemed to have tabled, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) the exchange of correspondence referred to, but for the moment withhold the statement until the Chair has had an opportunity to consider the arguments and review the precedents.

DIVORCE ACT

On the Order—Introduction of Bills.

June 17, 1977—Mr. Robinson—Bill intituled: "An act to amend the Divorce Act (living separate and apart)"

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to reduce to 18 months the three to five year waiting period required for a marriage that has broken down to be dissolved. It also eliminates the question of fault under this ground for divorce.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Is this a government bill? Are you doing this for the government or for yourself?

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The proposed seconder of the motion, as indicated to me by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson), is not in the House. I took the liberty of naming another hon. member. In view of the rather controversial subject matter of the bill, that may have been a liberty the Chair ought not to have taken, and perhaps the bill should stand until the proposed seconder is in the House.

GOVERNMENT PROCEDURES TO ENSURE CBC CONFORMS TO ITS OBJECTIVES

Question No. 1,776—Mr. Herbert:

What procedures does the government use to ensure that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation conforms to its objectives?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): On December 2, 1976, the Secretary of State appeared before the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts where this matter was raised. At that time, the minister stated that parliament has imposed upon the Secretary of State a self-denying ordinance with respect to the CBC, which is to say that the day to day operations of the corporation are a matter for CBC management. However, Parliament has certain instruments of examination, the principal one of which is the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, before which the Corporation appears annually. More important, parliament, through the enactment of the Broadcasting Act in 1968, established an agency to regulate and supervise all aspects of the Canadian broadcasting policy enunciated in Section 3 of the Act. As it is known, the Government has asked the CRTC to undertake an inquiry to determine whether the French and English networks of the corporation are fulfilling its mandate.

GOVERNMENT GRANTS TO CBC OVER PAST 10 YEARS

Question No. 2,214—Mr. Woolliams:

What was the total amount lent by the government to CBC over the past ten years?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State):

Fiscal Year	Amount
1967-68	$ 21,300,000
1968-69	22,200,000
1969-70	24,700,000
1970-71	5,300,000
1971-72	33,040,000
1972-73	22,000,000
1973-74	55,934,000
1974-75	0
1975-76	0
Total	$184,474,000

Commencing in the 1974-75 fiscal year, the CBC capital vote became a budgetary item not subject to repayment. The above does not include: (a) funds advanced to the CBC for the construction of broadcasting facilities at Toronto, for the Ontario Educational Communications Authority (OECA). These funds, authorized by Order in Council were in the amount of $630,000 in 1969-70, $310,000 in 1975, $700,000 in 1976 and $150,000 in 1977. These monies are fully repayable by the Ontario Educational Communications Authority; (b) the approved increase (1976-77 Supplementary (D) Estimate) in the working capital of the CBC by $10 million for a total working capital base of $25 million.

IGLOOLIK RESEARCH STATION

Question No. 2,414—Mr. Firth:

1. How many scientists from outside the Northwest Territories used the Igloolik Research Station in (a) 1975 (b) 1976?

2. How many (a) government officials (b) Territorial government officials visited the Igloolik Research Station in (i) 1975 (ii) 1976?

3. (a) Are such visits by Territorial and Federal officials subject to the approval of the Igloolik Settlement Council (b) are the activities of the Igloolik Research Station subject to the approval of the Igloolik Settlement Council?

4. What is the number and type of research projects being conducted from the Igloolik Research Station?

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Most projects usually last over a long period of time and several scientists may be involved in each of the projects. In addition there may be laboratory technicians and assistants who work with the scientists. The number of scientists using the Igloolik Research Station during 1975 and 1976 was between 20 to 30 for each year.

2. (a), (b), (i) and (ii) Not known.

3. (a) No. (b) The activities of the Igloolik Research Station are not subject to the approval of the Igloolik Settlement Council but the issuance of scientific licences by the Commissioner of the Northwest Territories for research projects in the Igloolik area requires the approval of the Community Council. The community is also kept informed of laboratory activities through an Advisory Committee made up of representatives from the Igloolik community. Reports are issued regularly to inform the community at large of current laboratory activities.

4. 1975: Nine projects, (i) Oceanography, Defence Research Board (two projects); (ii) Earth Physics, Dept. of Energy, Mines & Resources (two projects); (iii) Tidal Measurement, Environment Canada; (iv) Soils Studies, Simon Fraser University; (v) Archeological Survey, University of Arkansas, U.S.A.; (vi) Anthropological Studies, Graduate Student, University of Toronto; (vii) Eskimo Artifact Studies, Royal Albert Memorial Museum, U.K. 1976: height projects; (i) Study of Nutritive Content of Native Foods, University of Manitoba; (ii) Ecophysiology, York University (two projects): (iii) Study of Ground Vegetation, McGill University: (iv) Ecology of Arctic Soil Mites, McGill University:*(v) Oceanography, Defence Research Board (two projects): (vi) Physiological Cooling in Man, Defence and Civil Institute of Environmental Medicine at Downsview.

TRANSITION TO POST CONTROLS PERIOD

Question No. 2,416—Mr. Howie:

What steps are currently being taken to ensure a smooth transition from the present period of wage and price controls to the post-controls period?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): At the time the wage and price controls were introduced, it was made clear that they were to form only one part of the Anti-Inflation Programme. To evaluate what has been done to ease the transition to the post-controls period, it is necessary to look at the whole picture. In the March 31 Budget, the various policy initiatives that have been undertaken were described. As well as fiscal and monetary policies to encourage moderate growth and produce more jobs while winding down inflation, work is in progress to attack the structural problems at the root of the inflationary pressures. An announcement was made in the budget that a discussion paper would be issued which would explain the plans for decontrol and set out a proposal for a monitoring agency. In addition, suggestions would be made regarding structural reform and improved procedures for consultation. This paper was published May 27. Using the paper as a starting point, the government will consult with the objective of obtaining a broad understanding of what is required to hold down inflation. Following the consultations, a decontrol date will be announced.

COST OF DEPARTMENTAL PROGRAMMES FOR STUDENTS

Question No. 2,419—Mr. Marshall:

1. What additional staff was hired and what was the cost to operate the Student Summer Employment Programme (a) Hostel Services (b) Open House (c) Student Community Services (d) Summer Language Bursary under the Department of the Secretary of State?

2. Are any other programmes available for students under the Department?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): 1. Fiscal Year 1976-77: (a) Hostel Services, eight persons hired; Operating Costs, $155,000; Grants, $772,497; Contributions, Nil. (b) Open House Canada does not come under the Student Summer Employment Programme. (c) Student Community Services, 37 persons hired; Operating Costs, $527,000; Grants, $5,179,565; Contributions, Nil. (d) The Summer Language Bursary Programme does not come under the Student Summer Employment Programme.

2. No other summer programme for students available in the department for 1976-77.

PRIVILEGE

MRS. HOLT, MR. BALDWIN, MR. LAWRENCE—RULING MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: There remain outstanding three questions of privilege on which I have indicated to the House my intention to rule during this week. However, the somewhat turbulent events of the earlier days of the week led me to withhold this decision until this moment. This concerns three outstanding motions under our privilege procedures. On May 6 the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) moved that the question of the publication of the in-camera proceedings of the sub-committee on penitentiaries of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs which have not been reported to the House be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

● (1530)

Second, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) moved:

That the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections inquire into the statements alleged to have been made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, which appear in today's edition of the Globe and Mail, and into related or other incidents, which indicate that the rights of parliament on behalf of the people to have full and unabridged reporting of the actions of government are being threatened.

Third, the motion of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) on June 13:

That the matter of the reference in that CBC program last night as it pertained to me be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections so that I may have an opportunity of clearing what I think is the very great stigma that attaches to my reputation and to my name.

These matters are related in some way to the relationship between the House of Commons and the press and to some extent they have certain basic principles in common. Each deserves to be dealt with on its own merits, however, and I shall endeavour to do so, taking them in reverse order.

First, the point raised by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. The CBC documentary on organized crime in Canada which was shown in two parts on Sunday, June 13 and Monday, June 14 made reference during the two segments to some hon. members of this House. On Monday, June 14 following the first segment, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) and the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham raised the matter of privilege and at that time made a brief explanatory statement.

On the following day the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) made a similar intervention, and the day after that the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) did likewise, both interventions relating to the contents of the second segment scheduled and shown on Monday, June 14. Both the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta and the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe indicated the matter was being taken up in the courts on their instructions.

Of the four hon. members who raised a grievance in that respect in the House under our privilege procedures, only the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham proposed a motion. The practice resorted to by all four hon. members is not new, and while it does not in my opinion technically constitute a question of privilege, it is a practice that has been resorted to customarily in similar circumstances. This practice permits what is essentially a personal statement of an hon. member of this House under the umbrella of privilege in circumstances where the hon. member feels unduly attacked and gives the hon. member an opportunity to air that matter and to be heard by the House. A similar practice exists in Great Britain and is described in May's 19th Edition at page 343.

Precedents abound on the highly restrictive nature of privilege in our House. One of the most often quoted decisions relates to requiring for privilege an element of obstruction or interference of an hon. member in the exercise of his duty, of obstruction of hon. members, collectively or individually, in the discharge of their functions as members of this House.

Where the press is concerned, we also have the benefit of two earlier decisions in which on one occasion the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) and on another occasion the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) raised questions of privilege in recent years. On both occasions they presented to the House, as did the hon. member in this particular case, well reasoned presentations. I therefore had the benefit of considerable preparation on both those occasions by hon. members, and in addition, of course, the usual excellent research assistance that was so thoroughly done. I think those precedents are of some assistance to us.

[Mr. Speaker.]

In respect of the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria on May 20 I had this to say at page 13708 of Hansard:

There has really never been an occasion on which an hon. member has been deprived of the opportunity, when there is a grievance of this sort, to air that grievance. Whether or not it constitutes strictly a question of privilege, there has never been a time when the hon. member concerned did not have the opportunity to raise the question, to air his grievance and to make it well known, as the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria has done today. Other members who might have wished to take part in the discussion could have done so.

However, it will remain my view that a fundamental right is involved here equal, at least, if not greater, than the special privileges which surround the rights of members, who really ought to claim privilege only if their opportunity to operate as members of the House of Commons is actually interfered with. Certainly, the right to comment and express to the public what takes place here is an aspect of the freedom of the press which is one of the fundamental rights of our society and one which ought not to be interfered with, in my view, unless it is in fact in contempt of this institution.

On a subsequent occasion on the point raised by the hon. member for Athabasca which concerned some unsavoury remarks, to say the least, in the press about the performance of members of this House who are physicians and were serving on one of the standing committees of the House at that time, I was able to refer with great gratitude to assistance provided by the excellent study done at that time by a committee of the United Kingdom parliament which put forward the following language on this point. The following excerpt from their proceedings appears in Hansard of April 9, 1976 at page 12668:

The proposal made in paragraph 42 is fully consistent with the principle which your committee believe to be right, that the House should be slow and reluctant to use its penal powers to stifle criticism or even abuse, whether of the machinery of the House, of a member or of an identifiable group of members, however strongly the criticism may be expressed and however unjustifiable it may appear. Your committee regard such criticism as the life blood of democracy. In their view the sensible politician expects and even welcomes criticism of this nature. Nonetheless, a point may be reached at which conduct ceases to be merely intemperate criticism and abuse and becomes or is liable to become an improper obstruction of the functions of parliament. For such cases, however rare, the penal powers must be preserved and the House must be prepared to exercise them.

I also quoted the following passage:

In your committee's opinion it would be an indefensible abuse of power if a member could evade such a defence by invoking the penal jurisdiction of the House. The citizen has prima facie a right to make fair comment upon such activity of a member as is a matter of public interest; his right is even stronger to speak and publish the truth of a member's conduct. These rights should not in the normal way be defeated by the use of the penal jurisdiction of the House.

I have said many times that the intent and clear purport of that language is that the protection of an elected person against unwarranted or intemperate publicity, even abuses or defamatory publicity, is precisely that which is enjoyed by every citizen before our courts. No more, no less. It is entirely consistent with that principle, I think, that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe and the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta indicated their intention to pursue this matter before the courts.

As elected people we can and do expect to be the targets of attack. When those attacks seem offensive I think it is appropriate that the hon. member is offered the courtesy of the House to extend to his hon. colleagues an explanation of the circumstances. I am sure any hon. member who wishes to so state will always receive that courtesy. That is what was done here by the four hon. members. As has been held in the past, I hope that hon. members will understand that I am not on technical grounds able to find that a question of privilege does exist.

It would sometimes be tempting for the Chair to make a comment on the quality or lack of it of the particular reporting that is involved at any time. However, I ought not to do that, and I shall not. I have also said that remedies of this sort are the same for members as they are for every other citizen and that when these matters do take place, if they go beyond the point of being offensive to the point of being defamatory in a legal sense, certainly members ought to and will I am sure pursue matters through the courts.

On the motion of the hon. member for Peace River, the matter was inspired by a statement attributed to the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal). The more forceful and useful contributions in support of the motion were in respect of suggestions that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) a few days previously had demonstrated the truth of the fears expressed in the proposition by intervening to suppress publication in two newspapers at least of an unfavourable feature article about himself which appeared in a weekend supplement.

In his contribution to the argument the minister conceded that he considered the article to be offensive and that indeed the newspapers were advised a few days before the scheduled publication by his solicitors that if it was their intention to carry the article in the regular weekend supplement an injunction would be sought to restrain them. The newspapers did not carry the article.

I have consistently taken the position in respect of members' complaints about reporting, as I have just said, that the remedy is indeed in the courts. How can I then find that it would be a matter of privilege for an hon. member to indicate, as was the situation with the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds), if it is his intention to pursue that remedy. It is a rather happy coincidence, I suppose, for our efforts to untangle this complex problem, that the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta indicated that it was his intention now to pursue the matter in the courts, but that prior to publication he had attended with his solicitors upon the CBC, to indicate to them that if they confirmed their intention to carry the segment, he would be considering taking some action to restrain them. In fact, he says that he was informed it would not be carried, which I am sure will probably be the subject of some of his argument in the courts.

In any event he attended with his solicitors to make that indication, which is precisely what the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) did. If I say that members must pursue these matters in the courts the same as any other citizen, should a member not do so, or should he not, having the right to do so, advise in advance of his intention to do it? However, he must do it in the proper manner.

In respect of the Minister of Transport it was suggested that because he is a minister of the Crown, his attempts to do this would carry with them the threat of pressure exerted by the government or influence exerted by the government. In the circumstances I am not able to agree. I cannot find in the motion put forward by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) or in any other contributions on the subject that, in fact, there is even an allegation, indication or evidence of any undue influence exercised by the minister. If that were to be the suggestion or content of the motion, the matter might be subject to a different interpretation in future circumstances. But in these circumstances the minister interjected, and of course the House takes his word, that his approach to these newspapers was properly carried out through his solicitor, and the indication was that if the newspapers proceeded to or intended to carry the material, the minister would seek a legal remedy in the courts. I cannot find, surely, that the right to seek such remedies is different as between one member and another.

I do concede, of course, that the standard of conduct in exercising the remedy, which is the right of every member, is probably higher in a minister than it is in another member, for the obvious reason that the connotation of government pressure, as was argued extensively, is always present. Whether it is theoretical or real is not the point. The appearance of it is always there. I say, therefore, that there is no differentiation in the application of the basic principle as between the minister and any other member. The principle does not deprive the minister of the rights he enjoys or any other member or citizen enjoys, but it imposes on the minister in the exercise of his legal right a standard of conduct which is higher than that of members, and certainly higher than that of other citizens. However, on the information before me in this argument I have no indication showing that the minister did not adhere to that especially high standard of conduct, and I have not heard any member make any suggestion to that effect. Therefore, having said that other members ought to pursue their remedies in the courts, and having said that I find the minister must exercise great care in so doing, I say there is no indication that he did not do so in the case and I cannot see the point as making any contribution to the argument on privilege.

In any case, I think even the most enthusiastic supporters of the motion proposed by the hon. member for Peace River realize that it envisages a general program or intention on the part of the government to somehow interfere in the relationship between this House and the freedom of the press. Although it envisages a general standard of conduct, I suggest that not even the most severe critics of the minister would ever suggest that this, in the circumstances, was anything but an isolated incident, and was connected in any way with any kind of general program. Therefore I say the minister's action was not improper and in any case does not make a contribution to the argument on privilege, in these particular circumstances relating to this motion.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal) was listened to carefully in respect of his statements which gave rise to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Peace River. I heard him warn about the dangers inherent in certain legislative provisions before the House, in so far as they might somehow restrain the proper freedom or independence of the press in our country. I do not know I can do other than conclude that his remarks initially, and certainly as he explained them in this House, constitute a contribution to the debate in respect of these particular legislative measures.

If it is true, as he alleges, that there is some danger in the purport or intent of these legislative measures, surely the remedy is for the House to debate them, vote against them, expose them to public view, and use every other remedy available to members by way of amendments or otherwise, and so attack those particular legislative provisions. I cannot find that the matter goes beyond an attack on the legislative provisions themselves, and should be argued in the usual way in debate. I cannot find that it has about it that special aspect of privilege which, after all, differentiates a substantive motion, which has this one particular characteristic: If a matter raised by way of what is normally a substantive motion has inherent in it something which affects the privileges of members in the House, in the narrow sense I have defined, it takes priority over other business, can be put by the member without prior notice, and is given priority, because it touches on privilege.

In the circumstances the Chair must always decide this: Is this the substance of a substantive motion, in ordinary terms, or is it privilege? If it is privilege, it is given priority. If it is not it may be treated—if I may be permitted the observation—in the way this motion might very well have been treated, as an ideal one for an allotted day, or perhaps in other ways in which motions can be brought forward by private members. It is, in other words, a substantive motion and not, in my opinion, a motion which touches privilege.

The motion of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) contains, on the face of it, all, if not almost all, the elements of privilege, and is supported by clear precedent in the British House of Commons. It contains elements of interference with the work of members in their committee, because it relates to the publication prematurely of a subcommittee document in preparation for a committee report. It prejudices, I think, the secure identity of witnesses and people who co-operated with the committee. It prejudiced in that way probably the work of future committees, with respect to the kind of co-operation we hope our House of Commons committees will secure. There is no doubt that in the United Kingdom the matter would be dealt with as privilege.

I point out to hon. members that it would be dealt with in the United Kingdom as privilege because of a specific resolution of that House which says that the premature publication of confidential committee reports before they have been tabled in the House will be treated as privilege. Our House has never taken that step. I think there are probably a number of good reasons why we have never done that, but we may want to and I think we ought to consider carefully some of the difficulties which face us here. For instance, I am concerned because the motion in this case indicates an attack upon the press for the publication of a confidential document. Of course, it attacks the press because the press has published the document, and that publication is a fact which speaks for itself and needs no further argument to establish it.

It concerns me, however, that the motion appears to attack the press for publishing a confidential document but does not attack ourselves as members of the House for our own attitude in respect of our own confidential documents. Since it misses that point it misses something I think most important with respect to the privileges of the House. I do not accuse. I simply ask are we prepared to concede that we ought to go to a committee of this House and ask it to examine the conduct of outsiders without asking it to examine our own conduct in this regard? It may be accidental. It may be the result of negligence; it may be a deliberate release by one of the members, or by any member of the staff. How can we attempt to inquire into those who publish the document unless we are prepared to inquire into our own conduct? And if and when we inquire into our own conduct, would we not ask ourselves this: Does this committee have a mandate to inquire into the conduct of members, upon this kind of motion? I would say, no, but it certainly should. And if it does this, should there be specific allegations, as we have said in the past, about misconduct by a member, a staff person, or others? I do not know. However, I am concerned in case we would appear to embark upon one kind of inquiry without embarking on the other, and we could not undertake an inquiry into the conduct of members, I suggest, without a proper and specific mandate.

The result of this practice in the United Kingdom, where such matters have consistently been treated as privilege, is this: The committee reports back to the House that the publication has taken place, that the publication is premature, and that it therefore offends the privileges of the House, something we already know, I suggest. The House usually debates the matter and finds that no penalty should be exacted. I wonder, before we take one step in the direction of that procedure, if we want to be led in that direction. Perhaps we do. I suggest that, in the circumstances we should answer some of these questions before we attempt to deal with this matter as an absolute matter of privilege in every case.

While the hon. member's motion suggested that the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, I hope that if she and the House will agree with me we will perhaps be well advised to refer this matter instead to the rather excellent work of the committee on rights and immunities of members which, as I have said many times in the past, was inspired in its creation by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) who was the author of one of these motions.

I hope that committee will make specific reference to the circumstances of this case and, in reporting to the House, analyse some of these problems that I have referred to here, making specific reference to this particular case in its report to the House with recommendations as to how the House ought to treat the question of premature publication of documents, including all of the difficulties about whether it ought to amount to an inquiry into the conduct of members, whether it should be treated automatically, whether the House should pass a resolution similar to that passed in the United Kingdom and the difficulties that the House might experience in that regard.

I would find technically that until those inquiries or problems are cleared up that I would not hold the matter to be a matter of privilege that would be sent to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and therefore set that aside. However, I think I ought to ask the House now if it would give its consent to take that motion and refer it at this moment to the special committee of the House on rights and immunities with the express mandate that it clarify the problems that I have indicated and report back to the House on this one specific reference to this one problem which was raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt).

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: If I sense that I have the consent of the House to do so, it will be so ordered.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) yesterday raised by way of a point of order the question of tabling of documents. With respect, I think the point lacks some precision. I wonder if the hon. member might agree that I treat it as a notice of an intention to raise a point of order by him so that perhaps one day next week it can be argued in greater detail.

I have attempted to pull together the references. There is some lack of clarity as to whether or not reference is being made to documents referred to by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) or perhaps by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) on different days. In both cases the ministers treated the documents referred to somewhat differently and I think different precedents would apply.

I therefore ask the hon. member if he will examine the references that I have here, with which I will be glad to provide him, and perhaps give some indication to the government of an intention on an agreed upon date next week to argue the point so that I can have a little more precision on it. I would like to have a little more precise argument before making a decision on that matter, if that is agreeable.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed Bill C-26, an act respecting the organization of certain scientific activities of the government of Canada, with an amendment, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to our procedures for this month, I wish to inform the House that the questions to be raised at six o'clock p.m. are as follows: the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Darling)—Customs—effect on tourist trade of allegedly unreasonable taxing of United States citizens; the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen)—Royal Canadian Mounted Police—investigation of operations of Bank of Montreal in Vancouver—request for report; the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta)—Consumer Affairs—possibility of establishing food policy council to consider national food policy.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I apologize I did not raise this earlier, but you were on your feet and it is not proper for us when you are on your feet to make a request.

As a point of clarification and elucidation for the House, possibly there should be an amendment of the order of the House on the point to which you alluded. In view of the fact that we are approaching the end of this session, possibly that committee should be empowered to continue on into the next session, notwithstanding that it would not have completed its work. The House has the power to give it that authority. If unfortunately this session prorogued, there would have to be a further reference to the committee. The House could dispense with that at the present time if the order of the House were amended to the extent that the committee shall continue on beyond the present session until it shall have reported.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, if that suggestion is in order, we have no objection. However, I was under the impression that a reference died with a session. We could give the undertaking to renew the same terms of reference in the new session which would have the same effect.

Mr. Speaker: The undertaking of the minister, I am sure, is more than enough in the circumstances. I might say that committee has reported to the House on matters and suggestions sub judice. It has now under review the very important matter of changes in the rights and immunities of members with respect to television and radio broadcasting of the House and will go on to consider many other problems relating to special rights and immunities. I express now the clear understanding that that committee will be carrying on its work for quite some time. I am sure it will be expected that when the session ends, as the minister has indicated, that its mandate will be renewed. Orders of the day.

Employment and Immigration

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION REORGANIZATION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION ETC.

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-27, to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I intended to make a very short comment, but if the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) wants me to speak for 20 minutes, I will try.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Don't provoke him.

Mr. Nystrom: It is only when I get provoked. Before the lunch hour, I was speaking briefly on the last motion before the House. I was complaining about what I thought was a real discrimination against people coming from rural areas such as in my constituency where some people have been forced to lie to the Unemployment Insurance Commission in order to receive benefits. I was saying that I have had a lot of experience with that.

When I went to my office over the lunch hour, there was a telephone message waiting for me. The MLA in the Pelly constituency in my riding, Norman Lusney, who was elected on June 8 in a by-election victory by the NDP where he received nearly 50 per cent of the votes, had a particular case for me involving a man named Edward Wasylkowski. This gentleman had seen me during the by-election campaign about an unemployment insurance problem he was having. He had worked in a refinery in the town of Kamsack for 20 or more years. I use this as a specific example of what I was talking about. The refinery closed and obviously he lost his job. This is a very honest man, 58 years old. He has a house in the town of Kamsack. His family and friends live in and around Kamsack. He was honest with the Unemployment Insurance Commission. He told them at his age, with his family conditions and so on that it would be very difficult for him to move out of the Kamsack area to get a job. He could not really pull up his roots and move to Regina, Saskatoon, Winnipeg or elsewhere.

This gentleman is willing to work at absolutely anything in the Kamsack area. He has been looking very hard for a job. He told me of some of the places he was at seeking employment. This man was cut off unemployment insurance benefits. The Unemployment Insurance Commission said he was restricting his search for employment by not being willing to go outside the town in which he lives. I advised him to appeal the case. The appeal was heard a few days ago in Regina. He lost the appeal because he was limited in search of a job. The call I received from Norm Lusney on his behalf at two o'clock this afternoon is a specific example of what happens in a rural constituency. If Mr. Wasylkowski lived in Regina, Saskatoon, Winnipeg or elsewhere, there would be no problem.

Kamsack has a population of 3,500 people. It is a huge farm service centre. There are many villages around it. It serves between 10,000 and 15,000 people in that part of the province. It will be seen that I am not talking about a little village with a couple of hundred people. This is a fairly major town in Saskatchewan. This man is being penalized because he lives in Kamsack instead of Regina or Toronto. He is not able to draw unemployment insurance benefits which he would be able to draw if he lived in one of those cities. He is being penalized for being honest. He is a very honest and decent man. If he had said to the Unemployment Insurance Commission a few weeks ago that he was willing to work anywhere, he would have received his unemployment insurance benefits. The chances are he would not have found a job anywhere. He could have stayed in Kamsack, anyway, and drawn benefits. Just because he would have been able to mislead someone, he would have received benefits.

That is a terrible position to put people in, to force them to be dishonest, to try to tear people's consciences apart. I could go back through my files and find example after example of this type of case. As I said, this one just happened to come to my attention at two o'clock this afternoon. Later on I shall send the minister details of this case and appeal to him personally to try to get Mr. Wasylkowski back on unemployment insurance benefits, because he is still trying to locate work. The MLA, who is doing his job very well; he is trying to find this man temporary employment in a park nearby. Sometimes the Liberal party wonders why Canadians in certain areas are very cynical about them. I think in particular of areas such as the north, western Canada, rural Canada. I would say this is one of the areas. In the recent by-election in the town of Kamsack the NDP received some 55 per cent of the votes. The Liberal party fell from second place to a bad third place, and I doubt it will do any better than that in the foreseeable future.

The motion before us today also perturbs me as I look at it from the rural point of view. There are to be various scales for determining the benefit period for people who are unemployed. The country is to be divided into 54 different regions with regard to the Unemployment Insurance Act, and the length of time a person will benefit from unemployment insurance will depend upon the unemployment rate within each of these areas. I come from an area which has a very low unemployment rate—roughly 4 per cent. Part of the reason for this figure is that treaty Indians living on reserves are not counted when calculating the figure. In the past, for a major attachment, persons could claim unemployment insurance benefits, if my understanding is correct, for some 51 weeks if they had worked for at least 20 weeks. This is to be changed under the terms of the legislation before us. It is to be brought down to 50 weeks from 51 weeks for the person who is qualified to claim the maximum, that is, a person who has worked for 26 weeks and who lives in a high unemployment area such as the province of Newfoundland.

However, how is someone who lives in my constituency to be affected, where the unemployment rate is very low? My understanding is that such a person would get a lot less from unemployment insurance than he received in the past. As I read the legislation, I see that with a regional unemployment rate of 6 per cent or less, the weeks of insurable employment in the qualifying period will be 14. That is all—fourteen weeks. I therefore assume that for someone in my constituency to get those 14 weeks he would probably have to work 14 weeks because he comes from a very low unemployment area. So you have to work for 14 weeks in order to qualify for 14 weeks' unemployment insurance benefits. If I am wrong, I hope the minister, in his reply, will comment on this matter, because I am led to believe that those unfortunate enough to be unemployed, such as Mr. Wasylkowski and his co-workers employed at the refinery, would only receive a few weeks of unemployment insurance benefits. I do not think that is very fair at all. It is something which I think will balkanize Canada instead of bringing it closer together.

The unemployment insurance program is one to which everyone who is employed contributes on an equal basis, and therefore should be entitled to receive benefits from it on an equal basis. The motion we are talking about today affects a lot of Canadians in a very negative sense. I wish to give a few illustrations of what I mean. Take the province of Nova Scotia. In Nova Scotia the unemployment rate is, I believe, 13.2 per cent. It is very high. I wonder what the Liberals in Nova Scotia think about this amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I find that under the existing act, the one the government now wishes to amend, someone who worked for eight weeks could receive benefits for 44 weeks. Under Bill C-27, the bill before us today, and the amended version of Bill C-27 which the minister is talking about in the House, the same person would not receive benefits for 44 weeks; that person would receive benefits for no time at all. He would not receive any benefits; and this despite the fact that such a person could come from Nova Scotia, a province with a very high unemployment rate, and in spite of the fact that this measure is supposed to favour regions which have very high unemployment rates and discriminate against regions like my own which have a very low unemployment rate.

Again, in Nova Scotia, if a person works for ten weeks, under the present act he qualifies for 44 weeks of benefits. Under Bill C-27 he will be cut off entirely. But thanks to members like my hon. friend from Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) who decided to raise a lot of hell about this issue and who really fought hard on it, we have some minor amendments which will help some people in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Rodriguez: Not enough.

Mr. Nystrom: I know it is not enough. The hon. member for Nickel Belt is still very upset. But if the hon. member had some help from the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) then perhaps the act would be improved instead of becoming worse than it is. But the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi, New Brunswick, with an unemployment rate of probably 20 per cent or 30 per cent, is defending these changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act. He is not getting up and fighting for the unemployed in his constituency. I think that is an utter shame. People in his riding should know where he stands. They should know that he fails to stand by their side and stands instead on the side of bad policies and big corporations; that he will not get up here and fight for the unemployed in his region.

It is about time people in the constituencies realized where their members of parliament stand. If he had been standing up in the House like the hon. member for Nickel Belt, we would have had amendments to the act which would have preserved the rights which the unemployed in this country deserve. Because of a fight led by the hon. member for Nickel Belt, the minister has been forced to bring in amendments. Thus, a person who works for ten weeks in Nova Scotia, instead of receiving no benefits at all will get benefits for 42 weeks instead of 44. It is not as good as it was, but still it is better than it would have been under the original ideas of the minister from Sarnia, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen).

Taking the same example of a person in Nova Scotia, if that person worked for 20 weeks and suddenly became unemployed, he would qualify for 51 weeks of benefit under the present act, the one which is being amended today. But under Bill C-27 that person would have had his benefit period cut back to 40 weeks. Because of the fight put up by the hon. member for Nickel Belt—the credit really has to go to him—that person will now qualify, under the amendment, for 50 weeks of benefits.

I keep bringing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt because I know that members of the Conservative party have long been in favour of tightening up the Unemployment Insurance Act. I remember the members of the Conservative party in the 1972 campaign chastising the government—the former minister, Bryce Mackasey—for running a loose show, for letting people take advantage of the Unemployment Insurance Act. They want to lengthen the qualifying period a person has to work before he can claim benefits. The Conservative party initiated the tightening up of the Unemployment Insurance Act. We now have some of them going into high unemployment regions like Atlantic Canada. I was in Verdun for the by-election campaign and heard them criticizing the government for tightening up the act. I suggest that the members of the Conservative party are real hypocrites.

• (1610)

The hon. member for Nickel Belt has brought forward decent amendments to this legislation and he, with the support of a few members in the committee, but under his leadership, forced the government to back down. I should like the Conservative members to stand up in this House and do some fighting like the hon. member for Nickel Belt. Let me give the House another example.

Mr. Rodriguez: Tell them about Vancouver.

Mr. Nystrom: Yes, perhaps I should. I do not see any Vancouverites in the Conservative party in the House; they do not seem to be very concerned about this act. Vancouver has an unemployment rate of 8.5 per cent. If someone worked for eight weeks, he would be able to receive benefits for 26 weeks. However, under Bill C-27 he would receive no benefits at all. Even the hon. member for Nickel Belt could not persuade the minister to give such people any benefits. Probably no members of the Conservative party from Vancouver give a damn about the unemployed in Vancouver, because he had no support at all from government members from the maritimes. They just did not care about this bill; they left the fight to the hon. member for Nickel Belt on behalf of our party.

A worker in the city of Vancouver who is laid off after ten weeks of work will qualify for 26 weeks of unemployment insurance benefits under the present act. Under Bill C-27, or under the act as amended, that person would not get any benefits. Where does the Conservative party stand on this? They stand four square behind their friends in the Liberal party.

Mr. Rodriguez: They are taking the credit for this bill.

Mr. Nystrom: They are part of a little club. As the hon. member for Nickel Belt says, thay are probably taking credit for this type of amendment, as they do when they knock on some doors that I know of in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The expert on Conservatives and Liberals.

Mr. Nystrom: I have become an expert on the Liberals and the Conservatives because I have fought them for years in my riding. If the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar does not know what I mean, I invite him to think back to a few weeks ago when the two of us campaigned in the Pelly by-election. That was a by-election where the Conservative and Liberal parties threw in everything they had—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest that the hon. member get back to the motion under discussion.

Mr. Nystrom: I would love to, Mr. Speaker, but I was just responding to the very intelligent question asked by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar who had forgotten that we received 50 per cent of the vote in the Pelly by-election. In any event, as a result of that by-election there are now probably some unemployed Liberal and Conservative party organizers, and if they move out to Vancouver they are going to have some problems. As I was saying, a person who works for 20 weeks in Vancouver and then becomes unemployed would receive benefits for 35 weeks under the act. When Bill C-27 goes through, he will receive benefits for 38 weeks. That is a minor improvement, but again it is probably due to the hard work of the members of our party at committee stage. It is certainly not due to the work of members of the Liberal party.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Just take a look at the amendments which have been presented by the government.

Mr. Nystrom: I am informed, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi was only at one meeting. I find that unbelievable, but if it is true it is an absolute disgrace when he has 30 per cent of the people in his riding unemployed. Since I have been in the House the last few hours talking on this bill, he has been heckling our party, contending that the act is a darned good one as amended by the minister. He has been running interference for the minister in the House, suggesting that the unemployed should have their knuckles rapped, that they are abusing the system. It is a disgusting thing for a member who comes from an area where 30 per cent of the people are unemployed.

You can tell when the popularity of the Liberal party goes up in the public opinion polls; all of a sudden they become very smug and arrogant and start doing things to ordinary people. There are words I can use, but which I cannot use in parliament, to describe what they do to ordinary people when their party support rises in the public opinion polls. They have lost their sensitivity and are forgetting that the unemployed are people who need help and benefits. They do not care. I hear the hon. member from Toronto interjecting. He may not have any unemployed in his riding. He would not understand what an unemployed person looked like if he ran into one in a back alley. I am referring to the hon. member for—York Centre, is it?

Mr. Kaplan: Yes, York Centre.

Mr. Rodriguez: He is over at the Rideau Club at all the time. There are no unemployed people over there.

Mr. Nystrom: He is back from the Rideau Club now. I understand that members of the Liberal party from eastern Quebec and the Atlantic provinces have received submissions and complaints from their constituents about how this bill which amends the Unemployment Insurance Act is hurting them. But they have not responded at all to the wishes of their constituents. If the Liberal party members had any sensitivity at all, they would be withdrawing the amendments they have made to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to participate in this debate today, but the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) and the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) have been talking so fast and loose that a few facts have to be put on the record. It would serve them well to sit down and listen for a few minutes so they could learn the difference between fact and fiction. We have had the two greatest fiction writers in this House talking here all day, Mr. Speaker. Not only do they take credit for amendments to this bill with which they had nothing to do, but they take it upon themselves to try to discredit other members of the House for not attending committees of which they are not members. That, Mr. Speaker, from a party whose members are almost always consistently absent from this chamber. If it were not for their own House leader, on more days than not they would not even be represented in this chamber.

When Bill C-27 was introduced—and I admit without reservation that it was an attempt on the part of the minister to reduce the cases of abuse in our unemployment system—there were some members on this side of the House as well as the self-righteous socialists yonder who found the bill unacceptable. I must say that there were some members of the official opposition, too, who found the bill unacceptable. It was through the efforts, primarily of the members of the Atlantic Liberal caucus, that the substantive amendments to this bill were brought about. I say that because over a fairly lengthy period we met with the minister, who showed an extreme willingness to consult and co-operate with us, learning from us what the difficulties would be when this bill is passed.

Mr. Rodriguez: Did you see it before it was introduced?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): What is the matter over there? Can't you take the truth? Just sit down and listen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The parliamentary secretary will please address the Chair. The parliamentary secretary has the floor for the purpose of making a speech, and I suggest we all listen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I hope the members of the NDP will take that advice; they may become more enlightened. It was my colleague, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau), who brought about many of the amendments which are present in this bill today and which we now find acceptable in Atlantic Canada.

• (1620)

The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville is correct when he says there is a high rate of unemployment in my constituency. There is also a concerted effort by this government to overcome that situation. Hon. members opposite consistently find it convenient to ignore the job-creation programs of this government, to ignore the vast increase there has been in the number of people entering the labour force in this country, and to forget that the number of jobs being created on an annual basis is increasing every year and has increased substantially in this decade over the previous decade. Facts do not mean that much to them; they are more interested in fiction.

There is an important principle enunciated in this bill. The principle was given some force in the budget. It is the principle that in this country not all regions experience the same kind of economic opportunity. The budget and this bill proceed to deal with that disparity in economic opportunity. That is why there has been a differentiation of the qualifying period for unemployment insurance benefits across the country. The New Democratic Party would like to treat unemployment insurance as insurance to remain unemployed. It should be insurance against loss of employment income, and that is what the minister is trying to make it. They profess to be the experts on Atlantic Canada, but they should look at the success of their party over the years in that part of the country. This morning the hon. member for Nickel Belt consistently referred to Atlantic Canada and Newfoundland. He knows so little about us that he does not even know Newfoundland is part of Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Rodriguez: We know about golf courses in Newfoundland.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): You probably know about golf courses everywhere, because that is where you spend your time. You certainly do not spend your time here. The ten week qualifying period can be lived with.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member who has the floor made comments concerning me spending my time on golf courses. I have played golf once in my life. It was nine holes. I lost four balls and it took me 186 strokes to finish the course. He is not right when he says that I spend my time there. I spend my time in the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immmigration trying to filibuster a bill on unemployment insurance which is rotten, terrible and atrocious for the unemployed people in this country. I should like to suggest that that is where he ought to be.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I should suggest to the hon. member that that is not a point of order; it is a point of debate.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, we now know the hon. member for Nickel Belt has played at least one more game of golf than I have, and we also know what is wrong with him.

We can now live with the qualifying periods set out in Bill C-27. Through consultation with the minister and his officials, and primarily through the efforts of the minister, we have brought about sufficient changes in both the qualifying and the benefit structure periods of this bill in order that those of us who represent economically distressed areas of Atlantic Canada will have no difficulty living with it. It will go a long way toward bringing attention to the fact that in this country there are varying levels of economic opportunity. Those with lesser economic opportunity deserve special consideration from the government of Canada. It would also help if some of the provincial governments would turn some of their attention to the areas of economic distress in their own provinces.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It should be brought to the attention of hon. members that this motion, No. 11, if passed, dispenses with motion No. 30. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The House will now move to motion No. 15. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It should be brought to the attention of hon. members that this motion, if passed, will carry with it motions Nos. 29 and 32. All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The Chair has serious reservations about the procedural acceptability of motion No. 12 standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). This motion does not seem to be relevant to clause 38 of the bill. It seems to go beyond the scope of the clause which it seeks to amend. I refer to May's at page 521. Therefore, this motion is rejected on two points: one, it goes beyond the scope of the clause it seeks to amend and, two, it should have been brought in as a separate clause, but then it would not have been accepted because it puts a burden on the treasury. Therefore, the Chair rejects motion No. 12.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Chair indicated earlier that it would listen to argument on the procedural point. I think that should happen before the Chair rules.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, if it will assist the Chair, we have no objection to the argument being put.

● (1630)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I was under the impression that Mr. Speaker had listened to the discussion on the procedural point and to objections raised by hon. members. That is why I made my ruling. However, if hon. members wish to continue speaking on the procedural acceptability of the motion, I am willing to listen.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On June 21, Mr. Speaker said the following in respect of the motions on the order paper:

> When we come to motion No. 12 in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt, I think we should have a discussion on its procedural acceptability, because I have some difficulty regarding the relevance of the motion to clause 38 of the bill which it seeks to amend.

I do not know how to proceed now that the decision has been made without the discussion having taken place, but I hope that my persuasive approach might convince you, Mr. Speaker, not to make the ruling that you said you will make. This particular motion amends clause 38 of Bill C-27. Clause 38 opens up section 25 of the act which deals with pregnancy benefits. Since Bill C-27 opens up section 25 of the act, all I did in the amendment was to amend the section.

One has to assume, with respect to the ruling which you will make after we have had the discussion on the motion, that we are involved in proposing an expenditure of money. I think that, biologically speaking, all women who work and who pay into the unemployment insurance fund should be able to take advantage of the provisions of the act, in particular the maternity benefits.

An hon. Member: Why not the men?

Mr. Rodriguez: That is a question we are not discussing here. The fact is that there is a provision for maternity benefits under the act. When a woman starts to work and pays into the unemployment insurance fund, one has to assume that at some point in time she might become eligible for benefits under the relevant section of the act. In line with that thinking, we are not urging any expenditure of money but are, in fact, ensuring that the discrimination which presently exists in the act with respect to women who are not fortunate enough to be able to bear children because they cannot become pregnant, or their spouses are unable to impregnate them, but who adopt children, be eradicated and that these women be eligible for the eight-week benefit.

My motion is in response to many letters and appeals from women across the country who have adopted or wish to adopt children. The criterion for adoption, under the rules of various children's aid societies, as is the case in Ontario, is that in the period of time prior to the child coming into the home the mother must quit work and be in the home, as well as for the first two weeks after the child has arrived in the home. So, in effect, this is a similar situation to the confinement period of the mother who bears a child. I feel, as do the women who have written to me, that the same confinement period should be granted to women adopting children just as it is to women who bear a child.

We argue that there is no question of expending money under the motion. These people have paid the premiums and they should be able to draw the benefits. All we argue is that they be given the opportunity to draw them. I am sure that in the actuarial figures and in the projections which the Unemployment Insurance Commission makes with regard to premiums and the payment of benefits, the commission must make certain assumptions, such as that women—they know the percentage of the insured work force—who pay premiums might at some time wish to draw benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act. Basically, that is the argument we put forward before Your Honour, in the hope that the decision which was written for you before we had the discussion and put forward the argument will be withdrawn. How is that? I am not even a lawyer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I have listened very carefully to the argument put forward by the hon. member for Nickel Belt, but my opinion is not changed, because the motion goes beyond the scope of the bill since it does not seek to amend any part of the bill, but section 30 of the act.

Mr. Alexander: It was a weak argument, at that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I would like to refer hon. members to the citation found in May's at page 521. It could be argued, also, that motion No. 12 would entail additional expenditures from the public treasury and, therefore, should be accompanied by a royal recommendation, which only a minister of the Crown can obtain. With regret, therefore, I must rule that motion No. 12 is not acceptable from a procedural point of view.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, while we are on this subject, and given your eloquence—I certainly agree most assuredly with your conclusions—let me remind you, sir, that Mr. Speaker had also suggested that motions Nos. 19, 27, 28 and 33 standing in my name went beyond the scope of the bill. One of those amendments arose as a result of a question raised by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) having to do with the minister, rather than the commission, deciding what confidential information might be made available. The reason I am rising at this time is that perhaps the hon. member for Hamilton West will later be able to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move that motion, but in so far as I am concerned, I am prepared to drop motions Nos. 19, 27, 28 and 33.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It is my understanding that motions Nos. 19, 27, 28 and 33 standing in the name of the minister will be dropped. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Alexander: Reluctantly, I must agree with what Your Honour has just ruled, but I would appreciate it if Your Honour would keep in mind the comments of the minister regarding motion No. 27. I will try to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move that motion when we arrive at that point. Let me explain this. It was left up to the commission to distribute any information, written or oral, to any person within the department. I found that satisfactory. The offensive words were "to any other persons as they deem necessary".

• (1640)

Perhaps this information should have gone to other persons. Perhaps it should have been under the guidance and counselling of the minister because there could have been abuses. I am not saying there were; I have no reason for saying so. But in order to see to it that there is some control, I think hon. members from both sides of the House would appreciate there being some ministerial accounting in this matter. Therefore, in due course I will move an amendment, having given hon. members the opportunity to think about this so they can stand up and support me later.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I propose that motions Nos. 13, 14, 16, 17 and 18 be grouped for the purpose of debate, but that the question should be put separately on motions Nos. 13, 14 and 18. Then I propose that the question be put on motion No. 17. An affirmative vote would dispose of motion No. 16. However, if motion No. 17 is negatived, then I propose that the question on motion No. 16 be put.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) (for Mr. Orlikow) moved motion No. 13:

That Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 41 by striking out line 14 at page 18 and substituting the following therefor:

"sections 34 to 37 of the said act are repealed."

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie) moved motion No. 14:

That Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 41 by striking out line 17 at page 18 and substituting the following therefor:

"than twenty weeks of insurable".

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West) moved motion No. 16:

That Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 41, by striking out lines 35 to 43 at page 19 and lines 1 to 47 at page 20.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) (for Mr. Leggatt) moved motion No. 17:

That Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 41 by striking out lines 35 to 43 at page 19, lines 1 to 47 at page 20, lines 1 to 42 at page 21, lines 1 to 42 at page 22, lines 1 to 45 at page 23 and lines 1 to 6 at page 24.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West) moved motion No. 18:

That Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 41 by adding immediately after line 32 at page 22, the following new subclause:

"(12) provided that within one year from the proclamation of this act, the minister shall cause to be laid before parliament by way of ministerial statement, a definitive evaluation report on the said job creation proposal".

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Dispense.

Mr. Rodriguez: I notice that there has been a shift in the seating arrangements across the floor. I think by now the minister and the House are well aware that we object to changing the extended benefit period, in line with the proposals of the minister with regard to establishing 54 regions across the country and setting the length of the benefit period and regional rates in line with that kind of national plan. We object to it because it discriminates against certain regions of the country. Atlantic Canada and especially Newfoundland have staggering rates of unemployment. It seems to me that it does not matter whether a person is unemployed in Toronto or in St. John's, Newfoundland. The effects are the same; they are just as deadly and debilitating. Studies on the unemployed have been carried out in the United States and it has been found that suicide, wife beating, child beating and other offences tend to be numerous among people who are unemployed or who may have a history of long unemployment.

In the debates on these various motions we have pointed out the effects this bill will have on the regions of the country. My riding is in region 21. While the region may have a 6.1 per cent or 6.4 per cent unemployment rate, there are pockets within that region which suffer from devastatingly high rates of unemployment. If the minister is interested in cracking down on people who abuse the unemployment insurance fund, the most effective way of doing that is to enforce the act more effectively than is being done at the moment.

If jobs are available in Atlantic Canada, as pointed out in the study of the Atlantic region carried out by Canada Manpower, in which it stated there are many jobs available, and just a few operations which could not provide at least eight weeks of work, why are the unemployed not being referred to those jobs which are supposed to be available? In January, when we were in St. John's to study unemployment, we went to the Manpower centres and discovered that there were very few jobs posted. We understood that when a job came to the attention of the Manpower office there, it was posted on a bulletin board. The unemployed could go to that board and pick a job in which they were interested or for which they felt they were qualified.

On the day we were there, two jobs were posted on that board. We found that the unemployed in St. John's were trained or retrained, as the case may be. We found that women were being trained to be hairdressers. The hairdressing course was a very popular one. Women were being put on that course, and we found that there were more hairdressers on the market than there were heads to be tended.

I discovered that the same thing was true in my own riding. In my riding, a favourite course is the stationary engineering course. Everybody was being trained to be a stationary engineer. Before we knew it, we had more third-class stationary engineers than we had engines and motors to be stationary engineered! Therefore, we have consistently said that one of the most effective ways to enforce the Unemployment Insurance Act and to eliminate abuses would be to direct unemployed people to the jobs that are available. We have long argued that that is one of the most effective roles in which the Unemployment Insurance Commission and Canada Manpower could cooperate.

Unfortunately, they have developed a system in my riding whereby the Manpower centre is downtown Sudbury and the unemployment insurance office is five miles away in the suburbs. There is no bus service, and it is isolated from any attempt to refer to jobs those who are registered for unemployment insurance and are collecting benefits. We have consistently argued that this is what the visit to the Canada Manpower centre ought to be for, to refer the claimant to a job. If the claimant refuses the job, then a decision is made based on that choice, and from there on there could be a decision on whether it was a justifiable refusal. But we are not doing that. This whole operation is designed to get people off the unemployment insurance rolls, no matter whether jobs are provided or anything is done to stimulate job opportunity.

The hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) earlier talked about what a great job this government was doing in creating employment. But this is the same government that eliminated the Opportunities for Youth program and last year cut back on LIP. They claim to be saving $135 million through the changes to this act, but what are they doing with the money? I have grave doubts about whether replacing LIP with Canada Works is a step up the ladder.

One of the so-called progressive ideas offered in this bill is work-sharing. That was very prevalent in the days of the depression. It is not a creative approach to employment, and the government knows it. Then they said if a worker wanted to work on a community project, he would be paid unemployment insurance. No one could call the C.D. Howe Institute a left-wing organization, but it has commented that the only benefit from a training program comes if there is a job at the end. Unfortunately, the training programs available through Manpower produce hairdressers and stationary engineers. It seems to be just an attempt to take people off the unemployment rolls because if they are on a training program they are not counted in the unemployment statistics. Their chance of a job at the end of the course depends on the economic conditions which prevail at the time.

We have consistently pointed out that this is stupid and inhuman. It certainly is not correct to tamper with unemployment insurance through the adjustment of the extended benefit period, to conform to this new approach of regional unemployment across the country. We pointed out, as well, that it is silly to tamper with the minor attachment period because this is a time of very serious unemployment. How cutting people off unemployment insurance is going to help them find a job is beyond me. We know, for example, that there are about 58,000 jobs available at any given time. I think the latest figures show some 58,000 vacancies, but there are one million unemployed. It is fairly obvious that when you start tightening up this law, those people will spill over into community welfare programs. There are communities which can ill-afford to expand their welfare budgets so these people will end up costing the taxpayer a great deal of money.

There is the spectre of young people coming off the work force, and those who depend on working for the summer, not being able to return to school in the fall. These young people will find it difficult to get eight weeks of work, and if they live in a high unemployment area it will be difficult for them to get 14 weeks' work in order to qualify for benefits. The minister and his colleagues, and even hon. members to my right, have said that this is the most generous unemployment insurance program in the world. When we met in committee, the Construction Association and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association appeared there complaining about disincentives.

An hon. Member: They were all Tories.

Mr. Rodriguez: They were palsy-walsy with the Conservatives. Anybody would be friendly with them if the money for their campaign came from those organizations.

Mr. Paproski: I am supported by the little fellow.

Mr. Rodriguez: They claim it is the most generous unemployment insurance scheme in the world. But when we ask for details of how it compares with others, we find they are lacking—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I know my hon. friend's remarks are important, but I think he inadvertently misled the House. As we all know, the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) and myself are supported by the little person and not by the large, international trade unions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being five o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, pursuant to order made Wednesday, June 22, 1977, namely, private bills, notices of motions (papers) and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONTINENTAL BANK OF CANADA

MEASURE TO CONVERT IAC INTO CHARTERED BANK

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River) moved that Bill C-1001 to incorporate Continental Bank of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Now.

[Translation]

Mr. Reid moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, before this bill is read the third time, I should like to make a number of remarks to justify our position which has not changed concerning the powers granted chartered banks under federal legislation. But it would be useful, however, to consider for a while the history of chartered banks in Canada, in order to understand better the points which were made by the movers of this bill, by IAC Limited, which wants to become a chartered bank under the provisions of Bill C-1001.

• (1700)

Mr. Speaker, at the time Canada became a confederation of provinces in 1867—that's quite a few years before our time—the jurisdiction over banks became an area reserved to the federal government. A legislation authorized banks to carry out their operations in all parts of the Canadian territory, and a first permanent legislation governing banking activities was adopted in 1871. Following this, only the Parliament of Canada could authorize the creation of a bank under a special act in line with the new banking legislation.

That is why we continue to claim that anything to do with money is a jurisdiction of the central government, of the Parliament of Canada, and I feel it is normal that we should insist on this because it is becoming an ever more topical question—Canadians are increasingly interested in this—and because politicians sometimes infer that any province can legislate in this area and this must be accepted by all Canadians. This procedure to obtain a charter is always in force. It has not changed since the 1871 legislation was passed. However, the process of incorporation of a bank is long and complicated. That does not mean that it is a complicated, incomprehensible thing. It is people who complicate it to keep as many Canadians as possible away from knowing about bank operations.

The founding members of a commercial bank must introduce a petition to the Canadian Parliament to obtain a charter. This is the first step. The minimum required capital stock is $1 million. Each share must have a par value of $1 or a multiple of $1, up to $10. There must be at least five temporary directors, and each one must hold a given number of shares in his own name. The bill as it now stands contained a provision, amended later and agreed to by the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

After the charter has been granted, which requires a special act of the federal government, the shares of the bank are issued. We are discussing the special act of Parliament, Parliament is exercising its power, its authority, and it is good to consider whether it is really to the advantage of Canada to have a new chartered bank. Is it true this will stimulate competition? Will Canadians be better served? Will interest rates go down? Will governments be able to get loans at better conditions and at lower interest rates than now? Parliament must give special attention to all those points. For me, if I judge by the information I have and the research I have done, when many years ago, in 1924, Canada had 13 banks and 8,081 branches, competition was not greater than it is now.

Chartered banks have an association called the Canadian Bankers Association and are subject to the same laws since there is no special law for the Canadian Bank of Commerce nor any special one for the Bank of Montreal. The same law applies to all banks, all of them must work the same way, just as the caisses populaires in the province of Quebec are subject to a particular law which is their own. Individually, each caisse works under that law, with the difference that each one is autonomous, and through its directors may set up its own regulation for its own place, but for their whole operations all of them must necessarily abide by some general legislation which applies to all credit unions. Therefore it is the same thing for chartered banks.

Mr. Speaker, section 72 of the Bank Act, which every Canadian should know, would make anyone understand that when we suggest that banks have the power to generate money, to create money, that is true. It should be understood that money is modern quite simply because it is a matter of accountancy.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Chartered banks which hold a legal reserve under section 72 have the authority, on the basis of a fractional reserve, to create a deposit to lend money to a customer, whether an individual, a company or a government, and when the borrower refunds the money borrowed, they simply cancel the creation of money. The credit which had been granted is based on the real value and is turned into money in a modern way I support because it is much faster. In this way, the possibility of a theft of banknotes is more remote because there are fewer banknotes in circulation. These are clerical entries. They both add and subtract to and from my account by way of entries writing and the payment transfer is made.

The whole difficulty lies in section 72. This is what prevents me from accepting the fact that with a new bank we will contribute to establish more competition and that Canadians will be better served at the level of this institution called the monetary system. I doubt it, I do not believe it at all!

If IAC was able to make good profits in the lending business during 50 years, and if it wants to become a chartered bank today, it is not to lose money but to make more. I gather that those people are serious. They are honest and competent and they know where they are going. If they want to get a charter to create a bank to invest their capital, it is with a view to making more profits, it is because they take into account the competition of chartered banks; but they do not work on equal terms because IAC is not entitled, under the legislation which applies to it, to create, monetize the country's credit, the citizens' credit as banks are entitled to do.

I am shocked when I hear people tell the public: this is a complicated thing, it is impossible to understand, endure it as it is and shut up! In short, this is what it means. As we were told this afternoon by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), whom I highly appreciate and who is a good friend of mine: What you propose has never been done elsewhere. That is the classical answer. Yesterday, his colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) informed us about a new plan, a new service for Canadians. He took the trouble to specify that it is new, unique in Canada, that it has never been seen anywhere in the world. I commend him and the government for taking that action. It means that when you want you do not have to ape everybody else, ever waiting for others to act so you can imitate them.

Under these circumstances, I am glad when I see Canadians have enough initiative, enough courage to do something, to pass measures that are not taken in the rest of the world. That means we are really clever people who can do something on their own. We can do that. I think I told the House about the fact that it is a Canadian who invented the system we know now, the telephone system, and Graham Bell did not imitate anyone. He did not say to himself: Chinese did not do that, Russians did not do that, Americans did not do that. He did some research. He found out that it was possible with two pieces of wire—he even started with one piece of wire and the ground. It was called the ground telephone system because communication was established with only one length of wire while the other touched the ground. It has been improved ever since and today his invention is spread throughout the world. We are grateful to him for that.

I would like us to do the same in other fields, even in the financial or monetary field. This coming year—and that is only a suggestion on my part—I feel that while reviewing bank legislation, committees should take as much time as needed to scrutinize all financial operations to see if it would not be possible to improve the banking system. I am sure that bankers themselves would agree with Parliament to amend section 72 of the law so as to remove that power which reaches beyond Parliament and which makes it possible to establish and create a monetary system which runs parallel to that of the state, to that of the people of Canada, which falls under the jurisdiction of Parliament and which would be one of the responsibilities of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). Mr. Speaker, at the rate things are going we are bound to have a superpower type of system.

• (1710)

This is the power of finance over Parliament, over the judicial power, where we are dominated by four powers: finance, Parliament, the executive and the judiciary—and I would add a fourth one, the power of the press or of the media that gives people the information they want to give and this power is in the hands of the economic dictatorship.

Let us lift up the veil and try to find out who are the real owners of the big newspapers, of the privately owned radio and television stations. Let us try to find out and we will soon come upon all the same people we find in finance; because they have the monetary power, the financial power, they can also establish a press power which is serving their own interest. In spite of the willingness of reporters who are trying to give impartial information to the public, the owners of these big media employ people to censure the news they get and let through the news which will serve the interest of the economic and financial dictatorship, and people increasingly lose interest in public matters, because they cannot find anything in there that can truly and efficiently inform them.

Mr. Speaker, the day before yesterday Parliament had the pleasure of being visited by a group of students, boys and girls of 16 to 18, from every province in Canada. Someone responsible, whom I thank, organized a meeting in Room 200 with those students and one representative of each of the political parties represented in the House. We went to meet them and they put the following question to us: Does Parliament control the administration of Canada? Those young people wanted to know that, unmindful of political considerations.

The four hon. members recognized that, unfortunately, the Canadian Parliament does not in fact control the administration of our country because it is asked to pass bills which are not, generally, initiated by Parliament. Cabinet introduces them at the request of advisers placed at its service. Then Parliament is asked to either pass or reject them. But, as the majority decides, usually the bills are accepted by the majority. Further down the line, the executive council has all it takes to implement the will of Parliament, to be answerable to it and to make it responsible. I say no to that. So, we agreed on that, since it is impossible. Let us put any minister, with the best of intentions in the world, at the head of a department such as transport, for instance, where he has to manage the fields of communications, air transport, water transport, etc. How can one man alone possibly supervise efficiently the administration of so vast a spectrum? It is impossible. That is why we say that Parliament does not control its administration. Answers which seemed relevant were given. My colleague, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) will certainly corroborate this and the young people asked quite intelligent questions. They want to know what Parliament is, what the members and the ministers do. I was glad to spend two hours with those young people. I am sure of one thing, that is they left Ottawa convinced that they had learned something during their short stay. I therefore invite all my colleagues in the House to provide information to our youngsters. The truth should not be concealed even about money matters. They know where the dollar comes from, who creates it, what is its role in the world, how it ends and why it exists.

Now, Mr. Speaker, after all those considerations, of course I do not want to give the impression in Parliament that the fact that I systematically object to the passage of that bill will solve the problem in Canada. Absolutely not. I am not that naive, but I would like to establish quite clearly that I do not believe that even 20 members would considerably alter the system. They would merely divide the profit in 20 shares instead of—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired.

• (1720)

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a few remarks about this bill. I shall be brief. I am reminded of the comments which were made last Thursday when we were discussing a private members' bill concerning the Bell Telephone company. At that time an interjection was made on a point of order regretting, in effect, that there was no means of providing, in private members' hour, the application of Standing Order 75A or 75B—in other words, closure—on the ground that it was not fair to companies to put them through this process. But here, today, we see the results of what I believe to be one of the finest examinations of a bill to have taken place in private members' hour.

When this bill came before parliament the NDP took serious objection to it, first because it originated in the other place among the corporate retirees and then wound its way into the House through a private member, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid). We objected, also, to the manner in which interlocking directorships would continue the financial arrangements between the IAC and the Continental Bank. We felt it was certainly an exception to the Bank Act. The government promised revisions to the Bank Act, but that has all been forgotten now, thrown out of the window. We felt it was unfair to deal with corporations such as IAC outside the framework of the Bank Act, that we would shortly see

Household Finance, Avco, and the whole gang trotting in here with their friends in the other place starting private bills and smuggling them into this chamber via a private member.

An hon. Member: Here we go again.

Mr. Rodriguez: Hon. members over there do not like debate.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): It is the fiction I object to, not debate.

Mr. Rodriguez: Here again, the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) is missing the point. If we had gone along with the usual desultory examination at that point, we would now have before us legislation far inferior to this. Instead of making smart remarks, the hon. member would do well to start looking seriously at the bills which come before us during private members' hour.

We put forward our objections in the form of a number of amendments, and in these circumstances the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and his cohorts in the IAC saw the wisdom of the arguments advanced by members on this side who are concerned about the economic structures we put into place. As a result, the bill before us is a clear refutation of the comment made by the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) who expressed a wish that closure might be possible during private members' hour. We intend to apply the same gentle consideration to the bill which he is sponsoring.

I assure hon. members that what we have here in Bill C-1001 is a direct result of the recommendations and amendments we have put forward. If we had raised those objections in a purely philosophic or argumentative way we would, no doubt, have been told it was not possible to make changes of the kind we had in mind; that they would put great stress upon the company, making it impossible to operate, and so on. But lo and behold, the Bronfman family found it could accommodate everything we proposed. As meek as mice scuttling over the kitchen in the middle of the night to steal cheese, by golly, they accepted every amendment.

Very shortly we shall be discussing another bill in private members' hour. This is not a threat, but a promise. We intend to examine it very closely, and we hope the proposals we intend to make with regard to it can be realized. However that maybe, we are prepared to accept the bill before us as amended, recognizing that the suggestions we have made are incorporated in it. We hope it will be possible to reach a similar successful conclusion with regard to other bills which come before us in the same way.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Reid: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank hon. members for their courtesy and help. It has been a fascinating experience to be working with so many members on legislation of such importance. I appreciate the help and advice I have received in connection with certain changes which have been advisable. Most members will agree, I think, that we have been responsive to their wishes and that the bill is an improvement over the one first introduced.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

BELL CANADA

The House resumed, from Thursday, June 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. O'Connell that Bill S-2, respecting Bell Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications; and the amendment thereto of Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, last week I had just begun to make some remarks on the bill now before us. I will take up where the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) left off. It is our intention to do the same with this bill as we did with the bill on IAC. With a great deal of persistence our party was able to amend that measure to the extent that it became a decent bill. We propose to do this without the help of the Conservative party, I presume, because they are sitting on their hands.

The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) is an intelligent member. Like myself, he comes from the province of Saskatchewan, the province which offers us the experience of seeing how a telephone system should be run, because it is publicly-owned. It is a public utility serving all people equally. This is what Bell Canada should be; it should be nationalized and publicly owned.

• (1730)

For that reason I am not at all interested in facilitating Bell Canada's wishes to expand their company operations, or to get around the regulations of the CRTC and fatten the pocket books of their private shareholders. I am interested in a publicly owned telephone system in Canada such as the one in the province of Saskatchewan. That is a system the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar is proud of, one that I am proud of and which every other member of parliament from that province is proud of.

I want to see a system like the one in Manitoba which is also publicly owned. If the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) were here, I am sure he would be on his feet extolling the virtues of public ownership, because he worked for the Manitoba telephone system before he came to the House of Commons. I know what a great socialist member he is, and he would agree it is a good system. He would be opposed to Bell Canada doing what they are to the ordinary folk of this country. He would be calling for the nationalization of a utility that takes advantage of the ordinary citizen.

I should not really be speaking for these two Conservative members because I shall not leave enough time to speak for myself. I want to prove the case for public ownership. The Saskatchewan Telephone Corporation has been in operation now for a number of years and it provides excellent service to the people of that province. It also returns a great deal of profit to the people of Saskatchewan year in and year out. I have before me the 1976 annual report of the Saskatchewan Telephone Corporation and I find that it has made tremendous profits. Let me go back to 1967, for example. We are only a small province with one million people, and one would think it would be difficult to set up an organization of this sort. I know my Conservative friends will probably be flabbergasted at this, but the profit from Saskatchewan's telephone service in 1967 was $8,322,000. By 1970 the profits of Saskatchewan government telephones had grown to $11,718,000. By 1976 they had grown to $19,061,000.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) on a point of order.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I know the hon. member would like to entertain a question from me. I am very interested in his most informative figures and if he would permit a question I would appreciate it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Would the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) entertain a question from the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar?

Mr. Nystrom: Sure.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I know the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville is a great advocate of large profits for corporations, whether they be public or private. He seems to be extolling this view at great length here today. On the basis of logic and consistency I wonder if it is his view, having regard to the incredible profits made by this company in Saskatchewan, that the money should in fact be returned to the consumer across Saskatchewan in the form of lower rates and greater facilities, or does he feel that this money should go into the general treasury of the province of Saskatchewan?

Mr. Nystrom: I am really happy that the hon. member asked that question, Mr. Speaker, because I might have forgotten to speak about that. I think those profits should be used for a number of things, and I shall probably spend the rest of my time telling the hon. member what they should be used for and what they have been used for in the past.

The annual report refers to all of the rural telephone services in Saskatchewan. It is a really good service which cannot be compared to any other in the country. They use a lot of that money for their rural telephone service. They use a lot more money for communication into northern Saskatchewan. I could in some detail tell the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar how my constituent, Neil Byers, as minister in charge of telephones, has improved things in northern Saskatchewan. They have also spent money on cable television in the province. They have made all kinds of renovations and repairs to the existing system. They have participated in the Trans-Canada service. They provide very good salaries and working conditions to their employees, and so on.

Most important of all, Mr. Speaker, they have returned most of their profits to the people of Saskatchewan through the lowest rates of any telephone system in Canada. I am sure that all members of the House would be very interested in knowing how public ownership can be so efficient. It can have the lowest rates in Canada and still make a profit, and it can invest those profits in Saskatchewan, not in the United States or Mexico or elsewhere. They pay their workers decent salaries.

I have before me an article comparing telephone rates in August of 1976, which is the most recent data I have been able to accumulate. I would ask all hon. members, particularly those on the other side of the House, to listen to some of these rates.

In the city of Regina residence phones cost $5 a month, business phones cost $11.85. In the city of Regina there are 72,400 phones. Let me compare those rates with those of private telephone companies in other cities and see how much more inefficient these private companies are and how much more they charge.

The city of Halifax has 96,000 phones; residence phones cost $8.95 and business phones $26. In Moncton where there are 52,000 telephones, private phones cost $7.65 and business phones $22.30. They are even trampling on their business friends. That is what private enterprise does. In the city of Montreal there are almost 1,400,000 phones; private phones cost $7.45 and business phones $22.10. In the city of Ottawa there are 338,000; private phones cost $6.55, business phones $18.70. In St. John's, Newfoundland, poor little Newfoundland with all their unemployed and below average incomes, there are 46,000 telephones; private phones cost $8 and business phones $23.

In Saint John, New Brunswick, there are 47,000 phones; private phones cost $7.65 and business phones $22.30. In Sherbrooke, Quebec, there are 82,000 telephones; private phones cost $6.20 and business phones $17. In Toronto with 1,400,000 telephones, private phones cost $7.45 and business phones $22.10. In Vancouver with 511,000 phones, private phones cost $8.05 and business phones $24.20. In every case that I have cited today the rates are much higher than those in Saskatchewan, which I remind the House are $5 for private phones and $11.85 for business phones.

Mr. Paproski: What about the city of Edmonton?

Mr. Nystrom: Theirs is a publicly owned service as well, another plus for public ownership. Edmonton has 207,000 phones and a private phone costs $5.80. I am so happy to hear the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) arguing the case for public ownership and saying how great it is in the city of Edmonton.

Mr. Paproski: That is not what I said. I just wanted to know what the cost was.

Mr. Nystrom: Telephones probably cost a few cents more in Alberta since the Conservative party is worse at running public institutions that we are. Winnipeg, Manitoba is the only place that has lower rates than Edmonton and Regina. There is a publicly owned telephone system in Winnipeg, which has a rate of $4.90 for a private telephone, and a business phone rate of $11.65. If my memory serves me correctly, it was the grandfather of the former premier Duff Roblin who instigated a publicly owned telephone system in the province of Manitoba.

In every single case where telephones are publicly owned the rates are substantially lower than cases where Bell Canada is providing service. The figures I have referred to are for cities of comparable size. In every case where the telephones are publicly owned the system is more efficient and is providing service at a much lower cost. I have referred only to the figures for the urban centres, but if I refer to rural areas the rates are significantly lower if service is provided by a publicly owned outlet.

The Conservative and Liberal parties tend to say public ownership does not work, is inefficient, and cannot be properly managed. I should like to point out to them that in the three prairie provinces where the telephone systems are publicly owned service is provided at 10 per cent, 20 per cent and 50 per cent lower cost to people than the service provided by Bell Canada. I do not have the rural rates with me, but in those areas the rates are even lower where the system is publicly owned.

I am not interested whatsoever in Bell Canada getting more money and more privileges in order to expand their facilities. Coming from Saskatchewan I have had a chance to experience publicly owned telephones. Then I came here and experienced privately owned telephones. There is no comparison whatsoever. I am not only referring to the price. I am also referring to the service. When I ordered a telephone for my new home here, it took nearly two months to get a private line. That would never happen in Saskatchewan or Manitoba. If you order a new telephone in those provinces, it is a matter of days before you get it. You do not have to wait for months and months on end. You have to wait with Bell Canada because they are not interested in providing a service. They are only interested in making a profit.

The first priority of publicly owned systems is to serve people. They do not take advantage of people by being pick pockets and taking money out of their wallets. It is nothing short of that in some instances with Bell Canada. I will not expedite this legislation through the House and further line the pocketbooks of Bell Canada.

Mr. Paproski: You had better be careful or Bell Canada will cut your telephone off.

Mr. Nystrom: A week ago my telephone stopped working. Coincidentally that occurred the day after I spoke on the Bell Canada debate. I immediately called their office and they said it would take at least a week and a half to repair my telephone. In Saskatchewan employees would be fired if it took that long to repair a telephone. That is an indication of how efficient the publicly owned system is in Saskatchewan. It is not inefficient like the privately owned Bell Canada system. For reasons like that, I am not interested in filling the pocketbooks of Bell Canada or making the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) happy.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

Bell Canada takes advantage of too many ordinary people. They should be publicly owned, and the telephone system should be publicly owned by all of the people in each and every province so that those people could enjoy the same privileges and rights as we enjoy in the provinces of Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and Alberta.

When the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) gets up, he will be talking about public ownership of the telephone system in the province of Manitoba because of the low rates he and his constituents pay, compared to the rates which are paid by people in ridings like those of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) and the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). That is only because the telephone systems in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta are publicly owned.

It makes me passionate and somewhat angry when I compare the two systems of telephone service. I consistently hear that Bell Canada is poor and needs more money. In the question I answered just a few moments ago, I referred to the profits SASK TEL made despite all the service they provide. If SASK TEL can make such tremendous profits and provide service at such low rates, what is Bell Canada doing with the money they are swindling from the taxpayers of this country? They give various privileges to their executive people and they are involved in various types of investments. They do those things with the money they make from ordinary citizens.

I should like to refer to a list of Bell Canada's shareholders. Unfortunately I do not have enough time to refer to the 76 major shareholders of Bell Canada. I have heard Conservative and Liberal members get up and say that little old grannies own Bell Canada, and private citizens own Bell Canada. Well, very few of them own Bell Canada. Bell Canada is mostly owned by large companies.

In Saskatchewan the telephone system has 950,000 shareholders because every citizen of that province is a shareholder of SASK TEL. The same situation exists in the province of Manitoba, and that is the way it should be in the provinces of Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia, as well as the Atlantic provinces.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: When hon. members of the Conservative and Liberal parties realize they are not winning their argument, they start shouting and heckling.

I should like to return to the list of Bell Canada shareholders. There is Associated Investors Ltd. which has 2,400 common shares; Canada Life E-2 which has 6,100 common shares; Canada Life S-3 which has 22,325 common shares; Canada Life S-9 which has 12,000 common shares; Canada Permanent Investments which has 5,000 common shares; Canada Permanent Pooled which has 10,000 common shares; Canada Trust Investors Equity which has 15,000 common shares; and Canada Trust R.S.P. which has 62,000 common shares. Mr. Speaker, if I had a grandmother like that I would be a wealthy man.

Mr. Paproski: How many shares do you have?

Mr. Nystrom: I have no shares in Bell Canada. I have one share in SASK TEL because I am a resident of that province. Just like every other resident of that province, I have one share, and I am very proud of that. We also own a lot of potash in Saskatchewan, and we are likely to be owning a lot more in the future.

Mr. Paproski: The potash industry is another cartel.

Mr. Nystrom: Even if it is a cartel, it is a cartel on behalf of the people of that province. It returns all the profits to the people of that province and does not drain all of the profits out of the province and into other countries. I seem to be annoying hon. members by getting to some of the bare facts.

To return to the list, another Tory grandmother is Canadian General Life Equity which has 1,000 common shares. There is also Canadian International Investor Trust which has 12,000 common shares—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

• (1750)

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) was cut off in mid flight while listing these "little people" who own Bell Canada, and I am positive he would want to make sure that a few other examples go on the record. He has a list of 76 various large shareholders of Bell Canada and he got down to No. 11. I too am somewhat limited by time; I only have 20 minutes. I imagine I could fill my 20 minutes reading the list of shareholders and still be able to pass it on to another member. I will not do that other than to point out a few examples from the list to puncture the myth that it is the little people who own Bell.

We have, for example, Eaton Commonwealth Investment Fund owning 50,000 common shares, or Confederation Life owning 63,400, and Investors Growth owning 320,000 preferred shares. It ranges from that figure of 320,000 shares down to around 300 shares. That is an example of the kind of ownership that exists in this company. It leads one to question whether the company really is serving the interests of the individual subscriber, the little person as he is called by Bell, or whether Bell is serving some important or powerful corporate companies.

I want to move on to discuss why we take particular exception to this bill on Bell Canada, a bill which originated in the Senate and which only had a very cursory examination. For that reason, and because we feel that Bell does affect hundreds of thousands of subscribers in various parts of Canada it is important that we give it a close scrutiny to see what the company is up to, and to ensure that the bill is amended so that the subscribers are protected.

What the bill tends to do is to allow Bell to be treated like any other corporation in the matter of raising capital. It wants to change some of the regulations by which Bell has been governed up to now. But we in the NDP argue that you cannot treat Bell Canada like any other company, that because it is a monopoly it has a unique position in the country, it is a very powerful company, it does not have a competitor in certain provinces, and therefore it has to come under government regulation.

What we object to is the way in which Bell Canada, since its incorporation, has attempted to circumvent government regulation, that is to say regulation by the elected representatives of the people or the agencies which they appoint.

I would like to zero in on just a couple of areas to show why we need more regulation of Bell Canada rather than less, as this bill attempts to do. We find that Bell, by having subsidiary companies, has attempted to circumvent some of the original legislation governing the operation of Bell Canada, legislation which limited Bell to operate in the field of telecommunications. What we find is that Bell, through its subsidiaries, the companies in which it owns controlling interest, has been trying to increase investment in areas not related to communications. Through the use of subsidiaries Bell has been trying to increase its investment and its other costs in order to inflate its rate base and justify increased costs to subscribers, while at the same time shifting their profitable operations to their subsidiaries which are not regulated by any government agency. In other words, I submit that Bell is trying to circumvent the intent of parliament. Therefore we object strenuously to this bill because it is just one more in a series of attempts by Bell to bypass regulations.

Let us look at the way Bell tries to circumvent regulations. Let us look, for example, at its largest subsidiary called Northern Telecom, formerly known as Northern Electric. This company manufactures telephone receivers and related equipment. We should note that Bell originally manufactured this equipment itself, but eventually it changed over to having Northern Telecom do it.

Northern Telecom is a wholly owned subsidiary of Bell. What it has been able to do is to capture the market on telephone manufacturing and to become a profitable branch of Bell Canada. But when the government agency, formerly the Canadian Transport Commission now the Canadian Radio-Television Commission, goes about regulating Bell and determining whether subscribers' telephone rates should go up or not, the regulatory agency never takes into account the profitability of Bell's subsidiaries. This has always been a shortcoming in the past.

I have appeared before CTC hearings in the past and argued that you have to look at the total profitability of the company in determining rates. That has not been done in the past, and as a result Bell can argue that its costs have been going up and therefore subscribers have to pay higher telephone charges. But when we look at Bell's profitability through its subsidiaries, the question comes to mind that perhaps the rate increases in the past have not been justified. I think of Northern Telecom's profits in particular. That company reported record earnings in 1976 of $77.1 million, up to 14.2 per cent from a year earlier. That profitability is really a direct profit for Bell Canada. It is all part of the same conglomerate, the same large corporate structure. Therefore I submit that that should be taken into account when Bell goes before CRTC pleading poverty and asking for a rate increase.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The time provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CUSTOMS—EFFECT ON TOURIST TRADE OF ALLEGEDLY UNREASONABLE TAXING OF UNITED STATES CITIZENS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday of this week I had occasion to ask questions in the House of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) and the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin).

We know that the deficit in the tourist trade is getting worse each year. The deficit for the first quarter of this year is $410 million, a quarterly deficit greater than any annual deficit prior to 1975. As I mentioned, I addressed a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of National Revenue. The first minister seemed to think that the main problem was that all of a sudden too many Canadians were going abroad instead of touring their own country. It may be so, but facts have been brought to my attention which seem to indicate that the main problem might be quite a different one.

In my supplementary question I asked the Minister of National Revenue why her department's excise tax officers gave the impression that they were following a policy of harassment directed against American tourists, which can only be called a witch hunt, when they were assessing duties and taxes on, for example, American groceries purchased by U.S. citizens for use in Canada, or on U.S. manufactured boats used by Americans in Canada, and on U.S. registered automobiles while in use in Canada. The minister answered that she did not know which electors I represented, that she could not deal in generalities, and that she wanted specific details. I want her to know that I represent the electors of that paradise vacation land, Parry Sound-Muskoka.

I would also like to remind the minister that other regions of the country count greatly on the American tourist trade. I have received complaints in letters and in telephone calls. A constituent of mine who owns a fishing camp on Lake Nipissing sent me a letter telling me of a complaint she received from three American clients. They were coming to Canada with friends to go fishing for a week end. They had about $40 worth of groceries with them which they had purchased in the United States. They were humiliated and treated in an extremely rude fashion at the border, and they had to pay $6 duty on the $40 worth of groceries. The tourists were angry because they were treated somewhat like smugglers.

The law permits a person to bring with him duty-free food for two days. The customs officer is the final judge on what amounts to two days' food. It is hard for me to believe that $40 worth of groceries shared by three men could be much more than a two days' supply at today's costs. These people say they are not coming back. I do not think it was the idea of the $6; it was the principle of the thing.

The second case concerns an American who has been coming to Canada since 1961. He lives in Florida. Six years ago he purchased a lodge in Algonquin Park. It is a very successful operation. It turns over more than a quarter of a million dollars in business each year and is a great asset to the surrounding community. Every year the owner of this lodge brings his car into Canada for the summer while he is here. He also has two trucks. He leases one in Canada, insures it in Canada, and uses it in conjunction with his business. His other vehicle he purchased outright in Canada, insures it in Canada and so on. Both these vehicles are used in conjunction with his business.

He had to go to one of the customs offices to pick up some parcels which came from the United States. He paid duty on them. The customs official noted the American licence plate on his vehicle. Nothing was said at that time, but a few days later he received a telephone call. He was told in no uncertain terms that his American car could not be used for business, not even to pick up a few parcels from a customs office or to pick up mail. He was further cautioned that he was the only one who could drive his car. His wife could not even drive it. He was told that if he dared to do anything out of line his car would be impounded.

He was given strict orders to go back to that customs office by Friday of this week, which is tomorrow. Needless to say, he was in an awful quandary about this, and I was contacted. I just telephoned him half an hour ago. He went back to that customs office. He said he was amazed at the courtesy with which he was received. A permit was given to him, and he has no problems again this year. However, this case shows that there are officious officials in customs and excise who are creating bad feelings among tourists. I am sure hon. members are going to hear a great deal about this.

Many Americans owning boats have come to Canada over the years. They have brought them to their cottages or to their resorts, as the case may be, and they have left them here. In a great many cases they store them at marinas. In some cases they may leave them at their own cottages, but they go back to their own country at the end of the tourist season. However, they use their boats each year.

There has been no change in regulations, but it seems that now people will have to adhere to the letter of the law. Every American who owns a boat is either going to pay duty or take his boat back to the United States by October 1. This is my information. It certainly seems to be a hardship. A great many people are up in arms. Marina operators who get a good deal of business are up in arms. This matter was brought to my attention by a marina operator.

I am aware that marina operators did put pressure on customs and excise to have this regulation enforced so that they could sell more boats to Americans. A great many Americans buy boats in my area and have them serviced and stored there. There is no problem with that, but it would take a battalion to search out all the American boats that have been in this country for years and years. Everyone is aware that boats carried on trailers are heavy and contribute to higher gasoline consumption, and this is what will happen if they have to be brought back and forth each year.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I have to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, under customs regulations a non-resident may import an automobile, pleasure craft, and personal baggage for the length of his or her visit to Canada, but at the conclusion of the visit, goods imported in this manner must be exported. However, realizing the inconvenience that could be caused to non-resident visitors by insisting that their pleasure craft be exported at the conclusion of each visit, the department has, over the years, allowed pleasure craft to remain in Canada during the summer or vacation periods under permit. The foregoing concession has been granted to persons renting or owning seasonal residences in this country as well as to individuals who have yachts and secure storage at marinas.

Over the years repeated requests were received by the department to allow the off-season storage of pleasure craft in Canada. In recognition of the potential benefits of this storage to Canadian marina operators, a procedure was introduced in accordance with national legislation whereby a temporary admission permit would be issued in instances where a unit remained in Canada at a bona fide marina or recognized service depot for repairs or overhaul purposes. Although few problems were experienced with the introduction of this practice, some abuses were indentified where, for example, equipment of all kinds would be stored in Canada, often without any need of repairs and occasionally at locations other than marinas and service outlets.

Unfortunately, the situation has now reached the point where we must re-affirm the intent of the original regulation and limit winter storage permits only to those non-residents who are having their equipment repaired at bona fide marinas.

With respect to the importation of food into Canada by tourists, the present regulations entitle the visitor to this country to import a two day supply of food free of duty. A visitor may, of course, import quantities in excess of this, provided, of course, he pays the duties and taxes. It should be pointed out that customs officers use some discretion to extend a certain degree of latitude.

The regulation which allows foreign visitors to import two days food for each visitor is extended to allow him or her time to locate local sources of supply. The predominant concept of tourism of course is the belief that the visitor will avail himself of the goods and services of the country in which he is visiting. The rationale behind the present regulations is to encourage the purchase of foodstuffs in Canada, foodstuffs which, in large measure, are produced, manufactured, and distributed by Canadians and Canadian enterprises.

Like the hon. member I represent a constituency where the tourist trade is important. The rationale to which I referred is one which I accept and applaud. Upon reflection I am sure the hon. member opposite will do likewise.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—INVESTIGATION OF OPERATIONS OF BANK OF MONTREAL IN VANCOUVER—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, on April 19 I raised a question with the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) regarding the activities of the commercial crime section of the RCMP in the Vancouver area investigating an alleged illegality involving the Bank of Montreal in Vancouver as it affected a constituent of mine, Mr. Larry MacHale. The reason I asked the question is that it seems that the commercial crime section investigates over and over again. I have to admire the members of the police force for their willingness to carry out investigations ad infinitum.

• (1810)

It seems that the Solicitor General becomes fidgity if we ask him in the House how the investigation is going. His attitude is that, because the investigation is under way, we should not talk about the matter. Mr. Speaker, those are the stonewalling, Nixon-like tactics the Solicitor General uses in this House. Instead of clearing the reputations of people, he says we should not talk about the matter. I agree that if it were before the courts we should not discuss it, but since it is only in the investigation stage I do not see why we should not raise it. I say it is time we gave some of the people involved a chance to clear their names.

I understand that some of these matters have been on the books of the force in Vancouver for three years. How long is the department supposed to investigate? Allegedly, every time the investigation proceeds to a certain point the troops are called off and told to look into the question no more.

Sooner or later we must know the answers to certain fundamental questions. For instance, is the RCMP in Vancouver so woefully understaffed in its commercial crime section, that it cannot investigate such offences, adequately, to the satisfaction of the attorney general's department in British Columbia? If the Solicitor General wants to crack down on commercial crime, let him provide the RCMP detachment in Vancouver with the staff it needs in order to clear up white collar crime in the area.

The second question I raise is this: is the administration of justice being stonewalled in the Vancouver area? Why does the Solicitor General always tell us the matter is under investigation, and why does nobody ever get around to laying specific charges?

I raised this matter in the House on April 19. Since then the Vancouver Province has published some material relating to this matter and the Bank of Montreal. If the reporters on the Vancouver Province can dig up information, submit it to their legal beagles and make sure it passes all the necessary tests before publication, why cannot the attorney general's department or the RCMP do at least as much and secure such information? It seems to me, as the newspaper has published some of this material, that in order to allow people to clear their names charges should be laid; and it seems to me the Solicitor General's department or the attorney general's department is stonewalling in this regard.

The third question is this: whom is the government protecting? Why is there no action? If the department is investigating, it should either clear the names of some now under suspicion, or lay charges against those involved in the operation in question. As I say, let us clear their names or let us see some charges laid, but let us not smear with innuendo citizens who have become the victims of a seemingly spurious operation. Let us not smear with innuendo the police force which is doing its best to provide evidence on which charges can be founded. Names on both sides of the matter ought to be cleared, because officials in Vancouver want to know where they stand.

Surely the Solicitor General cannot hide behind the old excuse that this matter is under investigation. If it is being investigated, let us get to the root of the problem and lay charges. Let us give people who are now the victims of innuendo a chance to clear their names. I look forward to the Solicitor General's answer.

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we do not accept the suggestion of innuendo implicit in the hon. member's question. Mr. Ross Hamilton Lawrence MacHale of Vancouver, B.C., is the owner of Argon Developments Ltd., which is a firm engaged in real estate development in the Vancouver area. During June, 1973, Argon purchased a 14-lot subdivision from Raymond Harold Lawrence and, to do so, arranged financing with various lenders in the amount of approximately $550,000. Argon also purchased another subdivision in Port Moody, B.C., from Percy Contracting Services for nearly $300,000 which was financed through a different lender.

[Mr. Friesen.]

The above financing arrangements caused a strain on Argon's financial position, and as a result it was petitioned into bankruptcy. To avoid a bankruptcy suit, Mr. Alvan G. Percy, of Percy Contracting Services, arranged financing to relieve Argon of some of its indebtedness and, as security, took a mortgage on the property belonging to Argon.

Mr. MacHale has complained that Mr. Percy and other interested parties, including the Bank of Montreal, entered into a conspiracy to defraud him of his interests in the properties bought by Argon Developments.

This matter is still, at present, under active investigation as auditors are currently examining books and records, and until such time as this examination is complete, we cannot say whether or not there has been any criminal offences committed.

You will surely understand, Mr. Speaker, that because this matter is still under an active investigation, it would not be in the public's interest to disclose any additional information until such time as the facts are known and it is determined whether or not there is a cause to lay criminal charges such as the hon. member quite correctly suggested.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS—POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING FOOD POLICY COUNCIL TO CONSIDER NATIONAL FOOD POLICY

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, on May 31 I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a question having to do with the setting up of a joint food policy council consisting of both private and government members to cover every segment of food production from transportation to tariffs in order to come up with a comprehensive national food policy. The Prime Minister replied that it was an interesting suggestion, that he would consider it most seriously.

Since that time we have seen the unveiling of what the government has termed a white paper or blue paper on a national food policy. It is to that I will address myself because it ties in with the question I asked the Prime Minister on May 31.

In the interim we have heard the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott) talk about a national food policy. In doing so, they have totally confused the issue. The debate in Canada is now urgent in the context of moving toward a consensus on a national food policy.

I have called upon the government to set up a parliamentary committee to travel across Canada, giving it similar powers that the committee on penitentiaries had, to look in depth into the matter of a national food policy and report back early in 1978.

The Minister of Agriculture talks in terms of protectionism when he talks about a national food policy. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs talks about free trade when he talks about a national food policy. This was evident in the remarks of both ministers in the House as well as their press conference. The Canadian consumer and producer are in the middle of this debate between the two ministers. I ask the parliamentary secretary to clarify the positions of these two ministers. I further ask whether the government has given consideration to setting up a committee to look into a national food policy.

In my opinion there are two things that must be done in this House. As I mentioned before, the first is to set a parliamentary committee. The second is to make major changes in the Department of Agriculture. I call upon the government to set up a department of agriculture and food. It would give greater power to the Department of Agriculture and would complement what would be left of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The department would then have greater power in all areas of government.

It is becoming abundantly clear that unless policy changes are made the food industry will find itself unable to cope with demands in both the domestic and export markets in the future. We are facing a mini-crisis in the area of food policy, and the government must make fundamental changes. The first should be to create a ministry of agriculture and food and then to send a parliamentary committee, properly staffed, across the country to sound out the feelings of Canadians in all walks of life as to what they would like to see in a national food policy. At present we have absolutely no co-ordinated approach to agriculture and food.

We must remember that agriculture is more than just the farm gate. It comprises wholesalers, retailers, distributors, and tariff policies, and all these areas at the present time are segmented. I urge the government to look seriously into this idea of sending out a parliamentary committee, to consider seriously making the major changes to which I have referred, and to examine carefully the advantages of setting up a department of food and agriculture.

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his concern about a national food policy and for the representations he has made in this regard. I would point out that the representations he has made in the course of this adjournment debate are somewhat extended as compared with those he made on May 31. At that time he was talking about a joint food policy council. He now talks about a committee which would travel about the country, and suggests certain changes affecting the Department of Agriculture.

The response of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on June 23 might be repeated in this regard: these are serious representations and they will be well considered.

As the hon. member himself said, the question he posed has to a certain extent been overtaken by events in the past two weeks. The government has already announced a food strategy which provides a set of guidelines or principles to be followed in order to assure all Canadians of adequate supplies of safe and nutritious food at prices which are reasonable to both producers and consumers.

The strategy provides an umbrella under which policies and initiatives will fit. As the strategy makes clear, consultations will be taking place on specific prospects as we flesh out each part of them. This is why the Prime Minister said earlier that he considers the question to be a representation and why it is a subject for serious consideration.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At 6.25 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION REORGANIZATION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-27, to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, and motions nos. 13, 14, 16, 17 and 18.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, when I left off this afternoon we were discussing the fiddling around by the government with the extended benefit period under the Unemployment Insurance Act. Also grouped within the set of motions to be debated was one in which the government foresaw using the unemployment insurance fund for job creation purposes. When the committee was hearing evidence on Bill C-27, witnesses representing employers and employees came before the committee. It is not very often that such groups agree on things, but in this particular instance all employee and employer groups which appeared before the committee did agree on one thing. The work sharing proposals put forward by the government were completely opposed by all groups representing employers and employees.

Some of the Liberal members on the committee told me that the work sharing program was innovative, that the job creation proposals were innovative, and that the job training program was innovative. I say the work sharing programs are not innovative. Indeed they have been around since the pyramids were built. They were the first job creation program in history. I suppose in those days the Egyptians would have said that they were job creation programs. They were job creation programs, but at very high human cost.

We now have the new Pharaoh with his hair cut and his blue suit, telling us that he has some really creative job programs going forward into the past, into the 1930's.

I hear the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) braying. All he can do is count up to 20.

● (2010)

The government should get about the business of changing the federal Labour Code so that it does not remain a managerial right to order workers to work overtime.

The United Auto Workers made an excellent presentation before the committee. They urged the government to make changes in the federal Labour Code so that workers are not forced to work overtime by management. The Telecommunications Workers Union, which represents employees of Bell Canada, also urged the government to make changes in that code to determine emergency conditions under which management can call those workers out to lay cable. They were being called out on Saturdays to work overtime laying cable. Certainly that is something management might consider being an emergency, but in the eyes of anyone else that is not an emergency. There is the case of Griffin in Winnipeg, Manitoba, where workers are on strike. They are demanding a right to make optional whether a worker works overtime or not. There are a million people or more unemployed in this country, and yet there are companies standing on their managerial right to order workers to work overtime.

The minister is advocating work sharing. The unemployment insurance fund would supplement the work sharing program. If that is what the government wants to do, then it ought to come from general revenues and not from the unemployment insurance fund. The government continues to give the impression to the country that it is these workers who are costing the taxpayers $3.8 billion. It has the gall to tell us the unemployment insurance fund is going to cost $3.8 billion in 1977. Projected over next year it will cost $4 billion. The changes it is talking about will supposedly be a saving to the taxpayer, but next year taxpayers will find out the cost for unemployment insurance will be as high as ever. Do you know who will be blamed? The people participating in work sharing, the people participating in job creation and the people on training will be blamed. If the minister wants to implement his job creation program, then it must be done out of general revenues and not out of the unemployment insurance fund.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I will not be long in speaking to these amendments.

An hon. Member: You have 20 minutes.

Mr. Alexander: I do not think I will require 20 minutes because we have already been through it all. There has been an exhaustive search in the standing committee. We heard a number of witnesses, and I am satisfied with those who appeared. I thank them for their attendance because it opened up a new avenue, as far as I was concerned. It was one of a few instances where labour and management were able to get together.

The motions in total deal with the departmental use of unemployment insurance funds. The minister hopes to realize a saving as a result of the change in the eight week period and other matters contained in the bill. Both labour and management registered their concern and disappointment at the fact that the minister appeared to use these funds in terms of job training, job creation, and work sharing. They believe UIC funds are accumulated, and because of employee-employer feelings should be directed to the financial benefit of employees. They did not take an extremely hard line on job training and job creation. They would like to know how it works. They are concerned about the fact that we have had a lot of job training schemes and we do not know who is being trained for what. They are a little suspicious about the job training proposition which the minister advocates. As my party's critic, I cannot say I am not going to give the minister a chance in this regard.

We on this side of the House, in the past few months particularly, have called on the government to create jobs, or to create a climate whereby the private sector can create jobs. I am prepared to give the minister the benefit of the doubt with respect to job training. Training in needed skills is required in our contemporary society, rather than training for obsolete jobs. There is some concern about how this program is going to work, but hopefully it will realize jobs for the Atlantic provinces and the province of Quebec which have been hit with high unemployment.

I am surprised with my friends to the left, the socialists. The NDP have always cried about job creation. Here is an opportunity which may not be perfect, but those hon. members are saying that they do not want the government to create any jobs.

Mr. Rodriguez: You do not do it with UIC funds.

Mr. Alexander: Is he not a loud mouth, Mr. Speaker? I have been listening to his bombastic, useless rhetoric. Of course he is famous for that. I have also listened to him repeating himself, but I did not say a word. Now I have stood up for my 20 minutes, and that rascal stands up and refuses to give me an opportunity to speak. Now I see the hon. member getting up on a point of order.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not mind the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) taking us to task on debating the points at issue, but to misrepresent our position is not acceptable. We never opposed any job creation or training programs. The position we have taken in committee, and in this House, is that those programs should not be charged against the UIC fund. The hon. member is well aware of that. He is misrepresenting the position of hon. members on this side of the House. That is a very irresponsible position for the Conservative critic to take. Indeed he is the rascal.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. It takes a lot of nerve for the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) to get up and do what he has just done. For hours this afternoon we sat through his wild charges. Surely he can let the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) finish his speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's point of order was more a point of clarification. I do not see how the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) can clarify what has already been said.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate what the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) has just stated.

As I was saying about that rascal, and as I was saying about his party, they have now stated that they are not interested in job creation. I do not care whether or not he wants to split hairs with me. He says he does not want jobs created. We in this party say that we want to give the minister a chance to see whether this job creation proposal can work. We are prepared to be realistic, but the hypocrites on my left only say, "We are all for the poor. Create jobs for them".

● (2020)

I have watched the leader of the NDP stand in this chamber every day speaking to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), and to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), telling them, "There are one million people out of work. Create jobs", but now that there is an opportunity to create a few jobs, those rascals—and in particular the biggest one who is the smallest one—stand up and tell me they are not interested in job creation. I listened to that nonsense all day and I am getting sick and tired of the hypocritical attitude that that party adopts for their own particular benefit. But nobody buys anything they say. The proof of the pudding is that the socialists only have 15 or 16 seats. Mark my words, come the next election they will have even less.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: That is how much the people believe in the socialists. I do not want to get involved in partisanship. As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, we have here an amendment. I wish we could wipe out work sharing.

Mr. Rodriguez: You are losing your seats to the Liberals.

Mr. Alexander: I wish we could wipe out the socialists as well, but we will leave it to the people.

I find that labour and management in particular do not go along with work sharing. They are fundamentally opposed to it and I do not think I am exaggerating one bit, whether we talk about the CLC, the construction association, the manufacturers' association, or other representatives of labour and management. They all said, "No way, it does not work." Experiments were made with it in France, Italy, West Germany, and I will give the hon. member, the little rascal, credit, because he indicated that work sharing has been around for a long time and has not worked. There is no reason why we should be involved with it right now, and I will not pursue it any further.

While I am on my feet, let me say that while we appreciate what the government is trying to do with job training—

An hon. Member: Here you go again.

Mr. Alexander: Will you shut up, Cyril? I did not bother you, Sir.

We appreciate what is going to happen with job creation, but we are a little skeptical about it.

In my motion I ask that the minister report back to the House within one year after the proclamation of this bill to give us an analysis of the pilot projects. Incidentally, we would like to know at the same time about job training and job creation. That is my amendment.

What does the minister want with work sharing? He wants to share with others what few jobs there are in existence. That is not right. What we should be doing is to create an atmosphere where jobs can be created. Let me say without any hesitation that people do want to work, but I am worried about the fact that the Minister of Finance ignored OECD back in October and November of 1976, ignored the Economic Council of Canada, and ignored the Conference Board of Canada—all of them respectable organizations which said, "Mr. Minister of Finance, please get on the ball and create an atmosphere whereby jobs can be created;" in other words, "bring in a budget". That was in October of 1976. The minister did not bring down a budget until March 31, 1977, and at that time we already had one million unemployed.

It is incumbent on the minister to start talking about a revised budget so as at least to show the Canadian people that he is aware of reality. We have called for tax cuts, we have called for cuts in the sales tax, we have called for some contractual enterprise with firms which would be prepared to go to the slow growth areas for which they would receive tax relief, and we have talked about the unproductive programs of the government involving the tax dollar and putting them into the common pot to see whether we could use moneys that are not being used in terms of job creation to create jobs.

We have also said that wage and price controls have been a disaster. There are many ways of looking at this, depending on what conclusion you want to reach. The Minister of Finance would like to stop the controls but he does not know how or when to get out. We say we should get out by the end of June, as I think was indicated in our motion. Our recommendations as to what to do during the post-control period, monitoring, and all that sort of thing, are all on the record. We are not talking about sharing the work which is available. I do not like it because it would be a retrograde step. I want to progress, and the only way in which we can progess is by attempting to create jobs for those who are ready, willing, and able to work.

It is a shameful indictment of our society that in a country like ours, with our natural and human resources, we are unable to provide jobs for some one million people. It is a sorry state of affairs. It is all right for us to sit around here. We are gainfully employed for the time being, although some of us might not be back after the next election. You know how many letters we get, not only from high school students but from people with doctorates, B.Sc., B.A., and M.A., heads of families and others. We have a national crisis of significant proportion in terms of the high rate of unemployment. People do not want to be on the dole, they do not want to go to the welfare office, they do not want to stand in line for UI cheques—it is demeaning.

I do not want to be partisan and I have not been partisan as yet, but I must say that the government has created a nation of "gimmes" It has spent money as if it were going out of style. It spent some $10 billion in 1968, and $45 billion in 1977. Why? Because it said that people want that. I tell you, people are starting to say, "Listen, you are putting your dirty, greasy fingers into our pockets too long and too deeply". We had better start listening to the people. That will be the end of my partisan statement, although I could go on a little further than that to say how the government has destroyed the country. But I will not say it now, I will save it for another time. There is the scenario of the just society, another myth.

An hon. Member: Let's hear about it.

An hon. Member: Tell us more.

Mr. Alexander: We have heard "I shall save the nation". We have heard about national unity. This government, under the leadership of the Prime Minister, has not only destroyed this country but has created a nation of "gimmes" and has brought into being a separatist government in the province of Quebec. That is the end of my partisan statement. That is the message I will take to the Canadian people. Never mind this nonsense, "I am the saviour, I am the only man who can save this country". The one man who did nothing for this country who will be remembered is the one man who destroyed it, and he is still sitting here.

Let me continue by saying that I will accept the minister's proposal for job training and job creation but I cannot accept his work sharing concept. I hope he will appreciate the motion I place before the House to have this matter reviewed at the end of the year.

I notice that motion No. 13 is in the name of the NDP. We will vote against it, of course. We will also vote against motion No. 14 because that is another socialist motion. Motion No. 16 is in the name of our party, and of course we will vote for it. Of course, we will vote for motion No. 16 because it is a meaningful motion. As to motion No. 17, we will vote against it because it is NDP. Motion No. 18 is another good motion coming from this side of the House, from the official opposition, and we will vote for it. I do not think I have anything more to say on this point. I want to thank hon. members for their patience and understanding.

• (2030)

Some hon. Members: Hear hear!

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is quite a change in approach, doctrine and dogma to hear the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) after listening to the bombastic addresses from what we have come to call the little rascals around here. However, there have been many comments made yesterday and today in this debate, and I will probably have more to say at third reading because I think there is a little more leeway at that stage.

We found surprising support for the action we have taken on the variable entrance requirements from a member of the NDP this afternoon, and I would commend to him a reading of his own address. The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) in some areas saw fit to quote the Canadian Mining Association, but he forgot to read the paragraph in which that association supported the stand taken by the government on its variable entrance requirements.

Clause 41 of Bill C-27 contains three proposed new sections authorizing the developmental use of UI funds. New section 37 relates to work sharing, section 38 to job creation, and section 39 to training. The basic rationale underlying these proposals is to provide more productive alternatives to UI claimants while they are receiving income maintenance. To that extent I agree with the hon. member for Hamilton West that people do not want to be on the dole and that, if there is an opportunity to take some training, I think we have an obligation to provide it to them.

The original purpose of UI was to provide income protection to unemployed workers while they searched for suitable employment. This undoubtedly remains a fundamentally important purpose of the program. At the same time we all know that there have been dramatic changes in the economy, the labour market, and society, with the result that, for certain workers, immediate job prospects are poor. In these cases the provision of income maintenance by itself is not the most effective approach to the solution of their problems nor, indeed, to the problems of the labour market.

We know from experience that suitably designed training courses can help significantly to enhance employment opportunities. We are now proposing in new section 39 in clause 41 a more systematic approach based on streamlined financial arrangements. The current cumbersome approach whereby UI tops up manpower training allowances would be replaced. Those eligible for UI referred to manpower training courses would receive their full income maintenance from the UI program. This would not only make administrative and financial arrangements more efficient, it would also open up the possibility of additional funds being made available for training purposes. I am confident that these proposed arrangements are sound and should merit the full support of hon. members of this House.

I recognize that the proposals for job creation and work sharing constitute new departures. We have, therefore, indicated that we would be undertaking pilot projects in both cases to assess the extent to which the undoubted difficulties could be overcome and positive results achieved.

In recommending the use of UI funds in support of job creation projects it was again our hope to provide a more productive alternative to those whose immediate job prospects were poor. The question, of course, immediately arises: why not simply refer them to job creation projects financed in the normal way through appropriation? The simple answer is that UI funds could be an important way of stretching scarce funds available for job creation.

I am fully sensitive to the opposition which has been expressed by the representatives of both labour and management to the use of UI funds in job creation. I hope, however, that this will not result in the prevention of a period of experimentation to see whether the problems can be resolved.

In these circumstances it is my view that section 38 in Clause 41 should be retained in the bill. I do, however, give my unequivocal assurance that I would not proceed with implementation until there have been further opportunities for discussion. Specifically, I would propose to refer the question to the newly established advisory council to permit a fuller exchange of views than we have yet been able to have. I would also give my assurance that, if it is clear that no labour or management support for experimentation is forthcoming, these provisions will not be implemented.

The work-sharing arrangements contained in new section 37 in Clause 41 have also been a source of considerable controversy and criticism. Nevertheless, they seem to me to have sufficient potential merit to warrant not only careful consideration but also a trial period in the Canadian context.

I fear there is a danger that work sharing may be dismissed without a fair hearing. My department has undertaken a fairly extensive examination of the experience with work sharing in a number of European countries. These studies do not support the allegation made in some representations that these arrangements in Europe have been a disaster. Quite the contrary, they have become an integral part of labour market policy and programs in Europe and, despite some admitted concerns and criticisms, they have received widespread support from both labour and management.
