What the Gossips have to Report about

The Trench of Matters Political Parliamentary or Otherwise.

Some Teach-and-do matters All Mentionable Matters.

At the meeting called by Mayor Beck with on Wednesday a resolution was unanimously passed affirming the duty of the city to continue to the St. John relief fund, and on motion of Judge Fraser, seconded by Sir John Allen, a motion was passed that the council to make a grant of $5,000 for that purpose with the understanding that voluntary subscriptions would also be received. A public meeting will be held Monday night to consider and take action. A good attendance is requested.

The Fredericton Park Association propose giving our citizens an exhibition of racing under the electric light on the evening of the 22nd. There will also be a band in attendance which will furnish music for dancing.

The Common Council of St. John will purchase the Leary property at Sand Point, Carleton, in order to carry out their scheme of harbor improvement. The purchase price is not to exceed $25,000. The total cost of the improvement is estimated at $150,000.

The British legation at Washington has been instructed by Lord Salisbury to ask the United States Government for an explanation regarding the recent seizure of the British Steamer Composita in Port Charles Harbor, by the United States Revenue Cruiser Corwin.

A factory has been established by the Ontario government at the central prison, Ontario, for the manufacture of binder twine. The work will be done by the prisoners. The government endeavored to break the binder twine combine, but failed. It will now be done by the Ontario government.

On Friday last, nearly the entire town of St. John's, N.B., was destroyed by fire. About 2,500 buildings were burned, and 6,000 people left homeless. Among the burned buildings were the Episcopal cathedral, St. Andrew's Presbyterian church, the Methodist church and college, the Madras Temple, the Orange hall, the Athenaeum, the Roman catholic bishop's palace, St. Patrick's Hall, the Atlantic hotel, and the Commercial and Union banks. The people of Canada, the United States and England are sending liberal contributions to the relief of the unfortunate people. The Dominion Express Co. at St. John have offered to carry parcels from St. John to St. John's N.B., sent for the benefit of the sufferers, free.

Gladstone has been receiving a hearty reception everywhere, crowds accompanying him to the station. He is giving him a rousing send-off as he goes from place to place. The Gladstonians have taken the lead in the elections and in other particulars. He is a majority of between thirty and forty.

A small intelligence.

The meeting called by the Mayor for the St. John's sufferers was very completely attended—although some fifteen or twenty of our representative citizens were present. The cause of the small attendance is attributed to the unusual way in which the notice of the meeting was given. One paper containing the following: "A meeting will be held on Wednesday at 8 o'clock sharp, in aid of the St. John's sufferers." No name was signed to the notice nor did it name the place at which such meeting would be held. This accounts for the small attendance as very few of our citizens were aware of it.

When the St. John Valley road is built a number of gentlemen from this city are talking of inaugurating a beautiful summer resort up the river, in fact the site has been selected—a mile or two above Springhill. Several American gentlemen are also said to be interested in the project.

SPORTING NEWS.

"Tim" Keefe, the veteran pitcher, has been given the usual ten days' notice of his release by Harry Wright, manager of the Philadelphia Blue Club. On what grounds is not known. It is rumored that Wright has taken to the axe and is cutting salaries in twain. Great dissatisfaction exists among the players and Hamilton states that this is his last year on the ball field.

The Halifax Orient are to play the St. John Y. M. C. A. team on July 22 and 23 in St. John.

The Montreal team will shortly play a return match with the Y. M. C. A. of St. John. Nick Young says the reduction of the number of players to thirteen will save the league $100,000.

The single scull race on the river Charles last Saturday afternoon was won by champion Wm. O'Connor of Toronto. O'Connor's competitors were Jas. Ten Eyck, Peter Conolly, B. D. Rodgers and James Kennedy. Ten Eyck had the inside position next to the wall. Kennedy was second, O'Connor third, Rodgers fourth and Conolly on the outside.

The craters of Aetna were last active in 1855. Giarre, the destroyed village, lay directly to the east of the famous Valle del Boyo, on the eastern side of Aetna, a black and desolate space three miles in width, bounded on three sides by perpendicular cliffs from 2,500 to 4,000 feet high, opening only to the east. The people in the vicinity of the mountain are calm and betray no sign whatever of a panic.

POOR DOCUMENT

KATE VALLIANT.

With --the-- Circus!

'Yes, sir, Kate is the young lady's christian name, and tho' this has happened I'll say still that a nice young lady that Miss Valliant never set foot in the town. 'Twas here, to Quibb's, she was brought first as Miss Delarue, when the accident happened that made her acquainted with Dr. Decres, as you may have heard. I feel almost as if something had happened to one of my own, sir.'

'The water continued working up his pale, prayerworthy countenance, as he remarked the expression of mingled anguish and embarrassment which crept over the party's face. 'Tell me quickly about the-- He could not get the word out, but the water was ready to help him. 'About the murder, sir--for murder there's no doubt it is, tho' manslaughter was the charge Mr. Valliant was taken up on-- Well, sir, as far as I can make out from the many stories told, the lady was ill, and her brother (that's Dr. Decres) left her a draught to be taken at night, which her husband threw out of the window, giving her in its place deadly poison from the effects of which the poor lady died last evening, speechless and convulsed. Water-cresses, sir, fresh picked this morning.'

'Charlie pushed the neatly arranged plate of water-cresses, reclining gracefully against a salt-cellar full of the driest table salt, away from him with nervous haste, and almost moued as he rose from the table. 'Has the messenger gone to Blindon yet?' he asked quickly. 'So an eye, and stop him if he hasn't. I--I'll not send the note--I mean I'll write another. Anyway, get the note back, will you? and look sharp!'

'The waiter led the room looking his sharpest, but lingered in the hall for a minute or two to tell the porter what his mission was, and why he had been sent on it. At the bar he paused again to narrate the episode for the amusement of the presiding goddess, a Miss Quibb, who liked to know what went on in the coffee room. By the time he reached the yard, the messenger had left it for Blindon and Charlie Valliant's letter to Kate was beyond recall. When he heard this compromising fact, Charlie's wrath rose high, first against Mrs. Godefrey Wyndham, for having urged him on to this ruinously expensive course, and then against himself for having been influenced by her. If he had only waited quietly at home, Kate's recent feeling of consideration would have caused her to send him such a definite refusal when her father-in-law was made public, as would have deterred him from coming and justified him in staying away in everyone's eyes, his own included!'

CHAPTER XXXIII. AND LAST.

'If I had only breakfasted first, like a sensible, reasonable man, instead of writing in a hot haste to announce myself like an impatient ass who might have left town by the next train, and Kate would never have known he had been so near her? But now she would think him a coward if he slunk away without meeting her, and she shrank from the thought of living in her memory as that for the rest of her life. After a little time he mastered his reluctance to the inevitable interview. He recalled all he knew of Kate's sensitive pride, and reassured himself on the subject of being drawn into more intimate connection with the disgraced man. At the worst an interview with her would be painful, not dangerous. Kate's ready tact would be his best friend. She would make him understand at once that he felt an offer of marriage made in ignorance of what had happened, was cancelled by the sad and shameful circumstances now made known to him. In this way he would comfort himself up with such a dubious state of things, and for a few minutes he would succeed. Then dread of what the world would say, and his friends and family would say, if it ever became known that on the very day of the inquest he had ranged himself by the side of the 'murderer's daughter,' overwhelmed and shattered him. And all the while Kate's letter of refusal which would have set his pallid heart at rest was sending its way to him by post. Wandering restlessly about the town, dressing, yet longing for, the return of the messenger from Blindon, he found himself one of the crowd that was hanging about the police-station. A handsome pair of cobs standing close by attracted his attention, and on asking at their leads some question about their age and breed, he was startled by having this additional information given him. 'They belong to Miss Gower, sir; she has just driven Miss Valliant in to see her father.'

The thought was not to be borne! He would get away from the maddening atmosphere of the place before it unmanned him utterly. He began to retrace his steps towards Quibb's Hotel hastily. Against his will his eyes would turn to that horrible door through which his love had passed to visit and identify herself with her father. He quickened his steps, but before he passed it Kate came out, her face drawn with suffering, pale with intense feeling, harshly restrained. Her step was slow, but not faltering, for also was clinging to the arm of a man whose Charlie's jealous heart told him was Dr. Decres. In an instant the list of every man in the crowd was off his head, and in a sentence that it seemed as if a breath would have hurried, Kate, held up with tender care by her lover, reached the little carriage. Then Nina took her seat and the reins, and as they drove off Dr. Decres' voice broke the hushed spell: 'O! bless you, my Kate. I shall be with you soon!'

'In that instant she saw Charlie Glanville. He seemed to be trying to hide himself behind two or three intervening people; seemed to be striving to avoid her eyes; seemed quite willing that she should drive away without speaking to him. Yes! he seemed, and was, all these things; and yet he was Charlie Glanville! As he looked in her eyes changed from gloom to a gleam of hope, the man who had loved her so well while she was alone on her, realized what had happened, and what he had lost. It was as no use his standing erect now. The moment for coming forward was past. He felt, as he saw the gesture with which she turned and pointed him out to Nina, though he could not hear her words. For his self-complacency's sake it was as well the wind waited her words away from him, for they would have told her that he had considered himself all along. 'Is there, Nina, bending his head to give me? That's the man I once thought I liked better than my Dick!'

'When she got back to Blindon she found Charlie's messenger and note. The messenger she sent back to Quibb's Hotel; at once, carrying the note with him. CHAPTER XXXIII. AND LAST. That Mrs. Valliant had died from the effects of a subtle poison was ascertained, as was also the fact that the poison had been administered to her in the wine-glass which had been found standing on the table by her bedside. In the minds of the jurymen a prudent and reasonable doubt existed as to whether the poison might not have been prepared for her by some person or persons unknown, against whom they were quite ready to bring a verdict of 'Willful Murder' against Leonard Valliant. For some cause or other these six men carried the day occasionally. Whether they were of more credit and respect or not, it was not for them to be less so, and they were less so, and so were more ready to resign to the lengthened period of unadvised action, or whether their argumentative powers were greater than those of their colleagues, is not important. It is enough that they prevailed, and Leonard Valliant was committed to appear before the magistrates on the charge of having caused his wife's death. Innocent as he might be--as he was, Kate felt sure--Mr. Valliant had no witnesses to call to prove that innocence or strengthen his assertion. Dr. Decres could only swear that the medicine he had left for his sister had been innocuous, and that the settlement found in the glass by her side the morning had been of a deadly poisonous nature. The members of the unhappy man's own household could not it seemed, say more for him on their oaths than this--that he had sent the servants to bed, declaring that he would give the sleeping-draught to their mistress. That they had gone to bed, and had been waked up to hear that their mistress was speechless and unconscious, and to find that a glass, the settlement about which contained poison, was standing by her side. In vain poor Miss Decres heroically mastered her own emotion, and told out coherently and truthfully, her happy sister had lived with this man, and how motiveless any attempt on her life on his part would have been. In vain Valliant, in clearly unqualified tones, and with discreetly chosen words, told how Mr. Valliant had loved and valued his wife, and taken unusually tender care of her (while this witness was giving her evidence, it was noticed for the first time Mr. Valliant looked conscious of being struck). Weighed and broken he had been all along, but no shadow of guilt had crossed his face till the parlor maid, who had accompanied Mrs. Valliant from her altars to her new, had stepped into the witness box. In vain--all in vain--that Dr. Decres spoke out strongly his conviction that the poison which had been administered to his sister had not been administered by the hand of her unhappy husband. 'It is a poison of peculiarly specious nature. It happens that not a chemist in this town has kept it for months,' Dick said in the course of his evidence both before the coroner and before the magistrates. And it was after this, and before the trial was many days old, that a new element of interest was introduced into what was called throughout the public press 'The Valliant Mystery.'

'For two or three nights, it was whispered, Valliant, the faithful servant who had followed the fortunes of her mistress from that midnight episode some time her ill-starred married one, had been hysterically restless in her sleep. Calling now upon her 'master to forgive her,' she whispered about, came to the ears of the police authorities, and shortly in default of any other clue to the mystery turning up, led to the arrest of Valliant on the charge of complicity with the crime. Meantime Charlie Glanville had been suffering tortures of indecision that fell little short of those of anxiety which Kate was enduring. The brief glimpse he had caught of Kate as she raised her head and bravely faced the crowd that day at the door of the police station, had riveted in his faltering heart all the love and admiration he had ever felt for her. That this was but a reflection of what it was evident that Kate was enduring, he was sure. Still that it was in fact partly offspring of jealousy--not to be taken as a proof that his revived passion was not a strong and vehement one. It swept over him in its reactionary force with a violence that seemed to shake and weaken him. As he made his way back to Quibb's Hotel with unsteady, uncertain footsteps, his heart beat so violently, and his blood tingled so intensely through his veins, that his brain refused to work clearly, and a hundred unpractical resolutions--such an abandoned one as soon as--cooled through his mind. It was evident, even to his excited mental vision, that the disgrace of the father had not been detrimental to the daughter's position, and he accepted her love, though that never stood in the nearest relation to the murdered woman. It was also evident that Kate had not been ready, as he believed, and would have been, to throw the new love off at the old love's bidding. She must have received that letter which he had written to retract her consent, and that she had not blot out all that intervened between the interruption to their early love-dream, and his proposed resumption of it. She must have gathered that, instead of any self-forgetting grief, now to the remembrance of how the 'other fellow' had dared to look at and address her. Even detached sentences from papers--by all eagerly discussing the great local criminal event, fell upon his ears as he made his way back to Quibb's. From these he gathered that, instead of anything like surprise or pity being felt or condemnation expressed about Dr. Decres' fidelity to Kate in this hour of her loneliness, he was, on the one hand, men praised and extolled, and applauded him for it. Charlie felt himself to be a coward as he went along listening to the commendation heaped upon the man who was stanch to her, while he (Charlie himself) had been so ready to let her go down by herself--if go down she must. Even so, as he was about the door of the hotel, his thoughts shaped themselves into the resolve to stay in Rathlam and see the case out. Kate's answer to his last letter--the one sent from Quibb's in the morning, would probably be an invitation to Blindon, and he would go there, and he would go and ask her to let him re-assume his old proper place by her side? Or better still (her presence stepped in) better still he would not discuss her by his presence, but would stay on at Quibb's giving her the feeling that he was within reach, within call, until the worst was known. Then again the reflection that this thing against her father would never be forgotten swept over his soul, swamping all his nobler and more generous feelings, and he would rage in a futile way against fate and circumstance, the spite of Mrs. Wyndham and Fred and the fondness which still bound him against his better judgment to Kate in her fallen fortunes. He was soothing himself with the thought that such a fine unselfish nature as hers would realize that the absolute devotion of her life to him would be but an insufficient return for the generous magnanimity he was preparing himself to devote to her. He held his hand out impatiently, expecting to have put into it her loving cry, and he was praying for her to go to her at once. Instead of this the boy gave him--and gave him with a grin that showed a perfect understanding of it all--his own letter, unopened! 'Is this all, all? Charlie asked rather feebly, and the boy answered with avidity: 'Yes, sir, I heard Miss Valliant herself say, that's all the answer, and I come along straight, as quick as I could, think-
