I see no reason in principle why the advantages which have been obtained in Europe could not be achieved in Canada. Employees who would otherwise have been laid off would be helped to retain their skills and work habits. Employers would be helped to retain their skilled labour force. It is, of course, true that those workers who would otherwise have been retained in full time employment would have their incomes somewhat reduced. That is fully recognized in the title we have given to those arrangements, that is, work sharing. Such arrangements would not, of course, be designed to result in a long term reduction in the incomes of such workers. They would be limited arrangements designed to meet temporary problems.

Dealing with the hon. member for Hamilton West and his motion No. 18, I fully appreciate that in the final analysis whether work sharing arrangements produce positive results will depend on the willingness on the part of workers and employers to support our proposed pilot projects. My understanding is that a number of establishments in Canada have already begun to embark on various forms of work sharing arrangements. In these circumstances I think it is essential to pursue discussions more widely and fully with management and labour to determine whether there is a basis upon which to proceed before we jettison what may be potentially a very good idea.

I give my assurance to the House that, if this provision is retained, I will not authorize its implementation until I am satisfied that there is a willingness on the part of management and labour groups to participate. On this basis it is my recommendation that hon. members of this House support the provisions in Bill C-27 for work sharing.

With respect to motion No. 18 proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton West and with respect to the evaluation of job creation, that motion would require an evaluation to be tabled within one year of proclamation of Bill C-27. Let me emphasize that it is our clear intention to undertake evaluations of all the developmental uses of unemployment insurance funds, including the job creation proposal. I would certainly be prepared to table in parliament the findings of such evaluations.

I find, however, that the provision in the motion would introduce an undesirable element of rigidity. As I have indicated, the job creation proposals would not be implemented until after we had undertaken thorough discussions with the advisory committee. A period of one year following proclamation of the act itself would undoubtedly provide too short a time to assess results. Having given my assurance that we will be undertaking evaluations and making the findings available, I hope motion No. 18 can be withdrawn or defeated.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the minister, and to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) in his earlier comments about some of the stands we in the New Democratic Party have taken on the various amendments before the House. I would like to say at the outset that unlike the actions of the hon. member for Hamilton West—who read through the various amendments and rejected those proposed by the NDP out of hand just for the very reason, it seemed, that they were NDP amendments—we are going to support his motion No. 18 because we looked at the motion and asked whether it contains any merit, and I think the idea of an annual review of this government's ineptitude is quite worth while.

I am rather disappointed in my friend, the hon. member for Hamilton West. As an experienced member he should know by now that any program of job creation or the like proposed by the Liberals is no more than tokenism. I was surprised at his faith in the job creation and work training programs. He admitted these have not worked in other jurisdictions and he was skeptical about their effects, yet he was willing to give them a year to see how they worked.

This party rejects the idea of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) using unemployment insurance funds for these programs, not because we are against job creation per se but because we are against stealing funds from the unemployed for them. If the government is serious about creating jobs it should make a budgetary commitment to do so, and not tinker with money that should go to support people who have lost their jobs through no fault of their own.

The minister and his colleagues will not come to grips with the fact of one million unemployed by challenging the existing structure of our economy and our reliance on the private sector to create jobs. That just does not work because of the way the economy is structured. Instead of making that fundamental kind of reorganization and commitment to new industry, and hence new jobs, it prefers to attack unemployment. This bill will apparently save money, but by throwing some 330,000 unemployed people off the unemployment rolls. The savings will be used on make-work projects and job training.

The first reason we objected to this approach is that those 330,000 people will be excluded from benefits under the job creation and work-sharing programs. The money saved by taking people off unemployment insurance will go toward creating jobs for others. Only those who are still receiving benefits will qualify under this make-work project.

The other reason we oppose the amendment to Clause 41 is that if people on unemployment insurance accept jobs on these federal government work projects they will be paid out of UIC funds. It should be remembered that work on such projects will not be considered as employment and will not make people eligible for future UIC benefits. It is tokenism. Anyone who joins in the scheme knows that it is a phony make-work scheme; it is not real employment. He knows it is not taken seriously by the government and that he will never qualify for benefits on such schemes. It is a very cheap way for the government to get work done.

Surely it is far better to have people sit idly by collecting unemployment insurance than to move into this phony kind of busy work or job-creation scheme. The government should get going and create jobs instead of tinkering with the unemployment insurance scheme and making it look as if it was doing something creative. It is not fooling members of this House. It is not fooling the unemployed. A previous minister of manpower and immigration, Jean Marchand, who is now in the other place, in the course of a debate in this House in 1966 said:

> The hon. member made a suggestion with which I basically disagree when he said we should try to find part-time work for those who draw unemployment insurance.
> Unemployment insurance is a type of insurance. The people who get unemployment insurance are not living on public charity. If we give start to competition between workers and those who are on unemployment insurance, I fear we will create an unbearable situation. Those people start working for lower salaries and will finally end up competing with regular workers. To my mind we must instead find regular employment for the people on unemployment insurance, full-time jobs that will afford them a livelihood. We must not allow them to compete against the working class.

The former minister recognized the hazards of the slippery path upon which the present minister is about to embark. This kind of program will neither be productive for the unemployed, for those who are already employed nor, indeed, for employers. For these reasons we object to this scheme, not as the hon. member for Hamilton West implied, because we are against job creation per se.

The other thing I object to is that the money saved from throwing people off the unemployment insurance rolls will be available for on-the-job training of people eligible for UIC. When we look at the budgets for the department from 1970-71 to 1974-75 we see that it has spent up to 75 per cent of its budget on training. Where are those people who have been trained? Where are the jobs?

We retrain people, keep them off the streets, supposedly off the unemployment rolls, to what end? There are no jobs for them. People who know anything about the program concede that after the training is finished the trainees will not find jobs, because there are none. That is why we say the program is phony and the minister's proposed changes meaningless, for the jobs are not out there, in the first place. Taking money out of unemployment insurance and putting it into training is ridiculous. My colleague from Nickel Belt has told the House of the many hairdressers and clerks trained under the retraining program for non-existent jobs. I repeat, the minister's changes are meaningless, phony, will harm the work ethic in this country, and heap indignities on the unemployed.

In the few minutes remaining may I speak on motion No. 14, standing in my name? The government wants to pay extended benefits only to those who have worked 26 weeks or more, and the minimum requirements in this regard are being extended. Those lucky enough to work 20 weeks in areas of high unemployment will, under existing formulas, also be eligible for extended benefits. The government realizes how difficult it is to find work in high unemployment areas and, accordingly, will allow the unemployed to collect benefits for a longer period. But the government's new proposals for cutting back extended benefits will create hardships in Atlantic Canada, Quebec, northern parts of Canada and elsewhere for people who need extended benefits and who, because of the slowdown in the economy, cannot find jobs right away after being laid off.

The extended qualifying period set out in clause 41 is another example of the government's regressive thinking, for it is trying to fight unemployment on the backs of the unemployed. Instead of creating jobs it will discriminate against those who suffer from the Liberal government's mismanagement of the economy. For all these reasons the NDP cannot support the minister's proposals. I hope Liberals and Conservatives representing economically depressed areas are aware of the hardship this bill will work on the unemployed, and will speak against those provisions of the bill to which I referred. To do otherwise is to turn one's back on one's constituents, which no member of parliament should do.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended speaking in this debate, but since the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) said some nasty things about my friend, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), and called him a little rascal, I must point out who has been the big rascal for the past few years in our unemployment debates. I see that as soon as we go after him he walks out of the House.

Mr. Alexander: No, I am still here.

Mr. Nystrom: You would think that the Conservative party, including the hon. member for Hamilton West, has been defending the unemployed. The hon. member tries to make out that he has been attacking the big, bad government for how it has treated the unemployed. That big, bad rascal, the hon. member for Hamilton West, forgets what he told the government a few years ago, and I feel it appropriate to remind him, because his memory seems faulty.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is an honourable rascal.

Mr. Nystrom: Yes, he is an honourable rascal. On February 1, 1977, he said that back in 1971, when fewer were unemployed and the economy was healthier, he remembered telling the minister who was responsible for bringing in this monstrosity of a law to include in the program incentives to work. He suggested that 12 weeks of employment should be the minimum qualifying requirement, but the minister said, no. He said he had made that point six years ago. The hon. member for Hamilton West said in the House that the minister was going to be hard on the unemployed; but the rascal from Hamilton West suggested that the minimum attachment period should be extended from eight to 12 weeks.

The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) is quoted in the Montreal Star of January 13, 1977, as saying this:

> It is my personal view that the 12 weeks should be increased to levels in the former UIC program of 20 weeks. It is evident the changes are necessary and the government should be commended for introducing these changes . . .

The hon. member for Provencher supported the great changes the minister wants to make to the unemployment insurance program; at the same time the hon. member for Hamilton West is attacking the hon. member for Nickel Belt, saying he is against job creation. He could not even quote him correctly. Really, the hon. member for Hamilton West and other members of the Conservative party talk out of both sides of their mouths.

My hon. friend from Nickel Belt tells me that when the hon. member for Hamilton West and his colleagues meet the trade unions they talk about the big, bad government across the way, and condemn it for trying to hurt the working people and short change them with unemployment insurance benefits. As soon as the trade union people leave, they talk out of the other side of their mouths, speak of all the abuses against the unemployment insurance fund and say the sorts of things I read into the record a moment ago. It seems that the hon. member for Hamilton West has a convenient memory. He and his colleagues remember what they want, depending on their audience and whom they are addressing.

Time and again the Conservative members have said they want the qualifying period extended, benefits to the unemployed cut, and so on. The big rascal from Hamilton West represents a working town. I was in Hamilton last Saturday night and Sunday, and noticed that it is a working class town, a steelworkers' town. Many in the town are worried about unemployment, and many have been laid off. I took a taxi with a guy who worked for Stelco for 20 years and was laid off. He had been getting UIC benefits, but was cut off.

Mr. Paproski: What! You can still get a taxi?

Mr. Nystrom: He finally got a job driving a taxi part time. He was trying to make a few bucks. He had a family to raise and a home to keep. You would think the member for Hamilton West would be interested in helping people like that. But no. The hon. member wanted to extend the minimum attachment period.

I look forward to the day we televise this House, because then the people of this country will see how Conservative members speak out of both sides of their mouths.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): As you do.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, if only the constituents of the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) could see him in the House today! About 30 per cent of his constituents are unemployed, but he is arguing in this House that we should make the unemployment bill more restrictive and tighten it.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I never did any such thing. Now who is talking out of both sides of his mouth?

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I suggest the hon. member is doing precisely that. I, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes), and the hon. member for Nickel Belt spent much time this afternoon trying to convince the House that the bill will make the Unemployment Insurance Act more restrictive, more tight, and work hardships on ordinary citizens.

The hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi supports the bill and is running interference in this House for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen). He is out there in front, taking the flack for the minister, and in his riding 30 per cent of the people are unemployed.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): You are talking nonsense.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member often speaks while sitting on his brains. He likes to interject while sitting in his chair. If we had television in the House of Commons, his constituents would see what kind of a guy he really is, that he is not looking after their interests. In fact he would probably no longer be their member. That is why many members in the House oppose televising these proceedings.

● (2100)

If the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) has a question, I will be pleased to answer it. He does not have a question. I wish the Liberals would get up and make some speeches in the House. They seem to get sensitive when we talk about the problems affecting the ordinary Joe. He comes from the same town as the hon. member for Hamilton West. Both those members are concerned about how strong the NDP is in that city.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: I know that in the case of Hamilton West the NDP stole a seat from his party in the election held two or three weeks ago.

Mr. MacFarlane: Not my party.

Mr. Nystrom: There is no difference, really. The Conservative party is the same as yours. You are birds of a feather. There is no difference in philosophy. You can see how sensitive the Liberals and Conservatives get when we in this party start talking about the real issues affecting ordinary people.

This bill, and this motion moved by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, will tighten up the Unemployment Insurance Act. The hon. member for Hamilton West was misleading the House by saying that the hon. member for Nickel Belt is against job creation. The hon. member for Nickel Belt has talked about job creation time and time again, but not the type of job creation that is in this bill.

The job creation in this bill is another handout by the government to large corporations. It is the Santa Claus that we see so many times from Liberal and Conservative governments.

We have here what they call work sharing. What does work sharing mean? It means that if a company has to lay off one quarter, one third or one half of its workers, the company can get some help from the Unemployment Insurance Commission to keep the workers working. They can work half days or half weeks and collect not only part of their salary from the company, but be subsidized by the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

Mr. Alexander: Don't look at me when you talk about work sharing; look at him.

Mr. Nystrom: The hon. member for Hamilton West is becoming very sensitive. As soon as I start talking about an issue on which he agrees with the government, he gets very sensitive. That is why when he spoke he did not say anything concrete, but only called the hon. member for Nickel Belt a few names. When you start calling people names, you know you have lost the argument.

The work sharing program is not going to create any jobs. It would only be a subsidy program by the Unemployment Insurance Commission to some of the large corporations. That is all it will be. The hon. member for Hamilton West knows that. That is why he supports this motion. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration knows that, and that is why he has moved the motion before the House at the present time.

We know there is a real deficit in the unemployment insurance fund. In 1977 the plan is going to cost some $3.8 billion. The guess for next year is around $4 billion. However, we do not have any programs to create jobs in a concrete sense. We have Liberals and Conservatives supporting a program whereby the unemployment insurance fund will subsidize a few large companies.

The second part of the motion before us deals with what is called creative use of unemployment insurance benefits. What are creative uses? I would like more elaboration on what is meant by that. If there is an archaeological dig in the home city of the hon. member for Nickel Belt, Sudbury—

An hon. Member: They won't find anything there.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Clermont): Order please. I recognize the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom). The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) spoke a few minutes ago, so if he wants to speak later, he will have the opportunity, but for the moment, I recognize the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville.

Mr. Nystrom: Yes, I understand quite well, Mr. Speaker. Thank you. I think I still have four or five minutes to continue my speech on the motion of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen).

[English]

I was talking about creative use of unemployment insurance benefits. I was saying that supposing there was an archaeological dig—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Clermont): Address yourself to the Chair, please.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: I always respect the Chair, Mr. Speaker. The problem is the Conservatives are asking questions from behind the curtain. They are not even coming into the Chamber.

Mr. Symes: I rise on a point of order. It was the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) who was heckling from behind the curtain.

Mr. Nystrom: I was talking about archaeological studies in Sudbury. My understanding is that under the second part of the motion with regard to creative use of unemployment insurance benefits, unemployed people can participate in creative things such as an archaeological study in a place like Sudbury, and still draw unemployment insurance benefits. In principle that may sound very well, but I suggest there will be problems with that type of program.

If an archaeological dig is worth-while, why is it not supported by government funds with people hired on a full-time basis for a full time job and with some kind of future? Programs of that sort, whereby people drawing unemployment insurance benefits can work a bit on the side, will probably create a backlash in the community and some resentment. Some people will become known as the type who are on unemployment insurance benefits a lot, like to work a little bit in programs of this sort, and go back on UIC benefits. That will create a backlash for the unemployment insurance program. It should be an unemployment insurance program and not a program to subsidize people who work part-time on certain programs.

The third point about the motion before us is the training program. Training programs are fine and well, providing there are jobs to go to once the person is trained. That is one of the problems we have in Canada. We have a very high rate of unemployment. To train someone for a non-existent job is demoralizing.

I can speak from personal experiences in my area. A number of native, Indian and Metis people and lower income white people in my constituency have been trained for a specific job or a specific skill. When they got out of the training program they found there were no jobs for them to go to and, understandably, they were frustrated. The psychological effect is bad. The government has done a good thing by training them in a new skill, but when they cannot find employment to exercise it, the effect is negative and they have to fall back again on assistance from the state.

I could give other examples of make-work programs in my riding where people have been left without resources once the projects run out. Along with these programs it is imperative that the government create more jobs. There should be tax cuts introduced in favour of lower and middle income people—they would use the extra money to buy clothing, shoes and so on, goods which are labour-intensive and whose manufacture provides employment. There should be an extension of the housing program as one way of putting people to work, not only directly but indirecly, besides accomplishing a useful social purpose. If the government were to do these things, the training program itself would be more effective.

I know that members in our party have had considerable influence with the minister in terms of amendments to this bill. One of the reasons we are participating in this debate so forcefully is to ensure that the unemployed are treated more fairly and that they have jobs to go to. Canada is a country of great resources and technical ability. All we need is a government plan to put people to work through the creation of wider employment opportunities.

I hope the minister will reconsider his opinion, and I hope the official opposition, led by the amiable and affable member for Hamilton West—even though he is a big rascal sometimes—will oppose the motion as I do, in which case perhaps we shall see a constructive change in these proposals. I trust the official opposition will bear in mind the interests of the little man, the working man the Conservative party always talks about. I see the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) is rising, no doubt to make a speech, so I will end my remarks at this point.

Mr. Cullen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, motion No. 5 in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) is consequential to motion No. 16. If motion No. 16 is negatived there would be no vote on No. 5 Similarly, motion No. 6 in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) is consequential to motion No. 17, so it seems to me it would be appropriate to place them in the group upon which we are voting now.

Mr. Alexander: There can be no doubt about what the minister has just said. We have been dealing with job training, job creation, and work sharing. If my memory serves correctly motion No. 5 is in my name and motion No. 6 is in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez)—he is a great Canadian but he is still a little rascal. We have talked about job training and work creation, so we might as well lock those motions in when we are voting in due time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I should like to hear the views of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) on this question.

Mr. Rodriguez: We on this side have no objection to putting motion No. 6, which stands in my name, together with the other motions mentioned on this group. They are certainly related.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Of course, when we get to put the question we will proceed in that way, but the Chair suggested that the question be put on motion No. 17 before motion No. 16. An affirmative vote on motion No. 17, would also dispose of motion No. 16. It is only if motion No. 17 is negatived we would have a vote on motion No. 16.

Mr. Alexander: Motion No. 17 does dispose of motion No. 6 and motion No. 16 disposes of motion No. 5.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That was in my mind to say, anyway.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I was going to put the motions but the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) rose. I do not want to prevent him from speaking because I do not know whether he wanted to contribute to the debate. Is the House ready for the question.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The first question is on motion No. 13 in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow).

All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Accordingly the recorded division on motion No. 13 stands deferred.

The question now is on motion No. 14 in the name of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes).

All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Accordingly the recorded division on motion No. 14 stands deferred.

The next question is on motion No. 18 in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander).

All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

• (2120)

And five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Accordingly the recorded division on motion No. 18 stands deferred.

The House will now proceed to the division on motion No. 17, standing in the name of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), which will also dispose of motion No. 6. All those in favour of motion No. 17 will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Accordingly the recorded division on motion No. 17, which will also dispose of motion No. 6, stands deferred.

It is not possible at this time to put motion No. 16 until a decision has been rendered on motion No. 17. If motion No. 17 is negatived, the question will be put on motion No. 16. If it is adopted, then motion No. 16 is automatically disposed of. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House will now proceed to the consideration of motions Nos. 20 and 21 appearing in the name of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) and the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). These two motions have been grouped for debate but are to be voted on separately. Does the House agree that they be grouped together for debate?

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, motion No. 20 seeks to do something entirely different from motion No. 21. Motion No. 20 seeks to delete clause 43; motion No. 21 seeks to delete part of clause 48. Those are two entirely different situations and I think they ought to be debated separately.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The point raised by the hon. member for Nickel Belt is well taken. Mr. Speaker indicated that the two motions could be debated separately but left the door open. If the hon. member prefers that they be debated separately, he has made a very good point and so the House will take them one by one.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) (for Mr. Leggatt) moved motion No. 20:

That Bill C-27, An Act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended by deleting Clause 43.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, when Bill C-27 was before committee we had an opportunity to examine one provision of the Unemployment Insurance Act which I have always had difficulty accepting. Clause 43 provides:

Section 47 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"47. (1) Where the Commission becomes aware of facts that in its opinion establish that a claimant or any person on his behalf has, in relation to a claim for benefit, made a statement or representation that he knew to be false or misleading or, being required under this Act or the regulations to furnish information, furnished any information or made any representation that he knew to be false or misleading, the Commission may impose a penalty on that claimant not greater than an amount equal to three times his weekly rate of benefit.

In other words the commission has now become judge and jury of its claimants who may or may not knowingly have given the commission false information. The commission will determine whether any claimant gave wrong or false information, and I suggest this is the type of provision we should be very careful about when we pass legislation. In other words the commission is substituting itself for the courts of this land; it will determine guilt or innocence and levy punishment by way of fine.

I am just a little school teacher from the backwoods of northern Ontario, but I had always thought that only the courts could levy fines following upon a judgment that had been made. This commission is now being given the power to substitute itself for the courts of the land to decide what is or is not deliberately false, in my opinion denying claimants the due process of law which every free Canadian has the right to expect. It seems to me that we have an opportunity here to eliminate this provision.

In committee I argued that if the commission has instances where it suspects, or it is alleged, that claimants have deliberately misled the commission and have collected benefits as a result thereof, it ought to take the necessary action by proceeding through the courts of the land. If a claimant feels that he should come clean and he admits that he has indeed misled the commission, then he may do so and repay whatever is owing to the commission. The commission would have the choice whether to take the claimant through the courts. That was the basic argument I made in committee.

I realize there are other acts of parliament that give certain bureaucrats in this country this kind of power; but I am very leery of this sort of thing because it seems to me that every time we do this we give up a bit of that due process of law for which many of us have stood and fought to maintain. In our amendment we try to eliminate this provision in the bill; and if we see this kind of provision in any other bill I am sure the members of this party will attempt to remove it.

The reply of the minister and his bureaucrats in the committee was that this gave them a little leeway. They said, "What do you want us to do, take every claimant who has deliberately misled the commission to court?" I could be very impressed with the concern that the bureaucrats in the Unemployment Insurance Commission have for poor people were it not for the fact that daily I see how these people are treated in UIC offices across the land. Very little concern is shown in regard to informing them of their rights.

There is an example of someone going into the unemployment insurance office and informing the officials there that she is going away. That person has been on claim and she goes into their office and says, "My sister in Winnipeg is in hospital. She has had a nervous breakdown. I am going to help take care of the kids." You have to notify the commission when you are not available for work. Well, she did that, and the person in the office said, "Go ahead and do that. That is fine." But that person failed to inform her that four weeks on nil pay means that the claim is at an end. The officer forgot to inform the claimant of this one fact. One would think the commission should be helpful to its claimants.

We on this side are very concerned. Everybody should not have to go through the courts. I will settle for a little sensitivity on the part of the commission in dealing with claimants. I see hon. members smiling, but they do not have this problem. They do not have to line up at the unemployment office.

I should like to return to my example of this woman. When she returned, she went into the unemployment insurance office and said, "I am looking for work again." They replied by saying, "You have had four weeks on nil pay. Good-bye." Claimants who come before commission employees should be informed of this fact.

I have had considerable experience in regard to the situation of the Journal workers. This is a saga which is worth telling—the whole question of the Journal workers' endeavours to get unemployment insurance. They were told offhandedly that their dispute was industrial and they had no right to claim.

The role of the UIC is to help a claimant process a claim, if there is one. As a matter of fact at one time the unemployment insurance office had a placard depicting someone in a maze. That placard was entitled: "Let us help through the maze". After five minutes with the UIC, a person realizes that they are the ones who need help to get through the maze. A claimant becomes more lost in the maze after going into one of their offices than he was before he went in there. A good example is the whole fiasco of the Journal workers trying to establish a claim. In that instance they went through the whole process to the board of referees. The exhibits which were presented in that hearing were mislaid. They got lost somewhere in the maze of the UIC. As I have said, I have had considerable experience with them.

There was a time when Mr. Cousineau, the former Commissioner of the UIC, spent more time in my office than he did at his own office. I am sure they have a foot thick file of letters from me. These letters indicate hundreds of cases where people were improperly dealt with, the decisions handed out indicated insensitivity and they also indicated a lack of humanity toward the claimants' concerns. In the committee I was told that this is what they were forced to do because we wanted all of the cases put through the courts.

Justice must be served, and the only place justice can be served is in the courts of the land. It cannot be served in the backrooms of the Unemployment Insurance Commission where somebody sits and decides if a claimant is willingly and knowingly misleading. These are the same people who say, "Look for obvious signs of pregnancy. Look at the woman's face." During the interview of a potential claimant, who is applying for maternity or pregnancy benefits, their officers are instructed to look for signs of pregnancy. One case which comes to mind is that of a young man who came to me—

An hon. Member: About pregnancy?

Mr. Rodriguez: No, he was not applying for pregnancy benefits. He had been down to the UIC office after being called in for an interview. He happened to have in his hand a Slazenger satchel, which is a little carrying bag. He was being interviewed, and the officer said, "Do you play sports?" He said, "Oh, yes. Usually after I finish looking for work in the afternoon when I am up town, I go to the YMCA and work out." They arrived at the decision that this man was obviously not available to work because he was prepared to go and play sports, and he was taken off unemployment benefits. This man was forced to come to a federal member of parliament. He had to go through the process of trying to get the decision revoked.

I have literally hundreds of incidents similar to that. One would assume that the situation is open, cut and dried. These are the same people who want the power and authority to decide if someone is deliberately misleading the UIC with their statements. They would not know a misleading statement if it came up and hit them in the face. Many of the statements they have deemed to be misleading arose from the imagination of the interviewing officers of the commission.

Mr. Young: Misleading, like your speech.

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Young) can make his own remarks, if that is what he wants to do. It is too bad he will not come out here and make his speech.

There was a time when I used to report 125 cases a month—names and social insurance numbers—to the former commissioner of the UIC, Mr. Cousineau. These were cases where decisions were based on suspicions about the behaviour of people. The commission is saying that parliament should give them the power to determine—be the judge and jury—whether information given to them was willingly and knowingly misleading. A person is entitled to an open hearing in a court to establish whether he has willingly misled or knowingly misled, or in fact gave information not knowing the information was incorrect. We have a court set-up in this country and there are also legal services available. We have legal aid in 99 per cent of the provinces of this country. Lawyers are there to assist persons who want justice in open courts.

I am leery, I am fearful of giving these bureaucrats power. We have seen the abuse of power by bureaucracies, and it is time we returned the decision-making regarding our people to the courts. The bureaucrats are not the people's masters, they are the servants of the people, and it is the courts which should decide whether or not a claimant has infracted the law and should suffer the penalties under the law. It should not be the decision of the bureaucrats, and least of all the bureaucrats of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Can you imagine the mess we will have when we put Manpower and UIC together? The idea of melding those two boggles the mind. That is why we in this party prefer to eliminate this clause from the bill.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on motion No. 20 stands deferred.

The House will now proceed to the consideration of Motion No. 21 in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez).

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved motion No. 21:

That Bill C-27, An Act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in Clause 48 by striking out line 42 at page 26 and substituting the following therefor:

"and to which he was entitled, regardless of any changes in the claimants eligibility status since that time, the Commis-"

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion is one that I feel is extremely important. The reason that my party has put in this amendment has reference to a particular issue which came to light in the last few months.

As the house will recall, we passed a bill—historical perspective is important—Bill C-69, last session. It became effective on January 1, 1976. At that time there was a provision in the bill that anyone aged 65 or over would no longer be able to pay premiums to the Unemployment Insurance Commission nor receive benefits. There were thousands of Canadians who had established their claims prior to the coming into force of that law, but lo and behold, when the law came into effect on January 1, 1976, the bureaucrats in UIC—I am glad I just dealt with this matter to some extent a few minutes ago—promptly sent out letters to those people aged 65 and over who had established their claims saying, "now that we have passed this bill, because you are aged 65 you cannot collect unemployment benefits", and they were cut off.

You must realize that we are dealing here with people 65 years old and over, and some could have been up to 69 because 70 was the previous cut off age. Many of them having received this formal letter from the UIC said to themselves that obviously they could not fight city hall. Many of them received this letter as the official word on their claim, but 400 of them appealed the decision. That decision went all the way through to the courts of the land, and the courts ruled that these people were entitled to unemployment insurance benefits and that the government could not pass retroactive legislation. There were thousands, about 17,000 of them, who were cut off claims. These people felt that they should get the same benefits on their claims.

The hooker in this was that when people received the letter and accepted the decision of UIC, they promptly applied for Canada Pension or Quebec Pension. However, in the Unemployment Insurance Act it says that you cannot collect both unemployment insurance and Canada Pension or Quebec Pension, so the commission said, "We cannot pay you people because you disentitled yourself by applying for Canada Pension or Quebec Pension".

Having had that experience, when we came to this clause in Bill C-27 the opportunity arose for members on this side of the House to build in a protection against such future exigencies. We came up with this amendment which says that if a person established a claim and was entitled to it, but later it was found by the commission that it had made a mistake on the claim, they had goofed in whatever decision they made and the benefits were denied, the commission would pay the claimant back whatever it owed him or her, irrespective of whether or not the claimant received the Canada Pension or the Quebec Pension.

We put in this amendment because we argue that if the commission goofed, then a claimant is entitled to the benefits and his status cannot be used to say to him, "We goofed, but your status has changed so we cannot pay you what you are entitled to because we made the mistake." On the other hand the commission has the power under a clause in Bill C-27, which we are trying to amend, to claim money from a person who owes the commission money. They can collect from that person for that goof. If it can work one way—and it does not matter what the status of the person might be by then they might be collecting old age pension—why can it not work the other way?

Under a clause in Bill C-27 the commission has the right to collect from a person irrespective of what that person's status might be, but on the other hand the claimant does not have the right to collect from the commission when the commission goofed on the claimant's claim if his status is changed. This eliminates him from collecting unemployment insurance benefits. I do not think that is fair. From my experience with the Unemployment Insurance Commission, it is never the commission that loses but always the claimant—heads they win and tails they win.

There never comes a point when as a result of a mistake by the bureaucracy the claimant is reimbursed. That is why we took this opportunity to try to amend the clause. When we introduced it in the committee, the bureaucrats threw up their hands and indicated that we were opening it up too widely. When it was broad on the commission's side I did not hear them saying that that was not fair to the claimants and that it was too broad for the commission. We put this in specifically to protect claimants whose claims are goofed up by the commission. They have a right to that money on which the commission makes mistakes. These claimants should be able to go back and collect retroactively, regardless of their present status.

This is a simple case of justice and of making the bureaucracy accountable for the mistakes it makes. If a series of mistakes is made in a region, there must be something wrong in the way the program is being administered in that region. It seems to me that this is a good way to hold the commission accountable for the act it is administering. It is no wonder we are getting an offhand approach to the administration of the act down at the bottom. If mistakes are made, it seems that only the claimant suffers. If a mistake is discovered, the commission does not have to worry. It is not marked down somewhere that it made a goof on, perhaps, sixteen cases and that the cost to the taxpayer was "X" dollars. We have to be fair. If the commission has the right to go back to a person in whose claim a mistake was discovered, then a claimant should have the same right to collect, irrespective of his status at that later time.

A claimant should have the right to collect from the commission if it is discovered that the commission goofed, even if that claimant's status has changed. That is the argument being used with regard to the Quebec Pension Plan and the Canada Pension Plan as a result of the law which came into effect on January 1, 1976. I do not see how any reasonable person can deny claimants that right.

I have been around here only a short period of time, but in this Chamber in situations such as this what is really lost is an opportunity to debate effectively. Once the bureaucracy sets up its legislation the minister seems to run on a track. He is not prepared to accept any of the suggestions which come from this side of the House, and we do not come close to reaching solutions to our problems. What we develop in this Chamber is just shrugged off in an offhand way. What we have is time consumption rather than a meaningful approach to legislation and trying to come up with solutions. This amendment has been brought before the House in the hope that the government might recognize that there is some legitimacy in some of the points we raise. I think it is important that if a mistake is made by the bureaucracy, claimants have the knowledge that there will be justice with respect to what is coming to them, irrespective of their status after the discovery of that mistake.

Surely the important thing is to discover goofs when they are made, and by doing that we are not opening things up too widely. The commission should want to correct errors. That should be one of the prime concerns of those responsible for administering the act. They should want to administer the act fairly and correctly. If mistakes are made—and they are going to be made; after all, there are over one million people who collect benefits at any one point during the year—it is very important that the people who are served by the commission are assured that if those mistakes are made they will be corrected, and they will receive the benefit which is due them.

To argue that we are opening things up too widely, as the bureaucrats do, gives me the impression that the bureaucrats wonder who I am to question them. They think they have the interests of claimants in their hearts, and they wonder who I am to question them. It is very important that bureaucrats realize that they are the servants of the people, not their masters, nor the masters of the political system. Deputy ministers go on and on. Ministers come and go. Top bureaucrats go on and on, and I think the government ought to take a very good look at that. The people of the country should know that those they have elected to govern are in control and that bureaucrats are not allowed to become our masters.

If I were a minister and someone proposed an amendment and I found a small point which needed correcting, I would want to find out how to correct it. If things are not broad enough, we must recognize that justice is not being served to those who, on the instructions of the commission, have changed their status. Surely a minister should not accept excuses from his bureaucrats. He should ask for ways to solve problems. He should ask for amendments, and he should talk to hon. members in an effort to solve problems raised by them. Perhaps that is a strange way of looking at it, but that is the only way the people can be assured that bureaucrats are not running things and that the people elected and who have political power are the ones responsible for the programs which are paid for by the people. That distinction should be driven home time and time again.

I have seen ministers come and go in the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. Bureaucrats war among themselves in an effort to have the most influence with ministers. They struggle to see whose ideas are going to get through to ministers. Ministers should be leery of that. They have to be in control of their departments. The minister is aware of this, and he knows the problems that were caused with respect to those who were cut off under Bill C-69 on January 1, 1976. He knows the problems, and he knows the people feel resentment. They believed the letter under the letterhead of the Department of Manpower and Immigration, with the signature, which told them that now they had reached age 65 they were no longer eligible for unemployment insurance benefits pursuant to Bill C-69.

They bamboozled the people with that stuff and, thinking it must be right, the people did not attempt to take on such a powerful organization as the government. Since they could not afford to live on what they were getting and could not collect unemployment insurance they registered for the Canada Pension. That meant that immediately, according to the rules, they became ineligible for unemployment insurance benefits. We discovered the mistake, but when we wanted to have it corrected we had a hard time convincing the minister and the bureaucracy. We got the run-around in this House; one story from the minister one day and another story the next day.

Unsigned letters were sent to me by the assistant deputy minister that contradicted everything. If that is the way decisions are made in the department, then God help us.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

I appeal to the minister to recognize at least the argument calling for justice for these people. That is the purpose of the motion. In many cases in this country people have appealed to the board of referees and have been turned down on a two to one decision. Not being familiar with the process they never appealed further. Later, a similar case may have been decided differently by umpires. So it is possible for an appeal to be denied, not because the applicant does not have the legal right to benefits but because of ignorance of the law and the way the Unemployment Insurance Commission is administered.

There is a lot of merit in this particular amendment, Mr. Speaker, and I have tried to make members aware of it. The minister should recognize the problem and that it can be solved along the lines I have outlined in order to make things fair for everybody.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I just want to supplement what my colleague was saying but I will not belabour the point because I know the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) wants to speak on his motion.

I want to say something on behalf of people who come before the Unemployment Insurance Commission and have to deal with complicated regulations and with bureaucrats. As a member of parliament I have come across a number of people who have been treated badly either because of regulations affecting them when they have reached 65 years of age, or because they may not have understood the regulations and were penalized by arbitrary decisions on the part of the bureaucracy. Can we not define these things in the bill in a way which will make more human the workings of the Unemployment Insurance Act? Surely the minister could engage in ongoing discussions with his deputy who, in turn, could consult other officials down the line, and emphasize that they are civil servants who are there to help the public.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on motion No. 21, in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Accordingly, the recorded division on this motion stands deferred.

The House will now consider motions No. 23 and 24. It has been suggested that they should be grouped for purposes of debate only but voted on separately. I will put motion No. 23, and thus will bring motion No. 24 before the House as well.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville) moved motion No. 23:

That Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in Clause 50 by striking out line 17 at page 27 and substituting the following therefor:

"the House of Commons, fix the rates of".

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton) (for Mr. Alexander) moved motion No. 24:

That Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in Clause 50 by striking out lines 17 to 24 at page 27 and substituting the following therefor:

"The Governor in Council and on notice to the House of Commons by way of ministerial statement within five days of such approval, fix the rates of premium that persons employed in insurable employment and the employers of such persons will be required to pay in that year to raise an amount equal to the adjusted basic cost of benefit under this Act in that year as that cost is determined under section 63."

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, motion No. 23 is relatively straightforward. Since it concerns the principle of political accountability I hope all members will support it. It seeks to amend Clause 50, which has to do with premiums employers and employees pay into the unemployment insurance fund.

Clause 50 says that in respect of each year, "the Commission shall, subject to approval by the Governor in Council, fix the rates of premium . . ." My motion would remove the reference to the Governor in Council and in its place put "the House of Commons." The amendment would make us all more accountable politically for what happens to the unemployment insurance fund. Changes in premiums would need to be approved in this House where members can question the minister and either approve or not approve recommendations he makes on behalf of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. In that way we should make democracy work in the real sense of the word. All too often our public servants make important decisions—in saying this I do not mean to criticize public servants. They act first, and the government follows, and by the time it knows what is happening—and I point to the example of the former Solicitor General and his position with respect to the break-in in Montreal—

Mr. Rodriguez: A cover-up.

Mr. Nystrom: —it is too late. All too often the ministers come into the picture after the bureaucracy has made the important decisions. Accepting my motion would ensure that the House of Commons would consider all premium changes. In the past the commission has imposed higher premiums on employers and employees all too often without the approval of the Governor in Council. My motion would change these conditions and provide for political responsibility, and thus make democracy work better. After all, unemployment insurance premiums are another form of tax on the working people of this country, a tax which in total amounts to several billion dollars a year. Therefore we are not talking about small amounts of money; we are talking about billions of dollars. In many ways this is a tax bill. When we have a tax bill we, as members of parliament, should have some input.

I hope that members on all sides will realize that this is a totally non-political amendment and will support it. I see the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) is laughing in a very positive way this time. He is not being negative now. He is about to leap to his feet and utter some words of support for this highly rational and sensible motion that we are moving. I am sure that the members of the Conservative party will do the same because they profess to be great democrats.

I anticipate that we will have no problem getting this motion through the House and that we will have the co-operation of everyone concerned, including the House leader of the Conservative party.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to what the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) spoke about in connection with his amendment. While all of us in this House agree with the principle of accountability, we have to bear in mind the question of flexibility and the ability of the government to move on these things.

I do not want to plead the government's case, but motion No. 23, allowing the House of Commons to fix the rates does cause some danger in terms of flexibility. This is what concerns me about it.

The House of Commons traditionally rises at the end of June, the first of July or thereabouts. At least we always hope that will happen. It usually stays out for a long time, until the fall, when there might be some necessity for a change to be made. There is also the matter of the period of an election which could be called to add additional time to the time in which the government legitimately might wish to make changes. I would be very much concerned if it would make changes only for the sake of change during election time. I cannot believe any government, even this government, would do that.

I listened very carefully to the hon. member. He suggested this could perhaps be done by way of resolution. He said that would offer an opportunity to question. I do not think that would happen. There would be a resolution all right, but certainly not the questions about which he was talking. It is not a debate on a bill which, if we followed this suggestion, would eventually lead us to a motion on second reading and go to a committee where questioning could take place. Nor is it a statement upon motions in this House where questioning could occur. If it is the desire of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville to have questioning and examine as such, I say that the foundation for the approach by way of resolution that he proposes would cut out from under his suggestion.

This brings me to the second matter I would like to speak to, namely, motion No. 24 standing in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). That motion recognizes the responsibility of the government to fix the rates and thereby take the plaudits as well as the aspect of political accountability. It states that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration must make a statement in the House of Commons within five days of such approval. In fact it gives exactly what the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville wants, namely, the opportunity to question. It even goes a little further in that respect than does the motion put forward by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville.

The other thing it does is this: it advances an argument which is inherent in the parliamentary system, namely, that the government of the day is responsible to the House of Commons. I suppose it would be best if we all agreed that the bill be amended each time, but that course could prove difficult, not only for the government but for the people who would benefit, because of the time involved. The hon. member for Hamilton West has hit on a middle ground. It has the advantage of flexibility but none of the difficulties the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville wishes to avoid, that is, the complete inability of members of the House of Commons to ask questions on the matter.

I hope the minister will take a close look at the proposal advanced by my hon. friend, one which gives the government the responsibility of fixing the premium rates to be paid by persons in insurable employment and by employers in any particular year, bearing in mind that this approach also allows members of parliament to question the government with respect to the subject and, in that way, provides some form of accountability to parliament.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I think the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has spelled out the problem we would have with motion No. 23 in the light of its inflexibility. I would think it would be inappropriate to ask the House to deal with such a highly technical issue, one which is spelled out in considerable detail in sections 62 and 63 of the act. Moreover, because of the very tight timing in making the necessary cost estimates in September and October for the following year, there could be serious problems in meeting deadlines for notification of Revenue Canada with respect to the issuance of the necessary deduction tables for employers. The commission was established to deal with these questions, and given the necessary powers. In any event, since estimates for the commission will be reviewed by parliament and the parliamentary committee, there will be ample opportunity for parliamentary scrutiny.

The motion by the official opposition would simply require the minister to notify the House of the fixing of premium rates within five days of approval by the governor in council. I might note that this provision would be unworkable if the House were not in session. A preferable approach would be to inform parliament of the approval of the premium rates as soon as possible after a decision had been taken. I think this would better meet the requirement which the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) has in mind.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, for a while, when the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) was speaking, I thought he was confused about the matter before us because he seemed to be talking about fixing rates of benefits. But then something got through to him and he realized that it is the premium rate which is under discussion in this section. As the minister just indicated, the premium rate for the ensuing calendar year is fixed two or three months before that. So it seems to me that it is not the kind of thing which has to be determined overnight; there is some time in which to give consideration to the matter.

I thought the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton had also failed to read the motion put forward by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom). The motion does not suggest that the power to fix the premium rate be taken away from the commission and given to the House of Commons. The wording is such that it would still be the commission that would fix the rate. The only difference is that instead of the rate as determined by the commission being subject to the approval of the governor in council, it would be subject to the approval of the House of Commons.

On the point as to which of these two methods, that proposed by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville or that proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton West, is the better, it strikes me that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton would be the leader of the pack in complaining about the method proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton West. Under that proposal all we would have would be a requirement that the minister stand up within five days after the making of the decision by the commission and make a statement on motions, to which there could be responses, following which there could be questions to the minister, and that would be it. I can just see my good friend from Grenville-Carleton saying that this is parliament at its worst, that we can say things and ask questions, but that we have no power or authority over the minister or the commission.

If we are to bring the matter before the House of Commons, then it should be within the authority of the House of Commons to say yes or no. The motion of my hon. friend does not give the House of Commons at that point the right to change the rate and to make it something else; but it would have the right to say yes or no. Therefore it strikes me that if we are to bring the matter before the House of Commons at all—and I think it is a good idea—the proposal in motion No. 23 is preferable to the proposal in motion No. 24.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few brief comments on this amendment. I spoke at some length about what I feel is happening here. Even the answers which the minister read off tonight were composed by the bureaucracy. He just went through the motions and read them.

I mentioned in my previous comments the question of accountability. There is a great deal of talk about the importance of parliament and about parliament being supreme. Parliament is elected by the people of the country and parliament ought to decide those things which are of absolute importance to the people. Sad to say, that is nothing but a charade around here.

When I came here in 1972 I recall that my colleagues to my right, and I, suspected there was a shortfall in the unemployment insurance fund of $800 million. We waited two or three years before getting the Unemployment Insurance Commission officials before a standing committee of the House. We kept asking questions in the question period of the then minister of manpower and immigration, the present President of Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), and I remember the great difficulty we had to pin him down about the way the Unemployment Insurance Commission was administered. There are professional hockey players in the UIC, when you consider the manner in which they stickhandled around parliament and avoided any kind of examination.

An hon. Member: Guy Lafleur.

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, the Guy Lafleurs of Ottawa. They avoided any kind of scrutiny. I do not know what they were hiding. It was only in 1974 that we finally got the UIC before a standing committee of this House. By that time the thing had become cold potatoes and was no longer of any interest in terms of getting to the bottom of what happened to that $800 million shortfall.

The purpose of our amendment is to have the House of Commons fix the rate of premiums to be paid by employers and employees who participate in the unemployment insurance fund. That is a very important principle in terms of accountability. Members of this House would then have an opportunity to question the minister and to question the commission with respect to its operations. It is very important that hon. members have an opportunity to take a look at this monolithic outfit. Every time we opt out of our responsibility with respect to these bureaucracies, such as the UIC, we are doing a disservice to the people of this country because, once the unemployment rate goes above 5.5 per cent nationally, the taxpayers of the country pick up the extended portion of the Unemployment Insurance Commission fund. The expectation is that the UIC fund will cost us $3.8 billion in 1977. "Them is not potatoes". Next year the projection is a $4 billion unemployment insurance fund. One must imagine that type of expenditure without some kind of deliberate—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. The hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme).

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could have the permission of the House to ask the hon. member a very short question. I realize we will be adjourning in a few moments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We have reached the hour of adjournment. The question can only be asked with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Prud'homme: Since it is 10.30 p.m. and we are going to adjourn, may I ask the hon. member to join with me in wishing French Canadians a happy feast day?

[Translation]

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, best wishes to all my French Canadian friends.

[English]

Mr. Prud'homme: All across Canada.

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, all across Canada. I should point out that 41 per cent of my constituents are French-speaking. I wish them a fine holiday tomorrow. I will be celebrating with them in Nickel Belt.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 10.30 o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair. This House will resume on Monday, June 27, 1977, at eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(3) and the order made May 30, 1977.

At 10.30 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Special Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, June 27, 1977

The House met at 11 a.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION REORGANIZATION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION, ETC.

The House resumed, from Thursday, June 23, consideration of Bill C-27, to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration; and motion No. 23 (Mr. Knowles, Winnipeg North Centre) and motion No. 24 (Mr. Alexander).

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday we discussed motion No. 23, which calls for the House of Commons to fix unemployment insurance premiums. We think, since the House of Commons is the supreme body in the land, it should have authority to fix premium rates and to review those rates, for such a review would give the House the opportunity to review the commission's administration of the act.

We pointed out on Thursday how concerned we are about the perceptible and deliberate shift of control from the hands of elected members to the hands of bureaucrats. Increasingly, our bureaucrats are taking over the decision-making function. This bill would lump responsibility for immigration, manpower and UIC under one deputy minister who would be responsible to the minister. Surely that prospect ought to send shivers up our spines. Yet, lo and behold, in the bill as written we are to allow the commission to set its own rates and effectively to avoid the control of the House of Commons. I was first elected to this House in 1972, but only three years later were we able to bring the Unemployment Insurance Commission before the standing committee of this House to explain the shortfall of between $800 million and $900 million in the unemployment insurance fund.

It is said that the estimates give us the opportunity to question. I point out that by May 31 all estimates are reported back to the House. Even those not passed by the committee are deemed to have been passed and are reported back. Therefore, no matter what members of parliament think about the estimates, come May 31 the estimates leave the committee and are reported to the House. That is why this amendment is important, for it would vest the control of unemployment insurance premiums in the House of Commons.

I said on Thursday evening that members on my side of the House are increasingly concerned about the power of this country's bureaucracy. It seems that the minister is no longer responsible for the policy direction of his department. The previous minister told us about a year and a half ago that the whole question of the minor attachment period was a red herring thrown across our path, that there was no evidence of abuse, nor evidence to show it was a disincentive to work. Now, 1½ years later, the newly appointed minister says, "The minor attachment is a disincentive to work. We have the evidence." What has brought about this change in position in 1½ years? Clearly, the reason must be advice of bureaucrats. It seems that a war is going on within the bosom of the minister's department, one group of bureaucrats pushing one course and one set of policies, another pushing another set of policies.

Clearly, one group was in the ascendancy 1½ years ago and had the minister's ear; now the other group is in the ascendancy. Unless we can reverse the trend, the minister will lose control of his department. As it is, our ministers do what the bureaucrats tell them. When we were in committee we noticed how the $62,000 a year men and the $50,000 a year people were annoyed when we asked them how they administered the department. They resented specific questions on details of the unemployment insurance program.

It seems, therefore, that the minister is losing control of his department and it is time to vest control of the program in parliament where it belongs. Mr. Speaker, far too many of these issues are taken from the hands of elected representatives; and then we are told parliament is downgraded. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) earlier today at a press conference outside the House announced a new program for home insulation. Notice, he did not announce it in the House of Commons where elected members could have dealt with the matter. That minister and others accuse opposition members of not dealing with matters important to the nation. How can they say that, when the government opposite does not allow parliament to debate and deal with these serious questions?

Our amendment would return to the House of Commons control over the setting of premiums. Many have said that unemployment insurance is not insurance, per se. We agree.

You can look at the program as term insurance for a group, each member of which is insured against the unfortunate loss of his job. We also say that because of the nature of our country such an insurance program must be universal. Those who participate in it should pay premiums, the amount of which is set by the House of Commons. When the minister says that the program will cost us $3.8 billion this year and $4 billion next year, the people working and contributing to the fund are entitled to know, when they see large pay-outs being made from the fund, that people are not cheating.

A person should not say, "I see so-and-so is collecting unemployment insurance. He should not be collecting it." On the other hand, the unemployed should not be made scapegoats for the shortcomings of the program. Therefore, premium rates must be protected. Parliament is responsible for ensuring that premiums are set at levels which will not whip, so to speak, the unemployed. A person may have always worked and paid $2, $3 or $4 a week in premiums. There are those who have a low attachment experience with the work force. This is usually the young and the female sector of the work force, those whom the minister called women and kids. Those who work regularly become the whipping-boy for those who take advantage of the program only to be able to collect unemployment insurance.

The minister is responding by tightening up on unemployment insurance. This party does not approve of people stealing from the unemployment insurance fund. We have an act which provides for benefit control. We ask the government to carry out this benefit control in a fair and judicious manner, not in the manner which has been followed in the past. The computer can select groups. They can run benefit control on these groups in a wise and judicious fashion, not in the present manner. The minister and his bureaucrats have stated that there is an unwritten law for setting quotas with regard to how many a benefit control officer will eliminate from the unemployment insurance rolls. It becomes a kind of game.

The government reacts to the right-wing movement of the country which says the program must be tightened up. It states that $135 million will be saved by tightening up the program in this fashion. We have said that with one million unemployed in Canada, this is not the time to start fooling around with the minimum attachment period and the length of benefit. The Economic Council of Canada have stated that with our present high unemployment this is not the time to start fiddling around with the minor attachment period and the length of the benefit period. We have urged this upon the government. However, the minister has proceeded with this bill.

This place is no longer a debating forum. No longer is the minister touched by any debate or argument. The bureaucrats have sold him this bill of goods, and his mind is set like concrete: it has completely hardened. Rather than this place being a forum for debate, it is strictly a matter of time. That is what we have come down to, a matter of time. We on this side certainly do not approve of this type of move where the minister looks at the amendments and accommodates by accepting those which obviously have some benefit.

With regard to this amendment, parliament ought to set the premium for benefits to be paid. The argument that we have to move quickly on premiums does not hold water. The premiums are not set today for tomorrow. They will not be set tomorrow for the day after. Surely, the Unemployment Insurance Commmission have made projections with regard to the number of unemployed one can expect in the future. There are bodies within Canada, such as Statistics Canada, which have made projections with regard to the number of people who will be unemployed next year. These have been broken down into age groups. The OECD countries have broken down the projected unemployed into age groups and sex groups. Using those projections, surely they can project the cost of the unemployment insurance fund. Having projected that cost, they can then assign the premium rates for participating in the unemployment insurance program. That is the crux of the matter. The minister would have us believe he might accept this amendment—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I find it difficult to understand why the government is unwilling to accept this amendment. It sets forth a very basic principle of responsible government. The legislation which the government is proposing allows the Unemployment Insurance Commission, with the approval of cabinet, to set the rates which workers in this country will have to pay under the unemployment insurance plan. My colleagues, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), urge that this matter ought first to be submitted to the House of Commons.

We already require the consent of the House to impose very minor tax changes upon the people of Canada. Here is a power which we are giving to the Unemployment Insurance Commission and to the cabinet to levy what could amount to millions of dollars upon several million Canadian workers. The old principle is that taxation without representation is tyranny. The right of cabinet, on the recommendation of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, to raise the rates which workers in this country will pay under the unemployment insurance plan is something which ought to be referred to parliament.

This parliament, and this parliament alone, should have the power to levy what is virtually a tax on the workers of this country. The House of Commons should have the opportunity to review the operations of the act to see whether those increases are necessary and are in keeping with the benefits which are provided. However, under the government's proposed legislation no such opportunity will be provided. This is a negation of everything we have come to believe is part of the democratic process and the principle of responsible government. I cannot understand why the government is balking at accepting this amendment. We ought to have some explanation from them as to why they think, in levying a tax upon several million workers in this country, the House of Commons should be bypassed and the power placed entirely in the hands of the governor in council.

I recall the days when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) headed a government in this country. The Liberals were on this side of the House. They were constantly crying out that the Diefenbaker government was exercising arbitrary and dictatorial powers. I would like to know what they consider these powers to be, namely, the powers to levy taxation without reference to the elected members of parliament. We are entitled to something better than stony silence from the government, particularly the minister, as to why they are not prepared to refer back to parliament any changes in the rates which are charged the workers of this country under the unemployment insurance plan, so that the members of this House may know in detail what the rates are, why they are being increased, and whether they are being increased equitably across the work force of this country.

Surely, these are basic rights. I know the government has become very arrogant of late. Its attitude is very different from that taken when it found itself in a minority position and when the poll returns were somewhat discouraging. But its present arbitrary attitude is not justified. The government owes the House some explanation, and if it cannot supply one then the people should be appalled that hon. members opposite are taking this dictatorial attitude, assuming the right to impose levies on the workers, to take money out of their pay cheques in the absence of approval by the representatives of the members of this House.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to express the concern of my party about what is happening under this amendment as it applies to the setting of premiums for payment by both employers and employees. I listened to hon. members on my left, and I can only say I am in some doubt as to whether parliament has the competence to do what they want done. I was here last Thursday until 10.15 p.m. However, I believe the House went on until 10.30 p.m., so I missed a small part of the debate. Nevertheless, I read the argument put forward by my hon. friend from Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) who expressed concern about the difficulty which might arise if the House of Commons were to attempt to set the premium. In fact, I do not know exactly what is meant by that phrase, "the House of Commons fixing a premium". Do hon. members to my left suggest the House should become involved in the mechanics of sections 62 and 63, extremely complicated sections having to do with the fixing of these rates? With all due respect, I do not know whether we have the competence to do so.

Nevertheless, I can well understand the point the hon. member has just made. It is, in effect, taxation without representation. As I have indicated, it might be doing a disservice to the Commons to involve it in an attempt to determine a formula, and so on. But perhaps what they are having in mind, really, is to let the government bring in a figure, subject to approval by this House. Is that what they are suggesting?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he realize that what he has just said is the case, rather than what he said earlier? Will he look at both our amendment and his own, and realize that in both cases it is the commission which sets the rates? The difference between us is this: we ask that what the commission has done should be subject to the approval of the House of Commons. The hon. member's amendment asks that what the commission does should be the subject of a statement in the House. In neither amendment is it proposed that the House of Commons should do the technical work of fixing the rates.

Mr. Alexander: Let me read through the NDP motion. I was under the impression that it read, "the House of Commons, fix the rates".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is just one line.

Mr. Alexander: Don't get all shook up and say, "It is just one line". I think what the hon. member is talking about is approval given by the House after the governor in council has fixed the rates.

An hon. Member: The same as ours.

Mr. Alexander: All right. Don't get carried away. I am trying to understand the NDP motion and determine whether or not it is practicable. It seems the motion put forward by members to my left is similar to ours, except they want the approval given by the House of Commons before the rates come into effect.

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Alexander: Let us review the history. First, it was the commission who set the rates, and no one had anything to say about them whatsoever. The minister then proposed that there should be some accountability. So the commission will set the rates and the governor in council will approve them. There is that further step included. In effect, it means that ministers on the front benches of the government side will have to approve the rates. After approval, the minister would come into the House and make a statement, whereupon the spokesmen for the opposition parties would have an opportunity to make statements in response, and to ask questions.

Mr. Speaker, we have found in the last two or three years that ministers are disinclined to make statements in the House. They would much prefer to go before television cameras or talk to newsmen outside. What I was seeking in my amendment was at least to ensure that changes in premium rates, or the stabilization of those rates, should be the subject of a ministerial statement in this chamber. We would then, at least, have an opportunity to talk about the subject and to criticize the minister if necessary. In short, we would become a part of the procedure. As things stand now, if the minister does not accept either of these amendments, it would be the same old chestnut: it would be a case, as the hon. member has said, of taxation without representation. We shall have nothing to say on the matter whatsoever.

I feel a little embarrassed because of what the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has said on the subject. He placed before the House an excellent argument for not moving in this regard in terms of accepting the NDP motion. But I think, on reflection, I shall have to wait until I can consult with him about what we in the official opposition are going to do, because I would like to be on the side which is pressing for something more from the minister, whether it is approval of the rates or an opportunity of hearing the minister tell us what the rates are so that we can at least respond and ask questions.

As it stands, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has indicated he would be opposed to it. I want an opportunity to discuss this matter with him, because I would not want to embarrass him. As hon. members will understand, I will discuss this matter with him, and whether we vote with the New Democratic Party will depend on our discussion on the other motions. I still intend to move my motion. If we do not get the NDP motion, then I want an opportunity to state that at least we tried in both instances: the first one by way of approval and the second one by way of a ministerial statement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

[Mr. Alexander.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The motion now before the House is No. 24 standing in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

It is my understanding that motions Nos. 25, 26 and 31 are to be debated separately and voted on.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville) moved:

Motion No. 25.

June 17, 1977—That Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 54 by striking out lines 40 and 41 at page 28 and substituting the following therefor:

"shall cease to hold office on attaining the age of sixty".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, motion No. 25 before the House today is not very important to most members of the House. The effect of the motion is to change the age of people who are chairmen of boards of referees appointed by the governor in council for a three-year period. The change proposed is to 65 years of age instead of the present 75 years of age.

I am not against older people providing a very valuable function in the public life of Canada. I move the motion only because of consistency with previous government legislation—the Unemployment Insurance Act itself. The age of retirement from the Public Service of Canada is 65, and it would be consistent if we had the chairmen of the boards of referees retiring at age 65. That would be consistent, also, with legislation affecting the Public Service of Canada. The chairmen are not public servants, per se; but they are still part of the general public service and have the same public input into our country.

The age of entitlement for UIC runs out at age 65; once you are over the age of 65, you can no longer draw unemployment insurance benefits. Therefore, with respect to consistency, once again, the chairmen of the boards who are going to be judging those people applying for UIC should probably be the same age as those who are applying, namely, age 65. If the mandatory retirement age for chairmen of the boards of referees in our legislation is 75, which is recommended in Bill C-27, the only thing that is consistent with is the age of senators. Senators must retire at the age of 75. Anything that is consistent with the Senate is not consistent with party policies for which I stand. Because of matters of consistency and matters of logic, the age of retirement for chairmen of the board should be 65 rather than 75.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have a few points which I should like to make with respect to this amendment which we have put forward. This gives us an opportunity to make some points. It is my experience, and the facts have borne this out, that the chairmanship of boards of referees has become a political appointment by this government. It has become part of the whole operation of appointing chairmen of boards of referees on the basis of names probably submitted by Liberal riding associations across the country. It has become part of the whole patronage system, in the same way as senators are appointed on the basis of their contribution to political parties. There is a system set up whereby the Canadian Chamber of Commerce recommends names to represent employers on the board, and the Canadian Labour Congress recommends names to sit as employees' representatives.

Does the government put out an advertisement showing that they have 18 vacancies in chairmanships of the boards this year, and that anyone can apply? Do they send around letters to members of parliament, of any political stripe, saying that there are "X" number of positions available? Do they ask for possible names to be submitted with attached curriculae vitae? No, that is not done. It is said that any member of parliament can send in a name. It is difficult to do that when one is unaware of vacancies. As long as this is done, it becomes a parliamentary pork-barrel. We know about the former minister of state for urban affairs sending letters to Liberal lawyers asking who could be representatives of CMHC to negotiate with prospective purchasers of homes. That is one of the things which makes the people of this country very cynical about the manner in which the government operates.

We have taken the opportunity to move this amendment in order to get the whole question raised and considered in this House of Commons. With regard to Bill C-69, the minister brought in age 70 as being the limit for persons to make contributions to the unemployment insurance fund, or to collect. A year ago the government brought in an amendment which provided that at age 65 no one really is a supporter of a family, no one really has dependent children, no one really has to work at that age, and therefore there is no point in having them contribute to the unemployment insurance fund. Our party opposed that amendment. We said we knew there was at least one Canadian in his early sixties who had three dependent children. In our constituencies there are many men and women who are still supporting children, and those children are either in the late years of elementary school or are in high school. Many of the parents of those children have to work, and some of them have no skills. We argued against any change in the Unemployment Insurance Act which would cut off Canadians at age 65 from either contributing or collecting.

This government is not consistent. Perhaps it follows the principle that consistency is the hobgoblin of small minds and has, therefore, not maintained consistency with respect to the whole question of the pork-barrel clause. Pork-barrelling is the hallmark of this government. We have challenged the government to be consistent with its own act. What we want for the workers of Canada who come under the Unemployment Insurance Act, the government should also want for those it appoints to those nice, cushy jobs which pay perhaps $150 per day. That is a nice little sinecure for a Liberal hack, but it certainly does not give people who appear before boards any assurance that the chairmen of those boards of referees are really there to try to find a solution to their problems.

I have had much to do with boards of referees. I know other hon. members have, as well. I am amazed when I think of some of the individuals who have been appointed chairmen of these boards. I have made written complaints to the commissioner. My correspondence has been legion with respect to the manner in which chairmen have dominated boards and have not carried out the decision-making duties that they should. We are not saying that people who are beyond 65 are not capable of working, because we have always held differently. But we are saying that the government ought to be consistent. These chairmen ought to be consistent in their administration of the act. After all, the chairmen will also be making decisions with regard to people who are not eligible contributors or collectors.

That is basically why we proposed this amendment. We proposed it to draw to the attention of the government its inconsistency with respect to this point and to deride, once again, the pork-barrelling which goes on within this government, specifically with regard to chairmen of boards of referees. If the government wants to be fair and square and above board, it ought to place advertisements in local newspapers and send letters to members of parliament asking for nominees. That seems to me to be the only fair way to appoint chairmen of boards of referees.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I have just one comment to make. The hon. member indicated that this amendment is inconsistent. In fact—I indicated this in the committee—it would be consistent with the mandatory retirement age of persons holding judicial and quasi-judicial appointments. Given the fact that these people are holding quasi-judicial positions, it seems appropriate that the retirement age should remain at 75.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion No. 25 (Mr. Nystrom) negatived.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved:

Motion No. 26.

That Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended by deleting clause 55 at page 29 and substituting the following therefor:

"55. Section 92 of the said act is amended by adding thereto, immediately after subsection (1) thereof, the following subsections:

"(1.1) Subject to subsection (1.3), any judge of a superior, county or district court in Canada and any person who has held office as a judge of a superior, county or district court in Canada may, at the request of the chief umpire made with the approval of the governor in council, act as an umpire, and while so acting has all the powers of an umpire.

(1.2) No request may be made under subsection (1.1) to a judge of a provincial court without the consent of the chief justice or chief judge of the court of which he is a member, or of the attorney general of the province.

(1.3) The governor in council may approve the making of requests pursuant to subsection (1.1) in general terms or for particular periods or purposes, and may limit the number of persons who may act under this section.

(1.4) A person who acts as an umpire pursuant to subsection (1.1) shall be paid a salary for the period he acts at the rate fixed by the Judges Act, for a judge of the Federal Court of Canada, other than the Chief Justice or the Associate Chief Justice of that court, less any amount otherwise payable to him under that act in respect of that period, and shall also be paid the travelling allowances that a judge is entitled to be paid under the Judges Act." "

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion I am proposing to amend clause 55 of Bill C-27 is for the purpose of permitting judges of superior, county or district courts to act as umpires. Clause 55 as presently worded in the bill would authorize the use of deputy judges of the Federal Court of Canada as umpires for the purposes of the Unemployment Insurance Act. The chief justice of the Federal Court has recommended that this provision be reworded to provide that the chief umpire may have any judge of a superior, county or district court act as umpire without requiring him to be appointed as a deputy judge of the Federal Court. The provisions of this motion—also at the request of the chief justice—set out the conditions under which such judges could act as umpires, and the salary rates to be applicable to them. The wording proposed is analogous to that contained in section 10 of the Federal Court Act.

Motion No. 26 (Mr. Cullen) agreed to.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. At this time I would like the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion.

Mr. Cullen: What about motion No. 31?

Mr. Alexander: The minister wants to proceed to motion No. 31, and I will bow to his request. I do, however, want to bring in a proposed motion, No. 27. A similar motion was proposed by the minister but it was found to be beyond the scope of the bill and therefore was disallowed. However, it is my understanding that unanimous consent is required—I believe it would be forthcoming from both sides of the House—to move a motion similar to that which was moved by the minister. I will pursue that matter after we deal with motion No. 31.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved:

Motion No. 31.

That Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 69 by striking out lines 30 and 31 at page 34 and substituting the following therefor:

"31st day of March, 1978, based on estimates 1977-78, or for any previous fiscal year".

He said: Mr. Speaker, by way of explanation, the motion I am proposing would amend clause 69 of Bill C-27 for the purpose of updating the references to fiscal years contained in this clause. Clause 69 provides that the funds voted in fiscal year 1976-77 and previous fiscal years for existing organizations reporting to the minister may be applied to the new integrated department. In view of the lapse of time which has occurred since the drafting of the bill, this clause must be updated to refer to fiscal year 1977-78 rather than 1976-77.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, obviously this clause reflects the 1976-77 estimates and the minister has to bring in the amendment to update them. Hon. members know full well that Bill C-27 was based on studies reported in a document called "A Comprehensive Review of the Unemployment Insurance Program in Canada". This document was obviously available to the department and to the minister back in 1976 because it was on its basis that Bill C-27 was drawn up. The minister admitted that he had to change the figure because the bill had been drawn up some time ago.

I think it reprehensible that this review was not made available to members until February of this year. The minister stated that the review was supposed to be the Valhalla for all the changes in Bill C-27, but now he has sprung Bill C-27 on us and admits it was drawn up some time ago. One must remember that these changes were alluded to in the 1976 budget, yet we did not receive the bill until 1977. Now we are told the bill must be passed in haste so that parliament can have its recess, and extra sittings have been arranged so we can get it through in time. Here is a bill that has been sitting in the government's store place, wherever it might be. Perhaps they keep it in the same place as the chipmunks store their nuts. Now the minister comes forward and amends it because it is a year old. I do not think that is treating parliament with dignity and respect. This review was done in 1973 and 1974, and it was based on the situation at that time seen from the viewpoint of Canada Manpower Centres and the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

I think it is treating the House with disrespect for the minister to bring in a bill that is a year old and has had to be amended so as to bring the estimates in line with the situation this year.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand that the House will adjourn at 12:15 in order to take part in Canada Week celebrations. However, I think we can dispose very quickly of the matter which I wish to bring to the attention of the House. Motion No. 27 on the order paper was introduced earlier by the minister, but because of a procedural difficulty in that it went somewhat beyond the scope of the bill, Mr. Speaker did not allow it. However, as I understand it, the House can accept a motion if there is all-party agreement. This is what I am now seeking in moving the following motion:

That Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended by adding immediately after line 2 at page 31, the following new clause:

"60.1 Section 114 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"114. Information, written or oral, obtained by the commission of the Department of Employment and Immigration from any person under this act or any regulation thereunder shall be made available only to the employees of the commission or the said Department in the course of their employment and such other persons as the minister deems advisable, and neither the commission, the said department, nor any of their employees is compellable to answer any question concerning such information, or to produce any records or other documents containing such information as evidence in any proceedings not directly concerned with the enforcement or interpretation of this Act or the regulations."

The essential words in the section which I am seeking to amend are "such other persons as the commission deems advisable". In other words, confidential information would not only be restricted to the employees of the commission, but they could give it to any Tom, Dick or Harry who came knocking on their door. The minister understands it is wrong, I understand it is wrong, and I am sure hon. members to my left understand that such a procedure is not only wrong but is totally unacceptable. So the minister, in his wisdom—which sometimes comes forth very rapidly—moved an amendment, which I am moving now, whereby information obtained by the commission shall be made available to employees of the minister or persons whom the minister deems advisable. We now have some ministerial responsibility and I am sure hon. members will find no fault with that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) seeks the consent of the House to move the motion which he has just read. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Alexander) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): As this is the last motion before the House, perhaps we might vote on motions on today's order paper.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, there have been the usual discussions with respect to deferred votes on motions under Bill C-27, and I think there is a disposition to defer voting on all the items until at least this evening. I understand the precise time will be specified later in the day.

Mr. Paproski: It is so agreed, Mr. Speaker.

• (1210)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we agree; but this is the first time I have heard it suggested that these votes would not come until 9.45 p.m., as indicated by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane). There are 10 or 12 votes, and I think they should take place at an earlier hour than 9.45.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, at this stage the time has not been specified. It would be fixed in the normal course of negotiations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Agreed, and so ordered.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): One o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being one o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m. later this day.

At 12.13 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

THE LATE ANDRÉ FORTIN

TRIBUTES TO DECEASED MEMBER

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all members, like myself, were shocked and saddened last Friday on learning of the death of our late friend and colleague, the leader of the Social Credit Party. The tragic nature of his accident en route to his home after visiting western Canada only emphasizes the dedication he brought to his political role not only in this House but in the country.

I, personally, had the privilege of working closely with Mr. Fortin during the years when he served his party as House leader. As most members appreciate, it often takes time to adjust comfortably to the procedural functioning of this chamber. As one of the new and most youthful members of the House of Commons in 1968, Mr. Fortin was assigned a challenging role which he mastered quickly with skill and enthusiasm. That same spirit was evident in recent months as he undertook the leadership of his party. He was determined that his view of politics and his country would not be confined only to his own province, and his visit to the west coast last week was evidence of his desire to communicate his ideas to other parts of Canada.

The tragedy of his death is a cruel one for his wife and young children who until last week stood to benefit for many years from his guidance and affection. It is also a very real tragedy for this House and politics generally to lose at the age of 33 a young Canadian who had volunteered to accept the challenges and sacrifices of political life in order to serve the citizens of Lotbinière and the larger constituency in the rest of the country.

On behalf of the government, I wish to extend our deep sympathy to his constituents, his colleagues in this House and, most particularly, to the members of his family.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I and my colleagues associate ourselves with the words expressed by the Acting Prime Minister.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner).]

[Translation]

It was a tragic accident which ended the unduly short career of the leader of the Social Credit Party. The hon. member for Lotbinière died in the prime of life and with a promising future ahead of him. Those who had the opportunity to work with him more closely know what eagerness to work and what determination were those of the youngest party leader of our political system. Like his predecessor, the late Réal Caouette, the young leader of the Social Credit Party put all his energies into identifying the needs of Canadians to respond to them. He worked hard in all parts of the country to consolidate the foundation of his party, which was essentially a populist party, and he died at that task.

[English]

It is for me a very real personal loss as well. I, as did many of my colleagues, had the opportunity to work closely with the late André Fortin. We came to respect him as an individual and as a very dedicated member of this chamber, a man and a party leader who respected and sought to serve the traditions and develop the potential of our country.

[Translation]

Canada is mourning today the loss of a good politician, but as the saying goes, the good die young, and I am deeply touched by this loss not only of a colleague, but also of a sincere friend.

[English]

In my name and in the name of the members of my party, I want to offer to his family, his colleagues in the House of Commons and his constituents our most sincere condolences and deep regret on the death Friday morning of an outstanding member of parliament and a young man full of promise for the country.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I join in paying a sad tribute to an able and hard-working Canadian. Like André Fortin, I was elected to parliament in 1968. Although I did not know André well, our associations throughout this brief period were always frank and cordial. At all times I found him to be a man of his word. In politics, that is very important.

As has already been noted, less than a year ago he became the leader of a political party. During that period he learned the remarkable and pressing intellectual as well as the physical challenges that are involved. I do not think it is too much to say that part of the physical endurance of that task in this vast country probably contributed in some way to his sad death in the early hours of the morning last week.

André Fortin believed both in Quebec and in Canada. Before he died, he was working on that difficult formula which concerns all Quebecers, particularly those of a federalist persuasion, how to develop and maintain this important and historic dual life for his people and province and also his country. I am sure he had much to offer all of us in this country on that important question as well as others. Therefore, from a political perspective, we have all lost an important person.

[Translation]

He leaves behind him his wife and two young children, to whom we offer all our sympathy. This is a sad event for his family as well as for Canadian politics.

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all my colleagues and in my own name, I want sincerely to thank the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark), and the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), for their moving and comforting expressions of sympathy.

The warm tributes we just heard are a great comfort to us and will help bear the grievous loss we are experiencing as the result of the tragic event which caused the premature death of our young leader, Mr. André Fortin, whom we had learned to know as a dynamic organizer, aware of his duties and responsibilities.

It was at the end of a four-day tour of British Columbia from where he returned with much enthusiasm about his meetings with the supporters and organizers of our party that André undertook his fatal trip from Ottawa to his Victoriaville home when fatigue overcame him and put an end to a very promising career.

André Fortin was not only the national leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada but he was to us all a friend. He always showed an acute sense of timeliness and he was gifted with a great clarity of mind which enabled him to find the right word at the right moment. I think that under the circumstances it would be appropriate to quote an excerpt from the last speech he delivered in the House of Commons on June 15, 1977:

> If we want law and order, we will adopt mechanisms and legislation proving that we are serious and consequently we will punish those who violate the law and encourage those who abide the law. I think that is essential.

André Fortin will remain a friend in the memory of all those who worked with him or came in contact with him in political quarters, and in the memory of all Canadians, whatever their social standing. During his short political career, he gave the example of a model worker who knew the needs and yearnings of the Canadian people.

To his wife, his children, his constituents of Lotbinière and his relatives, we extend our deep sympathy.

● (1410)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should like to add a few words, although the leaders of the various parties have already expressed the general feelings of the House. The leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), André Fortin and I were elected to Parliament for the first time in 1968, and we have been very good friends ever since. We began our work here at the same time in a very deep and sincere spirit of mutual co-operation. On behalf of all hon. members, I wish to extend to Mrs. Fortin and her family my deepest condolences.

[English]

I should also like to associate myself with the remarks already expressed, both here and in the press. Undoubtedly, like so many other members who are attempting to devote their time to the responsibilities which all members take so seriously—their work here, their duty to be among the electors to explain the doctrines of their parties, their duty to be with the workers in the province, especially at this critical time in Quebec, and, finally, a commitment to spend some of that time with members of the family—André Fortin was led into a schedule which contributed to his fatigue and to his fatal accident. We all, as members, understand that. I believe every citizen of the country should realize it was his tremendous devotion and commitment to duty as a member and as the leader of a major party in this House which contributed to his death and should pay him tribute because of that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED PRESIDENTIAL VETO OF FUNDS FOR GARRISON DIVERSION PROJECT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I move under the provisions of Standing Order 43, a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, that being the restoration of funds by the United States Congress for the further construction of the Garrison Dam Project in North Dakota. Because of the serious implications of this action for the province of Manitoba, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie):

> That this House, through the Department of External Affairs, contact the president of the United States giving Canada's unconditional support for what will hopefully be a presidential veto on this most urgent matter.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, such motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

PROPOSAL THAT EXTRA REVENUE BE PLACED IN FUND FOR OIL EXPLORATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising out of the announced price increases for oil and gas over the next two years, an announcement which was made directly to the press and not to the House, thus preventing proper parliamentary questioning concerning the government's intentions. Given that these increases are the largest made in recent years; and given that they will give the petroleum companies an additional $1 billion annually in profits without any guarantee that these company revenues will be devoted to oil and gas exploration and development; and given that previous price increases have been siphoned off by the companies into dividends, into exploration abroad and into financing of marketing wars for the gasoline market; and given that the companies continue to refuse to commit themselves to continued exploration in Canada, unless the terms are exactly what they demand as evidenced by the recent drilling slowdown in the Mackenzie Delta, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urge the government to withhold these extra revenues from the oil companies and place them in a separate fund from which the companies could withdraw funds for exploration and development purposes only.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, such motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

DOMINION DAY

PROPOSAL THAT LEADERS OF ALL POLITICAL PARTIES PARTICIPATE IN CELEBRATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity in that this parliament, and the people of Canada, have the right to demand that on the national celebration of Dominion Day either Her Majesty the Queen as head of state, or her representative, the Right Honourable Governor General should give the message to the nation. If that is not to be, then I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That the Prime Minister, the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, the Leader of the New Democratic Party and a representative of the Social Credit Party should join in speaking in support of national unity, which is not the monopoly of the Prime Minister and the government, but of all Canadians. Otherwise, having regard to the election atmosphere that has been prevalent in the government ranks of this House in the last few days, Dominion Day, Canada's national birthday, will be used on parliament hill as a launching pad by the government for a general election this fall.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

HEALTH

PROHIBITION OF ASBESTOS FILTERS IN PREPARATION OF FOOD, BEVERAGES OR PHARMACEUTICALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely the recent revelation that asbestos fibres have been found in Canadian and European wines. The fibres apparently get into the wine because it is filtered through asbestos filters. Because of the dangers of accumulated asbestos to health, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urge the government to prohibit the use of asbestos filters in the preparation of any food, beverage or pharmaceutical product in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENT ON FORMS OF DEMOCRACY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising from a press conference statement by the Prime Minister at the recent Commonwealth Conference that democracy can exist in forms other than parliamentary and that there is such a thing as one party democracy, and finally, as it is essential to my motion, I should like to quote the following sentence directly:

● (1420)

I wouldn't be prepared to think I would be successful in arguing that for Canada at the present time, but such times might come, who knows?

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates):

That the Prime Minister immediately advise the House whether it has been, and now is, government policy to create in this country a dictatorial one party system, and particularly that he give an explanation of the meaning of his dictatorial, arrogant and demagogic utterance.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Instead of the urgent and pressing necessity required by the rule, that seems to have some political overtones to it.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO ESTABLISH ACCEPTABLE LEVEL OF SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 concerning our unacceptable and deteriorating postal service. Due to the growing dissatisfaction and anger of Canadians because of unreliable postal services and particularly extended delays in mail delivery, including notices of meetings, conventions, receptions and other important functions which do not reach their destination in time in spite of the fact that they are posted three to four weeks prior to the date of the event, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That the Postmaster General be requested by parliament to convene meetings with city postmasters in each province to hear their complaints and recommendations with a view to taking remedial action to re-establish acceptable postal service.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

SECOND BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER OF INVOLVEMENT OF FORCE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the acting Prime Minister, and it concerns the revelations which have just been made known with respect to the investigation being carried out by the government of the province of Quebec with respect to a second break-in at L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec offices which is alleged to have occurred on October 12, 1973, a break-in which was performed for the purposes of installing wiretapping equipment, according to reports. Was there any Royal Canadian Mounted Police involvement in the second break-in, and if so, was the solicitor general of the day, who is now the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, aware of it before or after the raid took place?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have very little information. According to press reports a letter was received by the then solicitor general in connection with that, but that is about all the information I have at the moment. The present Solicitor General is attending a federal-provincial meeting of corrections officers, and I will see that the House is given more information.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, at a press conference on November 21, 1973 the APLQ claimed that it sent a telegram as well as a letter. The minister has confirmed that a letter was received, and he is going to inform the House with respect to its contents. Would he also confirm, if he can, that in fact a telegram was sent and received—particularly the latter—and include that in the answer he intends to give to the House at a later time?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I noticed in the press reports mention of a telegram in earlier press conferences. I have no information on that, but we will determine it.

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—REQUEST FOR JUDICIAL INQUIRY

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in view of this further indication of a course of events in police practice, a course of events which is clouded even more by confessions at a trial and allegations by a former RCMP officer, I wonder if, in the course of his activities as acting solicitor general, Minister of Justice, Attorney General or in whatever capacity he is answering today, the minister will advise his colleagues in the government that perhaps the time has come in Canada for the traditional line of the government, to disregard the necessities of an inquiry, to be changed so that this whole matter can be moved from the political arena to a proper arena of inquiry where all the facts surrounding this whole history, of which I am sure the government is not proud, could be brought forward and dealt with in a proper judicial fashion.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I note that the minister of justice in the province of Quebec has indicated that the inquiry which has already been established is sufficiently wide to examine this matter. Of course, he is the appropriate authority in terms of any criminal activity that might be involved. So there is already an inquiry under way.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There is a meeting of provincial attorneys general and the Attorney General. Is this matter on the agenda of discussion? I am referring to the question of the propriety of an inquiry.

Mr. Basford: No, because it does not involve other provinces. Undoubtedly there will be conversations between particular ministers.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): How do we know that?

PROCEDURES FOR MONITORING DESTRUCTION OF FILES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Solicitor General. In view of the vague answers given lately on a wide spectrum of RCMP and ministerial activities, I want to ask the acting minister the following question. In view of the very sensible procedures by which National Health and Welfare officials monitor destruction by the RCMP of narcotics, are similar measures or procedures undertaken to monitor the destruction of RCMP files, tapes, ledgers and other materials of this nature? Was this done with respect to the 20 linear feet of files and other materials that the minister conceded were destroyed at Montreal June 3, 1977 on the basis of a report made by the divisional audit officer, curiously enough on a statutory holiday?

Hon. Ron Basford (Acting Solicitor General): The Solicitor General has explained that that destruction occurred in the normal course of record destruction, common within agencies. I do not have the details of those procedures, but I am sure the Solicitor General will be happy to give them.

Mr. MacKay: The Solicitor General indicated that some of these files dated back to the year 1966, but he specifically did not say how current some of them were. I ask the acting minister to take as notice that perhaps the Solicitor General should reassure the House and the country that the operational case records classification and retention system specified in the manual of the RCMP procedures for destruction of files has been followed in all respects here. Perhaps I could refer the acting minister to some of the relevant material, that is pages 10 and 11 of appendix 2-3, records management manual of the force.

Mr. Basford: I will refer that to the Solicitor General.

CANADA WEEK

REASON FOR FAILURE TO GIVE LEADERS OF OPPOSITION PARTIES OPPORTUNITY TO PARTICIPATE IN CELEBRATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have two questions about the need of a royal commission to inquire into the obvious series of RCMP misdeeds, but in the absence of the Prime Minister and of the Solicitor General and the inadequacy of existing answers, I will switch topics.

I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Is the Acting Prime Minister aware of the fact that at noon today at a function allegedly to be of a non-partisan nature, the kicking off of Canada Week to emphasize national unity, at which the Leader of the Official Opposition and I were invited to participate along with the Prime Minister, after the opening comments by the Minister of National Defence on behalf of the Prime Minister and following 50 minutes of entertainment, neither a representative of the Official Opposition nor of the NDP was called upon to speak at this non-partisan gathering accompanied by jets flying overhead in the front of the House of Commons?

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that.

An hon. Member: Liberal arrogance.

Mr. Broadbent: In view of the importance of maintaining a non-partisan approach to the question of national unity at this time and considering the importance of the rest of the week's activities, will the Acting Prime Minister assure the House that he will investigate that incident and that the rest of the events this week celebrating our past and looking forward to our future will be of a non-partisan nature?

• (1430)

Mr. MacEachen: I will be eager to investigate what deprived the leader of the New Democratic Party from making a statement this morning. I will agree with him on the necessity of a non-partisan approach to the question of national unity where it is possible because there are certain interests in the field in which there can be differences. I agree with the hon. member that the maximum amount of unanimity on this subject is desirable.

Mr. Broadbent: Certainly, it is important that the Prime Minister of the day act as Prime Minister at certain of these activities. I, for one, do not begrudge that and I will make that clear. He is spokesman for all Canadians. His party happens to have a majority and in certain functions I agree he should speak for the country. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if he will assure the House, however, that at those other functions this week which are officially described as non-partisan in which the other parties have been invited to participate, they damn well will participate.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, as I said, I will investigate the circumstances but I have been informed that the organization, the selection of speakers and so on for today was under the auspices of a private organization.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PARTICIPATION OF LEADERS OF POLITICAL PARTIES IN CELEBRATIONS

Mr. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to contain one's amazement at that answer. Perhaps the Acting Prime Minister could dispel the mystery surrounding this week's events if he would say whether the Leader of the Opposition, the leader of the New Democratic Party and a spokesman for the Social Credit Party will participate and speak on July 1 in front of the Parliament Buildings.

An hon. Member: Just a simple answer.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position either to verify or disagree because I am not involved in the preparation of the program.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You have to be a Liberal to be a good Canadian?

Mr. Grafftey: You make Mackenzie King look like a statesman.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

EXTRA-PARLIAMENTARY OPPOSITION LIST AND BREAK-IN AT PRAXIS CORPORATION—POSSIBILITY OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. I should like to ask if he had any consultations with the Prime Minister last week in light of the extraordinary events that unfolded in connection with the extraparliamentary opposition scandal and the break-in at Praxis Corporation in Toronto, particularly those events which led this House to believe there were threats to life from an unknown source. Has the minister been consulted and asked by the Prime Minister to launch an investigation through his department?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Oberle: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It is not my intention of course to reveal the names of agents and collaborators which the Solicitor General knows about, but certainly it should have been the intention of the minister to assist in revealing the names of people who are making threats to the life and safety of people. Is it the intention of the minister and his department to involve themselves in this rather critical situation?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General indicated last week that the matter had been referred to the attorney general of Ontario who is responsible for breaches of the criminal law which occur within the province of Ontario.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

INQUIRY AS TO THREATS TO MINISTER'S LIFE

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, directed to the Minister of Supply and Services. I should like to ask the minister if he, like myself, has been contacted by persons unknown to me and if he has been threatened if he revealed any of the facts connected with this extraparliamentary opposition scandal?

An hon. Member: You ask no questions you get no answers.

INDUSTRY

FOOTWEAR—REQUEST OF MANUFACTURERS FOR REDUCTION OF IMPORTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As no less than 21 Canadian shoe manufacturing companies have been forced out of business in the last 18 months because of imports from low wage countries such as Africa, Asia and Eastern Europe, does the minister intend to accede to the request of the Shoe Manufacturers Association of Canada that imports of shoes be reduced to 40 per cent of domestic consumption from the present 55 per cent to bring them more in line with what the United States and the European Economic Community have done to obtain a reasonable share of the domestic market for their domestic producers?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, a few months ago I met the representatives of this organization who have agreed with me that the best way to proceed was to ask the Anti-Dumping Tribunal to carry out a study at its earliest convenience. The tribunal was to carry out this study within a six-month period. I shall therefore send a message this week to the effect that I should like to be provided very shortly with an interim report, so as to act, should the need arise, on the findings this tribunal may have come up with.

[English]

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question. As the anti-dumping tribunal has evidently submitted its interim report, with which the minister does not seem to be conversant, stating that it does not recommend such a course and the Canadian Shoe Manufacturers Association is urgently requesting that the government take action to stop Canadian shoe manufacturing businesses from rapidly going out of operation, will the minister take action?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, as soon as this report is received, we shall make the necessary decisions. Indeed, we must comply with the current legislation in this area and we do not enjoy the same flexibility under this legislation as in the textile industry, where we demonstrated last November that we could act quickly.

BANK OF CANADA

ESTIMATED COST OF NEW OFFICE BUILDING

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. As it is 17 months since we had the last estimate of the cost of the new Bank of Canada building on Wellington Street in spite of many inquiries in this House and in committee, and as the Minister of Finance stated last month that a major review of cost estimates of the Bank of Canada is underway and will be completed by mid-June and that we would be informed after that time, would the parliamentary secretary now indicate the current estimated cost of this hall of mirrors, bearing in mind that it was originally estimated to cost $36 million but at last count 17 months ago the cost had jumped to $56 million.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we expect to have these figures before the end of June. One of the problems the Bank of Canada has in preparing estimates is that the last operation, namely the renovation of the original building has not been costed. Tenders for the cost will be made available hopefully before the end of June.

ALLEGED REFUSAL OF GOVERNOR TO HALT CONSTRUCTION OF NEW OFFICE BUILDING

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I put my supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board in the absence of the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that construction continues on the building of this temple of finance on Wellington Street which will be the most luxurious central bank building in the world, can the minister indicate if he is aware that at the time the government was moving to slow down the rate of impact of government spending on the economy, the Minister of Finance intervened with the governor of the Bank of Canada asking that he hold up construction of the building and was refused? If the President of the Treasury Board is aware of this would he now intervene directly in the hope that this building spree that is so unnecessary can be halted as quickly as possible?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of that detail in the history of this transaction.

ALLEGED EXPANSION OF AIRBORNE REGIMENT—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. On January 13 this year speaking to the Conference of Defence Associations General Dextraze said: "Rather than destroying the airborne regiment, I am expanding it." In view of that remark can the minister explain how he is going to disband the airborne mechanized commando, one of the three existing commandos in the regiment and still expand the regiment?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there are two commandos at the present time. There were plans for a third. If this is adhered to both will be going to Petawawa rather than one to Petawawa and one to Ottawa and then re-forming the third in Petawawa.

Mr. McKinnon: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the minister is a little confused about the third commando I can tell him it has been in Germany and is no longer going to be there which leaves a net loss of one commando. The often repeated excuse for the otherwise inexplicable move east of the airborne regiment was the fallacious statement that, as a result, some 1,200 extra men were going to be deployed at the sharp end. It now appears that quite the opposite is taking place and the government is now being forced to disband one of the three existing commandos of the airborne regiment. Will the minister now reconsider the whole disastrous idea, since the last viable reason for the move seems to have disappeared?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, there is some confusion in the hon. member's mind about the formation of the commando force that is to be changed. No, I do not intend to reconsider it. It has already been considered seriously. The troops' reposturing is a necessary part of the structuring of the armed forces. That one part of it is in abeyance, and will be until I have had the opportunity to look into it further.

STATUS OF QUICK REACTION FORCE

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Chief of Defence Staff, General Dextraze, went to great lengths to explain that the quick reaction force is going to be a French speaking commando unit stationed at Uplands Airport. Now that it is not going to be there can we assume we have no quick reaction forces, because we have the aircraft at Trenton, the airborne regiment will be at Pettawawa, and the parachute packing will be done at Edmonton?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, certainly, for any conceivable situation in which a fast reaction is required there is a fast reaction force, for example, special units engaged in the search and rescue role. However, other types of fast reactions can still be achieved in adequate time for any foreseen eventuality. Of course, that is one of the things I am looking into and one of the reasons for not proceeding with the third matter at this time.

HOUSING

HOME INSULATION PROGRAM—METHOD OF PROVIDING FUNDS TO HOME OWNERS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs is with regard to the statement which he and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources issued this morning with respect to the home insulation program for conserving energy. Since I assume CMHC will administer the program, I ask the minister what provisions are to be made for financing on the part of those who seek to benefit from the program? The statement says that some $350 per unit will be paid. Since it costs approximately $900 to insulate a home, how is the home owner to procure the other $550? Does the government intend to do as it did in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, guarantee the loans, or will it make arrangements with the provincial governments for them to guarantee the loans? What has the government in mind with respect to the disparity per home of between $350 and $900?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The utilization of government hot air.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the figures mentioned by the hon. member. It is undeniable that the program we are putting forward for all Canada is not as generous as the program which has been going on in the two Maritime provinces for some months now. Besides, this program is an incentive to encourage people to insulate their homes, and we believe that the amount offered will generate enough response from the public to meet our objective.

[English]

HOME INSULATION PROGRAM—CONDITIONS TO BE MET BY PROVINCES PRIOR TO RECEIVING GRANTS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It should be noted that the two provinces with Liberal governments are to get more generous treatment than the other eight provinces. That will be of some interest.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: That will certainly help national unity.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In the statement the two ministers issued they spoke of the conditions which participating provinces would have to meet—I will not read the list. I ask, will these grants be effective only when the provinces have put in place the lengthy program outlined in the statement? Since most of the required conditions will require legislation by provincial legislatures, does this mean that the program will not come into effect in the eight provinces of Canada until provincial legislation is passed, or will individuals be allowed to insulate their homes and be paid retroactively when provincial governments decide to participate?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The government is not sure.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): In answer to the hon. member's question, I feel it is clear that the residents of those provinces will not benefit from this program before the provincial governments have approved the conditions put forward by my colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and before he has discussed them with the provincial premiers or his provincial counterparts. I cannot accept the hon. member's point that legislation will be needed, for I am told that following those preliminary consultations with the provinces, the necessity to legislate has not been raised.

[English]

HOME INSULATION PROGRAM—APPLICABILITY OF PROGRAM TO RENTED PREMISES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister is aware that, according to his own statement, the provinces will be required to remove the sales tax on insulating materials. I am not aware that any provincial government can do that without legislation. I ask, what provision is being made to insulate the homes of renters. I point out that 40 per cent of this country's residents are renters. In Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, 97 per cent of the grants went to owners, only 3 per cent to renters. There is no provision in the statement for providing assistance to renters to insulate their homes. I point out that renters are usually people with smaller incomes and need to conserve energy just as much as home owners. I ask, what provision does the minister intend to make for those who live in rented accommodation, provided the owner of that accommodation is agreeable to having the home insulated?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): In answer to the first part of the hon. member's question, I remind him simply that often, through the budget, a decision can be made which comes immediately into effect, without having to wait for the passage of a bill giving effect to such a budgetary decision. Furthermore, as to the hon. member's concern about tenants I can assure him that the eligibility requirements apply to resident owners, tenants and non resident owners and therefore, if he looks at the release, he will see that there are credits not only for private homes but also for apartment buildings which have not more than three floors.

[English]

HOME INSULATION PROGRAM—DELAY IN APPROVING APPLICATIONS IN NOVA SCOTIA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister on the same matter? The program in effect in Nova Scotia apparently is fully endorsed by the public, but there are substantial delays in the approval of applications. I do not complain about the numbers of people submitting applications for assistance. Unfortunately, there are not enough on the staff to handle all applications coming forward. Could the minister assist the people of the area? Could he see to it that the office has a large enough staff to process applications, so that the work can be done before the fall when the people will want the insulation in place?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to see that the hon. member recognizes the intrinsic value of the program and admits that it is working marvellously well in his provinces. I can assure him, on the other hand, that we decide from day to day, according to the influx of applications, on the means to be taken to answer as quickly as possible the applications of the people in his province.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INVESTIGATION OF SALE OF CANDU REACTORS—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON ALLEGED DISCOVERY OF ADDITIONAL PAYMENTS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General I direct my question to the Minister of Justice. It concerns the ongoing RCMP investigation of AECL's involvement in the sale of Candu reactors. The Financial Post of June 18 says:

> . . .the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have actually broadened the ambit of their criminal investigation to include a number of newly discovered suspect payments made by Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd.

I ask the minister, to what newly discovered suspect payments does this story allude? Second, when will the RCMP make its report? The Solicitor General said some weeks ago it would be tabled by now. Finally, because of the important work the public accounts committee is doing in this regard, when will this new evidence be referred to that committee?

● (1450)

Hon. Ron Basford (Acting Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much whether the nature of that evidence can be disclosed until the investigation is completed and it is indicated whether criminal charges should be laid. I will, of course, refer the question to the Solicitor General and see that any additional answer that might be made will be made.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

EFFECT ON PRICE OF ESTABLISHMENT OF CHICKEN MARKETING BOARD—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding my party's original stand vis-à-vis marketing boards, I put the following question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to the spokesmen of Canada. It has come to our attention that a government report states that the recently approved national chicken marketing agency will cost consumers $89 million during its first year in operation and in some cases certain individual Canadians will be paying twice the amount for chickens. As spokesmen for the consumers of this country, has the minister brought this matter to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture and discussed it with him, outlining the grave consequences of this action? Who prepared this government document? Where did it come from?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I gather that the report to which the hon. member is referring is one released by the Consumers' Association of Canada. I understand it has not been obtained from my department. I would point out, as the hon. member is aware, that the system of supply-management marketing boards contemplated under the National Farm Marketing Act and the chicken broiler plan does contemplate some border controls to stabilize the industry here in Canada. I suppose it is fair to say, if experience proves any guide, that Canadian consumers will regrettably be faced with price increases. However, I certainly do not wish to provide any such estimate as that contained in the hon. member's comment. I can only hope that the price increases will be as modest as possible.

POSSIBILITY OF MILK PRICE WAR BETWEEN FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL AUTHORITIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Was not this a confidential report prepared by the minister's department? I will reiterate my question. Has the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs raised this matter with the Minister of Agriculture now that the recent report has indicated that the Canadian consumer may be the victim of a price war between the federal authority and the provinces in relation to milk? These are two important problems involving the Canadian consumer. One, we assume, is based on a confidential report from the minister's department. Has he raised these serious matters with the Minister of Agriculture and what kind of a break, as a result of the minister's representations to the Minister of Agriculture, can the Canadian consumer expect?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I cannot comment on the suggestion about the price war that the hon. member refers to between the provinces and the federal government on milk. Also, I cannot confirm or deny the existence of the study to which he refers because, as I suggested to him, what he refers to is not something released by my department, to the best of my knowledge. The hon. member asks if I have brought my point of view or that of my department to the Minister of Agriculture. I point out to him that the National Farm Marketing Act contemplates a poultry marketing scheme. Hearings were held under the act. A recommendation was made by the Minister of Agriculture to cabinet which bore a positive response from those hearings held under the act. I cannot go beyond that and discuss with the hon. member what my views might have been at that time when the recommendation was made by the Minister of Agriculture.

ENERGY

OIL—SUGGESTION EXTRA REVENUE BE PLACED IN FUND TO BE USED ONLY FOR EXPLORATION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Is it correct that the increase in oil and gas prices recently announced by the federal government will result in windfall revenues of some $1 billion going to oil companies, largely foreign owned, without any obligation on their part to use any of this money for exploration for and development of oil and gas resources? If this is so, as appears to be the case, will the government take immediate steps to protect the interests of Canadian consumers, on whom the burden of these higher prices will fall, by ensuring through legislation that the oil companies will get this additional revenue only if, as and when they carry out exploration and development work additional to what they have been doing?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to confirm the alleged facts pointed out by the hon. member. His question is in the nature of a representation which will be considered.

SOCIAL SERVICES

POSSIBILITY PROPOSED LEGISLATION INFRINGES PROVINCIAL JURISDICTION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the charge by Mr. Lazure that the federal government uses cost-sharing programs to enter into areas that the constitution closes to it and is justifying expansion of the civil service by going into fields not part of its jurisdiction, has the minister considered whether his proposed social insurance services act is an infringement upon provincial jurisdiction?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ritchie: As Mr. Timbrell has said that the conference was so empty it could have been preceded by a one-page memo rather than a two-day conference, will the minister advise whether anything useful was accomplished at the conference?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

ACCEPTANCE BY PROVINCES OTHER THAN QUEBEC OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, now that the province of Quebec has registered its very adamant objection to the introduction of new social services legislation, can the minister advise whether in fact all of the other provinces accept the legislation as introduced? If not, is it his intention to in any event push ahead, notwithstanding the fact that he does not have full support?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the provinces and the federal government together studied six different projects before chosing the one that was tabled in the House. No province, other than Quebec, has indicated any disagreement with the one tabled in the House which corresponds to the sixth version distributed for consideration to the provinces. I must point out, in addition, that at no time prior to the conference last week, either during discussions held in recent years or on several occasions since November 15 last, did the Quebec government indicate, through its officials or otherwise, that it did not agree with the proposed legislation.

[English]

SUGGESTED DELAY OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION PENDING CONSULTATION WITH QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): The province of Ontario is a big province, as is the province of Quebec. In light of the fact that we want equality of treatment and if Quebec insists on not giving its consent to this very important piece of legislation, will the minister advise whether he is prepared to withhold second reading of this bill until he has had further consultation with the provinces, in particular the province of Quebec, in order to see whether we can find some common ground in order to proceed?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, not only are the provinces of Ontario and Quebec important, but we do have ten provinces in this country. We had intensive consultations with all provinces and I intend to resume the consultations which took place in the past, in the same spirit, with all provinces. I do not think federal-provincial relations can lead to a situation where the provinces of Quebec and Ontario would have a sort of right of veto over all projects which could include federal-provincial cooperation. I can assure my hon. colleague that I will do my best to get continuous cooperation from those provinces which are of particular importance due to their population. I can also tell the hon. member that the Quebec Minister of Social Affairs said that he would send me additional comments in the near future. I am looking forward to receiving them. I do not intend to proceed to second reading of this bill until I receive the comments of my colleague from Quebec.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PLACEMENT BY MEMBER OF OFFICE TRAILER ON DOWNSVIEW AIR BASE

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. As a result of questions put to him on April 25, the minister indicated that the time honoured policy of separation of politics and politicians on Department of National Defence bases has been altered. Can the minister now confirm that he changed this time-honoured policy so that he could accommodate a fellow Liberal, the hon. member for York Centre, so that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance could put his red, party-coloured trailer with his name emblazoned on the outside of the National Defence Air Base at Downsview?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

DATE OF DECISION ON INQUIRY INTO SINKING OF "WILLIAM CARSON"—STEPS TO FIND REPLACEMENT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): My question is for the Minister of Transport. Has an official decision yet been taken with respect to the establishment of a judicial inquiry into the sinking of the CN ferry William Carson and, if so, when will such an inquiry be established?

Perhaps the minister could take this opportunity to tell us what steps the government has in mind to find a replacement as soon as possible for this ferry since many thousands of reservations have had to be cancelled because of the loss of the vessel.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Final details in connection with the inquiry have not yet been arranged but I hope it will be possible for this to be done soon. We have been looking at the question of alternative vessels and their availability; we have also been examining ways in which to use the total fleet on the east coast as effectively as possible.

TRANSPORT

HIGHWAY PROGRAM FOR MARITIME PROVINCES—POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Now we have had some indication from the Council of Maritime Premiers and the Province of Newfoundland through their respective highway ministers relating to further meetings with the minister regarding the $100 million highway program for the Atlantic region, would the hon. gentleman indicate whether he intends to carry to that meeting a much broader outlook with respect to the $1 billion program which has formally been asked for by the four provinces or whether he intends to consider only some modification of the $100 million program he recently announced?

[Mr. Dick.]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The very first proposals from the Atlantic provinces which did involve a program of just under $100 million was seen as being one which would extend over a period of years—perhaps at least ten years. What we have proceeded with at this point is a proposal for a cost-sharing arrangement for three years in relation to a cost-sharing arrangement involving, on our part, $100 million, which is a very significant step toward the accomplishment of the ultimate objective. At the meetings this afternoon I shall obviously be discussing with the Atlantic transport ministers the question of the relationship between the first phase of the program and the long-term objectives.

Mr. Forrestall: So, we are to understand that the minister's position with respect to this introductory offer of $100 million is essentially the position he will be putting before the four Atlantic highway ministers or transportation authorities.

Mr. Lang: It would really be inappropriate for me to deal in the House today with the full range of discussions to be held this afternoon. I am surprised the hon. member can so offhandedly refer to $100 million as though it were an insignificant sum. It seems to me it is an important contribution toward highway improvement in the Atlantic region and I had hoped Atlantic members would recognize this and welcome it accordingly.

REQUEST FOR STAY OF PROCEEDINGS AGAINST EDWARD ZIEMBA—PROPOSED LEGISLATION TO PROTECT SOURCE OF CONFIDENTIAL INFORMATION

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. It is in two parts. In view of the fact that the people of Ontario are shocked and disgusted that a member of the Ontario Legislative Assembly, Edward Ziemba has been held in the Don Jail in Toronto for refusing to reveal to a court the name of the person who gave him confidential information, would the minister immediately contact the Attorney General of Ontario and ask him to stay the proceedings of the trial and refer the matter to the Ontario Court of Appeal? The second part of my question is this: would the minister bring in legislation to prevent a recurrence of this situation?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): I shall be having dinner this evening with the Attorney General of Ontario and shall inquire what he intends to do. As to the second part of the question, which is an important one, it is necessary, of course, to consider and balance the interests of the accused in a full and fair trial by having in court all possible information which may be helpful to the accused. On the other hand, of course, there is the interest of people concerned with maintaining confidential privileged communications. The Law Reform Commission has, in its study of the Evidence Code and in its consideration of trial procedures, been looking into the question of privilege and has recommended a discretionary privilege in cases which may be similar to the Ziemba case. I would suggest that such a discretionary privilege has been recognized by the Supreme Court of Canada, and Mr. Ziemba's solicitors may want to consider that case, in particular, the case of Slavutych and Baker, and determine whether it is applicable to the present situation.

Mr. Gilbert: Will the Minister of Justice translate into legislation the case heard before the Supreme Court, one which is of interest not only for Edward Ziemba but for other Canadians?

Mr. Basford: As the hon. member knows, the Law Reform Commission in its proposed Evidence Code recommended a discretionary form of privilege. I have indicated that the Evidence Code is a matter for consultation with provincial governments and members of the bar associations. This consultative process is almost completed and we shall be discussing this subject further at the forthcoming meeting of provincial attorneys general.

PROPOSAL THAT UNAUTHORIZED WIRETAPPING EVIDENCE BE INADMISSIBLE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question. It deals with the debate which is to take place on Bill C-51. The purpose of the question is to shorten the time likely to be taken up, particularly on the report stage. The reason I ask this is in reference to the invasion of privacy and the hon. gentleman's amendment with reference to the admissibility of evidence from authorized or unauthorized wiretapping leaving it to the discretion of the judiciary, and the Supreme Court of Canada having laid down in the Wray case the kind of discretion which must be exercised, leaving the rest of the judiciary in Canada effectively without discretion, will the minister now reconsider his position, myself having put that proposition to him, and accept my proposition which would make any evidence derived from unauthorized wiretapping inadmissible, either part of that conversation or the derivative evidence?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): As the hon. member knows, this matter was very thoroughly discussed in the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and it will be debated again before passage. It would seem to me that the amendment worked out in committee and approved in committee is a very good one and falls within the concept of the recommendation of the Law Reform Commission which studied the whole field of evidence over a long period.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COATES—ALLEGED PARTISANSHIP IN CELEBRATION OF DOMINION DAY

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which in my opinion affects all members of the House. Most of my remarks will be directed to you, Sir, as the guardian of our rights as hon. members.

Today we begin what is known as Canada Week, and already questions have been posed to the Acting Prime Minister in relation to some of the functions which are taking place today on the Hill and to others which will be taking place later, most of them on July 1. My concern arose before today's events. The leader of the New Democratic Party today highlighted what can happen when the events are not handled in a proper manner from the point of view of parliament and members of this House.

I should like to stress that Parliament Hill comes under Your Honour's jurisdiction. The events which take place on this hill from time to time are Your Honour's responsibility. If something is going to transpire here, then you must be contacted and approve of what is happening. I would not want any member to think what is happening, at this time and in this way revolves around Your Honour in such a way as to leave the impression in the minds of the public that there is a partisan endeavour on the part of the executive of the government to usurp the responsibilities of all members of parliament to participate in a positive way toward making Canada a greater place than it is at this moment in time and to promote the theme of national unity, which appears to be the objective the government is striving to attain.

As a member of parliament who has been here for some years, I have participated at other times in significant events on Parliament Hill. Without exception, on every one of those occasions, every individual member of parliament, as well as those from the other place, were made aware of what was happening and were asked to participate in a positive way. I remember the Hon. Judy LaMarsh, when she was secretary of state, doing everything she possibly could in 1967 to involve every individual member of parliament in what was happening on Canada's 100th birthday.

On this particular occasion, I have been informed of what was happening by what I read in the newspaper, heard from the media and from the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). He has become aware of what is happening and has tried to make this House aware of the fact that what is happening is not in the best interests of this nation as a whole. It is urgently necessary for Your Honour to assume responsibilities on the part of all members of this House to see that all members are included. With the Speaker of the other place, Your Honour should see to it that all members of parliament from both Chambers have an opportunity to participate in every way they can at this late date. Canadians should be made aware that this is not some kind of partisan endeavour on the part of the Liberal government, but it is something in which all members of parliament wish to participate, in the hope that Canada will be a stronger and better place to live.

We look forward to Canada being a better place for our children to live in as a unified nation. If something is not done right away, I am fearful we will find ourselves in a position where the people of this nation do not even realize that there are other leaders and other political parties in this country. That may be something to laugh about, if you happen to come from the Liberal Party, but that is what irritates me no end. This should not be some kind of a partisan endeavour in which Liberals have a special right to participate. This is something for all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: It is time for all Canadians to see all their members of parliament participating. No government has the right to spend taxpayers' dollars to finance a special show for the Prime Minister of this country, which excludes everybody else who happens to be a member in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: No government has the right to set up the Prime Minister of this country as some sort of saviour of this nation. Every member in this House has a very determined desire to participate and make Canada a stronger place than it is right now. We have no available way of doing that. The government has precluded us, one and all, unless you happen to be a member of the Liberal Party, from participating in any way.

It is nothing short of shocking and scandalous, as far as I am concerned, to think the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) kicked off Canada Week. Canada Week is something we have never heard of before. It is not part of our constitution, unless hon. members on the other side are writing it day by day. The Minister of National Defence, speaking for the Prime Minister, appears to be the only member opposite who has anything to say about Canada Week, aside from the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts). In a letter I have, the Prime Minister refers to Canada Day, which is a new day as far as I am concerned. There is no legislation in existence which signifies July 1 as Canada Day. Up to now July 1 has been Dominion Day. If the government wants to change Dominion Day to Canada Day, let them introduce legislation into this House and let them pass it. If they can introduce it and if it can secure majority approval, then I have no argument about it. I accept July 1 as being Dominion Day. By writing letters, the Prime Minister cannot legislate for this country; but it may be we are not too far from the day when he will be able to legislate by edict under his signature. I hope that day never arrives.

This is not going to be a week in which unity becomes highlighted in this nation. If this government continues to use this week for partisan political purposes, which is what it is doing right now, I have to object to that as strenuously as I can. I ask Your Honour to protect us as individual members of this House and to see to it that every member has the same rights. When we came to this Chamber, we elected you to protect each and every one of us. I ask you to give us that protection through your office. We do not have that protection right now, when one considers what has been planned for this week. It will be a terrible atrocity if this government is allowed to go forward with the program they are presenting to the people of this country.

As was indicated today, unfortunately the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) does not know anything about it. He cannot even answer the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) as to who is putting on the festivities and what they are about. Everybody in this Chamber now realizes the Acting Prime Minister has been eliminated from participating in any way, shape or form. That is a terrible thing to be happening in this country at this stage of our affairs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I would like to give some information on what did happen today. Canada Week was inaugurated by the Council for Canadian Unity, a private organization which has requested permission to use the platform in front of the Parliament Buildings to launch Canada Week.

I can seek information to know if the federal government contribution was limited to lending the platform but I do not think so. I could bring some details tomorrow. I believe that the private organization which has inaugurated Canada Week is the Council for Canadian Unity.

[English]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I hope the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State (Mr. Guilbault) has not lost sight of the fact that the question of privilege which was launched by my colleague goes far beyond the matter of Canada Week. It was not a private organization which sanctified July 1 as a date of some importance in our country. The parliamentary secretary may have forgotten, but on that particular day we will celebrate the birth of a nation. It was a birth which had some difficulties, but in 1867 it was supported by all parties and by all elements generally in the legislatures.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Over the years the nation has had some rather tough times. Some of those rough times came about because governments did not care. I am not necessarily talking about this government, but governments have sometimes forgotten the importance of certain symbols and minorities. They have been just a little neglectful, and as suggested by my colleague, who spoke with much eloquence with respect to July 1, 1977, this matter should not be allowed to continue in this way.

If none of the leaders of the federalist parties in this House—except of course, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—are allowed to participate officially in the festivities of that day on Parliament Hill in front of the building which is supposed to signify in some way our sense of national unity, then with respect to the institution of confederation this government will not only neglect that institution but also harm it. I hope you, Mr. Speaker, as the first commoner, will not allow that to happen.

Last year I asked a question of the then secretary of state, who is now the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Faulkner), whether is was the intention of the government to provide $200,000 to assist in the promotion of a program celebrating Canada's birthday in 1976. I was told by the minister—in fact, I was jeered by him—that I must remember that the restraint program was in operation. This year when the corpse which was supposed to be dead, namely separatism, has announced that it is alive and kicking in one part of the country, it is interesting that this government should not spend merely $200,000 on an important event but that it is prepared to spend in excess of $3 million on an important event because the circumstances are different.

Circumstances certainly are different. Canada is facing a problem now, and its solution will depend on good will in this chamber and in every part of this country. If this kind of insipient partisanship which seems to have developed over this holiday—and I am using the real sense of the holiday; it is not just a day off—is allowed to happen, Canadians will be given a one-sided view of our interest as parliamentarians in celebrating that day. That is why I admire the hon. member who raised this question of privilege. It is important that we understand that no matter where we sit in this House of Commons, whether it is to Your Honour's right, to your left, or where you sit, it will be an important day not just for the Prime Minister, for the government of the day or for the Liberal Party; it will be important for all Canadians and all their representatives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I cannot believe, Sir, that it is beyond the imagination of yourself, of hon. members of this House or of a representative group to decide the best way in which this parliament as a whole—without regard to parties in the partisan sense but with regard to parties in the sense that we represent all Canadians who sent us here—should celebrate. Particularly the leaders of all the parties—and a representative of one party because of an unfortunate circumstance last weekend—should be allowed to participate openly in the celebrations on this bill for Canada's birthday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some serious difficulties with the fundamental aspects of questions of privilege as they involve any kinds of celebrations taking place anywhere in the country and certainly the role of the Speaker in attempting to decide the agenda of any event anywhere. However, there is an aspect of this question which does fascinate me, and that is not so much the arrangements about the expenditure of funds or the arrangements made by the government of the day. What interests me from the point of view of the privileges of all hon. members is the setting for these celebrations on July 1 being the House of Commons itself. Were they in the building, it would of course be clear that they would be subject to considerable jurisdiction on my part. As they will be located outside the building, that raises some more interesting questions of precise and exact jurisdiction.

In any case, I think all hon. members would probably realize that it is most doubtful that my jurisdiction in this matter would extend or would be expected to extend to the precise agenda or to the individual arrangements whether it be on a question of protocol or otherwise. That would be very difficult to expect each time I am asked to extend to hon. members of any party the use of these rooms and these buildings which, as I think all hon. members know, is a matter to which I have directed my attention several times in the past.

I have attempted to develop a policy that whenever these premises are used by hon. members to receive Canadian people who are taxpayers or visitors, there ought to be some parliamentary connection. We have attempted to do some things which would on the one hand encourage that activity to take place, because it is at the very root of our democratic system. However, on the other hand we must see to it that this does not become a commercial establishment and that events are not held here when they ought to be held in commercial premises. Therefore, what I am attempting to do is to exert some influence over the content of what takes place on these premises and to bear in mind that when the buildings of parliament are being used the activities should have a parliamentary flavour and a parliamentary purpose. Even if that were the motivation, which I feel all hon. members endorse, it would not be expected that I would want to inquire on every occasion into the full details of the agenda and of the arrangements, but I think it ought to be expected that since the parliament buildings are being used, I, on behalf of all members of parliament, ought to attempt to encourage the highest possible use and the appearance of the highest possible use, to the best interests and motivations of the premises.

Therefore, I could indicate to the hon. members who have participated in this discussion that while I do not see myself now—or at any time that I give my permission to any hon. member or group of hon. members to use these buildings—in a position to insist upon certain arrangements in their agendas, I certainly see myself in a position to encourage as much as possible the best possible use of the buildings in every sense and the appearance of that, and perhaps therefore I will take the matter under advisement and see what might be done in this regard.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have been standing for some time in anticipation of being recognized. I realize that Your Honour is taking the whole matter under advisement, but while you are doing that may I be permitted to make a couple of remarks that I think are germane to your consideration of the matter.

The hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) has put forward his point very well to the effect that you are in fact the person who had a direct involvement in the use of the parliament buildings and, I suggest, the grounds that surround the parliament buildings. But I think there is another consideration and, I suggest with the greatest respect, you should take it under advisement. That is the fact that we in the House are only one part of parliament. After all, Sir, you as the Speaker of the House who are seized with the responsibility of judging matters of privilege with respect to every member are also a person who must in fact give consideration to the protection of the rights of parliament. As you know, Mr. Speaker, parliament consists of three parts, the Crown, the Senate and the House of Commons. What I am suggesting to you is that there is a fundamental question in the use of the grounds and of the parliament buildings as a backdrop for national television during this week and particularly on July 1st. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State (Mr. Guilbault) suggests that the government has no control over an independent body which is organizing celebration on July 1st. Yet, if that independent body, whoever they are, did not have $3.5 million to use for this function, we would not have the backdrop, we would not have jets of the Department of National Defence planes flying over or a fly past of Jet Stars, whatever, and we would not have any celebration at all. So the point that the parliamentary secretary makes that there is no involvement by the government is a facetious point.

Secondly, I say that a double standard is developing here with respect to the operation of Canada Week and July 1st by this government of which I think you should be aware, Mr. Speaker. In the province of Quebec we witnessed the spectacle this weekend of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) participating at the celebrations there on behalf of the government. So far as the government is concerned it was quite satisfactory for representatives of the opposition party in Quebec, which I believe is the Liberal party, to be invited to participate, but when it comes to the national day in the capital of Canada, no provision is made for representatives from both sides of the House of Commons to participate.

I tell you, Sir, that this is not a matter which we take lightly. I know that in my own province in western Canada people are terribly concerned about the fact that there is no place in this participatory program for the Governor General. After all, he, not the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), is the representative of the head of state. The fact is that the Prime Minister has been received as head of state in foreign countries, that he has developed a large bureaucracy around him and that, in answers to the right hon. gentleman in his own words, he holds himself out as leader of this country. This implies that he considers himself to be leader of our country rather than the Governor General, and this is something that you, Mr. Speaker will have to consider. Unlike the situation in the United States we have a separation between our political leader and our head of state. Our Governor General is non-partisan, and we have a Prime Minister who is a partisan, political figure. Whether we like it or not, when someone speaks on behalf of all Canadians, it should be the representative of the head of state, the Governor General. Until that is changed, the use of parliament buildings, with the large flag flying over our building, with the expensive stage out in front, with the use of Department of National Defence planes and large expenditures of money, should be considered by you, I suggest with all respect, to be indirectly a challenge to the rights and privileges of every member of the House of Commons.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising from a question which I raised in the question period. I caught Your Honour's eye to ask a question in which I was seeking information. On April 25 of this year I put a number of questions to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) concerning the fact that he was allowing members of parliament to put constituency offices on national defence bases, something which has never been allowed here before. We have not been allowed on national defence bases before unless invited by a resident. There has been a great change in policy on this matter. Today I sought information on this matter because this time honoured policy had been changed and I wanted to confirm when and at what time it had been changed. I feel that my privileges have been—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely the hon. member knows very well that if he wishes to differ, as he is attempting to do, with the decision I made in respect of the handling of a question during the question period, it is a decision I have taken which is not subject to appeal. Secondly, this matter would never amount to a question of privilege, and thirdly, if the hon. member wishes to seek information, it is a valid objective during the question period. However, he must realize that the form in which he put his question today was clearly objectionable on the grounds of being argumentative. It was seriously argumentative.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, in an effort to clear up the record regarding a point of order I raised on June 22, as reported at page 6994 of Hansard, on which Your Honour deferred your ruling last Thursday because you wanted clarification and, as you put it "precision", may I put forward this point as briefly and precisely as I can. I will narrow down my point of order to the argument that the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), as reported at page 6968 of Hansard, made reference in his speech to two letters. It is these two letters that I would like to have tabled in accordance with the practices of the House. In support of my argument may I quote citation 159(2) and citation 159(3) of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition. I would also put forward in support of my contention a ruling of Your Honour of April 8, 1976 to be found at page 12612 of Hansard, and I respectfully submit to Your Honour that you take these under advisement. That is my point put as precisely as I could, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I would want some indication as to whether or not there are to be counterarguments, and then I will take the matter under advisement. If there is to be any counterargument, it will be made one day from now, and then I will take the matter under consideration.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As reported at page 7015 of Hansard of June 22, during a speech I was making on opposition day dealing with the matter of Cardinal Family Farms of Alberta I posed a series of rhetorical questions. However, my concluding remark was that the Cardinal Family had equity of $10,000 and received $153,000. That is a clear statement of fact rather than a rhetorical question.

I would have raised this point previously—and I will get to the point of order—but I did not have Hansard to refer to, it was in the hands of Hansard. There is no question that Hansard reported me correctly, but I would like to seek an opportunity, in light of my statement and in light of the statements of officials of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, that subject to the dedication of all parties serving on the Standing Committee of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and as an indication of my dedication and the dedication of other members—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will have to make it clear whether he is attempting to make a correction to Hansard or to clarify what he said on an earlier occasion.

Mr. Brisco: It is not a correction of Hansard, Mr. Speaker, it is a withdrawal of a remark I made which appears in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not aware of any procedure by which that can be done. Certainly, it cannot be done by way of a point of order in these circumstances. The hon. member might want to attempt to do that in some other way. However, it would require considerable consent and some examination as to the procedural basis for doing so. It cannot be done by way of a point of order under a correction to Hansard. The hon. member might want to give it some thought and to seek some advice as to how the matter might best be approached.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CANCELLATION OF AFTERNOON SITTING ON JUNE 28

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in view of the untimely death of our friend and colleague the hon. member for Lotbinière, the leader of the Social Credit Party, I understand there is a proposal with respect to the sitting of the House tomorrow. Perhaps the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council could advise us of that and then there is another matter I should like to raise.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, there have been the usual consultations and it is agreed that the House of Commons shall not sit tomorrow afternoon as a gesture of our profound respect for the late hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, since we are getting close to what might be construed as the end of the session, perhaps I could ask the question about the business of the House today. Could the parliamentary secretary confirm that it would be satisfactory that the votes on amendments to the unemployment insurance legislation be held this evening with the bells commencing at 9.45 p.m.?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): For 15 minutes only.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We will do our best on that. Could the parliamentary secretary inform us prior to beginning debate on Bill C-20, the legislation respecting the Auditor General, whether it is the intention of the government to bring in changes to the Standing Orders, or whatever is necessary, in order that the understanding that has been reached that the report of the Auditor General be automatically referred to the public accounts committee instead of being referred in the usual way can be put through? This is important from the point of view of the debate that is about to take place and it is a matter upon which I understand there is no difficulty between the parties in the House. If the parliamentary secretary cannot give me that information now, would he be prepared to do so later today?

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, to deal with the several points raised, perhaps I should go back a bit and conclude with some information about the hours for tomorrow. As I indicated, it would be appropriate that the House not sit tomorrow afternoon, but sit the normal hours in the morning and the evening.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think this has been agreed to but I think it should be made clear in the form of a House order and that a minister should request a House order. It is my understanding that we will sit tomorrow from 11 a.m. to one p.m. on government business, rising until eight p.m. and sit from eight p.m. until 10.30 p.m. on government business. In other words, we are aware that in doing this we are making no provision for routine proceedings or the question period tomorrow afternoon. It seems to me that this should be cleared up by a House order. There are still a couple of ministers in the House.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, there may well be a couple of matters in the course of dealing with the business of the House that would require House orders. Perhaps we should go through the list and determine what we need in the way of a House order. I could then ask the President of the Treasury Board to seek the orders.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is agreeable, Mr. Speaker. I think my friend means he will be dealing with the matter later today.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps there will be some consultation. We will be coming to motions shortly so perhaps there will be an application for a House order then.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, am I allowed to speak on this?

Mr. Speaker: Yes, of course the hon. member is allowed to speak. We are attempting to clear up a matter of House business and other hon. members may want to speak on it.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask about the committee meeting in the afternoon. One is scheduled for tomorrow and if it should have to be rescheduled out of respect for our late friend I should like to set the wheels in motion now.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, we could certainly cover that point in the House order that is to come later in the day. It would seem to me if the step we contemplate is a gesture of respect for one of our colleagues it would follow that neither the House nor committees would meet.

To revert to the point raised by the Conservative House leader, may I say it is agreeable to the government and I hope there will be unanimous consent, that votes on Bill C-27 deferred earlier today be taken tonight at 9.45 p.m.; that is, the bells would begin to ring at 9.45 p.m.

In connection with the other items of business, we intend to proceed this afternoon with Bill C-20, the legislation on the Auditor General. If standing divisions are called for during the course of that discussion it might be appropriate that those votes, if required, be deferred until 9.45 p.m. as well.

After we dispose of the Auditor General's legislation there are two finance bills waiting at report stage, the legislation dealing with the Bretton Woods Agreements and the legislation relating to currency and exchange. Thereafter, it would be our intention to move to Bill C-49 relating to the Canada Pension Plan. That is the order of business we had in mind.

Regarding the automatic reference of reports of the Auditor General to committee, I would have to leave that point for further consultation. The President of the Treasury Board may have something specific to say about it at this stage, but if not, I will undertake to consult on that point and report to the opposition House leader later in the day.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I was given to understand a few days ago that from five p.m. to six p.m. tomorrow a number of private members' bills would be brought forward. They are simply measures to change the names of some ridings and would not take very long. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could advise when they might be rescheduled so that this legislation can go through before the session ends.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that precise information at this time, but I will consult with the House leaders and hopefully will be able to give the hon. member the information before the end of the afternoon.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could negotiate quickly as it might be possible to deal with this legislation today between five p.m. and six p.m.

Mr. Goodale: I will try, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think things are sorting themselves out but I was a little puzzled about why the parliamentary secretary included potential votes at report stage on amendments to Bill C-20. We already have 10 or 12 recorded votes to be taken tonight. Unless we have completed Bill C-20 and want to add those votes on tonight, I would suggest that we should not have any but the votes on Bill C-27 and hold Bill C-20 votes. Let us be satisfied with 10 or 12 votes tonight.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, that was my intention when I raised the issue. If we finish Bill C-20, we could tonight dispose of the votes which may be deferred. If we have not finished with Bill C-20 tonight, I think we should deal with the deferred votes on it all at the same time, but at a later stage.

● (1550)

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Conservative party's House leader raised the point concerning referral of the Auditor General's report. I believe the chairman of the public accounts committee would confirm the communication sent by the House leader of my party to the effect that this matter would be dealt with through the procedures of the House, and that there will be favourable consideration of the matter at that time; the matter ought not to be dealt with in the Auditor General's bill or the amendments thereto, but ought to be dealt with in its appropriate forum.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

MEASURE TO CHANGE NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Terrebonne) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-427, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Blainville-Deux Montagnes).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Speaker, I simply introduce this bill because the Electoral Boundaries Commission did not draw the required attention to the feeling of belonging to a region when choosing the name for a new riding, and did not take enough into account the importance of the number of citizens identified to that region for geographical, political and historical considerations, especially the area of Blainville, which is a part of it.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MEASURE TO CHANGE NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (for the hon. member for Saint-Henri (Mr. Loiselle)) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-428, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Saint-Jacques).

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MEASURE TO CHANGE NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-429, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Saint-Leonard-Anjou).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to change the name of a constituency, and I am introducing it on behalf of the hon. member for Saint-Michel who is also the Minister of National Revenue, and is absent.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, there have been certain discussions, and I would now seek the concurrence of the House to defer the votes on Bill C-27, the unemployment insurance bill, until 9.45 p.m.; also, to accommodate our desires for some special time to be available tomorrow in light of the death of one of our colleagues, I would ask that the House not sit between 2 p.m. tomorrow afternoon and 6.30 p.m.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What about the committees?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I take it that on the request of the minister the House is prepared to consent to an order deferring the divisions on the report stage of Bill C-27 until 9.45 this evening, and to an order that the House and its committees shall not sit tomorrow afternoon between the hours of 2 p.m. and 6.30 p.m., but that otherwise the House shall sit at the ordinary hours for this month, that is to say from eleven a.m. to 1 p.m. and from 8 p.m until 10.30 p.m. in the evening, for the consideration of government business.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is agreed and so ordered.

3. Who was responsible for organizing the display cars and who worked on them?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Following the ancient customs of the House, I do it at the first opportunity, in this case about ten seconds after the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Goodale) resumed his seat. A number of us have been struck by the fact that the order paper seems to grow larger and larger and the amount of information provided by way of answers to questions on the order paper smaller and smaller. Accordingly, I took it upon myself this afternoon to look at the first part of the order paper devoted to questions and I found that 31 questions, all set down on the same date, have not been answered. I refer to that list of questions beginning with No. 1 and ending with No. 121, all in the name of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) none of which has been answered. In other words, 31 of the first 121 questions on the order paper still remain unanswered.

The next question listed is No. 138, in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). It is apparent that the questions of one hon. member have received a singular lack of attention from the government. That has provoked my question of privilege and I intend to found a motion upon it. Certainly, in this House we confront a most serious situation.

Sir, I know that some of the questions which have been asked in recent years can be pretty annoying and pretty stinging, but in the first 30 questions set down in the order paper by the hon. member for Leeds the strongest language I can find, to which not even the most exceptional person could take exception, is contained in a phrase found in both questions 29 and 30 which reads:

. . .included attendance at Liberal party functions or political business of any kind, directly or indirectly?

I do not think there is enough sting in that to merit the stonewall thrust up before the hon. member for Leeds.

I remember the answers to other questions, and remember the famous exchange which arose from the statement the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) made in western Canada, the statement that ferocity toward love might be inspired by the eating of beef. Some bright soul in the bureaucracy—I would not give the Minister of Agriculture credit for it—was able to fish out an appropriate quotation from Shakespeare. That was part of a beautiful game. But I cannot see that the government's stonewalling tactics are any part of a beautiful game. I think they are an affront to us. If we ask a question the least bit penetrating, or with even a tincture of political punch—and I have not read them all because some are too long—they are not answered. However, I think the hon. member for Leeds has a complaint, because his questions have not been dealt with seriously by the government in the House of Commons.

● (1600)

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That the lack of responsiveness of members of the ministry to questions placed on the order paper within a reasonable period—

For the purposes of this motion I will state nine months as being reasonable.

—constitutes a breach of the privileges of this House, and that this failure should be sent at once to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to determine whether there is a deliberate decision not to reply.

In support of my motion I merely make this comment. Up to question 871 of October 29, presented by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), that all falls within the nine-month period that I suggest is a reasonable period. There are pages and pages to support my motion that we should become an open parliament and should have freedom of information.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, this is the third time in recent months that I have risen on the same point of order with reference to question No. 506 which was placed on the order paper on October 14. The last time I raised this question I received the personal assurance of the parliamentary secretary that he would look into this matter and that I would, indeed, receive a response. I have heard nothing from him since then. I very much resent the fact that I have not had a reply to that question which until now I had assumed was an innocent and innocuous one. I now gather that there is more beneath the surface than meets the eye in relation to the question that I posed. I again draw this most forcibly to the attention of the parliamentary secretary and you, sir.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise to add just a brief comment to the question of privilege raised a moment ago by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave). At approximately 2.30 this afternoon my office received a communication from a high-ranking member of the public service. I have since checked out, by telephone, this person's identity and the information left at my office. I find it, beyond any doubt in my mind, to be authentic.

The information is that answers to questions Nos. 1196, 1197, 1198 and 1199 have been prepared for some considerable time, and that a stop order has been issued on the answers to these questions being placed before the House by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer).

I feel I have the right to outline these questions. They all concern the constituency of Matane. They ask for information as to how many cabinet ministers visited that constituency over a set period of time; why they went there; how much public money was spent while there; who accompanied them, and why those people accompanied them.

It also asks for information with regard to cheques issued to the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané), on his behalf, and paid for by the Department of Supply and Services. It also asks for information about payments on behalf of the hon. member for Matane when he was parliamentary secretary to the minister of state for urban affairs and when he was parliamentary secretary to the secretary of state for external affairs, including trips made and paid for by the government, people who accompanied him, and the whole gamut which I previously mentioned with regard to cabinet ministers. This is a very serious situation. It becomes very serious when a member of this House asks questions in all sincerity, requesting information about expenses of members of the cabinet or others, where the expenses seem to be grossly out of line. This is something taxpayers have a right to know about. It becomes a very serious matter when the government stonewalls the answers.

In the case of these particular questions, I realize it can be said as it is often said and quoted from the rules with regard to questions—that there is no obligation or necessity for a minister to answer questions. However, as I have said before, there is a moral obligation on a minister to answer a question from a member of this House, and, through a member of this House, to the people of Canada as a whole. That moral obligation is not being fulfilled, for reasons I can only interpret as political. The person who contacted my office this afternoon advised that the answers to the specific questions which I have named would be so politically damaging to the government that they would never be answered. In fact, that person stated that the stop order said they must die on the order paper in this session of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: If that is so, and I believe it is so, parliament has seen this government sink to a new and dirty low. It is time the parliamentary secretary ceased to sit there and shake his head or rise to say that he will answer my questions, as he did a few weeks ago, when I become civil. That has nothing whatsoever to do with the matter. His personal opinion of me is no answer as to why he or the government should not be answering questions in this House. They are not being answered for obvious reasons.

The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants cited the general concept of what has gone unanswered on the part of a number of members who have placed questions on the order paper. I mentioned certain specific ones of my own. Some of us are like voices crying in the wilderness when we rise day after day asking why these things go on. This government sits here, ministers joy-riding around the country on government aircraft, and will not tell us how much they are paying from government funds. That is another set of questions that I have. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) apparently thought he made a fatal error in answering one of my questions by stating that he had spent three quarters of a million dollars on his own behalf. Why can we not know what all the other ministers have spent of taxpayers' funds, riding around on government aircraft such as Jetstars?

I placed another question on the order paper with regard to the Minister of Transport. I can get its number, if the parliamentary secretary wants me to look it up. Last November, over "Cross-Country Check Up", the Minister of Transport was asked by a telephone caller why shortly after his arrival on a Jetstar at Saskatoon airport another Jetstar arrived with five female passengers. The caller asked who were they and what they were doing on a government aircraft. The minister undertook, over CBC radio, to tell that listener that he would investigate, find out and give that as soon as possible. That was last November. It is now June. That is not "as soon as possible".

I also have a similar question on the order paper as to why private individuals should be tooting around the country on government aircraft. Who are they? Who gave them permission? What were they doing? The Minister of Transport sits idle, says and does nothing, as do most other ministers on the front benches. I know that one cabinet minister prepared an answer with regard to his personal travel and handed it in. It is being held up because other ministers refuse to prepare theirs. This is a disgrace.

I have no more to say other than I fully support the point raised by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon). It is time this House was turned into what it should be—a place where the people of Canada can get information and where this government can no longer conduct a farce instead of a government.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I will be brief on this. I seconded this motion because I agree entirely with it. The part that puzzles me is why the questions are left unanswered. For example, on February 8 I asked question No. 1772. It asked for the names and addresses of all lawyers and law firms in the constituency of Victoria who performed services during 1975 and 1976 for the Canadian Radio-Television Commission and, in each case, what was the total amount paid to them. I had on the order paper 15 or 20 similar questions dealing with Crown agencies. Every other one has been answered. It makes me suspicious that something funny has been going on with the CRTC in that area. Surely, it is just as easy to get an answer from the CRTC as from any other agency of government. The government was able to answer all the others, and to do so in prompt fashion.

I have another question, No. 1915, which should have gone to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson). It was asked over four months ago. It is a very simple question. The minister announced in one of his press releases that he would be making certain changes with regard to the closing of bases. He said they were going to dispose of 1107 Avenue Road, Toronto. My question was:

> What is the target date for closing or disposing of 1107 Avenue Road, Toronto, Ontario?

Four months later there is still no answer. I would even accept the answer that they do not know, or that they do not have a target date. However, for the question to be left on the order paper as if it were of no consequence is certainly not satisfactory to me. I am forced to the conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that this government is too incompetent to be mendacious in an orderly fashion.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Now that we are having this little session of raising points with respect to questions, I suggest that some very important questions remain unanswered. I cannot understand why. I have one particular example, a question I asked, which has been on the order paper since October 13, seeking information relating to our penal system and inmates in Canada with respect to indefinite sentences, dangerous sexual offenders, habitual offenders, and the number on parole. This can hardly be considered as political; it involves factual information which the government should have at its disposal.

Many people are interested in statistics of this kind. I would not object to a reasonable period of time elapsing before questions are answered, but this question cries out for an answer and I ask the parliamentary secretary to use his good offices to see that it is answered without further delay. The number is 487.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are departing from the original argument, which is part of the cause for the procedural difficulty we are in. The original motion was under the heading of privilege by the member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave). I am sure he will realize, along with the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) who seconded the motion, and the other hon. members who supported it, that the comments of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) were accurate when he said in the course of his contribution that of course there is no legal or technical obligation, under the rules—or whatever the language was—and no specific obligation on the ministry to give answers under our rules, as is well known; but there is a moral obligation.

That was the basis of the argument put forward by the hon. member for Leeds. That may be so, and that has been the subject of discussion today. It is the subject of discussion almost every day when questions are answered. But each day when questions are answered, of course, a number of questions are not answered. They become the subject of attention and discussion each day the parliamentary secretary does that.

However, that has always been part of our practice, and that was basically what was being done a moment ago by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn).

The House will realize, I am sure, that since there is no obligation on the ministry to make answers under our Standing Orders, it would not be possible for the Chair to find that the failure to give answers either to one set of questions or to one member would in any way constitute a breach of privilege. As to determining whether or not the failure to answer questions is a deliberate decision not to reply, I would have grave difficulty, even if I knew it was a deliberate decision not to reply, to constitute that as a question of privilege; because since there is no obligation to reply, it can hardly be called a breach of privilege or a breach of the rules in any way to fail to reply. Whether that be deliberate, or whether it be negligent, whether intentional or unintentional, since the rules do not require a reply, I cannot find the basis for a question of privilege in failure to reply. Therefore, with regret, I set aside the matter of privilege.

It still remains, as was done a moment ago as part of our regular practice, that each day when the question is put as to whether or not the remaining questions should be allowed to stand, members contribute any grievances they have respecting questions which are outstanding. So long as that intervention is in good faith and makes reference to questions which have, indeed, been outstanding for some time, the Chair has never interrupted.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to prolong the point, because you have already disposed of it as a question of privilege. However, I was going to make the point Your Honour has just made in dealing with it procedurally. But to deal with the substance of the issue which was raised, quite apart from the procedural question, may I say that the government does, of course, take very seriously all questions which appear on the order paper.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Goodale: I have noted the representations which have been made today in a serious fashion, although some of the gratuitous explanations surrounding them might not be all that well taken. I do take the points that hon. members have made as a clear indication of their desire in good faith to secure information. A few days ago, on a similar point of order, I replied at some length about the answering of questions which appear on the order paper. I do not intend to repeat all that argument today. It served, I think, to illustrate the magnitude of the task which has to be done in answering 2,823 questions which appear on the order paper as of today's date. I can only add at this point—this may be of some reassurance to members—that it is still my intention to proceed to answer all questions which appear on the order paper before the end of this session.

I will take particular note of the specific questions referred to today and see if there are ways to expedite those items in particular since they are of interest and concern to members. I trust they will believe in the good faith which exists on this side, just as I believe in theirs.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I, on behalf of my colleague from Winnipeg North, draw attention to six questions, four of which were filed on October 12, 1976, and two of which were filed on October 13, 1976? I am sure the parliamentary secretary realizes that to be told that hundreds of questions have been answered is no answer to its taking more than eight months to answer these questions. I have looked at them and I can understand it taking a month or so, but not eight months.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, there is just one point I would like to make. What concerns me, sir, is some of the remarks you have made which I think are proper. I do not argue that under the rules we have now, there is no obligation on the part of the government to answer questions, except for the fact that we have two forms of questions. We have those questions that are put in the question period in an oral way. Then we have written questions which the table is very careful to make certain are factual questions, seeking only information. There is a very significant gap between—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a complaint about a specific question, I am quite prepared to have him make it. I was not aware he had risen to make a contribution to the question of privilege.

Mr. Coates: I have some specific complaints to make, but I want to get down to the fact that every question here—and I have quite a number which are eight or nine months old—is the result of members working quite a long time to prepare and seek information of a factual nature. I do not think the excuse is good enough that there are 2,800 questions left on the order paper which are unanswered. If there were 2,800 questions on the order paper, put there last week and not answered, I would say that was all right. But some questions I have on the order paper are nine or ten months old. As the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) said, it is quite obvious that he is being discriminated against. There can be no other conclusion reached, because almost all the questions first put on the order paper were his questions. The government has determined that his questions are not to be answered. That is a breach of his personal privileges as a member of this House—

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Coates: There are no two ways about it. The fact of the matter is that questions which have been on the order paper for ten months or more have not been answered. The hon. member cannot be singled out, no matter whether it is information which is damaging to the government or otherwise. He is asking for factual information, and that is his right.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, further to the remarks made by the hon. parliamentary secretary. I am sure he would not want unintentionally to mislead the House or the country concerning the number of questions outstanding. The top question is No. 2823. He fails to take into account that all questions which have been answered have to be subtracted from that number to arrive at the number outstanding. There may be 400, 500 or 600 left to be answered. There are certainly not 2,800 left to be answered.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understood the parliamentary secretary to be referring to the number of questions he was attempting to answer, and not the ones outstanding.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I was referring to the total number of questions which have been asked in this session. I am glad my hon. friend has drawn attention to the fact that we have done rather well in answering questions, in that more than 70 per cent have been answered.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the revised practices of this month, it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised at six o'clock this afternoon are as follows: the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche)—Canadian International Development Agency—Request for names of countries which allegedly do not honour their commitments—Attitude toward aid to Indonesia; the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp)—Immigration—Request for minister's permit for the Rae family.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

AUDITOR GENERAL ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING OFFICE OF AUDITOR GENERAL

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-20, respecting the office of the Auditor General of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

[Mr. Coates.]

Mr. Speaker: There are seven report stage motions for which notice has been pursuant to Standing Order 75. On a very cursory examination of them, the Chair has serious misgivings about the first four. In my view, motions Nos. 1, 2 and 4 are related motions, in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), and motion No. 3 in the name of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). Upon my initial examination of them, the motions introduce a rather new proposal which goes beyond the scope of the clause of the bill which is sought to be amended by the motion.

I am prepared to hear argument from hon. members who are putting these motions forward at this time, which I will take under reserve. Then the House might want to proceed with consideration of motions Nos. 5, 6 and 7, if that is agreeable.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated to the government that my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), will not be here for another hour or so. I requested that discussion of the motions in his name, Nos. 1, 2 and 4, be deferred until a little later. I wonder if I could modify that request and ask that the discussion on the procedural aspects of motions Nos. 1, 2 and 4 be delayed until my hon. friend arrives from Winnipeg, as he will in an hour or so.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has just indicated, there were discussions earlier about how we might accommodate the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). It is certainly agreeable to the government if the items of business with which he is concerned could be stood aside until he arrives. Perhaps we could deal with other items in the meantime.

Mr. Speaker: That would leave us with some discussion on the procedural regularity of motion No. 3 in the name of the hon. member for Peace River. If the hon. member is prepared to do so, I might hear that argument now. Then the House could move to the discussion of motions Nos. 5, 6 and 7 until we receive some indication as to when the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) is prepared to defend the procedural aspects of his motions.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River) moved:

Motion No. 3.

That Bill C-20, an act respecting the office of the Auditor General of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, be amended by inserting immediately after clause 8 the following:

"8.1(1) The House of Commons shall establish a committee to be styled the "Committee on Public Accounts" at the commencement of the first session of each parliament or within thirty sitting days thereafter.

(2) The committee shall be composed of nineteen members of the House of Commons appointed in accordance with the custom of the House and shall, except as otherwise provided in this section, have the same powers and be subject to the same rules as a standing committee of the House of Commons.

(3) The chairman of the committee shall be elected from among members who are in opposition to the government.

(4) Every report of the Auditor General made pursuant to this act and every report of the Receiver General, called the public accounts, laid before the House of Commons pursuant to the Financial Administration Act stands permanently referred to the committee, and the committee may, on its own initiative, consider any evidence heard or tabled before it in a previous session or a previous parliament.

(5) The committee shall

(a) examine every report of the Auditor General or Receiver General made to the House of Commons,

(b) enquire into any matter referred to it by the House that relates to the report, and

(c) make recommendations on anything in the report that, in the opinion of the committee, requires the attention of the House of Commons.

(6) Notwithstanding any act, rule of law, custom or prerogative, every person who is competent and compellable under the Canada Evidence Act to testify in a court of law is a competent and compellable witness before the committee, and the committee may deal summarily with any contempt committed before it in the same manner and to the same extent as the House of Commons.

(7) Every person required to give evidence before the committee may invoke the protection of the Canada Evidence Act in the same manner and to the same extent as a person required to testify in a court of law.

(8) For greater certainty, in this section, "person" includes an employee of the Public Service of Canada."

He said: Mr. Speaker, there are one or two general observations I should like to make. For Your Honour's information, motion No. 3 simply seeks to set out in detail what is left silent in the act itself. Clauses 7 and 8 of the bill provide for the Auditor General to report annually to the House of Commons on the work of his office and whether, on carrying out the work of his office, he received all the information and explanations required. In addition, clause 8 refers to a special report being made by the Auditor General to the House of Commons. The bill stops there and, as hon. members opposite will argue, we are then driven back to the normal procedure which has existed heretofore. It is a normal procedure which has not worked.

I think the Chair can take judicial notice of the length of time which has elapsed on so many occasions between the reference by the Auditor General to the House, through the intervention of the Minister of Finance, of his annual or special reports and the time spent before those reports actually arrive for consideration by the public accounts committee. The time-span is so lengthy for hon. members to secure that desirable objection that it was thought there should be some detail spelled out in the legislation which would rectify this glaring omission. It is an obvious and intentional government omission as to how the report gets into the public accounts committee. I have sought to do this by the establishment of a statutory committee. I realize that appalls hon. members opposite because it has never been done before. I have heard the argument that we should not do things which have not had the approval or sanction of tradition in the House. If we ever get into the substance of it, that will be the argument made.

If Your Honour examines with care what clause 7 does, you will see it is a provision for reference to the House of Commons. I can see nothing inconsistent in that. I will make my argument brief because it is one which does not lend itself to longevity. It is an argument which will or will not be accepted by the Chair.

The way in which the report gets from the House to the committee is what I am trying to achieve by this amendment. I should hardly think it can be argued that that is not germane to the provisions of clause 7. The report comes to the House, and my amendment takes it a step further by saying, having come to the House, this is what we should do with it. It is not opposed to the provisions of the bill and it is not divergent from them merely because it has not been covered by the bill.

The government is not anxious to see anything in the legislation which would provide for some authority in the House to get the report into the hands of the committee as soon as possible. Because it is not intended by the government is no reason to argue that it is a principle which is divergent and different from that which is in the bill. Therefore, to hold that this amendment is inapplicable and out of order is to hold that it is impossible for members of this House, when the government introduces a bill, to set out in more detail the means by which the purpose of the bill can be achieved.

The purpose of this particular aspect of the legislation is to obtain means by which this House can most adequately deal with reports of the Auditor General. Rather than leaving them to be discussed and dealt with by the House, for the reasons which I have mentioned—the laborious way in which the government in the past has attempted to prevent this from taking place at a reasonable time—I have said we should set out in detail an extension of the principle of bringing the reports to the House to cover the manner by which they reach committee.

I do not think there is anything in that which offends the House rules. We have in the Statutory Instruments Act a provision which gives to a scrutiny committee the right to examine statutory instruments and provides that there shall be a permanent reference of statutory instruments, which are defined in that act, to this committee, which can be, under the terms of the Statutory Instruments Act, either a committee of the House or a joint committee of the House and the Senate. As Your Honour knows, we decided in our wisdom, coupled with the wisdom of the other place—which together constitutes a mighty torrent of wisdom—that we should refer these matters to a standing joint committee.

That is a precedent whereby in a bill there was a means established by which statutory instruments which were the subject matter of the bill were referred for discussion, consideration and report to a committee of parliament. While it is true that I have sought to go into more detail on how this should be done, the principle is on all fours with the principles in the Statutory Instruments Act. The reason I sought to do this in more detail was the very considerable problem this joint standing committee ran into in its attempt to set up ways and means by which it could fulfil its responsibilities. I think we had a very long period of gestation, almost two years, from the time it was thought advisable to have this committee established until it first started to function. I have sought to rectify that omission by providing in my amendment how this should be done.

I am simply trying to extend in some detail the means by which the House, having received a report from the Auditor General, then proceeds to deal with it. Second, this is not without precedent. Similar measures have been adopted with respect to other legislation. I suggest to Your Honour that while it may be appalling to members of the House because it is an innovation, if there is a reservation in Your Honour's mind as to the bona fide nature and regularity of this proposal, I think Your Honour should take this well known principle into account and give the benefit of the doubt to the regularity of the motion so that it can be debated.

I am not saying that at this time in order to persuade the government to accept it. The only alternative is that at third reading I would, of course, be free to make a motion to refer the bill back to committee for consideration, without specifying anything. The committee could deal with an issue of this kind. The difference is that I could have 40 minutes instead of 20 at that time, which is, of course, to my advantage. I do not know whether it would be to the advantage of the House, but I can advise the House that it can look forward to a 40-minute speech from me at third reading rather than a 20-minute speech at this time.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I hope what the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and I have to say meets the point of potential difficulty Your Honour might have. To my mind, the question is whether this amendment introduces a new principle to the bill. The plain and simple answer to that is that the amendment is merely a continuation of a point on which the bill is totally deficient. After all, clauses 6, 7 and 8 would refer reports to the House of Commons. Clause 7 says that the Auditor General shall report annually to the House of Commons, but it says nothing about what the House of Commons shall do.

These are reports to the House of Commons, not to the government, yet it is a well known fact that under the rules there has to be a motion from the cabinet to refer an item to any committee of this House, with the exception of the estimates. Therefore, the fact that the Auditor General is responsible to the House of Commons with regard to his annual reports can be totally and utterly blocked by the government by its refusal to call that order of business or by its refusal even to put it down. Therefore, it seems to me that the motion of the hon. member for Peace River is the most natural thing to include in the bill in order to dispose of these reports.

Our rules are totally sound. The Chair would be the first to admit that despite the almost weekly requests that the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization consider this or that aspect of difficulties in the rules, it is still the government House leader and the government who refuse to put forward motions to refer to appropriate committees. All the committees have been boning-up until now, save and except the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. It had its organizational meeting, but since that time it has done nothing. I think that has been an act of total contempt of this House by the government House leader.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Considering the representations which have come from the Chair and from various members, it seems all agree that changes have to be made. However, nothing is done about it. To that extent, proposed motion No. 3 is quite in order and does not introduce a new principle in the bill, because all it sets out is what the House of Commons shall do with the report. In order to handle the report, there has to be a committee. The House is not going to consider the report of the Auditor General in committee of the whole, because with the exception of budgetary measures the House does not sit in committee of the whole unless there is specific agreement to do so. I find it just a little difficult to understand why there might be any objection to motion No. 3 on the ground that it might raise another point.

Second, in most ways motion No. 3 embodies what is already a matter of practice, but it puts it down. I admit that I might have preferred seeing a good deal of what appears in motion No. 3 in a special section of our rules dealing with committees, but the point is that there are two avenues to go down, and the government has chosen neither. As will be remembered, when the bill setting up the committee to deal with statutory instruments was dealt with the procedure had to be spelled out in the bill, but under our rules it is totally deficient. The same could be said about certain tax convention bills where, due again to a refusal by the government House leader to refer matters to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, the appropriate changes have not been made in the rules with regard to affirmative and negative resolutions.

Unless Your Honour is able to indicate to me a particular point he may have as the objection, it is a little bit, shall we say, like punching a pillow to have to consider it in advance. It always seems that the proposers of motions have to prove themselves innocent as far as their motions are concerned. If you, Mr. Speaker, could enlighten us as to what is concerning you with regard to this motion, then perhaps we could discuss that point.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will, I am sure, be aware, because he addressed himself to the point very directly, as to whether or not the amendment goes beyond the scope of the clause which it seeks to amend and in fact introduces a new principle into the legislation. The hon. member addressed himself to the point rather ably, I thought. That is the concern the Chair has expressed in procedural terms, and I will have to give careful consideration and examination to the proposed amendment and will endeavour to return to the chair as soon as I have an indication that the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) is here to make an argument with respect to his other motions.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Now that you have indicated, Mr. Speaker, the point that concerns you—

Mr. Speaker: I identified that point when I spoke on the motion of hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin).

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I do not understand, Mr. Speaker. When I asked a question of you, Mr. Speaker, you intimated that I was on that particular point. I wanted to add that it was simply that the recommendation in the bill is not a great recital, and that if one is not on the list of the elected, one must consider oneself to be non-elected. It states:

—and for the purposes set out in a measure entitled "an act respecting the office of the Auditor General of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto".

The field is wide open.

Mr. Speaker: Of course, there are some major concerns about new concepts being introduced into the statutory law, not only of this act but those which affect other statutes. In any case, I will have to examine them carefully and return to the House as soon as I can. This leaves us with motions Nos. 5, 6 and 7 for consideration. Motion No. 5 is in the name of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). Perhaps the House might want to consider it at this time.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I must admit right away—and I hope Your Honour will take judicial notice of this—that when I believe I am wrong, I always say so; but when I do not admit I am wrong, there is a fair presumption that I may be right. Clause 11 of the bill reads:

The Auditor General may, if in his opinion such an assignment does not interfere with his primary responsibilities, whenever the governor in council so requests, enquire into—

At the committee stage I had two amendments. One read, "whenever the governor in council or the House of Commons so requests". Then I proceeded to follow that with motion No. 5, which stated:

"(2) Notice by the House of Commons under this section shall be deemed to be given when not less than 50 members have filed a request with the Speaker to the effect that the Auditor General enquire into and report on a matter"

It is quite obvious that without the first part of the motion, the rest is meaningless. In other words, if there is no reference to the House of Commons inserted in subclause (1) of clause 11 that the House of Commons, as well as the governor in council, has the right to make a request if in its infinite wisdom it thinks it is necessary that the Auditor General should make an inquiry, the rest of the motion is meaningless.

I am, of course, in the hands of my friends and enemies—I do not know where they sit on either side of the House—but without the first part of the amendment, which got lost in the woodwork between the committee and here, it is useless for me to proceed with motion No. 5. I simply ask Your Honour to ask for the consent of the House and of the minister to have this issue brought forth and discussed, because it would take the unanimous consent of the House for me to be able to move, at this stage, the first part of the change in the clause, namely, that the House of Commons, as well as the governor in council, should have the right to make this request of the Auditor General.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand the hon. member to say that the amendment was put forward in the committee, but was lost?

Mr. Baldwin: No, I was away and it did not come forward here. I brought forward 11 or 12 amendments in the committee. This is one which was part of the other clause, but was not carried.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I gather, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member is saying that by oversight subclause (1) has been omitted from what is now before us. That being the case, I certainly hope the House will consent to the hon. member presenting his motion in the form he wanted to present it, that is, including a subclause (1).

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if there might possibly be some consultation on that point. Clearly, the procedures of the report stage allow an hon. member to restore before the House motions that might have been put forward in the committee. Evidently, what has happened here is that the hon. member has put forward the substance of his motion without consequential aspects which give the sense and meaning intended in the amendment he proposed before the committee. In the circumstances, in order to give the hon. member permission at this stage to change the text of his amendment to restore its full meaning, the consent of the House would have to be given. Does the hon. member have the consent of the House to do that?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baldwin: May I read my amendment? I move:

That in the fourth line of clause 11 at page 5 of the bill, after the words "governor in council" the words "or the House of Commons" be added.

Let me point out, Mr. Speaker, that with due respect I put the words "House of Commons" after governor in council, where it belongs.

Mr. Speaker: It is understood that the text of the motion of the hon. member will have to be amended in order to give a proper description to his intention. But for the purpose of this discussion the House can assume that this will be done, and when the question is put the amendment will include language which will achieve the objective of inserting in line 4 of clause 11 on page 5 of the bill, after the word "council", the words "or the House of Commons", and that the rest of the subclause will continue; and that the same amendment moved by the hon. member as motion no. 5 will add subclause (2) to clause 11 as stated in motion No. 5. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Baldwin: I see I carried the government as far as I can. Now I will have to work a little harder to persuade them to adopt my motion. Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to the present effect of clause 11, which reads as follows:

The Auditor General may, if in his opinion such an assignment does not interfere with his primary responsibilities, whenever the governor in council so requests, inquire into and report on any matter relating to the financial affairs of Canada or to public property or inquire into and report on any person or organization that has received financial aid from the government of Canada or in respect of which financial aid from the government of Canada is sought.

This is a very desirable objective, but it leaves open what we have often discovered in this House in the course of the question period or parliamentary proceedings, when matters have been brought to the attention of hon. members, that demonstrate there is a state of affairs which justifies some immediate inquiry. The problem with most auditors general reports is that they are of a post-mortem nature: it is usually after the patient is dead and a fairly substantial odour is coming from the corpse that the auditor general is called upon to conduct a post-mortem examination and make a report. That is proper; that is essential; that is a condition precedent for any proper parliamentary examination. There are many occasions, however, when if something were brought to our attention by the Auditor General at the time it might prevent the loss of a very large sum of money—or even a very small sum of money—with important principles involved.

This government has rapidly increased its expenditures from $14 billion to $46 billion in a very few years. It has had a burgeoning bureaucracy to help with the spending and misspending of this money. In the result, sometimes situations come to the attention of members or their constituents, or even to members of the government, which require immediate attention. There is no doubt that is the reason for clause 11. The government may well discover something which in its opinion justifies immediate examination, so clause 11 was included in the bill.

I simply ask the reason for prohibiting the House of Commons from doing the same thing. We are the forum which has responsibility to the people for the expenditure of this $46 billion. Personally, I have been frustrated on many occasions when issues have come up or circumstances have arisen and it has become apparent there is an immediate need for the auditor general to make a study. In the public accounts committee we are still engaged in the study of some issues involving Crown agencies. Questions have been asked in this House, and proposals made in committee, to the effect that the Auditor General would be justified in engaging in an immediate examination rather than waiting until the accounts of this fiscal year come under the examination of his officers, which might be a year or a year and a half from now—much too late. The very fact that this clause was included is a tacit recognition by the government that there may well be a situation when it is necessary that an immediate examination be made, rather than waiting until the usual audit is completed. It is with this situation in mind that I make this suggestion.

I go a step further, Mr. Speaker, and suggest that because of the problems faced by this House, and particularly the opposition, in so many instances in securing the adoption of suggestions, there should be a current, rather than a post-examination of a certain situation. But the government simply says no. All that can be done, then, is for a member to put a private member's motion on the order paper. It usually sinks to the bottom of the pile; but even if it were at the top, under the rules of this House there is probably one chance in a thousand that it would ever come to a vote. It seems to me if the right is to be given to the House of Commons to initiate an immediate study, that right should be based on a simple and expeditious motion by which the House could get a motion passed and have the auditor general seized with jurisdiction to make the examination. I have taken the figure of 50 members. In doing so, I regret it would not permit my hon. friends to my left in the New Democratic Party to be involved; but I am sure if we in this party saw that members of the NDP or the Social Credit party had become aware of a situation which cried out for examination, we would be glad to lend enough support to ensure that the desired number would be achieved.

I see my hon. friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), looking at me sympathetically. He knows I mean that. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I offered this amendment saying, in effect, that if the governor in council can initiate a current investigation, why cannot we? And if we should have the right, why cannot we have the right to perfect it in a way that we expect it would be done, rather than go through the useless mechanism of requesting that a royal commission be established or that the auditor general be required to make a study?

I suggest my amendment in no way interferes with the government's right to make such a request. I hope when the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) responds, he will tell us why the government does not trust the House of Commons to initiate the kind of request for examination which the government has allocated to itself.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) will not be surprised when I tell him I cannot bring myself to accept his proposal although we have studied it for some time now and listened to arguments put forward by the hon. member in committee. We are not recommending adoption. I can certainly understand that from time to time the House of Commons would want matters to be referred expeditiously to the auditor general.

In view of the pressures that can be brought to bear in this chamber, however, and of the publicity, the concern—I will not use the definition that the hon. member did about the corpse and all that—there has been ample illustration over the years of the ability of this House to make that kind of suggestion and get it through. Matters can be raised under Standing Order 43 and many other avenues by hon. members can be followed and pressure can be brought to bear that way. I am afraid, however, that if it were as automatic as the amendment would seek, then the auditor general would be drawn into political matters very quickly, on many occasions. That would be regrettable. I think the Auditor General indicated in committee that he would be apprehensive about such a proposition. He would not look with favour on it, and I am almost quoting what he said before the committee.

Regrettably, we could not look with favour on this proposal. I might mention that we discussed 38 amendments in committee, which were consolidated into 21 amendments since some of them were variations and repetitions of other amendments.

Of those 21, I think we accepted 12 or 13. Regrettably, we were not convinced at the time that it would be wise to accept the hon. member's proposal. That explains our present position.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question? He was gracious enough to leave lots of time for a question. He suggested that the Auditor General and the government were afraid that this simple and expeditious procedure might lead to issues of a political nature being raised in the House of Commons. Will the minister guarantee that when the government raises issues for the Auditor General to consider, they will not be of a political nature?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I think it is a matter of degree. I certainly feel that we should be referring matters of a serious nature; they could have political implications.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the stand the minister has taken is characteristic of the attitude of the Canadian ministry and stands in sharp contrast to the attitude in Westminster, if I may use that as an example. In considering legislation over there, ministers are much more conciliatory and more attuned to accepting amendments proposed either by the opposition or by government backbenchers. They are not afflicted with the "not invented here" syndrome with which Canadian bureaucrats advising ministers are afflicted.

As most of us know—and I know, for I have served on many committees, particularly this year—when our ministers deal with legislation and a member proposes an amendment, they will say, "No, we cannot accept it. We sympathize, oh, yes." There is no suggestion in the committee meeting of outright rejection. It is almost like our private members' hour. Beneath all the flowers, partial agreement, sympathy, and what have you, there is that absolute "No." That is, shall we say, one of the less admirable features of our Canadian cabinet system. The Canadian cabinet, without doubt, has established a dominance over the House. But it fails to recognize that the administration behind it has established a dominance over the cabinet. Some officials advise cabinet ministers not to accept amendments of this sort—"Oh, they might cause problems. We never thought of them; therefore they cannot be that good." That is the unfortunate psychosis, shall we say, or mental condition which afflicts those on the government side in the consideration of amendments emanating from the opposition or even from the government's own backbenchers.

The minister has already closed his mind. I was going to argue in support of my friend, but I already have the answer—"No." Therefore, I shall leave the House, speculating only on how the minister would have argued. Surely, hon. members know that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) wants to strike a blow on behalf of members of the House of Commons. I am astonished at the sheep-like, absolutely "blah" attitude of government backbenchers who do not realize their own throats are being cut. I was going to use another phrase. They do not realize they are being totally neutered by cabinet action. They will not be able to call in question anything the cabinet does in this regard. No doubt the governor in council could ask for a report, but the amendment says that when 50 members file a request, the auditor general shall look into it and report on the matter.

Those 50 members could include members on both sides of you, Mr. Speaker, and the inquiry could be on questions about which this House is greatly concerned. Frankly, I am disturbed by the minister's refusal to accept this amendment, which is an entirely reasonable one. It is the sort of thing with respect to which I have heard government backbenchers saying privately, "I wish the ministers would bend their stiff necks." They want members of the House to have some say in the administration of this question, or the discharge of their duties as individual members, instead of being mere rubber-stamps or nay-sayers at the cabinet's behest.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on motion No. 5 in the name of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion? All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Accordingly, the vote on the motion stands deferred. The House will now consider motion No. 6.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River) moved:

Motion No. 6.

That Bill C-20, an act respecting the office of the Auditor General of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, be amended in clause 14

(a) by striking out line 11 at page 6 and substituting the following therefor:

"corporation, which, along with the financial statements of the corporation or its subsidiary, shall be provided to the Auditor General forthwith upon their receipt by the corporation or its subsidiary.";

(b) by striking out line 12 at page 6 and substituting the following therefor:

"(2) the Auditor General shall request a";

(c) by striking out lines 25 and 26 at page 6 and substituting the following therefor:

"explanations, he shall so advise the governor in council, who shall thereupon direct the."

He said: Mr. Speaker, the perspicacity of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) pleases me, because he knows exactly what rights I have attempted to secure for the people of Canada through the agency of this House. This bill, so far as the auditor general is concerned, represents an improvement over the Financial Administration Act under which the auditor general is operating. The auditor general is to be governed by the auditor general legislation and he is to be given some help for discharging his duties. However, this bill does nothing for the House of Commons. I somehow have the old-fashioned idea that the House of Commons exists as a place in which hon. members representing some 23 million people and a large number of taxpayers can examine with care and in different ways exactly how the money provided by the taxpayers of Canada is used.

As I said a while ago, we have just been through, and are still engaged in, an exercise where the public accounts committee is struggling desperately under the antiquated rules inflicted upon it to try and find some information about the CANDU sales and Polysar. There has been a massive lack of success. It is not that members of all parties in this committee have not been struggling diligently and honestly in trying to secure that information. However, it is being denied them. That is one of the reasons the first amendment I proposed, which is now under consideration by Mr. Speaker, sought to provide for a more fundamental way of securing information. As the hon. member for Edmonton West said, information is the thing which this House is continually denied.

Earlier this afternoon, when dealing with a question of privilege, there was a very sharp observation. I regard it as a judicial statement, namely, that there is no responsibility on the part of the government to provide information. There is no truer statement. I have been out of this House for the past few days. Other interesting phenomena have been carried on here. Members of this party and the New Democratic Party have been trying to find out information. When I saw one of my constituents not long ago, he said to me, "Jed, are you going back there to find out from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) why they are not going to give us some of the facts?"

I told my constituent that under the rules which prevail in this House, when a minister has made a statement the members of the House are compelled to accept that statement. My friend said, "That is a very silly rule. Fortunately, I am not bound by it. I have a very healthy skepticism with regard to what the Prime Minister and the Minister of Supply and Services said. I am glad I do not have to abide by the rules and accept what has been said in the House by the right hon. gentleman and the hon. gentleman." I think he had a point. Being a member of the House, while in the House I am bound to accept it, although my constituent had a very sensible and healthy approach to which we in this House could possibly give some thought.

In any event, what I am seeking to do by this amendment is change clause 14 so that the public accounts committee will no longer be frustrated by the problems which they have faced and are still facing in their diligent and difficult attempt to come to grips with the scandal of CANDU and Polymer sales. It is obvious to many members of the committee that while some information may come out, there will be sufficient cover-ups. Outside a stroke of luck, it will be impossible for that committee to make the kind of report it should make so that we in this House, and through us the people of Canada, will know exactly what games are being played by some of these agencies.

One reason which inspired me to move motion No. 6 is that when reading through the transcript of the proceedings of the committee I discovered there was utter contempt shown by the witnesses appearing before the committee for the views, anxieties and members of the committee to dig information out of them. Any witness appearing in any court in which I have practiced adopting the same attitude as those witnesses would have gone to jail for contempt, as they should have. However, these people are free to go throughout the country. They have no obligation, no responsibility and no sanctions against them. The committee has not been able to get the information. Because the committee has not been able to get it, the House has not been able to get it and, therefore, the country has not been able to get it. On how many occasions will that be repeated?

The purpose behind my motion is to provide a compulsory responsibility on a Crown corporation or a subsidiary of a Crown corporation to ensure that the auditor general secures copies of reports and accounts; that the auditor general "shall"—not "may"—request a Crown corporation to furnish him with such further information as he requests. That is not the case at the present time. Finally, if he does not get it, he shall so advise the governor in council, who may direct the officers to furnish it.

If that sort of provision had been in the existing Financial Administration Act, the previous auditor general, Mr. Maxwell Henderson, and the present Auditor General would now have had, by compulsion, information which they were entitled to have, or someone would have gone to jail. That is the kind of power which should rest with the auditor general, and ultimately in us as his employer. He is our agent, our servant, although you would not know it from this bill. Consequently, at the appropriate time the knowledge of the auditor general would be the knowledge of this House. Affairs like CANDU and Polymer would no longer be permitted.

It is not just the presence of the act or provisions of this kind, but knowledge on the part of those who may well be wrongdoers, that there is a provision whereby information can be obtained. When there is that sort of provision contained in legislation, people who would contemplate doing wrong would be aware of it. Obviously, it would constitute a major deterrent. Without it, I see no reason why we could not have a repeat of the CANDU and Polymer affair running well into the future. It is in the hope that we can give to the people of Canada some belief that we mean business and will try and avoid a repetition of these incidents that I move this motion.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, once again we discussed this very thoroughly when we were dealing with the details in committee. I believe the effect of the proposed changes are twofold. First, the expansion of the information that is to be submitted to the auditor general is really a question of word meaning. There is no argument about the fact that he should have access to complete information from Crown corporations and the like. I indicated then, as I indicate now before the House, that to add the word "corporation" along with the words "financial statements of the corporation", and so on, as contained in subclause (a) of the amendment of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), is unnecessary. I am told by the profession and other people that it is really included. An auditor's report would include financial statements of the corporation, and so on. Therefore, the argument is that it is not necessary.

The other matter is more of a policy matter than simply wording. It seeks to make this a mandatory requirement on the part of the auditor general; that he shall do this, or shall do that. Indeed, one of the attempts that we made in the Auditor General Act as it is now before us was to retain and strengthen his independence. We have worded clause 14 so that he exercises his discretion. To change the word "may" to the word "shall" would remove his discretion and make it binding on him to do this. Indeed, I have to tell hon. members that having had this examined by the Wilson committee, and having discussed it with the Auditor General, he feels that if the word "shall" were imposed in the clause or section, it would tend to restrict his responsibility to exercise his professional judgment.

I doubt very much that there would be any suggestion, nor do I imply there would be a suggestion, that the auditor general would ever collude in not exercising his judgment to require this information if he felt there was, by his own professional examination, that necessity. Therefore, it is our preference to leave the wording as is in the bill before us, as it was before the committee. Indeed, we would regret the insertion of the detail in subclause (a) making it mandatory in the case of the auditor general.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Speaking to the amendment, may I say I share the views of my hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) about subparagraphs (a) and (c). I tend to agree with the minister that the auditor general is best protected as to his independence by giving him a choice to exercise his judgment as set out in paragraph (2). In paragraph (1) there is no mention of discretion on the part of the auditor general, but there is very definitely a greater power granted to him.

As I understand it, there have been recent cases where it has been held that the books and records of a subsidiary of a Crown corporation need not be produced. Perhaps my hon. friend from Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) can confirm that statement. It was the experience of the public accounts committee that an objection on this ground was raised and sustained; a subsidiary need not supply to a Crown corporation or to the auditor general information which is sought. All that subparagraph (a) does is attempt to force the production of that information. It does not in any way inhibit the judgment of the auditor general.

I was extremely surprised to find the minister rejecting the amendment contained in subparagraph (a) of motion No. 6. It may be he does not understand it in the terms I do, but my hon. friend from Peace River was trying to close a loophole which had frustrated the public accounts committee under the chairmanship of my hon. friend from Northumberland-Durham.

The minister would be the first, I think, if he were ever to sit on the public accounts committee, to want what is contained in subparagraph (a). I would agree with him about subparagraph (b). As far as subparagraph (c) is concerned, I believe my hon. friend from Peace River is right on target, because notwithstanding the preservation of the independence of judgment of the auditor general under subparagraph (c), if he so advises the cabinet or the governor in council that he has failed to obtain, by reason of refusal or inaccessibility, records, documents, and so on, which he thinks he should have, there is still a loophole open: the governor in council may say, "Be a good boy and don't rock the boat. You should not have this information." I say this because final discretion is left with the governor in council. It completely saps the power and independent judgment of the auditor general.

There are in this case two discretionary powers, one following the other, and I would have thought that here, again, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), in order to remedy the deficiencies which have appeared in the powers of the auditor general, would have greeted wholeheartedly subparagraphs (a) and (c). I would ask the minister to reconsider his views in light of the representations, especially if my hon. friend from Peace River is prepared, as I think he would be, to withdraw subparagraph (b). I make an earnest plea to the minister. What the amendments do is to plug, not a loophole but a hole in the wall through which one could drive a coach and four or, in more modern terms, a tandem truck. I ask the minister, and members on both sides, to support me in my contention with regard to motion No. 6.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am greatly touched by what my hon. friend from Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has said, and I am prepared to make a compromise. After all, we are approaching Canada Day and everyone is in an amiable mood. I would be prepared to withdraw subparagraph (b) if the minister will accept subparagraphs (a) and (c).

Mr. Andras: I am most impressed by the eloquence of the hon. members who have spoken and by the reference to Canada Day and the like. But with regard to the question raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) in connection with the records of subsidiary companies, I may say I know what he is getting at. I will make the point that I attempted to make in another forum—that it is really a matter of definition of subsidiary association with a Crown corporation and definition of a Crown corporation itself. This, in my opinion, is much better left to the definitions section of a revised Financial Administration Act, perhaps in combination with a forthcoming omnibus bill using the Crown Corporation Act as the basic legislation. Even if the amendments in subparagraphs (a) and (c) were accepted, their implementation would still require the definition of a Crown corporation and of a subsidiary.

Mr. Baldwin: I have one.

Mr. Andras: Well, that would mean more legislation. I really think that the good arguments which have been employed should be left until we bring forward amendments to the Financial Administration Act. There is a good deal of work still to be done there to clear up misunderstandings and bring the definitions up to date, including the whole question of the relationship between Crown corporations and subsidiaries, the degree of ownership and control, and so on. So although I understand what the hon. member is getting at, I feel strongly that amendments should be left until we bring the other bill before the House. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) rose on a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not think I can allow the minister to speak a second time on the motion. The hon. member for Peace River asked a question, to which I assumed he was expecting a brief reply, "Yes" or "No." The minister cannot speak a second time without consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House consent to allow the minister to speak a second time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I have completed my comments on subparagraph (a). I shall not comment on subparagraph (b) because there seems to be a hung jury, anyway. But since I am not prepared to accommodate the hon. member with regard to (a) and (c), I suppose (b) will have to stand or fall in accordance with the decision of the House.

I would point out, though, that we have made refusal of information progressively tougher. The auditor general may request it, and if he is not given it he may direct his inquiry to the governor in council. Let us not forget that if the governor in council does not proceed by way of its discretionary powers under this clause, the auditor general, by virtue of other clauses, will have authority to make the decision public in the House. I think we shall stay with an arrangement which has been thoroughly discussed with the Auditor General and with the Wilson committee which looked directly into this area.

Mr. Baldwin: I do not have the same confidence in government counsel as you have.

• (1730)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is now on motion No. 6 in the name of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

[Mr. Andras.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Motion No. 6 (Mr. Baldwin) negatived.

Mr. Alan Martin (Scarborough West) moved:

Motion No. 7.

That Bill C-20, An Act respecting the office of the Auditor General of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, be amended in Clause 14 by adding immediately after line 11 at page 6 the following new subclause:

"(2) The Auditor General or his representative is entitled to receive notice of every meeting of the Audit Committee of a Crown corporation and to attend and be heard thereat."

and by renumbering the subsequent subclause accordingly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to section 11 to Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

If hon. members will allow the Chair to inquire whether there is a decision ready on motions Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4, we could have the decision quickly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), would have been here by now, but his plane must have been delayed or something. Is it possible to proceed to something else and leave motions Nos. 1, 2 and 4 until later?

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We could go on to the adjournment motion, on which there will be only one question, if you would like to call it six o'clock; but you would have to give us five minutes to call in the one member who is prepared to speak in the adjournment debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In any case I have called on Mr. Speaker, and we will have to wait to see what his decision is.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have given some consideration to motion No. 3 standing in the name of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). I am endeavouring to do all I can to support the notion that the motion does not introduce a number of new principles into this bill, and I am having great difficulty with that. At this moment I cannot be very encouraging with respect to the likelihood that the House will go on to debate that motion.

This leaves us with the motions standing in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), which remain in some procedural doubt. It was a pleasant development that the House finalized so speedily its consideration of the report stage of Bill C-27 during the two hours this morning. Therefore it is not extraordinary that the hon. member for Winnipeg North might be caught by surprise. However, it leaves us in some difficulty about business. I wonder if it might be appropriate for the House to move to consideration of other matters or another government order.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, the next items of business, as I indicated earlier, would be two finance bills, Bill C-5 and Bill C-18, which deal with currency and exchange and Bretton Woods. Both bills stand at report stage. I notice the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Kaplan) is not here at the moment. I understand he will be here momentarily. If other hon. members are ready to proceed with those two items, I am sure the government would be ready to proceed as well.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the House for the delay of my colleague, which is putting us in a spot where we have to take it easy for a few minutes, but I do not think that will hurt us.

While Your Honour was out of the chair and Mr. Deputy Speaker was in the chair, a suggestion was made that we might proceed to the adjournment debate by calling it six o'clock. Perhaps we could have your ruling on motion No. 3 and then proceed to the adjournment debate. If my colleague is not here when we convene at eight o'clock tonight, I will not ask for any further delay.

Mr. Speaker: In a general way I can certainly give the House the benefit of my decision in respect to motion No. 3. We examined several paragraphs of the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). Further to the point of order and the arguments made earlier, we had to address ourselves to two considerations. The first was in relation to the principle of the bill itself, because a motion at this stage has to be consistent with the principle of the bill, and it must not exceed the scope of the clause which it seeks to amend. The bill itself establishes, as a new practice, the ability of the Auditor General to table a different kind of report from that which he has been able to table in the past, that is to say, generally it would be a special report under circumstances where the Auditor General feels it is necessary.

The purpose of clause 8 is to permit the Auditor General to make that kind of report. The purpose of the motion, in basic terms, is to endeavour to indicate what the House will do with a report as and when it is received in the circumstances as described in the statute. While that motion may not in itself be such as to offend the precedents and practices of the House with respect to amendments, the motion itself goes much further than that.

Rather than attempting simply to establish some disposition by the House of reports of the Auditor General of this sort when they are received, the motion goes on in rather extensive provisions to do such things as establish, at the beginning of every session of parliament, a standing committee of the House, which is a different practice than that which we now follow pursuant to our Standing Orders, to establish the membership of the committee, and to establish compulsorily that the chairmanship of the committee shall be filled by hon. members who sit in opposition to the government. Those provisions alone contain amendments to the practices of the House which are rather substantial in nature, and it seems to me that to reach so far as to attempt to alter substantially the practices of the House in respect to the establishment of committees which are to operate independent of orders of reference of the House and which are constructed by statute or constituted by statute is to depart from the present practice of the House with respect to orders of reference.

This motion would impose conditions, which would be a departure from those which now exist, in respect to an automatic order of reference to a standing committee independent of an order of the House; reach through this statute to attempt to alter the structure of standing committees; alter conditions under which committees operate, and in effect direct members of the committees when they are consituted together on how they shall proceed to do their business; and specifically it would direct the members of a committee to choose their chairman from among the members. While that is a practice of the House at the present time,—and it is a very laudable practice—indeed it is never a practice which has been attempted to be enshrined in legislation. Surely if that attempt is to be made it would have to be made through an amendment to the Standing Orders of the House.

The motion goes on to alter provisions of the Financial Administration Act. It goes on to extend powers of the committee to sit independent of the House, and things of that nature. All of it varies extensively the practice of the House which, as I say at first blush, must be done by amendments to the Standing Orders.

The purpose of what I have said is simply to describe the structure of the amendment. Again I say that the intent of the amendment, which was defended by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), is to attempt to extend the statute by describing how the House will deal—or to set up some manner of dealing—with these reports. This may—and I say may—have been achieved, but that is entirely different from what is proposed here. That is the intention and the motivation of this amendment, but to go on to describe in detail the membership of the committee, its structure and its powers, which are different from those of any other committee now sitting, seems to me to go far beyond what was ever anticipated as a part of the principle of this bill—and certainly far beyond the scope of any one clause—which provides simply that the Auditor General may report to parliament through Mr. Speaker, and that that report will be tabled in the usual way.

After very careful consideration I must find that in some very fundamental ways this motion does more than go beyond the scope of any clause which it seeks to amend, and in fact goes beyond the principle of the bill and introduces entirely new concepts into the practices of the House which I think would have to be done in a different way.

There may be some disposition in the House to call it six o'clock and to proceed to deal with the items which have been called for at that time. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY—REQUEST FOR NAMES OF COUNTRIES WHICH ALLEGEDLY DO NOT HONOUR THEIR COMMITMENTS—ATTITUDE TOWARD AID TO INDONESIA

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, since last February when I raised the question on CIDA that is at the core of the present debate, two significant things have happened. First, Michel Dupuy has taken over as president of CIDA, launched a drive to tighten up and improve the management of that agency, and appeared before three House committees. At his last appearance Thursday before the public accounts committee he reported that he had implemented more than half of the Auditor General's 92 recommendations for improving the management operation.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Second, the North-South Conference has come to its conclusion. The final communiqué listed 21 points of disagreement and only 20 points of agreement. It was not a happy conclusion. Thus, we have not made much substantial progress in putting into place the structural changes in trade and monetary systems needed to build up self-reliance in the least developed countries.

Where does this leave us? The work of CIDA continues to be of the utmost importance since aid programs, despite their limitations, are still very necessary. Therefore Canada ought to be progressing toward the .7 per cent of the gross national product figure that is the United Nations goal. As it is, we are going in a reverse direction since Canadian aid has slipped from .58 to .51 per cent of GNP in the last two years. But who can argue for a higher volume of Canadian aid until parliament and the public are assured that aid is being directed and administered in the best possible way? The Auditor General last year found a "very unsatisfactory state of financial control" in CIDA and set up a major audit which led to 92 recommendations. As a result of last week's meeting with the Public Accounts Committee we learned from the deputy Auditor General that there is in place "a well-balanced plan" to implement the recommendations which have been made.

Progress is being made. But of course we are not yet satisfied that CIDA is being run in the most efficient manner. Another auditor's report will be needed. Not even that, however, will be sufficient, for the Auditor General concentrates on control systems. In order to evaluate the effectiveness of Canadian aid programs we must go beyond control systems and have access to CIDA's country reports which describe the intentions of aid programs in the economic, social, and political context of the recipient country.

CIDA has for a long time needlessly employed the confidential stamp on much of its most relevant material. Even as late as last week CIDA was denying me access to the Auditor General's list of 92 recommendations. It took the pressure of the Public Accounts Committee meeting to make that list available to me. On reading it, I cannot see any possible reason for the previous confidentiality, except to avoid embarrassment to CIDA's former president, who left his successor with a leaky ship. If CIDA is to complete the process of regaining the confidence of parliament, the country reports must be made available. It is neither fair nor reasonable to ask members of parliament to vote CIDA's $1.1 billion budget without at the same time making available to us relevant information, as distinct from CIDA's public relations material.

We want to know some basic facts. What is CIDA doing to ensure that more aid goes for community development in rural areas of developing countries? What pressure is being put on the administrations of developing countries to enforce internal reforms so that the fruits of development get to the massive rural populations and not just the elite? What is CIDA doing about ensuring a strong Canadian input into development strategies for the third development decade? What is the amount of the Canadian contribution to the special action program set up by the North-South Conference?

There is a great deal at stake as we put together an improved CIDA operation and an enlarged Canadian role in the continuing north-south dialogue. The first priority has got to be on building Canadian public opinion to support CIDA, and to accomplish that CIDA has to do a better job of explaining itself.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) raised some questions concerning a statement in the Auditor General's report related to CIDA where it says that certain countries do not honour their commitments. He asked whether Canada will maintain a high level of aid to Indonesia without publicly protesting the violation of human rights in that country where so many political prisoners are being held.

In the light of our experience in the field of development cooperation in the last twenty-five years, it appears clearly, Mr. Speaker, that if there is one thing the under-developed countries are not joking about, it is their own development. With a few exceptions, they are not taking their commitments lightly. They do not come back either on commitments made with their partners or on arrangements made to achieve some projects to straighten out and restore their own economy.

However, it must be recognized that we are speaking here of underdeveloped countries, of poor countries, where shortages of all sorts are the rule rather than the exception, and where planning capacities and management experience are often scarce. By that very fact, we are dealing with countries where our help must be concentrated in a manner and spirit of true cooperation.

I think we all realize that errors in planning and implementation are inevitable and that the beneficiary-country can find itself unable to supply the promised resources for lack of them on the local market or lack of funds. As a result, the work of CIDA is occasionally delayed or made more complex, which is unfortunate but inevitable. As for the report of the Auditor General, I would merely add that we hear much more, and rightly so, of its negative aspects; on the other hand, to get an overall view of the situation, we should remember that the Auditor General mentioned a marked improvement during the fiscal year 1975-76, in the application of measures intended to tighten the financial control and improve the administration.

The problem of the violation of human rights has recently been given more attention in the press. I am convinced that all hon. members are happy to see the renewed interest in that most complex and persistent problem. The attitude of Canada, with regard to the violation of human rights in other countries, has traditionally been based on the conviction that it is easier to influence the internal policy of other countries, and really improve the living conditions of the persons involved, if we proceed slowly, making representations through diplomatic and other official channels, while maintaining good relations with those countries. In the specific case of Indonesia, the Canadian government is aware that there are political prisoners in that country; indeed, it brought up the matter at top level meetings, thus voicing the concerns of many Canadians about the problem.

An alternative to our traditional policy would be to denounce publicly, on behalf of the Canadian people, the violations that are brought to our attention. This would cause serious problems. First, such an initiative would bring about resentment and official protests against our interference in the internal affairs of sovereign states. We would then be faced with the law of decreasing efficiency, since Amnesty International and other groups have gathered evidence of serious violations of human rights in over one hundred countries, including most Third World countries. Even worse, it is not very likely that this would improve the situation of those victims of the oppression that are not known internationally, not considering that in certain cases, in some countries, their situation could become even worse. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out in his statement of last March 3, our policy in that regard will be very flexible.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

AUDITOR GENERAL ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING OFFICE OF AUDITOR GENERAL

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-20, respecting the office of the Auditor General of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) has three motions at report stage which would seek to amend Bill C-20, an Act respecting the office of the Auditor General of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

As I indicated earlier in the day, I had some concern that the hon. member's amendments were introducing into this statute a new concept of the responsibilities of the Auditor

General—something that went beyond the scope of the bill and certainly beyond the scope of the clauses the hon. member seeks to amend—by introducing responsibilities that were entirely foreign to those envisaged by the legislation. From a procedural point of view it gave the Chair some concern and I thought the hon. member for Winnipeg North ought to be given the opportunity to defend his motions. I now recognize the hon. member.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us, C-20, deals with the office of the Auditor General of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

It seemed pretty obvious to me, both as a member of parliament and as one who attended the majority of the meetings of the standing committee that deals with the Auditor General's reports and that dealt as well with this bill, that it has come before us because the experience of the last few years has demonstrated that the powers parliament had given to the Auditor General did not give him the authority he needed to do his work in the way in which parliament would like to see it done. He did not have the power to get and to give information to parliament and the people of Canada which they required, something which was behind the whole principle which parliament adopted when it established the position of Auditor General.

I do not want to abuse my rights by going into lengthy detail about the kind of committee meetings where the Auditor General and other people testify; suffice it to say that in my years in parliament I have never sat on a committee in which there was less division, and fewer party differences than that committee. This was because we were confronted, time after time, with tales of horror such that no member of the committee, regardless of party, could be anything less than worried. I will not go into detail.

Committee members hear with amazement how Polysar and its multiple subsidiaries carry on business, in a manner so bad that no member of Polysar or its subsidiaries will take responsibility for what was done. We heard of money being paid into numbered accounts in other countries, of unknown people being paid off for unexplained reasons. Similarly, in the case of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, we heard certain disturbing facts concerning the sale of reactors to Argentina and South Korea. I shall not discuss these at present. If the Auditor General had been given more authority, or more clearly defined authority and responsibility with respect to members of parliament, the government and the corporations whose books he ought to have audited, we would have avoided much of the difficulty about which we heard, and the people of Canada would have saved tens of millions of dollars. And, in essence, to overcome those shortcomings Bill C-20 was introduced. It is to broaden and clarify the authority and responsibility of the Auditor General.

I support the bill, as did other members of the committee, regardless of party. I am not trying to change the bill's fundamental character; I am trying to define more clearly the Auditor General's authority, to allow him to give parliament the information I believe parliament needs. I do not suggest, for example in my first amendment, that the Auditor General should have the right to say the registered retirement savings plan is a bad plan, which I think it is; or that the registered home ownership savings plan has saved people, mainly in upper income groups, substantial amounts of tax, which I believe it has, and therefore people in lower income brackets are forced to pay more personal income tax to meet the expenditures of the Government of Canada. I do not say the Auditor General should say if the accelerated write-off of corporate assets for taxation purposes is good or bad.

On the other hand I say that parliament and the people of Canada have the right to know how much money would have accrued to the Government of Canada in the absence of provisions for accelerated write-off of corporate assets for tax purposes. I believe parliament is better able to assess the effect of such provisions than is some partisan expert who has his own opinion as to how taxes should be applied. I say these questions are for parliament to decide. I therefore say that parliament could do a better job in this regard if the Auditor General, appointed by the Parliament of Canada, reports to the people by reporting to parliament and not to the government. For example, we should know how much money the government collects through corporate taxes and through personal income taxes. Armed with such information, we could understand better the workings of the Income Tax Act.

Similarly, I say it is not the Auditor General's task to comment on the effects of indexation of personal income tax. He should not say if it is moral or immoral. I happen to believe that the indexation of personal income taxes has been of benefit mainly to people in middle and upper income brackets. If you pay little income tax, what difference would indexation make? Why should the person who pays $100 or $200 income tax be overly concerned about the indexation of income tax? On the other hand indexation for those paying, say, $20,000 a year in income tax means a substantial amount of relief. For those reasons I propose my amendments. As I say, my proposals would not change the basic purposes and duties of the Auditor General, as outlined in Bill C-20.

Some senior civil servants who looked at our amendments in committee said that we do not know precisely how the amendments would work in practice. That is true. It is not our job to analyse in detail how our proposals would work. That is the job of permanent officials. Our job, as members of parliament, is to get as much information as possible on this subject, and one of our main sources of information is the Auditor General, who is an expert in accounting, non-partisan because he is a public servant, completely objective, I suggest, because he reports to parliament directly, and not to the government as do 90 per cent of public servants, and reports the facts as he sees them.

We know, from annual reports of the previous Auditor General who was appointed by the Conservative government and of the present Auditor General who was appointed by the Liberal government, that Auditors General do precisely what I suggested. Because they have effectively turned the spotlight on poor management practices and mistakes made by the government and senior public servants, governments do not love them, do not love even those Auditors General they themselves appoint.

In the objections raised to one of my proposed amendments it was suggested that the presentation of a tax expenditure budget by the Auditor General, as suggested in my amendment, would involve so many vexed questions concerning taxes and so much argument concerning what is and what is not a tax expense, that the solution to the question would require the application of much manpower and time and perhaps involve the Auditor General in political questions. I have already dealt with that. I do not want the Auditor General to make moral judgments. I simply want him to give parliament the information which I believe parliament should have if members of parliament are to do the job they are required to do. I do not believe that the questions involved are so difficult that arbitrariness is inevitable.

One of the objections is that the consequence of a tax expenditure budget which I put forward would mean the inclusion as a matter of course of questions on a number of items, and that would be misleading to say the least. Either the questions are difficult or they are not. If there are severe problems deciding what will go in, one cannot argue that the concept of tax expenditures is so strict that one cannot avoid putting in some things that somebody would prefer to leave out. Conversely, if the problems are so straightforward that they have already been decided, there is not much choice as to what will or will not go in.

It is difficult to see how the Auditor General will get himself involved in political questions or find himself faced with difficult problems which he will not know how to solve.

What we are asking is not something new. It is not something so radical that it has not been tried before. What I am asking for in my amendments is already to a large extent the law in the United States. What I am asking for is precisely the kind of information which the United States Congress gets in a routine way on the basis of existing U.S. legislation.

It may be that the kind of amendments which I have moved are not to the liking of the government. That would not surprise me. It may be that the government does not want members of parliament to have the kind of information which I suggest the Auditor General should be providing to members. It believes it is easier to run the business of government and get the income tax legislation, corporation tax legislation, accelerated depreciation and faster writeoffs of corporation assets for taxation purposes passed if members of parliament and the public as a whole are kept ignorant. That is not a good way in which to run the country. It is not the best way in which the democratic system can operate.

The best way in which a democracy can operate is for the people to have the most information that is available. If people are given all of the facts, they will make the right decisions. They will call on governments to do the things that are fair. In order for them to have the facts, they need the kind of information enunciated in the amendments which I have moved.

My amendments may not meet the desires or wishes of the government. The government may wish to vote against them. That, of course, is how a democratic system works. If the government wants to vote against my amendments, it has every right to do so. I submit there is nothing in my amendments that can not properly be included in the bill and therefore voted upon. I submit that my amendments are in order.

Mr. Speaker: As I indicated earlier in the day, I had some concern from a procedural point of view about the regularity of the motions put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). I have, in the interval, had the opportunity of studying them very carefully in connection with the terms of the bill itself.

It seems that the hon. member for Winnipeg North is proposing by way of his motion that the function of the Auditor General be extended in a very fundamental way.

The function of the Auditor General is as contemplated in the legislation and has been tried in previous legislation which this bill will alter. That function is to perform in respect of the books of the Government of Canada in the same way that an auditor generally performs in the private sphere in the books of any company; to determine whether accounts have been faithfully kept, to determine whether records are adequate, to determine whether money has been expended for purposes other than that for which authority has been given, to determine whether satisfactory procedures have been established and followed from an accounting point of view in respect of the use of public funds. Further, he is to indicate in his annual report some other observations as to whether or not the Auditor General has been provided in the course of his very important duties with proper and adequate information to ensure that the task has been properly performed. All of that is well understood by hon. members.

As usual, the motion put forward is one which has a motivation that cannot be questioned. The further provision of information as described by the hon. member for Winnipeg North in defending his motions is not what is in question. Neither is the motion as put forward earlier in the day by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) contained in his amendment.

As usual, these motions all put forward an idea which has a great deal of merit. That is never the test. The question is, does the amendment form, from a procedural point of view, a proper and appropriate amendment to this particular statute.

In the way in which it is put forward, it seems that the notion of the Auditor General which is contained in all of the hon. member's motions, examining the individual income tax returns or tax returns for corporations in order to make judgments as to whether amounts of money that have been claimed as deductions may fall into a part of a budget that ought to be expressed to parliament in terms of an assessment as to the global amount of money that may have been recovered by the federal treasury had these programs not been in place, is an extension of the function of the Auditor General.

Whether that information ought to be sought by members of the House of Commons is entirely another question. Whether or not it ought to be provided, perhaps by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) or the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin), in terms of answers to questions on the order paper or an examination on the estimates of these ministers in terms of their past operations vis-à-vis expenditure forecasts for the coming year by way of the budget estimates, are all very valid questions for consideration.

What I have to decide is whether or not it forms a part of this particular statute to have this information collected and these judgments made by the Auditor General in order that a report can be made by him on these questions. The very notion of the Auditor General making these judgments and examining individual taxpayers' tax returns, which goes far beyond his function in examining the books of the Government of Canada, is in itself in a very fundamental way an extension of the entire concept of the basic function of the Auditor General of Canada.

I therefore find that the motions, which are all related to the same basic concept of a tax expenditure or a tax expenditure budget, introduce in their very terms an entirely new and unrelated concept to this legislation and, therefore, procedurally fail.

In order to keep things procedurally organized, we have now disposed in one way or another of all seven motions at the report stage of Bill C-20. Four were found to be out of order. Three have been discussed and divisions have been deferred. I understand that motions Nos. 5, 6 and 7 were dealt with. Is there some indication of the time at which, now that discussion on the bill has finished, those deferred divisions will take place?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I am given to understand that there have been some discussions and that it has been favourably received that we take the deferred votes this evening, I believe right after the other arrangement which follows on 9:45 when we deal with Bill C-27. That is the information I have been given to understand is correct, that it is the disposition of all parties to proceed in that way.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The minister is correct when he says there have been discussions. But I might point out there are up to 13 votes to take, and this is something which cannot be done within a short period. I estimate it would take between an hour and two hours of voting starting around 9.45.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We might start earlier.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That could be considered. Or we might consider putting these votes over until tomorrow morning. If that is not a good suggestion it might be well to take the matter up further and discuss it during the next item of business. Then we could get back to the parliamentary secretary and the President of the Treasury Board and make some specific proposals. But I am somewhat apprehensive that if we take so many votes after 9.45 p.m. we might be here until well after midnight.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I agree with the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) that discussions should continue in the next little while to see whether the matter can be resolved. I should like to request that no consideration be given to the idea of taking these votes tomorrow morning. As the hon. member knows, a number of members are going to the funeral of our late friend tomorrow, which means leaving the House around 11.30 a.m. I still hope it may be possible to bring the starting time forward a little tonight. If we take about 15 votes at eight minutes a vote, that would account for 120 minutes, or two hours, if my arithmetic is not faulty. That is assuming the officers at the table are able to keep up that pace of eight minutes to a vote. But perhaps we continue discussions while the debate is going on in connection with the next item.

Mr. Goodale: In addition to the difficulty mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the situation I see is that in the course of our business today, for circumstances which were beyond anyone's control, we adjourned slightly early both this morning and before six o'clock, losing a certain amount of time which would otherwise have been profitably spent on the business before the House. In these circumstances I hope we can work out an arrangement to dispose of the votes this evening.

Mr. Speaker: I am prepared to put this matter over until the House leaders have had an opportunity to take it up further, but there is one difficulty to which I must draw attention. The bells cannot ring earlier than 9.45 p.m. tonight because there is an order of the House that deferred divisions on these motions shall begin at 9.45. While there is nothing to prevent the bells from ringing for a division on these motions, if it is the wish of the House, I believe we should decide to do one thing or the other.

An hon. Member: What about taking this division, anyway?

Mr. Speaker: The point is, we have concluded the report stage of Bill C-20. I am perfectly prepared to see the House take up the Bretton Woods Agreements Act for a few minutes and then give me some advice as to the course proposed.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE SUBSCRIPTION TO INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND AND INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR CONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Robert K. Andras (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-18, to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Andras (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, it was hoped that Bill C-5 would be called before Bill C-18. My hon. friend from York-Simcoe, who is the financial critic for the official opposition, has indicated his intention to make a few observations at this stage of the bill. He was hoping the minister would be here, but he has been detained at another meeting. I will do my best, however, as I have done in the past, to pitch in and substitute.

I do not know that there is anyone in the House or even, for that matter, among the experts advising the minister, who can say he has even a tolerable knowledge of this act in its entirety. Never have international financial relations been so complicated as they are today. We see one country after another getting into trouble, whether members of the fund or not. Canada is one of the classic examples. We proudly say we belong to the club. We pay our dues, and then we opt out of the major requirements. Instead of maintaining a relationship with other currencies, particularly with the reserve currency, the U.S. dollar, as required by the act, we have since 1970, I believe it is, adopted a floating rate. This is all very well for the cozy few, but some of us remember the jungle warfare of the period the second world war on international monetary markets as one nation after another devalued its currency in the course of dog eat dog competition. This ultimately caused the boat to rock so much and gave rise to so many counter-actions of a nationalistic and protective nature that the whole affair culminated in the Second World War. This was one of the contributing factors. It was also a symptom of the unacceptable quality of international financial relations prior to the Second World War.

Consider the Bretton Woods Agreement of 1944, the first phase, and then the second phase which followed in 1964 or 1965. Now we are seeing, in Canada, the third formal phase and I note that the French government, for example, is taking violent objection to the form which is presently being proposed to us, and we see this, that, and the other country devaluing its currency, not necessarily within the framework of the International Monetary Fund. These are, to my mind, disquieting symptoms.

It is to be hoped that the special drawing rights will relieve the pressure on the American dollar as an effective reserve currency with gold as its backing. The pound sterling has had a relatively stable past. In the early days of the Bretton Woods Agreement, I recall it used to cost me $4.75 Canadian to buy one pound sterling when I was a student at Oxford in 1947-48. Today it costs approximately $1.75 Canadian to buy one pound sterling. Both currencies have been thoroughly debased by inflation, although one could ask to see a currency that is not. Some do not exist in relation to their original valuations.

The special drawing rights, which we saw inaugurated some three years ago and which are being formalized by this agreement in a much more prominent role, are viewed by some countries as another source of drawing down benefits. Many of us view that aspect with some concern. We are not particularly worried about the developed countries doing more for the underdeveloped countries. To disregard man's obligation toward his fellowman would be merely hiding one's head in the sand. But I do not think it should be done through the medium of granting special drawing rights to underdeveloped countries or those engaged in the south part of the north-south dialogue, which is really a reserve tool within the IMF.

Along with my colleague from York-Simcoe, I hope we can get a great deal more information about the operations of the Canadian Exchange Fund in this relationship with our trading partners. There seems to be a hush hush attitude, which is not prevalent in a number of other countries, where dealings in the foreign exchange fund by the Bank of Canada have become sort of a sacred cow that one must not approach. We have been acting in the international market only when the bank or the government deigns periodically to release information in the most guarded terms.

There has been a great deal of pressure on the Canadian dollar lately. I fault the government for not telling the people why in layman's language, so that one does not have to become an international banker or expert on the foreign money market to understand why, some months ago, the Canadian dollar was trading as high as $1.04 and threatening to go higher, and is now down to 94 cents. I suppose that if one presented a Canadian dollar bill at a Detroit bank one would even receive less.

Americans may be glad to come to Canada thinking their dollar is worth $1.06, and hoping they will get $1.06 value Canadian. But when the shoe is on the other foot, our American friends go into a shell and say that they do not take our money. It could be worth $5 but they will not take it. Thus, they simply say they will take it at 90 cents, and you take it or leave it. The further south of the border you go the worse it gets. Sometimes you are in a position where you have got to leave it and they will take it, but at the reduced value.

I want to make a special plea on behalf of all members in this House for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and the Bank of Canada to be much more outgoing with regard to their actions respecting the IMF. It is not something which is holier than thou. Canadian people have enough sophistication. Those in the financial world should have the expertise to be able to tell them what is happening. Then they can take the appropriate action to improve our lot or guard themselves against unnecessary loss. All of this helps our total economy.

I hold a good deal of hope for Bretton Woods. I am not like some French parliamentarians who laid the blame for most of France's present inflation at the door of Bretton Woods and the lack of control over Euro dollars. I must confess that I could not follow their arguments. It may be they will have an opportunity of impressing me better in the near future. I certainly intend to look further into their arguments. Many formulae were advanced with regard to breaking the rigidity of the former values of the reserve currencies and the matter of the peg. Each of these formulae had their champions for a while and they had their vogue, and then they passed on to something else. They had some rather colourful names—the crawling peg, the snake, and a few others.

This will include those OPEC financial powers which will have to take a very realistic and responsible attitude toward international monetary relations. It may be all very well for some countries to build up their foreign exchange funds at the expense of another country in a sort of beggar thy neigbour policy. As the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert is always wont to say, there is no alley that does not have its ash cans. Those countries which engage in very questionable practices with regard to their financial relations with their neighbours in the world are going to reap some problems in the future.

While we in the House may express our opinions with regard to the Bretton Woods Agreement, there is not one dot of an "i" or one bar of a "t" hon. members of this House can change. This is an international agreement entered into by the government under its powers. I suppose if this House felt badly about the Bretton Woods Agreement and rejected this bill, the government's signature on that international accord would be repudiated by its parliament, and that would be a very interesting scenario to speculate upon, but I am sure that generally we hope to see some order in the international financial market.

I do wish, however, that we in Canada were not the ones at whom everyone can point a finger because, for our own particular advantage, we decided to opt out of the reserve positions on our own currency; in other words, that we would refuse to peg to the reserve currency as required by street adherence to the IMF accord. That, to me, is an action we may live to regret. In some ways we have been able to get the best of both worlds so far, but that will only be for a short time. I would have liked to have seen something more for stability in the long run in that field, and on that note I shall close these comments on behalf of myself and my colleagues.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about this complicated, little understood bill. Essentially it deals with Canada's participation in the International Monetary Fund and in international exchange. The bill raises certain questions. The original idea was to help countries and to rebuild Europe after the war. That has largely been accomplished, but new and greater problems have arisen.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

For the first time much foreign currency is owned and held by the OPEC countries, and the western industrialized countries which, from a national point of view, were once wealthy, are now in many cases debtors. This is particularly so of Great Britain, Italy, and even Canada. Even the strong countries of Germany and Japan depend very noticeably on the attitude of the OPEC countries toward the rest of the world. Some oil nations have shown considerable insight and understanding of the economic problems of the world, and their forbearance is to be commended, but a great many industrialized countries are faced with financial problems greater than they have ever had before, particularly France, Italy, and Great Britain. However, with the possibility of oil in the North Sea a substantial amount of foreign currency may see Britain through for the next decade. Even so, this latest change in the Bretton Woods Agreement means moving away from the traditional gold which was the standard for many hundreds of years. It is only a small part of the special drawing rights, but gold was important. Essentially the currency is now becoming paper.

Whether the International Monetary Fund will be a success depends on the abilities of the managers of the fund. If we are all going to be in one pool, as industrialized nations we may be able to help each other. However, we may get to a point where the whole system will collapse. This idea is being considered by many reputable economists around the world, and I do not think they can be ignored as paper tigers. Nor should we think that events can be regarded as unexpected or that there will be very little chance of any currency crisis which cannot be handled. I think there are very real dangers of that happening, and that is echoed by many economists who are aware of the great financial strains in the world. Even in our country, where we are supposed to have done a little better than other countries with regard to growth, it is interesting that the latest statistics from Statistics Canada show that from 1970 to the present time our economy has grown from $86 billion to $200 billion. That seems like a lot, but over two thirds of that is pure inflation. In other words, $80 billion of our economy now compared with seven years ago is just an inflationary figure.

Inflation has taken place around the world, but it is hard to understand why we cannot bring it to an end with a wholesale readjustment of currencies and of nations' trading positions. Therefore I believe the questioning and concern about whether the international currency arrangement can actually prevent a sudden and severe crash of currency are justified. In any case I presume that this bill is an attempt to take part in the working of the fund, and it is with considerable skepticism that I speak for this bill. However, as an advanced industrialized nation this is one of the contributions we can make to the world and to the western economic system.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CURRENCY AND EXCHANGE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND CERTAIN PROVISIONS OF THE ACT AND OTHER ACTS IN CONSEQUENCE THEREOF

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-5, to amend the Currency and Exchange Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved:

That Bill C-5, an Act to amend the Currency and Exchange Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, be amended by deleting Clause 5 and by renumbering the subsequent clauses accordingly.

● (2100)

He said: Clause 5 of the bill actually proposes that the Auditor General examine the books of account of the Foreign Exchange Currency Fund and report to parliament, as he does in his annual report, and he shall certify to a number of things that are required under the act. Now it is proposed that the Auditor General compile his report but submit it to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) who will then in due course table it in the House. Why this change? The Auditor General is responsible to parliament. I am sure Mr. Macdonell would be the first one to deny that he is the one who should tell parliament what it should do in regard to its relationship with him.

I found it passing strange, in discovering what was behind this proposed amendment, that it was for conformity, that there would be a tidying up, that down at the management level some lower officials in the Auditor General's office discussed with officials of the Department of Finance the possibility of getting some uniformity. After all, it would seem to be administratively tidier to have all the procedures the same. But why?

I find that responsibility is being centred more and more in the cabinet. The report on the performance of the Foreign Exchange Fund is not like the report on the operations of some Crown corporation. I find it singularly strange that if you ask any minister of the Crown who is responsible for a Crown Corporation which reports to parliament, about some aspect of the operation of that Crown corporation, this stock answer is, "I will pass the hon. member's question to the corporation. I have nothing to do with the direction of that Crown corporation". Yet they maintain that the Auditor General should report to the minister. That connotes a degree of responsibility. If I am told to report to a man, it is because that man has some authority over me. If I am told to deliver a report to an individual who will act as the conduit to higher authority, that is an entirely different thing.

When it comes to management and to fielding questions, the minister stands up in the Chamber during that 45 minute quiz show that is so loved by the media—they think that the sun rises and sets on parliament from 2.15 to 3 p.m. every day, Friday excepted—and says he will pass the questions on to the management of the corporation and will report back, or he tables a report from the corporation under the provisions of Standing Order 41(2). So on the one hand they are the first to duck responsibilities, but on the other hand, for administrative convenience the Auditor General is being asked to report to a minister, who, incidentally, will file the returns, but that is not the point.

The Auditor General is responsible to parliament. My goodness, we have passed Bill C-20 this afternoon, and what does that bill say with regard to the Auditor General? It sets up a great case that he is parliament's best friend, that he is the watchdog, to use the popular newspaper term. What did we do here? Did we put another ring in the chain around his collar?

In the committee we were not very satisfied with the evidence that was given, and I am concerned about it. Even if the Auditor General did give his assent to this change, I do not think, with the greatest respect to the Auditor General, that it is his business to tell us to change. The Auditor General may be an adviser in his role of criticizing government operations, which it is his duty to do, but his responsibility is to parliament, not to cabinet. Yet this motion sets it in and closes the final door. I put the amendment forward so we could have this debated in public. It was debated in committee, but frankly no one comes to the committee to hear it.

I regret very much this feature of the bill. The rest of the bill is perfectly fine, but this House and the other place in accepting this feature will have taken a step backward rather than taking a step forward. In my view the Financial Administration Act should be changed so that the Auditor General, in submitting his reports on Crown corporations, should report through the minister and not to a minister because, in my view, the office and the role of the Auditor General in respect of the House of Commons are sacrosanct. We have just knocked them on the head. I am opposed to Clause 5 of the bill.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few minutes to support my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), in the idea that the Auditor General report directly to parliament, not to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). I suppose there are good arguments to be made on both sides.

I was interested in reading the debate and the arguments of the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) when he suggested that perhaps the Auditor General should report to the Minister of Finance. It seemed to him that the Auditor General would not be able to make specific comments on what was happening to the fund and that only the Minister of Finance could take action to change or correct Canada's stance or present each one to the people who make the decisions about which countries will get the money. In some ways that is not a bad decision but I believe the Auditor General, who is a servant of this House, should make his report to this House. I think it would be a simple thing, if the Minister of Finance had to make it, for him conveniently to forget it or make it at such a time that it would not attract attention.

International monetary problems will be a greater factor in the next few years than they have been in the past. There is no doubt that the oil situation has created dangers. We read already about huge international debts owed not only by developing and Third World countries but by the communist countries that up until now had always paid their bills. They owe so much money to private banks in the United States, Germany, and western Europe that now many banks have refused to extend credit to them.

This is an important piece of legislation, Mr. Speaker. We are a trading nation and this year our imports and exports are estimated at $40 billion dollars each, or between 20 per cent and 25 per cent of the gross national product. With this in mind, and if we propose to become involved in lending money, directly or indirectly, it is important that the report of the Auditor General be made directly to parliament and not to the minister. It is the only thing that would give us some idea of the way in which the fund is administered.

Substantial changes in the exchange fund are proposed by the bill, and until it can be shown that they work there will be many questions. In committee I posed certain questions to the minister in regard to the United Kingdom and Egypt. In extending further aid to Egypt the International Monetary Fund laid down certain restrictions on what the Egyptian president could do with it. For example, he was advised to cut back on food subsidies. We all know what happened then. Egypt had its worst riots for two decades and at one time it seemed as if the president would be deposed.

The situation in the United Kingsdom only came to light because the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not want to agree to the restrictions proposed by the International Monetary Fund and he made his objections public. The Minister of Finance admitted this is what had alerted him to the situation in the United Kingdom and that he was familiar with the result in Egypt when the IMF had imposed conditions upon the president. Mr. Speaker, I think all this helps to illustrate that the report of the Auditor General should come directly to this House. It would serve no purpose if he talked only to the minister about questionable practices in the exchange fund account.

We are not dealing with small amounts of money here. We have a stand-by credit of about $300 million in the United Kingdom, we have a $250 to $500 million reciprocal drawing arrangement with Italy, and a $2 billion swap arrangement with the United States. The amounts are not small, and when the Auditor General is given his organization I think it is important that he make his reports directly to the House so that we can deal with them here and persuade the government to make any necessary changes.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak briefly to this motion. First of all I should remind the House that it was considered in committee and I listened carefully then as now, with all the objectivity of a parliamentary secretary, to the suggestion made to change the original proposal of the government. Even with that objectivity I have heard nothing to convince me there was any substance in the amendment proposed by the opposition.

We ought to remember that the Auditor General reports on a number of financial activities of the government under a great many statutes. Under virtually all of them, except for the oldest, the provision is made that his report goes to the minister and the minister tables it in the House. That provision is made for the simple reason that the Auditor General is not a member of this Chamber; he cannot walk through the door and deposit his document on the table of the House. That has to be done on his behalf by a member. The legislation provides that the report goes to the minister concerned with the enterprise being audited, and the minister tables it in the House.

It is a trumped up thing to try to make the point that there is something improper in taking this procedure which is used everywhere else and applying it to the currency and exchange account. This is an enormous account which is of considerable interest to parliament, the country, and the outside world, but to argue that it ought to be handled in any way different than in the legislation provided for all the other accounts and enterprises that are scrutinized by the Auditor General has no validity.

In fact the Auditor General particularly wanted this account to be changed because it has become his practice to provide the account audit to the minister and for the minister to table it. What is being settled through the legislation before us is only what is already the practice, that is, the report goes to the Minister of Finance and the minister tables it.

The present Auditor General has acquired considerable stature and respect in this House and in the country—so much so that the legislation amending his position, Bill C-20, was largely proposed by him and his staff. We have listened gladly to his suggestions. Members, by and large, accepted his suggestions. They are embodied in Bill C-20. The bill now before the House has exactly the same status. Like the Auditor General's Act, this is his own proposal to us. It is the proposal he made to regularize the procedure he actually follows. This is the procedure which will be used not only in this legislation, not only for this account in question, but for all the other accounts and enterprises which the Auditor General audits and concerning which he must report to this House. One could go further than saying the opposition is making a mountain out of a molehill in this case. I argue that they are trying to make something out of nothing at all, and consequently I urge hon. members to reject the amendment.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Hon. members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion? All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. Paproski: On division.

Motion (Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West)) negatived.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-5, to amend the Currency and Exchange Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): By leave, now.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND DEFINITIONS

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C-49, to amend the Canada Pension Plan, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, be concurred in.

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, we have proceeded with our business so expeditiously that I scarcely had time to regain my seat before Your Honour put the motion for concurrence on Bill C-49. Although there are no amendments to discuss at the report stage, I and some of my colleagues wish to speak on the bill. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) who is not here this evening wishes to make her contribution to the debate. Actually I did not know we would make such good progress.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Tomorrow.

An hon. Member: Now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Shall I put the third reading motion?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think what we are doing should be made clear. I do not mind our taking this bill tonight, but it was not understood that it would come forward this evening. We just seem to be slipping into it, as it were. The minister is not here, and the parliamentary secretary is not here.

Mr. Alexander: And the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is not here.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Goodale) tell us what is going on?

An hon. Member: There are no amendments.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is right. There is no amendment. We have dealt with the report stage and could go on to third reading now. But that was not the plan for tonight. If the plan has been changed we should have been advised. There has been lots of consultation today; it has worked well. But I do not like our proceeding without consultation.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is a matter of proceeding without consultation. I think the House has made perhaps unprecedented progress, which has led us to this evening's remarkable situation.

It was indicated earlier today in the statement concerning the order of business that, after we completed considering the Auditor General's bill, which we did earlier this evening, we would consider two financial bills, C-18 and C-5, both of which hon. members dealt with expeditiously this evening and both of which proceeded through third reading. As indicated earlier, the next item of business was the consideration of Bill C-49, the bill to amend the Canada Pension Plan. Many of us did not anticipate reaching it this evening; however, we have reached it and could use the 15 minutes remaining before the taking of deferred divisions in a constructive consideration of Bill C-49. The minister's parliamentary secretary is now present and in a position to proceed. Of course what we do in the next 15 minutes will not necessarily determine what we shall do tomorrow morning or evening. Because of our remarkable progress, that question would have to be settled by further consultation, before 11 o'clock tomorrow morning. We do not intend to inconvenience hon. members and did not intend to catch any by surprise.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the parliamentary secretary and I say this House must be run according to some reasonable semblance of order. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, we must understand what is being done. Many members did not think we would proceed beyond Bill C-5, and I do not think it was contemplated when the business of the House was announced earlier that we should deal with Bill C-49 this evening. For that reason we should consider if it is appropriate even to proceed with the consideration of that bill. Surely the parliamentary secretary agrees that the House must operate on the basis of consultation and understanding.

Mr. Railton: And logic.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): As the hon. doctor from Welland says, we must also use logic. But the understandings at which we arrive are most important for the smooth operation of this institution. Bill C-49 is not unimportant and, as the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) said, some who have a special interest in this bill, because they did not think it would be considered tonight, have become engaged elsewhere this evening in the discharge of their public duties. They would not be in a position to deal with it in an adequate sense because we would be foreshortening the period of time with respect to preparation.

● (2130)

The other aspect that is important is that the bill is of such significance that, frankly, we find it somewhat unusual for it to be introduced on third reading by a member other than the minister in whose name it stands on the order paper, and having it carried in debate by the parliamentary secretary.

I do not want in any way to deprecate the parliamentary secretary. I am sure he understands the basis on which I say that. This bill is either important or it is not. If it is important, it ought to be introduced and dealt with by the minister in a normal way.

It is not unusual from time to time in this House for bills to be dealt with by a parliamentary secretary. However, they are never dealt with in these circumstances unless there has been some advance consultation with the House leaders of the other parties. The courtesy of the House leaders of the other parties is granted in order to permit the government the convenience of doing it through a parliamentary secretary.

When we are approached in advance and it is indicated to us that a bill is important, that it must proceed and that it is impossible for a minister to be present, that permission is normally granted. However, the rules of this House, and indeed the dignity and traditions of this House, demand that the bill be introduced and debate begun by the minister.

I am not suggesting that we would in any way be castigating the government for not having other business ready. There are a number of bills with which we might deal.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Metric conversion.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We could deal with metric conversion.

Mr. Marchand: Let's go.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There are a number of other pieces of legislation with which we might deal.

Mr. Goodale: S-3.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The parliamentary secretary mentions Bill S-3. I have looked at the "must list" of the government that has been presented and which is slowly shrinking. I find that Bill S-3 is not on the "must list". I would not want to depart in any way from the very careful procedures that we have adopted in the best of faith.

There is Bill C-23, the metric conversion bill. I am sure we could proceed with that. The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) has a particular interest in that bill. If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) were here we could deal with Bill C-56, the beginning of the income tax legislation. I know that the people of Canada are very much interested in that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Will the hon. member please come to his point of order?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I was just developing it, Mr. Speaker. I was saying that there are a number of pieces of legislation on the government's list that are important. As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, there is awaiting second reading, which is of some significance, a bill arising out of the budget, Bill C-56, income tax bill No. 2. That bill contains the infamous, ridiculous, and retrograde step with regard to life insurance policy gains. I am sure there are members of the House who would like to deal with that particular bill. There are some amendments to the Fisheries Act—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has the floor for the purpose of raising a point of order. I suggest that he get to the point of order rather soon.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There are the Fisheries Act amendments which are now out of committee. We would be prepared to deal with that, except there is no fisheries minister here. My point of order—

Mr. MacFarlane: Where is your fisheries critic?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Our critic is available.

Mr. MacFarlane: Where is your finance critic?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Our critic is available.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has the floor. I wish he would get to his point of order rather soon.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The critics to whom the hon. member refers are available. I commend to the government that it consider going ahead with metric conversion because that is something which has occupied its attention very much. We are ready for that.

In conclusion, let me say this: it is important that we do not proceed with Bill C-49 right now because of the importance of the legislation. Second, the minister is not here. Third, there has not been the normal consultation. Fourth, unfortunately for us, certainly not for the institution of parliament, the legislative program has proceeded much too quickly and, indeed, beyond what was the understanding with respect to that legislative program.

There may be other members who will wish to speak to this point of order which I have tried to put as succinctly as I can. I have mentioned the alternative pieces of legislation that the government might deal with tonight if it is ready.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest to the hon. member that that was not a point of order but a good speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I hope I can do as well as the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) in terms of his point of order.

An hon. Member: Speak to the bill.

Mr. Alexander: I can speak to the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Will the hon. member please address the Chair?

Mr. Alexander: I was speaking through you, Sir. If you do not know what the bill is all about, Mr. Speaker, it is amendments to the Canada Pension Plan involving the splitting provisions and dropout provisions for the benefit of spouses. In other words, what the bill is attempting to do, for the benefit of the Liberal backbencher who does not know what it is all about, is to give some recognition to the role of women in the home. However, that is not what I want to get into right now.

What I want to get into is the fact that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) have both put their fingers on the point that concerns me. I was sitting on the other side of the House speaking with one of my Liberal friends, and I do have a few on the other side, determining what we were going to do tonight as a result of a number of motions on Bill C-27. He was trying to tell me there were 13 or 15. I tried to point out to him there were 14 amendments which would call for a vote on each one.

All of a sudden it dawned on me I was hearing a number, something like C-49. I immediately thought that was a responsibility which was mine. I thought that could not be, because there had been no discussion between the House leaders, which is the usual way that bills come before this House in terms of report stage and/or third reading.

Mr. Goyer: Are you for or against the bill?

Mr. Alexander: I hear the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) intervening, but I cannot hear him. I wonder if he would speak out a little louder.

Mr. Goyer: Are you for or against the bill?

Mr. Alexander: As I was saying, much to my surprise I had to run over here in order to determine what was going on. Then I listened with great interest to what my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre said. He is always on the ball when it comes to the legislative pussyfooting which we encounter as a result of the government's incompetence.

• (2140)

I am surprised that the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Goodale) should have said, "Oh well, it doesn't really matter—

Mr. Goodale: I did not say that. I announced it this afternoon. It is apparent you are not ready.

Mr. Alexander: —we are all prepared and it was assumed that if we got rid of the Bretton Woods bill and another bill dealing with finance we would automatically move to Bill C-49." That is a lot of nonsense.

An hon. Member: Call the bill!

Mr. Alexander: Moving to Bill C-49 calls for the attention of the government House leader.

Mr. Baldwin: And the minister.

Mr. Alexander: And of the minister.

I have nothing to say against the parliamentary secretary. I think he knows his job. At any rate he gets paid enough for doing it. But I do not want to deal with the parliamentary secretary, and that is my right. I know the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) would like to introduce this bill himself, primarily because of his concern about the attitude of Ontario, and that is my province. During the committee stage, which the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette) was not at, the minister told the committee that it was important to look into the position of the Ontario government, because I know, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: It is 9.45.

Mr. Alexander: Not quite. I have not finished. The problem of Ontario is one of extensive concern—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) that he is off on the wrong track. He should return to the subject of the point of order.

Mr. Alexander: I can readily understand, Sir, that as a former engineer you have never forgotten your background, the importance of staying on the track, and I will try to stay on the track while I prove my point. In short, it is most unfair for the parliamentary secretary to try to bamboozle us, or blackmail us—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Alexander: —and I will not stand for that kind of nonsense.

Mr. Goodale: It is because you are not ready.

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-27, to establish a Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions on Bill C-27, pursuant to the order made this day. We will proceed with the disposition of these motions in the order listed at the back of today's order paper, followed by motions Nos. 23 and 24 deferred this day.

Call in the members.

And the division bells having been rung.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The divisions are on the motions that have been deferred at the report stage of Bill C-27. I have some indication from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that he has a point of order concerning the combining of some votes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I believe that unless some combining is done, we will now have 15 votes to record. We are prepared in three cases to let the vote on one of our motions be considered as also a vote on another. The three cases are as follows: we would be prepared to have the vote on motion No. 8 to be considered as covering motion No. 10, for the vote on motion No. 11 to be considered as covering motion No. 30, and for the vote on motion No. 13 to be considered as covering motion No. 17.

Mr. Speaker: The vote is now on motion No. 2 in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander).

The House divided on motion No. 2 (Mr. Alexander), which was negatived on the following division:

● (2220)

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare motion No. 10 also lost.

Motion No. 10 (Mr. Blackburn) negatived.

Mr. Speaker: The question is upon motion No. 11 (Mr. Rodriguez) which will also dispose of motion No. 30 in the name of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes). Mr. Rodriguez, seconded by Mr. Nystrom, moved:

That Bill C-27, an Act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in Clause 33 by striking out line 34 at page 14 and substituting the following therefor:—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Some hon. Members: Out!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Out!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

"(c) fifty-one weeks of benefit have been paid".

Those in favour of the motion will please rise.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. There should be some clarification here about votes. A member, after he voted, and before the vote was completely tallied and the count was taken, stood up and left the Chamber. A few minutes ago he came back in and another member has gotten up and left, before the vote was announced. I think that we should know whether or not, when a vote is taken—

Some hon. Members: Out!

Mr. Coates: —a member should sit in his seat—

Some hon. Members: Out!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members should understand that there is no restriction on a member entering or leaving the Chamber during the hearing of a question of privilege; there is during the taking of a vote. The clarification that is sought is: When does the taking of the vote commence? The taking of the vote commences with the reading of the motion. I was putting the question.

The relevant Standing Order is Standing Order 12(2):

When Mr. Speaker is putting a question, no Member shall enter, walk out of or across the House, or make any noise or disturbance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member referred to—

An hon. Member: Comox-Alberni.

Mr. Speaker: —the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson), had entered the Chamber wrongfully. I indicated to him on a point of order that he ought to leave the Chamber, and he did. While I was putting the question, the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) sought the floor and got up on a question of privilege, during which the hon. member re-entered the Chamber.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member cannot have it both ways. During the putting of a question, there can be no taking of points of order or questions of privilege. During the putting of this question, I saw the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North. Surely if I am able to see him for a question of privilege I am not on the taking of a vote. We must be either taking the question of privilege or taking the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. For clarification of what is involved in putting the question, the putting of the question begins with the reading of the motion and ends when I receive the tabulation and make a declaration.

● (2230)

Mr. Coates: For your information, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have heard the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North on his question of privilege. Order, please. For the sake of clarification in the putting of this question I am prepared to ask the hon. member to abide by the sentiment of the House but not, in my opinion, by the technical rules of the House, and leave the Chamber during the taking of this next vote.

Mr. Coates: If you would just hear my question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have heard the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North.

Mr. Coates: Hear my question!

Mr. Speaker: With respect, the question of privilege raised by the hon. member was concerned with what is involved in the taking of a vote. I have indicated that it begins with the putting of the question and ends with my declaration of the motion being either carried or lost.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, the last count is wrong. My question of privilege relates to the fact that before the last vote was completed the hon. member got up—

Some hon. Members: Turn on the microphone!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My distinct recollection is that while I was reading the motion—

Mr. Coates: The second time! He has been out twice!

Mr. Speaker: This is the first time I have been aware that the hon. member or any other hon. member has entered or left the Chamber twice. I am prepared to hear points of order.

The hon. member raised a question of privilege and asked me what was involved in the taking of a vote. And I answered him. I have not heard any objection that the vote is wrong up to this point. If there is one, I am prepared to hear it.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, during the time of the taking of the last vote the hon. member for Comox-Alberni got up and walked out of the Chamber before the vote was completed. That was why I asked to know whether or not the hon. member's vote was counted having regard to the fact he was not in the Chamber at the time the vote was completed.

Your Honour got up and read me the motion. During that period of time the hon. member walked back in and took his seat. It had nothing to do with the subject of my original question of privilege which was the fact that the hon. member did not wait until the vote was completed before walking out of the Chamber. I asked you, Sir, whether his vote was counted and whether the vote which the Clerk indicated was the vote was in fact the vote.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Speaker: Of course if the hon. member puts it to me in that way—and I cannot verify it from the Chair—if there is no argument or discussion to the contrary—

Some hon. Members: Ask him!

Mr. Speaker: If there is nothing said to the contrary I have to accept the hon. member's statement. I will therefore ask the Clerk whether the vote of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni was registered in the division on the last motion.

The count shows that those voting against the motion included the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. The undisputed information I have is that before the vote was properly announced the hon. member for Comox-Alberni left the Chamber. The record will have to show that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni was not correctly recorded in the vote.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The question now before the House is upon motion No. 11 in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez).

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare motions Nos. 11 and 30 negatived.

Motion No. 30 (Mr. Symes) negatived.

Mr. Speaker: The question therefore is upon motion No. 15.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, motion No. 15 disposes of motions Nos. 29 and 32 introduced by the government.

Mr. Speaker: Motion No. 13 will dispose of motion No. 17. Therefore I called motion No. 15 which precedes No. 17 in numerical order.

Mr. Alexander: With all due respect my understanding was that motion No. 15 disposes of motions Nos. 29 and 32.

Mr. Speaker: Motion No. 15 disposes of motions Nos. 29 and 32, and is in the name of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen).

The House divided on motion No. 15 (Mr. Cullen), which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare motions Nos. 13 and 17 lost.

Motion No. 17 (Mr. Leggatt) negatived.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that the vote on motion No. 13 disposed of motion No. 17, and in light of the fact that a vote on motion No. 17 would have disposed of motion No. 6, the defeat of motions Nos. 13 and 17 wiped out motion No. 6. The question should now be put on my motion No. 16, which will dispose of motion No. 5 which is also in my name.

An hon. Member: Say all that again.

Mr. Speaker: The same result, then, is entered for motion No. 6 which was just entered for motions Nos. 13 and 17.

Mr. Alexander: Right.

Motion No. 6 (Mr. Rodriguez) negatived.

Mr. Speaker: The question now, it is suggested, is upon motion No. 16 which will also dispose of motion No. 5. Both motions are in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander).

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I am wondering about motion No. 14.

Mr. Speaker: If there has been no change in the order of deferral of these motions, the question is now upon motion No. 14.

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare motion No. 24 lost.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved that Bill C-27, to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: At the next sitting of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Because of the unfortunate circumstance which has caused a change in the usual House sittings for tomorrow, is the government House leader prepared to tell us what we will be dealing with tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock, and at eight o'clock tomorrow night?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, in the morning we will deal will Bill S-3, Bill C-26, and Bill C-38. If we dispose of those in the morning, in the evening we will deal with Bill C-49, Bill C-20, and Bill C-51.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being after 10:30 p.m., this House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

At 11:38 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 28, 1977

The House met at 11 a.m.

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, concerning our proceedings between now and one o'clock. Since a number of members will be leaving for the funeral of our late colleague I think it would be agreeable, if any votes arise during the course of debate this morning, to defer them until later in the day or to a commonly agreed on time.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO CLARIFY DEFINITIONS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill S-3 to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act and the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry if I am out of order. Are we going to the debate now?

Mr. Speaker: The debate will be on the third reading motion which I will now put.

Mr. MacEachen (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the debate on this bill on second reading was very short. Referring to the remarks of the minister at that time, in his closing paragraph he said:

> This is a bill of some technical complexity. The Superintendent of Insurance and other officials will be readily available to the committee for the purpose of considering this revision.

I also made a contribution to the debate at that time. There was a short reference from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who simply said:

> Mr. Speaker, this 60-page bill is obviously one of such a technical nature that the best place for it to be considered is in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. We are therefore prepared to vote for the motion to send the bill to that committee for detailed study.

The reason I mention those remarks is that the bill is indeed complex and did indeed go to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs where it received due consideration. It would have been extremely helpful at this time to have been able to refer to the proceedings of the committee. However, the hearing in the committee took place last week on Monday, June 20, and as yet the proceedings have not been published. In any event, they have not been received by the members of the committee.

There were some amendments put there. I note that the bill will eventually have to be referred back to the other place for the adoption or in any event consideration of the amendments put by the standing committee of this House. The bill received a fairly thorough examination by the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce of the other place. Reference to those sections that are being amended show that there was some concern about the practices that had been in place in the insurance industry.

As I pointed out in an earlier comment, accounting is an art, not a science. Being an accountant myself, I speak with some knowledge of this. Over the years accountants have been practicing their art instead of dealing with things as a science. Therefore, when statements of various insurance companies were produced, they were not always in a form which was easily comparable. It made it difficult for officials who had to deal with reports of insurance companies and the public to know exactly what was comparable.

The accounting profession is always flexible and interested in forward-looking change. The accounting profession was instrumental in putting forth the suggestions which led to the amendments on the reporting practices of insurance companies. I think we can agree wholeheartedly with a practice that will make it easier for officials and the public when considering statements. An interesting feature of the practices followed before was that the more business a new insurance company wrote, the greater the losses shown on its statements because of the regulation that insurance companies could not show big losses. In other words, their ratios had to be proper. The companies were actually restricted in the amount of business they could write.

This arose from the fact that the cost of issuing a policy—the sales commissions, advertising and other expenses related to that—had to be written off in the year that the policy was issued, although the income relative to the policy was not reflected until later financial periods. In a sense, that was an unfair treatment. Although they were certainly costs, they were in the nature of capital costs. Other businesses were permitted, and in fact obliged, to set up capital costs and write them off over the period in which the revenue was being earned. The fact that that practice is going to be followed by insurance companies is a good idea.

The bill also makes some changes with regard to the investments insurance companies are permitted. There was not unanimous agreement in the committee that these were necessarily good changes. Four per cent of an insurance company's real estate investments can now be in one real estate project. When you consider that a company can have only 15 per cent of its investments in real estate, then in the case of some big companies four per cent of that 15 per cent can represent a very large project indeed.

I found it questionable as to whether the insurance companies should be allowed to, in effect, compete in the development field. We found that insurance companies, as part of their real estate investments, were in the practice of buying real estate. In order to have a revenue producing asset on their books, they would lease that piece of real estate to a developer. The developer would come up with a plan for putting up a revenue building on that piece of property.

The practice often followed was that when the developer needed a mortgage, he would go back to the same insurance company which owned the land and get a mortgage on the property. The effect of it was that if the developer was very careful in his building, he could actually have cash flow out of the project. After all, he invested no money in the land. Although the mortgage is restricted to 75 per cent of the value of the project, the value is determined before construction begins. If savings can be effected during construction, he can actually cash out of the deal. I know there would be a long term lease as security for the insurance company. However, the policyholders' as well as the shareholders' interests are not being best served by having the insurance companies make such a total kind of investment in revenue real estate.

The Superintendent of Insurance told us that there were margins built in and that he knew of no problems. However, it is within the memory of all members of this House, I am sure, that even on projects where the developer owns the land, the government's own Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has had some serious problems with projects that have been managed improperly after development. Three come to mind. There is the project in Hamilton which has caused a good deal of problem to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Approximately $7 million of taxpayers' money was lent out, and now CMHC is having to foreclose. The title is in a terrible mess, and it will take them a long time to get out of it. Then there was the Rochdale fiasco in Toronto, which has been worked out, probably not without some loss. There is also the Quai d'Orsay property in Ottawa, which was mentioned in the House recently, and there are serious problems there.

In committee we were told and forced to accept the fact that this change was a good thing and that it would be going ahead regardless of that. There are no other particular areas we need to consider at this stage of the bill. I should like to repeat that it was a great inconvenience not to have the minutes of the committee hearings available to us at this time. I am sure there are other matters which my colleagues will put forward.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) has said, the report of the proceedings of June 20, when this bill was considered in committee, plus the reprinted version of the bill have not reached our offices. I checked ten minutes ago, and they have not turned up. The amendments appear in fragmentary form in the twelfth report of the committee in Votes and Proceedings. There are seven pages of amendments which are frankly meaningless unless related to the bill. They have to be incorporated into the bill before they can mean anything to anyone who wants to find out what changes have been made.

In so far as the House leaders are concerned, this bill should not have appeared at this time, because the material has not been prepared for availability in the House. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, myself, and the parliamentary secretary are really the only persons in the House who have any knowledge of the bill. The parliamentary secretary must assume some responsibility for allowing his House leader to propose this piece of legislation for discussion at this time.

Today is June 28, and there is no reason why we should not have had this material available to us.

The other House is awaiting this bill to consider the amendments made to it. The amendments are of a very technical nature, but there is nothing too contentious about them. From a procedural point of view and the handling of business in this House, this bill is an example of just how not to do things. One could put on a filibuster this morning by objecting to the House being asked to proceed on material which is not before it, since there is no printed copy of the bill available to us.

The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra has spoken about some of the information that was gleaned from the superintendent of insurance and his assistants at the time of the committee examination. I do not want to go into that. However, the point I want to stress is the reason for the seven pages of amendments: we are amending two parts of one act and a second act to say the same thing. The insurance industry in this country is governed by the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act and the Foreign Insurance Companies Act. According to Mr. Humphrys, the superintendent of insurance, within two years it will be possible to bring in a Canadian insurance companies act which will cover the operations of all of our insurance companies and will telescope a great amount of legislation into the one act. Therefore, amendments will be much simpler and we will put our insurance industry on a much sounder legislative footing.

The amendments from the Senate, and as they were amended in the committee, will put Canadian insurance companies, and particularly the newer companies, on a much sounder footing. As the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra explained, there are tremendous front-end expenses on the writers of new businesses. The early premiums went to write off these expenses and did not provide any funds for reserve or for investment. This was something which took all members of the committee by surprise, that the bulk of new business written by the insurance industry, whether life, automobile or general insurance, in the early years did not make any profit for the companies. In other words, new business contributed to the annual losses. This has led to a rather paradoxical situation—the more business you do, the more difficult position you are in.

From an investment point of view, there was a demand for large insurance policies in this country and there was no money available to handle the business. That is why, in the main, during the past few years we have seen such a high proportion of the insurance industry, particularly general and commercial insurance and not life, handled by foreign interests. The market was there, but Canadian insurance agencies and brokers had to find money abroad in the general insurance fields.

With these amendments, it will be possible to amortize these front-end expenses over a wider period of time. Hopefully this will put the Canadian insurance industry on a much sounder financial basis.

In conclusion, I hope progress will be made in achieving a uniform Canadian insurance companies act, which should be available for parliament to consider within 18 months to two years time. I should commend these amendments to hon. members so that they can go to the Senate and the bill will be concurred in by the House of Commons.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is the conclusion of the third reading of this bill, and I want to thank all members for the difficult work they did, particularly in dealing with so many complicated amendments. This is of tremendous importance to the investment community of Canada and therefore of importance to insurance policyholders across the country. I wish also to acknowledge and agree with the sentiments expressed by hon. members opposite having to do with the failure of the committees branch to produce the report which ought really to be before us together with a reprinted bill. It ought to be in our hands as we look at a technical bill of this nature which has been changed so greatly in committee. The explanation I have from the committees branch is that they are overloaded with bills and amendments. Nevertheless, it is regrettable we cannot have the reprinted bill before us.

An hon. Member: Then you should not have scheduled this hearing.

Mr. Kaplan: The hon. member observes that we should not have scheduled this hearing. But I would point out that hopefully we are close to the recess and that, because of the extent to which the bill has been amended it has to go to the other place again and all this has to be done before the summer recess. So, with my thanks to hon. members for their support I hope we can move, now, to third reading.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION (SCIENTIFIC ACTIVITIES) ACT 1976

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Prime Minister) moved that the amendment made by the Senate to Bill C-26, respecting organization of certain scientific activities of the Government of Canada be read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Can someone on the government side give us a brief explanation of this amendment? It is an amendment made in the Senate and it is very simple—it increases the number on a certain body from three to four and indicates who the fourth person will be. Is this something the Senate thought up itself, or does it arise from an oversight on the part of government which has now been corrected?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is a minor legal amendment to bring Bill C-26 in line with Bill C-53. When the legislation went to the Senate the bill read:

—three other persons, one each representing and nominated by the Canada Council, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada . . .

The Senate proposes four persons and reads:

—four other persons, one each representing and nominated by the Canada Council, the Social Sciences and Humanities Council, the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada and the National Research Council of Canada.

That has been proposed by the Senate and accepted by the government.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What the minister has told us is quite obvious from reading the bill and reading the amendment. He has not yet answered my question. Was it an oversight that it was not there in the first place or did Their Honours in the Senate think it up themselves?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): I would say the Senate initiated it.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I heard the minister mention that this was a legal amendment. I would hope the government would never propose concurrence in an illegal amendment, though under this administration it is always possible. In any event, we have had an opportunity to review the matter and are prepared to let the amendment go.

Motion agreed to, amendment read the second time and concurred in.

FISHERIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND THE ACT AND THE CRIMINAL CODE IN CONSEQUENCE THEREOF

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-38, to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Speaker: There are three motions before us at the report stage. Motion No. 1, in the name of the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey), motion No. 2 in the name of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), which appears to be acceptable from a procedural point of view, and motion No. 3 in the name of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc). The Chair has some reservations about the regularity of motions one and three and perhaps we could now proceed to a discussion on the procedural aspects.

Mr. Fleming: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It has been brought to my attention that Your Honour is somewhat concerned about the procedural regularity of motion No. 1. I believe the government does support this amendment and, though members on the other side can speak for themselves, that there is agreement generally that I should ask for unanimous consent to accept the motion if that would be in order.

The situation is much the same with respect to motion No. 3. I submit that this amendment affects only one clause of Bill C-38 and is narrow in its scope. Moreover, that particular part of the bill has been amended and has been opened up. I know that the amendment is the result of a desire by all parties, in committee—I am speaking about motion No. 3. There has been a desire expressed by all parties to see it moved and it follows action taken by the minister to accommodate the concern of the provinces.

While I am on my feet may I bring a further amendment to Your Honour's attention? If it is in order, I should like to table copies and seek unanimous consent for its acceptance. I should like to move an additional amendment concerning the question of liability in relation to marine pollution. During the committee sessions, additional amendments were included to provide, hopefully, for recourse by fishermen against loss of income caused by pollution. Unfortunately, we did not differentiate between marine pollution from ships, in respect of which legislative provision already exists and for which a special marine pollution claims fund exists, and land-based pollution, the major source in respect of which we were seeking to provide protection for fishermen.

This matter was brought to our attention by the Dominion Marine Association which also recommended that the inclusion of the provision as it presently stands could cause difficulty to the shipping industry when obtaining insurance coverage. In view of this, officials have been working with the Department of Transport and we now have a further revision to propose to Bill C-38, which I feel will clarify these new liability provisions. I would now like to present such a motion with the unanimous consent of the House.

The motion reads as follows:

That Bill C-38 be amended in subclause 7(3) thereof by adding thereto, immediately following line 16 on page 7, the following subsection:

"(10.5) Notwithstanding anything in this section, subsections (10) and (10.1) do not apply in respect of any deposit of a deleterious substance that, within the meaning of Part XX of the Canada Shipping Act, constitutes a discharge of a pollutant caused by or otherwise attributable to a ship."

● (1140)

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to refer to all the amendments listed on pages XII and XIII of today's order paper since I am not too certain that it would be in order to speak to them at this time. Some of my colleagues have indicated their intention to speak on motions Nos. 1 and 2 however, and if I am in order I should like to confine my remarks to motion No. 3. Is that satisfactory?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We ought to regularize the proceedings a little bit. There has been some indication of positions to be taken in respect of these four motions. I wonder if we ought not to take them one at a time and sort out the position on each.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, before you take this point by point, I should bring to your attention a consequential amendment. The table already has a copy of this and we would need unanimous consent of the House to introduce it. It merely seeks to bring in line the French text of clause 31(1) with the English text in order to reflect the agreed intent of the subclause. I would therefore move:

That the French version of clause 5 of Bill C-38 be amended by striking out line 12 on page 3 thereof and by substituting therefore the following:

«équilibre d'une manière préjudiciable»

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The parliamentary secretary has asked for the consent of the House to move an additional motion. That could be done only with unanimous consent, of course, and it may be appropriate to find out now whether there is unanimous consent before we go to consideration of the other motions in order that members might prepare themselves for discussion on the motion knowing that the House has given consent that it be moved.

The House is being asked now only to give consent to the moving of the motion by the parliamentary secretary. Consequential upon that amendment would be an editorial change to the French text that the hon. parliamentary secretary just read to the House, as follows:

That the French version of clause 5, bill C-38 by striking out line 12 on page 3 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

«équilibre d'une manière préjudiciable»

The motion cannot be moved at this stage without notice unless it has the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I want to be clear. I am not withholding unanimous consent on the indication of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). It is on the indication of another hon. member that unanimous consent is not forthcoming and therefore the motion cannot be put at this time.

The hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) on a point of order.

Mr. Jones: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. The parliamentary secretary made his point clear this morning. He went to other members of the House concerned with this particular bill but was not courteous enough to come to me. I do not see how I can be courteous enough to give unanimous consent under the circumstances.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I want to apologize. Unfortunately, I did not know until just before a series of events last night that this bill would come up this morning. At that time I tried to contact several members and it is my fault that I did not contact the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones). I sincerely apologize for it.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, with that explanation I am prepared to give consent.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands on a point of order.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, we are quite prepared to give unanimous consent to have the motion introduced but I do not think we should proceed to debate it. I think it should be placed in numerical order and be the fourth item dealt with. In the meantime, perhaps the parliamentary secretary could provide a copy for each party if not each member so that we can look at it before we discuss it. Otherwise, we have no objection.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My idea in disposing of the introduction of the motion upon unanimous consent first was that while the other motions are being considered, that very thing could take place and I am sure it will. Therefore, the motion is now moved by the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. Fleming) and seconded by Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan) and will form part of our deliberations at report stage. Perhaps communications can take place concerning the debate that will follow after the first three motions have been discussed.

Motion No. 1 standing in the name of the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador reads:

That Bill C-38, An Act to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be amended by deleting Clause 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"3. Sections 10 to 12 of the said Act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"10. No one shall with boat or vessel or in any other way during the time of fishing for seals knowingly or wilfully disturb, impede or interfere with any seal fishery or prevent or impede the shoals of seals from coming into such fishery or knowingly or wilfully frighten such shoals.

11. Disputes between occupiers of seal fisheries concerning limits and the method of fishing or setting nets shall be decided summarily by any fishery officer or justice of the peace, by whom arbitrators may be appointed to assess damages and any damages so assessed or arising out of a repetition or continuance of the difficulty ordered to be remedied may be levied under the warrant of any justice of the peace."

There has been some preliminary indication of procedural concern with motion No. 1 in that it goes beyond the scope of the bill. The motion seeks to amend two sections of the existing Act not mentioned in the bill, namely sections 10 and 11 of the Fisheries Act. In addition, motion No. 1 appears to be irrelevant to Clause 3 of the bill which prohibits the catching of certain categories of fish. The motion deals with the interference in the seal fishery and provides a method of settlement of disputes arising therefrom. However, there is an indication of some desire on the part of the government to seek support for that amendment and to seek the consent of the House for its inclusion at this time.

Is there any indication whether that consent is forthcoming?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier—and I am sure the other parties will speak for themselves—I think there will be unanimous consent to put this motion because of the importance of it to a particular group of workers in Canada.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there is one difficulty not alluded to and it may give us some concern. I am advised that there is a consent on the merits of the amendment but we have to be careful about the question of the royal recommendation. I am not privy to the problems of obtaining a royal recommendation but if one is required I think it should be obtained and that might give us some problems in terms of time.

Mr. Speaker: There will be discussion on any of the other motions.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the concern which the House leader of the Conservative party has just raised. If the House would proceed with the other amendments in Bill C-38 at this time, I would undertake to consult with him and officials of the House to determine whether in fact a royal recommendation is required. We will do our level best—since there seems to be a disposition in the House to accept the amendment—to have the recommendation in the hands of hon. members as quickly as possible.

Mr. Speaker: It is a rather severe procedural difficulty because in each case when we attempt to deal with these matters we are setting some precedents. Sometimes, even though there is a disposition in terms of the spirit and intent of the motion, I am sure there are some things the House can do by consent. However, I am concerned that we may be extending even that with respect to this measure and will find ourselves with a provision in an act to which it does not directly relate. In any case, I would like some time to reflect on the long range ramifications of attempting to deal with that situation which, in accordance with our precedents we cannot do procedurally. While we deal with other motions, there can be some consultation in that regard.

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker, I am not entirely clear on this. I am not as up to date as the House leader of the Official Opposition regarding the necessity for a royal recommendation. Let me simply make this point to you with regard to the intent of the government concerning this bill. I draw your attention in particular to section 69(1) and (2) of the same bill amending the Fisheries Act. Section 69(1) reads:

> The provisions of this act and the regulations that apply to any or all of Canadian fisheries waters, without anything in the context of such provisions indicating that they apply to any specified area of Canadian fisheries waters, shall, in relation to any fishing vessel on the High Seas,—

That is the way the Fisheries Act reads. The clause amending the Fisheries Act reads at this point:

> . . . in relation to any fishing vessel or aircraft on or over the High Seas—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if the hon. member would clarify for me from what part of the bill he is reading.

Mr. Rompkey: I am reading from section 69 of Bill C-38.

Mr. Speaker: Bill C-38 only has 22 clauses.

Mr. Rompkey: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I mean clause 19 on page 20.

Mr. Speaker: Which seeks to amend section 69 of the Fisheries Act?

Mr. Rompkey: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry if I confused you on that. The point is that the bill amended the act by adding the words "or aircraft" after "fishing vessels", and the words "or over" the high seas. It goes on to read:

> . . . that is subject to the jurisdiction of Canada, or any act or thing done or omitted to be done on, from or by means of such fishing vessel—

And again the words "or aircraft" are added at this point. I continue reading:

> . . . or aircraft, be deemed to extend and apply to the High Seas.

[Mr. Goodale.]

Subsection (2) reads:

> The governor in council may make regulations respecting fisheries located in waters other than Canadian fisheries waters applicable to vessels or aircraft—

The point is that the insertion of the words "or aircraft" could only be with regard to the jurisdiction and administration of the seal fishery. It was the intention of the government to protect the seal fishery in order to better manage it and better protect sealers in the lawful course of their work. That was the reason that that particular wording was inserted. Therefore, the argument is that this motion is in order because it is in line with the intention of the government to give greater protection to sealers as indicated by the amendment of the section in the act in clause 19 of Bill C-38.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again the Chair will take into consideration the nature of the amendment and the statute to see whether or not something can be accomplished at this point by unanimous consent. I think all hon. members understand that obviously the intention of the amendment is praiseworthy. That is not the difficulty. However, what is being done here is an attempt to go beyond this amending statute to another statute that this bill does not seek to amend. I am not certain that that can be done even with the consent of the House, and I will need some time to consider it.

Motion No. 2 is in the name of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt). Perhaps the House will move to consideration of that motion while we reflect on the other problems.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster) moved:

> Motion No. 2.
> That Bill C-38, An Act to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be amended in Clause 7 by adding immediately after line 22 at page 9 the following:
> "(15) Where fish have accumulated deleterious substances to an extent that the health of the Canadian people is endangered, the Minister may prohibit fishing in those Canadian fisheries waters until a time when the level of deleterious substances has decreased and no longer constitutes a health hazard."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I take it that at this point in the proceedings it is appropriate that we deal with the substance of the motion. There is no procedural problem with it. In any event, it is appropriate that this morning's Montreal Gazette carries an interesting story on mercury poisoned fish, the headline of which reads: "273 Waterways have Mercury Poisoned Fish". The article reads:

> At least 273 Canadian lakes and rivers contain mercury contaminated fish posing a health hazard if eaten, says a list compiled by the federal environment department and officially described as incomplete.

I emphasize the fact that that list is incomplete. The article goes on to read:

> The list shows that most of the affected lakes and streams—roughly 160—are in Ontario, Manitoba has 40, Saskatchewan and Quebec 22 each, the Northwest Territories 12, New Brunswick 6, Alberta 4, Nova Scotia 2, and British Columbia and Newfoundland 1 each.
> The report names nine industries which are known to cause mercury pollution in 21 lakes or rivers.

Then the industries are named, such as Domtar Limited at Lebel-sur-Quevillon, about 50 miles north east of Val-d'Or, Aluminum Company of Canada Limited at Arvida, near Chicoutimi, and Strachem Limited, Beauharnois on Lake St. Louis. Of course, the most famous case of all is the Reed Paper pollution of the English-Wabigoon river system. I do not think there is a more important amendment that this House can deal with in terms of this bill and I do not think there is a more important matter to deal with than this question of the poisoning of native Canadians as the result of our rush to industrialize a part of Canada. We cannot have it both ways in this country. We who live in the south and who look to the modern industrial world to provide us with the comforts, cannot sit home quietly and have our comforts at the price of the death of the native people in this country, and that is the risk we have been running for a long time. The warnings have been there, and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) have been dragged, kicking and screaming into this issue.

I will not neglect the province of Ontario. I think that province has much to account for in terms of its approach to the English-Wabigoon river system. This amendment would allow the minister to prohibit fishing in any waters until such time as the amount of deleterious substances decreases and no longer constitutes a health hazard. That would mean some disruption both for native people and for people who run tourist businesses along those streams, but surely we cannot continue to pay the price of poor health among native people just to keep a few small industries going. If we are interested in the health of fish, surely we should be interested in the health of humans, and this amendment gives us an ideal opportunity to move now.

Let us remember that the power which would be given to the minister would be a discretionary power. He may close those rivers. He would not have to, but at least we would not have the jurisdictional foul-up we now have in Ontario whereby the federal government says this matter is a provincial responsibility and the provincial government says it is partly its responsibility and partly that of the federal government and that the matter should be studied further. We have studied that system long enough, and we know that native people have mercury poisoning. We know also that on the Quebec side there are areas where there is serious mercury poisoning.

From time to time it is argued that because of the division of fisheries jurisdiction the federal government cannot act. I do not think that argument will wash. The Native Indian Brotherhood presented a very articulate and well researched brief to the minister. In terms of the argument in favour of the minister's reserve jurisdiction and the whole question of being able to end fishing in streams until those streams are properly cleaned up and the health of Canadians is protected, I am very happy to endorse that brief. I do not know why this amendment was not adopted by the government when the bill was first drafted and why it was not adopted by the committee because it would not allow the minister to exceed his jurisdiction. It is not a mandatory provision. It would allow the minister to use his jurisdiction, and where a dispute arises, as it has with regard to the English-Wabigoon matter, the minister could clearly move to end very dangerous situations.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. Fleming) indicated to the National Indian Brotherhood on February 1 that the government would not close the river system unilaterally. I am pleased to see the parliamentary secretary in the House today, and when he responds, as I am sure he would like to, I hope he will explain why he wrote that letter and why he rejected an amendment to the bill which would allow the minister to act unilaterally under the provisions of the bill. The government cannot have it both ways. It cannot write to the National Indian Brotherhood and say it does not have the power and then, when the brotherhood seeks to give the government that power in the form of an amendment, refuse to accept it. We are looking for a little bit of federal leadership. There must be co-operation, but the minister must clearly have reserve jurisdiction in terms of this mercury problem, which is a problem right across the country.

I have been dealing with the English-Wabigoon system because that is the system which has had the most attention here in Ontario, but there is a whole chain of poisoned rivers going from one end of Canada to the other. There is not much use in casting blame and saying that Reed Paper is the villain or that someone else is the villain. Yes, Reed Paper is the villain, but we have a very special responsibility to deal with the effects and the cause of that poisoning. Instead of keeping the price of paper low by poisoning Indians and by not putting in the kinds of devices that are needed to stop that poisoning, we in this House have a special moral responsibility to see that those streams are closed and that the natives of Canada are protected. I plead with the minister and his parliamentary secretary not to reject this amendment out of hand or on any partisan basis. Here is an opportunity to exercise leadership and not simply to say that Ontario does not really want to shut down the sport fishery and that if people eat a few of those polluted fish they will be all right. If the government says that, native people will quite rightly think that if the fish are all right for American tourists, they are all right for them. The problem continues to be compounded by a lack of leadership at the federal level.

I am not going to deal in detail with the jurisdictional argument which was presented to the minister by the National Indian Brotherhood. The position of the brotherhood is that the federal government has unilaterally abandoned jurisdiction as a result of some events which occurred a very long time ago. To me that seems to be quite a persuasive argument, and if we examine it from the point of view of the British North America Act, the jurisdiction is still clearly there. It is time the federal government stopped abandoning its powers and leaving them to the provinces. This is another opportunity for the federal government to assert itself in an area where we have not seen any federal leadership whatsoever. The federal government should protect the health of the Canadian people, particularly that of native people, from the effects of mercury poisoning.

This bill is basically designed to improve our capacity to increase the spawn and the size of fish catches, but it also deals with the question of fish quality, and when it deals with that, it must also deal with the question of the health of those who consume that fish. It is directly related. This seems to me to be a golden opportunity for the minister to accept this well reasoned amendment and to place himself in a position in which he could shut down the English-Wabigoon system until the problem of mercury pollution has been solved.

This would be a great incentive to industry. As this bill proceeded through second reading stage and through committee stage the argument throughout was that the powers in the bill are great. We know they are, but we should not be unreasonable in exercising those powers. We need those powers to encourage industry to clean up its act. All we have to do is use the bill to give industry notice that we have the potential to require industry to discontinue or change some of its operations. We think that if the federal government has this kind of power, industry will voluntarily comply. Surely, the same argument holds true for the proposed amendment. It would give the minister the power to shut down certain streams, and this would give industry a tremendous incentive to make doubly sure that it does not continue contaminating the 273 waterways which the Department of the Environment has identified as being contaminated by mercury.

I am disappointed that we have spent so much time on this bill in terms of considering its commercial potential. That is necessary and useful, but we seem to have spent an inordinate amount of time on that and not dealt with the other side of the question, which is the question of the poisoning of people who consume poisoned fish. I shall say no more. I commend the amendment to the minister and am disappointed it has not found favour with more hon. members.

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief. I do not think any native people would say the intent of the hon. member's amendment is not good, but that is not the issue. The hon. member spoke of a certain historical abandonment of responsibility, and I suggest that he was not correct. I do not believe that giving provincial jurisdictions the right to enforce federal legislation, by agreement, is necessarily an abandonment of responsibility. Certainly, it is not an abandonment according to what I studied in law school.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It is co-operative federalism.

Mr. Jarvis: I accuse the hon. member of no ulterior motives, but point out that the activities of the provincial Ontario NDP concerning the English-Wabigoon river system disturbs me deeply. I do not blame the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), but suggest that the leader of the Ontario NDP was more concerned about inspecting refrigerators and being reported in the headlines than about anything else.

I read carefully the brief of the National Indian Brotherhood and think, as does the hon. member for New Westminster, that it was well reasoned and well presented and undoubtedly led to this amendment being proposed. I discussed briefly with representatives of the Brotherhood the facts which prompted them to view the situation with respect to the river system with alarm, and I share their attitude. I commend the Brotherhood for preparing an excellent brief. On the other hand, I have great difficulty accepting at face value what the hon. member for New Westminster suggested. He suggests, after having assessed the history of the situation in the area, that the federal government should assume what he thinks is its constitutional responsibility under the British North America Act. I suggest that the progress we have made on environmental questions has not come about because one jurisdiction has taken away authority from another. We have made substantial progress by co-operating with our jurisdictions, provincial and municipal. I suggest that the federal government could have acted with respect to the English-Wabigoon river system by order in council, but chose not to do so for its own reasons, for which I might condemn it. I do not know.

Solicitors in the employ of the government of Ontario told me that, without question, the federal government had power to close the river completely to sports and commercial fishing, but chose not to do this because it thinks that regulations concerning the Fisheries Act can best be enforced in inland waters by provincial jurisdictions. I think I and the hon. member for New Westminster are debating this question today. The hon. member thinks the regulations could be better enforced at the federal level. I question that. I do not think big government getting bigger is necessarily better, particularly with respect to environmental matters. The ability of many provinces to enforce federal legislation concerning inland waters and fisheries will vary. The facilities and manpower for enforcing the regulations will vary as between provinces.

Something else troubles me about the amendment, and the hon. member did not address himself to the point. If the federal government chooses to take this action—and it would have power so to act even if the amendment were not passed—what consequences would flow from that action? Would the provincial government feel obliged, because of the action it took, to feed the native peoples who can no longer consume the fish from the river. If the federal government acted under this amendment, does the hon. member for New Westminster think no consequences would flow from that action? I suggest, seriously, that there may not be legal consequences, but there would certainly be strong moral consequences. If I cut off the food supply of certain native people in a certain geographic location, am I not morally obligated to provide them with a substitute food supply? Does the hon. member suggest the federal government should move into that area?

Mr. Leggatt: They did.

Mr. Jarvis: It has from time to time. Has the hon. member seriously considered the consequences of the federal government's closing, say, a waterway for commercial and sports fishing? What would be the position if the federal Department of Agriculture acted this way with respect to hoof and mouth disease in cattle? What would the consequences be? The point is important; unfortunately the hon. member did not consider it. If he suggests the federal government should assume responsibility in those cases, he and I part company. Obviously, the hon. member favours extending federal jurisdiction in matters affecting native peoples.

I have some doubt about this motion, first, because the federal government already has the power to do what the amendment proposes; second, because I am concerned about the consequences of those actions I mentioned.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): What about the consequences of inaction?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, since it is agreed that we should make progress with the bill, my reply to the points raised by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) will be brief. I believe the hon. member for New Westminster referred to a letter I had sent to someone. Actually, if memory serves me right, I believe he was referring to a response I gave in the House of Commons to a question.

Mr. Leggatt: That is right.

Mr. Fleming: In my response I said the federal government would not move unilaterally and tried to make the point the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) made so well some minutes ago. I believe the federal government has power to act under the present legislation. Therefore the matter comes down to a ceding of administrative responsibility. Should we, at will, no matter how worthy the cause, enter a field of jurisdiction because of some alleged fear the province or other authority will not carry out its responsibility; and leave that field of jurisdiction when we think that authority is acting properly, particularly in environmental matters? The hon. member for New Westminster said several times the government cannot have it both ways. That is the precise difficulty. We cannot have it both ways in the administration of this act and in the proposing of legislation. On the other hand, in many cases there is a healthy federal-provincial relationship in which the provinces assume responsibility for administration of the act.

In this connection may I quote part of a letter written to Mr. Noel Starblanket, President of the National Indian Brotherhood in February, by the senior assistant deputy minister, fisheries and marine service of DFE—Department of Fisheries and the Environment. I begin at the second paragraph. The letter reads:

> As you may be aware, responsibility for administration of the Fisheries Act has been delegated to the province of Ontario since 1898.

I believe that that is 1902.

> While provincial regulations under the Act must be approved by the federal government, we have not had a direct involvement in the management of Ontario fisheries for over 75 years. Although the minister retains the legislative authority for regulating fisheries, it is his firm position that the delegation of authority to the province to administer the Fisheries Act must be respected. He has indicated that he does not intend to intervene in a matter which is clearly a provincial responsibility.
> While the minister is not prepared to overrule any provincial decision regarding sport fishing on the English-Wabigoon, he does support the concept of a fishing ban in that waterway as a useful step to reduce the consumption of contaminated fish by native people. It is also his view that while enforcement of a ban would obviously require the active cooperation of provincial authorities, the opportunity should be provided for local residents to become directly involved in enforcement of the ban to maximize its effectiveness.

I point that out to try to state the particular position and also to argue that my minister has not been hesitant in making very clear his views as the federal Minister of Fisheries and the Environment on what should happen in that area. We have heard many arguments, particularly on occasion from members of the NDP, that we cannot continue to intrude on provincial responsibilities, that we must respect the practice that has been carried on for a number of years.

Clearly for 75 years we said we have the act, you will administer it and we have not intruded. On particular occasions where we believe the cause justifies it and we negate their judgment, surely there will be consequences. I think that is the point that the member for Perth-Wilmot was making, as well as consequences of compensation.

Much more important is the consequence of either giving people at a different level of government responsibility to carry on or not giving them the responsibility at all. I am sure the hon. member for New Westminster is not suggesting we should take back from Ontario the responsibility they have held for 75 years.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members know that by hearing the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I wish to respond to two points in the debate. One is that if the federal government took action under this proposed amendment, consequences would flow. That is correct. In fact, there is ample precedent for that. Consequences have flowed from the English-Wabigoon case. In fact, it was not the province of Ontario but the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand) who provided the freezers and the fish.

An hon. Member: In Ontario.

Mr. Leggatt: In Ontario, too. I am not suggesting any one particular group did it. I do not think it is valid to argue that because consequences flow from these kinds of decisions that there is not the lateral responsibility that goes with that.

Of course, any government would take the consequences of shutting down a stream. If native people were not involved, I would say there is a federal responsibility to those people in that area to receive alternate employment and alternate compensation as a result of the poisoning of the water. However, it does not seem to be a valid argument in terms of opposing this particular amendment.

The other question is the position of the New Democratic Party in Ontario. When I initiated this, I said I was not initiating it on a partisan basis. I did not want to compare the record of the federal government and the provincial government in this area and so on. However, since the hon. member wants to raise that question and insinuate that question into the debate, the record of the provincial Ontario government has been appalling with regard to the English-Wabigoon system. I am not using that as an argument particularly, but quite clearly they have made political decisions with regard to that area of the country which have damaged the health of native people, to their discredit.

The mere fact that administration of the Fisheries Act has been left to the provinces does not mean that for all time the federal government has abandoned its jurisdiction, its capacity to take over the clear question of whether a river should be open or closed. To continue to play this jurisdictional game between the provinces and the federal government means that in the meantime we are going to find Indians with mercury poisoning. Ordinary Canadians everywhere will have their health seriously affected while this silly constitutional debate continues.

The fact is the reserve jurisdiction is in the federal government. It is about time they took the leadership and had the guts to close down that river and put this amendment in the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: The question is on motion No. 2 standing in the name of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt). All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: I will order that the division be deferred.

Earlier in the day I expressed some concern about the procedural regularity of motion No. 1 in the name of the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey), seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). The motion seeks to attach itself to clause 3 of Bill C-38. Clause 3 of Bill C-38 reads as follows:

Section 12 of the said Act—

That being the Fisheries Act.

—is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

[Mr. Leggatt.]

What follows is a new clause 12 which defines salmon and other prohibited species. The purpose of the amendment to which the House seeks to give its consent from a procedural point of view is to repeal Sections 10 to 12 of the said act and to substitute a new Section 10 and Section 11.

I was concerned upon reading the motions that even with unanimous consent the House not attempt to do so because I was fearful that the proposed amendment of the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador went far beyond the provisions of this statute and into sections of the Fisheries Act not dealt with here. In fact, upon examination of the amendment, the statute and the Fisheries Act, I am indeed certain.

I was concerned that we ought not to do by unanimous consent that which was totally wrong from a substantive point of view. It seems to me that the House is perfectly able to give its consent to set aside its Standing Orders. It is perfectly able to give its unanimous consent to waive procedural requirements and precedents concerning notices and things of that sort. However, if we were to come to a point where we had an attempt to introduce an amendment which was totally contrary to the principle of a bill or totally beyond the scope of a bill, that is the time the Chair ought to intervene so that even upon unanimous consent we would not attempt to do things that were fundamentally wrong from both a procedural and substantive point of view.

However, in this particular instance there are certain conditions. First, Bill C-38 does in fact amend the Fisheries Act. That is its purpose. Second, it does set up machinery for the settling of disputes in several particular sections and imposes fines and penalties for difficulties about fisheries jurisdictions and things of that sort. Third, by examining sections 10 and 11 which it is proposed by this amendment to change, sections 10 and 11 already do in a substantial way what it is that this amendment attempts. The language in sections 10 and 11 of the Fisheries Act is almost identical to the language that is being put forward in these amendments. Therefore, what is attempted here is a relatively minor change to those two sections in order to give effect to the inclusion of provision for jurisdiction by certain fisheries officers, and some other related aspects, and also to change in a minor way the definition of the seal fishery, which is already the subject of those sections.

It might, indeed, be argued that even in these circumstances, since Bill C-38 does not touch sections 10 and 11 of the Fisheries Act this amendment is not in order. I would probably be persuaded on purely procedural grounds, since Bill C-38 does not propose to amend sections 10 and 11 of the Fisheries Act it could probably not be moved at this time. But given the unanimous consent of the House, under all the circumstances I have outlined, we are not stretching things too far in attempting to accommodate hon. members.

There is another point I should bring to the attention of the House. First of all, section three of the bill does not deal with sections 10 and 11 of the Fisheries Act. Further, the amendment which is put forward does not deal with the present clause three of Bill C-38. It takes clause three of Bill C-38 and repeals it, and I think the intention probably was to add on these two paragraphs dealing with sections 10 and 11 of the Fisheries Act. Instead of that, it is replacing the present clause three with the proposed amendments to sections 10 and 11 which means that clause three of Bill C-38 is lost. I am sure that was not the intention.

It seems to me all intentions would be more accurately served if the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey), seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) were to put forward what they now describe as a new clause three as a new subclause to the bill, which would become clause 3.1. Without touching the present clause three, it would deal directly with sections 10 and 11 of the Fisheries Act just as described. This, because of its procedural irregularity, would be done by consent of the House. The procedural irregularity is still well within the principle of the bill, bearing in mind that it does amend the Fisheries Act, as is sought to be done here, and does set out to regulate several areas of fisheries dispute as is also sought to be done here. It seems to me that the procedural abberation is no greater than we have allowed many times in the past and therefore if it meets with the approval of the House perhaps the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador could seek the unanimous consent of the House to introduce his motion.

Mr. Rompkey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps you could advise me whether it is necessary for me actually to introduce the clause as suggested or whether I am now at liberty to debate the motion.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador seeks the consent of the House to introduce by way of a new clause to the bill a motion at the report stage which would propose the addition of a new clause 3.1 and which would read as follows:

3.1 Sections 10 to 12 of the Act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

10. No one shall with boat or vessel or in any other way during the time of fishing for seals knowingly or wilfully disturb, impede or interfere with any seal fishery or prevent or impede the shoals of seals from coming into such fishery or kwowingly or wilfully frighten such shoals.

11. Disputes between occupiers of seal fisheries concerning limits and the method of fishing or setting nets shall be decided summarily by any fishery officer or justice of the peace, by whom arbitrators may be appointed to assess damages and any damages so assessed or arising out of a repetition or continuance of the difficulty ordered to be remedied may be levied under the warrant of any justice of the peace.

The seconder is the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall).

Does the House give unanimous consent to the introduction of this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is therefore deemed to have been introduced.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Crouse: On a brief point of order, Mr. Speaker. When the hon. member addresses the House on this motion, would he explain the reason for using the words "shoals of seals" rather than "herds of seals"? It is my understanding as a lifelong Lunenburger that when you went sealing you looked for herds of seals. I have never heard the expression "shoals of seals", in my life and I wish the hon. member would explain the terminology.

Mr. Speaker: Even to my unpracticed ear the expression sounds strange. Nevertheless, it is the language already used in sections 10 and 11 of the Fisheries Act.

Mr. Goodale: What about "flocks of seals"?

Mr. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am not sure I can give a satisfactory explanation of the term. I can only say that the terminology used in the amendment goes back to a previous day. Like the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) I am used to the term "herds of seals". However, "shoals" is the word which was used back in the dim pages of history and the people who drew up the act decided they would use this terminology. Perhaps the hon. member and I can discuss the point with the fisheries experts later on.

I want to make a few brief remarks on this important motion. There are two things we have to do on behalf of the sealing industry and on behalf of the sealers. One is legal and the other is political. I am using "political" in the broad sense of the word. What we are doing today is, I think, entirely legal, entirely in order. It is certainly not proper for anybody to go into the woods and interfere with a logger in the course of his work. Nobody is allowed to go down into a mine and interfere with a miner in the course of his work; nobody can go on the water and interfere with a fisherman, take up his nets, damage his boats. Yet last year on the ice floes off St. Anthony we saw people locking themselves to chains, stopping ships, taking clubs out of the hands of sealers and throwing pelts into the water. In other words, they were doing away with the means by which these people make their livelihood. After all, these sealers are engaged in an entirely legitimate pursuit, as are loggers, fishermen and, for that matter, office workers.

It is not our intention to keep away from the seal hunt those who go there for a legitimate reason. We do not want to keep away the press, for example. The press has gone to the seal hunt for the last several years and I think those reporters who are conscientious and reputable have given honest accounts and related the facts. Indeed, I think that from the small "p" political point of view the tables are turning on the side of the fishermen. This is due to the work of those responsible journalists who have written their stories and related the facts as they saw them. We do not want to keep such journalists away from the hunt. Nor do we want to keep away those who are engaged in research or even those who simply wish to go there as spectators to see what goes on.

In the past, however, people have gone there with the avowed intention of disrupting the sealers in the course of their work. I think that is wrong and that it should be stopped. It does not happen anywhere else in Canada; it is not done to any other workers in Canada and we are determined that it shall not be done to the sealers. Last year, the fisheries officers had no authority to stop that sort of thing. They were on the high seas and had no authority to do what they thought they should be doing. They were practically impotent to do what needed to be done. This act, in another section, gives fisheries officers the authority of peace officers and will enable them to enforce this amendment.

From the political point of view, the other thing we have to do, after we pass this amendment and put it into law thus tightening the law on behalf of sealers, is to do a job in Canada by telling the story of the seal fishery as it should be told in order to set the record straight. The people of Canada have been subjected to a lot of inaccurate information. As an example, the method of killing seals has been described by many as inhumane. We have on the record now a number of reputable humane societies in this country which say that the method of seal killing is as humane as possible and is more humane than the methods used in many abattoirs in Canada. It is more humane than the methods used in other areas of work whereby living creatures are killed. There is a balance of nature to protect and preserve. We, as human beings, are going to continue to eat, and continue to use that which is put on this earth for our use. In terms of the humanity of the kill, it has been shown that it is as humane as most and more humane than some. The government of Canada took exception to steps in the direction of inhumane killing. I remember when the previous minister of fisheries outlawed the gaff and introduced the club. There is enough information on the record to indicate that the method of killing is humane.

I hope the seal industry in Newfoundland can be developed because it is an important source of income for Newfoundland fishermen. In years past they have made $1,000 a year from the fishery. This year, which was a particularly good year, inshore fishermen made an average of between $4,000 and $5,000 from the seal fishery alone. When you consider half of the fishermen in the Atlantic provinces live below what would normally be described as the poverty line in this country, then we can justify that seal fishery.

We had to change the law and we also have to change the hearts and minds of Canadians. We have wolves in sheep's clothing and false prophets who have been preying on the emotions of people who are looking for a cause and have nothing to get involved in at the moment. It is unfortunate that a former reputable organization such as Greenpeace should get involved in a situation which is not in keeping with their past record. When they protested against the testing of nuclear devices, a lot of people in this country were with them. Now that they are trying to protect the whales, a lot of people in this country will be with them. When they attempted to protect seals, they did not know what they were getting into and were out in left field. I hope we have been able to turn the tables. I hope we will be able to tell the people of Canada in the future exactly how important this industry is to the Atlantic provinces and exactly what protections we should build in and are building into the Fisheries Act in order to protect people in the course of doing their jobs.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in seconding the motion of the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey). I commend him for the work he has done, and I also commend the government for giving us this means to protect what has been the heritage of many hundreds of Newfoundlanders for many hundreds of years. I am very pleased, and I am sure the people of the Atlantic region are pleased as well, with the fact that this is a humane hunt. As the hon. member indicated, it has been proven time and time again that people for some reason or other are trying to destroy the minds of other people for their own gains.

I have no hesitation in naming the people to whom I am referring. As is indicated in the article contained in the Toronto Sun, the people who wanted to ban sealing were: Brian Davies from Vancouver; Franz Weber from Switzerland; Michael Moynihan from New York, who is Senator Daniel P. Moynihan's brother; and some fellow from Boulder, Colorado who accompanied Brian Davies of the International Fund for Animal Welfare, Greenpeace. The article continues as follows:

> These types are the reason why, every springtime, when the harp seals begin to whelp on the front of ice moving down from the Arctic, St. Anthony turns into a scene that, if Paddy Chayefsky had known about it, he would have worked into Network.

These are people who are doing damage to Newfoundland Canadians, and they are allowed to get away with it. They went deliberately to the seal hunt last year against orders and provoked fishery officials and sealers just to get particular attention. They pretended they were drowning and pretended they were hit by fishery officers, just to get the attention of the press and to give the wrong impression to the people of Canada and the people of the world. They wanted to give the impression that Newfoundlanders were barbarians and that the seal hunt should not continue.

As my hon. colleague has said, the table has turned, and it turned as late as May 30, 1977 when the Ontario Humane Society indicated in a very good article that they were convinced the seal hunt was humane and supported it wholeheartedly. An article in the St. John's Evening Telegram of May 30, 1977 reads as follows:

> Canada's largest humane society has endorsed a report of a government committee on sealing which maintains Newfoundland's annual seal hunt is the most carefully regulated and controlled of outside slaughter operations.
> The 20,000-member Ontario Humane Society Friday unanimously passed a resolution supporting the report of the committee on seals and sealing at its annual general meeting held in Honey Harbour, Ontario.
> The COSS was appointed by the federal government in 1971 and is composed of scientists, veterinarians, and members of Canadian and international humane societies.

Perhaps much more will be said about this after today, but I should recommend to everybody in the House, if they have not seen it, the pamphlet put out by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) and entitled: "The Seal Hunt". Every member should send out copies of it to their constituents, so that the people of Canada are made aware that this is a humane hunt and can continue without the destruction of society and only to the destruction of false words, wrong impressions and false provocations by Canadians who should not be classed as Canadians.

A perfect example to cite is that of the petition which was sent out by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador and myself. In my district there are 25,000 householders, and there is only one small corner of my constituency which is called Plum Point from which landsmen fish. At the time we presented this petition in the House of Commons, it contained 15,536 signatures, and they are still coming in. The figure is now over 16,000. It indicates how 16,000 people in one part of Newfoundland, which is a fair proportion of the total population of approximately half a million, feel about outsiders coming in and destroying what is theirs through heritage. There are also the signatures which were collected by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador and other colleagues which total over 40,000.

I hope the amendments will give power so that we will not have the embarrassing situations which occurred in past years, particularly last year. To refer once again to Brian Davies, in 1975 he went to court and his case was deemed as being outside provincial jurisdiction. The case was postponed, and it has been appealed now by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford). In 1976, while his case is being appealed, the same man went out and committed the same crime, deliberately contravening the Seals Act. He is laughing at Canadian law-makers, at parliament. He should not be allowed to get away with this. The purpose of the amendment is to prevent people from interfering with this seal hunt. I have no hesitation in commending the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey) for bringing the motion forward and I am pleased that he asked me to second it. Passage by this House will allow us to accomplish something for Canadian society and Canadian fishermen.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I seek some clarification on the purpose of the amendment. I have great respect for the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey) because I know the amount of study he and other members have done on the subject. I am reluctant to get into a debate on a motion which concerns a fishery so far from my own constituency and about which the members supporting the amendment are so knowledgeable.

The amendment reads in part:

10. No one shall with boat or vessel or in any other way during the time of fishing for seals knowingly or wilfully disturb . . .

The words "in any other way" bother me. During the course of debate it has been indicated that there is no desire to keep responsible journalists away from reporting on the hunt but how do we define who is responsible and who is not in these circumstances? I agree completely with the comments of the Ontario Humane Society which were read into the record. I was one who refused unanimous consent several years ago to a motion condemning the activities of the Greenpeace in regard to the seal hunt and I think they were misguided in their activities last year. I am satisfied now that the evidence of our biologists is sound in the two areas in question, the humane conduct of the hunt and the biological capacity of this species to recover. I agree with those who claim the hunt is proper.

My concern with the amendment is that it would appear to be a move to "censor" the seal hunt rather than "censure" it. That may be a dangerous area. If we say that only certain journalists may observe the hunt we will be criticized very severely at home and abroad for apparently seeking to hide an activity that we do not need to hide. The whole world has looked at our seal hunt. I know that school children have been circulated in the United States and there has been talk of the "horrible hunt". I am not worried about the media; I am convinced that Canada won the argument last year on the facts. However, I am nervous about an amendment that says that any disruption in any way would be penalized.

That would leave a tremendous amount of discretion to be used about who we keep off the ice to report on the seal hunt. It seems to me to say we will let the good journalists on the ice and keep off the bad journalists. That is a dangerous position to take and I do not think we have anything to hide with regard to the seal hunt—there are some other areas where we may have things to hide but from the body of evidence I have seen, I am satisfied that the seal hunt is conducted properly.

Do we need legislation aimed at a particular group or particular journalists to prevent them from seeing what goes on? I think it would increase the problem rather than reduce it. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the amendment, not because I am opposed to the seal hunt but because we have nothing to hide and it seems to me the amendment is designed to prevent complete media coverage of the hunt. As long as people do not interfere with the hunt—by that I mean picketing or interfering with the sealers—or have an effect on the species by reducing the number of seals that may be in the area—I have to oppose the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Is the House ready for the question? The hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador.

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I would think the hon. member would have an opportunity to wind up debate on his motion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The precedent is of rather recent memory but is not of a very high quality. Due to the circumstances under which we are operating, the House will realize that earlier this morning I returned to the Chair and, while attempting to sort out one of the procedural problems we were discussing under these rather extraordinary circumstances, I gave the floor to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) who had already spoken on his motion. At this stage however, there is simply no procedure whereby a member can speak more than once, even if he wishes to close the debate. That has to be taken as a rather extraordinary occurrence.

For the benefit of the House I should like to settle a procedural question on motion No. 3. I was endeavouring to do so before one o'clock in order to assist hon. members in planning their schedule of work for this evening. Motion No. 3 is an amendment of the minister and proposes to add conditions to the power of the minister to prescribe an order in clause 8. The condition that is sought to be added is an offer of consultation with the provinces before that takes place. In committee, I am aware that the chairman ruled that amendment out of order on the basis of a precedent I had set in relation to the immigration bill only a few days previously. In reading the two clauses it is not difficult to understand why the committee chairman would make that ruling. The language of the two clauses is similar and it seems to me it would be difficult for the committee chairman to resist a comparison between them and therefore to follow the precedent set in the immigration bill and rule this amendment out of order.

Upon reflection, however, it seems to me that the conditions are somewhat different. In the immigration precedent the statute had put forward by way of a general authority clause all of the authorities the minister required in order to behave as the minister responsible for that particular statute. It was a general authority clause which every statute of that sort must have in order to see to it that the minister is clothed with the appropriate authority to operate all the programs contained in the statute.

To that clause of general authority for the minister, it was sought to add that the minister was required to consult with the provinces before the implementation of some of the programs. In that circumstance it seemed to me it added an entirely new concept of the statute. In this situation, however, the conditions are somewhat different for indeed what is prescribed here is not the general authority section of the minister but rather a specific power of the minister to prescribe an order under certain circumstances and in certain conditions. The amendment therefore seeks to add another condition. Therefore, it is quite different from the precedent that was taken from the immigration bill.

In any case we are again faced with the desire already expressed by the House—for indeed there has been a desire expressed by the opposition—that there be greater consultation with the provinces, and in these circumstances the minister is attempting to give some credence to that expression of goodwill by enshrining it in statutory language. In the circumstances there seems to be an intent of the House that the matter be debated. Even if I were to be left in some doubt on the matter as to its procedural regularity—and in fact I am not—it is always incumbent on the Chair to attempt to resolve the doubt in favour of the matter being discussed in the House.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Because I think the conditions are different and the precedent does not apply as exactly as it first appeared, although I understand perfectly the reasoning of the committee chairman in following the precedent, and secondly because if I were left in any doubt I would resolve it in favour of discussion, and finally, because there has already been an indication that if there were a procedural irregularity, which I do not find, the House would want to discuss this motion in any case, I think it appropriate that the motion be put before the House for discussion and that it be found to be appropriate on procedural grounds.

Is the House ready for the question on motion No. 1?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

I declare motion No. 1 carried.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

AMENDMENT TO STANDING ORDER RELATING TO REPORTS OF AUDITOR GENERAL

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, may I raise a matter that has been discussed with the other parties having to do with an amendment to the standing orders, but not one that causes problems in principle. It reads:

That Standing Order 65(1)(q) be amended by deleting the semi-colon at the end and adding the following: "to which the Public Accounts and all reports of the Auditor General shall be deemed to have been referred, immediately the said documents are tabled;"

The purpose of the amendment is to ensure that the public accounts and reports of the Auditor General are automatically referred. I would like to move that motion and have it adopted.

I have another point of order which may commend itself to the House.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). Is it the pleasure of the House that the President of the Privy Council shall have leave to introduce the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BROADCASTING, FILMS AND ASSISTANCE TO THE ARTS

EXTENSION OF REFERENCE ON FARM BROADCASTING TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): As hon. members are aware, the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts has been considering the question of farm broadcasting. Their term of reference has expired so that they have not been able to make a report. In response to a number of requests from members of the committee I should like to move:

That the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts be authorized to consider the subject matter of farm broadcasting and that the evidence adduced thereon in December 1976 be referred to the said committee.

The hope is that once the committee has received this reference it will produce a report in the remaining days of the session.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) seeks the consent of the House to introduce this motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There being no further business, I do now leave the chair pursuant to an order made Monday, June 27, until eight o'clock this evening.

At 1.08 p.m. the House took recess.

FISHERIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND THE ACT AND THE CRIMINAL CODE IN CONSEQUENCE THEREOF

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-38, to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment) moved:

Motion No. 3

That Bill C-38, an act to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 8 by adding immediately after line 11 at page 11 the following:

"(4) Where the minister or a person designated by the Minister proposes to make an order pursuant to subsection (2), he shall after to consult with

(a) the governments of any provinces that he considers to be interested in any such proposed order, and

(b) any departments or agencies of the government of Canada that he considers appropriate, but nothing in this subsection prevents the minister or a person designated by the minister from making an interim order pursuant to subsection (2) without such consultation where he considers that immediate action is necessary."

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak briefly on motion No. 3, which is before the House. I feel it is only proper that I put on record some of the concerns expressed by the provinces as well as those expressed by industry when this measure was before the committee for detailed study.

The motion moved for the minister is identical to one which was rejected by the chairman of the committee, but I am pleased to see that it has been introduced to the House once again. When we examined the original amendment in the committee, the concerns of a number of provinces were registered. It is not my intention to burden the record tonight with all of the objections, but I think some of them should be recorded in Hansard so that the positions of the provinces will be there for everyone reading Hansard to see. Starting on the Pacific coast, the brief submitted to the committee by the government of British Columbia reads in part as follows:

The proposed amendments to the Fisheries Act (Bill C-38) have been brought to my attention by a number of ministries within the British Columbia government, as well as representatives from major industries in the province. All are concerned with the effect the proposed legislative changes will have on existing co-operative arrangements between agencies of our two governments dealing with environmental protection and pollution control. They are also apprehensive about the potential effect of these proposals on resource and economic development.

The mutual objective of avoiding duplication of government regulations, particularly in relation to resource-based industries, will not be furthered by the proposed legislation. The close co-operation we have enjoyed in the environmental field may be jeopardized. The proposed legislation is oriented to a single resource—albeit of considerable importance to this province—but is out of step with the multiple resource use essential to the development of a healthy economy in British Columbia.

That is the prelude to their brief, which indicates some of the concerns of those who reside in British Columbia. I will not deal with all the briefs. I am picking them at random. The government of Alberta submitted one, which says in part:

The rights of provinces to maintain those areas of jurisdiction allotted them by the British North America Act is a fundamental principle of the Canadian constitution. Alberta strongly reaffirms this principle and maintains that the provinces have the right to receive adequate consideration by the federal government where proposed legislation may create encroachment upon provincial fields of legislation. Alberta feels that the proposed Bill C-38 clearly impinges on provincial rights . . .

An example of such a mechanism is a recent agreement signed in 1975 between Canada and Alberta in which they entered into an accord for the protection and enhancement of environmental quality. Both Canada and Alberta have jurisdictional responsibility in the field of environmental quality including pollution prevention, control and abatement. The accord was a recognition of this joint responsibility. It stated that both parties would co-operate to make certain that environmental programs were planned in such a way as to ensure comprehensiveness and eliminate duplication. It was also agreed that both Canada and Alberta would adhere to certain principles and practices relating to the protection and enhancement of environmental quality, in the development and maintenance of complementary programs with each government acting within its constitutional jurisdiction. The objectives of the accord were to provide a more effective solution to pollution problems through better co-ordination of federal-provincial activities.

Sections 7, 9 and 10 of the accord are quoted in the brief, as follows:

Section 7. Canada, after consultation with the province and all other provinces, agrees to establish broad national ambient quality objectives for air and water based upon nationally agreed scientific criteria.

Section 9. Canada, after consultation with the province and all other provinces, agrees to develop national baseline effluent and emission requirements and guidelines for specific industrial groups and specific pollutants. Specific groups or classifications of industries will be agreed upon from time to time for the purpose of establishing priorities.

Section 10. Canada and the province agree to have adequate discussions on possible environmental effects of proposed major developments or redevelopment projects. Canada and the province undertake to provide each other with data and other general information as they may mutually agree to be necessary.

There is much more in the brief. On page 3 the following is found:

The proposed legislation in its present form contravenes the spirit of the accord as some of the amendments represent an intrusion into provincial jurisdiction over water resource management, natural resource development, industrial development, and local works and undertakings . . .

The Honourable Roméo LeBlanc, Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, in his address to the House of Commons during the second reading of Bill C-38, indicated concern for the protection of fish and water quality. While the federal government's concern is laudable Alberta questions the right of the government of Canada to usurp provincial powers to achieve these ends.

Although that brief contains much more, I wanted to put the particular passages I quoted on record so that hon. members might consider them in committee. I am holding in my hand another brief presented by Dr. Henry Landis, Q.C., general counsel for the Ontario ministry of the environment. This was an excellent brief presented to the committee and some of the points he made are well worth repeating. He said:

The amendments should be evaluated not by how they may be administered but rather by what they authorize. If this standard is applied, they authorize environmental control which, in significant respects, goes beyond anything contained in Ontario's legislation, duplicates important parts of it, authorizes actions which could have adverse effects on the economy of Ontario and imposes on industries and municipalities duties and liabilities with respect to reporting and cleanup which are unreasonable . . .

The amendments may well affect the legal validity of Ontario's legislation dealing with water pollution and water quality. Because of the greatly increased scope of the amendments and the similarity between the provisions dealing with cleanup and the proposed amendments to the Environmental Protection Act for the same purpose, there is now a greater likelihood of a court coming to the conclusion that the field of water pollution and water quality has been occupied by federal legislation and as a result deciding that provincial environmental legislation such as the Ontario Water Resources Act and provisions of the Environmental Protection Act dealing with this field, is inoperative. The amendments add urgency to this recommendation.

He goes on to list a number of other objections to the proposed amendments.

Finally, I come to the brief presented by my native province, Nova Scotia, with respect to this bill and, again, I will only read into the record the pertinent parts dealing with objections to some of the proposed amendments. They say on page 1:

—some of the proposed amendments are foreign to the terms of Confederation, incompatible with fundamental tenets of natural resource management, and contradict the federal government's own policies and legislation respecting the "conservation, development and utilization", of water resources 'to ensure their optimum use for the benefit of all Canadians'.

It is essential from our point of view that individuals, industry and municipalities be confronted with only one set of requirements, and requirements that provide for economic development consistent with a high level of environmental quality. We see no need to confuse and confound the public further by initiating a duplicating approval process with all the bureaucratic rivalry, confusion and delays that such duplication would entail.

These are matters requiring urgent consultation, since the province has found—

This is important. I continue:

—through experience, that the staff of the environmental protection service of the federal government often does not take account of the economic realities of a particular industry, or of the over-all interests of the community it supports, or the province, in its decision-making respecting pollution control.

They continue to say:

Co-operation between our two departments of the environment is imperative. It is essential that the federal agency recognize the primary role of the province and work through the province to obtain the information they require. For its part, the province is already co-operating in this regard.

In summary, the province of Nova Scotia does not believe that the Fathers of Confederation intended that the fishery power extended to the federal government should be the supreme power with respect to water resources management or to local works and undertakings. In particular, we do not believe that such pre-eminence to fisheries matters should pertain to waters internal to the province.

We believe that the needs of the people for high quality potable water, for industrial and agricultural water for water based recreation, should receive priority at least equal to that given to fisheries management by the federal government. We do not believe that the rights and needs of the people of our province for development and economic growth would be well served if made subservient to the needs of fish as determined, without consultation, by bureaucrats of the federal government.

My province entered into an accord in 1975, for the protection and enhancement of environmental quality. It was entered into on behalf of the government of Canada by the present Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé) who was then minister of the environment, and on behalf of the government of Nova Scotia by Hon. Glen M. Bagnell, minister of the environment of the province. I shall not read all of the accord. Part of it states:

—the governments of Canada and Nova Scotia, recognizing that programs aimed at achieving environmental objectives should be planned and undertaken to ensure comprehensiveness and eliminate duplication, agree to adhere to the principles and practices stated below in the development and maintenance of complementary programs with each government acting within its jurisdiction; agree to develop new co-ordinating mechanisms and new complementary programs so that they are in harmony with existing co-operative or complementary arrangements in related fields flowing either from legislation or administrative practice; and agree to the following principles and practices relating to the protection and enhancement of environmental quality;

On page 3 they list the items to which they take exception. They concern the ambient environmental quality criteria and objectives. I shall read the points listed:

6. Canada agrees, after consultation with the province and all other provinces, to determine and promulgate scientific criteria for air and water quality based upon the best available scientific information.

● (2020)

7. Canada agrees, after consultation with the province and all other provinces, to establish broad national ambient quality objectives for air and water based upon nationally agreed scientific criteria.

8. Canada and the province agree to identify specific geographic areas of joint interest and to establish specific ambient quality objectives or requirements for such areas based upon agreed scientific criteria. Existing agreements would not be affected by such undertakings.

9. Canada, after consultation with the province and all other provinces, agrees to develop national baseline effluent and emission requirements and guidelines for specific industrial groups and specific pollutants. Specific groups or classifications of industries will be agreed upon from time to time for the purpose of establishing priorities.

10. Canada and the province agree to consult freely on possible environmental effects of proposed major developments or redevelopment projects. Canada and the province undertake to provide each other with data and other general information necessary for an environmental assessment and review.

It is obvious from reading some of the briefs and the tenure of the briefs presented to the committee, whether the information came from Newfoundland or carried through all of the provinces, right through to British Columbia, that the thread was identical, namely, that consultation must take place between the federal government and the provinces. It was not only with the provinces that we noted it: it was equally true of all the briefs presented by the various companies as their witnesses appeared before the committee. One brief in particular, presented by the Mining Association of Canada, was very critical of the present government and the manner in which this bill was organized. They state in their brief:

Nevertheless, we feel that the members of the committee should be made aware of our serious concern at the lack of prior consultation which marked the conceptual stage of this particular bill . . .

Yet it would appear that little effort was made by Environment Canada to consult at the time with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources whose professionals in the many disciplines associated with mining could have been of considerable assistance.

Neither was any effort made by Environment Canada to consult on aspects of the bill with responsible experts in the mining industry through the medium of the Mining Association of Canada.

These are just some examples, Mr. Speaker. They indicate the concern of citizens right across the country. Therefore, we in the official opposition were concerned when the chairman of the committee indicated that the original motion as presented was unacceptable. It was our intention to move a similar motion to that which is on the order paper now, in the event that it had not been moved by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc). However, this motion to which I address myself this evening states very clearly that the minister shall offer to consult with the governments of the provinces. I hope that wording will allay the fears of the provinces and their representatives who came before the committee. I am really surprised that this motion was not in the original bill.

Obviously, lack of consultation is of prime concern to Canadians. After all, if we are to have unity within the country when legislation is enacted at the federal level, consideration must be given to those who are affected thoughout the provinces. In the final analysis, it is only by consultation and agreement with them that we can make our laws effective. For all these reasons, we on this side are pleased to support this amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 3 (Mr. LeBlanc) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): By unanimous consent, Mrs. Campagnolo, seconded by Mr. MacEachen, moves:

That Bill C-38, an act to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 5 by striking out line 12 on page 3 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

"équilibre d'une manière préjudiciable"

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I will make a very short intervention, if I may. I had hoped that before dealing with this motion, for which I see no immediate reason for opposing, there might have been some explanation for the reasoning. This was never brought before the committee during the committee hearings, that I recall. I think I was there for all of them except maybe one. There may be some problems between the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). I do not say disagreement, but some problems because of the implications of the Canada Shipping Act. Therefore, I hope the parliamentary secretary, or someone on the government side, will take the opportunity at this point to indicate to the House what brought, on at this late date this particular government motion to amend at this stage.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, if I might, I will be very frank. I read an explanation into the record this afternoon. That explanation which I read into the record has since been sent off to Hansard. I will do my best in the absence of that piece of paper. Shortly before this bill came before the committee, at the request of my minister I approached the fisheries and environment critics of the official opposition, as well as the critic of the NDP, with regard to the possibility of bringing forward a further amendment to this act in committee which would in fact allow for civil liability in the case of fishermen who suffered loss of income as a result of pollution. They considered it, and were agreeable. After that point in time it was tabled and accepted in committee. I am trying to explain why it was so late in the day when that particular amendment came forward.

I sought that understanding from the opposition parties, because it was felt it would probably be some time before the Fisheries Act was again amended, and it was an important clause to have included although it developed late in the day. As a result of that, officials of the Department of Transport had some concern that this new clause as it reads would have an effect, or would at least confuse, already existing powers for liability that fishermen could claim in so far as the Canada Shipping Act is concerned.

The Department of the Environment and my minister did not feel that was a problem, because there is an existing fund of many millions of dollars for claims by fishermen against pollution caused by ships within the conditions of the Canada Shipping Act. In fact, to date there have been only two claims against that fund, for a total of about $635. We felt that was proof enough that there was no concern necessary on the part of the Department of Transport.

They believe that despite that argument, the shipping companies might face seriously increased insurance costs as a result of the Fisheries Act taking up this civil liability responsibility as well as the Canada Shipping Act. For that reason unanimous consent was sought to table the amendment today in order to accommodate them, since the essence of the clause is to redress in some measure fishermen for loss of income attributable to land-based pollution.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment) moved:

That Bill C-38 be amended in subclause 7(3) thereof by adding thereto, immediately following line 16 on page 7, the following subsection:

"(10.5) Notwithstanding anything in this section, subsections (10) and (10.1) do not apply in respect of any deposit of a deleterious substance that, within the meaning of part XX of the Canada Shipping Act, constitutes a discharge of a pollutant caused by or otherwise attributable to a ship."

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Jarvis.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on motion No. 2.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Call in the members.

The House divided on motion No. 2 (Mr. Leggatt) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare motion No. 2 lost.

Hon. Barney Danson (for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment) moved that Bill C-38, to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave now?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There has been consultation with the opposition parties and the independent member, and I believe there is agreement to proceeding to third reading now.

Mr. Speaker: Is it, by leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Danson (for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, when this bill was brought forward for second reading on May 16, 1977, I indicated that our party would support the over-all intent of the bill. Nevertheless, I stated that we were concerned with particular aspects of it. We supported the bill because the present Fisheries Act needs immediate revision, especially in the areas of providing more realistic penalties for those contravening the act, of providing a ticketing system for minor infractions so that fisheries officers no longer will be tied up for ages in court proceedings, and of extending anti-pollution standards and controls to existing industries and other possible pollutants of fishery waters. However, we were concerned about the extensive search and seizure powers of the fisheries officers; the extensive search powers of the federal pollution inspectors; the possible federal-provincial constitutional clash over anti-pollution jurisdiction; the small number of fisheries officers and inspectors with whom the department expects to do the job; and the content of the regulations which the governor in council may prescribe in the future.

Due to the prodding of my fellow Progressive Conservative colleagues on the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, as well as other members of the standing committee, most of our concerns have been satisfied. I introduced three amendments directed toward limiting the extensive search and seizure powers of the fishery and pollution control officers, and all three were accepted. These amendments will ensure that any future changes in the powers of fisheries officers will have to be approved by parliament, not by the arbitrary whim of the minister and his bureaucrats. They will ensure, also, that a pollution control inspector has to have just cause in making any inspections without a warrant.

Finally, they ensure that a fishery officer has to have a warrant before he can search a private home. Presently, a fishery officer can search any place without a warrant, although a ministerial directive was issued which restricted some searches. We on this side did not feel that a ministerial directive was sufficient. We felt that these restrictions had to be placed within the statute.

We were pleased that the minister was kind enough to table the regulations of Bill C-38 in the standing committee. Quite frankly, I wish more ministers would be so co-operative. We were not pleased, however, to find that the Department of Fisheries does not intend to hire extra fisheries officers. Our fisheries officers are already overworked and are spread too thin in many areas of maritime Canada. With the added duties being given to them under Bill C-38, we expected some indication that more would be hired. If I may make a suggestion, perhaps the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) should redefine his priorities. In our opinion, we need more men in the field, not more men in bureaucratic Ottawa.

One of our chief concerns has been the possible constitutional problem over pollution and pollution control. Unfortunately, this problem has not been resolved. Man has set foot on the moon, and he has sent scientific probes to Venus, Mars and Jupiter. All proved that there is only one planet in this solar system which is ideal for man, and that is the planet earth. We are stuck with this planet and we are responsible for the conditions existing on it. There is simply no other place, according to all the scientific data we have at the present time, for us to go. Consequently, I am appalled when I look around and see the impact we and past generations have had on the earth's environment.

Frankly, it is not only our transport system that is in a mess, as was stated by the previous minister of transport. Our environment is in a mess as well. Each day more beaches are declared unsafe for swimming. Each day more lakes and rivers are declared too hazardous for fishing. Even in the oceans such fish as swordfish are declared too contaminated to be eaten. That is a burden the fishermen of Nova Scotia have carried. In 1972 they were actually ordered out of the fishing industry in so far as it applied to swordfish fishing. We lost something like a $5 million industry for the fishermen alone as a result of mercury contamination. We must do better. We must start to clean up the mess.

I looked upon Bill C-38 as being an instrument which would aid in clean-up. With full federal-provincial co-operation, I was certain that Bill C-38 would be an effective anti-pollution instrument. Unfortunately, because of this Liberal government's centralist policies, Bill C-38 might not be an effective pollution control instrument. With a bill as important as Bill C-38 one would have expected the federal government would have had full and intensive consultation with the provinces and industry. On May 16, in the House, the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment stated:

In the application of the pollution provisions of the Fisheries Act to industry, we try to work co-operatively with provincial governments. Over many months leading up to the final preparation of this legislation, my officials consulted with their provincial counterparts. Many of the proposals in this bill are a result of those consultations, and I might say that in some cases provincial input helped us to improve this legislation. To the best of our knowledge, all provincial fisheries ministers are supportive—

If it had been possible for the minister to attend all the committee hearings—and I know it was not possible—he would have had a chance to read the various briefs presented by provincial and industrial representatives who appeared before the standing committee, and he would be well aware that he was somewhat mistaken. The briefs indicated lack of consultation between the federal government and those affected by the bill. Some of the industrial representatives had a difficult time, according to their testimony, just getting sufficient copies of the bill. The Nova Scotia delegation stated that there was very little prior consultation. Their brief said, and I quote:

These are matters requiring urgent consultation since the province has found through experience that the staff of the environmental protection service of the federal government often does not take account of the economic realities of a particular industry or of the over-all interests of the community it supports or the province in its decision-making respecting pollution control.

That is a very serious indictment. It was presented to the committee by the deputy minister of the environment of the province of Nova Scotia. Discussions between the federal Department of Fisheries and the Nova Scotia department of the environment really only began in Saskatoon after June 2, 1977. Despite all the years this bill was lying around, it is almost incredible to me that this should be the case. The prior knowledge that they as a department had was gained in August of 1976 at a meeting of officials, at which approximately five minutes were spent telling them the type of amendments and the subjects that were going to be covered. There were, however, no detailed discussions. Dr. Henry Landis, representing the province of Ontario, said when he appeared before the committee:

So far as I am concerned, the consultation was 100 per cent one way from the Environment Canada; not the other way around.

All the concerns I had were really regarded as not realistic, not practical, because the Bill was not going to be administered in this way.

I pointed out that in my opinion the bill has to be evaluated not by the intention of the government or the administrators as to how it will be administered in the future but as to what it authorizes. Administrators change with the passing of time, but the words remain in law, and you may have an administrator today who takes one view; you may have a different administrator tomorrow who interprets it differently. I made this quite clear to the people I spoke to.

Those are the words of Dr. Henry Landis who presented an outstanding brief to the committee. I hope those administrators within the Department of Fisheries and within the Department of the Environment will take time to read that brief carefully. It represents many weeks of deep thought and consideration of the problems which will arise between federal and provincial governments because of Bill C-38. At second reading I raised the matter of the problems which would arise if the federal government did not properly consult with the provinces. At that time I said the following:

On this side of the House we are concerned about the possibility of a federal-provincial confrontation over pollution. At the present time the federal government has control over any pollution which affects fish in their aquatic habitat, while provincial governments have control over any pollution which affects their waters in general. In my view, the federal and provincial governments should come to a firmer understanding and commitment on what each controls, and the powers that each can exercise. Otherwise, there is a tendency to confrontation, which I submit can only place further burdens on our presently strained national unity and on our already over-strained Canadian confederation.

It seems to me, when I look at some of these proposals, almost as though they are part of a deliberate plan to break up Canada, a deliberate plan to confront the provinces with policies and powers that should be vested in the provinces. I submit that federal-provincial co-operation is essential, because a province can delay the implementation of any federal anti-pollution regulation. In the case of controversial pollution issues, the provinces could claim that the federal government has responsibility, whereas the federal government could claim the opposite. Without a previous understanding, nothing would be done except pass the buck. Furthermore, what might happen where an industry located in an economically depressed region of Canada—heaven knows, the minister is well aware of some of these regions—might refuse to comply with the federal anti-pollution standards. If the province came to the defence of the industry, would the Supreme Court uphold as constitutional the federal government's claim over water pollution?

Although these are hypothetical examples, they are real possibilities if federal-provincial jurisdiction over pollution is not clearly delineated. It is because of factors such as I have outlined that the government not only faces unrest in one province—namely, Quebec—but similar unrest in Atlantic Canada, central Canada, Ontario and the western provinces. I raise this not to be critical but in the hope that the minister and his colleagues will carefully examine these matters when drawing up bills.

The Nova Scotia brief asserted as follows:

Some of the proposed amendments are foreign to the terms of confederation, incompatible with fundamental tenets of natural resource management, and contradict the federal government's own policies and legislation respecting the conservation, development and utilization of water resources to ensure their optimum use for the benefit of all Canadians.

Furthermore, the Ontario brief said:

The amendments in their present form, if enacted, constitute a serious threat to the administration of the ministry of the environment's programs and the legal validity of its legislation.

The amendments should be evaluated not by how they may be administered but rather by what they authorize. If this standard is applied, they authorize environmental control which, in significant respects, goes beyond anything contained in Ontario's legislation, duplicates important parts of it, authorizes actions which could have adverse effects on the economy of Ontario and imposes on industries and municipalities duties and liabilities with respect to reporting and cleanup which are unreasonable.

The application of the amendments in Ontario, which has effective environmental legislation and programs, is unnecessary.

The conflicts between the federal and the provincial governments are apparent. Because of the manner in which the federal government decided to proceed, that is, arbitrary enactment without prior and intensive consultation, I am not as hopeful now as when the bill was first introduced that C-38 will be an effective pollution control instrument. I submit that consultation could have ensured co-operation. At this stage I can only express the hope that the government will realize the valid concerns of the provincial administrations affected by this legislation and will take every opportunity to consult the provincial environment ministers before taking any action that impinges on provincial jurisdiction or authority.

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, although I looked forward anxiously to the introduction of this bill, I do not criticize the government for the long time it spent considering it after first reading. I say this because I think all hon. members want us to pass a strong, viable, flexible and effective fisheries act. I suggest that for the co-operation extended it, even to the point of courtesy, the government should be truly thankful.

The second reading debate took one day. The committee heard five or six witnesses per scheduled session, and the sessions extended well beyond the scheduled time. That committee discussed, approved and rejected certain amendments. I suggest that the department has reason to expect we shall finish debating the bill this evening, which is more than the government deserves—and I take no pride in saying that. Certain groups in Canada need our help, and although we may be disappointed at the government's presenting us with the present version of this fisheries legislation, we must put our disappointment aside in the interest of serving the many Canadians affected.

I shall talk under three headings. I shall discuss the process of consultation, the process of interpretation, and the process of implementation related to Bill C-38. I support what my colleague from South Shore (Mr. Crouse) said about consultation. I sympathize with the department which faced certain difficulties when consulting with industry; but the department should have known, when seeking to strengthen our fisheries legislation, that it would run into opposition from various segments of our industrial community. Naturally, it would seek to avoid such opposition if possible. Although I sympathize with it, I do not necessarily agree with what it did, since I do not think the avoidance of opposition necessarily serves the industry or the government.

Too often in the past we have circumvented the consultative process. However, I must be fair. I point out that after the bill was given second reading on February 21, I believe, the various associations involved with the industry showed almost no interest in the bill for up to three months and more. That disturbs me, since the headquarters of many of the associations dealing with fisheries questions are based in Ottawa. They could have monitored the legislation, and their failure in this regard disappoints me and no doubt disappoints the industry as well. I do not point an accusing finger only at the department or the minister. The fact that the industry did not respond as it ought to have disappoints me. I think it should have responded and shown some concern after the bill was given first reading.

My main concern about the consultative process relates to the provinces. I think one of the most important parts in the debate on second reading is contained in the following part of the minister's statement as reported on May 16 in Hansard at page 5669.

> In the application of the pollution provisions of the Fisheries Act to industry, we try to work co-operatively with provincial governments. Over many months leading up to the final preparation of this legislation, my officials consulted with their provincial counterparts. Many of the proposals in this bill are a result of those consultations, and I might say that in some cases provincial input helped us to improve this legislation. To the best of our knowledge, all provincial fisheries ministers are supportive. Several provincial ministers of environment or resources have written to me outlining some concerns over the impact of certain environmental aspects of the legislation, asking that there be some discussion of this at the meeting of the Canadian council of resource and environment ministers to be held in Saskatoon on June 1 and 2.

The minister went on to say:

> I see no problem in ensuring that provincial concerns can be fully met and considered in time for the committee's consideration of this bill, if the House so agrees to passage.

I do not question the minister's statement that there was consultation with various provincial counterparts. I suggest that the clear evidence brought out in committee showed that provincial governments—not ministers or their departments—opposed the legislation on this basis: there had been lack of consultation. I suggest, if the consultative process worked vis-à-vis fisheries ministers, the fact that it did not work in the case of environment and resource ministers is inexcusable and indefensible. Since the federal government has a history of consulting with regard to environmental legislation, the provincial governments have every reason to expect they would be consulted in advance, and were consequently lulled into thinking that no major amendments to the Fisheries Act would be passed in the absence of consultation. That, I suggest, puts the government in an indefensible position. I suggest that the department was obligated to consult with the provinces before going ahead with the substantial amendments incorporated in Bill C-38.

They had an obligation before first reading when the bill was in the draft stage. Frankly, it was fairly widely circulated among certain people in certain departments. After first reading they had an obligation to contact the various ministers of environment and resources personally and state that this was their draft legislation which received first reading on February 21. If there were matters of concern to them, or matters which they would like to have discussed with the federal government, they should have been told to contact the department. That is the least that would be expected because of the history of the consultative process on environmental legislation. I support that history, process, and policy.

One could anticipate provincial objection. There is no question that this is a massive movement into an area that the provinces have considered their jurisdiction. I do not think that was ever denied in committee by anyone.

I am not arguing the constitutionality of it, but when we start talking about water intake and that sort of thing, there is no doubt that this is an area where provincial governments feel they have had rather exclusive jurisdiction for some time.

Whether that feeling is correct or incorrect constitutionally, I make no comment.

When that situation exists, there must surely be a heavy onus on the federal government when it proposes substantial and substantive changes to the Fisheries Act to go through the consultative process. In my view that process in connection with Bill C-38 was a failure.

It particularly disturbs me when I find that probably the consultative process with provincial ministers of fisheries was satisfactory but was unsatisfactory with provincial ministers of environment and resources. That has to be completely inexcusable. If one can consult and secure the concurrence of a provincial minister of fisheries, and apparently the provincial minister of the environment perceives he was not consulted, that is not an acceptable situation.

Point number two is the interpretation of this legislation. I suffer the advantage or disadvantage, and I am not sure which, of looking at this legislation through the eyes of a lawyer. I construe it strictly. Maybe in this case it is a disadvantage. The history of the Fisheries Act, as I understand it, was an interpretation that is much broader and much more liberal than might be construed by someone with legal training, reading it as a lawyer might read it.

If the tendency was to interpret this legislation strictly according to legal tenets, it may be in some difficulty. I remember very well one clause that I read as imposing strict liability on a group of people or potential defendants. However, I was assured in committee that that was not the case, that to be guilty or to offend this particular section would require if not intent at least negligence. I will be interested in seeing how the courts interpret that section.

Groups of people may be perfectly innocent of any intent or negligence and may be found guilty under these sections. The owner of a deleterious substance, he who has control over that substance or he who permitted that substance to fall into a waterway, any one of the three are jointly and severally liable under that section. I sincerely hope that some reason will prevail in terms of the interpretation of that section.

I sincerely hope that in terms of the constitutional analysis of this legislation that we will not wind up with the situation about which fears were expressed by some departmental deputy ministers and other provincial witnesses. They suffer a very reasonable fear that, because of certain principles of constitutional law, certain provincial and environmental legislation may become invalid. That disturbs me very much. I wonder whether we should have been more persistent in committee in insisting that provision be made in the legislation that would indicate an intent not to occupy certain provincial fields. However, that will be left to the courts.

The final point is the implementation of this legislation. If it is implemented with a heavy hand there will be some serious difficulties. I have no hesitation in supporting legislation designed to catch and punish him who wilfully pollutes or him whose negligence is such that he simply does not care about environment and pollution. I have no hesitation in supporting strong legislation in that regard. However, I have serious reservations about the ability to use this legislation under the guise of fisheries to determine the course of development, construction, non-construction, preservation or desecration of land that would normally be the responsibility of the provincial and municipal governments.

If a heavy hand were applied under this legislation, the location of industry could easily be controlled under this act. That has not been and I hope it never becomes the history of the Fisheries Act, but I point out that serious potential danger.

For example, the environmental protection service, which to my knowledge has never used the act in that fashion, should not become zealous and seek to catch in the same net the wilful or negligent polluter, innocent polluters who make mistakes or those who have no control over the mistakes of others such as the owner of a deleterious substance who had no control over and was not negligent in permitting that substance to pollute.

In closing, I say again that my colleagues in this party want a strong and enforceable Fisheries Act. It is needed. Amendments to this legislation were needed. I hope that the consultative process will be restored. It has been damaged in some degree in Bill C-38. I hope the consultative process under the act, including the amendment passed tonight, will be used wisely and often. I hope the act will be interpreted not as a lawyer would interpret it but in a more liberal fashion. Finally, I hope it will be implemented with reason. If we are going to fight pollution in this country, co-operation and consultation are much better than penalty.

I say again that the government is very fortunate to have secured the co-operation, assistance and input of other parties in this House in view of the history of this legislation in which I, if I were a government member, would take no great pride.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I will not take too much time of the House because I am very concerned that we pass this bill on third reading tonight. I think it is a very useful piece of legislation.

The hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) summed it up very well when he pointed out that the legislation has all-party support. The approach the government has taken in drafting the bill and in being fairly reasonable in committee with respect to amendments was a wise one. I know some of the opposition amendments succeeded. The value of the bill is not merely its capacity to put some clout into protecting fish habitat; the real value of the bill, and I am not sure the government understand it yet, is that it says something about valuing our renewable resources. It places a premium on our renewable resources. The measure before us happens to deal with fish, but we can all think of other resources on which a higher premium ought to be placed, for example, our forests. With this bill, the debate on the nature of an industrial society has been moved forward.

We constantly talk in this House about ways of creating more jobs. In seeking this objective we most often go the traditional route by establishing industries, industries which are bound to phase workers out through improved technology, and decrease the cost of the product. A better answer, surely, would be to raise the value of our renewable resources and put more people to work in the renewable resources sector. In my opinion the government deserves credit for what it has done by way of this bill.

I am sure every member of the committee has been approached by various companies and groups with regard to the bill—I am thinking particularly of the mining and forestry industry. Knowing the members of the committee, I think I can say all of them have studied with care the briefs presented to them. They raise rather serious examples to show that should the bill be implemented with a heavy hand there is likely to be somewhat serious industrial dislocation. I have to say to both the mining and the forest industries in British Columbia that if they had shown a little more concern about the value of the fish in the province they might not have been faced with this bill today. I believe that industry and fish can live together. There is no need for them to be in conflict. But at the moment conflict is the rule rather than the exception; the mining industry, in particular, has ignored the value of the fishing resource time and time again.

The best example is probably that placed before the committee by the B.C. Wildlife Federation. They dealt with a river which runs very close to my riding, actually the old riding of Fraser Valley West—the Coquitlam River. Twenty years ago this river produced between 4,000 and 5,000 pink salmon, the same number of Chum salmon, between 1,500 and 2,000 Cohoe salmon, and the same number of steelhead trout.

In its wisdom the municipality decided to allow gravel mining operations right in the bed of the river. Subsequently such operations were carried out on the banks of the river but the silt-laden water that went into the stream destroyed the fish habitat. The difficulty was that this did not necessarily constitute a violation of the Fisheries Act because it could not satisfactorily be proven that the spawn itself was being destroyed. In fact what was being destroyed was the habitat, so the fish were not spawned at all. If this fishery had been maintained instead of the gravel industry, the economic value of the Coquitlam River fishing resource would today be $4 million a year. That is a measure of the destruction which has gone on in the past. Therefore I say to the mining industry, to the forest industry and to other industries which are concerned about these provisions that if they would co-operate with the people of British Columbia and with the Department of Fisheries I firmly believe the bill we are considering does not need to be destructive and that it can do the job of bringing back this precious resource.

In the Fraser River, the anadromous fish stock has declined by some 50 per cent in the last 30 years. We can bring this resource back and we can stop what has been a massive and concerted attack on the fish habitat.

I must say I had some initial reservations about the strict liability provisions of the bill, but thinking back to some of the legal principles of Rylands and Fletcher, since industry decides to place deleterious substances into the environment, since it decides to move those substances, I frankly do not see it is immoral that strict liability should attach to those who move those substances. After all, who is placing those substances into the environment to damage the resource? Therefore the screams which come from industry on this matter have fallen on deaf ears in this House, as I think they should. In my opinion we have to quit playing around nervously and put the onus where it belongs. The onus is on those who bring deleterious substances into the environment.

Of course, I am disappointed that the House did not see fit to accept the amendment which would have given the minister discretion to shut down those rivers which are mercury-polluted as a result of which the health of Canadians could be affected. I think it is inconsistent for us to be talking about giving the minister very substantial additional powers and yet he refuses to accept a key power by which he would have the authority not merely to protect the health of fish but also, perhaps, to protect the health of humans at the same time.

As I say, I am in general agreement with the remarks previously made by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot. I think the government is entitled to be congratulated on having brought this bill forward. Again, though, I would draw attention to the fact that it carries all-party support. I am satisfied that it is a necessary pre-condition to the renewal of recreational and commercial fishing in British Columbia.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to the bill before us, in the consideration of which I have participated throughout second reading, committee stage, and now at report stage and third reading, I would say there are some concerns which have persisted. One of them was recently recalled to my mind when the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) brought forward his amendment.

Turning to the minister's statement made in the Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, I would like to refer to page four of his address to that committee on June 16. The minister at that time referred to the impact of pollution on our rivers and said: "How many English Wabagoons can those who rely on Canada's fisheries stand?" He then went on to say, as can be found on page five of his statement:

The Fisheries Act exists for the people of Canada to protect their common property fish resource. The Fisheries Act is important to the fishermen of Canada, many of whom do not have alternate employment opportunities and many of them of native origin.

● (2150)

In light of those statements alone contained in the minister's speech to the committee, I am surprised at the actions of the government in voting against the amendment proposed by the hon. member for New Westminster today.

I should like to deal with another concern which is raised at page 4 of the minister's speech of the same date, and which reads as follows:

The facts are in stark contrast to the imaginary problems which could arise through some possible irresponsible application of some part of the Fisheries Act by some fisheries officers at some time, in some places.

It would be probably a much more comfortable situation if I did not have to speak at third reading and acknowledge the fact that within the Kootenay West there is an equal mix and balance between industry and those whose principal concern is the impact of industry on the environment. However, I am not prepared to duck that particular responsibility. For example, there are companies taking water from the Columbia River and putting it back in: we have Cominco Ltd, Canadian Cellulose Pulp and Paper, Canadian Cellulose Saw Mills; and we have Kootenay Forest Products on Kootenay Lake, and Triangle Pacific on Slocan Lake, which subsequently flows into the Kootenay and thence into the Columbia system.

There is also a variety of mines which are in production from time to time. Their systems require the intake and outflow of water. The H. B. Mine is an example. I should like to draw attention to one situation which occurred with the H. B. Mine. One day they had a fracture in their line leading to their settling pond, and a couple of so-called environmentalists who were driving by noticed this outflow going across the highway. H. B. Mine is only a couple of miles up the mountain side over a good road. What did they do? They did not drive up the mountainside to H. B. Mine and tell them that they had a serious break in their outflow which was causing it to go into the Salmo River and not into their settling pond. Instead they travelled to Nelson and reported it to a fisheries officer who, some hours or days later, was able to take responsible action.

Charges were laid against H. B. Mine. In dealing with that particular case the judge chastised most severely those two so-called environmentalists who would rather penalize industry and catch them with an accidental spill than resolve the matter by going directly to the plant and advising them of the problem.

There is no question that there has to be a balance; there is no question that industry has some very legitimate concerns. If it becomes apparent that the ministry is using an iron fist within the scope of this bill, then they are going to be in trouble. Officials may satisfy a community of 4,000, 20,000 or 100,000 people for a week or two weeks when because of an accidental spill, an industry is shut down. But if their action is not a reasoned action, taken with a proper balance in decision-making, and if they go in with the clout which some official thinks he has, and may well have under this bill, as I say they may find they have satisfied the environmental concerns of the community for the first week. But when the pay cheques are no longer coming in, they may suddenly find that the situation has reversed itself. Of course I am dealing with the so-called imaginary problems to which the minister alluded. In statements made by members at the standing committee level, I think those concerns were addressed to the officials, and the minister has gone on record in assuring us that they will use a reasoned balance.

I do not want the people in my riding, or people anywhere in Canada, to think I am espousing the cause of industry, because I am not. I am aware of the environmental damage which has been created by some industries. There is no question of that. The evidence is on the record. Certainly there are those who seem simply not to care, probably and possibly as a result of previous amendments to the Fisheries Act and the introduction of environmental legislation. On the other hand there are those industries which have spent millions of dollars on improvement of their efforts to combat pollution. If we are going to force upon an industry the expenditure of millions of dollars to improve an effluent discharge by a decimal percentage point, then I ask where is the reasoned balance? I am sure those in my riding who share my environmental concern will accept that point and that argument.

There is one other area which gives me cause for concern, and I should like to refer to the minister's speech at page 8, which reads as follows:

For example, there is an over-all blanket requirement for the provision of fishways at all obstructions if this is demanded by the minister. Owners or proposers in fact cannot even start construction until the minister has approved the form and capacity, and location of fish passage structures at dams. I do not always exercise this authority; in fact, I weigh the relative value; the value of a dam for whatever purposes proposed and the value of the fisheries resources.

I wish we could have had statements of that sort from the minister during the period in which we were dealing with the Columbia River treaty. I wonder if the minister is going to have the intestinal fortitude to live up to his word, when it comes to the Revelstoke Dam. Regardless of the Columbia River treaty, will the minister have the guts to live up to his word when it comes to the diversion of the Kootenay River into the Columbia River? As a result of the Columbia River treaty, already we are finding that the nutrients in the Kootenay Lake have changed, that water temperatures have changed, and that fisheries have dropped dramatically. Under that treaty we saw the total destruction of the spawning beds, all except one, that for the famous Kootenay Lake trout, a special individual species running up to 30 pounds and 40 pounds. We have seen the destruction of the spawning beds of the Kokanee, a landlocked salmon, sometimes called redfish. It is true they have put in false spawning beds which seem to have helped the Kokanee to recover. The facts are that fisheries have degenerated and deteriorated.

If the minister is not prepared to use his clout nothing will happen. There will be no freshwater fishery on the Columbia system or on the Kootenay . I want the minister to know that the people of Kootenay West and the people of British Columbia will be watching very closely to see what he and his department do about this type of construction which in some cases, I believe, could be classified as destruction.

I wonder whether this minister would have insisted upon fish ladders at the Keenleyside Dam—that dam constructed under the Columbia Treaty which we discover now was not needed. Regarding the minister's statement at committee on hydro projects or dams of any nature, I want him to know that I, and probably a lot of other members, will be watching very closely to see what he and his department are doing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I intend to restrict my remarks on Bill C-38 to a rather narrow area. I am not a member of the committee and it would not be wise for me to try to go through this bill in detail. The part I wish to speak about is the absence of any provision for, or clarification of, the means by which communities can be reimbursed for their work in cleaning up small oil spills where the culprit is unknown. I take it that deleterious objects on the water would include an oil slick.

I am not quite certain who is taking responsibility for this bill at the present time, Mr. Speaker. It may be the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo) or the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. Fleming), but I hope whoever is responsible will take note of this problem and give an answer later in the debate, or perhaps even write me about it.

This is not a great financial problem, but an important principle is involved. The government has advocated that communities and municipalities make plans to cope with oil spills, and has set up a maritime pollution disaster fund to reimburse moneys spent when the offending vessel cannot be identified. The money for this fund is collected from the tankers and oil companies.

I became interested in this matter about four years ago when there was an oil spill at the community of Oak Bay near Victoria. It happened in the evening and they could see the oil slick coming to shore. We all know that the best time to clean a spill up is while it is waterborne, and this is what they did, finishing at about four o'clock in the morning. They spent about $400 on the project, but then came the hard part. They tried for months to collect the money and, although they had properly receipted vouchers, were unable to get anywhere.

I took the matter up with the Minister of Transport of the day, the Hon. Jean Marchand. He had already told us that transport was in a mess, and certainly from the way the Oak Bay claim was handled this seemed to be so. When I pursued the matter I was referred to the Department of the Environment, but had no better success there. During a debate in this House the then minister of fisheries, the Hon. Jack Davis said I should have brought it to his attention and he undertook to see that Oak Bay was reimbursed. Unfortunately an election was called and he disappeared from the scene; he later resurfaced as a member of the provincial government of British Columbia.

Some two years after the event it was established that the Maritime Pollution Disaster Fund came under the Department of Transport, so I wrote to it. I ran into a very highly intelligent and capable civil servant, who was most polite and obliging. He knew the act from one end to the other, upside down and backwards, and would do anything except pay any money out of the maritime pollution disaster fund, which by then had grown to $30 million. I have kept on trying ever since. The fund went up to $40 million. At one time when I asked a question on the order paper as to its size, that is what they told me. Now it is $48 million.

I cannot say that the fund is a disaster—it is a disaster fund—but out of all the money they have collected up to date, they have paid out only $300, and some to a fisherman in Gaspé. It took a great deal of willpower on my part to resist the curiosity which I felt and not to inquire further as to how that fisherman in Gaspé managed to get some money out of the fund, because the main excuse that was given to me for not paying the municipality in my constituency was that they did not have prior Privy Council approval before they started to work.

I realize that with the time zone changes a man from Gaspé would have more chance of waking up cabinet ministers in the middle of the night than we do in Victoria, but I do not know what would happen if an outlying municipality tried to wake up the Privy Council to get their approval before it attacked an oil spill at 4 a.m. Ottawa time.

It is now four years since we first attempted to receive any succour from the government, and I see nothing in this bill that will make it any easier to get any money out of the maritime pollution disaster fund. I hope the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport or the parliamentary secretary will clarify whether they simply intend to collect money forever for the fund so it will end up like the pension fund for the civil servants, or whether they intend somehow, some day, to pay money out to communities which do the sensible thing and clean up oil spills before they pollute their beaches.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I can certainly keep within the time limits. I understand there is a disposition to have the measure passed tonight, but I should be able to finish well within the 20 minutes.

The reason I am speaking is primarily that in examining the bill before us this evening I find that 12 of its 22 clauses involve a field somewhat special to me, that is, the power of ministers, of the Governor in Council, to exercise discretion, to make decisions, and to regulate. This can be a pretty awesome power.

As everybody knows, it has become a very common habit in the legislative process today to include the right to make regulations and orders in council. I suspect, without being all that specific, that at least 80 per cent of our legislation includes that power, and it is a matter that has concerned members on all sides of the House before, and will continue to concern them. I made the point previously that it is not so much the fact that these powers are written into modern day legislation that should concern us as the problem that we should be able to deal with that sort of thing effectively. Whether we do or not, I really cannot say.

I know, as co-chairman of the committee to which these regulations and orders in council are referred on a rather generous basis, that we do our best to deal with the sub-delegated authority, what I would like to call the shadow parliament which takes over when we, the House of Commons and the other place, have had our say. The fact is, however—and I think everyone would recognize this as a fact of life—that once legislation has cleared this House, we tend to go on to other matters. That legislation is over and done with, as far as we are concerned. Presumably the watchdog committee, the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, has to play some role, but sometimes I have doubts as to whether that is a sufficient manner of dealing with the rules and regulations which develop from our legislation.

In any event, to be very specific, there are 22 clauses in this bill which deal with discretionary and regulatory options, and having looked at the bill some new thoughts about the problems which can arise have come to me. One new thought is simply this: we are in a rather sensitive area involving provincial jurisdiction over waters which are inland, and through this legislation we are attempting to exercise federal jurisdiction. Provincial acts are very much like the legislation we are considering this evening. Regulations can be made under those provincial acts, and I think they probably create a fair amount of difficulty for the people in the pulp and paper industry. I will follow up my theme as I make my speech. I have made a preamble, and now I am going to make a speech.

I would like to quote from a letter which was sent to me by a very distinguished Nova Scotian who served in the House of Commons very well on behalf of the Halifax constituency. The letter is from John A. Dickey. I think he was a member from about 1947 until about 1957. He is now the president of Nova Scotia Pulp Limited. In his letter Mr. Dickey makes a point about the importance of the pulp and paper industry to the economic life of Nova Scotia and of Canada. Mr. Dickey's letter reads in part as follows:

> While Canada possesses only 10 per cent of the world's supply of wood fibre it has for many years had the largest export of wood fibre in the world. In Canadian terms the industry is the largest Canadian earner of foreign exchange. This stature as you can appreciate has been achieved not because of a monopoly position in the raw material for the industry but by reason of ability to manufacture and export wood fibre in its various usable forms more economically than our competitors. Unhappily at the present time by reason of cost increases for the Canadian industry which are out of line with those of our major competitors, notably in wage rates, the Canadian industry has essentially lost its competitive advantage. By any standards the Canadian industry has met world standards in pollution control and environmental protection though this is inevitably a long and continuing process of improvement. We feel very strongly that this is no time to impose further strains upon the industry's struggle for survival beyond those absolutely necessary to achieve what is on balance the public good.

In an appearence before the committee which dealt with this measure the minister of the environment for the province of Nova Scotia, the Hon. Vincent J. MacLean, made what I thought was a pretty good point. I will put it on the record here. It is, of course, on the record of the committee proceedings.

> In summary, the province of Nova Scotia does not believe that the Fathers of Confederation intended that the fishery power extended to the federal government should be the supreme power with respect to water resources management or to local works and undertakings. In particular, we do not believe that such pre-eminence to fisheries matters should pertain to waters internal to the province.

If this legislation is to be effective, it must enter that delicate field.

Leaving aside that aspect of the dominion-provincial conflict, may I suggest, as I have suggested previously, that when we deal with a sensitive area such as this where the regulatory power is really the name of the game, much more so than the bare bones of the legislation, we should adopt the practice of bringing before the committee considering the legislation the draft of the regulations which will be effective under that legislation. I know those regulations will eventually be referred to the statutory instruments committee for its surveillance, along with other regulations and other statutory instruments. I am the co-chairman of that committee; I think it is the best committee in parliament; and I think we do a darned good job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCleave: I may say, if I blow my own horn, at least I blow it at myself instead of at other people. We tend to be a special crowd in that committee and perhaps not fully appreciative of some of the minutiae or major points of the regulations which come before us. If we have no farmers on the committee, perhaps we cannot assess well all the regulations dealing with the farming industry. If we do not have fishery experts on the committee like my hon. friend from South Shore, we may suffer from the same disability with respect to fisheries matters, although our intentions may be the best in the world. Of course we deal with legal matters. I suggest that not one legal matter escapes the eye of the committee, although perhaps we are missing some of the practical, down-to-earth points concerning the actual operations of trades and industries which are affected by the regulations. That is why I make my point again, and I hope some day it will grow into a school of thought.

I want this practice to grow up that, when it is practicable and possible, the regulations which must accompany an act should be drafted and presented to the committee which deals with the act in the first place. That would give us another shot at parliamentary direction, direction as to what the act intends to do. True, as time goes by these regulations will be monitored. As anyone will tell you who has ever attended meetings of the statutory instruments committee, some of the regulations which accompany some pieces of legislation are incredibly voluminous and would fill many volumes on anybody's book shelf. Nevertheless, I suggest that the practice of looking at draft regulations initially would be a good one. I hope a school of thought holding that opinion will grow up and I intend to do all I can to found that particular school of thought.

When regulatory rights accompany any legislation, the regulations should be examined by the committee which considers the act as well. In that way our parliamentary performance will improve 100 per cent. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association is of the same school of thought, I may say. Mr. Roy A. Phillips, executive director, touched on this point in the letter he wrote me on June 23, 1977, a paragraph of which I shall quote. He said:

The real problem with Bill C-38 is its legislative scheme. The bill creates blanket offences by turning most people who conduct themselves normally in an aquatic environment into criminals—unless their conduct has been exempted either by ministerial authorization or regulation by Governor in Council. This leads to the paradoxical result that this wide power of exemption may be desirable if only to arm the government with the means of 'decriminalizing' normal conduct.

We should consider some of the fines that are set forth in Bill C-38. Consider the nature of the offences that are created thereby. Consider that you, Mr. Speaker, and I might inadvertently be breaking the law by putting our toes into a pond, perhaps trampling on a small fish and thereby destroying some of the aquatic environment. That would not be done intentionally. We would not want to be subjected to some large fine, some process of law, or be hauled away by the scruff of the neck into a court. Nonetheless it is a possibility that all of these things could happen.

I realize that I am speaking after the fact. I do not intend to oppose the bill. I understand it has received the approbation of the committee. Those people worked hard and long. I understand the enormous battle that goes on between the environmentalists and that particular industry. It is not for me to come in late in the day to raise this again, except that I do have to view some of the powers set forth. For example, in Clause 9 on page 10 of what we are considering this evening, it states:

An inspector may, at any reasonable time, enter any place, premises, vehicle or vessel, other than a private dwelling place or any part of any place, premises, vehicle or vessel used as a permanent or temporary private dwelling place, where he reasonably believes—

I suppose in short that means the inspector is entitled to board a ship if the owner of the ship has not used it for his private dwelling place. Most people would consider that a ship is not a private dwelling place. To do that without the benefit of a search warrant is an extremely dangerous provision to have written into the legislation of this country.

Clause 12 on page 16 reads in part:

35. Any fishery officer may search or break open and search any building, vehicle, vessel or place where he has reason to believe that any fish taken in contravention of this Act or the regulations, or anything used in contravention thereof, is located."

Again, that is a very large power. I wonder if it is really necessary. Modern communications being what they are, somebody could apply for a search warrant. At least then there would be the intervening step of some judicial officer who may say, "Slow down; maybe you do not have reasonable and probable grounds; maybe you are a bit excited without due cause."

Those are my thoughts on this. I gather somebody else would like to make an intervention before we pass this measure and I am pleased to yield the floor.

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I shall be as brief as I possibly can. I think I have some responsibility on behalf of my minister to respond to some of the concerns expressed by members opposite. If that goes a moment or two past 10:30, perhaps hon. members will be kind enough not to notice the clock and, if it is agreeable to hon. members, we might bring this debate to a conclusion.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming: The Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) has asked me to express his disappointment at not being able to be here today at the report stage and third reading of Bill C-38. He was unable to return from British Columbia in the short time available since we received confirmation that Bill C-38 would be discussed in the House today. He has asked me to make a brief statement which he would have presented had he been here. It is as follows:

"I am pleased to speak at third reading of Bill C-38, an act to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof. This bill received first reading on February 21, and at second reading on May 16 it received unanimous support in principle from all parties of this House. Since then the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry has devoted seven sessions to Bill C-38. The views of industry, several provinces and some special interest groups have been heard. It is important to note the hard work of this standing committee. They extended hours of hearings to allow for all who wished to express their views. I would personally like to take this opportunity to express my appreciation to members of all parties who participated in the standing committee sessions dealing with Bill C-38.

"These committee sessions have resulted in many improvements which will help us in managing the important fisheries resources of Canada. All parties have contributed in this process and all have recognized the need for amendments to the Fisheries Act to allow us to deal more effectively with poaching, fish habitat protection and pollution of Canada's fisheries waters. I personally attended all of the committee's clause by clause sessions on Bill C-38 and know how diligent were the members to ensure that constructive views presented to the committee were reflected in the revised bill now before us. As a result, definitions have been sharpened, many provisions have been modified to reflect better the need and intent of the legislation, powers have been scrutinized closely, the application of the existing provisions has been questioned, and clarification has been sought concerning the future application of any new provisions."

The minister concludes: "I am grateful that Bill C-38 received this scrutiny and hopeful that with agreement on third reading it will soon be given consideration in the other place."

Again, on behalf of my minister, I wish to thank members of the opposition parties for their close co-operation throughout the committee review stage.

Perhaps I might, as parliamentary secretary, make a few brief observations in response to the opinions expressed by hon. members during the discussion tonight. I note the concern expressed by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) about the problem of the shortage of fisheries officers to carry out additional responsibility under this law. I know the hon. member raised this point in committee and that the minister responded to it there. I will draw the matter to his attention again. I also note the concern expressed by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco), in particular about the question of fish guards and enforcement by the federal government of the powers set out under the act.

The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) expressed concern about what experts in the department call "mystery spills". While I am no expert in this area I will ensure that he gets an explanation of the situation shortly. He will thus have a response, as requested.

The official opposition spokesmen for matters concerning both fisheries and the environment raised the question of consultation. I would simply say that in my view there was a considerable amount of consultation in the course of seeking appropriate amendments over several years, leading to the point at which the bill was actually put together. The difficulty which then arose was that, once the bill had been assembled and placed before cabinet, there could not be consultation as to the form of the bill until it had been tabled in the House—there could not be consultation with other levels of government or with industry. It was tabled on February 21 and some months passed—not a great many—before we found ourselves in committee. I suggest there might well have been either a lack of alertness on the part of some industries with professional forces here in Ottawa to the tabling of the bill, or perhaps there might even be the possibility of certain groups not moving as quickly as they might have done in showing a response. In any event, I do believe that when they were heard in committee all sides did their very best to accommodate the various concerns expressed and, as a result of that co-operation, we now have a much better bill.

The hon. member for South Shore made a particular reference to Dr. Landis, the chief legal counsel, I believe, in the department of environment and resources in Ontario, and I know that Dr. Landis, while he did put forward several excellent amendments which were included in this bill, admitted himself in committee that he had spoken on a number of occasions—I think he suggested a dozen occasions—with officials of the department.

Our problem may be one of the general legislative process. Often it takes a year and a half or two years for a bill to go through the process of parliament. This one was tabled on February 21 and has been dealt with, once we got to that stage, rather promptly. Perhaps that is one of the difficulties—that industry and the provinces did not expect it to happen so quickly. At any rate, I believe we had positive activity in committee and most of the major concerns were responded to by us.

The hon. member for Kootenay West and the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) expressed worry about the use of a heavy hand in applying this legislation. As they are aware, that was discussed in committee. I believe the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) also referred to that and expressed a fear that that kind of power in the bill can be used indiscriminately. Not one witness before the committee from industry, or from the provinces, suggested that the government had acted in a heavy handed way with the Fisheries Act as it exists. Although it is very similar in power at this point in time, this bill is simply an extension of some of those powers. I want to commend the even handedness of the department, the officials and the minister in carrying out the law. I certainly share the concern of all members in hoping that that practice continues.

Finally, if I may, I echo my minister in commending all hon. members, especially those active in committee who helped prove that thoughtful, positive exchanges can improve legislation and meet major concerns, as they did so well in the case of Bill C-38.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being 10.30 o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair until Wednesday, June 29, 1977, at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 10.35 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Special Order.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO RELATIONSHIP OF CERTAIN PERSONS WITH HYDROCULTURE LUWASA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43, concerning Hydroculture Luwasa Canada Limited, possible conflict of interest and illegalities existing on the part of certain persons and press comments today by the Prime Minister's principal secretary, James Coutts, admitting he was a director and shareholder in 1975 but does not know his present position with that company.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Cossitt: I move, seconded by the hon. member for Colchester-Cumberland North (Mr. Coates):

That a public inquiry immediately examine the position and influence of the following persons with reference to receipt of government business by Hydroculture Luwasa Canada Limited, namely, directors of that company, Liberal Party pollster, Martin Goldfarb, his brother, Harvey Goldfarb, Liberal Campaign Chairman, Senator Keith Davey, and, finally, the investigation examine the position of James Coutts and another brother, Stanley Goldfarb, named in today's press by Mr. Coutts as being in charge of a "blind trust" for Mr. Coutts.

Mr. Speaker: Under Standing Order 43 the presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No!

SUGGESTED SUPPORT FOR TEN-YEAR MORATORIUM ON WHALING ACTIVITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Under the provisions of the same standing order I, too, rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the International Whaling Commission is now meeting in Canberra, Australia, and in view of the fact that the United States, Mexico, France and other countries have given unanimous support for a ten-year moratorium to be placed on all international whaling activities and in view of Canada's consistent refusal to accept a ban on importing whale products to support conservation activities and its failure to support the ten-year whaling moratorium, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House instruct the Canadian delegation at this conference to support the position taken by the United States for a ten-year moratorium on whaling activities and a ban on the importation of whale products.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

SUGGESTED SPEED-UP OF HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT IN QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

Bearing in mind the fact that the federal Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and his counterpart responsible for the Quebec Planning and Development Bureau reached an agreement on June 22 last, on behalf of the two levels of government, which will allow for upgrading many roads in Quebec in an amount of $264,600,000, and that of Highway 117 leading to northwestern Quebec will benefit from that agreement in an amount of $36 million; and the fact that this agreement proves that it is possible for ministers of the two levels of government to cooperate and agree in the best interest of the citizens; and the fact that those agreements are much more useful and profitable to the people than battles with figures and other negative confrontations waged by some other ministers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That this House encourage the ministers to avoid useless confrontations and sterile fights with figures and work instead on the agreement such as that which was negotiated by Messrs. Lessard and Léonard which agreement will help give Quebecers better roads in coming years.

METRIC CONVERSION

WITHDRAWAL OF PROVISIONS CONVERTING LAND MEASUREMENT SYSTEM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the announcement by the government of the Province of Alberta that it will not convert its land measurement systems from acres to hectares, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this House commend the Government of Alberta for reflecting the views of the majority and request that the minister consider withdrawing those provisions in the metric bill presently before the House providing for such changes in the area of federal jurisdiction.

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATORY TREATMENT OF GROUP OF INDIANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my motion is presented under the terms of Standing Order 43 as well. I wish to lay before the House an incident which may involve the most horrendous example of racial discrimination. I refer to the treatment of a group of native people by our national airline at the Ottawa airport. On Sunday afternoon, June 26, some 15 native persons returning home to the Northwest Territories and the Yukon from their annual conference in Ottawa were ordered off Air Canada flight No. 179, even though they held confirmed seats and were already placed on the plane. They were told that the computer had no record of their group.

To the best of my belief they were taken off this plane in order to give preferential treatment to other passengers. I am told their subsequent treatment by the people's airline was shameful and also of a discriminatory nature. In light of the foregoing I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

[Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve).]

That this House issue a reference to the Standing Committee on Transportation presently examining certain aspects of Air Canada's operations.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

LACK OF PENSION FOR WIDOW OF VETERAN WHOSE DISABILITY PENSION WAS LESS THAN FORTY-EIGHT PER CENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, because I believe that all members of the House support the intent of this motion, I ask leave to present it under Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That this House notes the increasing concern of all veterans' organizations with respect to the rule under which a veteran's widow receives no widow's pension unless the veteran was in receipt of a disability pension of 48 per cent or more, and this House calls on the government to correct this situation without further delay by providing pro-rata pensions for widows of veterans in cases where the veteran's disability pension was less than 48 per cent, as recommended by the Woods Commission, the Hermann Commission and the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF DECISION NOT TO LICENSE CHANNEL 4 TRANSMISSION BY ARROW LAKES SOCIETY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent necessity, namely the decision of the CRTC, reported in the Arrow Lakes News, to refuse to renew the licence for the Arrow Lakes Television Society to carry channel 4 Spokane, effective September 30, 1977. In light of the fact that for over 20 years this Society has provided TV service to the residents of the town of Nakusp without a penny of federal funding, in light of the fact that for most of those 20 years there has been no CBC or CTV signal for them to carry, and in light of the fact that, largely due to the efforts of this Society, this government has saved money by no longer having to include Nakusp under the accelerated coverage program, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker):

That this House instruct the CRTC to immediately withdraw its decision not to license channel 4 Spokane, transmitted by the Arrow Lakes Television Society into the town of Nakusp.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion pursuant to the Standing Order can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ENERGY

CONSERVATION—GRANTS FOR HOME INSULATION—REASON FOR TAX EXEMPTION ONLY TO NOVA SCOTIA AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who, in his latest bit of electioneering, characteristically made a very important statement outside the House. In view of the fact that the home insulation grants in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island are not taxable and have a ceiling of $500 as opposed to a maximum of $350 which is taxable under the program just announced by the minister and his colleague, is the government prepared at the very least to afford the same tax exemption privileges to the other provinces as apply to Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island and, if not, why not?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, on a number of occasions I have made it very clear to the House that we have received representations from the two provinces of Nova Scotia and P.E.I. respecting their electrical costs and the very heavy increases in costs which can be associated with their dependence on foreign oil for the generation of their electricity. They are in a unique position. There is no other province that comes close to them. I think Nova Scotia has something close to 66 per cent of its electrical energy generated by oil. The next nearest province is down to about one third of its electrical energy from oil or one half of that amount. P.E.I. and Nova Scotia are in a unique position and for that reason we felt they should continue to have those particular benefits unchanged, and that the benefits that we are offering to the rest of Canada should recognize the unique position of those two provinces.

CONSERVATION—GRANTS FOR HOME INSULATION—SUGGESTED DELAY OF PROGRAM TO CONSULT PROVINCES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A supplementary question. I submit that the disparities in the two programs are not justified by the facts. As the minister well knows, it has more to do with politics. Therefore, I should like to ask the minister: in view of the fact that two of the provinces, Alberta and Ontario, have already expressed serious reservations over the program and have been critical over the lack of consultation and infringement of provincial rights, and given the fact of this lack of adequate consultation and unseemly haste in implementation, is the government prepared now to postpone the starting date of this program in order to give the provinces more time for this program in terms of legislation and the necessary budgetary revisions which will be necessary?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, let me try to deal with some of these questions of consultation. It seems to me that this is a very strange claim on the part of the province of Ontario, for example. Prior to the last energy ministers' meeting, which was on May 11, I circulated to all energy ministers who were to attend that meeting my interest in hearing from them what they were planning to do and what they had done in respect of energy conservation. It was indicated that it was going to be an important agenda item, which it was. Reference was made, in the press interviews following that ministers' conference to a national insulation program. There were a great many questions from your side to the opposition side of the House, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Speaker's side of the House?

Mr. Gillespie: —which ensued during the following weeks—were we or were we not going to introduce a national insulation program? At that time I indicated that discussions were going on between ministers on this side of the House. I pointed out that it was a very expensive program, and we wanted to be sure we could afford to offer it to Canadians on a reasonable basis.

Before any announcements were made, I entered into substantial discussions with all the energy ministers and their premiers. There were discussions between officials of my office and the various offices of the provincial government. I can understand why the province of Ontario might be a little concerned. They were in the middle of an election at that time, which the hon. member may remember. They put forward a loan program which they said the banks were going to administer. This may be a very useful supplement to our program.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Gillespie: I do not see it, in any way, as replacing the grants program. It may be a useful supplement in that those who need additional funds may be able to get them. I leave it to the Ontario government to decide whether they are going to go ahead with that. I do not accept their charge that in some way we have stolen their program.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the fact is that the minister did receive replies and he received alternative proposals which he ignored.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I should like to ask the minister: given the fact that the $350 grant will be taxable and conditional and will lean heaviest on the provinces which lacked the capacity to meet the conditions and will lean heaviest on low income earners across the country, will the minister take into account regional disparity in terms of incomes and the capacities of the provinces to meet the conditions of the program in terms of budgetary proposals which they will have to implement? Therefore, is he prepared accordingly to take these conditions into account and to deal with the provinces accordingly?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member examines the program, he will see that we have tried to build in the kind of equity to which he has referred. That is why those grants were made taxable. As the hon. member knows, the recent budget changes of the government of Canada increased the level of person who would not be subjected to income tax in this country. Therefore, they will receive the full grant without any tax whatsoever. On the other hand, the hon. member must recognize that there are some very wealthy Canadians who would be in the 60 per cent tax bracket. It seems to me he should want to support the government's approach, that that type of individual should not receive the same treatment as someone who is not in that taxable bracket.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: We tried to introduce a degree of equity, as far as income groups are concerned. The hon. member referred to unseemly haste. I should like to suggest to him that he has no sense of urgency in respect of the energy problem in this question. During the period I have referred to between May and now, we consulted with the provinces and we have provided a further two months for the provinces to work out with us the details of the program for their citizens.

CONSERVATION—GRANTS FOR HOME INSULATION—AVAILABILITY TO OTHER PROVINCES OF PROGRAM SIMILAR TO THAT OF NOVA SCOTIA AND P.E.I.

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can he tell the House why the grants are taxable in eight provinces but not taxable in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island? The minister cited electrical costs as being a factor in the program for Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, but in his own statement on Monday he pointed out that 80 per cent of all those housing units are oil heated.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Has the hon. member a supplementary question to ask?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, my question is this. In view of the differences in this program, as announced on Monday, does the minister not agree with the contention of Premier Schreyer, that the program is restrictive and unequally applied, and will he now make available the same program to those eight provinces as he has made available in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will read my answer to the first question I was asked today, and the answers I have given him on previous occasions, he will find the answer to his question, again.

CONSERVATION—ALLEGED FAILURE OF NEWFOUNDLAND TO AGREE TO CONDITIONS FOR HOME INSULATION PROGRAM

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The eight provinces which have been discriminated against must agree to meeting four conditions with respect to the program. One of those is that they shall adopt a new energy code for new buildings. The minister said in his statement that Newfoundland has agreed to those conditions. Is the minister not aware that the government of Newfoundland has not agreed to those conditions and that, therefore, his statement is misleading and inaccurate? Will he now correct it?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has read the announcement and listened to statements I, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and the Minister of State for Science and Technology made—and the last mentioned minister recently published a new insulation code—he would recognize that there is an opportunity for the provinces to provide input into these prescribed conditions, which will only be promulgated after that input by the provinces.

Indeed, other provincial groups may also wish to provide some input. We think this is fully consistent with the time schedule we set out, and fully consistent with the commitment on the part of the provinces to implement either these standards or their equivalent by the end of this year. If the provinces are prepared to make that kind of commitment, that is good enough for us. Because of advice I received and as a result of discussions I have had with the energy minister of Newfoundland, I have been led to believe that Newfoundland would go along with these new standards, on that basis.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CLOSURE OF HOTEL VANCOUVER—POSSIBLE VIOLATION OF AGREEMENT WITH HILTON HOTELS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour and the acting minister, I direct my question to the government House leader. It concerns the recent closure of the Vancouver Hotel in Vancouver and the attendant labour dispute. I point out, in connection with the dispute, that the hotel employees sought increases which were well within AIB guidelines, and my question concerns the closure decision. This hotel is owned by Canadian National and operated by the Hilton Hotel chain, and the taxpayers of Canada indirectly spent some $20 million recently renovating that hotel. Can the government House leader say if there was a violation of the agreement between Canadian National and Hilton hotels with regard to the closure of the hotel? That is the first question. Second, have inquiries been made to determine if the Canadian National system participated in any recent decision of Hilton hotels to close that particular hotel? I appreciate that the government House leader may have some difficulty answering, and that is why my preamble was so long. He now knows all about it and perhaps can answer now.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have no idea why I should be asked to deal with this question, unless I have a responsibility hitherto undisclosed to me.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You look like a bell boy and one always asks the bell boy.

MANPOWER

LABOUR DISPUTE AT HOTEL VANCOUVER—REASON FOR CONTINUING TO SUPPLY WORKERS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I directed my question to the government House leader because both the Minister of Labour and the acting minister have decided to absent themselves from the House. May I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration? Notwithstanding that particular dispute in Vancouver, the Department of Manpower has continued to supply workers to the Vancouver Hotel, which is a clear way to assist management in that particular dispute. Would the minister advise whether it is the policy of this government and of the Department of Manpower to supply scabs in industrial disputes to assist one side and not the other?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The Department of Manpower maintains a neutral position. When an employer indicates that he needs employees during a strike, we indicate to the individual before he is referred that that particular plant has been struck, and if he chooses not to go to work there unemployment insurance benefits are not cut off. If there were a lockout, is the hon. member suggesting that we would be fair if we said to the individual that we could not place him until the lockout is over? We must be as neutral as we can, and that is what we endeavour to do in these disputes.

POSSIBILITY OF PURCHASING STATION CJBR-TV RIMOUSKI—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State.

In answer to a question I asked in the House on June 21 about the CBC purchasing CJBR station in Rimouski, the minister insinuated that some hon. members were opposed to it. After consultation with all these hon. members, except for one representing a riding in the eastern part of the province—

An hon. Member: Who?

Mr. Allard: I have no right to name him but the hon. member knows very well who he is. Could the minister tell the House what prevents him from giving justice to this part of the population in eastern Quebec and northern New Brunswick where this service is overdue?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as I already explained on several occasions to the House, this is a matter which is being actively considered. Of course, advice from hon. members should be considered. There is the question of the credits which would be required considering the fiscal restrictions which are in effect now. I assure the hon. member that we consider this matter carefully and I hope to be soon in a position to answer his question.

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary.

Will the minister take into consideration the representations made by the Chamber of Commerce and all people from eastern Quebec, when a single member opposes this transaction?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I try to keep in mind the representations made by all members, but unfortunately, they are not all coherent. Some may want some kind of action, others may want another kind of action. So I try to consider all opinions expressed, but it is impossible to agree with everybody on that issue.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON FINDINGS OF TASK FORCE CANADA NOT GETTING FAIR SHARE OF BENEFITS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Having regard to the federal government's review of the north American automotive industry, does the minister agree with and support the findings of the automotive task force that Canada is not obtaining its fair share of benefits from the auto pact between Canada and the United States?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I said on several occasions that the auto pact had been very successful for Canada. We now have a much greater proportion of production in Canada than was the case before. There is still an imbalance between our production and our imports, but I agree that we shall take the necessary action to try to reduce that imbalance which is favourable to the Americans.

[English]

Mr. Kempling: Noting that the report indicates that Canada has not maintained its proportional share of new employment, new investment or research and development resulting from the over-all expansion of the north American automobile production, can the minister tell the House whether the existing distribution of the benefits of the auto pact trade is acceptable to him and, if not, whether he plans any measures to ensure that Canada obtains a better deal from the auto pact trade?

● (1430)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with the premises of the hon. member's question because when the auto pact was signed Canada accounted for only 6.7 per cent of the North American production whereas it now accounts for 12.5 per cent of the production and 10 per cent of the consumption, which indicates that in recent years this program was extremely beneficial for Canada. However, there is still a gap and I intend to take all the means required to try to fill it.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST OF PREMIER SCHREYER FOR FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE ON UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It has to do with the cold shoulder he has been giving to Premier Schreyer after Premier Schreyer asked the Prime Minister whether he would be prepared to hold a first ministers conference in order to deal with unemployment and, in particular, job creation. The Prime Minister indicated that he would look into his files, inasmuch as the second request came when he was at the Commonwealth Conference, in order to see just what occurred. In light of the importance of this matter has the Prime Minister had an opportunity to look into his files, did he leave instructions that this conference, which would be of significant benefit to Canadians, should be convened, and is the Prime Minister prepared to start the ball rolling?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have ascertained that I did answer Premier Schreyer's letter to me. The essence of the federal position is that if our officials and eventually ministers of finance and manpower ministers can meet and make some progress with the kind of idea Premier Schreyer has, we then could usefully consider convening a federal-provincial conference of first ministers. However, at this stage I do not think the latter conference should be convened until preliminary work has been done.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, in light of the seriousness of this matter and given the fact that we are losing billions of dollars in productivity as well as tax revenue, can the Prime Minister advise whether he has any specific timetable for the first ministers to meet in order to discuss this very serious matter? In other words, we cannot wait forever before the government starts to show some initiative in this regard.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we are not asking the opposition or the premiers to wait forever. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources announced a program which will be good for Canada from an employment point of view, from an economic point of view and from an energy saving point of view. Of course, the premiers and the opposition were very prompt in criticizing the program. They cannot on the one hand ask us to co-operate with the provinces and then disagree when, after having consulted the provinces, we go ahead with a proposal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: All I want is for the Prime Minister to take it upon himself to convene a first ministers conference as soon as possible—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Red Deer.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in light of the statement made earlier this week by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and in light of the reply just given by the Prime Minister I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the minister assure this House that governing by edict rather than by consultation and co-operation with provincial governments, as evidenced by his announcement of requirements for qualification for home insulation grants—an absolute invasion of provincial jurisdiction—will not continue to be federal policy? Instead, will this government make an attempt to govern adequately matters over which it has a constitutional right?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria.

DATE OF DECISION ON PURCHASE OF STATION CJBR

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. It is similar to that of the hon. member for Rimouski and follows many others which I have asked in that connection.

Since it is the avowed policy of the CBC and the federal government to provide the French-speaking minority outside Quebec with the services urgently needed to make up for time lost, can the Secretary of State assure the House and the French-speaking citizens of New Brunswick that a decision will be taken before August 1, the date on which the CBC must settle once and for all the matter of CJBR station?

[English]

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I cannot assure the hon. gentleman that the decision will be taken before August 1. I will try my best to have the decision taken before August 1, but I cannot guarantee that. However, I can assure the hon. member that the sentiments which he expressed about the federal government's determination to support Francophone communities outside Quebec as well as inside Quebec are the ones we hold very closely. We are concerned, as I have indicated on several occasions to the House, about ensuring that conditions are established throughout Canada so that Francophone language and culture will not only survive but flourish.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR ENFORCEMENT OF MINE SAFETY REGULATIONS IN NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The Minister of Labour has received repeated requests over the past few years from Mr. Hodgson, Commissioner of the Northwest Territories, for the authority to enforce the mining safety ordinance. The latest request, to which there had been no reply as of last week, came from Mr. Hodgson on February 15 of this year. This request is fully supported by the local steelworkers union, and I would like to ask the minister if he would inform the House how the government intends to act on this request and when we can expect a reply.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, since those regulations come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Labour, I am not familiar with this matter, but I will bring it to the attention of my colleague as soon as he returns.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PAID EDUCATION LEAVE—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. In view of the speech made on June 13 to the International Labour Organization by the Minister of Labour setting out a position on paid educational leave, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether this is now a policy of the federal government. If so, is it the intention of the government to promote such arrangements through Crown corporations and public service unions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the speech made by the Minister of Labour and referred to by the hon. member in his question. I cannot say that this is government policy, but with the hon. member's indulgence I will check the speech to see exactly what the minister said and to see to what extent he was enunciating a generous idea or an idea which is part of government policy.

METRIC CONVERSION

REQUEST FOR MAINTENANCE OF MILES AND ACRES IN VIEW OF UNITED STATES DECISION

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Small Business). Last week the United States government announced that it, unlike this government, was unwilling to disorient Americans needlessly by changing miles to kilometres. However, apparently this minister still intends to force this expenditure of millions of dollars, which will have the result of confusing people. Will the minister tell the House whether he has examined the U.S. initiative toward common sense, and will he now amend the act to allow basic measures such as miles and acres to stay as they are?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, we are consulting the United States government to see what its intentions are—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): What about Alberta?

Mr. Marchand: —with respect to miles and kilometres. It is our view that perhaps this announcement really was an announcement of a temporary measure and that it is the intention of the U.S. government in the long term to convert to kilometres. The information I have at this time as a result of further consultations with the provinces is that they have every intention of going ahead with their plans to convert road signs from miles to kilometres.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, not only will this cost Canadians a massive amount in terms of changing road signs and the like, but it will also place one more barrier in front of the U.S. tourist coming into Canada. With a tourist deficit projected to be $10 billion by 1985 will the minister, if he is not ready to end these metrication follies, at least postpone the change to kilometres until he has ascertained that that move will not damage our already shaky tourist industry?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly take the hon. member's question into consideration. However, the Metric Commission has already had considerable consultation with the United States and also, wherever possible, we are letting the American travelling public know of our intention to change from miles to kilometres. It is our view this will not be a deterrent to any American tourists coming to Canada.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

MERCURY POLLUTION OF LAKES AND RIVERS—REASON FOR FAILURE TO TAKE ACTION EARLIER

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister of the environment perhaps I could address my question to the acting minister. In reply to a question I put on the order paper, the government disclosed the names of a staggering list of 273 lakes and rivers, including Lakes Erie and Ontario, the St. Lawrence River and Georgian Bay, in which it knows there are fish with abnormally high levels of mercury. May I ask the acting minister why the chlor-alkali mercury emission standard regulation has not yet been produced and why the government permitted mercury poisoning of freshwater in all parts of Canada to become so extensive before taking action?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, in the reply to his question it was pointed out that a great deal of the mercury registered in these various rivers and lakes was from natural sources as well as industry. I might point out also that on April 20 this year the minister announced that regulations to limit the amount of mercury emitted to the atmosphere from chlor-alkali plants had been published and were to take effect some 60 days later. In addition, although the emission limits come into force on July 1, 1978, as I said, the regulations provide for the immediate start of reporting on control measures, malfunctions or breakdown and emission measurements so that enforcement actions can be focused on the problem areas. Back in 1972 under the Fisheries Act, action was taken to control chlor-alkali emissions into the waterways and I believe that mercury effluents have since been reduced to less than 1 per cent.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I am lucky that the parliamentary secretary brought his music today. In view of the fact that the natural flushing of water systems has been shown to be ineffective— Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether we could have some order from hon. members opposite.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Darling.]

POSSIBILITY OF USING HAT CREEK COAL TO REMOVE MERCURY FROM WATER

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): I can understand their uneasiness. If I had their record I would be noisy, too. In view of the fact that natural flushing of water systems has been shown to be ineffective in significantly reducing mercury levels in northwestern Ontario and that the government appears to be unaware of any effective and cost-efficient ways of purifying waters that have been polluted by mercury, may I ask the parliamentary secretary whether the department of the environment has investigated a process described on the CTV national news a couple of nights ago which employs Hat Creek coal as a purifying agent and has been shown in scientific tests at the University of British Columbia to remove at least 99.5 per cent of mercury from water, and if not why not?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I did not have the pleasure of sharing that program with the hon. member several nights ago. In my first answer to him I pointed out that major legislation was passed several years ago which has been extremely effective in preventing additional mercury going into the waterways.

Just a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked us to be quiet on this side. I am trying to answer his question and wish he would be quiet for a moment. As he well knows, and I believe it was part of the very lengthy and thorough response given to him, mercury has built up as a serious pollution problem in our waterways over many, many years—that is, industrial pollution aside from the natural mercury pollution. I will send the press release of a few months ago to the hon. member to give him some further information about mercury pollution in the air.

An hon. Member: He can't read.

Mr. Beatty: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. With the noise on the other side the hon. parliamentary secretary apparently did not hear my question. Is the department aware of any cost-efficient and effective method of removing mercury from water systems which have already been polluted with mercury? If it is not, why has it not conducted investigations into the use of Hat Creek coal as a purifying agent to remove mercury and other heavy metals from water systems which have been polluted?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, I am not an expert on Hat Creek coal. Had the hon. member given me notice I certainly would have had the facts on hand now. I will get the information and send it to him.

METRIC CONVERSION

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS IN MEETING COSTS OF CONVERSION

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce responsible to the Metric Commission. In light of the fact that the government has recently indicated that a subsidy will be made available to assist motor mechanics in changing over to metric tools, will the minister give consideration to broadening this assistance program to help farmers and other individuals who will also be forced to change over as a result of metrication?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, the Metric Commission and the sector committees have considered this question very carefully and have decided there are only two areas where subsidies would be needed. These were especially high cost areas. One is self-employed mechanics who have to buy their own tools and the other one is the retail scales conversion. We have no plans at present to increase the number of people who will require subsidy.

Mr. Scott: A supplementary question. Will the minister give consideration to the farmers and all those people involved with their own maintenance in this industry? Some of them will have to buy tools as expensive as those for the motor mechanic but the legislation ignores them.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I will look into that.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF PROHIBITING USE OF ASBESTOS FIBRES IN PREPARATION OF FOOD AND BEVERAGES

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of a recent consumers' report concerning the extensive use and health hazards of asbestos fibres in the preparation of food, beverage and pharmaceutical products in Canada are any steps being taken to prohibit its use?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think this question should be more appropriately directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

POSSIBILITY OF QUEBEC BEING INDEMNIFIED FOR NOT USING FORCE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, since the press reported on the meeting between the provincial justice ministers and their counterpart at the federal level, would the Solicitor General be in a position to advise whether any proposals have been made concerning the cost of the RCMP services in Quebec and whether representations by the Quebec spokesman were different from those of the former justice minister in the Bourassa administration?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, indeed both Quebec and Ontario justice ministers presented some claims. At first sight, Mr. Speaker, and after listening to the Quebec Minister of Justice, the arguments made in support of his request this year where similar to the ones that have been considered and examined at the time his predecessor, Mr. Choquette, discussed the same issue with my predecessor the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I want to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. By his answer, does the minister mean to say that he categorically refuses to reconsider that problem or that he will take the time to consider those requests more closely to be in a position to inform the House definitely on that matter soon?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, the matter was examined closely a few years ago and in fact the Quebec and Ontario governments had seen fit to raise this matter at another level than that of the Solicitor General. They were supposed to do so at the meeting which took place last December between the Minister of Finance of Canada and the provincial ministers. Following their requests, the Minister of Finance gave a clear answer.

As regards the Department of the Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker, of course we are in a position to offer police services to the provinces and in return, they give money to us. However, we cannot give subsidies to the provinces.

ENERGY

CONSERVATION—GRANTS FOR HOME INSULATION—REASON FOR DIFFERENTIATION IN TREATMENT OF PROVINCES

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to those put by my colleagues, the hon. member for St. John's East and the hon. member for St. John's West, to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Does the minister agree that under our federal constitution, such matters as building codes, direct sales taxes, the production of electricity and the manner in which it is sold and metered within a province, not to mention the question of speed limits on the highways, are matters solely and wholly within provincial jurisdiction? Will he also agree that property assessment, utility rate structures, landlord and tenant relationships are also within provincial jurisdiction? That being so, how can he justify the treatment of residents of eight provinces whereby they are singled out for special consideration and heavy taxation while the residents of the other two provinces are not? Does it have something to do with the complexion of the governments of the other two provinces, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia?

● (1450)

Mr. Speaker: With respect, that seems to be precisely the question put by the hon. member for St. John's East at the beginning of the question period.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): But we didn't get an answer.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENT CONCERNING ONE PARTY DEMOCRACY—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I would like to direct to the Prime Minister. It arises from a document issued by his office following the recent London Commonwealth Conference at which he gave a press conference. It concerns what he referred to as one party democracy at certain times being a good form of democracy and that such a thing might be argued for Canada some day. Will the Prime Minister explain to this House whether it is government policy to lead this country in such a direction? Will he give us the full meaning of what appears to be a rather undemocratic and somewhat demagogic remark in London?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if this country ever turned to a one party government, it would be because of members on the other side like the hon. member for Leeds.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I heard the Prime Minister's reply in its entirety because of the noise on the other side. However, I must say his words are very clear in his press release. I would therefore like to ask him another question. Did his statement which he made at the Commonwealth Conference in London represent any undisclosed policy or any policy that is presently under consideration but not yet in effect to downgrade parliament and move us further toward government by the Prime Minister's office?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member must be referring not to a press release but probably a transcript of a press conference I gave when I was in London. It was in answer to a question from some member of the media asking me if we should not exclude from the Commonwealth governments which were governed by one party democracies. I went to some length to indicate that the overwhelming majority of participants in the Commonwealth were not of the parliamentary democracy type but had one-party states and that if we were to exclude all of them, we would be in some difficulty. We would certainly end up with an all white Commonwealth, which is not my idea of a Commonwealth.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

Based on that, as the hon. member will see if he takes the trouble to read the answer in its entirety, I said it was up to each country to give itself the kind of government it wanted and that for some countries the one party democracy, one party state, was a legitimate form of government.

Mr. Cossitt: As it is pertinent to my final supplementary, may I quote the exact sentence. "I would not be prepared to think that I would be successful in arguing that", that is a one party democracy, "for Canada at the present time but such time might come, who knows?" Will the Prime Minister explain that statement to the House.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. As the members of the media who were there will testify, I said that with a bit of irony and with a smile. My feeling was that it is really the opposition that is making that conclusion inevitable, not my own policies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

LAY-OFFS IN CAPE BRETON—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In his absence, may I pose it to the Acting Minister of Transport. I refer to a letter that I wrote the minister on June 23 condemning the actions of Canadian National Railways on Cape Breton Island in their continuing policy of cutbacks and layoffs on Cape Breton Island, adding to an already unbearable unemployment rate. I realize that the minister has not had time to reply as yet. However, in view of the fact it has come to my attention that further cutbacks are to take place today in the taking off of the back-shift shunter out of Sydney, thus eliminating another five jobs, and it is also the intention of CN to take off what is known as the Sydney shunter which deals with local industries, removing the jobs of the yardmaster, an engineer and two trainmen, another four jobs, will the acting minister contact officials of the CN Atlantic region immediately to ascertain just what is going on?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice for the acting minister and be sure that the hon. member receives an answer.

Mr. Muir: I thank my colleague from Cape Breton for taking an interest in the question which the acting minister did not seem to know about. At the same time, will he ascertain from CN if it is their intention to remove the major portion of their present office located at North Sydney to Halifax, thus removing more jobs from Cape Breton Island?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I will take that as notice and consult with the hon. member for Halifax.

PENITENTIARIES

POSSIBILITY OF IMPLEMENTING RECOMMENDATIONS OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. A few weeks ago, I asked him a question concerning the advisory committee studying the report of the committee on penitentiaries including, of course, the RCMP, the National Parole Board and the Canadian Penitentiary Service. Would the minister now tell the House if he got that report from the advisory group? If so, could he tell if in the short term, in the medium term or the long term, some of those recommendations could be implemented? If not, when does he intend to make a statement in the House?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, indeed I got preliminary reports that I am now studying and discussing with officials of my department. The hon. member will also see that in Bill C-51 now before the House, I proposed several amendments taking into account some recommendations of the committee which studied the penitentiary system. Unfortunately, some of those amendments have been, and rightly so, declared out of order by the chairman of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of the House. However, I intend to present again in the House at the third reading stage one of these recommendations that would propose the almost immediate implementation of one of the recommendations considered as essential by the members of the committee, namely granting certain powers to the Solicitor General allowing him to appoint independent chairmen to the internal disciplinary courts of the penitentiaries.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

NUMBER OF WIDOWS NOT RECEIVING PENSIONS AND LOW LEVEL OF DISABILITY PENSION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the increasing concern of veterans and their organizations over the number of widows who do not receive pensions, and in view of the increasing concern over the widening gap between the rate of the disability pension and the base to which it was attached a few years ago, as well as the minister's sympathetic statements made several times to the effect that this matter is being reviewed, will he do his best to get the members of the cabinet to agree to bringing in this year the necessary legislation to correct these two situations?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has indicated, this is a concern of mine and many people in the House. As far as trying to get it implemented this year, I will do my best.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

NAMING OF KEITH CARRUTHERS ON EXTRAPARLIAMENTARY OPPOSITION LIST—OPPORTUNITY TO CLEAR NAME

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have two questions for the Solicitor General concerning a public servant, Ian Keith Carruthers, who found his name on the extraparliamentary opposition list. I am sure the present Solicitor General knows about this. There has been a report from the press that his name is there by accident, that when the name Carruthers was used, it referred to another Carruthers. With this in mind, has the Solicitor General conducted an investigation with respect to the matter because the name of Ian Keith Carruthers is very important to himself and I hope his good name is also important to the government.

● (1500)

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): As far as we are concerned on this side of the House there never has been drawn up the type of list the hon. member refers to, the so-called enemies list, so there is no action to be taken in that regard.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is very interesting. If it never occurred, then it suddenly appeared in the press. Hon. members know full well that it did not come from this side.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The public servant in question was, and I guess he still is, a valued employee of the Ministry of Urban Affairs and an officer with CMHC. I assume they would be very interested in his good name. Given the fact that his name has appeared in the press and that his reputation might have been affected thereby, has the Solicitor General received any representations from his colleague the Minister of State for Urban Affairs with respect to his employee or from the President of CMHC, and if he has not, would he take it upon himself personally to inquire into this state of affairs and at least make a statement with respect to the matter in the House of Commons and use his good offices to establish a tribunal before which this public servant could clear his name, a name which is valuable to him and which, I hope, is just as important to the Solicitor General and his colleagues?

Mr. Fox: If the hon. member is referring to a civil servant who feels his name has been slandered or libelled and if that has come about because his name has been published in a newspaper, I can only suggest to the hon. member that his proper recourse is to sue the newspaper which apparently published his name and accused him of being on some sort of list, or black list, which would have originated with the government.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The public servant in question has sued the Minister of Supply and Services and the Solicitor General in an effort to clear his name. He has indicated he is not interested in monetary damages but in clearing his name. In order to avoid the tremendous legal costs attached to an action such as this with respect to a matter which could be cleared up within the resources of the government, would the Solicitor General consider the unfairness of his answer and use his good offices either to make public the information in his possession which would indicate that Carruthers is clean or, on the other hand, to recommend the establishment of a tribunal where evidence could be placed and could be confronted, and Carruthers could be given an opportunity to clear his name in an expeditious and effective manner?

Mr. Fox: I am, of course, delighted to hear that members on the other side believe that names ought not to be bandied around loosely either in parliament—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: —or by the media.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): What about clearing it?

An hon. Member: Disgraceful!

Mr. Fox: If the hon. member is referring to a civil servant who feels his reputation has been slandered by his name being bandied in the media, I suggest once again that his name has not been sullied by this government or by any previous solicitor general and that his recourse lies against those who have bandied his name about. As far as we are concerned we have nothing to do with that man's name being brought out in the press.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I, on a point of order, ask the government House leader what is to be the business for the balance of the day and for the rest of the week? Perhaps he would tell us, also, the government's plans for next week.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. We shall call the report stage of the Auditor General's bill today and, hopefully, the House will agree to proceed to third reading. Afterwards we would turn to third reading of the Canada Pension Plan amendment. Following that, I should like to call the amendments to the Criminal Code—

Mr. Woolliams: What a dream.

Mr. MacEachen: —and third reading of the unemployment insurance bill.

An hon. Member: We shall be here until August.

Mr. MacEachen: As the hon. gentleman knows, there is a resolution on the order paper in the name of the Prime Minister. This will be called on Tuesday and it will provide an occasion upon which to debate the question of national unity.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That particular motion, I believe, is being called on the understanding that one of the allotted days of the opposition has been granted to it. I wish the hon. gentleman would confirm that this is the case, because he did not do so in his original statement. Would the government House leader consider granting additional government time for the debate which is to take place on Tuesday and Wednesday? We have no time left to grant, but perhaps the minister might consider granting more government time to the discussion of this motion, because of its importance. I think it is reasonable that members should be given an opportunity to put their views on record, since the question of confederation and national unity is one which affects every member representing all the people of Canada. Would the government House leader consider the possibility of allotting several government days to this motion?

Mr. MacEachen: I have, but as the hon. member knows, there is a real scarcity of available days for business between now and the adjournment. I fully acknowledge that one of the days set aside for the debate on national unity is a donation from the opposition, for which we are most grateful. We have added another day, so we shall have a two-day debate as a minimum. However, if there were favourable developments with respect to the legislative program, it might be possible to add another day. But we can consider this prospect as we get into the debate. It might be useful to consider restricting the length of speeches to, say, 20 minutes—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: —with the exception of leaders of parties, who may wish to speak for a bit longer. Then there is the possibility of reinstating extended hours, which will expire tomorrow.

Mr. Paproski: Not after all we have done for you.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think it would be inappropriate, the government having wasted the extended hours, to extend them again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I must say that the prospect of 20-minute speeches does not overcome me, and I would be prepared to talk to the hon. gentleman about that aspect. But I also want to say there is no scarcity whatever of House time. There is no fixed date by which the House has to adjourn, and we are prepared to deal with the legislation the government wishes to bring forward.

● (1510)

One other matter which is important from the point of view of our business later in the year is the undertaking that has been given by the government to provide, before a decision is taken respecting a pipeline, an opportunity for the House of Commons to consider the matter in the terms set forth in the House by the government House leader and by the Prime Minister in the media. Has the government any idea when all the reports will be down? I understand there will be one down by the first of the week, or perhaps at the end of this week. There is one more to come, I think the Lysyk report. When is it expected, and when does the government expect to be calling back the House to debate the matter? What form will the debate take, and has the government any contemplation as to when the debate will take place?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, on the question of the debate on the reports relating to the pipeline, as the hon. member has indicated we expect the report of the National Energy Board next week, and it may be possible to debate that report next week or the following week, if we are here. It is then our expectation that the two remaining relevant reports, namely Dean Lysyk's report and the second volume of Mr. Justice Berger's report, will be available on August 1. In keeping with the commitment which has been made by the government to give members of the House an opportunity to comment and to give their views on these reports before a decision is made, it is the intention of the government to recall the House, if it is not in session, the first week of August. The dates I have been considering are August 4 and 5, which would give us an opportunity to debate the reports which, hopefully, will be available on August 1.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, with regard to the length of speeches, hours of sitting and what we do during the summer, I think that could best be discussed first of all at a meeting of the House leaders, and we are prepared to take part in such a meeting, or in such meetings, if necessary. However, I should like the government House leader to make clear what we will do on Monday. He has told us that we will be considering Bill C-20, Bill C-49, Bill C-51 and Bill C-27, in that order. If by the end of tomorrow we have not finished Bill C-51, on Monday will we be staying with Bill C-51, or switching over to Bill C-27? It would be useful for the House to know what we will be doing when we come back on Monday.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it would be my intention to call the unemployment insurance bill on Monday regardless of the progress which has been made on the other bills. In the unlikely event that the criminal law amendments have not cleared on Thursday, it would not be my intention to call them again on Monday. I would make one further comment. In light of the fact that it is expected that the House will be recalled, for reasons with which we are familiar, early in August, it would be my wish to try to conclude this part of the session as quickly as possible. I am sure that the hon. member did not see the faces behind him when he made the comment he did.

Mr. Paproski: Look behind you at your own members, Allan.

Mr. MacEachen: I refer to his challenge to sit all of July. In order to relieve the anxiety which I detected, I would be willing to enter into negotiations with a view to concluding within a reasonable time so that members will have some time in their constituencies before returning in August.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is fine, Mr. Speaker. I have noted my hon. friend's remarks and I, too, observed the faces across the House. In his remarks concerning the debate on the inquiry, the minister injected a new element, according to my recollection, and that is that the debate on the pipeline inquiry might be conducted in a series. In other words, there might be one now on the National Energy Board report and one later on the Lysyk report and the second volume of the Berger report. That is something new; it has not been dealt with before.

Does the House leader intend to deal with this matter in a series of debates? If that is the government's intention, would the government not reconsider? It seems to me—I say this with respect—that until all the reports are in it would not be fruitful for the House to consider the matter. The purpose of the debate is to consider all the evidence.

Mr. MacEachen: Well, Mr. Speaker, certainly one debate is mandatory in light of the commitment that has been made. I have always had in mind that it would be possible, when the National Energy Board reported, to call the motion on the pipeline which is on the order paper, and this would give the House an opportunity to discuss it for a day. If that were done, it would not relieve the necessity of having a final debate in August. On that first point I am rather relaxed; it might be desirable to have a debate on the National Energy Board report, or it might not. We could consider that after we receive the report. My own view is that it might be useful to have the views at that time, but I would withhold my final judgment.

Mr. Clark: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, if the government is suggesting that it has extra government time to have an extra debate before the adjournment of the House, an extra two-day debate on the pipeline, I hope the government might reconsider the government House leader's suggestion that there is not enough time to extend the debate on national unity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: If we have the time, before adjourning, to begin a debate seriatim on the pipeline, surely we have time in the House on government days to take more than eight hours' debating time to discuss the urgent problem of national unity which is facing this country.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, earlier this week I raised a question of privilege on which Your Honour reserved your decision. I was just wondering when that decision might be rendered by the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The only question of privilege I can recall the hon. member raising was concerning the actions of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson).

Mr. Coates: I refer to the festivities here on Parliament Hill on July 1, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I can perhaps give the matter further consideration and give the House an accurate description of the way I see my responsibilities. I attempted, however, to describe to the hon. member and to the House in a preliminary way the way I saw my responsibilities in this regard; that is to say, that I did not see it as the responsibility of the Chair to be able to intervene in the individual and specific agenda of every event which takes place in these buildings; but, rather, I would attempt to persuade all those who hold events inside and outside these buildings—and there is some difference in jurisdiction—that the best motivations ought to be used in the true parliamentary sense. In that regard, I indicated to the House that I would express that sentiment to the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts), which I have done. However, I will attempt to formulate more precise language as to whether or not an exact question of privilege is involved.

● (1520)

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that no action has been taken, to my knowledge, since I raised my question of privilege, to alter the events as they have been planned and indicated to the government, I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway)—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should remind the hon. member we are in routine proceedings and we are not able, at this time, to receive that motion. However, we will be on motions shortly.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. While there is some discussion in the House with respect to our plans for House business, I wonder if I could raise with hon. members a point which I mentioned last week regarding private members' business this week. As events have unfolded, the only time available for private members' business this week would be Thursday afternoon between the hours of five and six. In the normal course of events, that time would be designated for the "B" schedule of private members' business, namely, the calling of private bills, notices of motions for papers, and public bills.

As I indicated last week, discussions have taken place and I think there is agreement to proceed with a series of bills standing in the name of various hon. members, instead of the normal course of business within that hour. These bills effect certain changes in the names of constituencies. For the information of hon. members, the bills are as follows: C-283, C-392, C-393, C-394, C-405, C-406, C-418, C-422, C-427, C-428 and C-429. There are 11 of them in total. There has been agreement to call those items in order beginning at five o'clock on Thursday, and to proceed with them through all stages without debate in order to accommodate the changes which members deem to be desirable. In the remaining time left to us in that hour on Thursday, there is agreement to take the report stage of Bill C-256.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that sounds agreeable, subject to one question. Does that list exclude the bill in the name of the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman)?

Mr. Goodale: That is correct.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Then that is agreeable.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary has confirmed the arrangement made last week, but part of that arrangement was that we gave time last week to private bills such as Bell Canada. Having given Bell Canada an hour last week, it was understood that that was in exchange for any time this week. The arrangements for tomorrow deal with public bills regarding constituencies, and the other bill named by the parliamentary secretary. Then if there is any time left, it should be on notices of motions for papers, and not private bills.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, that is correct. I would hold open the possibility that in the following week we might direct our attention to a particular notice of motion for papers No. 15 standing in the name of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom).

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the House will move to the consideration of private members' business tomorrow at five o'clock, in the order described by the hon. parliamentary secretary?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed, and so ordered.

DIVORCE ACT

MEASURE TO REDUCE WAITING PERIOD FOR DIVORCE AFTER MARRIAGE BREAKDOWN

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Last week, the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) was in his place at the time of introduction of bills, but momentarily the proposed seconder of this private bill had slept—stepped out of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: That is the first time the word "slept" has ever been used in Hansard as a combination between "slipped" and "stepped". In any case, the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Daudlin) had stepped out of the House momentarily and I volunteered the services of another hon. member to be the seconder of the bill, as I sometimes do. In view of the specific nature of the bill, it seems to me the matter should be stood over, as I indicated at that time, until both members were present in the House.

In consequence of having given the bill the usual formal introduction, the bill was printed and distributed as if it had been read the first time. I did not interfere with that process because I was quite confident the two hon. members would be present in the House today and the matter could be corrected in that way. Therefore, I see the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson), seconded by the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Daudlin), moving for leave to introduce a bill intituled "An act to amend the Divorce Act (living separate and apart)". The bill has already been explained by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore. Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-430, to amend the Divorce Act (living separate and apart).

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time? At the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PETROLEUM CORPORATIONS MONITORING ACT

MEASURE TO REQUIRE REPORTING OF FINANCIAL AND OTHER STATISTICS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved for leave to introduce Bill S-4, to require the reporting of certain financial and other statistics relating to the affairs of designated petroleum companies carrying on business in Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time? At the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO ADJOURN

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway), that this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

House of Commons

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Coates) which was negatived on the following division:

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 577, 886, 1,797, 2,080, 2,241, 2,284, 2,330, 2,345, 2,385, 2,436, 2,444, 2,445 and 2,466.

1976 CENSUS

Question No. 577—Mr. Reynolds:

1. What is the total expenditure for the 1976 Census?

2. (a) How many persons were employed to canvas door-to-door in order to issue the Census forms (b) what was the cost of hiring them (c) what was or is the length of their employment (d) on what date does it terminate?

3. What was the (a) purpose of including pencils with each Census form (b) cost, apart from the total Census cost, of supplying the pencils?

4. (a) For what reason was June 1, 1976 designated "Census Day" (b) what was the cost of advertising in the media that June 1, 1976 would be "Census Day"?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: 1. The cost of collecting the 1976 Census is estimated at $28,500,000. Much of this expenditure is for wages paid to the 33,000 employees hired to collect census information from householders across Canada. The processing and the subsequent dissemination of the mass of information (over 300 million facts) into easily understood and accessible statistics through publications, microfilms and computer tapes; together with research and evaluation of the results to provide basic information to improve future censuses will cost an estimated $32,500,000 spread over a period of 4 years. Planning the census, which included field testing new methods, designing and printing of questionnaires and a vast amount of preparation work cost approximately $20,000,000 spread over a period of five years. Part of this cost was for salaries and the purchase of equipment and supplies from within Canada. The total estimated cost of $81,000,000 spread over a period of nine years represents approximately 40 cents per Canadian each year.

2. (a) Approximately 30,000. (b) The total remuneration of the approximately 30,000 census representatives was approximately $11,000,000 including remuneration received during training. (c) and (d) census representatives were recruited in April and started their training (seven half-days) in May. The majority of census representatives completed their assignment by the third week of June.

3. (a) It is necessary to use a soft lead pencil to complete the Census questionnaire. The Census questionnaire is processed by machine which does not readily read responses coded in ink. Manual processing by Statistics Canada of responses coded in ink is a very expensive operation—given the potential volume involved. (b) Pencils were distributed to approximately 7,200,000 households. Cost of the pencils was $198,000.00 (about 2.5 cents each).

4. (a) Historically, June 1 has been the Census Day for several decades. There is some importance, from the point of view of the comparability of data from one Census to another, to preserve this date. Moreover, it is a convenient date for the following reasons: (1) for agriculture questions, areas sown to the more important crops can be determined more easily; (2) the weather is generally temperate and suitable for the enumeration; (3) children are usually in school unitil the end of June and the population movement to summer resorts has not started. (b) The total cost of publicity for the 1976 Census of Canada in the media is estimated to be $1.2 million. The program was developed to make Canadians aware that June 1, 1976, was Census Day, informing them of the procedures involved in filling in the questionnaires and returning them in the appropriate manner. Experience during the 1971 Census demonstrated that such an information campaign reduces the necessity for costly follow-up by improving the quality of the responses and the speed of return of the questionnaires.

CENSUS COSTS

Question No. 886—Mr. MacKay:

1. What was the total cost of the (a) 1941 (b) 1946 (c) 1951 (d) 1956 (e) 1961 (f) 1966 (g) 1971 Census?

2. What is the estimated total cost of the 1976 Census?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada replies: 1. (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (f) and (g) Total costs for censuses, including planning, implementation and publication can not be meaningfully compiled from existing records for the years prior to 1971. The costs supplied below refer to the census cost incurred as defined and published in the Administrative Reports for the respective censuses. Since the nature and complexity of each census differs markedly, these cost figures must be used with caution in drawing comparisons. Information prior to 1951 is not available. 1951, $8,292,000; 1956, $4,343,000; 1961, $17,530,000; 1966, $10,647,000; 1971, $40,865,000.

2. It is estimated that census costs during 1976 will be $36,500,000. The estimated total cost of the 1976 census is $81,000,000. This figure includes expenditures during the fiscal years 1972/73 to 1978/79 inclusive.

DIPLOMATIC IMMUNITY

Question No. 1,797—Mr. Beatty:

1. In 1976, which were the ten countries whose diplomats most often invoked diplomatic immunity to avoid being prosecuted for violations of Canadian law and in how many instances was diplomatic immunity invoked by each of the ten?

2. In each case, how many people are permitted to claim diplomatic immunity for each country?

3. In 1976, which countries did not invoke diplomatic immunity for diplomats who were in violation of Canadian law?

4. In each case, what was the nature of the offences which these diplomats were alleged to have committed?

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. In 1976, members of diplomatic missions belonging to the ten following countries have invoked diplomatic immunity, as indicated, in most cases for parking violations. USSR, 344; Nigeria, 267; Senegal, 241; Ivory Coast, 232; Gabon, 214; Zaïre, 153; Egypt, 148; Algeria, 143; France, 141; Tunisia, 132.

2. A person who is qualified in accordance with the Vienna Convention to be a bearer of a diplomatic identity card enjoys diplomatic immunities; members of the technical and administrative staff of diplomatic missions may only invoke immunity from civil and administrative jurisdiction for acts performed within the course of the exercise of their official duty.

3. Diplomatic immunity is not invoked when a diplomat finds himself in violation of Canadian law and chooses to pay a fine. Such cases would not be known to the government. A certain number of diplomatic missions appear not to invoke diplomatic immunity with regard to minor offences such as parking violations.

4. For the most part the offences were parking violations, other offences were largely minor traffic offences with a very small number of other offences such as disorderly conduct and shoplifting.

NUMBER OF MAXIMUM SECURITY PRISONS AND TOTAL NUMBER OF INMATES

Question No. 2,080—Mr. Howie:

1. As of January 1 (a) 1975 (b) 1976 (c) 1977, what was the number of maximum security prisons and what was the (i) total number of inmates (ii) total number of inmates in each case?

2. What is the projected total number of inmates in maximum security prisons for January 1 (a) 1978 (b) 1980 (c) 1985?

3. What new maximum security prisons are presently being built, or are scheduled to be built and what is the projected (a) date of completion (b) cost (c) number of inmates to be housed in each?

4. What maximum security prisons are presently being phased out of operation, or are scheduled to be phased out of operation, and what (a) is the scheduled date of termination (b) will be the decrease in inmate population on a yearly basis from the beginning to the completion of the phasing out of each?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): By the Ministry of the Solicitor General: (Canadian Penitentiary Service and National Parole Service) 1. (a) 12; (b) 12; (c) 11; (i and ii) See list below.

2. (a) 3,702; (b) 3,379; (c) 3,300.

FEASIBILITY STUDY FOR NEW NATIONAL GALLERY

Question No. 2,241—Mr. Herbert:

1. What has been the cost, to date, of the feasibility study for the new National Gallery?

2. What is the estimated total cost of the study?

3. To whom has the principal amount been paid?

4. What is the (a) description of the site on which the construction is projected (b) total area of the site?

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): 1. The limited architectural competitions and the related expenditures undertaken on the National Gallery cannot be classified as feasibility studies. Planning studies have been performed on the Wellington West planning precinct jointly between Public Works and the National Capital Commission. However, these were undertaken prior to the decision to locate the National Gallery on the presently proposed site and at the time were not directly concerned with the National Gallery. Studies connected with the suitability of the site for the National Gallery were done within Public Works and the National Capital Commission, and therefore no significant costs were incurred.

2. The cost breakdown for the limited architectural competition and related expenditures are as follows:

Competitors' prizes	$350,000.00
Competitors' Travel expenses	8,810.26
		$358,810.26
Professional Advisor fees	$26,531.83
Professional Advisor expenses	2,632.73
		$29,164.56
Program Consultant fees	$200,685.70
Program Consultant expenses	4,641.09
		$205,326.79
Miscellaneous Consultants' fees and expenses (including Jury)	$47,348.84
		$47,348.84
Miscellaneous expenditures	$33,258.72
		$33,258.72
Total Expenditures to date:		$673,909.17

3. Each competing firm and consortium, including the winner, was paid $35,000.

4. (a) The site is bounded by Wellington Street on the south side, the National Library and Public Archives on the west, the Ottawa River on the north and the Supreme Court and proposed Federal Court on the east. (b) 12.5 acres.

PERSONS DRAWING UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Question No. 2,284—Mr. Fortin:

1. Under the H-PEVAIC Programme and according to code D-28, did persons drawing unemployment insurance lose their right to benefits under section 40(1)(d) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, for having failed to attend an interview pursuant to section 107 and, if so, how many (a) in Quebec, from April 1 to June 30, 1976 (b) in each region of Canada over the same period (c) in each region of Canada, during the implementation of the section involved?

2. Did the persons drawing unemployment insurance thereby excluded regain their right and were they reimbursed and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Statistics on the H-PEVAIC program were not separately kept for this period.

2. Not applicable.

POLICY-MAKING RESPONSIBILITY RELATING TO EMPLOYMENT STANDARDS AND OCCUPATIONAL SAFETY

Question No. 2,330—Mr. Stevens:

As of December 31 (a) 1968 (b) 1976, how many federal employees were charged with policy-making or the interpretation of policies, relating to employment standards and occupational safety?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): As of December 31, (a) 1968, 8; (b) 1976, 14.

CBC COVERAGE OF TORONTO BLUE JAYS SPRING TRAINING CAMP

Question No. 2,345—Mr. Friesen:

1. How many CBC (a) TV reporters (b) radio reporters (c) cameramen (d) soundmen (e) other technicians covered the spring training camp of the Toronto Bluejays and, in each case, how long were they on this assignment?

2. (a) How many pieces of material were submitted by the reporters for (i) radio (ii) television (b) how many of the reports were aired (c) how many minutes of air time did this involve?

3. How many CBC (a) reporters (radio and television) (b) cameramen (c) soundmen (d) other technicians cover each of the provincial legislatures while they are in session?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. English Services: (a) Four sports commentators; (b) one sports commentator; (c) three staff, one freelance; (d) one; (e) one. One producer, one unit manager, one director, one production assistant and one script assistant were also assigned. The above staff were assigned as follows: TV—A crew of eight spent three weeks, a unit manager spent four days and a commentator spent five days preparing a one-hour special (fully paid for by its sponsor). One commentator and one cameraman spent March 6-14 producing items daily for two Toronto local sportscasts plus longer items for Toronto local evening news shows. All items were syndicated to CBC stations across Canada. One commentator and one cameraman spent March 25-April 3 producing a half-hour Toronto local special plus items for two daily Toronto local sports shows. Items were syndicated. A director spent one day directing an item for 90 Minutes Live, a national program, using the sports camera crew already on location. One commentator spent three days covering the camp for network news, network weekend sports shows and Toronto local station. Radio—Staff member from national sports desk of national newsroom spent two days providing items for national newscasts, plus a 15-minute item for network sports program Rebound. French Services: (a), (b) one (c) two (d) one (e) nil. One producer and one script assistant were also assigned. The French Services television crew was in Florida to cover the Montreal Expos training camp. At the end of that assignment the crew spent one day at the Blue Jays camp preparing three network television items.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION IN QUEBEC

Question No. 2,385—Mr. Fortin:

1. Following an inquiry by the Unemployment Insurance Commission in Quebec, which revealed that more than 40 per cent of the claimants did not attend H-PEVAIC interviews when they were summoned in writing as compared to those summoned orally, did the Department of Manpower and Immigration decide to summon candidates in writing despite the study and, if so, for what reason?

2. Did the decision of the Department take into account (a) the intelligibility of the UIC forms (b) the fact that, according to the Centrale des enseignants du Québec (Quebec Teachers' Union), 40 per cent of the adults of the Province have only an elementary level education and thus the most deprived are the ones who are victims of exclusions and, if so, has such a procedure been adopted across the country?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. No. The Department is of the opinion that summoning claimants in writing is better business practice than giving them appointments orally. In that way, there can be no misunderstanding as to the time and place of the interview and the name of the counsellor.

2. (a) Yes, the Department periodically reviews its forms in order to ensure that they can be understood by all claimants. As for the form used to summon them for interviews we feel that it is perfectly intelligible. (b) No.

MR. JEAN-CLAUDE BERNARDIN

Question No. 2,436—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

1. Does the Public Service Commission have in its employ a public servant of Haitian origin, Mr. Jean-Claude Bernardin and, if so, what position does he occupy?

[Mr. Roberts.]

2. Does Mr. Bernardin have a certificate of naturalization and, if so, on what date was it granted?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): In so far as the Department of the Secretary of State is concerned: 1. To be answered elsewhere.

2. The records of the Citizenship Registration Branch of the Department of the Secretary of State confirm that one Jean-Claude Bernardin was granted citizenship on December 2, 1976.

In so far as the Public Service Commission is concerned: 1. The Public Service Commission does not have in its employ a person by the name of Jean-Claude Bernardin.

2. To be answered elsewhere.

CBC ENGLISH LANGUAGE TV AND RADIO STATIONS IN QUEBEC

Question No. 2,444—Mr. Cossitt:

Since April 20, 1968, how many CBC English language (a) tv (b) radio stations, have been constructed or planned for the Province of Quebec and, in each case, what are the call letters and the location?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: (a), (b) In the province of Quebec since April 20, 1968, 11 English-language television stations and 13 English-language radio stations have either been constructed or their planned construction has been announced in connection with a CRTC hearing for a licence application. The call letters, where assigned, and locations of the stations that have been constructed or for the licensing of which hearings have been set by the CRTC are as follows:

	Call Sign	Location	Status
TV:	—	Baie Comeau	Under construction
	CBJET	Chicoutimi	On air
	—	Fermont	Planned
	CBFCT	Fort Chimo	Planned
	CBFGT	Fort George	On air
	CBFHT	Fort Rupert	Under construction
	CBFWT	Nouveau-Comptoir	On air
	CBPBT	Poste-de-la-Baleine	Planned
	CBSET-1	Schefferville	On air
	—	Sept-Iles	Planned
	—	Trois-Rivières	Planned
Radio:	—	Baie Comeau	Under construction
	CBMD	Chapais	On air
	CBMF	Chibougamau	On air
	CBJE-FM	Chicoutimi	On air
	—	Fermont	Planned
	CBMP-FM	Fort George	On air
	CBMQ-FM	Fort Rupert	Under construction
	CBMO	Lac Megantic	On air
	CBMK	Lebel-Sur-Quevillon	On air
	CBON	Maniwaki	On air
	CBMW-FM	Nouveau-Comptoir	On air
	CBVE-FM	Quebec	On air
	—	Sept-Iles	Planned

Other English-language stations are planned for the province of Quebec. The locations will, as is customary, be made public when the CRTC sets a date for a hearing following submission of a licence application by the CBC. A further 27 English-language television stations and 26 English-language radio stations are in this category.

CBC FRENCH LANGUAGE TV AND RADIO STATIONS IN PROVINCES OTHER THAN QUEBEC

Question No. 2,445—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What was the construction cost or estimated cost of all CBC French language (a) tv (b) radio stations, in provinces other than Quebec, presently operating, under construction, or in the planning stages and what is the combined total?

2. What is the annual actual cost or estimated cost of all CBC French language (a) tv (b) radio stations presently operating, under construction, or in the planning stages, in all provinces other than Quebec and what is the combined total?

3. (a) What is the combined annual cost of all items in Parts 1 and 2 (b) how many French language (i) tv (ii) radio stations are involved and, of these, how many were constructed, planned, etc. since April 20, 1968?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1 and 2.

	Construction Cost or Estimated Cost		Annual Cost or Estimated Cost
	(a) TV	(b) Radio	(a) TV	(b) Radio
In operation	$26,283,078	$ 7,315,425	$10,489,000	$ 5,894,000
Under construction	*3,637,450	1,911,790	98,574	65,295
In planning stages	9,038,891	3,571,800	616,455	694,140
Total	$38,959,419	$12,799,015	$11,204,029	$6,653,435

* Projects which have received CRTC approval but are not yet in operation.

3. (a) The question cannot be answered in a meaningful way as the "construction costs" show in part 1 above are a one-time non-recurring capital expenditure, whereas the annual costs are recurring. Therefore, the answer is as shown in part 2. (b) (i) 103; (ii) 120. Since April 20, 1962: TV—constructed, 27; under construction, 7; planned, 59; Radio—constructed, 36; under construction, 11; planned, 46.

FOREIGN AGRICULTURAL WORKERS

Question No. 2,466—Mr. Demers:

1. During 1976, in Quebec, did vegetable gardeners employ foreign workers who had temporary work permits and, if so, what (a) are the names and addresses of the gardeners (b) was the number of workers involved?

2. During 1977 to date, in Quebec, were vegetable gardeners authorized to bring in foreign workers who had temporary work permits and, if so (a) what are the names and addresses of the gardeners (b) on what date did they file their applications?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Yes, in 1976 (a) 2 vegetable garderners (See Note 1); (b) 32 workers.

2. Yes, in 1977 to date (a) 2 vegetable gardeners (See Note 1); (b) 24 January 1977, and 27 January 1977.

NOTE 1: The Department of Manpower and Immigration regards as confidential the names and addresses of clients.

[English]

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I rise again on a question of privilege which not only concerns unanswered questions of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt), but also some unanswered questions of my own. The other day, in response to the question of privilege I raised and to the motion upon which I founded it, the parliamentary secretary said that these things would all be done by the fall. I do not see any sacred difference between a fall date and this particular date. If there are answers to questions, they should be provided forthwith. If there are no answers, or the parliamentary secretary or his colleagues feel the questions are unanswerable, we should be told. This is a stalling practice and it is an invidious practice in the sense that we cannot read their hearts and minds or get through the small blood vessels to the Prime Minister's brain. The fact is, the questions are not answered because someone has animosity toward the hon. member for Leeds. I resent that, Mr. Speaker and I am going to voice my resentment at every opportunity.

● (1600)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCleave: The parliamentary secretary has to come in here next week with some of the answers for the hon. member for Leeds or I will be on my feet every time he stands in this House, protesting on behalf of any member who I believe has a legitimate question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I rise with respect to the privileges of members of the House. I have 15 questions on the order paper, some dating back to October 12 last year and seven or eight preceding this parliament. In the dying days of this session I hope Your Honour may be able to direct himself to answering the fear that my colleague has indicated is growing in regard to questions on the order paper which pertain to a politically sensitive area and instructions coming from ministers to delay responses.

My questions range from No. 160, dated October 12, to the last one about three months ago. The questions seek information that is of essential interest to the maritime shipping community in Canada. Perhaps the failure to answer arises from the failure of Statistics Canada and other data collecting organizations to provide the appropriate data for the answers. One or two of the questions even go back one full parliament. It would be a very simple thing for the parliamentary secretary to the minister responsible to rise and say that the data is not available and will not be available for a long time. A member would then have the opportunity to seek unanimous consent to withdraw the question.

I do not like the abuse of order paper questions which has been demonstrated by some of my colleagues in the chamber, and I know it has contributed to the workload of the departments. A lot of questions are irrelevant, but on the other hand members of parliament do have a right to ask questions. Where the answer is not given because the question is politically sensitive or because the appropriate information is not available, some other method of dealing with them must be found.

In the four or five parliaments during which I have sat in this chamber through the grace of the people of Dartmouth-Halifax East, I have always been left with a long list of unanswered questions. Those questions are never to the political disadvantage of the ruling party, but seek answers that are important to the maritime community which comprises a major portion of my riding. Mr. Speaker, I submit it is incumbent upon your office and your officers to direct yourselves to this question, in the hope that in the dying days of this session a better method will be found to deal with questions on the order paper.

Questions 160, 163, 174, 1,249, 1,396 and 2,156—I will not list the others—are vitally important to the changing trade patterns between this country and others upon whom we must rely for our well-being and our balance of trade payments. I think some of these questions could have been dealt with by the parliamentary secretary to the appropriate minister indicating that the information is not the type usually collected by departments and agencies of this government, and requesting that they be withdrawn. Hon. members would be willing to accept that, but we are not happy to sit through two parliaments without an answer to a simple, non-partisan question. I appreciate the indulgence of the House, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am certainly prepared to listen to other hon. members, but I think we should disabuse our minds of what constitutes a question of privilege. As I indicated to the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) last week, there is no obligation upon the government to answer questions. Accordingly, on technical grounds there is no opportunity for the Chair to find privilege when the government fails to answer a question. We recently changed our rules so that questions are answered every day instead of only two days a week, as previously. This provides an opportunity daily to ask whether the remaining questions shall be allowed to stand, and for hon. members to agree, as I am sure they will continue to do, that their questions remain unanswered. That does not change the character of the exercise and form a question of privilege, however.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I will grieve very briefly. Today the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) filed what he calls a green paper on access to government documents, but which I call a black paper. In effect, it constitutes a repudiation by the government of any intention to bring in legislation. The successive shocks they have suffered over the last few weeks with regard to information show this. At page 5 there is a very pertinent observation indicating why it might not be necessary. The green paper states, at page 5:

> Third, a statute creating an obligation for departments to respond directly to public applications for access to government documents might reduce the role of the member of parliament as seeker of information for, and articulator and defender of, the interests of his constituents. Opportunity for the public to seek documents directly from departments and agencies might lessen contact between citizens and members. On the other hand, the criteria for production of documents under notices of motions for the production of papers would have to correspond to any exemptions—

I quote that because after our experience in this House, mine over a great many years, and particularly the very laudable observations made by the two hon. members who preceeded me that they are not getting information, not getting the documents, and there have not been the answers, it makes this observation at page 5 hypocritical. I just put that before the Chair for its understanding.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. O'Sullivan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Twenty-seven days ago I drew to the attention of the parliamentary secretary questions Nos. 1,941 and 1,945. The parliamentary secretary said, in reply to that representation: "I will do my best to try and get the answers for him." I certainly hope the parliamentary secretary, given his reputation, will not be misleading the House and will get those answers for me.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I ask, Mr. Speaker, that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill C-58, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31 March, 1978.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty to inform the House that a communication has been received which is as follows:

Ottawa, June 29, 1977

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Wilfred Judson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 29th day of June, at 5:45 p.m., for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I just want to bring to Your Honour's attention the fact that I am unusually warm in this place. When discussing this matter with my friend, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), he indicated to me that the air-conditioner breaks down every year at this time. I am just wondering if you can assist me in this regard. If, in fact, the air-conditioner has broken down, sir, when do you think it will be fixed? I find it extremely uncomfortable in here at this particular time.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) raises a valid concern. In fact, it was reported to me late last night that the main motor of the air-conditioning system had broken down. The engineers are at work on it. They indicate that, regrettably, it will take until Saturday or Sunday to repair it. This means that today and tomorrow only, hopefully, will be the days we will be without its services. If the difficulty goes on any longer than that, I, too, will start to look for some sinister motivation behind the annual breakdown.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AUDITOR GENERAL ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING OFFICE OF AUDITOR GENERAL

The House resumed, from Monday, June 27, consideration of Bill C-20, respecting the office of the Auditor General of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Mr. Speaker: The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on Bill C-20. Call in the members.

The House divided on motion No. 5 (Mr. Baldwin) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: Therefore, I declare motion No. 5 lost. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), on a point of order.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that the air-conditioner has broken down and we are now nearing the end of the month of June, and in view of the question you just asked and the responses made by hon. members, I should like to draw Your Honour's attention to the rules of debate, Standing Order 28, which reads as follows:

Every member desiring to speak is to rise in his place, uncovered, and address himself to Mr. Speaker.

I should also like to direct Your Honour's attention to the French version of Standing Order 28, which reads in part, "la tête découverte", which means "head uncovered". Therefore, I should like to draw Your Honour's attention to the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo) who participated in the vote contrary to Standing Order 28, in my opinion.

Some hon. Members: Take it off, take it off.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on the same point of order?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will realize that the Standing Order to which reference has been made does not make reference to voting by members. It makes reference to the intention of hon. members to be recognized to speak.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: If and when the occasion presents itself, that we have to make delicate decisions of a discriminatory nature as to the dress regulations of male and female members of this House, we will meet that problem. At the moment, we have not come to it.

The question is now on motion No. 7 in the name of the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Martin).

The House divided on motion No. 7 (Mr. Martin) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare motion No. 7 lost.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-20, respecting the office of the Auditor General of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): By leave, now.

Mr. Andras moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: —I remind my colleagues that I am not rising to speak on the metric bill. I shall speak on legislation just as important as that. I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak on third reading of this important piece of legislation, particularly since it will soon become law. All of us, I think, have waited a long time for this bill. We waited for it to be introduced, it has been debated and we hope it will soon become law.

The bill has had a long gestation period, and the years of government indifference to the office of the auditor general should not be forgotten, even at this time. It is fair to say that the public outcry, the work of the opposition and the work of the auditing profession exerted pressure on the government, a government insensitive to how taxpayers' money has been spent and managed these last number of years. We are, therefore, pleased to see in the final stages of passage the legislation which seeks to clarify the terms of reference under which the auditor general will work and more clearly establish his authority and powers.

Without doubt, Bill C-20 is a significant improvement over existing provisions of the Financial Administration Act which set out the terms of reference, duties and objectives of the auditor general. Our present Auditor General, Mr. Jim Macdonell, has expressed pleasure with this bill, calling it the Magna Carta of his office. That shows, I think, his acceptance of this legislation. But there are certain dangers with which I wish to deal.

One of the great dangers as we consider the legislation is that more importance has been placed on this piece of legislation than is warranted, in my view. Any attempt to pass off this legislation as a panacea for restoring financial control within the government of Canada would be misleading and deceitful, to say the least. I am sure my colleagues will agree with me that there are many things that still go unanswered, ignored and undone in terms of restoring parliamentary control, financial management, control and accountability.

In that connection, I want to deal today not so much with what is in the bill but with what is not in the bill. The omissions and what these omissions imply are, to me, more crucial to the return of the over-all control of taxpayers' funds than any clause contained in the bill. Of course, the true test of this legislation, as it is of any other legislation, is how it stands the test of time. In that regard, I believe it is somewhat unfortunate that Bill C-20 is being considered at the same time as the Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability is getting into the meat of its work. It is still conducting its studies and we are not sure as yet when it will be reporting.

Also, I think it is rather unfortunate that we are considering legislation at a time when we know the government is preparing new legislation on Crown corporations of which members of this chamber have not yet been made aware. It is a piece of legislation that is being drafted in secret. It seems to me that at least some of the content of the legislation, and indeed the recommendations of the royal commission, would have been most useful in dealing with legislation as important as the bill before us.

While indicating to the House that we on this side support the principal thrust of Bill C-20, we must make that support conditional pending the outcome of the two factors which I have just mentioned, namely, the new legislation which will be introduced at some later date, and the recommendations of the Lambert commission. It is our feeling that changes to the bill may very well be needed at that time, so we want to reserve the option to press the government for the needed changes to the Auditor General Act pending the outcome of these two matters.

The debate during the committee stage showed that there was a great deal of concern among members from all parties with respect to the auditor general's relationship with Crown corporations. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) refused to allow any amendments which would have strengthened the legislation in that regard, because he claimed that new amendments to the Financial Administration Act were the proper vehicle to deal with such matters. It is our feeling that in terms of the auditor general's relationship and association with Crown corporations he might not have adequate tools and safeguards built into the legislation to deal with matters relating to the financial control and management of Crown corporations. He can only rely on the President of Treasury Board in that respect and deal with it at some unspecified date in the future.

It would seem logical that, as a minimum, the minister might have outlined the general changes which he expects to bring forward with respect to Crown corporations. But that was not the case, either. This to some extent has inhibited our ability to examine this piece of legislation thoroughly and to give it the kind of special attention it deserves because of these unknown factors. When the new Crown corporations legislation is introduced, and when the royal commission brings in its findings, it will probably be incumbent upon us and the government to move some amendments. So, once again, it is on that basis that we are supporting the legislation now. The Auditor General has expressed the desire that the bill be passed as soon as possible, and we will certainly respect his wish; but at the same time I can assure hon. members that we will not be losing our files on this legislation.

The next area of concern which I want to express is with regard to the relationship between the government and the auditor general. May I say at the outset that our party's respect for and total, unqualified confidence in the auditor general has been placed on the record on countless occasions. However, I have to say that there are trends which we have observed which cause us some uneasiness. I am speaking about what appears to us and what has been perceived as a less than adequate distance between the government and the office of the auditor general. I am reminded of the words of the former president of the treasury board, the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien), who was fond of saying that his relationship with the auditor general was cordial but not cosy. I think it is fair to say, if my observation is correct, that the relationship of the president of treasury board and the auditor general has become rather more cosy in recent times.

Let me illustrate a case in point. A clear example of this new-found brotherhood is to be found in the reaction to some 38 amendments which committee members advanced at the committee stage. The number was later reduced to 21 because of duplications, etc. The Auditor General and the President of the Treasury Board were essentially in agreement on every one of those amendments. This agreement for the most part was total, except in four instances when the President of the Treasury Board disagreed. The Auditor General termed the amendments acceptable, but prefaced that position by saying he preferred the present wording. The similarity of the position taken by Treasury Board and that of the Auditor General—traditionally two forces at cross-forces—can, if overdone, impede the effectiveness of the office of the auditor general. There is a perception, well founded or otherwise, that the auditor general might become more the auditor for the government and less the auditor of the government for parliament. That is a concern which some of us feel.

Many of the provisions in the original Bill C-20 also underlined this development. Clauses 7 and 8 require that the auditor general's report be submitted to the minister of finance, and the minister is to table it within 15 days. The results of this were made clear last November when the government used this time to devise the stalling tactic of appointing a royal commission the establishment of which was announced on the same day as the Minister of Finance tabled the Auditor General's report. Fortunately, an amendment was introduced and accepted to end this practice by referring the auditor general's annual report directly to the Speaker of the House of Commons.

I think this is a very important measure because it also serves as a symbolic gesture to parliament in that the auditor general, by referring his report directly to the Speaker of the House, becomes more directly responsible to parliament through the Speaker, and thereby to members of parliament. It is very important that the auditor general is seen in the eyes of the public as a servant of parliament. He must not be seen primarily as answerable only to the minister of finance but, rather, to be answerable to parliament through individual members of parliament and through the Speaker. I think that provision advances a principle that we feel is important.

It is interesting to note that at the time Bill C-20 was introduced, and throughout the subsequent debate which took place, there was no comment made by the office of the Auditor General with respect to this provision. It is fair to say that the Auditor General supported the amendment, but so, too, did Treasury Board.

Another provision which has caused hon. members on this side some concern is clause 10. Unfortunately, our amendment to correct the deficiency in it was turned down by Treasury Board and by the Auditor General. This clause provides that whenever it appears to the auditor general that any public money has been improperly retained by any person, he shall forthwith report the circumstances of the case to the president of treasury board. This clause is a continuation of the current provisions of the Financial Administration Act, and in my view it is seriously deficient. Among the several cases of improper retention of funds which auditors general have had to deal with over the years, the best known case was referred to in the 1972 annual report. In paragraph 74 of that report the then auditor general said he had to report the improper retention of moneys which involved the then president of treasury board himself. That case involved some $34 million of public funds.

In that particular case the then auditor general waited several months for the then president of treasury board to respond to his questions before he was obliged to report that illegal retention to the House of Commons in his annual report. What is more interesting is that during that lapse of time an election was held, so the facts of this matter, which could have been potentially embarrassing to the government, were withheld from parliament and thereby from the public of Canada. Because of the possibility of further instances where presidents of treasury board could arrange for the improper retention of public moneys, it is absurd and totally unacceptable to have auditors general reporting such instances only to presidents of treasury board.

My argument is strengthened by the fact that under the existing legislation the auditor general can bring forward a special report from time to time on any matter he considers to be of a significant nature, so it seems to me that surely this loophole should be closed. I am not suggesting for one minute that the present President of the Treasury Board would exercise that opinion, but as I said earlier, the true test of this legislation will be how it stands the test of time. I want to reiterate again that we in our party have great confidence in the present Auditor General. We can well understand what he has gone through in terms of the bargaining and negotiating which may have taken place, particularly as a result of the 1976 report he brought before the House. It was a very strong report, with some very strong recommendations. In very straightforward language it called upon the government to clean up the mess. The Auditor General was very straightforward and frank in advocating a formula for cleaning up the mess, and the recommendation of the appointment of a controller general was certainly one recommendation about which he felt very strongly.

However, I suppose it is fair to say that he was also very keen about getting this legislation through. He was very excited about it. I think there had to be some balance, a little bit of give and take, and quite frankly I am sure we can sympathize with him in trying to obtain the best of both worlds. While the relationship between the Auditor General and the President of the Treasury Board appears to be very close, I am sure that will not in any way jeopardize or compromise the ability of the Auditor General to do his job properly. I hope that in the future, when others are appointed to this very onerous and difficult task, the relationship between the government and the appointees will be kept at a distance in order to preserve the independence and effectiveness of this very important position.

It should be recognized that under the present arrangement the office of the auditor general has a fair amount of financial resources to distribute in terms of obtaining professional help from the accounting profession. This, too, is a matter which cannot be treated lightly. The auditor general has millions of dollars to distribute on outside contracts, which could easily go to friends of the party in power. That is why it is very important that we choose an auditor general who has the high calibre and the high degree of integrity of the present Auditor General. In that connection, I have to note that it was with a great deal of reluctance that the government accepted the idea that minimal qualifications should be imposed upon the appointment of auditor general. We proposed, and the government accepted the fact, that the person who is selected for this office should be a qualified auditor. The original section of the act did not define any qualifications whatsoever.

It is important that the confidence of the public and of parliament be maintained. If the auditor general is to be seen as a strong, independent watchdog of the funds which are distributed on behalf of the people of Canada, in order for him to keep that confidence and that independence he must be a man who is highly competent and highly qualified in this field. Only in this way can he maintain the effectiveness of the office as well as its prestige and integrity.

I spoke a few moments ago about the large amount of funds now available to the office of the auditor general. In no way are we questioning the efficacy of allowing a rather substantial increase in appropriations for the office of auditor general. Since this Auditor General was appointed, the budget of his office has increased from $3.8 million to $20.4 million. That means that the office has been significantly strengthened. It has been strengthened because of the resources available to the office and the additional manpower it has, and it will be strengthened by this legislation.

However, throughout the process of strengthening the office of the auditor general, parliament has been weakened. That bothers us. It bothers us that amendments such as the valid amendments proposed by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) are treated so lightly and casually. The auditor general releases his report, the report is referred to a committee and in many respects the committee becomes an adjudicator. It has to consider the report and hear the evidence of the minister or the government officials involved, and in many respects it has to be the judge. The committee does not have the power, the resources or the capability to do this job in an effective manner.

The committee should have unlimited power to call witnesses and papers. The auditor general can exercise the provisions of the Inquiries Act. We went through such an exercise when we were dealing with the AECL and the Polysar issues. Notwithstanding a very determined and sincere effort on the part of committee members from both sides of the House, we were not able to get very far in getting to the bottom of the references which were alluded to in the report of the Auditor General.

It is important that the office of the auditor general be strong, but it is also important that we recognize that the auditor general is a servant of parliament. He reports to parliament. The committee which receives his report must be equally strong so that it can deal with his reports in an intelligent and effective manner. With the power of parliament being eroded, a strong auditor general could do a good job. But in many ways parliament is powerless to act. We must remember that in the 1976 report he warned the country that parliament is close to losing control of the public purse.

What disturbs me is that neither Bill C-20 nor any other measure of the government we've seen lately do anything to alleviate this state of affairs. My colleagues and I have tried to have measures incorporated in the bill which would provide an expansion in parliamentary powers to complement the increase in powers and resources given to the auditor general. We wanted the public accounts committee to be protected by statute and to be given the investigatory powers, the staff and resources that would enable it to do its job. The inability of the committee system to deal effectively with the report of the Auditor General is highlighted by his 1976 report. I refer specifically to the matter of AECL. The Auditor General was only able to report the irregularity in this case because proper receipts were not maintained. If they had been, parliament would never have known about it. Presumably, under the new Auditor General Act, the auditor general could now include reference to payments such as those in his report to the House, no matter what receipts were on hand, by questioning the efficiency and effectiveness of the spending.

Where does this leave the parliament of Canada and the committee system, Mr. Speaker? We are back to square one. The auditor general has more power to comment on the expenditure of funds which in his view may not be spent in an effective manner, than the committee has to get to the root of the problem. The committee has not been strengthened at all. All it can do is study the report, hear the government's witnesses and balance the two views before coming to a decision.

The AECL hearings were stonewalled. We were not given complete information, nor were we able to call the witnesses we desired or required. Our work was, therefore, ineffective and incomplete.

Miss MacDonald: And the minister did not answer questions.

Mr. Mazankowski: The minister had frequent lapses of memory about approval of capital budgets and other things. That the committee did not do a good job of looking into the AECL fiasco is no reflection upon its members, but is the result of a hopelessly inadequate committee system. The government continues to refer to the committee system in glowing terms, but if it is to be an effective tool of this parliament it must be improved and upgraded. It is a sorry situation when the press have more resources than the committee system. They did a much better job of checking into the AECL matter than the committee, because they had more resources, more money, more time. Passage of this bill will not improve the committee system, Mr. Speaker. We may find out about more nefarious practices, but we will still have no way of getting to the root of the problem and finding out what actually transpired.

The government's abuse of the $1 vote is another example of how parliamentary control is being destroyed. During the committee proceedings on Bill C-20 we attempted to have an amendment passed that would allow the auditor general to comment on money spent for purposes other than that for which it was originally appropriated. Treasury Board turned the amendment down on the grounds that this bill was not the proper vehicle for discouraging the use of $1 votes. What is the proper vehicle, Mr. Speaker? There were 52 $1 vote items, some of which Your Honour found to be out of order. Some had to come back in the form of legislation.

As far as I am concerned, and as far as this government is concerned, there is no proper vehicle for restoring the authority of parliament. But it must be restored, Mr. Speaker. Parliament is becoming more and more of a nuisance to this government. To realize this we just have to look at the form and content of the estimates and the way they are handled; at the $1 vote items; at the weak forecasting of expenditures and the use of supplementary estimates; at the guillotine rule; at the powerless committees. There can be no doubt about this government's intentions, and the passage of the Auditor General Act does nothing to change things. The government is in a sorry state.

Mr. Oberle: Innocent ignorance.

Mr. Mazankowski: We look at Crown corporations and—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member as his time has expired. The special order which was adopted to extend the hours of sitting, at the same time limited speeches to 30 minutes. The hon. member would require unanimous consent to continue. Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Mazankowski: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall try not to abuse the privilege. I want to conclude by saying the spending programs of the government have grown astronomically. We have a situation where Crown corporations have become kingdoms unto themselves. I am happy that the minister is going to look into this situation very closely. Let there be no doubt that Bill C-20 will not do the job of clearing up the mess of government mismanagement and improper parliamentary control.

It seems to me we should be looking at two or three areas that would help us, as parliamentarians, to examine the spending practices and habits of the government. I think we should consider the possibility of establishing some form of independent review agency to appraise and evaluate ongoing government programs and consider alternative ways of operating those programs more efficiently and effectively. There should be an accurate appraisal of cost-benefit analysis of existing programs. Surely it is time we considered initiating some of the concepts of zero-base budgeting. Perhaps we should start with a few selected Crown corporations or government agencies and later extend it to other areas. The incremental budget process which has been used over the past few years has been a disaster.

I note in the Globe and Mail that the President of the United States has mandated that the federal budget for fiscal 1979 will use zero-base budgeting. In addition, it is stated that 11 states have adopted zero-base budgeting, more than ten cities are trying it out, and major companies have applied it to some of their operations. It is time we seriously considered the concept of zero-base budgeting. It is still a relatively new theme. There are a number of seminars and conferences on this very important subject. We should get on with the job.

As well, we should consider very seriously establishing a permanent joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons to deal solely with the Crown corporations in this country. The committee should be composed of a permanent membership and should conduct itself in a non-partisan manner. It should be given the power to initiate investigations on its own, and given the necessary legal, technical and financial staff to properly conduct its task. All reports of Crown corporations should automatically be referred to that joint committee, and any corporation could be called before the committee at its discretion. We should have either this committee or a royal commission to examine all Crown corporations in order to determine if they are still fulfilling a useful purpose and if, in fact, many have not outlived their usefulness and have become redundant. We know that Crown corporations are created by the stroke of a pen. Many times they are created to serve a distinct purpose. However, after they have fulfilled that purpose they continue to exist. There is good reason to have a thorough examination of the numerous Crown corporations in existence.

Fourth, as I said earlier, we must work toward restoring the supremacy of parliament by overhauling the committee system, strengthening our committees, giving them more power, more resources and the power to initiate action. Moreover, this government must become more liberal with the information that it provides to parliament and the public of Canada. As a starter, the government should introduce a freedom of information act along the lines advocated by my colleague, the hon. member for Peace River. We in this country are facing a confidence crisis in our institutions and parliament. There is a growing wave of cynicism in this country. People believe our parliamentary institutions, parliament and governments, do not listen. The government is not held accountable to the people. Crown corporations are not held accountable. There is a void of information. Surely this is one area where public confidence could be improved by providing a greater amount of information on how the people's money is being spent and whether, in fact, it is being spent wisely or foolishly. Government and parliament must regain control over public spending in this country. The public service must be rewarded for efficiency rather than empire building. We must work toward containing the growth of the public service. What is really happening in this country, as it has happened in other western industrialized countries, is that we are living in a society where we have a growing number of non-producers and a lessening number of producers.

In conclusion, it is with some regret that we do not have a total package before us which would clean up the mess of government mismanagement and lack of government control. I can only hope, on behalf of all Canadians and especially those who contribute so much of their hard-earned money to the government in taxes, that the new powers bestowed upon the auditor general will be used to shake this government into action. Only if he takes the offensive can these new powers, and Bill C-20, be seen as worth while and justified. Only then can the auditor general be really fulfilling his mandate to protect the taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief. I must say, in reference to the remarks of the last speaker, that I am far less concerned about the committee system as it is constituted than I am about the ineffectiveness of the opposition in these committees. The official opposition has its research bureau paid for by public funds. It surely is incumbent on the members of the opposition to decide for what purposes they use the resources available to them.

The discussions in committee on Bill C-20 have been most interesting and, for the most part, non-partisan. Amendments to improve and strengthen the bill were discussed and many have now been incorporated, including suggestions put forward by members of the opposition parties. Amendments that were not accepted are, in some instances, to be considered in changes which are proposed to other pieces of legislation. One of the amendments voted down earlier today is in this category. I concentrated my attention on that section of the bill which deals with economy and efficiency in the public service and the various government agencies; also on the effectiveness of the programs. I want to make reference to that section at this time.

In the bill one can read that each report of the auditor general shall call attention to anything that he considers to be of significance and which should be brought to the attention of the House of Commons. These include any cases in which he has observed that money has been expended without due regard to economy or efficiency, or satisfactory procedures have not been established to measure and report upon the effectiveness of programs. The specific subsections are intended to implement that part of the recommendations of the independent review committee proposing that the auditor general should, in his annual report to the House of Commons, call attention to any cases where he has observed that value for money has not been obtained for any expenditure or expenditures.

The committee described its "value for money" concept when it indicated that the concept encompasses three interrelated components: whether the money is expended economically and efficiently, and whether the program on which it is expended is effective in meeting its objectives. Economy and efficiency are susceptible to reasonably objective definition and measurement, and the auditor general should take due account of them in conducting his examination of expenditures. However, the assessment of the effectiveness of a program or policy depends upon the political judgment of parliament and the confidence that parliament has in the government of the day. The auditor general is required to report to the House of Commons when he observes that satisfactory procedures have not been established to measure and report upon the effectiveness of programs where such procedures could appropriately and reasonably be implemented.

The bill places no restriction on the auditor general's right to assess the various procedures used in government to ensure economy and to measure the efficiency and effectiveness of programs. The auditor general would report to the House on poor procedures and on the government's failure to implement satisfactory procedures where they could reasonably be expected to be applied. An assessment of the procedures should include an assessment of the adequacy of the reporting of the results of the government's own evaluation techniques both within government and to parliament. The difference in wording between subsections (d) and (e) of paragraph 7(2) emphasize the qualitative difference between the concepts of "economy" and "efficiency" which are susceptible to objective measurement, and that of "effectiveness" whose measurement is essentially a matter of judgment.

Bill C-20 requires the auditor general to comment on the absence of effectiveness measurement procedures where he feels that they could be of benefit, but clearly excludes the auditor general from conducting effective audits himself and thus becoming involved in judgemental decisions which are, by their very nature, political in character. The evaluation of the effectiveness of the government programs is a constitutional responsibility of parliament itself, and the wording of the bill protects the office of the auditor general from any danger of being drawn into political debate.

Everyone is concerned about the need for procedures which may be used to ensure that federal government programs are managed economically and efficiently and that they are effective in meeting the stated requirements of government policies. The underlying intent of sections 7(2)(d) and (e) of Bill C-20 is to require the auditor general to comment on uneconomical and inefficient practices, and furthermore to comment on any absence of effective evaluation procedures, including reporting mechanisms, where he feels that such procedures could be beneficially applied.

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-20 is a good piece of legislation that should go a long way toward alleviating the anxieties of the public who are naturally concerned about the manner in which their taxes are spent. I can now unreservedly support the passing of Bill C-20, an act respecting the office of the auditor general.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, administration of finances is the pivot on which management of a household, a business, a hobby, recreation, or any function progresses or fails, depending on the desire and capability of the person or persons handling the funds. When the operation is strictly personal or a private venture, the impact is perhaps not serious—at least, the amount involved is small. When we come to the issue of government financial administration, the picture is entirely different: we are involved in the trustworthiness of government, which operates solely on the taxes it levies on the population of this country, a matter of grave importance, and huge amounts.

It is all very well to say the federal government is doing the job efficiently simply because we have an auditor general, but his authority comes into effect after the funds have been spent. Therefore, regardless of the degree of authority he has, he is placed is an unenviable situation. The auditor of government books must try to ensure the general public that their money has been used sensibly and that adequate value was received, but he does not have an opportunity of limiting the amount paid, or checking on what was received, until long afterward. At best, his scrutiny, diligence and findings can affect government operations in the ensuing year or in the future.

[Mr. Herbert.]

The auditor general is the individual our taxpayers rely on to restore common sense so that government spending will be controlled. The auditor general has said the finances of this government are practically out of control. What has the government done to correct such careless disregard of money which does not belong to it to squander? I am not aware of any serious intent or action on the part of the government to cut back or to curtail spending to legitimate projects, although I have heard and read many cabinet ministers boast of their restrictions. Perhaps they have succeeded in convincing some taxpayers that their efforts are sincere and the results positive, but those who are aware of this year's $7 billion budget deficit must have doubts.

The auditor general does not, of course, participate in the preparation of the federal budget, but he should have authority to ensure that every dollar is accounted for precisely, that it had to be spent, and that full value was returned. If he cannot inform the general public of what is taking place behind the scenes of government finances, who will?

When I speak of government, I do not exclude the operations of parliament itself, over which the auditor general does not have any say, before or after. Criticism was levelled at parliament by the news media when it became known that House of Commons' staff positions totalled 2,554 last year and now number 2,746, averaging more than ten for each member of parliament. One must not overlook the related expenditures, regardless of where the staff is located—furniture, equipment, stationery, salaries, etc. Only members of parliament, all elected representatives, can exercise restraint as far as this House is concerned. Everyone could and should do so, thereby setting an example. Somebody must start the ball of restraint moving in the right direction, and in my opinion Parliament Hill is the place to start the game.

Mr. Speaker, are Canadians better served by this out of control hoist in the cost of operating the House of Commons? Is it fair to criticize this government, or any level of government, for overspending or overgoverning if we are following the same trend like a flock of sheep moving to greener pastures? I realize that everyone in this House is responsible to his or her electors, but I doubt that any voter would criticize an elected representative for exercising restraint and explaining why and how this was accomplished. Every worthy cause or deed has a beginning, and that beginning could be small. Its size at the onset is not important, but how it grows in the right direction is. Would it not be far better to be admired for good management and sensible use of taxpayer dollars than to do something just because others are? Why not be different? Why not restrict spending right here on Parliament Hill where the laws are enacted?

Yesterday, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) drew attention to a dangerous statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when attending the recent Commonwealth Conference where he said there is such a thing as one-party democracy, a form of government with which he apparently agrees. If this is the philosophy of the Prime Minister of Canada, head of a government which has been in office for approximately 36 of the last 42 years, it is not difficult to see what is happening to our country, and why, with that kind of thinking. In other words, this government is not satisfied with a stranglehold over the country's economy, but has a goal to exercise its dictatorship over the very well-being of its population. The longer this is perpetuated, the greater the danger of sacrificing our destiny, Mr. Speaker.

Greed is at the root of all evil, or so it is said. Perhaps greed of power is the most dangerous of the countless forms of greed we know. This government, in its attempt to camouflage inept handling of public funds, and by its willingness to continue to waste and squander that never-ending source of supply through an inadequate bill, is an excellent example of abuse of power and its insatiable appetite to spend.

The responsibilities of the auditor general are onerous; his position is one of the most important within the federal government; he should not be hampered or muzzled, restricted or ignored while he is examining the books and after he has reported the results. My preference would be to permit the auditor general of Canada to be more responsible than this legislation specifies, by giving him the power and the tools which would enable him to certify the accounts of Canada, without reservation. To place his signature of approval on those accounts there must be legislation to allow it and to protect him and his position.

Mr. Speaker, I now come to the unacceptable policy of this government of making decisions by order in council, a method by which large amounts are spent without reference to parliament or to the auditor general. That system of government is really not democratic, for the simple reason that it is secret and never publicly revealed. If the cabinet insists on carrying out its responsibilities in that manner, there should be a clause in this bill authorizing the auditor general personally to scrutinize all moneys allocated by order in council.

Mr. Paproski: Blind faith.

Mr. Towers: Yes, as my hon. friend from Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) has just said, it is now a matter of blind faith. Otherwise, not only do MPs not know, but the source of those funds, the general public, are kept in the dark as well. Who pulls the string on the order in council purse? The auditor general has said his desire is to have the relationship of his office with the government cordial, but not cosy. Nobody would frown on cordiality, but I fear that the relationship could become both cordial and cosy, though not through the intent or actions of the auditor general. What is meant by the word "cordial"? Does it mean that officials within the department of the auditor general, many of whom are former senior employees of government with a direct line of communication to cabinet, can undermine the authority and aim of the auditor general through their cordiality? Can anyone, morally, serve two masters or are there two masters? Often a slip of the tongue during friendly, harmless conversation results in harm. Do such people sever all mental connections with former associates, business, social or otherwise? Would it be fair to expect that? Are they unconsciously influenced by their former occupation and automatic ties to government, and by their access to the orders in council which I mentioned earlier? Being human beings, we all have weaknesses and I understand it would not be easy for certain individuals to cut themselves off, so far as work is concerned, from their former attitudes and thinking while involved in government spending and decisions in one federal department or agency when they take on duties in the office of the auditor general. Can such personnel in fact detach their minds to the degree required so that they can efficiently perform their job and ably assist our auditor general?

● (1750)

An hon. Member: Keep going.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand that my colleague from Red Deer (Mr. Towers) has only a few more remarks to make, and in the interests of getting this legislation through would it be possible for him to conclude his remarks before we follow Black Rod to the other place?

Mr. Paproski: Or when we come back.

Mr. Speaker: There is nothing to prevent the hon. member concluding his remarks and possibly completing passage of the bill, without seeing the clock, when we return from the other place.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

● (1800)

[Translation]

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

Bill C-58, An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1978—Chapter No. 22.

Bill C-48, An Act to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act—Chapter No. 23.

Auditor General Act

Bill C-26, An Act respecting the organization of certain scientific activities of the Government of Canada—Chapter No. 24.

Bill C-50, An Act to amend the Judges Act and other Acts in respect of judicial matters—Chapter No. 25.

Bill C-46, An Act to amend the Aeronautics Act and the National Transportation Act—Chapter No. 26.

Bill C-3, An Act to amend the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act—Chapter No. 27.

Bill C-53, An Act to correct anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors and other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada 1970 and other Acts subsequent to 1970—Chapter No. 28.

Bill C-12, An Act to implement conventions between Canada and Morocco, Canada and Pakistan, Canada and Singapore, Canada and the Philippines, Canada and the Dominican Republic and Canada and Switzerland for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax—Chapter No. 29.

Bill C-4, An Act to amend the Canada Lands Surveys Acts—Chapter No. 30.

Bill C-6, An Act respecting Diplomatic and Consular Privileges and Immunities in Canada—Chapter No. 31.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

AUDITOR GENERAL ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING OFFICE OF AUDITOR GENERAL

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andras that Bill C-20, respecting the office of the Auditor General of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before we were interrupted, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) had almost concluded his remarks. I believe there is a disposition to allow the hon. member to complete his remarks, then to put the third reading motion.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We are agreeable to concluding the deliberation on third reading stage, the hon. member for Red Deer who is not here having, I understand, completed his blistering attack on the government.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to ask the acting government House leader what is to be the business for tomorrow.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, we intend to proceed tomorrow with the report stage of Bill C-51.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. Could the acting House leader say what is to happen with respect to Bill C-49, so that we know what is happening?

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, there has been the usual discussion concerning the business for today. We hoped that we could deal with the auditor general bill and the amendments to the Canada Pension Plan this afternoon. Unfortunately, that was not possible. We want to proceed at the earliest opportunity with consideration of the Canada Pension Plan amendments, but intend tomorrow to call Bill C-51.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I assume that on Monday we shall deal with Bill C-27, the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, as intended, and that Bill C-49 will not come forward until after next Monday.

Mr. Goodale: That is correct, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It will come on some time in July.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, July is not far off—one day.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being after six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

At 6.11 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 30, 1977

The House met at 11 a.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

HOURS OF SITTING TODAY

Mr. Goodale: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There have been discussions with regard to the hours the House should follow today, and I believe there is agreement to alter those hours. All members have, I think, been informed. I should like, therefore, to ask the Minister of Justice to move the appropriate motion.

Mr. Basford: As the parliamentary secretary has said, this motion arises from the usual discussions. I, therefore, move:

That on Thursday, June 30, 1977, the House shall take up private members' business between 4:00 p.m. and 5:00 p.m., and shall adjourn at 5:00 p.m.; and

That on Tuesday, July 5, 1977, and Thursday, July 7, 1977 the House shall sit from 11:00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m. to consider government bills.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: As the parliamentary secretary has said quite correctly, there have been discussions through the usual channels and we in the official opposition are agreeable to this proposal. I hope that some time later today an announcement can be made with respect to the business which is to be carried on. I understand that the New Democratic Party are anxious that Bill C-51 should not be considered during the extended hours next Tuesday.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions and we are prepared to agree with this change of hours, or this trade-off, in order that members can get to their constituencies tonight in time for the celebrations tomorrow. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar is quite correct: we have requested that during the extra sitting on Tuesday, between 11 a.m. and 1 p.m., Bill C-51 not be called, since one of our members is committed to attend the law of the sea conference. We will be satisfied with any other item of government business being called that morning. I believe it is already understood that we will be on Bill C-27 on Monday. Perhaps I can assume that we will continue with Bill C-27 on Tuesday morning.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Social Credit Party of Canada, we accept the decision of the leaders. Despite the fact that we were unable to take part in the discussion yesterday, for very important reasons, I am pleased to tell the House that we agree with the decision.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on the same point of order to ask the Minister of Justice about Bill C-51, whether it is coming up on Monday or not.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I am really uninstructed on that matter. Personally, I thought it was coming up on Monday, but I understand the House leader made some announcement and we are taking Bill C-27 on Monday. With regard to the business of the House both on Monday and for the extended hours on Tuesday, I presume that the House leader will be having discussions and making an announcement in the course of the day.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps that can be confirmed this afternoon when the House is here for the question period and the usual announcement is made. The House has heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, may I make one further brief point. I should like to make a correction to yesterday's Votes and Proceedings respecting the business for private members' hour today. It had been recorded in Votes and Proceedings that after we had dealt with the constituency change of names bill, and after we had dealt with Bill C-256, we would then use the balance of the hour to deal with motions for production of papers. I think there is agreement that we not do that, but that we simply deal with the first two items of business in the course of that hour. There has been an undertaking that we will move to motions for production of papers, particularly motion No. 15 standing in the name of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), at the earliest opportunity next week.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the parliamentary secretary a question? Certainly, I agree with the procedure being followed, but may I ask the parliamentary secretary whether consideration was given to my private member's bill, which is the next one to be called and which has been postponed by agreement on two occasions. If it is not called today, of course, it will very likely die with the session.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I will take up that point specifically. It would be our hope to call it before the session adjourns, but I will try and be more specific for the hon. member later in the day.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, since the bill deals with an amendment to the Broadcasting Act, and it is now very relevant and appropriate in light of the findings of the LaMarsh commission on violence on television, would the parliamentary secretary undertake to take this matter up with the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé), with whom I have also had consultations?

Mr. Goodale: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1977

AMENDMENTS TO CRIMINAL CODE

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-51, to amend the Criminal Code, the Customs Tariff, The Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act and the Prisons and Reformatories Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair has had an opportunity to examine in a cursory way all 39 motions standing on the order paper, and at this time is prepared to indicate that I do not see procedural difficulty in respect at least to the first 16 motions. In order to be sure that the House has ample business to occupy it for today, I would propose, as an initial recommendation, to group those first 16 motions for discussion, during which time I will have an opportunity to examine the remaining motions.

Motion No. 1, standing in the name of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil), is acceptable for debate and, if required, will be voted on separately. Motion No. 2, standing in the name of the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher), will be debated and voted on separately. Motions Nos. 3, 4, 5 and 6 could be grouped for debate and, if required, a vote on motion No. 3 would also dispose of motions No. 4, 5 and 6. Motions Nos. 7 and 10 can be grouped for debate, with a vote on motion No. 7 disposing of motion No. 10. Motions Nos. 8 and 9 should be grouped for debate, with a vote on motion No. 8 disposing of motion No. 9. Motion No. 11 would be debated and voted on separately. Motions Nos. 12, 13 and 14 could be grouped for debate, with a vote taken on motion No. 12 disposing of motions Nos. 13 and 14. Motions Nos. 15 and 16 would be grouped for debate, but voted on separately if required.

If there is any comment, I would be glad to hear it now.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I find nothing wrong with the grouping, but I should like to make one suggestion respecting my own amendments. I have four amendments relating to that part of the bill dealing with guns. Motions Nos. 6, 11 and 13 deal with onus and put the onus on the accused rather than on the Crown. If they were grouped, I would say it would be a proper package. I have discussed the matter with the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) and he has agreed with it. So dealing with my own amendments, Nos. 6, 11 and 13 can be grouped; and my motion No. 25, which deals with orders in council, can be debated separate and apart from the others.

May I also make this suggestion. The hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) is not here. I tried to contact him in his constituency this morning but was unable to reach him. Most of the amendments were moved at committee stage, and some were lost by eight to nine. I believe one may have been accepted by the minister if it had been phrased a little differently. Therefore, I ask that all the motions moved by the hon. member for Palliser stand for today. My motions and those of the hon. member for New Westminster are ready to proceed, as is that moved by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil). They would pretty well take most of the day. It may be that after some discussion the hon. member for Palliser may feel he extended himself a little in the number of amendments he is moving, and perhaps some will be withdrawn. I see the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) is here. If we run out of work, we could debate his amendments. But I ask that motions Nos. 6, 11 and 13 be called together.

In light of the fact that these are being grouped together, I would ask the House to give me a little longer than the usual 20 minutes, if necessary. I shall be making only one speech, but I will, of course, be dealing with three different parts of the bill. So far as the gun control provisions are concerned, I have really only two amendments; I am grouping three, and the other stands alone. I can deal with the wiretapping part of the bill later.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think we know what the hon. member wants, but he has been looking at Monday's order paper, and today is Thursday, so he has the wrong numbers. Instead of motion No. 6, I think the hon. member means motion No. 7. I believe his three motions are Nos. 7, 11 and 13.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I was reading Monday's order paper, which is when I did my homework, and I see the numbers are different on today's order paper. I believe the hon. member is right in that regard.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What are the numbers the hon. member wants?

• (1120)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In any case, if I understood the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), he included in his grouping motion No. 1 in the name of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil). If my understanding is not correct, would that be dealt with separately?

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, separately, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Therefore, the proposal is that motion No. 1 in the name of the hon. member for Moose Jaw would be dealt with separately, and when we come to motion No. 7, if that is the case, motions Nos. 7, 11 and 13 will be grouped.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Motions Nos. 7, 12 and 14.

Mr. Speaker: We will deal with that in a moment once the hon. member for Calgary North has had an opportunity to sort it out.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, it will be motions Nos. 7, 12 and 14, because the hon. member for Moose Jaw filed his motion a little later than we did, which moved ours down. If the hon. member for Moose Jaw wants to include No. 1 in his, that is fine with me. Otherwise, it remains the same as I have suggested.

Mr. Speaker: That being the case, we would begin with motion No. 1. Motion No. 2 will be debated and voted separately; then the grouping of motions Nos. 3, 4, 5 and 6 will be discussed. When we reach motion No. 7, it will include motions Nos. 12 and 14.

There is an application that motion No. 2 in the name of the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) be stood over until the hon. member can be here, which is reasonable under the circumstances. Motions Nos. 3, 4, 5 and 6 are in the name of the hon. member Palliser. Therefore, the proposal would be to deal with motion No. 1 in the name of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) and then to move directly to motion No. 7 in the name of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams).

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I should like to indicate, from my side, that that is agreeable—that the motions in the name of the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) be stood for the rest of the day until we next deal with this bill. Therefore, I agree with calling motion No. 1 and then proceeding with motion No. 7.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if photostatic copies of your notes could be distributed in order for us to do our own checking.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, that would be helpful and I would be happy to do so. We will arrange for that forthwith.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw) moved:

Motion No. 1.

June 28, 1977,—That Bill C-51, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Customs Tariff, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act and the Prisons and Reformatories Act, be amended in clause 3 by striking out lines 47 to 49 at page 3 and lines 1 to 8 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"(b) any firearm that is designed or adapted to be fired when reduced to a length of less than twenty six inches by folding, telescoping or otherwise,".

He said: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments in connection with this amendment. Effectively, what it provides for is to remove subsection (b)(i) and renumber (b)(ii) as (b). Subsection (b)(i) reads as follows:

(b) any firearm that

(i) is not a prohibited weapon, has barrel that is less than 18½ inches in length and is capable of discharging centre-fire ammunition in a semi-automatic manner, or—

The reason for this amendment was set forth very well in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, which can be found in issue No. 18 dated June 2, 1977. I should like to refer to what Mr. L. H. Nicholson, the chairman of the firearms legislation committee, said at page 18:8, which reads as follows:

The next item is the definition of "restricted weapon". This is a new definition of a restricted weapon. It would include one that is semi-automatic or self-loading, discharges centre-five ammunition and has a barrel under 18.5 inches in length. It is understood that the purpose here is to provide some control over the M-1 carbine, an arm now favoured by criminals, but unfortunately it also covers other makes and other models in significant numbers now used by good citizens in hunting. The change proposed will prevent the further use of these firearms and it will cause a substantial loss to the present owners because they can no longer use them for hunting. The provision is therefore strongly opposed. As to the makes and models to which I refer and their numbers, I have some further information if it is of interest to the committee.

At page 18:16 the committee report indicates Mr. Nicholson referring to various rifles. He spoke about the Armalite AR180, sporter carbine, 18¼-inch barrel; the Rouger Mini 14, .223 calibre, 18-3/8—inch barrel; the Universal 1,000 auto-loading carbine, 18-inch barrel; the Plainfield carbine, .223 calibre, 18-inch barrel; the Hand R ultra-carbine, various calibres, 18-inch barrel; and the Savage auto-loading carbine, .22 rimfire, 16.5-inch barrel. He continued by saying, "I could go on; I have another half dozen."

There are numerous guns with barrel lengths that are under the 18½-inches referred to in this subsection. If this subsection is passed, it will mean that many people throughout Canada will have rifles which will immediately become restricted weapons. These people have had these guns in their possession for many years and have used them when partaking in sports and hunting. To bring in this particular clause would have the effect of putting all these people in a position where they are breaking the law, which is not the intention of the legislation. I am advised by the Saskatchewan Wildlife Federation that in many instances people have rifles with barrel lengths slightly over 18½ inches. If they damage the muzzles of those guns, they have to be taken to a gunsmith to be worked on, and they end up with barrels of less than 18½ inches and therefore would fall within this particular section.

The attempts to restrict the use of the M1 carbine can certainly be carried out by subsection (d) on page 4 of Bill C-51, which reads as follows:

—a weapon of any kind, not being a prohibited weapon or a shotgun or rifle of a kind that, in the opinion of the governor in council, is reasonable for use in Canada for hunting or sporting purposes, that is declared by order of the governor in council to be a restricted weapon.

It seems to me that under subsection (d) the governor in council could make the necessary order restricting the weapons it desires to restrict, thus leaving the hunter and the sportsman free to own, possess and use the guns to which I have referred. I am not happy with any legislation, particularly in the Criminal Code, which gives the governor in council the right to pass legislation which is never debated in this House. In this instance, subsection (d) is in the Criminal Code at the present time and it is adequate for our purposes. Therefore, I would ask that this House support my amendment.

I hope that the governor in council, in making use of subclause (d), will make the necessary arrangements, prior to enacting regulations, to have consultations with the various wildlife organizations and sporting groups so that they are aware of the weapons that are being restricted. I ask that hon. members support my amendment.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I support the amendment of my colleague, the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil). I know a considerable number of people who own carbines. In fact, I have one myself which I received many years ago. I have not measured the barrel, but I suspect it is somewhat less and would probably fall into this category. It is hard to imagine it being more dangerous than any other weapon. In fact, if a weapon is longer than 18½ inches, it could be sawed-off by anyone who wished to use it as a criminal weapon.

As I understand the legislation, the government wants control over the M1 carbine. However, I believe that any weapon should be put into the pre-emptive weapon code by order in council. It should be placed there as a restricted weapon, rather than a blanket provision cutting out all guns that fall under this classification. To outlaw all of these guns is not the best way to approach this problem, particularly when vast numbers are already in the hands of people. This is a popular sporting weapon. Presumably, if you have a gun 19 inches in length, it would fall within the legal category. The carbine is an easy gun for a sportsman to carry. I have found it extremely easy to carry. It is a very popular gun. It is light, and it is good in dense bush.

If a particular weapon is being used extensively by criminals, the best way to deal with that problem would be through subclause (d). I strongly suspect there would then be more co-operation from the sporting groups. This could be publicized through wildlife groups which encompass almost everyone in the sporting field. It would be given wide publicity that it is a prohibited weapon. By taking the public more into its confidence, there would be a better law.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to go on record as supporting the amendment of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil). I have received many representations from constituents regarding the length of the gun barrel. I strongly support the hon. member's argument that in many instances, due to lack of accuracy of guns, one-quarter to one half-inch is taken off at the muzzle. This usually causes some damage at the muzzle. The best way for a gunsmith to repair the damage and the accuracy is to shorten the barrel, probably by less than one inch. That makes it an illegal weapon under this act. In most cases, these guns have been in the hands of the family for years. Immediately placing them on the restricted list will prove a hardship.

This points out the whole scope of this type of regulation or law which the government of Canada tries to bring in that deal with gun control. It is very easy to bring forward such laws, but very difficult to make them do what they are supposed to do. Any law to control guns in Canada must be aimed at the criminal element. This is where the problem usually begins. The Liberal government is trying to bring in some kind of gun control that will control guns in the hands of people whom they believe should not have them. I do not know how they will be able to do that in a responsible manner. Those they are aiming at, people who use guns as weapons for their defence, in anger or other uses, will get these guns, at any rate, in one way or another. I agree with the hon. member for Moose Jaw that trying to control the M1 carbine should be done under subclause (d). It should not be done by taking away from responsible people in Canada something that they have not used in a criminal or irresponsible manner but have kept in good working condition.

When you look at the bill, you see that all the gun control is being done by regulation. It is all done by order in council. That is one reason so many people in Canada are up-tight about this bill. Nothing is really spelled out other than a few areas such as regulating the length of the barrel. I do not think we want to pass laws in this House that will make criminals out of people. It is very honourable to pass laws which attempt to control the criminal element—an element in Canada that needs a lot of control. It is unfortunate that we have them and that they have to be controlled. I do not really believe that we should be making laws that make criminals out of innocent people. I am referring to people who have cut down the length of the barrel of their guns to improve the accuracy of their shooting or to repair a damaged muzzle.

I know that it does not destroy a gun to shorten the length of the barrel but, rather, makes for more accurate shooting. We are talking here about changing a section so as to allow people to make changes to their M1 carbines, and I hope we will not pass this section as it stands, which would make criminals out of innocent people. Some people might not even know that such a law has been passed by the House of Commons in Ottawa and that their rifles are illegal under the new regulations. The barrel of the rifle could have been shortened years ago by someone in the family, and the gun handed down in the family. Suddenly, a regulation is passed in Ottawa and the fact that the gun had been shortened by a quarter of an inch, half an inch, or even one inch, makes the owner a criminal. We know what happens to people who are in trouble with the law.

The people we want to control are those who are deliberately out to break the law, who do not respect the law. There can be a larger number of rifles in the possession of innocent people who will find themselves in contravention of the law as a result of this section of the act. That is the reason I strongly support the amendment of the hon. member for Moose Jaw.

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a comment or two on this clause. I certainly support the amendment which has been proposed by my colleague. An amazing feature of this legislation is that while the government is generally moving towards a softer attitude with regard to the laws and lesser penalties for illegal activities, we now come face to face with a clause in the bill which, as my colleague, the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker), has said, makes criminals out of honest citizens and then subjects them to penalties that are in many instances very severe.

So I have a great deal of difficulty in reconciling the various positions taken by this government. I have almost given up trying to reconcile the government's policies because they are so contradictory, so unreasonable, that in many respects one reaches the point of throwing up one's hands and saying, "What is the use? They do not know what they are doing. They do not know how to handle the situation. They let on they have all the answers, and then they turn around and tell us they do not have the answers and ask us for suggestions". Then, when the opposition makes proposals, they reject them out of hand.

The whole thing is a horrible mess so far as this government is concerned. We know that the legislation which was introduced initially stirred up a great deal of resentment across the country, so much so in fact that the government had to bend and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) had to pull in his horns and take another look at the situation. Whoever drafted the legislation did not seem to have any sense or reason. It was so trivial in many respects that it was just a joke. So the government felt it had to remove some of these inconsistencies and absurdities. But we still have this bill before us which will make criminals out of honest, law-abiding citizens who for many years have had certain weapons in their possession and, having found themselves in circumstances where they were out of line a little bit, have been convicted and have had a penalty imposed upon them as a result of these new laws.

It seems to me that the proposition which has been advanced by my colleague is reasonable. He proposes that this matter be dealt with under another section of the act. I think that is perfectly reasonable. Surely, in considering a bill that has stirred up such a great deal of animosity, bitterness and resentment across the country, reason will prevail and the minister will agree to accede to the proposal of my colleague and will accept it.

No matter what amendments we make to the bill, it is a stupid bill—there is no question about that. The problem could be dealt with in other ways. On the basis of reason alone, I believe that an accommodation should be made by the minister and that this amendment should be accepted. Again I say that many aspects of the bill are repugnant because they encroach upon the freedoms and rights which people have enjoyed down through the years. The minister has acknowledged that this will have no effect on the criminal element in the country. I suppose he is looking for more scapegoats and he will turn against the law-abiding citizens of this country. I suggest that he should accept the amendment.

Criminal Code

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this amendment to a clause which has been considered very thoroughly and carefully ever since the introduction of Bill C-83, over a year ago. The question is the limiting in the statute of high-powered, rapid-fire weapons with a barrel length of less than 18½ inches. I think that when we are looking at matters of gun control we have to weigh and to balance the public interest against private interests. As I have said, we considered this matter very carefully with firearm experts in the RCMP and others.

Recently, even subsequent to the bill being reported from committee, I met with Colonel Nicholson of the Canadian Wildlife Federation. He came to me on this issue and pressed his case and the case of those who wanted this amendment. As a result of Colonel Nicholson's further visit, I re-examined the whole situation as late as last Thursday and Friday, and in my view the legislation as proposed should stand.

The purpose of this provision is to restrict rapid-fire, concealable weapons. Obviously, a weapon with a short barrel length is easily concealable under a raincoat or a trench coat if the stock has been sawed off. Police records indicate that a large number of short-barrelled guns are being used for criminal purposes. The M1 was developed during the Second World War as a personnel stopper. The AR-15 was designed and produced for use in the Vietnam war and these guns are now being used widely by criminal elements in the United States and in this country. Therefore, as a matter of public policy it seems to me that we should endeavour to restrict their availability and use in Canada as much as possible.

It would be contrary to the rules, but I wish I could bring into the House the kinds of guns we are talking about. I did show those guns to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and I think the committee was impressed by what we were talking about.

I met very recently with the Kelowna District Fish and Game Club. I showed its members the kinds of guns we are talking about. Once they knew the kinds of guns involved, they supported this bill and this proposal to restrict semi-automatic, centre-fire rifles of barrel lengths of less than 18½ inches. I have examined gun catalogues. I examined the list Colonel Nicholson produced to the committee. The list submitted included short-barrelled .22s which are not restricted under this provision. It included a number of weapons that by no conceivable definition could be considered hunting weapons. The Plainfield Machine Company carbine has a collapsible stock. It was designed as a military weapon and it is ideal for criminal purposes, but quite unsuitable for sporting purposes. If hon. members were able to see pictures of such weapons, let alone the guns themselves, I think they would readily agree that these really have no proper public use in this country.

With regard to the aspect of hunting, I point out to hon. members that last month in Saskatoon there was a meeting of the association of provincial hunter-safety training co-ordinators. This association is composed of provincial officers who operate within the ministries of natural resources and tourism or their counterparts in each of the provinces, and those officers are responsible for the development of gun safety programs and their operations in the provinces.

It was the unanimous view of the provincial administrators of gun safety programs that this type of provision should be in the law and that it should be supported. I refer to the restriction of less than 18½-inch, rapid-fire or semi-automatic centre-fire weapons. I suggest that there is no proper hunting use for these guns. That was the view of the provincial administrators. Many of these guns are of low calibre and would wound more deer than they would ever kill. Some of them are quite inaccurate in terms of target. They are not good shooting weapons. I could bring before the House a stack of textbooks on rifles and guns indicating that these particular weapons serve no useful hunting purpose.

I want to make it clear that for sporting purposes the present owners of these guns will be able to register them and use them for sporting purposes, that is, for target purposes as part of the regular activities of game clubs. However, when we consider the fact that these weapons are not suitable hunting weapons, and when we consider that they are widely used for criminal purposes and are ideal for criminal purposes, I think we should resist this amendment and implement this provision in the bill.

Hon. members have suggested that we should do this by regulation, but I resist that. Some have criticized this bill by saying it has too many regulations, but in the committee I think we were able to show that the regulatory power under this bill is much more restricted than it was in Bill C-83. The problem with accepting the suggestion of the hon. member from the Okanagan would be that the governor in council would be restricting specific types and names of rifles, and in a very short time neither gun dealers, gun owners, nor the police would know which guns are restricted and which are not.

The demand over the last year has been that there be as great a degree of certainty as possible so that gun owners, gun dealers and the police will know what is legal and what is not, what is restricted and what is not, and what is prohibited and what is not. If we were to accept the suggestions of the hon. member and deal with short-barrelled guns by way of regulation, I submit that in a very short time there would be very great confusion as to which guns were restricted and which guns were not. I do not think gun owners or the police want that result, and I submit that on reflection hon. members would not want it either.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would accept a question.

Mr. Basford: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Neil: The minister is probably aware that the Canadian Wildlife Federation and the Saskatchewan Wildlife Federation are opposed to this amendment because it would result in many thousands of people having in their possession restricted weapons after this bill is passed. Does the minister have any statistics to indicate how many of these weapons have been used in the commission of crimes? I am not talking about professional criminals.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I do not have that statistic here in the House. I am advised that they are widely used by criminals in this country and in the United States, but I do not have the statistics to cover that point. One need only recall the picture which appeared in the international press of Patty Hearst robbing the bank—it was probably the most photographed robbery in the world—and she was using a weapon of this type.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would admit that regardless of any regulation or prohibition, the professional criminal will always be able to get handguns, rifles and weapons of any kind?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, to a certain extent I have always conceded that, but I have also said that the more a law is certain, and the more the police can be certain what is restricted and what is not, then if they come across a criminal who is not committing a crime but is in possession of a weapon, they are better able to deal with the situation on the spot. It is also easier for customs officials to deal with shipments, and it is easier for gun dealers to know what they can import and sell than when there is a lack of certainty. If this amendment were accepted and the weapons were restricted by powers of regulation, there would be uncertainty for customs officers, dealers and gun owners.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister. In his response to the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil), the minister referred to semi-automatic weapons. When he referred to the statistics available regarding the number of sawed-off weapons, I wonder if he was talking about such weapons as the AR-15, a type of semi-automatic weapon, or whether he was putting the emphasis on sawed-off hunting rifles and sawed-off shotguns of the Lupara variety. Is he putting emphasis on the sawed-off shotgun, rifle or semi-automatic weapon?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the amendment is clear: it is aimed at short-barrelled, semi-automatic, centre-fire rifles.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The question is on motion No. 1 in the name of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil). All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred. It is my understanding that motions Nos. 7, 12 and 14 were to be debated, but that this has been changed and motions Nos. 7 and 28 will be debated now and that a vote on motion No. 7 will dispose of motion No. 28. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Agreed, and so ordered.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North) moved:

Motion No. 7.

That Bill C-51, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Customs Tariff, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act and the Prisons and Reformatories Act, be amended in clause 3 by striking out lines 41 to 44 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"(b) a peace officer or public officer"—

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North) moved:

Motion No. 28.

That Bill C-51, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Customs Tariff, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act and the Prisons and Reformatories Act, be amended in clause 3 by adding immediately after line 33 at page 43 the following:

"(2) Every order in council, regulation or form made under this act shall be laid before parliament within fifteen days after the order in council, regulation or form, as the case may be, is made or, if parliament is not then in session, within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof and every order in council, regulation, or form shall be subject to affirmative resolution of parliament and shall not come into force until published in the Canada Gazette."

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is correct that motions Nos. 7 and 28 will be discussed together. These deal with the question of legislating criminal law by order in council. In reply to the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) claimed that Bill C-51 is better than three bills because there are fewer orders in council. His argument, apparently, is that if Bill C-83 proposes 1,000 new laws by order in council, and Bill C-51 proposes only about 100, it is therefore better. When dealing with criminal law, Mr. Speaker, I say it is wrong to legislate by order in council. I know that in most legislation it is necessary to provide for orders in council in relation to administrative matters, but criminal law should be precise and concise so that people know what it is. This government has exhibited a growing tendency to extend the power of the executive over parliament.

On May 11 this year I pointed out that in 1976, 3,326 orders in council were passed, but only 653 were published in the Canada Gazette. How can we possibly know we are breaking the law if we do not know what it is—if it never gets published? Clause 3 of the bill provides for the appointment of peace officers and public officers to perform certain duties by order in council. That is the casual group. I suggest that is wrong, and motion No. 7 would amend clause 3 by striking out lines 42 to 44. The relevant part of motion No. 28 reads:

—order in council, regulation or form, as the case may be, is made or, if parliament is not then in session, within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof and every order in council, regulation or form shall be subject to affirmative resolution of Parliament and shall not come into force until published in the Canada Gazette.

After days and days of debate on Bill C-83, I asked the minister and the former solicitor general if they would agree to a similar amendment. They agreed to the amendment in substance, but it died on the order paper. There is a tendency in this government today, which makes people uneasy, to do everything in cabinet and bypass parliament. When dealing with the Criminal Code, surely the law should be legislated in a precise and concise manner.

Mr. Speaker, I want to put something on the record that has always impressed me. I have not been a great student of political science, but I should like to refer to a quotation of the late William Lyon Mackenzie King when he sat in opposition to the Conservative government led by the late R. B. Bennett. On one occasion he said:

Now let us come to another point which I wish particularly to stress. I refer to the right set out in Magna Carta that no man shall be disposed of his rights without the lawful judgment of his peers under the law of the land; not the law as made by the governor in council, not the law as made by some unnamed and as yet unexisting body, but the law of the land as known to everyone. It is an essential principle of liberty and freedom that the law of the land should be known, that it should be so known that every man as he runs may read. The law should not be something which is to make its appearance in the Canada Gazette after some board or governor in council, not parliament, has passed a regulation; it is something that should appear in the statutes of the country.

It is too bad Mackenzie King is not here, and too bad his ghost does not walk Parliament Hill.

An hon. Member: How do you know it doesn't?

Mr. Woolliams: I have heard his ghost walks somewhere.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Where have you been? Haven't you seen it?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): We already have too many ghosts around here.

Mr. Woolliams: My hon. friends opposite are excited. They wouldn't like to meet Mackenzie King.

Mr. Stanfield: Or his ghost.

Mr. Woolliams: They know what they are doing, giving power to the executive to bypass parliament. People talk of Trudeaumania. They should call it Trudeauphobia, because power is the name of the game. The party opposite is power hungry. As Mackenzie King said, all should know the law of the land. It should not be made by some unnamed or non-existent body. Mr. Speaker, since the Trudeau government took office we have had several solicitors general. They change, and as new men take on the job they change the law secretly, at night, while Canadians sleep.

Mr. Paproski: They change it from crisis to crisis.

Mr. Woolliams: That is correct. As Mackenzie King said, it is an essential principle of liberty and freedom that the law of the land should be known. We are entitled to know the law. The minister said the police must know what weapons are prohibited. I would be far happier if ordinary people knew what weapons are prohibited or restricted. On Monday, I am perfectly entitled to go hunting with my gun. Its possession and use is legal. On Tuesday, its possession and use is illegal. Why? Some unknown body has passed a law in the middle of the night, as it were—and the government would allow this. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has established his image across the country as a crusader for freedom of information. We are proud of his image and hope his crusade succeeds. I hope the government was making sincere proposals in the Speech from the Throne and will introduce legislation along the lines suggested by that crusader from Peace River.

Mr. Brisco: More than likely it was a put-on.

Mr. Woolliams: I hope it was more than that. If ever an amendment to a bill deserves the support of parliament, it is this one—because the government has a majority: it thinks it can do as it wants. Mr. Speaker, all governments come and go, but the principle of the rule of law remains. I say, inasmuch as 3,300 orders in council were passed, but only 600 published, Canada is in a sorry state. My remarks apply not only to this bill; they apply also to the human rights bill, the immigration bill, and others. This House grinds out bills like a legislative mill. In this case, parliament is erecting the frame of the House, but the executive will put on the siding and roof.

Parliament will legislate power for the executive to make laws while Canadians sleep. Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with a serious subject, the criminal law affecting the rights and liberties of the individual. I never thought I would see the day when a provincial legislator would be jailed for his refusal to divulge information. That was shocking. You cannot do your job without information. Sometimes you must get it surreptitiously because you cannot pry it out of this government. What happened to that legislation could happen to any Canadian on the strength of an order in council passed in secret.

I expect the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) remembers the time when this House debated a spy inquiry which involved certain civil servants. It was alleged that there was no law to cover the matter, and the minister of justice of the day passed an order in council whereby people were incarcerated. Lights in their cells were left burning. That minister said it was an emergency and passed the order in council. Surely there is no emergency so great that we can put in jeopardy the rights and freedom of the individual, as certain dictators in Europe did. You cannot put them in jeopardy by passing an order in council. Therein lies the great danger of this bill.

I want parliament to debate such orders in council; to examine them. That is why I propose my amendments. The first of them concerns the appointment of peace officers by order in council. Perhaps the point is not too serious, although the Casal group appearing before the committee wanted that provision changed. I ask hon. members to support motion No. 28 which will provide for orders in council relating to the criminal law to be brought before parliament.

Before I sit down, let me make one more point. Many people wrote to the chairman of our committee and to me asking for the opportunity to testify on this bill. I do not know why there was such a great rush in pushing this bill through committee. Sometimes we sat from early morning to late at night, but most people were denied the opportunity to testify. The Committee heard several small groups. The Advocate Society of Upper Canada, including benchers of Ontario, appeared before the committee. We listened to Messrs. Chappell, Cartwright and Cooper, distinguished scholars all from Toronto. They warned the government of the consequences of amending the criminal law as the bill proposes. I shall have more to say later about the invasion of privacy provisions, which are a disgrace. I am asking parliament, in a non-partisan way, to examine seriously how the government intends to enact criminal law by order in council passed by some unnamed body or unnamed person perhaps some time in future. It may be my lot to be that person, but I do not want that responsibility. I want Canadians to know where they stand. I want our law-abiding citizens to be protected by the law and to know the law. Because if they do not know the law, how do they know they are breaking it?

I will say no more lest I should undo my own case—which has happened in the past. I think my case is strong; I have tried to make it sincerely and intelligently. As a practising member of the Saskatchewan and the Alberta bars of 30 years standing, and as a trial lawyer, I know how these things work. I have defended people charged with contravening the wartime prices and trade regulations at a time when orders in council were ground out by the thousand and nobody could be certain of the law. People were brought before the bar of justice and tried for offences that nobody knew existed. That is why the learned judges saw fit to require that before a conviction was possible, the order in council concerned must be filed as part of the evidence. I ask the minister to reconsider and repent in reference to this matter.

● (1220)

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Perhaps I might take a few moments in which to deal with both these proposed amendments. The first is motion No. 7 which would change the meaning of "peace officer". The definition in the bill was put there at the expressed request of a number of provincial attorneys general who wished to restrict the general Criminal Code meaning of "peace officer" which includes deputy sheriffs, justices of the peace and others. Under the Criminal Code as it currently reads, provincial attorneys general have no authority to limit the ability of these people to carry side-arms. I am responding to the expressed request of a number of attorneys general in the amendment I am proposing. After all, they are the chief law enforcement officers in their provinces, and I believe it is incumbent upon this House to take their representations into account. The amendment of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) would go contrary to the expressed request of the provincial attorneys general.

With regard to motion No. 28, the one which I believe the hon. member regards as being more important, I would say, first of all, that is was moved in committee and debated there and that the hon. member for Calgary North could not carry even his own members on that one. For example, there was disagreement on the part of the distinguished co-chairman of the standing committee on statutory instruments. As hon. members know, all regulations passed by the governor in council stands permanently referred to the committee on statutory instruments for examination. That committee published an excellent report some time ago calling attention to improvements which should be made in the process of delegating legislation, its examination, and so on. Some of those recommendations have been accepted and the government is working on others. However, the responsibility for dealing with this matter lies, surely, with the statutory instruments committee, and our attention should be directed toward improving the processes followed in the examination and supervision of statutory instruments.

I must resist this amendment as a matter of principle. It was on this ground that it was not supported in the committee by the co-chairman of the statutory instruments committee. It would require that every order in council not only be laid before the House—I do not think there would be any great objection to that—but that it should be the subject of an affirmative resolution. I take this to mean that every order in council passed under the Criminal Code would have to be debated in the House. I see an hon. member shaking his head. He had better read the amendment carefully, because that is what it provides. This is a process of supervising regulations which has not even been suggested by the statutory instruments committee, a body which has a very deep and conscientious interest in this matter.

Mr. Woolliams: May I rise on a question of privilege? I know the Minister of Justice has not done this deliberately, but he has misquoted me. I said, "Every order in council made under this act", meaning Bill C-51, the amendments to the Criminal Code. I was not dealing with the regulations made under all statutes. I would ask the minister to make that point clear.

Mr. Basford: I am sorry. I was not trying to mislead the House. I meant to say, "under the Criminal Code", and I thought I had done so. In drawing up Bill C-51 we were conscious of the criticism which had been raised to the effect that there were too many areas covered by regulation. I believe that any impartial examiner of Bill C-51 would agree with me now that we have markedly reduced the areas of regulation and that the bulk of the regulations to be passed will relate to dealers and manufacturers. As I explained in committee, it is proposed to appoint chief provincial fire-arms officers who would become part of a national advisory committee to which would be attached representatives of the dealers and the gun sports. I have undertaken expressly to consult with this committee on the drawing up and making of the regulations. This, in my view, is an effective way of dealing with the matter. It would seem to me that these arrangements, together with the safeguards provided by the normal processes of the statutory instruments committee, are sufficient to meet the hon. member's objections. Provision is made for input into regulation-making by those interested in gun sports and in the sale of guns, while the work of the statutory instruments committee ensures that the Bill of Rights applies to all these regulations, together with some 18 other considerations which the committee takes into account.

I indicated last week that most of the regulatory power relates to dealers. We have already consulted the Retail Merchants Association, the Transport Association, the Association of Hardware Merchants, and others concerned with those parts of the bill which will be affected by regulation. They have indicated no objection to the provisions of this bill and appear to be satisfied with my undertaking as to the nature of the consultative process to be engaged in. If there is concern about regulatory powers generally, it should be expressed in the debate on the report which the statutory instruments committee published some time ago, and efforts should be made to ensure that the processes followed by that committee are as satisfactory as possible.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) says he resists these amendments. Well, he resists all amendments or requirements of a nature calculated to restrict the severity of legislation. I do not say this of him personally. It is an attitude he takes in his official capacity. He tells us that the provincial attorneys general have been consulted and have made suggestions. I agree there should be consultation with the attorneys general and that consideration should be given to their points of view. But in some ways they are interested parties, and in the final analysis what has to be taken into account are the views of members of this House. Theoretically, we should be involved. As I recall it, the opening words of the statute are, "Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and the House of Commons"—not, "Her Majesty by and with the advice and consent of the attorneys general of the provinces of Canada".

The minister made a very reasonable attempt to rebut the proposition advanced by my eloquent and learned friend from Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). He said that this is just a little entry that we are making, through the use of orders in council, regulations and delegated authority, to the criminal law. But it is from these little things, Mr. Speaker, that great ones grow. My reading of history tells me that during the First World War an act was brought in known as the Temporary War Income Tax Act. That has grown into one of the greatest monsters with the capacity to eat up so much of the economy of this country. The Temporary War Income Tax Act of 1914 or 1915 has become something which today probably not more than a dozen people in Canada readily understand.

This small beginning, this small entry to the Criminal Code through the use of orders in council and regulations which the Minister of Justice talks about, would, I suggest, if allowed to go unchecked, ten years from now amount to something which, as my hon. friend from Calgary North said, would mean we are legislating by order in council and by delegated authority a large part of our criminal law. As a matter of fact, with the powers the government now has in using governor general's warrants, orders in council, the War Measures Act if necessary, the Anti-Inflation Board, this parliament would not need to meet at all were it not for the fact that the constitution says parliament has to meet. So I am concerned about this trend.

Having said that, I suggest to the Minister of Justice that he examine the recent testimony which was given in the last two or three days by Sir Robert Speed, the very learned, eloquent and able member of what I might call the establishment of the House of Commons at Westminster, who has had great experience of this whole question of orders in council. The Minister of Justice will be derelict in his duty if he does not read that evidence in the very near future. I see the minister is not listening to me, so I will just continue my remarks and put them on record.

I had the pleasure of meeting Sir Robert Speed some ten years ago when this whole process of statutory instruments was being initiated here. I met him following discussions with the then Prime Minister, the late Mr. Pearson, having had an indication that Mr. Pearson was at least willing to consider some amendments to the statute law of this land to permit the House to take cognizance of the serious problem created by the undue use of orders in council. I was present at two or three meetings of the scrutiny committee in the United Kingdom and observed the very reasonable way in which they dealt with this whole question.

There had developed in the bureaucracy in the United Kingdom an equally reasonable response; in a great many instances all that was necessary was for Sir Robert Speed, who was counsel to the scrutiny committee, to pick up the telephone and to say, "Look, Mr. Parliamentary Secretary, I have just seen a number of orders in council that you are proposing to pass, and I want to point out some mistakes in them." For example, they had an unusual or unexpected impact, or were contrary to natural justice, or they had a retroactive effect, or they were not consistent with the enabling powers in the statute. In 90 per cent of the cases, after reasonable discussion those orders in council were brought into conformity with the enabling statute. When the scrutiny committee of the House of Commons—which is now a joint committee, by the way—was advised of the real facts, an arrangement was made.

I was also very fascinated by what Sir Robert Speed told us just two days ago, namely, that in most instances the right to enact orders in council for subordinate legislative purposes is usually accompanied by the introduction into the bill of the negative or affirmative resolution principle. The Minister of Justice knows that this proposal is contained in the second report of the statutory instruments committee, and I think it would have a very salutary effect. Indeed, the House is indebted to the hon. member for Calgary North for putting forward this idea at the present time.

Our distinguished visitor from Britain also mentioned that in the majority of cases, I think he said, statutory instruments are subject either to an affirmative or a negative resolution. Consequently, a great deal more care is taken by those who draft orders in council to ensure that they meet the purposes which the act designated for them, that they are consistent with the principles of natural justice, and that they do not give greater authority to the executive and the bureaucrats than they should.

After all, Mr. Speaker, if a bureaucrat who is designated to draft an order in council under a statute is aware that within two or three months the order in council would be subject to very searching scrutiny by men and women of the House of Commons and House of Lords who have been engaged upon the task for some time, he will attempt to see to it that the order in council meets the proper criteria. Because of this, counsel for Mr. Speaker in the United Kingdom told us there are fewer and fewer cases of statutory instruments being made subject to motions to set them aside or change them—what they call in England "prayers".

This is all my hon. friend from Calgary North is asking. Since the government is determined to incorporate into the criminal law the right to change, alter or add criminal law by means of order in council, then for heaven's sake this essential safeguard must be included in the law so that a committee of the House of Commons and the Senate have the right to scrutinize the order in council before it becomes law by way of an affirmative resolution of the House.

There are a number of cases where it would be exceedingly dangerous to change the criminal law before a committee of the House, and then finally parliament itself, had been given the chance to express approval or disapproval. This parliament has never shown itself to be unnecessarily vigilant in this regard, but as a member of parliament and as a member of the bar for many years I would be most unhappy about giving public servants of any government the right to make substantive law or to vary law having to do with criminal proceedings by order in council unless that process were first checked either by committee or by the House.

The minister should take the time to read the evidence which was presented before the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments last week. He should examine also what Sir Robert Speed said as to the practice, situation and circumstances in England. Surely we would be foolish not to follow the course adopted there, particularly when one considers the number of years this subject has been dealt with in England.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the amendment before us. I have a couple of questions which perhaps could be answered by the mover. The proposed amendment makes a great deal of sense, particularly in terms of using orders in council in the criminal law. One of my reservations is that under the question of declaring a weapon prohibited there may be some emergency if there is a sudden proliferation of that particular weapon in the country. That may be something of an ongoing danger. But that problem can be cured by the passage of the order in council, publication in the Canada Gazette, which would make it law at that point, and then the submission of the order in council to parliament. My only reservation with regard to the proposal of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) is with respect to an emergency situation. But that is curable under the terms of the wording itself. The principle he and other hon. members have put forward, of not allowing the government to change the law without parliamentary review, is fundamental to the system under which we live. This amendment is so important to that particular system that I can speak on behalf of my entire party by saying that we wholeheartedly support the change proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North.

Operating in a majority position, the government feels it can do anything with regard to the law. The more order in council provisions we put into the law, the less democracy there will be in this country. We represent ordinary people and not people who have access to the law, and we should have the opportunity of reviewing these orders in council and regulations in this place in order to provide a check on that matter.

As I have said, I have a minor reservation about the problem of an emergency situation with a dangerous weapon proliferating in the country. But within the reading of motion No. 28, the hon. member for Calgary North has answered that reservation. The order in council could pass and still be placed before this House in order for us to solve the problem and to have the kind of review which is necessary. I am happy to rise in support of this most excellent amendment.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, there have been occasions in the past when I have reflected on why we as a family have had occasion to retain the services of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) in his private capacity.

Mr. Leggatt: How much did he charge?

Mr. Brisco: Having listened to the hon. member today, I am thoroughly convinced that I made the right decision. Fortunately, it has never been a case of criminal law. However, there are some areas in this debate upon which I should like to comment. As a backbencher, I am concerned that a senior statesman of this parliament, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), would stand and speak on a matter which has given him a great deal of agony and concern. Above all others, he has become an expert in this field. Hon. members of this House who paid close attention to his remarks were backbenchers. It is unfortunate the minister is so occupied with this bill. He may speak next week after having read Hansard, particularly the comments of the hon. member for Peace River. In any event, it is disturbing that the minister did not concentrate on the statements made by the hon. member for Peace River.

There is provision in this bill to determine a class of peace officer or public officer prescribed by the regulations. I am not concerned only with the fact that it is by regulation; I am concerned with one person's, department's or province's interpretation of a public officer as opposed to another. The criteria may not be the same as far as the standard and quality required, the intelligence, balance and reason needed by someone who is given the responsibility of that role. Added to that is the opportunity to carry a sidearm which may not be uniform across this country.

When I was a student working my way through college, I had an opportunity to be employed by a detective agency, the name of which I will leave unmentioned. I was given a job at a meat-packing plant in Toronto where there had been a continuing series of thefts. I was provided with a .38 revolver. I never went down to the RCMP; I never filled out any application form, other than the one presented to me by the manager of the detective agency. I was handed a .38 revolver, with ammunition, and I was supposed to use it if the situation arose. Frankly, the situation did arise, but fortunately not on my shift. Some other fellow, who had been similarly provided with a .38 revolver, was faced with the confrontation of a thief crawling through a window of this meat-packing plant. Fortunately, he pointed the gun and scared the thief and that was the end of that particular sojourn. I wonder what would have happened if I had been the one who had to assume that role, not even knowing how to aim or fire at that stage in my life.

Mr. Leggatt: If he had been a Liberal, you would have shot him.

Mr. Brisco: Probably.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Either that or you would have turned and ran away.

Mr. Brisco: I am not indicating my favour of this entire bill—but it was very easy for me, as a university student, during the course of my employment to acquire the right to have a .38 revolver in my possession.

● (1250)

The purpose of this bill is to tighten up gun control in order to remove those particular loose areas. Two years ago I had the opportunity to urge two of my constituents to lay charges against a big-game hunter or outfitter in northern British Columbia who had harassed them. He had pointed a pistol at them and intimidated them. The minister has made much to do about his concern for gun control. That was two years ago. Two months ago they finally appeared in court for the last time. These two, hard-pressed constituents were flown repeatedly from Castlegar to Fort Nelson to appear in court, denied the opportunity of their own employment, losing money. They were making no money from the Crown in this little escapade; they were simply fulfilling their responsibility as they saw it.

The charges were read out in court. The man was charged with two things in this instance, possession of an unlicensed pistol in his possession in other than his dwelling place. He pleaded guilty on the first count. On the second count he said, "My hunting territory is my dwelling place."

The judge did not accept that and charged him with being guilty on both counts. That is a pretty fair assumption. He then proceeded to lecture and admonish the person appearing before him, and concluded by dismissing the case. There was not one dime in terms of a fine. If that is the kind of control we are going to have with the implementation of this bill, it is going to fall flat on its can.

I have asked the minister to indicate to this House how many times there have been prosecutions on the basis of charges of carrying unlicensed weapons, revolvers, or what have you, in the commission of a crime. I asked that question months ago. The minister has not yet responded. Provision is there not only in this bill but in previous ones. However, the provisions have not been carried out as the Canadian people, who want a little order and justice in this country, perceive them to be.

Coming to government secrecy and the eloquent arguments of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), I am reminded of a statement made yesterday by the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) and the document that he tabled in the House. All it says is that we are going to have to slacken off a little bit on government secrecy. It indicates that that little bit is damn little.

The minister is concerned about the standing committee on statutory instruments. He feels that the hon. member for Calgary North is going to create some problems. Having listened to the minister, I feel that if we follow the minister's suggestion it will obfuscate that particular committee. The hon. member for Calgary North indicated that while Canadians sleep, this all-powerful government which seeks to be more powerful drafts orders in council that in a majority of cases never appear in the Canada Gazette. For that matter, who reads the Canada Gazette? Once it is there it is supposed to be engraved in stone, and everybody knows about it.

I recall, in a different context, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) talking about trade and international dealings with the United States. He remarked that the United States was like an elephant and that Canada was like a mouse; that we were subject to the rumblings and twitchings of that, I will not say monster, but mighty beast. I would like to put that analogy in a different context. The Canadian people may well be the mighty beast. If we continue down the trail that this government is leading this country, that mighty beast is going to twitch once more. Indeed, it may well roll over and crush this government by regulation. That would be the best thing that could ever happen to this government.

Mr. Neil: In view of the time, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might call it one o'clock.

[Mr. Brisco.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At 12.58 p.m. the House took recess.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR RETURN OF VESSEL TO ARGENTIA-NORTH SYDNEY SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the CN ferry William Carson sank during the first week of June off Labrador and that the government still has not purchased or chartered a replacement and the fact that a vessel has been moved from the Argentia-North Sydney run to replace the Carson, interfering with the movement of thousands of tourists and passengers and seriously affecting the already weak local economy in the Placentia area as well as the shipment of cargoes of fish from Newfoundland by reefer truck to the mainland, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That this House censure the cabinet minister representing Newfoundland, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, for permitting interference with the Argentia-North Sydney ferry system and the weakening of the economy of the depressed Placentia area and directs the minister to cease discriminating against areas of Newfoundland outside his own district and the Minister of Transport to act immediately to return the vessel purloined from the Argentia-North Sydney run to that service.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please, does such a motion have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ALLEGED GOVERNMENT INTERFERENCE WITH BROADCASTING PROGRAMMING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the statement of the press spokesman for the Secretary of State that a "nice" telex was drafted to the President of the CTV network asking that they join the national grid for the CBC TV's July 1 variety show, and in view of the statement by the president of CTV that he regularly gets calls from the Prime Minister's office "requesting us to carry the Prime Minister's speeches", and having regard to the fact that television is highly regulated by the federal government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That this House deplores the continuing tendency of the government to influence broadcasting programming in Canada and promote the Prime Minister as the head of state.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be debated only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

PROPOSED REFERENCE OF MANAGEMENT-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS TO COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that existing contracts with postal unions expire today and negotiations are proceeding positively with all unions except the CUPW, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday):

That the growing impasse between the CUPW and the Post Office management be resolved by referring the matter to a parliamentary committee with power to travel and hear representations for the purpose of bringing in a report with recommendations that will assure the Canadian people of the quality of postal service essential to the wellbeing of the Canadian economy and community.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SOCIAL SECURITY

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF PENSION RIGHTS FOR HOMEMAKER SPOUSES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the urgency of the motion which I wish to present grows greater month by month. I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That this House urges the government to bring in legislation that will establish pension rights for all homemaker spouses equivalent to the rights of those employed outside the home, and that the government commit itself to the taking of this action before the end of 1977.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the presentation for debate of such a motion can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SPORTS

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF USE OF DRUGS BY ATHLETES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of a growing number of allegations that drug use in sports ranging from junior hockey to professional football is rampant and worsening, thereby not only affecting the long range health of individuals but, more importantly, influencing adversely the youth of our nation, and because Mr. André McNicoll, a former director of the Canadian Foundation of Alcohol and Drug Dependencies, funded by the federal Department of National Health and Welfare, was fired from his job for warning the management of two CFL teams, namely the Ottawa Rough Riders and the Toronto Argonauts, against allowing and, indeed, encouraging their players to use excessively such stimulants as speed and other drugs causing potential serious health implications, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That this House direct the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) along with the Minister of National Health and Welfare to investigate the extensive use of drugs in sports in order that appropriate and effective steps may be taken to rectify this serious, damaging and influential practice within the sports world in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such a motion for debate. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

SUGGESTION BOARD CEASE PUBLISHING NAMES OF OFFENDERS UNLESS CAREFULLY CHECKED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, in view of the damage done to the good name of Dr. Helmut G. Koch, Director of the Abelard Chiropractic Clinic in Edmonton, by the published announcement of the Anti-Inflation Board that Dr. Koch had not complied with certain instructions and in view of the later admission by the Anti-Inflation Board that the error was found inside its own office, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

Dominion Day

That the government issue a public apology for the injury done to Dr. Koch and instruct the Anti-Inflation Board to stop publishing the names of so-called offenders without the most rigorous checking of all internal systems.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the presentation for debate of such a motion can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

SENATOR DAVEY'S RELATIONSHIP WITH BLUE WATER RACING ASSOCIATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of pressing necessity relating to the press conference statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) yesterday that Senator Davey has no special responsibility beyond the ordinary to avoid conflict of interest. I move, seconded by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek):

That in the opinion of this House Liberal Party campaign director Senator Keith Davey carries, by virtue of his position as Senator and chairman of the Liberal campaign committee, considerable obvious influence; further, that this House considers his status to be that of an official as the term applies in section 110 of the Criminal Code of Canada; and finally, that this House condemns his admitted approaches to the Department of Agriculture for appointments for his questionable Blue Water Racing Company cronies.

DOMINION DAY

PROPOSED PARTICIPATION OF LEADERS OF POLITICAL PARTIES IN CELEBRATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that tomorrow is the 110th birthday of Canada and in recognition of the fact that the true spirit of unity can only be demonstrated by the participation of all political leaders of Canada's national parties, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

That the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State take an immediate 11th hour decision to ensure that all party leaders be invited to participate in the Dominion Day celebrations on Parliament Hill and thus demonstrate their love and pride of our nation to all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only pursuant to Standing Order 43 with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INQUIRY WHETHER IAN CARRUTHERS NAME ON EXTRAPARLIAMENTARY OPPOSITION LIST

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General touching upon his answer in the House yesterday that no EPA list was ever drawn up and I should like to quote from that answer. Referring to the government the Solicitor General said:

As far as we are concerned on this side of the House there never has been drawn up the type of list the hon. member refers to, . . .

The minister may think he is playing some tricks with semantics but in fact he is misleading the House of Commons and the Canadian people with that answer. Yesterday I asked the minister a very serious question concerning a public servant by the name of Ian Keith Carruthers whose reputation was smeared five years ago by the former Solicitor General. I guess we have to go back in view of his answer. Was Mr. Carruthers' name or was it not mentioned in a letter sent by the former Solicitor General to various ministers regarding the security risk? Answer yes or no.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has referred to my reply of yesterday. Perhaps the Chair would permit me to refer to some comments made on the other side of the House in connection with this so-called list. I believe when the matter was brought up in the House hon. members opposite have talked about an enemies list or blacklist, but it has always been clearly stated from this side of the House that there was not a blacklist or enemies list of any kind drawn up. It was clearly indicated that the type of letter read into the record by a member of the opposition made certain recommendations in a highly confidential manner to a number of ministers requesting simply that some individuals be reinformed on the securities aspect of handling documents containing confidential information. That is the extent of the matter.

As to the rest of the question, I responded yesterday to the effect that if some people in this country have been slandered, libelled or handled badly because their names have been published in the press, they have recourse against the newspapers. I for one wish them well in such court action.

EXISTENCE OF EXTRAPARLIAMENTARY OPPOSITION LIST—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that is interesting, particularly since the minister is a co-defendant in the court action. I suggest there is a lack of communication between the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General which would account for the misleading of the House yesterday and today, inadvertently or deliberately. Referring to this matter at his press conference yesterday the Prime Minister said:

> All the Solicitor General did at that time was take a list given to him by the police and say, "I have these names. Some of them are working in your department. I feel it is my duty to pass on the information which the police gave me, that is, that these people might be a security risk."

The Prime Minister himself confirmed the existence of the list. Is the Solicitor General now saying that the Prime Minister was misleading the Canadian public when he said there was such a list? In view of what the Prime Minister said, can the hon. gentleman explain which words he would use to describe that letter? Is it a list, a missive, a communication, or an extraparliamentary blacklist? I don't care about the words. The Prime Minister indicated there is such a list. How can the Solicitor General now deny it?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, we, on this side of the House, are not in the habit of misleading the Canadian public.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Zap! We will freeze your portfolio.

Mr. Paproski: What about wage and price controls?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, we, on this side of the House have never mentioned an enemy's list or blacklist. Those are words used exclusively by hon. members opposite. Interestingly, only after this documentation came to the attention of some hon. members opposite was the matter eventually published in the newspapers, and only then did this slanderous action take place. So far as we on this side are concerned, the letter to which the hon. member referred was handled with the utmost discretion, to make sure there would be no attack on the civil liberties of anyone concerned, especially since the only recommendation in my predecesssor's letter was to the effect that certain people ought to be briefed on security procedures within the government. That was the normal way of dealing with that type of problem, in the circumstances.

OPPORTUNITY FOR THOSE ON EXTRAPARLIAMENTARY OPPOSITION LIST TO CLEAR NAMES

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. This government has been misleading this country since 1963—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —and it is continuing to do so on June 30, 1977. If the Solicitor General had honestly tried to answer our questions in the question period to the best of his ability instead of evading them he would not have dodged behind words like blacklist, or any other name. The list is the extraparliamentary opposition list, and he knows full well to what I refer. Armed with that knowledge, will the Solicitor General tell the House if he is reconsidering the position he put before the House yesterday, a position which any person concerned about liberty, equity and justice in this country could not begin to comprehend, and allow those his predecessor accused, and he knows they have been accused, to clear their names and gain the restitution this government ought to hold out to any Canadian?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is repeating the question he asked me yesterday, and I believe I answered him fully yesterday. If any damage was done to the reputations of the people involved, it was done by the media when it decided to publish their names. We, on this side of the House, are not the source of information of that kind which got into the hands of the newspapers.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Who started it?

An hon. Member: You did.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Who wrote the letter? Blackmail, apparently, is fine as long as it is secret.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

SECOND BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question also relates to the Solicitor General's role in security matters. I refer the Solicitor General to the answer given by the Minister of Justice on Monday of this week. That minister said that after the second break-in of the APLQ premises which took place in October, 1973, the Solicitor General of the day, who is now the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, received a letter protesting against the raid. Is the Solicitor General now in a position to confirm the correctnesss of his colleague's answer and say what action the former Solicitor General took on receipt of that message?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not clear what the hon. member means by his question. A letter was sent to the then Solicitor General, asking questions about the alleged second break-in. All I can say is that parliament passed an act in 1974 which laid down strict regulations and guidelines governing the use in court of electronic listening devices used in criminal matters. It gave the Solicitor General authority to issue warrants authorizing wiretaps in matters involving this country's national security. I remind the hon. member that before 1974 we had no law forbidding the use of electronic listening devices. This entire matter was constantly brought to the attention of the members of the justice and legal affairs committee.

● (1420)

This whole matter was brought to the attention of the justice and legal affairs committee. The commissioner of the RCMP appeared before that committee on June 12, 1973 and explained the position of the force in detail. He stated that the number of cases of electronic surveillance carried out by the force in the ten years preceding 1973 was something like 1,912. The situation was brought to the attention of the parliamentary committee of the day, which was chaired by Your Honour, and it was studied by that committee; other members of that committee included three former provincial attorneys general who are presently sitting in this House. They were completely informed of the practice of the RCMP in the period of time preceding the very strict regulation of wiretapping activities which was enacted by parliament in 1974.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Solicitor General has indicated that police forces of the country have the right to trespass on private property without the necessity of obtaining authorization.

An hon. Member: Contrary to common law!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Can he tell us whether or not the RCMP were involved in this second eavesdropping incident and can he confirm that the police were doing so on the instructions of the then solicitor general?

Mr. Fox: I have just explained the practice of the RCMP which was also the practice followed by other police forces in this country prior to the amendments brought in by parliament in 1974 with a view to exercising stricter control over that kind of activity. I have pointed out to the hon. member that there were 1,912 cases of electronic intrusions by the RCMP in that ten-year period and I do not propose to go through the 1,912 cases to indicate who was and who was not the object of electronic intrusions at that time.

The hon. member will surely understand that it has never been the practice of any previous Solicitor General or Minister of Justice to indicate who was or who was not the object of electronic surveillance in the period prior to 1974. After 1974, parliament enacted certain guidelines and imposed certain obligations under which notification has to be given, and those amendments have led to a vastly improved situation compared with that which existed prior to 1974. I believe they have met with the general approval of hon. members.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It would appear that the Solicitor General did not understand the question I put to him; it is a simple one and even the hon. gentleman should be able to comprehend it. In view of the fact that he has had adequate notice since last Monday, that the Minister of Justice acknowledged the receipt of a letter by the Solicitor General at the time from the APLQ, I am asking specifically what steps the solicitor general at that time took in connection with that inquiry—the hon. gentleman need not tell me the object of the surveillance; we can surmise that ourselves. I want to know what was the role of the solicitor general with respect to matters of security which were brought to his attention, what direction he gave to the RCMP. That is a simple question. I do not want any of this statistical stuff. I am just asking what happened in this case.

[Mr. Fox.]

Mr. Fox: The hon. member has really asked two questions; first, what happened in this case and, second, what was the policy at that time. As to the policy at that time, I would refer him to the proceedings of the House of Commons committee on justice and legal affairs for June 12, 1973. He would see, in reading those proceedings, that the policy of the force was explained in detail. There is even additional information as to how many convictions resulted from those wiretaps.

As to the specific question of the action taken by my predecessor at that time, this matter was brought to his attention and he discussed it to his entire satisfaction with members of the RCMP.

ENERGY

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—FUNDING OF ORGANIZATIONS OPPOSED TO PIPELINE

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It concerns the decision we are expecting from the National Energy Board on Monday and has to do with the role played in those hearings by public interest groups such as the Canadian Wildlife Federation, the Committee for an Independent Canada and Energy Probe. In the course of the Board's deliberations it was decided there would be no funding available for public interest groups, which, of course, limited their capacity to respond to the case in favour of a pipeline. Did the minister, or his government, receive any request from either the Canadian Wildlife Federation or the Committee for an Independent Canada, the Committee for Justice and Liberty or Energy Probe for funding to assist them in presenting information to the National Energy Board? If he did receive such a request, what was the response of the government?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I believe I was asked a similar question before the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works and I made clear at the time that, from time to time, representations had been made to me seeking assistance of the kind to which the hon. member has just referred. I pointed out that there was no plan or provision made by my department for assisting such groups. Indeed, the public interest was the very interest behind the formation of the National Energy Board itself.

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—POSSIBILITY OF FURTHER REPRESENTATIONS BY INTERESTED GROUPS FOLLOWING BOARD DECISION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In the event that the position of the National Energy Board is contrary to the one espoused by the public interest groups I have referred to, does the minister have any plans to allow those particular groups, which have expressed such interest in this subject and represent such a broad cross section of Canadians, to have any further opportunity of presenting their views concerning the decision of the National Energy Board either to the minister himself or to cabinet?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, that is a very "iffy", hypothetical kind of question. The National Energy Board has been holding hearings for a very long period of time. It has been holding them for one reason, namely to determine what was in the public or national interest. We expect their report on Monday; that is the information that I have received. At that time if these public interest groups want to make further representations to the government they are, of course, free to do so.

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—POSSIBILITY OF GOVERNMENT GUARANTEE TO CANADIAN ARCTIC GAS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should point out to the minister that the public interest groups are five in number whereas the Canadian Arctic Gas consortium had literally hundreds of experts presenting evidence to the board. My question to the minister is this. A key part of the Canadian Arctic Gas application has to do with government guarantees of completion in the event of cost overruns. Has the minister, any of his officials or any representative of the government given any indication to the National Energy Board that a guarantee, on which of course the application of Canadian Arctic Gas is contingent, will be forthcoming?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): To the best of my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, no such undertaking has been given, and for a number of very good reasons. First, no formal application has been made; second, the government is not making any input into the National Energy Board's decision.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CAUSE OF DELAY IN DEVELOPMENT OF SOUTH SHORE OF ST. LAWRENCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. With reference to the agreements which were signed last week by the minister himself and Mr. Tremblay, his Quebec counterpart, agreements which provide for projects in the Montreal region and which recognize also that region as a designated area so that it may avail itself of these agreements, and considering that the south shore area is not included in one part of these agreements, could the minister advise the House whether this is due to the fact that the Quebec government submitted no proposition for this region of the province? If so, could the minister also advise the House whether he could come to an understanding with the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Transport, his colleagues in the ministry, to submit to the Quebec government a project for the development of the south shore area?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, indeed last week we concluded three amendments regarding agreements with the province of Quebec but I do not fully agree with the hon. member that his area will not get any benefits out of it. In fact, the agricultural development agreement provides for some benefits, as do those on forestry and sylviculture. However, there will not be as many benefits as for other areas, particularly the Lower St. Lawrence and the Gaspe peninsula. I agree with the hon. member that we should consider now what must be done in other areas of the province of Quebec, particularly in those he referred to. However, I intend to continue negotiating with the government of Quebec to put forward other special assistance programs respecting certain areas which in recent years did not get as much assistance as they could have. The hon. member knows that the Lower St. Lawrence and the Quebec City areas can rely on my solicitude in this regard, as I proved it up to now.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. However, in the second part of my question I insisted on the fact that there is apparently more cooperation on the part of both governments. Considering that the Quebec government did not submit any specific project for the south shore and the eastern areas, my question is the following, and I repeat: Would it be natural for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to take the initiative to submit a project for study by the government of the province of Quebec and to sign an agreement if necessary?

Mr. Lessard: As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I indicated to my colleague, Mr. Léonard, that I intended to submit to him in the near future some suggestions concerning the developments or initiatives which could be supported by my department. I intend to communicate this information to him as soon as possible, and we will see afterwards how the province will react. Then, I shall probably make public the developments I will be prepared to support.

Oral Questions

LEGALITY OF SEIZURE OF DOCUMENTS FROM ROYAL AMERICAN ROAD SHOWS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. In light of the fact that the Calgary Stampede is known as the greatest show on earth and we have also the Klondike Days in Edmonton—

An hon. Member: What about parliament?

Mr. Woolliams: Well, I am coming to something pretty important.

In light of the fact that there was a seizure made against the Royal American Road Shows—that they took part for many years in the stampede and Klondike Days—and now are not permitted back into Canada, was there any part of that seizure which was illegal? Were documents taken, after they were seized by certain police officers, by another department? What has the minister to say about the decision now in the federal court?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that the whole matter concerning the Royal American Road Shows is presently being investigated by a commission of inquiry set up by the attorney general of Alberta, I am sure all the facts which ought to be dealt with will be brought to light. I have full confidence in that commission which has been set up.

Mr. Woolliams: Seeing that this government, when it comes to the administration of justice, passes it off to the attorneys general of various provinces, I am asking the Solicitor General if the RCMP was involved in the seizure of those documents? Has he had any conversations with top officers of that force? Was there any illegality in reference to the same, as we have heard in questions put by members on this side of the House?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, there has been a judge appointed by the Attorney General of Alberta who thought the best way of getting to the bottom of the whole matter was to have a full-fledged investigation into the question of the Royal American Road Shows. Obviously, the hon. member for Calgary North does not agree with the position taken by the Attorney General of Alberta. Perhaps he would like to discuss it with him.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, there is no evidence that I do not agree with the Attorney General of Alberta. Obviously, I do not agree with this government, the present Solicitor General or the previous solicitor general.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I should like to put my question to him again. They are bypassing their responsibilities.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. MacKay.]

Mr. Woolliams: All my hon. friends in the corner do is sit there. I do not know why their constituents return them to their various seats, because they never say anything.

Mrs. Holt: They do it because we do not talk.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: Has the Solicitor General any evidence indicating that there was anything illegal or irregular in reference to the RCMP, which is his responsibility?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, the clear answer to the hon. member's question is that I do not have any evidence of any illegal activity perpetrated by the RCMP in that regard. The Attorney General of Alberta feels that we have co-operated fully with him and with the inquiry he has launched, instead of just making vague allegations against the police forces of this country, be it the RCMP or any other police force. It is quite obvious that the Attorney General of Alberta has opted for a method of getting to the facts and getting away from vague, generalized allegations, which do no service to anyone in this country.

POST OFFICE

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON FORMING CROWN CORPORATION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. In presenting the question, may I congratulate him—

Mr. Paproski: No congratulations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Congratulate him on nothing.

Mr. Dinsdale: —on the quality of his hospitality at the reception during noon hour—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): You were busy all morning making sandwiches, J.-J.

Mr. Dinsdale: —and for the new stamps, in the presence of Their Excellencies, Governor General and Madam Vanier—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Governor General and Madam Léger.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We tend to forget the Governor General's name because we never see him on Dominion Day.

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, I should have said: "Governor General and Madam Leger". That was a Freudian slip, because we all respect the Vaniers as well.

Since the sixties various studies, commissioned by the Post Office at considerable expense to the public in attempts to resolve the growing labour-management impasse, have recommended that the Post Office become a Crown corporation, will the Postmaster General inform the House if his department has followed up some recommendations with feasibility studies to examine in detail the pros and cons of forming a Crown corporation, and if so, what conclusions has he reached on this matter?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, first of all I thank the hon. member for having given additional publicity to this very, very worth-while occasion. I thank him also for having partaken in the masterfully prepared sandwiches which we had to offer. As well, I wish to transmit to the hon. gentleman a good Canada Day because I will not see him until tomorrow. Also I wish to thank the hon. gentleman for his question.

Having said all those pleasant things, I might indicate that at this time the question of whether the Post Office should or should not be a Crown corporation tends to be a red herring. As the hon. member knows, I have indicated quite often that I am favourably inclined toward that particular solution. However, as he has indicated to me, even the United States experiment, which was attempted with reference to making their postal department similar to a Crown corporation as it would be in Canada, has not been successful. There always has been and will continue to be a great deal of public identification with the Post Office being a department of the Public Service. We are devoted to the Public Service. At this time I would prefer to hear the representations of the hon. member, as included in his motion under Standing Order 43 which he introduced earlier on today. I thought his suggestion was one we might consider very seriously, indeed.

Mr. Paproski: Why did Goodale say: "No"? Why did Pierre say: "No"? Shame, shame!

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased the Postmaster General is more positive than some of his colleagues. In answering my specific question, has he himself engaged in feasibility studies? In view of the fact that he mentioned the United States experiment, has the Postmaster General studied the documents which led the United States—and they are still proceeding on this course—and also the United Kingdom to convert their respective postal services into semi-private and Crown corporation entities respectively, in order to resolve similar labour-management stalemates in their post offices?

Mr. Blais: Yes, Mr. Speaker, in all aspects, and I repeat—

Some hon. Members: No, no!

PUBLIC WORKS

ALLEGED CHANGE IN SYSTEM TO PERMIT HYDROCULTURE LUWASA TO TENDER

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the statements of Hans Hegeraats of the minister's department, as reported in the Globe and Mail recently, that tendering arrangements will be changed in order to allow Hydroculture Luwasa "to bid on contracts", I am wondering if the minister will tell the House, in view of the problems that have been so evident in recent years concerning tendering procedures, how this will come about, and whether he has checked thoroughly to ascertain whether Mr. James Coutts, or Senator Davey, or their representatives have spoken to his officials to expedite this proposed departure from apparently well established tendering procedures? In other words, do we need Hydroponic plants this badly?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I believe both the gentlemen made it very clear in fact there were no representations made to officials in my office. As far as I am concerned, in spite of the reservations expressed by the hon. member, the open tendering system is alive and well and working very well within the Department of Public Works.

Mr. MacKay: I appreciate the answer, Mr. Speaker, although I did not get an answer as to how these proposed changes will be expedited.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

RULES GOVERNING TRUSTEES FOR BLIND TRUSTS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): My supplementary is to the Prime Minister or government House leader. In view of the reported blind trust arrangements involving the Prime Minister's principal secretary, vis-à-vis Hydroculture Luwasa, the interesting firm where one partner is not aware of the other partner's identity, according to newspaper reports, would the minister or the Prime Minister now or at some future date tell the House who is eligible, in the government's view, to be trustees for blind trusts. Are there any criteria or any rules of eligibility for trustees in such blind trusts arrangements in view of the rather bizarre circumstances, whereby Mr. Coutts' interest in Hydroculture Luwasa has been put into a so-called blind trust, one of the trustees of which, Stanley Goldfarb, is the brother of a director of Hydroculture Luwasa, in which, of course, Mr. Coutts has an interest? In other words, Mr. Speaker, it is the peripheral vision of the blind trust which concerns us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there are certain rules as to what kind of trustees should be chosen. I will endeavour to transmit them to the hon. member.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PAID EDUCATIONAL LEAVE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Yesterday in directing questions to the Prime Minister with respect to the minister's speech on June 13 at the ILO regarding paid educational leave, I asked whether the comments contained in that speech were government policy. The Prime Minister responded and I quote from Hansard:

—I will check the speech to see exactly what the minister said and to see to what extent he was enunciating a generous idea or an idea which is part of government policy.

Do the ideas put forward in his speech at the International Labour Organization on paid educational leave amount to government policy? If so, is it the intention of the government to begin to initiate paid educational leave arrangements in the Crown corporations and in the Public Service unions?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member will be good enough to check Hansard and he will find that during the reply to the Speech from the Throne there were 14 points announced at this session. One of the 14 points was the fact that the government indicated at that time, and is still indicating, that we are prepared to set up a task force to study all the implications of paid educational leave. That study, as I indicated in my speech, is now underway.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, a number of the 14 points that the minister put forward have not been clarified in detail. In his speech in Geneva, the minister referred to paid educational leave in the unorganized non-trade union areas of workers in Canada. Will the minister advise whether it is the intention of the House to use public funds to cover the cost of such arrangements?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the terms of the concept being one that we foresee might be very helpful in diffusing labour management problems that have so plagued this country over the past few years, we would be talking in terms of setting up a task force that would bring together all those interested in this particular concept as a means for improving our industrial relations scene. That would include a study into the means of financing the whole arrangement. That has many serious implications that would only be revealed through a very serious study which we are recommending.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Leeds.

[Mr. MacKay.]

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, this is an important matter. I do not think that I should be cut off.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Leeds.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I have to object.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Fraser: Question period is a waste of time if we are going to be cut off on a matter of this importance.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure that sentiment is shared equally be several other members trying to get some time to ask their questions. I am perfectly prepared to see the time to dispute the matter. The answer has been clearly given by the Minister of Labour that the matter will take further study and review at this stage. With those kinds of answers, we ought to get some more immediate questions. The hon. member for Leeds.

CRIMINAL CODE

APPLICABILITY OF SECTION 110 TO MEMBERS OF SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It arises out of statements at his press conference yesterday. Is it government policy to consider that members of the Senate, and for that matter members of the House of Commons as well, do not fall within the classification of the word "officials" as defined in Section 110 of the Criminal Code of Canada which makes it an offence for so-called officials to use influence for obtaining government business and, therefore, such persons as Liberal campaign director Senator Keith Davey are permitted to participate in contracts for the government? Is this the reason the government permits business to be done with such a person having an interest in Hydroculture Luwasa?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you will recognize that the hon. member is asking me to interpret for him a very contentious act, the Senate and House of Commons Act. It is because the wording of this has not been interpreted in an unequivocal fashion over the years that the government put forth conflict of interest guidelines. Perhaps eventually we will clarify the meaning of this act. However, until this is done, the House of Commons is bound by the rules which it sets for itself and so is the Senate within, of course, the framework of its interpretation of this law.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

JUSTIFICATION FOR CONTRACTS WITH HYDROCULTURE LUWASA IN VIEW OF FACT SENATOR DAVEY SHAREHOLDER

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Supply and Services. Has the minister had an opportunity to examine whether Hydroculture Luwasa is about to receive contracts from his department or whether contracts are under negotiation with his department? Specifically, if this is so, what reasons justify this in view of the fact that one of the substantial shareholders is Senator Davey, the Liberal campaign chairman?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, four contracts amounting to $932 were awarded the firm in question, Hydroculture Luwasa of Canada Limited, following normal negotiations for which my department is responsible.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I contacted the Minister of Justice and the office of the Solicitor General today with regard to my question—

[English]

Mr. Speaker, yesterday a most unfortunate incident occurred on the island of Montreal.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry but I had given the floor to the hon. member for Northwest Territories; he now has the floor. I shall recognize the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi after.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ENFORCEMENT OF MINE SAFETY REGULATIONS IN NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Yesterday I asked the minister about the repeated requests by the commissioner of the Northwest Territories for authority to enforce the mining safety ordinance. At that time the minister informed me of his intention to raise this matter with the Minister of Labour. I have a copy of a letter from an assistant of the Minister of Labour which states that this matter does not come within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Labour. Will the minister please inform the House how he intends to act on this request and when we can expect a reply?

● (1450)

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): The hon. member himself said yesterday that it was under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Labour. It was for that reason that I referred it to him. I will look into it once more. It is something that is under the Territorial government, but I will check into it once more and give the hon. member an answer. However, I was following his advice yesterday.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON BOMBING IN MONTREAL

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, as I said before, I was in touch today with the office of the Solicitor General with regard to my question.

[English]

Yesterday a most unfortunate incident occurred on the island of Montreal when William Robert Scully, 35, of Notre Dame de Grace blew himself up with a bomb and was killed instantly. Considering that anti-separatist literature was found in the late Mr. Scully's apartment, has the minister asked for a full investigation of the matter? Was this an isolated action of a disturbed man? Was he acting alone or in concert with others, and was there other ammunition on the premises?

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. It goes without saying that, like all hon. members in the House, I am aware of the incident which occurred yesterday in Montreal when an explosive device blew up in a private home. The only information I have, for the time being, Mr. Speaker, is that the Montreal police are making an inquiry. As for us, we have no further details on the incident at this time.

[English]

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE GOVERNMENT INFORMED OF TERRORIST ACTIVITIES

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): I ask this of the minister very calmly in view of some of the implications in this matter. Can he assure the House that the federal government is now and will in the future be fully informed on this and other possible related matters by the anti-terrorist squad on the island of Montreal? Is the federal government making sure that it has all the information on matters like this and possibly related matters because of the obvious implications of the matter?

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to see that for the first time in a few months at least one hon. member of the opposition has recognized the need for an efficient security service by the RCMP not only in Montreal but across the country. I must remind the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, as I was saying at the beginning of my answer, that I have no other information right now. However, I must also point out that, traditionally, the working conditions and the operational relationship between the RCMP and the Montreal Urban Community always were and remain excellent, and that we have every reason to believe that the inquiry launched by the Montreal Urban Community will bring out the necessary precisions.

IMMIGRATION

REASON FOR DETENTION OF JAMES KENNEDY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and I have given him notice of the question because it involves a serious human rights issue similar to those Canada criticizes in other countries. It concerns James Kennedy, holder of a valid Irish passport who has been in Vancouver on a Canadian visa since 1974. The government now seeks to deport him because they say he is somebody else. Regardless of who he is, Mr. Kennedy was arrested on May 27, over a month ago, and is being held in maximum security in Oakalla prison, without bail, and, although no charges have been laid against him in Canada and proceedings for extradition have not been commenced by any other government and he has not been convicted of anything, he is treated like other convicts and is not allowed to phone his mother and father to prove his identity. What is the government's intention in connection with this matter?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I have been informed that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the person known as James Kennedy is actually James Joseph McCann who has an extensive criminal record in the United Kingdom. I have to be careful in commenting any further because his counsel at present has an application for a writ requiring this person to be brought before a judge to determine if he is being held in lawful custody, and I would be hesitant to comment any further than that.

Mr. Clarke: Could the minister say why this man is being held in prison at the taxpayers' expense for a deportation hearing when he has already volunteered to leave Canada, and why he is being denied bail when such people as Huey Newton in Toronto have been released on $1,000 bond?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, if the facts were that simple, it would be easy, but the individual has indicated that he wants to leave the country as Kennedy. He wants us to accept the fact that his passport is in fact a valid passport in the name of Kennedy. Those conditions are not acceptable.

INQUIRY WHETHER ANY GOVERNMENT SEEKS TO EXTRADITE JAMES KENNEDY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): May I ask the minister if the government of the United Kingdom or the government of the Republic of Ireland have asked for the extradition of this man or have they been in touch with the department with regard to the charges pending against him in either the United Kingdom or the Republic of Ireland?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): My information to date is that no application for extradition has been made, but this gentleman is being held under the Immigration Act. We believe he came into the country under a false passport and is holding himself out to be someone other than who he is.

ENERGY

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING PLUTONIUM PROCESSING PLANT

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It relates to earlier questions as to the government's intention regarding plutonium processing plants in Canada. Given the statements made last week by officials of the Geologic Survey of Canada that they were combing Ontario for sites suitable for a nuclear waste dump and further comments by Mr. S. A. Mayman, senior scientist with AECL, that any nuclear waste dump would be tied to a plutonium processing plant, has the Prime Minister consulted with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, as he said he would on May 26, about this matter and could he inform the House now of the outcome of those discussions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Following the hon. lady's question I did consult with the minister and he confirmed what I had indicated to the House, that there has been no decision by the government to proceed with the plutonium processing plant.

SUGGESTED STUDY OF RISKS PRIOR TO ESTABLISHING PLUTONIUM PROCESSING FACILITIES

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In light of the report that was prepared by the federal Department of the Environment for the Ontario Royal Commission on Electricity and Nuclear Power which strongly warns that no production of plutonium should be allowed in Canada before a complete study of risks and safety requirements is carried out, would the minister, first of all, ask his colleague to table that report—

Mr. Gillespie: Why don't you ask him yourself?

Miss MacDonald: Yes, I will put that question to the minister. I would like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources as well if he would give the House the undertaking that the government will not proceed with any reprocessing facility until such a study as the Department of the Environment recommends is made and there is ample time to discuss the study and debate it in public.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I think it should be made clear that the government will not make any decision with respect to reprocessing facilities without making a very careful assessment of all the factors involved. The report to which the hon. lady refers may be the kind of report which deals with some of these questions—I have not seen it so I cannot comment on it—but I do believe that they made a submission to the Porter Royal Commission which is considering some of these matters. At present my department has a task force which is considering the questions of the ultimate disposal of nuclear waste. I want to make it very clear that because we are looking at the ultimate disposal of nuclear waste we are not looking at the same time at putting in a reprocessing plant. The two could go together, but we have taken no decision that it should go that way.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO SITE FOR DISPOSAL OF RADIOACTIVE MATERIAL AT MADOC

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy for Ontario announced some two months ago that there would be no waste disposal site at Madoc. I have been saying that for some time. Mr. S. A. Mayman said it about two or three weeks ago. Would the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources for Canada now indicate that there is not to be a waste disposal site in the Madoc area?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have had no reason to say that there would be a waste disposal site at Madoc. I have never said there would be one.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will be aware that there are two private members' bills which have been printed with the same number, Bill C-427, one in the name of the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Comtois) and one in the name of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson). Bill C-427 in the name of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore was inadvertently printed on June 23, 1977, as I indicated to the House yesterday, while the notice for introduction of the bill remained on the order paper. This bill was introduced yesterday and will be reprinted as Bill C-430. Bill C-427 will stand in the name of the hon. member for Terrebonne.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

CONTRACTS WITH HYDROCULTURE LUWASA

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. A few moments ago I directed a question to the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer). When he was in the middle of his reply, I had the impression—and I think the correct one—that he was about to answer the important part of my question as to whether further contracts were about to be signed with Hydroculture Luwasa Limited. I am wondering if the unanimous consent of the House could be obtained to allow the minister to finish his answer. I am sure hon. members opposite would not deny one of their ministers the chance to finish telling the Canadian public the truth.

News Agency Letter

Mr. Speaker: The minister would need unanimous consent to continue his answer.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, first, the answer is no and, second, to complete my answer to the hon. member, I should like to say that I am aware of no influence that would have been used when the four contracts were awarded to that corporation.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

TABLING OF LETTER FROM L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, with your permission and at the request of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), I would like to table a letter from which I quoted on June 21, 1977. This letter was addressed to me, dated October 9, 1972, received in my office on October 11, 1972 and signed by L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec, the Mouvement pour la défense des prisonniers politiques and the Coopérative des déménageurs du premier mai.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: That is in response to the point of order raised by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), and unless there is further comment, that seems to bring that matter to a conclusion.

News Agency Letter

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to prolong this, but the matter was raised by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), and I think the whole House should be grateful to him because if Your Honour had made a ruling it would have expanded the precedents of the House with respect to this matter. I wonder if Your Honour was prepared to make a ruling, and, if Your Honour was prepared to make a ruling with respect to this matter, I wonder what would Your Honour's ruling have been.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think this is very important from the point of view of the precedents of this House.

Mr. Speaker: I can indicate to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) that I had, I suppose, several opportunities to change the course of the argument along the way. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) raised the matter initially as a point of order. If I had thought the point of order was entirely without merit, I would have said so at the time. Having acccepted the initial point of order, it has always been my practice to encourage argument on both sides of any question, because I think it would be foolish to attempt to make any decision without a contribution from both sides for fear that significant points may be missed in the argument. Therefore I encouraged a response from the side opposite the hon. member raising the point of order. That response might have been very illuminating. In fact the response is the tabling of the document, which seems to be a rather self-evident conclusion to the matter.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the document has just been handed to me. I was listening very carefully to the translation. There were two letters referred to in my point of order. One is the letter which has now been tabled. The other letter is a letter from an officer of the RCMP to the minister, who was then the solicitor general, advising him that there should be no acknowledgment of the letter I have in my hand. In my point of order I asked for the tabling of both letters, and I wonder if Your Honour would consider that.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps not at this particular moment because of the compression of time, but presumably there would be an argument from both sides with respect to the other letter, which I think was treated somewhat differently. On the face of it I would want to hear argument specifically about each letter. We have had one response with respect to this letter. If there was another which might be the subject matter of further argument, perhaps the two parties could agree that Monday at three o'clock might be a convenient time, and if not then Tuesday at three o'clock might be a convenient time to present arguments on both sides in terms of the precedents, and I would attempt to decide the question at that time.

INDIGENOUS PEOPLES RECOGNITION ACT

MEASURE TO RECOGNIZE INDIANS, MÉTIS, AND INUIT AS FOUNDING PEOPLES

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-431, to recognize indigenous peoples among the founding peoples of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Philbrook: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to ensure that the contribution of Canada's indigenous population to the social, cultural, and economic development of the country is duly acknowledged by the federal government.

Presently the term "founding peoples" is frequently construed to mean only the English and the French who colonized what is now Canada. This bill would explicitly affirm the historical commitment of Canada to include the indigenous peoples among the founders of our country.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ELECTORS PRIVILEGE ACT

MEASURE TO CONFER CONFIDENTIALITY ON COMMUNICATIONS BETWEEN PUBLIC AND ELECTED REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-432, respecting confidential communications between elected representatives and their constituents.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, this bill would create a privilege in court so that elected representatives cannot be compelled to disclose the confidences of their constituents unless their constituents direct them to do so.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

MEASURE TO CHANGE NAME OF CONSTITUENCY OF COCHRANE

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the consent of the House could be granted so that we could include a bill standing in my name under introduction of bills in today's notice paper. It is simply a change of constituency name, which would be joined with all the other bills which are going to be before the House later this day.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of the bill to take place at this time so that it can be included with all the others which are to be dealt with at four o'clock this afternoon would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

● (1510)

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-433, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Cochrane).

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Some hon. Members: Later this day.

Mr. Speaker: Later this day, by leave.

COST OF UNITED NATIONS HABITAT CONFERENCE

Question No. 57—Mr. Cossitt:

What was the total cost to the taxpayer of all aspects of the United Nations Habitat Conference held in Vancouver and, of this total, how much was spent for unused hotel rooms that had been booked for the Conference?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): The cost to the federal government as host for, and participant at, the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements: Habitat was $18.5 million. Of this amount $5.2 million was for the Canadian Participation/Information Programme, $11.3 million for hosting the U.N. Conference and $2.0 million in financial assistance to the non-governmental group which had responsibility for providing facilities and programme assistance for the Habitat Forum. Included in the host cost of $11.3 million is $400,000 which was required to settle claims for unused hotel rooms. For further details please refer to answer to Question 642 tabled this day on hotel costs.

HABITAT CONFERENCE HOTEL ROOMS

Question No. 642—Mr. Beatty:

1. (a) How many hotel rooms were rented by the government for the Habitat Conference in Vancouver, British Columbia, from May 31 to June 11, 1976 (b) how many were unused but will have to be paid for by the taxpayer?

2. What was the cost to the taxpayer for unused hotel rooms?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): 1. (a) 3,900 rooms (28,500 room nights) were reserved by the government for the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements: Habitat; (b) According to Vancouver hotels, 12,000 room nights were unused and claims totalling $570,000 were submitted to the government.

2. Negotiated settlements amounting to $400,000 have been concluded with the hotels.

NOTE: It is normal practice when hosting international gatherings to advance book hotel rooms. Because nations were slow in providing firm information on the size of their delegations, the bookings had to be made on the basis of the best information available. There were sufficient delegates in Vancouver to occupy all the reserved rooms, but over thirty delegations moved from the conference hotels to cheaper suburban hotels, and some delegations never moved into the accommodation that had been booked for them.

CONTRACTS FOR PROFESSIONAL AND SPECIAL SERVICES—DEPARTMENT OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES

Question No. 2,221—Mr. Broadbent:

1. In the fiscal year (a) 1974-75 (b) 1975-76 (c) 1976-77, how many contracts for professional and special services were let by the Department of Supply and Services on behalf of government departments and agencies?

2. For each of the same years, what was the total value of such contracts and, in each case, what was the total number of persons employed under its terms?

3. For each of the same years, what was the number of man-years of employment produced as a result of such contracts?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1, 2 and 3.

	Period	Number of Documents	Value $000
(a)	1974-75 (*)	2,621	71,206
(b)	1975-76	4,997	110,640
(c)	1976-77	5,207	122,973

(*) Excludes contracting by Regional Operations: data not available.
NOTE: The information relating to the number of persons employed and the number of man-years of employment produced as a result of such contracts is unavailable since our information system does not record it. The standard object (04)—Professional and Special Services incorporates a very wide-ranging spectrum of services as partially explained on pages 1-58 and 1-60 of the Main Estimates 1977-78. A number of these services are not manpower based (i.e. rentals of space, machinery, equipment...).

AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC ON TAX DEDUCTIONS OF EMPLOYEES WORKING IN QUEBEC

Question No. 2,268—Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton):

Is the government considering negotiating an agreement with the Province of Quebec in view of anticipated movements to Quebec of employees of departments, Crown corporations and agencies in order that such employees' income tax deductions be dictated by the province of residence as opposed to the province of employment?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): The federal and Quebec governments recently reached an agreement concerning the income tax deductions for federal public servants working in Hull and living in Ontario. Under the agreement, Quebec will reduce the provincial tax deductions for employees of federal departments so that the total amount of tax withheld will approximate the amount that would have been withheld had the person been working in Ontario. For other residents of Ontario working in Quebec, including those in the private sector and employees of federal boards, commissions, agencies and Crown corporations, Revenue Canada, taxation has indicated that it will reduce the amount of federal tax deductions to achieve this same result. It is expected that the necessary reduction in withholding will be implemented in July, 1977.

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON RE-CYCLING

Question No. 2,305—Mr. O'Sullivan:

1. What percentage of paper used by the Queen's Printer contains or consists of re-cycled material?

2. Does the government have a policy of encouraging the use of re-cycled material in fulfilling its needs for stationery and, if so, on what date was this policy initiated?

3. What (a) have been the total costs each year (i) 1972-73 (ii) 1973-74 (iii) 1974-75 (iv) 1975-76 (b) is the total estimated costs for (i) 1976-77 (ii) 1977-78 for the government's requirements for stationery?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of the Environment and Supply and Services as follows: 1. Specifications for paper used by the Department of Supply and Services permit recycled material. Most papers, from time to time, use some recycled material, but the actual percentage, however, is impossible to determine.

2. A policy was adopted in November, 1976 that departmental stationery should contain recycled paper. Subsequently, the Department of Supply and Services in co-operation with the Department of Fisheries and the Environment has developed the concept of a procurement specification for "Environmental Bond" i.e. a fine paper containing a certain percentage of post-consumer waste and introduced this to the Canadian fine paper industry. Discussions are continuing between the departments concerned and the fine paper industry.

3. The total paper costs are as follows: (a) (i) $5,990,000*; (ii) 9,895,000*; (iii) 18,668,000; (iv) 24,027,000; (b) (i) $25,268,000 est.); (ii) 28,567,000 (est.)

*In 1972-73 and 1973-74, billing was just being centralized under the department of Supply and Services; some departments purchased their own paper supplies.

CONSOLIDATED COMPUTER INC.

Question No. 2,347—Mr. Stevens:

1. How many of the KEY-EDIT 50, 60 and 1000 systems were delivered to Consolidated Computer Inc.'s (CCI), customers in 1975 and 1976 and the first quarter of 1977?

2. What was the quantity of each model delivered to customers in each year and in the first quarter of 1977?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Supply and Services is concerned: 1 and 2. Government Key-edit purchases and leases contracted through the Department of Supply and Services: 1975 deliveries 4 Systems, Model 50; 4 Systems, Model 60; 2 Systems, Model 100; 3 Systems, Model 1000; 1976 deliveries 18 Systems, Model 60; 1 System, Model 100; 3 Systems, Model 1000; 1977 (1st Qtr.) 5 Systems, Model 60; 1 System, Model 1000; 1 System, Model 555.

In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: 1 and 2. Details concerning Consolidated Computer Inc.'s (CCI) sales to the private sector are considered to be commercially confidential. Disclosure of such information could place CCI at a disadvantage vis-à-vis competitors.

CN/CP TELECOMMUNICATIONS OFFICE IN SASKATOON

Question No. 2,399—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

Is the CN-CP Telecommunications Office in Saskatoon opened on Saturdays and Sundays and, if not, will the government ensure that the Office will be open in future?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The Canadian National Railways advises that the CN/CP Telecommunications office in Saskatoon is closed on Saturdays and Sundays. The low volume of business offering does not, at this time, warrant opening of the office on those days.

LEG-HOLD TRAPS

Question No. 2,408—Mr. Patterson:

Is the government through the (a) Canadian Wildlife Service of the Department of the Environment (b) Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development testing new, more humane traps to replace the leg-hold traps and, if so, how much is being spent in each case?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of the Environment and Indian and Northern Development as follows: (a) Yes, indirectly. Trap testing is not being done directly by the federal government. However, some work is being done in this area, which will help the Federal-Provincial Committee for Humane Trapping reach its objectives. The Canadian Wildlife Service has awarded contracts of $25,300 to the Canadian Standards Association, and $33,400 to the Ontario Veterinary College for mechanical and biological testing. The committee is now making arrangements for trap testing on its own behalf. (b) Yes, indirectly. The development and testing of more humane traps and trapping techniques is a joint federal-provincial undertaking, conducted and co-ordinated by the Federal-Provincial Committee for Humane Trapping (F.P.C.H.T.). The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development contributes financially to the committee's program and provides federal representation on the committee. Direct contributions to the F.P.C.H.T. from 1973-74 to 1976-77 (incl.) totalled $57,967 and a further $42,035 has been committed for the years 1977-78 and 1978-79. Also, the following contributions were made to the Manitoba Wild Fur Development Program for field testing and Development of humane traps and trapping techniques: 1975-76, $20,550; 1976-77, $20,000 (estimate). The Yukon government reports that its game branch is involved in the field testing of traps provided by the Co-ordinator of the Federal-Provincial Committee for Humane Trapping. No expenses are incurred by the Yukon Territorial Government in this program. The Northwest Territories has contributed a total of $10,412 to the F.P.C.H.T. for 1973-74 to 1976-77 (incl.) and a further $4,000 is budgeted for 1977-78.

POST OFFICE DEFICIT AND SERVICE COMPLAINTS

Question No. 2,638—Mr. Beatty:

1. What was the total deficit of the Post Office Department in (a) 1966 (b) 1976?

2. How many complaints of lost or delayed mail were received by the Postmaster General (a) in 1976 (b) between January 1 and April 30, 1977?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): 1. (a) $30.7 million; (b) $546.2 million.

2. (a) Loss: 403; Delay: 2,330. (b) Loss: 141; Delay: 947.

NCC EXPENDITURES

Question No. 2,647—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What has been the total amount of money spent by the National Capital Commission in each of the past five years and what is the total figure combined?

2. For each year what percentage was spent in (a) Ontario (b) Quebec and how is the total figure broken down?

3. What is the breakdown of the estimated expenditures for the current fiscal year and will the amount spent in Quebec be approximately 60 per cent of the NCC's total budget?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): 1. In each of the past five years, the Commission's total net expenditures were as follows: 1972-73, $39,987,309; 1973-74, $33,715,756; 1974-75, $54,693,723; 1975-76, $67,181,195; 1976-77, $49,367,653; for a total of $244,945,636.

2. The breakdown for the net expenditures for each year is as follows:

	Ontario	per cent	Québec	per cent
1972-73	$ 23,355,000	58 per cent	$ 16,632,000	42 per cent
1973-74	17,283,000	51 per cent	16,432,000	49 per cent
1974-75	34,167,000	62 per cent	20,527,000	38 per cent
1975-76	48,680,000	72 per cent	18,501,000	28 per cent
1976-77	30,450,000	71 per cent	18,918,000	29 per cent
	$153,935,000	63 per cent	$ 91,010,000	37 per cent

3. A breakdown of the commission's estimated net expenditures in 1977-78 will be: Ontario, $28,234,000, 45 per cent; Quebec, $34,229,000, 55 per cent; Total, $62,463,000.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council would feel hurt if I did not ask the usual question about the business of the House, so I shall do that. Can he tell us what we will be dealing with in the next week and if there is any change in the plans set forth yesterday by his leader?

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, earlier today when we were dealing with the rest of business for today and next week a question was raised about the order of business for Monday and Tuesday. I am pleased to report that we will continue consideration of Bill C-27 dealing with unemployment insurance on Monday and on Tuesday morning, if it is not completed before one o'clock. If the bill were completed we would move to Bill C-49, Canada Pension Plan amendment, and if we are fortunate enough to complete that we will go to Bill C-17, the Air Canada legislation.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that is our special agreement with respect to Tuesday. Is it the order of business for Thursday and Friday as well, or will we have to consult further?

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I think further consultation would be required. I think there is a disposition that instead of continuing with that order, if we have not completed it by one o'clock Tuesday, then instead of continuing with it on Thursday, we would probably return to consideration of Bill C-51.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

AMENDMENTS TO CRIMINAL CODE

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-51, to amend the Criminal Code, the Customs Tariff, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act and the Prisons and Reformatories Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and motions Nos. 7 and 28 (Mr. Woolliams).

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments with respect to motion No. 28 which stands in the name of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). I endorse the remarks he made so eloquently before lunch, and also the learned and reasoned argument of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin).

Basically the Criminal Code of Canada provides for law and order in our country and sets the guidelines which affect every man, woman and child. I suggest that the citizens of Canada are entitled to know what the criminal law is, and for that reason the law should be contained within the sections of the Code, or alternatively in regulations that have been approved after debate in this House. I like to think that we live in a democratic country where we have respect for the freedom of the individual and where a person is considered innocent until proven guilty, and also that there is freedom of information as was discussed this morning by the hon. member for Peace River.

What happens when we begin to be ruled by regulation—regulations which the hon. member for Calgary North said are quite often prepared in the dark of the night without anyone's knowledge? I am not saying that we do not require provisions that enable the Governor in Council to make regulations. Certainly it would be foolish in this day and age to have all the regulations that are promulgated brought before the House for debate. Regulations made under the Criminal Code, however, should by their nature be subject to the scrutiny of parliamentarians.

Having regulations presented in parliament, as is suggested in the motion, would give parliamentarians an opportunity to debate them. When a matter is debated in the House of Commons it becomes the subject of public knowledge through television, radio, and newspaper, and people then have an opportunity to let their members of parliament know their views on the matter. The amendment of the hon. member for Calgary North proposes that within 15 days after regulations have been promulgated they be presented to the House of Commons.

We are not asking for a parliamentary debate on all regulations passed under the various acts, but we are asking that the regulations promulgated under the provisions of the Criminal Code be brought to the House for debate.

I practised law for some 20 years before coming to this House and I know it is very difficult at times to find out exactly what regulations exist. I appreciate that they are printed from time to time in the Canada Gazette, or if they are provincial regulations they are printed in the provincial Gazette, but how many people have the opportunity or the time to read them and find out what regulations have been passed?

Let me give an example of what happened in the province of Saskatchewan with respect to the metric bill. Through the influence of federal civil servants from Ottawa, civil servants of the province of Saskatchewan were able to have promulgated in that province regulations which changed the method of measuring land within the province from acres to hectares. Almost one year after the regulations were passed someone asked a minister of the province and a legislative member a question pertaining to the regulations, and was surprised to discover they did not know those regulations had been passed.

Cabinet ministers are supposed to know what regulations the Governor in Council passes. Presumably they are discussed in cabinet, but in this day and age when we pass so many regulations, ministers understandably have no time to read all of them. Mr. Speaker, it could happen that a regulation is passed without the public's being aware of it until someone is in breach of that regulation, after which it becomes public knowledge.

The criminal law of Canada is basic law, and the Code is probably one of the most important statutes in our statute books. If the Governor in Council can pass regulations which amend that law, there is something wrong with our system of government. That is why I urge members of this House to read motion No. 28, for they will see that it asks that all regulations made under the Criminal Code be brought before this House for consideration. In that process parliamentarians could debate them, and members of the public concerned about our criminal law would have the opportunity to make their views known on the acceptability of the regulations.

The hon. member for Calgary North has proposed an excellent amendment. I ask all hon. members who are at all concerned for our democratic way of life to support it.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to speak in support of the amendment. Although not legally trained I can understand how difficult it is to obey a law of which the public is unaware. The previous speaker spoke of orders in council which have the force of law. It is true that cabinet ministers and members of parliament should be aware of changes in the law, yet all too often a minister signs a document placed before him and so gives legal sanction to an order in council without being fully aware of its contents.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) suggested it is not necessary to table orders in council changing the criminal law because the statutory instruments committee scrutinizes all such changes in legislation. He suggested, I think, that it is not advantageous to make all such changes public. But the amendment asks more than that. It says that not only should such changes in the law be made public but, since they concern the criminal law, parliament should be given a chance to scrutinize them within 15 days of enactment, or 15 days after a session of parliament begins. This will allow parliament to debate them and either accept them or reject them. I suggest the Minister of Justice forgets that many regulations have a greater effect than the original enabling legislation.

That we may wish to outlaw certain guns is not the important point of the amendment. When we debate such questions we are really debating how regulations will be interpreted and enforced. I have heard members argue about the length of guns, but that is not a legislative matter. We decide in principle if we are to allow people to possess rapid firing guns, hand guns, or guns easily concealed. In the final analysis, questions as to whether guns of a certain calibre or of a certain type come within the prohibited class are determined through an interpretation of the law. The courts interpret laws, orders in council and other regulations, and acts accordingly. Really, we are enacting a prohibition against handguns, but it has been in effect for some years. We are adding to the prohibited list certain weapons not previously included under the heading of prohibited weapons. We set down the principle and the court interprets the regulations, which stipulate if guns of a certain calibre or certain length are in the prohibited class. My point is this: I may own a B-B gun of a certain calibre and go hunting with it today, but tomorrow, because the regulations are changed without my knowing it, I could be arrested for possessing a prohibited weapon. The point is that I would not know the law had changed.

Mr. Woolliams: Right on.

Mr. Peters: Surely it is unfair and stupid to amend regulations without letting the public know, and if the Minister of Justice cannot see the logic of making such changes in regulations public, his approach to our administration of justice is unrealistic.

In this country it is difficult to enforce justice. The average person thinks the police are picking on him. They pick on him when he drives, when he doesn't wear his seat belt, or when he commits a parking infraction, and the public views none of these infractions as serious. They are offences, true, but they are responsible for much of the public's animosity toward the police. These minor infractions create much friction.

What is the logic of passing regulations of which the public knows nothing? You can drive down the highway tonight, thinking you are within the speed limit, and be arrested because, without your knowing it, the province by secretly passed order in council reduced the speed limit ten miles an hour. Mr. Speaker, this is possible. You will be unhappy because you did not know the law had changed.

How would you feel if, through a sudden change in the regulations, 12-gauge shotguns or No. 5 shells were outlawed? If you are carrying that kind of gun to a duck hunt, you would be very surprised, very hurt, and very arrested just the same.

The Minister of Justice apparently believes in amending the Criminal Code by regulation, and asks us for authority to do so. Apparently he does not want these things made public, and in my view this is disgraceful and out of keeping with the principle of British justice. It may be he can go far in the direction he wishes, but it seems to me he is being unfair to the public, to the traditions of his office, and to the legislation which he wishes the public to support. British justice would call for him to go one step further.

Whenever the Criminal Code is amended by regulation or by order in council or any other of the statutory tools which the government uses, a reference should be made to parliament so that the representatives of the public might have their say. In my opinion the minister would have done the legislation a greater service if he had given an undertaking to proceed along these lines and to have allowed, say, for a day's debate on any changes in the Criminal Code. I do not believe he would find this proposition unworkable. It would have the additional advantage of helping to make the public aware of any changes which are being made.

I am always surprised to find that ordinary members of parliament, for whom I have a high regard, lose all sense of balance when they become cabinet ministers—all sense of responsibility to their colleagues and to the nation. The only people to whom they show any responsibility are their departmental officials. This is a great loss, because one would hope they would continue to exercise normal caution when asked to take measures which the general public will not accept. What seems to happen is that public servants put in place regulations which often take us far away from the legislation which was originally passed by parliament, making it difficult for the public or even for members of parliament to detect any continuity in the changes which take place. Governments would be well advised to make every effort to bring to the attention of the public changes which take place affecting their freedoms and rights. A government which does not make a constant effort to do this is, in my opinion, failing to serve the public well.

Some of us have had an opportunity of looking at the green paper put out by the government with regard to the right of the public to secure certain information. That document can be summed up in a very few words—if it is not likely to offend the civil servants or to cause the government any trouble, there is no great objection to information being published. But if there is any danger to civil servants or to the minister, the documents requested will remain secret. Any changes in the Criminal Code affect you and I from time to time—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): "You and me".

Mr. Peters: Very well, "You and me"—Stanley as well as the rest of us. They are quite likely to affect us as individuals. For this reason there should be as free and as open a flow of information as possible, not only because of the basic principle involved here but because it would help the general public to support the legislation we pass here and which must, of necessity, be changed from time to time. If the Criminal Code is to be amended by regulation, some way should be found to bring these changes to the attention of parliament, and the minister should be the first to accept the kind of amendment put forward by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams).

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, my intervention will be quite brief. I cannot let this opportunity go by without saying how much I support the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) which asks that when regulations are made they should be tabled in parliament within 15 days and then debated, especially under the section dealing with gun control.

This morning, when I was speaking, when the minister interjected to say I was in favour of regulation because I thought the length of gun barrels should be determined by regulation. If the minister wants to take a close look he will see I am certainly against regulating an important law such as this, though I realize the government likes to do most of its business by order in council and by regulation and incorporates this kind of situation in almost every law it brings forward. Anyway, member opposite are going to vote for this and have it included in the bill even though it is against the wishes of most of the people who are directly affected.

The people this gun law will directly affect are against this kind of thing, but knowing the bill is going to be put through anyway I want to take this opportunity to say I am certainly against regulation by order in council. I am against regulations such as those proposed by the minister in connection with laws as important as the Criminal Code. Many of the other members of my party who have had legal training have been able to put this position much more eloquently than I am able to do.

In the over-all, Mr. Speaker, I completely agree that an order in council can change the law within a matter of days, and in such a way that many people are affected. As I have said, it could make criminals out of innocent people. They are the ones who usually get the most harassment. They will not know what is happening to them, but just because they do not know the law does not mean that they do not have to comply with the law. If such regulations were brought back to parliament within 15 days and debated, the people of Canada would have a better opportunity of knowing exactly what is going on. That is the way we should treat the people of this country. In closing, may I say I am strongly in favour of the amendment and I hope my hon. friends opposite will see the logic of it, though I am not too sure they will.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my support for this amendment. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) has made a valid point, something worthy of considerable thought when we contemplate our parliamentary procedure. We seem to want to cure problems these days by centralization. Recently a report on broadcasting suggested that broadcasting be brought under one company or operated under one network, which may have a point but nevertheless shows the tendency today toward centralization. More and more we want government to intervene in our lives. We are presently studying a competition bill which, if it is passed, will enable government to intervene further in our private lives and in private business.

This brings me to the point that the bureaucrats, who must of necessity administer legislation, are being given a great deal of power, and I do not think we have properly addressed ourselves to the question of how to curtail some of the excesses which are bound to occur, since these bureaucrats are just as human as we are. Sometimes regulations are made without much thought being given to them; they are made on the spur of the moment, and sometimes the bureaucracy is not even aware of what is happening out in the hinterland. Perhaps they cannot be faulted for that. After all, a minister is probably far too busy to be aware of everything going on in his department, and one cannot expect otherwise. Nevertheless, we should try to do what we can to scrutinize orders in council before they are passed.

I understand that over 3,000 orders in council were passed last year by the federal government, and in addition many were passed in the provincial field. We have recently been discussing metrication, and the MLA's in my own province were unaware that the government of Manitoba had already introduced the metric system in the surveying field. I understand a similar situation exists in Saskatchewan.

This amendment provides a means whereby there would be a fairly routine laying on the table of regulations and orders in council in a specified form. I am sure that 99 per cent would go unchallenged, but at least they would be readily available so parliamentarians would observe them. No doubt some members of parliament would find something out of line in an order in council, and although this would not occur very often it would at least eliminate any untoward orders in council. I think this procedure would be a salutary one, those who draft these orders in council, who would have to be more sure of themselves, and in regard to making members of parliament take an interest in orders in council which affect their constituents.

I am not a lawyer, Mr. Speaker, but I understand that it is important that orders in council having to do with the Criminal Code be closely scrutinized. Although this can be said to be the case in all areas of government, it is particularly so in the case of the Criminal Code which needs to be clear and direct. I do not see how the adoption of this amendment would in any way change the Criminal Code as such. In this day and age when we are complaining about secrecy in government, when we are unfamiliar with the vast amounts of orders in council which are passed and with regulations which must necessarily issue from the various departments, this is a welcome departure and may well serve as a model upon which to base further legislative action.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I intend to enter this debate only briefly to deal with questions which have arisen on the motion of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). This amendment merely seeks to provide the vehicle by which parliament has some access to decisions regarding legislation which are taken behind the green, felt covered doors of government orders in council.

The interesting thing is that this debate has not been exclusively confined to lawyers, as is quite often the case when the Criminal Code is discussed. The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) who last spoke is a medical doctor. The member who preceded him is a leader in what I guess I could call the tender fruit industry of British Columbia. Perhaps this is indicative of the fact that the concern which exists regarding the attitude of government generally respecting orders in council is now spreading beyond the legal profession to members of the Canadian public who have not been burdened with a legal education. I think that is very important.

There is no doubt that one of the things which concerns anyone living in a free society is the tendency today for government not to disclose information, or to be hesitant to do so, particularly government in the Canadian parliamentary system, hampered as we are in terms of information by the doctrine of ministerial responsibility which is only observed when it is convenient to do so. This is buttressed by the document released yesterday by the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts), the green paper on freedom of information, which has been condemned generally as not pointing the way to freedom of information at all, but contains much finer language than heretofore sustaining the rights of government not to disclose.

It becomes extremely important when the statute parliament is dealing with is an amendment to the Criminal Code. It is not an amendment to the Weights and Measures Act nor an amendment to the Small Loans Act. It is an amendment to the Criminal Code, the effect of which can deal with the lives of all subjects in one way or another. Protection has been given to everyone—the blackest and the whitest among us in terms of reputation—by the doctrine that one is presumed innocent until proven otherwise. The same buttress against authority, or the same kind of protection, is intended by the hon. member for Calgary North. He is not saying that governments cannot act by orders in council and that there is not a place for orders in council. There is a place for orders in council in a complex society. We have to change our procedures in terms of the House of Commons, and governments have a great myriad of problems to deal with as well.

The hon. member is saying in his amendment that when there are orders in council passed under this unusual statute, this parliament should be apprised of them; that they should be made known to parliament as the people's representatives; that they should be tabled in the House; and that parliament should have an opportunity to deal with them, just as it would deal with any amendment to the Criminal Code. We are now openly discussing an amendment to the Criminal Code in this House. If there is no reason on the face of orders in council as to why they ought not to be dealt with, then they would not be dealt with and would stand. If there is some reason on the face of orders in council for dealing with them, then they would be dealt with.

The hon. member for Calgary North has not made an unreasonable case. The amendment calls for the order in council to be laid before parliament within 15 days after it is made, and if parliament is not sitting, then 15 days after parliament begins to sit.

The amendment continues as follows:

> ... every order in council, regulation, or form shall be subject to affirmative resolution of parliament and shall not come into force until published in the Canada Gazette.

That does not say anything, except this: in a subject matter as important as criminal law, the Parliament of Canada ought to have the say and ought to be able to review what bureaucracies have done, even though orders in council can be signed by someone other than a bureaucrat, which is not an unusual or improper suggestion to make to the House. That is the purpose of it, and I hope the government will support it. If it does not support it, I have to ask myself why not?

Perhaps there are a number of members of this House who disagree with this, including members of my party; but I cannot understand why the very important procedure of an affirmative resolution is alien to the thinking of some members. I hope hon. members on the other side will not vote against the amendment because it happens to be an opposition amendment. Whether we support a government or whether we are members of an opposition, members ought to look at the rights of each of us as representatives of the people.

I am aware of the doctrine that everyone is deemed to know the law. That is great for lawyers, that is great if you happen to know the law, and it is necessary for the proper administration of justice. But it is a devil of a thing for the fellow who is innocently caught in a situation, which can happen quite often.

I shall conclude my remarks because I do not believe there is another speaker from this side of the House and I do not want to hold up consideration of this amendment. I hope hon. members on the other side of the House will consider the propriety of the amendment and the spirit in which it is moved. Even though there may be members on either side of the Chair who disagree with the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North, I hope they reconsider their opposition to this important amendment.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if there has been any agreement—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There has been no agreement.

Mr. Patterson: Under those circumstances, I should wish to make some comments the next time the bill is before the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being four o'clock p.m., pursuant to the order made on Wednesday, June 29, 1977, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills.

HOBBY PROTECTION ACT (NUMISMATIC)

EXTENSION OF CURRENCY COUNTERFEIT LAWS

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-256, to amend the Criminal Code (counterfeit of rare coins and notes), as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance) moved:

That Bill C-256, An Act to amend the Criminal Code (counterfeit of rare coins and notes), be amended in Clause 2 by striking out line 22 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"minimum of six millimetres (6.0 mm), and everyone who commits an offence under this part with respect to counterfeit money as defined in this paragraph (g) is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think a word of explanation might be in order. At the committee hearings on this bill it was noted that the penalty provided in the Criminal Code was that in every case counterfeiting of rare coins pursuant to this amendment would have been an indictable offence. Members of the committee suggested to me that I make some effort to come up with an amendment which would have the effect of making the offence alternatively an indictable offence or an offence punishable on summary conviction. Accordingly, I prepared this amendment, consulted with some members of the committee, and tabled it to give effect to the undertaking that I gave at the committee that I would make an attempt to alter the penalties provided under this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Numismatic Counterfeits

Mr. Kaplan moved that Bill C-256, to amend the Criminal Code (counterfeit of rare coins and notes), as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): By leave, now.

Mr. Kaplan moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the speed with which we are passing bills this afternoon, why do we not sit for another half hour and finish the session?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Shall we call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Pursuant to the order made earlier this day, it being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday, July 4, 1977, at 2 o'clock p.m. pursuant to Standing Order 2(3). Have a good weekend.

At 4.05 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Special Order.

INCOME TAX

DEDUCTIBILITY OF CERTAIN QUESTIONABLE ITEMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of press reports that an official of the Department of National Revenue has confirmed that the costs of forms of prostitution are subject to tax write-offs under section 18 of the Income Tax Act as a business expense, and taking into consideration that those who take advantage of this tax break are deriving pleasure at other taxpayers' expense, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt):

That this House directs the Ministers of Finance and National Revenue to launch an immediate investigation into reports that section 18 of the Income Tax Act is being used to write off the costs of pleasures obtained at massage parlours and houses of ill repute as business expenses and that should this be the case, the government should not allow these items to be used for tax write-offs.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House, pursuant to Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

FAILURE TO INVITE ELECTED REPRESENTATIVES TO OPENING OF SENIOR CITIZENS' HOUSING PROJECTS IN REGINA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of pressing necessity arising from last week's official opening in Regina of two senior citizens' housing projects where the federal authority was not officially represented by the members of parliament for the area from Regina East or Regina-Lake Centre, but instead by Mr. Tony Merchant on the invitation of his sister, Mrs. Otto Lang. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That this House deplores the failure of the government to invite the elected representatives of the people and requests an explanation from the responsible minister, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, that in future the federal authority be represented at such events by the elected representatives from the areas concerned, regardless of their political affiliation; and finally the House reminds the Minister of Transport and Mrs. Lang that, at least, as yet, they do not constitute the parliament of Canada, despite any wishful thinking that they may entertain.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF FIRST DOMINION CARILLONNEUR, PROFESSOR PERCIVAL PRICE

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I might ask hon. members to join me in marking the presence of a very distinguished visitor in our gallery. On July 1, 1927 the magnificent carillon in the Peace Tower was dedicated and a recital was offered by the first dominion carillonneur, Professor F. Percival Price, who occupied that position from 1927 to 1939. Professor Price was with us last Friday, July 1, as a guest of parliament to celebrate this fiftieth anniversary and to hear the excellent recital of the present carillonneur, Mr. Gordon Slater, who is also present in the gallery. I wonder if hon. members would want to join with me in signalling the presence of this very distinguished gentleman.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

BILINGUALISM

QUEBEC'S BILL NO. 1—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PROTECT RIGHTS OF ENGLISH MINORITY IN QUEBEC

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State, if I may, which concerns what I have to call double talk that we have heard over the last little while from the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State on national unity. On Saturday, the right hon. gentleman reportedly said the following: that he intends to leave the constitutional testing before the courts of Bill 1 up to private citizens; and that he has no inclination to either reserve or disallow Bill 1. It would seem from all of this that what the Prime Minister intends to do is absolutely nothing with respect to Bill No. 1.

• (1410)

An hon. Member: Typical.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If this is not true, what action is the government prepared to take in the event that Bill No. 1 goes through unchanged in violation of one of the fundamental principles of the white paper on language presented by the Secretary of State, namely, that Canadian citizens have a right to educate their children in the language of their choice?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): To put it simply, the government of Quebec has indicated that there may be changes in Bill No. 1. That bill is now before the legislature, I understand, and therefore it would be premature to take any further action in regard to it until we know what the final position is to be.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am concerned about whether the government will ever take any position no matter what the government of Quebec decides. I base this view on a statement made by the Prime Minister three years ago in response to Bill 22 when he said "I would accept a unilingual French Quebec". Presumably, underneath all the double talk and electioneering, the Secretary of State is saying the same thing today. Will the hon. gentleman tell the House what measures, if any, he intends to take to protect the English language minority in Quebec which has every right to the federal government's championship as do the language minorities outside the province.

Mr. Roberts: It is the purpose and preoccupation of the federal government that the context within Canada for the survival and flourishing of the French language and culture should be favourable but as I have made clear on every occasion, the federal government does not believe that the English minority in Quebec should be denied access to English-speaking schools.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is a statement similar to the one made in the white paper on language. How does the government intend to enforce that right?

Mr. Roberts: It is, of course, the case that this statement was made in the white paper on official languages which was endorsed by the hon. gentleman's leader. It is clear that that white paper was an exhortation to the province to accept the principle of free choice.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): No answer!

Mr. Chrétien: No question!

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

ENERGY

CONSERVATION—HOME INSULATION PROGRAM—NAMES OF PROVINCES AGREEING TO CO-OPERATE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It relates to the statement he made last week concerning the government's home insulation program, details of which are exceedingly scanty. In view of the fact that the estimated cost of insulating an average home is $900 and the amount the government proposes to pay is $350, leaving $550 to be paid by the occupant of the house, which will be one of the major obstacles to making this program effective, I want to ask the minister which provinces have agreed to institute loans for the purpose of home insulation. Also may I ask him whether, if provinces do not co-operate in the plan, does this mean that in those particular provinces not even a $350 taxable grant will be available to the residents of that province?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Perhaps I should make it clear at the outset that when he talks about the costs of reinsulating a house—the hon. member used such figures as $850 to $950—he is talking about an insulation job which would be done by a contractor. If an individual were to do it himself, it could be done for a great deal less. I believe that $250 to $350 should cover substantially all of the insulation material associated with such reinsulation.

As to the question about the provinces which have indicated they are prepared to add loans, to superimpose loans, or to associate loans with our grant program, that is presently under negotiation with a number of provinces. Ontario is a good example. The province made an announcement about this during the election campaign, but the actual details of that announcement, how their loan program might work, had not been worked out then and I am not sure whether they have been worked out yet. The province of British Columbia did have a loan program which was administered by its public utilities commission. I believe the province of Manitoba had a loan program, and other provinces have been considering it, but this is part of the discussion which will take place between now and the September 1 deadline for the introduction of the program.

CONSERVATION—HOME INSULATION PROGRAM—POSSIBILITY OF MAKING EFFECTIVE DATE RETROACTIVE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that the program does not come into effect until September 1 and since the program can be most effective if work can be done during the summer months, has the minister given any consideration to making the date retroactive so that any individuals who choose, and qualify otherwise, to insulate their homes during the summer months, even if they have to wait until after September 1 to be paid, can do so under the plan, or would the minister be prepared to adjust the plan to do that so that as many people as possible can start insulation at present?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): We did consider that particular suggestion but it was ruled out when a very close examination was made of the administrative complexities that such retroactivity would introduce. We also feel that a period between now and September 1 is a good period for those who would not qualify in the first round. As the hon. member knows, the program will be made available to those who own or occupy houses which are the oldest 20 per cent of the housing stock in the country, and that will take a little bit more than a year to complete. I am sure there are many other Canadians who will want to take advantage of insulation supplies to insulate their houses without the benefit of the loan program because of the savings involved. I would recommend that those persons purchase their insulation during this two month period.

CONSERVATION—HOME INSULATION PROGRAM—POSSIBILITY OF INCLUDING TENANTS IN PROGRAM

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that there is nothing in this program to assist renters in insulating their residences, as is shown by the program which the government has been carrying on in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia where 40 per cent of the residences were occupied by tenants but 97 per cent of the grants went to homeowners, has the minister any program within this policy by which those who are in rented accommodation, and who need to reduce their energy costs just as much as homeowners, could be assured of assistance?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): We do anticipate that this will be possible, that renters will be able to take advantage of this program one way or another. We have been criticized in some quarters for trying to intrude into provincial jurisdiction. We have been trying to point out to the provinces, on the other hand, that unless certain actions are taken by them with respect to the landlord and tenants act or with respect to certain rent control practices, there will not be an incentive for the owner to reinsulate his house and therefore provide the benefit to the tenant. That is a very important part of the program as far as we are concerned and we hope the provinces will take the necessary measures to qualify.

AIR CANADA

REMOVAL OF NATIVES FROM AIRCRAFT—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Is he in a position today to make a statement to the House on the very unfortunate incident which occurred at the Ottawa airport? A number of native persons were removed from an Air Canada aircraft for the alleged reason that those people were of native ancestry. Serious charges of discrimination have been levelled against the airline. Is the minister prepared to make a statement in that regard?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, Air Canada has clearly indicated that the ancestry of the group had nothing to do with the fact that there was an overbooking, and certain people, therefore, could not be carried. Air Canada tried to make arrangements which were suitable to ensure that those people were taken care of in the interim and then put on alternate flights, but the incident had nothing to do with any particular background of the group.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister could tell the House why people who had already assumed their seats on the aircraft, people who had confirmed reservations, were removed in this sorry situation and why people who had not yet boarded the aircraft were not told that the aircraft was overbooked.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as far as I know at the present time it was part of the routine procedure for dealing with overbooking, but I will be glad to look into that further to see whether there were any special circumstances.

Mr. Oberle: It being apparent that the native persons involved through their national association are seeking redress in the courts by way of charges of discrimination, has the minister sought the advice of the Department of Justice as how the airline will behave in court with respect to this matter?

Mr. Lang: The Department of Justice would not ordinarily be involved.

OVERBOOKING BY AIRLINES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, the minister used the phrase "routine procedure". I hope he does not mean that overbooking is routine, because those of us who travel know that that has become all too prevalent a practice. Would the minister agree that the problem is serious and that something should be done to prevent an airline from overbooking, which in itself is an offence under law?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is a serious problem in trying to have airlines move at capacity while still allowing people to reserve and cancel without notice at no charge to themselves. I have raised this matter with the airline, and I hope that Air Canada and other airlines will seriously consider the possibility of charging for an absolute reservation, a bumpable reservation and the like in order to make sure that people know what it is they are buying.

Oral Questions

AIR CANADA

REMOVAL OF NATIVES FROM AIRCRAFT—SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION BY MINISTER OF LABOUR

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in light of the very serious consequences of this action by Air Canada, in light of the fact that cries of discrimination and racism have been raised, given the fact that within the Department of Labour the Minister of Labour has the proper mechanism whereby he can investigate this type of charge and keeping in mind that we do not like these in-house investigations by which Air Canada can whitewash the whole thing, would the Minister of Transport now take it upon himself to discuss this matter with the Minister of Labour in order to see whether the Department of Labour can follow up this matter? Would the minister take that under advisement?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Would the minister set at rest the rumours and speculations which abound today in the press, radio and television and advise the House whether he intends to continue to try to pull the country out of the simply frightful economic mess the government has got it into, or does he intend to switch his allegiance and his energies to another political arena in the future?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Yes or no?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton.

URBAN AFFAIRS

ALLEGATION GOVERNMENT OWES TAXES TO MUNICIPALITY OF OTTAWA-CARLETON—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. The major employers in most Canadian cities pay business taxes to the local municipality. In Ottawa the federal government is by far the largest employer and owns close to 40 per cent of the land, yet it does not pay business taxes at the same rate as other major industries. Can the minister explain the existence of a possible $18 million in non-paid taxes this year in the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton?

[Mr. Lang.]

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that some Crown corporations pay certain amounts of money to municipalities in lieu of taxes.

[English]

Mrs. Pigott: A supplementary question. I think there should be measures that the minister could consider to alleviate the situation whereby the average tax in Ottawa this year was $693, in Gloucester $990, in Toronto $597 and Hamilton $596. This shows the incredible pressure we are under in this area and I should like to know what the minister is going to do about it?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, when the Canadian government paid for the National Arts Centre, every Ottawa citizen was very proud of it, and I think that if one adds up all the expenditures made by the federal government for the city of Ottawa, one realizes that the people in Ottawa benefit substantially from the presence of the federal government in this city.

[English]

Mrs. Pigott: I find that very difficult to accept, Mr. Speaker. Never mind what is happening to the city of Ottawa, what is going to happen in Hull when 15,000 public servants move there? Is Hull going to have the same burden as Ottawa of non-paid taxes? What is going to happen to Hull?

PUBLIC SERVICE

SPLITTING OF UNIONS ON LINGUISTIC LINES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Is the minister aware of the decision of the Canadian Labour Relations Board which has split a national bargaining unit of the CBC along linguistic, cultural and sociological lines? As minister responsible for public unions, can he tell the House what the government intends to do about this very divisive decision which allows fragmentation of national bargaining units along racial lines and which if allowed to go unchallenged will become an invidious precedent for other elements within the Canadian Union of Public Employees?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will take the hon. member's comments by way of a representation and give them full consideration but I am not in a position to give a definitive answer today.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REASON CORPORATION FAILED TO INTERVENE IN LABOUR BOARD HEARING TO PREVENT SPLITTING OF UNION ON LINGUISTIC LINES

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, may I put my supplementary question to the Secretary of State. At this time in our nation's history when we are trying to pull this country together and keep it together, can the minister tell us, as minister responsible for the CBC, why the CBC did not intervene in the hearing before the CLRB and give its statement on the efficacy of national bargaining units rather than having units fragmented along linguistic and racial lines which opens up a whole new Pandora's box?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, my answer would have to be similar to that given by the President of the Treasury Board: I will take the hon. member's representation into consideration and make inquiries of the CBC. I shall try to get him the information as quickly as possible.

Mr. Nowlan: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate in part the answers of the hon. ministers and I would have put the following question to the Prime Minister had he been in the House today. The national unity debate is to start tomorrow and I do not know if the Secretary of State intends to participate. In view of the green paper on linguistic policy and minority rights, if the minister does intend to participate in the debate I wonder if he could give the answer at that time because it will obviously be a little more involved than is allowed within the parameters of the question period?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I would hope that if I catch Your Honour's eye, and if hon. members wish to hear me, that I will be able to speak in the debate and give some sort of response to the hon. member.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

FOOD POLICY—PROPOSED STUDY OF PROCESSING, DISTRIBUTION AND RETAIL SECTORS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs concerns the government's food strategy that he announced jointly with the Minister of Agriculture some days ago in the House. In light of the fact that an understanding of the processing, distribution and retail sectors will be essential to the formulation of any successful food policy, has the minister and his department set up an intensive and comprehensive study of this matter?

● (1430)

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I simply reply that, as the hon. member says, these are key areas in the system. I had several discussions with officials of my department, both before and after the announcement of the food strategy, and we are planning a number of studies in the areas the hon. member mentioned.

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since one out of four jobs in Canada depends directly or indirectly on the food industry and agriculture; since the president of one of Canada's largest food processing companies has stated that his company's next capital investment will be made in the United States because economic conditions in this country are poor; and as 16 of 17 processing plants in the Niagara Peninsula closed down between 1965 and the present, does the minister not believe that more intensive studies must be undertaken of the food distribution and processing industries so that we may maintain the remaining jobs in that industry in Canada, and a healthy economic climate?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge at once that this industry is probably the most basic and vital of the whole economy, inasmuch as our consumers spend between 20 cents and 25 cents out of every dollar on food. Therefore I agree that in this area we must develop studies as rapidly as possible.

FINANCE

TAXING OF BENEFITS FROM LIFE INSURANCE POLICIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Are significant measures being taken to satisfy the very real concerns of the Canadian Life Underwriters Association and the public in general regarding tax legislation on life insurance benefits payable to widows, orphans and other survivors of policy holders, as introduced in the last federal budget?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I invite the hon. gentleman to read the bill now before the House.

An hon. Member: You are reaching into the grave.

POST OFFICE

ALLEGATION UNION DENIED ACCESS TO MEANS OF COMMUNICATING WITH MEMBERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. Since negotiations between the Post Office Department and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers have broken down; since this breakdown in the negotiations was caused by the Post Office Department's attempt to interfere in dealings between the membership of CUPW and its leadership, can the minister tell the House if he has instructed his officials to permit CUPW leaders access to means of communication to inform their membership of negotiations both during and outside working hours?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, there has never been any interference with the possibility of the union communicating with its workers relating to any subject matter, including the negotiations. I take strong exception to the hon. gentleman's allegation that the cessation of negotiations was caused by the Post Office Department. The cessation was directly unilateral on the part of CUPW, whose members stormed out of the negotiation sessions, for the alleged reason of making application to the PSSRB, which has now been adjourned to September. The Public Service Staff Relations Board indicated that there is nothing in the application to prevent CUPW from returning to the negotiating table. Evidently they are not ready to do that, and their reasoning is completely unknown to me.

BREAKDOWN OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNION—PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the Postal Union has documented many cases of the Post Office's interference in union activities, interferences such as refusing to allow union publications to be posted and distributed to the membership; and since postal workers had actually documented cases of the Post Office's issuing conflicting bulletins to union members, can the minister tell the House whether—

An hon. Member: Look who's talking.

Mr. Rodriguez: Just be quiet.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: —can the minister tell the House whether he is now prepared to have a parliamentary committee look at the impasse which has occurred between CUPW and the Post Office Department?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the facts are quite to the contrary. CUPW has had seven sessions before the Public Service Staff Relations Board and has been invited to catalogue those particular allegations or those particular—

Mr. Rodriguez: Answer the question.

Mr. Blais: —cases which the hon. member has alleged. But the union has been unable to do that, because there are no such cases, Mr. Speaker. The Post Office Department has always been most interested in having instant and increasing communication between the workers and the Post Office Department. The hon. gentleman should check his facts.

Mr. Rodriguez: Answer the question.

Mr. Grafftey: We want Bryce.

Mr. Blais: If the hon. member will read the transcript of the proceedings before the Public Service Staff Relations Board he will see that the allegations he advances are completely groundless.

Mr. Rodriguez: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Resign, resign.

Mr. Rodriguez: Since the Postmaster General is substituting bluster for fact, is he prepared, since he did not answer the question I asked and he is so confident the facts are on his side, to submit the impasse to a parliamentary committee for investigation?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I answered a similar question on Thursday, asked by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris. I wish the hon. gentleman had been here to listen to the reply.

Mr. Rodriguez: I was.

Mr. Blais: Perhaps he should read Hansard of that day.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGATION JAMES KENNEDY INCARCERATED WITHOUT BEING CHARGED

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Justice. It concerns the denial of basic human rights to one James Kennedy who has been held in a maximum security institution in Vancouver for over five weeks without charge, on the strength, as the Minister of Manpower and Immigration said on Thursday, of reasonable grounds for believing he is somebody else. I ask the Acting Minister of Justice, is this the sort of treatment it is this government's policy to mete out to any landed immigrant? In other words, can anyone be locked up in this manner without charges being laid?

Mr. Paproski: Is there no acting minister who can stand up and reply?

Mr. Clarke: Apparently there is no Acting Minister of Justice.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

AUTHORITY FOR NEW FINANCING ARRANGEMENTS FOR CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Reports circulated recently say that the Canadian International Agency, CIDA, has obtained a new deal whereby it will be able to spend funds without referring all cases to Treasury Board. Bearing in mind the terms of the Financial Administration Act, can the minister say under what authority these new arrangements were made and if they were entered into to compensate for the lapsing fund arrangement under which CIDA benefited heretofore?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the new administrative processes applying to certain CIDA expenditures are totally within the Financial Administration Act and indeed there was, as a parallel consideration, the elimination of the ability or authority of CIDA to carry forward lapsing funds, for a cumulative effect. That was, in my opinion and the opinion of others, an impossible situation which should not be allowed to continue. These arrangements were not trade-offs, in that sense. They were part of the general reorganization of the structure or process.

GUIDELINES FOR ACCOUNTABILITY OF CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY TO PARLIAMENT

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question concerns the terms and conditions set forth in the guidelines Treasury Board drew up for CIDA to follow. Is the minister satisfied that CIDA should be both judge and jury with respect to its compliance with these guidelines? In these conditions, what sort of accountability to Parliament and the Auditor General are we going to see after the fact, after CIDA has spent the money? Is the minister satisfied that this procedure will be okay?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I doubt whether an elaboration on that matter is possible in a short answer given during the question period. I will be glad to inform the hon. member in much more detail how this process will work and why I feel reassured that there will be sufficient follow-up and respect for parliamentary authority.

FISHERIES

PROPOSED JOINT CANADA-UNITED STATES MANAGEMENT COMMISSION FOR GEORGES BANK—DATE OF IMPLEMENTATION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. Since eastern Canadian premiers and New England governors have agreed on the need for a joint commission to manage fish stocks in the disputed Georges Bank-Gulf of Maine area, an agreement which would take into consideration the historic co-operation of both countries' fishermen on the rich fishing grounds, will the minister say when this joint management proposal will be regularized? Second, will the minister indicate what progress is being made to determine the precise boundary between Canada and the United States?

• (1440)

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the possibility of a joint management plan was advanced by our officials some months ago. In fact, we felt that separating the boundary question from the stocks which tend to move back and forth would simplify matters. This suggestion was not accepted by the United States authorities at that time. It may be, however, that the difficulty of arriving at easy solutions for fish stocks that do move around will appear to recommend this approach. Certainly we like that proposal.

Mr. Crouse: In view of the valuable scallop, lobster and groundfish resource, will the minister consider making a proposal to his United States counterpart that the fisheries quotas on this bank be restricted only to American and Canadian fishermen, at least until such time as our deep sea fisheries stocks are restored above the sustainable level?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, given the fact that both countries have declared a 200 mile limit, it was felt that a joint management scheme could be the recommended approach. I might say in answer to the previous question that the boundaries matter has now entered a new phase of discussion between Canada and the United States. We should see some very serious negotiations going on in the next few months.

BANK OF CANADA

COST OF NEW HEADQUARTERS BUILDING

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. I have given him notice of the question. Can the minister indicate if he has at long last found out from officials at the Bank of Canada what exactly will be the final cost of the Bank of Canada building now being built on the south side of Wellington Street?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Just before coming into the House I received a statement from the Governor of the Bank of Canada. I will be glad to send it over to the hon. member.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I am sure many members of the House would be very interested in the overall figure for the cost of this building.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Can the minister now indicate the total figure, including all furniture, architects' fees, vaults and so on for the building? While giving us that, will he indicate when he last had a figure with respect to the total cost of this building.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the last question, subject to correction, I think it was my predecessor who last responded to a parliamentary question in this regard. I have the document here. The Governor has explained the situation on three pages. I would be glad to pass it over to the opposition.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the minister has indicated he has the document in his hands. Will he be good enough to table it for the benefit of all members of this House?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to table it. It is not in both official languages. If the House would be prepared to receive it on that basis, I would be prepared to lay it on the table.

Mr. Speaker: The tabling of such a document at this time would require the unanimous consent of this House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. He has been playing musical chairs. He has been here, there and everywhere. He may now be behind the curtain. Possibly Your Honour could see me in a moment or two.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION POLICY ON INVITING PERSONS TO REPRESENT GOVERNMENT AT OFFICIAL OPENING OF PROJECTS

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Prime Minister. Is it now government policy to permit the wives of cabinet ministers, such as Mrs. Otto Lang, to invite their relatives to officially represent the federal government at the opening of senior citizens housing projects or for that matter at any other federal projects? Will the government change this procedure to permit such functions to be performed by the federally elected representatives of this House, regardless of political affiliation?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is always a very good thing to have diversity in the representation. I find it most edifying that some women are willing to support their husbands in politics.

REASON WIFE OF MINISTER OF TRANSPORT ASSIGNED TO INVITE PERSONS TO OPEN HOUSING PROJECT

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister advise whether the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, who is responsible for arranging federal participation at official openings of senior citizens' projects, requested him or any of his staff to deal with this particular occasion that I have mentioned? More specifically, can he clear up just how his wife was assigned to usurp parliamentary and federal government authority?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check to see what route the requests in fact did follow. I want to tell the hon. member that the federal government was indeed very well represented by a member of the legislature from that area who performed his part very well. Tony Merchant did his usual good job in ensuring federal input into housing projects, which is not often recognized in other circumstances.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSING

REASON FOR FAILURE TO ALLOCATE MORE MONEY TO RESIDENTIAL REHABILITATION ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. It has to do with the $1.4 billion insulation program. How does the minister reconcile that $1.4 billion has been allotted to provide $350 grants when the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance program provides grants of up to $3,750 on loans for low-income families? It provides more than insulation. Why is more money not being extended to this program which would suit so many more people in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I did not quite understand the series of figures quoted by the hon. member. I will check his question and answer in detail tomorrow.

HARBOURS

HALIFAX—NEED FOR SECOND CONTAINER PIER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport about the often discussed second container pier for Halifax. The minister told me a few months ago he was not convinced that its time had come. Is the minister still of that opinion or is he now prepared to agree that it is urgently necessary for the development of that port?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I believe in reflecting back I said its time was coming and we would see when it had arrived. We have not yet made the decision of approving the additional money for a federal contribution, but I am still convinced that the time will come.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the minister whether there is any connection between the ardour with which the federal ministers seem to be working to get Cast to return all its operations to Montreal and the coolness of the minister toward the Port of Halifax?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it seems that the press reports indicate that the ardour does not rest with the federal ministers. Cast's return is in fact logical because that is where it ought to be. Obviously, we have not been playing a particularly active role in ensuring that. We have been doing our usual job of trying to make sure that transportation in Canada develops according to the best advantage to all of Canada.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

POSSIBILITY OF EXCEEDING FORECAST LEVEL OF EXPENDITURES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. There are reports which indicate that a good portion of the money which has been set aside for supplementary estimates has already been committed. Is the minister still optimistic about living within the level of forecast expenditures, as outlined in the 1977-78 fiscal year tabling of estimates? If not, can he indicate to the House any revised projections and, if so, when those projections will be coming forth?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, it is a tight fiscal framework with not sizeable reserves compared to previous years. Barring unforeseen eventualities, certain external happenings that could take place, as we indicated on previous occasions, we hope to meet our announced objectives and spending ceilings. I am still very optimistic we will stay within them.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister saying that he is fully optimistic that he is going to be able to live within the so-called 7 per cent increase in federal government expenditures for this fiscal year?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, it is not going to happen without a lot of effort. It will be difficult to sustain the restraint during that period of time, but yes, I am optimistic that we will accomplish it.

POST OFFICE

REPLACEMENT OF PLACE NAME ON CANCELLATION STAMP WITH NUMBERS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I see the mailman has returned, so may I direct a question to the Postmaster General. Will the minister explain in detail how far his department will extend the abolition of cancellations which state the name of the post office where the letter is mailed, replacing this with unidentifiable numbers? The minister led me to believe that this would be restricted to metropolitan areas such as Toronto and Montreal.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot recall having said that it would be restricted to the metropolitan areas of Toronto and Montreal. I indicated that we would restrict it as much as possible. I share the hon. gentleman's distaste for numbers replacing names. However, when we are dealing with a concentration of services in major area postal plants, we have to identify the postal plants and sometimes it is impossible to give the name of one over the name of the neighbouring area. That creates more squabbles than using the postal code itself.

REASON FOR LARGE CROWD VISITING MAIN POST OFFICE IN OTTAWA

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I am well aware of that but I am hoping that it will be restricted to those larger centres. My supplementary question is this. Could the minister inform the House of the reason for the overflow crowd visiting the main post office in Ottawa on July 1? Was it curiosity to see that monstrosity, or did most of them go there to pick up their mail which they could not get any other way?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I can see the hon. gentleman's tongue sticking out of his cheek. I am sure the hon. gentleman is very pleased, along with me, at the interest which the Canadian public is showing in the postal service and its mechanization. As he knows from having visited the Ottawa station, it is a very good one, very attractive. It is centrally located and we plan on having more open houses in order to familiarize the greatest number of Canadians possible with our postal services.

SPORT

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF USE OF DRUGS BY ATHLETES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and is further to a motion put last week. Realizing that the minister's concerns are more with amateur sports than with professional sports, and rightly so, but remembering the precedent setting legislation of the Minister of National Health and Welfare which interfered with professional football, would the minister advise the House whether or not she is aware that excessive and damaging amounts of drugs are distributed regularly by sports team managements to athletes, setting a dangerous precedent to our youth, a practice that prompted a director of the Canadian Foundation on Alcohol and Drug Dependencies to issue warnings to several CFL clubs, only to be fired for doing his job; and if she is not aware of this situation, could she undertake to initiate an investigation into the general extensive use of drugs in sports in Canada?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I feel that the hon. member has made a rather blanket statement, and in his broad net he may have captured some people in this country of whom we are rather proud. If he has any specific information dealing with specific detail which I understand he has been informed of, I would be pleased to receive it and on that basis I will consult with my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

HEALTH

ALLEGED FIRING OF MR. McNICHOLL FOR WARNING TEAM MANAGERS ABOUT ENCOURAGING PLAYERS TO USE DRUGS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): May I thank the minister of state for her answer and she can be assured that I will pass forward to her my information. May I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that Mr. Andre McNicholl was fired as the director of the Canadian Foundation on Alcohol and Drug Dependencies for warning the management of two CFL teams, namely the Ottawa Rough Riders and the Toronto Argonauts, for encouraging their players to use excessively damaging drugs and stimulants prior to their games, would the minister undertake to look into this matter and take steps to have Mr. McNicholl reinstated in his former position?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Well, Mr. Speaker, obviously I could not force any private organization in this country to reinstate somebody in a former position; but with regard to the particular allegations made by the hon. member, I will look into them. I am not aware of them at this time.

COMMUNICATIONS

POSSIBILITY RIGHT OF CITIZENS TO RECEIVE PROGRAMS ORIGINATING IN UNITED STATES TO BE CURTAILED

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications. In light of the recently announced decision of the CRTC to refuse to renew the licence for the Arrow Lakes Television Society and other TV co-operative societies to carry channel 4 Spokane, I would ask the Minister of Communications whether she condones this type of interference in the citizen's freedom of choice, and whether she could advise the House if her department or the CRTC have plans similarly to curtail the freedom of citizens of Canada and other communities in Kootenay West presently receiving U.S. channels?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the freedom of citizens is very well protected right now by the regulating process of the CRTC.

[English]

Mr. Brisco: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of the fact that the legal division of the CRTC has ruled that any co-operative society which is broadcasting on air instead of on cable American TV channels is, in effect, broadcasting a program without Canadian content, and in light of the fact that their licences will not be renewed this fall because they are broadcasting on air, will the minister explain why this is so when other societies can do the same thing off air?

[Translation]

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I do not know the details of that decision by the CRTC, but I feel that it concerns the need to protect against undue competition those who hold licences to operate a station. However, I will examine the hon. member's question in full detail, but I must remind him that I am not in the habit of getting involved in the decisions by the CRTC.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—STEPS TO ENSURE ADDITIONAL BENEFITS TO CANADA

Hon. Herb. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has the minister met as yet with the automobile manufacturers to discuss with them the findings of the recently tabled Arthur report? I understand that such a meeting was to take place recently. If so, has the minister obtained commitments from them to increase their capital investment, research and development and purchases of automobile parts in Canada to levels more commensurate with sales of their automobiles in this country, as I think should be done? If so, what are those commitments? If that is not the case, what steps are the government taking to ensure that there will be suitable levels of benefits in these areas to add to those benefits which the auto pact has already brought to Canada in other areas of the automotive industry?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity to have a long conversation with all the automobile manufacturers last week, and we discussed the problem. We found that the auto pact has been very advantageous for Canada in the last 12 years. However, there is room for improvements, particularly in the investments to be made in Canada. The manufacturers have thus agreed to meet with department officials for a review of their mid-term investment plans, and we will then take decisions which will hopefully be in the best interests of that industry and Canada.

TRANSPORT

ESCALATION OF PENSIONS OF RETIRED RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport regarding the report of Dr. Noel Hall on railway pension plans in Canada, about which the government has done little except to refer the matter to railway management and the unions. In view of the fact that any action that management and unions might take will not do anything for Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railway workers already retired, and in view of the fact that these pensioners have had no escalation of their pensions at all in 1977, will the minister put pressure on both Canadian National and Canadian Pacific to bring in escalation of the pensions of their retired workers this year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I accept the hon. member's suggestion that this could not be the subject of bargaining between the parties. However, my colleague the Minister of Labour is looking at the further action which the government ought to take and will be bringing forward proposals in due course.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that many of these pensioners are actually dying off before anything is done, which makes it urgent to do something for the senior pensioners of all our railways, will the government take a special look at the problems of railway workers already retired?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, we certainly are very sympathetic to that, but I hope that the hon. member would not take pressure off the unions and management for dealing with it as well in their bargaining.

● (1500)

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It is with great pride, speaking on behalf of Canadians of Slavic descent, that I rise on a point of privilege to pay tribute to the magnificent and moving performance by the Shumka Dancers of Edmonton in the Canada Day celebrations viewed by millions of Canadians from coast to coast and filling us with the sense of the oneness of this great nation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) really expects me to hear from someone on behalf of every group which took part in that three-hour show. I am sure there are other hon. members who would want to do so. I do not mean to be disrespectful, and I understand the sentiment behind every regional or ethnic group which participated in those celebrations, but if I extended to one member an opportunity to go on at some length in respect of one group, I would have to extend the same opportunity to every member. I think that would be an extension of a question of privilege.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I understand it is not necessary for the ministry to answer questions at all, and I also understand there are times and instances which require ministers to be absent from the House. However, I refer to order in council, P.C. 1976-2303 of September 20, 1976, which names as acting ministers of justice, in the absence of the minister himself, the present Solicitor General (Mr. Fox), who was not present in the House today, and the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand), a former solicitor general, who was also not in the House today. It involves very seriously the ability of ordinary members to carry out the duties which have been entrusted to them.

We had no response of any kind from a parliamentary secretary, and the Acting Prime Minister, whoever he was today, failed to intervene to indicate whether there was any acting minister of justice or not. In fact, there were 20 members of cabinet sitting there today, including the Acting Prime Minister, and they sat mute and let this question fall on the floor, while a Canadian resident who is here on a Canadian visa has remained in jail for over five weeks now without a charge and without a public hearing.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege. As Your Honour knows, this House has been preoccupied for the last three or four weeks with a series of very pressing questions relating to the responsibilities of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox). The Minister of Justice was absent today, as were those ministers who carry his responsibilities in his absence, the present Solicitor General and the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand).

Two weeks ago I laid before the Solicitor General information which is very critical and, in his words, affects the safety and lives of certain people I named to him. Having regard to the matter I raised in this House over the last three or four weeks, the matter relating to the break-in of L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec, in Montreal, particularly the second break-in which we wanted to raise questions about today, and the matter in Vancouver where an immigrant has been locked up for over five weeks in unusual custody—shackled when he is taken outside—without a charge, without an application for extradition from any other country, and without a charge against this person from any other country, I cannot believe that these gentlemen are not absent by design. The Leader of the Opposition—

Some hon. Members: Where is he?

Mr. Paproski: He is in Verdun.

Mr. Oberle: —has required these gentlemen to announce an inquiry into one or all of these very serious matters. With these members absent there is no way this House can function. There is no way members on this side can fulfil the obligations they have to raise these matters, and get satisfactory answers as long as this kind of behaviour continues. I am sitting here with information which is very critical. I have the names of persons alleged to have committed very serious crimes. Two weeks ago I asked the Solicitor General to give me guidance as to what I should do with this information. Today I wanted to ask him how much longer he expects me to sit on this information, having myself been threatened from an unknown source. This matter should be referred to an appropriate committee of the House and we should expect some kind of ruling from Your Honour.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I am in a bit of a dilemma because of the ruling Your Honour made concerning the question of privilege proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski). I was not going to speak about any of the particular groups, but as a member of parliament I wanted to say something about those who are not usually heralded in events like this. I am referring to the technicians, artisans, painters, electricians and the staff of this House who had to go through considerable extra trouble because of the events of July 1. Perhaps we could recall those people when we reflect upon the events of July 1. Despite ourselves, many of us had quite a good time on Canada Day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) will realize that under no circumstances would I permit him to do that.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

LENGTH OF SPEECHES IN DEBATE ON NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, in relation to the debate which the House will be taking up tomorrow and the next day in connection with national unity, there have been discussions involving both sides of the House about ways in which we might be able to accommodate as many members as possible who may want to speak in that debate. There have been indications that a great many members of this House will be anxious to take part in that discussion. We are exploring a number of ways in which they might be accommodated to the greatest extent possible.

At this stage we have obtained initial agreement as to the limitation of speeches during the course of that debate. I understand there is disposition in the House to make a House order directing that the first round of speeches be the normal 40 minutes in length, but that speeches after the first round be limited to 20 minutes in length.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, yes, that is so, I understand, from speaking with my friend, that the first speaker for the government will be the right hon. member in whose name the motion stands, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I wish to inform the House that the first speaker for Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition will be the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). The agreement applies to those two, the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) and the first spokesman for the Social Credit Party. I have indicated that order of speaking for my friend, and I want to thank him and say that we agree with the limitation of 40 minutes for the four I have mentioned, and 20 minutes for speakers thereafter in the debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we agree with the proposal that speeches in the national unity debate, after the first round, should be limited to 20 minutes. I am also happy to confirm the statement just made, that the opening speaker for the New Democratic Party will be our leader, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent).

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, we have agreed on this: 40 minutes for each party leaders, and 20 minutes for other members.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed, and so ordered.

CADET UNIFORMS

Question No. 1,408—Mr. Schumacher:

1. Was a decision made by the Department of National Defence to issue safari-style uniforms to all branches of the Cadet movement and, if so (a) on what date (b) by whom?

2. Were members of the Cadet movement consulted in regard to the change and, if so (a) what are their names, ranks and locations (b) on what date (c) in what location did such consultation take place?

3. What is the physical and dollar value description of the existing stock of older-style uniforms?

4. What is the value of the existing stock of the safari-style uniform and how many are on order at the present time?

5. Has any opposition to the change been received by the Department and, if so (a) in what nature (b) by whom?

6. How many of the safari-style suits have been issued and what was the total cost to date?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. During the past two years there have been a continuing series of discussions between the Cadet Associations and the Department of National Defence concerning clothing for the Cadet Leagues. Following these discussions, the Minister of National Defence, on 20 January 1977, announced that cadets would all be supplied with the bush jacket-style green uniform. The three leagues were given the opportunity to submit recommendations for modifications and additions to the new cadet uniforms to provide each cadet organization with distinctive item of dress.

2. Yes, on two occasions. (i) (a) Mr. W. J. Hodge, General Manager, Navy League of Canada. Mr. W. J. Brown, General Manager, Army Cadet League of Canada. Mr. A. MacDonald, Executive Director, Air Cadet League of Canada. (b) 30 Jan. 1974. (c) National Defence Headquarters. (ii) (a) Mr. J. E. Koyl, National President, Navy League of Canada. BGen E. G. Eakins, President, Army Cadet League of Canada. Mr. D. H. Arnett, President, Air Cadet League of Canada. (b) 6 Dec. 1974. (c) National Defence Headquarters.

3. $3,078,000—consisting of the residue of stocks used for issue to the Navy, Army and Air Force prior to integration. It is not in complete size ranges and consists mostly of adult sizes.

4. Seventy-eight thousand six hundred sets are being procured plus 30,000 sets of summer camp clothing for a total program cost of $7.6 million. 42 per cent of the total order has been delivered with a value of $3.2 million.

5. Yes. (a) By letter. (b) The Navy League of Canada and the Air Cadet League of Canada.

6. Eighteen thousand six hundred ninety-nine sets (less raincoats, sweaters and badges) issued to female Army and Air Cadets with a value of approximately $1.04 million.

INVESTIGATION OF IMMIGRANTS

Question No. 2,173—Mr. Stevens:

As of December 31 (a) 1968 (b) 1976, what was the number of federal employees engaged to investigate immigrants arriving in Canada?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Manpower and Immigration is concerned: Persons involved in interviewing applicants abroad as of December 31 (a) 185 (b) 179. Persons carrying out interviews at the points of entry in Canada of December 31 (a) 672 (b) 966 permanent and 32 casuals.

In so far as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is concerned: the Royal Canadian Mounted Police do not investigate immigrants arriving in Canada per se. They, however, do engage in the security screening of prospective immigrants prior to the landing of the individuals concerned as a routine part of the immigration procedure. They also conduct investigations in relation to immigrants who are in Canada. These latter investigations are specifically in relation to immigrants who are, or are suspected to be, in Canada illegally.

Order Paper Questions

CUSO/SUCO

Question No. 2,226—Mr. Herbert:

1. In each of the past five years, how much has been contributed by the Canadian International Development Agency to the Service universitaire canadien outre-mer?

2. In each year, what percentage of the budget of SUCO was contributed by CIDA?

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. CIDA contributes to the corporate-entity CUSO/SUCO and not separately to the Anglophone section (CUSO) or the Francophone section (SUCO). Over the past five years the contributions to CUSO/SUCO were as follows: 1972-73, $6,700,000; 1973-74, $7,300,000; 1974-75, $7,308,900; 1975-76, $8,376,000; 1976-77, $9,100,000. The CIDA contribution was allocated internally by the CUSO/SUCO Board of Directors as follows:

	CUSO	SUCO
1972-73	60.0 per cent	40.0 per cent
1973-74	66.9 per cent	33.1 per cent
1974-75	69.5 per cent	30.5 per cent
1975-76	68.2 per cent	31.8 per cent
1976-77	68.7 per cent	31.3 per cent

2. As allocated internally by the CUSO/SUCO Board of Directors, CIDA's contribution to the total operations of SUCO was as follows: 1972-73, 46.8 per cent; 1973-74, 55.5 per cent; 1974-75, 57.6 per cent; 1975-76, 41.3 per cent; 1976-77, 40.4 per cent.

DELIVERY OF POSTAL GROUP BOXES

Question No. 2,262—Mr. Bawden:

1. Are postal areas or depots, in the Calgary South Area, to be served by group boxes and, if so (a) which ones (b) what are the distances between the location of the boxes and the households?

2. Was there a delay in the shipment of group boxes and, if so, for what reason?

3. Will any contractual penalty be incurred by the supplier of the group boxes for non-delivery or late delivery and, if so, of what nature?

4. What are the operational functions required before such boxes can be made operational?

5. What is the name and location of the supplier of boxes?

6. Will the group boxes, installed in or near new developments in the Calgary South area, be replaced by letter carrier walks and, if so, on what date?

7. In the Calgary South area, what is the time delay in the (a) recognition that a new development requires group boxes and when orders are placed with the supplier (b) placing of orders for the delivery of such boxes and the installation near the respective new development?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): 1. Yes. (a) Woodlands, Canyon Meadows, Oak Ridge, Braeside and Pumphill subdivisions. (b) Generally not exceeding two to three blocks.

2. There was no delay in the shipment of group boxes by the supplier.

3. No, due to the fact that the supplier adhered to all terms and conditions of the contract. Shipments of boxes commenced two weeks prior to scheduled delivery on contract.

4. Painting, numbering and locating them on suitable sites.

5. Rousseau Metal Inc., P.O. Box 490, Saint-Jean-Port-Joli, Quebec G0R 3G0.

6. Constraint limits on manpower growth preclude us from extending letter carrier routes to these areas at the present time.

7. (a) Recognition of the requirements of group boxes in new developments is a continuing process, and orders for boxes are made a year ahead. (b) Delivery of boxes from existing stock and installations would take approximately three weeks.

FORMER MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT RECEIVING PENSIONS

Question No. 2,397—Mr. Isabelle:

How many former Members of Parliament are presently receiving pensions from the House of Commons and, in each case, what (a) is his/her name (b) was the number of years of service (c) is the annual amount received?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): As of March 31, 1976, 230 annual allowances were being paid to former members of parliament. Of these, 88 have become payable since the establishment of the new plan in 1970. (a) See the answer to question No. 2,191 given on May 2, 1977. (b) The average number of years of service on which these 88 pensions are based is 11.75. (c) The average annual allowance is $7,212.64.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if questions Nos. 1,781 and 2,210 could be made orders for returns, these returns would be tabled immediately.

● (1510)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I wonder why these questions are being made orders for returns, rather than being answered in the normal way. Is it so they will not appear in Hansard?

Mr. Goodale: As hon. members can tell from the bulky documents I am holding in my hand, the reason is obviously the lengthy nature of the answer in each case.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that these questions be made orders for returns?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

Question No. 1,781—Mr. McKenzie:

1. By province and territory, and for the whole of Canada, for each fiscal year 1966 to 1976, what amount of money was (a) contributed to the Canada Pension Plan Account (b) paid from the Canada Pension Plan Account to beneficiaries (c) expended, on a pro rata basis, from the Canada Pension Plan Account on administration of the (i) Account (ii) Canada Pension Plan Investment Fund (d) invested by the Canada Pension Plan Investment Fund in provincial securities?

2. For the same years, with regard to the amount of money contributed to the Canada Pension Plan Account that is greater than the amount disbursed to beneficiaries and on administration, what proportion (a) of the excess of contributions less disbursements, was invested in securities of a province (b) was not invested and to what use was it put?

3. For the same years, by province and territory and for Canada, how many separate issues of federal and provincial securities have been purchased by the Canada Pension Plan Investment Fund and, in each case (a) what is the date of issue (b) what is the rate of interest (c) what are its terms (d) on what dates are interest payments due (e) what are its repayment provisions?

4. With respect to the payment of interest and the repayment of the principal amount, are all issues of securities in good standing?

5. Does the government or any provincial government finance the payment of interest on any securities outstanding, with the issue of new securities and, if so, which governments?

6. Is there a point at which it would be financially inadvisable to allow a government to finance either payments of interest or repayments of principal by issuing new securities and, if so, to what indicators would the administrator of the Plan refer in establishing this point?

Return tabled.

DOCUMENT "SECURITY CLEARANCE REQUIRED FOR EMPLOYMENT"

Question No. 2,210—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources issue a document numbered 2860-0 and marked "confidential" on April 26, 1976, signed by Mr. R. P. St. John on the subject of "Security Clearance Required for Employment" and, if so, was the document circulated to Assistant Deputy Ministers, Directors General, Directors and Senior Advisors?

2. Did the document state in part that "a basic security clearance of 'confidential' is therefore required in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, even in circumstances where the person concerned does not have access to classified material" and, if so (a) what are the reasons justifying such a move (b) is this part of a new departmental or government policy to investigate more closely the private lives of public servants and what are the reasons for doing this?

3. (a) How many employees of the Department have been fingerprinted in connection with this security programme (b) on what date did the programme begin and on whose instructions?

4. (a) What is the total number of departmental employees originally scheduled to be fingerprinted (b) has the number been changed and, if so, what is the present figure?

5. Did the memo by Mr. St. John state that Assistant Deputy Ministers, Directors General and Directors require security clearance of "top secret" and that their Deputies require security clearance of "secret" and, if so, what are the names and job designations of those who (a) have (b) have not completed the security clearance forms?

6. What are the names and job designations of all such persons who have been (a) fingerprinted (b) originally ordered to be fingerprinted (c) remaining to be fingerprinted?

Return tabled.

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION, ETC.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved that Bill C-27, to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, and to amend certain other statutes in consequences thereof, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Alexander: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Knowing the way in which the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) often takes the opportunity afforded him by the rules as being the first to speak on this side, I just want to let Your Honour know that under Standing Order 31 I intend to speak on behalf of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, thereby circumventing the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: I would indicate to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) that the proper time to raise this very interesting point is at the conclusion of the minister's speech, not at the beginning of it.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, many long and intensive hours have been devoted by members of this House to the detailed consideration of Bill C-27 both during the hearings of the standing committee and at the report stage. Now that we have arrived at third reading, it seems to me appropriate to set the main provisions of Bill C-27 in perspective. I also think it desirable to take this opportunity of setting the record straight on errors and misrepresentations which have been made about the bill.

The first objective of the bill is to improve the quality of the employment related services of the federal government to Canadians. This is reflected in our proposal to integrate the Unemployment Insurance Commission with the Department of Manpower and Immigration. Undoubtedly, this will help to ensure better access to such services, better identification of needs and a better delivery system through integrated, personalized services in one location under a unified management. The amendments will also provide an improved framework for the achievement of a better balance between service and control in the administration of the unemployment insurance program, and the commission will be reviewing all existing service and control measures with a view to improving them both and achieving an optimum balance between the two. The integration of the two organizations will also promote the development of more pertinent and more coherent employment and income protection policies and programs. In this latter respect, I think our proposal to extend the commission form of management, which ensures adequate participation of the private sector, both labour and management, to the entire spectrum of employment services is particularly fitting.

The second, and complementary, objective of Bill C-27 is to streamline and improve the unemployment insurance program in order to make it more responsive to present economic circumstances. One area of such improvement will be the unemployment insurance benefit structure, which will be simplified and more equitable. It will also be better adapted to regional economic conditions, particularly as a result of the amendment I have made to add additional regional extended benefit entitlement in regions of high unemployment. Similarly, the variable entrance requirement will make the unemployment insurance program more sensitive to regional differences. We have been told that a variable entrance requirement is a major departure from the previous so-called concept of equality of access to the program and that it will balkanize the country and threaten its unity. When the NDP opposes the variable entrance requirement, they ignore the fact that workers living in areas of high unemployment face greater difficulties not only in finding employment but also in holding on to jobs. This is indicated in the statistics we have already circulated together with my statement on April 26 showing the higher proportion of short-term attachments in regions of higher unemployment. Among the murky misrepresentations made by members of the NDP on the variable entrance requirement there was one ray of light that came from the hon. member from Brant (Mr. Blackburn). He supported the notion that the entrance requirement could be increased when unemployment decreases. This is, of course, precisely what the variable entrance requirement does.

The representations made by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) on the variable entrance requirement have been distinguished more by their verbosity than by their accuracy. The most outstanding example is the reference he made both during the committee and the report stage to the brief submitted by the Canadian Mining Association. In quoting from the association's brief, he stopped just short of quoting a sentence in the brief which is in full support of the government's position. I think it is essential that the position of the Canadian Mining Association be put on record. The omitted sentence reads as follows:

> We believe, therefore, that the 10 to 14 week variable entrance requirement proposed by the minister on April 26th to your committee is appropriate and equitable under existing circumstances.

This is not an isolated example of distortions. The hon. member for Nickel Belt made a statement during the report stage that when he visited the St. John's Canada Manpower centre in Newfoundland, there were only two jobs listed on the job board. This is not so. The manager of the CMC advises that on that day he had upward of 50 jobs listed. Apparently the hon. member visited the office early in the morning and looked at one job board reserved for new jobs listed that day. Other job boards contained listings of dozens of other jobs. In view of these inaccuracies, Mr. Speaker, one wonders at all other statements by the hon. member.

The major objective of the unemployment insurance amendments in bill C-27 was not to cut costs. It was to achieve a better allocation of resources. As I stated on second reading, the evidence we have accumulated points to the fact that unemployment insurance is not the most effective way of helping to resolve the problems of those with a short-term attachment to the labour force. This was one of the reasons we substantially increased the funds available in our employment strategy to fund alternative measures, such as direct job creation, training and counselling. It was not, as spokesmen for the NDP have alleged, that we felt that the short term attachments were "ripping off the system".

This brings us to the third general objective of the bill, which is the provision for developmental uses of the UI funds. These are positive steps we propose to take to help reduce unemployment. In the area of training, we will rationalize and simplify the income maintenance arrangements for unemployment insurance claimants taking Manpower training programs. It is well established that suitably designed training programs increase earning capacity and longer term employability. Moreover, the new arrangement will liberate additional funds for training. Yet the NDP by opposing the provision, would deny these advantages to Canadian workers, notwithstanding representations I have received from at least one NDP member that additional training is urgently needed by the unemployed in his constituency.

As I indicated in my remarks at the report stage, the government is fully sensitive to the fact that the use of unemployment insurance funds for work sharing and job creation represents a new departure. I have also indicated our sensitivity to the potential problems involved and to the concerns expressed by representatives of management and labour. Nevertheless, these new approaches seem worth trying since they potentially represent a more positive and creative use of income maintenance funds. The government recognizes that work sharing will not be viable unless both labour and management in particular establishments are prepared to try it out. I repeat the assurances I have already given to the House, that the provisions relating to work sharing will not be implemented unless such support is forthcoming.

At this point I think it is also essential that the record be set straight on our concept of work sharing. It has never been envisaged as a general way of solving the problems of an over-all shortage of jobs. Rather, it would be designed as a way of helping particular establishments facing temporary economic difficulties to share work for specified periods rather than laying off part of their work force entirely.

I also repeat my assurance that we will undertake further intensive discussions with the new advisory council on the use of unemployment insurance funds in job creation projects. I am hopeful that exploration of the problems and how they may best be solved will lead to the conclusion that we should, in fact, proceed on a pilot project basis to determine the extent to which the advantages we see in these ideas can be achieved in practice.

The amendments contained in Bill C-27 have been made as a result of a long period of investigation, discussion and debate. I am confident that the integration of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Department of Manpower and Immigration, and the revisions of the unemployment insurance program constitute a sound basis for providing better employment services to Canadian workers and employers. I have already mentioned the need to achieve a better balance between service and control in the administration of the unemployment insurance program, which will be promoted with this bill. During the discussions in committee and in the House I have been struck by the frequent references made by many members on the need to provide better service.

In this connection it should be recalled that in the years immediately following the introduction of the new legislation in 1971, the commission's first concern was to improve service. As progress was made in that direction, parallel steps were taken to improve control measures. The commission's continuing responsibility for ensuring the integrity of the unemployment insurance program by maintaining adequate control is doubly important since the commission is the steward not only of public funds but also of premium contributions made directly by the private sector. I am not satisfied that we have yet achieved an optimum balance between service and control. I do agree, of course, that there are clear limitations on the extent to which control measures can be pursued. Financial considerations and public acceptance are two key factors which determine the parameters of control measures. At the same time, the integrity of the unemployment insurance program is essential to the program's acceptance by the public.

As I indicated earlier, many representations have been made to me and to the department both from inside the House and from agencies outside. I have read and have had summarized very carefully all the briefs presented to the committee, many of which contained excellent recommendations. In some instances, however, these recommendations ran counter to others. For example, in some instances the 10-week to 14-week period was considered too short, and in others up to 26 weeks a year was recommended. So one has to arrive at an appropriate balance in the circumstances, given the fact that this program can only be made to work if it maintains its credibility. That had to be the guiding force in reaching the decisions that we have made in the department. I thank the House for its attention.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in an interesting position. The minister indicated that we have spent long hours on Bill C-27 and that we have heard many witnesses by way of petition or in person. I would bring to Your Honour's attention such groups as the Railway Association, the Employers' Council of British Columbia, the United Auto Workers, the Canadian Construction Association, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canada Labour Council, and the National Anti-Poverty Association. All of these organizations, as well as others, had the required expertise which they brought before the standing committee, which enabled us to come to some rational conclusions in clause by clause consideration of the bill. I believe I can stand here and express to them, on behalf of my colleagues on both sides of the House, very warm thanks for a job well done in a very complicated and sensitive matter because, as we have been reminded on several occasions, of the one million unemployed.

The minister has indicated the three objectives of the bill. The first is to improve the quality of unemployment insurance, and in this regard he mentioned the merger of the Department of Manpower and the Unemployment Insurance Commission. We all know where that idea stems from: it comes from the official opposition. But we are not seeking credit, Mr. Speaker. I notice that the minister made no mention of this whatsoever. But we are used to giving the governing party our ideas. They take them and give us no credit for them.

This merger will improve the quality of the service, and now the left hand will know what the right hand is doing. As my good friend, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) said, we in the official opposition have been, on several occasions, a policy bank for the party which is supposed to be governing the country. But we do not mind; this is part of our responsibility which we accept and exercise willingly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: We do this in preparation to taking over after the next election. That will be my last statement which can go unrefuted. Then the minister spoke about a balance between service and control. When we talk about balancing service and control, we are thinking about equity and justice, because all too often we as members of parliament are made aware of the harassment by and heavy-handed approach of benefit control officers. You are well aware of this, Mr. Speaker, coming from your riding. In your hallowed position you are made aware of the problems resulting from the heavy-handed approach of benefit control officers.

So we must move in and, with the influence we have, try to convince the minister that the Unemployment Insurance Commission should not use methods of harassment, be overzealous or heavy-handed. I hope this is what the minister has been talking about. This is certainly what I would be talking about if I were sitting in his place. However, I had better stop there. I have already made my statement in that regard and the minister knows what I am talking about. We are talking about equity and justice when we refer to the balance between service and control.

The third objective the minister spoke about was to relate unemployment insurance programs to economic realities. What does that mean? It simply means that we now have a variable approach to unemployment insurance. Once again I noted that the minister, with his usual charity, singled out the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau). He said that as a result of that hon. member's input the minister is now providing for further extended unemployment insurance benefits. The hon. gentleman even looked across at me and said that the official opposition in their wisdom and expertise brought forward a solution which he adopted holus-bolus, that is, the variable entrance requirements. We are not seeking any credit for it whatsoever, because as the hon. member for Victoria said, this party is a policy bank for the party that is supposed to be governing.

This is what we are talking about in terms of unemployment insurance programs being in step with economic reality. I will not dwell any longer on variable entrance requirements: we know what this means. It will mean, now, that people on unemployment insurance for the next three years will be able to acquire benefits depending on the rate of unemployment. There will be a change in entrance requirements in accordance with the rate of unemployment from 10 to 14 weeks, inclusive. This is a step in the right direction. As I understand it, it will last for three years, subject to the approval of parliament. After the three-year period there will be a requirement for a 14-week eligibility period.

The third objective was the developmental use of funds. There were many comments on the first objective and vigourous comments on the second, and on the third objective we ran into a considerable amount of flak. We on this side of the House were certainly concerned about the job training aspect, we were more concerned about the job creation aspect, and when it came to work sharing there was a traumatic atmosphere. This idea was one which both management and labour were very reluctant to accept: they made no bones about that whatsoever. The minister is right with regard to the developmental use of unemployment insurance funds; we have moved away from what I thought was the original intent behind unemployment insurance. I would like to quote from the minister's remarks as reported in Hansard for June 23, at page 7068, just to show how far we have taken this bill. This is what the minister stated:

> The original purpose of UI was to provide income protection to unemployed workers while they searched for suitable employment. This undoubtedly remains a fundamentally important purpose of the program. At the same time we all know that there have been dramatic changes in the economy, the labour market, and society, with the result that, for certain workers, immediate job prospects are poor. In these cases the provision of income maintenance by itself is not the most effective approach to the solution of their problems nor, indeed, to the problems of the labour market.

At one time unemployment insurance was protection for unemployed workers, but now we have moved to another area. Remember when it was just for an involuntary lay-off? We have brought in the pregnancy aspect and sickness aspect, and now we are bringing in developmental use of unemployment insurance funds. We are far away from the pre-1971 days.

One thing the minister did not touch upon—and I think it is of such significant importance that it should be touched upon now—is the fact that no matter how much we tinker with this bill, we will always have a problem with unemployment insurance as long as we continue not to create meaningful, long-lasting jobs. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) is a nice guy from the class of '68, but he is going to run into flak. This government is not aware of what being unemployed means—and we have one million unemployed. Premier Ed Schreyer indicated that he wanted to speak with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). He suggested that the first ministers get together because we have a national crisis of catastrophic proportions. He indicated that he wanted to meet with the Prime Minister and the other premiers to devise required schemes and plans to get this country moving on job creation. The other day Mr. Darcy McKeough—

Mr. Rodriguez: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: I will not get carried away. I know where that voice came from. I know who said "Oh, oh", but I will not be led astray.

Mr. Rodriguez: A retreaded Liberal.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. McKeough said that we are going to have problems with job creation. He said this is extremely important in his province and in other provinces because of the spill-off. The minister can pat himself on the back and say that he has three objectives, and all that kind of nonsense. I accept that; it is great stuff. But why has he not told us what he is going to do for the one million unemployed? We are losing something like $17 million a day—billions in lost productivity and millions in lost revenue in terms of taxation. Has my good friend the minister thought about that? As usual, he ignores that. He is complacent. I do not say he does not care, but the fact of the matter is that he does not know what is going on.

By itself, this unemployment insurance bill will not remove the awful stigma of slow growth, high unemployment and no productivity. We should listen to Ed Schreyer. I am no socialist, but when Premier Schreyer wants a meeting, there should be a meeting. The Prime Minister told me today that the Manpower ministers should first get involved, and that after they look into the matter he might decide whether the first ministers should get involved. That is a lot of nonsense. Let the first ministers meet now. Let them say that they agree on purpose, on determination, and on the fact that we must solve this problem. In my view, the priorities are wrong. We need more than just tinkering and playing around with the Unemployment Insurance Act. We need a government which is dedicated to full employment and wants to direct itself to the creation of full employment. There should be a job for every man and woman who wants to work. That should be the policy. I chastise the minister—not too harshly—for ignoring that very basic principle. That is part of his responsibility. He did not even talk about employment except to say that one objective is the developmental use of unemployment insurance funds regarding job creation.

Many concerns were registered concerning training, job creation and the work sharing aspect of this bill. The minister indicated that he realizes there is some concern about job creation. We should determine what we have been doing in terms of training. We should have a complete assessment so that we can see whether we have been successful. I hope the minister will look at what we have done. Are we just training people to rejoin the unemployment rolls? That seems to be the conclusion reached by a number of people—experts, at that. So I hope when the minister considers the funds which are used for job training, he will make a complete, analytical study of what has happened in the past regarding job training so we do not make the same mistakes again.

There was some concern about job creation and using developmental funds, or at least what are called developmental funds but which are really going to unemployment insurance funds. I think the minister is concerned because he does not know how this will work. This is also the concern of management and labour; they do not know how it will work, either. We proposed an amendment which would have allowed the minister a year to analyse this scheme of his and to see how it would work and whether it is a proper approach. The minister did not want that amendment, so it was not passed.

On the other hand, when it came to job creation, my socialist friends voted against the job creation aspect of this bill. They are the ones who always stand up in this House and tell the Canadian people they feel it is necessary that the government create jobs. That is the same bunch—and I call them hypocrites—which voted against the job creation aspect. I cannot understand it. But they will have to answer for that, whether they come from the Atlantic provinces or anywhere else. I see a good friend, whose name I will not mention, who is very concerned about Atlantic Canada. I do not know how he is going to explain that his party voted against job creation. He can give me a shout and I will do my best to help him, as I have in the past with other hon. members.

Mr. Hogan: Forty-one jobs under Canada Works in my constituency.

Mr. Alexander: In connection with job creation I want to quote the minister, as recorded in Hansard for June 23, at page 7069, as follows:

● (1540)

> In these circumstances it is my view that section 38 in clause 41 should be retained in the bill. I do, however, give my unequivocal assurance that I would not proceed with implementation until there have been further opportunities for discussion.

That is very important: he is not going to implement this until there have been further opportunities for discussion. He went on:

> Specifically, I would propose to refer the question to the newly established advisory council to permit a fuller exchange of views than we have yet been able to have. I would also give my assurance that, if it is clear that no labour or management support for experimentation is forthcoming, these provisions will not be implemented.

I accept the minister's statement that he is going to meet with the new advisory council to get further advice. There is a catch, however, in what he said here today compared with what he said on June 23. He only referred to the advisory council today, but on June 23 he said:

> —if it is clear that no labour or management support for experimentation is forthcoming, these provisions will not be implemented.

I want the minister to recall that. We had some problem with respect to putting UIC funds to developmental uses, but being realistic and not hypocritical, unlike the socialists to my left, we told the minister we would go along with that. The minister said he will not do it until he has had further discussion with the advisory council and with labour and management.

The work sharing proposal causes us some concern, as well. Papers prepared on the results of experiments in Italy, France and Germany suggest that work sharing is not a good thing and that labour and management in those countries do not want it. Mr. Speaker, I wish the socialists to my left would not bother me. I am trying to make a responsible speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) has the floor.

Mr. Alexander: I do not want to become partisan. I do not want to have anything to do with these people. They want to pretend to the workers that free rides are available. But, Mr. Speaker, there are no free rides. It is just socialist philosophy that you get everything for nothing. We will have an answer for that in the next election. Some notes on work sharing prepared by my brilliant research assistant revealed some very interesting findings. Both labour and management felt that section 37 could result in disruptive intrusion into the collective bargaining process, and they were uncomfortable with the participation of government in such arrangements. Both business and labour worried about the criteria used to determine which businesses would be eligible. They feared that the work sharing program might be used to artificially bolster inefficient plants. This view was registered with us by all those whose names I referred to in my earlier remarks.

It was found there simply was not enough information fully to support the concept as outlined in section 37. In fact, specifically the Canadian Federation of Independent Businessmen, the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and the Canadian Construction Association pointed out that the experience of the West German government in work sharing was not, to their knowledge, successful. This is the program on which Canadian pilot projects will be based. Along these lines, the Canadian Federation of Independent Businessmen told us of the experience of some of their members who found that when they tried the short work week, people preferred to work 40 hours or be laid off.

The creation of inefficiency was a common worry of both business and labour, as was the question of handling fringe benefits. I think they were really concerned about the unwarranted intrusion into the collective bargaining process by the federal government. Both sectors found that unacceptable. We tried to delete the work sharing provision after listening to the advice of labour and management in the standing committee. They said that even with using UIC funds for developmental work sharing schemes, experience had shown they would not work.

I must give credit to hon. friends to my left, because they were opposed to work sharing as well. The minister insisted that it go ahead, however. I want his statement on record so that we can compare what he said today with what he said on June 23, because I caught him out on one statement with respect to job creation. On June 23 he spoke of consultation with the advisory council as well as with management and labour, but today he spoke only of the advisory council and forgot, maybe conveniently, what he had said about labour and management. The record shows what he said on June 23 about work sharing, as reported at page 7069 of Hansard:

> In these circumstances I think it is essential to pursue discussions more widely and fully with management and labour to determine whether there is a basis upon which to proceed before we jettison what may be potentially a very good idea.

He did not say "is a good idea"; he said "may be a good idea". Apparently he was not sure whether it was a good idea or not. Maybe that was a slip, and I will not take advantage of it. He went on to say:

> I give my assurance to the House that, if this provision is retained, I will not authorize its implementation until I am satisfied that there is a willingness on the part of management and labour groups to participate. On this basis it is my recommendation that hon. members of this House support the provisions in Bill C-27 for work sharing.
> With respect to motion No. 18 proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton West and with respect to the evaluation of job creation, that motion would require an evaluation to be tabled within one year of proclamation of Bill C-27. Let me emphasize that it is our clear intention to undertake evaluations of all the developmental uses of unemployment insurance funds, including the job creation proposal. I would certainly be prepared to table in parliament the findings of such evaluations.

That is a general, catch-all statement. In other words, there will be no work sharing unless labour and management agree; no job creation unless the advisory council approves as well as labour and management. The minister cannot meet with the advisory council until the bill is passed, however. It is already July 4, so I hope his officials have been holding discussions since June 23, because there is no doubt the bill will pass. I am not saying the government will ram it through, but they have the power to see that it passes. I am not going to name any names, but those who know what the bill is all about, even more than the minister or myself, will surely contact labour and management to find out what is going to happen with respect to these proposals.

I could go on and on, Mr. Speaker. I want to register some concern about whether the regulations regarding the 54 regions which affect the variable qualifying period will be based on place of work or on residence. This matter becomes very complicated. I should like to read from the minutes of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration of June 14, where the following exchange took place as reported at page 35:59.

> MR. RODRIGUEZ: Did we clear up this question of the claimant, where he resides and where he works? Will his benefit be payable on his domicile or on where he works? Have we cleared that up?
> MR. MANION: It is the place of residence.
> MR. RODRIGUEZ: On the place of residence.
> MR. CULLEN: We are going to try that. That will be in the initial phase. We will check that to see how it works. Everything is geared for that, so that will be the way the plan will be implemented.

MR. ALEXANDER: Is there a possibility of us having the reasoning behind the choice of place of residence as opposed to place of work? I will tell you there are many people very concerned about that. I missed the meeting where this was discussed. I believe it was last Wednesday. Have you really looked into this thing, the pros and cons, in a very definitive way that could be released to the members of the committee?

MR. MANION: There was a fairly extensive statement given on this. We looked at both options. There were several reasons for choosing place of residence. One was that the present administration of the UI Act is based largely on place of residence rather than place of work. It was felt that both claimants and the administration would be more familiar with this. There were administration complexities in adopting a place of work definition.

There are also some work incentives attached to the place of residence option.

MR. ALEXANDER: Is there not anything good about the other approach, the place of work?

MR. MANION: Yes, there are advantages of that as well, but they were felt not to be sufficient to outweigh the advantages of the place of residence option.

MR. ALEXANDER: Can we know some of them?

MR. MANION: The major one is the negative one, a concern that a place of residence option could give rise to people moving to areas where they would be subject to more advantageous terms. For this reason it is felt desirable to have the provision covered by a regulation so that if evidence of abuses occur it will be possible to switch. But if there is no abuse of the place of residence provision, there are some very substantial advantages to it, as I indicated.

As the House can see, members of my party were concerned about the effect of the 10 to 14 week flexible period on the 54 regions of the country, for this reason: people could move from one region of the country to another in order to take advantage of more generous benefits. Benefit levels will be determined by way of regulation, and although we do not favour the making of many regulations, in this case one must accept their limited use. I continue quoting the exchange in committee:

MR. ALEXANDER: So we are going to monitor this by way of regulation.

MR. MANION: We are going to apply it by way of regulation, but it will be monitored very closely by the commission in its adjudication process. If there is evidence that individuals have moved from areas where the unemployment rate is low to areas where it is high in order to secure additional advantages, it might be necessary then to switch to a place of work.

I put that exchange on record to let the people of Canada know that it may be difficult to decide the basis of benefit levels. However, most Canadians want the act to operate fairly and justly. They do not want people to rip off the unemployment insurance fund. People are concerned because unemployment insurance will cost the public and the private sector approximately $4 billion a year. Unless I am mistaken, unemployment insurance in 1971 cost us around $1 billion. Clearly, the growth in expenditure has been astronomical. That is why I am pleased to note the government realizes it will need to monitor the fund.

On the other hand, we do not want the government to be heavy-handed with those who have worked for years and must suddenly apply for benefits. We do not want to see benefit control officers hitting them over the head, as it were, with a sledge-hammer. We, on my side of the House, have always opposed that approach. My socialist friends in this House will say that we want to tighten the act. Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of tightening it. We want an act which takes into account the realities of life. We still believe in the work ethic. We want a bill which will foster the work ethic. At the same time, we want it applied compassionately.

[Mr. Alexander.]

Various aspects of this bill will come into effect at different times. I do not think the minister dealt with this, unless I am mistaken. Part I has to do with the creation of the department of employment and immigration, and the Canada and employment immigration commission, and part II with the creation of the Canada employment and immigration advisory council. Part I relates to the new department, and part II to the new advisory council. These two parts of the bill will come into effect immediately after royal assent. I hope the minister will tell me if I am wrong, for it is important for the people of Canada to know the facts about the bill. It contains several important changes regarding flexible benefit periods affecting 54 regions.

The minister gave the hon. member for Gloucester credit for raising the matter of the three-phased benefit. I give him no credit in that regard. At one time we had a five-phased benefit period. The benefit periods are to be reduced to three, an initial benefit phase, a labour force extended phase, and a regional extended phase. Previously, we had an initial benefit phase, a re-established initial phase, a labour force extended phase, a nationally extended phase and, finally, a regionally extended phase. As I say, we are reducing the benefit phases from five to three.

The minister told us this aspect of the bill will come into effect six weeks after royal assent. If I am wrong, I hope the minister will correct me. I understand, from information the deputy minister gave me, that one of the most important parts of the bill concerning the 10 to 14-week, inclusive, variable entrance requirements will come into effect on December 4, 1977. The minister did not blink. Perhaps he does not know. I hope he will stand up and say whether I am right or wrong. This bill is most important and complex and I want the minister to say whether I am right or wrong, because I remember what happened in the case of senior citizens. Their entitlement was cut off. We did not cut them off; the minister did. Let us not forget that, Mr. Speaker.

I mention this to let the people of Canada know with what kind of minister they are dealing. He said, in so many words, by introducing Bill C-69, that senior citizens had no right to work after age 65. That is an intolerable situation which we did not accept then, do not accept now, and will not accept in future. As long as you are healthy and want to work, you should be entitled to work. Our senior citizens who built this country should be given the right to work, to pay premiums and to receive benefits.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: When I said that, the minister did not even blink. That shows how callous and hard he is. He did not even smile when I made an impassioned plea. I do not know what the government will do. We hear they will go to the people in the fall. I hope they do not. Why should they go to the people? I am speaking to the bill, Mr. Speaker, although you may not think I am. I am not speaking about an election, though it may appear that I am. The government may go to the people in the fall, perhaps on the issue of UIC, and bootleg in an argument saying they need a mandate. But they have a majority now. I hope they do not have the cheek—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Would the hon. member please return to Bill C-27.

Mr. Alexander: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was speaking about cynicism and cheekiness, which both relate to this bill.

Mr. Alexander: If they have the cheek to call an election costing some $40 million, the Canadian people will crucify them. They will say they want a mandate. A mandate to do what? The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has brought this country to its knees. He has destroyed the country. Instead of bringing about national unity, he has brought about national disunity. I will say no more about that.

An hon. Member: Get back to the bill.

Mr. Alexander: I will return to it. I do not know which riding the hon. member represents. He is not important, but his riding is. We are going to fix him in the next election.

An hon. Member: He represents Laval.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He will qualify for benefits after the next election.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I was saying the variable entrance provisions will come into force on December 4, 1977. I will come to my last point. I have gone on for quite some time, but this is a very important bill. I will give the socialists their opportunity so that they can scream about eight weeks and all that. That is their concern. However, I hope they will be more responsible with this bill than they have been in the past.

● (1600)

The other important matter is the 54 regions. This is involved with the variable entrance requirements. This is where I get confused. It states this provision will come into effect in the summer of 1978. I do not know how that works, if you have the variable entrance requirements effective December 4. Maybe I took it down in error. How can you have 54 regions not involved until the summer of 1978?

That, Mr. Speaker, is my contribution. We are not going to filibuster this bill, hold it up and be repetitious, with speech after speech, like some people. We believe that all the arguments have been made by labour, management and concerned members of parliament who brought to this House previsouly, to the standing committee, and again to the House their concerns. I have placed most of our concerns on the table, the good things about the bill and the bad things. Hopefully, we can wind it down in due course, because, as I have said, we had a very exhaustive examination of the bill and the amendments during report stage. I hope hon. members will realize that there is no sense trying to filibuster this bill, as has been done in the past.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the minister defend this monstrosity of a bill, C-27. I then listened to "Puff the Magic Dragon", the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), who almost broke his wrist trying to pat himself on the back for this monstrosity. It was unbelieveable. I look forward to the time when we will have television in this House. The people of Canada will see that there is no difference between the two major parties in the House of Commons.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest that the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) get back to the terms of Bill C-27.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: Bill C-27 is an example of legislation which the official opposition ought to be examining with a critical eye. They should not be taking pleasure in saying that they pushed the government into something, that they recommended such and such, that they said this and they said that, and the minister listened to them. I thought the hon. member was praying: all he was saying was "I", "I", "I", "I", "I". I suspect with the movement from that side to the government side, the hon. member for Hamilton West may move over very quickly. The hon. member even made a plea that there be no election this fall. He actually pleaded with the government not to call an election. Maybe he is afraid of something; I do not know.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He is afraid you will be defeated.

Mr. Rodriguez: We on this side of the House have taken a critical look at the bill as well as the whole question of employment and unemployment in Canada. We believe the bill should be used to focus and zero in on the government's inability and hardness of heart with regard to coming to grips with the most serious problem facing Canada, the whole matter of employment opportunities. We have written to the minister. We do not object to regional rates of unemployment with regard to participating in the Unemployment Insurance Act. If the minister were to propose an unemployment rate of 3 per cent or 4 per cent, there would be no difficulty on this side. Also, he would find no difficulty if we were to set the premiums based on the rate of unemployment in the area in which a person lives. It is not right to try to sell people on the universality of a plan and then say to them later that it is not a universal plan after all, that participation in the plan depends on the rate of unemployment in the area in which one lives.

Members on this side have written to the minister in a very responsible fashion. I must make the distinction and say "the NDP", since the dragon made that distinction. We in the NDP have written to the minister. We told the minister that the way in which the present Manpower training programs are operated is inadequate. People are being trained for jobs that do not exist. When we visited Newfoundland to look at the unemployment situation in Atlantic Canada, we found that hairdressers were being produced by the thousand, but no hairdressing jobs were available. In my area we produce stationary engineers so stationary that they are stationary for miles because there are no jobs for them to station. If that is the kind of planning that goes on, and the kind of training programs that are being established, we want no part of it.

In the minister's own constituency there are 800 work permits for certain occupations, yet he says we do not have them in this country and they are not prepared to move. What are we doing? Are we training people with the skills that are needed? The Manpower training programs have never impressed me. They are designed to do one thing to package people, to pigeon hole them off the unemployment rolls. The government does not want them reflected in the unemployment rolls. That is primarily the purpose of this goverment's program. I have never been impressed with this government's creativity and far-reaching view with regard to training. If this money is being put into that kind of training program, we will never accept it.

We have written to the minister, making constructive suggestions as we in the NDP always do. We always take a positive approach. We tried to point out to the minister how to improve the administration of manpower, immigration and unemployment insurance programs over which he has responsibility. The minister told about the great wonders that will flow from putting Humpty Dumpty together again. It was almost déjà vu, reading some of the speeches when the split was made in 1971. Exactly the same reasons given for making the split are now being given for putting them back together. We were told then, and are being told now, that there will be better administration, and the people of Canada who pay the premiums will be better served. A regional meeting was held in Toronto. It broke up early. As far as the regional offices are concerned, they had no idea how they were going to put Humpty Dumpty together again. That is a very serious problem. Eeeeh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Let's see what Hansard does with that.

Mr. Ellis: Would you repeat that for Hansard?

Mr. Rodriguez: Hansard only records words, not sounds.

Mr. Ellis: All they ever get from you is sounds.

Mr. Rodriguez: It was a squeaking sound. We in the NDP are not opposed to putting the employment offices and the Unemployment Insurance together. But there are going to be very serious administrative problems. The top bureaucracy is insensitive to those at the bottom. That is why we have suggested to the minister that there must be communication between those at the top end of the bureaucracy and those at the bottom who have responsibility for putting this scheme together and administering it. Certainly we do not propose the joining of those two departments.

• (1610)

We look upon Bill C-27 not as just tampering with the Unemployment Insurance Act. We think there is more at stake than the amendments the minister is proposing to the Unemployment Insurance Act. This whole debate is really on the subject of employment for Canadians. I recall the heady days of 1968 when there was a federal election. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was running for his first term as prime minister of the country. Although there were not many promises, there were two things that he said he was concerned about and would work to try to achieve. One was national unity; the other was the elimination of regional disparities.

We can now, with some experience, observe the success of the Prime Minister's efforts on both these fronts. In 1968 the unemployment rate in this country was around 3 per cent. In 1971 it rose to 6.4 per cent. That was the first year of the great fight against inflation. The Prime Minister said that he did not care if unemployment rose to 6 per cent, he was going to defeat inflation. I think his words were that he was going to wrestle inflation to the ground.

Mr. Stanfield: No, that was later.

Mr. Rodriguez: I understand that was later. At any rate, he did not care if unemployment rose to 6 per cent, he was going to defeat inflation. In 1974 the unemployment rate dropped to 5.4 per cent. The rate at the present time is somewhere around 8 per cent. That is the StatsCan figure and does not include hidden unemployment. StatsCan changed the method of calculating the unemployment rate in this country and in one month cut the unemployment rate in Newfoundland by half; but 8 per cent unemployment in terms of numbers means that about one million people in Canada are unemployed.

The working class people of this country have been used to fight inflation. The government did not care what the unemployment rate was; it used the working class of this country as the scapegoat in defeating inflation. But it seems to me we have not defeated inflation today. If the present rate is projected to the end of the year, we still have double-digit inflation. You notice, Mr. Speaker, how consistently the government uses the unemployed as the scapegoat. Never does it accept responsibility for maladministration of the economy. The government always finds a scapegoat, and the scapegoat as recently as a year and a half ago was the workers of this country. They were blamed for causing inflation because their wage increases were too high and productivity was too low. Therefore, to defeat this psychology of inflation the government had to bring in a controls program. Again it had to find a scapegoat, and now hon. members opposite are all smelling of roses.

The government brought in the controls program which was advocated by colleagues to my right. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) took credit for it, but he is a little more modest than the hon. member for Hamilton West. As I envisage the next election, it will be run along the lines of the governing party wanting to keep controls, and the Conservative party wanting to lift controls. That is the kind of juxtaposition that I have in mind for the next federal election. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) says, it will be Tweedledum and Tweedledee. The government has failed on both counts. We still have high unemployment in this country, and we also have high inflation.

What is the word that we get from the corporate sector of this country? Again we look for a scapegoat. What is the message they are putting across? They say unemployment insurance is one of the prime factors for productivity being down; that after all, we are paying people after only eight weeks' employment and that is a drain on the economy. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association told the committee that we had the most generous unemployment insurance program in the world. I point out that we also have one of the highest unemployment rates among the industrialized nations of the world. Among the OECD countries we have the highest rate of unemployment of 15 to 25-year olds, something the government should be ashamed of. According to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the program is a disincentive.

Then the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, which represented small business, said that the program was a rip-off. The Employers' Association of British Columbia also told the committee that the program is a rip-off. The Association of Small Businessmen, headed by the famous—or infamous, depending on your view—John Bulloch, also told the committee that the program was a disincentive, a red rooster.

Mr. Ellis: He did not say that at all; he just said unemployment is very high.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) has the floor.

Mr. Rodriguez: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I welcome the interjection of the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis) and trust he will get up and make a speech at some point in this debate. I am interested in his comments, and somewhere along the line I am sure I will be able to comment upon them.

The Construction Association of Canada also appeared before the committee and said the program was a rip-off, that the Unemployment Insurance Act is too generous and the participating time too short. All of the groups I have referred to appeared before the committee. Then the minister admitted to me in committee, "Yes, it is a disincentive program; there is no question at all about that". I cannot imagine what goes on on the other side of the House. The government changes one minister, puts a new minister in his place, and suddenly things change. Let me read to the House the comments of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration's predecessor, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), in committee on May 28, 1975. Let us not forget, Mr. Speaker, that the whole basis for Bill C-27 is a comprehensive review of the unemployment insurance program which was made between January and June of 1974. This is what the minister had to say:

> I think it is a bit of a red herring myself. I think there are other areas that have to be tidied up in the act that are far more significant than that favourite whipping-boy of the short-term work claimant.

A little later on he said:

> The incidence of disentitlement or disqualification, as an effect of failure to meet one's obligations under the act, is lower amongst the group with a minor attachment to the work force as their proportion of the total claims load than those with a long-term attachment to the work force.

After only a year in his job, the present minister discovered that this was a disincentive program. The previous minister was in office for certainly longer than six months and, based on surveys, he had that statement to make. Perhaps he was getting bad advice from the top bureaucrats in his department, because if he felt that the program was a disincentive, that people were taking the program to the cleaners, he should have spoken up and been honest with the committee. One has to assume that he was being honest when he said that. We have to look, also, at what other groups are saying besides the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, as the hon. member for Hastings has pointed out. I should like to refer to the latest report of the Economic Council of Canada which reads in part:

> We believe that most Canadians affected by unemployment are well served by the unemployment insurance system and use it honestly—
> It would of course be possible to try to eliminate abuses by cutting certain categories of claimants or the duration of benefits, or by extending the period of work, before claimants could become eligible for benefits. But such recommendations could prove harmful to persons most exposed to periodic and genuinely involuntary unemployment.

The minister referred to my comments regarding the Canadian Mining Association brief, a copy of which I received from the clerk of the standing committee. I should like to read from page 5 of that brief as follows:

> The association condemns the abuses which some unemployment insurance claimants have made of the eight-week qualifying period. It is also aware that this period is shorter than that found in all other foreign jurisdictions, while the maximum level of benefits and the time during which they can be drawn are in excess of those found elsewhere. Nevertheless, with close to one million Canadians unemployed, and with most projections, including those issued by the government and its agencies, indicating the situation may worsen, the time is simply inappropriate from almost every perspective to seek a substantial extension, which we would urge in better times, to the eight-week qualifying period.

That is what is in my copy of that brief, and that is the end of the paragraph. I have never found myself in agreement with the Canadian Mining Association. The association indicated that the government ought to spend its time creating and going about doing things in the economy which will spin off the jobs that are necessary for our people. At this particular time in our history the government is coming in with changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act which will create grievous harm for many sectors of the country, especially people who receive lower incomes. There is a high correlation between the minimum attachment, those who are minor claimants, the length of time they collect benefits, and the regions from which they come. You will see the highest correlation between those who are minor claimants and those parts of our country which have the most aggravated unemployment rates.

I should like to refer to those who were eight-weekers and then went to collect unemployment insurance. In 1976 they collected 21.22 weeks, which is the average for Canada. The eight-week wonder in Newfoundland collected 31.15 weeks of benefits. In Prince Edward Island it was 28.37 weeks. In Nova Scotia it was 19.1 weeks. In New Brunswick it was 30.44 weeks. In Quebec it was 23.85 weeks. In Ontario it was 15.1 weeks. In Manitoba it was 12.2 weeks. In Saskatchewan it was 11.04 weeks. In Alberta it was 10.53 weeks. In British Columbia it was 18.42 weeks. As we go through the nine-weekers right down to the 20 plus weekers, we find this correlation is evident. Where you have a high unemployment rate in the country, you find people have a shorter attachment period to the work force, which reinforces the New Democratic Party's position. Changes at this particular time can only aggravate an already serious unemployment situation in the country.

What was the basis for bringing in the changes contained in Bill C-27? What led them to do this? The previous minister, now President of the Treasury Board, indicated a year ago that he did not go along with this prevalent attitude. I have the suspicion that there is an election in the offing and the government party will have to go to the corporate sector for donations. They will have to show the corporate sector that they are prepared to be tough. One of the issues the corporate sector has brought to the attention of the government is the minor attachment period and the length of benefits.

When the minister first brought in the bill, it changed from 8 weeks to 12 weeks. There was to be no regional unemployment rate. Therefore, he dropped that bombshell on his caucus and all the Liberal party backbenchers from Atlantic Canada got up and said, "You cannot do this; the NDP is going to make flak in the area". There was a lot of scurrying around, like mice in the pantry, and they arrived at this position of superimposing 54 regions on the country. We have a complicated Unemployment Insurance Act as it is. We recognize the difficulties in the administration of that act. God knows, that particular administration has received enough letters from me. When I took a look at the proposal, I discovered my riding would be region 21. Within region 21 there is a community, Killarney, which is 52 miles from the city of Sudbury, the industrial centre. In the wintertime the unemployment rate is 60 per cent. Because of the high industrial sectors in Sault Ste. Marie and Sudbury, the regional unemployment rate is 7.1 per cent. They will need anywhere from 12 weeks to 14 weeks to qualify for benefits.

The superimposing of the 54 regions will create hardships for small communities. When citizens of these small communities become unemployed, the program is administered in a very unfair way, as the minister is aware from the evidence given at the committee hearings. We know the difficulties, yet he proposes 54 regions. I do not think he understands the difficulties which will be encountered and the red tape involved for unfortunate Canadians who become unemployed. What was the rationale? The rationale was the comprehensive review of the unemployment insurance program in Canada. This is the rationale which was prepared between January and June of 1974. It was prepared after personal interviews with unemployed folk and upon what they called in-house data. Well, it was in-house, outhouse, backhouse, round-the-house, all sorts of data, much of which was highly erroneous.

Take a look at some of the statements made in part "B" of this comprehensive review. It says: "Canada has the fastest growing labour force of any industrialized western economy." Statistics are given from 1961 to 1975, but there are no accompanying international statistics with which to compare the figures. The document states, further: "The labour force is characterized by a high degree of mobility". The basis for that statement is the statistics for separation in one year, 1974, and changes of address in 1971. What a marvellous, up-to-date piece of research upon which to base a measure like Bill C-27 which the Conservative party has the audacity to support! Here is another statement in the document: "High wage increases have exceeded productivity increases." What is advanced as proof of that assertion? A comparison of wage increases in Canada and the United States in one year, 1974. Yet on the basis of such a comparison the minister is telling us, like the blind leading the blind, what a wonderful proposal we have before us.

I now call attention to another statement in the same document where there is reference to the reluctance of Canadians to work at traditional wage levels. What is the proof? A comparison of federal minimum wages in Canada and in the United States in one year, 1974. Then there is a section on what they call the relationship between job vacancies and unemployment. Again, the figures are for one year, 1974. They have the gall to say there were 92,000 full-time vacancies in 1974, compared with 525,000 unemployed. We are given no information about the nature of those employment opportunities. Another interesting section is called "Profile of claims—study and comments". The first heading is "Separations from employment, January to June, 1974" and beneath it: "One in five quits voluntarily and should be watched."

What is the value of that statement, Mr. Speaker? Unemployment in 1974 was the lowest for five years. It was a boom time, when lay-offs were few and jobs were easily found. It was the year when unemployment took a dip to 5.4 per cent. Even expanding the scope of the study for a full year would have given a more accurate picture, because unemployment dropped from 5.5 per cent in January to 4.9 per cent in June. Then it arose again in December to 6.1 per cent. In the same study, under the heading "Profile of claimants", a comparison is made between 8 to 11-weekers and those unemployed after 12 weeks. The figures used reflect only the situation in 1973 and 1974. What are the characteristics in years of high unemployment, like 1971? The figures which accompany the heading "Claimants listed by dependency, age and sex" are taken from only one year, 1974, and again no comparison is possible with a year of high unemployment. In relation to the duration of claims, once again the only figures were taken from 1973 and 1974 to support findings which go into ridiculous detail on the basis of such a small sample.

Then we come to a section on "Exhaustees and post-claim behaviour". Here we find a statement that "63 per cent were able to find work within six months of exhausting their claim; this high percentage may indicate a work disincentive in the case of some claimants." So out of a possible six years of operation, only one month was used, April, 1973. This study covered 2,649 people who exhausted their claims that month. They were surveyed six months later to determine whether they had found jobs. The unemployment rate in April, 1973, was 5.4 per cent. In October it was 5.8 per cent. In March, 1977, it was 8.1 per cent, adjusted. What relevance can a job search at a time of easy employment have at the present time when we are experiencing such a much higher unemployment rate?

Further on we find that in connection with the entry on part-time workers, 1,146 people were studied in August, 1974—a very small sample indeed when one is talking about close to a million people receiving unemployment insurance benefits at any one time. But they surveyed 1,146, in August, and August is the time when work possibilities are affected by student employment. Bear in mind, too, that 1974 was a year of relatively high employment, as I have already said.

I turn now to section "D" of this comprehensive review. They must have spent a bundle putting this together, with its flow charts, bloc graphs, etc. Part "D" is "The alternative approach to profile of claimants", and there is a subheading beneath it, "Relative claim rates and cost ratios". The size of the sample is not given. It was taken from one small, special labour force survey dated March, 1975—10 per cent of the sample of 1973 and 1974 files. No comparison was made with figures for earlier or later years.

Then comes a section called "Work disincentives", section "E". This section consists of summaries of seven studies on the effect of the 1971 act. The two studies which are given most space in the review concluded that the 1971 UIC changes had a negligible impact on the unemployment rate. One of those studies indicated that the benefit rate had the most powerful effect on voluntary unemployment. This conclusion is weakened by the fact that the author assumed that all unemployment is voluntary. The other studies done for the Economic Council and for Treasury Board have been judged to contain serious methodological deficiencies.

Consider other sections and the years to which the studies relate. Distribution of total benefits by provinces, 1973. Distribution of total benefits by occupation, 1972, the year after the new act came into being. Distribution of total benefits by industry, 1973. Total revenues by income class, 1973. Under "I" there is a section "Public perceptions of unemployment insurance". There was a survey done in 1975, they said; but, here again, the sample size is not specified and the questions asked are not indicated in the study. The study then considers the benefit structure and increased entrance requirements. This is section "K" of the survey. It describes the three-phase structure and estimates the financial impact of increased entrance requirements and puts forward arguments against increased entrance requirements as listed. This, Mr. Speaker, is the basis of Bill C-27.

The Conservative members gleefully grabbed at it and said, "This is what we have been asking for". They should be ashamed of themselves. They have reneged on their responsibility as the official opposition of the House, without properly investigating, debating and looking into the legislation that has been brought forward by this government. They do not even recognize when they are being used politically, they are so politically naive. The whole approach to Bill C-27 is, "We said it first. That is what we wanted. We have pushed the government in this direction". The minister, smiling like a Cheshire cat, says, "Come into the trap, buddies. We've got you where we want you".

All they find to criticize is job sharing. What do they pick on? The thing that all groups coming before the committee agreed upon. My, my, what a consensus party it is on my right! The one thing over which they cannot get into hot water is opposition to the work sharing program. We on this side of the House have said to the minister, "Yes, there are times when you can make changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, but you have to base them on the most up to date information and statistics you can get".

I have tried to point out that this survey, this so-called comprehensive review, is neither comprehensive nor a review. It is a rationale for a decision that has been made which has a political basis. I do not know what infighting is going on in the department. It is not for me to know; it is only for me to speculate about. All I can say is that it is our position on this side of the House that legislation based on information such as this—I have read all the stuff into the record; I have read the review of the Atlantic region, which is outdated—cannot be good.

We in our party have said that we do not object to changes being made to the act, we do not object to tightening up the Unemployment Insurance Act, but before you do it you must concentrate on creating employment opportunities. That is where your first priority should lie. You should not give the impression to the public that you are tough and that you are really getting down to those who are using unemployment insurance as a disincentive, because you are fooling the Canadian public that you are doing something constructive with respect to unemployment insurance and you are sucking in the Tories.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION REORGANIZATION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cullen that Bill C-27, to establish a Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I should have liked to find something satisfactory in the amendments to Bill C-27. Unfortunately those amendments are minor ones and most of them were absolutely necessary as a result of mistakes made in the other legislation. In addition, there is absolutely nothing altering the procedure to establish the insurability of employment. At the present time, unemployed Canadians not only have to experience some difficulties with badly drafted legislation and the reactions of various officials as to their eligibility for unemployment insurance benefits, but they have to accept the decisions of income tax officials who determine the insurability of their job. Let us imagine what goes on. I had to tackle such problems and there are still many which remain unsolved.

Through its investigators the Unemployment Insurance Commission decides whether a job is insurable or not, but it does not make the decision. Quite often they pay benefits for a number of months, even for six months, and then the matter is referred to the income tax people who decide whether the job is insurable or not. After the income tax people have rendered their decision, it takes months and years to be able to go before the Federal Court and defend the position of these unemployed. Then it is easy to see that there is no common sense in approving such a piece of legislation.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner).]

I have in hand a few notes concerning the piece of legislation which we are debating, to establish a Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof. This is a strange combination of commissioners, officials, advisors who have apparently the responsibility to redefine the tasks and to redirect the objectives to increase employment for the Canadian people. I wish the best of luck to all those who will have responsibilities in these administrative functions, even if this hotchpotch of redefining, of amalgamating is seemingly organized to create a model of confusion 1977, a new style which will perhaps outweigh the confusion reported in history about the attempts to build the Babel Tower. The Department of Transport has already made a demonstration of confusion as far as air traffic control is concerned.

● (1650)

His colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration may entertain the ambition to achieve the same goal on earth, in spite of the variety of factors to be taken into account: a department, a commission, a council, a reorganization of already existing institutions. Let us try and consider the operation of this new department while wishing the planners all possible success.

All that must be based on the most active and the best cooperation of the whole team while assuming it is capable of such cooperation. We already know a team of civil servants who practice cooperation advantageously for the fund. We all know that in the area of income tax, for instance, all kinds of taxes, this team gives us regular demonstrations of cooperation to the extent that even the people find it sometimes a little exaggerated. This laudable propensity to cooperate should be oriented in the field of real advantages, to find for the unemployed the best ways to use their services in order to contribute in their capacity to the production of goods useful to society.

The administrators responsible for that reorganization probably hold several diplomas, perhaps even doctorates, but I shall nevertheless offer advice on the cooperation which must exist between the employees of manpower centres and the Unemployment Insurance Commission. That kind of retraining will require cooperation courses, in order to meet the need to reconcile individual and collective interests. We must take into consideration that those two groups of employees have worked separately for many years. Their managers thought at that time that it was better that way. According to the new plans, they will have to decide together. Let us hope that the situation of the unemployed worker will be better understood.

A real job creation program should be based on the recognition that all forms of socially useful activity deserve to be recognized and remunerated. This would enable us to reach almost everybody except those who are disabled or too old.

This could include the mother of a family, for bringing up children in a period of transition is a socially valid occupation. And yet, this occupation is deemed as useful and valid only when the children of other people are involved. Taking care of other people's children, whether as a keeper, a day care attendant or a foster parent may be a source of income. Taking care of one's own children is not considered an employment. This occupation does not therefore entail the right to share in our society's wealth. Cooking meals for strangers is called working in a restaurant, but the cooking of a mother who is preparing meals for her own children is not considered as a job. We are not yet used to the idea that a person may be working without necessarily getting paid for it. We often hear the government talk about guaranteed income, but it shies away from all likely means which might make it possible.

This bill introduces the new notion of sharing work. The government states that the unemployed will not be compelled to accept jobs for which they are not suited, but it is the commission which will define the jobs which it feels is suitable for them. That is a lot of discretion! Because we know already its definition of the word "suitable" and the way it is applied when the unemployed are looking for jobs which are not available, we can foresee what sort of decisions the commission will come down with. Whether a person is young or old, with or without any experience of the labour market, being unemployed is never reassuring. The climate of fear and anxiety which prevails in periods of high unemployment is the result of a great many factors, the most significant of which is certainly financial insecurity. Although Social Crediters are often blamed for talking often about money, ask any unemployed person if it is not money which he is lacking.

The main concern for an unemployed man is to know whether he will be able to provide proper food, clothes and housing for his family. He is also concerned that perhaps he might not be able to cope with problems that could rise suddenly like illness, accidents and so on. With decreased income, he has to meet the same needs as when he had a job, taking into account that there might be delays in the delivery of cheques issued by the Unemployment Insurance Commission. That has happened often, as many of us know. Payments on accounts will remain the same during the unemployment period and, what is more, credit is more difficult to get during that time.

Whatever we say, the many applications to be made to find a job are not pleasant. It should not be left to any employer to take advantage of the situation of an unemployed man to have him do jobs in conditions and at rates that others would refuse. For instance, when forced to give reasonable wages to an experienced worker, the employer would find it profitable to lay-off this older employee to hire a younger one for lower wages. We must consider the fact that this sometimes occurs.

There are also employers who regularly renew their staff because of bad or hazardous conditions. An unemployed man must not be forced to take any job. Generally speaking, an unemployed man who has preferences and requirements about a job finds it hard to get one and moreover he may not qualify for benefits if he ever indicates his requirements or preferences to the Unemployment Insurance Commission or the Canada Manpower Centre.

Nevertheless, it is not only up to the Unemployment Insurance Commission to determine whether a job is appropriate or not. The civil servants are not the ones who will do the work, it is the unemployed man. Within a reasonable delay, an unemployed man may require the same job he was performing before, as well as the same salary and the same working conditions.

The commission decides on that reasonable delay which cannot be extended more than sixteen weeks in the case of skilled workers and three weeks for general labourers. I repeat that the commission and manpower centres must be aware that consideration is to be given to some factors when establishing working conditions for an employee. It should be remembered that they are dealing with a human being, not a machine, and that the employee can expect security and stability in his employment. He wants his place of work to be well organized and managed. It is only reasonable that he be treated fairly.

He would also like to be informed on the financial situation of the enterprise, so that he could count on an equitable salary. Those are fundamental realities for a human being. Many officials obviously do not consider these factors when it comes to compelling someone to look for a job.

Another factor is very important, and indispensable: the civil servant should be pleasant. Some of them really have a strange attitude. Not all, of course. Someone acts and others react, as if the common tie was not composed of individual assets grouped together, and as if wanting to reform society authorized one to be unpleasant towards its components.

However, I want to point out that the Unemployment Insurance Act has already helped out Canadian workers considerably, as it surely will in the future, provided the errors in the text of some sections are corrected and some planners cease to envisage, in their sick minds, the possibility of full employment at a time when automation is replacing a high percentage of workers in almost every field of productivity. Terms have been sought to qualify various categories of unemployed but that does not improve the lot of the citizen who has no income and no job. While our youth is being encouraged to get degrees, technicians are inventing machines that will create unemployment for our graduates when they leave college.

In a statement on March 15, 1977, the Canadian Council on Social Development was mentioning that many young people are too discouraged to look for a job. When determining the situation of unemployment, Statistics Canada adopts the criterion "actively seeking work" and therefore underestimates the problem. That estimation excludes a great many young people who need and want a job without actively looking for one. According to the 1971 census, 187,000 people from 15 to 19 and 350,000 between 20 and 24 were not included in the official manpower list of employed or unemployed persons nor in that of part or full time school attendance. Many young people have jobs without any qualifications, with poor wages and a limited future outlook. In 1975, 54,000 young Canadians were working half time, not because they chose to do so but for lack of full-time employment.

Surveys made by the Manpower and Immigration Department in 1973-74 showed that a high percentage of young workers, almost three-quarters of those aged 16 to 19 were holding a position with no promotion opportunities, but wished to get one. In the light of these statistics, the board of governors of an organization representing the whole population of Canada criticized the deliberate lack of policies of the federal, provincial and municipal governments with respect to this problem and the general attitude of the population which varies from indifference to apathy and accusations against the young people themselves. The council recognizes that the issue of unemployment among young people is part of the bigger problem of unemployment and underemployment and cannot be dealt with separately. However its seriousness and chronic nature as well as the long term disastrous effects it could have if nothing is done make it a very critical issue from an economic, political and social point of view and we should not forget this.

A detailed analysis of this bill leads us to conclude that the aim of this program is to provide an opportunity for students to get some form of experience and training they will be able to use in the future. The aim itself is quite laudable, but we have to wonder how the government is going to improve the situation if it does not take immediately the necessary steps to ensure some continuity and permanency to this program. It is sometimes difficult to understand the attitude of the government which seems to direct its legislation on unemployment by hiring figures jugglers who do their best to reduce the unemployment benefits by using various means of computing that do not reflect the exact facts concerning unemployment in Canada and above all do not take into account the difficulties encountered by unemployed people who cannot find jobs even though commission officials force them to follow complex procedures based on regulations established by imaginative but unrealistic technocrats. There is no need to have a university degree to know that it is almost impossible to find jobs when the unemployment rate is between 8 to 25 per cent in some areas. All government jugglers should orient their efforts toward job creation instead of doing calculations to reduce unemployment benefits.

On April 14, 1977, the Montreal newpaper La Presse reported the number of unemployed in Canada was dangerously approaching the catastrophic level of one million. Time has come for the government to use every means at its disposal to create jobs and allow those thousands of discouraged unemployed people to get organized to earn a good living honourably. Many suggestions have been submitted to the attention of the government to create long term employment. Some have suggested launching a housing program for the elderly; in rural districts, why not such a home in every parish instead of only one by region so as to use the necessary money to help the disabled, the blind and all those who are physically handicapped whom we are prone to forget too easily. A great number of practical activities could be created in the field of forest protection and that would contribute to create thousands of jobs during periods when that activity is most needed. It should be possible under shared cost programs to organize reforestation activities to reclaim abandoned farm lands.

Many public buildings could be built—post offices, refrigerated warehouses and how many repairs would have to be made to wharves in several areas! Many wharves on the south shore are drifting away while provincial and federal authorities quarrel about who is going to maintain them and under what terms. I have before me an article published in the local newspaper on Wednesday, June 1, 1977, mentioning that the rate of unemployment reaches 33 per cent in Kamouraska West, and also in another paper, Le Machiniste canadien, of June 1977, under the heading "A big lie", one can read, and I quote:

> We have all heard it said that the unemployed are simply lazy people who want to live at the expense of society and the taxpayers. It is a misleading attitude, even if it shared by as influent an organization as the Canadian Manufacturers Association. The reason people are unemployed in this country is quite simply that there are no jobs for them. Government figures prove it.
> Statistics Canada published last month a survey showing that in the first quarter of this year there were only 35,400 full time jobs available in all this country and for all classes of jobs. That agency revealed at about the same time that the number of unemployed had "officially" reached 914,000 in April. So there was a gap of 816,600 between the number of unemployed and the number of jobs available . . .

And you have Unemployment Insurance Commission officers telling people: Look for jobs!

> Even if we admit that there are lazy people, 10,000 and even 100,000, there are still a lot of people who want to work and do not have anything to do. So it is the majority of Canadian unemployed who want to work.

At present, as I suggested at the beginning of my remarks, there is no way a bill like this can be supported. We see from the way it is written how social welfare is increasingly becoming the form of assistance for unemployed workers. Unemployment insurance having changed—not always for the better—so as to deprive an increasingly greater number of unemployed of their benefits by extending the qualification period and shortening the number of weeks of coverage, tens of thousands of unemployed will no longer be eligible for unemployment insurance and will probably go on social welfare.

This clearly discriminatory and disloyal strategy of the federal government will massively affect the population of eastern Canada, Quebec and the Maritime provinces. The compensatory job creation program is still insufficient and insignificant in relation to the considerable savings that the federal government is achieving on the backs of the provinces. The central government is gradually and shamefully transferring its responsibilities for fighting unemployment to the provinces. This transfer of the unemployed maintenance burden is the result of many investigations, but it is still unfavourable to the unemployed.

Among all the lengthy reports that contain all kinds of statistics, I have not seen one about the many cases of unemployed who were not given their benefits because of administrative foul-ups resulting from a badly-made law whose various sections were re-arranged and written by highly paid technocrats who know nothing about the needs of the unemployed. The high officials, who are never unemployed, use their authority according to theoretical studies of economic mechanisms without taking sufficiently into account the human factors that should be the most important. Oh yes! There has been a lot of publicity about a few cases of fraud. I recognize that there can be some claimants who occasionally break the law, but I can also prove that, in most cases, it is because of mistakes due to the complexity of the act and the regulations, especially in the case of income earned early during an employment period.

The delay on the part of the commission in sending its weekly reports is one of the main reasons. It is rather easy to see for anyone even remotely aware of the various means by which the law and its regulations are applied. I do not understand why people can be inclined to support a bill that will inevitably continue to create a lot of problems in our regions, particularly in those where unemployment is the highest, but of course I guess this is too complicated. However, it seems to me that it would be easy to draft certain texts of law that would be understandable by the people who are unemployed. All these people have not attended university and they have to deal with bills which they do not understand. Besides, there are a lot of civil servants who do not understand them either.

I remember having put a question to the committee on two clauses of Bill C-229, asking what was meant there. I was then answered that it was just legal talk, that those things were written just in case someone would take this issue to the superior court. Then inevitably, if they draft laws such as the one before us, how will it be possible for workers who have to deal with the various problems of unemployment ever to get a little understanding. The Unemployment Insurance Commission has paid out millions of dollars to the unemployed in the course of 1975 and 1976 because there was a lot of unemployment. I still think that the government should rather get itself moving to create jobs. In fact, such efforts are done on a very small scale. Nevertheless, I still wish to thank those who contributed in fostering employment in the riding of Kamouraska with projects under the Local Initiatives Program, or Young Canada Works, Canada Works programs but I must say, it is not sufficient in the present situation. We must have other big work schemes. There are a lot of tasks which should be undertaken. I have mentioned before certain projects which could be launched, whereby people would get jobs that would earn them an income which at least would allow them to live and sustain their family. I must say that this is the only way of solving the unemployment problem.

It just will not help to give some technocrats and other civil servants very high salaries, which, as I was mentioning before range between $20,000, $25,000, $30,000 and $40,000 a year just to play with the texts of laws which are too complicated. The result of that situation is that you only end up making them more complicated while nothing gets solved. And what are we preparing by doing that, gentlemen of the government? We are just paving the way for revolt. It is sad to say it but if we do not react by helping workers, we will have to bear the consequences of that inaction.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in our view, one of the most grievous shortcomings of the present government is its failure to recognize the very real seriousness of unemployment in Canada. That failure is demonstrated by the fact that it has scarcely looked at what could be done to solve unemployment. Instead, it has come forward with an amending bill which will make unemployment insurance more difficult for the unemployed to receive.

I hope I do not sound like someone giving a lecture based on past experience, instead of someone making a speech in the House of Commons, but I remind older members of the House, the ones of my generation—there are quite a few—that this country went through an unemployment experience in the 1930s which was indeed tragic. I know it seems that we can have more persons unemployed today than we had in the 1930s and yet not be faced with the almost rebellious and revolutionary situation we faced in that decade. I think one of the reasons is that, after the experience of the 1930s, we won in parliament a good deal of social legislation the result of which is that even in times of unemployment there is money of some sort in the pockets of most people.

That was not the case in the decade of the 1930s. When persons were unemployed then, many of them did not handle any money month after month. They collected vouchers which entitled them to food hand-outs or meals in a soup kitchen. The went to work in my city of Winnipeg in the woodyard. They went out to dig the Grassmere ditch. They were sent to River Heights, to pick dandelions off the grass, in return for which they collected vouchers for food.

Mr. Rodriguez: Dandelions make good wine.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That was not so well known in those days; certainly that was not the purpose. The memories of some members of this House of those days are vivid. Younger members who do not recollect those days, or whose parents did not describe those days to them when they were children, would do well to read a book written within the last decade by James H. Gray, entitled "The Winter Years". That book effectively "tells it as it was".

That tragic decade was brought to an end by the outbreak of World War II. The combination of the unemployment of the 1930s and the following World War led, in the end, to a good deal of social legislation which ameliorated conditions, and still does today. But, Mr. Speaker, we delude ourselves, and this is where the present government is mistaken, if we assume that because there are not unemployed riding the boxcars, because there are not soup kitchens, because there are not riots in places like Regina, because there are not marches on Ottawa, the problem is not as serious today as it was then. I contend that present unemployment insidiously is doing untold damage to the fibre of our people and untold damage to the morale and unity of our country. I argue that the government ought to tackle unemployment seriously; it should not just make it more difficult for the unemployed to collect unemployment insurance benefits, which is all Bill C-27 does.

My recollections of the 1930s were reinforced by an experience which the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) and I underwent a short time ago. Taking advantage of June 24 being a holiday in Quebec and hence a holiday for the House of Commons, we set up a one-day hearing in our city, Winnipeg, inviting persons, organizations and groups to come before us and tell us about unemployment as they know it. We announced—I suppose that is why so many came—that neither one of us would make a speech.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You must have had a mammoth crowd.

Mr. Paproski: Yes, it must have filled a telephone booth.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We had quite a crowd. We made it clear we were there to listen. We heard from about 16 or 18 delegations during the day. Our sessions were held in one of the rooms of the University of Winnipeg in my constituency. Of the delegations we heard, only one actually suggested that there was no unemployment problem. It was the nurses' delegation, representging the Manitoba Association of Registered Nurses. When I said that, since I spend a good deal of time in Ontario to carry out my duties as a member of parliament, I had heard about nurses being unemployed in that province, the answer was, yes, the association knew that. I was told some hospitals in this province had been closed, which was one of the reasons Ontario nurses were moving out there.

Mr. Rodriguez: The hospitals were closed by a Tory government.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But that was the only delegation saying there was no unemployment problem. We heard from various trade unions and varous groups and organizations. But what impressed me most, and I discussed it with my hon. friend for Winnipeg North, who will be along later this evening—if he makes the same speech I am making, that does not mean there has been collaboration between us—was the case made to us on behalf of young people. It was made in particular on behalf of two different kinds or groups of young people. On the one hand we had representatives of students of the University of Winnipeg and the University of Manitoba who told us of surveys they had made showing that a substantial number of graduates of last year and the year before had not yet found work. The plaintive case they made to us was that it was damaging and demoralizing for young persons to go to university with the thought of ultimately being able to make a special contribution to society, only to find, on coming out, that there is no place for them.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

I will spell out a bit just how the day ran. We had one university group in the morning, and another in the afternoon. In that way, they did not hear each other. However, both university groups had the same story. They were wondering what was ahead for them and for this country, when there are no jobs for many of those we put through university, with all the years of study and sacrifice that they make. The other group of young people represented at those sessions held in Winnipeg on June 24 was from areas like my own of Winnipeg North Centre and Winnipeg North where many do not get to university. They get through elementary school and high school at best. For them, too, there are no jobs.

We had social workers there, pleading with us to bring to parliament the message that these young people are not just discouraged because there are no jobs, but they are finding their way in increasing number into institutions of various kinds. I remember, in particular, one sister from one of these organizations pleading with us to realize what the unemployment situation is doing to the very lives, character and future of the young people of this country.

I lived and worked through the 1930s. I could not write the book that James H. Gray wrote, but I can certainly tell the story of those days. Some of us came into politics because of what we went through in the thirties. I say what is happening today is worse. In the thirties, the economy had ground to a halt. There were things that could be done to get us out of that. However, if we do not get out of this, if we go on causing young people, whether they are of the upper levels who can get to university, or the levels that do not get there, to find that there is nothing for them to do, God help us in the years and decades that lie ahead.

This is a problem of great seriousness. I see no evidence that the government across the way appreciates that seriousness at all. I said a while ago that in my view unemployment is not only damaging the fibre of our people as individuals, but it is doing great disservice to the morale and unity of this country. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will not think I am getting into tomorrow's debate. That will come. I am talking about unemployment and unemployment insurance.

One of the major reasons there are stresses and strains in the Canadian confederation is the economic conditions. When unemployment is as high as it has been for a long time in the province of Quebec, one cannot blame the people of Quebec for wanting a shake-up, wanting something new. When unemployment is high in the other parts of Canada, the people in those parts look for someone to blame. The tendency has been around for a long while to blame the other group, the other racial division. That has been exaggerated because of the unemployment that is there. If we really want to save our country tomorrow, we must do more than our dedication to a national and united country. Let us not indulge in platitudes and speeches, thinking that the language issue is the only issue. The fundamental issues that disturb the people of this country are the social and economic bread and butter issues. I do not see any evidence of the government realizing the seriousness of the situation.

I plead as strongly as I can with the government to realize that this is not something that is passing just in 1976, 1977 or 1978. It is not something that is so much less worse than unemployment in the thirties that we do not need to worry about it. The future of life in Canada, the future of our country, can depend very largely on whether we can find socially useful and productive employment for all the people of this country.

My friend, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), in the better part of his speech had a good deal to say, with which I thoroughly agree, about the loss that we suffer every day that nothing is done about unemployment. He cited the millions of dollars that we lose every day, not just in terms of the money that is being paid out in unemployment insurance but in terms of the production that is not produced. This country still needs housing on a massive scale. This country still needs urban renewal in all the cities of Canada. This country still needs modern and efficient transportation systems across the country and in our urban centres. These things call for employment in excess of the numbers that are unemployed today. For the government to sit there and try to run the country, when it cannot find a way to put together people and resources to produce those things that are needed, is a sham, and that government ought not to be sitting there today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I plead for serious consideration of the most effective answer to unemployment which, in the simplest terms, is employment. In the simplest terms, it is to put the country to work producing those things that our people need.

Hon. members are quite used to hearing my voice concerning all aspects of pension matters. One of the things that I plead for is the possibility of earlier retirement. I do not ask that it be made compulsory, not in the least. However, I firmly believe that if pensions such as old age security and the Canada Pension Plan were made available on a voluntary basis at age 60 instead of age 65, many of our workers would take advantage of that opportunity. There are many jobs where one does not want to quit. I am an example of one who does not want to quit.

Mr. Rodriguez: What about the Senate?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Forget that. That is not work. It is one thing, at my age of 69, to enjoy being in parliament. It is another thing, at age 50, 55, 58 or 60, to go day after day into the rolling mills, railway shops, mines, textile factories, packing plants or forests and do backbreaking work. On occasion I talk to workers at the shop gates. They put many things to me, but the thing that is spoken to me most about is earlier retirement so that they can escape from the rat race and have a chance to live.

• (1730)

All power to those who have the kind of job where they can stay on, but I suggest that it would be a practical, positive solution for a goodly number of our unemployed if earlier retirement were made possible. But can we get these people across the way to take a look at this proposition? No. They say we are trying to force people to retire, instead of making it voluntary. They say that the country cannot afford something for those between 60 and 65 because there are others below 60 who are having a hard time. Granted there are these kinds of problems, but is the government examining them? No. Its answer to unemployment is to make unemployment insurance more difficult to get. Hon. members opposite say they are responsible. They say they are the government of the country and that they are running it. They are running it into the ground.

A while ago my hon. friend from Kamouraska referred to the guaranteed annual income—something else that we on this side of the House are proclaiming—and suggested it was one way to answer unemployment, that it was a real way of sharing available work, and that it was a form of security. But can we get the government to examine this? No. It has to be discussed with the provinces, says the government; the provinces do not want it, and so on. These so-and-so's across the way are presiding over a country rich in natural resources, rich in real wealth, rich in people who are prepared to work. Yet they cannot somehow put things together so that goods can be produced to provide a guaranteed income for all our people, to provide for voluntary retirement, and to provide for the production of those things which our people need.

Mr. Paproski: They would like an election, Stanley. That is all they think about.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend says that what those across the way want is an election. The only reason they want an election is that they think that can put them back in office for another three or four years.

I have already mentioned my age, Mr. Speaker, which simply tells you how many years I have had to endure this country under a Liberal government, the kind that keeps fooling us about what they are going to do, from Mackenzie King on down, and never really coming to grips with the problems and issues that face us. I submit that we never had a better example of that than we have today. Here is this tremendous social problem, the tragedy of unemployment which is hitting our people, yet the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) brings in Bill C-27, the only effect of which is to make it more difficult for unemployed people to collect unemployment insurance. It makes it more difficult in a number of ways. The most serious way of all, of course, is that it increases the number of weeks which a person has to be attached to the labour market in order to collect unemployment insurance, at a time when in some parts of the country it is difficult to get any attachment at all. The government has also built up a complicated mass of machinery for running the program which is bound to take first prize for the impossible.

How the government has any moral right to stay in office, Mr. Speaker, I simply do not understand. This is why I stand here today pleading with the House, and particularly with the government, to take this issue seriously. This is not something which is simply passing. It is not just the experience of the 1930's on a lesser scale. It is a tragic thing which is doing damage to the character and the fibre of our people. It is doing damage to the morale and the unity of our country. I feel very strongly that something better than this bill should be brought in.

In the meantime we have the bill in front of us. I know it has been debated at length at second reading, in the standing committee and at the report stage, but it still has in it these provisions which make it so difficult for unemployed persons to collect their unemployment insurance. There are a number of clauses in the bill that ought to be reconsidered by the standing committee, though even that is not enough. No matter how good an unemployment insurance bill is brought in, it would not be enough. We need other things too, such as production, employment—a whole host of pieces of social legislation. But at least we ought to reconsider this change from an eight week attachment to 14, with a sliding scale and all the complications.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, because I believe we should still review this whole bill, and because in particular I think the bill should be sent back to committee for a reconsideration of the attachment clauses, which make it more difficult to qualify for unemployment insurance, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan):

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That", and by substituting therefor the following words:

"Bill C-27 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration for the purpose of reconsidering clauses 29 and 30 thereof."

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the amendment just proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to Bill C-27, which deals with amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. We in the New Democratic Party have fought this bill in the House and in committee because we believe it does a serious injustice to the one million unemployed Canadians.

The bill is a sham in terms of government seriousness regarding the plight of the unemployed. It is an attempt by this cruel and heartless Liberal government to make the unemployed of Canada the scapegoat for the government's own economic failings. No responsible member of parliament elected by his constituents to stand up for their rights, whether they be employed or unemployed, can support this iniquitous legislation which fails to address itself to the nature of our unemployment and to the reason why the people of Canada who want work cannot find it. Rather than assist them in their hour of need, this will only discriminate against them.

If the amendments in this bill are passed, we are going to throw an extra quarter of a million, perhaps even one third of a million, Canadians off the unemployment rolls. This bill will lengthen the qualifying period for a person to become eligible for unemployment insurance. In view of the unemployment rate of 8 per cent and the lack of job creating policies on the part of this Liberal government, the situation can only get worse. As people become unemployed the government has the nerve and callousness to disqualify them from receiving benefits which they have contributed to over the years.

We hear from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that what is at issue here is leadership in this country. I ask the Prime Minister and his Liberal supporters: where is the leadership in creating jobs and reducing unemployment in the kind of approach we see before us in this bill? Instead of attacking the number one problem of unemployment, this bill attacks the unemployed, and we in this party will not stand for it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Symes: The minister tries to do the double shuffle by appearing to be active in trying to change this bill and attacking the problem of unemployment. He said that there are a number of Canadians today who are not really serious about working, that these people move in and out of the work force on a temporary basis, that these people really do not need the extra money, that these are not long term attachments to the work force and therefore are artificially pushing up the unemployment rate and proving to be a drain on unemployment insurance funds. That is the type of rationale behind this bill, that unemployment is really not that bad. To prove it, the government wants to disqualify a number of people from receiving unemployment benefits. I reject that kind of argument.

In the past I have risen to try to bring forward statistics from government agencies which refute the claim that people who work eight weeks and draw unemployment insurance are really only minor attachments who are not serious about long term employment. When we look at the problem of the unemployed today and try to analyse who the unemployed are, we receive very revealing facts and figures. Of the one million unemployed in Canada, the shocking fact is that 48 per cent of those people are under the age of 25 years. In other words, the future generation, those we have supposedly educated and trained and will rely on to keep the country going in our old age, make up approximately half of our unemployed. This has got to be a serious problem, not only from the viewpoint of over-all statistics. What is this doing to the future of this country? It is disillusioning the people we will be relying on to keep this country great.

One of the reasons I left the teaching profession to enter politics was what I saw happening to some of the senior students I taught. These students had great potential to go on to post-secondary education, but they were not going on to universities or community colleges for job training because they saw some of their friends, who had gone on to university, graduating and not being able to find jobs commensurate with their training and, in some cases, not being able to find jobs at all. At that time I felt if that situation were allowed to continue and grow worse we would be building a generation in this country who were becoming disillusioned about the system and the manner in which the government was operating. In the five years since I have been here, I have seen that situation worsen under the economic policies of this Liberal government.

When the young become disillusioned and when the whole concept of work becomes a foreign one, because people cannot find jobs, then the country is in serious trouble. Yet the government cannot seem to recognize that young people today do not want to go to university and their parents and they themselves do not want to spend hundreds and thousands of dollars getting that kind of training, only to find there are no jobs available when they graduate.

What kind of response do we see? Instead of a commitment to reduce unemployment and to provide jobs for these young people, under the callous leadership of the Prime Minister we hear the government saying to the young people: "Well, you can leave the country". That is the type of response we receive to the problem of unemployment for the young and, in an even worse sense, it is found in this bill.

Because of high unemployment, young people today have not had a chance to contribute for eight weeks in order to qualify for unemployment insurance should they be laid off, which in all probability will happen as long as this government is in power, and that qualifying period is going to be increased to anywhere from 10 weeks to 14 weeks.

All we receive from the federal Liberals are token responses to the problem of unemployment. We get Opportunities For Youth Programs and Local Initiatives Programs. Those programs only provide temporary part-time work at minimum wages, and thus fail. Then the government comes up with new names such as Canada Works and Young Canada Works, which also will only provide temporary make-work projects.

Another response of the government is to create the myth that 6 per cent or 7 per cent unemployment is natural in this country and not serious, as women and young people make up a large proportion of the unemployed. It also tinkers with the unemployment insurance system to make it appear that the government is trying to do something. Another more insidious method is to tell the public that it has to live with high unemployment in Canada, which is somehow indigenous to our country and that the problem is too big to solve. In this bill, that is recognized by the action of disqualifying people, who want to work, from receiving benefits when through no fault of their own they become unemployed.

I reject the underlying philosophy, exhibited in this bill, that nothing of any real substance can be done about unemployment. Other industrialized countries in the western world, such as France, Japan, Britain, Sweden and Germany, between the years 1962 and 1973, had an average unemployment rate of 1.8 per cent. During that same period of time Canada had an average unemployment rate of 5.1 per cent. I have to ask myself why it is that other countries can do something about the high rate of unemployment but under the Liberal government Canada cannot. I reject the argument that nothing can be done, except to tinker with unemployment insurance or to implement temporary make-work programs such as Canada Works.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Symes: Other countries can do it. Surely there is enough competence in this country to do it, but obviously it is not going to be found on the government benches. The government says we cannot afford the cost of full employment programs. I say we cannot afford the cost of high unemployment which amounts to billions of dollars in lost goods, services, taxes, and unemployment insurance payments.

● (1750)

The major problem affecting national unity is unemployment. Look at any of the surveys carried out in Quebec and you will find that the major concern of Quebecers is unemployment and the failure of the federal government to show a meaningful presence in the economy by creating jobs. No wonder the Quebecers are disillusioned with the federal system when they see that the government has consistently allowed unemployment in the province to be higher in Quebec, comparably, over the years than in other provinces.

If we were to reduce unemployment by 350,000 we would add more than $6 billion to the gross national product, a sum equal to the cost of five Olympic games. I am arguing that we must create jobs rather than engage in the kind of nonsense we see in the bill before us. The government should be addressing itself to changing the structure of our economy to one which perpetually creates high unemployment. If other countries can bring down their unemployment rates by restructuring their economy, we can do so.

We shall never solve the unemployment problem as long as we continue to be dependent upon the export of raw materials as opposed to processing and manufacturing here. I come from a region in Northern Ontario where we are blessed with large supplies of raw materials. But I see what is happening. We are digging out our minerals and chopping down our trees and exporting the raw materials to other countries. As we do so, we export jobs, because the jobs are where the material is refined and processed. As long as we allow this to continue we shall remain hewers of wood and drawers of water. If the government were serious about restructuring this aspect of the economy, we could create jobs here at home. Instead, the government allows foreign-owned companies to buy up our minerals and forest products and export them to other countries so that the parent corporations can enjoy the benefits of manufacturing the finished goods.

Is it any wonder that today, because of the policy followed by successive Liberal governments, 60 per cent of our manufacturing industry is foreign-owned, and that over 95 per cent of our oil industry is foreign-owned? When foreign direction exists to such an extent is it any wonder we should continue to export our resources and, in the process, to export jobs? Is it any wonder that when there are economic problems affecting parent companies in the United States the first lay-offs should affect Canadian subsidiaries? Is it any wonder that virtually no research and development is being done in Canada, with the result that our own research scientists and university graduates cannot find jobs here? Until we tackle the issue of foreign ownership we shall not be able to restructure the economy in such a way as to reduce the exporting of our raw materials, and jobs with them.

Instead of tackling unemployment by ending programs which have created it, such as the anti-inflation program, the government insists on continuing them. The anti-inflation program has taken hundreds of millions out of the pockets of wage-earners. Is it any wonder that we find ourselves in a situation in which factories have to reduce production because fewer people are buying goods? Is it any wonder that factories today are operating at only 83 per cent of capacity, or that they should be forced to lay off employees, with the result that unemployment worsens? We contended when the government introduced the anti-inflation program that it would only increase unemployment. Today this is apparent, but the program goes on nevertheless. What is the response? It is to tinker with the unemployment insurance system, making it worse, to give the appearance that the government is trying to do something about unemployment.

Supporters of this bill are failing to recognize that the number one problem facing this country is the shortage of jobs. We in this party will continue to oppose these amendments because they make it even more difficult for the unemployed to survive. If these people are disqualified their only resource is to starve in the streets or get assistance from municipal welfare, throwing an increased burden upon municipal governments which have the least ability to raise funds.

We want to see changes in the unemployment insurance program but, more important, we want to see increased employment opportunities.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. It being six o'clock the House stands adjourned until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Does the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) have the unanimous consent of the House to revert to motions to table some documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PIPE LINES

TABLING OF NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD REPORT ON NORTHERN PIPE LINES

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to table, under the provisions of Standing Order 41(2), in both official languages, volume 1, "Reasons for Decision, Northern Pipelines," issued by the National Energy Board, and the technical supporting volumes 2 and 3 under the same name dealing with the technical, economic, financial, social, and environmental questions to which the National Energy Board addressed itself.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION REORGANIZATION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cullen that Bill C-27, to establish a Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the third time and do pass.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. At six o'clock the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) had the floor.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, before we adjourned for the dinner hour I was addressing myself to the amendments before us in Bill C-27 to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, and I was developing the argument that the government, rather than addressing itself to the fundamental and pressing problem of unemployment, preferred to tinker with the unemployment insurance system.

I was trying to outline why I rejected many of the arguments the government was putting forward to justify these changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act which will affect the unemployed at a time in our country's history when they are least able to defend themselves, at a time when our unemployment is as high as 8 per cent, and the projections are that it will be higher. I was pointing out that, rather than tinkering with the system, we need some fundamental changes in the structure of our economy to get away from always developing and exporting raw materials instead of processing them here in Canada, and that we should end the anti-inflation program which has created higher unemployment through lowering demand in the economy by rolling back workers' wages.

I also want to stress that the government should be taking initiatives in the public sector that have some meaning in terms of job creation, that it should be undertaking some projects which meet direct human needs which the country is facing at this time. I can think of programs that we implemented back in 1972 when we had a lower unemployment rate and yet the government, because it was a minority parliament, found the money to institute needed capital projects for municipalities. I think of the construction of sewer and water mains, roads, transport facilities, and aid to institutions such as hospitals. These are areas in which there is a genuine need today to provide services and amenities, and yet we still have one million Canadians unemployed and a government that prefers to tax workers with higher unemployment insurance premiums rather than commit itself to some of these effective capital works projects that provided people with work in the past and provided the general public with needed services.

At a time when there is one million unemployed, the government cannot tell me that it has no precedent on which to base some kind of job creation program. I am not talking about the namby-pamby Canada Works projects that it keeps coming up with, or some of the provisions in the bill that we discussed earlier, such as work sharings to which the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) referred. At a time when the majority of Canadians do not have adequate shelter, the government should be doing something about high unemployment by instituting a housing program of some substance. To inject more funds into that would return to the federal Treasury funds ten-fold over as workers got back to work and carried their fair share of paying taxes and spending on goods and services. A housing program that would be meaningful is needed desperately, and it would provide jobs. We also know there are many homes needing repairs and renovations. We know that government assistance in urban renewal is needed. Municipalities have been begging the government not to cut back on urban programs but to maintain adequate funding and, indeed, to increase funding in that area. Yet we get a negative response.

I cannot allow the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) to say that there are not ways to create jobs through the public sector. We know of instances in the past where there have been programs to develop parks, environmental clean-up programs and energy conservation programs, and programs like that could be undertaken now to a much greater degree than the phony and hollow program the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) announced recently. Programs for community services would not only provide services but also jobs.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) mentioned the idea of voluntary retirement at age 60. This would make new jobs available for people in the work force. Let us not accept the argument that unemployment is such a big problem that it escapes solution.

I pointed out that Canada has the worst unemployment record in the industrialized world. Through imaginative programs in the public and private sectors other countries have been able to reduce unemployment significantly. I categorically reject the negative thinking and the bankruptcy of ideas that the federal Liberals have imposed upon this country and upon the one million unemployed. That is not economic leadership; that is a rejection of the fundamental idea that a government has a responsibility to the people to create and maintain a sound economy.

We in the New Democratic Party feel that this bill would discriminate against the unemployed in the areas of the country where it is virtually impossible to find long-term work. It is no accident that in Atlantic Canada, Quebec, and northern Ontario there is a lack of long-term jobs. That lack exists because of the nature of the regional economies of those areas. I have been to Atlantic Canada; I come from northern Ontario, and I know what I am talking about. The figures show that in these regions those who can find temporary work are seasonally employed people. In Atlantic Canada, for instance, they work in fish plants for certain amounts of time when those plants are operating, or in some of the woodland operations, or in service industries. In areas like that where the economies are chronically weak, no matter how people try, they cannot find long-term work.

What does this bill do? It raises the qualifying period from eight weeks of employment before a person becomes eligible for unemployment insurance if he becomes unemployed to anywhere from ten to 14 weeks. We have pointed out that that kind of modification will throw anywhere from a quarter of a million to a third of a million people off the unemployment insurance roll and will force them on to municipal welfare rolls because, contrary to what the minister says, these are not people who are just marginally attached to the work force and who really do not need to work. These are young people looking for their first jobs or for jobs to finance higher education. They are women who have been forced to go out to work to supplement their family income because of the government's failure to keep down rising costs. They are people who have to work because their families depend on their incomes, and for the government to disqualify those young people, those women and those unskilled workers, when we have high unemployment, is cruel, heartless, and totally unjustified.

On the average in the Atlantic provinces and in Quebec, excluding the city of Montreal, we find that the requirement before one can become eligible for unemployment insurance benefits will be about ten weeks of employment. In Ontario it will range anywhere from 13 to 14 weeks. In my part of the province, northern Ontario, I suspect it will be about 13. On the prairies it will be about 14 weeks, and in B.C. 10 or 11 weeks. The hon. member for Nickel Belt pointed out that when the government institutes these 54 regions with their varying periods of qualification, there will be a bureaucratic nightmare. We already have problems with the Unemployment Insurance Act as it is. When we divide the country into 54 regions, we will run into problems with people moving from one region to another.

I predict that this minister will have to hire more civil servants to make the already overgrown bureaucracy in his department even fatter. Worse than that, we will have an unjustified application of this act because we know that even within a region there will be differences. In Sault Ste. Marie there may be an unemployment rate of 7 per cent, but in the town of Blind River just a few miles away there might be unemployment rates of anywhere from 14 per cent to 20 per cent. There are regions like that all across Canada. People in towns which have chronic high unemployment are going to be caught by this increased qualifying period, and they will not be able to find jobs. They will be thrown off the unemployment insurance rolls and forced on to city welfare rolls.

This is a bad piece of legislation. It does not attack the fundamental problem of unemployment. Indeed, it attacks the unemployed. I know the minister likes to present the argument that the people who are going to be affected most are young people and housewives, those who really do not need to work, according to the minister. However, his own statistics gathered by his department and by Statistics Canada prove the contrary, that people who are eight to 11-weekers, those who can find only temporary work, are not the majority of those who are claiming unemployment insurance benefits. The minister tries to make the public think that this is a great number of people and that these are the groups who are draining the unemployment insurance fund, milking it and cheating it. That is just not so.

When we look at the statistics on the operation of the unemployment insurance system we find, for example, that in the first five months of 1976 those who worked eight to 11 weeks made up only 15 per cent of all the beneficiaries of unemployment insurance. That is not the great majority. The minister says that even if the figure is only 15 per cent, those people are not serious about working. He says they are in and out of the labour force trying to make a fast buck, and then drawing benefits.

In the first five months of 1976 63.8 per cent of all eight to 11-weekers in the work force were in Quebec and in the Atlantic provinces, areas with low job vacancy levels and histories of only seasonal work. They are not just housewives and young people. Many of them are adult males and heads of households who have to depend on unemployment insurance to keep bread on the table for their families because they can find jobs lasting only eight to 11 weeks, seasonal work. They have to depend on unemployment insurance benefits because of the government's mismanagement of the economy.

If that is not enough to convince the minister, we find that more men than women will be affected by this change in the Unemployment Insurance Act. To the argument raised by the Conservatives that the main beneficiaries of the eight-week attachment period were women and young people, not serious participants in the work force, the former minister said at the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, on May 28, 1975, as recorded at the bottom of page 19:18:

> I think it is a bit of a red herring myself. I think there are other areas that have to be tidied up in the act that are far more significant than that favourite whipping boy of the short-term-work claimant.

Earlier, speaking of the eight-week attachment period, he said:

> The incidence of disentitlement or disqualification, as an effect of failure to meet one's obligation under the act, is lower amongst the group with a minor attachment (eight weeks) to the work force as their proportion of the total claims load than those with a long-term attachment to the work force.

I refer to the following figures again only because I know the minister has a hard time understanding them. In June, 1976, only 12½ per cent of unemployment insurance recipients were under 20 years of age; adult women made up 41.7 per cent of recipients, and adult men, 45.8 per cent.

Moreover, let no one accept the phony argument that of the women who collected unemployment insurance benefits, there were some who did not need to work to support the family. A study of unemployment in the years 1971 and 1973 found that unemployed wives tended to come from families with low incomes—women who had to work to meet the family bills, the higher food costs, higher clothing costs and higher energy costs.

This party argues that the proposed changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act to increase the qualifying period will hit hardest the young people and women who need to supplement the family income; they will hit hardest at areas of chronically high unemployment such as Atlantic Canada and Quebec and will not help the unemployed, as the minister likes to claim, by saving money that could be directed into other programs. The changes would just take money away from the unemployed in one area to help the unemployed in another and, in our opinion, that is no way to tackle this crucial problem.

I have tried to outline ways the government could act to create jobs. I have tried to show how this act will be discriminatory. It will hurt the unemployed, especially in regions where people cannot find long-term work. For these reasons this party will fight the bill to the end and try to convince the minister that this is not the approach he should take. He should be creating jobs, not attacking the unemployed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) gave notice of changes to this act in December, 1976, the Minister of Labour for the province of Nova Scotia was quoted on the front page of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald as saying that such a move at this time could impose serious economic hardships in Nova Scotia. He said that the timing was wrong, that many people who wanted jobs could not get them, that the real unemployment figures were soaring and not just because people did not want to work. He also said that the provincial social services department would have to pick up the slack for many jobless people left without UIC payments under the proposed changes. He is a Liberal, but was advancing an argument that this party has used in this House and which was repeated this afternoon in the speech of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez).

We find it incredible that at a time of the highest unemployment since the depression, this government attacks unemployment by proposing a change in the eligibility for benefits, thus indirectly attacking the unemployed who need help the most.

Members from northeastern New Brunswick where 25 per cent to 30 per cent unemployment is normal, from Cape Breton as I am where 20 per cent to 25 per cent unemployment is normal, or from Newfoundland where most areas except St. John's are equally affected, are all appalled that at this time, when this nation has such high unemployment, the government would be so heartless and cruel as to offer these changes as a means of alleviating the problems which affect the poor and the low income groups.

This afternoon the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) described the depression and its effects upon the people. Although he did not argue that unemployment is felt as severely now as then, he said that in many ways the effect could be worse because if unemployment amongst the younger generation keeps increasing we will in effect be sitting on a tinder box. We are alarmed at the composition of the unemployed in this nation and the growing unemployment amongst young people—the minister had the nerve to refer to them as kids—young adults graduating from high school ready to enter university, vocational or technical schools at a time when all these institutions are increasing their fees. Both parents need to work to meet the increased cost of living, and the consumer price index is rising to a higher level than was anticipated by the Anti-Inflation Board even four months ago.

The path we are following could easily lead us to double-digit inflation by next new year yet all the government offers at this time to low income people is a proposal to tighten eligibility for unemployment insurance benefits.

The reason there is so much unemployment in Canada today is basically because there has been less than 5 per cent growth in the gross national product for three years in a row. I know the minister and his cohorts who draft the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act do not like to hear us quote the Economic Council of Canada. The basic reason is that we had 3.2 per cent growth in 1974; the rate went up .6 per cent in 1975, was 4.6 per cent in 1976, and right now, according to first quarter figures and the report of the Conference Board, we shall be lucky if we see a growth rate of 4 per cent, a rate which will not even absorb new entrants to the labour force. Therefore one must conclude that unless we can keep young people in school longer or use gimmicks to keep them out of the labour force, unemployment this winter will be between 8.5 per cent and 9 per cent. The ones hardest hit will be young adults, and married women who must work to supplement the family income.

• (2030)

The minister and hon. members opposite who spoke put forward a naïve philosophy in support of this bill. Mr. Speaker, the proposed changes in eligibility will affect kids and housewives they say, but I say these are young adults and housewives who must work. If the head of a household earns $25,000 or more, there is no need for the wife or married partner to have a secondary attachment, or marginal attachment as the minister calls it, to the labour force. That family can maintain a decent standard of living. But if the head of the house is making less than $20,000 per year, the married partner must work in order to maintain a decent standard of living. Some call that materialistic. When our middle or upper classes want to improve or maintain their high standard of living, we do not say they are materialistic; therefore why should we accuse people earning between $12,000 and $14,000 a year of being materialistic if they want to aspire to a decent standard of living?

Mr. Rodriguez: Right on.

Mr. Hogan: And I say nothing of the 20 per cent of Canadian families who live on a measly $6,000 or $7,000 a year.

An hon. Member: The working poor.

Mr. Hogan: Yes, the working poor and the poor. This bill neglects them. Instead of changing the act, the government should change its policy, to provide jobs in this country.

The growth figures I mentioned previously show that at least 2 per cent or 3 per cent of Canadian unemployment is due to deficiency of growth, or what economists call deficiency of aggregate demand. In plain words that means there is too much unused factory capacity in this country. We underutilize our manufacturing sector and underutilize our human beings, as one can readily see from official unemployment figures. Those figures say nothing of the hidden unemployed. There may be between 200,000 and 400,000 more unemployed than our official figures show, depending on whose figures you accept. Our statistical unemployment figures do not reflect accurately our underutilization of human beings. Mr. Speaker, underutilized human beings and underutilized economic capacity are the main reasons for much of our unemployment.

When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) brought down his budget recently he said implicitly something the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had said explicitly, namely, that our people are trying to take too much out of the economy. He tried to recite the classical formula of inflation, too much money chasing to few goods. He used a monetarist argument which bears little relationship to our economy which suffers from the underutilization of human beings and factory capacity. Mr. Speaker, if it were a fact that Canadians are taking too much out of the economy, our factories would work at 100 per cent and unemployment rates would be in the vicinity of 4 per cent or 5 per cent. But that is not the case. Our unemployment rates are in the 8 per cent to 8.3 per cent region and, if the projections of the Conference Board based on first quarter figures are correct, this winter unemployment could go up to 9.0 per cent.

The minister, and the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), have suggested that we oppose job creation. That is nonsense. If the government had listened to my party's leader at the time of the last budget it would have cut taxes for this country's low income people, increased demand, and put our factories back to work. Instead of doing that, the Minister of Finance, on the advice of Mr. Bouey, Governor of the Bank of Canada, adopted the sort of policies Mr. Simon, United States Secretary of the Treasury under President Ford, adopted to fight inflation.

The government is trying to cure inflation by creating more unemployment, and the sad part of it is that it is not curing inflation, because it is getting worse. My authority for saying this is the projection of first quarters figures to which I referred earlier. Mr. Speaker, we must tackle both inflation and unemployment. You cannot argue simplistically that cutting income tax for lower income groups would so increase aggregate demand as to push inflation up. The government still thinks that too much money is chasing too few goods, and will not cut taxes for lower income people. On the other hand upper income groups already avail themselves of many tax loopholes, and if you increase their incomes you merely enable them to increase their personal savings. The people in the upper income levels are already increasing their savings, but the people lower down on the scale are not. We need to correct this.

Mr. Breau: That is the government's policy.

Mr. Hogan: Of course it is the government's policy, but it is wrong.

Mr. Breau: The hon. member is stating the government's policy.

Mr. Rodriguez: Listen. He said it is wrong.

Mr. Hogan: I say the government should have decreased taxes for people at the lower end of the income scale. This would have stimulated demand and decreased unemployment. But the government chose not to do this. It should have acted to bring interest rates down. It chose not to do this because it is imbued with the notion that our inflation is a result of too much money chasing too few goods. When will the government get it into its head that its policies lead to the underutilization of human beings, as measured by our unemployment figures, official and hidden, and the underutilization of manufacturing capacity?

The government would not have increased inflation if it had cut taxes for lower income people. In the face of slack demand prices would not have risen. As it is, some powerful corporations could well push prices up in future; and such inflation could be termed cost-push inflation, which must be tackled by other means.

Mr. Breau: Like wage and price controls.

[Mr. Hogan.]

Mr. Hogan: Which have worked beautifully, I suppose.

Mr. Breau: And controls on big unions.

Mr. Hogan: You are controlling costs beautifully.

Mr. Breau: Are we controlling the big unions?

Mr. Symes: You are taking the money out of the pockets of workers.

Mr. Breau: Yes, workers making $10 an hour and more.

Mr. Hogan: Do you want to make a speech?

Mr. Orlikow: He hasn't got the guts now, after what he said.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Will the hon. member please address the Chair? He has been recognized, to allow him to make a speech.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, the government's policies have led to a deficiency of aggregate demand and deficiency of growth, and are causing a great deal of hardship. At the same time, they are not tackling the structural problems of the Atlantic region, and other regions, including Ontario and Quebec. When will the government get the message that you cannot continue to protect with high tariffs that are the highest in the western world, about 30 per cent? They were started under Sir John A. Macdonald in 1879 and have continued until 1977. Now the government is finding that this is beginning to catch up to workers in the textile industry and other areas.

● (2040)

The government kept postponing the adjustments that had to be made. Plants did not modernize in Quebec and Ontario. We are paying for it with higher costs. It is now necessary to have import quotas in order to keep the unemployment rate in Ontario and Quebec from going sky high. There are other forms of protective measures as well.

The structures in the Atlantic region must be examined. DREE policies are not doing the job. I raised this with the representatives of the Economic Council of Canada when they appeared before the DREE meeting. There must be new types of institutions to co-ordinate better the funds for development going from the federal government to the provincial governments in order that there will be an actual increase in per capita earned income in the Atlantic region, instead of maintaining per capita income as the criterion by which we should be judging growth in the Atlantic region. You cannot judge growth in the Atlantic region in that way. You cannot argue on a per capita income basis as proof of development.

There must be more than just transfers in terms of unemployment insurance into these areas. There must be jobs. The people there must be allowed to make a productive contribution to the Canadian economy. We must close the gap of earned income per capita. However, the government does not think along those lines. It only suggests that possibly new institutional arrangements will be needed.

No one pretends that in a federal state where there is a division between the federal and provincial levels of government and the child of provincial governments, the municipal governments, that it is easy to do these things.

We have to get at the root of the problem rather than by just making transfer payments into the Atlantic region, whether through baby bonus grants, unemployment insurance grants or what have you. That is really only a band-aid approach. That might sound too socialist to some people; what do they offer alternatively?

Mr. Kaplan: That's nuts.

Mr. Hogan: You listen and I will tell you.

Mr. Kaplan: It just doesn't add up.

Mr. Hogan: The hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) should know that growth in the major metropolitan areas is buttressed by DREE at the expense of employment in the outlying areas. That is a situation in every province, starting from Newfoundland through to Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and into Quebec, Montreal and possibly Quebec City, where the large areas are supplemented by DREE. I know this is so in the Atlantic region. There is recently an attempt to change this, but it is not a serious attempt.

This is contributing to the over-all unemployment situation in Canada. This failure of government policy to create more growth is causing the cyclical high unemployment that we have at the present time. It is failing to correct regional disparities with serious efforts to increase earned income per capita in areas such as the Atlantic region and Quebec.

Several members have raised this point. I want to emphasize it once more. A very serious problem exists for the young people of this country. I am not talking about kids, but about people who have finished grade 12. We do not have grade 13 in my area. These people would like to go to vocational or technical schools and on to other forms of higher education.

These young people cannot get jobs because there is not enough money in Young Canada Works. The minister stated with regard to job creation that we do not need to worry about the effects of the change of eligibility for unemployment insurance. He stated that with the changes he is now introducing the Canada Works grants to these areas will offset any loss. I wish to quote some figures for the benefit of the minister.

For the first quarter net benefit period of 1976 for Glace Bay, these was $1.744 million in unemployment insurance. By 1977 that increased to $2.18 million. In Sydney it was $4.21 million for the first quarter of 1976, and $5.02 million for the first quarter of 1977. I have not referred to areas such as Port Hawkesbury and Inverness in the constituency of the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen), but the situation is the same there.

Active claimants for unemployment insurance for the first quarter of 1976 averaged 76 units of people. In Glace Bay last year there were 2,112, and for the first quarter of this year 2,260. Last year in Sydney there were 4,935, and 5,300 this year. This indicates a complete failure of the government's programs to create jobs in these areas. Why would they want to put more unemployment insurance money into those areas than money to create jobs? This is what the government has been doing with its LIP project, the son of LIP, Canada Works, and the son of OFY, Young Canada Works.

The minister solemnly stated in this House that Canada Works was different from LIP because it would create permanent jobs for 50 to 52 weeks of the year. It is true there is a difference between Canada Works and LIP in that there are two stages of Canada Works as opposed to one stage in LIP.

I took down the figures the minister quoted. I found that the allocation to Cape Breton for the first part of the LIP grant was $349,000 for my constituency, $382,000 for the constituency of the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir), and $347,000 for the constituency of the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso.

Mr. Breau: There should be more there.

Mr. Hogan: If you want to offer patronage like you do, that is fine. In any event, that is not much money when you consider there were 14,445 persons on active claims at UIC offices throughout Cape Breton Island in February of this year. The total labour force for the Island was about 48,000. That means one in four was drawing unemployment insurance benefits and not contributing to the economy.

What is most discouraging is the fact that this does not even take into account all of the young people entering the labour markets who cannot find jobs and are not eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. This money does not even begin to tackle the problem of unemployment in that area. My allotment provided the equivalent of 43 jobs for one year, and the other constituencies will get the equivalent of 41 and 47 jobs for one year. This is terribly discouraging, especially in an area with a housing problem which is some 70 years old.

Houses in mining areas, for example, desperately need repairs, to say nothing of the need for at least one new coal mine in these times of increasing oil prices. So far as the housing problem is concerned, I wrote to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) and he sent me back information about increases for all of Nova Scotia. In my letter to him I said this:

> When the Hon. Barney Danson was head of your present department, he went to Cape Breton for a special meeting and personally told me that he was shocked at some of the housing that he had seen.
> I have been trying to get the Cape Breton Development Corporation and CMHC involved in a special program for the mining communities are often left a legacy of old (about 70 years and over) company housing which I have often referred to as proletarian housing. They lack basements and many of them that are now owned by coal mine pensioners and/or their widows are going down the hill fast and are creating blighted areas in various sections of the mining towns.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, incipient slum areas are being created. Continuing:

Enclosed is a recent copy of a letter which I sent to Mr. Matheson, who is presently the head of Devco. I cannot see why CMHC and Devco cannot get together to offer these pensioners and widows a special rehabilitation package. It would save a large problem for the future as I see it and would create jobs that are badly needed there now.

This is particularly so in light of the unemployment insurance figures to which I have referred.

A five to ten year plan would not be that expensive. I, personally, would like to see an experiment on this type of rehabilitation carried out over a five year period, with the worst homes being chosen.

Even though the pensioners are generally below $6,000 in family income, I would expect that they would have to make some contributions because I don't want such a program to be looked on as just welfare. Some of them may be capable of putting some sweat equity in but in any case they should be required to make some financial sacrifice in return for this effort.

Devco officials have, in the past, not considered this as a part of their obligation under the Cape Breton Development Act as I see it, though they are in the housing field to some extent already by holding an equity in Reeves Modular Homes (for the building of new homes). This is worth while but is totally beyond the ability of the pensioners and/or their widows to pay.

I wish you would seriously discuss this matter with Mr. Curran, CMHC manager in Sydney and with Mr. Matheson of Devco to see if we cannot get something started in the mining towns of Cape Breton.

The present NIP and RRAP programs are too slow and cumbersome to meet this need in an efficient way. In fact, I would go so far as to say, as I have in the attached letter, that for some of the mining areas of Cape Breton, and I am sure it would hold in other places that have an old stock of company houses, that having an area declared a NIP one before you can get RRAP funding, is putting the cart before the horse. The dominant need in such areas of old housing stock is home repair and neighbourhood improvement should follow, giving the people decent shelter.

I realize that you have all of Canada to think about but a slavish universal clinging to any federal program is one of the things that can get any federal state into difficulties. This is but one example of how this is happening in Canada today.

As I have said, there is more unemployment insurance being paid in my area than is required to provide short-term and medium-term jobs, such as constructing decent homes for the people over the next 20 years. This would create jobs in the construction industry and would have a multiplier effect on the economy as well as reducing unemployment in the area by perhaps 2 or 3 per cent.

I disagree with the hon. member for Hamilton West. The reason I am still opposing this change in eligibility is that we are not getting the guarantees which are shown in the first phase. Why should we leave people subject to the whim of government when we know that instead of spending money on unemployment insurance the government could spend it on creating jobs even for the short term? I suggest there is something seriously wrong with the co-ordination which should exist between the various departments. The finance department is, of course, talking outmoded economics. It is of the view that the prime cause of inflation in this country is too much money chasing too few goods—a demand-pull inflation. That is not why we have an inflationary spiral in Canada.

We can improve the cyclical unemployment picture by stimulating the economy. I hope there will be a budget this fall which will cut taxes for low income groups and reduce their mortgage rates by one or 2 per cent. At the moment there is a moratorium on public housing in Nova Scotia because CMHC and the province cannot get together. As a result people are being pushed off into slum housing. The government is paying as much unemployment insurance in some of these areas as it is in some places in Newfoundland, and this is why the government should make a special effort to create jobs instead. In so doing it would be helping national as well as regional policy.

[Mr. Hogan.]

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, frankly it makes me somewhat uneasy and perhaps somewhat embarrassed to talk about unemployment in a country as beautiful and as big as Canada, a country which is enormously wealthy and young and which has incredible potential. It is truly sad to talk about unemployment when there are underdeveloped and poor countries which envy us our wealth. They must think we are stupid not to find the answer to stimulate our economy and correct the present situation.

Mr. Speaker, unemployment can be considered a waste of human resources. Statistics Canada has given a rather dark picture of work possibilities for Canadians in 1976 and 1977. According to these reports from economists, Mr. Speaker, stagnation threatens several regions of our country and the social and economic effects of such a situation can no longer be ignored. Indeed, I have received in the last few weeks many copies of a petition asking for the withdrawal of the bill now under consideration, Bill C-27. Up to this time, approximately 6,000 people have signed this petition which reads as follows:

I, the undersigned, am opposed to the bill introduced by Minister Bud Cullen and denounce it as being unrealistic, misleading, discriminatory, catastrophic and reactionary, and demand instead the implementation of effective programs to fight against seasonal unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, it is true that the bill introduced in the House by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) on December 10 of last year contains some amendments which are important for all workers and unemployed in the country, especially in eastern Quebec and the Maritime provinces. Bill C-27 stipulates that from now on a claimant will need to have worked at least 12 weeks to be entitled to unemployment insurance, instead of eight, as the present legislation provides. Moreover, claimants having worked fewer than 25 weeks will of course be entitled only to an initial benefit period and will lose the right to benefits during the following periods: an extension period according to the period of unemployment, an extension period according to the national unemployment level, an extension period according to the regional level of unemployment, an extension period according to the gap between the national and regional levels of unemployment.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, our courageous workers are going to lose some benefits because of this bill as is indicated in the following data, an illustration which will give us an eloquent but rather frightening idea of what is going to happen, if this bill is passed. The eight-week working period, according to the present law, entitles one to 44 weeks of benefits. Under the new law, not a single week. Ten worked weeks entitles one to 44 weeks of benefits under the present law. But with the new law, naught. Twelve worked weeks entitles one to 44 weeks of benefits, but under the new law, 12 weeks only. And so on and so forth, Mr. Speaker. As has been said before, the bill pretends to be realistic, and of course, it is the case as it is brought forward at a time when all our economists foresee an important slackening in our economic activities and a sharp rise in our unemployment level for 1977.

Misleading, because in the presentation of the budget they minimized the savings that the commission is going to make by insisting on the job creation programs without first ensuring that these very programs will affect the same unemployed people that are affected by the cutback. One can in fact foresee that the Canada Works Program will not really affect seasonal workers in the Gaspé peninsula, in northern New Brunswick, the fishermen and the people who work in the seasonal hotel industry and so on. It is discriminatory because it eliminates completely from the benefit of unemployment insurance all seasonal workers, married women, students who hold a summer job, yet do not qualify for the 12 weeks of employment even though they still have to pay their contributions to the unemployment insurance fund. This measure is catastrophic from an economic standpoint for the lower St. Lawrence region, the Gaspé region, northern New Brunswick and probably all the regions affected during those months when unemployment is at its highest level and the unemployment insurance will make savings of several millions of dollars through those cutbacks and that on the backs of the workers. It is a reactionary measure from a social standpoint because it will substantially increase the number of people on welfare given the absence of efficient programs to fight seasonal unemployment in the lower St. Lawrence and the Gaspé region.

Mr. Speaker, the present government insists on the fact that it has had to give priority to the fight against inflation even if that fight was going to contribute in a painful soaring of unemployment in Canada, an increase such as we have not known since the thirties. In fact, in my humble opinion, that is quite ridiculous, as I said previously, in such a vast and rich country as ours where so many things should be done whereby we could employ all the present unemployed people and still another million individuals. We would not even have enough people to fill the positions required to accomplish all the tasks which we should carry out in this country, such as building houses for middle income workers and senior citizens, such as constructing roads, improving the landscape, cleaning up all beaches, and what else. Mr. Speaker, it is not because there is no work to be done that we have unemployment, it is because the financial system does not meet the need of society in 1977.

Let us take as an example the shoe industry situation. In the last 12 months, 21 shoe manufacturing plants went out of business in Canada, which resulted in the loss of 2,500 jobs when we are now experiencing, as I was saying a moment ago, the highest unemployment rate in 37 years. Yet, what is the government doing to correct this situation? Nothing at all. They are making studies, they are studying and studying. Besides, when questions are asked, the answer is that the matter is under study. In other words, while fighting inflation, the federal government slowed down the economy which resulted in a very high unemployment rate, particularly in Quebec, even though inflation in this province has not been the main problem since 1967. Quite the opposite, the main problem is undoubtedly the economic revival and job creation.

In this context, it can easily be understood why an ex-minister of the Liberal government could say: "If we do not succeed in decreasing the unemployment rate, the number of revolutionaries will increase, and Quebec will not have enough police officers to control the number of people revolted by the present system." Mr. Speaker, official opposition members are probably right when they say that the action proposed by the government to fight unemployment does not give the expected results. Here is a study entitled: Data on unemployment 1960-1971. That review enables us to analyze the comparative unemployment situation in 1960, 1965 and 1970. Here is the average annual unemployment rate for each of Canada's five regions. In the Atlantic area, the rate was 7.6 per cent of total labour in 1970, 7.4 in 1965 and 10.7 per cent in 1960, under a Progressive Conservative government. In the Quebec region, the rate was 7.9 per cent in 1970, 5.4 per cent in 1966 and 9.1 per cent in 1960. This means that unemployment was higher in Quebec under the Progressive Conservatives in 1960. In Ontario, the trend is similar. A 4.3 per cent rate in 1970, 5.4 per cent in 1960. In the Prairies, 4.4 per cent in 1970, and 4.2 per cent in 1960.

In British Columbia, the rate was 7.6 per cent in 1970 as compared to 8.5 per cent in 1960, which was under the Conservatives. With such a poor unemployment performance, I suggest the opposition parties are in no position to give lessons, and they should be the last ones to criticize the government for not solving unemployment.

Seasonally adjusted statistics for January 1953 to December 1971 provide the following unemployment data for the periods from 1959 to 1962, under a Conservative government, and 1968 to 1971 under the Liberals. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think I have quoted enough figures. I simply wished to emphasize that political parties, whether Liberal or Conservative, have no magic wand to stop unemployment and control inflation.

We in the Social Credit Party of Canada believe we possess this magic wand and even if other members have often made a mockery of us, the fact remains that if they have a better alternative, I wish these gentlemen of older parties would give us some indication about it, so that we can work on it. I suggest that up to now, only the Social Credit Party of Canada has seemed in a position to do something or advocated a policy likely to fight inflation while solving the unemployment problem. I can see some members opposite or on my far right smiling. Their smile is meaningless and apparently they are satisfied with the present situation and the distressing plight of almost 700,000 Canadians who are almost always unemployed. This does not seem to affect them.

We in the Social Credit Party of Canada want to ensure the economic freedom and security of each and every Canadian and for this purpose, we are proposing to the Canadian people to implement a system which is said to be a new one whereas I believe it has been experimented in several places, where it was quickly removed as were those who were administering it. One can say that the mover of this alternative comes from England and wrote a volume on the Social Credit philosophy in 1916. For many people, social credit is a monetary reform plan. This is obvious! This is why in these days when money or credit is scarce, the monetary reform they are advocating is so popular.

The Social Credit Party of Canada is more than that. It is a social credit and a philosophical policy, that is to say that social credit is a philosophy rather than a policy. However, whenever a problem arises at home, it cannot be solved outside the door. Therefore, this is why in the political field it is important to attempt to put everything in order. The expectations of the Social Credit philosophy can be defined as an association or the power of human beings living in society to achieve the desired results in order to meet their needs.

So, Mr. Speaker, the way things are going, it is obvious that the traditional parties are helpless. All they can do is try to put people to sleep with all sorts of nonsense and let the skunk grow, as I said not too long ago in one of my speeches. You get used to the smell and to the idea that nothing can be done about it and that it must be suffered until the skunk dies by itself.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say to the government that it is now faced with a sizeable challenge and that I think it should consider creating immediately more jobs, particularly jobs suited to the needs of the people, the working people and which would have the effect of allowing those people to regain their pride and dignity lost through idleness, and at the same time they could make their contribution to the unification and the harmony of a beautiful and great country. I dare believe that those few words will have the effect of making the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) think and that he will withdraw this bill, at least for the moment, because if it were passed as it is that would have terrible effects on the working class and all the people in my area and in northern New Brunswick.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to join my colleagues in opposing the measure before us. We have opposed this bill from the beginning because we have never believed, nor do we believe now, that the reason unemployment insurance benefits cost the taxpayers so much is because there are large numbers of people who do not want to work and are living off the system. We believe the reason there is more unemployment today than there has ever been since the end of the Second World War, or even since the great depression, is not because people are suddenly unwilling to work but because the economic policies of the government have helped to create unemployment and made it more difficult for people to find jobs.

I find it interesting that the major opposition to this bill has, from the beginning, come from members of the New Democratic Party. I find it interesting that from among the 16 members of parliament who belong to the NDP only two, the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) and the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth), represent constituencies which have very large numbers of unemployed. My constituency has so few unemployed that the amount of money available under Canada Works and Young Canada Works is the minimum allowed for that type of program.

When the bill was before us last March stories appeared in the newspapers that Liberal members from the maritimes would vote against the government and bring about its defeat because the bill was so bad. Let me quote from the Globe and Mail of March 21, 1977—I wish the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) would listen to some of the things he said back in March and compare them with his silence today, rather than sit talking to the minister as he is doing now. The report in the Globe and Mail reads:

> Herbert Breau, Liberal member for Gloucester, said the group was concerned about worsening unemployment in the country, especially in the maritimes.

Then the article goes on to give the figures. I am not surprised the hon. member was concerned because, according to the Canadian Press:

> The Atlantic provinces were the hardest hit, with unemployment rates of 15.1 per cent in Newfoundland, 13 per cent in New Brunswick, 11 per cent in Nova Scotia and 9 per cent in Prince Edward Island.

> Mr. Breau said in an interview, "We may or may not vote against it, but we have communicated our serious concerns to Prime Minister Trudeau, Manpower Minister Bud Cullen and the four maritime ministers."
> "We will wait for a definite answer from Bud Cullen before making a decision to vote for or against the bill when it comes before the House."
> "My constituency has one of the highest unemployment rates in the country—as high as 30 per cent now—and these provisions will make the situation worse. I have to consider the welfare of my constituents."

Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has been conspicuous by his silence in this debate. Yet nothing has really changed. Nothing has been done by the minister which will be effective in helping the unemployed in the hon. member's constituency.

On March 19, 1977, a couple of days earlier, the Toronto Star carried a news story under a big headline "Trudeau Faces Revolt by MPs over Jobs Bill". The first paragraph read:

> The Trudeau government faces a backbench rebellion if it insists on pushing through a bill to make it even tougher for jobless Canadians to get unemployment insurance benefits.

The report continued:

> The government could fall if Newfoundland MP David Rooney gets the four other Atlantic Liberals he says are also opposed to the bill to join him in voting against it. The five, he says, have agreed that the bill is unacceptable to them in its present form.
> Rooney says he is so disgusted by the harmful effects of Bill C-27 that he is prepared to risk Liberal defeat to down the measure, and already he has the support of enough colleagues to bring down the government.

● (2120)

Later in the story they quoted the hon. member for Bonavista-Trinity (Mr. Rooney) as follows:

"The cabinet would have got the bill through by now if it hadn't been for us holding up our support", said Rooney. "We've been under tremendous pressure to give in. But if I voted for that bill I'd be a martyr to my party and a traitor to my constituents.

"Most Canadians think of the jobless as a minority—and often a lazy one. In my district, I believe they're a tragic majority, and a bitterly disappointed group of people who want to work. There just aren't any jobs for them."

Has there been a sudden upswing? Are there suddenly thousands of jobs in the Maritime provinces? Of course there are not, and there are no prospects. The government's own service—there have been official press releases and those we have been able to hear about because somebody in the government service has felt they were so important that the information must be disseminated to the public whether or not the public likes it—tells us that unemployment this year will be at least 8 per cent and closer to 9 per cent, and prospects for 1978 are even worse than for 1977.

But of course the hon. member for Gloucester, and I suppose the hon. member for Bonavista-Trinity, will say, "But the bill is quite different than it was back in March. We forced the government to change things". As a matter of fact while my colleague, the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond, was talking, the hon. member for Gloucester, who was so opposed to the bill back in March, was interjecting. He was not getting up to speak in support of the bill and of course not saying those things publicly which supposedly he was saying privately back in March. He was not saying anything.

Mr. Breau: Read my speech on second reading.

Mr. Orlikow: Yes, I know the kind of thing you were saying. What has happened? How many changes have there been to make the hon. member accept the bill? Let us look at these changes.

Mr. Breau: Changes amounting to five weeks.

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. member can speak later if he wishes. What are the changes which have made this bill acceptable to him? The changes would have Canadians work a minimum of between ten and 14 weeks in a year to collect insurance, depending on the unemployment rate in their area.

When the hon. member for Gloucester and other members were opposing the bill back in March, it proposed increasing the required minimum work period from the present eight weeks to 12 weeks. Under the minister's compromise proposal, Canada would be carved into 54 employment areas, those used by Statistics Canada in its monthly unemployment survey, to calculate the number of weeks a person would have to work to claim unemployment insurance benefits.

I said at the beginning of my speech that in the city that I represent there is not the kind of unemployment that exists in the Maritimes or in Quebec, whose members, at least Liberal members, have been singularly quiet about unemployment despite the fact that they have a 10 per cent rate of unemployment.

One thing I do know from listening to people who have problems in terms of unemployment, from listening to people who came ten days ago to tell the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and myself about how unemployment was affecting them, is that there is a universal feeling that the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the UIC do not react very quickly, very sympathetically, and very effectively to problems such as unemployment. I do not have the faith which the hon. member for Gloucester seems to have in this proposal for 54 different regions, each one having a different requirement period.

Mr. Breau: I would like to ask the hon. member a question, with his permission, and I think he is giving it. Is the hon. member aware that the proposal in Bill C-27 which was the most harmful to high unemployment areas such as mine and the maritimes in general was not the eight to 12 weeks provision but the change in the benefit structure that would have caused people with a minor attachment to the labour force to lose three months of benefits? That benefit structure has now been changed so that the effect on the minor attachment claimant is not three months less but the same as it was in the original program. Is the hon. member aware that the most important change to the people with minor attachment to the work force is that they will now receive 44 weeks of benefits?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I hope you will not deduct the time of that long so-called question from my time. I will answer the hon. member. If he had waited a couple of minutes I would have gone over precisely that change.

Under the minister's compromise proposal, as I said, Canada will be cut up into 54 regions. I say that that will be a bureaucratic nightmare. It may give employment to some of the economists and statisticians who have been graduating from Canadian universities and cannot find jobs, but certainly it will not help the unemployed, and there is no one who should know it better than those hon. members who come from high unemployment areas, such as the hon. member for Gloucester.

Before I get away from the original proposal of the 12 week work period required for qualification to the present ten to 14 weeks, I want to remind the hon. member for Gloucester, and some of his constituents I hope, that under the proposal which he is supporting the variable period will be re-examined after it has been in place for a while and the qualifying period will increase to a uniform 14 weeks across the country after three years, unless it is specifically extended by parliament. In view of the record of this country under both Liberal and Conservative governments of being unable to lessen regional disparities, in view of the fact that the people of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and eastern Quebec continue to be far behind the areas of high employment in Ontario, B.C. and Alberta in terms of wages, and in view of the hon. member accepting the idea that three years from now a person will have to work 14 weeks to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits, I say that the hon. member for Gloucester has sold out his constituents.

Mr. Breau: I will be here in three years.

Mr. Orlikow: Part of the reason you will be here is that they may not know.

Mr. Breau: You don't expect to have much influence in three years.

Mr. Orlikow: If the hon. member does not have more influence in three years than he has this year, things will continue to be bad for his constituents.

Mr. Breau: You never know; the NDP might be in power in three years.

Mr. Orlikow: This provision is changed to allow claimants up to 32 weeks of regional extended benefits. The bill as originally introduced called for a maximum of 20 weeks. Regional extended benefits are also calculated on the rate of unemployment in a given region. What this means is that the bill as it is now changed is not worse than it was before. What good does that do for the people of New Brunswick? What the hon. member is doing when he accepts that kind of proposal is to accept the fact that the people of New Brunswick will continue to be plagued by high unemployment as they have been through all these years of Liberal government. That is the situation, and I say that Liberal and Conservative members of parliament from the maritimes, and Liberal members from Quebec, particularly that part of Quebec east of Montreal, have not represented the best interests of their constituents by supporting this bill, even as it is amended.

● (2130)

Some ten days ago the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and I spent a day hearing representations from some of our constituents about the employment situation as it affects themselves and people they represent. As I said at the beginning of my speech, ours is not a high unemployment area, and yet as I listened to the representations made to us I could not help but be reminded of the years before World War II. It is true that the situation is not exactly comparable to what it was in the 1930's. It is true that people are not actually going hungry these days, because we have unemployment insurance benefits, welfare, and old age pensions. However, there are people who are unemployed, even in areas with relatively low rates of unemployment. The unemployed are no longer the poor, the uneducated, and the native people. What we have now is the kind of unemployment we have had for a number of years, but added to it we have unemployment among some of the best educated and highly trained people this country has even seen.

I want to put on the record some of the representations which were made to us. The president of the Building Trades Council, Leo Desilets, appeared before us, and I am going to try to summarize what he said. He said that unemployment in Winnipeg is the worst it has been since 1961. He believes that 1978 will be worse than 1977. He said there is little in the way of projects on the planning boards to be started. Usually projects in the construction industry begin in the spring. This year very few were started. Mr. Desilets represents about 15,000 workers normally, but he pointed out to us that federal, provincial and municipal governments have shelved a number of projects, because along with the anti-inflation legislation came a call from the federal government to municipal and provincial governments that they, together with the federal government, should show restraint, and restraint means that projects which had been planned and announced are not being proceeded with. The hon. member for Gloucester interjected a little while ago and referred to $10 an hour workers who are unemployed, as if it is a disgrace to get $10 an hour.

Mr. Breau: I did not say that.

Mr. Orlikow: That is how it sounded. If the hon. member did not mean that, I am happy he did not mean that because I do not think a person is living particularly high off the hog these days at $10 an hour, particularly construction workers, who are lucky if they work eight months of the year.

Mr. Breau: I did not say that.

Mr. Orlikow: I thought I heard it.

Mr. Breau: I was talking about income, not unemployment.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Don Posnick, a representative of the United Steel Workers of America, reported to us what has happened to members of his union in the last six months. They are organized, and they bargain for 32 plants in the area. The situation for those workers is grim. Usually when there was a lay-off in one plant, Mr. Posnick told us that the union was able to direct laid off workers to another plant. This year that is not possible. Co-operative Implement is down from 1,000 workers last year to under 500 now. The reason it has that many working is that the company is operating on a four-day work week. The Manitoba Rolling Mills at Selkirk laid off between 250 and 275 workers because of automation, and another 100 would have been laid off except that the union negotiated an earlier retirement plan which permitted long service employees to retire. They are down to 400 employees from the usual 700.

Allied Farm Equipment is down 50 per cent, from 200 workers to 100. Joy Manufacturing is down from 140 to 68, and that company is working a four-day week. Dominion Bridge is in the constituency of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. For years Dominion Bridge had a permanent sign asking skilled workers to apply for work. Jobs were available. Today that sign is down, and 125 people have been laid off. Manitoba Bridge closed for seven weeks in January of 1977. A total of 1,000 steel workers have been laid off. These are workers in the over 50 age group, and unless they were highly skilled, they were laid off. Mr. Posnick suggests that many of them will never get work again. Dominion Bridge has laid off 125 workers. People with 18 year's seniority were laid off for five weeks. Mr. Posnick said that many members of his union will exhaust their unemployment insurance benefits before they will find another job. Steel workers are not the only ones who find it difficult.

The president of this year's graduating class from the educational faculty of the University of Manitoba appeared before us. He told us that he surveyed 648 members of this year's graduating class. Over 60 per cent of them responded, and anyone who has conducted any kind of survey knows that that is a very large response. In June of this year, last month, when most school divisions had hired for next September, 56 per cent of those graduates who responded had not found a job either in Manitoba or outside that province, and 25 per cent of those who responded did not expect to get jobs this fall. That is the situation for the graduating class in the faculty of education. We are talking about a group of students who spent four years at university. That cost the people of Canada tens of thousands of dollars.

The Economic Council of Canada, the Department of Manpower and Immigration, and every other agency which was supposedly studying the needs of this country were urging young people to stay in school, to go to technical-vocational schools, to community colleges or to universities. We know that all the surveys which have been done show that a person with a university education earns a much higher income and has a much better ability to earn than people who have not gone to university. People who have gone to community colleges are able to earn a great deal more than those who have not. The young people of this country responded to those appeals. They went to universities and community colleges. Today they are coming out of those institutions, and there are no jobs.

The president of the graduating class of the school of social work at the University of Manitoba was unable to come to see us because she was ill, but I spoke to her and she told me that the job situation for graduating students at the school of social work is, to say the least, grim. She says that 50 per cent to 60 per cent of this year's graduating class have not been able to find permanent work.

I am glad that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) is in his seat. The president of the graduating class of the school of social work told me that the Canada Manpower office in Winnipeg has a terrible attitude toward students. The minister shrugs at what I say. I am just quoting what the president of the graduating class of the school of social work said. If the minister likes, I will be happy to give him her telephone number so he can find out whether I am quoting correctly. She said that the Canada Manpower office in Winnipeg has a terrible attitude, as though it were the fault of the students graduating in social work that there are no jobs. There are no jobs, not because there is no need for social work but because the federal government itself, and it has convinced all provincial governments, preaches restraint. What restraint means is fewer services, and that is achieved by helping fewer people. The needs are great but we are told to show restraint—to cure inflation on the backs of the unemployed. That is what we are doing.

• (2140)

One of the most moving presentations I have ever heard in my political life was made by Sister MacNamara, the Director of Rossbrook House Inc. in Winnipeg, and I should like to quote from her brief. She referred to the fact that we have 900,000 potential members of the work force who cannot obtain jobs. She also referred to the fact that the ranks of the unemployed include skilled, semi-skilled, and professional personnel. She said:

> Though the unemployment picture cuts across all age groups, the problem is especially acute among younger workers and those who are entering the work force for the first time.
> These facts would be bad enough if they stated the worst of the situation, but the fact remains that the unemployment statistics conceal as much as they reveal. Statistics indicating rates of 7 per cent or 8 per cent never reflect the actual situation in areas of chronic, long-term unemployment, such as the inner cores of major cities. Whole groups are excluded from the statistics, status Indians and young workers being conspicuous among those who simply do not count in the eyes of statisticians. Few reserves boast unemployment rates of 7 per cent or 8 per cent. The actual figures would be closer to 40, 50 or 100 per cent. But reserves are never included in the statistics.

Of course that is true. That is how the unemployment rate is kept lower by probably half to 1 per cent than it actually is. She continued:

> Similarly, school drop-outs, willing to work but with few marketable skills, have never been able to obtain a foothold in the work force and therefore are not counted in the unemployment statistics.
>
> The result is that the unemployment statistics are seriously defective in terms of accurately documenting prevailing conditions, and the statistics are most conspicuously wrong when documenting those groups where unemployment is a traditional problem.
>
> For the young worker, the unskilled or the marginally equipped, the jobs that exist are short-term. The lay-off syndrome dominates, with consequent damage to the morale of workers whose working lives are lived in six-week intervals.

This is a dedicated woman who works seven days a week.

Mr. Rodriguez: Not like the minister.

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. member says, "Not like the minister." Some of her most caustic remarks referred to agencies whose staff work five days a week, from nine till five daily, who are not available in the evening, on Saturdays or Sundays when they are needed.

She continued:

> In Winnipeg's core area, young people aged 15 to 25 constitute a group of chronically unemployed.
> Unemployment is just one more problem in an area conspicuous for its social dilemmas. But unemployment among the young is an especially serious matter. Truancy in the district runs at approximately 30 per cent beginning in the primary grades.

I must say that is probably the most shocking part of the brief. I know the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was as shocked as I to learn that youngsters in grade three are persistently staying away from school.

She went on:

> High school attendance is virtually unknown.

Mr. MacFarlane: What is she; a teacher?

Mr. Orlikow: She is a social worker; she is not a politician.

Mr. MacFarlane: That is her problem; she does not have any work.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is not a joke; this is serious.

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. member on the government side says, "That is her problem." This is someone dedicated to working with people who are not able to make it in our society, and the government whip says "It is her problem." Mr. Speaker, when youngsters in grade three, presumably eight or nine years of age, are not attending school, perhaps because they do not have shoes, or only have one parent who is out working—

Mr. MacFarlane: Now you are giving reasons. It sounded as if she had all the answers.

Mr. Orlikow: I never said she had any answers. All I did was try to relate to members of the House who want to listen—which I doubt the government whip wants to do—what that person said. If I thought the situation she described was unique to Winnipeg I would not bring it up here.

The same situation exists to a smaller or greater degree, however, in Toronto and Montreal. It is worse in Kenora which has a much higher native population, and it is probably worse in Thunder Bay; it is bad in Vancouver and Regina as well. I say we have not faced the problem; we have not looked at what we are going to do, not just about full employment but about the 10 per cent or 15 per cent who never make it. What are we going to do to break this poverty cycle, the cycle of alcoholism and all the problems so prevalent in this country? Government members do not want to listen to that. They would like to ignore it.

Mr. Breau: We are listening.

Mr. Orlikow: I am glad the hon. member for Gloucester is finally listening.

Mr. Breau: When you talk sense.

Mr. Orlikow: I say we are facing a crisis. I appeal to members of all parties to face that crisis. Getting tough with the unemployed and cutting back on unemployment insurance is the worst way to try to deal with the problem, not the best way.

Let me put on the record what Sister MacNamara said. After referring to high school attendance in the inner core of the city, which is represented in part by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and in part by myself, as being virtually unknown, she continued:

> The police report that 38 per cent of all their calls come from the inner city, and the annual report of the police department for 1976 records a 24 per cent increase in juvenile crime, with the greatest increase occurring in the age group under fourteen.
> The end result of all this is reflected in the average age of the local penal institutions, Headingley Gaol and Stony Mountain. In both the average age is in the early twenties.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

> The young resident of the core area, enjoying few of the assets that other young people take for granted, has no hope of bettering his situation or reversing the pattern of an unhappy past unless he can in some way become economically independent at a fairly early age. Thus unemployment for him takes on a virtually tragic aspect. It deprives him of the opportunity he needs, while reinforcing negative behaviour patterns that will further jeopardize his hopes for a stable, productive future.

Comparing the LIP grants of other years to the Canada Works Program of this year she said:

> One source of hope has been found in short-term federal grants. This year LIP was phased out to make way for Canada Works. Advance publicity for Canada Works indicated that grants would be available on a 12-month basis, with funding worth up to $180,000 per project. Such news was more than welcome, and the enthusiasm in various non-profit groups was exceeded only by the despair that set in when only two grants were given in Winnipeg North Centre with a total value of $100,000.

● (2150)

> The net effect of the Canada Works program in Winnipeg North Centre is that a constituency receiving $965,000 under the last LIP in 1976-77 has thus far received only $100,000 under the first round of Canada Works grants. What will happen on the next round, with applications due late in August and funding due to start in November, remains a matter of conjecture at this point.

I will not quote other parts of the brief which have little to do with the federal government or its agencies. She painted a black picture in a city which has relatively little unemployment when compared with unemployment in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick or eastern Quebec.

How does the government propose to cure unemployment? The budget proposed virtually nothing; it put virtually nothing in the pot, so to speak, to cure unemployment. This year less will be made available by way of grants under Canada Works than was made available last year under LIP, or other programs. But more are unemployed than were unemployed one year ago, and according to predictions more will be unemployed in 1978 than are already unemployed in 1977. Therefore, we say this is no time to cut back unemployment insurance benefits. This is not the time to make the act tougher.

Let me put on record how much provinces will lose if this bill passes, and I hope the hon. member for Gloucester is listening. If this bill passes, the estimated cuts in unemployment benefit payments in Newfoundland will be between $24 million and $28 million, or between 13 per cent and 15 per cent. In Prince Edward Island the cuts will amount to between $4 million and $5 million, or between 12 per cent and 15 per cent. In Nova Scotia the cuts will be between $9 million and $11 million, or between 6 per cent and 8 per cent. In New Brunswick—I hope the hon. member for Gloucester is listening—the cuts will amount to between $19 million and $22 million—

Mr. Breau: Before the amendments, you mean.

Mr. Orlikow: No. I am speaking of how much less the provinces will get under this plan, compared with what they would have got under the old plan.

Mr. Breau: The hon. member had better check his figures.

Mr. Orlikow: The cut in New Brunswick will be between 11 per cent and 13 per cent. In Quebec the cut will be between $93 million and $109 million, or between 8 per cent and 9 per cent. The Ontario cuts will be between $85 million and $101 million, or between 9 per cent and 11 per cent. In Manitoba the figure is between $7 million and $8 million, or between 10 per cent and 11 per cent. The Saskatchewan figure is between $8 million and $10 million, or between 10 per cent or 12 per cent.

Mr. Breau: Before the amendment.

Mr. Orlikow: The Alberta figure is between $7 million and $8 million.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member whose allotted time has expired. He may continue if he has the unanimous consent of the House. Has the hon. member unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, surely the hon. member for Gloucester should have agreed to the hon. member's continuing to put figures on the record, because his list of figures is incomplete and makes conditions in the province of the hon. member opposite look bad. And I think he is prepared to support the bill.

Mr. Breau: How do you know that?

Mr. Peters: I don't know that. Perhaps the hon. member does not care one way or the other, but I do not know.

When making his third reading speech and telling the House that the employment and unemployment responsibilities of the department are once more to be put under one roof, as it were, I think the minister said many of the things I had said when the two functions of the department were separated. At one time the two functions of the department were carried on under one roof. You entered the room and asked for a job. If you could not get a job, you went to the other side of the room to collect your benefits. That was a sensible arrangement, and I am glad that the minister, after all these years, has decided to amalgamate under one roof those two functions of the department.

I am surprised that the minister should agree to assume his new responsibilities on top of his existing responsibilities. He is an amiable minister, but I suggest he needs help in overseeing the operations of his extensive department.

Members of the Conservative party in particular have said we must change the Unemployment Insurance Act in order to curb abuses of unemployment insurance. It has also been suggested that abuses are especially prevalent among those whose periods of attachment to the labour force have been of short duration. The previous minister commissioned a study in this area and concluded, after examining the evidence, that charges concerning abuses are not correct. However, the present minister has seen fit to bow to pressure and, if the proposed changes come into effect, a large number of people will be taken off the unemployment insurance rolls. We are not heartless in this country. We like to look after the unfortunate.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Will the acting government House leader please tell the House what government business we shall consider between 11 o'clock a.m. and one o'clock p.m. tomorrow?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, according to my information we will continue consideration of this bill tomorrow morning, between 11 o'clock a.m. and one o'clock p.m.

Mr. Peters: And the next day, and the next.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ENERGY—SUGGESTION HOUSING MINISTRY MAKE LOANS FOR HOME INSULATION AS CONSERVATION MEASURE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, the question I raise this evening is the one I directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) on May 27. It related to the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program, which has now been brought into better focus by the announcement which the minister made, together with his colleague, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), concerning a $1.4 billion insulation program. Mr. Speaker, nobody suggests that the $1.4 billion insulation program will not be of benefit to some people in Canada. The ministers announced, with the greatest of fanfare, grants of up to $350 to cover two thirds of the cost of purchasing insulation materials for attics, walls, basement walls and floors over unheated spaces, for owners or tenants of self-contained homes, whether detached, semi-detached or row housing.

Really, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is not aware or completely overlooks the fact that there is already in existence the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program which provides grants up to $3,750 for the same purposes. It is a much better program because it goes much further in providing storm windows, siding, plumbing and heating systems, and many other home improvements such as the installation of foundations and basements in addition to insulation, which is most important.

RRAP provides for loans, of up to $10,000 to low income earners of $6,000 or less. They can have $3,750 forgiven. It further provides that for every $1,000 over $6,000 income they lose $250 of the grant. The loans are repayable in up to 20 years, adjusted to family income. The highest payment is around $80 per month.

This is the program that the people of Canada want, particularly those on low income. in order to insulate their homes. However, insulation is no good by itself. Let me quote some figures to support that statement.

Statistics Canada indicates that 898,000 Canadians earned under $3,000 a year, 729,000 earned between $3,000 and $5,000, and 880,000 earned between $5,000 and $7,000 a year. It has been proved that most of those people own their own homes. However, because of the high cost of living, they cannot keep them up. Most have only space heaters, no basements, and many have holes in the walls. How far would $350 go to provide insulation for which they have little or no use?

A good portion of the $1.4 billion should be directed to those in the low income brackets under the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Plan. That program has been in existence since 1973. The parliamentary secretary knows how many times I have asked here in the House of Commons about where the extra funds are. It is a good program, the best they ever produced, but there are not enough funds. However, they can find $1.4 billion to provide two thirds of the cost of insulation, when for the hundreds of thousands of home owners in the category I referred to the $350 will go nowhere.

I have a beautiful little pamphlet here. I could send it to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. It invites people to participate in the program and get a free grant.

When I look at the homes in Newfoundland, and the situation must be the same across Canada, those on low income cannot afford to repair their homes. They are already spending a fortune on fuel, something they cannot afford.

The minister should take a realistic look at these programs and compare them. No one objects to the $350 grant. However, those earning $6,000 or less require much more. There are also those who cannot work but still own their homes. There is no hope of them insulating their homes in order to conserve energy and save a little money.

I say to the minister and the parliamentary secretary that they should look at the value of the RRAP program and put a portion of that $1.4 billion where it will do some good. They will save more than the $50 million they expect to save under the insulation program and save it for those who need it, the poverty stricken in this country.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by saying that I very much appreciate the strong support of and the comments made by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). The RRAP program, as he knows very well, operates mainly in areas which, in consultation with the provinces and municipalities, have been designated so-called NIP areas, neighbourhood improvement areas, or in special rural areas of 2,500 people or less. The RRAP program is a fantastic program. It has great contributions to make to our existing neighbourhoods and will no doubt receive increased funding over the years. As the hon. member knows, in the last three years we have gone from $10 million to $107 million this year, which I think is a substantial increase considering the budgetary restraints under which we operate at this time.

The other program to which the hon. member referred is the insulation refit program, which is a completely different approach from the RRAP program, as he knows. The insulation refit program addresses itself to all Canadians and has a schedule fixed according to age of housing and areas of priority which are set according to criteria which have been well explained by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) and by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet).

In responding to the hon. member I should like to tell him that we shall continue to work in trying to better develop programs like the RRAP program. I am hopeful and confident that the insulation refit program will have just as much success as the RRAP program, and I am sure that a year from now he will be back here telling us how great this program is.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—USE OF WRITS OF ASSISTANCE—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON STUDY

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring forward a matter which I last raised on March 16, 1977, and on previous occasions, primarily with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), relating to writs of assistance and the decision of the Federal Court which severely criticized the granting of writs of assistance in connection with the enforcement of the Customs Act and other federal statutes.

I purposely let this matter lie for as long as I have to allow the Minister of Justice, whom I took at his word at the time, to have an opportunity of making the fullest possible investigation, in consultation with the Law Reform Commmission and officials of his department, regarding the continuation of the provisions which allow these writs of assistance to be granted. In effect they are unlimited and unspecified as to time and as to the powers which are available in regard to entering and obtaining evidence.

At the time I raised this matter on March 16 the Minister of Justice indicated to me that he was in fact reviewing the question; he said he was conducting a fundamental review of whether and to what extent writs of assistance should be continued in our law. I am sorry to see that neither the Minister of Justice nor his parliamentary secretary is here tonight. I am regretfully coming to the conclusion that the Minister of Justice, in regard to some of these important decisions relating to the civil liberties of Canadian citizens, tends to fence on questions and to answer them in a general way by saying the matter is under review. Then he simply does nothing about them. I think that on a matter of such great importance the Canadian people require some indication from the minister at this time of what position he is taking with respect to the provisions which allow the issuance of writs of assistance.

It has been pointed out, both editorially and in the House by myself and my colleagues, that writs of assistance and the powers available thereunder in Canada are unparallelled in any other jurisdiction. I suggest it has been long argued by those concerned with the administration of criminal justice in this country that it is unfortunate that no statutory considerations are set out for obtaining writs of assistance. The lack of judicial discretion when issuing these writs, and the corresponding lack of criteria upon which they ought to issue, should be compared with the provisions relating generally to search warrants. For example, in Re United Distillers Ltd. (1946), 88 C.C.C. 338, C. J. Ferris, of the British Columbia Supreme Court, stated at page 341:

> The law seems to be well established that in granting a warrant to search, the information before the magistrate must be of such a nature as to permit him to grant the warrant judicially.

At page 344 of the same report, he continues:

> I find that the warrant to search was issued without there being contained in the information sufficient material to entitle the Justice of the Peace acting in a judicial capacity to issue the warrant.

This judgment was quoted with approval in Schumiatcher v. A. G. of Sask. and Salterio, J. P. (1960), 33 W.W.R. 132. The case law has generally held that the issuing of a search warrant is not a mere ministerial act, but a judicial act and that the judge must exercise a judicial discretion. For example, in Rex v. Moore (1922), 63 D.L.R. 472, the court stated:

> Clearly what the statute requires is not merely that the constable is to have information which justifies him in making an oath that he has reasonable ground for belief, and that the magistrate himself should be satisfied by information on the oath of an officer that there is (in fact and in truth) reasonable ground for belief upon which the magistrate, in his discretion, may grant a warrant . . .

There is a very substantial difference between the use of writs of assistance in Canada and their use in England. In the English cases the court always has the alternative of either granting or refusing the writ of assistance. In any case it is a very rare occurrence that a writ of assistance will be issued in England, and for the most part the writ is issued for the purpose of recovering possession of and preserving chattels.

In Canada writs of assistance are far more serious matters for they are not considered merely as remedial, but rather are used to enforce criminal and quasi-criminal legislation—all the more reason that these writs ought only to be issued at the discretion of the presiding judge on the basis of explicit criteria which ought to be carefully scrutinized by the court.

I should like to quote from the book of E.C.S. Wade and G. Godfrey Phillips, entitled "Constitutional Law" at pages 366 and 367, which reads as follows:

> The principle that a plea of the public interest does not justify a wrongful act was established by the eighteenth century cases known as the General Warrant Cases. The practice of issuing general warrants to arrest unspecified persons and to search property is said to have originated with the Court of Star Chamber. It is obviously a powerful weapon to assist an embarrassed executive to obtain material upon which to formulate changes against persons suspected of hostility toward the government. At a later stage the practice was authorized by the Licensing Act, 1662, for use by a secretary of state to prevent publication of unlicensed material, and such warrants continued after the lapse of that act in 1695. The General Warrant Cases arose out of the attempt of George III's government to stifle the political activities of John Wilkes and the publication known as the North Briton. Even at a later date the severity of the law against seditious publications was maintained largely by executive action, but the cases decided once and for all the illegality of general warrants and thus deprived the executive of a formidable instrument of oppression.

Writs of assistance were also an issue at the time of the American revolution and they have not been legal in the United States since that time. I appeal to the Minister of Justice to come forward and tell this House, and the country, what position the government intends to take with respect to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first I must apologize for the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) not being in the House tonight. He is out west. He is aware of the interest the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) has shown in this matter. If my reading of the material is correct, he has raised this matter on several occasions, both inside and outside the House.

On March 16, 1977, the Minister of Justice told the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar that he was conducting a fundamental review of whether, and to what extent, these writs of assistance should be continued in our law. I am informed by the Minister of Justice that the review will also deal with the courts' discretion in granting these writs, and the accountability of police action taken under the writs.

I have been advised also that the review will examine the necessity of the writs in terms of each of the various acts that allow for their use, that is, the Customs Act, the Excise Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Food and Drugs Act. The Department of Justice review will be completed very, very shortly.

As the hon. member has mentioned, the Law Reform Commission is also studying these questions in connection with its ongoing work on police powers of search and seizure.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.17 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, July 5, 1977

The House met at 11 a.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION REORGANIZATION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION, ETC.

The House resumed, from Monday, July 4, 1977, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cullen that Bill C-27, an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the third time and do pass; and the amendment thereto of Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, in this debate a great deal has been said about the problem of unemployment. It has been very interesting to listen to people quote statistics on the large number of unemployed. If a person is unemployed, it does not really make much difference to him if all his neighbours are unemployed, or if there are a million people or a million and a half people unemployed in Canada. For him, unemployment means a total change in his standard of living and the way in which he relates to his community.

Many members are too young, and some have poor memories, but the remarks made last night by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) everyone in Canada should take very seriously. During the last depression, one afternoon a young fellow came to my father's farm and we hired him to help with the hay and milking. I remember his being paid $25 a month, which was probably $10 more than he would have had from a neighbour, since my father was fortunate enough to have a government job in 1935. When war was declared, I enlisted in the air force. I remember walking down one of the tunnels in the asylum for the insane at St. Thomas where they trained all the Commonwealth technicians for our war effort. I remember passing a guy and saying "Hi". Although this guy was a wing commander and I was an AC-2, he was the same man who had worked for us for $25 a month on the farm and was damned glad to get it.

I also remember others who, because they were veterans, were moved into northern Ontario and given land you could not have grown anything on if you had been the late J.C. They were put on that land as a favour because they were veterans. I remember one of these veterans in particular, my father-in-law, who had been a successful businessman in Windsor and had moved to the farm at a time when you could not get enough food to feed the children. Yet in less than 10 years he was running the major employment branch of Hill-Clark and Francis, one of the largest woodworking factories in North America at that time, being responsible for about 400 employees.

It seems to me that we are doing the same sort of thing again. It is possible today to get a job digging ditches, if you want to dig ditches. You can get a job picking tobacco or tending to the crop before it is picked. It is possible to get a transient type of job. But we have a very highly skilled, highly trained and highly motivated group of young Canadians, many of them products of the baby boom following the last war, who are now looking for work. Although we made an effort to train them, they find it impossible now to get any employment. What a terrible waste. We have educated them to enter a society which is incapable of providing them with gainful employment.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said last night, we will end this before long by having a world confrontation, by having a war. This is all society is capable of doing. As sure as I am standing here, we have learned nothing in the last 50 years. We have already had two major wars to end unemployment, and it looks as if we will have another one very shortly. Such a war could break out anywhere. I am not a prophet and cannot pick the spot, but this time it will likely be in Africa.

It seems to me that after the last war we believed we were smart enough to be able to control our own society and economy and no longer would we have to settle unemployment problems by war, by killing off a few people and dumping production in the ocean or some place because there was not enough money to buy it. No longer should we talk about the Rothschilds or the Carnegies or other well known families which may have played a very large role so far as the last war is concerned. We should realize there were many economies which just did not have enough money in the system to make it possible to purchase the goods they were capable of producing. We are again in that position, not only so far as food supplies are concerned but other commodities as well.

I remember the very homey remarks of the late leader of the Social Credit party, Réal Caouette. He used to talk on television about the need for sidewalks in a certain community. He pointed out that we had the people, that we obviously had the sand, cement and the water, and that we had the cement machines to make the cement. All we needed was the will to put it all together and we would have sidewalks. But if any of the ingredients are missing, whether it be the manpower, the water, the cement or the sand, it is pretty hard to make sidewalks.

Something is missing today, Mr. Speaker, since we are not able to build houses or to provide an adequate living for Canadians although this country has resources in abundance. But we will be able to do so if there is a war. If we get mad enough at somebody else, we will find a way. We will have the will, we will provide the money, and we will realize our immense potential.

Let me tell the House what happened at the beginning of the last war in regard to something we need very badly today. Canada has one of the longest coastlines in the world. There is an abundance of fish off our shores. We have some oil and gas off our shores. There is immense potential in the sea. We are a trading nation, and therefore we need the sea as a highway to move our goods to market. But we do not have any ships. The same was true at the beginning of the last war. We built the liberty ships and a merchant navy which grew to be third largest in the world. Then, right after the war, C.D. Howe sold it all to Onassis, and Onassis died a very wealthy man. So we learnt nothing from that; we still do not have any ships.

Mr. Rodriguez: Jackie got it all.

Mr. Peters: My hon. friend says Jackie got it. It is a very odd situation when the wife of a president ends up owning a Greek merchant navy. Perhaps this is an indication of the times we live in. But one thing we could do is build ourselves another merchant navy. I was very interested in accompanying other members of the House to a NATO meeting very recently where they talked about how limited were supplies and about how long they would last before we would have to replace them. Does it not amuse members of parliament; does it not amuse the nation—

• (1120)

Mr. Alexander: I am interested in the hon. member's tours throughout the world, and particularly his recent visit to NATO; but I thought we were dealing with Bill C-27, amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I hope my good friend will desist from recounting that interesting trip and will get back to reality, namely, Bill C-27.

Mr. Peters: Perhaps I am taking a circuitous route, but I was trying to say that when we went to NATO they indicated that we would have to move supplies to Europe, and that most of them would have to be moved by boat. Surely, we and the rest of the country can see us having to hire a Panamanian, Liberian or Onassis fleet to take our goods from this country to the areas in need. The point I am making, for the information of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), is that there are measures we could take to end the unemployment problem in Canada, and if we do that the minister will not try to cut down the benefits which we pay to our unemployed.

It seems to me that the honorable member for Hamilton West has not been able to participate in this debate except to say, "Me, too. Yes, Mr. Minister, you have cut it down a little bit, so I will support it". That is no answer. The answer must be to provide employment so that jobs are made available for people in this country. I think it is damned important for us to put the problem in the right perspective; that is, we have the trained people and the resources in this country, yet we are still incapable of providing the jobs and the benefits that should flow from them. The production lost as a result of strikes has always been pointed out. Sure, we have strikes in this country.

An hon. Member: A hell of a lot of them.

Mr. Peters: That may be true. But the loss in production as a result of unemployment is far greater than the loss in production as a result of strikes. Nobody ever talks about that. The hon. member who made the comment a while ago is a Liberal; therefore, he should be interested in a Liberal way in facing the problems of the country. That means providing employment and the government giving leadership. All the government is saying is that they cannot get the money, and therefore have to cut back on the benefits paid to the unemployed.

I said last night, in the few moments I had to speak, that no matter how good this minister may be, he is not capable of handling this department in the way proposed. Immigration is a major problem in this country. The province of Quebec is saying that they want a say in matters of immigration. So immigration is very important. But if it is so important, why do we tack it on to the tail end of the employment structure in the nation, when we have never had as many problems in that area as now? Surely, if the government were serious, it would break up this department, take immigration out of it, as well as some ancillary functions, and leave employment and unemployment to the minister who should be working in close co-operation with the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour not only to provide benefits for the unemployed but also to provide jobs for them.

The minister refers to young people as bums, and to housewives as creating problems in short-term employment. I heard that when I was a kid. I heard that all the people walking up and down the road were bums. They were bums in the sense that they were hobos or gypsies travelling from place to place. Many young people know today that you can travel from coast to coast in this country and still be unable to find employment.

What is the government's answer? It is to reduce payments to those who are in the very worst circumstances. Let me say, for the benefit of the hon. member for Hamilton West who does not seem to understand this problem, that it is very much like the gun legislation. It depends to a great extent on where you come from and what your aspirations are. If you live in downtown Toronto, it is quite possible to visit 1,000 employers in a month and ask for 1,000 jobs; but I suppose that 50 per cent of members here represent ridings with communities where there is only one industry. In such communities it is impossible to get a job unless someone leaves his job or dies. The only way to solve the problem in such cases—and it is a reasonably simple way of solving the unemployment problem—is to set up an additional industry. In my community there have been two major bankruptcies recently, resulting in the loss of about 1,000 jobs, which meant that approximately one-third of the whole labour force was affected.

Unless another one-third of the labour force leave their jobs, there is no possibility in the near future for the unemployed one-third who have been laid off, because of the bankruptcies, to find employment in that community. They can either leave the area or they can stay there and hope that someone, somewhere will be able to provide them with a job. Many of these people enjoy the dubious benefits of short-term assistance from the federal government, the dubious benefits of the Canada Youth Program or of Canada Works. These benefits are dubious because they are obviously only a stop-gap measure. They do not provide these people with training or allow them to get ahead in any chosen profession. They do not do anything but supply them with sufficient income to maintain themselves and their families for a short period of time.

I cannot help but think that if you were to give that kind of donation to a young businessman—in my area it amounts to about $200,000—he would probably set up a business which would employ 50 or 60 people, which would provide permanent jobs and which would be expansionary in nature, thus creating additional jobs in the future. The kinds of jobs that are provided in these types of programs are temporary, mundane jobs that do nothing for a person's morale or future opportunities.

Unemployment insurance has always been the scapegoat of the Liberal party. They have used unemployment insurance since the day it was proposed by Woodsworth to Mackenzie King. Mackenzie King did not only see it as a benefit for the people, but also a benefit for the Liberal party—and it certainly has been used as that. I remember when they brought into the program, for political reasons, the fishermen from the east coast. They had no chance of being employed year-round because they could only fish part of the year. The rest of the year they were subsidized by the unemployment insurance fund.

The next time there was an election, the bushworkers were brought in. They are seasonal workers in the forest industry. They became indicators in the systems. Every time there has been difficulty, unemployment insurance has been changed and tampered with. That is what is happening this time. The minister had no intention of going beyond 12 weeks until the hon. member for Hamilton West made a big fuss. That big fuss resulted in the minister's own backbenchers raising a hue and cry and demanding that those in less advantageous areas be given a temporary advantage. The scheme the government has come up with is probably the worst possible scheme it could have developed. There are something like 54 districts—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman. A point of order was raised earlier by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). At that time I did not have the bill before me, but I have now. The amendment before the House is as follows:

> That Bill C-27 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration for the purpose of reconsidering clauses 29 and 30 thereof.

Citation 165(9) of Beauchesne's reads:

> After an amendment has been moved and seconded, the question on the amendment is proposed, and any member who speaks after that question has been proposed speaks to it and not to the main question.

Therefore, I ask the hon. member to refer to clauses 29 and 30.

Mr. Alexander: That is what I was trying to tell you earlier.

Mr. Peters: The hon. member had a much more valid point of order then than he has now, because I am speaking about—

Mr. Alexander: You are questioning the Chair. I didn't stand up.

Mr. Darling: He didn't say anything.

Mr. Paproski: Don't you dare question the Chair, Arnold.

Mr. Peters: I am not questioning the Chair. I am suggesting that I am in order. If I reflected on the decision of the Chair in any way, I apologize and I withdraw those remarks. I felt that the hon. member for Hamilton West was not paying very much attention to what I was saying, or he would have known that I was in order at the time.

Perhaps some hon. members do not know the problems we already have with regard to the computer. Since it has been introduced, the computer has had to take into consideration a number of factors which are not necessarily related to the amount of the contributions or to the pay-out of benefits which takes place in the day to day operations of the act. In addition, there are other factors such as the national unemployment level as ascertained by Statistics Canada, Canada Manpower, and so forth. The national figure is a very dubious one, but it is inserted into the computer and that figure is used despite all the other factors involved. Now there is another factor. The regional factor will also be fed into the computer and each case will be calculated according to region. That is so complicated that nobody will know whether calculations are being done correctly or not.

Besides the 10 to 14-week requirement, there will be 54 independent areas. All this will be a nightmare for anyone trying to ascertain whether he is getting what he is entitled to. Also, appeals will be difficult. Instead of using all these complicated factors, it might be wise to go back to the system where claimants came face to face with the people who made the decisions with regard to claims. Rather than referring matters to district offices, or conducting appeals of various kinds, including the involvement of members of parliament, would it not be much more simple for a person to make a claim face to face with the person who is going to make the decision?

Anyone who had anything to do with the changes which took place on at least two previous occasions will know that these latest changes will cause untold difficulty as far as the computer is concerned. In addition, the minister says we are going to apply this program over a period of three years, in varying degrees, and that at the end of the third year, unless parliament makes a change—and we can rest assured that it will make a change—we will go to the 14-week entrance requirement. Operating the system with a computer is going to be very confusing. Let me use an example so the minister will know what we are talking about. An unemployed person in Gaspé goes to Sarnia where there is a high employment rate. In Sarnia a person will have to work 14 weeks, and the rate will be different. Perhaps that person from Gaspé lives next door to someone from the local area. His benefits will have to be calculated in a totally different way than his neighbour's. There will be considerable difference in the length of time for which he will receive benefits. He will probably receive benefits when his neighbour will not be able to do so.

The minister shakes his head, but that is a fact. That is the way it will work. The minister wants mobility. That means people will be moving around the country. They will be moving from my area, where there is 15 per cent unemployment, to the constituency of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), where there may be a low rate of unemployment. People will be getting rates different from their neighbours'. Benefits will be calculated in a different manner. The length of time benefits can be received will be different in different areas, and the amount of benefits will also be calculated differently in different areas.

People in the department who have been involved with this subject for a long time are very good at changing one thing to solve another, but in doing so they often create about three new problems. The minister has to listen to them because this is complicated legislation and he has other problems to deal with which are just as complicated. Each person has an idea about how a particular problem can be solved. The minister seems willing to incorporate all this into the legislation. How much more simple it would be for us to discuss in this House the problem of how to create employment.

Surely, even the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling), who is making some noises, could give this parliament very good advice on how to provide employment. Indeed, most members of the House could offer ideas on how to provide full employment for this country. Surely, we are not going to wait until a general says that the only way to solve unemployment is to declare war, or a general somewhere else says, "For the good of the people, we will take the country over", as happened yesterday in Pakistan. And not only the generals, but the admirals. We had to get rid of one because I understand he told the government that war is inevitable and we should prepare for it. He is right. War is as inevitable as the fact that the sun is going to set tonight and rise tomorrow—unless we can find a better economic system to provide employment for the people.

The war may take a very unusual turn because it may come from the people we have educated. They may bite the hand that fed them in the cradle because they have been trained in the stupid universities we have in this country. They are stupid; there is no doubt about that. We have business schools, but they cannot train people to start a business. Who starts a business in this country? The man who never went to college but who just got out and did it. The college man would not start a business because he has studied Adam Smith and knows the theory that it would not work today.

This stupid clause which will create a calamity for people in underprivileged areas of the country will pass because the government has the numbers—not because they are right. They have the numbers, and they have friends in other places to assist them. Surely, no one in this House would agree that changing the Unemployment Insurance Act is the best way to solve the problem. It can only be solved by providing work for the people now seeking unemployment insurance.

Not long ago I inquired at the Manpower centre in my town about the number of women in the area who were unemployed. Something like 150 women were registered for employment at that time. The manager of the office told me the same thing that the leader of my party has been saying for a long time, namely, that there are probably more hidden unemployed in this country than there are registered unemployed. He suggested that there might be 300 women looking for work, not just the 150 who were registered. When K-Mart opened a store in a shopping centre in the area, 300 people applied for employment in one day. I am told that altogether 1,200 people applied for the 75 part-time jobs paying the minimum wage. The government and the Conservatives say that people do not want to work, but these 1,200 people would have liked to try. Maybe they would not have liked the jobs, and maybe they would not have stayed. I cannot tell that. They did apply for employment, however, and employment was not available.

Mr. Speaker, I hope we send this bill back so that consideration can be given to this clause.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in this debate which apparently will be carried on indefinitely, since I had stated my views at other stages of the discussion. However, I wonder today whether it would not be advisable to ask hon. members to come to an agreement without monopolizing the time of the House. We realize, Mr. Speaker, that a war of attrition has been launched. The government has decided to stand pat. It was probably deceived by its officials, because we know that in the end they are the ones who do the work and direct the minister in his decisions. I think that at the outset the minister meant well, even if the bill gave rise to long discussions and several changes.

• (1150)

He brought in some minor changes to the bill after it had been considered at length in committee, he decided to rewrite the whole bill if necessary to bring in other changes: but I think what this bill needs is a radical overhaul. We are dealing with the superficial, and the civil servants—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. It might be useful to remind the hon. member that the discussion is on the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and more precisely on clauses 29 and 30 of the bill, and not on the bill generally.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that. You intervened a moment ago but other speakers before me have had more time. Of course, the Chair can always call members to order on this amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, an amendment dealing with clauses 29 and 30, but I think that if we are to understand this amendment to clauses 29 and 30 it is necessary to speak a little about the bill to see what brought on this discussion. It is all very well to restrict the debate without talking about the core of the matter.

The Chair wants us to try to pluck the bird without knowing specifically what kind of bird we are dealing with. Furthermore, I must say that I am not prepared to accept these matters of restrictions. I simply want to talk about the motions put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre providing some amendments because the minister tells us that he increased the qualifying period and reduced the benefit period. Then, he is telling us that those who will benefit most from the new system are the regions with a high unemployment rate. Let us see. Having cut down at both ends, the minister talks about the regions with the highest level of unemployment. So I am justified in fighting back because there is a 30 per cent unemployment rate in my area, Mr. Speaker.

I was furious when I heard people talking about 12 weeks, and rightly so. This was changed from 10 to 14 weeks but it is not yet in proportion with the unemployment rate in our area at all, Mr. Speaker, especially when the benefit period is reduced to 30 or 32 weeks. What is the result of these amendments? It means that the unemployment insurance fund will save more money and that the Liberal government will go on levying taxes as they have been doing for 15 years, while transferring the responsibility on to the provinces because after 30 or 32 weeks, the guy will not be able to get unemployment benefits and he will still be without work. Then he will fall under the responsibility of the province.

The Liberal government is so apt at shifting the responsibility on the provinces that we would not dare talk about it at the present time. Finally, however, the provinces will be forced to care for him through welfare. They will have to replace the federal government which has the funds, which taxed the workers for this unemployment insurance fund and now that they have been taxed to the hilt the government turns off the tap, keeps the funds and tells them to go to their provincial governments or to refer to welfare services in their province.

This is all we will end up with, in view of these amendments. And people are surprised. They say here that the efforts of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) to introduce the notion of regional disparities into our unemployment insurance scheme are far from gaining the support of all hon. members in the opposition, and I am sure that if hon. members on the government side could speak their mind and have their say, they would show that they are not happy about them either. They are not more stupid than we are, but they are not allowed to say what they want. They are simply sitting there, waiting for this war of attrition to end.

It is most unfortunate indeed to have a system of government which operates like this, for I feel that all together, we in this House certainly represent the larger number of Canadians and want them to obtain a fair deal and compensation for all the taxes they are paying, but that is not what is happening today. We need not wonder why none of the provinces are happy with the federal administration. None of them are happy because the federal government is getting too much for what it is willing to give back. The proof is right here, in the number of weeks and the arrangements for paying unemployment insurance benefits.

Mr. Speaker, in the beginning, I was rather pleased with this work because the idea was to reunite the two services, but I now realize that this reunification will double the number of public servants and that we shall have twice as many well-paid public servants while the unemployed will receive nothing, and that twice as many public servants will benefit from the taxes paid by the workers to protect themselves. Of course, the public servants are well protected! The trouble today is that we have a public service government. There is now one public servant for every four people; if we go on like this, tomorrow there will be one public servant for every two residents in Canada. Let us go on, everything is fine, but during that time, people are starving. It is a good thing that part of the population is working, but in a few years, I believe there will be more people out of work than people who are working, and that those who work will get discouraged and will put an end to this whole system because today, those who earn $400 a week give $175 in taxes to the federal government. This is what hurts and it is expensive. I therefore believe that we should draw the attention of the government to this subject. It is very well to say that wage increases are accepted, but I believe that the government accepts them because it is profitable.

We are now reducing the number of weeks to get rid of the high level of unemployed. There is one point that I would like to make. It is true that there are unemployed people with a good education, I admit this, but what have we done in this regard? I would like to give an example of the unemployment problem at the higher level. I now have a list of young people aged from 20 to 25, technicians who have a degree in electronics. Mr. Speaker, these technicians would like to work. The employer is there and is trying to give them work. He wants to do so, but as soon as he is discovered, he would have to pay a $500 fine to the Quebec Construction Board, even though he would like to hire people who are much more competent than the old employees who got their trade card because of sympathy. Today, these young people are not directly under the jurisdiction of the federal government, but I believe that the federal government should, as much as possible, bring pressure to bear in this case because the situation is disastrous. These young people go to the Quebec Construction Board for a trade card. They have a trade. They have degrees. But the union leaders control the situation and the young people are told: We have enough people, we do not need to hire anyone else or still, you do not have any experience. They are told to go and gain experience when they cannot even get a working permit.

Mr. Speaker, I was using that example simply to indicate to the minister that that malaise exists. When he goes to discuss this with Quebec's manpower minister—I already suggested this on several occasions unsuccessfully—perhaps he will get better results. But it is a bad thing. And do not forget that those who have had the Quebec construction Board working permit for 25 or 30 years work six months a year and rest the other six. That is what I call unemployment with luxury. Those people earn $12, $13 or $14 an hour during six months, and then tell themselves they are going to pay everything in taxes, so they are better off not going to work. Those are the people on unemployment insurance.

Those are the kind of problems that need to be considered, Mr. Speaker. We must try to solve them to find the way to get ourselves out of that slump and allow our young people to enter the labour market before they decide to take the ultimate way out—revolution. I did say the ultimate way out because if you saw all the young people who come to my office you would realize that they are pretty close to revolution. When you consider that a young man cannot even get a simple labourer's working permit—I did say "a simple labourer's working permit"—without being fined! But when will we stop stifling people with all those fines left and right and telling people: You are not allowed to go here, you are not allowed to go there, you are not allowed to do that! Instead they are being told: Apply for social welfare. Mr. Speaker, as long as we will have bills like the one which is now before us, that will not solve the real problem. No. I call them public servants' bills to increase highly paid public servants and let the others starve.

I would like this discussion to end as soon as possible but I urge the government to act. It should be able to do something to bring about some changes in this area. We have come up with some suggestions and drawn its attention on these points. We are saying that the present work week is not consistent with the unemployment rates in our region or elsewhere. We should absolutely do our best to help those who are drawing unemployment benefits while working. That smacks of patronage! I believe we could reach a consensus by having officials draft omnibus bills, while government members are sitting still, waiting for the debate to come to an end.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I hope an effort will be made—for we are sensible people—to cut this debate short so we will not have to spend the whole month of July in this House for nothing, while the minister keeps saying that he will not budge an inch. I am only asking the minister to think about it and make a final effort to bring this discussion to a close.

[English]

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, like some other members, it was not my intention to speak on this bill. However, in view of the economic situation in my constituency and the maritime region generally, I feel I have an obligation to my constituents and the people of that area to make this House realize that we are still a part of confederation even though the CBC on Dominion Day failed to realize it. Nevertheless, my remarks will be brief. They will be to the point and, in some cases, very pointed. The bill has some valid propositions. However, they are so veiled they do not appear as being valid. There are other points and questions in the bill that are questionable, particularly in view of the serious unemployment rate and the economic situation in this country, especially in my constituency and the maritime region generally.

Considering all the present circumstances, the economic situation and the unemployment situation, I suggest that the motion to have this bill set over for some months is proper. The bill should be considered, and the whole organization of the Manpower department, the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the allied bureaucracy related thereto should be considered. They should come up with something that is based on a positive policy of employment, which is a more positive and logical direction.

We should be talking about employment, not providing unemployment benefits. That is where the philosophy of this bill and its predecessors are wrong and out of place. The government should study unemployment insurance benefits, social assistance benefits, welfare benefits and welfare assistance in total and come up with a co-ordinated scheme to provide employment. Instead of unemployment, welfare and like social programs, we should be considering items like this. A special employment fund should be set up to provide for the carrying out of worth-while and necessary federally-funded and operated projects which would create employment in times of recession, depression and in slow growth areas such as the maritimes. In my own area of the maritime provinces, I speak of two items. I have spoken about these to other members of the House. I mentioned one that would provide employment and reduce the number of people on unemployment insurance.

As the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) stated, it is jobs that are important. I remind the government of the Chignecto Canal, a promise of confederation that has never been carried out. There have been 12 engineering studies paid for by the federal government, and three royal commissions. Not a sod of earth has been turned except the one by a member of parliament several years ago. Another project is Fundy tidal power. Why can that not be done? From an engineering point of view it is feasible. If projects like these were carried out, those areas could get on their feet and be self sufficient. As well as providing improvements for the area, they would provide employment. We would not have to talk about unemployment insurance benefits.

We do not want to be a have-not area in the maritimes. I am sure the people in portions of Quebec feel the same way. If an employment fund were set up for projects such as those, to be built in times of economic depression and unemployment, people could be put to work. There would not be the same need for welfare, which is another matter. I will get to that later. If an employment fund for those types of projects were set up by the federal government, the cost of funding would be negligible. In addition to the improvements, the people in those areas would be paying income tax rather than collecting unemployment insurance benefits. Federal expenditures would negative one another in the long run. They would bring the maritime region and other slow growth areas up to the standard of the rest of the country.

I have a second suggestion. I put these suggestions in a very clear and helpful form in the hope that the government will do something about them. I listened to an American station. We get those down our way once in a while. Thank goodness we do, because the CBC does not do that hot a job. They tell me they do not have enough mobile equipment. The government should take steps to encourage and promote "workfare" instead of welfare. It should provide jobs and put people to work. There are many federal projects that could be started and completed during times of high unemployment.

There are good reasons for this motion. Items such as those mentioned could be considered during the layover period. A new bill could be prepared to provide those things that are logical, positive and sensible. If these suggestions were accepted, the bureaucratic population of Manpower, the Unemployment Insurance Commission and all the other allied departments under the minister could be reduced. Those public servants who would have to find other jobs would be more productive to themselves and to society in general. If projects such as I have mentioned were put into place, the whole system would be productive, people would be more productive and this country would not be in the economic doldrums in which it finds itself time after time.

The Chignecto Canal was a promise of confederation. I suggest it could be carried out if an employment fund were set up. I have brought this matter to the attention of the minister. He has been decent and fair. I hope he will discuss it with his cabinet colleagues. This is the type of thing that will create employment and provide long-term benefits for the whole maritime region. Like projects must be carried out in Quebec and other areas of slow growth. I hope the minister has listened to what I had to say and that his cabinet colleagues will take cognizance of what has been said here today.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I did not have an opportunity to speak on the principle of the bill on second reading. Nor did I have an opportunity to attend the committee meetings which went into depth with regard to the problems contained in Bill C-27. However, after hearing the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), who speaks in a very folksy and earthy way, talk about the problems confronting us as a result of unemployment and directly related to the Unemployment Insurance Act, I felt it incumbent upon me to say something.

The hon. member for Timiskaming, in relating the clauses that would be referred back by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for study, indicated that in his constituency a plant was intended to be opened. More than 300 women who otherwise would not have been looking for employment applied for employment. He stressed the principle that it is not only the 900,000 people who are unemployed at the moment; it is the number of hidden unemployed which is of major concern. Some economists have set that figure at between one million and 1½ million. Therefore, it behooves all of us to direct our attention not only to Bill C-27 but to the larger question of employment.

I recall our leader speaking about a visit to Abbotsford, British Columbia—a beautiful province. In Abbotsford there was an employment notice to the effect that McDonald's hamburger chain was to open a new hamburger stand in the area. Believe it or not, there was a line-up a block long for people applying for the menial jobs which are related to the operation of a hamburger business. This underlines the situation we are facing.

It is rather striking that today we should be considering the question of national unity, the question of Quebec. We shall hear the leaders of all parties set forth their ideas on this subject. May I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that according to a survey carried out by the Toronto Star it is not the language issue which divides Quebec from the rest of Canada, but economic and employment issues. This is why it is so important we should tackle these aspects. According to the comments I read in the Star report, one of the sources of dissatisfaction in Quebec is that most of the English newspapers there are pussyfooting, wishy-washy and gutless.

Mr. Rodriguez: Liberal.

Mr. Gilbert: Those are three adjectives which might well be applied by them to our Liberal friends in the government, and also to our Conservative friends. The main thrust of this bill deserves all those adjectives. One of the great things about debate in this House is that out of the clash of ideas comes wisdom. We started out with the idea that the minor attachment period would be increased from 8 weeks to 12 weeks.

I can still recall the opening speech of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), the theme of which was: The Liberals have stolen our thunder. I recall the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), the spokesman for the Tory party on manpower and immigration, saying—in Montreal, I think it was—that if he had his way, it would not be 8 weeks, 12 weeks or 14 weeks, but 20 weeks. So it was good to find the House engaged in a solid debate on second reading, because in the course of that debate we heard from members of the Liberal party more representative of the maritime provinces and Quebec, and we also heard from members of the Conservative party summing up the reaction from their constituencies to the proposed changes. I am sure the members from the maritimes impressed on the minister the need for changes in the bill and were somewhat ashamed of the opening statements of the hon. member for Hamilton West and of the statements made by the hon. member for Provencher.

It is important that we debate this bill, and debate it thoroughly. I would not call the minister incompetent. I think he is competent, and I think he is sincere. I believe he is well aware of the difficulties. I have known him since 1968, and he has given me that impression. But he is caught within the web of the Liberal party and the cabinet, so his main endeavour is not to solve unemployment but to penalize the unemployed. This is unfortunate. I doubt whether he is deserving of the adjectives "wishy-washy" or "gutless", but he is caught in an unfortunate position. Coming from the city of Sarnia, he must be getting representations similar to those the rest of us are receiving with respect to unemployment.

Let me speak for a few moments about my experiences in my riding of Broadview, in Toronto, which I am sure is representative of a great many ridings across the country. It embraces many nationalities and economic groups; it is really a microcosm of the country at large. The main ethnic component is English, representing between 40 and 45 per cent of the population. When I first began to represent the riding, the figure was in the region of 65 per cent. Next in order of number come the Greeks and Macedonians, then the Chinese and the Italians. So the constituency is very representative of the country at large.

I operate a constituency clinic which I attend every Saturday morning. For weeks, months, years almost, I have not had people coming to me with the sole pre-occupation of finding employment. In the last six months there has been a dramatic change in my work at the constituency clinic. Every week five or six people ask me to help obtain employment for them. For my part, I do not believe a politican should be looked upon as one who obtains employment for persons. I believe he should be looked upon as one who is concerned with national issues and who directs his attention and resources to dealing with them. He should not be seeking employment for his constituents, especially since there are other agencies which have been set up to do so. The Department of Manpower and Immigration, for instance, is playing an effective role in this area.

As I say, five or six people come to my office every weekend seeking employment. Their ages range from 16 to 65, but the largest group is in the 16 to 25 age bracket. It is discouraging to find men in the prime of their working life telling me they have served in the armed forces, that they have worked hard, that they have been laid off, and that they have done their best to find employment but without success. It is disheartening to hear them tell me of their family responsibilities, their need to buy food, clothing, to keep up rent payments, and so on. It is equally disappointing to hear young people between the ages of 16 and 25, many of them with university education, telling me they have looked for work and that employers have told them they are overqualified. In other words, all their years of study in high school and university counts for naught.

There are the semi-skilled and the unskilled. The government has attempted in some way to update the skills of many of these people, which is to its credit. Within the bill there are provisions for retraining and upgrading some of our workers. It is necessary to do so. These people are faced with a major worry; that is, having finished their courses and being retrained, there is no employment for them. This has a psychological impact on the way they apply themselves to their studies and skills. It has a tremendous impact, as well, on their general well-being if they cannot find employment.

On third reading, the minister's speech related directly to the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to refer back to committee for study clauses 29 and 30 of this bill. One of the objectives of the minister is to streamline and improve the unemployment insurance program in order to make it more responsive to economic circumstances. He said the unemployment insurance benefits structure will be simplified and made more equitable. Every time I receive a phone call from someone who has an unemployment insurance problem, I feel very uneasy because of the complexity of the act and its provisions. Usually I have to depend on my riding secretary to assist me with regard to these complexities.

The minister said he is going to make it more equitable, and he set forth a very complex scheme dividing Canada into 54 regions. He also referred to a formula which will be known as the variable entrance requirement. Depending on the region, that requirement will be from 10 weeks to 14 weeks. This is the government's response to the cries and howls of the members within its party, the members of the New Democratic Party and the maritime members of the Progressive Conservative party. That formula is not workable. It is neither fair nor equitable to the workers in the maritimes, in British Columbia, in Northern Ontario or in any area of Canada.

Originally, the bill was from 8 weeks to 12 weeks. Now the minister wants the change to be from 10 weeks to 14 weeks. Canada has a very mobile work force. There is the difficulty of a young person working for a period of time in the maritimes where unemployment is very high. If that person decides to better his position by coming to Ontario he will be faced with a 14-week requirement. That problem will be multiplied in the various areas across this country. Therefore, the New Democratic Party considers the changes are difficult to administer and are so unfair to workers that they are not worth supporting.

With regard to the riding of Broadview, when you have unemployment you are faced with racial tensions, which is a very bad thing. When you have full employment, there is an easing of those tensions and there is no ill-feeling among the different races and nationalities, as there is when they are competing for employment; there are tensions between the people who are working and those who are not working. Some unacceptable adjectives are imposed upon the non-working by the working. This may be because of feelings of resentment, jealousy, or what have you. Therefore, it is very necessary to devise a program which is fair, reasonable and equitable in order to reduce racial tensions and also to reduce the tensions which exist between the working and non-working across this country.

When we had unemployment problems in the past, we faced that problem by having wars. Many members, most notably the hon. member for Timiskaming, enumerated some of the results of trying to solve the unemployment problem by having wars. Wars kill off the flower of our communities, the young men and women. This is one of the effects of trying to solve the unemployment situation by having wars. There is an attempt to solve unemployment by giving massive credits to corporations in the hope that these moneys will be used by the corporations to reduce the level of unemployment.

We have regional development programs, we have major tax concessions to corporations with regard to depreciation allowances and with regard to accelerated depreciation allowances, and we have programs to generate employment in depressed areas. The result of the regional development programs set forth by the minister of that department, who is a sincere, concerned and devoted Canadian, is an unemployment figure of 900,000 which was supplied by the Department of Manpower and Immigration. The more accurate figure is between one million and 1.5 million.

The government has to take a new approach with regard to unemployment if we are to reduce it from 8 per cent and 9 per cent to 3 per cent. The figure should be 3 per cent, because that would take care of the people who shift from one job to another. The Liberal government and the opposition parties as well have a duty to provide full employment. We can talk all we want about freedom of religion, speech and assembly, but we must talk about some of the things which are closer to all Canadians. I am referring to the right to work and full employment. Also, there is the right of a person to develop his highest potential. There is the right to medicare and decent housing. These are the rights we should be stressing. The right to education has been included. These are things we should be stressing. I imagine that foremost is the right to work.

When I read the minister's statement on third reading regarding development by the government of the work sharing principle, it seemed to me there had been a cop-out in regard to full employment in Canada. When we get these work sharing principles in place, Mr. Speaker, we will find there are many people still unemployed. Many of the tensions that I spoke of a few minutes ago will still exist, and this will not bring about a good result.

What we should be debating now is a bill having to do with full employment. The bill should include some of the measures the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) put forward, as well as some of those put forward by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), the members of the New Democratic Party, as well as some of our Liberal and Conservative friends—because full employment involves us all. The major concern in this country is employment, and we should be directing our minds to employment rather than to Bill C-27 which deals with unemployment.

When I come to think of it, Mr. Speaker, employment for even 10 to 14 weeks is a national disgrace. When the UI bill was first presented to the House, it was never the intention of the government of the day to speak of unemployment in terms of 900,000 people but, rather, in terms of only 3 per cent—workers in the work force changing from one job to another who needed interim help during that changeover period. Neither was it the intention of the government to speak of 10 to 14 weeks' employment in order to qualify for unemployment insurance. I think we should keep in mind that our goal should be full employment, and that the minimum unemployment rate should be 3 per cent.

If I may be a little folksy for a moment, I recall when Bryce Mackasey was minister of manpower and immigration in 1971 and we were dealing with the eight-week requirement. Most members had received a tremendous amount of mail from teachers across the country because they were not included within the UI provisions previous to that 1971 amendment. I, myself, and many others argued that they should be included since unemployment affects all areas of the economy. During the last few years teachers have had a hard time obtaining employment. Our universities and teaching colleges are still turning out teachers who are unable to find work owing to general economic conditions. It was, therefore, a good thing that Bryce Mackasey had the wisdom and the foresight to include the teaching profession within the provisions of the act. Some teachers are now reaping the benefit of the changes which we brought about in 1971. Unemployment affects all—university graduates, the semi-skilled and the unskilled. No one is left untouched by the scourge of unemployment.

We need government measures that will depart from the old methods of tax allowances and job training programs and move to job creating programs which will meet the immediate needs of the unemployed. I am sure the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) will have no difficulty directing his mind to some of the major work programs which are necessary across this country. I have just returned from a convention in Winnipeg where I heard about some of the concerns delegates had in their areas, such as lack of transportation, housing, shortage of recreational facilities, home insulation, and some of the specific matters mentioned by the hon. member for Moncton and others. It is not sufficient for the minister to talk of streamlining and improving the unemployment insurance program so as to make it more responsive to economic conditions. We do not need amendments to the UI bill; we need a major thrust toward creating direct employment throughout this country.

The minister spoke eloquently and with sincerity about improving the quality of employment-related services of the federal government for all Canadians. This is why we have been talking about integrating the UIC and Manpower and Immigration. It is very important that we have a direct handle on these particular departments. I am sure that from his brief experience within his ministry, the minister has become aware of the multiplicity of problems not only with the UIC but with Manpower and Immigration. I rather admire the minister's capacity to absorb all the stresses and strains in those three departments, because they are tremendous. But he could make it much easier both for himself and for most Canadians if he brought forward employment-creating measures which would help to eliminate the need for improvements in the field of unemployment insurance and in manpower and immigration.

Your Honour may have noticed, as I have, that many people now look upon immigration with a jaundiced eye. At one time immigration was regarded as a necessary step in the development of this country. When I think of the contribution made to the growth of this country by immigrants over the last 50 years—I include the contribution of my parents and, I am sure, the parents of most members here—it has been fantastic. However, we are now reaching the point where people are looking on immigration policies with suspicion and distrust. We are encountering major difficulties with the amendments to the immigration bill in committee, and I think the whole cause of this is unemployment. If we can solve unemployment, this would ease tensions in regard to immigration. We would continue to have a flow of people into this country of all races and nationalities who would contribute to and enjoy the benefits of the resources of this country, and not only among ourselves but with the world at large.

In closing, I ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to give full consideration to the motion to refer back, moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in order to review clauses 29 and 30 of the bill. I ask him to do so, not in the light only of improving the 10-week to 14-week formula, but to review it in the context of the larger problem of unemployment and to come back with measures to meet this problem. If he did that, he would receive the grateful thanks of all Canadians and the admiration and respect of members of the House, as well as their support.

● (1240)

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to refer clauses 29 and 30 back to the Standing Committee on Manpower and Immigration. When we completed the study of Bill C-27 in committee, I took it upon myself to form a package of the minutes of the committee hearings on the bill and the second reading speeches, which I sent out to every premier in Canada and every major trade union in the country, asking them to look them over and to give me their opinions, because I thought that was the kind of job an effective opposition should do. The answers have started to come in, and I want to bring to the attention of the House the first response which I received today. It is very fortunate that it came in today. It was from Mr. Richard Hatfield, premier of the province of New Brunswick. He said:

Dear Mr. Rodriguez:

[Mr. Gilbert.]

Thank you for your letter of May 9 in which you invited our comments on Bill C-27. As you are no doubt aware, the province has already expressed its opposition to two key portions of the bill, and those have since been modified in response to overwhelming general objection. There are a number of other aspects of the bill which we view with some concern, so I have asked my officials to prepare a brief on these items.

He has done that and submitted to me his brief on what took place in committee. It is certainly an eye-opener. When I think of all the nabobs the government has at its disposal, all the so-called experts, we in this corner in the House are limited in terms of number and expertise; but surely, with some ingenuity, one could get the opinions of responsible people like the premier of New Brunswick. The comments that are made are rather revealing. They may have some application to what will be debated later today and tomorrow in the House. The first thing that the premier notes—I think it is very important and that the minister and members should be aware of it—is as follows:

It is characteristic of federal Manpower programs that their implementation or change has considerable impact on provincial programs. While the province appreciates that the federal authorities must change their priorities and programs in response to changing labour market conditions, it can only add to provincial frustration to be presented, without prior consultation, with a plethora of curtailments, terminations, initiations, and modifications in such program areas as unemployment insurance, vocational training, and job creation.

While it is true the bill presently before you is one concerning which there was prior notification to the province, there was no prior consultation—that is, there was monologue, but not dialogue.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Rodriguez: He says, further:

As noted, we have voiced our concern about the most serious aspects of the bill and changes have been made. We do not feel, however, that these changes are yet totally adequate.

What is very important with respect to the minor attachment period or the qualifying period is what he says next:

To begin with, they are, and appear to be, ad hoc adjustments made in response to general opposition.

We have made that comment in the debate on this bill. First, the minister brought in Bill C-27 based on his comprehensive review on the unemployment insurance program, which moves the qualifying period from 8 weeks to 12 weeks. Apart from the shortcomings of the comprehensive review, which we pointed out extensively last night, the minister got a lot of flak from the backbenchers in his party. Suddenly he discovered light, like St. Paul on the way to Damascus. Suddenly he was struck, and discovered that there are regions in Canada where unemployment is much more serious than in others. This great enlightenment has come upon him suddenly. Do you know why it came? It came because of the threatened embarrassment by his backbenchers. Members from Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Quebec objected to some measures in the bill and threatened the minister with the embarrassment of their voting against this bill. As Mr. Hatfield pointed out, quite correctly, the minister came in with ad hoc amendments to the bill. Mr. Hatfield went on to say:

They do not form part of an integrated yet flexible over-all goal regarding UIC. Secondly, the time constraint on the amendments completely negates the advantage of tying benefit and entrance regulations to regional labour market conditions. To suggest that the 14-week rule will apply across the board in three years is tantamount to saying that in three years no more consideration will be given to regional conditions. This is a position totally unacceptable to the province.

The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) was very gentle when he said the official opposition has been pussyfooting around. It has capitulated and broken faith with its colleagues from the eastern parts of this country. Here is Premier Hatfield pointing out very important opposition. But the Conservatives are quick to jump in and pat themselves on the back, such as in the bumbling performance the other night when the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) took all the credit for this monstrosity of a bill which is being perpetrated on the people of Canada. The hon. member knows full well that, under the bill, at the end of three years the qualifying period will be 14 weeks. Here is a Conservative premier pointing out the serious shortcomings of such a provision.

Will regional disparities disappear in three years, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and members of the House? Nothing in the government's previous action or policies indicates to me that they intend to eliminate serious regional disparities in the country. They say, in the bill, that after three years regionality will no longer be a consideration. That is a condemnation of the minister's approach to this problem. What they brought in with this superimposition of 54 regions and the 10 weeks' to 14 weeks' sliding scale is just a measure to get them off the horns of a dilemma. It was to save the government the embarrassment of having its own backbenchers voting against it. I am glad that the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) just came in.

Mr. Breau: I have been here all morning.

Mr. Rodriguez: I was just reading a letter from his premier. The government was looking for a way to get off the horns of a dilemma, and the minister and his nabobs came up with an ad hoc approach. The premier's letter points out other problems he had with the committee minutes I sent him, and with Bill C-27 in the form it now is. Premier Hatfield does not share my political philosophy, but I certainly admire his honesty and sincerity. I think he is a genuine conservative and I admire that. He is genuine and he levels with people. I admire that, too. When we deal with other problems at third reading of this bill I will read other parts of Premier Hatfield's letter with respect to work sharing, and so forth.

With reference to the qualifying period, our motion to send this bill back to the committee is a wise move. The minister and his nabobs are now hearing very constructive debate and constructive propositions with respect to the most serious problem facing Canada at the moment, namely, unemployment. What good is it to wrap ourselves in the flag and say that we have one country, if we still have 1½ million unemployed? We should be trying to serve the basic needs of our people. The hon. member for Broadview pointed out that the right to work is a very basic and fundamental right of every Canadian. That was also pointed out in the committee. Many groups and individuals came before the committee. I cannot think of a group which put the whole problem in a nutshell better than the United Auto Workers. Since the Conservatives are famous for quoting corporate sector briefs, I feel it is important that I quote what I consider to be an excellent synopsis of the whole question. I quote from the UAW brief as follows:

> Our society is characterized by a lack of job security. Jobs are dependent on the ups and downs of the market and the decisions of corporations geared to profit-maximization. At present the rate of unemployment in Canada is at a rate higher than at any time since the great depression and even the government acknowledges it will continue to get worse. As of March, 1977, Canada has a higher unemployment rate than any other industrialized country. As quick as the government was to restrain our wages in October, 1975, in the name of a national emergency, no such crisis is apparently recognized by the government today.
> We want jobs; we need jobs; the right to a job should be as basic as any civil rights (if not more so). The failure of the government and our social system to guarantee this right forces us to depend on unemployment insurance. The government, in Bill C-27, is attempting to further erode even this secondary right to unemployment insurance, and it offers as compensation for this certain reorganizational changes in the manpower programs.

That is one of the most excellent presentations we experienced in the committee's consideration of Bill C-27. There is no question that we have a problem in creating employment opportunities. There are certain policy directions this government must follow. There is work to be done. There are many job opportunities to be seized.

The other day I read about our trade relationship with Japan. In that study it was noted that 96 per cent of our exports to Japan are raw materials. On the other side of the trade picture, 95 per cent of our imports from Japan are manufactured products, primarily cars, cameras and electronic equipment. That, in a nutshell, is a microcosm of the problem. We have been allowed to develop a hinterland economy. Our people rip raw materials from the ground, cut trees down, and ship them out. In the area I represent, the predominant industry is mining. Our men and women take raw materials out of the ground. These raw materials are put into a semi-processed state—nickel pellets: we call them nickel matte. We ship those nickel pellets to Pittsburgh. Falconbridge ships its raw material to Norway.

We are badly in need of government policies which would make it uneconomic for resource companies to ship raw materials out of this country. There should be measures to encourage the processing of raw materials in Canada to finished products. There is no reason in the world why this government should permit a great country like Canada, with its fantastic resources, to be raped by multinational mining companies. Canada is not only being raped; it even pays mining companies to depreciate our resources. As our former leader, David Lewis, often used to say, there can be no rape if there is consent—and that is often what happens.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EXTENSION OF HOURS OF SITTING ON JULY 5 AND 6—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move under the provisions of Standing Order 43 a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. I have discussed it with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and with the leader of the government. I hope the House will accept it, because it is important to allow as many members as possible to speak in the next two days in the debate on national unity. I think there is agreement on that point at least. Accordingly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies):

That on Tuesday, July 5, 1977 and Wednesday, July 6, 1977, the ordinary time of daily adjournment shall be deemed to be 11 p.m. and 7 p.m. respectively.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such motion can be presented at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As the mover of the motion suggested, I agreed to the motion, and I do so on behalf of my party. But I think there should be an understanding that the hour tonight between ten o'clock and eleven o'clock shall be devoted entirely to the national unity debate and not to late show questions.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is agreeable to us, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must put the question.

[English]

The House having given its unanimous consent, it is moved by Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton), seconded by Mr. Gillies, that on Tuesday, July 5, 1977 and Wednesday, July 6, 1977 the ordinary time of ordinary adjournment shall deemed to be 11 p.m. and 7 p.m. respectively.

Shall I add that this shall be done for the continuance during those hours of the debate on national unity?

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier).]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, we do not agree with those hours, we want the usual schedule.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Baker, Grenville-Carleton) which was agreed to on the following division.

ENERGY

ALCAN PIPELINE—POSSIBILITY OF ENVIRONMENTAL AND ECONOMIC STUDY OF DEMPSTER PIPELINE

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister and it arises out of the report yesterday by the National Energy Board about the possible construction of the Alcan gas line and the fact that the Canadian gas will be brought up, if it ever is, along the Dempster highway, a proposal about which we know nothing in terms of economic costs or environmental conditions. Given that recommendation, is the Prime Minister asking for the preparation or development of a study of the implications of the Dempster pipeline on native rights, economic and capital costs, environment and so on, so that the information will be made available to the Canadian people and in particular to the cabinet before they reach a decision so we will not find that the Canadian gas is locked in forever?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will gladly examine the suggestion of the hon. member. I must confess that the report, which is very voluminous and was only put in our hands last night, has not yet been studied by cabinet.

ALCAN PIPELINE—SUGGESTION PRESIDENT OF UNITED STATES BE ASKED TO EXTEND DEADLINE FOR DECISION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Is the Prime Minister going to ask the President of the United States to extend the time in which the decision is made, given the fact that there are so many unknown factors about the Dempster line? I understand the president has the right to take until the end of December. Will the Canadian government request that he do so?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I rather think that if the President of the United States wants to seek a delay, he will do so under his own steam. He may be in touch with us as to the likelihood of our making an announcement before September 1. I am sure there will be some communication between the two administrations, but I repeat that I have no thorough knowledge of the report which was brought down last night and I have not studied its implications in so far as talking to the President of the United States is concerned.

ALCAN PIPELINE—DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON BACKSTOPPING OF CONSTRUCTION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): My question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I should like to ask him whether in fact there has been any communication between his department and his counterpart in the United States about the reality and reliability of the U.S. government backstopping the Alcan pipeline as was recommended by the National Energy Board?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I do not know of any specific discussions. There were general discussions in the sense of considering it at one time. As the hon. member knows, I have had some general discussions with the special adviser to the president, but they were of a general nature dealing with the various options that Canada had. I do not recall any specific exchange of views with respect to any backstopping.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF PROVINCIAL STATUS FOR YUKON

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Yesterday's recommendations raise new questions about the future of the Yukon territory. If the NEB report is accepted by the government and by cabinet, the Yukon will have an area of substantial development without the ability which provinces have to funnel the funds in the best interests of the region. Will the Prime Minister now take the initiative and begin the process of bringing that territory to full provincial status?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, you will recognize that the question is hypothetical.

MEASURES TO AID COMMUNITIES IF MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE NOT BUILT

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): I have another question for the Prime Minister and it arises as a result of the NEB decision. It has to do with the future of many small businesses and individuals in the Mackenzie Valley who built up their businesses with government encouragement in the expectation of a pipeline going through.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Neil: I am thinking specifically of the town of Inuvik which spent several million dollars on infrastructure at the instance of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Neil: Will the Prime Minister tell the House whether the government has prepared an alternative northern development program in the event that there is no pipeline development in the Valley?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I realize that members on the other side want to express some views on what their preferences are as to the pipeline and what should be done by the government in certain circumstances. That is why the House leader has committed the government to a debate in the House on this subject. The hon. member is asking questions about what would happen if the government does such and so. I repeat that we only received the report last night, we have not studied it, and therefore the questions asked of the government are premature. If they are representations, we will take them into account.

ALCAN PIPELINE—SUGGESTION PRESIDENT OF UNITED STATES BE REQUESTED TO EXTEND DEADLINE FOR DECISION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister which arises from his answer given to the hon. member for Don Valley. The Prime Minister, I say with respect as one says around here, seems to have missed the point of the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Not unusual.

Mr. Broadbent: Since the information that the NEB had on the social and environmental aspects of the Alcan route was, to say the least, limited and since the government's Department of the Environment and the Lysyk study are looking at precisely these matters, from the point of view of Canadian interest would the Prime Minister get in touch with President Carter to request an extension of the September 1 deadline to which he referred?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Dean Lysyk's study is supposed to be brought to the government on August 1. We would contemplate making it public as soon thereafter as possible. The deadline of the end of August which we have imposed on ourselves is still reachable. If we find it cannot be reached, I would consider suggestions from the leader of the NDP.

ALCAN PIPELINE—PROPOSED EXTENSION OF TIME FOR LYSYK INQUIRY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Since the time allocated for the kind of survey and hearings undertaken by the Lysyk inquiry, if my memory serves me correctly, amounts to about six weeks, which is considerably less than that taken by the Berger inquiry to cover similar kinds of considerations, does the Prime Minister not think it appropriate to extend the term of the Lysyk inquiry, say, by two to three months, so that an adequate job can be done, and therefore, related to that, request of President Carter that he put off the September 1 deadline in the full knowledge that President Carter himself knows he can do that and has at least until December 1?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I think the leader of the NDP would be better advised to wait until he sees the Lysyk report. Perhaps it will be satisfactory to him and to the House. If it is not, then he can make his representations at that point.

NORTHERN PIPELINE—PUBLIC OPINION SURVEY AS BASIS FOR DECISION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Representations at that point in terms of a predetermined debate time by the government would be a little futile. I would like to ask my last supplementary of the Prime Minister and ask him if he would confirm that the government will reach its final decision on the pipeline on the basis of a public opinion survey which the government party has commissioned and a copy of which I have here, labelled "Super Rush, Secret" to be completed and turned in with the results by yesterday. Is that going to be the real basis of the government's decision on which route to take for the pipeline?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Personally, I have not seen this question quoted by the hon. member nor the questionnaire in which it would be contained. Perhaps it is a survey put out by some supporters of the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FINANCE

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT LEND MONEY AT ADMINISTRATION COST—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

As reported in Le Devoir of June 28, the Islamic Development Bank makes interest-free loans, or loans at administration cost only. Did the minister contact that bank to see how it operates, so as to apply the same method in Canada? If so, is the minister prepared to use it in the near future?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, if the minister is unaware, could he ask his department to undertake a study precisely to apply such interest-free loans, as is done in other countries, contrary to what his party has said for a number of years, namely that it was not done elsewhere?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to review the hon. member's question.

ENERGY

DEMPSTER PIPELINE—POSSIBILITY OF COMPLETING ENVIRONMENTAL STUDY PRIOR TO SEPTEMBER

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, and in the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development I will direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the emphasis placed by the National Energy Board upon the importance of the Dempster link in the Alcan proposal, and in view of the fact that there has been no environmental study prepared or commissioned on this important 600-mile corridor, will the minister advise whether the government, logically through the Department of the Environment, has the capacity to complete an adequate environmental assessment prior to September 1? Alternatively, is the minister of the view that the proponents would have the capacity to complete that review before September 1?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to relay that question to the Minister of the Environment. I am not in a position to give a precise answer to the question, but if the hon. member would look at the report of the National Energy Board, he would find that the kinds of questions he just asked are anticipated in that report.

POSSIBILITY OF COMMITMENT TO ALCAN PIPELINE PRIOR TO ENVIRONMENTAL STUDY OF DEMPSTER PIPELINE

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I quite agree, but there was no indication in the report that such a review could be carried out by September 1 or, alternatively, by December 1. Is it the minister's view that a commitment to the Alcan proposal—which would in the future rely very heavily, according to the NEB, on the Dempster link—should be made before an adequate environmental assessment can be completed on that portion to which I have just referred, namely, the Dempster link? In other words, is it the position of the government that a commitment to the Alcan route can be made before an adequate environmental assessment?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has confirmed that his question was based on what is anticipated in the NEB report. The Prime Minister has made it very clear that we have not as yet had a chance to study all the implications of that report. We look forward to doing so in the very near future.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I very much regret that the minister has misunderstood me. I will make my question perfectly clear. Regardless of the National Energy Board report, is it the government's position that a commitment to Alcan can be made before an environmental assessment of the Dempster link is completed?

An hon. Member: Yes or no.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I made it very clear that these are questions which the government is considering at the present time. We have not taken a decision on these matters.

An hon. Member: You never do.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GARRISON DIVERSION—PROPOSED REFERENCE OF INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION REPORT TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment and the Secretary of State for External Affairs my question is for the Prime Minister. It has to do with the anticipated final report of the International Joint Commission with reference to the Garrison Diversion project which is expected later this month. Would the Prime Minister assure the House that this final report will be referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry so that the committee can take a very critical and close look at the final recommendations of the IJC?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to take notice of the question, and I will be happy to see that it is answered.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED MANDATORY STANDARDS FOR RUSTPROOFING OF AUTOMOBILES

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It has to do with the terrible rip-off Canadian consumers have been subjected to over the last few years with regard to rusting of automobiles. I fully concur with the actions of the minister today in this regard. An authorized official of the National Research Council said yesterday that rustless cars could be built. He said, and I quote:

> There are no technical limitations to the production of a vehicle which would be free from corrosive failure for its normal mechanical life.

In view of this statement by an authorized official of the National Research Council is the minister now ready to make rustproof standards for automobiles made in Canada or imported into Canada mandatory and not voluntary?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his encouragement. I, too, noticed in the newspaper this morning mention of the report of the National Research Council. I have requested a copy of the report. I have heard Dr. Cohen of that institution express views similar to those quoted. Thursday and Friday I will be meeting with my provincial colleagues at a federal-provincial conference of consumer ministers at which time we are going to consider the proposed anti-rust code which I introduced previously. I am hopeful my provincial colleagues will concur with my views. I am encouraged by their comments to date, and I hope there will be some agreement coming from them and general support from the automobile industry.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PAKISTAN—RECOGNITION OF MILITARY REGIME AND RESTORATION OF PARLIAMENTARY DEMOCRACY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I have a question for the Prime Minister. Is the government giving consideration to recognition of the new military regime in Pakistan, and will the Prime Minister consider expressing to the president of Pakistan the concern of Canadians for the personal safety of the elected representatives of the people of Pakistan and for the early restoration of a parliamentary democracy in that country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member certainly expresses the feelings of the government in general, but in this particular case I was just informed of the coup a few minutes ago, and I have not yet been informed as to the steps which might have been taken by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I will inquire.

ENERGY

ALCAN PIPELINE—PROPOSAL UNITED STATES ASSUME EXPORT COMMITMENTS WHEN LINE COMPLETED

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that Canada exports one trillion cubic feet of gas per year, which is 40 per cent of our total production and which means that we are exporting cheap gas, and in view of the fact that after a period of 20 years we will be purchasing very expensive gas from the Arctic, I want to ask the minister if, in the course of negotiations with the United States government regarding the proposed Alcan route, it is the government's intention to suggest to the United States that when that line is completed the Americans take over some of Canada's export commitments to the United States so that a larger amount of gas may be retained for the use of Canadians at reasonable prices?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, this is the same kind of question the hon. member's leader was asking a few moments ago. It is based on a series of hypotheses. It has been made very clear that the government has not yet taken a decision with respect to the Alcan route, although that was the recommendation of the National Energy Board. There are a number of implications of the NEB recommendations with respect to conditions and terms imposed on the applicant and the United States, and I think it would be quite premature for me to express any view on that at this time.

MEASURES TO ENSURE INCREASE IN CONSUMPTION NOT GREATER THAN TWO PER CENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I hope, however, that the minister will keep that in mind.

In view of the fact that conserving energy is one of the alleged goals of the government and that the minister has set a 2 per cent increase in our energy consumption as the goal for 1985, and in view of the fact that the National Energy Board report tabled yesterday says that from 1985 to 1990 our increase in consumption will be 3.5 per cent, does the minister agree with that estimate? If he does, what steps is he going to take to change the situation so that we will reach the 2 per cent goal which he has told the House is his objective?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the higher figure. I made it quite clear that in total energy terms I think we should be able to get our rate of growth down to the lower figure. I think the hon. member should recognize that a number of different assumptions are built into the NEB report. The board had a slightly lower figure, for example, in its oil report, which was just recently received. I believe that my figure is attainable, given the support of the provinces and the awareness and the support of the Canadian people for getting our energy consumption down to very close to a zero rate of growth by 1985.

NORTHERN PIPELINE—DATE OF DEBATE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary is directed either to the Prime Minister or to the President of the Privy Council, the government House Leader. In view of the fact that both hon. gentlemen have stated there will be an opportunity for the House to have a debate first of all on the National Energy Board report and second, that when the government has made a decision with respect to the matter it will be submitted to the House for discussion and a vote, I want to ask the government what timetable they have in mind. Since the Lysyk report will not come in until the end of the month I assume the debate on energy will take place in August. When does the government intend to give the House an opportunity to debate and approve or disapprove the Alcan route recommended by the National Energy Board?

● (1450)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on the first point, I expect that we will recall the House early in August in order to have the views of the House after all relevant reports have been tabled. Hopefully that will be the first week in August. There is no commitment on my part at any time that any particular decision would be put before the House for ratification at that time. What I have said is that it would be inconceivable that a project of this magnitude could be undertaken without legislative action by the House.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN PENSIONS PAID TO MINERS IN CAPE BRETON AND NOVA SCOTIA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the difference between the pension paid to miners in Cape Breton and pensions paid to miners in the rest of Nova Scotia, and in view of representations that have been made to the minister as well as to the Minister of Mines in Nova Scotia, I wonder if the minister could tell the House whether he is taking a serious look at the situation in order to reduce this disparity in a single province?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am willing to have another look at the situation, but I should like to remind the hon. member and the House that some time ago DEVCO studied the problem and improved the Cape Breton miners' pension plan considerably. I am quite willing to take up the matter again with DEVCO's management and to report to the hon. member what has been decided, but once again I believe we have done quite a lot to improve the lot of Cape Breton miners.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SPLITTING OF UNION ALONG LINGUISTIC LINES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): My question is directed to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the recent decision of the Canadian Labour Relations Board in splitting along linguistic lines national bargaining units of the CBC, I wonder if the Prime Minister can tell the House if this splitting along linguistic lines is an affirmation and full extension of bilingualism or is it the beginning of the conversion of the government to deux nations? Also, in view of the precedent that this creates for other national bargaining units, what action if any does the Prime Minister intend to take?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that the hon. member is referring to a specific case. If he is, it would be before a quasi-judicial body and I do not think it would be appropriate for him or for me to comment. If he is talking about principles in general, I must say that on this point I agree with the preamble that the hon. member made. We do not intend to see the country split on linguistic or racial lines.

Mr. Speaker: A supplementary.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Prime Minister very much for that answer in part. I can understand now why he does not have his tie tied too tightly because he is a very slippery character, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: Very, very slippery. The interesting thing and ironic thing, Mr. Speaker, and the paradoxical thing, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member have a supplementary question?

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, if you could restrain yourself—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: —as well as the Prime Minister ever restrains himself in giving information to this House—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nowlan: I should like to draw to the Prime Minister's attention, Mr. Speaker, especially ironically, paradoxically, on the Canada Day—

An hon. Member: Resign.

Mr. Nowlan: I will resign the day you want to resign and I will fight the election right now, lover boy.

Mr. Speaker, the interesting point of this is that this decision, that is not now pending before a judicial body but is an actual decision of the Canadian Labour Relations Board and is now in effect, came out ironically on the weekend that we celebrated Canada Day, July 1, Dominion, the first, you name it—it fits everybody—

An hon. Member: What is the question?

Mr. Nowlan: The question is this, Mr. Speaker: Because I asked two ministers of the Crown yesterday about this decision, neither of whom knew anything—they did not know—they did not have a—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Order, please. I wonder if the hon. member would put his question forthwith.

Mr. Nowlan: Never, Mr. Speaker, in the history of parliamentary democracy on July 5 have I seen you so anxious to rule me out of order. My question is this. Since two ministers of the Crown yesterday did not know what I was talking about in terms of a decision of the Canadian Labour Relations Board that splits national bargaining units along linguistic lines—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Order, please.

Mr. Nowlan: The Prime Minister does not know it today and you, Mr. Speaker, do not know it today.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Order, please. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

Mr. Nowlan: Oh, no. Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: I have a supplementary to the Prime Minister on something that is so fundamental that—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nowlan: I will sit if you let me have a supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Order, please. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

Mr. Nowlan: No, no!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Nowlan: You can say oh, ho, no but I want the Speaker to tell me to sit in my place and tell me that I do not have a supplementary to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nowlan: If the Speaker says this to me I will sit in my place and then rise at three o'clock and badger this House and the Chair and the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Where is your leader?

Mr. Nowlan: Are you going to order me out?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

Mr. Nowlan: Are you prepared to tell me I do not have a supplementary to the Prime Minister?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): My question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—

Mr. Nowlan: Who is the shame? The shame is the Chair and you people.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nowlan: If he wants to carry me out he can. This place has become Mickey Mouse.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

RESOURCES

JURISDICTION OVER RESOURCES IN THE SEABED BETWEEN VANCOUVER ISLAND AND MAINLAND

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice, and since this question concerns energy, mines and resources, I direct it to that minister. Could the minister tell the House what stand the government is taking in the matter of federal-provincial jurisdiction over the waters lying between Vancouver Island and the mainland, and even more particularly over the resources on and under the seabed of those waters? Is he able to say where this matter stands before the courts? Is the government seeking yet another confrontation with yet another province?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I wish I could give the hon. member a full and detailed exposition of the position at the present time. This has been under examination by the government. As the hon. member must know, there have been discussions with the United States and with the provinces of Canada. The best I can do right now is pass on the hon. member's representations to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and draw it to his attention.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I am absolutely staggered, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): —that the minister should bring the United States and the Secretary of State for External Affairs into a matter relating to waters between Vancouver Island and the mainland. It has nothing whatever to do with the United States. I wonder how the minister can rationalize a claim by the federal government over inorganic seabed resources as well as claims over resources under the seabed in waters lying between Vancouver Island and the mainland? Does he advocate that the Island separate from the mainland in order to create an 11th province? Is that Canadian unity?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member probably understands, there have been discussions with the United States with respect to boundary questions, involving the moving of fish and involving mineral resources on the seabed.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I am talking about the waters between Vancouver Island and the mainland.

Mr. Gillespie: If I misunderstood him with respect to his question and the area he is concerned with, I apologize and will refer the question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

AIRPORTS

CALGARY—MEETINGS WITH MINISTER CONCERNING INCREASED RENTAL CHARGES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Transport arises out of the user fee or rentals to be charged at Calgary airport. Does the minister intend to intervene personally in the dispute concerning increased rental charges which MOT intends to impose on the seven airlines which will use the facilities of the airport? If so, when will he hold such meetings and with what parties?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, several persons who want the facilities at the airport have asked to see me. I have agreed to see them later this week but cannot give the hon. member the exact time.

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON ADOPTION OF ECONOMIC TARGETS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance relating to the meeting of the OECD nations in Paris. Will Canada comply with the OECD request that in future economic goals shall be established by every country in order to better control inflation and unemployment, which is what the meeting in Paris recommended?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that was not the recommendation. The hon. gentleman will see when he examines the communiqué that some countries adopted the concept of targets. I, in indicating what we see as the weakness of that particular approach, indicated we would continue the stabilization policies of the past.

Mr. Stevens: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Your leader has arrived.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, may I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Finance who just indicated that he feels the establishment of targets is not desirable for Canada. He is reported as saying that he feels such goals are not advisable because people may lose confidence in the government if the goals are not attained. Will the minister say if that is a correct report of what he said in Europe? Second, would he explain the statement more fully because, surely, if the goals are not attained that is exactly what the public should do—have no further confidence in the government?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out to the hon. gentleman previously in the debate on this question, and as I pointed out to the OECD meetings, many aspects of economic performance in Canada are going to be subject to variables which no government, irrespective of political complexion, will be able to control. Therefore to hold out to the public a pretention that, for example, the impact of increases in foreign food prices or other impacts of that kind can be controlled by the government is to create an expectation which no government can fulfil and which we think it would be unwise to hold out in the first place.

TOURISM

LIMITATION ON NUMBER OF PASSENGERS ON CHARTER FLIGHTS TO VICTORIA BECAUSE OF LACK OF CUSTOMS SERVICES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is the minister, who is supposed to be supporting tourism strongly, aware that charter flights bringing tourists from the United States to Victoria, B.C., are not permitted to bring more than 117 passengers at a time, by an edict of the customs services? One company, "Ports of Call" from Denver now flying in charter groups on Convair 190s, is being forced to turn away customers while it flies in 117 passengers and 33 empty seats on each flight. Is the minister aware that his work is being cancelled out in this fashion?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McKinnon: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister confer with the Minister of National Revenue to see if she can make additional customs officers available, and will he also confer with the Minister of Transport, to convince him that he should make space available for customs use at the airport? Perhaps he could get these two ministers to play on the same team he is on.

Mr. Chrétien: We are all playing on the same team, and all's well for the time being, Mr. Speaker.

ENERGY

REQUEST THAT NORTHERN GAS PIPELINE SERVE DAWSON REGION BEFORE UNITED STATES

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

As the prime reason invoked by the government to justify the construction of a pipeline in northern Canada to transport, eventually, Canadian gas to the southern areas of the country, as no oil company will be interested in exploration without being sure that any new gas can be brought down to markets in southern Canada, can the minister tell the House whether the government will require the Foothills consortium to commit itself to building the pipeline that will transport Canadian gas from the Mackenzie Delta to the Foothills network near Danson, when Canadian government requests it to do so, before awarding it the contract for the transportation of American oil from Alaska to southern United States?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, that important aspect of the National Energy Board's decision rendered yesterday and conveyed to the government will be examined closely in the weeks to come.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In view of the unusual circumstances which arose earlier this afternoon, perhaps hon. members will agree to ending the question period after I recognize the hon. member for St. John's East and the Leader of the Opposition.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR REPAIR OF AIR CONDITIONING SYSTEM

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. I wonder if the minister could put to use some of this country's sophisticated technology with which we can provide leadership in using nuclear energy for peaceful purposes and putting satellites in space orbit to repair the antiquated air conditioning system of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, that sounds like an excellent suggestion.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REPORTING RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN FORCE AND PROVINCES CONTRACTING FOR ITS SERVICE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. I wonder if the Solicitor General can advise the House of Commons whether he or his officials are giving consideration to a review of the reporting relationship between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and those provinces to whom their services are contracted.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, I attended a meeting of attorneys general in Ottawa last week during which I discussed that very question with various attorneys general. Some told me they were entirely satisfied with their working relationship with the force, but one or two said the relationship could be improved. I, of course, am interested in seeing working relationships with the force improve.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. A few minutes ago, we voted against the motion moved by the House Leader of the Official Opposition to extend the hours for debate on the important issue of national unity, scheduled for today and tomorrow. We were somewhat amazed on this side of the House because last week, when we attended the House leaders' meeting to discuss the hours for that debate today and tomorrow, I myself suggested that there should be a time extension in order that a larger number of members could express their views, and I also looked for assurances that at least four spokesmen for our party could rise during that important debate. We could not secure that assurance, and moreover we were not consulted later concerning the hours for today's debate. This is why we felt compelled to vote against the motion and I would take this opportunity to submit respectfully that we often experience difficulties on this side of the House in having our objections recorded to motions under Standing Order 43, while on the government side the hon. member responsible for objections simply shakes his head.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of the national unity motion put forward by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), since the Social Credit Party of Canada has suggested during House leaders' meetings that the debate should be extended by four hours in order that a larger number of members could speak on the question, and since no consultations were held with the Social Credit Party of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That this House extend the July 6 sitting from 7 to 10 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Under the guise of a question of privilege the hon. member clearly put up a question for debate in another form. This certainly is not a genuine question of privilege.

• (1510)

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to get involved in the Social Credit leadership problems or anything else. In view of the nature of the debate this afternoon, I apologize in part for perhaps over-extending some of my rhetoric. Because of the fundamental concern I have about the question, I will use the rules properly and not prolong this part of the afternoon. I will certainly put my question at ten o'clock and hopefully come back to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) tomorrow for a solution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with regard to the incompleteness of a letter tabled on June 30 by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer). It is only today that I have had the opportunity from the Chair of getting a translation of it. I believe a copy of it is available for Your Honour.

I draw Your Honour's attention to words about half way down the letter which indicate the existence of certain copies of telegrams which are "annexed to the letter". My submission is simply this. If they are annexed to the letter and accompany the letter, they are part of the letter. If they are part of the letter, they should have been tabled with the letter. I make this point now in the hope that Your Honour will take this under consideration for 24 hours during which time I hope the minister will be in a position to table those telegrams. If not, I hope Your Honour will then be in a position to order the production of those documents.

Mr. Speaker: I certainly would not want to interrupt the debate of the next two days to hear argument and try to settle a rather complex point of order of that nature. I am not clear on the precedents as to whether the requirements were adhered to in tabling the letter, whether quotations from it extend to any enclosures. I will have to examine that. Perhaps we can discuss the point on Thursday afternoon at three o'clock.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

TABLING OF LETTERS BETWEEN MINISTER AND FORCE DATED OCTOBER 11 AND 26, 1972

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table two copies of a memorandum sent by my executive assistant, on October 11, 1972, to the commissioner of the RCMP, as well as an answer to this memorandum sent to my executive assistant, on October 26, 1972, by the assistant director general of the RCMP security service.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I take it that document is in response to the second point of order raised by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath).

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In the past we have had some difficulty getting translations of some of these letters that are tabled. Certainly the point was validly raised by the hon. member opposite the other day in refusing permission to give unanimous consent to a matter that was not tabled in both official languages. May I ask if these are in both languages, and if not, why not?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, certainly to the satisfaction of the hon. member, I would tell him that the documents I tabled are copies of the original. The memorandum was drafted in English as was the answer to it, which means that the hon. member will have no problem to understand.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants) moved that the Fourth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, presented to the House on Wednesday, June 29, 1977, be concurred in.

He said: Mr. Speaker, may I tell the House very briefly the purpose of this motion. It is to provide for a lesser or smaller quorum over the summer so that we can keep up with our work, presuming we will be lucky enough to get out of here in the first place.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 1,406, 2,335, 2,558, 2,779 and 2,792.

DREE PROGRAMS IN ATLANTIC REGION

Question No. 1,406—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

1. Is DREE aware that the 1976 APEC report Industrial Incentives Programs in the Atlantic Region comments that "it is simply hard to believe that the region requires nearly 300 incentives programs"?

2. Has DREE taken any initiative to (a) coordinate (b) prevent duplication among the programs and, if so (i) in what way (ii) which programs?

3. Is DREE satisfied that there is adequate coordination among industrial incentive programs in the Atlantic region and, if not (a) for what reasons (b) which programs is DREE dissatisfied with?

4. Is DREE involved in any regular meetings which seek to coordinate two or more of the incentive programs, and is there any formal mechanism through which administrators of each program are notified of changes in other programs?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: 1. DREE is aware of this statement but its own analysis suggests that the number of financial incentive programs in direct support of industrial development in the Atlantic region is but a fraction of the stated amount.

2. As a matter of policy, DREE takes into consideration any assistance made available to applicants under the Regional Development Incentives Program by other departments, provincial governments, municipal or local bodies. This prevents duplication between programs and helps ensure that their application is coordinated. As a further coordination mechanism, larger and more complex cases are reviewed by the Incentives Advisory Board, composed of representatives of DREE and other federal departments.

3. DREE believes that the policy and procedures outlined in the above answer to question 2 provide for an adequate level of coordination with other programs available in the Atlantic region.

4. DREE is involved in regular meetings with officials of the federal Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to coordinate the application of the Program for the Advancement of Industrial Technology (PAIT), the Program to Enhance Productivity (PEP), and the Industrial Design Assistance Program with the application of the Regional Development Incentives Act (RDIA). Through such arrangements DREE is kept informed of any changes in the provisions of these programs. DREE is also involved in regular meetings of the review boards which are involved in coordinating the application of RDIA with the incentive programs that are jointly funded with the provincial governments. These jointly-funded programs include the Industrial Assistance Program and the Service Sector Assistance Program in Prince Edward Island, the Tourism Assistance Program, and the Pilot Programs in Kent county and northeastern New Brunswick in New Brunswick, and the Newfoundland and Labrador Development Corporation Limited and the Industrial Incentives Program administered by the Newfoundland and Labrador department of rural development. In addition, although it is not a jointly-funded program, DREE is represented at review meetings of the Rural Industries Program in Nova Scotia in order to coordinate the application of this program with RDIA.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES CHARGED WITH POLICY-MAKING—DEPARTMENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

Question No. 2,335—Mr. Stevens:

As of December 31 (a) 1968 (b) 1976, how many federal employees were charged with policy-making, or interpretation of policies, regulating the development and management of Indian and Northern affairs?

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Indian Affairs: (a) 1968, 24; (b) 1976, 56. Northern Affairs: (a) 1968, 39; (b) 1976, 30.

GROS MORNE PARK

Question No. 2,558—Mr. Marshall:

What projects are being carried out and/or completed (a) under the original $5.3 million provided through the Gros Morne Subsidiary Agreement (b) under the new $8 million agreement extended to March 31, 1980 including (i) a list of capital works projects to be carried out this summer (ii) highways work (iii) fishing facilities and other works?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: (a) Projects initiated under the Canada-Newfoundland Gros Morne Park Area Development Subsidiary Agreement, signed on May 28, 1974: (1) Tourism Studies; (2) Regional Planning and Land Use Studies; (3) Inshore Sports Fishing Study; (4) Rocky Harbour Water and Sewer Systems; (5) Norris Point/Neddy Harbour Water and Sewer Systems; (6) Cow Head Water and Sewer Systems; (7) Trout River Water and Sewer Systems; (8) Woody Point Water System Extension; (9) Solid Waste Disposal Study and construction: Norris Point—Rocky Harbour, Cow Head area, Woody Point area; (10) Access Road route 430 to Rocky Harbour; (11) Reconstruction and paving Norris Point to Rocky Harbour; (12) Highway 430 reconstruction St. Paul's to Shallow Bay; (13) Paving main road in Cow Head; (14) Bridge construction—Crousher's Gulch. (b) The amendment to this agreement, signed April 22, 1977, provides funding for the continuation and completion of the following projects, as originally identified by the agreement; (1) Tourism Studies; (2) Regional Planning and Land Use Studies; (3) Rocky Harbour Water and Sewer Systems; (4) Norris Point/Neddy Harbour Water and Sewer Systems; (5) Trout River Water and Sewer Systems; (6) Woody Point Water System Extension; (7) Solid Waste Disposal Study and construction: Norris Point—Rocky Harbour, Cow Head area,

Woody Point area. The Gros Morne Park Area Development Subsidiary Agreement is implemented under the direction of a federal-provincial management committee. Work to be carried out this summer will include continued activity towards completion of projects identified in section (b); in addition, the management committee will approve other projects on an on-going basis for implementation during the summer.

COST OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON WORKING CONDITIONS IN POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Question No. 2,779—Mr. Rodriguez:

What was the total cost of the Royal Commission on Working Conditions in the Post Office Department?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Total Cost: $78,960.

OPERATION FRIENDSHIP

Question No. 2,792—Mr. Marshall:

Did the Department of Veterans Affairs offer or give assistance to the various British agencies sponsoring Operation Friendship, in advising veterans who served in Britain in a military capacity, or granting special coupons offering savings on food, drink, accommodation on visiting the UK during the Royal Jubilee and (a) if so, in what manner (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): No. (b) The department was not requested to do so.

[English]

Mr. Milne: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to refer briefly, as I have on a number of occasions, to certain unanswered questions. The first are questions concerning the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and its international program service, questions Nos. 67 and 68 and questions Nos. 70 to 75 inclusive. These questions have stood on the order paper both in this session and in the last session for approximately one year. They concern matters of possible information, documented in the questions, by the Department of External Affairs for the international service of CBC. After one year and after having raised this point of order a number of times, I think I am perfectly justified in asking why on earth these answers are being hidden both from the public and from parliament.

Finally, I wish to refer to question No. 1 on the order paper which has been there since the beginning of this session. It also goes back to the last session, making a total of a little over one and a half years. The question asks for something very simple, the amount of business received since April 20, 1968, when our present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took office, up until now by William Teron or any companies with which he is associated. That man, of course, is now the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Why does it take one and a half years or more to answer this very simple question. Surely, it should not be held back because the man is head of a government corporation. It should not be held back because he is a personal friend of the Prime Minister. This is information to which this House is entitled. I feel that the parliamentary secretary or the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), who is peering through the curtains, might take notice of this fact, although I notice he is not paying much attention to what we are saying.

Mr. MacFarlane: Does anybody?

Mr. Cossitt: It is obvious that those on the other side never pay much attention to anything. It is about time that someone in authority in the government did. If the ministers will not do that, the Prime Minister should. He supposedly has supreme authority in this country. He should tell these departments to answer the questions on the order paper and not stall with regard to giving information asked for by members of parliament on behalf of Canadian people for a year and a half and goodness knows how much longer. Perhaps the Prime Minister would like to reply to this point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CONFEDERATION

DEBATE ON NATIONAL UNITY

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister) moved:

That members of this House dedicate themselves anew to the continuing unity of Canada as a free and independent country organized on the basis of a federal form of government with two official languages and a diversity of cultures.

He said: Mr. Speaker, whether one looks at the present world or back upon past history, one finds that the great eras of all peoples are always full of appeals to build or save the nation. We, Canadians, are now addressing ourselves to both tasks at the same time. We must build as well as preserve our country, and this twofold task, seldom seen in the life of nations, draws today public attention to the House and to this debate which I have the privilege to open.

But why such a debate, you will ask? Certainly not because we are divided on the issue of national unity. This country's unity has been the primary purpose of every Parliament, every government since Confederation. The national unity concept is not linked to any government nor any party in particular. I am confident that all hon. members will not allow anybody to question Canadian unity. However, I am aware of the fact that some members of Parliament as well as many Canadians have a feeling of frustration for not doing anything under the circumstances. They realize something is threatening their country and they wish to protect it. They want to participate, help, do something and they are wondering: What can I do to help preserve my country's unity? Let me know and I shall do it. This is how their frustrations, their uncertainty and possibly their concerns are expressed.

Because I understand these feelings and hope to mitigate them, I shall not deal too much today with our purposes, since we basically agree on those. Instead, I shall insist on the progress achieved by Canadians and on the new measures the government is implementing so that Canadians may commit themselves even more to national unity.

● (1520)

[English]

Before looking down the roads immediately ahead, Mr. Speaker, let us briefly assess those roads which Canadians and all their governments have taken—and not taken—in the seven months past. Since November 15, Canadians have been confronted with the most dramatic choice they have had to make in their history as a nation. And in these seven months, we've come a long way toward that choice. We've made news in Canada—and much of it, Mr. Speaker, has been good news.

Good news, as those sitting in the press gallery know, is very often what doesn't happen. Like the good news that Canadians did not panic; that their governments did not become paralyzed; that the country did not, as it might have, become caught in an upward spiral of racial or regional hostility. That has been very good news indeed.

But perhaps the best news of all, is what did happen. Slowly, with understandable hesitation, millions of Canadians have come to accept the choices which we now face as an unparalleled—and perhaps even overdue—opportunity: to shape for ourselves, with our own hands, a Canada that is more truly ours, more truly itself.

My paramount goal in these past six months has been to help Canadians to define the decisions they now must make. I have told Quebeckers that finally they will actually have to choose whether they want to remain, or not to remain, Canadians as well as Quebeckers. And the fact this choice finally must be made, and not perpetually talked about only, is a good thing for Quebeckers. And for the whole country.

But non-Quebeckers will strongly influence the decision that Quebec has to make. That is why I have been telling non-Quebeckers that they themselves face a fundamental choice as well. Fundamental—though unfortunately not as simple as marking a ballot "yes" or "no". The choice is this: Do you, or do you not, want to live in a Canada with a French-speaking community—now of six million people—who have spoken French for nearly four centuries; who will continue to speak French; and who will continue to live as a community? Because if you do, if English-speaking Canadians accept to have a Canada—with all its solitudes and heartbreaks and misunderstandings, and yes, with all its glorious human wealth, enough to stretch to a limitless future—if you want to have such a Canada, it will have to be a Canada based on genuine acceptance of a newly dynamic, competitive and self-assertive French-speaking community, centered on but not confined to Quebec.

To choose such a Canada does not mean that everyone will have to speak French. It does not even mean that everyone must love eating their corn flakes out of those famous bilingual cereal boxes. Quite frankly, it means something far more difficult than that. It means that English-speaking Canadians will have to open their hearts, to open their minds, in order to understand that French Canadians still do not feel treated as fully equal partners in their own country, or even in the province where they form a majority.

And it means that if the Francophones are to remain part of this country as first-class citizens with a fair share of the power and a fair crack at the opportunity; but without having to give up their language and culture then this will require certain accommodations by the English-speaking majority, accommodations like sharing more power with French Canadians in business, professions and private organizations; like greater willingness on the part of provincial governments, and local communities and school boards to provide for French-speaking minorities.

And greater acceptance for language equality in federal institutions. So French as well as English-speaking Canadians can say: "This is our government. It speaks our language. And all of Canada is our country. We can grow here."

So it has been my first priority since November 15 to tell these things to Canadians, because these are among the crucial choices they now face. Another priority as a Government since November 15 has been to make continued progress on two essential fronts. The first, as I have just indicated, is our official languages policy.

[Translation]

Thanks to the support of all parties in this House and the cooperation of federal civil servants, for some years the government of Canada has been increasingly capable of providing services to its citizens in their own language and to enable more French Canadians to work in the federal public service. The proportion of Francophone civil servants has now reached 26.9 per cent, that is about the same percentage as the French-speaking population of Canada. In the administrative category, the French-speaking proportion has risen from 13.4 per cent in 1971 to 19.7 per cent now. Similar progress has also taken place in the armed forces, and the French presence has increased throughout the country, thanks to the radio and TV networks.

This evolution took place without any prejudice to the rights of English Canadians to speak and hear English spoken, to prosper and find success in life in their language. Conversely, the recognition of the two official languages in no way meant the setting up of two official cultures, one English the other French.

The men and women who built Canada belonged to different cultures, and we want to preserve this diversity. Our policy aims at promoting a strongly multicultural Canada, a Canada where everybody is a first class citizen. Why then have English and French as the official languages? Because almost all Canadians, whatever their cultural backgrounds, speak either one of these two languages; and because nearly one Canadian out of five, approximately 18 per cent, Mr. Speaker, speaks only French.

In view of the progress accomplished in federal institutions the government thinks that from now on it is not only possible but desirable to enter into a new phase of our linguistic policy, a stage in which the emphasis will be less and less on crash language courses for civil servants and increasingly on the teaching of the two official languages to the children in schools—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, of course the implementation of the language policy has given rise to certain mistakes and certain problems, but the government wants to correct the situation. The government has just tabled a working paper on the official languages. This paper shows clearly that the equality between the two official languages of Canada is not the responsibility of the public service alone, or even of the federal government alone. Moreover, the language issue is not restricted to Quebec and a few square miles more on this side of the Ottawa River. The language issue, as I believe that an increasing number of Canadians have come to realize in the last few years, is national in scope. Since the election of a separatist government in Quebec, it has become more obvious that the manner in which we will solve the language problem will have far-reaching consequences for all Canadians and the future of our children.

Our paper shows clearly that the provinces will have an important role to play in solving language problems, because under our federal system, they have many responsibilities in this area, especially as concerns education. But, in the long run, it will be the Canadian citizen and his attitude towards the linguistic equality of his fellow citizens that will be the decisive factor.

● (1530)

[English]

Today I wish only to call the House's attention to what the policy paper says about one subject, about Canada's official language minorities, that is, the one million or so French-speaking Canadians living in the nine provinces with Anglophone majorities and the somewhat smaller number of English-speaking Canadians living in Quebec.

Why do I single out our official language minorities today? Quite simply, Mr. Speaker, because there are two roads to separation in this country—two dangers we must avoid if we want to preserve the unity of Canada. The first danger would result if a clear majority of Quebeckers were to become so dissatisfied with their present lot and future prospects as Canadians that they freely voted by a clear majority to separate. But, there is a second way which is perhaps more dangerous and certainly more insidious, that separation could occur over a longer period of time perhaps, but with equal finality. That is the separation by attrition which would eventually result if we were to drift progressively into a Canada composed of two linguistically distinct territories: a Quebec, speaking only French; and the rest of Canada, speaking only English. To some that might superficially seem a functional, friction-free solution to our language problems, but it would not be a solution at all. It would weaken Canada; it would give us less and less in common; it would one day break us apart. A Canada of two language ghettos existing side by side is not acceptable to this government nor, I believe, to this House.

The federal government believes that the 1971 Victoria Charter proposals for language guarantees in provincial legislatures, provincial courts and provincial government head offices would provide a good departure point for building a sound constitutional base for minority rights. The federal government is also ready to discuss with the provinces ways in which it can assist them to provide more education in the minority official language. We are willing to consider ways and means, up to and including new constitutional provisions, to enable the federal government to assume direct constitutional responsibility for education of official language minority groups.

To be sure, I agree wholeheartedly with the proposition that the level of rights the nine other provinces accord their linguistic minorities should more closely resemble the level of rights Quebec has traditionally accorded its official language minority. But, I say this should be accomplished by building up French in the other provinces and not by knocking down English in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot emphasize strongly enough that the question of unity is not confined to the issue of language, nor confined geographically to the province of Quebec. I said earlier that more linguistic equality for French-speaking Canadians will require certain accommodations by English-speaking Canadians. But, why should English-speaking Canadians make such accommodations? Frankly, they will do so only if they feel that confederation is worth it to them and only if they feel that they too are benefitting from the federal system and that is it meeting their aspirations.

In the case of most English-speaking Canadians, this feeling has less to do with language programs than with how successfully we fight inflation and high unemployment; with the quality of our social programs, with transportation and resource development and with many other policies. The Altantic region must feel we are making progress in overcoming stubborn regional economic disparities; that we are helping to develop to the fullest offshore resources; and assisting to control the inequities of high energy costs. The westerner must have, and feel he has, a greater voice in national decision-making and a greater role in national power-sharing; must feel that our transportation system will take better account of the need for an equitable freight rate structure and efficient movement of agricultural commodities; and that our international trade negotiators are making every reasonable effort to favor more processed exports. For that matter, the Quebecker will judge his federal government not only by whether it speaks two languages, but also by how well it meets his other concerns as a worker, a farmer or a businessman.

[Translation]

Therefore, the second front on which it is imperative to act is to ensure that the federal system better meets the needs of the average Canadian, whether he lives in Quebec or any other part of this country. The unity of this country will be improved when every Canadian, no matter where he lives or what his language is, will be able to say: "Those people in parliament are working for me, they are looking after my problems. They are preparing a better future for my children here in Canada in this united country that is mine."

And that is why, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the best service a member of parliament can do his country is to ensure that his constituents realize that that hon. member is truly vital to their development, their fulfillment, so that the citizens in every part of this country will be able to recognize through their federal member of parliament that they are effectively being run by the government of Canada, that their government is not only the provincial government which is a provincial level government but that their government is first and above all the government of Canada, the government of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted quite modestly to congratulate the members of this House who for the most part play this role with great courage in a vast country and who because of their very heavy program in Ottawa cannot be in every area and every constituency as much as they would want to.

● (1540)

[English]

I might add, Mr. Speaker, that over the months I have written to the provincial premiers to seek from them an understanding whereby the taxpayers of Canada would be in a position to know which government was spending their money. Thus they could democratically decide whether the spending was well or not well done. To this effect, I am seeking agreements between the federal government and every provincial government in order to give sufficient knowledge to the citizen, through publicity and other means, so that he would know where the money is coming from, either from the federal government or elsewhere.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: We have already signed such an agreement with the province of Manitoba; and I hope that other provincial governments who are anxious to work and build for the unity of Canada will also be anxious to make sure that in this way the federal presence, the reality of the federal parliament, be made known in every part of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I just pointed out how important it is for the unity of this country to look properly after the business of this country. But it does not mean that I am for the status quo—far from it. As I stated unequivocally on several occasions, the government of Canada is committed to considering together with the people of Canada the possibility of bringing in basic in-depth changes to its directions, to federal institutions and to the constitution. It is to this matter of utmost importance that I now come.

We Canadians have reached our maturity as North American people. We do not alter our institutions or our constitution under the whim of the moment, as the Parisian designer who is eager to launch his new spring collection. We must get used to the idea that we have launched into a venture which will not end in a few weeks or months. The main reason is that no change, no redistribution of powers between the federal government and the provinces, nor any other step could reinforce national unity, unless those changes really derive from understanding and brotherhood.

This is why, though specific proposals for institutional changes will be effective at a given moment, my first concern since November 15 has been to help Canadians reconsider their behaviour, analyze their feelings and face the decisions and the direction that will soon have to be taken with openness and generosity but also with deeply felt honesty. Indeed I have been able to see that it is exactly what some Canadians have already begun to do.

[English]

Since November 15 millions of Canadians, English and French speaking, easterners and westerners, people from southern Canada and from northern Canada, have not only been awakening to the realities of Canada; what is even better, they have embraced the present situation not as a defeat for Canada but as a great challenge, a great opportunity for building a better Canada, not only for Quebeckers but for all of us.

To those who are impatient, I say this is a great deal of progress for the country to have made in seven months. To those who are uncertain or worried, I would report that I have heard more constructive, stimulating thinking about Canada by ordinary Canadians in these past seven months than in all the rest of my life. So in a sense, Mr. Speaker, we are coming at last face to face with our national summons, the task of nation building and nation saving.

Because Canadians are accepting this challenge, I believe that we can now begin to enter a new phase of discussion, of choice, a new phase in the examination of fundamental change in our Canadian system of federalism. This fact was underlined by our recent appointment of the former deputy minister of justice as the government's special constitutional adviser. We have already begun a far-reaching review of our federal system and constitution. We will, of course, also pay close attention to the views of the provincial premiers. As my letter to them last January said, we are quite willing to discuss with the premiers the whole gamut of Canada's constitutional arrangements. We are willing to discuss, in other words, the most profound reforms and fundamental changes in any and all aspects of our federal system from A to Z.

In fact, there is only one set of formulae which we are not willing to discuss—those which commence from the premise that Canada is or could be anything other than a unified country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: During the crucial months ahead we will need wide input, wide involvement, by the people of Canada. The debate on fundamental change must not be confined to closed rooms, or to privileged elites, whether of politicians or bureaucrats, or of academics or intellectuals, though all these people have much to contribute. The government wishes to enable individual Canadians and their non-governmental organizations to play a more informed role in the national re-examination of the federal system, as well as to participate more effectively in other activities favouring the enhancement of Canadian unity.

[Translation]

In the last few months, and I am very proud to say so, the groups and individuals who have expressed their wish to do their part are so numerous that it is difficult to count them, let alone meet them. To be efficient, these private organizations sometimes need information and support services; they should also, if necessary, have the benefit of advice. On the other hand, the great majority of Canadians express their views and are being influenced by others by way of a wider and more diffuse forum than by the established structures, namely public opinion. That is why the government believes it is necessary to offer people a new way to participate, through groups of men and women who would focus attention on new ideas and different points of view while listening very carefully to what the public has to say. Thus, all Canadians, and not only a small number, would be better informed and in a position to play a more decisive role.

[English]

I have decided to entrust this work to a new national task force on Canadian unity, which will serve for an initial period of one year. The mandate of the task force will be to support, encourage and publicize the efforts of the general public, and particularly of non-governmental organizations, to enhance Canadian unity; to contribute to the knowledge and general awareness of the public its own initiatives and views concerning Canadian unity; and to help to develop processes for strengthening Canadian unity and provide a source of advice to the government on unity issues.

I am delighted to announce that the Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin, whom the House will presently recognize sitting in Your Honour's gallery—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —and the Hon. John Robarts—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1550)

Mr. Trudeau: —have agreed to serve as co-chairmen of the task force on Canadian unity. Mr. Pepin and Mr. Robarts have already given so much to their country. Both of them have just completed important public tasks, Mr. Pepin at the Anti-Inflation Board, Mr. Robarts in his study of metro government in Toronto. The fact that they have agreed to head the task force on Canadian unity so soon afterwards is a testimony to their dedication to public affairs and to their country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I am glad to see that the whole House joins me in paying tribute to their dedication. I am also delighted that four other distinguished Canadians will serve as regional members of the task force—Mr. Richard Cashin of St. John's, Newfoundland—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —Dr. John Evans of Toronto—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —Mrs. Muriel Kovitz of Calgary—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —and Mayor Ross Marks of Hundred Mile House, B.C.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I want to add that a fifth regional member, a French speaking Quebecker, will be added to this list very soon.

An hon. Member: Will it be René?

Mr. Trudeau: I will be happy to have any suggestions made the the leader of the NDP, but he would have to be quick because we expect to name this person very soon.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the privilege of opening this debate. I should add that I will have to leave tomorrow before it is concluded to meet Chancellor Schmidt of Germany who is arriving in Canada through Vancouver. I apologize to hon. members for not being here to hear every one of them speak in this debate—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —but members will understand that the debate was postponed from last week to this week for the convenience of some members of the House.

Mr. Alexander: You can always read Hansard.

Mr. Trudeau: I will read Hansard, as the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) knows I do with passion and regularity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: It is a debate in which we above all wish to hear the ideas, and perhaps the visions, which inspire private members of the House on both sides. For this reason—and also because of my own views about Canada's unity are familiar to the House—I thought it would be appropriate if instead of "orating" I gave the House a report on the priorities which the government has followed since November 15, as well as the new means it is providing to enhance the national debate Canadians will carry on in the months ahead.

But let us make no mistake about it, Mr. Speaker. In this House and in every province in this country we are fighting to preserve a great and precious country. The most effective weapon we have is understanding. Debates, task forces, language programs, constitutional proposals—all these will be to little avail unless we have the ability to summon understanding and generosity towards each other's aspirations, as individuals, as members of cultural and regional communities—and as Canadians.

That is the message I have sought to carry these past six months. That is the message which hon. members must carry this summer at every opportunity and to every part of the country, to all our constituencies, to the service clubs, to church halls and legion halls, to the farms, factories and street corners, the message that Canada will not be fractured, the message that we will preserve the unity of this nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I know that the task for Canada will not be easy, but was it easy for the Canadians who settled a sometimes harsh land? Was it easy for the Fathers of Confederation or for the early explorers who penetrated to all corners of this unknown continent? No, the task of creating and recreating Canada has never been easy. But now the task is ours, and the task shall be accomplished.

After all, the odds were much greater against those earlier Canadians who built from scrach this unexpected and even unlikely nation, a nation which, politically, socially and economically, is now one of the freest and most advanced in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Where they built with their hands and their heads, conquering nature, devising vast transportation systems, we must now build with our hearts. We must now decide how we want to live together and better govern ourselves so that our children may live in a Canada which is truly united and truly itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Alexander.]

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I want to say first of all to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in light of his very glowing references to the role and the importance of individual members of parliament and the job we have to do that, if I might presume to speak on behalf of the other refurbished "nobodies" in the House of Commons, we appreciate his new recognition of our status and our role—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: We're somebodies now.

Mr. Clark: —and we intend to give him and his colleagues an opportunity to put their faith in parliament to work a little later.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Naturally, I welcome this debate which my colleagues and I have sought for a long time. The Prime Minister spoke about good news and bad news, and clearly one of the pieces of bad news is that this debate in the only forum which can serve to unite this country has been so long in coming.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I am pleased that we have been able to get a little more time. But still the debate is too brief, the resolution is too limited and the scheduling of this debate, on a summer day after we were supposed to have risen, is far too late in terms of the importance of the subject which we are discussing today. I want to say to the Prime Minister that this should have been the first place to which he came to discuss national unity, not somewhere else. I suggest to him that more Canadians would read Hansard with "passion" if there was an opportunity for this House to become engaged, at a critical time, in debates of urgent importance to the country and not be cast off as a group of nobodies.

● (1600)

This parliament must play a continuing, creative role in helping work out the problems which face the country. I shall be proposing an amendment at the end of my remarks to allow parliament to play precisely that role in advancing and maintaining the unity of the country.

The Prime Minister's speech was too limited by his preoccupation with language policy as a means to resolve the basic problems facing this country. I heard the Prime Minister speak about the importance of other issues, as I have heard him speak before and as I have seen in his recent writings. But the fact remains that language policy has been the preoccupation of this Prime Minister and of this government too exclusively. This has created some of the serious problems which exist in this country, because we have failed to assign the same priority to questions such as regional disparity and western alienation as we have assigned to the Prime Minister's particular approach to language policy.

Most serious of all is the fact that this debate comes too late and this sign of some action by the Prime Minister comes too late. The election, in the province of Quebec, of a Parti Québécois government was nearly eight months ago, and today is the first time the government has brought this question to the House of Commons. As the Prime Minister said, he has taken other actions. He has established a secretariat. There have been some television spectaculars. On the lawns of Parliament Hill the other day there was a $3.5 million birthday party.

Mr. MacFarlane: I thought it was great, and so did everybody else.

Mr. Clark: The question is not whether the whip of the government party had fun; the question is whether that event helped to unify Canadians and whether it will have any lasting effect. By way of action there has also been a statement by the government on language rights, a statement which, depending on whom we listen to and when we hear him, might be federal policy or might not be federal policy. The statement was one upon which, in any event, only the provinces can act. Only the provinces can implement some of the measures suggested in that statement.

My colleagues and I applauded the Prime Minister when he said that the better way to deal with the question of minority language rights in the country is to build up the rights of French-speaking Canadians in other parts of Canada, rather than break down the rights of English-speaking Canadians in the province of Quebec. We agree with that, but we think it probably would have been of more comfort to those Canadians who are most acutely concerned now about their status—the English language minority in the province of Quebec—if the Prime Minister had given at least the minimum guarantee that I have given and that others have given, that if there is a violation by any legislation in the province of Quebec of the constitutional rights of the English language minority, that question will go to the courts of the land.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Now we have a blue-ribbon inquiry—a task force. I want to take this opportunity publicly and early not simply to express my appreciation to the distinguished Canadians who have agreed to serve on this task force, but also to wish them well in the efforts they are undertaking. What concerns me is not the personnel of this task force, but the idea that a new means was necessary when a traditional means exists and is underused, to wit, the parliament of Canada. The Canadians appointed to this task force are distinguished. They have had excellent careers in the public service at various levels in Canada, but with the exception of the mayor of Hundred Mile House none of them is an elected person. They are given a mandate to report, not to this parliament but only to the government of Canada, which can hide, doctor or do nothing at all with the recommendations they bring in.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Clark: The terms of reference which have been accorded them are terms of reference which we will want to examine in some detail to ensure that this task force is allowed the largest amplitude to study all of the questions which pertain to national unity, and not simply those questions which the Prime Minister, during his career in this House and before, has felt have been at the centre of national unity.

During the past eight months of relative inactivity by the Prime Minister of Canada, it is important to note that the premier of Quebec, Mr. René Lévesque, has not been at all so reticent. Nor, in all modesty, have I or have the leaders of other parties in the House of Commons been reticent in terms of putting forward some of the specific changes we think must be contemplated in developing a new and viable federalism. However, we are only opposition parties. We are only members of an unconsulted parliament. We have the opportunity to propose, but we do not have the opportunity to act. Only governments have the power to act, and some governments have acted. The government of the province of New Brunswick, three days ago, proclaimed the last sections of an official languages act for that province.

The government of the province of Ontario, with the cooperation of all the parties in the provincial legislature, has accepted its moral obligation to the French-speaking citizens of Essex county and it has begun, in an effective way, a public discussion of some of the problems we are facing. The province of Quebec has certainly been acting. It has been acting with Bill No. 1 which is not the subject of hearings and is going before a committee. The government of Quebec has been acting with Bill No. 2 which will affect the conduct of the referendum when it comes. Most importantly, it has been acting with a relentless campaign of propaganda designed to shift the burden of proof to the federalists from the separatists, where the burden of proof belongs in this case.

Putting aside all the television spectaculars, the fact remains that in the months since the November 15 election the Prime Minister of Canada has failed to exercise the leadership that is his.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That is what the polls show, is it?

Mr. Clark: He has failed to call upon parliament to help him, although we want to help him and although we can.

Mr. Pelletier: You don't want to help him.

Mr. Clark: I assume that the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) has enough influence in his caucus to be able to get on the speakers' list for this debate, and I look forward to hearing him. The Prime Minister has failed to call upon the premiers of the provinces of Canada to help him, although they want to help him and although they could help him in this present crisis.

An hon. Member: He needs help.

● (1610)

Mr. Clark: I make it clear to the House that had that responsibility been mine and had I been prime minister of Canada during those days, one of my first acts would have been to seek the advice of parliament and then call together the premiers of Canada, the partners in this federal system of ours. If the premier of Quebec had not come to the first meeting, I am sure that after we made progress in that first meeting he would either have come to the subsequent meetings or suffered the consequences of abstention—the consequences that would be visited upon him by the electorate in the province of Quebec.

The sad fact is that the Prime Minister of Canada has not taken initiatives on behalf of Canada in this debate. Instead, he made one speech in Quebec City proposing to start from scratch; then under questioning he refused to say exactly what "scratch" was. Later, in March of this year, he said to the government of Quebec:

[Translation]

"Your turn, gentlemen!"

[English]

He invited the separatist government to take the initiative in redefining confederation. Mr. Speaker, they are doing that with a vengeance. They are doing that whilst this government sets up task forces. I can think of nothing more absurd than to ask a government that wants to divide this country to set the ground rules for uniting this country. If the Prime Minister had called in the premiers, or if he had consulted parliament, he would know that the problems of Canada are much broader than language, much broader than discontent in the province of Quebec. Any comprehensive program to create a sense of community in this country must look to other real problems as well.

First, we have to look to the problems of the economy because we are living now in an economy and a country that is operating very far below its potential. As well as creating unemployment, including unemployment in the constituency of the loud-voiced member from New Brunswick opposite—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: As well as creating unemployment, this economic slowdown has created serious discontent amongst people in Canada, some of whom voted against the federal system on November 15. There is no question at all that a weak economy stimulates division, and there is no question, by contrast, that a strong economy can let us build together toward common goals. If we are seriously concerned about uniting this country, that fact has to be a priority of any government of Canada.

The second fact is that there are serious regional disparities in this country which remain unresolved after a decade of government by the party opposite. In Atlantic Canada, despite the existence of DREE, the economy continues to lag because Atlantic development has been given none of the priority that language development has been given in this country. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion is now a second-fiddle ministry overruled by stronger departments.

The best recent example of this is the shocking announcement made by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) that in 1976-77 the two major categories of government purchasing by the government of Canada—the purchasing for science and engineering and the purchasing for commercial supply—saw a marked decrease. In the case of commercial supply, purchases made from Atlantic Canada were cut in half. On the one hand, this government, dedicated through a department to regional economic expansion, was working through a stronger department to take away the economic means which would make that expansion possible.

In Western Canada there is a sense of grievance which grows over the fact that so little priority has been given to changes in freight rates, tariff policy and industrial development which could let that region realize its potential. The Prime Minister talks about those things now, as he talked about them when he was in trouble in the election period and at the WEOC conference. It has all been talk, however. The priority has not been given to the development of western Canada that has been given by this government to pushing their own particular language policy.

The point I want to make is that these grievances, these problems, are as real and as much a potential source of disunity as are the concerns in Quebec about the security of the Quebecois culture. Regrettably, through nearly a decade in office this government has virtually ignored these other priorities and has created in most of the country a sense that the government will not respond to their real problems.

The motion before the House reads as follows:

> That members of this House dedicate themselves anew to the continuing unity of Canada as a free and independent country organized on the basis of a federal form of government with two official languages and a diversity of cultures.

This is the third time in eight years that the present government has asked parliament to reaffirm the linguistic and cultural diversity that is a fact of life in our country. I have no objection to that in itself. But a statement about languages and cultures, or a statement about "a federal form of government" is completely inadequate to define what Canada is and what Canada means to our people. Implicit in the resolution and in the basic approach of this government for the past nine years is the concept that language and language policy will unify Canadians. In that respect the Prime Minister could not be more wrong.

In recent weeks we have had a spate of television advertisements celebrating our sense of Expo, our sense of centennial. We can all remember that atmosphere. There was a spontaneous enthusiasm about our future which was far removed from the forced gaiety which marked our approach to our one hundred and tenth birthday. We have fallen a long way back since 1967. We are, as a nation, much less united now than when this government came to office on a promise of unity. If we are serious about bringing the country together and establishing real harmony which lasts longer than a birthday party, we must examine exactly what went wrong. To use the Prime Minister's words, we must "open our minds".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Perhaps there are members on the other side who can open their minds and their mouths at the same time, Mr. Speaker, but I would feel more confident that my message was getting through if they would allow me to express it. My message, and I say this in utmost seriousness, is this: We must be prepared to examine and change policies and approaches which have not worked, even if that means changing attitudes which some, including the Prime Minister, have come to regard as articles of faith.

● (1620)

I want to deal for a moment with the question of the official languages policy of the country. It behooves all of us who want an effective policy which will contribute to the unity of the country to be frank and honest about what we face. Of course, it has never been in question that we must have institutional bilingualism as a matter of justice and fairness in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Sir, I would appreciate the opportunity of being heard by some of my colleagues opposite. Perhaps those in the Liberal caucus who are not accustomed to hearing conflicting views might show us the courtesy of listening to them.

An hon. Member: Is there no conflict on your side?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, bilingualism, or having two languages, by definition does not unite. It divides. It is a necessary goal, but it is not the glue: bilingualism is not the glue which will hold this country together.

An hon. Member: Crazy glue.

Mr. Clark: I say to my colleagues in the House of Commons, we must accept that fact realistically. We must recognize the importance of that policy, but we must look beyond the differences of language and culture for the values and goals which will draw us together as Canadians. We must seek to build Canadian unity, not on the basis of bilingualism or of language differences but despite bilingualism, which is an important, continuing part of the policy of this land.

Sir, let us examine this question calmly and carefully. Making our federal institutions bilingual is clearly, as anyone can see who would look, a source of serious problems in the country. The implementation of the program has in some ways been a disaster, including a disaster to good will. It has been dangerous and difficult, particularly in its effect on morale in the public service. Equally serious—and I underline this to Canadians in the House of Commons who may not have had the experience and opportunity I have had to travel extensively in provinces other than Quebec—is the fact that the many English Canadians whose inclination had been to accept this policy are now becoming disillusioned and resentful about it. The reason is that so little progress has been made in the teaching of French as a second language and so little sensitivity shown in the development of the official languages policy in this country.

I come to the question of schools. Children go through their provincial school systems without acquiring a working knowledge of French. Their parents know this is going to be a handicap to them. French is becoming not just an asset but a necessity for those seeking opportunity to progress fully in the federal public service. At the moment, that fact, unfortunately, is seen in two-thirds of the country not as an opportunity, but as a barrier to opportunity. For the Prime Minister to go to Saskatchewan, or anywhere else in Canada, and tell his audience they do not have to worry about learning to speak French does not, in that context, accord with reality as those parents see it or as seen through the eyes of parents looking to the future of their children.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Government hypocrisy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I understand, sir, that there are some members on the other side of the House who would sooner not hear this truth. But it is important that the House of Commons should be a place where truth can be spoken, no matter how unpopular it may be.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I say the Prime Minister and government should not underestimate the resentment which exists in the country on that account. The policy of institutional bilingualism, essential as it is, will collapse unless the federal government provides the help, financial and otherwise, which will enable the provinces to produce bilingual people for bilingual federal institutions. The programs so far introduced by the federal government are hopelessly inadequate, given the size of the task. If the government does not act soon to make up for lost time, offer to the provinces encouragement, opportunity to parents who want to support the program and only ask that their children should be equipped to take part in it, the divisions in this country which the language policy has created will become too deep to heal.

We must also face the fact that increased use of French outside Quebec is, in itself, no answer to the problem in Quebec. Teaching French as a second language to English-speaking children is enriching for them and irrelevant to most Quebeckers. Providing education in their own language to French-speaking minorities is beyond the power of the federal government, as everybody in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada knows. At the moment, and for the foreseeable future, that problem is beyond solution by way of constitutional reform. The right of French Canadians to education in their own language may have existed once, but it was taken away by provincial legislation. It exists now in New Brunswick and there have been some changes in Ontario and Manitoba in recent years. But to speak of the right to French-language education outside Quebec as if it now exists is, for the most part, misleading.

[Translation]

Quebeckers perceive this aspect of Canadian reality under its true light and it would be very vain to try to convince them that it is otherwise. If they have doubts about the future of their language and their culture within the boundaries of their province, they do know that their National Assembly, which represents a population more than 80 per cent French-speaking, will always be much more conscious and more capable to act to preserve the French language and culture than any other legislature, including the Parliament of Canada. To admit it is to acknowledge the evidence.

For some years the federal government has made a mistake trying to compete on that level with the Quebec government. Ottawa should have recognized that the Quebec government is the most able to preserve and promote the French language within the limits of that province. It is not without reason that our constitution has given to the provinces, with special reference to Quebec, all the powers which were available and which were then considered necessary, so that they could assume their responsibilities over all cultural questions. However, as new communications and cultural means developed, Ottawa has always refused to adjust, therefore to conclude arrangements within the spirit of the constitution. In fact, Ottawa has appropriated all powers and it has constantly undermined the undeniable rights of provinces in cultural areas. This trend will have to be changed and the sooner the better.

[English]

Sir, I ask the House of Commons, is it going to wreck the country if Saskatchewan gains some say in cablevision, or if Quebec does? Is it going to wreck the country if Alberta gets into pay television, or if the governments of the provinces are able to run non-commercial television free of the regulatory shackles the federal government has put on them? Of course it is not. Yet this is what we are led to believe by the federal government and all its creatures. The central government should rid itself of the idea that it should enjoy exclusive authority over culture in any respect. The federal government must be prepared to share jurisdiction in those areas.

● (1630)

To say, as the Prime Minister does, that they should cut both ways, that the provinces should share their jurisdiction with Ottawa, is hardly relevant since Ottawa has already bought its way into every field imaginable. There is hardly a field where the provinces enjoy apparently exclusive jurisdiction which the federal government has not bought into at some time over the past few years. If we are going to have a truth in labelling provision in terms of federal expenditures, as the Prime Minister was talking about, it might be useful for that label to include a designation of those programs which the provinces were forced to accept by Ottawa at disruption of their own priorities.

If November 15 had never happened, I would be arguing here for a more regionally-based federalism. I advocated such an approach to our country's problems well before my election as leader of this party. The country is too big to be run entirely out of Ottawa. That is why we have a federal system, to combine a strong centre with strong parts. Precisely because they are closer to people, provincial governments are better able to respond to needs that differ in different parts of Canada. We could go through a long list indicating the truth of that statement.

What is at issue here is not just the future of one province, but the concept of our whole, large country. Of course we need a strong central government to establish economic policy and to meet other common needs. But we also need strong provincial governments, strong local governments and a strong private sector to meet needs and develop potentials that are not common across Canada. We are an uncommon country. We differ from place to place, from person to person.

The danger with national institutions is that they can become so centralized, so standardized, that they ignore or diminish the differences which give life to this country. We see that in the CBC which periodically must be wrenched back to the regional realities of Canada. We see it in the determination, until recently, to pretend that unemployment is the same problem in Alberta as it is in Newfoundland. We see it in too many other ways. What we must do is develop a situation in which it is possible for strong provincial governments to do what they do best, and possible for a strong federal government to do what it must do. It should be in that spirit that we approach the problem of redefining our constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: My time is running out.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Clark: Since there is a limitation in this debate, I do not want to intrude upon the time of private members of parliament by speaking at any greater length. I want to make the point that we have a possibility within this country. It has been demonstrated by the premiers of several of the provinces by their disposition and by their approach to federal-provincial affairs. We have the capacity in this country to achieve a number of changes by administrative arrangement now, without having to wait for constitutional change. That could be done tomorrow if there were an accord on the part of the Prime Minister of Canada and the premiers of the provinces to do so.

I make the point that while none of us would accept the idea of a constitutional special status, it has been the long-established principle of this country that it is possible for different provinces to have different administrative arrangements with the government of Canada. That is a field we should be examining much more carefully as we look for ways to make our federal system serve the needs of this country right now. That is essential, not simply to make the system work but to make it seem to work to those Canadians who now have some doubts. We federalists have to cause Quebeckers to understand that their choice, as they go to referendum, is not between their perception of the status quo and the Péquiste formula. We have to make it clear that the choice is between what we, as supporters of confederation, advocate in Canada, and the changes that the Péquistes advocate which would take Quebec out of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: As an excuse for not offering positive proposals for change, the Prime Minister has been saying over and over again that no proposal for evolution within confederation is going to change Mr. René Lévesque's mind. Of course not. We are not trying to change Mr. Lévesque's mind. We are, surely, trying to persuade the people of Quebec that the arrangements and relationships within confederation can evolve to meet the cultural and regional needs of all the partners. The only convincing way to do that is for this government to enlist parliament and the provinces in developing that approach. In Quebec, especially, the approach must be seen as representing the views not only of the federal government but of all the other provinces. Beyond the present constitution, beyond the Quebec referendum, lies the need to commit ourselves and address ourselves again to the task of constitutional change. As I have said, there are other changes that we can make without having to contemplate constitutional change. Constitutional change is only part of the answer, as institutional bilingualism is only part of the answer. Both are necessary to demonstrate to unhappy federalists everywhere that this system is capable of change, that there is a choice between separatism and the status quo.

We must recognize that it will not be laws that bring us together. As we have seen, unhappily, with the insensitive application of the Official Languages Act and the strange rigidity of the government on constitutional change, laws and legal questions can often drive people apart. What we had in 1967, what we had in 1867, was a determination to build together that did not rely on laws. We all came into this confederation because it served our interests. There is no question in my mind that we are all better off as citizens of a large land, full of potential; no question that it is in the interest of Quebeckers to share in the development of the Athabasca oil sands, and in the interest of Albertans to share in the growth generated at James Bay. We have here a potential to grow that is unparallelled in the world and which is best realized if we grow together.

Despite our efforts to define identity or to guarantee language rights, the real source of harmony in this country has been our ability to build it together. That potential is still here today, but we are not building toward it: we are drawing back and drawing apart. To use the langauge of the resolution, we need to dedicate ourselves anew to the concept of building together in this country. That means we must give as much priority in the next decade to economic and regional growth as we gave to language in the decade behind us.

In the meantime, we have healing work to do. We must reform programs that have not worked. We must help Canadians from one region to learn more about their neighbours. We must restore respect for our common institutions. Commissions, birthday parties, and television speeches all have their role in that process, but the central role belongs to the only agency which represents all the people of Canada. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

> That the motion be amended by adding the following words at the end thereof;
> "and as a means of actively and constructively affirming this dedication urge the establishment of a special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on national unity to recommend such constitutional, economic and social measures as will allow the federal system to respond fully to the needs of all Canadians."

● (1640)

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, a few years ago Canadians informed the government of Canada that the tax system was unequal and unfair. As a result, a royal commission was set up and certain recommendations were brought forward. Since then the tax system has become more unfair, more unequal. Some years later Canadians sent the government a message that the foreign ownership of our resources was causing trouble and that somehow or another we should be controlling our own economic destiny. Once again the government responded. It set up a royal commission on foreign ownership. The commission made recommendations and, once again, the government acted: it acted in such a way that Canadian industry is being gobbled up at an ever-increasing rate.

More recently, Mr. Speaker, the government learned that there is a serious problem of national unity. What did it do? It set up a task force on national unity. After eight months contemplating the results of the most dramatic provincial election in our history, the government put all its brains to work, all its political and emotional commitment to the future of our country, and produced the idea of setting up a task force. If the past performance of government task forces tells us anything about the future, we can expect greater disunity in the future, rather than a united Canada. I regret that this has been the response of the government to the country's most serious crisis this century.

When the right hon. gentleman became Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in 1968, he took over the government of a country which had lived through a period of genuine excitement. What took place in 1967 or 1969 was not a spurious, Pepsi-Cola kind of enthusiasm. What we saw in 1967 at the centenary celebrations was interesting architecture, much of which had come from Canadian architects, interesting cinema, much of which had come from Canadian directors making films for the first time, and imaginative music much of which had been written by Canadian composers. Beyond all this there was a sense among our people that the country was finally progressing toward a greater degree of self-acceptance, of awareness and independence as a nation.

Since then, as has been pointed out many times, most recently by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark), we have experienced one of the most alarming periods of disunity in the history of the nation. The Prime Minister, in his lecture today, trotted out two potential causes of discontent. One was economic and the other was cultural. I agree with him that much of the discontent in Canada has its roots in cultural and economic considerations. But I call on the right hon. gentleman to acknowledge that he has been Prime Minister for nine years and that the programs and policies having to do with cultural growth and economic growth are policies for which his government has been responsible. Throughout his speech I looked in vain for the slightest hint that the government might have failed somewhere. I looked for the slightest touch of modesty, the slightest acknowledgment of the fact that when the Prime Minister was elected there was not a separatist in any legislature in Canada, whereas today separatists form the government of Quebec.

The Prime Minister talked about the future as though the past decade did not exist. Yet it did exist. It was a decade of unrealized expectation for Canadians—lost expectations which had been raised in 1967 on a very solid foundation in both the cultural and economic fields. I suggest that the two areas the Prime Minister singled out are the correct ones. But there has been failure on his part, both in terms of analysis and in terms of implementing policies, which have led us specifically to the dilemma which faces us now.

Let me deal, first, with the nationalist question which is what the cultural question is all about. The Prime Minister has trotted out his old, 1968 nostrum, the Official Languages Act. Once again he implied that somehow or other, if this measure could gain acceptance across the land, the Quebec problem would go away. The right hon. gentleman's logic distresses me. I would have thought that a man with Jesuit training would have understood things more clearly. Throughout the period since 1967 he has been trying to apply the principle of the Official Languages Act and to gain acceptance for it across Canada. And it is precisely in the same period that the forces of separatism have gained ground. So whatever else might be said in favour of the policy, it surely has not headed off the forces of separatism.

Cannot the Prime Minister draw a lesson from this? Surely it is a clue to him that if this country is to remain united, it will not do so on the basis of an official languages policy. That policy—and I repeat what has been said by my two predecessors as leaders of this party—was a good policy and we shall defend if. At any time the government makes dollar grants of a sensible character for language training in the civil service or, more effectively, for training our young people in the two languages at the school level, we shall support this policy. But I ask the Prime Minister to get over his illusion that the Official Languages Act is a motivating force in the achievement of national unity. It is not. I do not agree with the Prime Minister's conclusion that the national application of the principle of bilingualism will somehow bring about national unity.

• (1650)

Why do I say that? I say, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Prime Minister that the cultural problem is not a national problem. The cultural problem about language is in the province of Quebec. The Quebeckers, the Quebecois, and the vast majority of that province who speak French are sympathetic and desire that French-speaking minorities elsewhere in Canada have the same rights as English minorities do in Quebec. My party and I agree with that. That has not been the central source of their discontent with our federal union, which is a crucial point. Since the early sixties what we have seen emerge in the province of Quebec is a positive, exciting form of nationalism, a nationalism in which the people of that province—ordinary workers, factory workers, office workers or functionaries in a bureaucracy—have decided at long last in their history to become the cultural masters of their own house.

The tragedy of our time is that we have had a Prime Minister—I say this seriously—who intellectually and honestly opposes nationalism. But I say equally seriously that he is dead wrong when he says that all forms of nationalism must be negative. Therefore, he has not been able to show the kind of leadership to the province of Quebec that this country requires, because he has always seen nationalism as being inward-looking, negative, regressive and withdrawing.

In terms of the history of the province of Quebec up to the sixties, during the formative intellectual years of the Prime Minister's own life, I would suggest that he was right. Earlier forms of nationalism in his own province were precisely that: that is what it was all about. They wanted to go back to an earlier form of society. If the new nationalism which emerged in the 1960s in the province of Quebec had been like that, then the Prime Minister's action would have been correct. But I suggest that his diagnosis is wrong. He is intellectually rigid in his understanding of nationalism, and therefore he was unprepared to say to the young Québécois, "I am with you". He could not say to Gilles Vigneault, to Monique Leyrac, or to a whole list of young French Canadian writers and singers, "You can be both a Québécois nationalist and a Canadian".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The rest of Canada must understand that this Quebecker does not understand the positive force which is to work in his own province. He had to say to young Quebeckers in particular, "You must make a choice. You must decide to be a nationalist and a Québécois, on the one hand, or a Canadian, and give up your nationalism, on the other hand". That has been a decisively negative aspect of the Prime Minister's leadership. One of the inevitable consequences of that response on the part of the Prime Minister has been to encourage the kind of negative development which he feared might occur.

While the Prime Minister is correct that there is a cultural aspect to our problem of disunity, he is wrong in pointing his finger to the problem of minorities, as important as they are in other provinces. A great example in this context would be President Roosevelt. In the 1930s that great country to the south of us was going through immense problems and there were constitutional difficulties connected with those problems. But President Roosevelt showed moral leadership. He did not rigidly distinguish between what was a federal matter and what was a state matter in his country. He said there were certain areas to deal with problems federally. As a president, he did that and achieved constitutional changes as well. Beyond that, he went over state boundaries, as I am suggesting the Prime Minister should have done in terms of his attitude to his own people in the province of Quebec.

Instead of René Lévesque saying that the language of work must be French in the province of Quebec, our Canadian Prime Minister should have said it. Instead of René Lévesque saying that the majority of people in the province of Quebec are Francophone, and therefore must have a majority of the positions of power in the boards of directors, it should have been our federalist Prime Minister saying those things. I suggest to the Prime Minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, that he had better start taking up that kind of leadership in the province of Quebec and not leave it all to René Lévesque, because if he does the ball game will be over.

In addition to the cultural question, respecting which I submit there has been a decisive failure of leadership in this country and no indication on the Prime Minister's part that he plans to change that in the future, there is the economic domain. There is a very important connection in the province of Quebec between the economic discontent of Quebeckers and the cultural resentment they feel toward Ottawa. It is not coincidence that the young, some 40 per cent of whom are under the age of 30 and committed to independence, feel the way they do.

In the last couple of years the province of Quebec has experienced 50 per cent of the new unemployment in Canada. The province of Quebec has a quarter of our population but a third of our unemployment. How does a young worker in Ste. Thérèse or in the Gaspé region, feel when he sees in Ottawa a government which rejects his cultural desires, and compounds, the problem by doing nothing about his human need for a job? That is the precise connection which is being made now by thousands of young Quebeckers all over that province. In real terms, I remind the Prime Minister that we are talking about 400,000 who are out of work in the province of Quebec, and a disproportionate number of them are young Quebeckers. Having failed the Quebec French-speaking population on cultural grounds, the grievance is compounded when their human desires to have a job are ignored.

Beyond the province of Quebec there are economic reasons for discontent in our land. Because the Prime Minister knows something about history, I ask him to remember that when this union came into being in 1867, it did so because the regions coming together thought they were all going to get equality of concern, if not absolute equality, by the national government. They expected approximate equality in their circumstances and their opportunities to grow.

In economic terms, I suggest that is still the legitimate foundation of the national union. If that is not achieved in Canada, the national union will not be maintained either. I direct the Prime Minister's attention to the figures for Atlantic Canada. The leader of the opposition brought out some of those figures today. I ask the Prime Minister to consider the fact that our fellow Canadians in Atlantic Canada suffered disproportionately, age after age, decade after decade, from unemployment which has worsened during the last decade rather than getting better. As has already been indicated, the program of regional development has been virtually scrapped.

On television the other night I saw a very moving Cape Bretoner who said to all Canadians watching television that they had serious problems in Cape Breton. He mentioned something which I am sure, caused people who live in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver to shake their heads and wonder about. He referred to the fact that they still have outdoor "johns". That is a joke for most of us because it is so remote from our cultural experience, but for a good part of Atlantic Canada it is a reality. That type of regional inequality is something Canadians in that part of our fine land will not tolerate much longer.

There has been lots of rhetoric and nonsense spoken about western Canada in regard to western alienation. Perhaps occasionally I have indulged in a little of that myself. But the reality is there. The Prime Minister knows that there was a western economic opportunties conference in 1973, when the four provincial governments met with the federal government and set up a series of legitimate demands. What were those demands about? Did they want special treatment? Did western Canadians say they wanted something that Ontario and Quebec did not have? Of course they did not. They said to the national government, "Give us an equal break. Change the freight rates system so that in the prairies there is an equal opportunity to develop industry, just as there is in southern Ontario". That was a reasonable demand. They asked for some moderation in the government's taxation policy on resources which it changed overnight without telling them. Again, that was a reasonable demand.

Following that conference, if I recall correctly, the Prime Minister said that these were sensible proposals for western Canada, that they were legitimate expectations for our prairie people whether they live in Moose Jaw, Calgary, or in the more rural parts of the prairies. But what did the Prime Minister do, Mr. Speaker? In 1973 the conference took place in a year when there was a minority federal government. In 1974 there was an election and the Prime Minister got his majority and forgot entirely about western economic grievances. He forgot entirely those legitimate concerns of western Canadians who want to feel part of Canada too, those on the prairies more than those in British Columbia. They feel that the Liberal party of Canada plays a cynical game in every election. The cynical game is that they calculate their majorities in Ontario and Quebec and say to hell with the rest of Canada.

I think any objective analysis by a historian, or political scientist, of government by the Liberal party over the past 20 years will support that western cynicism. The Liberals do their polling, they send out their surveys and find out whether leadership or some other policy is the issue, they count the votes in Ontario and in Quebec and, by God, if there is a majority, they call an election. In the meantime, serious harm is done in our country because westerners become more discontent with their lack of power and the people of Atlantic Canada continue to suffer prolonged inequality. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that an unjust confederation, not just from the point of view of the people of Quebec but from the point of view of western and eastern Canadians, will not survive and the Prime Minister had better learn that.

One issue, more than any other, of concern to our people, whether in western Canada, in Quebec, in northern or southern Ontario, is unemployment. I am not going to take the time of the House this afternoon to repeat speeches which I and others have made in past weeks and months. Let me simply say that the problem does take on national unity implications. I say that because there is an unhealthy correlation between high levels of unemployment and regions of serious discontent and the state of national unity. If you go to Newfoundland, you hear cracks about upper Canada and Newfoundland has 30 per cent unemployment. If you go to the Gaspé region, you find separatist members have been elected and you also find very serious levels of unemployment. There is this kind of pattern existing in a good part of our country within provinces and between provinces.

I say to the Prime Minister, as I have said elsewhere, that one of the best ways of making the nation work is actually putting the nation back to work. I wish that the Prime Minister would take that objective a little more seriously. The approach to the question of national unity taken by my party has been a serious one. We have not recommended a national commission. Since last November 15 we have been working to draw up very specific suggestions regarding what should be done at this time to maintain a strong, united country. Before coming to two or three points in that program which I want to emphasize—and I want to emphasize them with pride because 950 or so delegates at a recent convention of my party worked all over Canada Day weekend, appropriately and symbolically enough, to come up with what I think is a remarkably sound resolution on the subject—I want, in all seriousness, to discuss what I understand to be the central argument of the official opposition.

I listened with respect and with interest to the Leader of the Official Opposition this afternoon when he emphasized economic concerns as a legitimate and important aspect of national unity. I want to say on behalf of my colleagues that we are in full agreement with the Leader of the Official Opposition on that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: But beyond that, Mr. Speaker, there is a substantial difference between our approach and the Conservative party approach on the constitutional issue. There was not much emphasis placed in the speech of the Leader of the Official Opposition today on the point, though it has been emphasized many times in speeches he has made outside the House. I want to deal with it because I think it is a dangerous point. I refer to the argument that at this point in our history we must, either by tax point transfers or by changing constitutional power, give more authority to the provinces.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, that would be a serious mistake for us as a federal union. As a federal country we are now burdened in some sense with a central government which has less economic power than the other major federal countries in the world. To take any more power, principally economic power, away from the central government would, in fact, contribute to disunity. The point I want to make is that giving either tax points to the provinces or constitutional power will cause the rich provinces to get richer and more powerful and, conversely, the poor provinces to become poorer and less powerful.

For example, a tax point transfer involved in recent legislation introduced by the government and supported by the official opposition just a few months ago. One tax point transferred to a province means $4 per capita to the province of Prince Edward Island, but $10 per capita to the province of Ontario.

Mr. Kaplan: They are equal.

Mr. Broadbent: No, Mr. Speaker, they are not, and I can go into the details of the new equalization formula. As a result of the decision reached in the new fiscal arrangements, there is in excess of a $1 billion net increase to the province of Ontario over any other province. On behalf of my party, I want to say that the kind of Canada we want to build is not one in which we will find the rich provinces, whether Ontario, British Columbia or Alberta, becoming richer at the expense of all the rest. We will have nothing to do with that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Quite apart from any notion of equality which, from my perspective, is so central to the argument, I appeal to my colleagues in the other parties to consider the following argument. If they are not interested in principle, in the notion of equality as such, I would ask them to think about the implications for national unity. If this kind of transfer continues, whether in the tax system or constitutionally, what it will mean is that the Atlantic provinces will build up a set of grievances against Ontario and against British Columbia, and perhaps Saskatchewan, after a few years of bad crops—and that is possible—will find itself once again in a have-not position. This will cause great resentment against the richer provinces. By giving more power to the provinces, either in the form of constitutional change or fiscal transfers, what we will be doing is sowing the seeds of future discontent in our land. So for national unity reasons alone I think we should oppose this kind of move.

If we reject that kind of constitutional approach seriously put forward, what is the option? Do we revert to the kind of centralized federalism that we have had over the last ten years, one that has shown no respect for or sympathy with the nationalist development in the province of Quebec; one that has insisted upon a rigid application of national programs, whether we are talking about hospitalization or CMHC, right across the land? I suggest that is not the option. There is a third alternative, and I should like to sketch in what I think some of the components of that third option are in terms of Canadian federalism at this point in our history.

First, we want to emphasize the need for an effective national government with a national program, whether we are talking about unemployment insurance, medicare, hospitalization or housing. All of these programs must be maintained on a national basis in order to give Canadians from coast to coast some reason to identify with the national government. Such programs can be nation building.

Second, we suggest that the government take the rhetoric of decentralization seriously, but instead of decentralizing fiscal power or constitutional power what they should do is decentralize in a fundamental way the administration of such programs. They can establish housing programs on a very broad scale and money will go to the provinces to build homes within a certain income category and price range, but then leave to the provinces the right to decide what kind of housing they will build. We do not need the rigidity that we find in CMHC.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The housing needs of New Brunswick are different from those in downtown Vancouver, and both, again, are different from those in rural Quebec. So let us turn over pretty completely the administration of such national programs to the provinces, the same as I said on another occasion in terms of hospitalization. If the provinces are to get money for hospitals, they should not be told, as the government has told them in the past, to spend it all on acute care hospitals. Maybe one province needs more nursing homes than acute care hospitals. Again, the solution is not to get rid of such national programs, which I take to be the logic of the Conservative party. The solution is to maintain such programs, but to radically decentralize the administration and give the provinces the right to decide whether it makes more sense for them to build acute care hospitals or nursing homes. That is our second point, that we can have substantial decentralization in the administration of national programs.

The third point I would make, particularly at this point in history, is that we need a massive program to deal with unemployment. The Prime Minister recently came back, with what I took to be some kind of pride, from a meeting of seven industrialized countries and said that we are not unique, that all countries have the unemployment problem. What he did not point out is that among the seven countries we are the worst. He casually forgot to say that the other six have an unemployment problem, that is true, but two or three of them have social democratic governments which are doing a hell of a lot better than Canada is with the combination of inflation and unemployment. That is the point. Certain governments are prepared to involve themselves in the kind of national economic planning that is necessary to deal with both inflation and unemployment, and the resolution passed by my party on the weekend calls for such a national planning effort on behalf of this government.

Fourth, I turn to the constitution. It is our view that some constitutional change is necessary; some is inevitable. There has been change in the past and there will be change in the future. Some sensible proposals have been made by a number of Canadians both inside and outside this House, but I want to stress that in our view the basic structure of our constitution is sound and the prime source of our current tensions and problems in Canada does not come from the constitutional structure we now have. It comes, rather, from the policies and leadership, or lack of leadership, in the politics associated with that constitution.

I suggest that, for example, in the province of Quebec where the cultural problem is the serious one, René Lévesque is showing that within the present constitution the French language can be made the language of work for the people of Quebec—and I and my colleagues, salute and support that effort. Second, the effort to make changes in the distribution of power in the province of Quebec can be done within the present constitution. It is the case that the minority of Anglophones dominates the power structure in the corporations in that province, and it is the case that if the prime minister of that province wants to change that, as he does, he can do so within the present constitution and we should encourage him in so acting.

Finally, another aspect of concern to the people of Quebec, as expressed by a good number of them, anyway, is that they want to get more control over their natural resources, as do a lot of people in other provinces who support the philosophy of my party. I say through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Premier of Quebec that if he wants to do to the asbestos industry in Quebec what Alan Blakeney has done in his province to the potash industry, more power to him. He can do that also—I want to stress this—within the existing constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Although we are very open, as a party, to those who want to propose constitutional change, it is certainly our view at this point that that is not the primary concern and that more basic economic and cultural matters and problems can be solved by political and economic decision-making within the present framework.

Let me conclude with our last point. What I think is really required in our country, more than anything else, is a leadership which says to the people of Quebec and to ordinary Canadians outside the province that there are, in fact, two great cultures. I say that to the Prime Minister who tries to pretend that somehow it is simply a multicultural society. It is multicultural, but he knows as well as I do that there is a predominant Francophone culture established as a society in the province of Quebec, and there is the English community outside of it. What we require, surely, from the national leadership is for those of us who are federalists to say to the people of Quebec, "Let us work together. There is an immense amount of good that we can do. Within the federal union we can best preserve your cultural existence and Francophone community so you will not be gobbled up by the Americans to the south; and together you, the province of Quebec, and Canadians elsewhere can build a just and decent society that is really committed to building a sense of community based on the values of liberty and equality."

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Social Credit Party of Canada, I am pleased to take part in this important debate on national unity, or more especially as far as Social Crediters in the House are concerned, on the constitutional future of Canada. The conditions in this country have changed substantially in 110 years. We have evolved from a mainly agricultural and stable society into an industrial, technological, urbanized and active community in the business world, so that our needs have also changed.

Some clauses of our constitution should not have been altered, while others should have been abolished or slightly amended. Considering our present constitutional document, the Social Crediters are demanding a new constitution for several reasons and among others because our constitution is already 110 years old. It was not drafted in Canada, by Canadians, for Canadians without outside pressure. And then our constitution is still in London after 110 years and we are not sure where it is localized and how it could be patriated. With this so-called Canadian Constitution which no longer meets our needs and which causes us so much trouble to patriate, it is the contention of the Social Crediters that it is easier and better to have it where it is, especially when we consider the trouble its patriation would entail in relation to its real value in Canada nowadays.

A new constitution drawn up by the provinces is the safest way to come up with Canadian constitutional harmony, to the satisfaction of all parties involved, namely the provinces. We should not be unduly bothered Mr. Speaker, by the constitutional troubles Canada experiences at this time as we are contemplating a new constitution. France and the United States have set up their constitution in more dramatic circumstances than ours, following bloody revolutions. However, the procrastination demonstrated by this government, as well as previous ones, and its attitude towards the provinces in the present constitutional crisis could only lead us, perhaps too soon, unfortunately to a situation which other countries have experienced with regret.

Sentimentally, the Social Crediters identify themselves with the whole country. Intellectually, I am sure that the future of everyone will be better if we stay together. Why should we separate or divorce if it is to get married again. Thus I approve and we approve the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) not to believe in divorce between the provinces or in the separation of Canada, nor in the marriage of the provinces under a so-called sovereignty-association. Still I cannot understand the actions of our Prime Minister in the light of what he says, for the actions of an individual generally reflect the actions of the country, and all the more so when one is Prime Minister.

Divorce and separation are totally contrary to marriage and national unity. On December 3, 1976, I made a speech in the House on the value of the British North America Act of 1867, in the course of a debate on the constitutional issue which was initiated by the Social Credit Party after the Quebec election of November 15. I will not repeat today the arguments I put forward in that speech. However I would like to resume the discussion on this question by addressing myself to the new Canadian constitution which we have been claiming for such a long time, as I indicated in my speech of December 3, 1976.

● (1720)

In La Presse of May 4, 1977, Mr. Pierre Desmarais II, president of the Conseil du patronat du Québec is reported as saying:

> We need a refurbished federalism which the provinces have to redefine.

Mr. Speaker, we in the federal government think of ourselves as being all-powerful, those who have the absolute power. We in the federal government have to be the ones to tell the provinces what their constitutional future is. Well, here is what Mr. Pierre Desmarais II, president of the Conseil du patronat du Québec, has to say:

> Mr. Pierre Desmarais is in favour of a refurbished and renewed federalism which the provinces have to redefine.
> Speaking before the Rotary Club and the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Metropolitan Quebec, Mr. Desmarais contended that one of the first rules of the game of Canadian federalism is "that the distribution of sovereign powers be consistent with the will of the provinces".
> It rests with the provinces that make up the country to decide what part of their sovereignty will be shared with the central authority. The review of our constitution and the reorganization of constitutional jurisdictions are essentially the responsibility of the provinces. If they want to reduce their aggregate powers to increase their respective power the decision is theirs alone. There is no national will without the will of the constituent parts.

I think this is very important. I go on quoting:

> There is no national will without the will of the constituent parts. This is the price we have to pay for our national unity.
> To this extension of provincial responsibilities, Mr. Desmarais adds the necessity of proportional representation of French-speaking people at every level of the federal administration as well as the respect for the linguistic rights of the minority groups. However, he refused to elaborate on the form this division of powers should take, believing that it is for the provinces to sit at the table and determine what they expect from the federal system.
> In response to the terms of the conference entitled "Why choose Canada?", Mr. Desmarais expressed his conviction that the federal system is the best formula to ensure the future of French-speaking Canadians because it is a flexible formula, because our institutions are able to adjust according to our needs and hopes, because it allows a combination of forces and because it brings men together.

In 1963, Mr. Speaker, addressing the Quebec Kiwanis Club, the Hon. Daniel Johnson, the late Quebec premier, stated as follows:

Before starting to draw up a new constitution, tailored to fit the needs of modern day Canada, the principle must be laid to rest according to which in a federal or confederal regime all provinces must of necessity be shaped in the same constitutional mold, have the same rights, the same responsibilities and the same sources of revenue. He added that a new constitution, perfectly adapted to the legitimate aspirations of the two cultural communities, would be possible only when English Canada and French Canada will have understood that Quebec is not, and can never be, a province like the others. Mr. Speaker, constitutions are made to serve man and not to enslave him. The greater and stronger governments become, the greater the risk of people becoming isolated from the main centres of decision. The 110 years of massacre inflicted upon the constitution of 1867 by the present government and its predecessors has led to Canada finding itself, in 1977, in a worse situation than it was in 1867.

Ever increasing centralization on the part of the federal government has provoked a back lash on the part of the provinces which clamour increasingly for greater autonomy. From that state of affairs stem two contrary political forces which have led Canada to the brink of the abyss of separation. Everyone knows that our so-called constitution of 1867 was never approved by referendum in Canada in 1865. Why weren't the people consulted in 1865—on a question of such tremendous importance, in which its future was at stake? This consultation did not take place because the debate was so hot at the time of Confederation that the bishop of Trois-Rivières, among other people, had to intervene to calm down people and because the federal government of the time feared being beaten in Quebec by a referendum; so they decided to avoid the verdict of public opinion by having their plan approved by members only.

A new confederation should comprise autonomous communities with equal rights, but in no way subordinated to one another, although united by common allegiance, namely the principle of equality of all provinces in a new constitution which does not mean that there is unanimous consent on the part of all members of the collectivity. A new Canadian constitution should give to the provinces the right to decide for themselves whether they want to remain in Confederation. This right would contribute to a large extent to prevent potential violence because of the right of peoples to determine their own destiny in peace and order.

All obstacles put in the way of promoting and abetting separatism can only accelerate what we dread. A new constitution should provide for flexibility, openness of mind, mechanisms for regular consultations between the federal government and the provinces and a decentralized federal authority which would supplement and strengthen provincial governments. Strong provinces would thus attenuate regional conflicts. It is thus essential to redistribute powers among more viable units. If the provinces see fit to reduce their present eleven parliaments and two territories, they should be free to do so themselves.

An autocratic government can only appeal to a dictator. In a democracy, the government must look after the ordinary citizen, see to his welfare, his security and his expectations. It must consider his desires which are expressed through popular organizations and action committees within parishes. Government of the people, by the people, and for the people is infinitely more complicated than are absolute monarchy and dictatorship, for example. A new Canadian constitution as proposed by the Social Crediters would allow every province to determine itself its political and financial course in a Canada whose wealth and diversity could very well go with a decentralized federalism at the service of the provinces and not out to subdue them.

National unity might be a noble and desirable aspiration if it applies to English Canada only, but it becomes an irritant and against nature if it seeks to encompass French Canada. French Canada can only let itself be drawn into that national unity movement by sacrificing its own national characteristics and resigning itself to fusion and simulation. A single uniformity might be desirable in a country where there is only one nation, only one community, only one language and only one culture. We are against the Liberals' or this government's national unity because we are against the present constitutional melting pot.

We are against the status quo of this government. We are for national harmony via a new constitution because national unity in Canada, Mr. Speaker, is impossible since we have not one but two national communities. The province of Quebec must bear alone the responsibility for the French-Canadian culture. When the powers are uneven, the legislative and fiscal powers cannot be the same. It is wrong to think that all provinces must have exactly the same powers and the same means of action. It is in the name of that faulty principle that Ottawa continues to multiply constitutional subsidies for joint programs in provincial fields without leaving Quebec any other choice than conforming to common standards to recover the money it pays in federal taxes or tax itself again for the maintenance of its own institutions. What I just said, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the province of Quebec also applies to all other provinces of Canada.

It is in the name of this false principle that this government, this status quo government, is asking us to disregard the pact of 1867 in order to comply with the will of the majority in a federation where French-speaking Canadians make up 30 per cent of the population but control only one government out of 11. So long as the same constitutional straitjacket is imposed on all ten provinces, we will never get out of the present constitutional impasse. The two communities making up the Canadian nation will be a problem for each other.

The counterpart of this constitutional dead end lies entirely and solely in the sharing of powers among governments. If Canada exists today and if it is to exist tomorrow, it is on one essential condition, to remain a federal state in fact and not only in name. The federal state is a creature of the provinces. It seems this fact has been forgotten here. Its only purpose is to promote their common interests, that is the interests that the provinces feel are similar enough to be looked after by a sole representative for all, namely the federal government, for more flexibility, for the sake of economy or for greater efficiency.

The federal government must have limited powers. They should not have any other powers than those conferred upon them by the Constitution. They should not try to interfere with the responsibilities and jurisdictions of the provinces, neither in time of war nor indirectly nor under the pretence of their international role. They cannot either act through statements and on strictly political grounds, without first submitting the matter to the provinces, nor through fiscal means or judgments rendered by their own courts, nor can they do it in case of emergencies or for the protection of so-called national interests. They cannot argue either that evolution has traditionally been a centralizing force or that economic progress commands it or finally, that nowadays science and technology require greater centralization.

However, that is what the federal government has been doing in Canada for several decades. To cope with this situation, to counteract this centralizing trend, to avoid the disruption of Canada and so that the provinces are not reduced to mere administrative ridings and are in a position to assume their responsibilities for the better-being of their citizens and to avoid that French-Canadians are forever second-class citizens in their own country and, finally, to assert the principle of equality among individuals and groups, it is therefore essential that the new Canadian Constitution should provide for safeguards and limited federal powers.

These vital safeguards are the following: First, a constitution written in a clear language which cannot be subject to whimsical interpretation; a constitutional court whose fairness and non-partisanship would be unquestioned; a list of federal powers which would be limited with corresponding restricted fiscal powers; a compulsory constitutional amending formula which would not enable the federal government to unilaterally increase its powers.

These requirements are not met at present and in all fairness it can be said that this is the root of our political, constitutional, economic and social difficulties. Here is the answer: the provinces should be granted real powers. Having said that, I want to deal for a few moments with the suggestions made by the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) who advocates more centralized powers but an administration at the provincial level. This is nonsense because how could a province properly look after its own administration if the federal government retains all financial authority? How could a province decide upon the quality of housing if the federal government does not grant enough funds to build good houses in the provinces? Centralization has proved its worth in Canada. Since 1867, we have had ever-increasing centralization. Let us see what the situation is now.

Mr. Speaker, let us give real authority to the provinces! All the authority not conferred on the federal government by the initial constitution or by amendments thereto should belong to the provinces. This is the spirit of the confederative act, the autonomy of the provinces or the self-determination of the provinces is the right of privilege and the ability to make one's own decisions. This right is the basis of the natural freedoms that are nowadays called "human or civic freedoms or rights" and also "political, economical and social rights". These rights are individual rights and no democratic state has the authority to take them away; it can only control and regulate them and prevent some abuse against others.

Democracy is founded on the autonomy and freedom of citizens; it also exists in the autonomy of the provinces. In very large countries, and I consider that Canada is one of the largest countries in the world, this autonomy, this freedom is handed down through regional institutions. This is why true federalism means that the provinces which make up confederation have the right to self-determination and to enter contractual relationships with one another through a constitution which must provide for the protection of their rights as provinces by keeping the peace among them, by maintaining law and order and preserving the traditions of each of them and by increasing the common prosperity.

Among all the federated states of the world—and there are more than 20—Canada is the only one where the federal government assumes full powers, and since this is against the nature of things, this issue should be clearly resolved, otherwise we shall never get out of the constitutional status quo in which the Prime Minister and the present government have put us. If, under a new constitution, full powers belong to the constituent provinces, it is useless to list them. Our constitution, like the constitution of the United States, should proclaim unequivocally that the member provinces are the founding provinces and that the founded state is the federal state. This brings me to give the following explanation: Only the constituent provinces can agree to amendments to the constitution. The federal state could never make such changes alone, neither through foreign legislation in London or elsewhere nor by a simple federal legislation. If at times there were matters on which provinces would not necessarily agree and the interest of several provinces would prompt them to accept an extension of federal duties, such extention could only be made through a constitutional amendment under a majority rule still to be determined. The constituent provinces would never agree to an amending formula unless they knew first what powers they are prepared to hand over to the federal government, but particularly as basic conditions: that they have full powers, that a constitutional tribunal be set up and that the constitution restrict the unilateral action of the federal state.

One of the most serious deficiencies of the present constitution is that it does not provide for an amending formula. The provinces cannot initiate amendment procedures. Moreover, there is no distinction between matters of major and minor importance and lastly, a constitution must be flexible, that is it must be easily adapted to the circumstances. This could be done by drawing up a list of possible concurrent powers, where the federal state can legislate and spend public moneys. However, the provinces could always act concurrently if they wished. But their legislation should always have priority over federal legislation in all cases not otherwise provided for.

This does not mean, however, that the federal government would be excluded of all new activity. On the contrary, its concurrent powers should be more extended than they are now, but along with an opting out right without any financial or other penalty for those provinces which would not accept the federal paramountcy in the areas not clearly allocated to the federal government under the constitution. Such a sensible approach is to be found in every modern constitution. We are also convinced that the French language will never be protected by other than the founding province of Quebec. We are also convinced that the old federal parties are committed to centralizing residual powers in Ottawa, and that such a centralization effort stems from an electioneering approach on the one hand and the bureaucratic and financial establishment on the other.

In this light, the Social Credit Party of Canada is recommending a new constitution that would respect the principles stated earlier and allow for constitutional harmony between our Canadian provinces. Concretely the Social Credit Party of Canada urges the drafting of a new constitution made in Canada by Canadians for Canadians, aimed mainly at reviving the true Confederation spirit where the parties involved, provinces in other words, will recover and assume all the powers that belong to them, in order to protect and safeguard their identities and ensure their true participation in monetary, fiscal and trade decisions in Canada. In order also that such decisions taken at the federal level exert exclusive control on and deeply influence provincial economies and provincial initiatives.

The steps leading to a new constitution would therefore be the following: provinces will be responsible for establishing the constituent assembly to draft a constitutional proposal. The constituent assembly could be comprised of representatives of the people especially elected for that purpose, members of parliament and provincial legislatures, representatives elected by various organizations, with the help of experts in an advisory capacity only. The constituent assembly could hold sittings in every province, consult with all existing organizations, in order to be in a position to develop a modern draft meeting with the aspirations of every social class and the various groups.

Once the proposed constitution had been drafted, the various provincial legislative assemblies would scrutinize, amend and accept in principle the proposed constitution, which would then be submitted to a constitutional conference of all Canadian provinces. The proposed constitution would further be submitted to the people of each and every province through a referendum. Finally, this new constitution would become law on the date set in the constitution. It would give provinces complete responsibility with full powers, and extend to the federal level responsibilities to execute the mandate given by provinces for their greater social, economic, political and cultural development.

[English]

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as a Canadian who feels deeply and passionately about the future of this great country, I deem it a great honour to have the opportunity to participate in this debate. I begin from the premise that Canada, after the election of November 15, can never be the same again. It seems to me we have two clear options. First, that we shall go on to be a stronger, more united country, more united than ever before; or, second, that—as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said earlier—we shall drift into separation by attrition and shall end up with French only being spoken in French Canada and English only spoken in English Canada. At times I see great hope for a stronger, more united country. At other times I am very concerned in case that which none of us wants should come about.

It seems to me that we are discussing, in this debate, the sorts of questions which arise in the discussion of any personal relationship. In any relationship, be it that of business partners or any other personal relationship, it is important for both partners to lay their differences on the table openly and frankly. If there are differences, one must ask if both partners are prepared to make attitudinal changes which will restore the former relationship. If that were not possible, I should be most concerned about the future of our great country.

Several have already spoken in this debate. Writers have written articles on the question and perhaps expressed their views more clearly than I can express mine. They have written articles about this country, studied its history and expounded the difficulties it faces with great clarity and depth. However, I have made it my business, as a member of parliament, to travel across Canada and to participate in many different areas in the debate on national unity. It seems to me, therefore, that we are debating a fundamental question. When we debate the French-English question, we are really debating the right of a people to preserve a culture as old as this country. We must accept that a substantial number of our people are unilingual and their ancestry goes back to the beginning of this country. Also, when we debate this question we are debating equality of opportunity in education, economics and social matters. Perhaps, most important, we are debating the right of Canadians to be perceived by other Canadians as equals.

It seems to me that the debate has centred mainly on the French-English language question, but I should like to broaden this debate and put on record certain facts affecting the region of the country I represent. Mr. Speaker, I represent many people who came to this country in the last 20 or 25 years. Many of them voice the same concerns. Many of them belong to visible minority groups. They question their role in Confederation and whether they are perceived by others as being equal to other Canadians. It seems to me, no matter if we debate economic development in the maritimes, problems in the west, the aspirations of native peoples in the north to have their land claims settled, and objectives heeded by the rest of Canada, that the basic question with which we must deal is the right of individuals to play a role in this country, a role equal to that played by other Canadians socially and economically. Our individuals seek these rights.

Perhaps I can draw an analogy with the anti-inflation program. Since the days when inflation was running rampant, it seems to me one can see a perceptible change in the attitude of many in this country. People were striving for almost unrealistic gains, were doing so with an attitude detrimental to groups not as strong as the ones to which they belonged. I think of business groups which made a point of saying that unions should be done away with. I also think of unions which said that what happened in future did not matter; they were concerned about present wage gains. An individual somehow felt in his position he was a good deal better off than the next person.

● (1750)

There is a whole harsh attitude, particularly in that part of Canada that I represent, toward people who speak a different language, have a different colour of skin, dress differently or come from a different economic stratum. It is all of these we should be concerned about. If we look at it in sheer isolation, we are not effectively speaking to the problems facing Canadians today.

I was attracted to a comment, reported in Maclean's magazine, by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman), and I quote:

> We are in danger of becoming a nation of well off bitchers—province against province—group against group—region against region—person against person.

As a country we can only be successful if the larger, stronger, and more powerful groups are more charitable to the minorities and conscious of their rights and aspirations.

It all comes back to the question of attitudes and whether people are prepared to change and understand. I think they are and I think they can be. Who would have thought in October, 1975, when we had such a confrontation in our economy, that today business, labour, and government would be sitting down at the same table, perhaps not in total agreement but at least discussing some of the problems? If we can accomplish that, in spite of the threat of inflation presented to the country at that time, surely we should have a similar ability as Canadians to have that same attitude of wanting to look sincerely at the problems of national unity and seeing what we might be able to do.

I want to talk for a few minutes on what I think are some of the solutions to the national unity question and what the role of members of parliament should be in this entire matter.

I feel very strongly that we, as a government, have to stand four-square for minority rights. I am pleased that in this session of parliament Bill C-25 with regard to human rights and the discrimination question has been passed. The recent publication "National Understanding" was a large step forward for this. However, we do not want to leave it there in terms of having printed this policy paper and having passed that type of legislation. Everyone in this place has to believe sincerely the motivation behind that legislation and that document.

If we are not concerned enough to want to stand up for the rights of minority groups, not only to preserve them but to promote them, we will fail our country. Surely the many different viewpoints put forward by various groups relate to their concerns about this.

When we talk about the French-English question, this means that French speaking Canadians across Canada must have the types of rights that English speaking people want to have for English speaking people in Quebec. On that there are many points you can make. I was pleased to hear the Prime Minister comment earlier today about the tragedy at the present time of retrenchment on that in one part of the country rather than turning the argument around so that we are all concerned about bringing the rest of the country up to where it should be. It is not too late to rally to that side of the argument.

There is considerable danger that if we want to decide that very little can be done we will lose the advances that we have made in terms of minority language and other rights over the years. We have to support that side of the argument which maintains that the parts of Canada which do not offer real opportunity for minority language groups should do something about it.

I represent an area in Ontario, one of the richer provinces, one that could well afford to do a good deal more than they have been doing. I am desperately concerned that they get on with the job. If my knowledge of history is correct, in certain parts of Canada both official languages have been in the court system for as many years as this country is old. In some parts of Ontario today we find the situation where they are trying, on an experimental basis, to use both official languages. These are areas where there are substantial numbers of Francophones. This is something that has to be accelerated very quickly.

One of the difficulties that people in English Canada do not seem to understand and must learn to accept is that French has to be the working language in Quebec. Many of the people I talk to in English Canada somehow feel that this a real retreat from some other position. I refer them to speeches which the Prime Minister has made a number of times. It is as natural for many people in Quebec to speak French as it is for us in English Canada to speak English. Having said that, I am equally concerned that the freedom of choice for minority groups in Quebec be protected.

It does not seem to be very well understood in English Canada that for a very long time it has been possible for an Anglophone in Quebec to be born an Anglophone, educated as an Anglophone, work as an Anglophone, operate socially as an Anglophone, and die as an Anglophone. At the same time there have been full services in the provincial government over all these years in both languages. English Canada must now look very carefully, certainly where there are groups significant in number, at providing these types of services as well.

That is the kind of objective we should be working toward, rather than moving away from that position.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock later this day.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Milne: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock, when we took recess, I was talking about some of the thrusts which I thought important toward improving the relationship between the English fact and the French fact, and suggested that this question should really be considered in a wider range.

One of the things I think is terribly important is the role the Francophone has played in middle and senior management in many companies in Quebec and, indeed, in the government here and across Canada. I think it has been well documented, and perhaps the record should show, that of 104 of the largest businesses in the province of Quebec, fully 90 of them are considered to be completely Anglophone, 43 of them did not have one single Francophone on their executive payroll, 23 of them had one, 13 had two, six had three, two had four, and only four had five or more. Anyone should be able to imagine from those figure how discouraged Francophones must be in the business community that their progress had not been more substantial than that.

The chief point I want to make in the remaining few minutes I have at my disposal is that whichever way this argument about the future of Canada turns out it will surely in the final analysis be determined through the political fact. The time will come when Canadians will have to decide whether the leadership of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Liberal party are best suited to handle this problem, or whether it is the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) or one of the other parties. Based on the speeches given today and the performance since November 15, no question remains in my mind about which person Canadians will vote for and follow. The Prime Minister has consistently gone across this country and talked about national unity. He has expressed the same point of view wherever he has spoken, and has garnered substantial support for this viewpoint on the matter.

I was very disappointed to hear the Leader of the Opposition today making known his more-or-less partisan point of view. When he talks about lack of leadership I think he should look at his own situation. It seemed to me during the by-elections in Quebec, as reported in the press, that certainly some of the candidates of his party were very close to the PQ in terms of—

Mr. Grafftey: That's poppycock.

Mr. Milne: It happens I have the floor at the moment and wish to put that on record. When you look at leadership, the leadership given by the Prime Minister has been outstanding. But my greatest concern is that Canadians might join the party called "Apathy", which would be the greatest tragedy of all.

I recently read a survey indicating that if the "undecideds" were left out about 28 per cent of the people in Quebec would probably be committed one way or the other to the separatist option. Perhaps about 40 per cent are committed to the federalist option, and another 32 per cent are classified as moderates. This argument will certainly be won or lost in the appeals to the hearts and minds of these moderates. There are many comments we could make on that, but in an article which appeared in The Globe and Mail on Friday, December 31, the Rabbi of the Holy Blossom Temple, Dr. Plaut, wrote:

> Everyone agrees that there is a significant segment of Quebeckers, anglophones and relative newcomers as well as an important section of the francophone community who will remain deaf to the sirens of independence. Obviously their support is essential and they need to be strengthened, but their effectiveness will be limited by their numbers.
> There is, however, a third segment. Its members are as yet undecided francophones whose votes will determine the fate of the province and of Canada. What can we do to attract them to the vision of one Canada? The answer will not so much lie in concession, handouts and credits, for most of them are not likely to arrive at this most important decision of their lives on the basis of short-run economic advantages. I think they can be swayed by new attitudes in anglo-Canada, attitudes which have been sadly lacking in large portions of the population. What they need to know is that they are understood and accepted in their differentness, and welcomed by a change of heart, and not merely with bilingual arrangements.

I would be difficult to say it any better than that.

I am watching the clock and see I have very little time left in which to speak. I wish I had the time in which to comment on the educational system. I am deeply distressed that the funding which is available is not being used by the provinces. Indeed in the riding from which I come a group of parents have been paying extra to have their children educated in French, and even then it has become a matter of concern as to whether that can be continued. Fortunately a decision has been made that it can continue, but I make the point that a lot of parents and a lot of constituents are way ahead of governments in terms of their desire to see secondary education in the other official language.

I also hold the view that the teaching of Canadian history in our schools is one of the most overlooked factors in this whole equation. I well remember in school hearing at great length about Hannibal taking the elephants over the Alps, but I would think there are many people in Canada who have only a very limited knowledge of the history of their country. Many students have looked on history as a subject to "get through on" whereas in fact it is extremely important to national unity.

In conclusion I should like to read into the record a letter I received just this morning from a person who had lived in Ontario and moved some three years ago to Montreal. He is now in the process of moving back to Ontario, and these moves are occasioned by the fact that he works for a company which has production facilities in both provinces. He says:

> I'm sure you, like myself, are very concerned about our country at this time in its history. Living here in Quebec I can see major economic problems growing day by day that have been brought on to a great degree by the events of November 15 last. In many respects these economic problems are bound to spill over provincial borders and have a profound effect on Canada as a whole.

● (2010)

The majority of the people of Quebec, as best I can determine, are not in favour of secession from Confederation. However, they are determined to bring an end to the second-class citizen status placed upon them by the majority of Canadians. To this end they have improved their quality of education and are today turning out science and commerce graduates that are capable of standing shoulder to shoulder with any Anglophone Canadian graduate from across the country.

The Francophone Canadian is a very proud individual. He is a different person than his parents and grandparents. He harbours desires for success and the amenities of life the same as all of us and is prepared to make the sacrifices to achieve them. His only reservation is that he wants to do it in his language of thought and not be compelled to carry on a full time translation process in order to get his point across.

I can sympathize with this desire as could any Anglophone who would take the opportunity to live for a period of time in Quebec. Language however has been at the root of many problems in the history of the world and possibly because we are such a young country we must make our own mistakes.

My wife and I—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, nine years after the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) formed his first administration, almost eight months after a separatist government is elected to office in the province of Quebec, members of the House of Commons are finally accorded a two day debate on national unity. For this debate the government presents a resolution in which members are asked to dedicate themselves anew to the continuing unity of Canada. Some of us, indeed the majority of us, dedicate ourselves anew to this country each day we enter this Chamber. We do not need a prolonged debate to do that, but two days is pitifully short to explore the reasons for the deep divisions and conflicts in this country, and to put forward proposals as to how they can be met and resolved.

The resolution itself reveals a very simplistic approach to the issue of national unity. Since last November 15 we have been exhorted, or we have exhorted others, to stand up and proclaim how much we love our country. But words, however fervently spoken, are no longer enough. The Canadian people have passed through that phase since November 15. Yes, we can all be and are missionaries in the cause of national unity, as the Prime Minister urged this afternoon. But surely it is not necessary for any of us in this Chamber to reiterate our feelings about Canada. We know how deeply we feel, and through our actions we try to show it with every passing day.

What this country does not need, and does not want, is a Charles de Gaulle approach. It would be an affront to Canada, to Canada's history and to Canada's people, for any individual to try to pass himself off as the incarnation of the country or the saviour of the country.

The Prime Minister has said again and again that will and determination will carry us through. But will and determination, unless channelled into some meaningful forum, cannot in themselves resolve the crisis this country faces today. Canadians are looking for a forum, an agenda, or a plan of action in which they can participate on a continuing basis in this emergency. But they do not have such a forum because the people's representatives—the duly elected members of parliament—do not have such a forum, except for a limited two day debate on a resolution couched in platitudes.

The Canadian people are entitled through their elected representatives to participate in deciding what form their future will take, and surely the best framework for this task is a parliamentary committee, as my leader has proposed. The failure of the Prime Minister to recognize this fundamental truth makes me wonder if he would not deliberately reject this idea for his own personal aggrandizement. He was asked last April to establish a special parliamentary committee to deal with the problems in our federal system. He said he would discuss the suggestion with the government House leader. The House leaders subsequently did discuss such a move, and I can only surmise that the reason a special parliamentary committee on national unity is not being proposed by the government at this time is that the Prime Minister vetoed it.

Civic-minded groups all across the country are setting up committees to discuss ways to rectify the country's current malaise. Can the House of Commons, the most representative forum of the people, do less than that?

Let us take a look at what the government has done in these last few months since the election of a separatist government in Quebec. Faced with the most serious challenge to Confederation in our history, members of the government did what they do with any other problem. They created a new secretariat in the bureaucracy. They realized there was something very special about this problem, so they appointed two secretariats. The secretariats have swung into action collecting newspaper clippings, running Pequiste economic pronouncements through a computer and, of course, co-ordinating each other's work. Their multicoloured flow charts, their computers, their analyses—everything is in perpetual motion inputting to Canada's very first programmed Prime Minister.

Today we have the appointment of a special blue ribbon commission. As worth-while as the operations of that group might be, it is yet one further example of the contempt the Prime Minister has for the relevancy of this institution. For parliament to take this lying down would surely be the ultimate abdication of its responsibility. These are eminent Canadians whom the government proposes to appoint; but they do not have the mandate that we have as members of parliament, the one institution chosen by all Canadians. The challenge that faces parliament in this year 1977 is not one that can be delegated to any outside commission, no matter how eminent.

The Prime Minister might just learn something from history. I ask him to cast his mind back to the difficulties of 1864, when the union of Upper and Lower Canada ran into grave problems. It was all too evident that the system was not working. Did the political leaders of that day send for an architect of an earlier time to help devise a remedy? Had the present Prime Minister been there, his answer would obviously have been to reactivate Lord Durham.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: No, the political leaders of that day turned instead to their colleagues in other jurisdictions, to the working politicians of the time—Macdonald, Brown, Cartier, Galt, Langevin, Tilley, Tupper—and even though it took them three years of study, scrapping, reconciliation, and accommodation, they came up with a plan for a united Canada. They did not pretend to have the last word on Confederation. They were not searching for an ultimate truth, either to find one or to impose one.

● (2020)

The resolution before us and the attitude of the government for nine years suggest that language and language policy are the ultimate truth, that the country is defined by its languages, that bilingualism is the soul of Canada. This displays a very limited, a very narrow concept of Canada. Canada is much more than that. We know, Mr. Speaker, that economic disparities between English and French speaking groups, or between different regions of the country, exacerbate the problems of national unity every day they remain unresolved. But there is another dimension to the problem of national unity which has been largely ignored, and that is the political dimension. I do not mean by that the calling of an early election to capitalize on a crisis and thereby heighten the cynicism which abounds in the country regarding our political institutions. No, Mr. Speaker; when I refer to the neglect of the political dimension of this crisis I am referring to a long overdue analysis of our political system, our federal system, to see how it has to be changed to meet the demands of a greatly changed society from that of 110 years ago.

Over a century of experience in the art of federalism has provided Canadians with a workable political structure which is the envy of many countries throughout the world, given our complexities and diversities. But that does not mean that it does not require a major overhaul from time to time.

The agenda, the mandate, for a parliamentary committee looking into the causes of disunity in this country could cover a number of problems not presently being dealt with in any other forum in this House. It could monitor what the government is doing at the federal-provincial level and suggest ways to avoid the absurdity of one branch of government spending months working out complex new fiscal arrangements with the provinces, in complete isolation from another branch of government working on a language policy which, if implemented, would necessarily involve tremendous additional federal funding.

A special committee dealing with the problems of national unity might be able to bring some order out of this chaos. When lapses of that nature occur, is it any wonder the central government is regarded with distrust and hostility as the "alien they" by individuals, groups, and provincial governments across the country?

Well, how to overcome this lack of legitimacy, how to bring a new harmony to the federal system, how to make our national institutions reflect the regional nature of the country which has forced the provinces to be the primary spokesmen of regional needs? These questions would be high on the list of priorities for a parliamentary committee to examine when considering the faltering political dimension of our federal system.

Another agenda item for this Commons committee could be the consideration of a regional base for certain of our national institutions. Provincial nominees on such major bodies as the Senate and the Supreme Court of Canada would be an obvious starting place. In addition the committee could examine the composition of the ever-growing number of regulatory, administrative, and quasi-judicial agencies which exercise such broad powers.

As Professor John Meisel of Queen's University puts it in a forthcoming paper:

> Some of these agencies like the CRTC and the CTC are within federal jurisdiction but deal with matters vital to provincial development; others like the National Energy Board operate in areas where the provinces share constitutional responsibility. In both cases there are good reasons for shaping the structure and membership so as to provide closer ties to provincial governments.

I am gravely disturbed when I see major recommendations being made by a three man federally appointed board, such as the National Energy Board, in a field in which the provinces have unquestioned rights, and yet the provinces must come before board hearings in the manner of suppliants, with exactly the same status accorded to any individual citizen in this country. Is it any wonder we do not have a national energy policy when the main national agency for formulating that policy does not reflect the true political dimensions of the federal system? The same can be said regarding the lack of a national transportation policy, a national communications policy, a national regional development policy, etc.

But if regional or provincial representation were included in national institutions, Professor Meisel considers that "federal institutions would thus act as brokers of distinct regional and ethnic interests, and the decisions of such bodies, while applicable nationally, would result from the reconciliation of various provincial interests. Federal policies would more likely respond to regional interests, and also the regional interests represented in Ottawa would begin to perceive the national dimensions to their concerns."

The need to restructure the political—and by that I mean the federal—dimension of these bodies would be an important agenda item for a parliamentary committee seeking to eradicate some of the causes of friction in our federal system. Such a committee, if bold enough, might even examine the failure of this Chamber and of political parties to provide adequate national representation. On many occasions I have said that I believe the lack of strength of the Conservative party in Quebec over a long period of time, and the lack of Liberal representation on the prairies, have aggravated the threat to national unity.

The imbalance is apparent in considering even the most recent general election. While the Conservative party got 20 per cent of the total vote in Quebec, it got only 4 per cent of the seats. The Liberals, with 27 per cent of the vote on the prairies, won only 11 per cent of the seats. A special committee of parliament might consider the benefits and disadvantages of modified form of proportional representation and whether, by relating seats won more closely to votes, the problems of national unity might be alleviated.

I have no doubt such changes would have a profound impact on our federal system. They could alter its fundamental nature. But I believe that today's circumstances demand that we must be prepared to move beyond linguistic acceptance, beyond even constitutional realignments, to a re-examination of our entire political system.

In recent months members of parliament, journalists, academics, Canadians from coast to coast have begun to despair about the ability of this institution and other national institutions to cope with the great national problems that confront us. Parliament must not be seen to be impotent on this issue. It must not be seen as impotent by the people of Canada because, if it is, the cost not just to the credibility of this institution but to democracy itself will be extremely high. A parliamentary committee with broad powers to examine and question, to travel and hold hearings and to make recommendations, is one way to begin to put our own house in order, and the survival of our political institutions depends upon such an examination. Indeed, it could have the effect of alleviating the strains and stresses in our Confederation. As John Meisel has put it, "Motivated by the need to avoid disaster and to fashion a new community, we might thus create political institutions suited to the unique circumstances imposed by the regionally and ethnically divided nature of Canada and by the demands of the post-industrial society."

There are those who say that survival of our country is too strong a phrase to use with regard to the crisis of national unity which we face. I do not believe so, Sir, but I am interested in the survival of Canada, not in the political survival of the present government.

The resolution the government has placed before us should do more than to ask us to dedicate ourselves anew to Canadian unity—it should challenge us to take bolder moves, to examine all possible alternatives to create institutions that will ensure that unity. We must not only work but we must be seen to be working at federalism. And we must do it in this House! Let the government give us the forum—the committee—and we will get on with the job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have decided to open my remarks on the motion proposed by the right hon. Prime Minister by quoting a very short passage of a speech of Mr. Gordon Robertson, which shows very clearly the difficulty many people in this country have to feel like Canadians. Mr. Robertson said that over the years French Canadians have realized that English Canadians were not great enough to negotiate with them on equal terms, to acknowledge them as a community that deserves all our respect, to give them their rightful place in all areas of activities of our Canadian society. They have found out that we were unable to establish with them, even within the province of Quebec, relations based on dignity and respect. This brief quotation is taken from an address delivered by Mr. Gordon Robertson, Secretary to the Cabinet for Federal-Provincial Relations, during the graduation ceremony at Dalhousie University on May 12.

This finding of Mr. Robertson had already been repeatedly echoed in the report of the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission. It has been expressed in many ways throughout the history of Quebec and of Canada. Its more acute expression, which caused the greatest shock to Canadians, was undoubtedly the election of the Parti Québécois. The election of the Parti Québécois was not merely a rejection of the Bourassa government in Quebec, it was also an end result and a crystallization of the profound feeling of inequality on the part of French-speaking Canadians of Quebec. The slogan of Mr. Lesage "Masters in our own home" and that of Daniel Johnson, "Equality or independence" were not just electoral catch phrases. They were the evidence of a collective will to be recognized as equal partners in a country that too often just tolerated them.

Mr. Speaker, are we as a country driving down a dead-end street? Have we reached a point where there is nothing more to be done? If we answer yes to these questions, it will be because we will have let fatalism, fanaticism or prejudices preside over the decisions regarding the future of this country. Why not build this future and define this country on the basis of tolerance and generosity? If we can be filled with tolerance and generosity, then the question lies as to how we must build this future and define this country. I will try, Mr. Speaker, to answer this question by a few suggestions.

The first point to which it is always important to come back is that of the basic equality of the two languages and the two cultures, French and English, all across the country. It has become common place to speak about bilingualism in this country and some remarks made today in this House lead us to doubt that this objective can ever be reached. Quebecers have always accepted the principle of co-existence between English- and French-speaking Canadians and that in a spirit of equal rights, mutual respect and dignity. However they know, and history proves it, that this principle has not been applied to them. If a French-speaking Canadian feels as a stranger outside Quebec, how can you expect him to feel attached to this country? If the French language had been granted in the rest of the country the recognition and the rights granted by Quebec to the English language, we would not be debating today the question of national unity. If all political parties had fought to support the policy of bilingualism that was drafted in the wake of the studies of the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission, we would probably not be debating today the issue of national unity.

Mr. Stanfield: That is not true!

Mr. Grafftey: You are dreaming in colour.

Mr. Bussières: It is you who is dreaming in colour.

This equal status for the French language and culture vis-à-vis the English language and culture is not yet a fact in this country. This equality is even fought by people who are sitting in this House, Mr. Speaker, by those who claim that this is not true. The efforts towards bilingualism have been questioned so many times. One feigns to agree on its principle but disapproves of its application. The millions of dollars spent are a pretence to demonstrate that the application is quite inadequate. Injustices against a few civil servants are a pretence to demonstrate that the application is out of tune. These are specious arguments, Mr. Speaker, so specious that they are not even clever enough to take the hypocritical disguise of sophism. The Leader of the Opposition was saying this afternoon that bilingualism is a dividing factor more than an unifying factor. This is an assertion which is too gross, Mr. Speaker, to be taken for a sophism.

For God's sake, we must go on investing millions of dollars for bilingualism. It is the price that we have to pay for the past stupidity and the past injustice. All hypocrites should stand to be counted. All those who believe in principles should accept the challenge of their application. It is unbelievable that after the claims of the 60s and of the 70s one is still reduced to go to court to be given the right to work in French, as is the case for the Air Canada employees in Dorval. It is unbelievable, Mr. Speaker, that one has to count on the fingers of one's hand the members of this House who were courageous enough to denounce the racism and fanaticism of the people from CATCA and CALPA when we were confronted with the crisis on working language in air communications. I am proud, Mr. Speaker, that these members are sitting on this side of the House.

Quebec Bill No. 1 has been readily mentioned lately with regard to bilingualism. How unwise, and above all, how stupid to put forward such an argument. Even after the adoption of Bill No. 1, no French-speaking minority in Canada will be able to boast of having an education system as comprehensive as the one provided to the English-speaking minority in Quebec. I too, Mr. Speaker, regret some provisions of Bill No. 1. However, I would feel much freer to oppose them if I could give examples of generosity towards the French outside Quebec, as we can boast of our generosity towards the English-speaking community in Quebec. The debts of history always manage to catch up with their creditors. We have now to pay the price, or rather to repay the debt of a century-old failure, a failure due to the obtuseness, the meanness and the quiet equanimity of those who form the majority.

Let us recognize that both languages and cultures are equal, let us be tolerant and generous and show all French Canadians that Canada is their country. Mr. Speaker, I would now like to deal with the second series of prerequisites for Canadian unity: constitutional reform. Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people never had the opportunity to state their wish to belong to this country. The Canadian people never had the opportunity to speak out for their political institutions. The Canadian people never had the opportunity to speak out for their constitution. The Canadian people never had the opportunity to define themselves. This has been done for them in time and by circumstances. After having accepted equality, I believe that the national unity crisis will have to be solved through a process which will enable all Canadians to identify themselves with their country, their institutions, their constitution. I also believe that this process must finally provide an opportunity for all Canadians to speak out through a plebiscite for these institutions and this constitution.

What should that process be? I believe it cannot consist merely of the joint committee suggested this afternoon by the Leader of the Official Opposition. In my opinion, it should take the form of a constitutional conference different from the federal-provincial conferences we have known in the past. That conference should bring together members of the Senate, members of all parties in the House of Commons, members of all parties in every provincial legislature, and members of the Yukon and Northwest Territories Councils.

Those parliamentarians should be joined by citizens who have demonstrated a particular interest for the Canadian unity issue. That conference should be called by and report to Parliament at the end of its study. Parliament would act on the report of the conference. First the conference should consider how Canadians can identify themselves with their country; second, it should study Canadian political institutions; third, the Canadian constitution and, lastly, a formula to allow Canadians to approve by plebiscite their institutions and the constitution.

It is startling to note to what extent Canadians know nothing about their country and it is also dramatic to note how Canadians are ignorant of each other as a group. How is it possible to understand people whom you do not know? How is it possible to love a country you know nothing about? We should see to it that every Canadian knows his country, that Canadians from all areas have an opportunity to know each other. I think that is the starting point of Canadian unity.

The conference should also consider as a second point our political institutions. We now have a national flag, a national anthem, but we have to Canadianize other institutions. The symbol of political institutions could be a factor of unification. But citizens must see their own image in that symbol, identify themselves with it. We must make efforts so that our political institutions reflect the present reality and those institutions must bring together all Canadians.

If we put aside the issue of equality for English and French and concentrate on regional disparities, transport, power sharing, we realize quickly that the frustrations of Quebecers are not different from those of westerners or Maritime residents. What is needed in Canadian political institutions is a mechanism allowing all regions as such to put forward their views and their aspirations.

The third point the conference should consider is the constitutional review. That study should deal first with patriation of the constitution. It is urgent, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians have a constitution which belongs to them. A modern country like Canada can no longer tolerate that the main text of its constitutional documents should be abroad. We must patriate the constitution forthwith, find an amending formula, add to it provisions recognizing the equality of the French language and culture and the English language and culture.

In the area of constitutional review the conference will have to study the existing provisions, clarify the grey areas as much as possible while at the same time avoiding the trap of decentralization. Decentralization is not, in spite of what some say, the cure-all to the breaking apart of Canada. On the contrary, to keep this country united, the central government must have enough powers to act on the economy, it must have enough powers to distribute wealth in this country. Finally, Mr. Speaker, the conference will have to consider and suggest to Parliament a mechanism that would allow all Canadians to have a say on the recommendations in their report that Parliament would keep in the area of political institutions and the constitution. That mechanism of a constitutional conference might seem cumbersome and the subject of their study, utopian. However, the present state of the crisis should motivate the people who will make it up to do whatever is necessary to achieve such an objective in a relatively short period of time.

In conclusion, I would like to reaffirm my faith in this country, say that the many examples of tolerance and generosity that can be seen every day are a guarantee that the basic attitude of Anglophones vis-à-vis Francophones is going to change. It is that change in attitude which is going to save Canada. It is the tangible manifestation of that equality which is going to save this country. It is not through fear of economic problems that Quebecers will remain Canadians, but when they have proof that they are first class citizens of this country, when they are given institutions and a constitutional statute that will define them and give them a sense of belonging. I wish this were the objective of every member in this House.

[English]

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, in approaching this debate of such great national significance this afternoon and this evening, I suppose few of us remain immune from the thrust of our own respective ridings.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I represent in this House the constituency of Brome-Missisquoi. I would first recognize that because of our historical, sociological, etc., revolution, we have what I have always called a true spirit of national unity. As I said many times, our area is 80 per cent Francophone and 20 per cent Anglophone, and there is to be found a true spirit of unity. As everyone knows, Brome-Missisquoi is located in the Eastern Townships. In the past, the Eastern Townships gave the Canadian people and Canada a great prime minister, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent.

Mr. Speaker, I will indicate quite frankly, tonight in this House that I myself voted twice for that true Eastern Townships gentleman.

[English]

I repeat—

An hon. Member: Welcome back.

Mr. Grafftey: Not today, I am afraid, not today. I voted for the late Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, once the prime minister of my country, twice. He typified the part of the world I come from where, because of our historical and sociological evolution, French speaking and English speaking Canadians live side by side in national unity. I find it hard to talk too much about it in the House tonight. We do not talk much about differences between French speaking and English speaking Canadians or national unity in my part of the world because we live it. It is deeply felt and deeply lived in our aspirations for Canada.

● (2050)

[Translation]

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, Mr. St. Laurent spoke French with his father and English with his mother.

[English]

We know the origins of Louis St. Laurent and that he spoke to his mother in English and to his father in French. What would he do today? He would take René Levesque and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) into the woodshed and give them a damned good licking. That is what he would do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, we have in our great and young country two official languages and many cultures, as has been suggested many times in this House.

[English]

When I first came to this House of Commons, Mr. Speaker—perhaps too many years ago in many ways—the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) as Prime Minister helped bring those whose ancestors came neither from the United Kingdom nor France, into the mainstream of Canadian life. Once again, whether we like it or not, because of the actions of this government, those people feel that their legitimate aspirations in the mainstream of Canadian life are continually ignored.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the great speeches made in the House of Commons, the great speeches of statesmen like the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that's all very well—

[English]

I know that in debates like this one tonight it is not good to dig up history, but I am going to lay a few facts on the table. It is fine to hear the Prime Minister talk about national unity in this House of Commons, but I am more interested in what his minions say at the grassroots when they get back home.

I remember when the right hon. member for Prince Albert was Prime Minister of this country, some Liberal notable said, "We are going to destroy him." What did they do in my province? They said he was anti-French, anti-Quebec. Now they wonder why they have a divided country, yet they come and plead in this House to make this a bipartisan issue. That is pretty hard for those of us who have heard—

[Translation]

—the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) say that he has found on many occasions in my province that the party which I represent here is anti-Canadian, anti-Quebec, anti-French. That's all very well to say that in Quebec, but it is a different story to make a point as statesmen must do before the House and the press gallery. We are here to state the truth and to find why my country is so divided today.

[English]

Between 1957 and 1963, Mr. Speaker, I heard the Liberal machine attack the right hon. member for Prince Albert in my province, saying he was anti-Quebec, anti-French.

[Translation]

Well, in the great speech he made in the House of Commons, the Prime Minister suggested that all members should cooperate, but in Quebec, he and his ministers, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) claim that the only federalist party is the Liberal party and that to preserve Canada, we need the Liberal party. This was stated on several occasions in my province, but in the House of Commons they think that the country will be united after a two-day debate. That is not true! It is absolutely incredible!

[English]

It is all very well for the Prime Minister to come to this House this afternoon, read a speech—and I give him a C minus at the freshman level of university for it—and then fly out of the House while his minions in my province preach the worst kind of disunity, saying the only federal party is the Liberal party, and the only way to save Canada is to vote Liberal.

[Translation]

If Canada is divided today, it is because for the past ten years, there has been a policy for the Francophones and another for the Anglophones.

[English]

Someone who spoke before me said that after ten years of the present government, asking the Prime Minister to save the country now is like asking an arsonist to put out a fire.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh! What a good line.

Mr. Grafftey: It is a pretty good line. The way the Prime Minister is handling the national unity issue makes Mackenzie King look like a statesman on the conscription issue. I well remember meeting the Prime Minister in a television studio during the election campaign of 1965. I have known him personally for years and was a great admirer of his—as I still am in many ways. After we both arrived in Ottawa we would sometimes have coffee together in the cafeteria, as many of us do. We would sit there talking, in the days before he was even named parliamentary secretary to the then Prime Minister, the late Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson.

I do not claim that I was speaking for my party at the time, but a couple of years before Expo I suggested that we needed a modern constitution, suited to modern times, suited to Canada for Canadians. I felt this not only because we had gone through the quiet revolution in Quebec but because I was firmly convinced that while it could be argued that in many ways the British North America Act was flexible enough for modern needs, I perceived it was not. The problems we face today did not exist in 1867. I talked to him often about the necessity for a modern constitution, made in Canada for Canadians, by Canadians. He rejected that out of hand. He said he had come here to settle a few scores and that the British North America Act was flexible enough for our needs, and that was that. I wonder if he feels the same way now, ten years later.

Even if he did feel the British North America Act was flexible enough to adapt itself to contemporary needs, why has he for ten years confronted the legitimate aspirations of every region of my country? Is that not one of the major reasons for division in Canada today?

An hon. Member: Have you read the Victoria Charter?

Mr. Grafftey: I can read the Victoria Charter as the hon. member can.

[Translation]

But anyone can read the Victoria Charter, the speeches, the Standing Orders, one can read anything, it is the actions that count, it is the attitude, it is the sense of understanding that count. I can read the Victoria Charter as well as the hon. member.

[English]

This afternoon my leader, seconded in a great speech by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), put the proposition before the government that you can name task forces, you can talk, you can do anything you want, but unless a joint parliamentary committee composed of all parties in the highest forum of this land can be brought in a bipartisan way into the national unity debate, there will be trouble—real trouble. I say, you should not exclude us on this side of the House. Some will say I am partisan, but I find it strange that the Prime Minister should have delivered a poorly read, high school oration in the House this afternoon, and then flown off to the west coast. That was his total contribution.

• (2100)

An hon. Member: He has a schedule to meet.

Mr. Grafftey: I don't care. This is an important debate and he should be in his place.

Mr. Breau: He is busy with his duties.

Mr. Grafftey: I did not schedule those. If he is serious about this debate he should be in his seat. I say, if the Prime Minister and his party make this a partisan issue by excluding members on my side of the House from such a parliamentary committee, we shall be in deep trouble. I believe, as speakers before me have said, that the highest body in this land should have something concrete, constructive, and ongoing to say about keeping our union together. My position is the same as it was ten years ago, and I say the government should accept the amendment right away. Since the Prime Minister is not present, perhaps someone else on the front bench opposite can rise and, in a spirit of bi-partisanship, say, "The government accepts this amendment."

I say to the Prime Minister and his minions, you do not have to be a Liberal to be a good Canadian.

An hon. Member: Oh! Come on!

Mr. Grafftey: "Come on," says the hon. member. That is how many of us feel.

An hon. Member: I thought you said you didn't care.

Mr. Grafftey: I quit your party, after having been a member of it for five years in the province of Quebec, because I discovered that the Liberal party says, "The Liberal party first, Canada second." I joined a party which says, "Canada first, the Progressive Conservative party second." Let us have a little more national unity and a little less Liberal unity in this country. I believe, for the good of Canada, this parliamentary committee must be established.

[Translation]

An hon. Member: You are a clown.

Mr. Grafftey: Agreed, but to be a clown, one has to be a Liberal!

I feel we should have such a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate, with members from all political parties and not only from the Liberal party. We must have such a committee here in the largest forum in Canada. Mr. Speaker, I am not speaking necessarily for my own party but as a member of parliament, and we have the opportunity to really speak out tonight and tomorrow. Therefore, I hope that after the next election, the new government will call a great constitutional conference with the participation of every province and political party, in order to draft a constitution made in Canada, by Canadians and for Canadians.

[English]

We are here, putting our constructive thoughts forward.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Why not?

[Mr. Grafftey.]

Mr. Grafftey: Surely the government House leader believes we must set up a joint parliamentary committee to examine the subject matter. How in the world can you exclude members on my side of the House from this ongoing discussion, unless the Prime Minister wants to make it a partisan issue?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Of course he does.

An hon. Member: You heard him, didn't you?

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I want to see action, not speeches. Let the Prime Minister put his actions where his mouth is and convene an all-party, joint parliamentary committee to examine this question. Otherwise how could it be a non-partisan examination?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: Because of present conditions in the country I get letters, as I am sure other members do, asking what I think about special status. I will tell you what I think. Far too many politicians at both levels of government have been bandying the word around irresponsibly. What do I think of special status for Quebec? I do not. I think we are a country of many regions. We all have our special aspirations within this great federal union. We all have our special problems. I suppose that in Saskatchewan the fisheries problem is not the same as it is in our coastal regions.

Let us be forthright and responsible when we talk about special status or ask questions about it. It is incumbent on those in public life at all levels of government to use language responsibly, especially when there are not literal translations for certain phrases d'une langue à l'autre.

I have been concerned over the years, when discussing the question of national unity, with the notion that we must have either/or, that you cannot have strong provinces and a strong federal authority at the same time. The Prime Minister and his supporters often say it must be either one or the other. He tells Quebecers they must settle either for the status quo or for Lévesque. They have no other choice. If that confrontation continues much longer, we shall be in deep trouble. There is another choice, a responsible middle ground which cannot be called a compromise.

The Prime Minister delivered an incredible speech in the House this afternoon, eight months after the November 15 election, a speech for which, if I were a professor at McGill and the Prime Minister were a freshman, I would give a C minus. I will say now, and say over and over again, I am sick and tired of hearing it said that those who do not accept the Liberal option are second class Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman whose allotted time has expired.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to remind the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) that he heard, as well as I did, the right hon. Prime Minister telling the House that he had been called to Vancouver to meet the president of Germany and that this trip had been planned several months ago and that this debate was postponed until this week to accommodate the NDPs who were holding a convention last week. So you should at least be honest about those things.

Mr. Speaker, unity does not mean uniformity. Despite everything that distinguishes us, we must seek, find and develop the links that unite us. We will have to find a middle ground towards a new federalism, seek and find our own identity and build a country upon our common resources. We will have to build a country based on equity and understanding, justice and equality. This equality cannot be based on the balance of numbers. It will have to be based on a definition of this Canadian society which will be tolerant and respectful towards minorities, whether they are linguistic, cultural, social or economic minorities.

It took an electoral victory on November 15 last to make many Canadians consider the separation of Quebec as a threat and to force them to reassess our confederative pact in the light of the important part the French-speaking group has to play. We will have to define what we want, what we hope to find to ensure the existence of a united country where all classes of society, from the richest down to the poorest, can live fully and have their share of the tremendous wealth of our national heritage in every area, whether cultural, social or economic.

In 1963, Mr. Speaker, the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism stated the following: "Canada, without fully realizing it, is going through the greatest crisis in its history". Needless to say that this warning left most Canadians a little puzzled and sometimes unconcerned. The anglophone press namely overreacted to the comments of the authors of the report, as evidenced by its question: "What does Quebec want?"

Things have changed and this change came about in some cases by means of political violence, educational conflicts in several provinces, through a failure to understand the objectives of institutional bilingualism, regional and provincial opposition in linguistic matters at the local level and the gradual rise of the Quebec identity which now exists, Mr. Speaker. All that have led to the present debate on Canada and national unity. If I speak a bit sharply, Mr. Speaker, it is because I feel somewhat distressed. I think it is the word that sums up all others and the only one that can reflect the fears expressed by a group to which I belong and which, in my case, is the Francophone minority of Ontario.

Recently, speaking at the opening of the conference on the future of our country entitled Destiny Canada, Georges Ramsay-Cook, a history professor, said, and I quote:

> The Canada of 1867 was a nation composed of areas whose inhabitants wished to preserve their own identity within a common Canadian framework.

Professor Cook stresses the fact that this dual allegiance exists in all areas and, still according to him, there is no doubt that all Canadians, regardless of their area, cultural group, class or sex, refuse above all to be condemned to that permanent minority status and want Canada to give them the possibility of achieving relative equality. If a society is to be judged by the way in which it treats its minorities, whether linguistic, cultural, social or economic, the sense of equity, freedom and equality will have to be awakened in Canadians. We can no longer continue to witness, like helpless spectators, the deterioration of the situation, the tearing to shreds of the national fabric.

English Canada will have to be perceived in its actions as being big enough to deal with Francophone groups on an equal footing and recognize in them communities worthy of its respect and of assuming the place that is rightly theirs in every sphere of activity. That challenge will have to be met, Mr. Speaker, while asserting ourselves individually and collectively, and also respecting the rights of our fellow citizens of other origins. For some in the English provinces, that requirement does not seem essential, considering all the injustices that French-speaking Canadians have been subject to since the beginnings of Canada. If the famous question "What does Quebec want?" becomes as enigmatic as "What will happen in Quebec?", we are obviously facing a disquieting and disconcerting situation. What will happen in Quebec will be determined as much by what will happen in the other provinces in the next few years. Let us hope that the poor record of the English provinces to date will not prompt some to find other Plains of Abraham.

After 110 years, is it not appropriate to look seriously at past mistakes in order to correct them and build a country within which differences are considered an asset, a positive element and where experience serves to eliminate injustice? Of course, we need a new formula since after 110 years one of the partners is talking about separation or even divorce. What worries me about the possibility of separation with economic association, is not the sharing of assets or the financial settlement, but indeed who will be responsible for Lord Durham's heirs. Yes, what will happen to the linguistic minorities if Quebec separates from the rest of Canada? Some claim they will soon be assimilated. Others, that they will be used as hostages by both French Quebec and English Canada. Personally, I feel that chances are that we, the Canadian minorities, will become the Palestinians of North America.

As early as 1912, French-Canadians faced the same problem. Monsignor Langevin, a bishop from western Canada, opened the French Language Convention held from June 24 to 30, 1912, with these words, and I quote:

> As far as we are concerned, no one has the right to stop the French-Canadians at the boundary of the province of Quebec and tell them: Beyond this line, you are no longer at home . . . We are at home everywhere in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, those words still apply today. As I said earlier, we must study the matter from the point of view of the errors made with a view to correcting them, rather than dreaming up grandiose schemes or rely on more or less theoretical and often emotional formulae on national unity. Over the past ten years, institutional bilingualism and what it is supposed to achieve or provide for Canadians has been sufficiently promoted, it is now time to try to convince all Canadians that they have equal opportunities for self-fulfilment on cultural, social and economic levels, individually as well as collectively. There is a wide margin between institutional and individual bilingualism.

One of the greatest assets of Canada is the heritage bequeathed by two nations with different cultures and languages. On the other hand, I believe that the contribution of the other ethnic and cultural groups is an enrichment for the two founding nations. Canadians must become more tolerant and understanding. How many times, alas, have we not been aware of racial and cultural discrimination? And this always against minorities. What can be done? The rate of assimilation as far as my group is concerned, the French Canadians outside Quebec, is frightening. I note with concern that according to the 1971 statistics, 27 per cent of French Canadians have made a linguistic transfer and joined the majority group.

I have in hand the document from the Francophones outside Quebec, entitled: "The heirs to Lord Durham," and I quote:

> Comments. The trend is very clear. The regression of the French-speaking groups is dramatic. Nearly half a million Canadians of French origin do not have French as their mother tongue any longer: this is an almost irreparable loss.

This paper is, I think, well written and easy enough to read to make any willing listener understand that the situation is a critical one, a difficult one, a really dangerous one for Canada, my Canada, our country, Mr. Speaker. The rate of assimilation, as I said earlier, is accelerating to a critical point. French as a national language is in process of being relegated to the level of folklore and that, in seven Canadian provinces. Provincial bilingualism exists only in two Canadian provinces: Quebec and New Brunswick. All that is needed to understand the extent of the problems and the challenge that has to be taken up, is to read this document. If the existence, the survival and the promotion of Francophones outside Quebec does not become a Federal and other governments' priority, within ten years we will not have to be concerned about a bilingual Canada and even much less about a united Canada.

It is said in that particular document that 71 per cent of French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec will be assimilated by 1991. What will happen? We are going to die! We do not want to die and we will survive because this government, this Parliament will ensure to minorities in this country the respect and equity they are entitled to. As a matter of fact, in almost every province, these minority groups are represented through their provincial organization, whose role with governments is to let them know what the expectations of their members are. The financial resources of these organizations are not sufficient because of their very minority status and the relatively small number of their members. Up to now, the federal government have had a totally inadequate budget for supporting the work of these organizations. The provinces have only made token contributions to them. Therefore, without voluntary work, fund-raising campaigns and, let us admit it, the great dedication of these French-speaking Canadians, these minorities would soon disappear.

[Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier).]

Canada has an identity of its own, unequalled among other countries: a nation with two international languages and several cultures, which can work together because of their heritage and traditional features to produce results of the highest quality. Canada has a third important group in addition to French or English-speaking citizens: I am referring of course to our native people for whom we must show a lot of love, understanding and respect. They are entitled to retain their language, their traditions and their culture. I am referring as well to those Canadians who have deliberately left their country of origin to find a better place to live and a more promising future. These people have personally decided to adopt a new country.

It is true that many of these new Canadians, after deciding to settle down in this country, have generally chosen to speak English. It is also true that immigrants have not always been made aware of the presence of French-speaking Canadians nor have they been confronted with the French language or culture. For reasons which are easy to understand, the Canadian reality will have to be better explained as far as the official languages are concerned, so that they can choose to belong to the language group which seems most natural to them. We should no longer tell immigrants that Canada is an English-speaking country. We should not have them believe that the French language is only spoken in Quebec but we should explain to them that French and English are the official languages and they are considered equally by the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, if in the future, immigrants can only choose between French Quebec and English Canada, that would contribute to strengthen the false argument concerning the balkanization of the French language in Quebec while the English language is spoken in the rest of Canada. This argument today is called "separation by attrition".

Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest a few changes. I believe they are necessary: first in addition to a commitment to federal institutional bilingualism, all provinces should as Quebec and New-Brunswick already do, offer public services in both official languages. Our constitution needs to be rejuvenated. It should include for one thing a declaration of fundamental human rights and liberties. Each province should also adopt a charter which would respect the rights and liberties of its linguistic minorities and be liberal toward them.

Provincial governments are partially responsible for achieving goals of linguistic equality. All Canadian provinces without exception must ensure basic rights to education and must recognize and support by legislation the right of their citizens to be educated in one or the other official language. Moreover, provinces must encourage people to learn the other language and allow them to become bilingual if they so wish. The federal government should call on the provinces to clearly state within a year their intentions concerning the education, the rights and the matter of public communications of their French-speaking minorities. In all provinces there should be at least the right to live in one's mother tongue, the right for parents to have their children educated in the language of their choice when justified by number, the right to communicate with government and public agencies in the official language of their choice and the right to argue in court in one or the other official language.

In order to assist the provinces the federal government should offer them all legal and financial assistance needed. The situation in my opinion is so critical that if the provinces should positively refuse to do that, I would seriously consider the use of federal powers provided in section 91 of the British North America Act and for reasons of peace, order and security, to put under the protection of the law those minorities which are so essential to my country.

Second, it is essential that a public body consisting of a representative cross section of society be set up to consult with the people on the future of this country. The Prime Minister has proposed a formula and I agree with it.

Third, given the importance of the group and its need to exist in a united Canada, I believe it would be necessary to set up a national board responsible for the promotion, survival and development of the French-speaking communities outside Quebec. I am convinced and I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this board should report to the Prime Minister and, through him, to the House of Commons. The board would have to consult in order to work out concepts, plan and obtain approval for the programs required for the survival and development of minority groups.

Fourth, the Secretary of State should be immediately reorganized so as to foster the implementation of programs. The existing mechanisms set up following the decentralization and regionalization of that department will have to be reviewed. The minorities were not prepared for that, Mr. Speaker. They have been badly served in the last two or three years. The maturity of the minority groups and their mutual needs are so different that it was doing them a bad turn to expect them to take advantage of an organized regionalization or decentralization to meet the government standards which could not meet the needs of the flagging communities.

Fifth, the federal government and the provinces must absolutely give a new direction to their budgets to balance the survival chances of the linguistic minorities, more particularly the French-speaking minorities outside Quebec. What about a linguistic policy which seems to favour the English-speaking majority through a program called institutional bilingualism and which cost $300 million, when this minority group got only 1 per cent, that is $3 million up to this year? The government increased those credits to $6 million this year, and I think it was about time.

Sixth, we will have to bring the Canadian constitution back, but in the meantime we must get the heart and spirit of Canadians back so that we can write a social contract taking its inspiration from and reflecting our common expectations and wishes, free from any past illusion and based on respect, equity, and particularly fraternity between the groups.

Seventh, we have to review all our statutes at the municipal, regional, provincial and federal levels in order to put an end to those many frustrations which offend and annoy us continuously, Mr. Speaker. I think for instance of the simple fact that a French-speaking person who lives in Ontario, like myself, cannot write his will in his mother tongue and have it registered. This is not legal. I think of the Air Canada case. I think of the Forest case in Manitoba. I think of the Filion case in Toronto and of a great many other cases, Mr. Speaker. We will absolutely have to review our statutes to do away with injustice and frustrations.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I would like to read something which is fairly important in my constituency. It is a text written by someone who works in an area which I consider very important, namely children education. She wrote a creed for children. Her name is Mrs. Betty Nickerson, national coordinator of the All About Us/Nous Autres movement. I read this creed: We all come from somewhere, we chose Canada by adoption. In our cultural baggage we have the experience and the wisdom of the world.

Those choice morsels, chosen among the sterling values and traditions of our various peoples, we offer them in tribute to our new homeland. We leave behind us wounds, wars and famines. We live here in a vast and generous land, filled with challenges to be met. The ingeniosity we put forth in meshing our various cultural elements will help us develop an identity throughout this phase of our growth, and throughout our lives. Each one of us, within his own confines, will add a flash of colour to the Canadian mosaic. How are we going to fit all those pieces together? There lies the challenge. And that, Mr. Speaker, was written for children. I pay tribute to Mrs. Betty Nickerson.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, the preceding speaker spoke of love, and I suppose we shall need lots of love in this country if we are to make our way through to the 21st Century. I should like to talk tonight about some of the facts as I see them in Canada. Occasionally, and only occasionally, do we have a chance to speak in this House about the objectives and aims of the part of the country from which we come, not necessarily our own constituencies but the regions from which we come to represent people in the House of Commons.

I can quite understand the feelings of some of the comments of the hon. member from Quebec who spoke before the last speaker. I come from a part of the country which, frankly, at the present time feels misunderstood and is tired and frustrated coping with what seems to be an ongoing problem of Confederation. We in the west believe that while Quebec must play a part in Canada, that part must be kept in the proper perspective.

Canada is not so much a bilingual country with hyphenated English-Canadianism or French-Canadianism at it is a multicultural country composed of people of many different racial origins who, I believe, want nothing more than to be known as Canadians. The feeling in Canada as we move at times almost deliberately to pit one race against another is growing indifference and, in far too many cases, growing hostility. The reality is that Canadians do not understand each other. Perhaps our country is too large or too diverse, or perhaps we are all too preoccupied with making a living to really care. Or perhaps we are all victims of a prime minister who, for the last nine years, has been concerned solely with political survival.

Central Canada has spent the last half century producing people who are not British, who are not French, but are simply Canadians. The same process has been going on in Western Canada only for the last two decades. Western Canada has a different vision of this nation from the vision which central Canada holds. It arises from a different historical experience and perspective in Canada.

● (2130)

The settlement patterns of the east, New France, the maritime colonies, the Acadians and the Loyalists of Ontario were groups of people who settled, struggled, endured and finally, with a lasting tenacity took hold and survived. The roots are deep, unchangeable, unique and crystalized. From this pattern of accepted and established differences has come the concept of Canada as a bilingual and bicultural nation.

In the west the settlement pattern was not one of roots but rather waves, with each successive wave—Indians, French trappers, Scottish settlers, Hudson Bay Company employees, Ontario settlers, and European immigrants—inundating and sweeping over the former. This pattern produced, when the European homesteaders were gradually absorbed, a diluted pan-Canadianism, an optimistic vision of a country from coast to coast and a group of strangers who suffered great hardships, were forced to intermix and ultimately to grope toward a new awareness of themselves and their place in a new Canada.

The people of the west, the sons and daughters of those long trainloads of European immigrants, brought the vision of Canada peddled at the turn of the century. They believed in the unity of this country. They were certain that it was indivisible, that it had a destiny, and they were determined to build it. This concept or notion of one Canada seems to be out of fashion today. The federal government has launched a concept of duality. Everything now is divided into two—English-French, Canada-Quebec, Trudeau-Lévesque. Splitting or dividing has become part of the national fabric, and the people of the west, whose historical background led them to support an antiquated pan-Canadianism, find themselves trying to cope with a new official duality.

Suddenly Canada is two parts, each part fighting to secure its own position and power. The sons and daughters of those European immigrants find that they truly belong on neither side, conveniently forgotten in the fray. They are not French. With their strange last names, their family pasts and their older generations, they are not quite English either. In the growing division, they seem not to belong. With a sense of frustration and confusion, they argue using the old terminology. "We are Canadians", they say, hesitating to select the arbitrary French or English designation before the term.

[Mr. Murta.]

At the present time in Canada there appears to be no place in our national life for this vision held by the west. It appears hopelessly out of date—a remnant from a time when Canada was a young, enthusiastic nation. The eastern vision of Canada is one of duality. Certainly at the present it appears, on the basis of numerical superiority alone, that this vision will triumph. But out west where people feel isolated and removed, where they feel thrust out of the stream of national life—while the Quebec crisis consumes its second decade—there is a feeling of frustration, anger, sadness, and defeat.

Initially the people of the west were receptive to bilingualism, because they were told that it was the price to keep Canada together. Their belief weakens as Quebec drifts toward separation and a diminishing respect for the Canadian confederation. It is my opinion that the people of the west will, for the foreseeable future, be charged with bigotry. They will continue to be described by their own Prime Minister as ignorant rednecks, swearing at bilingual labels on cereal boxes. Their concept of one Canada will inevitably be read as an attempt to impose standardization on all Canadians, to assimilate all cultures and languages, and to force all minorities into one mold. It is not that simple. In reality the people of western Canada earnestly desire that every Canadian, whatever his language or culture, should feel some commitment to his country, some respect for its institutions, and some faith and trust in its future.

For anyone who takes the time to know and understand the people of the west, you will find them generous, frank, optimistic, and loyal. Today they are confused, afraid, skeptical, and isolated. If the federal government could only treat the west as part of this nation and make a serious attempt to explain to them the necessity for its actions, the whole national fabric might be a little bit closer, and a little warmer.

Of all the areas in Canada the west would be most receptive to changes in the structure of Confederation, but the extent of such changes must be carefully studied before they are agreed to. We cannot give away all our heritage and forget all our past in an effort to preserve a territorial unity which may prove to be incapable of preservation. Rather, we must see how far we can go without losing the identity we have now. If we go beyond a certain point, we are no longer Canada. If, as we believe, there are millions in this country who want Canada to remain in being, then we must be ready to pay a price. If we must pay that price, we must also be determined that Canada will continue to exist as a country.

We have a future if our desire, dedication, and sense of nationhood are strong enough. All parts of this country must be represented, all parts of this country must be listened to and understood.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (2140)

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, we have been hearing a lot about separatism since the Parti Québécois victory in November. Allow me to make some observations on this matter of national unity. The importance of this subject to us all can scarcely be exaggerated.

I think if the English speaking world keeps telling the Parti Québécois, in their struggle for the future hearts and minds of the Quebecers, that they cannot make a go of it economically without us, it may only stiffen their resolve to have a try at it. We must remember that Quebec with its some six million people is, by the standards of the countries that belong to the United Nations, far more populated than most of them and, of course, has much greater territory. Norway, for example, is a well respected country with only four million people.

It may be that economics will defy René Lévesque's siren song of separatism and that it might founder badly on economic shoals in terms of fearful economic cost to the people of Quebec, as I would guess would likely be the case. A 1971-72 study showed Quebec received a surplus of $600 million from the federal government. André Raynault, a past president of the Economic Council of Canada, estimated some months ago that Quebec was now receiving about $1.5 billion more than it gave to the federal government; and we all have read that on February 25 the Quebec government released a study which purports to show that between 1961 and 1975 the federal government collected $4.3 billion more from Quebec than it spent in that province. The accuracy and implications of these figures will be debated for months.

The notion though that Quebec has nothing to offer in economic advantages except cheap labour and natural resources is, to say the least, exaggerated. The market of that province is now rich and sophisticated. The work force is, for the most part, more skilled than that in the Atlantic provinces, and certainly no longer cheap. I would guess that the indigenous capacity for innovation in technology is as great as anywhere in Canada.

Of course, the Parti Québécois is banking a good deal, so far as the economic aspects of its strategy for selling separatism are concerned, on the continuance of a Quebec-Canada customs union. One cannot, in fact, be sure that an arrangement of this sort would be attractive to English speaking Canadians if Quebec goes its own way politically. I find it highly unlikely that two such nations would be able to agree on a central bank issuing common currency and having a monetary union, as Lévesque mentioned in his New York speech, or that they would be able to agree to a common level of tariff. I am sure that the rest of Canada would not consent to giving a new nation of Quebec a veto over these kinds of matters.

An article some months ago by John Downs in the Financial Times points out the importance to Quebec employment of industries like textiles, clothing and footwear heavily protected with tariffs. Canadians from coast to coast, of course, pay for this protection when they buy garments and shoes in the stores. We in the maritimes have constantly been critical of the high cost of Canada to us because of the highly protective tariff in Quebec as well as in Ontario. Between them, Ontario and Quebec account for more than 80 per cent of the manufacturing output and employment in Canada.

According to a study by the Economic Council of Canada, about 37 per cent of the manufacturing jobs in Quebec and 27 per cent in Ontario are dependent on tariff protected sales to other provinces. We, like other Canadians, have reluctantly accepted tariffs as a means of keeping our fellow citizens in these jobs but, of course, there is no assurance that the political equation would be seen in the same terms if Quebec separated.

However, let us not underestimate the leadership of the Parti Québécois, who have among their members at least a couple of prominent economists. They are aware that the plight of many of Quebec's most vulnerable industries can only be solved by radical surgery, hacking out, as it were, the inappropriate sectors to make way for others of higher productivity. They might be reasoning that this operation would be better performed in circumstances where Ottawa, by shaping English Canada's trade policy vis-à-vis Quebec, would have to do all the dirty work and receive most of the blame.

I think if we were to underrate the possibility and the shrewdness of such manoeuvres, we would be making a big mistake. In any case the very nature of the separatist movement, based upon an old idea of independence, fed by a very strong emotional stream and bolstered by a charismatic leader like Lévesque, who is backed by probably the brainiest cabinet that now exists in any province of Canada, makes its followers rich in potential for self-sacrifice. An old endemic idea of independence, strongly backed by a torrent of emotion and a new found political power, must not be taken lightly by anybody who professes to love this country.

What I am trying to say is that what English speaking Canada must appreciate is that the Parti Québécois has managed to become the focus of the new pride of many French Canadians, their society and its achievements, and thus the calculation of gain from a particular constitutional system is going to be more than a matter of economic arithmetic. The Parti Québécois have, in fact, done what all colonized people, or people who have seen themselves to be colonized, have done: they have sought independence to give their colonists self-esteem. They will find, as others have found, that self-esteem can bring a high economic cost, but again I remind us all not to underestimate the potential for sacrifice in such a movement.

In the immediate months and years ahead, all of us in Canada must try to be wise and civilized to an extent that we may not have reached before if we want our national affairs to evolve toward a successful conclusion, instead of into the kind of strife that has done such unbelievable harm in places like northern Ireland, Cyprus, and Lebanon. In the ongoing debate, strident voices, in their zeal to defend Canada, or English speaking Canada, would do well to remember the fundamentals of good manners.

In this connection it was sad to hear the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), who aspires to be Prime Minister of this country, quoted as making the observation some months ago that he would not rule out completely the use of force to hold Quebec in Canada. My guess is that all thinking Canadians want the potential use of force to be completely excluded from the thinking and talking of all members of parliament and most especially aspiring prime ministers.

I think it is clear in the recent past that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who in the 1960's made a valiant, well-intentioned effort to bridge Canada's two solitudes, to use that apt phrase coined by the Cape Breton born Hugh Maclennan in his novel of the same name, has been too inflexible in dealing with some of the constitutional difficulties as they relate to Quebec as a unique province in our Confederation. He has been inclined at times to hit Quebecers over the head with seemingly inflexible interpretations of the British North America Act. At the same time, in his well-intentioned bilingual policy his government has succeeded in alienating many English speaking Canadians by pressing bilingual policies in areas where English Canadians are in a very dominant majority, and by refusing to take constructive criticism, at least until recently, on how the bilingual approach might be radically altered for the future good of Canada. Admittedly, some of this criticism on my part is hindsight.

The Prime Minister seems prepared to gamble that the kind of federalism which he has always pursued can win a straight intellectual confrontation with Mr. Lévesque's idea of independence. But, as I have implicitly suggested, the fight may be more emotional than intellectual, and in that regard the Parti Québécois may well have the upper hand. I think it is important to point out that perhaps neither the independence as outlined by the Parti Québécois, nor the federalism as presently practised, responds to Quebec's needs.

Around the House of Commons it was constantly pointed out after the Parti Quebecois victory in Quebec that only 41 per cent of the people of Quebec voted for the Parti Québécois. The assumption is that only half of those who voted really wanted separatism. What this type of observation neglects to state is that none of the parties which contested the November election, including the provincial Liberals, favoured the kind of inflexible federalism traditionally expounded by the Prime Minister.

Whether or not the Prime Minister, or English speaking Canada, like the notion, Quebec's political leaders have moved away from that style of federalism in which Quebec is a province just like the others. I do not think that patriation of the constitution, or the whole question of the future of the constitution, should have the highest priority in the national debate now, but rather the debate should be on how to get over a million Canadians back to work in good jobs, and get rid of the AIB with the proper decontrol mechanism. However, what may be needed by the time Mr. Lévesque holds his referendum is some means to permit constitutional options, rather than extremes of separatism or the existing form of federalism.

On the nation's economic input toward the intensification of the Quebec separatist movement, the present government must be held responsible for the some 10 per cent unemployment that exists in that province. Probably at least 40 per cent of the young people in Quebec between the ages of 16 to 22 are suffering the effects of unemployment generated in large part by the failure of the present government's economic policy. This government has certainly managed to mismanage our national economy, and we in the Atlantic region and our fellow citizens in Quebec share the legacy of those policy failures as shown by our extraordinarily high unemployment. Little wonder that a tenured, separatist, professional elite at the University of Montreal and other Quebec universities, as well as teachers at the high school level, find willing ears amongst young Quebec students as they advocate their separatist ideas.

It seemed to be a most chastened and humble Prime Minister talking to us on national unity today in the House rather than the arrogant man who was telling us, as recently as last year, that separatism was dead in his native province of Quebec. As our leader, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), said earlier today, we in the New Democratic Party offer Canadians a positive option. This means a federal government committed to national programs aimed at cultural and economic equality, and political and economic independence for Canada.

The New Democratic Party underlines its determination to defend and promote the position of our official languages and the multiplicity of our cultures.

The NDP urges all Canadians to share this vision of a fairer, independent Canada, and to join with us in establishing the national policy priorities needed to overcome this present crisis.

Therefore, on this national unity question, our party has resolved: First, that while the NDP believes the people of Quebec have the right to make their choice without coercion, we strongly support a federal Canada and are confident that the majority of Quebecers will decide to remain within Canada.

Second, the NDP recognizes that some constitutional reforms are necessary but affirms that it is not by constitutional amendment alone that we will solve the national unity problem. We believe it essential for the federal parliament to maintain sufficient power for effective national economic policies to build a fairer, freer Canada. As one from the Atlantic region, I believe very strongly in this concept of our party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) is seeking the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I regret to have to rise on a point of order but I think this is a very important debate in which we are all participating, a debate which every member of the House should be able to throw his heart into and speak from his gut. According to Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, Citation 144, it is the rule of both Houses of Parliament that a member must address the House orally and not read from a written, previously prepared speech, because if the practice of reading speeches should prevail, members might read speeches that were written by others and take up the time of the House.

I have noted that each of the last four speeches has been read in the House. I think the rules should be enforced, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I accept the hon. member's point of order. It has been a long standing practice of the House that speeches not be read and, as the hon. member said, made with "gut" feeling. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) was perhaps referring to notes. I am sure he will conclude his remarks, as the hon. member said, with "gut" feeling.

Mr. Hogan: I use the same kind of notes as the Prime Minister was using this afternoon.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) was using as well.

Mr. Rodriguez: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Earlier today the leader of the hon. member who has raised this point of order read his speech from notes, and so did the Prime Minister this afternoon.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He had a full text which some of us had in front of us.

Mr. Rodriguez: An so did the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). If hon. members are allowed to stand up on points of order of this sort every time a Conservative member in the House reads his speech, we would be up constantly on points of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond has the floor.

Mr. Hogan: The New Democratic Party rejects the current policies of the Conservatives and Liberals which would give more power to the richer provinces, a step which will balkanize Canada and provide for increasing disunity. With notes or without notes I can say that, my friend.

Third, the NDP reiterates its determination to defend and promote the position of both French and English, our two official languages, and the multiplicity of our cultures which enrich and strengthen our national fabric, and further recognizes that the existence of a bilingual Canada depends on the presence of a Quebec where the language of work is French, just as English is the language of work in most of the other provinces.

Fourth, that in implementing existing national programs, and in the development of new ones—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is at the end of his speech. In view of the unfortunate interruption surely he should be allowed to finish.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I think there was about a minute and a half of interruptions. Perhaps the hon. member should be allowed extra time.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hogan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank hon. members for their kindness in view of the inconsiderate interjection.

Fourth, that in implementing existing national programs, and in the development of new ones, the NDP stresses the importance of delegating much administrative authority to the provinces and affirms the need for the federal government, in co-operation with provincial governments, to devise new policies and structures that will respond more sensitively to regional needs and aspirations and permit the people of all regions and provinces to achieve their economic and cultural goals within one Canada.

Finally, fifth, that in continuing relationships between the federal and provincial governments an attitude of serious co-operation would replace that of confrontation which has characterized Ottawa's approach for the past decade.

Vive le Canada libre—long live a free Canada!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I will abide by the rules of the House since I have no written speech before me. If it is so, it is because any member of the House who wants to participate in such a debate can recite a series of impressive statistics or rely upon a series of statements made by university people, newspapermen or perhaps even politicians; or else he can do as I decided to do, that is rely on personal impressions after having travelled throughout this country.

When we listen to the comments of many hon. members, we notice that words like: price to pay, 15 November. We hear stereotyped words which have come to sound like clichés, like in Quebec where we have developed clichés like sovereignty-association, special status, government of Quebec sole representative of francophones in this country. We have invented the expression cultural sovereignty. We were quite in advance in the making of some clichés.

On the other hand, the Anglophones, if cataloguing is allowed, were the staunchest champions of the cliché "What does Quebec want?" If in 1977 we still hear it, if in the minds of the people of Windsor whom I visited no more than two months ago, if in the minds of the people of Calgary where I was some four weeks ago, if in the minds of the people of Picton, and the minds of the people here and there throughout Canada, the question still persists "What does Quebec want?", I wonder just how in earnest the hon. members were, regardless of their political party, who voted and then fought for the Official Languages Act.

The Canadian reality, Mr. Speaker, appears to me to be something like this: on the one hand, we have a people that is slightly surprised, and on the other, a people that is impatient; surprised because it is true that until 1962 the people of Quebec, probably because of the collective decision it made, had refused to become educated collectively. However, since Jean Lesage, since 1962, it can be said that that failing was remedied; and besides, up to 1962, we were not the only people in Canada who had not taken great advantage of a department of education. There were other provinces, whose names I shall not mention, in the very same situation. Now, the truth about the years 1967, 1968, and 1969 proves that in Quebec, in Canada, French Canadians are every bit as well educated; that French Canadians are as scientifically, technologically equipped as the English-speaking Canadians. The time has come therefore for the Anglophones to accept institutional bilingualism; not only must they accept the fact that 27 per cent of civil servants should be francophones, but they must also accept the French fact in this country not as a Quebec reality but as a Canadian reality.

● (2200)

Francophones must be recognized not only in government institutions but also at the Royal Bank. They must accept that there be as many anglophones as francophones with MBAs, that there is room for them in the pipeline projects, in Calgary, Edmonton or Toronto. Members of parliament on either side of the House must defend energetically these lofty principles but, as the Prime Minister was saying, they must sell their convictions in their own ridings and come to grips with the problems, but I fear that they do it halfheartedly. And that is not good enough, Mr. Speaker. It is true that national unity is necessary.

Quebec's independence would be as bad for English Canada as for French Canada. I think the two provinces that can least afford to separate are Quebec and Ontario. Together, these two provinces account for 75 per cent of the manufactured goods produced in this country. As far as Quebec is concerned, we make the other provinces pay our manufactured goods 10 per cent more than they would pay elsewhere. Ontario makes the rest of the country pay its manufactured goods 7.5 per cent more than they would pay elsewhere. Some people suggest that the cause of Quebec separatism, of Quebec frustration is an economic one, others submit that bilingualism was implemented in a way that was unacceptable, that a committee should be appointed to solve the problem. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that since the coming of Pierre Elliott Trudeau, the Canadian who most ably describes the Canadian situation, those opposite have not yet grasped Canada's real problem, and appointing joint committees of the Senate and the House of Commons is sheer nonsense.

I am 100 per cent in favour of the suggestion made by my colleague from Portneuf (Mr. Bussières) that some sort of constituent assembly be established, with people coming from all parties in this House, all political parties in provincial legislatures, and representatives from municipalities, labour, universities and business. I feel that such a body would have many advantages. First, it would preclude any partisan views such as we have heard in this debate this afternoon. It would also have the advantage of truly involving the people in such a public debate.

I challenge 20 per cent of the hon. members to tell me what one fiscal point is worth in each province. People want a change. Nobody is satisfied with the status quo. Some chose the easy way out, that of urging decentralization, as this pleases everyone. My friends, if we decentralize as much as the Parti Québécois would have us, we would be compounding the problem. If we accepted that easy formula, with five provinces below the national average, we would be going against the basic principle of Canadian federalism, which is to fight regional inequalities. And yet, Mr. Speaker, no one seems able to give a precise definition of that easy solution of decentralizing. No one. Some people refer to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, others to immigration, but it varies from one province to another and even sometimes the same man has different views as he changes locations. I, for one, think that the real answer, Mr. Speaker, is to gather a group of men who will do some research, who will first of all analyse the present formula of federalism, study all the announcements concerning the constitutional issue made by the greatest Canadian of all, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, since he became Minister of Justice in 1966.

They will see, and I am referring now to Quebecers, that one must make a distinction between French-speaking Canadians, the government which really represents them and the importance to be granted to the Quebec government. I believe that if we have French-speaking Canadians, whether from Quebec or elsewhere who are making a full contribution to this House, no provincial government can rightly pretend to be the only one to represent any minority or any majority in Canada. I suggest that provincial governments, and as long as we shall not be more specific in terms of language, Mr. Speaker, we shall tend to say, like some old colleagues or former provincial ministers who were standing as champions of this philosophy, that the Quebec government should defend French-speaking Canadians throughout the country. Well, I tell them: "You fell right into the trap." Since 1970 or as early as 1966, the Quebec government and even now Peter Lougheed have caught the germ.

When the federal government administers a jurisdiction in a way they do not like, instead of criticizing it, they say: "We will take over your jurisdiction." It is somewhat like a company where there are four partners who have invested the same funds. They assume different responsibilities at the beginning, but when they realize that one is slower than the others, they say to him: "Listen, you have the same privileges as ours, but we will take over your responsibilities." The three others are overburdened and everyone becomes less efficient.

The answer Mr. Speaker is to call those individuals together and advise them that in Canada some rights are not negotiable. The best way to deal with the problem is to include the amended legislation on the official languages into the new Canadian constitution. We must dedicate ourselves forever to the purposes of this government, to this level of government, to the equality of both languages, to the equality of both cultures. We must consecrate the basic principle of redistribution of wealth and equality of men, whatever their sex, their language, their colour, before the law and institutions.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, whether one is a French-speaking Quebecer, an English-speaking Ontarian, or a Zulu, as far as all the rest of the problems in Canada is concerned, I think that when it comes to the development of territories, economic problems, the solution may have pretty well the same name, whether it is in Vancouver or in Montreal. Mr. Speaker, if for that matter we had programs in this country to promote exchanges, to allow the people of Newfoundland who are more different from the people of Calgary than I am from a guy from Toronto, if we get programs so Canadians would know one another, understand one another better, I am convinced that it might not be necessary to discuss those problems of Canadian unity.

Well, Mr. Speaker, and briefly, I subscribe to the formula proposed by my colleague for Portneuf (Mr. Bussières) and since this government has a proposal or a motion in that sense, that approaches this proposal, I will support it without reservations. And when we see those people, the only question we will have to ask them, Mr. Speaker, will be this: In Canada, we have three levels of government—municipal, provincial and federal. Which one is in a better position to administer most effectively such or such a power? Let us stop seeing in magic and easy formulas the solution of tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker, we only have to think that we are facing in Canada the same problems as all industrialized countries in the world. The two main ones are energy and the economy. In the nine years to come, Canada will have to spend $120 billion in the public and private sectors in energy development. Only $10 million will go to the James Bay project, $4 million will go to the tar sands, and the rest of this sum will be spent in the Northwest Territories and the Arctic.

In all objectivity, can we think that it is possible to have ten or eleven energy policies in Canada? We are in a privileged situation in the economic sector while we are talking about unemployment and inflation, and in 1982 and 1983, according to the reports of the Economic Council of Canada and most economists in our universities, we will have to face some alternatives. Around 1985, our unemployment problem could become a lack of manpower. At that time, we will be able to re-orient our manpower to less efficient and less competitive sectors, and I believe that Quebec will benefit greatly if we can apply the strategy that our Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and our Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) are now developing and introducing. Mr. Speaker, if we state the issue clearly to these people on the basis of the interests of Canadian citizens rather than on the basis of the political partisanship of the various parties or of the various provincial governments, I believe that Canada and Canadians, whether they be French-speaking or English-speaking, will have a marvelous future.

I am thinking of people my age. This might be the last comment that I make this evening. For my part, I have never really suffered from what the English Canadians have left as a legacy of the Plains of Abraham. Perhaps I was brought up in a privileged environment? Perhaps I have something of an advantage? However, Mr. Speaker, I believe that it would be a good idea for young Quebeckers and members of the opposition to go see them like we, the Liberals, are doing. Young Quebeckers are open. They want to know who are their neighbours and their brothers from the rest of the country.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I shall repeat what I said in Picton about a month ago: When a Frenchman lands in Dorval, we have a tendency to tell him: Welcome, cousin! I can hardly wait for the day when the Anglophones of this country tell me sincerely when I come to see them: Welcome, my brother.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, Gladstone said that if he were to make a speech of ten or 15 minutes he needed about six weeks' notice. My hon. colleagues will be upset to learn that I was told of my impending intervention very late. I think they should be glad that there is a time allocation on my speech.

Some people who belong to service clubs—I do not want to be unfair—sing of brotherhood on Mondays and tell racial jokes on Tuesdays. As we reflect on what we say in these days when we are thinking about national unity, I suppose we realize that we should be thinking about our country every day. Things might be said that are blunt and direct—and why should they not be—but which are in no case hurtful of any individual. It is in this context that I want to say one or two things about the country and what I think about it.

On Friday evening, July 1, 60,000 or 70,000 people stood in the rain outside this building on grounds that are a part of the complex of Parliament Hill, waiting to make a commitment by a national anthem upon which we are apparently still unable to agree. They wanted to make this commitment to Canada. In a way they were lucky, although I would not have traded where I was on July 1 for being here. I was in a smaller place, but where the evocation of Canada was just as strong in feeling if not in numbers.

Reflecting on those 60,000 or 70,000 people it seemed to me they were representative of all of us who could not be here. I think in a way parliament is a commitment—not really "in a way"—we do have a commitment to people who wait outside, outside in all places in this country. This is an institution that curiously watches other institutions of our country reform themselves, yet does not seem to be able to find a formula not only to cope with its own business but for a new constitutional arrangement for the country.

I heard a wise, new member of parliament say in caucus that she was uncomfortable with the "we/they" focus of some of the debate on unity. It was a curious and very sensitive observation. I think there is too much of the "we/they" going on in our country. As we debate our future can we not do it as Canadians, not good guys and bad guys, federalists and others, but as Canadians who in different ways and with different talents care very deeply about our country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: I suppose almost all of us—at least we say all of us, I have heard it endlessly since November 15—say that we do not opt for the status quo. If we do not opt for the status quo and if we use logic—I know that is dangerous—then we need some new arrangement.

I am going to flatter myself and some others who suggested some new arrangements to the government and to parliament. We tabled those suggestions in this House five years ago. It is interesting to see some of the suggestions made by a former joint committee after its travels across the country now having the character of imprimatur on government departments and secretariats. I hope, as we reflect upon the new committee, that some of the things the former committee did will prove useful as a frame of reference. The recommendations of that joint committee are impressively current and imaginative. A new committee could use them as the basis for a fresh examination of the issue.

Saul Bellow wrote a book entitled "Journey to Jerusalem". He mentioned the preoccupation of Israel was survival. As an artist and writer he felt some alarm that a country he admires was committing itself so totally to survival that all the other essential components for Israel were lost sight of. Although we can thank God that Canada does not have external threats, we obviously have internal threats. I hope that national unity does not become such an oppressive preoccupation of government that all the other attributes of citizenship are lost sight of.

A week ago when I asked a minister about a certain policy direction—I do not doubt his motives—he replied that national unity was the preoccupation of his department and that the particular decision I referred to would have to wait. Other questions flow from that answer. I warn colleagues that it will not be useful for our countrymen to engage in this debate if it becomes an excuse for inactivity on the part of government. There is a danger to Canada in this preoccupation with the theme of national unity, the danger that the theme will be used as an excuse to postpone other essential decisions governments must make. I will not list them because we are under a time constraint, but other members have spoken of questions in the economic, social and cultural sphere which await government action.

As the cabinet chooses the direction we are to take as a country, I hope it will opt for a population vibrant and alive as it was ten years ago, vibrant and alive in the way my leader mentioned and in the way it was during the phenomenom of Expo in 1967 on our one hundredth birthday. That will be one of the tests of the government. I hope the criterion by which we measure this test will be much broader than the government's mere responsibility to maintain national unity.

I have another comment to make. I am worried by some of the inward-looking aspects of this debate. What are people in the world thinking about this country, as we go about this agony, as we expose ourselves and our agonies to the world? One wonders if it matters. Personally, I believe very much that this country's survival matters to the world outside Canada.

If I may say so without presumption, during my public career I have looked at the pluses of democracy, so to speak. I remember what happened as Greece overthrew the colonels. We have watched in the last few months a remarkable transformation in Spain. First there was a referendum, then we saw a democratically elected government. No voter under age 64 had ever voted before in Spain. I allude to those two examples, and to India. Actually we saw another example of the negation of the rule of law yesterday in another Commonwealth country. Therefore I say we in this country have a kinship with those in the world on the side of democratic institutions. Those people care how we arrange our institutions, how we respond to this country's challenges, to see if we can find a way, with mutual understanding and good will, to make what I used to call a precious experiment. Then a friend said precious is not a good enough word; we must call it a noble experiment, because this country, make no mistake about it, is a noble experiment in sharing.

One of the elements of federalism is the sharing of powers. Crude people call it sharing the pie. One could use other examples; I hope I am not offending anybody. Perhaps somebody in this debate has talked about sharing the pie. "Pie" is not a bad metaphor. It means the pie of Canada. But there is another essential element, reconciliation. George Woodcock spoke about it in his little book about Canada, written at the time of the centenary. He spoke of the two elements essential to the working of a federal system, sharing and reconciliation. I am sorry to say I have seen little evidence lately in this country of the ability to reconcile.

There are, by latest count, only a dozen or a dozen and a half federal systems in the world. Perhaps the experts can confirm my figures. Perhaps the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) can. I am not certain of my figures, but I do not suppose there are more than a dozen or 15 federal states in the world. Those of us who believe in the federal system have a tremendous responsibility to show the world that the system works and is the best system for a country of the size and diversity of this one where more than one language is spoken.

Let me end on this note. Surely the language aspect of this debate has been immensely complicated by the fact that many in this country have not yet accepted another language as a learning experience. To many people other languages have been associated with emotional experiences, presumably because of fear or threats, or because of insensitivity in the application of the Official Languages Act, as my leader said.

I do not suppose my short contribution will be remembered, but it is on record, and nobody can do anything about that. I make a plea for this noble experiment, almost unique in the world of federalism, this noble experience we share with only a dozen or so other states, and it is this: let us maintain the two essential elements of the experiment at all times. Let us not have one versus the other, but both. Let us foster the ability of governments and people to share and to reconcile, for if those elements are missing our unity is in trouble.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, it is an honor and a privilege for me as a member of this House to take part in this important debate on national unity. Is it possible to live together in Canada in each of our two large linguistic and cultural communities? Can each one be respectful of the rights, dignity and existential needs of the other? Is this not an important and basic principle in this country? Historically, for over a century, has this principle been reasonably respected? The negative answer to this question explains in part the present unrest in our Canadian society. Therefore, it has become important and indeed vital in order to correct this situation, to improve the way our Confederation operates, and to prevent the splitting of our country, to change some of our attitudes and offer a third option between separation and status quo.

I do not think I am being overnationalistic and on the contrary I believe I am being realistic and objective in laying the blame on the English speaking community in this country for not respecting, as it may and should have done, the French speaking community, in the course of this first century of Confederation. If English Canadians had agreed to treat French Canadians as equals, if they had dealt with them without a complex of superiority and if they had carried out with them a relationship based on respect and dignity all over this country and in all areas of human endeavour we would not be witnessing today the withdrawal on its own territory of a people, a dangerously high proportion of whom, now believes that it is the only way to preserve its language, culture and community and we would not be facing today this threat of assimilation of the French speaking minority outside Quebec into the English speaking Canadian melting pot.

If the West had been more receptive to the efforts and representations of my right honorable predecessor as representative of the Drummond constituency in the House of Commons, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who having later become prime minister of Canada, pleaded the French Canadian cause in the newly formed provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan and if Manitoba had not literally eliminated the language of its pioneers by banishing French from its schools, courts and legal books, if Ontario had refrained from forbidding the use of French in the schools of its minority who at the beginning of the century numbered in the thousands! If in the Maritime they have earlier given full recognition to the important French-speaking minority by officially acknowledging the French language and culture, giving people full access to all levels of education in their mother tongue, in other words, if our two communities outside Quebec had coexisted on equal terms, if only they had coexisted!

It seems to me that the frustration of French Canadians is well justified when we consider the privileged lot that the French-speaking majority in Quebec reserved at that time for its important English-speaking minority which, in addition, always dominated on the economic level. And recently, the no compromise attitude of the CALPA and CATCA concerning air bilingualism, and the defeatist attitude of Donald Creighton who said "No more concessions" to Quebec certainly do not contribute to improve the situation. If on one hand some changes in attitude and mentality are needed, and they are justified by the historic background that I just depicted, fortunately we now see evidence of those changes, on the other hand the fact that a majority, a part I should say of the present French-speaking community is prepared to forget all about Canada seems to me basically unfair and inappropriate, for their ancestors as well as for their descendants, for themselves and for their fellow citizens who want to maintain the unity of our country. Our forefathers gave us examples of fight and courage, not of defeat. What an insult to those who have built and protected this beautiful and great country if we let go a large part of territory with all its ressources and if we let our French-speaking brothers and sisters outside Quebec alone to defend their cultural and linguistic heritage. What a denial of justice to our children who have a right to those huge material and cultural resources which we will abandon on their behalf without their authorisation. What a shame if we were to deprive them of the noble right to realize themselves the great challenge of diversity when they attain their majority.

Most young people see the world and things around them in quite a different way. Those young people openly express in many ways that they disagree with the value system generally accepted by our generation. They reject materialism and they often renounce the comfort to develop nature worship. They believe in a better world where there would be more room for fraternity, social conscience, love, liberty and peace.

Can we spare them the scandal of this useless ravage of a country in an affluent society and in the eyes of a world far more complex to whom it is repugnant to show this example of a social failure? For those who might be tempted to separate, what masochism! Why give in to frustration in a reaction so exaggerated that it might deprive them not only of an invaluable good but, as well, in the present state of affairs, would gain them the qualification of renegade? Are not the French Canadian people a hard working, tenacious and courageous people? Is it not prepared to share since its generosity is proverbial? Does not its great jovial humour make it one of the most sociable? Does not its prudence incite it to let someone else bear the burden of the proof of a better condition, those who, through interest or opportunism, want to break the country to try and create another one?

And what treason, Mr. Speaker, in respect of all French Canadians in Quebec and in other provinces who chose to work towards the achievement of equality of our two linguistic groups, within the federal government or outside it, while respecting Canadian unity! Why abandon the remarkable work of the Trudeaus, Marchands, Pelletiers and others?

The courage French Canadians have shown through difficult times and the measure of success they have met with in Ottawa and elsewhere over the last 10 years in particular warrant us to persevere, to believe in our fulfilment and to strive for it in harmony with our English-speaking fellow Canadians. The important thing, therefore, as the distinguished Secretary to the Cabinet for Federal-Provincial Relations, Gordon Robertson recently pointed out, is that our two communities really make it their goals to promote the co-existence of two languages and various cultures in this country in a climate of mutual generosity and complete equality".

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, I must emphasize the fact that attitudes have to change and a better understanding must develop between French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians if this country is to be kept united and that is possible! But I feel that we would be deluding ourselves to think that those changes of attitude so long overdue would be enough. The preservation of national unity also calls for a renewed federation: the anglophone community must agree wholeheartedly to such changes which will adequately protect and fully promote the French language and culture in Quebec. Moreover, all Canadians must soon accept the necessity of providing all minority groups, from everywhere in Canada, with the best guarantees possible ensuring them equal status and development opportunities.

In this spirit, Mr. Speaker, why not at the same time bring our constitution back unilaterally and make an official declaration of principle through a joint resolution of the Canadian Parliament and Senate? Having exclusive control over our own constitution, would it not be a symbolic affirmation that has now become timely and necessary? How long do we still have to wait uselessly to get out of what our Canadian Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) properly calls a "constitutional impasse that has frustrated governments of all political persuasions, both federal and provincial, for nearly 50 years"? Would it not be time to put an end to a unique and hardly enviable distinction of our country, that is the need to go before the British Parliament, the Parliament of another country, to change such and such basic aspect of our constitution?

But there are priorities of a less tangible kind that are important when human societies are buffeted by the uncertainties and the attacks on confidence that we find in the world of today. Affirmations of national will and indications of collective determination to renew and strengthen faith in structures and in values that unite people are symbolic, but they are important. Such a symbolic affirmation occurred, I think when the Parliament of Canada adopted our national flag. Does anyone doubt it has strengthened our sense of being "Canadian" or of being united for important purposes? A similar symbolic affirmation could occur if we were seen to attest our faith in our form of government by ending a defect that has flawed it for decades. We should not be seen constantly to be failing as a people in a matter that relates to the central structure of our national fabric. In short, it is well worth some attention from this parliament to conclude this long outstanding piece of national business.

This is the idea expressed by the right hon. Prime Minister in the House on April 9, 1976, before the election in Quebec of a government committed to independence or separation. In view of this acknowledged objective of the PQ government, the unanimous consent of the provinces on an amending formula for the constitution seems to me illusive before the referendum they promised to hold has taken place.

It is evident that in the circumstances this unilateral patriation would not be done in a way that could bring changes in the distribution of powers or in the position of the provinces. Speaking about the unilateral patriation of the constitution, the Prime Minister of Canada said that if unanimous provincial consent is impossible to achieve "it must not provide any means by which Parliament could act unilaterally in future in any area where it cannot do so today since that would erode the essence of our federal system". We will have to accompany the unilateral patriation with a temporary amendment formula providing for unanimous consent to change sections of the constitution which cannot be changed now in Canada without the unanimous consent of the provinces, while waiting to find more flexible and more comprehensive means to amend our constitution: this would result in the fact that a principle centred in London would be replaced by the principle of consensus in Canada.

We would have to take the advantage of the procedure concerning this unilateral patriation of our constitution to reaffirm clearly in a formal declaration of principles the undertaking of the Canadian Parliament and of the Senate, while exercising their power under the constitution, first to avoid any action likely to jeopardize the maintenance and development of French language and culture, and to take all possible means to preserve and develop it; second, to avoid any action likely to jeopardize the equality of status and the opportunities for development of minorities in Canada, and to find out all possible means to preserve the same equalities; third, to promote the same opportunities for all people who live in Canada, to ensure their well-being and to encourage economic development in order to reduce social and financial inequalities between people, wherever they live in Canada.

This federal declaration of principles, Mr. Speaker, accompanying the unilateral patriation of our constitution, would thus clarify the intention of the Parliament and the Canadian Senate concerning the rights of French-speaking people, minorities, individual freedom and regional disparities in Canada. This clear and official declaration, accompanying the great symbolic affirmation of our constitution patriation, would influence and induce those attitude changes I have already mentioned and which are so desirable, even necessary for Canada's survival.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding I humbly suggest that my proposition, if implemented, would have the effect of paving the way for the two essential conditions for the safeguard of the Canadian unity: changing our attitudes and our institutions. Indeed, they would first enable us to influence and induce attitude changes, the feelings and magnanimity needed by our two linguistic and cultural communities so they can realize a great common goal: co-existence in conditions of reciprocal generosity and complete equality. And secondly, it would also offer a third alternative besides separation and status quo, in giving rise to a symbolic act of affirmation without precedent, accompanied by a firm declaration of principles, thus creating the opportunity to revise our constitution here in Canada so we could make changes in it which would satisfy the legitimate aspirations of the French-speaking people of Quebec, of minorities all across Canada and of individuals in all areas.

That is, Mr. Speaker, my humble contribution to this great debate on national unity.

[English]

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, discussions on the subject of national unity have taken place certainly in this nation for the past 120 years. In most cases, these discussions have centred around what could and should be done to keep Quebec happily in the union. Many have suggested adjustments to the constitution while others have felt that an entirely new constitution is in order. Aside from the numerous conferences and propaganda being distributed promoting national unity, members of parliament have, for the most part, discussed this topic in their constituencies. But truly, what good have all these discussions and talks done?

The situation has gone to the extent that even Canadians from the extremities of this country—east and west—are considering thoughts of their own independence. But here we as members of parliament sit, further discussing an issue that has already been used and abused, thinking to ourselves that maybe in some small way we are aiding the situation when, in actuality, we should be waking up to reality and realizing that our discussions are not even going to influence the situation. The unity of Canada now is up to Quebec.

Since 1963 the federal government has been attempting to court the province of Quebec, first of all by establishing a royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism and empowering it to recommend ways in which Canadian confederation could be developed "on the basis of an equal partnership of the two founding races." The wholesale revision of the language clause, section 133, in the British North America Act, which the commission recommended in order to extend the legal limits of bilingualism, failed for the simple reason that the province of Quebec vetoed it. And to quote a well-known Canadian historian who has already been quoted today:

—despite this crushing disappointment, Parliament tried to carry out as many of the Commission's recommendations as it was constitutionally capable of doing. It passed the Official Languages Act which established federal bilingual districts wherever the minority official language was equal to, or more than, 10 per cent of the population. It appointed the Commissioner of Official Languages and began an officious attempt to promote bilingualism in the federal civil service. The English speaking provinces, impressed with all this federal business, started to enlarge the place of French in their school systems.

But the results have not been cheering. This historian goes on to say:

The results were certainly mixed and doubtful. Bilingualism in the federal civil service cost vast amounts of money, produced negligible results, and aroused angry resentment among English speaking bureaucrats. The office of the Commissioner of Official Languages was soon crowded with a robust army of dedicated snoopers and the Commissioner himself appeared to think that his most important public duty lay in abusing and hectoring English Canadians for their neglect of a language only an infinitesimal minority would ever have the occasion to use. The bilingual colleges had the tendency to remain only theoretically bilingual and the French total immersion courses in the schools did little more than deepen the illiteracy in English with which pupils tried to enter the universities.

As I listen to the speeches here today I am amazed at some members who seem to have their heads in a bucket. Certainly none of us really wants Canada to be divided like a piece of pie. Certainly this country is worth saving and worthy of our loyalty. But the fact which most of the members here today do not realize is that the federal government—and members of all parties are to blame—has allowed the decisions in this country to be made by one province, one province that is a nation unto itself.

What more can we do to appease this province now? Quebec alone received the greater part of the budget of the Department of Health and Welfare. For the year ending 1976 about 50 per cent of the DREE grants went to the province of Quebec. The minister of justice for the province of Quebec now wants, I believe, about $11 million in return for assistance which the Montreal police have given the RCMP. Just this last week the federal government spent $3.5 million on what was called Canada Week in an attempt to unite the country. It is indeed all well and good to want to keep this province in the geographical union of Canada as we know it today, but I would not think that this should be done at the total expense of the other provinces which wish, desire, and want to stay in this union voluntarily.

● (2250)

Absolutely no attention seems to be paid to the other provinces. Quebec is becoming a spoiled child—not a prodigal child but a spoiled child. Nowhere in Canada is the unemployment rate as high as in the Atlantic region, but what has the federal government done about this reality? It has merely continued to pour money into its favourite charity—Quebec. And what has the province of Quebec done to thank the federal government for its undying donations? It has introduced bill 1. It has as much as spat in the eye of its benefactor, the Parliament of Canada. Bill 1 is the only document ever produced which preaches the antithesis of the bilingualism program and the antithesis of democracy so eloquently.

The federal government and its programs are being totally ignored by the province of Quebec except, of course, when it is on the receiving end. So why should we continue to give and continue to coax a province to be in the union if it has no will to be there?

Quebec's new language bill states specifically that the language of business in that province is to be strictly French. There is to be no bilingualism there. Is this then not going to hamper the operation of federal government business in that province? The Government of Canada seems willing to ignore these factors. While ignorance may be bliss in the short term, it certainly cannot be the rule in the long term. Something must be done to halt the actions of Quebec, whether it is by disallowance of the bill or in some other way. Bill 1 is causing major inequalities for many Canadian citizens, not only in the province of Quebec. For example, to prevent the use of English public signs, to forbid the use of an English corporate name in the province, and to forbid a local community from determining whether its local democratic institutions, such as town councils and schools boards, should use English as well as French in their proceedings and their administrations—these are real and important denials of liberty.

The people of Canada are wondering how the federal government can ignore such inequalities in its midst. But then, a quick journey to Parliament Hill would instantly make one realize exactly what is going on in this country.

It is becoming increasingly difficult to be served by the ranks of the support staff on the Hill in the English language. Food is served in French, photostating is done in French and, excluding the secretaries, it is not stretching the facts to state that 79.9 per cent of the support staff on the Hill are of French origin.

In most cases these people are hired as bilingual staff regardless of their qualifications. Somehow the term bilingual has been grossly distorted. And may I also say for the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) benefit that the term "linguistic equality" has also been misused in the hiring practices on the Hill.

To me, if a person cannot say "potato" in English, they can hardly be considered as bilingual staff in a restaurant. But the personnel branch on the Hill does not feel that way. This in itself would indicate who is being discriminated against.

It is time that the federal government started practising what it preaches. If it wants language equality, then it is time that fairness and equality were promoted right down the line, fairness in hiring, and fairness in the allocation of federal government funds.

But instead of promoting fairness and straightening out the bilingualism and the Quebec mess, the government chose to issue yet another statement under the name "A National Understanding". The preface to this booklet, which was delivered to all our offices, states:

> . . . the government wishes to emphasize that the official languages policy is not, and never was, intended to be a cure-all for all the problems of national unity.

The preface goes on to abridge the problems in our country today but states that:

> . . . breaking in on them are our continuing problems of language. They are the most acute issues facing us, as the events of the province of Quebec have demonstrated.

This does not seem to be a logical statement to me. How can people of any country rationally decide on their country's future when they have no jobs and no money?

It is obvious that the Prime Minister, for some reason or another, has taken the defeat of the Liberal party in Quebec to mean only a vote for separatism. This is a wrong assumption indeed. The people of Quebec voted for what they thought was better government and better economic policies, and this is what the people of Canada want today. I am not sure whether the people of Quebec realize what they got or got what they want, but it is our unemployment situation over and above all the other problems in this country which is most important. Instead, the Quebec situation is being used as an excuse to ignore the problems of dissatisfaction with the unemployment situation. I suggest that at this time the problem of national unity is really a red herring to cover up matters of unemployment, inflation, and other serious crises.

The recently issued statement on the government's language policy does not even mention the inequalities inherent in Bill 1. The statement is full of generalities in bold print, but when one reads the finer print one can easily deduce that the government is in full agreement with Quebec policy.

The federal government has finally admitted that the place to teach the two official languages is in the schools, but its interpretation of the school system and who should be allowed into certain schools is definitely stilted. I would like at this point to quote a typical paragraph from the booklet entitled "A National Understanding", which, incidentally, makes no sense at all. However, this is in relation to the school system in our country, and it reads as follows:

> In any event, the federal government asserts that it is incompatible with the unity of Canada that Canadian citizens should be able, when they move from province to province, to send their children to schools where they are taught in their own language. The government believes that necessary facilities should be provided, wherever they do not exist, for people moving from the province of Quebec to other provinces, and that they should continue to be provided for people moving from other provinces to the province of Quebec. In both cases, the federal government recognizes that there will be particular situations where this will not be feasible. But the principle remains.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being 11 o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At eleven o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Special Order.
