OFFICIAL REPORT

Tuesday, March 23, 1937

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Mr. W. H. MOORE (Ontario) presented the third report of the standing committee on banking and commerce, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Mr. A. M. YOUNG (Saskatoon) presented the fourth report of the standing committee on railways and shipping.

SUPREME COURT ACT

AMENDMENT TO CLARIFY PROVISION RESPECTING APPEALS

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 78, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The purpose of this amendment is merely to clarify the meaning of the present section 37 of the Supreme Court Act. Under that section there is a right of appeal per saltum when parties agree and with the consent of the court of final resort in the province. It is to make clear that the appeal must be from a judgment which is applicable to that court of final resort as well.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HAMILTON WEST BY-ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): Before the orders of the day are called I should like to direct the attention of the house to 31111-130 a statement issued by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), which appeared in this morning's papers, with respect to the results of yesterday's by-election in Hamilton West.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LENNARD: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister made a misstatement of fact, and I should have the privilege of correcting it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think that the hon. member's statement is not a proper one on the orders of the day.

ROYAL AIR FORCE

REPORTED REQUEST FOR DOMINION COOPERATION IN TRAINING AND SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. R. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) to reports from London, England, which have recently appeared in the Canadian press, to the effect that there is now in operation a scheme for the training of pilots from Australia in the Royal Air Force, and that a similar scheme is being established in New Zealand. This article, which appeared on Monday in the Brantford Expositor and other leading Canadian newspapers, is headed in one of these papers "British Air Force seeks Canadian Pilots" and reads in part as follows:

"There is already in operation a scheme whereby pilots are trained as cadets in the Royal Australian Air Force and then serve a term of years with the air force of this country," Sir Philip said. "Afterwards they revert to the Royal Australian Air Force Reserve."

"New Zealand is establishing a similar scheme and also a system whereby applicants are medically examined to ensure that they are not turned down when they come to this country."

In the closing paragraph, Sir Philip Sassoon, the Under-Secretary for Air in the imperial government, states:

We should welcome adoption of a similar system by Canada, from which dominion no fewer than one hundred young men have come on their own and have been accepted for short service commissions. We welcome these pilots. They are first rate young men and we wish to do everything in our power to facilitate their entry.

I should like to know whether any steps have already been taken by Canada to enter into such an arrangement. If not, is it the intention of the government to enter into such a system?

Hon, IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): My hon, friend was good enough to give me notice of the question. A few minutes ago I laid on the table a return to an order containing exhaustive information in reply to a question asked by the hon, member for Kindersley (Mr. Elliott). The question my hon, friend has just raised is fully answered in that order, but if it is not I shall be glad to bring down supplementary information at a later date.

PORT OF VANCOUVER

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO HANDLING OF WATERBORNE FREIGHT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). For some time there has been more or less dissension on the Vancouver waterfront on the part of rival organizations, and the shipping federation has been brought into the matter. I understand that the city council of Vancouver has asked the Department of Transport or the federal government to appoint a commission or some unbiased authority to investigate the situation. I should like to know whether that request has reached the government yet and whether the minister is prepared to say what action will be taken in the matter.

Hon, C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): The hon, gentleman kindly gave me notice of the question. I received, dated March 16, a telegram from the city clerk of Vancouver reading as follows:

The following resolution was adopted by city council March fifteenth: That the federal government be asked to appoint a competent unbiased authority on port and marine matters to make a survey of the situation on Vancouver waterfront with a view to ascertaining whether the handling of waterborne freight into and out of Vancouver is not so out of line with international practice as to militate against the best interests of the port.

[Mr. W. R. Macdonald.]

In reply to the hon. member's inquiry I may say that the intention of the National Harbours Board of withdrawing from the British Columbia Shipping Federation has already been made known to the house. I am advised by the National Harbours Board that this policy is being worked out as rapidly as conditions will permit. No situation appears to exist at Vancouver which prevents the facilities of the port being fully used for the benefit of Canadian trade, nor does there appear to be necessity for any survey and investigation as requested.

THE PARLIAMENTARY GUIDE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GEORGES BOUCHARD (Kamouraska): May I ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) whether the Canadian Parliamentary Guide has been printed this year? Is it true that it has been printed and distributed to the senators, and may we hope that it will soon be distributed among members of this house?

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): The Parliamentary Guide is published by a private individual, though he is a member of the civil service. The publication is a private one. The House of Commons used to have an estimate out of which it bought copies of the Parliamentary Guide and distributed them to members of the house, but I understand that this year that estimate has not been introduced and the money has not been provided for the purpose. Neither the Secretary of State's department nor the printing bureau has anything to do with it, the publication being, as I say, a private one.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to inquire whether the Secretary of State has told us the whole story in view of the fact that the Parliamentary Guide has been distributed to the Senate.

Mr. RINFRET: I will be quite frank; I have told everything I know about it. If there is something I do not know and which the leader of the opposition knows I shall welcome the information.

Mr. BENNETT: It is of such a character that I will communicate it to the hon. gentleman privately.

Mr. POULIOT: Therefore he was right not to state it.

Mr. STIRLING: May I ask the Secretary of State out of what funds the copies of the Parliamentary Guide issued to the senators have been purchased?

Mr. RINFRET: I would surmise that the distribution to the Senate has been made in the same way as it used to be made to members of the House of Commons, that is, out of a fund in the Senate estimates. I do begin to feel that there is something underlying all this in which the opposition is much better versed than we are. I wish to state most positively that I know nothing about the Parliamentary Guide except what I am now communicating to the house. It is published by a Mr. Normandin, who is employed in the printing bureau, but it is published at his own expense and to his own profit. The House of Commons used to buy a certain number of copies, but I understand from the clerk that this has been discontinued. The Senate also buys a certain number and distributes them to the Senators. The Secretary of State, however, has positively nothing to do with it.

Mr. BENNETT: When was it discontinued?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We will all inquire now.

HALIBUT FISHERY

AMENDMENTS TO CONVENTION BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I wish to direct to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) a question based on the following press dispatch:

The senate foreign relations committee has submitted to the senate for ratification a proposed convention with Canada regulating halibut fishing in the North Pacific ocean and the Bering sea.

Will that treaty be introduced at the present session for ratification along with the United States amendments?

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): A joint commission which has been administering halibut fishing in the waters mentioned in that dispatch has made a recommendation to the government for some amendments to the existing convention. These recommendations were forwarded to the Department of External Affairs and are being considered at the present time.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the orders of the day.

Mr. E. J. WERMENLINGER (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called, I should like to ask the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott), or some other minister who might reply in his stead, when answers will be tabled to the questions passed as orders for return on February 10 last, respecting a subject of interest to all the postmasters of the country, as well as to another question, concerning all the civil servants of Canada, which was passed as an order for return on February 22. As the end of the session is approaching, I would ask the Postmaster General or some other minister whether these returns are to be tabled shortly.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to call the Postmaster General's attention to the remarks of my hon. friend. If one of the motions referred to concerns all the civil servants of Canada, as he has just said, it is no wonder that the return is not ready; indeed, it would be surprising if it were ready before next session.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

CANADA-UNITED KINGDOM TRADE AGREEMENT

Customs tariff—ex 377a, et al. Wrought iron in the form of billets, bars, rods, sheets, strips, plates or skelp: rate of duty, free.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): When the house was in committee of ways and means last week the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) asked me and other members as to the effect of a certain change in tariff duties on a certain industry in Brantford, and suggested that I was interested in employment. I thank him for the reference, and assure him that I am very much interested in employment not only in Brantford but throughout the whole dominion. I should like however to draw the attention of the committee-and more particularly of hon. members from the city of Toronto, which is known, or at least claims, to have a corner on loyalty-to a certain advertisement that appeared recently in a magazine. Hon, members will recall that last year the Toronto Transportation Commission purchased twenty-seven motor buses to carry Canadian workingmen to and from their daily toil. Motor bus bodies are manufactured in Canada, and if the Toronto Transportation Commission do not know where, I can assure hon. members from Toronto that in Brantford we manufacture the very finest motor buses made in the world. The Toronto Transportation Commission were in the market for twenty-seven motor buses. They no doubt looked all over Canada, but, forgetting the principle so highly extolled by members from Toronto, of work for Canadian workmen, they purchased, to carry Canadian workingmen, buses made in the United States by United States workingmen.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): I am quite sure that hon. members from Toronto, whom I hold in high regard and am proud to count among my personal friends, were not parties to this transaction, but I do feel that it should come to the attention of the committee.

I hold in my hand a picture of these twentyseven motor buses lined up in front of presumably Canadian factories. They are splendid buses. This picture appears in a Canadian trade journal printed in Toronto. The advertisement itself is in the form of an insert, in the centre of the magazine, and on the back of the insert showing these United States buses made by American workers to carry Canadian workingmen, is none other than a picture of the union jack. But, Mr. Chairman, looking further, I find that the Toronto Transportation Commission not only bought the buses in the United States, not only had the union jack placed around the picture of the buses, just as many hon. members, especially those from Toronto, are at times apt to wrap the union jack around them when they make an address, but had this insert, which could have been printed in Canada, printed where? In the United States of America.

When hon, members of this house, especially from the city of Toronto, inquire into employment in other cities I feel that they should first see that their own house is in order. When Toronto practises what it preaches we may all say, yes, we will follow Toronto; but in the meantime we shall do what is in the best interests of Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: I must first congratulate the hon, member on his zeal for the employment of workers in Canada. I must [Mr. W. R. Macdonald.]

commend him for the speeches he has hitherto made in this house on behalf of Canadian workmen. If he keeps on along that line he will be changing his seat from that side of the house to this side, where the defenders of Canadian workmen are in the majority.

In reference to the item he has brought up I may say that personally I would much rather those buses had been made in Brantford by Canadian workmen than by workers in the United States. In that I support his zeal to have buses for Canadians made by Canadian workmen. I may tell him however that I am afraid the workmen themselves do not ride in the buses. The buses in Toronto are used to carry high class office assistants from Forest Hill village and the upper part of the city to their offices downtown. Most of the workers ride in the street cars.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): Surely Canadian workmen are good enough to make buses for the people of Toronto.

Mr. MacNICOL: No bus is too good for Canadian workmen. I would like to see them ride in the finest kind of buses. As for the magazine mentioned by the hon. member, I did not get the name. What was the name?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): The name of the magazine is Bus and Truck Transport. I understand it is printed in Toronto, except for the insert.

Mr. MacNICOL: I imagined the whole magazine was printed in the United States, owing to the fact that the present government has largely crucified the magazine business of this country.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): That is not correct. The magazine, with the exception of the Toronto Transportation Commission advertisement, is printed in Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. gentleman will pardon me for recalling that the present government has crucified, I am told, the printing of fifty-two magazines in this country. They are now printed in the United States, so naturally I thought this magazine was printed in the United States. Otherwise I must again commend the hon. member for his support of Canadian workmen. I will recall to his mind the fact that yesterday Canadian workmen in Hamilton voted for a Tory candidate, and elected him. And while I do not want to see a by-election in the hon. member's riding I can promise him that if there should be one, the workman there would also vote for a Tory candidate.

Mr. DUNNING: Now that we have had a speech from each side on the question of buses and magazines, I wonder if we could consider wrought iron, the item before the committee.

Mr. CHURCH: The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Macdonald) is labouring under a misapprehension. Just the other night his colleague from Brant (Mr. Wood) rose in this house and attacked the financial position of the city of Toronto, which is one of the most solvent cities in Canada, with a sinking fund of nearly $30,000,000 available to meet its obligations. It owns all its public utilities, which are operated at cost, and each one has a large surplus.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: I am coming to the item; I am pretty close to it. In reply to the hon. member for Brantford I may say that the city of Toronto operates its transportation system through a commission. The service is furnished at cost, and that commission is managed so efficiently that it does not find it necessary to exceed its estimates at any time. When the commission took over the transportation system it was found that the facilities were not sufficient to furnish the materials needed, and many of the orders had to be filled in Montreal and by the Westinghouse people in Hamilton. It is true that the commission have shops of their own in which a good deal of the work can be done, but wrought iron and many other parts must be brought in. Let me tell the hon. member that the steam railways cannot serve all the people and refuse commutation tickets, and if it were not for the buses a large portion of our population would not have any trans-portation service at all. The Toronto Trans-portation Commission is not asking for any favours in connection with wrought iron or anything else. This is the first time I have ever heard of Toronto getting anything free in connection with wrought iron or anything else.

Mr. SPENCE: I am glad the hon. member for Brantford drew to the attention of members of this house from Toronto the fact that these buses bought by the Toronto Transportation System were purchased in the United States. Of course there may have been some reason for that; they may have called for tenders, and the tender from Brantford may have been much higher than the others. Personally, however, I should be glad to see these buses bought in Canada even if they did cost a little more money. This again brings up the question of an irresponsible commission which is not under the control of the city council of Toronto or anyone else. They take it upon themselves to do this sort of thing without consulting the members of this house, the members of the city council or anyone. We have several commissions of the same type under this government, however, and they do not seem to be criticized.

Mr. HARRIS: I should like to say just a word, Mr. Chairman. Perhaps the dumping provisions might be invoked in connection with these articles which contain a certain amount of wrought iron. Then if the tariff were made sufficiently substantial so that these goods could be manufactured in Canada, the Toronto Transportation Commission would not be able to buy these articles in the United States.

Mr. MAYBANK: I move that these apologies be accepted.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—377c. Ingots, cogged ingots, blooms, slabs billets, n.o.p., of iron or steel, of a class or kind not made in Canada, when imported by manufacturers of forgings for use exclusively in the manufacture of forgings, in their own factories, under regulations prescribed by the minister: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 378. Bars and rods, of iron or steel; billets, of iron or steel, weighing less than 60 pounds per lineal yard:

(b) Not further processed than hammered or pressed, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 10 per cent.

(c) Cold rolled, drawn, reeled, turned or ground, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 10 per cent.

(d) Hot rolled, valued at not less than 4 cents per pound, n.o.p.: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: This is a reduction in rate.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 378a. Bars or rods, of iron or steel, hot rolled, viz: Rounds over  $4\frac{\pi}{3}$  inches in diameter and squares over 4 inches: rate of duty, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 379. Bars or rods, of iron or steel, including billets weighing less than 60 pounds per lineal yard, not rolled, as hereunder defined, under regulations prescribed by the minister:

(e) Bars of iron or steel, hot rolled, 5 inches in diameter and larger, when imported by manufacturers of polished shafting for use in their own factories: rate of duty, free.

(f) Sash or casement sections of iron or steel, hot or cold rolled, not punched, drilled nor further manufactured, when imported by manufacturers of metal window frames, for use in their own factories: rate of duty, free.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there a change in this

Mr. DUNNING: These are entry free bound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff-380. Plates of iron or steel, hot or cold rolled:
(a) Not more than 66 inches in width, n.o.p.:

rate of duty per ton, $4.25.

(b) More than 66 inches in width, n.o.p.: rate of duty, free

(c) Flanged, dished or curved, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 5 per cent.
(d) With chequer, diamond or other raised pattern on contact surface: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: The present rate of duty is bound; there is no change, except on subitem (c).

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to suggest to the minister that when he reconsiders this item, perhaps next year, he might go into the advisability of extending the protection to include plates up to 78 inches in width. A goodly part of the steel plate business in Hamilton during the last year has been the rolling of plate between 66 and 78 inches in width. Owing to the fact that there is very little plate coming in from the old country at the moment, due to the war scare, that plant has been able to dispose of plate made in Canada up to 78 inches in width. I am convinced that it would be taking another step in the right direction if the minister would consider protecting plate up to 78 inches in width next year.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be glad to take note of my hon. friend's remarks. The concern that is making these larger plates is now running full time and, I think, doing very well. A year ago we helped the situation to some extent by restoring the dump provisions relating to this article which previously had been suspended. With respect to steel, and particularly steel plates of this size, the present world condition in regard to demand and manufacture renders it quite impossible to predict what might be the situation twelve months from now.

Mr. BENNETT: You cannot do anything about it twelve months from now; you are bound for three years, are you not?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: The rate is bound, yes.

Mr. STEWART: I understood the minister to say there was no reduction here. I think there is.

Mr. DUNNING: Not in the (a) section. There is a reduction in rate in the (c) section.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 381. Sheets, of iron or steel, hot or cold rolled:

(a) .080 inch or less in thickness, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 7½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no change in this item.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff-382. Hoop, band or strip, of iron or steel:

(a) Hot rolled, .080 inch or less in thickness, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 5 per cent.

(b) Hot rolled, more than .080 inch in thickness, n.o.p.: rate of duty per ton $3. (c) Cold rolled or cold drawn, .080 inch or less in thickness, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 7½ per

(d) Cold rolled or cold drawn, more than ·080 inch in thickness, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 12½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction of rate under (a) and (b). The present rate is bound under (c), and (d) shows a reduction in rate against Great Britain. I could give the detailed reductions, but I think hon. members already have them.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to direct the attention of the minister to another matter with which I know he is acquainted already. because I have had reports from the people who have written him and who have also written me, in reference to items 382, 383, 385 and 386.

Mr. DUNNING: We have not reached those items yet.

Mr. MacNICOL: But what I have to say in regard to this item applies to all four items. As I understand it, at the moment some of our manufacturers are having very great difficulty in obtaining the necessary raw products with which to carry on in Canada, particularly plates of the thicknesses referred to here, because in the United States they have little to export and at the moment we cannot import any considerable quantity from Great Britain. I am just wondering what we are going to do in Canada. At the moment it is not a matter of duty at all; it is a matter of sufficient production to supply us with plate of the thicknesses required to permit, for example, the galvanized iron plate plant at Sarnia, and other similar plants, to continue in operation. Is there anything that can be done to provide these plants with their raw products?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend realizes, of course, that the difficulty he now mentions is practically world wide at the moment, and at the present time I see no prospect of its easing. As he says, it is not particularly a matter of tariff but rather of the extremely great world demand for this class of article. All I can say is that we are watching the situation and wherever it is possible to give any assistance by way of developing a source of supply we are glad to do so, although generally speaking the men engaged in this class of manufacture are alive to their own business and very much more efficient in regard to it than the government possibly could be. I think they are very much alive to the situation and are working on the matter at all times. Up to now I must confess that the condition has been growing steadily more difficult with respect to the supply of this class of material. That is true not only of this country but I believe of all other countries as well.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I was waiting until another item was called, but since that item is now to be discussed I shall make my observations at this time.

In the first place, black sheets are produced in only one mill in Canada, for the purpose of galvanizing. That mill is at Hamilton, and belongs to the Steel Company of Canada. They have no iron ore, and import their iron ore or raw material from the United States. In the second place, they are unable to meet the Canadian demand-absolutely. In the third place, orders placed in England cannot be filled at the present time. Some orders placed in England last fall are being filled in part, and some cannot be filled. In the next place, black sheets are required for galvanizing, and are required in western Canada, not next summer, but now, with the opening of navigation. Great Britain does not supply these plates at the moment, because she cannot do so and at the same time meet her own domestic demands. fore there is but one market left to which the Canadian can turn, and that is the United States. Shall he be denied the right to buy in that market when he cannot buy anywhere else? Shall he have to pay an extra ten per cent to buy in that market? That is the issue.

We have met that issue in connection with Indian corn and other matters. When we have found the Canadian consumer confronted with an impossible situation we have at once enabled him to get his raw material by lessening the rate of duty and putting it upon a basis at least similar to that which prevailed in Great Britain under the preference. The rate on plates from Great Britain stands at five per cent. If my memory serves me correctly the rate on plates from the United States is 20 per cent, plus three per cent excise tax, making a total of 23 per cent. The British rate is five per cent, with no excise tax. The Canadian consumer is denied the right to buy in England; he cannot buy a plate. Canada has one factory, the orders of which more than cover its capacity. Shall the Canadian consumer in western Canada be without galvanized sheets? That is the issue.

I submit to the minister the matter can be dealt with simply by doing with the sheets exactly what we did with Indian corn from the Argentine. We could make a free rate for three months so that the sheets could come in from the United States, or—in order that no unfairness might be shown to those who have purchases—make it five per cent, which is the same rate as applies to England. The only difference would be that in purchasing from the United States one would have to pay the three per cent excise tax, making a total of eight per cent, and thereby discriminating against the purchaser to a certain extent.

The situation is one which cries for relief; it is not imaginary. The other day in my room a westerner who for twenty years has been meeting Canadian demands told me that he found himself unable to buy galvanized sheets.

Mr. DUNNING: From British sources of supply.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not British sources of supply at all.

Mr. DUNNING: The individual my right hon. friend mentions has been filling the demand from a British source of supply.

Mr. BENNETT: He had to, because the preference was fifteen per cent. The real truth of the matter is that in order to give England something for what they gave us, namely a free market for our products, in 1932 we did endeavour to give them a preference on steel. We gave a preference under the intermediate tariff to such an extent that they were able to get some business. The hon, member for Davenport has referred to another item which I shall not mention.

Why cannot the government do something for the Canadian consumer, who is crying for relief, and who wants galvanized sheets? Why cannot they do something? That is what I want to know. We did it in connection with Indian corn; why can we not do it for black sheets? There is only one house in Canada producing them, and that house is sold out and will not quote prices for future delivery. That plant is working to capacity, and yet here is a person crying for galvanized sheets; people are crying for them. They are very much in demand in western Canada, as every hon. member from that part of the country must know. Hardware firms which usually supply them are driven to the position of either importing galvanized sheets from the United States and paying a high duty, thereby putting out of employment employees in Canadian galvanizing plants, or doing without them. The hon. member for Davenport referred to a plant at Sarnia, but I shall not make special reference to it at the moment.

Aside from all that, why cannot the government ask the British government, in view of the fact that Great Britain is unable to supply us with what we require, to let us take down the tariff barrier for three months, in order that the supply may be made available for the Canadian galvanizer with his pots at Sarnia, or elsewhere as the case may be? South Africa at once acceded to such a request when we asked them about corn.

Mr. DUNNING: They took a little time.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes—until they found out they were going to have no crop. As soon as they saw there was a crop failure they realized that Canadians had to have corn and they said, "As the corn cannot come from us, and you want to let it in, go ahead and do it"—and we did it.

Here is the steel situation. Iron sheets are required for galvanizing. We cannot buy them in Canada; we cannot buy them from Great Britain, but we can buy them from the United States. But if we have to pay 20 per cent duty on them, together with a three per cent excise tax, the price of raw material will be so high that the galvanizer in Canada cannot possibly supply the market. That is the position. Why can we not do something to help out?

I suggest to the minister that the British government be asked to permit us for three months to import raw material from other countries. Someone will say, "You cannot get raw material from the United States." You can, because I know of a manufacturer who has quotations on it, and can obtain delivery in three weeks. I do not know whether that supply will last long, but I do say that here is a situation created by world conditions, and that under that situation Canadians cannot get their supply. I should have said earlier in my remarks that some have a supply, or a partial supply, and can galvanize. Others cannot, however, because they have not the raw material. The answer of some people is, "If their credit was good enough they would have bought a supply and put it away in warehouses in England. Had they done that, they would have it now." We cannot ruin our business by showing favouritism of that kind, where business would depend on whether a man had a million dollars in the bank at a particular time. True, some of them were able to make purchases and to store those purchases in anticipation of a situation under which, if pressed, they could draw from their stores. But that is not this case. This is a condition exactly similar to that which obtained in connection with the corn situation in South Africa and the Argentine. I believe England is not unfair: at least I never found them so in the four and a half years we had dealings with them in connection with the trade agreement. They were always reasonable with respect to any request made. If we asked them for a period of two or three months, or as the minister may determine, to place black sheets on the free list, I have every reason to believe our request would be favourably consideredunless they have changed their general policy in dealing with matters of this kind.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that I replied to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) in connection with the item at present before the committee. I was not dealing with the matter to which the leader of the opposition is referring. It was my expectation that I would have to make detailed reference to that item when we reached it in the schedule, at a point about ten items beyond the one now before the committee. Perhaps it would facilitate the work of the committee if we were to pass along, and deal with the matter in proper order.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon, member for Davenport dealt with it, and that is the reason I did so.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not understand the hon. member for Davenport to be referring to black sheets.

Mr. BENNETT: He was talking about sheets for galvanizing.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff-383. Sheets, plates, hoop, band or strip of iron or steel:

(a) Coated with tin, of a class or kind not made in Canada, n.o.p.: rate of duty, free.

(b) Coated with tin, n.o.p.: rate of duty, free.

(c) Coated with zinc, n.o.p.: rate of duty,

7½ per cent.(d) Coated with metal or metals, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 5 per cent.

(e) Coated with paint, tar, asphaltum or otherwise coated, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 5 per

(f) Coated with vitreous enamel, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 10 per cent.

(g) Corrugated, coated or not: rate of duty, 10 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: On three items there are no changes; on two there is a reduction of  $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and on one 5 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—385. Sheets, plates, hoop, band or strip, of iron or steel, hot rolled, valued at not less than five cents per pound, n.o.p.: rate of duty, free.

Mr. STEWART: I think it would speed up the passing of these items if the minister would continue the practice he started of announcing when the item is called whether there is any change.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be glad to do that. In this case the reduction is from 5 per cent to free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—385a. Sheets, plates, hoop, band or strip, of rust, acid or heat resisting steels, hot or cold rolled, polished or not, valued at less than five cents per pound: rate of duty,

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 386. Sheets, plates, hoop, band or strip, of iron or steel, as hereunder defined, under regulations prescribed by the minister

(a) Plates, when imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture or re-pair of the pressure parts of boilers, pulp digesters, steam accumulators and vessels for the refining of oil, in their own factories: rate

(h) Sheets, plates, hoop, band or strip, hard-ened, tempered or ground, not further manu-factured than cut to shape, without indented edges, when imported by manufacturers of saws for use exclusively in the manufacture of saws, in their own factories: rate of duty, free.

(m) (i) Sheets of iron or steel, cold rolled, when imported by manufacturers for use ex-when imported by manufacturer of sheets coated with tin: rate of duty, free.

(ii) Sheets, hoop, band or strip, of iron or steel, hot rolled, when imported by manufacturer for nearly sheets, the manufacturer is the manufacturer. turers for use exclusively in the manufacture of sheets, hoop, band or strip, coated with zinc or other metal or metals, not including tin, in their own factories: rate of duty, 5 per cent.

(p) Sheets of iron or steel, hot or cold rolled, with silicon content of .075 per cent or more, when imported by manufacturers of electrical apparatus, for use in the manufacture of electrical apparatus in their own factories: rate of duty, free.

(q) Hoop steel, hot or cold rolled, plain or coated, .064 inch or less in thickness, not more than three inches in width, when imported by manufacturers of barrels or keys or by manufacturers of the control of the co facturers of flat hoops for barrels and kegs, for use exclusively in their own factories: rate of duty, free.

Mr. BENNETT: In (a) there is a reduction of 5 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction in the rate in (h) from 5 per cent to free. There is no change in item (m)(i); this is binding the free entry. The next item is the one to which the leader of the opposition was referring a few moments ago. I gather from his remarks that the interested parties have made to him the same representations that they have made to me as representing the government. I had not an opportunity to tell the committee about this previously, but a difficulty has arisen due substantially to the circumstances to which the leader of the opposition made reference. As he says, there is only one mill in Canada manufacturing black sheets for galvanizing. Another mill is getting ready for and will be in production in the next few months. This mill will produce continuous sheets which will serve the same purpose. A number of those who have been purchasing black sheets in England for some years past now find their sources of supply very much delayed, if not denied to them altogether. The question arises whether or not some special arrangement should be made, having regard to the particular circumstances now prevailing. If I could be certain of all the facts, as the leader of the opposition evidently is, my answer would be different. I can only say that the facts are being carefully sifted and every effort will be made to meet the situation.

I would point out that there is no difficulty in reducing the rate under the intermediate tariff from 20 per cent to 15 per cent, but under the agreement we would have to reduce the British rate from 5 per cent to free because the 15 per cent margin must be maintained. As to whether that is quite fair, having regard to all the circumstances, or as to whether it is necessary to go further than that, I am not yet in a position to state. If it is necessary, in order to meet Canadian consumptive demand, to go further than that, then we must communicate with the British government, as we did with the South African government in the case of corn. I have no more reason to think that they will be difficult about the matter than has the leader of the opposition. I do know that we must be able to give them all the facts with respect to Canadian consumptive demand and Canadian sources of supply. On their part they will have accurate information as to the possibilities of meeting Canadian demand from British sources. They already know of that.

I can assure the committee that we are not losing sight of the problem. It is one of the problems which arise in the course of administration when we are faced with an upset such as the one which has taken place in the iron and steel industry of the whole world as a result of the tremendous armament programs. I can assure my right hon, friend that the matter is under consideration, the facts are being assembled and proper action will be taken.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, the minister says that if he was as sure of the facts as I am he would have no difficulty.

Mr. DUNNING: Of all the facts.

Mr. BENNETT: The essential facts are all the facts that are necessary to be known if the government is in earnest in dealing with this matter. First, the interest that represented the matter to the minister was not, I think, the interest that represented the matter to me. I was approached by a representative of the consumers, not of the producers. The man who supplies most of the west with this material was in this city. He told me that he was unable to get his raw material, and wanted to know what he was to do to meet the demands of the consumers of western Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not the same man.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly not. I assume the interests who saw the minister were the producers of galvanized sheets. The gentleman who saw me has been for the last twentyfive years the principal western distributor of this material. I do not know whether the minister saw him.

In order that there may be no question about the matter let us see what are the essential facts. Time is important. Every day lost, every hour lost, makes it more difficult to get raw material at reasonable prices from the United States. Prices of steel in the United States have gone up from $3 to $8 per ton, and will probably go higher. While we are investigating the cost of agricultural implements the prices of the raw materials that enter into those implements have increased twenty-five per cent. That is the position which we have to face at the moment.

The first essential fact is that there is only one source of supply in Canada at the moment. The second essential fact is that the contemplated additional production will not be available during the next three months. That can be stated as a certainty. If it is available in three months, it will not be in a position to supply the requirements of black sheets for galvanizing.

Mr. DUNNING: It is working every day turning them out.

Mr. BENNETT: To supply the requirements of these people.

Mr. DUNNING: That is supplying Canadian demand.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the second factory, not the first—not the Hamilton plant. The minister said there was a second plant which would probably be in a position to increase its production during the next few months. I am pointing out that it is not in a position at the moment to meet the spread between the demand of the Canadian people and the production of the single factory at Hamilton.

The next essential fact is that they cannot get supplies from England. The British will not undertake deliveries in time to make galvanized sheets available in western Canada this season. The other fact is that, at the moment, you can get galvanized sheets or may be able to get them-in the United States. The question of price is important, because it is dependent upon daily, almost hourly conditions; every hour lost imperils the opportunity of production by one plant with which the largest, or one of the largest, distributors in western Canada has placed his orders. These are essential facts. facts should the British government know that they do not know, that the minister has, that cannot be presented? Shortly, the story is that Canadians in the west cannot get galvanized sheets for their requirements this spring unless we can bring in from the United States a quantity of raw material for the production of these sheets. In order to do that-

Mr. DUNNING: That is not proven as far as I am concerned. That is my point.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not pretend that I have the facilities which the minister has at his disposal; for he has only to ring a bell and he can ascertain these facts within twenty-four hours. This country has a service of telegraphs and telephones quite adequate for that purpose. The known distributions in the west can be communicated with, the supply they have on hand ascertained, and their prospective market known. The prospective supply is known to all. Just where the pots are located is known. Where they can be dipped is known. And the availability of supplies from Great Britain and Canada can be ascertained within a few hours. The gentlemen concerned who have been presenting this matter went home two weeks ago. I may add that I did not meet them.

The subject is of such pressing importance that the minister should ascertain the facts and communicate by cable with Great Britain before another rise in the price of raw material in the United States makes it impossible for these men to do business at all. It must be borne in mind that the raw material already purchased by other buyers will be profitable to them, because they will sell on a basis of market prices which will give them larger profits than they would otherwise obtain. In other words, those who have had foresight and have been financially able to acquire large supplies of raw material are going to reap a harvest, whereas those who have to purchase at an increased price must either face a loss, if they sell at a price as low as their competitors can afford to do, or sell at a price which their competitors will maintain for the sake of the larger profit that will accrue. That is why I think the matter is important and pressing and that cable communication with the British government is desirable, if the source of supply upon which western Canada relies for its galvanized plates is to be available this year. If it is not, then the other factor must be considered, namely the purchase of the galvanized plates from some other source, and that involves the question of the duty that has to be paid for the completed article as compared with the raw material. If the minister thinks that I was endeavouring to express full certainty about the facts, let me say that I was only pointing out that there are facts which are known to him and should be known to every member of the committee who desires to know them. There is no assumption on my part of knowledge of the facts but rather a statement of them to the committee in order that they may have an intelligent appreciation of the real issue, which is whether or not western Canada shall get galvanized plates at a reasonable price, whether we shall have to import galvanized plates from the United States or some other country, and whether the increased price of the raw material which has come about, insuring to the benefit of those who will be able to sell their products at a high price, is to continue after a reduction of the tariff for the sole purpose of meeting such a situation. In the case of Indian corn or maize from South Africa we met the situation frankly. Such action was not taken solely by the present government; under similar circumstances, similar action was taken by the preceding government and would, I assume, be taken by any government when appropriate conditions arise. That state of things has now come about; delays are dangerous and will certainly involve increases in prices. Instead of wasting time in trying to find out what the facts are, the minister, knowing what the facts are, should take action so that this condition may not continue.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, it is very helpful to have my right hon. friend's eloquence and forensic ability applied to the task of persuading me to be willing to do something which, I think every member of the committee knows, it would be my natural disposition to do in any event. My reference to full knowledge of the facts relates to this feature: I know that certain Canadian fabricators are getting their supplies to-day from British sources. I know of one Canadian fabricator who is in the position to which my right hon. friend refers. It happens that the large distributor in Winnipeg to whom he has alluded has for years obtained his supplies of galvanized sheets from the one fabricator and is in the difficult position to which my right hon. friend refers. I am not certain that there are not some smaller fabricators in the same position. If that is so, there is considerable merit in the contention.

One must remember two things. One is that the plant which is operating is running twenty-four hours a day—supplying what? Supplying Canadian demand. The second is that several of our largest fabricators of black sheets are securing their supplies at this moment from British sources with which they have had connection for many years.

Mr. BENNETT: Just how many? Let us see what the minister is going to say.

Mr. DUNNING: There are three I could name.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, let us have them. I happen to know some of them. Who are they?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not like particularly to give the names of concerns.

Mr. BENNETT: Why not? It is well known who is in this business.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon, friend can take that responsibility if he wishes.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. DUNNING: At any rate I know that one of the very largest fabricators is getting supplies. One other I know is—

Mr. BENNETT: Have they had any supplies delivered to them in the last three weeks?

Mr. DUNNING: It is difficult to say.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it is not.

Mr. DUNNING: I know that they do not regard themselves as being in immediate difficulty. A third I have in mind, who formerly relied on British sources and cannot now do so because of his purchasing arrangements, is being looked after, I am advised, by the Canadian source of supply. However, there is no need for us to argue about the matter. I could have well imagined, had action been taken along the lines of the request of my right hon. friend before this item came up for discussion, that some hon. members would have condemned the government for letting down the tariff bars against the United States. We are very glad to know that the leader of the opposition has the great appreciation that he has of the nature of the problem, and, as I said at the outset, it will assist very materially in moving forward quickly in regard to it. It does not affect this item; it amounts really to creating an exception from this item for a temporary condition.

Mr. WARD: My understanding of the tariff regulations has been that unless ten per cent of a commodity was produced in Canada the provisions of the tariff did not apply. Am I correct in that?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. DUNNING: No, there is nothing of that kind. The hon. member is thinking of the dumping duty, not of the straight tariff.

Mr. BENNETT: The dumping duty would have no application if this were done now. I do not see why the minister finds it desirable in dealing with this item to talk about forensic powers or abilities.

Mr. DUNNING: I admire them very much.

Mr. BENNETT: That is beside the issue. There is no need of discussing them. We are dealing with an item and a problem that is involved in it, and we want to deal with that problem on an intelligent, businesslike basis. When the hon, gentleman says that he knows of one firm that is receiving raw material, sheets, he is referring to General Steel Wares, who get their material from Baldwins, with whom they had a working arrangement; and as a matter of fact the president of the enterprise is one of the directors of Baldwins. At one time they had a branch here. What is the sense of saying that there is any secrecy about it? Everyone is thoroughly familiar with all the facts. They say they are receiving a portion of their deliveries, but they had large credits arranged for their supplies. They had foresight, and they will probably reap a substantial profit by that foresight. They are the only large producers of galvanized sheets, and they are not suppliers to the particular business in western Canada to which I have reference.

Surely this is not a question of suggesting what might have been done. When a minister of the crown, particularly the Minister of Finance, suggests that under other conditions some different course would have been taken, that is entirely beside the point. The question is, what course have we taken? That is the issue, and it will be found that during the five years we were in office we took but one course with respect to these matters. While we were developing Canadian industry and giving employment to Canadians we saw to it that if the time came when it was impossible to secure requirements for Canadians there would be proper provision for that very purpose. We made provision whereby it could be done; for the tariff is precisely for that purpose.

This is not a matter that has arisen to-day or yesterday; it has been known for weeks, and has been pressed upon the minister. He says he wants to know what the facts are. I say that he has had ample time to get the facts; and if we had been as dilatory in dealing with such a matter as that lapse of time suggests we should no doubt have been blamed, as we were with respect to other matters.

The corn matter did become acute and the South African government came to an agreement and action was taken. Up to the moment England has not been asked. The minister makes that abundantly clear from what he says. It takes time for the government to make inquiries there, and by the time these inquiries are made it will perhaps be too late to deal with the matter and the whole channel of trade of the country in this direction will have been disturbed by reason of that fact.

The minister must not think that because one speaks in this manner there is anything personal about it. There is no necessity for animadverting upon the poor way in which the case may have been presented; I am trying to present the case. Nor is there any necessity to speak of what might have been done under other circumstances. All we can discuss is what has been done, and I have presented the matter as I have seen it. I may observe that I never in my life saw the person concerned except once. The papers are under my hand, because I brought them to the chamber in case it was necessary to use them should any controversy arise. The matter is of importance as involving the whole source of supply, and I would say frankly to the minister that if, as a result of any action taken, it becomes necessary to pay the high duty to obtain galvanized sheets from the United States mills I shall consider that we have made a capital mistake, when we can secure the raw material under the terms I have mentioned so that Canadian fabricators can produce the finished article and maintain continuity of life in the industry in question. I am not unmindful of the difficulties.

There is of course a galvanizing plant at Hamilton which is well known, being a branch of an English house. I believe it is one of the largest plants in the country.

Mr. DUNNING: It is.

Mr. BENNETT: As far as I can remember it is probably the largest in Canada. But there are smaller plants. The one at Sarnia has three or four modern pots capable of doing as much galvanizing as two of the old pots; and as regards those at Montreal and other places, some of them are the very latest and others old. The question of improvements that have been made in galvanizing arises in this connection. In some of the plants in Canada the work can be done with greater celerity than was possible five or six years ago. Indeed, the improvements that have been brought about in galvanizing have been quite substantial, more especially in connection with galvanizing pipe. That question, however, does not arise at this particular moment. We are now dealing with the matter of sheets, and if as a result of the discussion the minister will continue his inquiries with as much zeal as possible under the circumstances, it will be appreciated by all those who are affected-and every consumer of galvanized sheets has a vital and direct interest in this transaction.

Mr. DUNNING: Before allowing the matter to pass I should say that I have positive knowledge of only one concern that is adversely affected to the extent portrayed. Any action would involve a specific length of time; my right hon. friend sees that.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. DUNNING: When I spoke of all the facts I had in mind that feature of it. The fabricators in Canada indicate what their capacity is, and we do know what our imports from Great Britain were last year. We do not yet know, however, to what extent these imports of last year will be diminished by the circumstances now prevailing and which are being looked into. But this much is clear. Some of the largest fabricators are still receiving their supplies from English sources.

Mr. BENNETT: My information is that they have not received any lately.

Mr. DUNNING: I know of only one plant that is adversely affected by reason of not having made forward orders upon its English connections. From the point of view of my right hon. friend that is important because that particular fabricator supplied the largest distributor in western Canada; and the largest distributor in western Canada and the plant at Sarnia to which reference has been made are, of course, very much concerned. I can only assure my right hon, friend that the matter will not be lost sight of, and action can be taken very quickly so far as this government is concerned. But we want to be sure, when submitting a request to the British government on a matter of such importance, that we present all the facts in the best possible manner so that no question can afterwards be raised.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister realizes that, so far as the United States is concerned, the present tariff means a prohibition against these people.

Mr. DUNNING: In order to make any entry from the United States effective, the dumping provisions also would have to be removed.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but they would not apply. The minister will find that they do not apply under present price conditions. But leaving that aside, the real issue is this, that they cannot maintain their pots at all if in order to secure their raw material they have to pay the present tariff, plus three per cent excise tax and eight per cent sales tax on these goods. The hon. gentleman is quite right in saying that the distributor in western Canada has had a contract for his supply of materials.

 $\ensuremath{\mathrm{Mr.}}$  DUNNING: And the supplier cannot fill it.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly.

Mr. DUNNING: Because the supplier did not protect himself.

Mr. BENNETT: He could not secure the raw material.

Mr. DUNNING: He accepted a contract without protecting himself with respect to raw materials.

Mr. BENNETT: He did what I suppose nine out of ten manufacturers do; they assume that they will be able to meet the situation with respect to orders as required. When he gave his orders, had they been filled he would have been all right; but they were not. Last year when I spoke on the budget I referred to the tariff board's report of October, and I also referred the other day to the question of sheets. I used the word "strips," but I am informed that technically that is not the proper word. I was talking about the continuous sheets used in automobile production. I did not know the situation until I was in Australia and when I came back I applied it to our conditions and found then what the position was. We are facing a reality which means a prohibition to this man if he has to pay twenty per cent plus three per cent as against his competitor who buys for five and no three per cent, and who by reason of his financial position is able to make arrangements which are denied the other person.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend knows, of course, that this is not the first time this has been asked for.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not familiar with what took place before.

Mr. DUNNING: I am fairly sure that—under circumstances not so extreme, I admit—similar application was made to my right hon. friend's government.

Mr. BENNETT: That was another matter. The information given to the minister just now is not quite accurate in that regard. Something else was involved, the question of the release of the United States Steel Company's sheets at Ojibway, and an arrangement was made, which the minister can ascertain, by which they were distributed under conditions that worked a hardship upon some people by reason of certain undertakings that were given not having been implemented. After 1932 it may be so; I have no recollection.

Mr. DUNNING: I can only say that in the representations made to me by those who are opposed—naturally, because of their own interest—to any action being taken, it was definitely indicated to me that representations made to my right hon. friend, or my predecessor perhaps, had been refused, and [Mr. Dunning.]

always the Canadian demand had been met. Of course there never has been such an extreme situation as that now existing.

Mr. BENNETT: I think if the minister will look into it during the dinner recess he will find it had to do with the Ojibway accumulation of sheets.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, that is a separate question, a different question.

Mr. BENNETT: After 1932 I can recall no question arising of there being an ample supply at all times, and the imports from England are shown. The Hamilton plant did not begin to produce the black sheets until 1932 or since. I remember that when we were framing this item in the tariff, production in quantity had not arisen, and the question of production in quantity had to be considered. I do recall, now that the minister mentions it, that Mr. Boyd of the Sarnia plant was in London at the time certain arrangements were being made in connection with these matters, and he had some trouble which arose largely out of the difficulty in adjusting the United States Steel supply of plates that were permitted to be sold under conditions probably based upon an erroneous appreciation of the circumstances. I daresay the minister knows the story. They had a large quantity of plates and the plates were to be galvanized and sold under certain conditions so as not to glut the market. It was said that advantage was taken of it, and those who had bought in good faith and paid the duty contended that they were entitled to rebate. The treasury board considered it. and my recollection of the conclusion reached is that they had made a case for adjustment, and an adjustment was made. I cannot speak with clear recollection of that, but I do recall the story and I recall the release of that large quantity of United States Steel black sheets from Ojibway. They were galvanized at Hamilton. The question of the effect that sale had upon the distribution by General Steel Wares on the one hand and a certain plant on the other was a matter that was pressed upon us, and they showed us exact figures of the result of the sale of those goods at a rate of duty which was not the rate provided for when they entered this country, because they came in as raw material to be manufactured, and that was not done. I do not think there was any case such as this.

Mr. DUNNING: There were certainly no circumstances similar to these which now prevail. I concede that at once.

In (p) and (q) there is no change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—387c. Steel grooved (or girder) rails for electric tramway use, weighing not less than 75 pounds per lineal yard, punched, drilled, or not, of shapes and lengths not made in Canada: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—388. Iron or steel angles, beams, channels, columns, girders, joists, tees, zees and other shapes or sections, not punched, drilled or further manufactured than hot rolled, weighing not less than 35 pounds per lineal yard, n.o.p.; piling of iron or steel, not punched or drilled, weighing not less than 35 pounds per lineal yard, including interlocking sections, if any, used therewith, n.o.p.: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—388b. Iron or steel angles, beams, channels, columns, girders, joists, tees, zees and other shapes or sections, not punched, drilled or further manufactured than hot rolled, n.o.p.; piling of iron or steel, not punched or drilled, including interlocking sections, if any, used therewith, n.o.p.: rate of duty, $4 per ton.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—388d. Iron or steel angles, beams, channels, columns, girders, joists, piling, tees, zees and other shapes or sections, punched, drilled or further manufactured than hot rolled or cast, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 20 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction from 25 per cent to 20 per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: We cannot get them in now anyway.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—388e. Iron or steel side or centre sill sections, of all sizes not manufactured in Canada, weighing not less than 35 pounds per lineal yard, not punched, drilled or further manufactured, when imported by manufacturers of railway cars, for use in their own factories: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—390c. Piston ring castings of steel, in the rough as from the moulds: rate of duty, free.

Mr. WARD: I referred to this question a few days ago. I am sorry the Minister of National Revenue is not in his seat. This is a matter which concerns greatly the mining and lumbering industry of Canada. About three months ago, on representations made by the Caterpillar Diesel Tractor Company of the United States the commissioner of customs gave a ruling which removed the 25 per cent duty levied on the importation of diesel engines. About three weeks ago, on representations made by the British trade commissioner, this ruling was cancelled. The information was given to me by men in the trade that this ruling was cancelled on representations by the Dominion Steel Company, which I believe is a branch of the great Dominion Bridge group, on the pretext that this firm was manufacturing diesel engines in Canada. May I point out that the United States company up to January of this year had manufactured some 22,000 or 23,000 diesel engines, which engines were admitted to Canada free of duty if they entered as part of a tractor.

The CHAIRMAN: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I think he is out of order in bringing this matter up under the present item.

Mr. WARD: Well, I am not sure there is going to be an opportunity to discuss it later.

Mr. DUNNING: There is an item under which it can be dealt with. It is 409m, and possibly the Minister of National Revenue will be here when we come to that.

Mr. WARD: There will be an opportuinty to discuss it then?

Mr. DUNNING: Under item 409m.

Mr. WARD: Will the Minister of National Revenue be in his seat then?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot say. The hon. member can go and get him in the meantime.

Mr. WARD: Well, I shall defer my remarks until then.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—392. Forgings, of iron or steel, in any degree of manufacture, n.o.p.: rate of duty,  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: A reduction in rate from 20 per cent to  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 392, 392a. Forgings of iron or steel, in any degree of manufacture, hollow, machined or not, not less than 12 inches in internal diameter; and all other forgings, solid or otherwise, in any degree of manufacture, of a weight of 20 tons or over: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a combination there. There is a reduction on part of the item, on certain forgings.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does this item cover locomotive steel? I am not finding any fault; I just want to know whether each of them or all of them collectively refer to steel forgings for the manufacture of locomotives or railroad

Mr. DUNNING: Not necessarily. My hon. friend will note the specifications—not less than 12 inches in internal diameter, and of a weight of 20 tons or over. The classification is pretty broad.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—393. Tires, of steel, in the rough, not drilled or machined in any way, for railway vehicles, including locomotives and tenders: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff-ex 394. Axles and axle bars, n.o.p., and axle blanks, and parts thereof, of iron or steel:

(a) For railway vehicles, including locomotives and tenders: rate of duty, 71 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction from 10 per cent to  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—396. Pipe, cast, of iron or steel, valued at not more than 5 cents per pound: rate of duty per ton, $5.

Mr. DUNNING: This is an old friend. There is a reduction in rate from $7 to $5 per

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff-396a. Pipe, cast, of iron or steel, n.o.p.: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction in rate from 5 per cent to free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 397. Pipes and tubes, of wrought iron or steel, plain or coated:

(c) Not joined, with plain ends, not more than 2½ inches in diameter, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 5 per cent.

(d) N.o.p.: rate of duty, 12½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no change under (c); there is a reduction from 15 per cent to 12½ per cent under (d).

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff-ex 397(b), 398a. Pipes and tubes of iron or steel, seamless, cold drawn, plain ends, polished, valued at not less than of the manufacture or repair of rolls for paper making machinery: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: This is a reduction on part of the previous item from 10 per cent to free.

Item agreed to. [Mr. MacNicol.]

Customs tariff-401. Wire, of iron or steel:

(a) Barbed fencing, coated or not: rate of duty, free.

(b) Twisted, braided or stranded, including wire rope or cable, coated or not, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 15 per cent.

(c) Drawn flat or cold rolled flat after draw-

(c) Drawn hat or cold rolled hat after drawing, coated or not, n.o.p., not more than '25 inch in width and less than '1875 inch in thickness: rate of duty, 7½ per cent.

(d) Coated with zinc or spelter, curved or not, in coils, '144, '104, or '092 inch in diameter, with tolerance not to exceed '004 inch, and not for use in talegraph or taleghone lines, non. for use in telegraph or telephone lines, n.o.p.: rate of duty, free.

(e) Coated with zinc or spelter, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 10 per cent.

(f) Single or several, coated, n.o.p., or covered with any material, including cable so covered: rate of duty, 15 per cent.

(g) N.o.p.: rate of duty, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—402a. Woven or welded wire fencing, of iron or steel, coated or not, n.o.p.; wire cloth or wire netting, of iron or steel, coated or not: rate of duty, 20 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction from 25 per cent to 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—402b. Woven netting, of iron or steel, coated, made from wire of 17 gauge or heavier, with meshes not smaller than one inch and not larger than two inches, with specially strengthened joints, when for use exclusively on fur farms, under regulations prescribed by the minister: rate of duty, 12½ per cent cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction from 15 per cent to 12½ per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: The 10 per cent discount on British production applies to a tax of 15 per cent and over, does it?

Mr. DUNNING: Not to 15 per cent; only when it is over 15 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: I was uncertain whether it was over 15 per cent or on 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Not including 15 per cent. Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—406. Coil chain, coil chain links, including repair links, and chain shackles, of iron or steel:

(a) One and one-eighth inches in diameter and over: rate of duty, free.

(b) Less than one and one-eighth inches in diameter: rate of duty, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—407. Silent chain and finished roller chain, of iron or steel, and complete parts thereof, of a class or kind not made in Canada, n.o.p., either chain of the type which operates over gears or sprockets with machine cut teeth: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—407a. Chains, of iron or steel, n.o.p., and complete parts thereof: rate of duty, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction in rate on this item from 20 per cent to 15 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: I should just like to point out that in reality when we deal with any of these items where the reduction is to 15 per cent or lower it is not fair to say there has been a reduction of 5 per cent. Twenty per cent less 10 per cent is 18 per cent, and the real reduction is not 5 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Effectively, wherever less than 15 per cent enters the picture, that is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: Wherever the rate is lowered to 15 per cent or less, and it was over 15 per cent, the effective reduction is the difference less 10 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right. Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—408. Malleable sprocket chain and link belting chain of iron or steel, including roller chain of all kinds for operating on steel sprockets or gears, when imported by manufacturers of agricultural implements for use exclusively in the manufacture of agricultural implements, in their own factories, under regulations prescribed by the minister: rate of duty, free.

Mr. McDONALD (Souris): I notice that a great many parts for machinery are imported free, and I should like to know if the complete machine, the finished article, carries a duty. In that way the manufacturers are protected; they are permitted to get the parts free while there is a duty on the machine. Has the department taken any steps to see that the consumers are protected in that respect?

Mr. DUNNING: In the case of farm implements, which I know my hon. friend has in mind, while the duty against the United States is 7½ per cent generally, agricultural implements are free from Great Britain. This item of malleable sprocket chains and so forth has been free from Great Britain for many years, just as the machine itself is free

Customs tariff—409. Cream separators and complete parts therefor, including steel bowls: rate of duty, free.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is there any change in this?

Mr. DUNNING: No; it is free entry bound.

Mr. BENNETT: There are considerable importations of cream separators into this country under the intermediate tariff. If one takes the trade returns and divides the number of machines into the valuation given it is apparent that there must be something wrong in the computation of the duty, because the price which is determined by dividing the number of importations from Sweden into the price received is so very low that the duty of 25 per cent added to it means nothing at all. It is difficult to understand but I think that matter properly belongs to the Minister of National Revenue, so I will deal with it at another time.

Mr. DUNNING: Sweden is the principal source, as my right hon. friend knows.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, though some come from England.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—409m. Internal combustion traction engines; traction attachments designed to become combined with automobiles in Canada for use as traction engines; complete parts of all the foregoing: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: I believe the hon, member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) desired to say something on this item.

Mr. WARD: Item 428e deals with diesel engines—

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon, friend desires to discuss diesel engines in particular he will have the opportunity under item 428e.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course under this item internal combustion engines are free across the board.

Mr. WARD: I am sorry the Minister of National Revenue is not here, because it seems to me the matter to which I am going to refer reflects directly upon his department and the officials in charge of that department. I am not going to go over what I said in this house previously, but I should like to point out that on investigation—and I have this from a reliable source—it can be proved that the firm that applied for the cancellation of the ruling that permitted these engines to enter free of duty have manufactured only one diesel engine in Canada. I am informed that this engine has not been sold and is not likely to be sold. Surely the commissioner of customs and his officials ought to investigate thoroughly matters of this kind before taking this action. The person who gave me this information informs me that in many cases where a dumping duty is applied, if I may refer to that for a moment, and where information is supposed to be gathered in the country of origin, no such information is gathered at all. These values are really set either by reference to an interested manufacturer in Canada or by a decision on the part of an official in one of the larger customs houses along the border. That is why I thought I should like the Minister of National Revenue to be here, because it seems to me it is time a little purging was done in that department in order to get rid of some of the trade exclusionists who disgrace it. It does seem too bad that we should sit here in parliament; the Minister of Finance should bring down his budget containing certain tariff items and this house should pass the resolutions, only to have the intent of the minister entirely defeated by the actions of some officials of the customs department. The time is coming when there must be a showdown on this question. If a commissioner of customs can cancel a ruling, really on the sayso of some interested person in Canada who has manufactured only one engine, which has not been sold and is not suitable to the Canadian trade, surely there is need for an investigation.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—410b. Machinery and apparatus for use exclusively in washing or dry cleaning coal at coal mines or coke plants; machinery and apparatus for use exclusively in producing coke and gas; machinery and apparatus for use exclusively in the distillation or recovery of products from coal tar or gas; and complete parts of all the foregoing, not to include motive power, tanks for gas, nor pipes and valves 10½ inches or less in diameter: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction in rate from  $7\frac{1}{2}$  to free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—410l. Ore crushers, rock crushers, stamp mills, grinding mills, rock drills, percussion coal cutters, coal augers, rotary coal drills, n.o.p., and complete parts of all the foregoing, for use exclusively in mining, metallurgical or quarrying operations: rate of duty, 5 per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are we importing any considerable quantities under this item?

Mr. DUNNING: I have the details. The imports total $582,000 worth of ore and rock [Mr. Ward.]

crushers; $5,200 worth of percussion coal cutters, coal augers and drills, and $527,000 worth of rock drills n.o.p., comprised within the item.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—410n. Diamond drills and core drills, not including motive power, electrically operated rotary coal drills, and coal cutting machines, n.o.p., and integral parts of the foregoing, for use exclusively in mining operations: rate of duty, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—410u. Blowers of iron or steel, n.o.p., for use in the smelting of ores, or in reduction, separation or refining of metals, ores or minerals; rotary kilns, revolving roasters and furnaces of metal, n.o.p., for use in the roasting of ore, mineral, rock or clay; furnace slag trucks and slag pots, n.o.p.; and integral parts of all the foregoing: rate of duty, 12½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction from 15 per cent to  $12\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—410z. Machinery and apparatus, no.p., and complete parts thereof, for the recovery of solid or liquid particles from flue or other waste gases at metallurgical or industrial plants, not to include motive power, tanks for gas, nor pipes and valves 10½ inches or less in diameter: rate of duty, five per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction in rate from  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent to 5 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—412b. Flat bed cylinder printing presses, to print sheets of a size 25 by 38 inches or larger, and complete parts thereof; machines designed to fold or sheet-feed paper or cardboard, and complete parts thereof: rate of duty, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—412d. Offset presses; lithographic presses; printing presses and type-making accessories therefor, n.o.p.; complete parts of the foregoing, not to include saws, knives and motive power: rate of duty, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—412b. Flat bed cylinder plete parts thereof: rate of duty, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—414c. Adding, bookkeeping, calculating and invoicing machines and complete parts thereof, n.o.p.: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction in rate from 15 per cent to free.

Mr. BENNETT: Are we doing any assembling of these machines in Canada? Is there any production of them?

Mr. DUNNING: I have the figures for 1934 for adding, bookkeeping, and calculating machines, cash registers, and so on—$2,886,000. Last year we exported $322,000 worth.

Mr. BENNETT: Was that assembled material, or machines produced in Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: The imports would give some indication. The total imports were valued at $892,000, of which $876,000 came from the United States, I have not any record of the assembling.

Mr. BENNETT: I looked into the matter once, and found that we were doing a substantial amount of assembling. Whether or not we are now producing, I do not know.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course these exports must qualify for British content to the extent of fifty per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: As the minister is aware, the labour in connection with the item is very high.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. The fact that we export to the United Kingdom, Australia, Sweden and to a small extent to the United States, would indicate that there is a high proportion of British content which, as my right hon. friend suggests, would be chiefly labour.

Mr. BENNETT: I think so, yes. Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—415. Electric vacuum cleaners and attachments therefor; hand vacuum cleaners; and complete parts of all the foregoing, including suction hose, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 5 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction from  $12\frac{1}{2}$  per cent to five per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—415d. Sewing machines, with or without motive power incorporated therein; complete parts of sewing machines: rate of duty, 5 per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: One moment, Mr. Chairman; we are getting along very nicely, and I do not wish to hold up the committee; as a matter of fact I want to help the minister all I can. I interpret the trade return to read that during 1936 more than 5,000 sewing machines were imported from Great Britain and about 8,000 from the United States.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member's figures are not quite correct. The total imports were 11,500 from all sources, valued at $452,000. My figures are for the fiscal year, whereas I believe the hon. member's are for the 31111-1314 calendar year. Of these machines 6,400 came from the United States, 4,800 from the United Kingdom and 300 from Germany. Sewing machine parts were imported to the value of $237,000, and we exported $1,500,000 worth of sewing machines and parts. The Canadian production was exported to Brazil, the Argentine, Jamaica and a small amount to the United States and the United Kingdom.

Mr. MacNICOL: As a Canadian I am proud of the sewing machine plant at St. Johns, Quebec. The item indicates a cut of fifty per cent in the rate of duty, and I have been wondering if it would be beneficial or detrimental to employment in the city I have named. I know that we export two or three times as many as we import. This is a business which Canadians have been trying to foster, and I trust the decrease in the item will not materially affect employment in it.

Mr. DUNNING: Generally speaking this industry is an example of that unusual thing, a monopoly concerning which there is very little complaint from any source, either from customers or from the labour engaged in it. I assure the hon. member he need have no fear about the industry not being able to take care of itself.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should imagine a monopoly would not be opposed to closing a plant. I trust there will be no such result in connection with the manufacture of sewing machines in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: So far as anything is certain in this uncertain world, I can assure the hon. member that it will not have that result.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—422. Street or road rollers and complete parts thereof: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction from 10 per cent to free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—424. Fire engines and other fire extinguishing machines; chassis for same; complete parts other than chassis parts: rate of duty, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—425. Lawn mowers: rate of duty, 10 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction from 20 per cent to 10 per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: How many do we import from Great Britain?

Mr. DUNNING: We imported 2,500 lawn mowers valued at $40,400, of which 2,100, valued at $34,300, came from the United States, and 375, valued at $6,100, from the United Kingdom. The more expensive and higher capacity machines came from Great Britain. We exported 4,600 machines, or nearly twice as many as we imported, 1,200 of which went to the United Kingdom and the balance to Australia and New Zealand. We shipped one lawn mower to the United States. Our exports were valued at $6,950. In 1934, the last figures I have our production amounted to 27,700 machines, valued at $171,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Principally at Guelph?
Mr. DUNNING: Brockville and Guelph,
I believe.

Mr. GLADSTONE: One of the largest manufacturers of lawn mowers in Canada is located in Guelph. They are at a loss to understand why at this time there should be a reduction of fifty per cent. They are required to import the special material they use because it cannot be made in Canada, and are now very anxious to know whether they can get some relief in connection with that imported material, the charges on which run at the rate of $4 per ton. Will the minister give some consideration to this matter?

Mr. DUNNING: From the figures I gave it is apparent that so far as the ordinary hand lawn mower is concerned, the Canadian industry is quite capable of taking care of itself. The British negotiators of the agreement were more particularly interested in the heavy power-driven machines. I shall be glad to consider any request for easement in the duties on raw materials used by any concern which believes it is at a disadvantage by reason of paying duties considered to be out of all proportion.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Gladstone) has demonstrated what happens when tariffs are cut generally. The manufacturer of one product protests against the treatment given to the manufacturer of another product, and asks the minister to lower the duties on the materials he uses.

Mr. DUNNING: When the process is started at the top it is quite easy to reduce all along the line, but the procedure is more difficult when you start at the bottom. At times it involves a geometric increase all along the line.

Mr. BARBER: Does the three per cent excise tax apply to any of these items?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. GLADSTONE: I have never found the price of lawn mowers to be exorbitant. I have told the manufacturers in Guelph that they may expect some compensation because of the changes being made by the Canada-United States and Canada-United Kingdom agreements. The markets for our natural products are being widened and as a result the people of this country will have a greater purchasing power.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—427. All machinery composed wholly or in part of iron or steel, n.o.p., and complete parts thereof: rate of duty, 10 per cent

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to a matter which I have taken up with the customs department and the Department of Finance concerning the interpretation by customs of some items. It is all very well for us to pass these items as proposed by the Department of Finance, but we find that everything is quite different when we go over to the customs department to get an interpretation of the items. The small manufacturer in Canada is being discriminated against. I have in mind particularly small plants engaged in doing mechanical work for dentists and doctors and melting gold and platinum alloys and doing research work therein. Some of these plants are located at Fort Erie, Windsor and other points along the border. Because of a ruling of the department these plants are being almost driven out of business. Why? Because of the interpretation placed upon this item by the customs department. This same material can be imported free of duty from the United States, but the furnace with which it is manufactured must pay a duty of 15 to 35 per cent to enter Canada. plus a sales tax of eight per cent and an excise tax of three per cent. The result is that the doctors and dentists and refining and melting work go to Buffalo or Detroit to have their work done, which work can be brought into Canada free of duty. These furnaces should come in free because they can't be got in Canada, for the melting of gold and platinum alloys.

I do not want to detain the committee but I think the position of these small manufacturers should be made clear. We should try to keep this work in Canada and give the small man here a chance. A furnace of the type used by the people to whom I refer can be used for only one purpose, that is, the melting of metal. If it is imported by a mining company it is allowed to come in duty free, but when it is imported by these small manufacturers it has to pay a duty of from 15 to 35 per cent, plus sales and excise tax. As I understand it, these furnaces will come under item 427a as not capable of being manufactured in Canada. One of these companies found that they needed a new type furnace, but because of the ruling of the department they were unable to get one. The Encyclopaedia Britannica gives the following definition for a worker in metal:

The art of extracting metals from their ores, refining them and preparing them for use, includes various processes as smelting, amalgamation, electrolytic refining, rolling and heat treating. It also applies to the structure of metals and alloys, to their constitution and its relation to their physical properties and to the thermal and mechanical treatment of metals.

Much of this work is being done in Buffalo, Rochester, Detroit and other cities along the great lakes, that should be done in Canada. I believe in Canada for the Canadians and our own work for our own workmen. This dental and other mechanical work should be done in Canada. I do not say that this is the fault of the minister because I know he is most sympathetic to the small manufacturers. I think the real fault lies with the customs officials who know very little about this metallurgy refining work and who place a duty of 15 to 35 per cent, plus 8 per cent sales tax, plus 3 per cent excise tax, against an article very necessary to these small Canadian manufacturers. I was over in Buffalo and other border cities a short time ago and I saw a company of this type employing more than one hundred men. They are getting a lot of work from Canada as a result of the unfair and unjust interpretation placed upon these items. These small plants are being forced to nearly close up and men are losing their jobs. They can go to Buffalo in fifteen or twenty minutes and have their work done there. I know the minister is most sympathetic to these matters, and I wish he would look into this particular case with the national revenue heads. These interpretations we allow another body to make are simply driving the small man out of business.

Mr. DUNNING: I should be very glad to bring the hon. member's remarks to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley). If it is possible to do anything helpful, I am sure—

Mr. SPENCE: That is all the good it will do.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 427, ex 446a, et al. Motion picture projectors, are lamps for motion picture work, motion picture or theatrical spot lights, light effect machines, motion picture screens, portable motion picture projectors complete with sound equipment; complete parts of all the foregoing, not to include electric light bulbs, tubes, or exciter lamps: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: A reduction in rate from ten per cent to free. It is a combination of two items.

Mr. BENNETT: Do we get any motion picture projectors from Great Britain?

Mr. DUNNING: A very small amount, four or five hundred dollars' worth.

Mr. LENNARD: Is this change made upon a request from motion picture interests in Canada, or is it a concession to interests in the old country?

Mr. DUNNING: It was asked for from British Columbia—that is one place I remember quite distinctly; of course it was also asked for during the negotiations, by the British. Practically all of the apparatus included in this item is of a class or kind not made in Canada. There is a production here of certain pieces of motion picture apparatus, but it is very small.

Mr. LENNARD: I wondered whether this was a request from Famous Players?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: My figures show we got $23,568 worth of such machines from the United States and $425 of imports from England last year.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right. I quoted just the British figure.

Mr. BENNETT: And $1,200 worth from Austria. The preference does not seem to be of much service.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—427a. All machinery composed wholly or in part of iron or steel, n.o.p., of a class or kind not made in Canada; complete parts of the foregoing: rate of duty, free.

Mr. BENNETT: That was in the budget of 1936.

Mr. DUNNING: It is just binding free entry.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—427b. Ball and roller bearings: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: A reduction in rate from five per cent to free.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is there any plant in Canada now making ball bearings? There used to be some plants.

Mr. DUNNING: There is not sufficient production for statistical purposes.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is all under one group, anyway.

Mr. DUNNING: That is to say, there are not three concerns manufacturing, and hence we have not a duty. We imported last year $735,000 worth of ball and roller bearings, of which $474,000 came from the United States, $169,000 from Sweden, and only $80,000 from Great Britain. This will give Great Britain a better opportunity.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Here is another respect in which the customs department has been operating in the way an hon. member referred to. I do not think that on this account we should hold up the Minister of Finance on his budget items, but we should all get ready for action when the revenue department's estimates come up.

Mr. DUNNING: Order. The hon, member is encouraging insubordination!

Mr. BENNETT: Highly irregular.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff-427c. Machinery for dairying purposes, viz:-power churns, power milk coolers, power fillers and cappers, power ice cream mixers, power butter printers, power cream savers, power bottle sterilizers, power brine tanks, power milk bottle washers, power milk can washers; ice-breaking machines, valve-less or centrifugal milk pumps, sanitary milk and cream vats; none of the foregoing machin-ery to include motive power: rate of duty,

Mr. DUNNING: No change

Mr. MacNICOL: What was the particular reason for the last phrase in the item, "to include motive power." In some of the items, I notice motive power is excluded.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no change in either the wording of the item or the rate. It was precisely the same under the 1932 agreement, and as far as I know is not working any hardship.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would not Canadian motive power operate all these machines?

Mr. DUNNING: I could not say as to that.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Do the parts for these machines come in free?

Mr. DUNNING: The parts do not enter under this item. They will come in under various items, dependent upon their composition. With reference to the question of the hon, member for Davenport (Mr. Mac-Nicol) I should call his attention to the fact that he has misread the item.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. BENNETT: It does not include the motive power.

Mr. DUNNING: No; it does not include the motive power.

Mr. MacNICOL: Pardon me, the minister is right. I should have read, "none of the foregoing machinery to include motive power."

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—427d. Machines designed for making rigid composite box-ends of wood—consisting of a centre with separate nailing edges attached—from scrap or waste mill stock, and complete parts thereof, not to include motive power: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff-427e. Automatic machines for making and packaging cigarettes, not to include tobacco preparing machines: rate of duty, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff-428d. Magnetos and complete parts thereof when imported by manufacturers of internal combustion engines, for use ex-clusively in the manufacture of such internal combustion engines, in their own factories: rate of duty, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff-428e. Diesel and semi-diesel engines, and complete parts thereof, n.o.p.: rate of duty, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—428f. Air-cooled internal combustion engines of not greater than 1½ h.p. rating, and complete parts thereof: rate of duty, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff-ex 429. Cutlery of iron or steel, plated or not:

(b) Table knives and table forks: rate of duty, 15 per cent.
(c) Penknives, jack-knives and pocket knives of all kinds: rate of duty, free.
(d) Knives, no.p.: rate of duty, free.
(e) Spoons: rate of duty, 15 per cent.
(f) Scissors and shears, n.o.p.: rate of duty, free.

free. (g) Razor blades; razors and complete parts thereof: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—430. Nuts and bolts with or without threads, washers, rivets, of iron or steel, coated or not, n.o.p., nut and bolt blanks, of iron or steel: rate of duty per one hundred pounds, 25 cents and 7½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction in rates hereMr. STIRLING: A big one.

Mr. DUNNING: —from fifty cents and ten per cent to twenty-five cents and 7½ per cent. Our imports were 27,000 hundredweight valued at $360,000, of which 26,000 hundredweight came from the United States and the balance from the United Kingdom. But we exported 45,000 hundredweight valued at $270,000, of which 34,000 hundredweight went to the United Kingdom. We export more bolts and nuts to the United Kingdom than we import from there; $190,000 worth went to the United Kingdom.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—430a. Hinges and butts, of iron or steel, coated or not, n.o.p.; hinge and butt blanks of iron or steel: rate of duty per one hundred pounds, 75 cents and 5 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: This is a reduction in rate. The present rate is 75 cents per hundredweight plus ten per cent ad valorem; the new rate is 75 cents and 5 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. BENNETT: Merely a change of 5 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 431b. Adzes, anvils, vises, cleavers, hatchets, saws, augers, bits, drills, screw-drivers, planes, spokeshaves, chisels, mallets, metal wedges, wrenches, sledges, hammers, crowbars, cantdogs, and track tools, picks, mattocks, and eyes or polls for the same: rate of duty, 10 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no change.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not wish to miss an opportunity when I can find one of congratulating the minister, and I must compliment him on this item because of all this long list this item was carefully picked out to remain as it is, and I am in accord with his action. It does protect that nice plant down in Brockville of which the directors were and perhaps are yet Mr. Graham and Mr. Edwards and Mr. Fulford. I recall last year this item was carefully protected. I wish the minister would exercise the same care with reference to some other items and leave the rates of duty as they are.

Mr. DUNNING: These congratulations, Mr. Chairman, are somewhat equivocal. I was unaware of the directorate of the plant to which my hon. friend has referred, but I do know that the largest producer who ever talked to me about this matter was the Hon. J. D. Chaplin, and he had every right to talk about it because he had a big business. I should not have mentioned his name in connection with it but for the delicate allusions of the hon, member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol).

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 431b. Files and rasps: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction here, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MacNICOL: It places it right on the free list. I was wondering if this would affect the plant at Port Hope which makes files. I do not know offhand.

Mr. DUNNING: We have had no complaints.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—431c. Machinists' or metal workers' precision tools and measuring instruments, viz:—calipers, micrometers, metal protractors and squares, bevels, verniers, gauges, gauge blocks, parallels, buttons, mercury plumb bobs, dividers, trammels, scribers, centre punches, pocket speed indicators, straight edges, key seat clamps and other clamps and vises used by toolmakers for precision work, precision tools and measuring instruments, n.o.p.: rate of duty, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—431d. Engineers', surveyors' and draughtsmen's precision instruments and apparatus, viz:— alidades; altazimuth surveying instruments; aneroid barometers, engineering, military and surveying; angle prisms; boards, military sketching; box sextants; clinometers; compasses; cross staff heads; curves, adustable, irregular, railroad and ship; curvimeters; drafting instruments of all kinds, including fitted cases containing the same; dipping needles; drafting machines; heliographs; integrators; levels, tripod and hand or pocket types; levelling rods; liners, section; meters, portable, for hydraulic engineering; pantographs; planimeters; protractors; parallel rulers; parallel ruling attachments; poles, ranging; pedometers and paccometers; plane tables, military and topographic scales, flat and triangular; slide rules; splines; straight edges, steel and wooden; tacheometers; tallying machines, pocket; tee squares, steel and wooden; telemeters; theodolites; transits, tripod and hand or pocket types; triangles of all types; tripods for use with any of the foregoing instruments: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no change.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: What is the value of these instruments imported from the United Kingdom?

Mr. DUNNING: The imports include both (c) and (d). In the import classification machinists' precision tools are included with engineers', surveyors', and draftsmen's precision instruments. The imports reported amount to $98,000 of which $68,000 came from the United States and $16,000 from the United Kingdom. That covers the two items.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: There is a difference between (c) and (d).

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: I cannot take time to read 43Id but apparently it covers the most important instruments that have been used in our civilization in both geographical and hydrographical developments. There is an important difference from the national standpoint between 43Ic and 43Id. What is the value of these instruments from the United Kingdom as compared with Germany or Austria?

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry, but the trade statistics do not separately classify items 431c and 431d. The imports from Germany under these combined items were $13,000.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: Could we have that information at a later date?

Mr. DUNNING: The items were separated in the last budget so that the trade statistics from now on will classify the figures separately and it will be possible next year to give that information. At present the items in the trade statistics are combined.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: This is my unlucky day; I am to get everything next year.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—431e. Measuring rules and tapes of all kinds: rate of duty, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—432. Hollow-ware, of iron or steel, coated or not, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 10 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: The reduction in rate is from 20 per cent. The total imports were $33,750, of which $30,000 came from the United States and the rest from the United Kingdom. The exports are not separately listed in the trade returns. In 1932, which is the last record we have, the production was $67,800.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—432a. Kitchen and dairy hollow-ware of iron or steel, coated with tin, including cans for shipping milk or cream, not painted, japanned, or decorated: rate of duty, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: The reduction is from 20 per cent. Imports were $34,000, of which $25,-000 came from the United States and the rest from the United Kingdom.

Item agreed to.
[Mr. Dunning.]

Customs tariff—432b. Hollow-ware, of iron or steel, coated with vitreous enamel: rate of duty,  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: What were the imports from the United States in 1936?

Mr. DUNNING: The total imports were $190,000, of which $91,000 came from the United States, $71,000 from Great Britain, and $15,000 from Germany. Our exports are not listed separately in the trade returns. Our manufactures of kitchen ware coated with vitreous enamel were just over a million dollars in 1934.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—432d. Manufactures of tinplate, painted, japanned, decorated or not, and manufactures of tin, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: The reduction in rate is from 20 to 15 per cent. The imports were $360,000, of which $317,000 came from the United States and $34,000 from the United Kingdom. The total production in the last year of record is $582,000.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 432d, ex 339. Collapsible tubes of lead or tin, or lead coated with tin: rate of duty, 10 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: This is a new item representing a reduction in rate. Up to the present time these tubes, if wholly of lead, have been subject to 20 per cent from Great Britain, and if of lead and tin have been at the same rate under another item. The new rate proposed is 10 per cent. The imports were $51,700, of which $38,000 came from the United States and $13,500 from the United Kingdom.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—433. Baths, bathtubs, basins, closets, lavatories, urinals, sinks, and laundry tubs of iron or steel, coated or not: rate of duty, 5 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: The reduction is from 10 per cent. The imports from the United States are slightly over $40,000.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 434, ex 434a. Motor rail cars or units for use on railways and chassis for same; complete parts of the foregoing: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: This involves, partly, a reduction in rate from 15 per cent to free. The item is a new one to cover motor rail cars or units for use on railways and chassis or complete parts thereof. Up to the present time rail cars or rail units have been dutiable under item 434, but under the budget of 1935 chassis for such rail cars or units were granted free entry under the British preferential tariff. The item now under discussion goes further in that it makes the complete unit free when imported from the United Kingdom.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff-434b, ex 438. Steel wheels for use on railway rolling stock: rate of duty,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: The reduction is from 15 to 71 per cent on part of the item; there is no change in the rest. Under the budget of 1935 pressed steel wheels for use on railway rolling stock were guaranteed a rate of 7½ per cent from Britain, and all other wheels remained dutiable under 434 at the rate of 15 per cent from Britain.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 435. Locomotives and motor cars for railways, of a class or kind not made in Canada, and complete parts thereof, for use exclusively in mining or metallurgical operations: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff-ex 438a. Automobiles and Customs tariff—ex 438a. Automobiles and motor vehicles of all kinds, n.o.p.; chassis for the foregoing: rate of duty, free.

Provided, that machines or other articles mounted on the foregoing or attached thereto for purposes other than for loading or unloading the vehicle shall be valued separately and duty assessed under the tariff items regularly applicable thereto.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 438, ex 438a, ex 711. Electric trackless trolley buses and chassis for same; complete parts of the foregoing: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: The reduction is intended to bring the item to date so as to include trackless trolley buses, a form of transport which may conceivably have a wide use in Canada in the future. The rate previously was 15 per cent, and it will be made free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—438b. Bearings, clutch re-lease; bearings, graphite; bearings, steel backed non-ferrous; bushings, graphited or oil impreg-nated; ceramic insulator spark plug cores, not further manufactured than burned and glazed, printed or decorated or not, without fittings; commutator copper segments; commutator insulating end rings; discs of hot rolled steel, spun or forged, with or without centre hole, for disc wheels; distributor rotors, cam assemblies and vacuum control assemblies; door bumper shoes; electric wiring terminals, sockets, fittings and connectors; gaskets of metal and asbestos, composite; ignition contact points; keys for shafting; lenses for head, tail, dome, signal and cowl or parking lamps; lock washers; piston ring castings in the rough, with or without gates and fins removed; steel bolts capped with stainless steel; switches for lamps, and parts thereof; vulcanized fibre in sheets. and parts thereof; vulcanized fibre in sheets, rods, strips and tubing; all the foregoing being of a class or kind not made in Canada, when for use in the manufacture of the automo-biles, motor vehicles or chassis enumerated in tariff items 438a and 424, or for use in the manufacture of parts thereof, or for the replacement or repair of automobiles, motor vehicles or chassis enumerated in tariff items 438a and 424: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: Items 438b to 438h inclusive are without change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff-438c. Ammeters; arm rests and wheel housing lining of indurated fibre, pressed to shape; axle housings, one piece welded, machined or not; carburetors and parts thereof; chassis frames; cigar and cigarette lighters, including base and parts thereof; con-trol ventilator gear box; cylinder lock barrels, with or without sleeves and keys thereof; dash heat indicators; fuel pumps and parts thereof; gasoline gauges and parts thereof; hinges, finished or not, for bodies; horns and parts thereof; instrument bezel assemblies and parts thereof; instrument board lamps; locks, electric ignition, steering gear, transmission, or combinations of such locks, and parts thereof; mouldings of metal, with nails set in position, lead filled or not; oil filters and parts thereof; oil gauges and parts thereof; pipe lines, bent to shape and equipped with fittings or not, and tubing therefor, for fuel, air, or liquid for actuating hydraulic brakes; purifiers for air, and parts thereof; purifiers for oil and parts thereof; radiator grills, assembled or not, but not polished or plated, and not to include finish or decorative moulding; radiator ornaments, unplated; radiator shutter assemblies, automatie; radiator water gauges; radiator shells, not plated, nor metal finished in any degree; shackles, bearing spring and parts thereof; speedometers and parts thereof; spring covers speedometers and parts thereof; spring covers of metal and closing strips or shapes therefor; stampings, body, cowl, hood, fender and instrument board, of metal, in the rough, trimmed or not, but not metal finished in any degree; starter switch assembly and parts thereof; steering wheels, and rims therefor; sun visor blanks of gypsum weatherboard; thermostats and parts thereof; throttle and spark buttons assemblies; vacuum tarks; windshield wipers assemblies; vacuum tanks; windshield wipers and parts thereof; all the foregoing being of a class or kind not made in Canada, when imported for use in the manufacture of the automobiles, motor vehicles or chassis enumerated in tariff items 438a and 424 or for use in the manufacture of parts thereof, or for the replacement or repair of automobiles, motor vehicles or chassis enumerated in tariff items 438a and 424: rate of duty, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—438d. Front and rear axles; brakes; clutches; internal combustion engines; steering gears; magnetos; rims for pneumatic tires larger than thirty inches by five inches; transmission assemblies; steel road wheels; and complete parts of the foregoing, all of a class or kind not made in Canada, when imported by manufacturers of automobiles, motor vehicles or chassis enumerated in tariff items 438a and 424 for use only in the manufacture of motor trucks or motor truck chassis: rate of duty, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—438e. Parts, n.o.p., for automobiles, motor vehicles or chassis enumerated in tariff items 438a and 424, not to include wireless receiving sets, die castings of zinc, electric storage batteries, parts of wood, tires and tubes or parts of which the component material of chief value is rubber:

(1) Brake linings, and clutch facings whether or not including metallic wires or threads:

(a) when made from crude asbestos of empire origin: rate of duty, free.

(b) when made from crude asbestos of nonempire origin: rate of duty, 15 per cent.

(2) Automobile and motor vehicle engines, stripped, n.o.p., and complete parts thereof, n.o.p.: rate of duty, free.

(3) Parts, n.o.p., not electro-plated, whether finished or not: rate of duty, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—438f. Hot rolled strip of iron or steel with rolled or mill edge, not being of greater value than 2\(^2\) cents per pound, of a class or kind not made in Canada, when imported by manufacturers of automobiles, motor vehicles or chassis enumerated in tariff items 438a and 424 or by manufacturers of parts of automobiles, motor vehicles or chassis enumerated in tariff items 438a and 424 to be used in the manufacture of such automobiles, motor vehicles or chassis, or parts thereof, in their own factories: rate of duty, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—438g. Motor cycles or side cars therefor, and complete parts of the foregoing: rate of duty, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—438h. Annular ball bearings and parts thereof, when imported for use only as original equipment in the manufacture of goods enumerated in tariff items 438a and 424, under regulations prescribed by the minister: rate of duty, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—439f. Children's carriages, sleds, and other vehicles; complete parts of all the foregoing: rate of duty, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: The reduction is from  $22\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

Mr. HEAPS: What were the imports. [Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: There were 9,600 units valued at $49,200, of which 8,700 units, valued at $37,400, came from the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom now has the principal part of the trade in carriages. As regards sleds and other vehicles and parts comprised within the item the situation is reversed. We imported $37,950 worth of which $33,800 came from the United States.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the minister the production in Canada of a similar class of goods?

Mr. DUNNING: In 1935, baby carriages and sleighs, $302,000; children's vehicles and parts, $496,000; children's sleighs, $91,000.

Mr. BENNETT: We export some, do we not?

Mr. DUNNING: They are not separately listed in the trade returns.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—440j. Trawls, trawling spoons, fly hooks, sinkers, swivels, sportsmen's fishing reels, bait, hooks, and fishing tackle, n.o.p.: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—4401. Aircraft and complete parts thereof, not including engines, under regulations prescribed by the minister: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—440m. Engines and complete parts thereof, when imported for use only in the equipment of aircraft: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: A reduction in rate from 10 per cent to free. Our imports last year were $199,000, of which $99,000 came from the United States and $98,000 from the United Kingdom.

Mr. BENNETT: And we are not making any.

Mr. DUNNING: No, only assembling them, and this is to facilitate assembling.

Mr. BENNETT: It was only a revenue tariff

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—440n. Complete parts for repair of engines enumerated in tariff item 440m: rate of duty, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—441e. Guns and rifles of a class or kind not made in Canada: rate of duty, 5 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Mr. THORSON: Might I ask the minister to go back to item 409, cream separators? I should like to ask some questions.

Mr. DUNNING: I am in the hands of the committee. I am not unwilling.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member of course is out of order.

Mr. THORSON: I quite appreciate that, but with the leave of the committee, I should like to ask some questions.

The CHAIRMAN: I am in the hands of the committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: We passed that.

Customs tariff—445c. (i) electric telegraph apparatus and complete parts thereof: rate of duty, free.

(ii) electric telephone apparatus and complete parts thereof: rate of duty, 10 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—445d. Electric wireless or radio apparatus and complete parts thereof: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—445f. Electric dynamos or generators and transformers, and complete parts thereof, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: A reduction in rate from 25 to 15 per cent. The imports of dynamos or generators and parts amounted to $284,000, of which $209,000 came from the United States and $65,000 from the United Kingdom; transformers and parts, imports $81,000, of which $65,000 came from the United States and $15,000 from the United Kingdom.

We exported $223,000 worth of the articles covered by this item, of which $113,000 went to the United Kingdom. That is, we exported more to the United Kingdom than we imported from that country.

Mr. BENNETT: Under present conditions there will be no imports from the United Kingdom anyway. They are engaged in other work.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, that is my view, but the British government have hopes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—445g. Electric motors, and complete parts thereof, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: A reduction in rate from 25 to 15 per cent. Our total imports of electric motors and parts were $1,184,000, of which $925,000 came from the United States and $239,000 from the United Kingdom; the rest in small amounts from other countries.

Mr. MacNICOL: None from Sweden?

Mr. DUNNING: From Sweden $12,000. Our exports are included in the total I gave under the previous item, and our production in 1934 was just short of $3,000,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: On Saturday last the new building of the Toronto Stock Exchange was opened. I am told that many but not all of the motors used in that building, and there is a large number, were imported from Great Britain, and some from Sweden. A motor manufacturer in conversation told me that this reduction will be a considerable handicap, will considerably interfere with the production of motors in Canada. Of course it cannot be helped now, but it looks as if the duty has been reduced approximately 40 per cent. That is a fairly substantial reduction. Their labour cost in Great Britain is so much less than in Canada, and their plants are very large; I have been in some and will be again this summer. I wonder if this is not too substantial a reduction on a line of goods which Canadians have developed quite a capacity for manufacturing.

Mr. DUNNING: We are exporting to the United Kingdom.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know, but we are importing a lot too.

Mr. DUNNING: Exports two to one of imports.

Mr. BENNETT: We are importing a lot of second hand motors from the United States and rewinding them.

Mr. DUNNING: But not so much as before.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Circumstances alter cases. In contrast with the remarks of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), last year there was a very considerable reduction in the rate of duty on electric washing machines coming into Canada from the United States. The manufacturers of these machines are desirous of receiving some consideration in the matter of their raw material, and particularly with respect to the electric motors, on which they would like to see the duty equalized with that on the motor in the washing machine. As it is now I believe these small motors carry a duty 5 per cent higher than on the motor included as part of the washing machine. The reduction in duty on electric motors coming from Great Britain is not helpful because no motors of the type used in washing machines are brought from England, nor can they be brought from there because the production of such fractional horse-power motors has never been developed in England, and prices there are considerably higher than in Canada or the United States where this type of motor is used so largely on small appliances. I would ask the minister to consider the question of equalizing the rate of duty on electric motors coming from the United States with the rate on motors coming in as part of a washing machine.

Mr. DUNNING: That is a thorny question. It does not arise under this agreement; it arises under our general tariff. I recognize the force of my hon. friend's point, but there are many difficulties in the way.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 445k. Electrical instruments and apparatus of precision of a class or kind not made in Canada, viz:—meters or gauges for indicating and/or recording altitude, amperes, comparisons, capacity, density, depth, distance, electrolysis, flux, force, frequency, humidity, inductance, liquid levels, ohms, operation, power factor, pressure, space, speed, stress, synchronism, temperature, time, volts, volume, watts; complets parts thereof: rate of duty, free

Mr. DUNNING: A reduction in rate from 15 per cent to free. Our total imports were $130,000, these statistics covering electric meters and complete parts.

Mr. BENNETT: Largely used in aircraft.

Mr. DUNNING: There are various classes of meters and meter parts. But the item does not include automobile ammeters.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—4451. Electric storage batteries, composed of plates measuring not less than eleven inches by fourteen inches and not less than three-quarters inch in thickness; complete parts thereof: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—445m. Flame proof electric switch gear, for use underground in coal mines, and complete parts thereof: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Gladstone.]

Customs tariff—446. Electric steam turbo generator sets, 700 h.p. and greater, of a class or kind not made in Canada, and complete parts thereof: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change. Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—446a. Manufactures, articles or wares, of iron or steel or of which iron or steel or both are the component materials of chief value, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 10 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No change. Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 446a. Cellulose acetate film reinforced with wire mesh: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction from 10 per cent to free. This is a new item, its purpose being to afford free entry of cellulose acetate film reinforced with wire mesh. This is merely a technical description of what might be referred to in simpler terms as windowing for poultry houses. This material, sold in England under various trade names, is to some extent displacing glass for window use. It is non-breakable, luminous, semi-transparent, said to be non-inflammable and is reputed to have the advantage of transmitting certain health-giving rays which are excluded by ordinary glass. So far as is known there is no Canadian manufacture.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 446 et al. Electric welding apparatus, not including motors: rate of duty, 10 per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like again to congratulate the minister on seeing to it that the words "not including motors" are in this item. If he will follow my suggestions along these lines—I made this suggestion last year—instead of those of the hon. member for Melfort he will certainly help to provide work for Canadians.

Mr. DUNNING: When my hon. friend from Davenport advises me to make a tariff item free, I am sure there will be joy among the angels.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—446b. Steel bicycle rims, not enamelled nor plated: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change. Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—446c. Golf shafts of seamless steel, coated or not, but not chromium plated: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—446d. Bottles or cylinders of seamless steel used as high-pressure containers for gas: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—451. Buckles, clasps, eyelets, hooks and eyes, dome, snap or other fasteners of iron, steel, brass or other metal, coated or not, n.o.p. (not being jewellery): rate of duty, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction from 20 to 15 per cent, qualified by what the right hon. leader of the opposition said a moment ago, that the 10 per cent discount will not apply on the new rate whereas it did on the old. The effective reduction, therefore, is from 18 to 15 per cent. Our imports amounted to $224,000, of which $186,000 came from the United States and $26,000 from the United Kingdom.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—451a. (i) Spring-beard needles and latch needles: rate of duty, 10 per cent.

(ii) Needles, of any material or kind, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 10 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: This is a reduction from 15 to 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—451b. Pins manufactured from wire of any metal, n.o.p.: rate of duty,  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—462. Philosophical, photographic, mathematical and optical instruments, n.o.p.; speedometers, cyclometers and pedometers, n.o.p.; complete parts of all the foregoing: rate of duty, 7½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: This is a reduction from 15 to  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—465. Signs of any material other than paper, framed or not; letters and numerals of any material other than paper: rate of duty, 10 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction from 15 to 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff-469. Machine card clothing: rate of duty, 10 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: This is the same reduction, from 15 to 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—471a. Pressed steel belt pulleys, for power transmission, and finished or unfinished parts thereof, including interchangeable bushings: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—475b. Matrices for sterectypes, electrotypes and celluloids described in item 475a: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—476. Surgical and dental instruments of any material; surgical needles; X-ray apparatus; microscopes valued at not less than $50 each, by retail; and complete parts of all the foregoing: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—522. Rovings, yarns and warps, wholly of cotton, not more advanced than singles n.o.p.: rate of duty, 12½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: This is the first of the textile items. There is no change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—522c. Rovings, yarns and warps, wholly of cotton, including threads, cords and twines generally used for sewing, stitching, packaging and other purposes, n.o.p.; cotton yarns, wholly or partially covered with metallic strip, generally known as tinsel thread: rate of duty, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—522d. Yarns and warps, wholly of cotton, mercerized, number forty and finer, imported, under regulations prescribed by the minister, for sale to manufacturers, to be further manufactured in their own factories: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—522f. Yarns and warps, wholly of cotton, number forty and finer, when imported by manufacturers of mercerized cotton yarns, for use exclusively in the manufacture of mercerized cotton yarns, in their own factories: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—523. Woven fabrics, wholly of cotton, not bleached, mercerized, nor coloured, no.p., and seamless cotton bags: rate of duty, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—523a. Woven fabrics, wholly of cotton, bleached or mercerized, not coloured, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 20 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—523b. Woven fabrics, wholly of cotton, printed, dyed or coloured, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 20 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction from 22½ to 20 per cent. The specific duties were removed in the last budget. Our imports last year from the United Kingdom of printed cloths amounted to $1,105,000. In piece dyed cloths our imports from the United Kingdom were $1,750,000, and in woven fabrics, cotton yarn dyed, our imports from the United Kingdom were $394,000.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the minister the same figures for our imports from the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. Our imports from the United States of woven fabrics of cotton, printed, were $311,000; of woven fabrics of cotton, piece dyed, $534,000, and of woven fabrics of cotton, yarn dyed, $131,000.

Mr. BENNETT: They carried a specific duty?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask under what item denim would come?

Mr. DUNNING: If it is wholly of cotton, the ordinary plain blue denim, it would be under this item.

Mr. HEAPS: I presume there are different colours, blue, green, and so on. Personally I should like to see this duty reduced a little further, because I do not see the necessity for this very high protection on this class of goods, which is very largely manufactured in this country as well as in the United States. I believe there is very little denim imported from the United Kingdom. I understand further that in the corresponding item dealing with manufactured goods there has not been a reduction made, so that while there is a reduction under this item on denim coming into this country there has been no reduction in the duty on overalls and other finished articles. I understand some complaint has been registered with the department in this regard.

Mr. DUNNING: No, the complaint was just the reverse.

Mr. HEAPS: I was trying to get my facts correct; but complaints have been made.

Mr. DUNNING: By manufacturers of overalls.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. HEAPS: I should like the minister to discuss that aspect, and I was wondering if the matter could not be adjusted by bringing the tariff in both cases down to a proper level so that Canadian manufacturers would not be placed at a disadvantage.

Mr. DUNNING: It will be remembered that a year ago the budget removed the specific duty on the raw material coming from Great Britain.

Mr. BENNETT: Under the preference.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. Last year also the specific duty was removed from the finished article in order that the advantage of the reduction might be passed on to the consumer. By this we are still further reducing the duty on the raw material from the United Kingdom to the manufacturers of overalls.

Mr. HEAPS: But I am told none of that material comes from the United Kingdom.

Mr. DUNNING: I query the suggestion that plain denim is not imported and cannot be secured from the United Kingdom, rather than from the United States.

Mr. HEAPS: When I worked at my trade a number of years ago I used considerable quantities of denim and at that time none of it was purchased in the United Kingdom. It is practically all Canadian or United States production. There is not a great deal of it coming from the United States, because the Canadian manufacturer usually puts his price at a level where it does not pay to import denim. The price of denim is maintained at a certain figure, plus the United States cost of production, plus the tariff less a fraction of a cent, and as a rule, so far as price is concerned, the Canadian manufacturer in our secondary industries is practically at the mercy of producers of denim in Canada. He has to pay the price they fix, and the price they fix is the one practically fixed by producers of denim in the United States, plus of course the tariff. If the tariff on overalls is reduced, and the tariff on denim is maintained, the overall manufacturers are placed at a disadvantage. My plea is that the minister reduce the tariff on denims, because I do not believe there is any need for the high protection given Canadian manufacturers of denims.

Let me give my reasons for making these statements. First of all, the Canadian manufacturer buys his raw material, or should buy it, at exactly the same price as the United States manufacturer. There is no duty on raw cotton entering Canada. I do not believe the cost of producing denim in Canada is any greater than it is in the United States, in spite of the greater production in that country.

Mr. BENNETT: It is cheaper in the southern states.

Mr. HEAPS: I think wages in the southern states are no less than they are right here in Canada.

Mr. BAKER: Labour is much cheaper there.

Mr. HEAPS: Taking labour costs in the northern and southern states I would say that they are somewhat higher than those found in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: But the figures do not show that.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think much can be said about labour costs. If the manufacturer in Canada can import raw material duty free, I do not see why he must have a protection under the intermediate tariff. I would suggest to the minister, both from the general standpoint of reducing cost to the consumer, and giving the secondary manufacturer a fair opportunity, that the cost of denim be permitted to come down in exactly the same way as the cost of the finished article has done.

Mr. DUNNING: The argument is rather circular in form, because we here propose a We are now considering the reduction. British agreement, and the proposal is to reduce the duty on denim as a part of the item. Of course I know what the difficulty is. It is that the overall manufacturers, who a year ago were quite ready to accept the reduction in duty on their fabrics, did not with the same good grace accept the reduction in duty on the finished overalls. That is the truth of the matter. Last year we removed the specific duty on the fabrics under the British preference, and we reduced the specific duty on overalls from three and a half cents to one and a half cents per pound weight. Now we are reducing the rate again with respect to the British preference. It will be 18 per cent net in future, allowing for the discount. In the budget item I propose to remove the cent and a half per pound on the finished overalls.

Mr. BENNETT: That is in the ways and means resolution.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, which is not presently before the committee. Our best judgment is that that is an equitable working of the reduction on fabrics and the finished commodity. I know that the overall manufacturer to whom the hon. member (Mr. Heaps) refers wrote me in the matter. Like all manufacturers he wants his raw material free, and a tariff as high as possible on the finished product. That is a very human desire. Nearly every person who communicates with the Minister of Finance has that desire to a greater or lesser extent. In reply to the hon. member I can only say that a careful study of the matter leads me to the belief that the adjustments downward which have been made in connection with our raw material and the finished product are applied to meet the interests of all concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: What did we buy from England under the reduction of last year?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not the figures, but I could get them.

Mr. BENNETT: I was only interested in the effect of the reduction. The contention of the hon, member has been that we cannot get denim from England.

Mr. DUNNING: Denim is not separately classified, but is included with other coloured cotton fabrics.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the intermediate tariff on denims?

Mr. DUNNING: It is  $27\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, plus  $3\frac{1}{2}$  cents per pound.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister explain why there should be such a high tariff on denims coming into Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: The United States agreement effected a reduction a year ago.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): When the minister was first answering the hon, member in connection with the tariff against denim he said that it depended on certain things; I understood him to mean the amount of cotton or wool in the denim.

Mr. DUNNING: No; this denim is wholly of cotton.

Mr. BENNETT: It is overall material.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I thought both cotton and wool were used.

Mr. DUNNING: No, just cotton.

Mr. MacNICOL: A moment ago the minister made the observation that the manufacturer wanted to have the duty as high as he could have it; what the manufacturer had in mind was trying to provide more jobs.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh yes?

Mr. HEAPS: I still maintain the minister should seriously consider the duty imposed on denims. I used a great deal of this material at one time, and I know how the price has gone up and how it fluctuates all the time in view of our tariff structure. In 1930 when the tariff on the item jumped, some of the manufacturers in Canada refused to invoice goods to the secondary manufacturers. They shipped the goods, and when they felt the rate was going up they sent the invoices. The result was that the costs went up, too.

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid the leader of the opposition will have to answer the hon. member.

Mr. HEAPS: I happen to have seen correspondence in connection with the matter. I have never yet been able to discover why the textile industry in Canada requires an intermediate rate of  $27\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the intermediate rate.

Mr. HEAPS: Our importations are chiefly under that rate, and in addition there is the excise tax of three per cent, bringing the whole rate to something over 30 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: And in addition a specific duty of three and a half cents per pound.

Mr. HEAPS: We cannot justify so high a tariff on articles in every-day use by the people of Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend's original premise is wrong when he states that the importations come principally from the United States. In every classification of this item which I read, the imports from Great Britain are two and three times as great as those from the United States, and in some cases even more than that. The competitive factor in connection with textiles of this character is the British price.

Mr. HEAPS: My information is that so far as denim is concerned, there is hardly any imported from the United Kingdom. The minister admitted a few moments ago that there was no item which would show the amount of denim imported from the United States and from the United Kingdom.

Mr. DUNNING: Let us see if we cannot get a closer figure. Is denim a woven cotton fabric printed?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. DUNNING: Is it a woven fabric, cotton, piece dyed?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. BAKER: Sometimes it is.

Mr. DUNNING: Or is it yarn dyed? I think piece dyed would more likely cover it.
[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. BAKER: It would not be woven; it would be piece dyed.

Mr. DUNNING: Under that heading we imported from the United Kingdom $1,750,000 worth, and from the United States $500,000. The price competitive factor is the imports from the United Kingdom.

Mr. BENNETT: On cotton textiles.

Mr. DUNNING: If it should be yarn dyed, the imports from the United States last year were only $130,000 as against nearly $400,000 from the United Kingdom.

Mr. HEAPS: I think the figures quoted by the minister prove my contention. The tariff on these items is so high that the Canadian manufacturer cannot afford to bring in these goods. Eight-ounce denim which will sell in the United States for 15 cents a yard will cost the manufacturer here the same price, plus whatever tariff is placed against the material. The Canadian manufacturer has freight charges to pay and other items of expense which make it impossible for him to bring in this material. The figures read by the minister would indicate that he cannot possibly import these goods from the United States.

Mr. BAKER: How does Great Britain keep the cost down?

Mr. HEAPS: There is very little of this overall material brought in from the United Kingdom. I am told that they do not produce it there at all. The only competition is from the American manufacturer. The Canadian manufacturer finds it impossible to bring in these goods from the United States. I would venture to say that if the rate of duty was reduced from 27½ to 22½ or 17½ per cent, the minister would find that within twenty-four hours the Canadian manufacturer would bring down his price in conformity with the change in the tariff structure.

Mr. MacNICOL: And throw a lot of men out of work.

Mr. DEACHMAN: What were the rates on these items prior to 1930?

Mr. BENNETT: There was no specific duty at that time.

Mr. DUNNING: The last time this item was dealt with was in the budget of 1928. At that time the rates were 20 per cent, 25 per cent, and 27½ per cent ad valorem, with no specific duty. Under this proposal the rate will be 20 per cent as against Great Britain, exactly the same as it was in 1930.

Mr. DEACHMAN: What about the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: The present rate against the United States is  $27\frac{1}{2}$  per cent ad valorem, plus  $3\frac{1}{2}$  cents per pound. Of course, the British agreement does not touch the United States duty.

Mr. DEACHMAN: What would be advalorem equivalent of this rate?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not that information at the moment. This is rather a difficult item to deal with, as there are so many classifications of material.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Surely someone can tell us what would represent the ad valorem rate in connection with products such as this.

Mr. DUNNING: My information has been made up for the purpose of dealing with the British rates.

Mr. DEACHMAN: The British rate is not competitive to the same extent.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will wait until eight o'clock, I shall have that information.

Item stands.

PRIVATE BILLS

TORONTO GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. W. R. MACDONALD (Brantford City) (for Mr. Plaxton) moved the third reading of Bill No. 53, to incorporate Toronto General Insurance Company.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I do not see the mover of the bill here. I call the attention of the government to the very extensive powers for which this company is asking. Under section 8 it may make contracts of insurance in respect of accidents, automobiles, aviation, bonds, burglaries, credit, earthquakes, explosions, falling aircraft, fires, forgeries, guarantees, hail, inland transportation, machinery, plate glass, sickness, sprinkler leakage, steam boilers, tornadoes, and the weather. These are very large powers to be conferred on one company, and one which is putting up very little in the way of money or securities.

What rates are to be given by this company? Surely, if parliament is to give life and fire insurance companies such wide general powers their rates should be regulated, as I have always contended by a body similar to the board of railway commissioners. The arts and sciences, notably preventive medicine and surgery, have reduced the death rate over fifteen to twenty points per thousand within the last few years; large amounts of money have been spent by the dominion and provincial governments and by municipalities for purposes of fire prevention; and surely it is not desired that the same level of rates shall prevail as was in force years ago. This is a matter which I think the government could very well consider.

Under section 8 this company is empowered to deal in some nineteen different classes of insurance, most of which were never heard of in the olden days. Why should not the government consider some general policy to apply to all these companies? It is well known that some of them are started without the financial security they should have. They deal mostly with industrial workers, and charge very high rates. Let anyone who doubts this statement try to get insurance in any of the classes I have enumerated and at the rates charged. In the cities and towns the rates for burglary insurance have been raised because a number of places have been broken into, and in other classes of insurance there have been increases. If the federal government incorporates these companies under the general act there should be, I repeat, some body with power to control their rates, or they will become like some of the shark loan and mortgage companies.

I regret that the mover of the bill is not present, although I do not take objection to that; he is a good friend of mine and has no doubt looked into the bill more closely than anyone else. But take clause 9, dealing with subscription and payment of capital before commencing business. The company is to be allowed to commence business when it has $275,000 of its capital stock subscribed and paid for. What regulations are there for such companies? I should like to know; I raised the point last year. I am sure the time is coming when we must have some regulation. In the United States during the past four years there have been a number of federal investigations into companies such as these; many of them, quite illegally, took their trust funds and gambled with them all over the civilized world, and they could do so because they were under no form of regulation. No doubt the department of insurance is a good one and its superintendent is efficient, but this is not enough. The time has come for the government to consider laying down some policy along the lines I have suggested.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

FEDERAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 49, to incorporate Federal Fire Insurance Company of Canada—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City)—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1-Incorporation.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask the minister or whoever is in charge of this bill whether it has received the approval of the government or of those in charge of measures of this kind?

Mr. DUNNING: These bills, incorporating Wellington Fire, Federal Fire, Gore District Mutual, Sterling Insurance, and Sons of Scotland, have all been examined by the superintendent of insurance, have been to the committee on banking and commerce, and have been returned here without amendment. They comply with all the conditions of the Department of Insurance.

Mr. HEAPS: The superintendent of insurance has approved of these measures?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. In some cases in these bills there are conditions to be complied with before the incorporation can be proceeded with. For instance, in the case of a provincial company which is by statute becoming a federal company, the protective provisions are inserted at the instance of the superintendent of insurance in order to ensure that everything is regular. I have not personal knowledge of them, I might say, but I have confidence in that official.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 10 inclusive agreed to. Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

WELLINGTON FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 50, to incorporate the Wellington Fire Insurance Company—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford)—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Sections 1 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Classes of insurance authorized.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. CHURCH: I would call the attention of the committee to the fact that the incorporators of this Wellington Fire Insurance Company are the same as the incorporators of Federal Fire Insurance Company, the bill previously before the committee; they are all good people, though, and they are asking for the same powers as those provided in the other bill. All these companies are from Toronto. Why do they want a federal charter? They are doing only a local business. Why are two companies being incorporated for the same purposes? I don't want to oppose them but I want to secure information. There should be proper control over rates and for that purpose I submit that we ought to have a federal department.

Why do these people want two charters? By no stretch of the imagination can it be said that either of these bills is for the general advantage of Canada; they are merely for the promotion of local business. Here we have two companies seeking incorporation on the same day. One of the bills has passed through practically all its stages in this house and nothing has been said about it. No wonder the condition of affairs in Canada to-day is what it is in connection with these insurance companies. There is a long list of classes of insurance in which this company may engage, all set out on page 2 of the bill, and I think we should have an explanation either from the minister or from the sponsor. Does the government propose to pass further general regulations to control these companies? Can some five or six persons come here and obtain two separate charters in one evening. one in the name of the Federal Fire Insurance Company and the other in the name of the Wellington Fire Insurance Company, without one word of explanation from some responsible person or any government policy?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is a peculiar circumstance that we should be asked to incorporate at the same time two companies having the same set of directors. I do not know anything about this bill but it does strike me as a rather peculiar arrangement, and I support the suggestion of my hon. friend that there should be an explanation.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): Both of these companies were incorporated under provincial authority and are now doing business under provincial charters. It is now their intention to extend their operations beyond the province of Ontario and for that reason they wish to have incorporation under the federal parliament. The applicants are directors or officers of the existing companies and the intention is that when the new companies are incorporated, organized and entitled to do business, they will take over the assets and business respectively of these provincial concerns. It is merely a matter of extending their charters, giving them dominion jurisdiction, whereas at present their charters are only provincial. I am advised that both companies intend to surrender their provincial charters and operate under dominion jurisdiction.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is not in the slightest an answer to the question. There have been two companies operating under provincial charters and they now seek dominion incorporation. What I said was—and I simply followed the hon. member for Broadview—that we should be told why there should be two companies operated by the same board of directors and doing work apparently in the same field.

Mr. DONNELLY: Does the hon. member mean that the Federal company and the Wellington company have the same directors?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If the hon, member will turn to the bill we have passed he will see that those seeking incorporation are:

Herbert Begg, insurance director; William Robert Begg, manufacturers' agent; William Henry Buscombe, insurance executive; John Gordon Hutchinson, insurance executive, and George Alexander Gordon, insurance executive, all of the city of Toronto, in the province of Outario, together with such persons as become shareholders of the Company, are hereby incorporated under the name of "Federal Fire Insurance Company of Canada" hereinafter called "the Company".

When we come to this bill for the incorporation of Wellington Fire Insurance Company we find that the persons enumerated in section 1 are:

Herbert Begg, insurance director; William Robert Begg, manufacturers' agent; William Henry Buscombe, insurance executive; John Gordon Hutchinson, insurance executive, and George Alexander Gordon, insurance executive, all of the city of Toronto, in the province of Ontario, together with such persons as become shareholders of the company, are hereby incorporated under the name of "Wellington Fire Insurance Company" hereinafter called "the Company".

These are both fire insurance companies and there seems to be no reason why there should be this duplication, when both companies are out to do the same type of work and apparently in the same field.

Mr. THORSON: It may not necessarily follow that the shareholders of both of these provincial companies are the same persons. It 31111-1324 may be a matter purely of convenience to pick out these particular persons as the incorporators of the dominion company in each case.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is quite true that the shareholders may be different; we do not know anything about that. All we can go on is the enumeration of the names of those seeking incorporation, and I submit that we should have some definite information before we pass the third reading.

Mr. HEAPS: There should be some definite statement in this committee before we adopt a measure of this kind. I do not think we should be asked to incorporate two different companies having the same set of directors and both doing the same business. If either the minister or the hon. member who sponsors the bill is unable to give us any information at this stage, the logical thing is to allow the matter to stand until that information can be given.

Mr. DUNNING: The sponsor of the bill evidently cannot give the definite reasons why the incorporators are the same in both these bills. One can only take it that these two separate provincial companies have at present the same or substantially the same personnel in their directorates, and the two companies separately are seeking federal incorporation. What apparently some members of the committee desire to know is why the two companies should not amalgamate if they are owned by substantially the same people. That information, it seems, was not given in the banking and commerce committee. I was not present in that committee and therefore have no knowledge of the circumstances, but if it is deemed important to have it I think the bill should stand tonight so as to give the sponsor an opportunity to secure full information. I do not think that parliament particularly wants to force amalgamation. It may well be, as the hon, member for Selkirk has suggested, that the shareholders are substantially different although the directors are the same. There may be circumstances of which we are unaware and we ought to be made aware of those circumstances.

Progress reported.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 51, to incorporate Gore District Mutual Fire Insurance Company—Mr. Edwards.

Bill No. 52, to incorporate Sterling Insurance Company of Canada—Mr. Parent (Quebec West and South).

SONS OF SCOTLAND BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION

The house in committee on Bill No. 54, to incorporate the Sons of Scotland Benevolent Association.—Mr. Reid—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On clause 1-Incorporation.

Mr. POULIOT: Are the ladies and gentlemen mentioned in that clause real good Scotch people? It is a Scotish benevolent association? I should like to know if they are all Scots?

Mr. DUNNING: The sponsors are.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 16 inclusive agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. THORSON: Will the sponsor of the bill be good enough to explain the title?

Mr. REID: It is rather late to start explaining now after the preamble is carried.

Mr. THORSON: It is a misnomer.

Mr. REID: I do not think the hon. member is in earnest. I shall be glad to tell him after it is through.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

INDUSTRIAL LOAN AND FINANCE CORPORATION

The house in committee on Bill No. 57, respecting Industrial Loan and Finance Corporation—Mr. Vien—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On clause 1—Loans of $500 or less: aggregate charge.

Mr. McIVOR: I do not wish to be discourteous to the Senate nor to the hon. member from the other side of the house, the sponsor of this bill. The other night I said a similar bill was unchristian, but that was not fair to the hon. member for Cartier. I will say that this bill is inhuman. Within the last few days I have read some of the advertisements of corporations of this type, and they are very misleading. They seem to be brotherly, very inviting and very sympathetic to those in distress. Once you get into their clutches, however, it is a different story. To me passing a bill of this kind is dike hitting a man when he is down. Often in my youth, and occasionally later on, I engaged in the manly art, and it was always considered a brutal thing to hit a man when he was down; a person who did that sort of thing was called by a special name. I think a corporation or financial concern that will hit a man when he is in financial trouble is most inhuman, and we, the representatives of the people, should not tolerate it. I say they are inhuman because anyone who plans or contrives to reap a rich harvest from his fellow-men who are in deep distress and liable to lose their all, deserves that word. If the hon, member who is an expert in the administration of lethal gas could give these people a few drops of that gas, not enough to be fatal, I think it might be a very good thing.

My personal view is that the borrower should be protected. If our provinces are not able to pay four per cent I am sure hon. members will agree that individuals should not be asked to pay the rates demanded by these companies. I wonder if hon. gentlemen realize that there are companies which seek to extract from those in financial trouble not four per cent, not ten per cent, not twenty per cent, but  $27\frac{1}{2}$  per cent and, judging by the experience I have had in the past, before you get out from under, it may cost more than thirty per cent and perhaps nearly fifty per cent.

I had one experience that causes me to rise in my place to-night and protest against companies of this kind. I knew of a hard working man who got into debt, perhaps through listening to a high pressure salesman, and he was faced with the possibility of losing all his property and working a great hardship on his family. Along came these financial concerns, saying: We will get you out of your trouble. They say: Consult us and your financial difficulties will be removed. It is like jumping from the frying pan into the fire. I do not wish to make it any stronger, but I could not call myself fair and honest to my fellowmen if I did not register the most vigorous possible protest against the incorporation of companies of this kind. I voted for the other bill because it was sponsored by an hon. member in this corner of the chamber. It was sent to a committee, but I hoped it would never be returned to this house.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I agree with what has been said by the hon. member for Fort William. I have been opposing bills of this kind for the last ten years, because ninety-five per cent of these loans are made to the industrial workers of the country, who are not getting one bit of support from this parliament. We have legislation protecting the farmers, the fishermen and everyone else, legislation which I supported and would support again, but the industrial worker receives no protection at all. These companies are principally engaged in local business. Not by the widest stretch of the imagination could it be said that their operations are provincial, let alone federal, yet they come to this parliament for incorporation; the bills are referred to a committee and sent back here; these companies are exempt from the operations of the Usury Act, the Interest Act, and the Companies Act and given the widest power to hold up people at two per cent per month, and all that sort of thing. We are not going to stand for it any longer.

Last year a bill with a preamble almost identical with the preamble of this bill was opposed by the Minister of Finance. That bill was considered on June 9, 1936, and the minister said:

The government holds the view that in these times of declining interest rates it is doubtful wisdom for parliament to incorporate more companies empowered to charge these high rates of interest. It is true that the general legislation enacted a few sessions ago endeavoured to set maximum rates and it is natural that the companies incorporated by parliament should in their advertising attach some importance to that fact. The impression has gone abroad, among certain sections of the public at all events, that parliament, by the general legislation now on the statute books, has authorized the charging of the maximum rates. I know that such was not the intention, and for this, among other reasons, the government was gratified to see the study being given to this matter by a committee of the other house. However, for the reasons I have indicated, the government cannot accept the solution proposed by that committee.

It is evident, Mr. Speaker, that this matter of interest rates and the conditions applying to small loans must again engage the attention of parliament. It is the intention of the government to initiate, between now and the next session of parliament, a further examination of the matter with a view to amending the existing general legislation. In the meantime, I must oppose the second reading of the bill. . . .

Nothing has been done since then. This session these companies did not introduce their bills in this house; apparently they learned a lesson last session, when three or four of these bills were talked out or voted down. This time they went to the other house, where the bills passed all stages. Now we are asked to deal with them here. I am opposed to these companies; I believe these bills run contrary to the policy of the government. We have set up a body or commission to loan money for home improvements, and committees have been formed in the larger centres. The Ontario legislature recently passed legislation exempting the repairs and improvements from municipal taxation, and now this parliament is going to kill that work of incorporating a number of these useless companies. They are well named shark loan companies. I do not know any other legislature where they could get charters. They would be laughed out of the British parliament; they were put out of the United States, some of them, following an investigation conducted by the government of that country some four or five years ago.

These are the companies that are putting in the bailiffs. They sue people in the courts, and some of these poor people are sent to gaol. Already there are thousands of people in gaol for debt, and now we propose to add to that number by passing legislation of this kind. The time has come to vote down these bills. We are not sent here to represent these shark loan companies; we are sent here to protect the poor industrial workers. One of the things the government had to face in the by-election in Hamilton West yesterday was the feeling held by the industrial workers who have lost their equities in their small homes in that city. The industrial workers are not going to stand it any longer. Some of these shark loan companies have such bad names that they are now attempting to change them here to another name. They do not like to do business any more under the old name. Although I have never done business with these companies, I often receive literature from them. I am not in need of a loan, but three or four times each month I receive their circulars through the mails. How they get into the mails franked, I do not know. I called the attention of the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) to it last year.

The cities and towns are getting sick and tired of these companies. Despite the high taxes a man is asked to pay, they attempt to charge two per cent per month. The parliament of Canada should vote this sort of thing down, right away. The bill, every section of it, should have the six months' hoist. I am surprised that any hon. member familiar with conditions in the industrial cities and towns of Canada should introduce a bill such as this. The workers in those industries have no protection, and yet we sit here and propose to pass a bill which will do them an injustice.

This type of company has been severely criticized by some of the division and county courts judges. One judge said a few days ago that he wished some members of parliament who pass such acts would visit his court to see how legislation of this kind is adversely affecting men, women and children in the province of Ontario. I wish some hon members of the house would visit some of the division courts or police courts and see for themselves the effects of it. These companies take chattel mortgages, bills of sale, liens and other forms of security and then, in some way or another they get the person who has obtained the money into court. Our judges have not been slow to criticize this sort of legislation. In the olden days hon members of the house would have opposed a bill of this kind.

I do not know where the government stands in the matter. Last session they told us they would have a policy next year; where is that policy? This session they tell us the same thing, and no doubt next session we will be told the same thing again. The government of the day is responsible for this measure. So long as the party opposite is the party in power, it will be responsible for the preamble of the bill. As such they should lay down a policy to-night, as they promised a year ago, as evidenced by the observations appearing at page 3550 of Hansard for 1936.

Mr. STEVENS: Unfortunately, when this bill was before the banking and commerce committee I was required to attend another committee which has been sitting almost continuously, dealing with the prices of agricultural implements; and as a result I could stay in the banking and commerce committee only a very few minutes. While there I expressed my views, and in doing so referred to the fact that the original act to which this measure is an amendment exempted the company from control of the Interest Act, the Money Lenders Act, and the Loan Companies Act. In the few minutes in which I appeared before the banking committee, not having the act under my hand, I was not in a position definitely to establish my assertion. The superintendent of insurance, who was adviser of the committee, intimated that I was quite wrong and that the present bill was not in that category. I was pretty sure I was right but I did not have the act under my hand; subsequently, however, I had the opportunity to look at the original act.

It will be noted that the bill purports to amend paragraph (b) of subsection 1 of section 5, chapter 68 of the statutes of 1930. I have that statute under my hand, and I find that paragraph (b) of subsection 1 of section 5 reads as follows:

Notwithstanding anything contained in the Interest Act or in the Money Lenders Act or in paragraph (c) of section 63 of the Loan Companies Act . . .

[Mr. Church.]

Then it goes on to describe the powers. So that I was right when I drew the attention of the committee to that fact. The committee, at least while I was there, disregarded that fact, and the bill is now reported to the house. That is one of the reasons I rise once more to protest against the passing of this type of legislation.

The other evening, when the bill was before the house, at least two of its supporters were rather inclined to ridicule the stand taken by some hon, members and myself, intimating that we were perhaps ill informed and somewhat prejudiced, and suggested that the broadminded thing to do was to let the bill go to a committee. Some of us argued that if we were opposed to its principle we ought to express our opposition then on the motion for second reading. However, our views did not prevail and the bill went to the committee. While voting that the bill be sent to a committee, a number of hon. members expressed a good deal of doubt as to the wisdom of passing this type of legislation.

I wish now to refer briefly to one or two arguments advanced which, I believe, influenced hon. members in their support of the measure. For instance, it was said that if we do not pass the legislation, companies can incorporate under provincial acts, and that if they can incorporate under provincial acts they can secure much wider and less restricted powers than those granted by parliament. Therefore they suggested it was in the interests of poor, suffering humanity that this two-per-cent-per-month bill should be passed, in order to save the people from the looser legislation of the provinces.

Any company incorporating under a provincial statute is subject to the federal Interest Act, and if we turn to the British North America Act we find that the exclusive power of control of interest rates rests with this parliament. Parliament proposes, by this measure and its sister act, to take these companies out of its jurisdiction—literally to legislate them out of our own jurisdiction. That is what we are doing.

I wish hon. members would seriously consider this, because to me it is a vital principle. The only control parliament has over these companies is the control it has through the Interest Act. Now then, by these very acts we are legislating ourselves out of the control of these companies. It is one of the most subtle pieces of legislative chicanery that has come to my attention. In association with other hon, members, over and over again I have spoken against this form of financial company. Up to this session we have never been able to get hon. members in any number to become seized of the enormity of the practices of money lending sharks. I am not saying that this particular company should be described as a money lending shark, but I do say that those who charge usurious rates of interest ought to be placed in that category. There is an air of decency about these companies. I do not know about this particular company, but some of these companies are subsidiaries of American companies.

Mr. VIEN: Not this one.

Mr. STEVENS: The other company was, and it is similar to this one. I am speaking about them in a general way.

Mr. VIEN: We are talking about this one now.

Mr. STEVENS: I may say to the hon. member that I know what I am talking about just as well as he.

Mr. VIEN: Mr. Chairman, I want to correct a misstatement of fact, which I am sure my hon. friend will accept gracefully.

Mr. STEVENS: I have accepted it.

Mr. VIEN: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Unless the hon. member is speaking on a point of order, he is out of order.

Mr. VIEN: I want to correct a misstatement of fact, and I rise to a point of order.

Mr. STEVENS: I accepted the hon. member's explanation.

Mr. VIEN: This company is not a subsidiary of any foreign company.

Mr. STEVENS: I accepted that explanation long ago. We could have saved considerable time if the hon, member had noted that. What I am saying is that certain of these companies, similar to this company, are subsidiaries of American companies. While those in charge of these companies may not be disreputable, I do say that the rates of interest charged, whether by this company or by the money lending sharks so-called, are rates which this parliament dare not sanction.

So much for that part of the question. Let us see what this bill is doing. It is proposed to add a subsection to section 5 of the original act. Let me point out to hon. members just what we are doing. In the first place, we are legislating ourselves out of control of this company by making it no longer subject to the Interest Act. Under the original act this company could make loans secured by the assignment of chattel mortgages, and so forth, charging not more than 7 per cent per annum, and could deduct in advance the interest on all its loans. I shall read only parts of the section in the original act. It continues:

(ii) charge, in addition to interest as aforesaid, for all expenses which have been necessarily and in good faith incurred by the company.

And again:

—when a loan authorized by the said subparagraph (i) has been made on the security of a chattel mortgage, or of subrogation of taxes, be entitled to charge an additional sum equal to the legal and other actual expenses disbursed by the company—

It has been argued that we are bringing this and other companies under more restrictions, but this bill merely places certain limits upon loans under $500. On other loans this company can charge 50 per cent by running up the expenses.

Mr. DONNELLY: That is what they are doing now.

Mr. STEVENS: Of course it is. Under this bill they are to be limited to two per cent per month. I wanted to draw attention to what we are actually doing. We have not by any means relieved the country from the danger of loan sharks, as the unrestricted provincially incorporated companies are not affected in any way by this legislation. In the second place, as I have stated already, we are sanctioning this company to carry on notwithstanding the Interest Act, the Money-lenders Act and the Loan Companies Act. My submission is that this is a policy which this parliament ought not to adopt. As I said before, this parliament should consider seriously the necessity of providing loans for industrial workers similar to those provided by the rural credits act.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, the other bills pass through the house like a scene from moving pictures. We should consider this bill very carefully. It consists of only one section, which contains forty-eight lines. There are only three sentences, and if the bill is read too fast it cannot be understood. I intend to read it very slowly in order that everyone may be able to understand it. The section to be added reads:

(iv) whenever the company, under authority of this act, makes a loan of five hundred dollars or less—

That is exactly what the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) was saying.
—subparagraphs (i), (ii) and (iii) of this paragraph (b) shall not apply.

Mr. THORSON: What are those sub-paragraphs?

Mr. POULIOT: I will come to that in a moment. I continue:

Instead, the company may, with relation to such loan, make against the borrower an aggregate charge, expressable as a percentage of the principal money loaned, which charge shall be deemed to include all interest on the loan, all charges thereon or therefor of every nature and kind other than interest, all disbursements (except for registration fees as hereunder provided) made in connection with the loan and all other fees, charges or services whatsoever arising out of or incidental to the loan.

Could you understand that, Mr. Chairman? No one can understand it. No one can know the real intent of this legislation. The sponsor of this bill (Mr. Vien) is a very eminent lawyer and I am sorry he did not take more time to clarify the language of the bill. If this bill is referred to as shark legislation it is because it has too many teeth.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house again in committee of ways and means, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

CANADA-UNITED KINGDOM TRADE AGREEMENT

Customs tariff—523b. Woven fabrics, wholly of cotton, printed, dyed or coloured, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 20 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: The information for which the hon. member for Huron North asked just before six o'clock is being prepared and is not quite ready. Due to a change in tariff treatment of the United States in the past fiscal year it is difficult to get comparative figures with any great ease. I will give the information later in the evening.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the minister allow this item to stand?

Mr. DUNNING: I could, but I can give the information on another item. I am quite certain it will not make any difference to the views of hon. members as to this item.

Mr. HEAPS: I wish to discuss further the tariff and tariff rates, but so long as I have the opportunity upon another item I have no objection to this being passed.

Mr. DUNNING: May I point out to my hon, friend that the matter he has raised is really not at present before the committee because it relates to the intermediate tariff. As I have explained before, this schedule affects the British preferential rate only. Later on, on the budget items, of course there will [Mr. Pouliot.]

be an opportunity for the hon. member to discuss what he has in mind, particularly as this same item will again come before the committee, after the British agreement is disposed of, with respect to other tariffs,

Mr. HEAPS: I do not wish to discuss the same thing twice over. Under the circumstances I will raise the matter when it comes under the ordinary items of the budget.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 523b. Shadow cretonnes, wholly of cotton, with printed warp and plain weft: rate of duty,  $12\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction in rate. Shadow cretonnes from Great Britain have entered in the past under item 523b at 22½ per cent. The new rate will be 12½ per cent with respect to this particular class of cotton goods. Inasmuch as it is a new item we have no available data on this classification.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Is the product made in Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: Not to any extent. Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 523b. Gabardines, wholly of cotton, with not less than 280 ends and picks of ply yarn per square inch: rate of duty, 12½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Gabardines are also a new item, designed to segregate the gabardines fabrics from item 523b. Formerly these gabardines entered at 22½ per cent duty. In future they will enter at 12½ per cent. So far as our information goes, they are not manufactured in Canada.

Mr. DEACHMAN: It is purely a revenue item. What is done is to reduce the duty substantially on what is wholly a revenue item. That, I take it, is the effect of the change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 523, ex 523a, ex 523b. Woven fabrics, wholly of cotton, composed of yarns of counts of not less than 80 and not more than 99, including all such fabrics in which the average count of the warp and weft yarns is not less than 80 and not more than 99: rate of duty, 12½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is here a reduction of rate, also a new item affecting woven fabrics wholly of cotton, of counts 80 to 99. Following the conference of 1932 there was incorporated in the schedules a new item, 523c, which provided for the entry under the British preferential tariff of cotton fabrics composed of yarns of counts of 100 or more.

The object of that item was to permit free entry of a type of cotton fabric not then made in Canada, and not likely to be produced economically in the dominion. The item then created may be said to relate more particularly to very fine cotton shirtings of a certain kind and to certain laws, muslins, voiles and marquisettes. The item has proven of considerable value to United Kingdom exporters, as evidenced by the fact that the imports under it in 1935 were valued at $340,000, and in 1936, $424,000.

The United Kingdom industry has always asked that it should be given greater liberty with regard to these counts than was provided by the item in the 1932 agreement. There were many articles which just failed to qualify before, by virtue of the counts from 80 to over 100. During the recent negotiations the United Kingdom authorities pressed very hard for a new item which might be described as covering a middle band of these fine fabrics, that is fabrics made of yarns 80 or finer in count, at a rate of 121 per cent. Canadian cotton mills are working to some extent in fabrics of this fine quality, but we think that a rate of 12½ per cent against the British production of these finer quality cotton products is justified.

Mr. BENNETT: Have we any record of our production of these fine counts?

Mr. DUNNING: We have no separate record, no.

Mr. WALSH: Has the minister had any communications from any of the mills in Canada that are interested in this particular item?

Mr. DUNNING: On this particular item?

Mr. WALSH: No, who are interested in this particular item?

Mr. DUNNING: I have no recollection of any. When I say that, my hon. friend will of course understand that my correspondence on all these matters is very large, but I have no recollection of any relating to this particular item.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—523c. Woven fabrics, who!ly of cotton, composed of yarns of counts of 100 or more, including all such fabrics in which the average of the count of warp and weft yarns is 100 or more: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change is made in 523c.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—523e. Woven fabrics wholly of cotton with cut pile, n.o.p.: rate of duty: 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no change. Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 523e, ex 561. Fabrics with cut weft pile, wholly of cotton or of cotton and artificial silk: rate of duty, 5 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: This is a reduction in rate. Again it is extracting fabrics of cotton weft pile, wholly of cotton or of cotton and artificial silk, from the general item of which they formerly formed a part. This classification is entirely new, and is intended to deal only with cut pile fabrics wholly of cotton or of cotton and artificial silk.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a great difference between the two, of course.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, but it is convenient to group them. They are not available in Canadian manufactures so far as I am aware.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a great distinction between cotton and artificial silk.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, but they must be of weft pile. The common factor is the cut weft pile.

Mr. BENNETT: The common denominator.

Mr. DUNNING: The reduction will be from 15 to 5 per cent.

Mr. BAKER: Are these goods not manufactured in Woodstock, Ontario?

Mr. DUNNING: I have no knowledge of them being manufactured anywhere in Canada.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—523f. Woven fabrics of cotton, not coloured, when imported by manufacturers of typewriter ribbon for use exclusively in the manufacture of such ribbon in their own factories: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—525. Woven fabric, wholly of cotton, specially treated and glazed, when imported by rubber manufacturers for use in their own factories, exclusively as a detachable protective covering for uncured rubber sheeting: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—528. White cotton bobinet, plain, in the web: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—529. Embroideries, lace, nets, nettings, bobinet, n.o.p., fringes and tassels, wholly of cotton: rate of duty, 20 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—529a. Lace and embroideries, wholly of cotton, not coloured, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture of clothing, in their own factories: rate of duty, 7½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—530. Lace and embroideries, wholly of cotton, coloured, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture of clothing, in their own factories: rate of duty,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—532. Clothing, wearing apparel and articles, made from woven fabrics, and all textile manufactures, wholly or partially manufactured, composed wholly of cotton, n.o.p.; fabrics wholly of cotton, coated or impregnated, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 25 per cent.

Mr. WARD: Is not 25 per cent a high rate of duty as between Canada and Great Britain? I am disappointed that there should be this high rate on clothing and wearing apparel.

Mr. DUNNING: In respect of this item, one and a half cents per pound duty was removed in the last budget, irrespective of the agreement feature. The imports from Great Britain of cotton clothing, the completed article, are not and cannot be very great because of the style factor. The important import from Great Britain in connection with cotton and artificial silk is not the completed article, but the fabrics and the yarns that go to make up the fabrics. My hon, friend will see, if he looks at the items we have passed, that with respect to the fabrics and the yarns low duties prevail. They are the commodities that come in. The style factor enters in connection with the intermediate tariff much more largely than under the British preferential tariff for the reason that we have an affinity with the United States in matters of style, particularly with regard to women's cotton and silk clothing represented by the item now before us.

Mr. WARD: That is very good as far as it goes, but does not this 25 per cent protect the Canadian manufacturer to that extent and enable him to charge that much more? If the farmers, the fishermen, the miners and others engaged in the primary industries are to survive they must be enabled to buy, in the lowest possible markets, their textiles, boots and shoes, machinery and all the material that is necessary in the processing of our natural resources.

When we sell our goods in the markets of the world we have to meet competition from countries where there is a low standard of living and a low scale of wages. That, at any rate, is what we have been told; that is what is so loudly proclaimed in this house by those who speak for the manufacturers. Daily they remind us that the manufacturers are in danger of being put out of business and that our workmen may lose their homes and suffer a reduced standard of living if we lower the tariff. Well, is not the farmer in the same position? He must compete in the markets of the world over which he has no control, and must sell his products in competition with the very countries in which we are told these very same conditions exist. But when he comes to buy his requirements he buys in a market never less than fifty per cent above the price at which the same goods could be purchased in the markets of the world. He is at a tremendous disadvantage. But apparently the noisy crowd we have from Toronto and other manufacturing centres have got the ear of even our good one-time free trader in the person of the Minister of Finance. I do suggest that the free traders and those representing the agricultural areas of Canada must express more vigorously the views of the people they represent. It seems to me that a duty of 25 per cent between Canada and Great Britain is entirely too high.

Mr. MacNICOL: You have far too much influence in this house now.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): What was the tariff in 1930 under this item?

Mr. DUNNING: In May 1930 the duty on this item was  $22\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, and in September it was increased to 25 per cent, plus 3 cents per pound. The specific duty was eliminated at the last session.

Mr. BENNETT: It was cut in two first.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. It was reduced in 1935 to 1½ cents per pound and the specific was eliminated altogether at the last session of parliament. I appreciate all that my hon. friend (Mr. Ward) has said, but I wish he would not suggest that I have ever at any time been a free trader. I am not and never have been and I do not believe such a policy practicable for Canada. I believe there is only one member of the house who really does believe that.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DEACHMAN: I would point out to my hon. friend, although he may not be a free trader and possibly has no desire to preach tariff protection now, that the present item really constitutes an increase in protection, because certain items that form the raw materials of our clothing manufacturers have been reduced. The net protection therefore is now higher than it was before this budget was brought down.

In May, 1930, this item stood at 22½ per cent. It now stands at 25 per cent, with reduced duties on certain of the raw materials. There is another factor to be considered, however. I believe there has been some progress in industry since 1930, and the result of the mechanization of industry is to reduce the percentage of wage cost and to increase the capital cost.

We are always told that the protective tariff is for the purpose of protecting the poor working man. If any hon, members have not heard that before, let them listen to the member for Davenport and they will hear it.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. gentleman heard it in Hamilton.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Well, if my hon. friend was not in Hamilton he must have found out anyway that during the Liberal regime wages went up fourteen per cent, whereas during the regime of the high protectionist policy to which he is devoted wages declined sixteen per cent, and still he votes for protection. The question I asked the minister was: Is this clearly an item on which the effective protective rate is increased?

Mr. BENNETT: Of course it is.

Mr. DEACHMAN: The raw materials are reduced, but in this item there is an increase in the effective rate of protection. While my hon. friend admits he is not a free trader, and while I with equal frankness say emphatically I am, I do not think my hon. friend will admit that he is a high protectionist.

Mr. DUNNING: Not for a moment.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Yet that rate stands higher to-day than in 1930, and very substantially higher when all the relevant circumstances are taken into account.

Mr. WALSH: Is the 3 per cent also added to this?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. WALSH: The 3 per cent would represent a further concession, would it not?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no 3 per cent excise tax with respect to importations from Great Britain.

Mr. WALSH: But with respect to these goods manufactured in Canada there is?

Mr. DUNNING: No, it is a duty on imports entirely, but it does not apply to British imports.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It is just an additional tariff.

Mr. WALSH: The item represents a reduction then?

Mr. DUNNING: No. There was a reduction last year. The item has stood exactly as it is since a year ago.

Mr. WALSH: And the minister has had no complaints from any of the textile mills?

Mr. DUNNING: The textile mills are not affected by this item. This affects the manufacturers of clothing, not the textile mills.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 532. Handkerchiefs, wholly of cotton: rate of duty, 15 per cent.

Mr. DEACHMAN: This item illustrates what I suggested a moment ago. This has been brought down from 25 to 15 per cent, I understand?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Here is an item which is the raw material of manufacturing, cotton fabric for covering books—

Mr. DUNNING: My hon, friend is on the wrong item. This is a reduction on your handkerchiefs.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 532. Woven fabric, wholly of cotton, for covering books: rate of duty, 15 per cent.

Mr. DEACHMAN: On this item there has been a straight reduction of 40 per cent in the tariff for the advantage of the Canadian manufacturer. But as I pointed out in regard to the item of clothing, which is wholly a consumers' item, no reduction has taken place. There is an increase of protection.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon, friend had listened to me when I described the effective competition, and if he will look at the budget resolutions, he will find that that very item comes back again from the consumers' point of view in the budget resolution which we shall reach by and by.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Our attention was called this afternoon to the fact that we are discussing the items as they appear, and I am dealing now with the item here, following that suggestion.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon, friend would not argue from the particular to the general he would be right. But if he is going to argue from the particular to the general he must embrace in his discussion what is being done both in the Canada-United Kingdom trade agreement and in the budget resolution, from the point of view of the consumer.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Then may I discuss the two?

Mr. DUNNING: Just in the interest of understanding what I am trying to do.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I have not yet had an explanation from the minister why an item which is wholly for the use of the manufacturer should be reduced, while a substantial consumers' item remains higher than in 1930.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon, friend will come back to this on the budget item, we shall be able to consider the whole matter together much more intelligently.

Mr. DEACHMAN: My difficulty is that we do not come back to this in the budget items. I cannot find it there.

Mr. DUNNING: I assure my hon. friend it is there; page 9 of the ways and means resolution, item 532, clothing, wearing apparel, et cetera.

Mr. McDONALD (Souris): I should like to ask our protectionist friends whether it is not true that on all goods which they export from this country they get a drawback of the duties paid on the raw material. If that is true, can they blame us who represent rural constituencies for wanting to get our goods and implements of production as cheaply as we can so that we can meet competition in the outside market? I see here that there are lower duties on raw materials, but on finished articles the duty is not nearly so low.

Mr. WALSH: I want to come back to that excise tax. A certain quantity of these goods is manufactured in Canada. In order to manufacture them raw material is imported. When the manufacturers import their raw material I presume they pay the 3 per cent excise tax.

Mr. DUNNING: Not from Great Britain.

Mr. WALSH: But if they import their raw material say from the United States, if it happens to be raw cotton, or from Egypt, the 3 per cent excise tax is charged?

Mr. DUNNING: Provided the importation is from a foreign country; not from Great Britain.

[Mr. Deachman.]

Mr. WALSH: And that goes into the cost. So that when you have a duty of say 25 per cent you have to bear in mind that in Canada the manufacturers also have to pay an excise tax of 3 per cent, which probably the manufacturer in the other country has not to pay, so the 3 per cent is a factor that we have to bear in mind.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—537. Rovings, yarns and warps, wholly or in part of vegetable fibres, not more advanced than singles, n.o.p., not to contain silk, artificial silk nor wool: rate of duty, 12½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—537a. Rovings, yarns and warps wholly or in part of vegetable fibres, including yarn twist, cords and twines generally used for packaging and other purposes, n.o.p., not to contain silk, artificial silk nor wool: rate of duty, 17½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: A reduction in rate from 20 per cent to  $17\frac{1}{2}$ .

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—537b. Linen thread, for hand or machine sewing: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—537d. Rovings, yarns and warps, wholly of jute, not more advanced than singles, n.o.p., not to contain silk, artificial silk nor wool: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—537e. Rovings, yarns and warps wholly of jute, including yarn twist, cords and twines generally used for packaging and other purposes, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 25 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction in rate from  $27\frac{1}{2}$  to 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—539. Cordage, exceeding one inch in circumference, wholly of vegetable fibres, n.o.p.: rate of duty,  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction in rate from 20 to  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 540. (a) Woven fabrics, in the web, wholly of flax or hemp, not to include towelling and glass cloth of crash or huck, with or without lettering or monograms woven in, nor table cloths and napkins of crash with coloured borders: rate of duty, free.

(b) Articles wholly of flax or hemp, such as sheets, pillow cases, table cloths and napkins, towels and handkerchiefs, but not to include towels or glass cloths of crash or huck, with or without lettering or monograms woven in, nor table cloths and napkins of crash with coloured borders: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff-541a. Woven fabrics, wholly of jute, n.o.p.: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—541d. Canvas in the web, wholly of flax or hemp, or both, plain woven, not coloured, not further manufactured than impregnated with weatherproofing or preservative materials, suitable for manufacturing into tents, awnings, tarpaulins, hatch covers and similar articles, weighing not less than 18 ounces and not more than 26 ounces per square yard: rate of duty, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—542. Woven or braided fabrics not exceeding 12 inches in width, wholly or in part of vegetable fibres, and all such fabrics with cut pile, n.o.p., not containing silk, artificial silk nor wool: rate of duty, 20 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—542a. Woven or braided fabrics not exceeding 12 inches in width, wholly or in part of vegetable fibres, n.o.p., not to include silk, artificial silk nor wool: rate of duty, 22½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction in rate from 25 to  $22\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

Mr. SPENCE: It is just interference.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—542b. Linen fire hose, lined or unlined: rate of duty, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction in rate from 25 to 15 per cent.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Are these goods made in Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, there is one producer in Canada.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—547. Bags or sacks of hemp, linen or jute: rate of duty, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—548. Clothing, wearing apparel and articles made from woven fabrics, and all textile manufactures, wholly or partially manufactured, composed wholly or in part of vegetable fibres but not containing wool, n.o.p.; fabrics, coated or impregnated, composed wholly or in part of vegetable fibres but not containing silk, artificial silk nor wool, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 25 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction in duty. The present rate is 25 per cent plus 3 cents per pound; the specific duty of 3 cents per pound is being taken off entirely.

Mr. DEACHMAN: What was the rate under this item in the tariff of May, 1930?

Mr. DUNNING: It was 22½ per cent against Great Britain in 1930.

Mr. WARD: To satisfy my curiosity, would the minister tell us what this clothing is that is made from woven fabrics composed wholly or in part of vegetable fibres?

Mr. DUNNING: These are mixtures. Here are a few of the commodities: collars and cuffs composed of vegetable fibre; quilts, counterpanes, and so on; handkerchiefs wholly of hemp, flax or vegetable fibre; clothing and wearing apparel; diapers; textile manufactures generally, of vegetable fibre.

Mr. WARD: I protest; I think the duty is entirely too high.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, we are taking off 3 cents a pound.

Mr. WARD: Of course the duties imposed from 1930 to 1935 were so extreme that we should not compare this Liberal policy with the policy in effect during those years, which was so ruinous to most of the people in this country. I see the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Edwards) in his seat The other day he told us about the number of additional employees who were put to work in Kitchener following the higher tariffs imposed by the previous government. He did not tell us, however, that from 1930 to 1933 the woollen manufacturers of Kitchener were able to buy their wool for just 331 per cent of what that wool cost in 1929, though in 1933 woollen fabrics were 92 per cent of the price of 1929. They were buying their raw material at one-third the former cost and selling the finished article at almost one hundred per cent of the previous price. The hon. member did not tell us those things, nor did he tell us that wages were not maintained in Kitchener at the 1929 level.

Mr. EDWARDS: My hon. friend will have to absolve me from blame; I did not know anything about Kitchener. If he will confine himself to South Waterloo I may answer him. Mr. WARD: My hon, friend is not very far from Kitchener.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I agree entirely with the hon, member for Dauphin, and I want to tell the Minister of Finance that he made a slight mistake a moment ago. I do not pretend to be as apt an exponent of free trade as my hon, friend from Huron North, but I believe in it as sincerely as he does, and I consider the tariffs contained in this budget, not only against Great Britain but against other countries as well, far too high in many cases and they should be lowered.

Mr. WALSH: The more I listen to the arguments on the other side of the house the more sympathy I have for the Minister of Finance.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not need it.

Mr. WALSH: Last evening we listened to a suggestion from another minister with regard to the political pressure that was brought to bear on him in connection with a certain measure that was to come before the house. To-night we see the Minister of Finance somewhat harassed by his own supporters.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. WALSH: They are arguing for a policy of free trade, and they are supporters of the government which is responsible for this budget. Is the Liberal party in Canada a homogeneous party or is it a party made up of members who seek to be elected on their individual records as free traders, protectionists and what not?

Mr. BENNETT: Mostly what nots.

Mr. WALSH: The Minister of Finance has brought down a budget imposing certain duties. If my hon, friends from the west would go to industrial centres like Cornwall and similar places, where the people are dependent on industry for their very existence, or speak even to the farming communities in the terms that they have used in this house, I am afraid they would sound the death knell of the Liberal government in this country. I have every sympathy for our western friends, and I do not say that as a platitude. I recognize the fact that the west is growing a product which it has to sell in the world markets, and certainly I would give every assistance possible to enable our farmers to trade in that market to the best advantage.

But I ask my hon. friends to be a little sympathetic to those of us in the east who have been associated with industry all our lives. I ask them to show a little consideration for the working men in our factories and [Mr. Edwards.]

for the farmers who are dependent upon these centres of population. That is all I am asking. I am not asking for high protection; I am not a high protectionist. I believe in protection just sufficient to enable an industry to earn a reasonable profit and give employment to as many as possible. That is all I am arguing for in this house, and I would ask my hon. friends not to seek to establish themselves at the expense of entire communities in the eastern part of Canada. Be a little more sympathetic towards those who have to earn their living in factories and to the farmers who depend upon these factory workers for the marketing of their products.

I think there is a common basis on which we might work. I grant that in the past certain duties have been much too high. I am ready and willing to have those duties brought down to an equitable basis, but I am not willing on any class of goods that can be manufactured in this country to bring down the duty to a level that will force our industries to close. My hon, friends may think that on this side of the house we are exaggerating the picture. I am not exaggerating the picture when I tell the committee that already one industry in this country has closed, as a result of competition from across the border. As the Minister of Finance knows, two factories manufacturing velvet have had to close their doors, thereby putting men and women out of employment and on to the relief rolls. No wonder the Minister of Labour has to come to the house and report an increase of the numbers on relief, and an increase in unemployment. That is the reason for it.

Mr. GRAY: When did he do that?

Mr. WALSH: According to his own reports.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): His last report was the very opposite.

Mr. WALSH: Look up the report for the month of February last and compare it with February of the previous year. Compare the actual conditions.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Those employed in industry, or those on relief?

Mr. WALSH: The point I make is this: I am asking hon. members from the west to give the east a little more consideration. I feel they can do that without jeopardizing their own position, or their influence in their respective constituencies.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Just a word in reply to the hon, member for Mount Royal,

Mr. SPENCE: Another free trader.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Yes, and proud to be one, too. The hon, member intimates that by lowering the tariff we will put people out of work. So far in Canada we have never had a real demonstration of whether or not a lowering of the tariff will put people out of work, but we certainly have had one which has proved conclusively that the more you raise the tariff the more people in industry you put out of work. In 1930 the present leader of the opposition went from one end of Canada to the other and told the people that he would make the tariff fight for them, that it would get them jobs.

Mr. MacNICOL: And he did.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): All we have to do is look at the records, and we find that from year to year as the tariff went up, employment in industry went down. At the same time there was a decrease in the amount of wages paid in industry, and the amount paid to each person declined. Hon. members need not tell us that we are endeavouring to ruin Canadian industry by lowering the tariff, because every time tariffs have been lowered in Canada, Canadian industry has employed more people and paid more wages. Those are the facts.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does that apply to the furniture industry, too?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): What we want is a demonstration—it is what we would like to have—of what lowering the tariffs in a substantial way would do towards building up industry in eastern Canada, giving more people employment, and giving them more money for the work they do in industry.

Mr. SPENCE: Why don't you be fair, and admit that in the last five years there was a depression.

Mr. THORSON: Mr. Chairman, a moment ago the hon, member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh) made a statement to which I wish to take exception. He spoke of the agricultural population as being dependent upon persons engaged in industry. It is time the people of Canada came to a proper realization of the attitude that ought to be adopted towards the real wealth of this country. I make the statement, without fear of successful contradiction, that industry in Canada depends upon agriculture, has always depended upon it, and will always depend upon it. Ever since the beginning of the industrial revolution, industry has depended upon agriculture.

Mr. BAKER: And agriculture upon industry.

Mr. THORSON: It would not have been possible to bring about the industrial revolution had it not been for the fact that in other parts of the world there were large areas capable of producing surplus foods and raw materials. That made possible the division of labour that took place and the increase of wealth throughout the world that resulted from that division of labour. The industrial revolution could not have taken place in Great Britain if it had not been for the fact that in this new world there were large areas capable of producing surplus foods and raw materials. Ever since that time industry has depended upon agriculture and upon those primary industries that are concerned with the production of primary products, whether food or raw materials. I believe this country ought therefore to come to a proper realization of the kind of tariff and fiscal policy which it ought to follow.

During the previous regime a totally different attitude was adopted. It was urged that by raising the tariffs and making our manufactured goods in Canada we could solve our unemployment problem, but there was a complete failure of these policies. I think the time has now come when this country should adopt policies that will increase our real wealth. Our real wealth consists of our primary production, but that wealth is of no value to the people of Canada unless we devise policies which will put it into circulation. We cannot put our basic wealth, the primary production of Canada, into circulation unless we are prepared to buy manufactured goods from abroad. The sooner we learn that lesson the better for the whole of Canada; for by that method we will increase our total wealth, we will increase the purchasing power of our primary producers, and they will be better able to buy the manufactured goods of those who are engaged in the secondary industries.

Those of us who believe in a policy of lower tariffs do not wish to harm industry. We believe there is a certain value in having diversified occupations in this country, and we are prepared to pay a certain price for the benefit of such diversified occupation. But we are not going to pay too big a price. We have been paying much too big a price in the past. I suggest that the hon. member for Mount Royal looked at the picture from the wrong end. When he spoke of agriculture being dependent upon industry he saw the picture in reverse for, in my opinion, industry depends upon agriculture. Indeed, the whole of Canada depends upon the welfare of those who produce our basic wealth. That basic wealth is the primary production of Canada.

Mr. WALSH: Coming back to the item under discussion may I say that with the greater part of what the hon, member for Selkirk has said I find myself in complete agreement. I recognize the value of primary industry in any country. I do not seek to place emphasis wholly upon secondary industry for the development of our country. But I was earnestly asking our western friends to recognize the fact that there is a secondary industry in Canada, and that that secondary industry must be protected if it is to survive. If the item under discussion carries too high a tariff, then the Minister of Finance and the officials in his department are in a better position to know that fact than any hon. members sitting to the right or the left of Mr. Speaker.

I feel perfectly confident that no minister of finance will seek at any time deliberately to injure any industry in this country. I have confidence that no minister of finance will seek to grant such protection to the secondary industries of this country as to enable them to make excessive profits. In erecting a tariff structure it is difficult to avoid going too far in one direction or the other. What we should seek to do is to find the happy medium where industry would receive that amount of protection which would guarantee its existence.

I want my hon. friends from the west to realize that there is no one in the east who does not recognize the value of the western farmer, or the value of the farming population of this country. The secondary industries are dependent upon the purchasing power of those engaged in the primary industries, just as they are dependent upon reasonable tariffs. If the secondary industries had not the purchasing power of those engaged in the primary industries, they could not survive no matter how much protection they were given. They are absolutely dependent upon two factors. First, the purchasing power within the country, a large part of which is in the hands of those engaged in primary industry; and second, a measure of protection, not necessarily high. They should be given sufficient protection to enable them to manufacture the implements necessary to those engaged in the primary industries for the carrying on of their operations effectively and cheaply.

I hope I have made myself abundantly clear. I am not asking the minister to raise one item; I am simply pointing out the danger of going so low as to squeeze some industries out of existence. I have a letter before me—no doubt the minister has a copy on his file—which states that two companies have been forced to close their doors. This action was not necessary because the duty was placed too low, but because certain industries in another country are taking advantage of the regulations in order to bring goods into this country.

Mr. THORSON: What country does the hon, member refer to?

Mr. WALSH: The United States. They are dumping first-class goods into this country by stating that they are seconds. In that way the goods are brought in at a lower valuation. The velvet industry may not make very much profit, but it can survive if the competition is fair. But in this instance the competition is not fair. I think the minister should endeavour to get these duties set at a point where the manufacturer can exist, and where they will be fair to those engaged in primary industry. I am ready to assist him as much as I can in that particular objective.

Mr. DUNNING: Now that there has been a general discussion, I wonder if we could again abide by the rules in committee and discuss only the item before the chair. We are supposed to be dealing with item 548.

Mr. GLEN: Mr. Chairman, I think the latitude which has been allowed to-night with regard to the discussion of free trade and protection might well be allowed in connection with this item. When I listened to the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh) speak to-night I could not help but think of the many complaints I have received from farmers in the west. He spoke of two companies which had been put out of business, but I can tell him of two thousand farmers who have been put out of business during the last six years. In my business I meet men every day who complain about the high protection and the discrimination against the west in favour of the industries in the east against which they have to contend. The hon, member stated quite reasonably that he is not in favour of increased protection, but I wonder if he remembers the remarks which have been made by some of his colleagues. Only the other day the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) referred to the bonus given to the farmers as a dole. If the hon, member did not hear that, I can assure him it was said.

Mr. BENNETT: It was said that industry in this country was on the dole.

Mr. GLEN: The kind of speech we have just listened to from the hon. member for Mount Royal is just the sort of thing that creates friction between the east and the west.

Mr. BENNETT: The statement was that industry was on the dole.

Mr. GLEN: That was not the statement made by the hon. member. He said that we were willing to accept these doles. The farmers of the west are given some consideration in the sale of their grain, and then we find members of the Conservative party complaining that we are getting a dole. We are not getting a dole, we are simply getting the consideration in the sale of our wheat which we never had before.

Mr. WALSH: Would the hon. member quote from Hansard rather than put words into the mouth of an hon. member who is not present?

Mr. GLEN: At the moment I cannot give his exact words, but that is the meaning of his words.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a vastly different thing. The hon, member has no right to make such a statement.

Mr. GLEN: That remark was made in reply to the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross). That remark just bears out the feeling in the west with regard to the protection given to the central provinces. I can remember the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) saying that when he got into power there would be a scientific reduction of the tariff. All the scientific reduction we got was a raise to the high heavens. As I said before, it is this kind of talk that is creating dissension in the west. People in the west, and in the maritimes if you like, feel that they should receive the same treatment as the central provinces. From 1930 to 1935 the industries of this country received considerable benefits from this government, and surely the time has come when the west should have its share.

Some people complain that there are no free traders in this parliament. There are plenty of free traders. The Liberal government was elected on a policy of lower tariffs, and we feel that effect should be given to this policy. That is what those of us who have thought over the matter believe should be done. We contend that in lower tariffs is to be found a solution for the unemployment problem. We do not believe for one moment that industries are likely to suffer. The time has come to give a demonstration of what freer trade and lower tariffs mean to this country, after the experience we have had under protectionism.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 548. Woven dress linens containing not more than 15 per cent by weight of cotton yarns for decorative effect: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: On woven dress linens, the whole item is made free. I think it might have left a rather better taste in the mouths of some hon, members who have just spoken if we had then been discussing the present item.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Is the product made in Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: So far as I know, no. There is the question of the combination of linen and cotton, which may involve some mixed cotton production.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—549c. Haircloth, composed of horse hair in combination with any vegetable fibre: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction in the rate for haircloth for those who desire to wear it.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—551. Yarns, composed wholly or in part of wool or hair but not containing silk or artificial silk n.o.p.: rate of duty, 15 per cent, and, per pound, 6 cents.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—551a. Yarns and warps composed wholly of wool or in part of wool or hair, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in their own factories, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 10 per cent, and, per pound, 5 cents.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—551c. Yarns and warps, composed wholly of hair, or of hair and any vegetable fibre, imported by manufacturers for use in their own factories: rate of duty, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—552. Felt, pressed, of all kinds, in the web, not consisting of or in combination with any woven, knitted or other fabric or material: rate of duty, 15 per cent, and, per pound, 5 cents.

Mr. WARD: What are these?

Mr. DUNNING: The specific duty of 7½ cents per pound, is reduced to 5 cents per pound. The ad valorem remains as it is. The production in Canada of felt goods involved includes hair felt, shoe felt, woollen and cotton felt, paper-makers' felt, harness felt, padding, insoles, and then there is a miscellaneous item. The ad valorem incidence of the double duties following the deduction for direct shipment was practically 20 per cent.

Mr. WARD: I am informed by those who should know, men engaged in the paper-making industry of Canada—

Mr. BENNETT: The question is, do they know?

Mr. WARD: —that felt manufacturers in Canada are exporting these felts for papermaking to Sweden and selling them at the present time at just half of what they are being sold for in Canada. If that is so, while manufacturers were complaining only a short time ago about the dumping of goods in this country, here are our own Canadian manufacturers dumping in the far away country of Sweden, I am told, at just half the price they charge paper-makers in Canada.

Mr. CASSELMAN: What evidence have we of that fact?

Mr. DUNNING: I am interested in the information that the hon. member has. Perhaps he will give it to me in greater detail and let me check up on it. I should be surprised to learn that these felts are being sold by Canadian manufacturers in Sweden at half the price at which they are sold to our own paper-makers, who, I know, are pretty close buyers.

Mr. McCANN: The information that has just been given with reference to felts is, I believe, hardly correct. In my constituency, Kenwood Mills Limited are large manufacturers of the felts used in paper mills. It is true that they export a considerable quantity to the United Kingdom, and I understand that this lowering of the tariff will not hurt them in the least. They have as large a business in this country as they can carry on, and in addition they ship a very considerable quantity to British manufacturers for papermaking purposes. I can hardly believe that they are not more astute than to sell to Sweden at fifty per cent of what they can get for the felts in this country, when they are rushed night and day in manufacturing for our own and British use.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—553. Blankets of any material, not to include automobile rugs, steamer rugs, or similar articles: rate of duty, 20 per cent, and, per pound 5 cents.

Mr. DUNNING: This is a reduction in rates on blankets from  $22\frac{1}{2}$  per cent and 10 cents a pound to 20 per cent and 5 cents per pound.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Can the minister give us the ad valorem equivalent of these two rates?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: You want the ad valorem incidence of the combined duties?

Mr. DEACHMAN: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: It depends on the value of the blanket, of course.

Mr. DUNNING: It is very difficult to generalize.

Mr. DEACHMAN: The average could be taken on the total importation of blankets.

Mr. DUNNING: The total duties paid, after allowing for the direct shipment discount, were very close to $100,000 on an invoice value of $250,000. It will be understood, of course, that necessarily I am generalizing.

Mr. BENNETT: That is forty per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Thus the ad valorem incidence of the double duties was about 40 per cent.

Mr. DEACHMAN: That is the average?

Mr. DUNNING: That is the average.

Mr. BENNETT: We import only a certain kind of blanket into this country.

Mr. DUNNING: Upon last year's values the new combination duties will yield about 23 per cent on the average, as near as we can ascertain. Sometimes it is a little misleading to take an average with respect to articles covering a wide range of values.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the rate in May, 1930?

Mr. DUNNING: Ad valorem rates have been unchanged since 1928. That is to say, the present ad valorem is below the rates in force in May 1930. The specific duties were first added in September 1930, at 20 cents under the British preference and reduced from 20 to 10 cents following the conference in 1932. That 10 cents is now cut by this agreement to 5 cents specific, and the ad valorem rate is reduced to 20 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: It is still higher, though, than it was in 1930.

Mr. DUNNING: If the average is correct in its application to ad valorem and specific combined, it will be just about the same as it was in 1930.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Can the minister give the percentage of wage cost in the production of blankets? I believe that in respect to this item the figures will be available to him. I have contended that that information should be given in respect to all these items so that we can see it before we discuss the items in the house. For instance we might find out that the wage cost in this item is approximately 25 per cent. Suppose that were true, I should like to submit to the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh) this question: If the wage cost in the production of blankets is 25 per cent of the selling price of the blanket, how much then does he think would be an adequate gift from the gentlemen of western Canada to the manufacturers of eastern Canada in connection with the protection of that item?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Has the minister the information available?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not the information regarding wage costs in the manufacture of blankets. Indeed I think it would be very difficult to get at it accurately, because many of the plants manufacturing blankets are manufacturing other articles as well. I doubt very much whether it would be possible to split up the labour cost in very many of the mills that manufacture, among woollen commodities, blankets and other items. I do not believe I have any approximation of it.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Can the minister give the total for the woollen industry?

Mr. DUNNING: I want to give the hon. member what I have, but I doubt whether he can extract from it what he is seeking. The number of establishments manufacturing woollen cloth in 1934 was sixty-six, paying salaries of $4,730,000. There were thirty-four establishments manufacturing woollen yarns, with 2,464 employees, receiving $1,700,000 in that same year. In carpets, mats and rugs, there were twenty-seven establishments, paying wages of $995,000. In woollen goods not elsewhere specified, in which from the bureau of statistics point of view blankets would be included, there were twenty-four establishments, paying wages of $1,033,000. As regards the total of woollen textiles, I am always a little suspicious of the separation which I have just given because I do not think it is possible statistically to take accurate account of the overlapping of various products in one establishment.

Mr. BENNETT: Not unless you have separate cost sheets.

Mr. DUNNING: Unless there are separate cost sheets; and anyone who looks into the industry knows that it is all but impossible in a number of smaller establishments to get that information. The total in woollen textiles in 1934 was 151 establishments. This is apart from the hosiery and knitted goods.

These 151 establishments employed 10,636 people, and paid $8,459,000 in wages. The only comparable item in the other statistical record—I know that my hon friend is familiar with these statistics, much more so than I am—is a table of costs of materials used, gross value of production, and value added by manufacture. He is familiar with that, but I do not know whether it will help him to get the information he wants.

Mr. BENNETT: That is given in the year book for the whole of Canada.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Can the minister give me the total production of woollen goods? He has given the wages and salaries for the item in connection with which he mentioned $8,459,000.

Mr. DUNNING: The total production of that classification apart from hosiery and knitted goods?

Mr. DEACHMAN: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: The value at factory of total production in the woollen textile industries was $33,872,000 in 1934. I am not sure that that does not include some overlapping into the knitted goods. We have attempted to show them separately, and that is the closest I can come to it.

Mr. DEACHMAN: It is twenty-five per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: The classification covers all woollen goods. Wages did not cover the whole but only part of it; and speaking from memory, my recollection is that the year book gives a higher figure than that.

Mr. DUNNING: These are year book figures.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister has given the total woollen textiles as $33,000,000. The classification for wages is not the total for the woollen textile industry. I have the figures.

Mr. DUNNING: I could perhaps arrive at a more accurate conclusion by giving the total of woollen and knitted goods; that would eliminate any possibility of overlapping between the two classifications. There are 28,614 employess in this whole schedule, and salaries and wages are $22,025,000. If I turn over the page and give the total including knitted goods, in 1934 the value at factory of all the products is $33,872,000, plus $4,085,000 for woollen hosiery, plus $1,635,000 for underwear. So that if we add together these figures—$33,000,000 odd, $4,000,000 and $1,600,000—we arrive at a total value of production at factory of $39,000,000 as against a total wage cost of $22,025,000. That being the total, there can be no overlapping with any other industry. At any rate there is none so far as I know, speaking offhand.

Mr. HEAPS: I understand that a few years ago the tariff board made an exhaustive investigation into the question of labour costs in the textile industry. Will the minister be good enough to give us some information in this regard when the item comes up under the general budget schedules? I do not think that these general figures give a really accurate idea of the situation.

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid that information such as my hon, friend refers to, based on that investigation by the tariff board, would be quite out of date if he has in mind the rates of wages and so on prevailing at that time and as indicated in that report. However, I shall be glad to have the matter examined prior to taking up the general tariff items to see whether I can give information that will satisfy the hon, gentleman.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not believe that this investigation by the tariff board would be out of date to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: The evidence presented to the Turgeon commission contains some information on that point.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, possibly. I should say to the hon, gentleman that the report to which he refers was made in 1935, and it covered the situation as it existed in 1933 and 1934. I will bring it down for what it is worth.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to have more than the wage scale, because the wage scale does not give the labour content accurately in a yard of goods. Taking similar types of goods, I want to be able to find out if I possibly can the difference in labour content between a yard of goods produced in Canada and a yard produced in the United States, also in Great Britain.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon, friend is aware that in the report in question the tariff board practically gave up all hope of arriving at accurate information with regard to the point to which he refers. They did not regard it as possible because of the very wide ramification of differences between a yard of one material and a yard of some other material, however closely the two might be related from the standpoint of the user and from the standpoint of production costs.

From the standpoint of production costs, if my hon. friend looks up the report in question he will find that the board pointed out the great difficulty in arriving at accurate information, in regard to each class of goods, of the weight and value of the raw material entering the finished product in relation to the labour cost. If I remember aright, the board's report indicated that about 140 separate classifications would be involved for yarn alone on the basis of count. It is a most complex question. But I shall be glad to furnish the report of the board; in fact, it is available to my hon. friends now; it is part of the records of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: When I made the reference to the 198th day of the Turgeon inquiry, of course it has not reached the 198th day; but in the brief that was filed, and in the oral presentation made between reading chapters from Adam Smith and John Stuart Mill by Mr. McRuer, there was a statement in respect to labour cost in connection with the production of cotton and other textiles. I do not know that it is of any particular value, but at least it is there and in the brief filed by Mr. Kellock on behalf of the textile industry. The matter was there gone into at some length.

Mr. DUNNING: But they disagree with each other very widely.

Mr. BENNETT: Naturally.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—554. Woven fabrics, composed wholly or in chief part by weight of yarns of wool or hair, not exceeding in weight six ounces to the square yard, n.o.p., when imported in the gray or unfinished condition, for the purpose of being dyed in Canada: rate of duty,  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, and, per pound,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  cents.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—554a. Woven fabrics, consisting of cotton warps with wefts of lustre wool, mohair or alpaca, generally known as lustres or Italian linings, n.o.p.: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—554b. Woven fabrics, composed wholly or in part of yarns of wool or hair, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 22½ per cent and 12 cents per pound.

Provided, however, that the sum of the specific and ad valorem duties imposed by this item on imports under the British preferential tariff shall not be in excess of 50 cents per pound.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction in rate from 27½ cent and 17 cents a pound to 22½ per cent ad valorem plus 12 cents per pound, provided that in no case shall the sum of the two duties be in excess of 50 cents per pound.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is this the item covering filter cloth or wool for mines?

Mr. DUNNING: Not yet.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Will the minister be good enough to state the ad valorem equivalent of these two rates? I think the reduction is reasonably substantial, and I should like to have it on record.

Mr. DUNNING: The ad valorem incidence of the specific duty varies considerably of course according to the type of cloth, so that the net effect of the reductions cannot be easily seen. It can, however, be summarized accurately. For example, total duty on a 10 shillings per yard Yorkshire worsted is likely to be within 2 shillings, or 20 per cent, which compares favourably with our own—that is the British—import duties. The total Canadian duty on typically heavy woollens from the Dewsbury-Batley valley is under the new agreement likely to be still in the neighbourhood of 50 per cent.

That is the Yorkshire Post's view of the new duties from the export point of view; I give it without necessarily endorsing it. It is one view of the subject. There is a wide range of possible differences.

Mr. BENNETT: The only proof of the pudding is in the eating in these cases.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, but the reduction is substantial.

Mr. BENNETT: It would be with someone suffering from dyspepsia.

Mr. DUNNING: I can give my hon. friend the combined weight of the duties bearing upon this item averaged under four headings of goods which come under the item, for two successive years. On flannels the total ad valorem incidence in 1935 was from 46 to 48 per cent, and in 1936 it was 46·3 per cent. On overcoatings the ad valorem incidence was 41 to 43 per cent in 1935, and 41·9 per cent in 1936. On tweeds the ad valorem incidence was 41 to 43 per cent in 1935, and 41·6 per cent in 1936. On worsteds and serges the ad valorem incidence of the combined duties was 36 to 38 per cent in 1935, and 37·4 per cent in 1936.

Mr. BENNETT: That is after the budget of 1936?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. There were several factors operating to bring about the slightly lower ad valorem effects operative in 1936.

In the first place, the specific duty was reduced under the budget of 1935 from  $18\frac{3}{4}$  to 17 cents per pound. Secondly, under the same budget, there was inserted in the item a provision to the effect that in no case would the sum of the specific and ad valorem be in excess of 65 cents a pound. This provision would mean that on cloths costing \$2 or more per pound the maximum duty could not be more than  $32\frac{1}{2}$  per cent ad valorem.

Thirdly, with a rising wool market and somewhat firmer prices generally, the incidence of the specific duty would be less marked than under the conditions prevailing in the preceding year.

To work out under the same four heads the ad valorem incidence combined of the new duties provided under the agreement, for flannels, it is 35.7 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: On what basis of price? Because the rise of wool prices changed it.

Mr. DUNNING: On the average value per pound in 1936.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is wholly unfair.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the closest we can come to it. The rise was in 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: But the rise is now; it took place in the Australian wool crop.

Mr. DUNNING: It is taking place every day.

Mr. BENNETT: But the rise has been phenomenal; it is twice what it was the previous year on some classes of wool.

Mr. DUNNING: Twice what it was in 1935. Part of that increase is reflected in the figures I formerly gave. We cannot tell how much is there reflected; that is one of the difficulties in answering specific questions such as the hon. member for Huron North asked, because by the end of this year, dependent on the price of wool very largely, these figures may turn out to be quite an incorrect calculation of the incidence of the combined ad valorem and specific duties. But for what they are worth, and having regard to the qualification just made, I give them. On flannels, 35·7; on overcoatings, 32·7, on tweeds, 32·2; on worsteds and serges, 30 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 554b. Filter press cloth of wool: rate of duty, 20 per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is this the material used in the mines for filtering purposes?

Mr. DUNNING: No, this is not the cloth used in mining. There is a special item in the tariff for that. This is a new item for filter press cloth of wool. Filter cloth made entirely from human hair is already enumerated in the tariff under item 549e. Filter cloth of wool up to the present time has been dutiable at 27½ per cent plus 17 cents per pound. Imports have not been separately recorded, nor is there any available data as to the value of Canadian production. It is known, however, that filter cloth of wool is manufactured in Canada. The proposal is to grant a rate of 20 per cent ad valorem, which is a reduction from 27½ per cent ad valorem plus 17 cents per pound specific.

Mr. LOCKHART: How much of that cloth came into Canada during the past year?

Mr. DUNNING: Unfortunately, this being a new item, there are no separately recorded statistics.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—554c. Woven fabrics, composed wholly or in chief part by weight of yarns of wool or hair, not exceeding in weight four ounces to the square yard, when imported in the gray or unfinished condition, for the purpose of being dyed or finished in Canada: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—554f. Woven fabrics, composed wholly or in part of yarns of wool or hair, commonly known as billiard cloth: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—555. Clothing, wearing apparel and articles made from woven fabrics, and all textile manufactures, wholly or partially manufactured, composed wholly or in part of wool or similar animal fibres, but of which the component of chief value is not silk nor artificial silk, n.o.p.; fabrics, coated or impregnated, composed wholly or in part of yarns of wool or hair, but not containing silk nor artificial silk, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 30 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction in rate; the specific duty of 18\(^3\) cents per pound is entirely eliminated. In future it will be a straight ad valorem duty, as is the case in all comparable items in other classes.

Mr. BAKER: In this class of items were the words "wholly or partially manufactured" previously included, or is that an innovation?

Mr. DUNNING: It is exactly the same designation.

Mr. BAKER: There will be no trouble in connection with the administration of such items? I thought there might be some danger [Mr. Dunning.]

of bringing in what might be called partially manufactured goods which might simply mean paying the duty practically on the value of the cloth alone. Is that not a new phrase?

Mr. DUNNING: No, it is not.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—556a. Melton cloth, imported by manufacturers of tennis balls for use in the manufacture of tennis balls, in their own factories: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—556b. Slipper cloth, woven, napped on one or both sides, wholly or in part of wool, not to contain silk or artificial silk, weighing not less than 22 ounces per square yard, when imported by manufacturers of indoor footwear, to be used exclusively in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—557b. Garnetted material wholly of silk, artificial silk or similar synthetic fibres, produced by chemical processes, obtained by disintegrating cocoons, yarns or fabrics, prepared for use; filaments or loose fibres wholly of silk, artificial silk or similar synthetic fibres produced by chemical processes, not more advanced than in the form of sliver; waste portions of unused fabrics, wholly of silk, artificial silk or similar synthetic fibres, n.o.p., not to include remnants nor mill ends: rate of duty, free.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction here from 5 per cent to free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—558b. Rovings, yarns and warps, wholly of artificial silk or similar synthetic fibres, produced by chemical processes, not more advanced than singles, not coloured, with not more than seven turns to the inch, under such regulations as the minister may prescribe:

(a) Produced from cellulose acetate: rate of duty, 5 per cent.

(b) N.o.p.: rate of duty, 20 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—558c. Rovings, yarns and warps, wholly or in part of silk, n.o.p., including threads, cords or twist for sewing, embroidering or other purposes: rate of duty, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction from  $17\frac{1}{2}$  to 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—558d. Rovings, yarns and warps, wholly or in part of artificial silk or warps, wholly or in part of artificial silk or similar synthetic fibres, produced by chemical processes, n.o.p., including threads, cords or twist for sewing, embroidering or other purposes, not to contain silk; artificial silk yarns, wholly or partially covered with metallic strip, one pound of which shall contain not less than 10,000 yards; under such regulations as the minister may prescribe:

(a) Produced wholly from cellulose acetate: rate of duty, 7½ per cent.

(b) N.o.p.: rate of duty, 25 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—558f. Rovings, yarns and warps, wholly of spun artificial silk or similar synthetic fibres, produced by chemical processes, not coloured, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture of cut-pile fabrics, in their own factories: rate of duty,

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—560a. Woven fabrics wholly or in part of silk, not to contain wool, not including fabrics in chief part by weight of artificial silk, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 22½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction in the rate on woven fabrics of silk from 271 to 22½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff-561. Woven fabrics wholly or in part of artificial silk or similar synthetic fibres, produced by chemical processes, not to contain wool, not including fabrics in chief part by weight of silk, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 27½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction in rate from 30 per cent.

Item agreed to.

tariff—565. Embroideries, lace, braids, cords, chenille, gimp, fringes and tassels, whether containing tinsel or not, nets, nettings and bobinet, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 221 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction from 25 to  $22\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 565. Plated or braided lines and cords, non-elastic, whether of tubular or of solid construction, not exceeding one inch in circumference, wholly or in chief part by weight of vegetable fibres: rate of duty, 17½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction from 25 to  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—567. Clothing, wearing apparel and articles, made from woven fabrics and all textile manufactures, wholly or partially manufactured, n.o.p., of which silk is the component of chief value: rate of duty, 27½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—567a. Clothing, wearing apparel and articles, made from woven fabrics and all textile manufactures, wholly or partially manufactured, n.o.p., of which the component of chief value is artificial silk or similar synthetic fibres produced by chemical processes: rate of duty, 25 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—568. Knitted garments, knitted underwear and knitted goods, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 20 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction from 25 to 20 per cent on knitted goods of all kinds.

Mr. BAKER: Has the minister taken into consideration what this will mean in the additional quantity of goods that will be imported? For some time past there has been a gradual increase in knitted underwear coming into this country from England. I am not personally interested in this matter at all, but this is a line with which I have been acquainted in my business for fifty years, and naturally I have some little knowledge of it. There has been some increase in our importations of women's knitted underwear.

Mr. DUNNING: Of silk or wool?

Mr. BAKER: Of wool. I have tabulated figures obtained from the Department of Trade and Commerce, and I find that the importations into this country of underwear and knitted goods, under the different headings, totalled 250,000 dozen during 1935. That means a great deal of labour. I am only thinking of the labour end of it, because this is one kind of work which, during the hard times, kept things going in many households in which the people otherwise would have been on relief. The girls and young men were able to work in the factories and earn enough money to keep the households off relief, but in 1935 the importation of these goods reached the point I have mentioned.

No doubt this reduction of five per cent is intended to increase the volume of our importations from Great Britain; if that is not the intention, what is the use of the reduction? This is clearly a class of goods that gives work to many people, and I think it is a serious matter. As I have said, I have no personal interest at all in this question. I did not like hearing a remark to that effect passed the other evening, because I think it is quite right for any hon member to give information to the house even if he has a personal interest in a matter, because if he has a personal interest he also has personal knowledge.

Mr. DUNNING: I agree entirely.

Mr. BAKER: Something of that kind was said the other night, and I think perhaps that thought restrains many hon. members from speaking on questions with which they are well acquainted. In my business I have had some knowledge of goods of this class for fifty years, although I have not a cent's worth of personal interest now. In 1935, as I have said, we imported some 250,000 dozen of knitted underwear and other knitted goods, which means a very great deal of labour, and no doubt this reduction will bring about an increase in our imports.

Mr. DUNNING: I should like to give my hon. friend the information I have with respect to knitted underwear of wool, which is the principal item to which he is referring. In 1936, a year later than the figures he gave, we imported from the United Kingdom $18,000 worth of these goods. During the previous year our production of knitted underwear was divided into several items, and here is the value of some of the items: $1,032,000; $364,000; $1,592,000; $325,000; $6,282,000; $523,000; $249,000; $2,109,000 and $129,000. These figures all have to do with knitted underwear.

Mr. BAKER: I know our production is very large, but nevertheless in 1935 we had 250,000 dozen of knitted underwear and other garments coming into this country, and I fear that the importations will increase, which will mean less labour here.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask if we export anything under this heading?

Mr. DUNNING: We export a little. Our exports of cotton underwear totalled $106,000. We even shipped $29,000 worth to the United Kingdom. Our exports of wool underwear amounted to only $11,000, most of which went to Newfoundland.

Mr. BAKER: Is the minister not concerned about the removal of this additional five per cent? Does he not fear that a larger quantity of these goods will be brought in from the United Kingdom, which will mean less work for our people here?

Mr. DUNNING: No, I am not worried about it. I have given a great deal of [Mr. Baker.]

thought to the matter, and I do not share my hon. friend's concern.

Mr. BAKER: If that should occur, what would be the next move?

Mr. DUNNING: We will cross that bridge when we come to it.

Mr. BAKER: I look forward to this becoming a matter of considerable concern, and I predict that this reduction will bring about too large an importation of underwear from England.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—568a. Socks and stockings:
(i) of wool: rate of duty, 20 per cent, and, per dozen pairs, 30 cents.

(ii) n.o.p.: rate of duty, 20 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a reduction in rate here. The former rate was 30 per cent ad valorem, and 75 cents per dozen. It is cut to 20 per cent ad valorem and 30 cents per dozen. I know I will be asked as to the ad valorem incidence, and I believe I have that information somewhere. The ad valorem incidence of the combined duties approximated 44 per cent, after making the usual deduction for direct shipments. On the basis of last year's values the ad valorem incidence of the compound duties now provided should work out at almost exactly 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister give the figures of imports and exports in production?

Mr. DUNNING: Under this heading the total imports in 1936 were valued at $364,000, of which $357,000 came from Great Britain. Our exports are not separately listed in the trade returns. Our production in 1935 is a combination of a number of items, of which the following will give an idea: $2,000,000; $1,000,000; $598,000; $215,000; $98,000; $615,000; $69,000 and $86,000. That is the total of our own production.

Mr. BAKER: In 1935, from the United Kingdom we imported in round figures, $350,000 worth of hosiery of different classes.

Mr. DUNNING: In 1936?

Mr. BAKER: In 1936 it was more than that; I have the figures for 1935. That was a matter of 86,200 dozen. That quantity of hosiery would give a great deal of labour, and certainly we can make hosiery in Canada. It is true that in 1935 we produced 6,194,000 dozen, or $20,000,000 worth, practically all of which was consumed in the country. I view with great alarm the cut in the duty. The minister will realize that it is a very heavy cut, from 75 cents a dozen to 30 cents a dozen, in addition to the ad valorem cut. It is important to have foresight of the situation; we must realize that this will mean great increases in importations from Great Britain, and in that case just that much less labour in Canada for workers in hosiery mills. These mills constituted one of the greatest supporters of households in Canada during the depression years and were the means of keeping families off the welfare lists. Does not the minister view with alarm the fact that this great cut will mean larger importations from Great Britain? I doubt if there is anything in the tariff which has been cut to so great an extent as this item.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the minister give the committee the corresponding tariffs on the same class of goods in 1930?

Mr. DUNNING: In May, 1930?

Mr. HEAPS: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: The classification then was so widely different from the present one that it is rather difficult to get at it. The closest I can come is to quote the British rates and classifications, as they then prevailed. They were these: Goods of cotton, 20 per cent; of wool, if over $1,50 a pound, 27½ per cent; of wool, if over 90 cents a pound and up to $1.50 a pound, 25 per cent; below 90 cents a pound, 20 per cent. If they were of silk or artificial silk they carried at that time a duty of 25 per cent. So the whole classification was different prior to 1930.

Mr. BAKER: May I draw the minister's attention to a fact of which he is no doubt cognizant. In the new schedule we find only the words "socks and stockings of wool"; is that not correct?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BAKER: And the n.o.p. item is the second one?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BAKER: What is meant by "socks and stockings of wool"? The previous item contained the words "socks and stockings wholly or in part of wool"; is it not a clerical error to have the present item worded differently?

Mr. DUNNING: The customs department has been compelled to rule on the point, and I can give the hon. member the substance of the ruling. The ruling is that the meaning shall be "substantially of wool" and the meaning of that, again, is that the major component, by weight, is to be of wool.

Mr. BAKER: Will that be the ruling of the National Revenue department on the new tariff?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, that is now the ruling of the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. BAKER: In other words, the interpretation of the item will mean that there must be 50 per cent or 75 per cent wool?

Mr. DUNNING: More than 50 per cent, by weight, of wool.

Mr. BAKER: Of course the minister understands that the question of wool in the production of socks and stockings is not of such great importance, because other fabrics are used. Is it possible to go back to the original wording of "wholly or in part of wool"?

Mr. DUNNING: No, not now.

Mr. BAKER: It is not at all possible?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BAKER: Was this item particularly requested by the United Kingdom representatives?

Mr. DUNNING: This form of wording?
Mr. BAKER: Yes, and was this change in the tariff offered by the Canadian government?

Mr. DUNNING: Partly one, and partly the other. From an administrative point of view, the old wording was very unsatisfactory. If you say "wholly or in part of wool" the question immediately arises "what part of wool"? Under the present arrangement a customs ruling is involved, whereby there must be 50 per cent, by weight, of wool before it can come in under this classification.

Mr. BAKER: May I draw the minister's attention to the fact that interpretation of "wholly or in part of wool" would mean that if there was any wool in it, it would come in at 30 cents and 20 per cent. But in the other class there is no 30 cent rate. This is vastly different.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry? Mr. BAKER: I am not satisfied with it.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Speaking as a Liberal, if I may do so, I find it difficult to defend an item where the rate of duty is higher upon the socks bought by the working man than upon those bought by the cabinet ministers. Under the present item I would expect that a very low grade of sock would come in at approximately 35 per cent, and a higher grade at about 20 per cent. What justification would there be for imposing the higher duty upon the poorer class of goods?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not acknowledge the hon. member's premise.

Mr. BAKER: No, he is wrong. May I ask how the hon. member works it out?

Mr. DEACHMAN: I work it out on the basis of socks at $3 per dozen and it comes to 30 per cent; then, at $18 a dozen, we get a rate of approximately 22 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: But I am not accepting those theoretical figures. The figures are those for which socks are entered for duty purposes, and while I have not the information before me there was an endeavour on the basis of typical importations to evolve a duty for socks of wool under the definition I have just given, which would get away from the great disparity which existed under the former tariff, and which has been materially reduced under the proposal here. This is one of the broadest reductions of duty contained in the whole list.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I congratulate the minister upon this substantial reduction, but at the same time I would point out that when you are bringing in socks valued at $3 per dozen, you have a rate of 23 per cent, and on the expensive socks valued at $9 per dozen the duty is something like 30 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not only on the value; it is also on the weight.

Mr. DEACHMAN: If the minister wants real information I can show him the invoices.

Mr. BAKER: I think the hon. member for Huron North is mistaken, as socks of wool are as a rule the expensive socks. The n.o.p. item would cover the odd importation of silk socks, but the large volume of importations would be under the other item.

I have had fifty years' experience in this line of business. There has been a great deal of talk about the high duties which were put on in the session of 1930. I do not intend to make a political speech, and I shall deal only with the practical side of this question. Despite the alleged high duties which were put on at that time, since 1932 the people of Canada have been able to purchase their socks and stockings at a lower price than ever before in the history of the dominion. I am not talking from the theoretical point of view; I am giving the actual facts. If I do say so, I am speaking as one who knows something about this matter. The tariff was never higher and since 1932 the people of Canada never bought better stockings for their money. We must not run away with the idea that tariffs increase the prices of our commodities. Competition makes the price, and competition was keen.

[Mr. Baker.]

Mr. TOMLINSON: Were the benefits passed on to the employees of the knitting factories?

Mr. BAKER: The newspapers of the past week contained the annual statements of two knitting companies. One made no money at all; the other did not make enough to pay dividends.

Mr. TOMLINSON: How about the Circle Bar Knitting Company in Kincardine?

Mr. BAKER: I hold no brief for any particular knitting company. I have been in the game for fifty years, and I know what occurred since 1932.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Surely the hon. member knows enough of the history of Canada to realize that in the years following 1932 the people found it extremely hard to buy socks of any kind?

Mr. WARD: The hon, member has just referred to a certain period when we had the highest tariffs in the history of this country. I would direct his attention to the fact that in that period the prices of raw material were at rock bottom. In 1932 there was no market at all in western Canada for wool, and it sold for as low as 3 cents a pound. Cotton was selling in Texas for 6 cents a pound. If the prices of socks and stockings did not go up, it was because the raw materials were available at low prices, rather than because of any protection given the manufacturers. I have lived on a farm most of my life and it has often been my job to wean calves. I have found that the longer a calf is allowed to suck a cow, the harder it is to wean. That is exactly what is happening in this country. The manufacturers have been sucking the cow of western Canada, and we are now finding it very difficult to wean them. When there is a suggestion of lowering the tariffs, the hon. member stands up in fear and trembling and says that these companies are going out of business to-morrow.

Mr. BAKER: I did not make any such statement.

Mr. WARD: Is he afraid to go out at night because he might see a shadow? Every time there is a suggestion that tariffs should be reduced, hon. members of the Conservative party get up in fear and trembling and say that these great institutions will be put out of business.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—568b. Gloves and mitts of all kinds, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—572. Oriental and imitation oriental rugs or carpets and carpeting, carpets and rugs, n.o.p.: rate of duty, 30 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—573. Enamelled carriage, floor shelf and table oil-cloth, linoleum, and cork matting or carpets: rate of duty, 15 per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the linoleum or oil-cloth covered by this item be used in the manufacture of carriages covered by item 439f?

Mr. DUNNING: The description is carriage, shelf and table oil-cloth, enamelled, as distinct from floor oil-cloth.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would that be used in the manufacturing of children's carriages?

Mr. DUNNING: It is the thin type of oilcloth used for a number of purposes and generally referred to as carriage oil-cloth.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 24, 1937

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT COMMITTEE

Mr. MAYBANK:

1. Did the government or the employment commission appoint a committee called The Youth Employment Committee for the purpose of considering and advising upon securing employment for the youth of Canada?

2. If so, when was such committee named; by whom, and what is the proper name of such committee?

3. What is the personnel of the said committee, and the address and calling of each?

4. Has said committee ever submitted any report or recommendation? If not, can the government state when such a report may be expected; and will the government lay such report before parliament for discussion?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes.

2. Second of September, 1936. By the governor-general in council upon the advice of the Minister of Labour under and by virtue of sections 8 and 9 of the National Employment Commission Act, 1936—Youth Employment Committee.

3. Alan Chambers of Victoria, B.C., Merchant; R. F. Thompson of Toronto, Ontario, Retired Clergyman; Joseph McCulley of Newmarket, Ont., headmaster; Andre Montpetit of Montreal, P.Q., Lawyer; W. C. Nickerson of Halifax, N.S., Merchant.

4. Yes. Two main and three supplementary reports have been made to the National Employment Commission, one of the functions of which body is to advise the minister. Any action which the government may decide to take on the recommendations of the commission will be duly made known to the house.

*PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION TO CORONATION

Mr. CHURCH:

Will all returned men who are members of the parliament of Canada go to the coming coronation if they can, or will a representative delegation of them be sent by the government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not possible to answer the first part of this question:

Will all returned men who are members of the parliament of Canada go to the coming coronation if they can— . . . .

I cannot answer that question nor do I think anyone else can. The other part of the question is:

—or will a representative delegation of them be sent by the government?

There will be returned men on the parliamentary delegation but there will not be a special delegation of returned men.

TORONTO-HAMILTON HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT SCHEME

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. What proportion has the dominion government undertaken to pay towards the cost of the Toronto-Hamilton highway improvement scheme between Long Branch and Port Credit?

2. How many miles of this highway have been widened and improved recently from Long Branch westward?

3. Has the said improvement scheme been completed?

4. If so, what was the total cost per mile?
5. If the said work has not been completed, what is the total estimated cost per mile of same?

Mr. ROGERS:

1, 2, 3 and 4. The dominion government agreed to contribute to the province of Ontario 50 per cent of the cost of certain highways described and set forth in schedule "C" to an agreement dated September 10, 1936, between the dominion government and the government of the province of Ontario under The Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936, which agreement was tabled on January 15, 1937. Project 36-31 was included in the aforesaid schedule described as "Port Credit to Long Branch, asphaltic highway, 3.6 miles, dominion contribution $122,000." Statements of claim received and paid to date in respect to this project amount to $115,160.13.

5. The total estimated cost of project 36-31 above referred to was $244,000.

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. What proportion has the dominion government undertaken to pay towards the cost of construction of the highway between Toronto and Hamilton, known as the "Middle Road"?

2. What is the estimated total cost of this highway when completed?

3. What is the total estimated cost per mile of this road from Etobicoke river westward to Hurontario street when completed?

4. What is the maximum width of the road allowance provided for the highway between the said Etobicoke river and Hurontario street?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. The dominion government agreed to contribute to the province 50 per cent of the cost of certain highways described and set forth in schedule "C" to the agreement between the dominion government and the province under The Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936, dated September 10, 1936, and tabled on January 15, 1937. The project as set forth in the agreement cannot be exactly identified with the highway known as the "Middle Road," but the following statement sets out three projects which may be included in the "Middle Road," together with the maximum dominion contribution and the statements of claim received and paid to date:—

Schedule	Description				Domin	ion
No.				Contributio	on	Payme	ents
36-28	Brown's Line to Centre Road—Middle Rd. Concrete Highway,			$		$
	5 miles	 	 	93,100 00		85.275	58
36-57	Oakville Bridge on Middle Rd.	 	 	80,737 50		68,098	47
	From Burlington Subway to Campbell's Corners, concrete pavement, and grading from Middle Rd. to Hamilton H.
	also Middle Road Bridge		 ٠.	56,000 00		45,357	14

2 and 3. See reply to 1.

4. The agreement does not provide for the width of the road allowance between the Etobicoke river and Hurontario street, this being a matter of provincial regulation.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION Mr. CHURCH:

What are the names, occupations, addresses, salaries, living and travelling expenses of the present federal radio commission?

Mr. HOWE: The former radio commission was abolished on November 2, 1936, by the repeal of the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act.

If, however, the question refers to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation the following information relating to the board of governors has been supplied by the corporation:

Mr. CHURCH: These questions, 2 and 3, are not answered properly at all. Beauchesne at page 111 states that questions may be placed on the order paper seeking information from ministers of the crown relating to public affairs; and paragraph 339 states that questions addressed to ministers should relate to the public affairs with which they are officially connected, to proceedings pending in parliament or to any matter of administration for which the minister is responsible. Paragraph 349 states that the purpose of a question is to obtain information and not to supply it to the house. The answers are not complete, and we have a right within the rules to ask that information on the subject matter be given fully. I cannot get the information in the public accounts nor in the radio booklet tabled. Public funds are being spent in this matter and I wish to establish the right to all information asked for from time to time. One minister the other day refused to answer the questions at all.

GOVERNMENT-OWNED RAILWAY LINE, WINDSOR—WINDSOR JUNCTION, N.S.

Mr. PURDY:

For a copy of order in council, dated 14th November, 1914, dealing with lease between the Department of Railways and Canals and the Dominion Atlantic Railway, of the government owned line of railway from Windsor to Windsor junction, Nova Scotia.

Mr. HOWE: Return tabled herewith.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE PROVISION FOR RESERVE CONSTABLES AND NON-

PROVISION FOR RESERVE CONSTABLES AND NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act to provide for the appointment, calling up for training and duty, and payment of a certain number of men as reserve constables, to be known as the "Royal Canadian Mounted Police Reserve," and for the appointment from among such constables of reserve non-commissioned officers; to provide also that time served in the permanent forces of Canada may be included in the term of service of an officer or a constable for pension purposes; and to provide further that any person who ceases to be a constable shall have the right to continue the payment of instalments for pension purposes or the right of withdrawal of all such contributions.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

SIT-DOWN STRIKES

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE AS TO ATTITUDE OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. A. McLARTY (Essex West): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with I wish to address a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). In view of the reports in the press, does the government intend to take a stand with regard to what are called sit-down strikes in industrial establishments?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): In answer to the hon. gentleman, who communicated to me the question he was going to ask, I desire to make the following statement:

A "sit-down strike," so-called, is, I understand, instituted and carried out by the employees of a factory or other industrial or commercial concern, who, having entered the [Mr. Girouard.]

premises legally in connection with their work, illegally remain and take possession of such premises, and hold same by physical force against the owners and employers. A sit-down strike in Canada would be entirely illegal, and would not only tend to undermine all respect for law and order, but would, if proceeded with on any large scale, likely disrupt the business and administration of the country. Such a sit-down strike would also likely tend to create a riot and public disorder, which is contrary to the views of organized labour in this country. Legitimate means of redressing grievances already exist in Canada.

The sit-down strike shall not be permitted to obtain any footing here. The administration of justice is of course committed to the provincial authorities and they are exclusively responsible for it. But the dominion government is prepared to utilize all the resources and agencies at its command and to the extent of its legal powers to the end of restraining and eliminating this illegal mode of procedure in Canada.

PETITIONS OF RIGHT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, during the last session of parliament, while the bill respecting National Harbour Board was under consideration, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in proposing the rejection of an amendment which I had submitted to provide for suits in tort against the board, gave an assurance that during the recess his department would prepare a bill to amend the existing law with respect to petitions of right, and providing for suits in tort against the crown. On January 26 last the minister assured the house that a draft of such a bill had been prepared and submitted to the government for approval, and the minister then expresed his intention to submit that bill to the house during the present session. It has not yet appeared on the order paper. I ask the Minister of Justice if he has any additional information to give to the house regarding the matter.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): A draft of a bill along the lines mentioned was prepared and has been submitted to the various departments of the government, preparatory to being submitted for approval by the council. But I must say that there are many difficulties in the way, and strong objections come from almost every department. I have found that in the United Kingdom the committee which sat a few years ago prepared a draft of a bill concerning this matter, which has never been enacted because of difficulties presenting themselves there. Under the circumstances I have decided to exclude from the ordinary course which is now followed, commissions of the government, such as the one concerning which my hon. friend moved an amendment last year, and others which deal more particularly with business and public utilities. But I am afraid that at this stage of the session it would be difficult to proceed with this legislation. I respectfully ask my hon. friend to give me a little more time to achieve the end he has in view.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the minister renew his assurance for the next session of parliament?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

FURTHER LEGISLATION

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): May I inquire what additional legislation we may reasonably expect during the present session? I would have inquired on Monday but I thought possibly the Prime Minister might like an opportunity to determine the matter, and this seems to be the appropriate time to ask.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I may say to my right hon. friend that I think the house already has before it practically all the proposed legislation. There are one or two minor matters which will have to be considered; I shall give the house a list of them to-morrow. There is, I think, nothing more of special importance.

Mr. BENNETT: That is quite satisfactory.

MAIL DELIVERY ON GOOD FRIDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask if there will be delivery of mail on Good Friday, a national, public and religious holiday.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) is not in his seat at the moment, but I shall direct his attention to the hon. member's question, so that it may be answered to-morrow.

Mr. CHURCH: I thought this was a Christian country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It might be a Christian act to deliver the mail.

TAXATION OF WAR PENSIONERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley), first, whether it would be possible to ascertain the amount of revenue the government derived in 1936 from the taxation of pensioned veterans of the late war, and second, whether the government has considered putting such pensions on a tax-free basis.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue):Perhaps the hon, member would put the question on the order paper. I shall try to get an answer to it.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—DISMISSAL OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) if a return ordered on January 27 relating to dismissals from the Department of Agriculture can now be tabled?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): It will be brought down to-morrow.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY SECURITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Some weeks ago a question I had on the order paper from the early part of the session dealing with the matter of the Grand Trunk securities was passed as an order for return, but as far as I know the return has not yet been tabled. I would ask the government to look into the matter and see if I can have the return very shortly.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): I have discussed the matter with my deputy, who has the matter in hand. It deals with a delicate legal situation, and it is necessary to obtain very complete legal advice before we answer the question.

NEW WESTMINSTER PENITENTIARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) if his attention has been drawn to a matter affecting the administration of the penitentiary at New Westminster, where the usual process has been reversed in that some person or persons succeeded in breaking into the penitentiary over the high walls surrounding that institution, and were able to get away with some valuable equipment. My second question is this: Can the minister inform the house when the royal commission investigating the penitentiaries will reach the Pacific coast?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I shall be pleased to inquire into the first question raised by the hon. member, and do my best to satisfy his legitimate curiosity. In reply to the second question may I say the commission is in Kingston; it will complete its work there in the very near future, and will proceed to the Pacific coast.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

CANADA-UNITED KINGDOM TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, last night we completed the discussion of schedule IV and that brings us to article 6.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Article 6 is as follows:

The government of Canada undertake that the goods the growth, produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom enumerated in schedule IV appended hereto, when conveyed without transhipment from any part of the British empire enjoying the benefits of the British preferential tariff into a sea, lake or river port of Canada, shall not be subjected to duties of customs higher than those specified in that schedule.

The government of Canada undertake as regards goods the growth, produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom other than those enumerated in schedule IV that, under the British preferential tariff, no new protective duty shall be imposed and no existing protective duty increased except after an inquiry at which United Kingdom producers shall enjoy full rights of audience.

ights of addrence.

Article agreed to.

On article 7:

The government of Canada undertake that goods the growth, produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom enumerated in schedule IV, when not of a class or kind made in Canada and when subject to duties of customs on importation into Canada, shall, when conveyed without transhipment from any part of the British empire enjoying the benefits of the British preferential tariff into a sea, lake or river port of Canada, enjoy the benefit of preferential tariff margins which, in the case of any such goods, shall not be less than the difference between the rate of duty provided for in this agreement and the rate of duty now levied upon like goods the growth, produce or manufacture of any foreign country, provided however that, if the duty on foreign goods becomes less than such preferential tariff margin, no duty shall be levied on the like goods of United Kingdom origin.

Mr. BENNETT: Does that contemplate the possibility of a stop-over in any other country? The language is indefinite.

Mr. DUNNING: Is the leader of the opposition referring to the method of shipment?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes?

Mr. DUNNING: It is the usual shipment provision; there must be direct shipment.

Mr. BENNETT: From British port to British port?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Article agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: Is the schedule to be taken up now?

Mr. DUNNING: Article 7 refers to schedule IV which was passed last night. We will now proceed to article 8.

On article 8:

The government of Canada undertake in respect of the goods the growth, produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom enumerated in schedule V appended hereto that the difference between the rates of duties of customs on such goods on importation into Canada, when conveyed without transhipment from any part of the British empire enjoying the benefits of the British preferential tariff into a sea, lake or river port of Canada, and the rates upon similar goods the growth, produce or manufacture of any foreign country shall not be less than the margins set out in that schedule.

Mr. DUNNING: That brings us to schedule V:

The schedule now before us comprises ninety-one tariff items, eighty-four of which have already appeared in schedule IV, so far as rate of duty is concerned. In schedule V Canada undertakes to maintain the preferential margins indicated in the schedule. The chief difference between the present schedule V and schedule E of the old agreement is with respect to the number of items, there being 215 in the former agreement and 91 in this one. The 215 were qualified subsequently by negotiation between the two countries, with respect to some ten or fifteen—

Mr. BENNETT: More than that. There were 100 free items with Great Britain when the late government left office.

Mr. DUNNING: I believe my right hon. friend and I are not talking about the same thing. I am referring only to fixed margins.

Mr. BENNETT: They were taken out, and therefore no longer were applicable. That was done by agreement between the Canadian and British governments. Some of these bound items were made free. As a matter of fact others of them were found to have no value at all.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think there is anything further I can say about the schedule as a whole. We can take it item by item if that is the way the committee desires to proceed.

Mr. BENNETT: The only items that need be considered, I should think, are those not covered by the items already disposed of. We have gone over the rates of duty with respect to a number of these items, and the effect of this schedule is to bind certain articles that we considered yesterday.

Mr. DUNNING: To bind the margin.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, except with respect to certain of them, and I should think we could dispose of those certain items and the others might be taken as already disposed of. There are ninety-one items in all, and it could be done very quickly.

Mr. DUNNING: I think I should indicate to the committee those items on which there is a change in the amount of margin; I believe that would facilitate discussion of the whole schedule. On item 410b, coal cleaning equipment, the preference is increased by means of a reduction in the British preference rate, which was effected yesterday in schedule IV. On item ex 427-ex 446a, motion picture equipment, the margin of preference is also increased by reducing the British preference rate in schedule IV. On item ex 445k, electrical instruments, the margin of preference is increased by reducing the British preference rate, which we did yesterday. On item ex 392, forgings of steel, the preference is also increased by reducing the British preferential rate. On item ex 397b, pipes and tubes of iron and steel, the preference is increased by a reduction in the British preferential rate. There are twentyone items on which the preferential margin is reduced.

Mr. BENNETT: It was those items I was going to ask the minister to mention; it seemed to me that we would save time in that way.

Mr. DUNNING: These are the items: ex 208j, sal ammoniac; the margin is reduced. Item 208t, chemicals n.o.p.; the margin is reduced. Item ex 210, peroxide of soda and so on, is removed from the margin list. Item 216, acids n.o.p.; the margin is reduced. Item ex 219, solutions of hydrogen peroxide; the margin is reduced. Item 219d, sulphuric ether and chloroform; the margin is reduced. Item ex 247-247a, artists' colours and so on; the margin is reduced. Item 320, plate glass; the margin is reduced. Item 321, other plate glass; the margin is reduced. Item 339a, lead capsules for bottles; the margin is reduced. Item ex 353, certain manufactures of aluminum; the margin is reduced. Item 428f, combustion engines: the margin is reduced. Item ex 429, penknives and pocket knives; the margin is reduced. Item 440 (1), aircraft; the margin is reduced. Item 523c, cotton fabrics woven of yarns of counts of 100 or more; the margin is reduced. Item ex 540 (a), pure linen fabrics; the margin is reduced. Item ex 540 (b), articles made from pure linen; the margin is reduced. Item 551c, hair yarns; the margin is reduced. Item 605a, pig leathers and moroccos; the margin is reduced. Item 392a, hollow forgings; the margin is reduced. Item 398a, polished tubing; the margin is reduced.

Mr. BENNETT: In order that there may be no misunderstanding, that has reference not to the duty but to the established and fixed margin.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: There are two items to which I desire to direct attention. The maintenance of a twenty per cent margin on plate glass is referred to in one item, and without going into it in detail, I noticed that the report made yesterday with regard to automobiles dealt with this question. Frankly I glanced through that report very rapidly, and just noticed that there was some reference to the matter, but I intend to look at it more carefully when the opportunity arises. What

I desire to point out, however, is this: we seem to be in a most unfortunate position in connection with plate glass. It affects our furniture situation and our automobile situation, and the whole business seems to be in the hands of a cartel or syndicate. It does seem that we are bound to make our purchases under conditions and circumstances with regard to prices that certainly enhance the cost of the production of some of our furniture and some of our automobiles. Can nothing be done in that regard? The margin of twenty per cent that is still maintained is much more than is necessary, having regard to the fact that the Belgian operations are under the control of the British, and the whole thing is operated by one vast—I hesitate to use the word "combine"-

Mr. DUNNING: It goes beyond that.

Mr. BENNETT: I would not use that word. I would use the word "cartel," but it is more than a cartel. They have a cartel, but in addition they have an overriding organization that deals with the subject. I have no doubt that the minister had this brought to his attention when he was discussing this agreement. Does he see no way out for us at all in connection with it? It has become a matter of substantial importance to the Canadian people.

Mr. DUNNING: I agree.

Mr. BENNETT: It is dealt with in these two items, 320 and 321. I confess that I have no constructive suggestion to make, but I thought possibly the minister, having looked into it, might have in mind some method by which we could overcome the difficulty.

Mr. DUNNING: Plate glass, of course, is a splendid illustration of the extreme of the cartel situation. I think all who have studied the matter will agree with that statement. It will be noticed that in the ordinary budget tariff items this session a reduction of five per cent, which is one-fifth of the duty under the intermediate tariff, is being made.

Mr. BENNETT: I am afraid that is not going to help very much. Probably anything short of free entry would not be of much help.

Mr. DUNNING: There is some question as to whether even free entry would help.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I know.

Mr. DUNNING: I want to proceed with reasonable care. The British government is fully aware of the views of the Canadian government, which are substantially similar [Mr. Bennett.]

to those expressed by the leader of the opposition a few moments ago, and indeed this position is at least partly responsible for article 10 of the agreement, which will enable us to make plate glass free if cartelizing conditions continue to affect Canadian industry in the manner in which this plate glass cartel has affected and is affecting Canadian industry to-day. I am advised that there has been some little improvement, but I am not prepared to say that we regard the situation as at all satisfactory even yet.

Mr. BENNETT: As far as article 10 is concerned, we had not reached it and I was not going to mention this matter until we came to it, but the truth is that we knew of the existence of the condition provided for in article 10 when we signed the agreement, because there is nothing new about it. I am sorry to say that it has been known to me for years and I think it has been known to the minister, so that as far as article 10 is concerned we signed it with full knowledge of the fact that it applied to plate glass. But by what method we can avail ourselves of that article to improve conditions is something else entirely, and I asked the minister if he had any suggestion to make, as to how that result might be brought about.

Mr. DUNNING: The British government know our views on the matter, of course, and plate glass is in a sense not now bound, if we wish to invoke the provisions of article 10 to unbind it. In a sense the producers are warned, and we shall take advantage of the provisions of article 10, unless there is improvement in this situation, to make plate glass free if necessary under the intermediate tariff. I know they are showing a disposition to cooperate, but as yet I am not prepared to guarantee the effectiveness of that cooperation. It is certain that both governments are now interested in eliminating the conditions complained of.

Mr. HARRIS: Could the minister tell us something about crude peanut oil, item 278b, which was not mentioned in the other schedule?

Mr. DUNNING: We are guaranteeing the continuance of the present preference of ten per cent on crude peanut oil from Great Britain. This means that a tariff of ten per cent will be continued during the life of this agreement under the intermediate heading.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the margin.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS: There are large imports of this commodity from China. A refinery is nearing completion in British Columbia which I believe is to be used for the treatment of Chinese peanut oil. It is the intention to refine a product which comes in as not being for food and sell it for food purposes. I should be glad if the government would see to it that the statistics are so arranged as to give some indication of these imports of inedible products which are refined in this country and sold for food purposes.

The ten per cent preference to Great Britain is not enough perhaps and the margin of preference might well be increased in the interests of Canada. I think the United Kingdom will find it impossible to freight the crude peanuts from China, process them in England and then transport the resultant product to Canada on a ten per cent preference. The tendency will be to increase the imports from China direct. The cost of producing peanut oil or ground nut oil in China is so small that it comes into serious competition with the production of fats in Canada. Any increase in the preference would benefit Great Britain, and any excise tax, duty or processing tax which should be placed against this product would enure to the benefit of the Canadian producers of animal fats.

Mr. DUNNING: Item 278b covers crude peanut oil, for refining for edible purposes, used as materials in Canadian manufactures. The imports last year from the United Kingdom were valued at $1,650,000; from China, $900,000, and from the Netherlands, $580,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That would come from their East Indian islands.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. While in England we were advised that they were pressing Indian peanuts to produce some of the oil which is sent to Canada. There is some question as to whether Chinese peanuts would qualify under the content clause of the agreement which stipulates fifty per cent British content. There was some indication that the product from Chinese peanuts crushed in England would not qualify, in that there has been a desire on the part of some of those interested to get the content requirement reduced as applied to this particular commodity. This parliament has the power to increase the margin at any time; we are simply guaranteeing that it will not be reduced.

Mr. HARRIS: Could you give the imports in pounds?

Mr. DUNNING: They are given in hundredweights.

Mr. HARRIS: I wanted to compare them with the other figures which were given in pounds. The minister can give the figures in tons if he likes, but we do not sell butter by the ton; it is sold to the housewife by the pound. A tank steamer load of this product was landed in Canada from China at a cost of less than two cents per pound. This oil was made up into a product which was described as capable of doing any shortening work that butter would do. When close to eighty per cent of a product which costs two cents per pound is made into shortening, it is pretty difficult to produce butter to compete with it.

Mr. DUNNING: The total imports under this item were 566,500 hundredweight, which reduced to pounds amounts to 56,650,000. The imports from the United Kingdom amounted to 264,380 hundredweight or 26,438,000 pounds.

Mr. HARRIS: And from China?

Mr. DUNNING: The imports from China amounted to 18,600,000 pounds.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): I should like to refer back to item ex 710, which reads:

Coverings, inside and outside, used in covering or holding goods imported therewith, shall be subject to the following provisions.

Would that pertain to the importation of British hats that are in a hat box as an inside container?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The hon. member is out of order. That item was passed last night.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): It is just for information that I am asking the minister whether the reduction of five per cent is on the hat-boxes that would be contained in the large box container, or the container itself, or both.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not wish to call my hon. friend out of order; he appreciates, I know, that the item about which he is asking the question is not before us in this schedule, and as it was passed last night I have not here to-day the detailed notes with respect to it which I had yesterday. But I can read to him the wording of the item, which of course must be interpreted by the National Revenue department in administration. In that connection I can indicate to him at once that there is no change in the wording of the item, so that whatever has been the practice will continue to be the practice so far as the wording is concerned.

The item reads:

Coverings, inside and outside, used in covering or holding goods imported therewith, shall be subject to the following provisions, viz:

(a) Usual coverings, containing free goods only; usual coverings, except receptacles capable of holding liquids, containing goods subject to a specific duty only, n.o.p.

And:

(b) Usual coverings, containing goods, not machinery, subject to any ad valorem duty, when not included in the invoice value of the goods they contain.

There is no change in the wording of that item

Article agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: What shall we now deal with?

Mr. DUNNING: If we have carried schedule V we shall go back to article 9.

Schedule V agreed to.

On article 9:

The two governments undertake that, except as provided for in legislation already in force, goods the growth, produce or manufacture of either country covered by the provisions of articles 1 and 2, or of the first paragraph of article 6, as the case may be, shall not be subjected on importation into the other country to any imposts or charges other than the customs duties leviable in accordance with the provisions of the said articles unless equal imposts or charges are imposed on similar goods the growth, produce or manufacture of the importing country.

Mr. DUNNING: This is the usual standard clause in commercial treaties.

Article agreed to.

On article 10:

Each government reserve the right to suspend or modify the preferential margin specified in respect of any item in schedule III or schedule V, as the case may be, if, after inquiry, it appears to that government that a predominating share of the trade in such item is controlled by any organization or combine of exporters and that by virtue of the guaranteed margin that organization or combine is exercising this control to the prejudice of consumers or users of the goods in question.

Article agreed to.

On article 11:

Neither government will, without the consent of the other government, amend their regulations regarding qualification for preferential tariff treatment so as to increase above fifty per centum the prescribed proportion of the value of any class of manufactured articles which must be derived from expenditure in the British empire in order to entitle the articles to preference.

Mr. BENNETT: That fixes it at fifty per cent, then.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what it says.

Mr. DUNNING: It is an undertaking that neither country will increase the proportion beyond fifty per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I say.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: It fixes the maximum, but it does not fix fifty per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: No. That is the maximum.

Article agreed to.

On article 12:

The government of Canada, recognizing that the entry of Canadian goods into the United Kingdom market free of duty, as assured in article 1 of this agreement and, in particular, their exemption from liability to any special or dumping duty, even if sold in that market at less than their comparable selling price in Canada, warrant more nearly reciprocal treatment of United Kingdom goods offered for sale in similar circumstances in Canada, agree to exempt particular classes of United Kingdom goods from special or dumping duty under the conditions set out in the following paragraphs.

If it appears to the government of the United Kingdom that any goods enjoying entry free of duty into the United Kingdom under the provisions of article 1 of this agreement are exported from Canada to the United Kingdom at export or selling prices lower than the fair market value for home consumption, as determined on the bases laid down in section 6 of the customs tariff of Canada, and that in consequence thereof the sale of similar United Kingdom goods is being prejudicially or injuriously affected, they may notify the government of Canada of the facts of the case and request that United Kingdom goods of each or any class or kind normally manufactured by the Canadian industry manufacturing the goods in question shall be exempt from special or dumping duty on importation into Canada.

On receipt of such notification and request the government of Canada will take suitable steps to correct the situation complained of and, if other measures are ineffectual, will exempt United Kingdom goods, as specified in the notification, from special or dumping duty for such period as may prove necessary. Recognizing that in certain circumstances it may be found necessary to exempt from special or dumping duty other United Kingdom goods of a class or kind normally manufactured by the Canadian industry manufacturing the goods in question, the government of Canada agree that they will accord sympathetic consideration to any request that the United Kingdom government may make under this article for such exemption and will, in consultation with the United Kingdom government, determine what measures shall be taken to restore fair trading conditions.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have been wondering whether there is any means by which the minister could induce the Canadian manufacturer, or be assured that the Canadian manufacturer will do so, to honour the intent of the agreement and eliminating any possibility of the United Kingdom finding it necessary to inflict upon Canadian industry the penalties herein contained. I am certainly not in accord with the Canadian manufacturer dumping on the British market or the British manufacturer dumping on our market;

there should be the strictest fair play. Perhaps there is some necessity for all the provisions of this article, but as I have said, I wonder if there is no other way whereby the government could ensure fair trade between the manufacturers of the two countries. I note that the article states:

If . . . any goods . . . are exported from Canada to the United Kingdom at export or selling prices lower than the fair market value for home consumption . . .

Such a condition should not exist. I mean that no manufacturer should so violate the principles of fair trading as to permit such a condition to arise. A little further on it is stated that the United Kingdom government—the facts of the case and request that United Kingdom goods of each or any class or kind normally manufactured by the Canadian industry manufacturing the goods in question shall be exempt from special or dumping duty on importation into Canada.

It is provided further:

On receipt of such notification and request the government of Canada will take suitable steps to correct the situation complained of and, if other measures are ineffectual, will exempt United Kingdom goods as specified in the notification, from special or dumping duty for such period as may prove necessary. Recognizing that in certain circumstances it may be found necessary to exempt from special or dumping duty other United Kingdom goods of a class or kind normally manufactured by the Canadian industry manufacturing the goods in question, the government of Canada agree that they will accord sympathetic consideration to any request that the United Kingdom government may make under this article for such exemption . . .

It is pointed out that where the United Kingdom finds it necessary it may apply to the Canadian government for permission to dump into Canada any line of goods of a kind made by a Canadian company which is violating the article. I find from certain surveys I have made that in England there are a large number of companies that manufacture on a mass scale, confining themselves to one line whereas in Canada many companies make many lines-I speak about the line that I am more familiar with-a certain company manufactures boilers, radiators, iron pipe, iron pipe fittings, castings in connection with the steamfitting trade, valves and so on. This condition does not exist in the old country in their large plants. As I understand this article, if the United Kingdom found that a Canadian company manufacturing radiators violated the spirit of the agreement by dumping radiators in England, then the United Kingdom could ask for permission to dump into Canada not only radiators but all the other lines I have mentioned as manufactured by a particular company making radiators in Canada. It strikes me that if we could use some means to prevent a violation of the spirit of the article—and evidently the hope is implied in the article that it will not be violated—trade would be much more amicable between the two countries than if it were necessary for Great Britain to seek to dump upon our market not only the particular line in respect to which the treaty might be violated but all the other lines manufactured by such a company as I have mentioned.

Mr. BROWN: I have read article 12 several times and I am utterly unable to understand it. I do not get its meaning. No doubt the minister is aware that both countries engage in a certain amount of dumping, that is, selling goods in each other's market somewhat below the selling price in the home market. I am wondering what the actual meaning of this article is.

Mr. HARRIS: The questions I have in mind are similar to the one asked by the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Brown). We might go as far as to say that all countries do some dumping, and in that direction I can see grave difficulties for Canadian industry under this Canada-United Kingdom agreement. The remarks I am now making I base on our exports to the United Kingdom at the present time and that proportion of those exports that might be termed manufactured goods. At present we export to the United Kingdom about 20 per cent of household food products; in round figures, about 40 per cent of grains, seeds and animal products; 35 per cent of building materials, and products for the secondary industries, such as lumber and so on; while our exports of manufactured goods to Britain amount to between 5 and 7 per cent in what might be described as manufactured goods, the main items being rubber products, footwear and so on, amounting to about $4,500,-000; cotton products, $500,000; hardware, about $1,250,000; automobiles, about $2,000,-000; films, about $1,750,000; leather goods, about $750,000; soaps about $700,000, and other miscellaneous items making a total of about $16,000,000 of manufactured goods, largely the product of the Canadian workman and the use of Canadian raw material.

Under this article, as I read it, that trade is imperilled. We have in our customs act a provision, section 6, I believe, with regard to the fair market value for home consumption; and when one thinks of what that provision means in its relation to the dumping of goods from foreign countries, and in conjunction with the adoption of article 12, one can see that one of the first consequences will be a decline in the standard of living here to the United Kingdom level. But it is much more far-reaching than that. As I understand the United Kingdom tariff structure, they have not in their customs law a provision similar to ours with respect to dumping, with the result that countries such as Czechoslovakia, Belgium, France and even Russia can pay the duty that is prescribed by the United Kingdom tariff and sell their products in England. For, as we all know, the duty there is not nearly sufficient to stop the practice of European dumping, and I understand that the United Kingdom has no dumping provision. The result is that the consumer in England of products that are made in these countries can very well buy those products at a lower price, even with the duty paid, than he would be able to buy them in the United Kingdom.

In view of these facts I wish to ask a few questions which perhaps will induce the government to make some satisfactory answers along this line. I would ask them to see to it, whenever one of these items is brought to the attention of the Canadian government by the United Kingdom authorities, that the Canadian manufacturer and exporter to the British market shall not be placed in any inferior position or at any disadvantage in relation to the European manufacturer who is able to supply the English market with the same commodity. Will the Canadian government act immediately on any submission received from a United Kingdom manufacturer, which is not supported by full evidence, that the Canadian export price is lower than the fair market value as determined in section 6 of the Customs Act. I would expect the answer to that to be that they would so act. The minister will correct me if my surmise is wrong. Is it the understanding of the Canadian government that the United Kingdom government will investigate and determine whether the submission to it is a pertinent submission of facts which prove that the Canadian goods in question were actually dumped on the United Kingdom market?

Mr. DUNNING: The answer to that is that the United Kingdom government is under obligation to be certain of its facts before communicating with the Canadian government about the matter.

Mr. HARRIS: If the United Kingdom manufacturer merely submits to the United Kingdom government a claim as to alleged [Mr. Harris.]

dumping, will that submission be accepted by the Canadian government for investigation without the United Kingdom government first investigating the complaint? Is the Canadian government just going to let the United Kingdom manufacturer make a complaint to the British government which is passed on by the British government without investigation, or will the United Kingdom government make an investigation before submitting the complaint to the Canadian government?

Mr. DUNNING: The second paragraph of the article I think makes that clear.

If it appears to the government of the United Kingdom that any goods enjoying entry free of duty into the United Kingdom . . . are exported from Canada to the United Kingdom at export or selling pries lower than the fair market value for home consumption, as determined on the bases laid down in section 6 of the Customs Tariff of Canada. . . .

The United Kingdom government obligates itself to satisfy itself as to the facts. hon, friend may be very sure that on any complaint from the British government under this section the Canadian government will also assure itself as to the correctness of the facts. This was one of the difficulties, in fact one of the chief criticisms made by the United Kingdom government, as regards the operation of trade between the two countries. The Federation of British Industries have made vigorous complaints to their own government regarding the dumping of free goods into the British market. As is well known, the federation rather desires the enactment of antidumping legislation in the United Kingdom. Up to this time no anti-dumping legislation has been enacted, and there does not appear to be a disposition to meet the problem in that way. There was however a complaint by the British government—a strong complaint, may I say-that when they are admitting our goods free of duty it is going pretty far to dump them on that market at prices lower than are charged for the same commodity under like conditions at home. It is very difficult to meet that argument. The manifest intention of both governments was to encourage fair trade practices and to go as far as possible to discourage unfair trade practices, and it was hoped that this provision would be itself effective in stopping the abuses, specific instances of which were brought to the attention of the Canadian ministers during the negotiations. The accuracy of the instances we could not question at the time, and investigations since have demonstrated that they were well founded in several rather important cases from the point of view of British trade.

I may say that with respect to this article I expected more complaint from Canadian industry than I have received. I have not had a single complaint, and only one inquiry as to its bearing, along the line that the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) took this afternoon. There is, I think, a fair understanding on the part of Canadian industry that the design of article 12 is to ensure fair trading as far as we can under the agreement.

Mr. HARRIS: As to the last observation of the minister I may say there are quite a number of complaints under way. Within forty-eight hours of the tabling of the agreement certain groups, members of the federation in the United Kingdom, got very busy, and if the minister has not received many complaints so far—

Mr. DUNNING: I meant complaints from Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. HARRIS: Answering my consumer friend sitting behind you, we are all anxious to do all we can for the consumer in Canada, yes; but let my hon. friend take a broad view of the situation and see what is actually going on the world over. The cartels in Europe, subsidized in some cases, are dumping the surplus products that they do not require for home consumption. Thus Great Britain finds herself the recipient of many million pounds' worth of cheap goods, and it is very difficult for us to hold our own against that position.

In regard to the British Federation of Industries, I think it is time that the government in Canada, regardless of its political stripe, should take into its confidence industry in Canada, in the same manner as the federation of British industries enjoys the confidence of the government of the United Kingdom. And I say to industry in Canada that they ought to get together and see that their representations are properly made to governments, divorcing the matter from politics, and that fair consideration is given to the possibility of making for diversified industry in this country.

Section 7 of the Customs Tariff contains these words: "If other measures are ineffectual to correct dumping." Does that mean that the Canadian government will authorize the dumping of United Kingdom goods into Canada if it appears that it cannot otherwise stop the Canadian manufacturer or exporter from dumping?

Furthermore, article 12 provides that a Canadian industry manufacturing the goods in question shall have these provisions applied against it. If one or two manufacturers, which may represent ten per cent of the trade, should transgress the dumping provisions, does this mean that the entire industry is to be penalized? Because we are bound to find among our industries a few people who will endeavour to dump a surplus in order to get ready cash or for some other reason. Is the entire industry in Canada to be penalized under this clause?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon, friend will notice the last words of article 12:

they will accord sympathetic consideration to any request that the United Kingdom government may make under this article for such exemption and will, in consultation with the United Kingdom government, determine what measures shall be taken to restore fair trading conditions.

Mr. HARRIS: Is there a compensating clause for the Canadian industry?

Mr. DUNNING: It means that both governments recognize that there is a problem During the discussions the possible case cited by my hon, friend was discussed. The fact of course is that the government of the United Kingdom and the government of Canada are not antagonists in this matter; they are not going to adopt an unreasonable attitude towards each other. We know it is a problem for which we cannot lay down strict and specific remedies in law. Here we provide a possible type of remedy which can be applied on mutual consultation as to the manner and extent it is desirable to do so under the circumstances. My hon, friend must look at article 12 in that broad spirit. First its intent is by its very presence to say to those who are guilty of something which they know is unfair that here is a piece of machinery under which they can be penalized unless they reform. Secondly, if one or two units in a large industry are guilty there is the moral effect of the possibility that the whole industry may conceivably be made to suffer; therefore the moral influence of the whole industry would we hope be brought to bear upon members guilty of unfair practices. Failing that, the two governments must consider the circumstances, and in an extreme case my hon, friend from Davenport would be quite right. If a company manufacturing radiators, among other articles, dumped radiators into Great Britain, while a return privilege to British manufacturers of radiators to dump those radiators in Canada would not be effective as a remedy, under this article the British government could say to Canada, "Well, will you, the government of Canada, consider giving us the right to dump another article which is produced by the same industry that is dumping radiators into our market?" One could not refuse at least to consider such a case if and when it arose, having regard to the basic fact which underlies this treaty, that our goods are going into their market not only free of dumping duty but free of any tariff duties whatever. It is a matter of elementary fairness, we think, to be willing to give consideration to some measures to prevent specific abuses such as were brought to our attention.

I do not claim for a moment that it is possible to put into language a clause which would be sufficiently tight to deal with this whole matter. One cannot imagine all the circumstances which might surround particular cases, but we do know that we can rely upon the good faith of the government of Great Britain, and I am sure I can say that the government of Great Britain relies upon our good faith. The two governments can cooperate to prevent those trade practices against which Great Britain has no antidumping law but against which our manufacturers are protected by means of the dumping provision in our customs law. Someone has said something about the consumers being protected. In that regard I should like to direct attention to section 17 of the customs tariff:

In the event of producers of goods taking advantage of any duty imposed under this act to increase the price of such goods to the consumer, or using any such duty to maintain prices at levels deemed by the governor in council to be higher than should prevail, having regard to general economic conditions in the country, the governor in council may reduce or remove such duty.

It is just as well to remind ourselves once in a while of the existence of sections like that in the customs tariff.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Will the minister be able in another year, we will say, to bring down instances that may be brought to his attention by the British government under this article, with the names of the firms that have committed the offence?

Mr. DUNNING: Well, at the moment I can see no reason why, one year from now, I should not give any case in which the guilty party had not reformed, so to speak. I do not know that it would be doing any good to recite that we had a difficulty with a certain organization and that during the year the difficulty was removed. I can see no need to reflect upon anyone in that fashion, but I see no objection at all to communicating to the house the names of any who persistently occasioned difficulty in this regard and who were incorrigible, if I may put it in that way.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It might be good information to have, in regard to framing tariffs in another budget or before another house, if we knew that some of these people not only did not need any tariff but were able to sell for less than other firms could manufacture the goods in another market.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Has section 17 ever been invoked, and if so when and with regard to what commodity? The last case I recall was in connection with glass.

Mr. DUNNING: One is compelled to rely upon one's memory and that of the officials who are here, and it is impossible to answer that question from memory.

Mr. DEACHMAN: It has not been used very frequently.

Mr. DUNNING: It is there.

Mr. DEACHMAN: It has not been used very often.

Mr. HARRIS: The minister recited the last five or six lines of article 12. Without using time in reading that section again, as I see it this is all onesided. We all know that the English business man is a very shrewd trader, and we are not so highly organized here as they are in Great Britain. It seems to me it is the duty of our government to look after our people. I do not say for a moment that this provision was inserted in order to give the British government something to work on, but I do say there should be a compensating clause in similar language to take care of the Canadian manufacturer or the Canadian producer.

While I am on my feet I should like to ask what specific steps the government may take to restore so called trading conditions. Will the Canadian government see that these conditions are restored promptly, or as quickly as possible? Will our government see that this clause is not made to affect an entire industry when perhaps only ten or twelve per cent of that industry is incorrigible, to use the word of the minister?

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid my hon. friend is pressing me too far when he asks me to indicate what can be done in particular cases, when the clause provides for consultation between the two governments and a maximum of cooperation. I do not think I should be pressed as far as that.

Mr. HARRIS: To come back to the other question, since there is nothing to prevent foreign goods from Belgium, Czechoslovakia and other European countries being dumped on the United Kingdom market, at a dump more than equal to the United Kingdom cost plus import duty, will the government take action against any Canadian industry under this clause if that industry seeks to market goods in the United Kingdom in competition with such foreign manufactured products? That is to say, if Czechoslovakia ships an article into the United Kingdom valued at $100, against which there is a duty of 20 per cent, giving a total cost of $120; if Canada ships the same commodity to the same market to sell at $120, and it is then proven that this amount is a little less than the selling price of that article in Canada, would that constitute a matter which should receive sympathetic consideration on the part of the Canadian government on receipt of a complaint from the United Kingdom government? Or, on the other hand, will the government keep in mind at all times the fact that the value of goods shipped from these countries, plus the duty, should not be considered to be the value of similar goods coming from Canada? In other words, will the government see to it that our market for manufactured goods in Great Britain, which now absorbs only seven per cent of our total exports, is maintained and not thrown open to European countries, as I am rather afraid may happen in this case? I put that statement on record for the benefit of our friends overseas, and in order to bring this point to the attention of the minister. Where goods of the same class are manufactured in Europe, in Great Britain and also in Canada, in days gone by this has happened: They have been dumped into the United Kingdom by the European country and consumed by the people of the United Kingdom. In turn the goods produced in the United Kingdom were shipped to Canada under the preference, and here they competed with our own goods. But getting back to the main question, I should like the minister to say a few words with regard to the possibility of the dump being applied against Canadian goods when the total duty paid value of similar goods imported from European countries might be less than the selling price in Canada of the Canadian goods.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course such a case would have to be examined in the light of the evidence bearing upon the circumstances.

Mr. HARRIS: It is just the principle I wish to discuss.

Mr. DUNNING: I am certainly not going to answer positively a hypothetical question regarding the application of this clause. I am sure the hon, member does not expect that, but simply desires to put his remarks on record.

Mr. HARRIS: If I said to the minister that this is not a hypothetical case, would be enunciate a principle?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon, friend was not asking me to enunciate a principle, but has asked me as to the treatment of a particular case, one which did not involve the naming of the guilty industry, the nature of the commodity or anything other than an assumed set of facts. I am sorry I cannot answer him on that, but I can point out to him, with respect to that part of his question relating to the importation of foreign goods into Great Britain, that on foreign goods there is a duty, as he recognizes.

Mr. HARRIS: Yes, quite.

Mr. DUNNING: But does he also recognize that the British Import Duties Advisory Committee has power to act immediately in connection with such matters?

Mr. BENNETT: Only to recommend, that is all; they have no legislative power, and never have had.

Mr. DUNNING: We will get details of that. My officers assure me—

Mr. BENNETT: That they have legislative power?

Mr. DUNNING: No, not legislative power.

Mr. HARRIS: Would the minister-

Mr. DUNNING: Will the hon. member permit me to finish? I was about to say Great Britain can raise its duties against foreign countries to prevent the kind of abuse to which the hon. member has referred. The agreement relates to goods concerning which they are continuing to allow free entry from Canada. Under no circumstances, except by agreement between the two parties to the agreement, can any duty be placed upon those articles. Great Britain says to us, "Under these circumstances surely you are willing to cooperate with us in seeing to it that your manufacturers do not dump on our market goods which they are offering below the price at which they sell similar goods in their own market."

The whole design of the clause is to give notice to industry in both countries that the governments concerned take cognizance of the problem, and that they are deliberately setting up machinery for complaint and consultation as to the cause of complaints and the merits of them, and also, under certain circumstances, for the application of a remedy which the British government suggested would be a fair one. The application of that remedy, so far as Canada is concerned, is surrounded by safeguards, and I can assure the hon. member the government will take every possible care to see that injustice is not done Canadian manufacturers. But I do not want to say a word in committee this afternoon which could be interpreted by any Canadian manufacturer as offering to him encouragement to dump in the British market, and thereby disturb proper and fair trading conditions there. I have no doubt at all that with respect to meeting foreign competition in the British market, these cases will be taken up on their merits, and that those merits will be apparent in the result.

Mr. HARRIS: I appreciate the minister's point, but I should like to follow it through to a conclusion. None of us encourages or wants to see our industry dump on the British or any other market, but I should imagine it would be a principle underlying the operation of this trade agreement, and that this government would accept it as a principle, that legislation under article 12 would not be effective against Canadian industry until such time as the United Kingdom corrected a case similar to the hypothetical one, so called by the minister, which I have brought to his attention.

Mr. BENNETT: This article says just the opposite.

Mr. HARRIS: That is to say, that the Canadian government would not feel disposed to permit the imposition of a dumping duty against Canadian goods going into the United Kingdom until such time as the United Kingdom had put her house in order with regard to the same commodities coming from Europe.

Mr. BENNETT: The agreement says the opposite to that.

Mr. HARRIS: I cannot just understand it.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, this is the most extraordinary article ever put in any agreement that has ever been before parliament. It is clear, from the explanation made by the minister, that he himself realizes that fact. Let us look at the article to find out first what the subject is, and then the predicate. It says:

The government of Canada-

Leaving out all the words in between—

To what do they agree?

. . . to exempt particular classes of United Kingdom goods from special or dumping duty under the conditions set out in the following paragraphs.

[Mr. Dunning.]

That is a definite, positive and complete obligation assumed by the Dominion of Canada under the terms of a solemn written agreement. Let us have no misunderstanding about it:

The government of Canada . . . agree to exempt particular classes of United Kingdom goods from special or dumping duty under the conditions set out in the following paragraphs.

That is our obligation. All that comes between the words "the government of Canada" and "agree" are recitals of existing conditions. The obligation is what we agree to do, and we agree—there is no halfway house about it—

. . . to exempt particular classes of United Kingdom goods from special or dumping duty—

Under the following conditions. Therefore the next inquiry is: What are the conditions? They are five or six. Number one is:

If it appears to the government of the United Kingdom that any goods enjoying entry free of duty into the United Kingdom under the provisions of Article 1 of this agreement are exported from Canada to the United Kingdom at export or selling prices lower than the fair market value for home consumption, as determined on the bases laid down in section 6 of the customs tariff of Canada.

This has nothing to do with what other countries are doing. It has nothing to do with anything else in the world except—

Mr. DUNNING: And with something else.

Mr. BENNETT: Hold on; I am talking about condition number one, under which these goods are offered for sale at other than a fair market price in Canada, under the provisions of our law. That is condition number one. Condition number two is—

Mr. DUNNING: "And"-

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister will, to use his own language, permit me to make my observations I shall be obliged.

"And," number two-

-that in consequence thereof-

Mr. DUNNING: Of the first.

Mr. BENNETT:

-in consequence thereof-

That is, in consequence of condition number one, the sale of these goods at other than a fair market price—

-the sale of similar United Kingdom goods-

That is, the sale of goods produced in the United Kingdom—

—is being prejudicially or injuriously affected—

Those are the words which are in our statute: "prejudicially or injuriously affected." If the second condition is complied with, namely, that the sale of United Kingdom goods is prejudicially or injuriously affected, which effect is to be determined, then condition number three arises whereby the United Kingdom government—

. . . may notify the government of Canada of the facts of the case and—

Condition number four-

each or any class or kind normally manufactured by the Canadian industry manufacturing the goods in question shall be exempt from special or dumping duty on importation into Canada.

Observe those four points. Let us have no misunderstanding about it. There are no conditions with respect to the conditions themselves. They are absolute, definite and certain. (1) You have the fair market price contravened; (2) you have an injurious or prejudicial effect upon United Kingdom goods, and (3) you have a request that United Kingdom goods shall take the place in the Canadian market, not somewhere else, of goods normally manufactured by Canadian industry, and shall thereupon be exempt from special or dumping duty on importation into Canada. Those are the conditions. The minister asks about our being sure of our facts, but I am saying that all that has to be done is to comply with the conditions named in this article. Then number 5, as mentioned in the first paragraph reads:

On recept of such notification and request the government of Canada will take suitable steps to correct the situation complained of and,

We are not to make inquiries. The government has bound itself and the honour of Canada to take steps to correct the situation complained of—nothing else—just that. The honour of this country has been bound to correct that situation by suitable steps, without any variation, without any condition of any kind being imposed with respect to it. I proceed to the next point:

. . . if other measures are ineffectual, will exempt United Kingdom goods,

That is the sixth condition.

special or dumping duty for such period as may prove necessary. Recognizing that in certain circumstances it may be found necessary to exempt from special or dumping duty other United Kingdom goods of a class or kind normally manufactured by the Canadian industry manufacturing the goods in question, the government of Canada agree that they will accord sympathetic consideration to any request that the United Kingdom government may make under this article for such exemption and will, in consultation with the United Kingdom government, determine what measures shall be taken to restore fair trading conditions.

That refers to the last condition only and to nothing else. I put this to the committee: Have they ever heard the like of that? If only one man sells a bankrupt stock in England, at a time when he is about to go under, at a price which contravenes the definition of fair market price so as to affect the sales of a United Kingdom manufacturer, this government may be asked to do certain things, and this government has pledged the honour of the Dominion of Canada that they will take suitable steps to correct the situation complained of.

Then they say, "if we cannot do it one way, we will do it another way." The other way is to threaten the manufacturers in Canada, because one of their number has done wrong, with the deprivation of the protection which Mr. Fielding first put upon the statute books of this country with reference to dumping duties. In other words, because one has sinned, all are to suffer. But this is only ancillary to the main thing.

The main thing is that they have pledged this country to take suitable steps to correct the situation complained of. The situation complained of is the sale in Great Britain by a Canadian of goods at less than the market price as defined by the Canadian statute so as injuriously or prejudicially to affect the British trader. I cannot conceive of any government agreeing to a proposition of that kind. I can conceive of them agreeing to the latter clauses; I can conceive of them saying that they will punish the whole if they cannot succeed in keeping one of their number from doing so and so; but that is not what is being done. What they have undertaken to do is to pledge the honour of Canada to take suitable steps to correct the situation complained of. Thereis no question of price or anything of that, sort. They simply say: "We have bound ourselves to agree to exempt particular classes of United Kingdom goods from the special or dumping duty and from the conditions set out in the foregoing paragraph." I have given those conditions. And all the casuistry in the world is not going to change

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: All the casuistry of the minister this afternoon when he talked about investigations by governments and all that sort of thing perishes. We agree to do certain things. When a complaint is presented we agree to take suitable steps to correct the situation complained of. If those steps do not succeed, then we proceed in another way. The other way is to threaten every Canadian manufacturer with the deprivation of the protection which Mr. Fielding thought he should have by means of the dumping duty. That is the position, and I should like to hear a justification of it.

Mr. DUNNING I should like to give some justification, not for the condition upon which the leader of the opposition bases his remarks—

Mr. RYAN: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUNNING: —but with respect to the condition which both governments anticipate might occur.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member does not know what I am talking about.

Mr. RYAN: I rise to a point of order; the right hon, gentleman says I do not know what he is talking about.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think so.

Mr. RYAN: I ask him to withdraw it. I must say I have a little more respect for the people of the United Kingdom than he has. He gives as an example, one bankrupt stock going into Great Britain and the English merchants thereupon rising up in arms and threatening the people of this country. If that is the attitude he takes in the matter, I am sure I have greater respect for the people of the United Kingdom than he has.

Mr. BENNETT: I think my remark has been absolutely justified. The hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Ryan) has demonstrated that he did not know what I was talking about. I do not suggest that the people of Great Britain would take up arms. Apparently he has not read the section.

Mr. RYAN: I beg to differ with the right hon, gentleman. I followed him very closely and he said the merchants of the United Kingdom would ask that certain conditions be imposed.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the government, not the merchants.

Mr. RYAN: The government would speak for the merchants.

Mr. DUNNING: It seems to me that we have got a little off the track.

Mr. BENNETT: We have not got down to the facts.

Mr. DUNNING: We are rather in the realm of remote speculation when the leader [Mr. Bennett.]

of the opposition assumes that this article will be enforced because of the dumping of a bankrupt stock of Canadian commodities in England. I am not a lawyer, but I think I understand something of the English language. Certainly I understand the intent of the British manufacturers who were negotiating with me. I would regard it as an absolute breach of faith on the part of the British government if they based any application to the government of Canada under this section upon the dumping of a bankrupt stock of Canadian goods. I am quite sure that such will not occur. I think the language itself is sufficient indication of the intention. Look at the second paragraph, which reads:

If it appears to the government of the United Kingdom that any goods enjoying entry free of duty into the United Kingdom under the provisions of article 1 of this agreement are exported from Canada to the United Kingdom at export or selling prices lower than the fair market value for home consumption, as determined on the bases laid down in section 6 of the customs tariff of Canada, and that in consequence thereof the sale of similar United Kingdom goods is being prejudicially or injuriously affected,

The plain intent being a continuing condition, a continuing industrial competition, not the dumping of a few hundredweight or a few tons of bankrupt stock of a certain article. Surely my right hon. friend knows that just one bankrupt stock was not in the minds of either government. Will he take my assurance that never in the discussions was the interpretation placed upon it that he now puts

Mr. BENNETT: I certainly would accept the hon. gentleman's statement.

Mr. DUNNING: I can assure my right hon. friend that there was no such intention on the part of the British government. It is a continually disturbing dumping condition which the British government has in mind, and which the language of this section is intended to cover. The article states that on receipt of such notification and request the government of Canada will take suitable steps. Remember, the notification and request is accompanied by a statement from the British government of the facts complained of.

Mr. BENNETT: Where does that appear?

Mr. DUNNING: The second paragraph states that they may notify the government of Canada of the facts of the case. The next paragraph states that on receipt of such notification, accompanying the facts—and the notification is sent only for the purpose of giving the facts—the government of Canada will take suitable steps to correct the situation complained of. What are the suitable steps?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know.

Mr. DUNNING: Neither do I.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite. That is my point exactly.

Mr. DUNNING: But we are prepared to ask the cooperation of Canadian industry to help us to remove one of the greatest causes for complaint we had to face in negotiating with the British government. We believe that Canadian industry generally will cooperate with us to remove the abuses which are intended to be covered by article 12 of the agreement. Not one Canadian industry has complained to me of the unfairness of article 12, and that from only one source has there been a request for information about it, I think speaks very well for the good intent of Canadian industry to cooperate with the government in this regard. We certainly do not intend to sacrifice the interests of Canadian industry, nor do we pledge the honour of Canada to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: Under this article you have pledged the honour of this country to take suitable steps to correct the situation complained of. I am familiar with this difficulty. During our term in office complaints were made about the dumping of Canadian goods on the British market, I said then, as I say now, that no one would complain if the British government passed a statute dealing with dumping.

Mr. DUNNING: That was my answer to them.

Mr. BENNETT: I will mention one item; they complained that we were dumping flour in the British market, and I dare say they told the minister the same thing.

Mr. DUNNING: There was no complaint about that particular item.

Mr. BENNETT: The then secretary for the dominions stated that he had received a formal complaint from the milling interests that we were dumping flour on the British market. I think I was able to assure him that there must have been some misunderstanding with respect to it. But that same complaint was made with respect to manufactured goods other than flour-not natural products-which were being manufactured largely in the province of Ontario. Undoubtedly these goods were being sold there lower than they were being sold here. Since the days of Mr. Gladstone-and he frequently indicated this-the British government have never been hesitant in saying that goods were sold abroad cheaper than they were sold at home, that the home consumer had to pay a higher price than the foreign buyer. The explanation was given that this was the only method of maintaining the foreign trade of Great Britain against the competition that arose from time to time.

The hon, member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) gave in a nutshell an outline of our difficulties in meeting foreign competition. Foreign goods entering Great Britain have to pay a duty while our goods have free entry. The contrast is between free entry and the payment of a duty. The British government says that we should not dump our goods in their market because we are being protected by the duties imposed against foreign producers. But under the conditions that are imposed those are not the factors to be considered. The conditions are named:

First there must be a sale of goods-not a continuing sale—at a price other than the fair market price. That is set out as condition number one. Condition number two is that this sale must injuriously or prejudicially affect the British producer. As a matter of fact, we have had this condition before us many times. The adviser of the minister who is sitting here can give him some of the details of cases which have been brought up where it was claimed that the British manufacturer had been injuriously or prejudicially affected by such sales. That is a condition which I say should not react upon the industry as a whole. Obviously this does not contemplate a remedy for a Canadian who is trying to seek a market and who is not selling his goods cheaper than the goods of Czechoslovakia, Belgium or Germany are being sold. In other words, he loses his profit even though they pay the duty. He sells his goods in England at "X" whereas his price in Canada is "X" plus. The fair market price in this country is the determining factor. When the price at which goods are sold in Great Britain is less than the fair market price in Canada, the claim can be made that such sale is injurious and prejudicial to the manufacturer in Great Britain. The Canadian replies that he is compelled to sell at this price because a cargo came in the day before from Czechoslovakia and he is meeting the price at which those goods are being offered. In other words, they have overcome the duty and are selling at a price which he has to meet. When such a case is reported to us we are hereby binding ourselves to take suitable steps to correct the situation complained of.

Mr. DUNNING: There is one alternative open to us. A while ago I hesitated to be positive with respect to the powers of the British import duties advisory committee. I have the statute before me and I should like to outline those duties.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to have them read.

Mr. DUNNING: I think they have a bearing upon the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: The president of the board of trade may ask for an inquiry.

Mr. DUNNING: I quote from the Import Duties Act, 1932, of Great Britain:

3. (1) Where it appears to the committee that an additional duty of customs ought to be charged in respect of goods of any class or description which are chargeable with the general ad valorem duty and which, in their opinion, are either articles of luxury or articles of a kind which are being produced or are likely within a reasonable time to be produced in the United Kingdom in quantities which are substantial in relation to United Kingdom consumption, the committee may recommend to the treasury that an additional duty ought to be charged on goods of that class or description at such rate as is specified in the recommendation.

(2) In deciding what recommendation, if any, to make for the purposes of this section, the committee shall have regard to the advisability in the national interest of restricting imports into the United Kingdom and the interests generally of trade and industry in the United Kingdom, including those of trades and industries which are consumers of goods as well as those of trades and industries which are producers of goods.

- (3) The treasury, after receiving a recommendation from the committee that an additional duty of customs ought to be charged on goods of any class or description, may, if they think fit so to do, and after consultation with the appropriate department, by order direct that such additional duty of customs as is specified in the order (being a duty at a rate not exceeding the rate specified in the recommendation) shall be charged on the importation into the United Kingdom of goods of all or any of the classes or description specified in the recommendation, and an additional duty so directed to be charged shall for all purposes be deemed to be chargeable under this section.
- (4) An order under this section directing an additional duty to be charged may direct that it shall be charged—

 (a) by reference to value or to weight or any othere measure of quantity;

(b) for any period or periods, whether continuous or not, or without any limite of period;(c) at different rates for different periods or parts of periods.

I do not think it is necessary to read any more to demonstrate that the treasury of Great Britain has power to deal with the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: On the contrary, the minister intimated that it was the committee that had the right, and I told him that the committee had no legislative power.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: I was meeting the point that immediate action could not be taken in Great Britain. Certainly the inference I drew from the reply of the leader of the opposition was that action could not be taken.

Mr. BENNETT: Let the minister read what I said. Because the minister is wrong is no reason why he should put wrong words into my mouth.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend was meeting my argument that the British government had machinery whereby they could meet foreign dumping by an increase in duties in a particular instance, and I am merely reading the sections of the British Import Duties Act which creates the machinery I had in mind, and which I was advised existed. With that machinery, if a case should arise under article 12 of the agreement now before the house, and if it is shown that action is necessary in order to meet competition from Czechoslovakia-I believe that was the country named, but any other country will do by way of illustration—then surely it will be expected that the government of Canada would call attention to the fact and that its representations will be given due consideration. The two governments are not antagonistic in this matter; we are not trying to get the better of each other.

Mr. HARRIS: I do not think anyone suggested that.

Mr. DUNNING: This is not a lawsuit in which one party is trying to beat the other; it is a matter of two countries recognizing that a problem does exist and that there should be, if possible, some reasonable machinery for dealing with it. I admit at once that the machinery here proposed is not and cannot be perfect, and that the obvious method is for the British government themselves to impose dumping duties. But one can scarcely expect the Canadian government to advocate that the British government should impose dumping duties on Canadian goods. That is their business. It was with a view to having some means whereby improvement could be effected that article 12 was evolved. I do not look for abuse under it, but if there is abuse I can assure my right hon. friend at once that under the provisions of a later article steps will be taken towards consultation.

Mr. BENNETT: You can consult and revise the agreement, of course.

Mr. DUNNING: Under the general consultative article we can negotiate for such adjustments as are necessary. This afternoon's discussion, I fancy, assumes a great deal of difficulty which will not in practice arise.

Mr. BENNETT: I have stated that the import duties committee had no legislative power. The book was sent for and the article read, and it sustains the view I expressed, namely, that they have power to recommend. The British treasury issues what is equivalent to our order in council; they have done so previously. To all intents and purposes it is the same as an order in council of the Canadian government.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no such power here, though.

Mr. BENNETT: We have power by order in council—

Mr. DUNNING: Not to raise duties.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh no; we have no power to do that. I am only saying that an order of the British treasury pursuant to a recommendation is the equivalent of an order in council made here upon a recommendation for any purpose. Instead of calling it an order in council as we do, they speak of it as an order of the treasury. But legislative power does not rest with and has not been delegated to the committee, and the treasury is not bound to accept a recommendation in whole though it may do so in part. I saw it in operation once.

The minister seems to think that this is not likely to become an acute question, and I only wish that we could share his confidence. But he has already intimated that it has caused much difficulty in the working of the old agreement, and in fact it has caused difficulty all the time. For it has been contended that our people were dumping goods on the British market. That contention has been made continually. It was made about flour, and I could mention other items which perhaps it would be inadvisable at the moment to do.

Mr. DUNNING: No doubt we have the same items in mind.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, no doubt. On the other hand, the British complained that we had imposed a dumping duty on certain steel products with the result that they could not sell those products in this market, the presumption being that they were offering their goods here at a lower price than they were selling them for at home and were therefore subject to the dumping regulations.

As things are now, the power of the imports duty committee to make recommendations to the treasury is not always acted upon very expeditiously, I may tell the minister. I know that in some instances they took a very long time to become operative. That is one of the difficulties I see, and my point is that we have bound ourselves to take steps to correct the situation. The rest is only ancillary to that, and if we cannot evolve any other method we may punish the whole industry in Canada because of the sins of one.

Mr. DUNNING: But we do not bind ourselves to do that. We have put ourselves in the position where, if no other suitable method is available, we may consult.

Mr. BENNETT: We have put ourselves in a difficult position. What we shall in fact have accomplished is this: We shall have provided for non-dumping sales in Canada of goods from the United Kingdom at prices which they will make, and which in their judgment will be satisfactory to them and their producers, regardless of the effect upon Canadian production. That is what it means if it becomes effective. I hope the minister is right when he says that he does not believe it will be necessary to do this, but I think it is my duty to point out that it is an extraordinary thing to say that all must suffer, all must be punished, because of the sins of one. In the extreme case which I took, the contemplated bankruptcy, the person involved was in that position where he did not care what might happen so long as he got rid of his goods; and there being no other place where he could get rid of them he shipped his cargo there. It was not a question of the bankruptcy of a single man but of an entire stock which was going to be unloaded on the British people on terms that were satisfactory to him for his purposes, but which might and probably would be prejudicial and injurious to the interests of the British producer. I must say I have never seen the same provision; but I am reassured when the minister says that he has received only one complaint.

Mr. DUNNING: It was not really a complaint but an inquiry.

Mr. BENNETT: Under the circumstances it seems to me that there is less cause for worry than I thought, and if the minister says that only one person has made inquiries with respect to the matter it seems to be fairly obvious that the difficulties which I foresee will not arise. At any rate I hope they will not.

On article 13:

The government of the United Kingdom will invite the government of the non-self-governing colonies and protectorates to continue to accord to Canada any preference which may for the time being be accorded to any other part of the British Empire:

Provided that the operation of this paragraph shall not extend to any preferences accorded by Northern Rhodesia to the Union of South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and the High Commission Territories in South Africa.

The government of Canada undertake to accord to those non-self-governing colonies, protectorates and mandated territories, to which the benefits of the British preferential tariff are at present accorded, and also to Malta, the benefit of any preferences for the time being accorded to any part of the British Empire:

Provided that nothing in this paragraph shall interfere with existing obligations or special arrangements already in force between Canada and other parts of the British Empire; and,

Provided further that the government of Canada shall not be bound to continue to accord any preferences to any colony or protectorate which, not being precluded by international obligations from according preferences, either (i) accords to Canada no preferences, or (ii) accords to some other part of the British Empire (in the case of Northern Rhodesia, excepting the Union of South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and the High Commission Territories in South Africa) preferences not accorded to Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the existing agreement, no change?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Article agreed to.

On article 14:

The government of Canada undertake to accord to goods the growth, produce or manufacture of any of the non-self-governing colonies, protectorates or mandated territories of Togoland under British mandate, the Cameroons under British mandate, the Tanganyika Territory or Palestine, treatment not less favourable than that accorded to similar goods the growth, produce or manufacture of any foreign country.

Mr. DUNNING: This gives the most favoured foreign nation treatment to the mandated territories. Mr. BENNETT: Including Palestine, for which there was a separate provision under the old agreement, which was not included in the original agreement?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Article agreed to.

On article 15:

The government of the United Kingdom will invite the governments of the colonies and protectorates shown in schedule VI appended hereto to continue in operaton the preferences accorded to Canada on the commodities and at the rates shown in that schedule, and the government of Canada will continue in operation the preferences accorded to the colonies, protectorates and mandated territories by Canada as set out in schedule VII appended hereto:

Provided that the government of Canada shall not be bound to continue to accord any preferences to any colony or protectorate which, not being precluded by international obligations from according preferences, either (i) accords to Canada no preferences, or (ii) accords to some other part of the British Empire (in the case of Northern Rhodesia, excepting the Union of South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and the High Commission Territories in South Africa) preferences not accorded to Canada; and.

Provided further that, in the event of the denunciation and termination of the Canada-West Indies Trade Agreement dated the 6th July, 1925, either government shall be at liberty, on giving at least six months' notice, to terminate the provisions of this article not earlier than the termination of that agreement.

Mr. DUNNING: Palestine never before had most favoured nation treatment.

Mr. BENNETT: It had by special order in council.

Mr. DUNNING: Only on oranges.

Mr. BENNETT: No, the question of mandated territories was considered at some length and the British government was of the opinion that we might do it, but the League of Nations took the other view, so there was no extension except with respect to oranges.

Mr. DUNNING: That was with respect to the British preference. I am speaking of most favoured foreign nation treatment.

(21) Sarawak	Condensed milk	10 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. DUNNING: Schedules VI and VII are part of article 15 and are a continuation of the old schedules in those cases. I point out that these schedules with respect to the colonies need not extend to the full term of this agreement, but they extend to the time of expiry of the West Indies agreement, in order that the West Indies and the other colonies may be considered together by Canada when that time comes, instead of having the overlapping condition which I believe was embarrassing before.

Mr. BENNETT: We were precluded from dealing with matters because of the West Indies agreement.

Mr. HARRIS: I understand we are not precluded, that the articles in the tariff await the expiration of the West Indies trade agreement. Under the present agreement, section 16, they can still deal with articles coming from the colonies.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, that is a matter of arrangement between the two parties.

Mr. HARRIS: So, as I understand it, we are not precluded from dealing with these items until the expiration of the West Indies trade agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the point. We are precluded from dealing with articles covered by the West Indies agreement until such time as that expires.

Schedule agreed to.

On article 16:

In the event of circumstances arising which in the judgment of the government of the United Kingdom or of the government of Canada, as the case may be, necessitate a variation in the terms of this agreement, the proposal to vary those terms shall be the subject of consultation between the two governments

Article agreed to.

On article 17:

The agreement will come into force on a date to be mutually agreed between the two governments. On the coming into force of the present agreement, the agreement concluded between the two governments at Ottawa on the 20th August, 1932, shall cease to have effect. Pending the coming into force of the present agreement, the two governments will apply its provisions as far as may be possible and will consult together with regard to the dates on which particular provisions of the 1932 agreements shall be deemed to have been replaced by provisions of the present agreement. The agreement will remain in force until the 20th August, 1940. Unless six months before the 20th August, 1940, notice of termination shall have been given by either government to the other, the agreement will remain in force until the expiry of six months from the date on which a notice of termination is given.

Mr. BENNETT: What provision does the government propose to make in connection with the coming into force of the agreement?

Mr. DUNNING: The British government is dealing with the matter in their Finance Act, I gather. That is our latest advice; we have no assurance as to date. But the government of Canada purposes to deal with the matter by proclamation when we get accurate information.

Mr. BENNETT: The reason I asked was in connection with the various tariff items. The resolution becomes effective at midnight on the day submitted to the house. Some it is not intended should be thus dealt with, I take it, or are they all becoming effective? Section 17 does not make that clear.

Mr. DUNNING: If my right hon. friend will refer to article 9.

Mr. BENNETT: Article 17 is the effective article in regard to coming into force.

Mr. DUNNING: By article 9 the two governments undertake that, "except as provided for in legislation already in force."

Mr. BENNETT: What is happening is this: I had sent to me a memorandum from an importer stating that all imports are now subject to revised entries since the date of the budget speech. The date of coming into force is not clearly indicated unless it is meant that they come into force by proclamation.

Mr. DUNNING: We cover that in the bill. The arrangements are indicated in the budget speech: "By arrangement with the government of the United Kingdom, which is as anxious as we are to put the tariff changes arising from the agreement into force at the earliest possible moment, it has been agreed that the provisions of article 9 and schedule E of the 1932 agreement shall cease to have effect from twelve o'clock to-night, when the provisions of articles 6, 7 and 8 and schedules 4 and 5 of the new agreement will be in effect."

Mr. BENNETT: But how can you do that?
Mr. DUNNING: Under article 16 of the old agreement, and 17 of the new, and the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: The bill founded on this. I think that is the only way it can be done, because it is a statute of the parliament of Canada, which your agreement does not change.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, section 3 of the bill, which I hope to introduce immediately, will say:

From the date of the coming into force of this act, and subject to the provisions of article 17 of the agreement, the United Kingdom Trade Agreement Act, 1932, shall be repealed.

And section 4:

The governor in council may make such orders and regulations as are deemed necessary to carry out the provisions and intent of this act and of the said agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: Should you not add a clause providing for proclamation?

Mr. DUNNING: It comes into force on proclamation.

Mr. BENNETT: I should say, "in whole or in part."

Mr. DUNNING: That is covered by the agreement itself, I think.

Mr. BENNETT: No, there is no reference to proclamation. If you provide that proclamation may bring it into force in whole or in part you then will admit the provisions of article 17.

Schedule agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it proposed to include the letters and annexes as part of the bill?

Mr. DUNNING: No. I think we should make better progress if we now reported these resolutions relating to the agreement and its schedules, and asked for leave to sit again this day with respect to other items, in order that this bill may be introduced. It is a separate measure entirely and should be dealt with in that way, I think.

Mr. BENNETT: Do I understand it is not intended in the bill to introduce a provision with respect to lead and zinc and these other matters?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: Not in the bill. It is not essential that there should be; in fact, such conditions are changeable, and therefore it would only be confusing if it was included in the bill.

Resolutions reported, read the first and second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 79, respecting a certain trade agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Customs tariff-8. Canned meats, poultry or game: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: This is the residue of the item after extracting that portion which formed a part of the trade agreement. There is no change either in wording or in rate.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff-105a. Lemon, orange, grapefruit or citron rinds, sulphured or in brine: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. DUNNING: These are rinds which are used in making candied peel and for making marmalade. Grapefruit rind is included with the other varieties.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—105b. Olives and cherries, sulphured of in brine, not bottled: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff,  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. STIRLING: I take it that the change in wording here is to conform with the report of the tariff board?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. The investigation of the situation with respect to cherries carried on by the tariff board indicates that processing of cherries in Canada is of fairly recent origin. Small quantities were processed in Ontario in 1928, but it was not until 1933 that real interest was shown. In 1936, 924,000 pounds of cherries, of which ten per cent were dark coloured cherries, were processed in British Columbia, and approximately 185,000 pounds of Niagara peninsula cherries were processed. This quantity of fresh cherries resulted in a production of 776,300 pounds of processed cherries. The change in wording is to deal with the method of packing. The previous item read "in brine" and the practice has been to import them in sulphur, so the usual difficulties occurred.

Mr. STIRLING: Can the minister go further and say whether the balance of that same recommendation will be adopted by the government?

Mr. DUNNING: The question of valuation, of course, is a matter of government policy from time to time, so I would not care to say.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister is not prepared to state whether or not the balance of the recommendation will be adopted?

Mr. DUNNING: No, not at the moment. Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—120. Anchovies, sardines, sprats or pilchards, packed in oil or otherwise, in sealed tin containers, the weight of the tin container to be included in the weight for duty:

(a) When weighing over twenty ounces and not over twenty ounces each, per box: British preferential tariff, 2½ cents; intermediate tariff,

5 cents; general tariff, 6 cents.
(b) When weighing over twelve ounces and not over twenty ounces each, per box: British preferential tariff, 2½ cents; intermediate tariff, 4 cents; general tariff, 4½ cents.

(c) When weighing over eight ounces and not over twelve ounces each, per box: British preferential tariff, 2½ cents, intermediate tariff.

preferential tariff, 2 cents; intermediate tariff, 3 cents; general tariff, 3½ cents.

(d) When weighing eight ounces each or less, per box: British preferential tariff, 1½ cents; general tariff, 1½ cents. cents; intermediate tariff, 2 cents; general tariff,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  cents.

Mr. DUNNING: This is what is left of the item after taking out what was specially dealt with in the British agreement.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—157c. Isopropyl alcohol, per gallon: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 50 cents; general tariff, $1.

Mr. BENNETT: There must have been an n.o.p. item previously, because the general rate is now $1 per gallon whereas it was 25 per cent before.

Mr. DUNNING: This is a very difficult subject; in fact, I do not think we have finished with it by imposing this tariff. As my right hon, friend indicates, formerly it came under an n.o.p. item at 25 per cent, and one of the difficulties is that it is being consumed by individuals and from time to time a great deal of difficulty is created.

Mr. BENNETT: From what is it produced?

Mr. DUNNING: It is an alcohol, but curiously enough it is derived from petroleum, and I doubt if this will be the last step we will be compelled to take with regard to it because of recent reports-some, in fact, since this item was first discussed—from the mounted police with regard to the rather terrible misuse of this new type of alcohol.

Mr. BENNETT: Then I would have suggested that the intermediate rate should be $1, because it must be perfectly clear that most of this alcohol will come from the United States, where petroleum exists in such large quantities, rather than from countries under the general tariff. Just why it is 50 cents under the intermediate tariff instead of the old 25 per cent, I do not know.

Mr. DUNNING: What we are thinking is that we may require to have excise control over the item, as similar alcohols are controlled. That, of course, would be a much more effective way of dealing with it.

Mr. BENNETT: If it is real alcohol, it falls under the statute now.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the question; and the lawyers are considering that point now. At the present time it is deemed to be a chemical. I do not know if we can persuade our legal advisers to take a different view, but certainly it is being used as alcohol and the effects it is producing are terrible.

Mr. BENNETT: Would it not be better, then, to describe it by the scientific name and say "commonly known as isopropyl alcohol" to remove any doubt about it? I have heard something of its bad effects upon humans, but I have never seen it and I did not know how it was manufactured. It does seem to me, however, that it would be well to describe it by its chemical name and then say, "otherwise known as isopropyl alcohol" so as to get away from any difficulties that might arise in administration.

Mr. DUNNING: "Isopropyl" is its name, and we are adding the word "alcohol" because that really covers the debatable part of it. There is no doubt about the term "isopropyl" being appropriate.

Mr. BENNETT: Then if the word "alcohol" is used at all I should think the excise would apply.

Mr. DUNNING: That is what we are hoping.

Mr. BENNETT The very minute you use the word "alcohol" the provision of the excise act becomes active.

Mr. DUNNING: That is why we are using it.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—160. Alcoholic perfumes and perfumed spirits, bay rum, cologne and lavender waters, lotions, hair, tooth and skin washes, and other toilet preparations containing spirits of any kind:

(a) when in bottles or flasks containing not more than four ounces each: British preferential tariff, 30 per cent; intermediate tariff, 90 per cent; general tariff, 90 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: This is giving the farmer a chance on his eyewash.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. DUNNING: I am trying to regularize my right hon. friend's system of eyewash; that is the real fact. It is a reduction in duty already effected by reason of arrangements made by the last administration.

Mr. BENNETT: This is an old item.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Mr. DUNNING: Before we reach the next item in the schedule I have an amendment I should like to have moved to customs tariff 178a.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move:

That schedule A to the customs tariff, as amended by resolution No. 2 of February 25, 1937, be further amended by striking thereout tariff item 178a, and by inserting in lieu thereof the following item, enumeration and rates of customs duties:

178a. Provided, that on the goods specified in item 178 and dutiable under part (ii) of the item, when forwarded to Canada by mail, duties may be prepaid by customs revenue stamps, under regulations by the minister, at the rate specified in the said part item, except that on each separate package weighing not more than one ounce, the duty shall be each: British preferential tariff, 1 cent; intermediate tariff, 2 cents; general tariff, 2 cents.

Mr. BENNETT: That is in addition to the new item in the budget.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no change, except in the numbering and form of this item so as to harmonize with the agreement item. But it is necessary to do it this way, in order to have it effective.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—187b. Sensitized negative film, one and one-eighth inches in width or over, for exposure in motion picture cameras: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: This is a reduction based upon a report in connection with reference 95 of the tariff board, dealing with motion picture and sound equipment. I have the report before me, if there is a disposition on the part of any hon. member to question

Mr. BENNETT: It has been tabled, has it not?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, on budget day.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—219a. Non-alcoholic preparations or chemicals, such as are used for disinfecting, dipping, spraying or fumigating, n.o.p.:

(i) when in packages not exceeding three pounds each, gross weight: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

(ii) otherwise: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: I have a motion with respect to item 219a.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move:

That tariff item 219a, as contained in resolution No. 2 of February 25, 1937, be amended in wording by striking thereout the phrase "such as are used" immediately before the phrase "for disinfecting."

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff-219e. Chloropicrin, ethylene oxide, methyl bromide, methyl formate, cyanides, or mixtures containing any of these, for use in combating destructive insects and pests: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. DUNNING: This item accords free entry from all countries to specified insecticides and fumigants. It is proposed to extend it further to include methyl bromide and methyl formate. The federal Department of Agriculture has used methyl bromide successfully in the treatment of vegetables and fruits, and the methyl formate is used as a disinfectant to kill vermin in furs. At present these two commodities would be classified at rates of free, 15 and 15 per cent. They are not made in Canada, the United States being the chief source of supply.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff-232d. Casein: British preferential tariff,  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff,  $27\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

And per pound: British preferential tariff, 2 cents; intermediate tariff, 2½ cents; general tariff, 3 cents.

Mr. BENNETT: What is casein worth, per pound?

Mr. DUNNING: I have only the import figures, showing an amount of $10,000.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—235. Liquorice fibres, whether or not dried, cleaned, cut to size, ground or sifted: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: This and the two following items constitute a rearrangement of the items covering liquorice fibres now dutiable as vegetable fibres n.o.p. The revised item in the first instance makes provision for lower rates of free; 10 per cent and 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—235a. Liquorice paste, not sweetened: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 12½ per cent; general tariff, 17½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—235b. Liquorice in rolls or sticks, not sweetened: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff,  $22\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—236b. Spinal braces and parts thereof: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. BENNETT: Does it not create some difficulty for a Canadian industry when the duties are made free all across the board?

Mr. DUNNING: The matter was examined by the customs officials to get a wording which would meet the requests received from many sources with respect to spinal braces. We cannot find whether or not spinal braces of this kind are made in Canada, but we have no trace of such production.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—237. (a) Synthetic resin moulding compositions containing synthetic resin derived from phenol and formaldehyde or their homologues or mixtures thereof, in powder or granular form: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

(b) Synthetic resin moulding compositions, n.o.p., in powder or granular form: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

(c) Synthetic resins, n.o.p., in liquid, powder, granular, or lump form; or in tubes, cylinders, strips, sheets, plates, blocks, bars, rods, angles, channels, tees or other shapes or sections, when for use in Canadian manufactures: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

(d) Laminated products of which any synthetic resin or resin-like substance is the chief Customs tariff-237. (a) Synthetic resin thetic resin or resin-like substance is the chief binding agent, in tubes, cylinders, strips, sheets, plates, blocks, bars, rods, angles, channels, tees or other shapes or sections, n.o.p.: (i) with a base of paper or of fibreboard: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

(ii) with a base of cotton fabric or other woven fabric: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: I have an amendment to the wording of 237 (c). The process of extruding is now a recognized process, and must be covered.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move:

That tariff item 237(c) as contained in resolution No. 2 of February 25, be amended by inserting the words "not further manufactured than moulded, extruded or pressed," immediately after the word "sections" in line 4 thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Mr. DUNNING: We now come to another group of plastics, also the subject matter of a tariff board report.

Customs tariff—238b. Cellulose nitrate or pyroxylin plastics, in tubes, cylinders, balls, strips, sheets, plates, blocks, bars, rods, angles, channels, tees or other shapes or sections, not further manufactured than moulded or pressed, when for use in Canadian manufactures: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—238c. Moulding compositions of cellulose acetate or other derivatives of cellulose, in powder or granular form: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—238d. Cellulose acetate in sheets not less than five one-thousandths of an inch in thickness, and in rods, bars, tubes and other shapes or sections, not further manufactured than moulded or pressed, when for use in Canadian manufactures: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move, Mr. Chairman:

That tariff item 238d as contained in resolution No. 2 of February 25, be amended by inserting the word "extruded" immediately after the word "moulded" in line 4 thereof.

Mr. DUNNING: This is simply to insert the word "extruded," as was done in the former item.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—238c. Regenerated cellulose, and cellulose acetate, transparent, in sheets, not printed, and manufactures of regenerated cellulose or of cellulose acetate, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—238f. Interlined sheet stock, composed of sheets of cellulose plastics cemented to cotton fabric: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 17½ per cent.

Item agreed to.
[Mr. Dunning.]

Customs tariff—238g. Synthetic plastic materials with a basis of casein, soybean, gelatine or starch, in tubes, cylinders, strips, sheets, plates, blocks, bars, rods, angles, channels, tees or other shapes or sections, when for use in Canadian manufactures: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. DUNNING: There is an amendment to this item, covering the same point.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move:

That tariff item 238g, as contained in resolution No. 2 of February 25, be amended by inserting the phrase, "not further manufactured than moulded, extruded or pressed, but not including casein button blanks in the rough," immediately after the word "sections" in line 4 thereof.

Mr. DUNNING: These items are of considerable importance. It is quite an advance to get them into one schedule, and have them properly classified.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—241. Litharge, which may contain up to two per cent of carbonaceous matter, and mixtures or combinations of such litharge with lead or other products of lead, litharge being the chief constituent by weight, when imported by manufacturers of electric storage batteries, for use exclusively in the manufacture of storage battery plates, in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. DUNNING: This is a rewording which involves a reduction.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—242. Dry red lead; orange mineral; antimony oxide, titanium oxide, and zinc oxide such as zinc white and lithopone; white pigments containing not less than 14 per cent by weight of titanium dioxide: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—246b. Stains and oxides, valued at not less than 20 cents per pound, for use exclusively as colouring constituents in the manufacture of vitreous enamels and pottery glazes; finely divided metals or compounds of metals, whether dry, or suspended or dissolved in a liquid, for use exclusively in the manufacture of tableware of china, porcelain or semi-porcelain: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 22½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: This is a rewording of this item.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—254. Gums, viz:—Australian, copal, damar, elemi, kaurie, mastic, sandarac, Senegal, tragacanth, gedda, and barberry; lac, crude, seed, button, stick and shell; ambergris; Pontianac; gums and blends of gums, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: I desire to move an amended wording here.

Mr. ILSLEY: I beg to move:

That item 254, as contained in resolution No. 2 of February 25, 1937, be amended by substituting for the phrase "gums and blends of gums, n.o.p." in line 4 thereof the following: "gums and blends consisting wholly or in chief part or gums, n.o.p."....

Mr. DUNNING: The amended wording is desired because of the difficulty in distinguishing precisely what are blends of gums, and to permit the entry of such blends of gums even in the event that they contain in minor part some substance necessary to the admixture which may not be chemically a gum.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—282b. Saggars, when for use in the manufacture of ceramic products: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—287. All tableware of china, porcelain, semi-porcelain or white granite, but not to include tea-pots, jugs and similar articles of the type commonly known as earthenware: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Is the wording of that quite satisfactory—"not to include tea-pots, jugs and similar articles of the type commonly known as earthenware"?

Mr. DUNNING: "Similar articles."

Mr. BENNETT: All right if the department thinks so.

Mr. DUNNING: It is already included in the agreement. I do not think we had better go any further in definition.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I should like to point out that the product referred to in this item is not made in Canada, and we are giving to the British manufacturers under this rate a very substantial exclusive market because the duty under the intermediate and general tariffs is practically prohibitive. My understanding is that within the last few years the British manufacturers have raised their prices very materially and are taking advantage of a situation which gives them practically a monopoly in this market. I believe there would be a decided improvement in the dominion at the present time both from the standpoint of revenue and price if the intermediate and general tariffs were at a lower rate.

Mr. DUNNING: The free entry of this class of tableware is not new. I think my hon, friend knows that we are continuing the free entry, and we are amending the wording to define clearly what we intend. I do not like to discuss in detail the difficulties attendant upon the handling of the intermediate tariff under present conditions. The matter is a very complex one, and nowhere are there more difficulties than with commodities such as these. The hon, member says that they are not made in Canada. It is true of a great many articles that while they may not be made in Canada, similar articles may and often do displace articles that are made in Canada; they are alternative to them. The ordinary earthenware is made here. Medicine Hat pottery is, I think, developing very substantially, and I understand that semi-porcelain tableware is made at Hamilton. The effective competition under the intermediate tariff in respect of this particular item is from such a wide range of foreign countries that I would certainly prefer to get a little quid pro quo by way of the admission of certain Canadian products to the interested countries before we undertake to reduce the intermediate duty. In fact, even over the present intermediate duty, certain types of these goods are being imported in volume.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I would point out that this is one of the substantial items in our tourist trade with the United States, where prices of china are extremely high, and tourists come here and buy large quantities to take back. If the British producer will put these articles in at a low price to give us a chance to market a large quantity and make a substantial profit on them we can do an important business with the United States; but if the British price, through restrictions imposed by the intermediate tariff, remains too high we lose a large portion of that market, which is well worth while.

Item agreed to.

Mr. DUNNING: Now item 296e, Mr. Chairman, a new item. My colleague will move it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move:

That schedule A to the Customs tariff, as amended by resolution No. 2 of February 25, 1937, be further amended by inserting therein the following item, enumeration and rates of Customs duties:

Customs duties:

296e. Magnesite, calcined, not further manufactured than ground, when imported by manufacturers of insulating materials for use exclusively in the manufacture of such insulating materials in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: The item is intended to afford a reduction in duty on certain calcined magnesite imported for use in manufacturing in Canada, the insulating material commonly known in Canada as eighty-five per cent magnesite insulation. Magnesite is produced in Canada, including the calcined magnesite, but the Canadian product is too high in calcium to permit of its use in insulating material, and there is no objection by Canadian magnesite industries to the insertion of this item.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the reduction?

Mr. DUNNING: The rates will be free, free, and 30 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Properly speaking, notice of this should have been given in the votes and proceedings.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not anticipate that we should be going on with it to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: If there are only a few items it is not important.

Mr. DUNNING: They are mostly matters of wording. This is the exception so far.

Motion agreed to.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—306d. Ornamental or decorative marble (not including chips), unicolour or variegated, of colours and/or texture not produced in Canada, rough, hammered, sawn, sand rubbed, chiselled or polished, with or without design thereon, when specially imported and used for interior work in churches and public buildings, not to include buildings operated for commercial purposes or for private gain or profit: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: This is contentious; I have had representations against it. I suppose that everyone who has had anything to do with the Finance department or with the Department of National Revenue over a number of years will remember that many applications are received for remissions of duty in connection with ornamental marble imported for church uses. We have thought it well to face the matter squarely and to do outright what has really been the administrative practice over a period of years, so that there will not be any doubt or embarrassment to trouble future ministers.

Mr. BENNETT: The important words are "not produced in Canada."

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. I should say in fairness that it is represented to me that while this class of article is not produced in Canada—

Mr. BENNETT: Something takes its place?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: This largely covers Italian marbles.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—320. Plate glass, not bevelled, in sheets or panes not exceeding seven square feet each, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister say anything more about plate glass than he has said already? I am not going to discuss the item at length, but the other day I glanced through the report, which shows that this certainly affects our furniture business and our automobile costs. I do not know what would be the effect of putting the intermediate tariff much lower—whether or not the cartel does not extend even to the United States. I am not sure on that point.

Mr. DUNNING: By this reduction, which became effective only on budget day, the duty is reduced by one-fifth. This is our first step. We shall now see what will happen under the reduced duty with respect to United States and Belgian producers. If it should happen that in spite of the reduction the present condition continues, we shall have to use the escape clause in the agreement passed this afternoon in an endeavour to settle the matter. There is no doubt at all that an abuse exists. I prefer to deal with it in this manner, but of course we have a perfect right to move under the other method at any time.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister inform the committee of the extent of the control exercised over glass production by this cartel?

Mr. DUNNING: I doubt if I could put any limits on it in its relation to plate glass and window glass. If my memory serves me right there is only one British firm. With respect to other types of glass I do not think the crystallization is at all complete, or really pressing.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the minister believe that by introducing a tariff the difficulties which are presented by a cartel controlling so much of the production can be overcome? Mr. DUNNING: I am trying that experiment. I do not know. It is one remedy that is available to us, and this reduction is the first step. A possible further step might be the utilization of the escape clause of the agreement and making plate glass free. I am not prepared to take that step until we see the results of this one. It is impossible to forecast accurately.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—321. Plate glass, not bevelled, in sheets or panes, exceeding seven square feet each, and not exceeding twenty-five square feet each, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—328a. Parts, unfinished, for the manufacture of spectacle and eyeglass frames: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 5 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: We have dropped the word "metal," because there are parts of things other than metal.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—342a. Copper alloys containing boron, for use exclusively as a flux or a deoxidizer in melting non-ferrous metals: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the reason for such a great cut in these duties?

Mr. DUNNING: This is an entirely new item. It is designed to effect free entry of copper alloys containing boron for use in the smelting of non-ferrous metals. These alloys had been dutiable previously at 15, 25 and 25 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Under n.o.p.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. It is represented that the duty on these alloys has caused an actual deterioration in the quality of the final products because of the enforced substitution of inferior fluxes and deoxidizing agents.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—348a. Sculptures in any material, in round or in relief, east or cut from models prepared in Canada and designed by sculptors domiciled therein, not to include more than two replicas or reproductions of the original model, under such regulations as the minister may prescribe: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. BENNETT: I remember making an inquiry some months ago. We were endeavouring to develop in this country the business of casting copper or bronze, and I was told that they had made great improvements of late. Of course this will end that industry. Whether it amounts to anything I do not know. Entry will be free from all countries of the world.

Mr. DUNNING: This is asked for by the sculptors' society, and we have not been able to find any successful development of casting in Canada. Certainly those interested from the artistic point of view are not satisfied with what they can get done here. It will be noticed that in the wording we have endeavoured to ensure that the permission will not be abused by saying: "cast or cut from models prepared in Canada and designed by sculptors domiciled therein, not to include more than two replicas or reproductions of the original model." We think we ought to encourage our artists to this extent.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. There is no need, though, of putting on the limitation of two.

Item agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: What are we proceeding with this evening? Really, I am not very fit.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The supplementary estimates of the present fiscal year, and one or two items on the order paper which were mentioned last night—the second reading of the bill to establish Trans-Canada. Air Lines, the New Brunswick national park bill, and the fisheries research board bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Is the Minister of Finance going on again to-night?

Mr. DUNNING: If I could be relieved tonight, I should appreciate it. If further supplementary estimates for the current year could be taken up in case of need it would relieve me, because I have had a pretty hard time.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock. Progress reported.

NEW BRUNSWICK NATIONAL PARK

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 75, respecting the establishment of a national park in the province of New Brunswick and to amend the Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island National Parks Act, 1936.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

 $31111 - 136\frac{1}{2}$

On section 2—Lands set apart as a national park in New Brunswick.

Mr. STEWART: Has the minister any more information to give regarding the probable site of the park?

Mr. CRERAR: No. When the resolution was before the house I explained the position, but perhaps my hon. friend was not in his seat on that occasion. Several sites have been reported upon. Under the parks act the New Brunswick government has to supply the federal authority with the park area free of charge. That involves on the part of New Brunswick the repossession of certain properties in almost any park area that may be selected. That matter is now before the government of the province, and I daresay they are looking into it with a view to offering a satisfactory site at the least possible expense to the province.

Mr. CHURCH: I see no objection to these provinces having parks but we are passing legislation in advance of the securing of the sites. Why cannot Ontario have equal treatment in this matter? There is a great deal of discussion in the Ontario papers about the linking up of the parks I mentioned the other night, and I suggest that the minister should have a survey made there. I do not object to there being parks in the provinces by the sea, but I submit that there should be permissive legislation under which a survey might be made in Ontario of various properties which the government owns in that province.

Mr. CRERAR: That is a matter which in due time, and I hope before long, will be considered. There are three small park areas in Ontario—quite small. Work on the park in Nova Scotia was begun last year, and so far as New Brunswick is concerned this bill is to enable the work to get under way there. I trust that before many years have passed we shall be able to give consideration to the useful suggestion made by my hon. friend.

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FISHERIES RESEARCH BOARD

PROVISION FOR REPEAL OF BIOLOGICAL BOARD ACT

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 77, to repeal the Biological Board Act and to create the Fisheries Research Board of Canada.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. STEVENS: This is not on the list given last night. I have no objection to our proceeding with it but no notice was given of it.

Mr. STIRLING: Yes, it was mentioned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was mentioned.

Mr. MICHAUD: As I explained when the resolution was before the house, this is really an amendment to the present act, although according to the title it is to repeal the Biological Board Act. The purpose is to change the name of the board, also the method of selecting the members of what is now known as the biological board. The members of the board are scientists, who work voluntarily and give their attention exclusively to the study of fish. They are asking for this legislation because they feel that the board's present title is misleading. The members are engaged exclusively in fisheries research; they do not investigate any other biological subject. Moreover, it has been found difficult to maintain the membership of the board under the provisions of section 4 of the act as it stands.

Under the amended act the members will be selected by the minister; there is no change in that regard, but the method of selecting them is changed to some extent. The new act directs from what class of people the members shall be selected, namely, two from the department, two representing the fishing industry on the Atlantic coast, and two representing the fishing industry on the Pacific coast, and nine scientists selected from a list including nominations which may be made by any Canadian university. Under the act as it stands to-day the minister selects seven members and then designates universities which recommend to him one member each. Some of the universities have not given any attention to fisheries research lately, and in fact did not recommend any of their staff to this board. So this new act is asked for by the board as at present constituted to facilitate their work. There is no additional expense involved, and it is to satisfy them that it is presented.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I have been interested in following the work of fish research for many years. Nothing struck me more than the character of the research work being carried on in New Zealand in respect to fish and the results obtained there through scientific research.

This bill is commendable in all respects except for the question whether this work should not be done by the National Research Council, or under its direction. I do not know, for I have not had the opportunity to be advised, what possibility there is of the National Research Council devoting some time and effort to research work with respect to the fisheries of the country. When the council came into being I thought that it would be an aid to the federal power in connection with every branch of research work which it was desired to carry on. I have been disappointed in some cases, but I still think there should be provision for aid being given by the council through research on scientific lines to every branch of the federal power. I am sure that it might be done. It was one of the many things that one would like to have had opportunity to deal with, but the pressure of other things made it impossible.

I do suggest to the minister that on this board of fifteen there should be a representative of the inland fisheries. There is provision for two from the Atlantic coast and two from the Pacific coast, but our great inland fisheries are left unrepresented. The great lakes supply large quantities of valuable fish. Undoubtedly the supply of fish shipped from Manitoba to the United States has been substantial. In the northern part of Alberta large quantities of fish are obtained and shipped to the American market in a frozen condition. It seems to me that should warrant some representation being given-I do not say necessarily two members-to the great inland fresh water fisheries of the country. In the lakes and rivers in the north, of the three prairie provinces, and in the great lakes we have extremely valuable fish resources, which should be developed and conserved. I think that question might be worthy of the minister's attention. I have no strong views on it but it did occur to me as desirable. It was not indicated how many members there are of the biological board.

Mr. STIRLING: Seven.

Mr. BENNETT: Just why it should be increased from seven to fifteen is a little difficult to understand, but as they are serving without remuneration other than their expenses I suppose it is desirable to have as many scientists as possible. But one might well be selected to represent the inland fisheries.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Before the minister replies, might I offer another suggestion, namely that there should be representation on the board of the organized fishermen? The industry itself is to have representation.

Some of us have been listening to-day to Mr. Butler of the international labour organization and have been reminded that it consists of representatives of the government, of industry and of labour. It seems to me we might go so far in this legislation as to provide not merely for departmental officials, scientists and representatives of the industry, but also for a representative of organized labour. Surely in this matter the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour would agree. I do not want to offer an amendment, but I submit that such a provision ought to be included.

Mr. MALCOLM McLEAN (Melfort): I should like to add a word to the plea of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) on behalf of our inland fisheries. He referred to the western provinces, but I think he left out the one in which I happen to be most interested, Saskatchewan. Saskatchewan has great fisheries. The landlocked salmon of that country, or lake trout, is a very valuable fish, and something should be done to protect and propagate them if at all possible. Also in Saskatchewan particularly, and perhaps running over into Manitoba there is the last great reserve of sturgeon of which we know in this country. Occasionally specimens of sturgeon are caught elsewhere, but I think the commercial fishing of sturgeon is pretty much a thing of the past. There are sturgeon however, in the waters of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and if the fisheries research board devoted some attention to it they might discover a way by which the sturgeon supply could be much increased. I understand that up to the present the difficulty in connection with the artificial hatching of these fish has not been overcome. Sturgeon is one of the most valuable fish in the world, and I should like to see some scientific representative on the board who would devote particular attention to the fresh water fish problem, particularly in connection with landlocked salmon and sturgeon.

Mr. J. J KINLEY (Queens-Lunenburg): I am glad to see that this bill provides for representation for the practical end of the fishing industry. Science is one thing, but practical application is another. In order to succeed, the two must work together. The county I have the honour to represent has been for years a great centre for deep sea fishing in Canada. With regard to research we find out some things for ourselves and copy some things from people in other countries who are carrying on the same industry. It is true of all industry that a great deal can be learned by observation and looking around to see what other people are doing.

The practical end of this matter should be kept in mind, and the research board should have a strong commercial section who will seek to apply what is learned and make it of real benefit to the fishermen of this country.

There are two divisions of the fishing industry, strange as it may seem, there is the branch upon the sea, and that upon the land. The fishery upon the sea is national in its importance; the branch upon the land deals with the preparation of the fish, the care of the fisherman's family, and the social conditions surrounding the fishing industry, which are largely a matter of provincial concern. Therefore in the formation of this board I think it would be well for the dominion government to work with the provincial governments, especially those of the maritime provinces, and to consider their recommendations in regard to personnel.

I think the change proposed is commendable, and I am glad that provision is being made for the payment of the men who will do this work. I do not like boards that are supposed to work for nothing; usually they are worth what you pay them. In this instance provision is made whereby the minister will have some control over those who are working for the government, which is I think most desirable. Properly constituted and given the right instructions this board, I believe, will be of some benefit to the fishermen of Canada.

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): I do not know of anything that is deserving of more attention by the research council and the biological stations than our fisheries. One thing is sure, and that is that unless some means are developed to take care of the situation, perhaps by artificial propagation, some of our greatest fisheries assets will be completely wiped out. When we see what has been accomplished in other lines, we have reason to believe that if this industry is given the attention it deserves similar results might be obtained. I hope the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) will see to it that the energies of this board are devoted to a very earnest endeavour to assist the fishing industry, and that artificial propagation is carried out wherever possible.

In the county which I have the honour to represent we have a biological station which has done valuable work, and no doubt the results that have been accomplished at that station in the special work they have undertaken can be achieved also in other lines. There was a time when there were lobster hatcheries all over the maritime provinces.

For some reason or other these hatcheries have been discontinued; perhaps the department felt they were not a success. But even if they were not successful in the past I do not see why this board could not develop some way of making the hatcheries a success in the future. I do hope that they will be re-established so that the lobster fisheries, which provide the best cash return for the fishermen of the maritimes, may not be completely wiped out.

Mr. VITAL MALLETTE (Jacques-Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to remind the house of the extensive fisheries situated in the province of Quebec. In addition to the great commercial fisheries of Gaspé and the Magdalen islands, of the Saguenay and of the whole north shore of the St. Lawrence, the northern part of Quebec possesses numerous lakes, which swarm with fish and are the delight of the tourist. I must not fail to mention the St. Lawrence river and lake St. Louis, on the shores of which lies the county which I have the honour to represent in this house. As regards the preservation of our fisheries, I understand that the fishermen of these regions do not take sufficient interest in the matter. The federal government and the government of Quebec should co-operate with a view to finding a way to attain this end. I am of opinion that the province of Quebec should be represented on this Fisheries Research Board. I am certain that there are in Quebec men who possess all the qualifications required to fill these positions.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, in the Windsor Star of January 9 of this year I read a very interesting article, as follows:

Rail Cars Keep Meat, Fish Fresh
New System, Devised in Canada, Being Studied by Lines
Tests Described
Colder, More Constant Refrigeration
Gained at Less Cost

Ottawa, Jan. 9.—A railway refrigerator car which provides colder, more constant and more evenly distributed refrigeration at less expense and labour than the type at present in use on Canadian railways, has recently been developed by the Biological Board of Canada, in cooperation with the National Research Council, and is now receiving the attention of the two railways, it was learned here yesterday.

After reading that article I felt rather curious about the matter and communicated with the proper officials of the Department of Fisheries in order to ascertain whether or not the National Research Council had anything to do with this marvellous improvement. The letter I received in reply was dated January 25, and reads:

Experiments in the new method of railway car refrigeration have been carried on now for some years by our Prince Rupert station staff. These experiments were conducted entirely by the staff. Mr. Young, who has been in charge of the work, was able to interest the Canadian Pacific Railway Company sufficiently to design a car with his advice for the purpose of making a test shipment of fish or meat from Vancouver to Montreal. This took place last summer and Mr. Young accompanied the car across the continent.

While the new system was found to be highly successful and much more economical than the old method, curiously enough it was found, owing to the even distribution of the cold throughout the car, that when the door was opened in Montreal the rushing in of air from the outside caused condensation inside the car. With the old method of refrigeration in the railway cars the cold was not properly distributed throughout the car, consequently, in the centre of the car the temperature was higher than that at either end of the car so that when the door of the car was opened no condensation took place as the outside air struck the comparatively warm air in the centre of the car. This problem could have been easily solved by our station staff by the development of a dry air tunnel but it was known that the National Research Council had worked out an arrangement for the unloading of cooled fruits. It is proposed that this arrangement be applied in the transportation of fish and meat. To that small extent, therefore, the National Research Council comes into the picture of the new refrigerator system for railway cars.

This letter was very polite. With regard to the remarks of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), it seems to me that the experiments that have been carried on by the National Research Council since General McNaughton became president have been most crazy. I should like to give the house a picture of what has been done since he has been in charge. The most stupid experiments have been carried on, leading to nothing, and that was why I asked for the economic value in dollars and cents of each of those experiments. I have before me a return of the house in that connection, and I am sure hon. members will laugh when I read it. They will see the futility of the sort of work that has been carried on, at the cost of a million dollars, since McNaughton went there in June or July of 1935. It has been a complete waste of money. The experiments carried on by Doctor J. A. Anderson include:

Demonstrated that barley proteins form one complex, not two distinct fractions as formerly supposed. June, 1935, to March, 1936.

This is very good for the unemployed.

Developed new method for measuring diastatic activity of malt, more rapid and precise than older methods. March, 1936, to January, 1937.

This is to help the brewers and the drinkers of beer.

Developed new method for experimental malting with a precision equal to that of chemical analysis. April, 1936, to February, 1937.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would direct the attention of the hon. member to the fact that we are discussing a bill the subject matter of which is not in my judgment relative to what he is now saying. The hon. gentleman is talking about the National Research Council, with which this bill is not very much concerned. I think his remarks should be confined to the merits of the bill before the house.

Mr. POULIOT: I agree with you, sir, and I would not have mentioned this, had it not been for the suggestion of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) that both boards be merged and that the work be done by the National Research Council. I have attempted to show the futility of the work of the National Research Council, and in doing so have praised the bill sponsored by the minister. The body he is creating will be much more valuable than the National Research Council has been. One of the men to be appointed to the board has found a very excellent way of transporting fish, something which had not been done previously by the council. To show the absurdity of the proposition of the right hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Bennett) I should like to prove that at great cost to the country, since McNaughton has been there, the National Research Council has been doing nothing useful. Until the right hon, gentleman withdraws his argument, I am sure what I am about to say will be in order.

Doctor W. H. Cook, a famous scientist, has made some excellent discoveries. He has collaborated in the design of the first fully automatic carbon dioxide refrigeration plant to be built. That took place between June, 1935, and January, 1936. He designed and built the apparatus for maintaining humidity in cold storage rooms, and that took place between June and December of 1936. Between September and November, 1935, he determined the maximum storage life of chilled poultry. I shall refer to only one more of his undertakings, and then shall refrain from making further references.

Information discloses that he determined conditions for defrosting and dechilling cold storage poultry, without formation of condensate. He determined the cause and method of preventing freezer burn in cold storage poultry. That work was done between April and October, 1936. Then he designed the apparatus and method for collecting and measuring tainting substances given off in minute amounts by food products in storage. That was accomplished between September, 1936, and February, 1937.

What is the utility of that work? Here we have a gathering of sensible and practical men, with the probable exception of one—and I leave it to the committee to decide who he is. Probably it is the one who made the suggestion that the National Research Council was of some use. Hon. members have heard about the subjects on which these men are working. It is absurd, that is all.

Then we find something of great importance to the country, the work done in connection with soya beans. This is of the utmost importance—a work which since June or July, 1935, has been costing a million dollars. Doctor H. D. Chataway has been working since September and October of 1936 on a scientific discovery concerning the relationship between the moisture content of soya beans and the relative humidity of the air. If you have not had enough of that, I have.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1-Short title.

Mr. STIRLING: Will the minister give details on the explanatory note which states that the board shall be smaller, despite the fact that section 4 says it will be double the size?

Mr. MICHAUD: If the hon, member would read section 4 of the act and compare it with section 4 of this bill he will find that the present membership is seven, plus members from the universities. For some time the board had as many as twenty members. The present membership, I understand, is fifteen, because some of the university representatives, through death, resignation or other causes have not been acting. Under the new bill the membership will be limited to fifteen.

Mr. STIRLING: The supplementary members are limited to nine, whereas before there could be any number.

Mr. MICHAUD: That is correct.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3-Board created.

Mr. BARBER: Section 3 states that the appointment of the board shall be under the control of the minister. In the past the biological board has been under the control of the minister, has it not?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. BARBER: We were hoping that the board of scientists would be more directly under the department.

Mr. MICHAUD: That has always been so.

Mr. BARBER: It was our hope at the coast that not only would there be scientists, but that there should be some practical men acting under the minister. Apparently appointments will be limited to scientists with some representatives of the industry.

Mr. MICHAUD: It is difficult to agree on a definition of the term "practical man." I believe some discretionary power is given the minister to appoint so-called practical men as representatives of the industry. Those representatives might well be described as practical men. The object of the legislation is to enable the minister to exercise discretion in the appointment of practical men, men who have knowledge of the work and have been connected with it.

Section agreed to.

On section 4-Constitution of board.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister indicate how the four representatives of the fishing industry on the two coasts are to be appointed?

Mr. MICHAUD: Under the act they would be appointed by the minister, selected from among those in the industry who give particular attention to research work. On both coasts there are parts of the industry which have their own research laboratories and officials who are willing to use their knowledge, experience and talents. That is why we would like to appoint them to the board and use them to full advantage.

Mr. STIRLING: Then the minister is referring to scientific men on each coast connected with the industry, and not to canners or fishermen. He has in mind men employed in scientific work, if I understand him correctly.

Mr. MICHAUD: Scientific or semi-scientific. We would want men who are giving enough attention to the scientific side of the industry to be useful on such a board. This would not be a marketing or business board, but simply a board of men getting together and corresponding with each other during the year, and carrying on research work in connection with fish and other marine life.

Mr. KINLEY: I think this board should be allied as closely as possible to the active end of the fishing industry. Most of the firms located on the Atlantic coast carry on research work of their own. They have to in order to keep in touch with conditions and with progress. I think we should use these practical men and that preference should be given to their appointment on this board.

Mr. BARBER: Mr. Chairman, this section states that two of the members of this board are to be from the department, two are to represent the fishery industry on the Atlantic coast, and two are to represent the industry on the Pacific coast. I would imagine that such membership would consist of one man representing the canneries and one representing the fishermen. There are men in the department who have been carrying on practical work of this kind for the last fifteen or twenty years and I think some of them should be included in the membership of the board. Last year I protested against leaving fish culture entirely in the hands of scientists. It is all right to have scientists on this board, but they should be working along with practical men. I had hoped now that a reorganization is going to take place that some of these practical men would be made members of the board.

Mr. REID: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister would be well advised to consider the practical end of this matter. In the past few years there has been a tendency on the Pacific coast to exert pressure on behalf of the sport fishermen, and an effort has been made to make it appear that that type of fishing is just as important as commercial fishing. The biological board spent considerable time and effort in the development of sport fishing, and an effort may be made to exert pressure upon this new board to have more attention paid to sport fishing than to the commercial end. The minister would be well advised to consider the appointment of practical men to the board. There is a great deal to be said in favour of sport fishing, but I think we all agree that commercial fishing should be the first consideration of the department.

Mr. MICHAUD: The department has not overlooked the advantage of using some of these so-called practical men. There is on the present board a man who is connected with the canneries, also one who is connected with the fishing industry on the Pacific coast. Both of them are what would be termed practical men.

In connection with sport fishing I might say that part of the duties of the board will be to study the possibilities of developing sport fishing throughout the country with a view to attracting more tourists, and a special committee of the board is looking into this matter.

So far as geographical representation is concerned, I think all parts of Canada are represented. The present chairman is a professor from Manitoba university, and it is quite natural that considerable study be given to inland fisheries. Another member is on the faculty of the Saskatchewan university. While there are only two members from the department, the other officials are at the disposal of the board.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On section 9-No salaries.

Mr. BARBER: Will the same policy be carried out in connection with this board of paying a per diem allowance and travelling expenses?

Mr. MICHAUD: Exactly.

Mr. TOLMIE: Could the minister outline what the board is doing to encourage sport fishing?

Mr. MICHAUD: The department is trying to encourage sport fishing as much as possible. As is known to hon, members representing the eastern provinces, for some time Doctor A. G. Huntsman has been endeavouring to revive some of the sport fishing areas which have been exhausted. In the central provinces we are cooperating with the railways and with the provincial authorities in an attempt to develop fishing areas. On the Pacific coast there is a commission, made up of members of the department and the provincial government, studying the possibilities of coordinating the work of the two governments with a view to bringing down the cost by the elimination of duplication. An effort is being made to develop fishing areas in British Columbia which up to the present time have not received much attention because of the dual responsibility. An interim report was forwarded to the department a few weeks ago. I have not read it in detail, but from what I have read I believe there is hope for an early agreement between the two governments which will bring about the further development of sport fishing areas on the Pacific coast.

Mr. TOLMIE: Are any hatcheries being used for the development of sport fish? Are restrictions placed upon certain areas in order to increase the supply of fish?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. KINLEY: The conservation and also the development of sports fishing in the province of Nova Scotia is an important matter, and the fish and game societies think that parliament is not doing very much. problem especially in my riding, where there are two splendid salmon rivers, is one of water control. At times in the year the rivers get into such a condition that the fish cannot make their way up the stream because of water shortage, and by providing a water control at the head of the lakes this condition could be very much improved. In the days when the lumber companies were operating they controlled the water, but now that they are gone, although they do not operate on some of the rivers, they have left their dams there, and these dams could very well be repaired and kept in shape; it would not cost a great amount of money.

The south coast of Nova Scotia is only an overnight journey from the city of Boston, and it is a favourite place of resort for sportsmen and tourists in May and June; in fact, the salmon are running in the Medway river now. This is a great source of revenue to the people along the shore. We believe that our tourist trade is merely in its infancy and that it can be developed to a considerable extent. The last government did start a rearing pond at Harmony, in the north section of my county, and this government finished it—a creditable act on their part. I understand that now it is to be put in operation, and I hope that we shall have another rearing pond on the Nine Mile lake, which is at the head of Lahave river. We might have a dam at Sherbrooke lake in order to control the flow of water into the Lahave river, which is rapidly becoming one of the best rivers in Nova Scotia for salmon fishing: it is a large river, the largest in the province. I am a little disappointed that action was not taken sooner for the development of this river. I recognize there are some difficulties about flowing rights on the lake, and that that is under provincial control, but I understand from the fish and game association that the lumber company, Hollingworth and Whitney Company of Boston and New York-who control the river, will give a transfer of their flowing rights, and if the dam is put in, the water will never be higher than it was at the time they were operating this river.

May I impress on the minister that the fish and game society of Nova Scotia are commendably active at the present time, in the interests of the province and of tourist traffic, that salmon fishing is a great asset to our country, and that the department should spend some money in order that the fish may be conserved, the industry further developed, and our tourist trade from the American cities largely increased.

[Mr. Kinley.]

Mr. MICHAUD: I am sure that the hon. member and others representing constituencies where there are fishing possibilities realize the difficulties which confront any body, especially a government, in reviving sport fishing, particularly in Nova Scotia. What is involved is practically the artificial reconstruction of sports fishing. On account of the deforestation of the country there is a great difference between the spring and the midsummer flow in the river, and by reason of the industrialization of that section of the country several water-powers are built on practically all the rivers of importance, and it is difficult for the fish to ascend the rivers to spawn when they cannot find enough water at midsummer. We practically have to rebuild artificially the water facilities for the fish to come up and spawn in order to maintain a sufficient quantity for those who wish to avail themselves of the possibilities. I assure the hon, member that the department is doing everything practicable and possible to develop sports fisheries in the province of Nova Scotia.

SUPPLY

FURTHER SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1937

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Administration of justice—Yukon Territory— Miscellaneous expenditure, including salaries and allowances of court officers, et cetera further amount required, $2,300.

Mr. BENNETT: What is this for?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just for what is set forth. The Minister of Justice intimated to me a moment ago that this small additional amount was necessary to cover expenditures already incurred.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Transport—chargeable to income—marine service—life saving services, including rewards for saving life—further amount required, $3,500.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to find out what is the policy of the department in this matter of life saving. For many years all the money that parliament has voted in respect of this service has been for the sea; we have forgotten all about our magnificent inland waterways. Toronto city council, for instance, has had to provide about $100,000 of the ratepayers' money for what is properly a federal government service. There are about seventy-five men in the life saving service at Muskoka, Georgian bay, lake Huron, lake Ontario and all over the great lakes doing what is federal work.

I might call attention to the disaster of the Sand Merchant at Cleveland. The eviddence showed that this vessel was altogether inadequately equipped in case of accident, and we know very well what happened. In the fall there is one disaster after another, but nothing is done to safeguard our sailors. When there is any danger, all they can do is blow their sirens and trust to luck; they have to depend on some American lifesaving station. Nationalism is the great toast in this country. Well, I say, let us do something to show that we are as a nation prepared to take care of our seamen. We cannot go on any longer like this. Eighteen fine Canadian citizens were drowned off Cleveland in that disaster on December 9 last year, but what does this department Have these people no rights?

We provide ample protection for all workers on land; there is legislation for the safety of men employed on the railways and in other forms of transportation. If they can be provided for in this way, surely the time has come when Canadian sailors on the great lakes should be given some measure of protection. Why should we leave them to the mercy of any American life-saving agency? There should be an advanced policy for the safety of those navigating the great lakes. Are we to wait until next fall when another boat goes down before taking action? There was a disaster near Muskoka and another at Owen Sound and there was not a single life-saving station in the neighbourhood. All the money this department is spending for the protection of our sailors is some $2,000, and the vote is mostly for the maritimes. I suppose the government will wait until another ship sinks before doing something, and in the meantime they will assure us that the matter is receiving consideration.

There are the heroes of peace as well as the heroes of war. These sailors on the great lakes are heroes, but when they are drowned their families find themselves on the street. Their wives get no pensions. Ontario contributes over 40 per cent of the revenues of the country. Why should not that province be given some consideration?

Mr. HOWE: The government maintains three life-saving stations on the great lakes, one at Pelee island, one at Southampton and one at Port Stanley. As regards the Sand Merchant, it was a Canadian boat operating in American waters at the time of the disaster, and it was a few miles off Cleveland. Obviously no Canadian life-saving station could possibly have been aware that she was in distress. An investigation was held and it was found that the boat had complied with all the regulations under the shipping act, but the question was raised whether the design was suitable, and thereupon a board was set up to look into the matter. That board includes the best marine architect we could find and we expect shortly a report on the Sand Merchant.

Mr. CHURCH: The investigation the minister talks about was only a whitewash. Had it been carried on by a jury the verdict would have been different. What I want to know is what steps are being taken to prevent these terrible disasters on the great lakes. A number of ships might have been lost and some 2,500 passengers drowned in accidents, but the government does nothing. The only life-saving station we have is the little one off Pelee island, which was obtained in a by-election. You may hold any number of investigations you like, but what is the good of all that when these poor sailors have gone to the bottom and their families are on the street, all because of the failure of this department to provide adequate life-saving facilities such as they have on the American side?

Look at the life-saving stations they have at Detroit, Toledo, Buffalo and other places. But here we are talking about a few dollars when the lives of our seamen are at stake. This department has been passing the buck ever since I have been in parliament. The hon. member for Parkdale knows how necessary it is for the government to provide lifesaving stations on the great lakes. Toronto has spent over $25,000,000 in connection with the harbour and the city has to maintain the life-saving station. Why? Because the government got out of it when the harbour board was formed. When the board was formed in 1913 I came to see Mr. Hazen and all he gave us then was an old lifeboat with oars, which would take three or four hours to go about ten miles. This department seems to be catching the sleeping sickness that has afflicted some of the others; it is passing from department to department; and in the meantime the sailors are waiting for something to be done.

I know the minister is a busy man and his duties are onerous, and many of them he is discharging very ably. But in this particular branch of the activities of his department I certainly do not think that he is doing anything. We are sure to have a few reports, however, and in due course they will be thrown into the waste paper basket. But we do not want reports; we want a really efficient life-saving system. At present we are depending almost entirely on the American lifesaving stations in case of disaster. There is provision in the act for the prosecution of those who fail to equip ships properly. Have you ever heard of any prosecution under that act? The statute says that the Minister of Marine shall prosecute, but no prosecution ever takes place. This paltry vote will not go very far, but it will provide a few medals to be handed around. That is all that we shall get out of it. So far as the passengers are concerned, they can go to the bottom of the lake and the Lord be with them.

I look around the chamber to-night and see hon, members on both sides representing lake ports, hon. members for the Hurons, the Greys, Muskoka, Parry Sound; why do we not hear from them? Owen Sound last fall had a disaster, and steamboat captains and others went to their last end. Shipping men were down here the other day, master and mates and engineers, and presented a memorandum to the government, asking for increased protection on the great lakes. These men want life saving stations, not medals; they want proper aids to navigation, as the American stations have. We have many members representing shipping centres on the lakes, but every time this item is up they are sitting silent. By next fall when there is bad weather the same conditions will recur on the great lakes from Hamilton to the head of the lakes, and all you are doing here is nothing. You are going to pass a vote to give a few medals, some of which will go to the department and to people who know nothing whatever about life saving.

There should be a large vote and survey made. The country should not depend on the taxpayers of the city of Toronto to spend $100,000 for life saving for which the dominion government is responsible. The Toronto life saving crew have been sent out all over the great lakes; almost every day calls come from municipalities all over Ontario as far north as Parry Sound and North Bay, and as far west as Windsor, and to the waters of Muskoka—and the Toronto taxpayer pays. And all we do here is pass an item for a few medals. If a man is at the bottom of the lake a medal will not do him much good. We are years behind the times.

Mr. SPENCE: I wish to endorse what the last speaker has just said. We in Toronto think that the dominion government should contribute some part of the money we spend [Mr. Church.]

for the life saving service there, because it costs a lot. Last summer there was a wreck on lake Simcoe and our life saving crew were called up there to rescue some people out of the lake, and before they left there was another accident at Owen Sound. A boat went down and several lives were lost. The Toronto life saving crew and divers were taken there and did all the work.

It is costing Toronto a lot of money to do life saving all over the country. The life saving crew are called to Muskoka, Parry Sound, Owen Sound, lake Simcoe around Jackson's Point, and all through there. It is very unfair. This item is only $2,500 but I presume there is another somewhere. The vote should be increased. We should have proper protection on the great lakes, and some contribution should be made to Toronto for the work they have done in saving lives all over the lakes within a hundred miles of Toronto. Is any more money provided besides this $2,500?

Mr. HOWE: The vote in the main estimates was $44,300; this is to make up the deficiency. I am bound to say that the money spent by the Toronto harbour commission is collected from the shipping on the great lakes and is spent for life saving in the same service. It is hardly a contribution from the city of Toronto.

Mr. SPENCE: The life saving crew there is paid by the harbour board and the city of Toronto.

Mr. FURNISS: The hon. member for Broadview issued something of a challenge to the member for Muskoka in this matter. I happen to represent that riding. I do not think there are many lives lost on the Muskoka lakes or lake Simcoe that could be saved by life saving equipment. There was an accident on the Muskoka lakes last summer in which a speed boat cut a row boat in two, and a woman lost her life. A jury was called to hold an inquest, but they did not find the body and no inquest was held.

Mr. SPENCE: That is only one instance; I could mention many.

Mr. FURNISS: That is one case where lives could not have been saved by life saving equipment. It has been suggested to me that at these summer resorts where a lot of motor boats are used, some speed regulations should be put into effect so that the boats will not race around at thirty or forty miles an hour, endangering small craft. I pass the suggestion on to the minister for what it is worth. A small fee might be charged to every motor boat owner, a nominal sum per foot for the running length of his boat, and that money used to pay a man for looking after the traffic on the lakes. It has been suggested that every operator of a motor boat should pass an examination, the same as the driver of a motor car. In view of this and other accidents on Muskoka lakes due to excessive speed of motor boats, I think that suggestion is worthy of consideration.

Mr. CHURCH: I can produce the log book of the Toronto harbour life saving station. Sitting opposite me is the hon. member for Spadina. Only last summer he had to phone the life saving station on a Sunday. Several people were in the water, some of whom drowned, and he got the lifeboat sent to lake Simcoe. Let me tell the hon. member who represents Muskoka that there was an accident there last summer in which a woman had her head cut off, and the thing was whitewashed by the authorities. No investigation whatever was made, and the body has not been found to this day. The log book would show repeated calls during recent years from the Muskoka lakes from Toronto residents who have their summer cottages in the hon. member's constituency, and there is no life saving station there at all. I am not speaking as a party man. I want to see lives saved not only in Muskoka but elsewhere, Georgian bay and lake Simcoe are dangerous waters in the summer. All the Toronto members know that almost every week-end Captain Lang and his crew receive calls from all these localities. I have not the official list here but last year the calls for this station were the most numerous in the history of the city; the crew go all over the lakes doing life saving. What has the hon, gentleman to say about the sinking of the Sand Merchant and the disaster at Owen Sound? Were no lives lost there? Of course there were; eighteen in one of them. And we are going to pass an item for a few medals! I hope the hon. member for Muskoka will get one of them, because I am unaware of anything he has done since he has been in the house either in the interests of our national parks, life saving or anything else. I can tell him that his constituents want him to wake up and see that something is done, that some funds are provided by the government for the Magnetawan district, the Lake of Bays, and other places where the Toronto crew has had to go during the past three or four years. The taxpayers of Toronto are getting tired of paying the bills for Muskoka and these other districts where there are no life saving stations and no aids to navigation at all.

Mr. FURNISS: I wish it understood that I am not crying down life saving apparatus, but I do not think many of the lives lost in these lakes, to which hon, gentlemen have referred, could have been saved by means of life saving apparatus. The accident to which the hon, gentleman referred in particular occurred in the Muskoka lakes. They dragged for the body for a week without being able to locate it, and it never came to the surface. I understand that when a body is mutilated it does not rise to the surface as it would otherwise; the gases escape, and it remains below the surface. No inquest was held and no report was made about the accident, which I understand occurred away out in the lake. I do not live near the Muskoka lakes; I live near lake Simcoe, and the only complaint I heard last summer was in connection with the harbour at Beaverton. That complaint had to do with the excessive rate at which speed boats entered the harbour, endangering small craft and also the lives of those in bathing. I am not disparaging the need for life saving equipment, but I do say that very few of the lives that have been lost on the lakes could have been saved even through the use of life saving equipment.

Mr. CHURCH: The hon, gentleman only has to look at his local newspapers to see the disasters that have occurred in his own district. I am surprised that a gentleman representing such a constituency does not know more about the need for these appliances and aids to navigation.

Mr. KINLEY: Is it not a fact that the Sand Merchant was lost off the city of Cleveland, in United States waters?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; I said that.

Mr. KINLEY: Then that is the answer. For half an hour the hon, gentleman has criticized the Canadian life saving system in regard to this boat which was lost while under the protection of the United States life saving system which he has been commending.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPENCE: I am rising just because hon. gentlemen opposite are calling carried. I want it understood that I am not saying the Toronto life saving crew could save lives in lake Muskoka or Georgian bay, but we have such splendid equipment that when authorities in other parts of the country cannot find the bodies of those who have drowned, our crew goes up with grappling irons, diving equipment, and so forth and does the work.

Mr. FACTOR: I should like to say just one word in reference to this matter. The incident which has been referred to by the hon, member for Broadview happened about a hundred and fifty yards in front of my cottage at lake Simcoe. Five people were drowned. Of course there was no adequate equipment available to locate the bodies, and I had to call the Toronto life saving crew to come up. They made that fifty mile trip, and inside of three-quarters of an hour found all five bodies in the lake.

I think hon, gentlemen who have spoken, though they mean well, are not placing the responsibility in the proper quarter. The provision of life saving apparatus should be a municipal responsibility, I suggest. For instance, in the lake Simcoe district I think the summer residents should get together and provide proper, modern life saving equipment, and I would say the same of the Muskoka district. I cannot see how the federal government could possibly provide sufficient equipment to take care of all the summer resorts on all the lakes throughout Canada.

Mr. CHURCH: Under the British North America Act all matters having to do with inland waterways, lights, buoys, aids to navigation and so on are a federal responsibility. No part of this vote is spent on the great lakes. Right in lake Muskoka, which is a navigable water, there are rocks and obstructions twice the height of this desk which are not lighted at night. I passed some of them last summer in a boat travelling forty to fortyfive miles an hour. We might have been thrown right into the water if we had struck one of these huge rocks, which are found right through the lakes. They are unlighted and uncharted, and I say to the hon. gentleman that the taxpayers of Toronto are getting sick and tired of spending $100,000 for life saving service all over the great lakes. This item means nothing; not a dollar of it is applied to the great lakes. The only thing the government does is to strike off a few medals, while some municipal authority has to shoulder the burden to the extent of $100,000.

Item agreed to.

Railway Service—Maritime Freight Rates Act—Additional amount, in excess of the sum of $1,740,000 already appropriated, to authorize and provide for the payment from time to time during the fiscal year 1936-37 to the Canadian National Railway Company of the difference (estimated by the auditors of the said company and certified by the said auditors to the Minister of Transport as and when required by the said minister) occurring on account of the application of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, between the tariff tolls and the normal tolls (upon the same basis as set out in section 9 of the said act with respect to companies therein referred to) on all traffic moved during the year 1936, under the tariffs approved, on the eastern lines (as referred to in section 1 of the said act) of the Canadian National Railways, $76,014.46.

Mr. STEWART: I suppose there is no explanation to be given in addition to what is contained in the footnote? That note is as full as it can be?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct. It is a statutory vote.

Item agreed to. .

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions— British Columbia and China and/or Australia—further amount required, $27,750. Prince Edward Island and Boston—further amount required, $10,000.

Mr. STEWART: I should like some information as to the total amount expended for the British Columbia-China service, for which this amount of $27,750 is a supplementary item, and I should like the same information with respect to the Prince Edward Island-Boston service, for which this further amount of $10,000 is required. What was the first amount in each case, and what is the reason for the additional amount required?

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Chairman, this vote includes two items, one for the service between British Columbia and China and the other for the service between Prince Edward Island and Boston. My hon friend has raised a question with respect to each of these items.

With regard to the service between British Columbia and China, the main estimates contained a vote of $118,800 for this service for the current year. This was sufficient to pay the contract subsidy of $4,950 per trip for twenty-four trips. It is estimated that by the end of March of this year twenty-nine trips will have been made; that is to say, there will be five additional trips, to the cost of which must be added $3,000 paid under the terms of the contract as additional subsidy for three calls made at Prince Rupert during the present fiscal year.

Doubtless my hon, friend wishes to know the reason for the additional trips. The reason lies in the fact that a strike of longshoremen in Canadian Pacific coast ports resulted in the diversion to British Columbia of a very considerable number of orders for lumber. The additional trips provided for here were arranged in order to permit those shipments arising from that exceptional demand to be made. That covers the additional amount as far as that service is concerned.

I come now to the service between Prince Edward Island and Boston. In the main estimates there was an amount of $10,000 for this service, and it was the hope of the department that it would be able to secure the service for this subsidy. When tenders were called it was not found possible to have the service done for the amount indicated, and accordingly provision had to be made to have the service performed. May I add that this is a service of considerable importance to Prince Edward Island, as there is quite a traffic in farm products between Prince Edward Island and the New England states.

Mr. STEWART: I suppose the lowest tenderer got the contract.

Mr. ROGERS: My information is that no one tendered for the service at the amount made available in the original estimates. Subsequently the Farnorth Steamship Company offered to do it for $20,000, and the contract was made with them at that rate. During the previous year the service was subsidized over a somewhat similar route. The subsidy was then $35,000 for twelve trips. The service carried passengers as well as freight.

Mr. HEAPS: How many trips were made this year?

Mr. ROGERS: Nine.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister attributed the extra subsidy to the strike on the United States Pacific coast. I should like to know if that strike did not put a great deal of business in the way of these lines. If so, would it not be reasonable to expect that the extra trips were more profitable than they would have been under normal circumstances? In addition to getting the more profitable business brought about by the strike, they received the government subsidy. That does not seem reasonable to me.

Mr. ROGERS: I am not in a position to say whether or not the business was more profitable. I take it that the strike on the Pacific coast would not have materially affected the delivery price of lumber in China or Australia. As a matter of fact it did increase the demand for the British Columbia product, and in order to sell their lumber the exporters made application for an additional number of trips. Provision was made accordingly.

Mr. MacINNIS: Will the company furnish a balance sheet showing its business turnover, so that the department may know whether it has made a profit or a loss on the year's business.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is the department subsidizing a line of ships from the west coast of British Columbia to South Africa?

Mr. ROGERS: I believe one company is so subsidized. I hesitate to speak on the point without having the information before me. I believe the point will arise in connection with the main estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would the minister answer my question as to the statement to be made by companies with respect to business done by them.

Mr. ROGERS: I have nothing before me which indicates precisely the procedure followed when a subsidy is made for a particular service. I take it that a company applying for a subsidy would have to make a case, in other words, establish the need for such subsidy to permit the service to be given. In the short time I have been acting Minister of Trade and Commerce I have had occasion to observe that these matters are gone into with considerable care. For example, in some cases where steamship companies have applied for increased subsidies, and it has been found that as a matter of fact they have been carrying on profitably, the proposed increase has not been granted. With the information before me I am not able to say whether in this particular instance the company furnished a statement of its profits or losses on the trips actually made.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Department of Mines and Resources—Surveys and Engineering Branch—Hydrographic and tidal and current surveys, and to provide for the operation, maintenance and repair of hydrographic steamers—Further amount required, $12,000.

Mr. MITCHELL: Will the minister please explain the item?

Mr. CRERAR: The hydrographic survey has a boat operating in the gulf of the St. Lawrence and on the east coast. Unfortunately last summer it ran on a rock. As the hon, member is no doubt aware, the hydrographic survey charts the coast. In carrying out this work the boat was damaged and had to be sent to drydock for repairs and this amount represents the expenditure so incurred. As it could not be foreseen when the estimates were voted a year ago, provision has to be made now.

Item agreed to.

Indian Affairs Branch—To provide for expenses connected with the administration of Indian Affairs—Further amount required, $140,000.

Mr. STIRLING: A week or two ago I drew the minister's attention to the plea of the provincial secretary of British Columbia, who has administration of the health of the province. He made an effort to persuade the minister to give some assistance in connection with the fighting of tuberculosis among British Columbia Indians. I understood the minister to say that in these supplementaries he hoped to provide money sufficient to enable him to give the desired assistance. Has he obtained that money?

Mr. CRERAR: I believe the hon. member is under a misapprehension. These supplementaries represent additional amounts required for the fiscal year ending in a few days, on March 31, 1937. In other words, the estimates submitted to the house a year ago were short these amounts. I hope to have in other supplementary estimates an item covering tuberculosis among the Indians.

Mr. STEWART: Would the minister explain the item? This seems a large amount for increases in administration only.

Mr. CRERAR: The amount is due almost entirely to the increased cost of medical care among the Indians in the past year. In several parts of Canada there were epidemics of influenza, measles and the like, and in our estimates submitted a year ago we pared to too fine a point the expenditures for medical services. If my memory serves me correctly, I believe $40,000 was required for feed and fodder for Indians in the southern part of Alberta. For the information of hon. members, in the dried-out areas there are several reserves with a substantial amount of stock for which it was necessary to provide feed.

Mr. TOLMIE: I have received a similar communication from the government of British Columbia with regard to the prevalence of tuberculosis among the Indians of the province. Do I understand the minister to say there will be another opportunity to discuss this matter?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Might I ask under this item a question with reference to the disaster among the Indians at IIe a la Crosse, Saskatchewan, where recently about 46 to 50 have died of some disease. Last year approximately $120,000 was spent for the medical care of the Indians in Saskatchewan. That is a very high cost. I have made calculations in connection with the cost of medical care of [Mr. Crear.]

Indians on many of our reserves, and shall speak more fully on the matter later on. I was wondering what had been done in connection with the tremendous loss of life at Ile à la Crosse. If these deaths had occurred in a white community, the whole country would have been aroused, but when 46 Indians die, there is not much fuss made about it.

Mr. CRERAR: I believe my hon. friend secured his information from newspaper reports. The case he cites has not been brought to my attention. There has been what amounts almost to an epidemic of influenza and measles on certain reservations. This was not foreseen when we passed our estimates a year ago, and these supplementaries are to make up the deficiency in the expenditures made during the fiscal year which will end in a few days. I shall inquire into the circumstances of the case referred to by my hon. friend, and probably be in a position to give him some information when the estimates of the Indian department are before the committee.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Has the minister before him the number of temporary employees who have been made permanent during the year? Perhaps this would account for some of the increase in this item.

Mr. CRERAR: This item does not relate to that at all.

Mr. BARBER: As has been intimated, we shall have an opportunity to discuss this question of tuberculosis at a later date. I am glad the minister has intimated that provision is being made in the supplementary estimates to take care of—

Mr. CRERAR: I hope to have provision made in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. BARBER: At two residential schools in British Columbia there have been established what are known as preventoria to combat tuberculosis. Both of these schools are carrying on excellent work, but I have been advised that the department has decided to discontinue the grant of forty cents per pupil which is made to each school. The one at Coqualeetza has been supported to the extent of ten, but fifteen patients have been taken care of. Those in charge are very anxious that this work should be continued because it is practically the only work being carried on by the department in connection with tuberculosis. These people are taking care of Indians under the age of twenty years, the dangerous age for tuberculosis. I should like the minister to bear this in mind when he is preparing his supplementary estimates.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—Expenses of litigated matters—Department of Justice—further amount required, $23,000.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) desired to discuss certain matters under this item, but perhaps an opportunity will be afforded when the main items are being considered.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the Minister of Justice left the chamber a moment or two ago he said to me he anticipated that this question would be raised. He informed me that there is an item in the main estimates which would permit such a discussion.

Item agreed to.

To provide for payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council and for the cost of administration thereof—further amount required, $300,000.

Mr. LAWSON: What is the reason for the additional amount required under this item? There is not much information in the item itself.

Mr. CRERAR: The committee will recall that a year ago we provided $1,950,000 in the estimates for subventions for the movement of coal from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to Quebec and Ontario, and from Alberta and Saskatchewan to the western boundary of Ontario and even into the province. Because of the expansion in the movement of coal this amount has been found to be insufficient. The estimates of a year ago were kept down to the level of what was required in the previous fiscal year.

Mr. MITCHELL: Is there any intention this year to change the rate of these subventions, either upward or downward?

Mr. CRERAR: The subvention principle will apply this year as in other years, but this does not mean that the rate may not vary slightly. If my hon, friend has looked into the matter, he will know that the basis upon which these subventions are paid is the cost of producing coal in the United States. If the cost of producing goes up in the United States and the Canadian cost remains stationary, then the subvention rate would be lower. If the Canadian cost increases to the same degree as the American cost, then the subvention rate would remain practically the same.

Mr. MITCHELL: The basic rate is not being changed?

Mr. CRERAR: The principle upon which the rates are based remains the same.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not quite on that basis; there is another basis.

Mr. HARTIGAN: All through this session of parliament we have been having a jamboree of aids to agriculture in Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and the other provinces. I am not speaking in a declamatory manner about what other people may want, but I should like to refer to the statement of the minister to the effect that these subventions are based upon the cost of producing the coal. We from the east sympathize deeply with the afflicted portion of our population in the western provinces, and I want that understood before I start. As far as landing coal in Ontario is concerned, our greatest competitors are the English. I cannot quote his exact words, but the Minister of Agriculture stood up in this chamber the other evening and stated that not only must wheat be sold at the prices set by the wheat board, but all other agricultural products would be governed by the same rule. I do not differ with the minister as far as that is concerned.

Mr. SPENCE: You are very agreeable.

Mr. HARTIGAN: I am agreeable.

Mr. SPENCE: I suppose you want something for yourself.

Mr. HARTIGAN: Is agriculture to be the predominating industry in the dominion of Canada? If it is to be the policy of the dominion government to market agricultural products, then what about our other primary producers? Why should special treatment be given to the agricultural industry and not to our mining, our forestry and our fisheries industries, which are all concerned with important basic products?

I have said, and I repeat, that I am agreeable to marketing arrangements for agriculture, but why exclude the products of our forests, our mines and our fisheries? If we are to have regard to one section of this dominion, and say that we will market their products for them, set a certain minimum price, and ensure that no imported agricultural products or florists' supplies or anything of the kind shall be admitted unless they conform to certain price standards, that is all right, perhaps; but to continue that sort of thing will drive the rest of us into some sort of combination in which the eastern provinces may join up with the industrial sections of the country. If that state of things should occur, the west will have another thought coming; for while the value of agricultural products may be estimated at some $700,000,000 last year, our manufactured products amounted to $1,400,000, without counting the production of the eastern provinces in mining and other industries. So what should they be entitled to? There must be a halt called somewhere. Some hon. members talk about a paltry two million dollars subvention for the coal movement of eastern Canada, while we sit here and vote two and a quarter million dollars for what? A superannuation allowance for civil servants of Canada. And where does ninetenths of the proceeds of that superannuation allowance go to? The city of Ottawa. The exact amount, I think, was $2,080,000. But we do not discuss it.

The raft of stuff which goes on down here under the Minister of Agriculture, I tell you is something terrific. We must not imagine that Canada is producing supermen. How can we inculcate in the workers in our fisheries, in our agricultural districts of the eastern provinces, and in the lumbering industries a real love of country, struggling under the difficulties they now have to face when they realize that all this money is being voted out in other directions? We are not opposed to grants to the drought-stricken districts of the west; we want them to be treated in a fair manner; but if things continue the way they are going at present, our people will be driven into an alignment altogether different from what the eastern portion of Canada has ever had before.

There are many other points I wish to refer to which I shall bring up under different items at a later date. All through the session, it seems to me, the east has been practically ignored. I will name two instances now. Recently I gave an interview to a man who I thought was an honoured member of the press gallery-and I have always had a very high respect for the press gallery. He violated the best ethics of journalistic procedure, with the aid of an old and amnesic editor; and the kind of man who can write an article such as appeared the other day, discussing things that had never arisen in this house, typifies the sort of thing which is causing unrest to-day.

I have referred to only a few matters which need our attention. At another time, and perhaps in another place, I shall go further.

Item agreed to.

Battlefields Memorials—further amount required, $10,000.

Mr. STEWART: Has the minister any explanation of where these expenditures were made?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This is in connection with the unveiling of the Vimy memorial in July of last year. When the [Mr. Hartigan.]

main estimates were being considered in committee I gave the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) full information as to details. There is an actual deficit of $8,839.98, and some accounts yet to come in which will amount to $1,161.02. This provides for that amount.

Item agreed to.

Royal Commission on Anthracite Coal—further amount required, $8,500.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister tell us what is the total cost of this commission? I am bound to say that the report is rather disappointing, inasmuch as it did not deal with the importations of anthracite to Nova Scotia from Germany; and several cargoes of German anthracite, sometimes spoken of by vendors as Welsh anthracite,, came in to Nova Scotia to which no adequate reference, in my judgment, was made. It seems to me that the commissioner was largely concerned with one firm and its dealings. I should like to know what the total cost was.

Mr. ROGERS: I have not before me the terms of reference of the royal commission which inquired into the importation of anthracite coal. I do have before me a statement of the expenses, which I take it will cover the particular question asked by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). The amount voted in the supplementary estimates, 1936-37, was $15,000. As the inquiry proceeded it was necessary to obtain two additional amounts from unforeseen expenses, one of $5,000, and another of $3,500. The present vote is for the replacing of those two amounts taken from unforeseen expenses, a total of $8,500, and the original $15,000, making $23,500 the cost of the commission.

Mr. HARTIGAN: The whole trouble is that coal is made an article of barter in Canada; that is about the size of it. You can bring it in from any country. It is about the easiest thing in the world to import in exchange for Canadian products. But if anybody suggests applying the same principle to wheat he is told: No, you cannot barter with wheat; it must get the highest price in the country. But coal: Sure, trade it and bring it in; we will trade in it with any country. That shows the state the coal trade of this country is in. Our actual and potential coal supplies in Alberta, Nova Scotia, and British Columbia are sufficient to provide all Canada with coal at any time. What would happen under conditions of national emergency, when our supplies of coal from foreign countries would be cut off? A few nights ago an hon. member-I admit he was on this side of the house-asked why did not Ontario put a duty on coal? Let them pay the duty, he said; at any rate that is what he meant. It is true of wheat and any other commodity that when it reaches a price beyond which it is not profitable to buy, people will purchase wherever they can get it cheaper, and that holds good of coal. But if the long looked for conflict of the nations should take place, if a general conflagation should occur-I do not believe it will-what then of our coal situation? We should have to depend on British Columbia, Alberta and Nova Scotia coal: the shoe then would be on the other foot. Under present conditions it is all very well to bring in supplies from the very country which perhaps might be our enemy in another war-though I do not believe there will be another war. But the trouble is that our policy does not make provision for the absorption of the total Canadian coal production, leaving us free to get any further requirements from outside sources as we need them.

Mr. KINLEY: Is there not provision in the tariff whereby manufacturers in the central provinces get a drawback of 99 per cent of the duty paid on coal which is used for manufacturing purposes?

Mr. CRERAR: If the hon, member is addressing the question to me, this is not my item.

Mr. BENNETT: Under certain conditions.

Mr. KINLEY: Yes, under certain conditions—if the manufactured commodities are exported. In that case there is a 99 per cent drawback of the duty on American coal. I do not believe there is any comparable treatment so far as Nova Scotia coal is concerned.

Mr. HARTIGAN: That is the fly in the ointment. The hon, member knows that there is a qualification and that the coal must be used for metallurgical purposes. But why should that be? Why should we not try to be independent so far as coal is concerned? There is no doubt about it that in the event of war we occupy a strategic position, with the north pole on one side, the Atlantic on the east, the Pacific on the west, and a friendly nation to the south, and we should be foolish if we did not take advantage of our geographical position. Every hon. member will agree with that. Any nation that attempted to violate our neutrality would immediately involve the British Empire in the conflict; and if England did not defend our neutrality, so much the worse for England, not for Canada.

Mr. KINLEY: I was simply trying to help my hon. friend. In my opinion the drawback on coal justifies subventions for the maritime provinces.

Mr. BARBER: Could the minister break down the $23,500 to show salaries and other expenses?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not the detail of that expenditure, but if my hon. friend is anxious to have the information I am content to let the item stand.

Mr. BARBER: No, the minister can give it to me some other time.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be glad to.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not usual to replace money, taken from unforeseen expenditures, by a vote of this kind.

Mr. ROGERS: Possibly I was at fault in using that language. Actually the money was taken from unforeseen contingencies to meet the additional cost of the commission while the inquiry was proceeding.

Mr. BENNETT: This money is to reimburse unforeseen expenditures which have been accounted for by a return made at the opening of parliament.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. The notation I have is that the $8,500 is required to replace the amount obtained from the vote for unforeseen expenses.

Mr. BENNETT: The point is that the minister has no right to "replace" it. Unforeseen expenses mean just such expenses as were paid from that vote for this particular purpose; therefore the payment was regularly made, and the report submitted to the house so indicated. This cannot be to replace that money.

Mr. ROGERS: In view of the right hon. gentleman's observation perhaps it would be better to allow the item to stand. The information before me is that this $8,500 is for the purpose of replacing the amount taken from unforeseen expenses, and if that is not correct it ought to be rectified.

Mr. BENNETT: It would be only a matter of properly wording the item, because it is not proper to replace the money if it is validly and legally taken from unforeseen.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We might pass the item on the understanding that the wording will be looked into.

Item agreed to.

Post Office—Outside service—Salaries and allowances—further amount required, $185,000.

Mr. LENNARD: What is meant by outside service?

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Postmaster General): This is part of vote 275 which amounted to something over $16,000,000. The payment for March for these various services includes city offices, railway mail service, and district offices; and the shortage occurs almost wholly in city offices where postal clerks and letter carriers are engaged on continuous service Saturday afternoons and holidays. This is the $185,000 to which I referred, when the coming year's estimates were before the house, as being necessary to pay the extra help for the Christmas rush and to make up overtime up to March 31.

Mr. LENNARD: The member for Broadview this afternoon asked whether the letter carriers would be obliged to make deliveries on Good Friday. Can the minister answer that question now?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The statement I gave when we were considering the main estimates is the best I can do in that regard. It must depend on the requirements of the service. The order for providing service on holidays stands, and that service will be given on Good Friday unless, in the opinion of the postmaster, the mail can be cleared without the full service. But the mail must be cleared. There is and has been for years discretion in the postmaster as to just how much service shall be required.

Mr. LENNARD: I understand that the purpose of this innovation was to create positions for additional employees in order to relieve the unemployment situation.

Mr. MacNICOL: Only the Liberal unemployed.

Mr. LENNARD: I do not know about that, but if the department wishes to carry on and employ more men I suggest that it can do so in a far better way by improving the service in the outlying districts. I know of certain outlying districts in Hamilton, Ontario, where they get one delivery a day, and then the mail is two or three days old before they get it. It is very unsatisfactory. Then take Mount Hamilton in Hamilton. They have no parcel delivery, merely because, I believe, the regulation provides that if there is no delivery within a quarter mile of the last house on the outskirts of the city proper, that service is not allowed. It is ridiculous.

There is a great section of the city of Hamilton on the mountain deprived of parcel delivery service. I think the minister would do well to take this matter up and see if something can be done.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): That occurs in practically every city, and must occur until the houses are numbered and the population becomes more thickly settled. But it is receiving attention.

Mr. LENNARD: But they have no parcel delivery service there. The houses are numbered. This is something the government of the day should remedy. It is a hardship. These people are paying taxes and they should have this service.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): What is being done here is a step in the direction of improving the postal service throughout the whole of Canada. We are every day receiving requests, many more than it is possible to grant, but we are endeavouring as far as can be done within a reasonable increase of expenditure to give to the cities and towns, and the rural parts as well, the best service that can be given.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): What proportion of this $185,000 is being expended in the city of Toronto in temporary employment of Christmas rush men?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I do not think I can give those figures accurately. I can get it for my hon. friend if he wishes it. The total amount expended on the Christmas rush depends upon the amount of extra work to be taken care of in the different cities. In Toronto for the December delivery the amount of mail to be handled was $153,289 more for that one month than it was for the same month two years ago. Perhaps that will give my hon. friend an idea of how it is divided.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Very good, but a short time ago I inquired for the names and addresses of the temporary employees in Toronto for the Christmas rush. I again appealed for those names about a week ago, and the minister promised them within a few days. Probably some of this money is for the cost of compiling this data for me; is it?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): No, that has to be done by us.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Well, I hope the minister will have the names and addresses for me soon.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I am sorry, but I sent the full list to my hon, friend this afternoon. If he did not get it I regret it.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Thank you very much.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the present status of the results of the examinations held on November 21 for additional employees for the postal service? I recollect that when the minister's estimates were up before, he told us he had put on a considerable number of temporary employees at Christmas, and that they would probably remain on until I think about the end of March.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Until the new eligible list is prepared. That was expected about the first of April.

Item agreed to.

Transport—Chargeable to capital—River St. Lawrence ship channel dredging—(a) to provide for contract dredging in the St. Lawrence river and Montreal harbour—further amount required, $117,563.21.

Mr. STEWART: Could the minister explain this item, how it arises and whether there has been any change in the matter?

Mr. HOWE: This is the final estimate on two old contracts. The larger is a contract dated May 30, 1930, for dredging between the upper end of Longueuil shoals, Montreal harbour, and Ste. Croix, $112,343.21. The work was completed just at the close of navigation in 1935. As my hon. friend knows, on a large contract of this kind before the final estimate is passed it is necessary to make a complete survey of the area and check up all the progress work. That work was completed last season, and this item is put in to cover it.

The other is a similar situation having to do with Barre à Boulard at the lower end of lake St. Peter. That amount is $5,220. It is the final estimate on a contract that was placed in 1934.

Mr. TOLMIE: What is the depth to which the St. Lawrence is dredged?

Mr. HOWE: We now have a 35 foot channel from the harbour bridge in Montreal to the sea at the 1934 datum, which is practically the lowest water we have had in the river for some years. That channel is completed except for certain work in Montreal harbour which is still continuing.

Mr. TOLMIE: How high up is it affected by tides?

Mr. HOWE: My impression is that it is nearly to Montreal harbour.

Mr. STEWART: About Three Rivers.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has this work or similar work to be done every year at the same sections of the river and harbour?

Mr. HOWE: No, this is work which was completed in 1935. This is just measuring it up.

Mr. MacNICOL: The reason I ask is that we passed an item earlier in the session for approximately $2,000,000, I believe, which had I think the same title.

Mr. HOWE: The item for $2,000,000 was for the current season's dredging. Practically all that dredging is in Montreal harbour, and the purpose is to bring Montreal harbour to the 35 foot depth which is maintained in the channel below Montreal.

Mr. MacNICOL: As an engineer, is the minister satisfied that the proper way to keep the depth of the channel in the St. Lawrence below Montreal to what it should be is continually to dredge the channel? A number of engineers are beginning to think that some other system should be adopted. It is the opinion of some that the deeper the channel is made, the faster the water runs away, and that it will require constant effort to keep the channel open.

Mr. HOWE: The work being done both under this and the $2,000,000 item is a program started some years ago, and it is practically being finished. An interdepartmental report has been prepared and will be available very shortly giving a program for the future, and I am sure my hon. friend will find some information there.

Item agreed to.

Naval Service—To provide for the maintenance of the ships and establishments of the naval service, including the Royal Canadian Navy, the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve and the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve.—further amount required, $2,201,000

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This item was held over to meet the convenience of the right hon. leader of the opposition. Would it be convenient for him to proceed with it now?

Mr. BENNETT: I remember that the minister said it would be quite satisfactory if it stood until to-morrow, and in view of the time of night perhaps that would be better.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Very well. Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Labour—Grants in Aid—Amount required to provide for monthly grants in aid to the provinces—further amount required, $2,929,773.97.

Mr. HARRIS: Mr. Chairman, this item reads: "Labour—Grants in aid—Amount required to provide for monthly grants in aid to the provinces—further amount required, $2,929,773.97." I presume this amount is intended to cover projects designed to give a very considerable amount of work, and that the minister has such projects under consideration.

I should like to take a few minutes to present to the minister and the committee a project which will do a great deal to relieve unemployment in an area comprising the eastern part of the city of Toronto, and more particularly the townships of Scarborough and East York. The hon. member for East York (Mr. McGregor) has brought this matter to the attention of the Minister of Labour on several occasions and also has been good enough to attend with me before the railway commission in this connection.

The township of Scarborough has made application for an order of the board directing a grade separation where the Canadian National railway intersects Victoria Park avenue, which avenue is the town line between the corporations of Scarborough, Toronto and East York, in the county of York.

Under the system of grants in aid it is possible, as I view it, with the approval of the province concerned, to earmark or direct for certain specific work a portion of the grants in aid provided. The plea that is made by the municipalities to the province, and in turn to the minister and the Department of Labour, is for approval of grants in aid being used to pay relief labour in order to carry out certain projects in certain areas. I have reference to judgment No. 26765152 of the board of railway commissioners. It is now pending further consideration, waiting for the township of Scarborough, which made the original application, and the township of East York to come to some agreement with the dominion and provincial governments with regard to obtaining a reasonable contribution for relief purposes. As soon as that contribution is arranged, the railway commission say that the application will be further considered. That establishes the basis.

Now I want to poin' out the importance of the elimination of this particular hazard. It has been before the municipal bodies and the board of railway commissioners ever since I have been in the House of Commons and for perhaps ten years previous, but to indicate the seriousness of the matter I will go back to 1927, at which time there was a very serious accident at this crossing in which several lives were lost. At that time the township of Scarborough applied to the board for an order, pointing out that traffic on this avenue at this intersection is heavy, that seven or eight tracks have to be crossed, and that the protection afforded at that time was nil. In 1927 a census showed that in a twentyfour hour period 2,069 horse-drawn vehicles, motor cars, motor trucks, bicycles and pedestrians crossed at that point. Another census taken in 1930 showed that this number had risen to 3.346, while in 1936 it had increased to 5,058. In the last census it was shown that during the day time the average number of crossings was 300 per hour, while at night the average was 100 per hour.

With these figures in mind, Mr. Chairman, I think the Minister of Labour and the committee will be seized of the importance of affording protection at this crossing, and I think the present time is very opportune for that action to be taken. The railway commissioners still have the matter under consideration, and are just waiting for one point to be cleared up. The townships of Scarborough and East York are not able to put up their portion of the cost, and the board is waiting for the townships to secure a reasonable contribution for relief purposes, at which time the application will be further considered.

In 1930, when the previous application was made, the commissioners concluded that it was a very dangerous crossing and ordered that a watchman with a stop sign be placed there, the cost to be distributed as follows: the railway company, 55 per cent; the city of Toronto, 15 per cent; the township of East York, 15 per cent, and the township of Scarborough, 15 per cent.

A subway was not ordered at that time because the Canadian National had under consideration moving the yards at Danforth station some four or five miles further east, and in fact had made a large expenditure clearing some two or three hundred acres preparing for the removal of those yards. The railway company said that probably this would eliminate the need for so many tracks at this point. But this project has been abandoned, and no doubt the tracks will remain where they are for many years to come. It is quite possible that the engineers may point out that only six of these tracks are really necessary. At the same time I should like to say that there is a very heavy grade on the railway track itself at this point. The order of 1930 directed that westbound trains must slow down to ten miles an hour at this point, but because of the heavy grade it is almost impossible for those in charge of the trains to slow down to that speed. I venture the opinion that every second train passes that crossing at double the speed of ten miles an hour.

In addition, Mr. Chairman, since 1930 there has been established just to the north of this railway crossing a market place known as York market, which serves some fifty thousand people living to the south of the railway crossing, many of whom go to that market two days a week. To the south of the crossing there is a very large collegiate institute, one of the best in the city of Toronto, with a school population of over two thousand. A large number of pupils from the school have occasion to cross the same level crossing.

I should like to put on record that the nearest crossing in that thickly populated portion of Toronto, and the suburban districts of Scarborough and East York, is an overhead bridge about half a mile to the west, and another small subway about half a mile to the east. Victoria Park avenue is the natural outlet for a heavy stream of traffic. It is the outlet for a population close to 100,000 people who may wish to get to No. 2 highway, one of the main highways leading in and out of the city of Toronto, and also for those who wish to get to highway No. 7, which serves the people who choose that route. The increase in traffic has naturally increased the hazard, and to such an extent that the Minister of Railways and Canals of a previous government viewed the crossing. The railway commissioners and their engineers have been there, and their considered judgment is that even with the stop sign throughout the day and the man with a lantern at night, something more is needed. The watchman on duty at the time of the board's visit stated there had been no serious accident since 1927. But the opinion was given by the railway board:

That the frequency of train movements over the crossing, together with the heavy traffic upon the highway, constituted a dangerous condition which might prove to be beyond the power of a single watchman to overcome.

The condition is there.

The possibility of eliminating the hazard is now available in view of the vote before us. When the order comes down there will probably be a request for 15 per cent from Scarborough and 15 per cent from East York, making a total contribution of 30 per cent. Even though these two townships are not in a position to finance their portion of the work, I do not know of any other townships in the dominion which, in view of the great numbers of unemployed on relief rolls, could put a relief expenditure to better use.

The cost of the steel work in connection with the elimination of the crossing is estimated at $44,000; the concrete work at $70,000; the sewers at $20,000; the pavements at $6,000; the work in connection with tracks and trestles while building is in progress $42,000; sidewalks $3,000; replacing telephone wires $5,000; making a total cost of $250,000.

A great deal of the concrete work which would be done to the extent of $70,000 could be done by relief labour. In like manner, much of the excavating, to cost $20,000, could be done by relief labour, thereby taking unemployed off the relief rolls. The work on sewers, pavements and sidewalks to a great extent could be done by relief labour. To my mind it would be possible through those elements of cost to absorb the entire 15 per cent requirement, or whatever the requirement may be, when the judgment of the railway commissioners is put into the form of an order. The work I have outlined will be for the benefit of all those concerned. The money from these grants in aid would be for a useful purpose and would take off the relief rolls those of our citizens who, wanting work, have not been able to get it. It would be a real service to Scarborough township, East Toronto and East York, a real service to the unemployed—and a hazard would be eliminated.

The minister has had many representations from the hon. member for East York (Mr. McGregor), in which I have had the privilege of joining. I indicated to the minister my desire to speak at this time, and if he would be good enough to make a statement which would help in any way to bring about an early consideration of the matter by the board of railway commissioners, so that the judgment might be changed to an order, he would be doing a real service for all parties concerned. Would the minister be good enough to make one or two observations?

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Chairman, the matter to which reference has been made by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) has been brought to my attention on a number of occasions. Scarborough is not the only municipality which is interested in obtaining assistance which would enable it to take advantage of funds which might be made available under the railway grade crossing regulations. As the hon. member was proceeding I thought that if he could speak with the same conviction and persuasiveness before the railway board, we might have to provide much less by way of grant in aid for the purpose he has in view.

Mr. HARRIS: But he is not a lawyer.

Mr. LAWSON: You do not have to be a lawyer to appear before the railway board.

Mr. ROGERS: The question of what could be contributed from a grant in aid does raise some difficulty. At present I am not in a position to say it can be done. I will say, however, that it is the subject of discussion between the federal Department of Labour and the Department of Labour in Ontario. I agree entirely with the view that if a particular portion of the grant in aid is paid out in a particular municipality, it is desirable that so far as possible the money should be used for the payment of wages on worth-while work.

Mr. HARRIS: Hear, hear!

Mr. ROGERS: I am entirely in agreement with the hon, member on that point. Perhaps he will understand that I cannot go further at the present time.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): What portion of the grant goes to Saskatchewan, and is any portion for the farm placement scheme? It would be interesting if the minister could give us figures in connection with the operation of the scheme in Saskatchewan.

Mr. ROGERS: First of all, this particular amount is in excess of the vote approved at the last session for grants in aid to the provinces. I have not the precise allocation, provincially, of the excess amount. However, I can give the hon member the distribution by provinces of grants in aid in the past year.

Mr. BENNETT: Does that include this amount?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. The distribution will be as follows:

Prince Edward Island	$ 35,086	47
Nova Scotia	660,450	00
New Brunswick	412,781	25
Quebec	8,255,625	00
Ontario	9,906,750	00
Manitoba	2,229,018	75
Saskatchewan	3,302,250	00
Alberta	1,651,125	00
British Columbia	2,476,687	50
Total	$28,929,773	97

That includes the additional amount. May I say, further, that this does not include what is to be paid out under the farm employment plan. There was a special item of $1,000,000 in the estimates of last year for that purpose. The latest figures I have show that 23,058 were placed in the month of February in Saskatchewan. This does not necessarily mean that this number of unemployed single persons are now upon farms; that is the number of placements made in the province to date. [Mr. Harris.]

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): This amount is in addition to what was passed last year in the supplementary estimates?

Mr. ROGERS: That is correct.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): The total figure was something over $28,000,000?

Mr. ROGERS: That is correct.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): By any chance would that be the amount referred to in an announcement made last year just after the session closed? I think the house prorogued on June 23, and the Regina Leader-Post of July 2 contained the following headline:

$30,000,000 Works Plan Announced.

Agreements with Provinces made,

Rogers Declares

The article goes on to state that this amount is in addition to the $40,000,000 voted in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. ROGERS: That amount was not included. The hon, member is referring to the amount of the dominion-provincial joint works program.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): When I read in the Leader-Post that an agreement had been made with the provinces just six or seven days after the house prorogued, I took the liberty of writing to the private secretary of the minister in the following terms:

Would it be possible for you to furnish me with a copy of the contract entered into between the dominion and the provincial government of Saskatchewan covering this year's road work under the relief measure or any other arrangement that has been made between the two governments?

I received a reply from the minister acknowledging receipt of my letter and stating:

The agreement you refer to has not yet been ratified by council and therefore I am not in a position to give you the details you ask for, but in any event the provincial authorities will be able to give you the exact details of the work they intend to do with the assistance of the contribution which the dominion government is to make under the terms of the agreement to be entered into, and I would, therefore, suggest that you communicate with the provincial minister of highways, the Honourable Charles M. Dunn, who, I am sure, will be pleased to forward you the information you require.

I then wrote to the provincial minister of highways stating that I had noticed this announcement of a further program of $30,000,000. I told him I would like to know what portion of the $30,000,000 the province of Saskatchewan was likely to receive and upon what projects that money would be spent. I received the following reply:

In reply to your letter of July 27, I may say I noticed the article to which you refer in the Leader-Post. We only have the one agreement with the federal government and there was no additional work planned, which was announced to us, other than what we saw in the newspaper.

When this item came up I thought possibly it covered the amount mentioned in the newspaper article. Having seen that announcement so soon after the house prorogued I was quite interested. The information I received is covered by what I have given to the committee. The minister now states that no portion of this will be used for the farm placement scheme.

Mr. ROGERS: That is correct.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): We will have an opportunity to discuss this matter when the special supplementaries are before the committee.

Mr. ROGERS: There will be an item under which full discussion may occur.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Is the amount mentioned by the minister as having been granted to Saskatchewan, over and above the two items appearing on page 5 under governor general's warrants and totalling a little over twelve million dollars?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. I think my hon. friend is referring to the amounts made available in the drought area.

Mr. DOUGLAS: This is for direct relief?

Mr. ROGERS: Direct relief in the drought area.

Mr. HEAPS: This amount of almost three million dollars is the amount which the department estimated would be required for unemployment purposes during the last fiscal year?

Mr. ROGERS: I do not think that is an unfair way of expressing it. When the estimate was made I do not think I gave the house to understand that it was possible to forecast with exactitude the amount that would be required during the coming year. When relief grants are adjusted quarterly it requires a measure of foresight in the prediction of economic recovery. For example, the drought conditions affected not only the drought areas but created a situation in the cities of the western provinces which we did not anticipate at the time. The estimate was made of the amount which would be required for grants in aid under conditions then existing.

Mr. HEAPS: How does this amount compare with the estimate for the previous year?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not the actual figures here, but it is considerably in excess. If my hon, friend will put that question to me when the special supplementaries are before the committee, I shall be glad to answer it.

Mr. MASSEY: Further to the remarks that were made so ably by the hon, member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), and the reply thereto by the minister, I should like to say a word or two. The minister stated that the purpose of this vote is to provide work.

Mr. ROGERS: For relief purposes.

Mr. MASSEY: I should like to direct attention, not only to the Victoria Park avenue level crossing, but to the level crossings at Jones avenue, Greenwood avenue, and Woodbine avenue in the city of Toronto. If these level crossings are to be eliminated it will be necessary to do a considerable amount of work before the actual construction is commenced. In other words, there are physical difficulties in the way of constructing the separations at these three points. Would it not be possible to earmark a portion of this vote for these purposes? A certain amount of preparatory work requiring unskilled labour could be done now under these grants. The same procedure could be followed in connection with certain harbour improvements and the much discussed Toronto airport, but I am particularly interested in the three grade crossings mentioned. Perhaps I may be somewhat out of order in bringing up this matter at this time, but considerable valuable and profitable relief work could be done in this connection, and I ask the minister to consider the matter when dealing with these grants in aid.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Is not much of the increase in this amount to which the minister has referred due to the increase in grants brought about by climatic and other conditions?

Mr. ROGERS: No, I do not think that would be a correct statement of the situation. The grants are made in lump sum payments to the provinces, those grants being the same for each quarter unless there has been some adjustment for the ensuing quarter. They are not affected actually by changes in relief scales. If my hon, friend asks whether the grants to the provinces this year have been in excess of what they were last year, the answer is that they are in excess. This does not mean that there has been an increase in the number of unemployed people; it means that we have taken a larger share of the total cost of relief at a time when the municipalities and some of the provinces are in a position of very grave financial difficulty.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): But in addition to that, have not the individual grants to individual people been increased considerably in the past year?

Mr. ROGERS: In some provinces that has been the case, but the dominion Department of Labour has never, to my knowledge, interfered directly in relief scales: that is a matter that is left entirely to the provinces and the municipalities concerned.

Item agreed to.

Deficit of Canadian National Railway company-Additional amount, in excess of the sum of $39,900,900 already appropriated to be paid from time to time under such conditions as the Minister of Finance may prescribe, to the Canadian National Railway company (hereinafter called "the National Company") and to be applied by the National company in payment of the net income deficits arising in the calendar year 1936, including such supplementary con-tribution to The Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways employees' provident fund as may be necessary to provide for payment in full of monthly allowances under the provisions of The Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways employees' provident fund act, notwithstanding the limitation contained in section four of the said act, and including such supplementary, contribution to including such supplementary contribution to the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada superannuation and provident fund as may be necessary to enable payment to be made of monthly allowances under the rules and regulations of the fund, notwithstanding the limitation contained in section thirteen of chapter sixty-five of the statutes of Canada, 1874, and including profit and loss but not including non-cash items and interest on Dominion government advances, of the National Company or of any other or others of the companies comprised in the Canadian National Railways (as defined in chap. 10 of the statutes of Canada, 1929) or any company controlled by stock ownership or otherwise by any company comprised in the Canadian National Railways or by the National Company in respect of any of the Canadian Government Railways entrusted to the National Company, $3,403,393.82.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the minister what his intentions are with regard to the Canadian National hotel in Vancouver? This hotel has been standing uncompleted for many years, and there is a great demand in the city that it should be opened. I should like to know what the government intend to do about the hotel. I believe it is the only one of the Canadian National system that has not been opened; it cost many millions of dollars, and is just standing there as a monument.

An hon. MEMBER: Of what? [Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. HOWE: I can assure my hon. friend that the directors of the railway are giving this matter their earnest attention. I assume the fact that work has not been restarted is an indication that they do not believe the position justifies immediate action, although a little work is being done on it this year. But if general conditions improve and revenues rise we will hope that the directors of the railway will see their way to complete the building in due course.

Mr. GREEN: The directors have been considering the matter for a year, and they should soon come to some decision about it. Approximately how much money has been spent on the hotel, and what will be the cost of completing it?

Mr. HOWE: The directors have been considering the matter for six years, and they are just about as far ahead this year as they were in the preceding five.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh no.

Mr. HOWE: The amount of money spent to date is about $8,000,000. The amount required to complete it is about $2,500,000.

Mr. STEWART: This, I take it, is in addition to the amount that was voted last year to cover the deficit.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: What does that make the total? I see it is mentioned in the item.

Mr. HOWE: $43,303,393.82.

Mr. CRERAR: It is that amount added to $39,900,000.

Mr. STEWART: I suppose this money has been advanced to the railway in the mean-time?

Mr. HOWE: I believe it is being financed temporarily out of the working capital. It requires to be financed as against last year's operations.

Item agreed to.

Write down of assets-

To authorize—as the dominion's contribution to a program of adjusting the indebtedness of farmers living in the drought area of the province of Manitoba which program has been sponsored by the government of the province and involves appropriate adjustments in debt or tax claims on the part of the provincial government, the municipalities and certain mortgage lending institutions—the writing off and cancellation of certain treasury bills of the province held by the dominion, provided (1) that said treasury bills be transferred in the books of the Department of Finance from "active assets" to "non-active assets" as at March 31, 1937; (2) that final writing off and cancellations of said treasury bills be subject to the approval of the governor in council and in accordance with such terms and conditions as he may approve, including the nature of the evidence to be submitted as to the adjustments made by the provincial government, the municipalities and the mortgage lending institutions aforesaid; and (3) that the amount of treasury bills to be written off and cancelled shall not exceed the amount advanced by the dominion government to the provincial government by way of loan to assist in financing expenditures incurred for relief, seed grain and seeding purposes in the said drought area during the period from May 1, 1931, to January 1, 1935, and shall not in any case exceed in the aggregate the sum of $804,897.02.

Mr. BENNETT: I think, Mr. Chairman, we are entitled to a very complete explanation of this item. This involves the Dominion of Canada writing off $804,000. The next item is nearly $18,000,000. It represents promises to pay given, in this case, by the province of Manitoba to the dominion for money loaned to it and for which it gave its treasury bills. The item contemplates the removal of that amount from our active asset column to our non-active assets, but in reality it means that we are writing it off altogether. I think some very reasonable explanation should be given why the dominion which, on the promise to pay with interest, advance in good faith sums of money for which it has a claim to reimbursement certainly in respect of certain moneys paid to the provinces outside of the initial subsidy altogether, should treat two provinces in this way when a third province is getting nothing. So far as this resolution is concerned, the province of which I happen to be the only representative on my side of the house is the only province of the three that is getting nothing at all in the form of an allowance being made on account of its debt to the dominion. There certainly should be some explanation given, first as to the circumstances which warrant such action being taken, the releasing, that is, of our debtor from the payment of his debts; and second, why two provinces are selected for such treatment and the third is left out altogether.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We might let these two items stand until to-morrow. Perhaps my right hon. friend would be willing to allow us to finish the governor general's warrants.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it will probably involve some little discussion. Perhaps I might outline what I desire to have an explanation of in connection with the governor-general's warrants.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let us take an item that we can pass.

Item stands.

Governor general's warrants 1936-37—To provide additional amount for Stewart and Yukon Rivers—Improvements (governor general's warrant of July 23, 1936), $4,500.

Mr. BENNETT: Here is an instance where it is reasonable for me to refer to the statute:

25. (1) If, when parliament is not in session, any accident happens to any public work or building which requires an immediate outlay for the repair or renewal thereof, or any other occasion arises when any expenditure, not foreseen or provided for by parliament, is urgently and immediately required for the public good, then upon the report of the minister that there is no parliamentary provision, and of the minister having charge of the service in question that the necessity is urgent, the governor in council may order a special warrant to be prepared, to be signed by the Governor General for the issue of the amount estimated to be required, which shall be placed by the minister to a special account, against which cheques may issue from time to time, in the usual form, as they are required.

(2) The authority to make expenditure under such warrant shall lapse and any unexpended balance be written off at the end of the fiscal year in which the warrant is given: Provided that during a period not exceeding thirty days subsequent to the end of the said fiscal year, issues out of the consolidated revenue fund may be made for an amount or amounts not exceeding the amount of the expenditure authorized by the said warrant, for the purpose only of discharging any debt properly incurred and payable prior to the end of the said fiscal year, which may be outstanding and chargeable thereto and which for good reason was not paid within the said fiscal year, and such expenditure may be charged in the accounts of the said fiscal year.

That is section 5 of chapter 27 of the Statutes of Canada, 1931, the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act.

The first of the governor general's warrants is the one to provide for improvements on the Stewart and Yukon rivers. That can hardly be said not to be foreseen. It is certainly not provided for by parliament, but parliament did provide a sum of money for that particular service.

The statute further says that only such sums can be paid during the fiscal year as parliament has provided for—I will, perhaps, read that later. What I should think we are entitled to is an explanation why this form of blank cheque should be thrust upon us. Here we have a complete reversal of policy; here we have blank cheques issued for every form of activity that was contemplated by the relief act to the extent of twelve millions of dollars, covering improvements to a river in the Yukon, payments to enable the annuities act to be administered—running the whole gamut from the Yukon to annuities—relief expenditures and assistance with freight charges on cattle and feed—all the very payments that used to be made under the provisions of the statute that authorized the executive to do it, and now steps are being taken to do it under section 25.

The Prime Minister used to say that he suggested these might be done by governor general's warrants. It is true we might have done it by governor general's warrants, but in that case there was no authority except the general authority, and it was necessary to satisfy the governor general that it was (a) unforeseen or (b) it was not provided for by parliament. Now parliament does provide for these things; the only thing is that it did not provide enough, though it cannot be said that in some of these cases the expenditures were unforeseen. The result is that we have, by the operation of this section, a complete disregard of treasury control, about which my right hon, friend used to talk so severely to his predecessors in office. I am not for a moment saving that he was not warranted in lecturing them; I am merely endeavouring in this instance to point out that the course pursued is one which is wholly at variance with what was expressed in days long since forgotten by my right hon. friend who is now leading the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With all due respect to my right hon. friend, there is a great difference.

Mr. BENNETT: I expected that the right hon, gentleman would say there was a differ-

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When my right hon, friend was in office we asked that he give to the house at least some idea of the expenditure he proposed-how monies would be used, in what specific way-and we indicated our willingness to vote what was necessary to meet specific expenditures. We never expected him to be able to anticipate things that were wholly unforeseen. It was with respect to anything wholly unforeseen but which nevertheless would be urgent and immediate that we stated that governor general's warrants could be used. For example, if my right hon, friend had asked for several millions for unemployment relief, which amount had been appropriated for the purpose, and had then encountered, as the present administration has encountered this year a drought situation in Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, we should have felt that he was justified in using governor general's warrants to meet expenditures in connection with such a totally unforeseen condition.

[Mr. Bennett.]

What we complained of was that he sought to avoid all specific appropriations and to make all expenditures out of a blank cheque.

Mr. BENNETT: All relief expenditures.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, all relief expenditures. We thought that he should have asked the house for at least some specific amount for relief; an amount voted on an estimate which in his opinion would represent what was necessary, and that he should have supported his estimate by reasons for the particular sum being placed at the figure it was. I recall quite well mentioning to my right hon. friend as a case in point the practice followed by Sir Robert Borden during the great war. Sir Robert could not say how many millions would be required for certain purposes, but he formed an estimate which he submitted to the house, and the house voted the required amounts for specific purposes based on the estimate given.

Mr. BENNETT: He could make such an estimate, knowing how many men there were and how much per head it was likely to be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He did so to the best of his ability and I am sure that my right hon. friend, with his ability, could have formed an estimate that would have been fairly exact; and if after doing his best he had encountered some unforeseen disaster we should have been glad to help him out.

Mr. BENNETT: It is pleasant to hear the right hon, gentleman say that after the event. I realize that experience has taught him what we learned during five years. What we learned in those five years he is now learning. But there could not be a better answer than is provided in this very document. We have $12,500,000 provided by governor general's warrants for expenditures which it is said could not have been foreseen nor provided for by parliament. Certainly that statement does not apply to all of them. The second one is a legitimate and proper use of the power-the necessity for dealing with a fire. But when it comes to providing by governor general's warrants for the expenses of the royal grain inquiry, in the light of a report from a special committee and the fact that it was known that an inquiry was to be held, obviously indicating what was involved, we find $103,000 provided on November 18, 1936, for that very purpose, and I do propose to ask with respect to this what sums have been spent, seeing that we are now at the end of the fiscal year. There is no doubt about it that item 400 would be difficult to justify under the statute-

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I can explain that.

Mr. BENNETT: -in this sense, that it was known that this is coronation year and that an extraordinary strain would be put upon the high commissioner's office. The one with respect to the textile industry can hardly be justified for the simple reason that the commission was even then making copious extracts from Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations, while the learning of John Stuart Mill was also being invoked. Under these circumstances it is a little difficult to understand why we should have a governor general's warrant for these particular expenditures. That, I suggest, will be found to be at variance with the practice to which the right hon. gentleman has properly referred. With respect to the provision of an additional amount for the administration of the Annuities Act, it would be stretching a point to bring that within the provisions of the section. That is a clear case in which parliament is supposed to have provided for the public service. Indeed, I have known the service stopped because there was no money, on the ground that you could not possibly secure money for such purposes by means of governor general's warrants.

I have discussed this at length because it constitutes an appropriation of public moneys by the executive without reference to parliament, and the expenditures can be made within the fiscal year. It is true that this day week no more money can be spent out of these grants, and the amount that has been legitimately expended up to that time has to be accounted for inasmuch as it must be kept in a special account, and the comptroller and the auditor general will take care of that.

The fact is that a substantial number of these cannot on principle be justified as a proper exercise of the executive power in connection with money grants without the consent of parliament, except retroactively given. Not as unforeseen or unprovided-for expenditures, we are voting at least $12,500,000. Even the large items, which alone amount to $12,-000,000, it would be difficult to say were not to some extent foreseen, for when this house rose in June, or shortly after, when I crossed the prairies it was apparent that more money would have to be provided for relief purposes, though no one could have foreseen when this house rose that any such large sum as $12,000,000 would be required for that purpose. I think that is clear, and I agree that to that extent it is a valid exercise of the power. But having looked at the orders in council, I doubt whether it can be said that they constitute the proper procedure for the valid exercise of the power, because the estimates are of such a character as to involve an appropriation which is vastly greater than one would contemplate from the details given, especially having regard to the fact that these are to be kept in a special account and that ultimately the auditor general and the comptroller of the treasury must account for them. The statute itself, of course, provides that nothing in it shall release either the minister or the deputy minister of responsibility with respect to any negligence or otherwise in the discharge of their duties.

I have gone into the question at this length because it involves a principle which, as I remember, the right hon, gentleman used to say it was highly important that we should keep in mind.

When you come to the question of the appropriation of moneys, it was never intended that the executive should make an appropriation unless there was clear authority granted by parliament for the purpose. When the power was conferred upon the executive with respect to relief matters, I pointed out then, as I do now, that I could not indicate within millions of dollars what would be required. And it is clear that we were right in that view, for here we find $12,000,000 odd required because of the drought between the time parliament rose in June and a few weeks later. Here is $12,-000,000 applied by executive action for a particular purpose. If I, standing in my place, had suggested that this sum would be required, I fancy I should have been laughed at, and so would anyone last year who might have ventured in the month of May to suggest that $12,000,000 would be required for relief in consequence of a crop failure. At that time people believed that a crop was certain.

I mention this because it involves a principle which I should not like to see adopted any more than is necessary, while I am the first to admit that if the necessity is urgent, and it comes within the provisions of the statute the power must be exercised. The limitations upon the exercise of the power I think sometimes have not been carefully studied, for I recall that the first time a governor general's warrant was issued by the late administration I sent for the auditor general and had some difficulty in inducing him to believe that this had to be kept in a special account. He said it had not been done. I replied: All I can say is, there is the statute that requires it to be kept in a special account against which cheques will issue only under certain circumstances and conditions. It is that particularity that parliament has placed in the statute that necessitates very strict observance, because it departs from the parliamentary principle of which the right hon. gentleman always used to remind us, namely, that the executive does not make the appropriations—parliament makes them. And a retroactive validation of an executive appropriation is not consonant with the rules that govern the appropriation of the money of this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to take any exception to my right hon. friend's statement of the importance of surrounding the resort to governor general's warrants with the greatest caution possible. I agree entirely with all that he says about the great care that should be exercised in the use of governor general's warrants. But may I point out that while my right hon. friend has drawn the attention of the committee to the fact that the total amount spent under governor general's warrant as here set forth is $12,540,300, of that amount $12,240,000 is for two items only, and each of those items is concerned with the drought in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, which could not possibly have been foreseen. We could not have asked parliament at the last session to vote anything for a drought likely to occur in the summer, and which did occur in the summer months. When the drought actually occurred we estimated the amounts here set forth as about what would be required. The estimate was made in September and October of last year; the actual expenditures I am told have just about equalled the estimate. We figured as closely as possible to meet the situation. I do not think my right hon. friend will take exception to our using governor general's warrants for the purpose of meeting the drought situation. There was no other way to meet it short of calling parliament. I am prepared to support very strongly the use of governor general's warrants in such circumstances as coming exactly within the provisions of the statute.

Mr. BENNETT: I admit that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend says he admits that. That leaves in all only some $300,000 additional, for which governor general's warrants may issue. Of that amount my right hon. friend says that what was used for fighting forest fires, $40,000, was quite proper. I think he is right in that. Equally proper was the amount of $4,500 additional for the Stewart and Yukon river improvements, to which he took exception, because that amount was for floods, which could not be foreseen. We would not have been justified in asking for that appropriation at the time of securing the original appropriation any more than our neighbours on the other side of the line would have been justified in anticipating the volume of the recent floods on the Ohio and the Mississippi.

My right hon, friend referred to the expenses on account of the high commissioner's office, and said we might have foreseen the coronation expenses. The expenditure had nothing to do with the coronation. The expenses there were in part incidental to the Vimy pilgrimage. The pilgrims visited London, were there some days, and there were expenses in that connection which the high commissioner's office had to meet. Then my right hon, friend's friend who had been high commissioner in London had returned to Canada. We would not anticipate his moving expenses; no one knew what they were until the bills were in, and unfortunately those bills fell on the present administration and we had to pay them. We did not wish to keep the former high commissioner waiting for another year for his moving expenses, so an amount to cover that outlay was included in that sum. Then I believe it was found necessary to appoint one additional member to the staff in London. The total is made up of the amounts for these three purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say that the explanation in respect to the other items is a good deal better than the last, because we did know that he was bound to return to Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly the former high commissioner thought it was urgent that he should get his luggage from the old country immediately. I think it was; I think the account should have been paid.

My right hon, friend also took exception to the sum required in the administration of the Annuities Act also.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I said that could have been foreseen.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government thought it was estimating pretty liberally when it asked for the amount it did to pay commissions on annuities sold; but as a matter of fact the sales exceeded anything that had been anticipated even in the imagination of the minister. An hon. member says: Good times, prosperity.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it is perhaps fear of the future, if you ask me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But there it was; the persons who sold the annuities had performed a service for the country; they had sold the annuities, and were entitled to commission on the sales. They turned in the moneys for the annuities; at least the applications with initial payment had gone to the department, and they were entitled to their commissions. We might have withheld payment until parliament met, but obviously there was an obligation there which required to be met immediately. It is apparent, Mr. Chairman, that my right hon, friend is still a little concerned about the attacks made upon him for the use of the blank cheque.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh no, we have long since passed that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But what has been used in a form of blank cheque in these cases has been authorized by a statute enacted to meet just such cases.

Mr. BENNETT: So was ours.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was put through, as I remember, by closure in this house.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh no, we did not have to go that far.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. BENNETT: No, I want to speak again about some of these items. The first one carries, yes.

Item 394 agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May we carry No. 395?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Governor general's warrants 1936-37—To provide for the cost of fighting forest fires in the national parks of Canada (Governor General's warrant of September 17, 1936), $40,000.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

It being twenty minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 25, 1937

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

STANDING ORDERS

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier) presented the second report of the standing committee on standing orders, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier, for Mr. Moore) presented the fourth report of the standing committee on banking and commerce, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

DEMONSTRATION FARMS-QUEBEC

Mr. MULLINS:

- 1. How many demonstration farms were being operated prior to 1930 in the province of Quebec?
- 2. How many of these demonstration farms are being operated at the present time?

Mr. GARDINER:

- 1. Demonstration farms are operated by the provincial government but the dominion Department of Agriculture operated forty-two illustration stations prior to 1930 in the provof Quebec.
  - 2. Fifty-three illustration stations.

NEW BRUNSWICK NATIONAL PARK

Mr. BROOKS:

- 1. Was a survey made in the year 1936 by a representative of the Department of Mines and Resources of prospective sites for a national park in New Brunswick?
- 2. If so, what sites were surveyed, and where located in New Brunswick?
- 3. Was a report made to the commissioner of national parks, and, if so, in what order were the proposed sites recommended: (a) first choice; (b) second choice; (c) third choice, etc.?

Mr. CRERAR:

- 1. Yes. A number of sites submitted by the province were examined in the year 1936.
- 2. Mount Carleton site in Northumberland and Victoria counties, a site in Albert county, and a site in Kings and Queens counties.
- 3. A report was made recommending the Mount Champlain site in Kings and Queens counties as first choice; the Lepreau site in Charlotte county (previously examined and reported upon) as second choice, and the Albert county site as third choice. This report, without being considered by the dominion government, was forwarded to the provincial government, as the latter must furnish free of charge the property covered by the site finally selected.

PRIVILEGE-MR. MASSEY

Mr. DENTON MASSEY (Greenwood): I rise to a question of privilege, At page 2096 of Hansard I read the following:

Only the other day the hon, member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) referred to the bonus given to the farmers as a dole. If the hon, member did not hear that, I can assure him it was said.

That statement was made by the hon, member for Marquette (Mr. Glen). I was not present in the house at the time, and immediately following that statement my right hon. leader (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh) endeavoured to convince the hon. member for Marquette that he was in error. At no time within this house or outside of it have I said anything that could possibly be construed as even insinuating what that remark suggests, and if the hon. member were in his seat I am sure he would be pleased to withdraw his statement.

SOCKEYE SALMON FISHERIES

CANADA-UNITED STATES CONVENTION FOR PRESERVATION AND EXTENSION IN FRASER RIVER SYSTEM—CONSIDERATION OF UNDERSTANDINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That, in connection with the exchange of ratifications of the convention between Canada and the United States for the protection, preservation and extension of the sockeye salmon fisheries in the Fraser river system, signed at Washington on the 26th May, 1930, it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve of a declaration being made on the part of Canada to the effect that the provisions of the convention may be administered upon the following understandings:

(1) That the international Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission shall have no power to authorize any type of fishing gear contrary to the laws of the state of Washington or the Dominion of Canada;

(2) That the commission shall not promulgate or enforce regulations until the scientific investigations provided for in the convention have been made, covering two cycles of sockeye salmon runs, or eight years; and

(3) That the commission shall set up an advisory committee composed of five persons from each country who shall be representatives of the various branches of the industry (purse seine, gill net, troll, sport fishing, and one other), which advisory committee shall be invited to all non-executive meetings of the commission and shall be given full opportunity to examine and to be heard on all proposed orders, regulations or recommendations; and that this house do approve of the same; provided that nothing in this resolution contained shall be deemed to prevent the governor in council from exercising at any time any authority in him vested to make effective orders or regulations duly adopted by the said commission.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, as the committee is aware the sockeye salmon fisheries convention between Canada and the United States for the protection, preservation and extension of the sockeye salmon fisheries in the Fraser river system was signed at Washington on the 26th May, 1930. The convention was subsequently confirmed and sanctioned by an act of this parliament, chapter 10 of 20-21 George V, during the session of 1930. Agreement, however, has not been reached to exchange ratifications, and the convention therefore has lain or in other words been inoperative for some seven years. At the moment we are faced with the necessity of considering whether or not the convention should be accepted subject to certain understandings which the senate of the United States desired to have declared in connection with the exchange of ratifications. The senate of the United States approved of the convention by the requisite two-thirds majority on June 16 of last year, subject, as I have said, to these understandings.

Mr. BENNETT: Did they not call them reservations when they made them?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think they called them understandings; that is my impression, but I shall make sure of that before we conclude the discussion. According to my memory at the moment, the way it was expressed was that the convention was ratified subject to "the following understandings."

In the opinion of the government it is not necessary, nor is it in accordance with general practice and procedure, to bring understandings of the kind before the house for approval, inasmuch as in our view they are not inconsistent with either the principle or the purpose of the convention. But the hon, member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) is particularly interested in the subject, and he as well as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has expressed a desire to have an opportunity to discuss the understandings. The government therefore have thought it advisable to submit the understandings in the form of a resolution for the consideration and, we hope, approval of both houses of parliament.

On March 3 the hon, member for Comox-Alberni asked whether or not the understandings would be submitted. At that time I replied in part as follows:

These understandings, which under existing practice and precedents constitute clarifications or interpretations upon administrative aspects, appear to be not inconsistent with the principles and purpose of the convention; accordingly the question of their submission to parliament, which confirmed the convention in 1930, does not arise.

As I have said, since that question was answered in that way the leader of the opposition also expressed a desire to have the understandings discussed. The acting Prime Minister, my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), gave an assurance on March 12 that this opportunity would be afforded, the exchange of ratifications having not yet taken place.

Since the understandings relate to the convention as it has been signed, it might be desirable for me to indicate briefly the provisions of the convention.

Article II provides for the establishment of an international Pacific salmon fisheries commission, each country appointing three members. Under articles III to VII the commission is instructed and empowered:

- (a) to investigate the natural history of this fishery as well as hatchery methods, spawning ground conditions and so on;
- (b) to conduct fish cultural operations, improve spawning grounds, establish hatcheries, rearing ponds and other facilities for the purpose of stocking convention waters;
- (c) to recommend the removal of obstructions to the ascent of sockeye salmon;
- (d) to report annually upon the commission's investigations and action taken;
- (e) to regulate the taking of sockeye salmon in convention waters;
- (f) to regulate the fishery with a view to a substantially equal division of the catch;
- (g) to regulate the size of meshes in appliances used for catching spring salmon during the spring salmon fishing season and the fishing equipment permissible for use on the high seas covered by the convention.

Under article VI an affirmative vote by at least two commissioners from each country is required to make any action by the commission effective. This is important in view of the powers given to the commission. The result is that neither country, through its representation, can impose its view on the other. There must first be a process of reaching agreement; then, and only then, action may proceed.

That brings me to the understandings which the United States senate, in giving its approval, desired to have declared in connection with their agreement to ratification. The first understanding is:

That the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission shall have no power to authorize any type of fishing gear contrary to the laws of the state of Washington or the Dominion of Canada.

The convention itself indicates that the commission is not concerned with types of fishing gear, but only with the size of meshes in certain circumstances. It was never contemplated that the commission should have the right in any way to authorize any type of fishing gear contrary to the laws of either the United States or Canada. Accordingly this understanding was not considered inconsistent with the main intent of the convention, and may be regarded as a harmless declaration of administrative intention.

Before considering the second understanding, the one upon which I imagine discussion may arise, I shall pass to the third. It is in these words:

That the commission shall set up an advisory committee composed of five persons from each country who shall be representatives of the various branches of the industry (purse seine, gill net, troll, sport fishing and one other), which advisory committee shall be invited to all non-executive meetings of the commission and shall be given full opportunity to examine and to be heard on all proposed orders, regulations or recommendations.

The convention does not make specific mention of the appointment of an advisory committee. It does not say that an advisory committee shall be appointed. In that particular the convention respecting sockeye salmon is similar to the convention respecting halibut, to which agreement was given several years ago. Under the halibut convention it was found advisable to establish an advisory committee, and such a committee was in fact established and has been in existence. It is quite within the power of the commission dealing with sockeye salmon to adopt a procedure similar to that adopted by the halibut commission in its consideration of halibut fisheries. Such indeed has been the intention. This step would be in no way inconsistent with the Sockeye Salmon Convention, but rather in furtherance of its purpose. No special provision is necessary. So that from our point of view the third understanding is superfluous, and there could be no legal or formal objection to its acceptance.

The one remaining understanding is the second one, which is in these words:

That the commission shall not promulgate or enforce regulations until the scientific investigations provided for in the convention have been made, covering two cycles of sockeye salmon runs, or eight years.

It is true that in the opinion of our fisheries experts eight years seems an unnecessarily long time to be permitted to elapse before the commission shall have power to make regulations. On the other hand, if in the interval at any time agreement should be reached between the commissioners with respect to any regulations they deem advisable, there would appear to be no reason why at such time some supplementary agreement between the two countries should not be reached. As a matter of fact such a course was followed with respect to the halibut convention. In connection with investigations respecting halibut it was found that about eight years of scientific inquiry were required before the commission felt they would be in a position to recommend something practicable and advisable. It is possible the present commission might find itself similarly situated with respect to promulgating regulations in respect to the sockeye salmon. However, as I have indicated, if a majority of the commission on both sides come to the point of view that regulations are desirable at an earlier date, it is always possible for our government to ask the United States government to join with us either in consideration of amendments to the present understandings or in the drafting of a new convention.

I believe the eight year period is intended to cover two cycles of sockeye salmon runs. In view of the fact that either national section of the commission could delay regulations for eight years or longer for that matter, if it, or its government, or other influential interests were not convinced of the desirability of regulation, the third understanding could be regarded as not going to the heart of the convention, but as a statement of intention or interpretation as to the sense in which it had to be administered, if any practical progress was to be made.

I have already pointed out to the committee, at least two of the commissioners of each country must agree on regulations before such regulations can be promulgated. Under these circumstances, even without the understanding to which I have referred, if either country did not wish to have any regulation promulgated in a time less than eight years, it would be very easy for its cotamissioners to prevent the step by a ma[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

jority of them refraining from agreement with the majority on the other side.

As to the present position, through careful inquiry at Washington our government has ascertained that there is not much hope of securing the approval of the United States senate to practical action without these understandings. Apparently it has taken some seven years to get agreement to this point. We are now in the position of having to decide either to let the convention as a whole go by the board, or to accept it subject to the understandings I have read. The government believes that the understandings constitute clarifications or interpretations upon administration aspects of the convention and are not inconsistent with its principles and purpose, also that apart altogether from the references in the understandings, although regulation is postponed, there remain for immediate action, considerable other functions and powers, and there are sufficient to warrant the convention being brought into force at the earliest possible day. The important thing is to get the commission and scientific investigation immediately under way. We believe the better course is to accept the understandings rather than to let the convention lapse.

An examination of the fisheries resources throughout the world would indicate that they are being rapidly exhausted, and that unless between countries, conventions and agreements can be speedily effected the result is likely to be serious. Experience has shown that it is impossible to exaggerate the importance of conservation measures. Only by joint action can conservation be carried out. Some seven years have elapsed which might have been utilized for the purpose of protecting, perserving and extending the fisheries. Let us hope that another period of time will not be permitted to elapse without some beneficial action being taken. If in this sockeye salmon case, the investigations of the new commission when set up, as well as the further experience of the fishing industry should indicate that it would be practicable to promulgate effective regulations before the lapse of two sockeye salmon cycles of eight years, it will always be open to the government to raise the matter again and to endeavour to secure the agreement of the United States that regulations should commence. The convention is for a period of sixteen years, subject to continuation unless exception is taken by either side. If the understandings are accepted so that agreement may be reached for exchange of ratifications, our government proposes to inform the government of the United States that the right is reserved to raise this question again as soon as circumstances may appear to render such a course appropriate. This will be kept in mind and no opportunity lost in this connection.

In connection with the halibut convention it was found that a period of eight years elapsed before it was possible to put forward practicable regulations, and to get sufficient agreement on all sides for that purpose. It may be that was one of the reasons why the senate of the United States in the present instance has thought it well to name an eight year period.

I should point out further that the government understands that those connected with the fishing industry on our western coasts are in entire agreement with an acceptance of the convention upon these understandings.

Just this one word in conclusion in order to show the significance and importance of the convention. At the time the senate of the United States was investigating the matter it was disclosed that the salmon pack on the Fraser river system and Puget Sound which in 1913 amounted to 2,357,000 cases, had fallen in 1929 to 172,291 cases. This enormous reduction may have been due partly to the rock slide in the Fraser river that took place some years ago as well as to over-fishing. The government believes that such a convention as this will make it possible for these valuable resources, instead of becoming exhausted, to be re-established, and their magnitude restored to what it was in previous years, if not vastly increased beyond that point.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, I regard this matter as one of more importance than the mere incident to which it refers. It will be within the knowledge of most hon. members that this is the second attempt to conclude a treaty between the United States and Canada with respect to the sockeye fisheries. The first convention was criticized somewhat in this house and the then and now Prime Minister negotiated a new arrangement which was approved by this house before he left office in 1930 and embodied in the statutes of that year. I then suggested that in dealing with a country as large as the United States, where so much uncertainty prevails with respect to the action that may be taken by the senate, it would be well if we had the approval of the senate to the convention or treaty before it was confirmed by the parliament of Canada. However, I understand that at that time our minister at Washington was of the opinion that the circumstances were such that the treaty would be approved by the senate. Such, however, was not the case, and, as the Prime Minister has said, for seven years efforts have been made to have action taken by the United States to ensure approval of the treaty by the senate before ratifications were exchanged.

Two questions arise. The first is whether the conditions that have been imposed by the United States senate in confirming the treaty are reservations or understandings. That question is not easy of solution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have the exact wording here, if my right hon. friend would like me to give it to him. It is:

Resolved (two-thirds of the senators present concurring therein), That the senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive M. 71st Congress, 2nd session, the convention between the United States and Canada for the protection, preservation and extension of the sockeye salmon fisheries of the Fraser river system, signed at Washington on May 26, 1930, subject to the following understandings to be made a part of such ratification.

Mr. BENNETT: I regard that as important, because there are certain principles of international law which I think are being contravened by the action we propose to take. When the Prime Minister was dealing with this matter last year he spoke of them as reservations. The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) asked a question on the orders of the day, to which the Prime Minister replied, as reported on page 3848 of Hansard of June 18, 1936, as follows:

Mr. C. G. MacNeil (Vancouver North): I wish to repeat the question I directed to the government yesterday as to the present status of the Fraser river sockeye salmon treaty, in view of the announcement of ratification by the United States senate.

Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King (Prime Minister): I have in my hand the answer which I was going to read. I tried once or twice to rise so as to anticipate my hon. friend's question. The question he asked was:

What is the present status of the Fraser river sockeye salmon treaty, in view of the announcement in to-day's press of ratification in the United States senate?

The answer is: The sockeye salmon convention, the second attempt to ensure the preservation of this important branch of the fishing industry, was signed in 1930 and approved by the Canadian parliament in the same year. Differences of opinion in the state of Washington prevented action by the United States until this year. This week it has been approved by the senate, subject to three reservations. The first of these reservations, providing that the commission is not to authorize fishing gear contray to Canadian or state of Washington laws, presents no difficulty; the convention does not grant such power. The third, providing for an advisory committee of five from each country, representative of the various branches of the industry, is also quite consistent with the purpose of the convention. The second reservation, however, providing that the commission will not put into effect any order or regulation before its investigations have covered two cycles of salmon runs, or eight years, raises serious difficulty. It was of course understood that thorough investigation would precede any regulation of the actual fishing operations, but there is, in the opinion of those qualified to judge, no ground for anticipating that this would require anything like eight years, or more than half the fifteen years for which the convention runs. We therefore propose to discuss this question with the United States authorities, in the hope that some satisfactory solution of this point can be found and made effective next year.

The Prime Minister has been very frank and has told the committee that although discussions have taken place with the United States authorities, apparently there has been no desire to modify the terms of the conditions, understandings, or reservations, which were attached to the approval given to the treaty last year by the senate. I cannot look upon these reservations as being mere understandings. The first understanding reads:

That the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission shall have no power to authorize any type of fishing gear contrary to the laws of the state of Washington or the Dominion of Canada.

I think that that understanding is faultily drawn. I believe what they intended to say was that they should have no power to authorize the use of any type of fishing gear. As it reads now it provides that they shall have no power to authorize any type of gear, not the use of gear. It is quite clear that in article V the treaty contemplated that the commission should exercise supervision over the type of mesh that should be used in fishing for sockeye salmon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The size of mesh.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. Article V reads:

In order to secure a proper escapement of sockeye salmon during the spring or chinook salmon fishing season, the International Salmon Fisheries Commission may prescribe the size of the meshes in all fishing gear and appliances operated in the waters described in article I of this convention which are frequented by sockeye salmon.

Whenever the taking of sockeye salmon in said waters during said period between the first of June and the twentieth of August in any year is permitted under the orders adopted by the commission in respect of Canadian waters any fishing appliances authorized by the laws of the Dominion of Canada may be used in such waters by any person thereunto legally authorized, and whenever the taking of sockeye salmon in said waters during said period is permitted under the orders adopted by the commission in respect of waters of the United States, any fishing appliance legally authorized by the senate of Washington may be used in such waters by any person thereunto authorized by that state.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Article V clearly contemplates that the commission shall have power to prescribe the size of mesh, not for the purpose of catching fish but to permit the escapement of fish. They contended—and properly so in my judgment, although I am not an authority—that we were not permitting the escape of fish that should escape because of size and not be caught as articles of commerce. As it stands now, article V is subject to the reservation or understanding that the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission shall have no power to authorize any type of fishing gear contrary to the laws of the state of Washington or the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is there not a distinction between type and size?

Mr. BENNETT: I follow all that, but the effect of it is to render the first paragraph of article V nugatory and useless. I say that with some hesitancy, but I have given a great deal of thought to it. The minister will observe that—

In order to secure a proper escapement of sockeye salmon during the spring or chinook salmon fishing season, the commission may prescribe the size of the meshes in all fishing gear and appliances that may be operated....

In Canadian and United States waters. If that does not mean that the size of mesh to be used in Canada and in the United States is to be prescribed by the commission, it means nothing. It cannot mean anything else. No one to whom I have talked has suggested that it means anything else. Then follows a provision that the Canadian form of fishing appliance shall not be altered by them, nor shall the United States form, but the size of the mesh which permits the escapement of the fish is to be regulated by this commission. Obviously it is not going to regulate it in a museum in Washington.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But the understanding does not have to do with the size of the mesh.

Mr. BENNETT: The reservation or understanding says that the international commission shall have no power to authorize any type of fishing gear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: "Type."

Mr. BENNETT: -"of fishing gear."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And obviously the mesh in the net is the essential thing. It is of no use to talk about the size of a mesh lodged in a museum in Seattle or Vancouver. This contemplates the use of the mesh in a net, otherwise it does not provide for the escapement of anything. There is no getting away from that difficulty. If the commission is to settle the size of the mesh, obviously the mesh must be in a net and obviously the net must be utilized for catching the fish. Therefore it contemplates that the fishing gear, and the type of gear, which is the mesh and the net, shall be of such a size as will permit the escapement of the salmon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would it not be possible to have different types of gear with mesh of the same size?

Mr. BENNETT: No; that is the whole point.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why not?

Mr. BENNETT: The essential thing is that the catching of the fish depends on the size of the mesh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly.

Mr. BENNETT: About that there is no doubt. The question of the type of appliance that is used for the purpose of enabling that net to catch the fish is another thing altogether.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is all that is dealt with.

Mr. MICHAUD: That applies to escapement, not to catching fish.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister is too experienced in catching fish not to see that, while this act provides for escapement, it obviously provides for retaining those that are larger in the mesh and lets the smaller go out of the mesh.

Mr. MICHAUD: The commission has nothing to do with any type of fish other than sockeye.

Mr. BENNETT: But it distinctly says they have the power to authorize the size of the mesh to provide for the escape of the smaller fish.

Mr. MICHAUD: Of sockeye.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They still have.

Mr. BENNETT: No, they have not. That is the point exactly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am afraid we cannot agree there.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): May I ask the right hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Does he regard the intent of the mesh to be that the smaller fish of any species should be allowed free?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly. That is what it says in distinct terms:

In order to secure a proper escapement of sockeye salmon during the spring or chinook salmon fishing season, the commission may prescribe the size of the meshes in all fishing gear and appliances operated in the waters described in article I of this convention. . . .

Notwithstanding that, it will have no power to authorize any type of fishing gear contrary to the laws of Canada or of the state of Washington. It therefore follows that whatever Canada may prescribe as to the type of gear which may be used, meshes that do or do not conform to a regulation or order of the commission cannot be interfered with either on the United States side or on the Canadian side.

Mr. REID: May I interrupt the right hon. gentleman? Did he not leave out the word "other"—any other type than the spring or chinook salmon? That makes quite a difference.

Mr. BENNETT: No. It says:

In order to secure a proper escapement of sockeye salmon during the spring or chinook salmon fishing season, the commission may prescribe the size of the meshes in all fishing gear and appliances operated in the waters described in article I of this convention, which are frequented by sockeye salmon.

I have read that just as it appears; there is no question about it. I leave that matter, only submitting that I cannot regard this as a mere understanding. The effect is to prevent this commission from effectively controlling the size of the mesh in connection with fishing operations under any type that may be authorized by the Dominion of Canada, on the one hand, or the state of Washington on the other.

With respect to the enforcement of regulations, I think there will be no difficulty in this house or any other chamber in showing that this is at entire variance with the general principles of the convention. I am certain that the minister would not have recommended seven years ago that the house ratify the treaty if it had contained that provision, because the effect of it is to render the whole treaty practically nugatory for eight years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, no.

Mr. BENNETT: Let us be fair about it. I am sure the minister desires to do what he deems to be the very best for everybody in connection with this matter, and I am sure he knows the efforts that were made to secure the approval of the United States senate to the treaty in the form in which it is drawn. This is the provision:

That the commission shall not promulgate or enforce regulations until the scientific investigations provided for in the convention have been made, covering two cycles of sockeye salmon runs, or eight years.

For eight years this convention is nugatory and without effect, except that they carry on the investigations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That relates only to the regulations to be promulgated.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but the regulations are the expression of the results of the investigations. On the one hand you have the scientific investigations; on the other hand you have the regulations—the one the seeking of knowledge, the other the regulations to give effect to knowledge thus obtained; and here you have a statement made by the senate that for eight years no regulations are to be promulgated.

Mr. HOWDEN: From what date?

Mr. BENNETT: From the date of the ratification. That would be half of the fifteen or sixteen years. I approach this matter simply from the standpoint of a Canadian who is concerned about it, because we all have had to do with it. Certainly there is no question of party politics involved. The minister secured the treaty in the form in which it is; we endeavoured to secure the approval of the senate to it; finally, last year or about a year ago, the senate approved it with these three understandings or reservations. I submit with great confidence to this committee that the effect is to render completely nugatory this treaty for a period of eight years. Unless as a result of the knowledge obtained, regulations can be promulgated to give effect to the information so procured, it is obvious that the effort will be in vain.

I submit in all confidence, Mr. Chairman, that there is no member of this committee who, after careful consideration, will say that this has anything to do with an interpretative understanding. It goes to the very basis of the whole thing; it strikes at the root of the treaty. We were to have side by side investigations and regulations; on the one hand, immediate regulations for the preservation of this industry which is being destroyed, on the other hand continued investigations not only in the wider waters but in the narrow waters and in the river itself. In fact the question was discussed, you may recall, of the rights of the two countries to acquire lands for the purpose of ensuring an extension of the breeding grounds of the fish. Now, all these regulations that we were to have, predicated upon these scientific investigations, are to have no value and cannot be promulgated until eight years from the date of our ratification. In other words, for another seven years the fisheries are being depleted; for another eight years they are to be depleted still more, making in all fifteen years of the life of the treaty in which nothing is to be done to conserve the industry. That is the position.

The third understanding or reservation with respect to the setting up of an advisory committee might well be regarded as an interpretative administrative act, because I think one could read into the terms of the treaty itself, by implication, sufficient power to enable the authoritative body to set up an advisory committee. But it is at variance with the terms of the treaty when it begins to define who the advisory committee shall be and is a new term introduced into the negotiations and therefore amounts to refusal to accept the treaty. On that point international law is not silent, and I shall read from Oppenheim's International Law, the edition by McNair, volume 1, at page 724, on treaties. I think it might be well to indicate to the committee-and I hope I shall not be misunderstood in doing so-that the approval of parliament is not the ratification of the treaty. Ratification is the act of the head of the state, the sovereign, and hence it is that treaties run either in the name of the kingemperor on the one hand or in the name of the president of the United States on the other. That is ratification by the head of the state; approval is another thing; but the principles that govern with respect to approval and ratification, in so far as the treaty itself is concerned, are not contradictory. I quote from section 516:

Ratification is effected by those organs which exercise the treaty-making power of the states. These organs are regularly the heads of the states or their governments, but they can, according to the municipal law of some states, delegate the power of ratification for some parts of their territory to other representatives. Thus, the Viceroy of India is empowered to ratify treaties with certain Asiatic monarchs in the name of the King of Great Britain and Emperor of India.

In case the head of a state ratifies a treaty, although the necessary constitutional requirements have not been previously fulfilled (as, for instance, where a treaty has not received the necessary approval from the parliament of the said state), the question arises whether such ratification is valid, or null and void. Many writers maintain that it is nevertheless valid. But this opinion is not correct, because it is clearly evident that, in such a case, the head of the state has exceeded his powers, and that, therefore, the state concerned cannot be held to be bound by the treaty.

517. It follows from the nature of the ratification, as a necessary confirmation of a treaty already concluded, that ratification must be either given or refused, no conditional or partial ratification being possible. That occasionally a state tries to modify a treaty in ratifying cannot be denied; but conditional ratification is no ratification at all, but equivalent to refusal of ratification coupled with a fresh offer which may or may not be accepted.

I pause for a moment to point out that these three understandings constitute fresh offers on the part of the United States, and that was the reason I suggested to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) the desirability of parliament approving of this new offer, if it thought fit, so that there would be no question that the ratification when it took place would be an absolute and not a conditional ratification, having regard to the provisions that regulate such matters by international law.

Nothing, of course, prevents the other contracting party from entering into fresh negotiations in regard to such modifications; but it must be emphasized that such negotiations are negotiations for a new treaty, the old treaty having become null and void through its conditional ratification. On the other hand, no obligation exists for such party to enter into fresh negotiations, it being a fact that conditional ratification is identical with refusal of ratification, whereby the treaty falls to the ground. Thus, for instance, when the Senate of the United States on December 20, 1900, in consenting to the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, added amendments which modified it, Great Britain did not accept the amendments, and considered the treaty to have fallen to the ground.

Quite particular is the case of a treaty to which a considerable number of states are parties, and which one of the contracting parties ratifies only in part. Thus France, in ratifying the General Act of the Brussels Anti-Slavery Conference of July 2, 1890, excepted from ratification articles 21 to 23 and 42 to 61, and the powers acquiesced in this partial ratification, so that France was not bound by these twenty-three articles.

But it must be emphasized that ratification is only partial and conditional if one or more stipulations of the treaty which have been signed without reservation are exempted from ratification, or if an amending clause is added to the treaty during the process of ratification. It is therefore quite legitimate for a party who, in signing a treaty, made reservations against certain articles to except those articles from ratification, and it would be incorrect to speak in this case of partial ratification.

Again, it is quite legitimate—and one ought not in this case to speak of conditional ratification—for a contracting party, who wants to secure a certain interpretation for certain terms and clauses of a treaty.—

That is the interpretative administrative provision.

—to grant ratification upon the understanding only that they should bear a particular interpretation. In such cases ratification does not introduce an amendment or an alteration, but only fixes the meaning of otherwise doubtful terms and clauses of a treaty.

The leading example of that was, I believe, the declaration of London. It is not mentioned in the immediate context here but I believe it appears later on in the book. Great Britain placed a certain interpretation on certain words of the treaty of London and declined to ratify the treaty unless this interpretation were ensured by proper terms. That, one can understand. But if this be sound, that there can be no such thing as an approval of the treaty conditionally, then it follows that the approval given by the United States constituted an approval with a fresh offer, and this parliament is now asked to accept a fresh offer in addition to the terms of the original treaty. In view of what the minister has said, if those most interested deem it desirable, it may be that it is in the interests of the country as a whole to accept it, and I have no definite opinion on the subject. But it does occur to me, as it does to the minister, that eight years is a long time to wait to have authority conferred upon a commission to enact and promulgate regulations. That is all I desire to say with respect to that point.

Now I want to say a word with respect to procedure. It will be recalled that in 1930, by chapter 10 of the statutes of that year, we passed an act in which we confirmed the treaty to which reference has been made. We are now adding to it three paragraphs which, I contend, on the authority of Oppenheim, constitute a fresh offer which we are accepting, and I do suggest to the Minister of Justice that it would be desirable, from the standpoint of maintaining uniformity of practice, that a short bill should be prepared on the basis of this resolution ratifying, in the terms of this resolution, the three understandings in question. I suggest that only in order that we may maintain uniformity of the practice and procedure which we have initiated in connection with this treaty. The position may be summarized in a few sentences. A treaty was approved by this parliament by a chapter of the statutes of 1930 and now there has been a modification of it—I will leave out the words "understandings" and "reservations" and use the generic term "modification." That modification is comprised in three paragraphs that are now before us, and I suggest, in order that our position may be consistent, that we should now say, in terms of the statute, that we are accepting the new offer, and enact it as a statute of Canada, supplementary to the statute which we passed in 1930.

There remains only one other question that might be mentioned, and that is the effect upon the general situation with respect to what was said by the privy council a few days ago in connection with our treatymaking power. What I wish to direct attention to is this:

It must not be thought that the result of this decision is that Canada is incompetent to legislate in performance of treaty obligations. In totality of legislative powers, dominion and provincial together, she is fully equipped. But the legislative powers remain distributed and if in the exercise of her new functions derived from her new international status she incurs obligations they must, so far as legislation be concerned when they deal with provincial classes of subjects, be dealt with by the totality of powers, in other words, by cooperation between the dominion and the provinces.

If those words have any value—and in my opinion they have not-they perhaps should not be overlooked until such time as they have been overruled.

Mr. CAHAN: Or withdrawn.

Mr. BENNETT: "Withdrawn" may be the proper word, but as it is a hypothetical case perhaps "overruled" would be the more appropriate term. But that factor does arise. It need not be considered in detail, but I think it is my duty to direct attention to it in view of the fact that that pronouncement was made long subsequent to the date of our adoption of the treaty by legislative action, and long subsequent to the date of modification of the treaty by the act of the senate itself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To enact a statute, would not help us at all, if what my right hon. friend is now saying is true.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not suggest that it would, but in my judgment it would strengthen our hands in so far as maintaining the validity of our position on the first statute is concerned, if now that these modifications are made we adopted the same method in dealing with them. Because the language of the Prime Minister's declaration, it will be recalled, is this: he asks parliament to state

. . . it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve of a declaration being made on the part of Canada to the effect that the provisions of the convention may be administered upon the following understandings.

There is, I think, a slight contradiction of terms there. When we talk about giving effect to the provisions of the convention and administering it "upon the following understandings," it is not too much to say that at least in part, that is a modification, and certainly in one particular a very important reservation. In other words, what we looked upon as immediate action will now be delayed action; what we looked upon as continuous improvement will now be delayed for eight years. Regulations which we had hoped would begin to effect the preservation of the fishery in which we are so keenly interested will not, as far as this treaty is concerned, become effective until eight years from the date of ratification. The ratification can probably take place in ten days, but we should have to wait eight years more before we had any promulgation of regulations to effect the preservation of a fishery which we regard as extremely important. The net result is that if the contentions of my friends from British Columbia are correct—and I defer to their views-that we have not been obtaining our portion of this fishery, this state of things will be continued for eight years notwithstanding that article VIII is of very great importance.

Mr. REID: We have obtained a greater catch in the past two years.

Mr. BENNETT: Article VIII reads:

Each high contracting party shall be responsible for the enforcement of the regulations provided by the commission in the portion of their respective waters covered by the convention, and to this end they agree to enact and enforce such legislation as may be necessary to make effective the provisions of this convention. to make effective the provisions of this convention, with appropriate penalties for violations thereof.

For eight years that will have no effect at all. And the seventh article, to which we attach the greatest importance, will become completely nugatory:

Inasmuch as the purpose of this convention is to establish for the high contracting parties, by their joint effort and expense, a fishery by their joint enort and expense, a inshery that is now largely non-existent, each of the high contracting parties should share equally in the fishery. The commission shall, consequently, in regulating the fishery do so with the object of enabling, as nearly as they can, an equal portion of the fish that is allowed to be caught each year to be taken by the fishermen of each high contracting party. fishermen of each high contracting party.

Certainly the effect of this reservation is to render that article completely useless for eight years, because this was to be done by regulation. If it were not that one does not desire to speak in other than respectful terms of the legislative body of another country I would say that our friends from the state of Washington have certainly endeavoured to put it over us. We have laboured incessantly to maintain the principle that as the fish spawn in Canada and are caught in the sea, there should be as nearly as possible an equal division of the fish caught. That was the whole purpose of our efforts. But as it now stands, for eight long years no regulations are to be passed which will in any sense regulate equality of catch by the fishermen of the high contracting parties, although that was the essential matter with which we were dealing.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But if the treaty falls, it will be more than eight years; it will be never.

Mr. BENNETT: If there is no treaty, my hon. friend is entirely right. We would just have to take conditions as they are. But I know that if Canadians were to assert themselves within their legal rights on the Fraser river they could make it difficult for our neighbours to get the spoil of the sea that they now secure. It is because they realize that on the one hand, and we on the other hand desire to have friendly and amicable relations in respect to this great resource, that we said that the catch should be equally divided between us, and that was to be secured by regulation of the fishery. And now for eight years there is to be no regulation. That is my difficulty.

I have no party interest in this matter; if the government, with the fund of knowledge that it possesses respecting the situation which I have not, is of the opinion that to proceed in accordance with the resolution is in the national interest, I am content. I desire only to point out my difficulties, and certainly they are very real, having regard to the purpose of the treaty. The essential part of it was equality of catch. That has been destroyed, for it was to be secured by regulation, and regulations are not even to be promulgated for eight years from the date of ratification. Whether it is worth while to wait eight years for regulations that have effect only if four people agree, two from each country-which of course is an unusual provision but was the only one our friends would accept—is another question. Whether it is worth while to wait eight years, with the experience we have had with this and other treaties, for the purpose of determining whether or not at the end of that period two men representing Canada and two the United States will agree upon regulations that will give Canada half that catch, I cannot say. It is for parliament to determine.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say a word to my right hon. friend in regard to his last remark. In the view of the government the vital thing is to get a commission appointed and get it to work. Experience has shown in regard to the preservation of the halibut that little if anything could be done until a commission was appointed. After the commission was appointed very much was achieved in a comparatively short time. In the case of the halibut fisheries commission no regulations were promulgated in less than eight years; it took that period of scientific investigation and study and experimentation to enable the members of the commission to become agreed on the regulations they wished to make and satisfied they would be practicable. But it did not prevent the governments of the two countries from amending the original convention and giving additional powers and putting through measures which were helpful in the conservation of that resource.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course they can do that without a treaty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I do not agree with that statement. Unless some sort of organization in the nature of a commission is established they will never get together. Once a commission is established with a personnel of three representatives from each country upon it, then you have the necessary machinery wherewith to work towards securing something in the way of agreement between the two countries. Without some such organization it would be very difficult indeed to get agreement. And apart altogether from the matter of regulations promulgated, there are other functions and powers given to the commission, as I indicated at the outset. For example, under articles III to VII, the commission is instructed:

(a) to investigate the natural history of this

(a) to investigate the natural history of this fishery as well as hatchery methods, spawning ground conditions, et cetera;
(b) to conduct fish cultural operations, improve spawning grounds, establish hatcheries, rearing ponds and other facilities for the purpose of stocking convention waters;
(c) to recommend the removal of obstructions to the search of sockeys asymptotic content of the search of tions to the ascent of sockeye salmon;

(d) to report annually upon the commission's investigations and action taken.

Similar powers were given to the commission having to do with halibut-

Mr. BENNETT: Of course halibut and salmon are entirely different. The halibut are deep sea fish entirely, while salmon have their origin in Canada. That is the real difficulty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is quite true, but the means of effecting an agreement between the two countries as the consequence of the appointment of a commission remain the same. An agreement was reached between the United States and Canada on certain matters affecting the conservation of halibut. It was eight years before that commission promulgated regulations. The convention was agreed to in 1923, if I am not mistaken, and it was 1930 before any regulations were promulgated by the commission. In the meantime they had been experimenting and investigating. They had taken action in a number of directions, and on one or two occasions the convention itself was amended. Before this session closes I propose bringing before the house another amendment to the halibut convention arising out of the work of the commission. We believe that once this sockeye salmon commission is established. since it will be in the interests of the United States as well as in the interests of Canada to conserve the sockeye salmon in the Fraser river system, suggestions or possibly recommendations will be put forward by the commission itself which will enable amendments, if necessary, to be made to this convention within the next couple of years, without waiting the expiration of an eight-year period.

As to the other point mentioned by my right hon. friend, I must say that the government does not agree at all with his view that the powers of the commission are in any way altered with respect to dealing with the size of mesh. We believe there is a distinction between the type of gear and the size of mesh. The understanding is that the commission is not to seek in any way to deal with the type of gear in the connection set forth.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps without interrupting the right hon. gentleman I might ask this: If the commission say, "We will have a four-inch mesh," and the laws of Canada and the United States provide for a three-inch mesh, what happens?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The commission has power to deal with the question of the size of the mesh. Let me read again the first sentence of article V:

In order to secure a proper escapement of sockeye salmon during the spring or chinook salmon fishing season, the commission may prescribe the size of the meshes in all fishing gear and appliances. . . .

That is all we need to consider. The understanding is that the commission is not permitted to consider the type of fishing gear and appliances, but the convention gives the commission full authority to deal with the size of meshes for escapement purposes. I want [Mr. Bennett.]

to make that clear, because it is on that interpretation of the understanding that the government is seeking the approval of this house.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): The treaty and the proposed amendments have to do with the run of sockeye salmon in the Fraser river, and as a member representing quite a large number of fishermen on the Fraser river I feel it incumbent on me to say something with regard to this very important matter.

It is well known to those of us who live in British Columbia that the great runs of sockeye salmon have been going down until now they are not nearly as large as they were in former years. In 1913 the catch amounted to some 2,409,760 cases, which dwindled to only 226,093 cases in 1936. In order that the house may better understand what this means in the number of fish caught, let me say that in 1913 over 26,000,000 sockeye salmon were caught, whereas in 1936 only 2,500,000 were caught.

It should be pointed out that the sockeye salmon of the Fraser river are entirely Canadian fish, for it is in the rivers and lakes of British Columbia that the fish are propagated and live for one or two years before heading out to sea. It is to these same rivers and lakes of British Columbia that the fish return to spawn before their life cycle is completed, and then they die. On the return journey, however, they pass through United States waters, where they are caught in large numbers. So much is that the case that up until only two years ago United States fishermen were catching the greater proportion of these fish. In some years their proportion of the total catch rose as high as 78 per cent as against Canada's proportion of 22 per cent. It was felt that something should be done which would permit Canadian fishermen to obtain a larger percentage of the total catch, since these fish are reared in Canadian waters. and since we have spent large sums of money in maintaining and propagating them. That being so, it was considered hardly right or fair that United States fishermen should obtain the greater share of the catch of this variety of salmon.

Briefly that is the story behind the treaty, and from that point of view the treaty is not only commendable but highly desirable. Canada could easily destroy this variety of salmon, but of course that is unthinkable. However, it is strange that the United States should have taken so long to agree to the treaty which was passed by Canada in 1930. While there are many commendable features to this agreement, however, I believe that because of certain conditions which have changed since 1930, when the treaty was first signed, if the treaty were coming before the house now for the first time certain provisions might well be altered. For instance, following the elimination of trap nets by the United States some two years ago, Canada has caught more sockeve salmon than the United States. Last year we caught 78 per cent of the sockeye, so one of the conditions that brought about this treaty has largely disappeared. Canadian fishermen would have little cause to complain if we were assured that no trap fishing would be allowed again by the United States; probably we could get along without a treaty of this kind, but unfortunately we have no such guarantee from the United States. What means will be taken to apportion properly the catch between Canada and the United States of course will have to be worked out later by the commission that is to be set up.

If the entire treaty were coming before the house one criticism I would offer would be that I do not believe the boundary lines are quite correct. On their return to the Fraser river, and before they enter the strait of Juan de Fuca and Puget sound, the salmon are caught in large numbers off cape Flattery at a spot known as Swiftsure bank, the greater part of the fishing being done from twelve to twenty-five miles off cape Flattery. These banks extend out about twelve miles from shore before deep water is reached. Then it is only three hundred feet deep, and as far as thirty miles from shore the water is not more than six hundred feet deep. The most favoured region, however, is the Swiftsure bank, where the water is only 180 feet deep. Hardly a fishing day passes when you cannot find at least 100 boats fishing on these banks. My criticism of the boundaries as defined in the treaty is that the line should have been drawn very much further south than the 48th degree of north latitude. The present line is only some twenty to twenty-five miles south of cape Flattery while the actual fishing bank extends fifty miles to the south.

Again, im article I the high seas boundary is far too vague. The article states that territorial waters on the high seas westward from the western coast of Canada and the United States shall come under the provisions of the convention, and therefore are to be affected by the various orders or regulations which may be issued, but the question arises as to how far westward into the open waters of the Pacific ocean the treaty really extends. Very little difficulty will arise, I think, in regard to the definition of territorial waters. According to international law, territorial waters briefly are those waters within the three-mile limit. The question of the waters beyond the three-mile limit. however, is something else entirely. It is not so easily defined because of the fact that international law, as agreed to and understood by practically all nations, does not recognize the laws of any country on the high seas beyond the three-mile limit. Consider for a moment how this question might affect not only the salmon industry of British Columbia but also the halibut industry, in regard to which I shall have something to say on a later occasion; as we are dealing only with the salmon treaty I shall endeavour to confine my remarks on this resolution to the matter of salmon.

As stated in the treaty, no limit has been placed upon the distance westward, and it is to this I wish to direct the attention of the committee. The question is likely to become one of grave international importance should a foreign country decide to invade these fishing banks, which are well outside the territorial waters or the three mile limit. In these days of modern fishing operations and equipment we see ships, known as mother ships, being outfitted for long fishing expeditions, fully equipped with small power boats used for catching the fish, and with cold storage plants, and so on, to take care of the fish caught. These boats are outfitted for cruises lasting anywhere from six to eight months.

Great Britain has long been a pioneer in this type of fishing, sending her fishing vessels out into many oceans; although so far she has refrained from lending encouragement to fishing on the north Pacific, due no doubt to the fact that she recognizes the difficulties which would arise in Canada and the United States which have a treaty between them regarding halibut. Great Britain's last great fishing invasion was to the coast of Greenland, where six ships were sent out each year, fishing there until fully loaded and then returning to Great Britain.

Japan is another country which will have to be reckoned with in the matter of fishing off the Pacific coast. It is not generally known Japan has over 1,500,000 of her citizens in the fishing industry, which is twice as many as are engaged in the textile industry in Japan. As a matter of fact, Japan is recognized as being supreme in fisheries, the catch by the Japanese amounting to one-quarter of the total world's catch. The Japanese method of fishing consists of sending out large floating canneries, operating on the mother ship principle. These vessels are equipped as canneries. They carry with them the fishing boats and fishing gear. The Japanese have demonstrated that sockeye salmon can be taken on the high seas in deep water and far from shore. They use enormous nets. The length of them is almost unbelievable, being three to five miles in extent. A practical monopoly of the fisheries off the coast of Siberia was granted by the Japanese government to a Japanese concern, and literally hundreds of miles of nets, veritable barriers, were put out in the high seas by fishing vessels and resulted in preventing the salmon from ever reaching the home streams in Siberia. As is well known, so extensive has been the fishing carried on by the Japanese along the Siberian shores that these fisheries have been practically destroyed and Japanese fishing companies have been looking for new fields of enterprise. Since 1930 they have carried on their mother ship operations off the coast of Alaska. I might add that this year they are operating off the coast of Australia, having investigated that field over a period of two or three years.

Previous to last summer Japanese fishing boats off the Alaskan coast were catching only crabs, which, it may interest hon. members to know, in those Alaskan waters sometimes attain a size of three feet. Last summer, however, a new 10,000-ton ship visited the Alaskan waters. It was an experimental vessel from top to bottom, having a reduction plant, cold storage, and the latest, most modern and scientific equipment. From the mother ship power boats were sent off in different directions. They took samples of the sea water, temperatures, et cetera. These boats returned in the evening to the mother ship, when the scientists aboard immediately analyzed the sea water and compared the temperatures. From this they gained information, and could show the fisherman where to fish. That 10,-000-ton boat came on down the Pacific coast, finally calling at Seattle, where it was discovered they had on board some 22,000 cases of salmon caught on the expedition. This catch represented a total of about 270,000 salmon.

According to press dispatches, Mr. Hara, Director of Fisheries in Japan, made a statement in the Japanese Diet that the government intended to encourage Japanese salmon fishermen in the public waters off Alaska. This is being done, in view of the promising nature of the fishing there, as indicated by the information obtained by the expedition ship which visited the shores last year. Already petitions have been filed with the Jananese diet asking for the issuance of licences for fishing salmon outside the three mile limit off the coast of Alaska. It is to be sincerely [Mr. Reid.]

hoped that nothing will be done to precipitate unfriendly feelings or relations between the United States and Japan, but some solution will have to be found for this before any overt act is committed to arouse the violent opposition of United States fishermen, or retaliation from United States commercial interests.

True, for the time being this will not directly affect the salmon fisheries of the Fraser river, but once the Japanese begin their extensive fishing methods off the Alaskan shore, what is to prevent them coming on down the coast and fishing off cape Flattery and within the waters designated in article I? The situation is so serious that I would urge that steps be taken to deal somehow with the matter at this time, believing that the problem should be faced openly and not underground-it is a matter which might become dangerous if submerged. I respectfully suggest, Mr. Chairman, that that matter be discussed at the forthcoming imperial conference. I do not know just what can be done about it, but it is a matter which has international complications. It should be discussed at that conference, before the situation becomes grave.

The sockeye salmon coming to the Fraser river are Canadian fish and, whether caught in the open sea or not, should be definitely declared as such. Canada spent a total of more than $7,000,000 on fisheries in the ten years between 1925 and 1935. The United States have spent $9,000,000 in an endeavour to protect and develop their fisheries in Alaska. The importance of the salmon industry should be judged not only by the number of men engaged in it, but also by the value of the product.

Salmon is one of our most wholesome and outstanding food supplies. Fish as food is perhaps of more importance to a nation such as Japan, which to a considerable extent has to rely on the catch of fish to maintain her people. An appeal might well be made by that country on that ground alone.

The importance of the fishing industry of British Columbia is indicated by the fact that the total capital investment in British Columbia fisheries in 1935 amounted to $20,890,825. The fisheries production in British Columbia was valued at $15,169,529, and that for the whole dominion at $34,427,854. These figures show that British Columbia is in a supreme position in Canada so far as fisheries are concerned. In 1935 there were 10,965 persons engaged in fishing, in connection with British Columbia fisheries, and 6,065 in manufacturing, making a total number of 17,030. There were 5,808 engaged in gill net fishing, alone, with a catch valued at $954,394; there were 320 operating purse seines, with a catch valued at $355,850. In 1935, salmon fishing in British Columbia had a total value of $12,-099,000, and halibut fishing a value of $940,000.

With respect to territorial waters may I say that the straits of Juan de Fuca, which are ten to twenty miles in width, are, I believe, designated as national waters. It is equally important that the waters around Swiftsure bank and for a definite distance off the United States and Canadian shores covering the entire fishing bank should also be designated as United States or Canadian waters. At least in the treaty we should place some definite limits to the high seas boundaries embracing the fishing banks.

I realize there might be some difficulty in this, owing to the fact that international law does not recognize anything outside of the three mile limit, but in view of the seriousness of the matter and the grave problem which may arise, it should not be overlooked at the imperial conference taking place this year. I am strongly of the opinion that had there been no treaty entered into between Canada and the United States in regard to halibut, British fishing boats would have been operating in the north Pacific halibut fishing banks this year, and I have no doubt that Great Britain will adopt the same policy in the matter of our sockeye salmon fishing industry. I am equally as confident, however, that if there had been no treaty, encouragement would have been given by Great Britain to her fishing fleet to operate in these northern Pacific waters, and as is well known, Great Britain has for hundreds of years maintained her right to fish anywhere outside the three mile limit of any and all countries. As recently as 1923 Great Britain dispatched His Majesty's steamship Harabel for the protection of British fishing vessels off the Russian coasts, due to the fact that the Soviet government on May 7, 1923, through the use of gunfire, had captured a British trawler which was fishing just outside the three mile limit of Russian territory. Unless Canada takes steps to declare the sockeye salmon a Canadian fish and Canadian property, little support need be looked for even from Great Britain in the event of our fishing banks being invaded by foreign fishermen.

As I have pointed out, the situation in regard to the sockeye salmon heading for the Fraser river is unique and the contention by us that they are Canadian fish cannot be successfully disputed. The fish are propagated entirely in Canadian rivers and lakes and are fully protected by law and regulation with a view to their preservation. Canada has spent millions of dollars in this connection. Canada and the United States have been working together for years in connection with the halibut and the salmon industries. They have endeavoured to see that these great industries not only do not perish but shall be increased if possible.

The treaty we are now discussing is a culmination of the efforts made by Canada to have the United States cooperate with us, not only in the matter of the equal distribution of the sockeye salmon but also in arriving at methods designed to bring back if possible the industry to the position it held in 1913 when the total pack was two and a half million cases. If we in Canada hatch, develop and preserve this species of salmon, then we have a right to claim them as being Canadian fish outside territorial waters. I believe every hon. member will agree with me when I say that that is what we should do.

Referring for a moment to the duties and functions which will devolve upon this commission to be set up, I contend that it should be urged upon them that more serious consideration should be given than has been given in the past by departmental officials and previous governments to the blocking of rivers and streams by power companies. Some important streams in the Fraser river system have been blocked by the British Columbia Electric Railway Company which has put in dams at Stave river. These dams prevent the salmon from ascending to the spawning beds. I believe a survey has been made of the waters of the Fraser river above Hope. No doubt further electrical power will be required and a constant effort should be made to see that from now on there does not take place on the Fraser what has taken place on the Columbia river. If that ever happens the entire salmon industry will be wiped out.

Dams were erected on the Columbia river, the effect of which has been gradually to destroy the fisheries. Repercussions of this action are now being felt in Canada. It should be pointed out that the variety of salmon known as spring salmon, which are caught in considerable numbers in the waters of British Columbia, are propagated in the Columbia river. Because of the dams and obstructions which have been placed on the Columbia river, the catch of spring salmon has gone down each year. Power wheels have been placed along the Columbia river to lift the salmon over the dams, but these have not proven very successful if at all.

At this point I should like to tell the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) what I told the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) two years ago when he was prime minister, that Canada was lax in her duty when she allowed these obstructions to be placed on the Columbia river without protest. Canada has a considerable interest in that river. It will take me only a moment to quote from the treaty which was signed in 1846. Article II reads:

From the point at which the 49th parallel of north latitude shall be found to intersect the great northern branch of he Columbia river, the navigation of the said branch shall be free and open to the Hudson's Bay Company, and to all British subjects trading with the same, to the point where the said branch meets the main stream of the Columbia, and thence down the said main stream to the ocean, with free access into and through the said river or rivers; it being understood, that all the usual portages along the line thus described shall in like manner be free and open.

In navigating the said river or rivers, British subjects, with their goods and produce, shall be treated on the same footing as citizens of the United States; it being, however, always understood, that nothing in this article shall be construed as preventing, or intended to prevent, the government of the United States from making any regulations respecting the navigation of the said river or rivers, not consistent with the present treaty.

By that treaty British subjects, that is Canadian citizens, were to be allowed free approach and access from the interior of Canada right to the Pacific ocean through United States territory. During the last few years quite a number of dams have been built for power purposes on the Columbia river. These dams have taken away from us the right granted in the treaty of 1846 and we are now beginning to feel the effects of the construction of these dams. Since these dams have been completed, fishing on the Columbia river has practically passed out of existence. Besides the one dam to which I have referred, another dam is nearing completion located about thirty miles from Spokane. This dam will back up the waters of the Columbia river across the boundary line into Canada. This whole matter should be taken up by the International Joint Commission and a claim made by Canada for adequate compensation for the losses sustained through the violation of the treaty of 1846. I need not point out that if Canada had violated such a treaty, the United States would have made immediate representations in protest.

I should like to refer to the third understanding. The Prime Minister has pointed out that while the representation is not compulsory, it is intended that various branches of the industry will be represented upon this commission. I cannot see any reason at the moment why sport fishing should be represented. As is well known, the sockeye salmon [Mr. Reid.]

is not a sport fish. I think the representation on this commission should be confined to commercial and actual workers in the industry. Representations were made only last year by sports clubs in my district to eliminate the commercial fishermen from two rivers. It was pointed out that a six or seven inch mesh net would not stop the sport fish, but these clubs wanted the rivers for themselves. The attitude of the sport fishermen in many parts of Canada does not take into account the men who gain their livelihood from fishing. These sports fishermen are concerned only with having a little pastime generally after their week's work is

I should like to add one word in answer to some statements made by the leader of the opposition. Perhaps I can do this best by asking a question. What further can be done by Canada if the United States will not sign the treaty? The treaty passed this house in 1930 and since that time representations have been made at various times to have it approved by the United States. But they would not do it. I do not agree with the leader of the opposition when he says that nothing can now be done for eight years. During the past two years, since the traps have been prohibited by the Americans, Canada has been getting a greater percentage of the sockeye catch. Last year Canada got 78 per cent of the catch as against 22 per cent caught by the Americans.

The treaty can be summed up as having at least two desirable points. The first is the attempt to equalize the catches as between the United States and Canada, and the second is the preservation of the fish. An attempt is being made to preserve the fish and if possible increase the catch in the Fraser river. As to the preservation of fish, this work has been carried on for some time by the Canadian fisheries department. If one looks over the records of the catches for the past years he will see that the remarks made by the leader of the opposition are not exactly correct. The catch last year of sockeve salmon on the runs to the Fraser river amounted to 226,393 cases. If the catches had been going down every year to the point of depletion, they would not have caught as much as they did in 1932 or 1933.

Mr. BENNETT: That indicates the undesirability of the treaty.

Mr. REID: We have no guarantee that traps will not come back. Having no guarantee, then I say that a treaty is desirable. It is desirable and we are at least assured that for at least two years we shall be able to get a greater proportion of the catch than the Americans because they have agreed to prohibit the use of traps for two years. So that for the next two years there is no doubt that Canada will get the greater proportion of the fish coming through Puget sound waters. But as I say, what further can be done to make the Americans sign a treaty? It would be unthinkable for Canada to go out and destroy the sockeye on the Fraser river just because the Americans will not sign a treaty or because they are getting a greater percentage of the catch. I know the suggestion has been made here and there, but to me it is unthinkable. To my mind we have everything to gain even if nothing is done for eight years, although that contingency is greatly in doubt, and it may well be that, as in the case of the halibut treaty, something will be done after the commission starts to function

I shall reserve further remarks until the committee considers the various clauses, but I thought it incumbent upon me to suggest to the committee the important questions that arise affecting the high seas and territorial waters, point out the possibilities of international complications, and to urge that it is far better for Canada to face the issue at once.

Mr. J. S. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): In view of what has been said, including the interpretation placed upon some of these regulations by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), I should like to place before the committee some information. Reading from fisheries document 1092 of the bureau of fisheries, United States Department of Commerce, I find:

Chinook, quinnat, or king salmon. The largest of the Pacific salmons is the chinook or king salmon. It is found throughout the region from the Ventura river, California, to Norton Sound, Alaska, and on the Asiatic coast as far south as northern China. As knowledge extends, it will probably be recorded in the Arctic.

In the spring the body is silvery, the back, dorsal fin, and caudal fin having more or less of round black spots, and the sides of the head having a peculiar tin-coloured metallic lustre. In the fall the colour is, in some places, black or dirty red. The fish has an average weight of about twenty-two pounds, but——individuals weighing 70 to over 100 pounds are occasionally taken.

This is the point I want to stress.

Dealing with the sockeye, that name being an anglicizing of the apparently Russian word sukkegh—the sockeye, blueback, or red salmon:

The red or sockeye salmon, when it first comes in from the sea is a clear bright blue above in colour, silvery below. Soon after entering the river for the purpose of spawning, the colour of the head changes to a rich olive, the back and sides to crimson, and finally to a dark blood red, and the belly to a dirty white. The maximum weight is about 12 pounds, and length 3 feet, with the average weight about 5 pounds, varying greatly, however, in different localities.

That throws some light on the question of the nets and the meshes of the nets. The plain object of a net is to catch not a few but every fish of a particular type which it is spread to catch, and if the mesh is too large, so that the small fish of that type pass through, it will not be very long before the fish of diminished size will be reproducing themselves in the spawning ground. But in this case, where chinook and sockeye salmon are running together, evidently these regulations are intended to permit the sockeye spawning fish to pass through the net, which is otherwise gauged to catch all the chinook, king or spring salmon.

I thought that that information should be brought out, in view of what has already been said.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Chairman, I would like first to thank the government, and more particularly the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who I think was leading the house when he agreed to bring this matter into the house at the request of myself and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). It is no lack of modesty that leads me to put my name before his, but simply because I brought it up first by a question in the house and then on the orders of the day, and I suffer no least illusion as to what my fate would have been if it had not been for the powerful intervention of the leader of the opposition. I have only to look at the answer that I got to the question which I asked on March 3, when I was told that the reservations or understandings simply constitute clarifications or interpretations upon administrative aspects and therefore it was not necessary to bring them into the house. That, Mr. Chairman, is another illustration of the ever-growing custom in this house, not under this government alone, but under preceding governments as well, of proceeding to eliminate almost all the power and influence of the ordinary common member and giving us government by cabinet rather than by parliament. We hear a lot about the common man, the man in the street, the forgotten man. I think there should be a movement in this house to preserve the rights and jurisdiction of the man who represents the common man —that is, the ordinary member of parliament. Otherwise the day will come when we may get ourselves elected by what methods we can, and stay at home and let the two dozen men who now control this house continue to control it. When I say that I am not referring to the cabinet alone, but to both sides; twelve men on the government side and about eight on this side control the policy of this house. I make that statement without any fear of contradiction from those who know. The rest of us, knowingly or unknowingly, willingly or unwillingly, are merely puppets, merely chessmen on the chess board of political history.

I heard the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), in a debate which I shall not particularize for fear I might be out of order, suggest to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that we should assert ourselves, that Canada should assert itself and should pass certain legislation or acts under the Statute of Westminster. That is perhaps necessary, but I would not use the word "assert"; I would use the word "exercise," because the British government, when it gave us the Statute of Westminster, did so with no niggardly hand. The British are not going to fuss whether we exercise our powers or not. Such language smacks rather of the boy with his watch, anxious to get into a debate as to what the time is. If the hon, member would use his undoubted abilities and his long experience in breaking a lance, as the saying is, for the rights and privileges that are far more precious and far more seriously threatened-I mean those of the common ordinary member of parliament-he would be doing something which I think would be much more effective. I am not going to be called to order for diverging from the subject, and I will confine myself to this particular matter, although I could point readily to repeated instances of this ever-narrowing circle, where successive governments have sought-it is natural and it is convenient-to take power from the ordinary members of parliament and confine it within the ranks of the governing bodies.

In 1929 the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), speaking to a motion respecting the sockeye treaty, said, as reported at page 2630 of Hansard:

It has been intimated to the government that some hon. members of the house would like to have detailed information with respect to this treaty. In order to supply the information which they wish to have, it would appear to be desirable to have the resolution referred to an appropriate committee of the house where that information could be given.

He therefore moved to send it to the marine and fisheries committee, where, he said, we should have the advantage of hearing witnesses, and so on. That was seven years ago. | Mr. Neill.]

That the action was sound at that time is proved by the long and extensive debate that took place in the committee, a debate far more effective and detailed than could have been afforded in committee of the whole house. The matter was thoroughly discussed in that committee for weeks and resulted in a very close vote on the motion for recommendation of the treaty for approval. So close, indeed, was that vote that it was carried by the casting vote of the chairman.

While this is not a new treaty, there are such substantial changes in it as to make a full discussion imperative. It was determined to have it adopted by government action alone and the members of the house would have had no opportunity of learning anything about it except through the columns of the press-and this in connection with a treaty which is of vital importance to the province of British Columbia at least. The leader of the opposition quoted the Prime Minister, as reported at page 3848 of Hansard of last year. The Prime Minister at that time said that while two reservations were not important the third was of such a character as to raise serious difficulties, and he went on to say that it was proposed to discuss the question with the United States authorities in the hope that a more satisfactory solution might be found. I presume that the negotiations took place verbally, because I asked for correspondence the other day and was told that there was none. When the Minister of Justice agreed the other day to bring the matter before the house the decision of the government to do this was phrased in the usual way by the clerk's office; it was to be in committee of the whole. That, of course, means that there may be a full discussion such as we are having to-day. A few days ago we were told that the intention was not to bring the matter to the committee of the whole but merely to discuss it on a motion for the Speaker to leave the chair, which would mean, of course, that the debate would be very much restricted. On a motion for the Speaker to leave the chair there is practically no debate; there are a few set speeches, but no questions can be asked and answered, and the effective value of proper debate is entirely lost. The ordinary procedure with regard to resolutions coming before the house is to have a bill based on the resolution submitted to the committee of the whole, where it can be fully discussed. But this matter, we were told, was not to be dealt with in that way, so that if we had lost this opportunity to-day we should have been confined entirely to set speeches by one or two members, but there would have been no real opportunity for the imparting of information which is so necessary in connection with a matter of this importance. The leader of the opposition has secured these privileges to us, though as a matter of fact they always adhere to the house and should not be taken away; and while I am grateful to him for having secured my right of free speech, I rather resent the necessity of having to shelter under his prestige and influence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am perfectly sure the government would have been only too pleased to accord to my hon. friend the same courtesy as was accorded the leader of the opposition. When I answered the hon. gentleman's question I was making a statement as to the procedure in matters of this kind, but it was always understood that if the hon. gentleman or any other hon. member wished to discuss in detail a matter of this kind the government would not seek to prevent his doing so.

Mr. NEILL: I did not see much evidence of yielding to my request until the leader of the opposition came to my rescue. The statement was made that it was not material.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say that there would be no further discussion.

Mr. NEILL: We will leave it at that. The matter is before us anyhow. I do protest, however, against any lessening of the privileges of the ordinary member, because those privileges are diminishing all the time. Some of the rules of the house are archaic and grotesque having regard to the fact that there are more than two parties in the house. Have we no ability to change the rules? Were not members deprived of their rights the other day owing to the correct interpretation of rules that have been out of date for the last fifteen years? When I speak in this way I am not moved by any personal consideration; I am speaking on behalf of the ordinary member of the house.

As regards this treaty I want to reverse the ordinary process and make one or two comments on matters of detail before dealing with the main principles. As regards reservation No. 1, should there not be at the end the words "or regulations made thereunder"? Most matters dealt with here are effected by means of regulations and if those words were inserted I think it would be clearer.

In reservation No. 2 it is provided that the commission shall not promulgate or enforce regulations until the scientific investigations provided for have been concluded. There are no scientific investigations mentioned in the treaty itself. What this has reference to is the provision contained in article III for the making of an investigation. Article III states:

The commission shall make a thorough investigation into the natural history of the Fraser river sockeye salmon. . . .

And so on. This second reservation provides that the regulations shall not come into effect until the scientific investigations mentioned in the treaty have been made, but the treaty itself makes no mention of scientific investigations.

Reservation No. 2 also provides that the regulations shall not be enforced for a period of two cycles or eight years. What is a cycle? Ordinarily, in connection with sockeye salmon, a cycle is supposed to mean four years; but think the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) will agree with me that, especially in view of the fact that we are adding to our knowledge all the time, many of these fish are now supposed to run a cycle of five years. Again, it says, two cycles or eight years. Does that mean whichever is greater or less? It is rather vaguely worded. It is evident that either party to the treaty or the commission itself could postpone action indefinitely by declaring that the scientific investigations had not been concluded. As a matter of fact scientific investigations are never concluded, for science is always teaching us more and more.

Should not the word "orders" appear after the word "regulations"? Article IV of the treaty does not mention anything about regulations; it speaks of orders, and if we introduce the word "regulations" we ought to connect it up with the word "orders" in some way. When the Prime Minister gives his explanation in reply later on, I submit that he should inform the committee why it was necessary for us to insert the last words:

And that this house do approve of the same; provided that nothing in this resolution contained shall be deemed to prevent the governor in council from exercising at any time any authority in him vested to make effective orders or regulations duly adopted by the said commission.

I do not understand that. If it means anything it contradicts something else and is not necessary. At any rate, it seems superfluous to me, though that may be only because of my lack of knowledge of the subject.

I believe the leader of the opposition said that this was the second attempt that had been made to have a treaty ratified. If I mistake not, it is the fourth attempt; cortainly it is the third. There was one ratified in 1918, but the United States senate turned it down. At any rate this matter has had a long and chequered career, and through all this time I have been a staunch advocate of a treaty. I am therefore more than regretful to have to oppose this substantial amendment of the treaty. I am in favour of a treaty but I consider that the amendment defeats the main purpose of the original treaty. Such a treaty has been the ambition of members of parliament and different governments and officials for many years, and its final ratification was looked upon as a matter for congratulation; and I must say that by far the greater part of the credit for the treaty belongs to the gentleman who is now deputy minister of the Department of Fisheries. When his work in that department comes to be recorded he will be able to point to this as a major achievement in his career and one of which he may well be proud. I know that certain men on the coast who have a flair for and greater access to publicity have succeeded to some extent in taking some of the credit for it; but I have a fair knowledge of the situation and I am thoroughly convinced that the greater part of the credit should go to Doctor Found. And I say that all the more gladly because in other matters it has been my misfortune to oppose his methods.

As regards the first and third provisions, I do not think there is much trouble. I do not agree with all the features of the third, but I do not think there will be much trouble. As regards the second, however, that is something I consider wholly undesirable. The life of the treaty is sixteen years, and to put in a provision that nothing should be done for eight years to my mind renders it highly undesirable. However it may be sugared over, I do not think you can get away from the fact that it means a complete cessation of activities. The commission is to consist of six members, three from each side, and there is a provision in article VI that no action will be taken by the commission unless it is affirmatively voted on by at least two commissioners on each side. That prevents any trouble with one of our commissioners being "got at," as the saying is, or weak-mindedly giving away the interests of Canada. It does assure that at least two of our men will be in accord before anything is done. It will guarantee that they will be practically unanimous.

Then the commissioners must be men of repute. We give them broad powers, and if we cannot trust them we should not appoint them. They are to proceed with what article III calls for, a thorough investigation, and then take appropriate action, and we must suppose that they will not do so [Mr. Neill.]

before they are satisfied. If such is the case, why tie their hands for eight years? We appoint them and say to them "Go and do an important work," and then without knowledge acquired by experience we butt in and say: You must not do anything for eight years but just sit and look nice. The suggestion was made that in this eight years we might get a new convention. Well, if that is the best solution we had better not have this convention; because in eight years we might get a more suitable one. I think the chances would be strengthened rather than lessened if we did not pass this. If it is passed the feeling will be: it is passed and we had better stick to it.

The Prime Minister made a point in connection with the halibut treaty, but I would point out that the conditions are entirely different. In the case of the halibut business the fishing is done far out at sea. We had to begin de novo; we did not know where the banks were; we had to hire a boat to locate them and map them so that we had some vague idea what the treaty was governing. The salmon business is quite different. We have been investigating the salmon situation for thirty years, and if we have not yet acquired enough practical knowledge to be able to formulate rules I do not know when we shall be able to. The trouble has been, not lack of information, but lack of cooperation by the people on the other side of the line. They carried out their investigationtheir books and records are full of it and so are ours-and all that was required was to get together. So that the suggestion that the cases are parallel, and that because seven years passed in the one case, we should by force of law wait eight years in the other is not appropriate. In the case of the halibut, if they had found themselves ready to do something at the end of three years they could do it; but in this case they could not because the law says they are not to do anything for eight years. A treaty of any kind, a bargain of any kind, involves certain concessions on both sides, sacrifices perhaps, restrictions at any rate. But why agree to the restrictions and make the sacrifices and then arrange that we are to get no benefit for eight years?

There is a provision under article VII that each of the parties shall share equally in the catch, that it shall be divided as nearly as possible fifty-fifty each year. That is the crux of the whole deal; the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) put his finger on it. The Minister of Fisheries can tell us that the reason the treaty fell down in years gone by was that the Americans could not see their way to agree to give up the hold they had on our fisheries. They were getting 70 to 79 per cent of the total catch of fish running through Puget sound to the Fraser river, and they would not give way and divide fifty-fifty with us. That is the rock on which the preceding convention was wrecked. Now we have got down to this fifty-fifty division. That was the essence of the whole thing, and we are going to give that up. Whether the advantage now will inure to us or to the other side, I shall deal with in a moment. But when we were getting only 21 to 30 per cent of the fish and the Americans were getting the rest it was highly to our advantage to accept the treaty. Possibly we might be less concerned now if the Americans did not accept the treaty without these reservations, because they took out their traps in Puget sound in 1935 and 1936, and the result was that our catch went up from 21-30 per cent to 52½ per cent in 1935 and to 86 per cent in 1936. That of course reversed the situation. We are now taking the big end. If we had any guarantee of that continuing, which we have not, we would not need to be so concerned about fifty-fifty. If that is so, and if there is any reasonable probability of it continuing we have not so much to gain.

I have alluded to the Americans taking out their traps. They took out 219 on an average. and if our government would insist on the four or five which we maintain being taken out, there is every prospect that the Americans will ban trapping in Puget sound. They have just passed legislation to that effect in Washington. It is suggested that the 86 per cent caught by us last year was caused by natural conditions. That may be so; in any case we put our hand to the treaty on a fifty-fifty basis and I think we should stick to it. But that does not involve the substantial material change which the Prime Minister described last year as being very serious. I would have hoped that the negotiations would be continued to see if we could not get them to accept the treaty as it is.

There is another reason to pause in considering this treaty now. After all we are dealing with things as they are, and times change. We never dreamed for a moment at that time that Japan was going to take the attitude which is now threatened. They sent a huge steamer to Alaskan waters last year, carrying boats which would be equivalent to the dories used in cod fishing on the Atlantic, the steamer acting as the mother ship, and they fished and caught salmon galore. And there is nothing to prevent them practising the same method in these waters off Puget sound; in fact, it is suggested that they will do so. And they are subject to no treaty, no restrictions. The convention was that we shall control our nationals from fishing in certain waters and all the waters westward thereof. That takes in all across to China and Japan. But we cannot control or prevent nationals of other countries from breaking the provisions of the treaty.

I think we might be well advised to pause and see whether anything can be arranged with Japan, or change the treaty if she is going to pursue the same merciless policy that she pursued in Russian waters, observing no rules or seasons or anything but just cleaning out everything. If Japan is going to do that in our waters and in American waters there is no use making a treaty of this kind. And the same thing applies to British ships. It was suggested that a British boat was going to be sent to do the same thing—not necessarily under the auspices of the government, of course.

There is a side line in connection with the halibut treaty that we might follow up. Canada and the United States made the halibut treaty of 1923, but I find that the Washington people inserted a restriction, as they have in this. That restriction was to the effect that none of the nationals or inhabitants or vessels of any other British country shall engage in halibut fishing contrary to the provisions of that treaty. In other words the Americans said: We have made a deal with Canada, and Canada will control her nationals, but what about the British-they might send a boat around and engage in that fishery? Well, I have no doubt this understanding was agreed to at that time, but I am told they have passed a subsequent treaty in which that clause was not inserted. So I think it would be a good thing if in the treaty now forecast by the Prime Minister in regard to halibut we put in a clause binding the British in the same way. An example such as that makes us hesitate to bind ourselves for sixteen years when we can see no definite advantage for eight years certain. I address myself to business men. Suppose I had bought a house, had arranged price and terms and conditions, and sent my agent to close the bargain. Then he comes back and says "Yes, it is all right. I have signed, sealed and delivered the papers in your name, but you cannot have it for eight years." I would be inclined to say, "That is not the bargain I made. I prefer to wait and make a bargain with somebody else who will give me a house right away. At least I want to know what I am going to do, and I cannot tie up my whole future as far as this house is concerned for eight years, and trust that nothing may happen in that period." If we can make a suitable treaty, if we can get the assent of our American cousins to the treaty which we adopted and they signed, by all means let us go ahead, forgetting even these objections I have mentioned. But if they do not agree to that and impose such an onerous condition as inaction for eight years, I do not know that we would not be better to leave the treaty unratified. We are not refusing to ratify it; we are only leaving it in the air, as they left it for so long. Conditions may change; a year or two from now the American government might be very eager to make this deal; two or three years from now we might be glad we did not make it. At least let us not deliver ourselves into this sort of bargain, when there is nothing to be obtained to our advantage for eight years after we sign it.

Mr. STIRLING: I think consideration will have to be given to the question of where control will lie during the eight years if we agree to these reservations. Under this convention a commission is set up, and that commission is given control. At the present time control is in the hands of Canada on one hand, and the United States on the other. If we give that control to the commission and the commission is told that it must not operate for eight years, in whose hands will control lie in the meantime?

Mr. MICHAUD: Control of what?

Mr. STIRLING: Of the fisheries.

Mr. MICHAUD: Of the quantity of fish that may be caught?

Mr. STIRLING: The whole question of the control of the fisheries.

Mr. MICHAUD: Control of the fisheries remains with the respective governments, where it is to-day.

Mr. STIRLING: But just as soon as we ratify this arrangement we hand control to a commission.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Only with respect to such matters as are specifically given to the commission.

Mr. STIRLING: Matters which now are dealt with by Canada.

Mr. BARBER: I think the objection we take to the treaty is occasioned by the delay of eight years. The Prime Minister has pointed out that the delay is to permit scientific investigations to be carried on during that period. We know that scientific investigation was carried on in Canada for eleven years; last session a report was made, and as a result of that report the sockeye hatcheries [Mr. Neill.]

were closed. It may be a question whether it was wise to have that report made last year in view of the fact that this treaty was coming up, and questionable also whether or not action should have been taken based upon that report resulting in the closing of the sockeye hatcheries of British Columbia. I understand that hatcheries and matters having to do with the propagation of fish are supposed to be dealt with under this treaty.

Mr. MICHAUD: That was a report made by the biological board.

Mr. BARBER: They were scientists, just the same.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Might I just say in a word that the government takes the view that unless it is possible to get the two countries together to begin investigation and to initiate measures of conservation in connection with these great fisheries resources, there will after a bit be no fisheries industries left to talk about or fish to divide. The rate at which these resources are being exhausted is appalling, as shown by the figures I have given to the committee this afternoon. Unquestionably the choice lies between seeking to make a beginning by mutual agreement between the countries, in connection with methods of protection, conservation and extension of these fisheries, or allowing matters to continue to drift as they have been drifting for the past few years.

That is the position. Certainly the government wishes that in some particulars the agreement might have been a little different than it is, but from the inquiries we have made at Washington we are satisfied that as matters stand at present it would be impossible to get the senate of the United States to go further than they have gone in this matter. I imagine that these understandings were brought forward in the senate as a means of getting the convention approved and having a start made. It all depends on the faith one has in the good intentions of others as to whether one would say the understandings will be used to block what is of common interest, or interpreted in such a way as to further what is of mutual benefit. We believe it is to the mutual interest of both countries to preserve these resources.

Mr. NEILL: Would that not apply just the same if we did not have the eight-year period? I would trust them to use their judgment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to the eight-year period, I said previously that in the event of the house approving this resolution, in communicating with Washington the fact that the resolution has been approved and that ratification may be agreed upon as a consequence, the government will state that at any time within the eight years we may wish to raise the question of regulations being promulgated at a much earlier date. If after the commission is appointed and the commissioners begin their work they find that it is desirable to promulgate regulations say within one or two years, and we have reason to believe that there is agreement between them to that extent, then we will immediately communicate with Washington and ask that further consideration be given the convention with a view to its modification or to the drafting of some new convention in the light of what has been demonstrated, through investigation, to be to the advantage of both countries. There is every reason to believe that if a proper case is made out it will be favourably viewed, but the main thing is to get the parties together and at least let them begin investigating and considering recommendations for their respective governments which will help conserve this great resource.

Mr. BENNETT: I think perhaps the Prime Minister has not quite followed the significance of the observations made by the hon. member for Yale. The Minister of Fisheries, I am afraid, has overlooked the fact that the moment this treaty comes into effect article V provides that all powers of prohibition and otherwise with respect to fisheries are vested in the commission. I am afraid I did not make myself quite clear. My difficulty is whether or not the regulating power provided for in the reservation or understanding will affect that in any way. The Minister of Fisheries was wrong when he said the Canadian government would have anything more to do with it. The moment this treaty comes into force article IV provides:

The commission is hereby empowered to limit or prohibit taking sockeye salmon in respect of all or any of the waters described in article I of this convention, provided that when any order is adopted by the commission limiting or prohibiting taking sockeye salmon.

Any order adopted by the commission limiting or prohibiting taking sockeye salmon in the

Any order adopted by the commission limiting or prohibiting taking sockeye salmon in the waters covered by this convention, or any part thereof, shall remain in full force and effect unless and until the same be modified or set aside by the commission.

The other article to which I also directed attention has to do with the powers of the commission, subject certainly to the point made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that there is no provision at all in the treaty for scientific investigation. The hon. member for Fraser Valley has just pointed out that after eleven years of effort we have completed that scientific investigation, but it is article IV that gives me concern.

I am afraid I did not make that quite clear. If the regulations are not to be promulgated until after eight years and the authority is vested in this commission immediately after the treaty comes into force, I wonder just what position we will be in. A moment ago the hon. member for Yale spoke to me about it before he mentioned it to the committee, and I said I did not know. Frankly I do not know. When the minister said the control rested with Canada obviously he was wrong. We are divesting ourselves of the responsibility and turning it over to the commission. If the commission is to do nothing, then real force is given to the points made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the hon. member for New Westminster. That is my real difficulty about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I understand it, the powers which already reside in our government with respect to matters of control of the fisheries will continue subject to regulations which may be promulgated.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. STIRLING: It is handed to the commission.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certain powers to do certain things are given the commission, but those powers do not necessarily conflict with the powers of our own department.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not wish to interrupt, but the Prime Minister probably sees that the restriction on fishing is covered by the treaty. That power of restriction is vested in the commission, whereas our parliament has vested itself with the authority to authorize our people to fish in those waters.

Mr. MICHAUD: That power is vested in the commission only for the purpose of attaining the object of the treaty. The ultimate object of the treaty is to ensure an equal division of the fish caught by each country in Fraser river waters. In order to enable nationals of each country to attain that object there is a provision in article IV whereby:

The commission is hereby empowered to limit or prohibit taking sockeye salmon in respect of all or any of the waters described in article I of this convention.

It is evident that article IV is for the purpose of bringing the catch on one side to the same level as that on the other, at a time of the year when normally the run would not be equally distributed.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but is that not done by regulation?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: This regulation says there shall be no limit for eight years.

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And that will clean out our fisheries.

Mr. MICHAUD: If we had no treaty that would continue to prevail.

Mr. BENNETT: For eight years there is to be no treaty.

Mr. NEILL: I say that is what we want, if there is to be no treaty for eight years, but I object to its being in existence and not operative.

Mr. MICHAUD: The equal division of the catch is not the only purpose of the treaty. I am afraid that is a misapprehension under which we have been labouring.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it is conservation on one hand and equality of catch on the other.

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes, and more than that, to bring back the run of sockeye on the Fraser river to the 1913 level, if possible. It is more than conservation. The purpose is to try to increase the quantity of fish in the Fraser river by investigating the possibilities of protecting breeding grounds and preventing the over-catch in American waters of fish coming up to breed in Canadian waters, where Canadians have their only chance of taking them. So considering the purpose behind the treaty, and the powers to be given to the commission, it must be admitted that unless there is some change it will not be possible for the commission to order an equal division of catch on the river. That is certain. However, in view of conditions as they prevail to-day, I am afraid that Canadians will not be the first to ask for a revision of the understanding.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. BENNETT: I think we shall have to say "on division," because I cannot bring myself to follow that part of it.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the resolution?

Mr. BENNETT: Does the government propose to found a bill on it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: It has no authority in law, then.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

NON-RESIDENT INCOME TAX

CONVENTION BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES AS TO RATES AFFECTING INDIVIDUALS AND CORPORATIONS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve of the convention entered into at Washington on the thirtieth day of December, 1936, by the government of Canada and the government of the United States of America, concerning rates of income tax upon non-resident individuals and corporations, and that this house do approve of the same.

Convention between Canada and the United States of America concerning rates of income tax imposed upon non-resident individuals and corporations. Signed at Washington, December 30, 1936.

The government of Canada and the government of the United States of America, being desirous of concluding a reciprocal convention concerning rates of income tax imposed upon non-resident individuals and corporations, have agreed as follows:

Article I

The high contracting parties mutually agree that the income taxation imposed in the two States shall be subject to the following reciprocal provisions:

(a) The rate of income tax imposed by one of the contracting states, in respect of income derived from sources therein, upon individuals residing in the other state, who are not engaged in trade or business in the taxing state and have no office or place of business therein, shall not exceed five per centum for each taxable year, so long as an equivalent or lower rate of income taxation is imposed by the other state upon individuals residing in the former state who are not engaged in trade or business in such other state and do not have an office or place of business therein.

(b) The rate of income tax imposed by one of the contracting states, in respect of dividends derived from sources therein, upon non-resident foreign corporations organized under the laws of the other state, which are not engaged in trade or business in the taxing state and have no office or place of business therein, shall not exceed five per centum for each taxable year, so long as an equivalent or lower rate of income taxation on dividends is imposed by the other state upon corporations organized under the laws of the former state which are not engaged in trade or business in such other state and do not have an office or place of business therein.

(c) Either state shall be at liberty to increase the rate of taxation prescribed by paragraphs (a) and (b) of this article, and in such case the other state shall be released from the requirements of the said paragraphs (a) and (b).

(d) Effect shall be given to the foregoing provisions by both states as and from the first day of January, nineteen hundred and thirty-six.

Article II

The provisions of this convention shall not apply to citizens of the United States of America domiciled or resident in Canada.

Article III

This convention shall be ratified and shall

This convention shall be ratified and shall take effect immediately upon the exchange of ratifications which shall take place at Washington as soon as possible.

Signed, in duplicate, at Washington by the duly authorized representatives of Canada and the United States of America, this thirtieth day of December, in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-six.

For Canada:

(L.S.) Herbert M. Marler Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary

For the United States of America: (L.S.) R. Walton Moore Acting Secretary of State

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee. Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I do not believe I need enter into a long explanation of the convention standing in my name as a resolution on the order paper. It is one between Canada and the United States of America concerning rates of income tax imposed upon non-resident individuals and corporations, and was signed at Washington on December 30, 1936. In May of last year the United States authorities made certain alterations in their income tax law by which it became necessary for persons remitting certain dividends and other forms of income to nonresident aliens to deduct 10 per cent therefrom and pay it to the United States government.

Since 1933 Canada has had a provision in its income tax legislation by which five per cent is deducted from certain dividends and interest being remitted to non-resident aliens. The result was-

Mr. BENNETT: —that we got several millions of dollars in income tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. After the passing of the amendment in the United States the result was that more was deducted from incomes of residents of Canada derived from sources in the United States than was deducted from incomes of residents of the United States derived from sources in Canada. Representations were made by and on behalf of this government, at the time the bill was under consideration in the United States, that the deduction should be five per cent in the case of residents of Canada so that it would be the same as the deduction made here. Before the bill actually became law a change was made in it providing for a treaty with countries contiguous to the United States, the effect of which might be to reduce the deduction to five per cent. I read the following from an explanation of the United States Revenue Act of 1936:

In the case of foreign corporations subject to taxation under this title not engaged in trade or business within the United States and not having any office or place of business therein, there shall be deducted and withheld at the source in the same manner and upon the same items of income as is provided in section 143 a tax equal to 15 per centum thereof, except that in the case of dividends the rate shall be 10 per centum, and except that in the case of corporations organized under the laws of a contiguous country such rate of 10 per centum with respect to dividends shall be reduced to when rate (not less them. 5 now be reduced to such rate (not less than 5 per centum) as may be provided by treaty with such country;

Mr. LAWSON: Is that section 232 of their act?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am reading from the explanation of section 144 of their act. If hon. members will refer to the convention, they will see that clause (a) reads as follows:

(a) The rate of income tax imposed by one of the Contracting States, in respect of income derived from sources therein, upon individuals residing in the other State, who are not engaged in trade or business in the taxing State and have no office or place of business therein, shall not no office or place of business therein, shall not exceed five per centum for each taxable year, so long as an equivalent or lower rate of income taxation is imposed by the other State upon individuals residing in the former State who are not engaged in trade or business in such other State and do not have an office or sleeped business therein. place of business therein.

The effect of that is that on dividends remitted from the United States to Canadian corporations not engaged in trade or business within the United States, and not having any office or place of business in the United States. the rate is five per centum and not ten per centum.

Mr. BENNETT: The same as the Canadian rate.

Mr. ILSLEY: The same as the Canadian rate. Section 211 of the Revenue Act, 1936, of the United States refers to non-resident alien individuals. Subsection (a) reads:

There shall be levied, collected and paid for each taxable year, in lieu of the tax imposed by sections 11 and 12, upon the amount received, by every non-resident alien individual not engaged in trade or business within the United States and not having an office or place of business therein, from sources within the United States as interest (except interest on deposits with persons carrying on the banking business), dividends, rents, salaries, wages, premiums, annuities, compensations, remunerations, emoluments, or other fixed or determinations, emoluments, or other fixed or determinations. able annual or periodical gains, profits, and incomes, a tax of 10 per centum of such amount, except that such rate shall be reduced, in the case of a resident of a contiguous country, to such rate (not less than five per centum), as may be provided by treaty with such country.

So far as the United States is concerned, this treaty is made under authority of that section. The treaty reduces the deduction from ten per centum to five per centum in the case of remittances from United States sources to individuals residing in Canada. It will be noted that this applies not only to dividends but to various forms of income in the case of individuals, and to dividends only in the case of corporations. This reduction will be beneficial to residents of Canada, but it will be particularly beneficial to the government of Canada. The government has been the heaviest loser by the ten per cent deduction on the part of the United States government. A person paying an income tax to the Canadian government is entitled to deduct the amount paid to the United States government. If the income tax is equal to or greater than the ten per cent deduction, the whole loss comes out of the treasury of the dominion. That being so, the benefits of this convention will inure partly to the Canadian resident and partly to the Canadian government.

Mr. BENNETT: Not much to the government; more to the individual.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not so sure about that. I have not made any computation, but it would all come out of the government if the income tax levied in Canada is equal to or greater than the deduction made in the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: A man paying an income tax of $200 can deduct $50 if that is the amount the United States government has taken at the source, but it would be difficult to conceive of a man having such investments in the United States that five per cent of the income thereon would be equal to the income tax paid in this country.

Mr. ILSLEY: I discussed that point with the commissioner and he tells me that there are many such cases. Our tax here is an income tax upon which there are certain exemptions, but the tax there is a gross tax upon the remittances to this country. In many cases it may exceed the income tax paid to the Canadian government. However, that is a minor point. So far as I can see, this convention is to the advantage of Canada. We are not extending any particular concessions to the United States, but the United States is now doing for us just exactly what we have been doing for them since 1933.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. BENNETT: We could not place our rate at ten per cent without discriminating against the United States. It was felt that a rate of ten per cent was too high to be imposed upon British investments in this country. My hon. friend will remember that when he was in opposition there was considerable discussion whether or not there was any warrant for the tax. Many people complained bitterly about it, although in England they impose such a tax at the source. To avoid being discriminatory, we are making the five per cent tax apply to all remittances made to this country. This has brought in a very large sum of money, especially with respect to bearer bonds and things of that kind.

Mr. ILSLEY: Briefly, that is the explanation of this convention, but I shall be glad to answer any questions.

Mr. LAWSON: There are two or three things I had in mind in connection with this convention, but some of them have been dealt with by the minister in his preliminary explanation. I note that paragraphs (a) and (b) of the convention provide that the rates of income tax imposed by the contracting parties shall be so and so. Paragraph (a) relates to the tax to be imposed upon individuals, while paragraph (b) refers to non-resident foreign corporations. As I understand it, the United States act fixes the tax on all income leaving the United States for a foreign country. That is set at 10 per cent in respect of dividends and interest, and 15 per cent in respect of other income.

Mr. BENNETT: Deductible at the source.

Mr. LAWSON: I have not read the American act for some three or four months, but I understand that in the case of a contiguous or adjoining country discretionary power was given to the president to reduce the rate in respect of dividends only to five per cent. I am speaking from recollection when I make that statement. This convention deals with the rates of income tax to be imposed by the contracting states. Will it not be necessary to have legislation of the house of representatives and the senate of the United States to bring this convention into effect, as the discretionary power vested in the president is limited to dividends only? That is the first point I have in mind.

Mr. ILSLEY: This convention is a treaty within the meaning of the constitution of the United States, and must be ratified by the senate.

Mr. LAWSON: On, this is a treaty.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a convention, not a treaty; because you see it does not run in the name of the head of the state; it runs in the name of the government.

Mr. LAWSON: That is very confusing to me, because it is called a convention.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a convention. That is the distinction between it and the halibut treaty. One is in the name of the head of the state; the other is in the name of the government.

Mr. ILSLEY: The United States provides for the reduction by treaty, and this is regarded as a treaty and as requiring ratification by the senate of the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the reason, I take it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a treaty.

Mr. LAWSON: There is no distinction between a non-resident foreign corporation and an individual, because if the whole matter is a treaty and has to be ratified by the senate, then irrespective of what the present provisions of their act may be this provision will supersede it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. LAWSON: The next point I want to raise is this. The persons who may get the benefit of this, both (a) and (b), read "who are not engaged in trade or business" in the taxing state "and do not have an office or place of business therein." There has been a great deal of feeling, shall I say, on the part of many Canadians because of the attempt of the United States to tax them on stock transactions which they have had in the United States in respect of which they are assessed income tax by the United States because of capital gains made in one year, which may never have been drawn; the transactions in truth and in fact may have resulted not in any profit but in a serious loss; and that applies to a substantial number of Canadians. The United States government did hold that by the very purchase and sale of stock on a United States stock exchange one was engaged in trading or business in that country, and if this convention were worded differently than it is, and but for the conjunction "and" before "have not an office or place of business therein," I would not have difficulty. May I take it that if this convention is passed, one will not be carrying on trade or business in the United States unless one has therein an office or place of business?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not sure that I understand the hon. gentleman's question. The matter of taxing individual gains made on the stock market is not within this convention at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. ILSLEY: As I understand the point made by the hon. member he is objecting to the wording thinking that in some way persons in Canada who speculate on the New York stock exchange will be deemed to be carrying on trade or business within the United States.

Mr. LAWSON: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: And that therefore the reduction of the ten per cent to five per cent will not apply in the case of such persons?

Mr. LAWSON: Right.

Mr. ILSLEY: The information I get is that it is not expected that it will be held that such persons are carrying on trade or business within the United States. We take that view.

Mr. LAWSON: That seems rather obscure and indefinite, does it not, in view of the wording of your convention? Let me assume that I, as an individual, buy and sell stock in the United States and have two or three transactions in one year. I want to know, does this convention apply to me? I am a Canadian resident in Canada. In order to know it, I read that I am exempt from the regular rate of income tax in the United States and that I am subject to a five per cent deduction only if I am not engaged in trade in the United States. That is number one. And number two: if I have no office or place of business therein. Now I say, surely that was not intended. Must it not have been the intention, and should this not read, "who are not engaged in trade or business in the United States unless they have an office or place of business there"?

Mr. ILSLEY: All I can say is that it is the view of the Department of National Revenue and of myself that the purchase and sale of stocks on a stock exchange in the United States would not constitute engaging in trade or business in the United States.

Mr. LAWSON: But is it their view?

Mr. ILSLEY: We anticipate that there will be no difficulty about this. I want to point out that there is nothing that could be done in drawing the convention that would meet that situation. The convention had to follow the wording of the United States statute. The United States statute, sections 211 and 143, stated the sort of treaty that could be made. The wording is taken from the United States statute, and the draftsman of the convention could not state it in any words other than the words that are used there. All I can say is that our interpretation of these words is that buying and selling of stocks is not engaging in a trade or business, and that we anticipate that that also will be the interpretation of the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: But is that quite the point?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is.

Mr. BENNETT: This convention deals only with two things. It deals with the income derived from any source, and it deals with dividends. It deals with an income tax based upon an income from any source and from an income derived from dividends. I can cite a case. I had 117 shares of a particular kind of stock in the United States. I have since sold it so I can speak about it. On that they took at the source ten per cent. Under this statute they will take only five per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: That is all there is about it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Right.

Mr. BENNETT: That is all this convention touches—just that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: But the point made by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) is an entirely different one. The question is whether or not the embarking on transactions on the stock exchange and deriving a profit therefrom does not render the stock holder liable to taxation, whether the profit be either capital gain or otherwise. If it is capital gain they say they tax you—and that is all there is about it.

Mr. LAWSON: And I say they should not.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, we have no control over that at the moment. I remember that the issue arose sharply; it was started in the United States, not here.

Mr. ILSLEY: The United States since 1936 does not tax capital gains.

Mr. BENNETT: No, they have stopped it. But these cases referred to by my hon. friend are cases where Canadians are harassed on capital gains they made in the United States during the years that capital gains were taxed. I have not followed what happened to them, [Mr. Ilsley.]

but they were a great deal worried in 1935 and asked to have the matter presented to the government of the United States because they said "We have no business in the United States." And finally the United States drew a sharp distinction between the transaction that my friend might have carried on here through his broker in Toronto, utilizing an American agent, and transactions which he carried on direct with a broker in New York, and there is a clear distinction between the two. In the one case there was never any deposit of moneys to his credit in the New York office; it was all through the Canadian office, and in that case the situation was clear. But if, on the other hand, he embarked on stock market transactions in the United States and made capital gains, the contention was that those gains were liable to taxation because they were profits made in the United States without the intervention of any Canadian house between him and the profit. They drew that distinction clearlyat any rate that is my recollection of what they did.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am advised that they were not taxed because the Canadian was carrying on business or engaging in business in the United States, but because he was making a profit in the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. ILSLEY: I understood that the point made by the hon, member for York South was a little more subtle than that.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course it is.

Mr. ILSLEY: I thought he was making this point, that if the leader of the opposition is drawing an income from the United States, and they ascertained that he bought or sold a share or two on the New York stock exchange, that would disqualify him from taking advantage of the five per cent and would put him in the ten per cent class. I do not think there is anything to be apprehended in that regard. I think that is a purely groundless fear.

Mr. LAWSON: Paragraph (c) reads:

Either state shall be at liberty to increase the rate of taxation prescribed by paragraphs (a) and (b) of this article, and in such case the other state shall be released from the requirements of the said paragraphs (a) and (b).

In other words the convention may be nullified at any time by either party. Will there be founded on this resolution a bill in which discretionary power will be vested in the minister or somebody else to exercise this right of repudiation? If not, how can you acquire the right to do it in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: It will have to take its ordinary course.

Mr. LAWSON: And its ordinary course means doing nothing until parliament meets again.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the intention.

Mr. LAWSON: That is one of the very reasons why Canadians have been subject to a deduction of ten per cent, whereas United States citizens have only been subject to a deduction of five per cent on money leaving this country. I presume nothing could be done about it by pressure on the United States government to change the situation until such time as this parliament was in session; hence this convention. Would it not be wise so to amend the appropriate act that the minister might have discretionary power to deal with the matter between sessions, or to have it done upon recommendation of the minister by order in council, instead of having to wait for another session of parliament to take action if difficulty arose?

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to mention a point I raised in the discussion of the preceding convention. I am rather inclined to think it would be desirable to found a bill on the resolution. It will be recalled that in 1930 we discussed this question when the fisheries convention was under consideration. That was a treaty but we called it a convention at that time and founded a bill upon the resolution. If we desire to take any action predicated upon this resolution it must be crystallized into legislation to enable us to do so. There is no necessity for legislation so far as the five per cent rebate is concerned, and the mutuality of arrangement, which is covered by the treaty. But if we desire to take domestic action in connection with enforcement we have to do it by virtue of legislation, because that is the form in which we give a sanction, if I might use that word without offence, to the provisions of the treaty itself-the convention. If the minister will look at the statutes of 1930 he will see how far we had to go to provide for that situation. It is always desirable to have in the statutes of Canada provision for any action that may be taken by any Canadian department of state for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of a convention. It is quite clear that as between the two countries it is unnecessary; but for domestic enforcement with respect to our own citizens there must be a statute, as my colleague has suggested.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to the necessity of statutes, my right hon. friend a moment ago quoted an authority; was it from Todd.

Mr. BENNETT: No, McNair's edition of Oppenheim.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to quote Todd, on Parliamentary Government in England, volume 1, page 365, under the caption "The right of making treaties.":

It is a peculiar function of sovereignty to make treaties, leagues and alliances with foreign states or princes; and by the law of nations it is essential to the validity of a treaty that it be made by the sovereign power, for then it binds the whole community. In the British empire this sovereign power is vested exclusively in the crown, acting under the advice of its responsible ministers.

This is the part to which I wish to direct attention:

Whatever engagements or contracts the sovereign enters into, no other power within the kingdom can legally delay, resist, or annul; although the king's ministers are responsible to parliament for their participation in the conclusion of any treaty derogatory to the honour and interests of the nation.

The making of treaties carries with it surely all that is necessary in the way of giving it enforcement, unless there are some specific acts which the treaty calls upon the state to perform, and which require additional legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: As to the question of the state being bound as such, in honour or otherwise, to implement its undertakings, as indicated by the document, call it a convention or a treaty, there is no question as far as the other country is concerned. But if the treaty contains provisions that involve the possibility of action being taken in regard to our own citizens it is the practice to crystallize it into legislation. The minister will recall the discussion we had. If he will look at the treaty of 1930—I mention that as an illustration—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I remember it.

Mr. BENNETT: —he will recall that it made provision to deal with our own citizens. If I might express an opinion, I thought possibly it might be better to have legislation in this case; I am not clear about it. But if it does contemplate any action being taken by the minister or by any department of state against Canadian citizens within Canada for the enforcement of its provisions, it should be crystallized into legislation.

Mr. ILSLEY: That has all been gone into carefully, and the commissioner of income tax advises me that he does not think that any compulsory action against any citizens of Canada will be necessary, at least of a character that would require enabling legislation. They are filing income tax returns with us, and we get all the information in that way without further enabling legislation. That is the considered view of the commissioner.

Mr. BENNETT: This convention has not yet been ratified by the United States?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON TAXATION SELECTION OF PERSONNEL AND SETTLEMENT OF TERMS OF REFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River): Before the orders of the day are called I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. On February 16 last the Prime Minister made the following announcement to the house:

... we propose to appoint a royal commission of inquiry to investigate the whole system of taxation in the dominion.

Will the Prime Minister be good enough to say whether the members of this commission have already been selected, and if so, who they are?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I might answer in the one word "No" the question whether the members have been appointed. They have not. I might say to the hon. member, however, that the government have been giving very careful consideration to the personnel and the terms of reference of the commission. My hon, friend will realize that it is not a matter merely of deciding upon whom the government would wish to have serve on the commission; it is necessary to ascertain whether the persons desired are available. This takes a little time, and I am afraid that until after prorogation it will not be possible to settle finally either the personnel or the terms of reference. It is one of a number of matters that will perhaps have to be more carefully considered once we are through with the business of the house.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

THE PARLIAMENTARY GUIDE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): The other day reference was made in this chamber to the distribution of The Parliamentary Guide. I notice this afternoon that the guide has been distributed to the members of this house. I should like to know if there is any item in the estimates providing for such distribution, and if so, whether such item has been passed.

Hon. C. A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I do not know anything about it, but I will take note of my hon. friend's question.

Mr. HEAPS: Objection has been taken in past years to the distribution of the Guide to the members, and I was under the impression that no more were to be distributed to them. If such is the case I should like to know who gave authority for this distribution.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is the hon, member objecting?

Mr. HEAPS: I certainly am.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The matter might be looked into, and if there is any information I can give my hon. friend later, I shall be very happy to do so. At the moment I know nothing about the distribution of the Guide.

Hon. J. E. LAWSON (York South): In view of the statement of the Prime Minister I would suggest to him that it might be enlightening were he to read the statement of his Secretary of State given to the house the day before yesterday, from which we understood that the reason there had not been distribution was because there had been a failure to provide for payment in the estimates of this session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be very glad to do that.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE FURTHER LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I promised the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) that I would make a statement to-day as to the further bills to be brought down by the government before the end of the session. I might say that owing to the necessity of having either prorogation or some weeks' adjournment before very long the government has sought to curtail its legislative program from now on as much as possible. If it should be found impossible to conclude what is already before the house and appears on the orders of the day, and such additional measures as I shall mention now, before prorogation or an adjournment which would permit of the house continuing later on in the summer, of course we would wish to be free to bring forward further legislation. That may have to be considered, but I do not expect it will be necessary. At the present time our intention is simply, in addition to what is already on the order paper or indicated by what we have already had before us, to introduce a bill to approve the new halibut convention signed at Ottawa, January 30, 1937, amending the existing convention of 1922 and 1930, a bill respecting the guarantee of seed grain loans, a bill respecting the stores of the Department of Transport, a minor amendment to the Immigration Act, and supplementary estimates for the fiscal year 1937-38. As to whether or not legislation will be necessary with respect to the agreement with Germany, I cannot say at the moment. I prefer that that matter should be left over for decision until the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce who negotiated the agreement is back in the city. I expect he will be here on Monday next. I cannot say whether there will be any legislation arising out of the reports of committees. up to the present there does not appear to be any. That includes, I think, all that the government propose to bring down.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Does the legislative program outlined by the Prime Minister preclude any consideration of steps by the government to implement the recommendations of the Veterans' Assistance Commission?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I expect the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) will be here next week, and I shall direct his attention to my hon. friend's question, and have an answer given later on.

CORONATION POSTAGE STAMPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) in regard to the issue of coronation stamps. I understand that only one denomination of stamp is going to be issued. In view of the demand for the stamps and the fact that this is coronation year in most of the countries of the world, would the Postmaster General care to make a statement? I would point out that by the issue of a full complement of stamps we should on a conservative estimate stand to make half a million dollars. That is the financial aspect. The other is that a complete series of stamps for the coronation should be issued in commemoration of the occasion.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Postmaster General): There will be only one stamp issued as a coronation stamp. That has been the practice in the old country, and this is the first time a coronation stamp is being issued in this country.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

ARRANGEMENT WITH CORPORATION RESPECTING LINES AND SERVICES FOR TRANSPORT OF PASSENGERS, GOODS AND MAILS

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 74, to establish a corporation to be known as Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Before the motion is put I should like to say a few words on this bill. I believe that Canadians in every part of the nation are keenly interested in the establishment of a trans-Canada air service. For this reason, and also because the terms of the bill have only been available for a day or two for study by members of the house, the press and the public, I think we should give the principles of the bill full and careful consideration.

This is one bill that should not be rushed through the house. It is one of the most important to come before parliament not only during the present session but during the life of this parliament, because it lays down an air transport policy for Canada. Such a policy is bound to be a long term policy; I think the minister will agree with me in that. Once such a policy has been adopted it will be hard to change, and we do not want to make any mistake at the start.

Incidentally, this bill seems to change the air policy which Canada has followed in the past and which we have been led to believe would be followed in the future, in that it puts the government into the actual business of operating our main airways. I will admit that at first such operation is indirect, through the Canadian National Railways, but provision is made for the government to take over the trans-Canada air lines at any time, which of course would mean direct government operation. The old Canadian air policy was that the government should supply the aids to navigation leaving private companies to conduct the actual flying operations and to take the lead in extending flying in Canada.

Personally I am heartily in favour of the establishment of a trans-Canada air service at the earliest possible date. Last year I advocated the adoption by Canada of a bold, progressive air policy, because it would do much to draw the different parts of our nation together, and because the Canadian people are a progressive people, greatly interested in flying, and such a policy would do much to hearten them. But I have doubts with regard to the air policy now announced, and I should like the minister to explain two or three aspects of the air policy which is being established by this bill before it is given second reading.

First I would ask the minister to explain why the government does not take the lead by organizing this new trans-Canada air line itself, instead of placing the burden on the Canadian National Railway, which already has all it can handle in connection with railway problems. In this bill the government actually asks the Canadian National to give the leadership that is required in developing Canada's air policy. It may be wise for the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific to have an interest in the new trans-Canada air line, perhaps a controlling interest, but I suggest that it is unfair to make the Canadian National responsible for the success of this new company. After all, our Canadian National Railway is doing its job of railroading and doing that job very well, but it is not organized to set up an air transportation system or to organize and supervise any such system. The railway has no department for air service; it is not in a position to decide who is to control this new line, how it is to be managed, how it is to be operated and so on; yet this bill places that burden on the Canadian National.

The bill goes further; it asks the Canadian National to establish a competitor. This air company will compete with the railways in the most direct way possible. It will compete with the main line of the Canadian National; it will serve the same part of Canada. It will compete not only in passenger traffic but also in the carriage of goods. It is not clear whether or not the bill covers freight as well as express, but as it is worded I think it might cover both. The air company will also be competing in the carriage of mail, which is probably even more important to the railways than the competition for the carriage of passengers and goods.

It would not be so bad if the minister could assure the house that any air company or companies already operating successfully and on a reasonably large scale are prepared to cooperate and take an active part in the formation of this trans-Canada air line, in directing the operations of the new company and in giving the leadership that will be required. Apparently such is not the case. In introducing this bill the other evening the minister said, at page 2042 of Hansard:

The Canadian National Railways will underwrite, in the first instance, the stock of this company and distribute it among firms at present engaged in aviation in Canada which wish to participate.

That does not sound as though any of these air companies now operating are prepared to come in and make this new air company work. It would seem that the government only hopes that the Canadian National will be able to persuade such company or companies to cooperate. I cannot emphasize too strongly the importance of having at least one of our real air companies participating actively and having a real voice in the management of the new Trans-Canada Air Lines, because the record of these companies shows that with their leadership we may expect not only prompt action, which is very important, but also a bold, progressive policy.

In support of that statement I should like to refer to what these private companies have actually done in Canada during the last few years without any government assistance other than a subsidy for the carriage of mails. These are the approximate figures in regard to the services rendered by private air companies in Canada. In 1933 they carried about 539.000 pounds of mail. In 1936 that figure had jumped to 1.500.000 pounds. In 1933 they carried 85,000 passengers. I have not the figure for 1936, but by 1935 the number had more than doubled for that year they carried 177,000 passengers. In 1933 they carried 4,000,000 pounds of freight, and it is estimated that in 1936 they carried 27,000,000 pounds; in other words, in those four years the amount of freight carried increased to six times the earlier figure. In short, Mr. Speaker, these private air companies have opened up a new Canada for us in our north country. I submit to the minister that unless there is a real company actually ready and willing to cooperate, this bill will set up a trans-Canada air line which will be without life, without any punch, and which will not be in a position to give real leadership. Really it will be just a sort of hybrid organization in which there will be none of the initiative we would get in a trans-Canada air line operated by a private company experienced in the business of air transportation. After all, in promoting air services, whether in Canada or any other country, a great deal of initiative is necessary, far more than is required in any ordinary line of development.

Then I think the minister should explain why the British plan would not work in Canada. As I understood his explanation to the house the other night, in Great Britain the government works through Imperial Airways, which is a private company subsidized by the government. I believe the British government owns about 25 per cent of the shares, and is able to say what service will be given, what routes will be flown, what schedules will be maintained, and so on. Here in Canada we already have several air companies. Mind you, I do not stress one more than another, but we have, for example, Canadian Airways Limited, with a splendid operating record. The Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific each have invested $250,000 in this company. Why does not the government pick out one of our Canadian air companies and then back it up? We are going to subsidize the new company in any event. It seems to me that the government is much too worried about the number of air companies in Canada. Referring again to page 2042 of Hansard, the minister said:

It might be argued that the government should do this direct, but I think everyone here will appreciate the impossibility of working out a plan involving a great number of competitors. . . .

Why should there be a great number of competitors? Why cannot the government adopt the British plan, pick out one company and subsidize it, and see that this company does its job properly? Surely it would be possible to arrange with one of these companies for supervision and control by the government. I have no doubt the government could even arrange to have directors on the board, just as it proposes to do in regard to the new company set up under this bill, and could arrange for a restriction on share transfers, for the right to the government to buy all the shares and for the strict limitation of profits.

I should also like the minister to explain whether the new company is to do the actual flying, or whether it is to engage other companies to do it? There is some doubt left by the bill; I would refer the house to paragraph (a) of section 13:

The corporation is authorized (a) to establish, operate and maintain air lines or regular services of aircraft, of all kinds, to carry on the business of transporting passengers and goods by air, and to enter into contracts for the transport of mails, passengers and goods by any means, and either by the corporation's own aircraft and conveyances or by means of the aircraft and conveyances of others. . . .

In either case there is small incentive to a privately owned air transport company to furnish capital for the new company; and also if the intention is that private companies are to do the actual flying they will have to do it at a profit, and there will be no such thing as a national service at or near cost, as promised the other night by the minister.

Finally I would ask the minister to explain how much of the capital of $5,000,000 is to be found by the government acting through the Canadian National Railway; how much the minister expects to have subscribed from other sources, and from what other sources he hopes that capital will be subscribed? I believe the house is entitled to the information before it adopts the principle of the new bill, the effects of which will be so far-reaching. These questions have been puzzling me and, I believe, many other Canadians. I hope the minister will answer because my questions are asked not with any idea of annoying him or the government or in any spirit of partisanship, because I believe the trans-Canada air system should be kept above party politics. They are asked simply because I want to see our trans-Canada air lines a great success and an inspiration to the Canadian people.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there are one or two further questions I should like to ask. I agree with the hon, member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) that it does seem a very awkward arrangement to ask an already overburdened railway company to carry out the organization. In fact, it seems to me that we are getting so many commissions of one kind or another that it is difficult for us definitely to place responsibility. I believe that is a much needed requirement. However, instead of looking to private companies and private initiative as the hon. member suggests, I cannot see why the government could not undertake a service of this kind, not through a separate department but rather through the formation of a commission.

Last session we revised the set-up of the broadcasting commission. I suppose the new set-up is of too recent date for us to judge as to its success or failure, but it does seem to me that in many respects the problem connected with broadcasting is very similar to that of the air lines. It is a new kind of service, one which may compete with an existing service, one which covers the whole country and in connection with which there must be more or less of a monopoly. Further it is a service so intimately related to the whole life of the country that it seems to me it must in the long run necessarily come under government control. So I cannot see why at this stage, rather than with great effort later on, we should not set up a distinct body under government control to initiate and, if necessary, to operate or at least to regulate flying.

Again, I notice the government must subsidize the corporation's deficits during the initial period, but the initial period is not definitely stated. I notice, however, that according to paragraph (g) of section 14 the term of the contract shall be not less than ten years.

Mr. BENNETT: The definition appears in paragraph (g) of the interpretation section.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does it mean that the subsidy covers a period of ten years?

Mr. BENNETT: The period ends December 31, 1939.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It does seem to me that if the country is to be called upon to subsidize the air lines to the extent of the deficit, there is no reason whatever why the government ought not to be granted shares in that company, at least to the extent of the subsidies. I would go further than that, because after all the government is virtually giving a very valuable franchise, and something which is really in the nature of a monopoly. I cannot see why the government should not own the majority of the stock. Surely the lessons we have learned from railway building have taught us that the people, through the government, ought not only to retain control but maintain a controlling financial interest in the corporation.

These are matters upon which from a reading of the bill I am not very clear. Before the principle of the bill is accepted I should like to hear a full explanation from the minister.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I confess I have read the bill with sympathetic consideration of the difficulties of the minister on the one hand, and an endeavour to see what could be done to protect the public interests, on the other. On the second reading of a bill we are supposed to accept or reject the principle. It is improper to consider the bill section by section, and it is contrary to the rules to endeavour to relate one section to another. We are supposed only to discuss what we call the principle of the measure.

What are the principles of this measure? From a careful reading of it I have endeavoured to summarize them, and I would say the first principle is that a corporation is to be created by the government of the country, which corporation is to have a capital of $5,000,000, the provisional directors being employees of the crown at Ottawa. That is principle number one.

The second principle is that the shares thus authorized by parliament are to be sold by the corporation through indirect, not direct, methods. In other words the Canadian National Railways are to underwrite the issue. They are not to underwrite in the sense in which the term is used in business, namely, to become absolutely responsible, between the crown and the railways for $5.000,000, but to be charged with the responsibility and at the same time have the opportunity to sell these shares. That is principle number two.

Principle number three arises out of the statement of principle number two. I regard that as being somewhat difficult to understand and appreciate. It permits the Canadian National Railways to underwrite and dispose of the shares. Perhaps I should read the section applicable:

The shares of the capital stock of the corporation shall be offered for subscription to the Canadian National Railway Company, and in the event of non-subscription of any of the said shares by the said company such shares not subscribed for shall be offered for subscription to such other persons engaged or interested in aviation as are approved by the minister.

I venture to suggest that hon, members of this house will find it very difficult to find another measure of this kind which has been submitted for their consideration. First of all, the Canadian National and the Minister of Transport are one and the same thing to all intents and purposes. I am sorry to say that that is so, but it is. There never has been a more complete domination of an enterprise than that of the minister over the Canadian National at the present time. That being so, he is offering to himself in another capacity the shares of the enterprise. He says: Do you want them or not? Inasmuch as that involves a capital expenditure, Mr. Hungerford as director will say to the minister: As this is a capital expenditure and as we have not the money, will you tell us whether or not we can subscribe for them because you have to find the money? Whereupon the minister says: Certainly. That means the Dominion of Canada finds the money; that means the minister, as Minister of Transport, finds the money. That principle is there and you cannot get away from it. Is that a sound principle?

I have asked myself a dozen times why the minister has not said at once that the Dominion of Canada is going to subscribe for these $5,000,000 of shares, instead of saying that five men in the public service shall be created into a corporation and they shall offer to the Canadian National Railways, which administratively is a part of the Department of Transport, the shares of the air corporation. The only answer the railways can make is: We want them if you will give us the money to pay for them. The minister then says: I will give myself the money in another capacity to subscribe and pay for the shares.

Let us go to the next principle. If he concludes that he will not sell the shares to himself or provide the money with which to buy them from himself he then says: I am going to offer them for sale. But to whom does he offer them? Not the public. He offers them to other persons engaged or interested in aviation, approved by himself. In other words, the persons who may subscribe for shares in this corporation, the deficits of which we are to pay, are persons of whom the minister must approve and who are interested or engaged in aviation.

The $5,000,000 has been subscribed. The next principle is that the corporation cannot take anything in the way of second-hand air craft or worn out equipment in payment for the subscription for shares unless in the opinion of the minister such property or services have a value equivalent to the total nominal amount of the shares, or of the call made in respect of the shares. We are limiting subscriptions to those interested or engaged in aviation. Then we say that if they want to trade in worn out equipment or machines, they can do so only if the minister thinks they are worth the amount of their subscription. That is unusual. There have been several lawsuits which have gone to the court of last resort based on that very thing.

Mr. HOWE: Read the next lines.

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that. They read:

—the directors shall be jointly and severally liable to pay to the corporation the total nominal amount of the shares or of the call, as the case may be.

The supreme court here decided that question not long ago. Now we have our enterprise created. We have the people engaged or interested in aviation as our shareholders; or we have the minister in another name—in the name of the Canadian National—as the share-holder. Then what happens? Any one who has bought these shares can sell them only to such persons engaged or interested in aviation as are approved by the minister. He must approve those who buy the shares in the first place, and approve those to whom they may sell. That is restraint of alienation, and the courts have had something to say about that, although this parliament undoubtedly has the right to impose such a principle.

The next principle deals with the ownership of the shares, and I do not think any one can object to that. But now we come to the most delightful of all principles. I know this will interest the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) because he is involved. If the minister wants to buy the outfit he may do so with the approval of the governor in council, which is his colleagues. He is not going to pay the cost of the shares; he is going to pay the book value, and if necessary, that book value is to be determined by the Exchequer Court of Canada. Any of us who have had to do with these matters know that when you are dealing with book values you are confronted with franchise values and things like that. That is where the joker is.

Mr. HOWE: Franchise has nothing to do with the book value.

Mr. BENNETT: Contracts may have been entered into to carry mail, and for their purposes they would be considered part of the book value. These shares are to be held by the minister in trust for His Majesty. The next principle is a simple one. Section 14 reads:

The governor in council may authorize the minister to enter into a contract with the corporation (to be known as the trans-Canada contract) for the organization, operation and maintenance by the corporation of lines of aircraft (to be known as the trans-Canada lines) for the speedy and efficient transport across Canada and between and within the several provinces of passengers and goods.

There is one paragraph in this section which is exceedingly interesting. Paragraph (c) reads:

(c) for the payment to the corporation, at the end of each calendar year of the initial period, of a subsidy equal to the deficit, if any, resulting from operations during such calendar year, which subsidy shall be payable out of moneys to be appropriated by parliament for that purpose;

Those of us who during the last few years have had to consider the difficulties faced by this country in connection with railways know that the initial difficulty arose through the operations of the contracting firm of Mackenzie and Mann. This was a construction company building railroads. A contract was made with the Mackenzie and Mann Construction Company to build the railroad for the subsidy and the shares and the bonds. They sold the bonds, and they had the subsidy and the shares as their profit as contractors. The railway company can buy this corporation only if we find the $5,000,000 for them. I ask if it is desirable that we should at this stage provide for the payment of the deficits of this corporation.

Mr. DUNNING: It is only for two years.

Mr. BENNETT: I know it is only for two years.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The initial period.

Mr. BENNETT: That was exactly the story put up by Mackenzie and Mann.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No similarity at all.

Mr. BENNETT: The similarity existed before the hon. gentleman came to this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have heard about it.

Mr. BENNETT: I know what happened in connection with that. Let us now turn to the next principle embodied in the bill. This company shall have a contract with the government. This contract is for the carriage of mails, and thus far the carriage of mails has been a profitable operation for the companies that have participated. If the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) were to give the details it would be found that the sums paid in subsidies for mail carrying were the moneys upon which the companies relied. And the contract shall be coterminous with the Trans-Canada contract. That principle, I think, should be applied in an entirely different way from the manner indicated. Questions of rates and matters of that sort are to be dealt with in the manner indicated by the bill; that is a matter of detail and need not be further discussed.

I submit that in the light of the experience we have had in this country, if we are going into this air line business we should own it from the start, and not later.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Vancouver South will not agree with me, but I am pointing out that inasmuch as we are called upon—it is one of the principles of this measure—to pay the corporation's dividends we might as well start in as we did with other [Mr. Bennett.]

enterprises and say that we are going to direct the policy from the beginning. One of the difficulties to-day about the railroads is that we had nothing to do with laying them out. They were laid out for contractors, and not for the public. They were laid out for the mileage and for the subsidy, and not otherwise. Here is a franchise which is going to be very valuable—a franchise for carrying the mails and passengers all the way from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Shall we part with that franchise or not? Shall we hand it over to a private enterprise or not? That is what is involved in the principle of this measure.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of National Defence shakes his head and says "no." If the control of the company is vested in other than the crown or the railway, the things follow that I have mentioned, and therefore the contracts and everything connected with them inure to the benefit of the corporation, which is not the crown. That is the reason the minister provided that the crown may expropriate. Otherwise why provide for expropriation?

I submit that the proper course to pursue at this time is as I have suggested. What the future may disclose I cannot say. We are on the threshold of great advances. Anyone who has followed the story of aviation in this country and abroad and who knows what man has done to overcome difficulties, how he has been able to bridge in days distances that used to take weeks, how, for example, he has been able to fly from the Cape of Good Hope to London in a few days, in contrast with the long journeys of former years, realizes that in making arrangements for flying across Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific we are dealing with matters which are on the threshold of tremendous developments.

It may well be that we shall conclude later that it is desirable to pursue some other course. We should not now provide that the people may acquire later something that they are parting with. It should be the other way about,—that we may, if we so desire, sell, instead of our buying back something that we ourselves created. As we are creating it, let us hold it. As we are making it, let us keep it. And if in the fulness of time it is desirable that themanagement and operation should pass, let it pass. We shall have something in the way of control that will enable us to dictate policies, to provide for the hundred and one-things that cannot be foreseen at the moment. And who suffers if we do that?

It is obvious that the Canadian National Railway cannot take over this enterprise except by paying for it money which we in the end will have to find. With a deficit last year of $43,000,000 and this year estimated at $35,000,000, it is obvious that the necessary $5,000,000 must come from us. And as it is to come from us, let us own the enterprise now. That is what I say to the minister. I ask him to revise this bill to provide that at the start the ownership shall rest with us: that the shares and the capital stock shall be owned by the minister in right of the crown, in trust for the crown. If that is done, we shall not have parted with something which may have a value that I, for one, cannot possibly estimate.

If I jocularly referred to the difficulties of underwriting by the Canadian National Railways, I did it because the Canadian National and the government are, with respect to financial matters, one and the same. But, sir, this cannot be regarded in any sense as a party matter. It should not be. Certainly I have not suggested to any of those with whom I am associated that they should take a particular view of the matter. The opinions I express are my own, as the views expressed by the hon, member for Vancouver South are his. I have had at least some experience with respect to these matters. Perhaps it is less personal and direct than that of some others, but I know well the evils that have come upon this country through such courses as are contemplated here. It may be said that government ownership is always inefficient, that it always has been. I am not prepared to say that it need be, but even though there is inefficiency we can devise methods by which efficiency can be secured and the property retained in the people.

This is my plea to the minister. This bill need be modified only to the extent of providing that the capital stock shall be such and such and shall be provided out of the con-solidated revenue of the country, which is where it will come from in the end if the underwriting is taken up by the railway. That would enable the company to make contracts with the Canadian National Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway if they so desired, the same as they do in other countries, to correlate their carrying activities with those of the railways. In the United States for instance, as is well known, provision is made whereby passengers may, if they so desire, travel by air during part of the day and in pullmans during the other part of the day. That might easily happen in this country in connection with both railroads; it could happen without the railroads being shareholders. If it were thought desirable that others should be brought into the enterprise as minority shareholders, that could be done.

The plea made by the hon, member for Vancouver South for those who have been pioneers in this branch of transportation is something to which I referred the other evening. I realize that we put $250,000 into the Trans-Canada line—the Canadian National did, but we found the money-and the Canadian Pacific Railway put in $250,000; and the contracts were cancelled within the terms of the contracts because as I said on another occasion, we could not contemplate the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars to drive aeroplanes through dust that men could not see through, representing the spoliation of the farms of western Canada, where we had to disburse millions of dollars for relief. The service could not be continued under those conditions, and therefore within the terms of the contract we discontinued it. There are certain claims in that connection which may be of such an equitable character that the government will desire to give them consideration for the sake of the shareholders, and perhaps have the shareholders represented on the directorate for the purpose of obtaining the benefit of their wise judgment and large experience.

But I do now implore the minister not to part with this property. To-night the field is clear. To-night no franchise encumbers the ground. To-night we stand in a position to create by act of this parliament an enterprise that will have complete control of aerial navigation between the Atlantic and the Pacific. We have that right tonight. If we pass this measure and hand this right over, not to the crown but to a body of shareholders, and provide that the crown may buy it back some time in the future if it so desires, we shall be going in the wrong direction. I plead with the minister to reverse the process, to own the enterprise now, and sell it later if he so desires. That is the difference between the minister's view and mine of the principles that underlie this measure.

I make this suggestion to the minister not because I can be said to be one of those who believe in public ownership and control, for I have not that reputation, but because I have found by grim experience that the condition that now exists in Canada with respect to railroads has arisen in consequence of the blunder we made. We cannot make a blunder if we keep what we have got; and what we have got to-night is control of the whole matter. It seems to me, therefore, wise to take initial steps to ensure that that control shall be retained by the action of this parliament, and if we desire later to terminate it or to part with it, we may do so through an act of this house and as a result of the intelligent expression of opinion by members of parliament.

I have no desire to go into the matter at greater length, nor do I wish at this moment to go into details, because that will have to be done in committee. But I do hope that the minister will not part with control as this bill provides—control which in my judgment is so essential to our success in view of all the difficulties that will confront us—and we shall then be in a position to cope with the situation in a manner that will be denied us if we adopt the principle of this measure.

I certainly am desirous of assisting the minister as far as it is in my power to do, but I cannot assist him in having parliament give its approval to this principle. In expressing these views I assure him that I am not putting Them forward as embodying a council of perffection, nor am I for a moment suggesting that I know better than he does what ought to be done. I am asserting, however, that the experience of this country indicates that now is the time for us to hold what we have, just as we did with the radio, so that if ever we have to part with it, or if we desire to do so, we may at least have a clear appreciation of the value of our franchise and of our properties, and the value of the contracts that we are making in one of the branches of government for the carrying of the mails. That is all I have to say in urging the minister to weigh all these considerations before we commit ourselves to the principle of this measure.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): I wish to say a word or two because I consider this bill a very important one and I should not like to express in an adverse vote the stand I take on this question without first giving a statement of my reasons for doing so. I have long held the view that some definite steps should be taken for the establishment of a trans-Canada air service. I urged it some years ago, and I have always been one of those who have held very strong views on the subject. So that I have no criticism of the minister in taking some step towards the accomplishment of that end.

On examining the bill, however—and in the haste with which we are doing things these days one has little time to look carefully into some of these measures—I am perturbed perhaps rather more by its form than by its real intent. It will be noted that the bill in its general form is in the style of a public bill; that is clear from the short title and the preamble. But when we turn to the constitution of the corporation we find that the bill is cast in a different form. It provides for the incorporation of certain individuals under the name of Trans-Canada Air Lines, which is the form used for private legislation. In other words, we have in this bill a mixture of private and public legislation. That is my first objection to the bill.

In the second place I object to the bill for the reason that in the part of it that provides for the capital stock it is stated that the shares of the capital stock of the corporation:

—shall be offered for subscription to the Canadian National Railway Company, and in the event of non-subscription of any of the said shares by the said company such shares not subscribed for shall be offered for subscription to such other persons engaged or interested in aviation as are approved by the minister.

I do not think—and I address myself now to the Prime Minister—that any minister of the crown should be clothed by a public act with such responsibility. I wish to avoid the appearance of casting any reflection upon the minister personally, but I do say in the light of considerable experience in this house that it is inadvisable to put a blanket power of this kind into the hands of any minister in any government at any time. I strongly object to it.

Let me point out what might happen. If this bill passes we have a corporation set up composed of five or six gentlemen of very high standing—all civil servants, if I mistake not. They are incorporated and become a corporate entity. Thereupon this new corporation must offer its stock first to the Canadian National Railways. I do not know what is in the minister's mind. He may give us the assurance that it is the intention of the Canadian National Railways to take up all this stock; I do not know. But if it is the intention of the national railways to do that—

Mr. HOWE: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman? I have anticipated his objection and I intend to introduce amendments to section 7, which will make the purpose much clearer.

Mr. STEVENS: Without labouring the point, then, I will wait until the committee stage. I merely observe that as it stands before me I object to it, and that would be one reason why I would oppose the bill.

There is another point. This corporation which we are creating is in operation, we will assume. We do not yet know who the share-holders will be; if we knew, we should perhaps be justified in granting the power sought in paragraph (f) of subsection (1) of section 14, which states that the trans-Canada contract shall provide:

—for the operation and maintenance by the government of Canada, without charge to the corporation, of emergency landing fields, lights and radio beams, necessary for the operation of the said trans-Canada lines and for the supply to the corporation free of charge of weather reports.

Then follows a proviso that if at some future time the revenues of the corporation warrant it, they may be charged for these services. The point is that we are creating a private corporation and placing on the statutes of the country an obligation upon the government to maintain a very substantial portion of the facilities necessary for the conduct of this business. That adds great weight to what has been said before. If you are going to that extent in public ownership, surely it would be better to make it absolutely and avowedly a publicly owned organization from the start.

There is another point, but these are the main points I wished to refer to. Reference has been made to the question of an unknown deficit. My interpretation of the clause by which we undertake to pay any deficit that may arise, knowing how these things work from observation over many years, is that it is, in fact, an invitation to those operating this company to think, using the popular expression, that the sky is the limit—Don't worry, because your deficit is guaranteed by parliament, no matter how much or how it is incurred. There is no limitation, no restriction upon the directors of this corporation.

For these reasons I hesitate to support what otherwise I should like to support, a genuine move for trans-Canada airways. My mind is not clear, that is, I am not enthusiastic about a government-owned trans-Canada airway. I am inclined to the view, and have been for many years, that inasmuch as trans-Canada aviation will be distinctly in competition with the two railway systems, they ought to organize and control and operate such a system in conjunction with their railways. For instance, one might take the airway to Winnipeg, then get on the train and go over night to Calgary, and then take an airplane for the rest of the trip, or reverse the process. In my opinion it can be operated most advantageously in conjunction with the railways. Here again we are in the dark. It may be that it is in the mind of the minister to do something of that kind, and when we go into committee he may explain it.

But we are being asked here to approve the principle as embodied in the bill without knowing where that principle is going to lead us. As the bill is now drafted I could not give it my support in principle, although I should very much like to do so. I have made these remarks for the purpose of giving the minister an opportunity perhaps to clarify the situation in his answer.

Hon. J. EARL LAWSON (York South): I have in mind one or two matters to which I should like to call the attention of the minister before he closes the debate. With much of what has been said by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) I entirely agree. I have, however, one or two matters in mind which I should like to deal with a little more fully.

Personally I cannot claim to be a public ownership man, if by that is meant one who favours the public ownership of most things in the country, although I have always recognized that there are certain exceptions to my general rule or principle of the greater efficiency of private enterprise. But there is one principle to which I make no exception and of which I am thoroughly convinced, and that is that we should not have ownership or operation which is part public and part private. I think I made my views of that situation fairly clear in connection with the central bank legislation. As I see it, under this bill we are going to set up an air transport corporation which may or may not be, but has the possibility of being, partly public and partly private.

It will be observed that under section 9 the shares of the capital stock shall not be transferable except to such persons engaged or interested in aviation as are approved by the minister. I direct attention to the word "transferable" because the last section provides that certain sections contained in part III of the Companies Act are applicable. It seems to me that under that section, although you could not transfer a share once it is issued, there is nothing that requires the approval of the minister of the initial issue; because when you issue a treasury share you do not transfer a share. In the terms of the Companies Act you may allot or issue it, but you do not transfer it. Therefore I suggest that the minister seriously consider the fact that this board of directors, which for convenience I will call original directors or original incorporators, have extraordinary powers, provided that the Canadian National Railway Company saw fit not to exercise the whole or any part of the option conferred upon it by the sections of this bill previous to section 9. In other words, the stock might be offered to the Canadian National Railway; the Canadian National Railway has to come to the minister and say: Will you provide us with the money to subscribe for this stock? And the minister on behalf of the government might say no. Whereupon the treasury shares could be issued to any group or corporation as this temporary board of directors saw fit.

Then I come to section 11. The leader of the opposition dealt with the question of book value, including franchise, and there was a vehement shaking of heads from some of the ministers interested in the promotion of the bill. I submit that the statement of the leader of the opposition was absolutely correct. Let us, for example, go back to the days when electric railway franchises were valuable. Why did not the city of Toronto expropriate the street railway years before it did? Because it did not want to pay the value of the franchise of the company carried on the company's books. Why did not the city of Brantford expropriate before it did? Why did not dozens of municipalities expropriate private corporations operating electric railways? Because they desired to wait until the franchise expired, so that they would not have to pay the value of the unexpired term of that franchise.

I trust that what I have to say now will not be construed as any aspersion on the present minister or anyone connected with him. I merely point out the loopholes which are left in the bill. Let us assume that the Canadian National Railway, because the government does not see fit to supply it with the money, does not exercise its option to purchase these shares, and that the shares of this corporation fall into the hands of other corporations or private individuals; and they after the selection of a board of directors obtain an appraisal of that franchise by duly qualified engineers and appraisers and write that appraised value on their books as an asset. Surely it would not be contended, at least by the Minister of Justice, that the value of that franchise, written into the books of the company, fixed on the basis of an appraisal, should not be included in the book value if the minister at some subsequent date thought it desirable to acquire all the shares of the corporation. I am inclined to the view that if that occurred, if there was disagreement and the matter went to the exchequer court, the court would hold that the franchise had a value proportioned to its unexpired term, and that value would have to be paid for.

Another section to which I wish to call attention is section 16, dealing with rates. I observe that the minister has power to fix rates. I confess that from reading the section [Mr. Lawson.]

I could not come to a conclusion whether it was the rates to be paid by passengers and persons who desired to use the air transport or rates in respect of the trans-Canada contract which is defined in a previous section. In any event subsection 2 of section 16 provides that in case of deficit there shall be an increase in rates. To that I have no objection, but subsection 3 provides that as soon as there is a surplus there is to be a decrease in rates. I have no objection to a decrease in rates if there is a surplus, but I do object to arbitrarily fixing, by statute, the decrease which must take place as soon as there is a surplus. Surely if business in general learned one lesson from the depression of the last few years, it learned the wisdom of setting aside a reserve in the days of plenty and of surpluses to meet deficits and losses in bad times. So I suggest to the minister that serious consideration should be given to the question of arbitrarily, by statute, requiring a reduction in rates. If you are going to have a board of directors capable of exercising sound, reasonable business judgment, I think it might at least be left to their discretion whether or not there should be a recommendation, say, for a reduction of rates having regard to the previous service.

Having dealt with a few sections specifically, Mr. Speaker, I do urge this thought upon the minister and the government with regard to the whole plan. This scheme leaves in the hands of one man, whoever may be the incumbent of the office of Minister of Transport at any particular time, a vast discretion. It leaves in his hands power to embark upon the expenditure of a huge amount of public money at some future date for the acquisition of something we now have. Worse than that, in my view, it leaves in his hands the power to make a deal, while this parliament is not sitting, to acquire at a huge price based on book values-and book values can tell many stories—an enterprise we now have and which costs us nothing. And all that can be done without the sanction of this parliament, and without parliament having one word to say about it until it is all over.

The closest analogy I can think of at the moment—and believe me I do not mention this because of political partisanship—is the approval that was given to the diversion of a huge amount of water from the St. Lawrence in connection with the Beauharnois development. There power was vested in the Minister of Public Works, and without parliament having an opportunity of saying yea or nay or of expressing its views in any manner, a huge quantity of water was diverted. I am not suggesting that this was beyond the statutory powers of the then Minister of Public Works, but the water was diverted. It does seem to me that we should not make it possible for such a large amount of the money of the taxpayers of this country to be diverted or used or expended at the discretion of one man, admirable though he might be, without this parliament being able to say yea or nay or having an opportunity to discuss the proposal in detail.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this bill contemplates a type of air transportation that is practically new in Canada to-day. It contemplates a service between centres of population, a service that must run on schedule and must have a very high efficiency if it is to be depended upon for the efficient transportation of mail. While we have in Canada a very highly developed aviation service it is not by any means similar to the service contemplated by this bill. At the present time we have a service into remote districts, operating on floats in summer and on skis in winter, and depending upon natural waterways for landing places. In serving urban centres, of course, a much more highly developed service is necessary.

Some three or four years ago the work of constructing proper landing fields was undertaken, and up to the present some $7,000,000 has been expended in that way. That work is well advanced towards completion. This service, of course, involves operation on wheels for twelve months of the year. To make such a service reliable a very elaborate weather reporting system is necessary. Weather reports must be available to the pilot at almost any moment during his flight, which involves a high degree of development. The pilot must fly by night as well as by day, in fog and storm as well as in clear weather. For that reason a radio beam must be provided between landing points which will keep the pilot on his course whether or not he has any visible contact with the ground.

All these things are new in Canada, but during the last ten years they have been developed to a very high state of efficiency on this continent. It has been an expensive development, as the history of the industry will show. The companies that have started in this service and have disappeared would number a score or more. Our task in Canada is to set up this service without all the lost motion that has been expended during the past ten years. We cannot afford to spend ten years in bringing ourselves up to present day efficiency. We must start where our competitors are to-day and we must develop an organization in this country as rapidly as possible.

This is a very difficult problem, and before coming to a final conclusion I think I exhausted all available sources of information. I have ridden in every type of equipment used on the mail routes in the United States; I have discussed the problem with the heads of all the successful trans-American companies; I have had the privilege of discussing the problem with the general manager of Imperial Airways and with officers of the British air ministry, and I have read every report in this connection that I have been able to lay my hands on. As a result of all this I have come to certain conclusions. The discussion we have had in the house to-night, all of which I know has been very friendly and offered in an earnest desire to bring about the best possible result, has brought out at least four different views as to how this work should be undertaken. After listening to the discussion I am convinced that this bill offers the most practical solution that can be suggested. I believe we have safeguarded ourselves at every point.

The first suggestion was that we should turn this line over to one of the private air companies. The question which immediately suggests itself is, which company? Well, perhaps there is one company that by its experience and standing in the industry would have a right to be chosen over other companies, but to-day that company is engaged in extensive services quite foreign to the services we are going to develop here. I have not been able to decide how we could ask that company to separate this trans-Canada service in an effective way from the services operated by the same corporation in the north.

We go back to the experience of other countries. England, I believe, has had the least trouble in the development of aviation. What was done there? In England a new company was formed, under government auspices, headed by the best business brains in the country. I believe Sir Eric Geddes is the present head, and if my memory serves me correctly he was the first head of the company, and was taken from a high government post for the work. The company was privately financed, except for about 25 per cent, which the government retained. The British government has two directors on the board, the other directors representing the private capital invested. On the other hand, I have in my hand the report of the committee which considered the development of civil aviation within the United Kingdom, and that committee reports that for the development of services across England the cooperation of the railways should be sought. Adequate reasons are given why the railways should have a part in the development.

In my view it is only reasonable that the railways should have a part in the development of air transportation. In the first place they are in the transportation business; and in the operation of air lines there are problems in common with the operation of railways. For instance, both must have ticket offices; both must have facilities for soliciting express and passenger business. The legal problems of both are more or less on a par, and a legal staff trained to railway transportation matters would be valuable in air matters. I could set out many other points where the services are more or less parallel. So it seemed to me from the start that in a properly organized trans-Canada system the railways should have a part.

Then came the question of personnel. Naturally the pilots in Canada are working for aviation companies. Were we to set up a company under government auspices, and then bid for the services of the twenty or thirty most experienced pilots? We could take them only from certain places, namely from the businesses using them to-day. That led me to the belief that we should have the cooperation, as shareholders, of one or more of the companies engaged in aviation so that we could have their assistance in setting up the personnel of the service.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has said that the government should own and operate this service, but the experience of other countries hardly indicates that that is a wise procedure. A government directly in the transportation business is under certain handicaps which are not so serious in the case of a wholly owned transportation subsidiary of a government. For instance, going back to the Intercolonial railway, I think everyone will agree that an accident on that line cost the government a great deal more than a similar accident costs the Canadian National Railways to-day. As a minister of the government I shudder over the possibility of being responsible for the crash of a plane-load of passengers travelling on a wholly owned government air line.

In any event, after the consideration of these matters the government has decided that its agency for transportation, the Canadian National Railways, should be the means of organizing this company, just as it was used as the means for operating such shipping as the government has owned, and the means of operating other government transportation facilities.

[Mr. Howe.]

I have said it is intended to place the organization of the company in the hands of the Canadian National Railways. There has been a great deal of objection to-night to the power the minister would have in selecting shareholders and directors of the company. But surely in turning the problem over to the directors of the Canadian National Railways, the minister is turning it over to seven able business men who have a certain responsibility to the government, and who would be well qualified to handle the problem.

There is one point the bill does not make clear, but which it will make clear, namely that the Canadian National Railways will retain at least fifty-one per cent of the stock of the company. It will be noted that the government has three directors and the shareholders have six, which would mean that even if the railway disposed of the full forty-nine per cent, the government would have three directors, the railway company would have three, and such private aviation interests as may come in would have not more than three. So that at all times we would have government control.

You might say: Why is the government entitled to three directors if it is not an investor? I think the reason is that the investment of the government in air fields and facilities will be three or four times as great as the investment to be made in facilities by the aviation company. In other words, the investment in landing fields will be vastly greater than the investment in flying equipment. Further, the government has committed itself to provide weather and beam service, or radio-telegraphic service on the route. The operating costs to which the government is committed are certainly fifty per cent of the total operating costs falling upon the aviation company. Further than that, the government has undertaken that the company shall operate without loss; in the same direction they have provided that it shall operate with a very limited profit, provided the operation develops in the direction of reduced operating expenses.

Perhaps no set-up is perfect, but I do believe we have adopted the soundest possible arrangement, and in the end I believe it will be generally agreed that we have arrived at about as sound a method as could have been found of setting up the company to achieve the results we want.

The question now arises: Have we invited the private interests to participate? That question was asked. May I say we did not need to invite them. They came from every part of Canada and the United States, and put on the most persistent lobby in Ottawa that I have ever seen. The only way we could make progress was to absolutely refuse to talk to them. We said, "Go back home. We will write our bill, and when we get it written and bring it down you will see it. If you then want any part in it we will give you the chance to discuss the matter." How could we make a deal on the one hand with perhaps a dozen clamouring aviation companies, or with one or two of them, and on the other hand bring down a bill which the government or parliament would approve? The thing was absolutely impossible. Someone had to make up his mind as to the proper set-up, pick out the responsible people to take care of the initial financing, and after that sit down and see what these services had to offer in the way of experienced personnel, trained operators, and so on; and then decide whether one, two, four or some other number of private companies should be associated in the new organization, whether each would give it strength or otherwise, and then determine the final set-up accordingly. I do not see how any other method could have been used, and I may say I have been living with this problem for several months.

There has been some worry as to the book value. I may say that we undertook at first to have two companies as shareholders, and that we split with one of them on the question of book value. One of them said that if they built up an efficient service it would be considered to have a valuable franchise, which franchise should be considered in any final settlement. We replied that the book value alone would be considered.

The books will be audited by the government every year. If the bill is read carefully it will be seen that it will be impossible to write one dollar into the books which has not been earned in one way or another. We have provided that if for reasons of defence or otherwise it is thought desirable that the government should own this enterprise, it can be taken over at book value. That is, the actual investment less such depreciation as is determined by the contract. The rates of depreciation, the purchase price of equipment, and so on will be covered by the contract. We are providing that the company can get back only the earnings that are allowed it for the period that it is operating the lines. We believe that as long as we designate the routes and provide free service on those routes, it is we who make the franchise valuable, and not the company. I believe this phase is amply safeguarded.

I think we are getting the best features of government ownership without the obligation of direct government operation, which in the past has been troublesome. A year or two ago the United States found themselves in an impossible position in connection with the private mail contracts. Almost over night they cancelled those contracts and turned the carriage of mails over to the military services. However, the disasters of the next few months were so appalling that the government hastened to revive the private contracts. It may be that the government had not the time to bring the carriage of mails to a high state of efficiency by providing the proper personnel, but the fact remains that the people of the United States were shocked beyond measure at the number of pilots who were killed in that short period in carrying the mails.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1-Short title.

Mr. HOWE: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. LAWSON: I should like to ask one or two questions before the committee rises. I refrained from interrupting the minister when he was speaking—

The CHAIRMAN: I would direct the attention of the hon, member to the fact that this motion is not debatable.

Mr. LAWSON: It will only hold up things that much longer when we are in committee.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

FURTHER SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1937

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Naval service—To provide for the maintenance of the ships and establishments of the naval service, including the Royal Canadian Navy, the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve and the Royal Canadian Volunteer Reserve—further amount required, $2,201,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the Minister explain this item?

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): This vote of $2,201,000 is required because of the purchase of two destroyers from the British admiralty. The cost of these destroyers was $1,068,000 each; $40,000 is needed for recruits, and $25,000 to pay the passage of the crews to England.

Mr. BENNETT: This vote does not state that any ships are to be purchased.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is a mistake in the wording of the item.

Mr. BENNETT: It should be corrected. The item simply states that it is to provide for the maintenance of the ships.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This item is for the purchase of the two ships.

Mr. LAWSON: There is no mention of maintenance in the item.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is to cover the purchase price, some refitting in England, and the cost of sending the Canadian crews to England.

Mr. HEAPS: What will be the total cost of these boats when they are completed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The total cost will be $2,201,000 less the amount necessary for personnel expenses. The actual price is $1,068,000 each, which includes a certain amount for refitting.

Mr. HEAPS: What will be the total maintenance cost for these boats?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Because of their larger size, there will be an additional maintenance cost of about $230,000 per annum for the two boats.

Mr. HEAPS: That is over and above what it cost to maintain the other two?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is correct.

Mr. HEAPS: What will be the total cost of maintaining the two new boats?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The maintenance of each destroyer will run to about $296,175 per annum.

Mr. GREEN: One of the old destroyers, which I understand are to be broken up, was named the Vancouver. The suggestion has been made that some memento from that ship should be given to the city of Vancouver. Will the minister take this suggestion under consideration?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be delighted to see that it is carried out.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the item should contain the proper description before we vote the money. Put it in some sort of shape which adequately explains what it is for.

Mr. DUNNING: I move, Mr. Chairman, an amendment to the wording of the item, to read as follows:

To provide for the purchase and refitting of two destroyers for the Royal Canadian Navy.

Mr. MacNEIL: What is the total personnel of each destroyer?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I gave that information in full in the main estimates. I believe I have it here. The total involved, on the estimates of this year, will be 1,212 officers and men of the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve, and 1,339 officers and men of the Royal Canadian Navy, an increase in the Royal Canadian Volunteer Reserve of 161, and in the other branch, of 373, or a total increase of 534.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister be good enough to report progress on the mine sweepers?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As far as mine sweepers are concerned, it is expected that tenders will be called for within the next two weeks for their construction in Canada.

Mr. STIRLING: Both east and west?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is expected to divide construction territorially as far as possible.

Mr. BENNETT: This seems to me an opportune moment to make a few observations with reference to our naval policy. I was hopeful that the minister would regard it as desirable to postpone any definite commitments to purchase mine sweepers or other naval craft until such time as he had had an opportunity to discuss matters with the British admiralty. I also desire to point out that during the recent weeks we on this side of the house have refrained from making any observations on this subject believing that the government was best able to determine what was desirable in the public interest with respect to defence. But I have long felt that it is desirable that there should be some measure of agreement between parties with respect to this matter. Feeling that as strongly as I do, we refrained from pointing out that the secret memorandum to which the minister referred in connection with the military estimates was one that had been prepared and delivered to the then Prime Minister in May of 1935, and that in consequence of armament having followed disarmament efforts we were then in a different situation from what we had hitherto been in.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There were two memoranda—one in 1932 and one in 1935.

Mr. BENN'ETT: I am dealing with 1935. In speaking of the naval situation I purpose to refrain from making any observations that can be regarded as contentious; rather I am going to rely entirely upon quotations from the speeches of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, both when in office and out of it, for the purpose of endeavouring to direct the attention of the committee to the importance of our having a clearer appreciation of what has been done in Canada in days gone by with respect to naval defence, what our commitments are at the moment, and why, in the language of that great leader of the Liberal party, we should pursue a policy of close cooperation as respects naval defence with the British authorities.

In 1909 Sir George Foster—then Mr. Foster—moved in this house a resolution on naval defence. It will be found in the journals of the House of Commons of March 29, 1909. It was seconded by Mr. Haggart, of South Lanark, and is in the following terms:

That in the opinion of this house, in view of her great and varied resources, of her geographical position and national environments, and of that spirit of self-help and self-respect which alone befits a strong and growing people, Canada should no longer delay in assuming her proper share of the responsibility and financial burden incident to the suitable protection of her exposed coast line and great seaports.

On that occasion Sir George Foster made a speech which Sir Wilfrid Laurier described in 1913 as one of the best of the many good speeches he had made. Sir Wilfrid at that time did not think that Sir George Foster's resolution went far enough, so he moved in his own language an amendment, seconded by Mr. Paterson, and in his discussions he had the aid also of Sir George Foster in making certain other additions to the resolution finally adopted, which was in these words:

This house fully recognizes the duty of the people of Canada, as they increase in numbers and wealth, to assume in larger measure the responsibilities of national defence.

The house is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the mother country and the self-governing dominions, the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

The house will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service in cooperation with and in close relation to the imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the admiralty at the last imperial conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the empire and the peace of the world.

The house expressed its firm conviction that whenever the need arises the Canadian people will be found ready and willing to make any sacrifice that is required to give to the imperial authorities the most loyal and hearty cooperation in every movement for the maintenance of the integrity and honour of the empire.

That was carried unanimously, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier refers to it in a speech from which I desire to make a few quotations. Next year Sir Wilfrid Laurier's administration placed upon the statute books the naval law of Canada. The act, which is chapter 43 of the statutes of 1910, is well known, I take it, to most hon. members; its short title is the Naval Service Act. This act provided practically for a Canadian navy. In 1911, before his administration was defeated, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in accordance with the provisions of the Naval Service Act, called for tenders for four cruisers and six destroyers to be built in Canada. Those ships were tendered for, and the date fixed for the expiration of the receipt of tenders was in the fall of 1911. As a matter of fact the day fell after the defeat of his administration and Sir Wilfrid Laurier did not accept the tenders.

In 1912 the government of Sir Robert Borden considered the question of our naval defence, and in consequence of the information imparted to the representatives of his government introduced into the House of Commons a resolution providing for the construction of three dreadnoughts at an expenditure of $35,000,000. That was done on the basis of an alleged emergency. Sir Wilfrid Laurier denied that there was an emergency, and upon that question the parties joined issue. During the course of the debate Sir Wilfrid made a speech to which I should like to direct the attention of this committee, for in that speech he reviewed the past in the light of seventy years of a life which he said he hoped he had not lived in vain, and he gave to the Canadian people his view of their obligation and duty in relation to naval

At page 1022 of Hansard of December 12, 1912, Sir Wilfrid referring to the resolution introduced by Mr. Foster speaks as follows:

When four years ago my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) introduced this subject in a concrete form, we were in control of the house, and the house will agree with me that we did not receive his motion in any carping spirit. The motion moved by my hon. friend was to this effect.

Then he read the resolution which I quoted a few moments ago. He went on:

We received the proposition of my hon. friend quite sympathetically, and we suggested to him that it would be advisable to enlarge it and to bring it to the broader basis of imperial defence, in view especially of the new conditions which were then and had been for some time arising in Europe. I am bound to say that our suggestion was well received by our friends on the other side, and they in turn offered us some amendments, which we were only too glad to receive. The original motion of my hon, friend, thus amended, was passed by the unanimous voice of parliament. It was in these terms.

Then he read the terms of the resolution I have already given to the house. He then discussed certain questions dealing with the recent election and the difficulties that had been experienced in Quebec and elsewhere in connection with his naval policy, and he said:

It has also been said in the province of Quebec during the last contest that we could rely on the Monroe doctrine. To anyone who would rely upon the Monroe doctrine, I would say, let him examine the record of Cuba after the Spanish-American war. When the Cubans were desirous of removing the yoke of Spain, they appealed to the United States for help, and they got it, but when, with the assistance of the United States, they had freed themselves from the control of Spain, they found that they had a rather high price to pay for the help they had received. That price was the abridgement of a portion of their independence. After the war was over, the people of Cuba naturally wanted to establish a regular government of their own. They called a convention and adopted a constitution, but that constitution had to go to Washington for revision, and there after three months' discussion, certain conditions were imposed upon Cuba, which to the people of that country were extremely distasteful, which convention they adopted by a narrow majority of five. The following conditions were made part of the constitution of Cuba:

Cuba shall not make any foreign treaty which may tend towards placing the independence of the island or any portion thereof in jeopardy; no loans can be issued unless a surplus of revenue is available for the service of such obligations; the United States can intervene to preserve the independence of Cuba or to ensure protection for life and property; the acts of the United States military administration in Cuba since 1898 are recognized as valid; proper hygienic precautions must be taken to protect public health on the island; the ownership of the Isle of Pines is left for future consideration; coaling stations shall be sold or leased to the United States in localities to be hereafter decided.

This shows how much Cuba had to discard of her sovereign power for the sake of the Monroe doctrine. We have to take our share in the defence, not only of our native shores, but of the empire as a whole. We can defend ourselves only by the assistance of the mother country.

The foregoing was followed by these words, after he had spoken of the Australian navy:

I insist once more upon what is stated in the memorandum: There is no emergency, there is no immediate danger, there is no prospective danger. If there were an emergency, if England were in danger—no, I will not use that expression; I will not say if England were in danger, but simply if England were on trial with one or two or more of the great powers of Europe, my right hon. friend might come and ask, not $35,000,000, but twice, three times, [Mr. Bennett.]

four times $35,000,000. We would put at the disposal of England all the resources of Canada; there would not be a single dissentient voice. . . .

Sir, I remember very well the question on that occasion, and those who were present in the house at that time cannot have forgotten it. This question gave rise to one of the most important debates, which, in the some thirty years of my experience, the parliament of Canada ever saw. I remember the speech of my hon, friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), an excellent speech, one of the very best he ever made, and that is paying a great compliment, well-deserved.

He was speaking of the debate on the resolution to which I have just referred:

I remember the speech of my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) the present Prime Minister, and if ever a man gave reasons against the policy which he has now introduced, my right hon. friend gave those reasons on that occasion

He was dealing with the question of there being no emergency. He proceeds:

Now, sir, I ask, why is it that my right hon. friend and his first lieutenant, the leaders of the opposition then, who to-day have the responsibility of office, will not go on with the policy so forcibly put forward by them, instead of a policy under which, in the language of my right hon. friend, there will be no preparation of the soil or beginning or growth of the product of defence? The reason, sir, is not far to seek. The reason is well known: there is one, and only one, and it is because this subject of imperial defence has been made the subject of contentious politics.

That position he amplified in the course of his speech, and he proceeded with the following statement:

I hope it is true, but would not the impression be much greater yet, if, instead of this money contribution, the nations of Europe were to see the young daughters of the empire, the young nations scattered over the whole world, building fleets of their own, to use the language of the resolution of 1909—

"in cooperation with and in close relation to the imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the admiralty at the last imperial conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Great Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the empire, and the peace of the world."

After referring to the ships at sea and the unfurling of the white ensign, he then proceeded:

Australia has adopted the same policy, and she has adopted it for the reason stated by my hon. friend in the debate of 1909: that having tried contribution, she found that contribution would not work. Australia, therefore, came to the conclusion which we came to: she came to the conclusion that gentlemen now sitting on the government benches came to, but which they have abandoned, and abandoned for what reason? For no other reason than the well-known reason of their alliance with the Nationalist party of Quebec.

That was part of his speech. Proceeding to deal with the question of there being no emergency, he said:

Well, Mr. Speaker, we went on with the execution of our policy. We asked for tenders, with the intention of having ultimately a double unit, one on the Pacific ocean and one on the Atlantic ocean; we asked for tenders for four cruisers and six destroyers, which would cost $11,280,000. We did not choose to award the contract, in view of the impending change of government .

Yes; we thought as the general elections were coming, that it would not be fair, in a matter of this kind, which was at issue between the two parties, to award the contract in case there might be, as there was, a change of government. I say now that the government. ment in power would have been better advised if they had awarded the contracts, and, had they done so, we would at the present time have under construction on the stocks in Montreal four cruisers and six destroyers.

He proceeded further, and dealing with the building of ships in Canada said there was a better way than making a contribution—let us have a Canadian navy as soon as practicable and have all our ships built in Canada. Then came these words:

I now come to another subject, which I would not have mentioned at all were it not for some observations made during the debate on the address by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle). During the last electoral contest, I heard it many a time, and I read it many a time, that our Canadian navy was a separatist navy, and that it was, on account of something which was to be found in the act, liable to be neutral in time of war. I have been too long in the fight to care very much for what may be said of me during an electoral contest; but when a thing is repeated upon the floor of parliament within my hearing, I owe it to myself to take notice of it. And, just here, apropos of this, let me recall a classical and historical incident.

Then he gives the classical story of the conditions on the eve of the battle of Salamis, of how when the commander would not listen to what was said to him Themistocles said, "Strike, but hear me first." And he concluded with these words:

I do not entertain, at the age of seventy, many of the ideas I had at twenty, or at thirty, or even at forty; but I trust I have not lived in vain, and that in the course of my long career I have learned something from chrowytiers and provides I have the something from chrowytiers and provides I have been supported to the course of the second control of the course observation and experience. Let the matter be settled once and for all, not only for myself, but for my friends here and outside, by my declaration: That any thought of separation from Great Britain, if any such thought exists anywhere, and I do not believe it does—would be a folly and a crime. As to the contention of my hon. friend from Kingston that in case of war our navy would be neutral, I have only this to observe I said a moment age that only this to observe. I said a moment ago that I hope I have not lived in vain, and I hope I am to be given credit for some common sense and some knowledge, and my answer to that contention is: when England is at war, we are at war, and the thought of being neutral would be like the command of King Canute to the sea to recede from his feet. action of ours could bring that about. When England is at war, we are at war; but it does not follow that because we are at war, we are actually in the conflict.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: We can be in the conflict only through two things, namely, actual invasion of our soil, or, the action of the Par-liament of Canada. That seems to arouse the hilarity of gentlemen on the other side of the

Mr. Graham: They have not read much history.

Then Sir Wilfrid proceeds to deal with other questions relating to stories of the wars, and various wars in the world, and participation in the Boer war, to which I shall not refer. On page 1035 he continued:

Some objections have been made to our Naval Act, because it was said that the British admiralty could not count at all times upon the support of the Canadian navy. I simply say that the admiralty can count at all times upon the Canadian navy, because last year we passed an agreement with the admiralty, whereby naval stations were created for the Canadian navy. The Canadian Atlantic station would include north of 30 north latitude and west of the meridian of 40 west longitude. The Canadian Pacific station would include north of 30 north latitude and east of the meridian of 180 west longitude. So the admiralty knew that at all times in those bodies of water there were Canadian ships to guard the waters; and the moment the ships of an enemy of England appeared in those waters it was the duty of our navy to pounce upon them, to grapple with them and to sink them, in the same manner as if they had been in the har-bour of Halifax. That is the interpretation placed upon that act. My hon, friends, how-ever, have to-day the administration of the act; they can interpret it themselves; but surely they will not interpret it in the way it is said they could. They can amend it as they please; but, whatever they do, if they are sincere, as I hope they are, they cannot put any other construction than the construction I put upon this act.

That act is still in force in the terms in which it was passed. There have been no substantial changes in it during revision or otherwise. It has had placed upon it by Sir Wilfrid Laurier the construction to which I have referred.

Then, dealing with armaments in Europe, he proceeded to say:

The problem that you have to deal with is one which demands a permanent policy—a policy for to-day, for to-morrow, and for every day, so long as the armaments grow in Europe; and the duty which you owe to yourselves, to Canada, and to the empire, is the enactment of a permanent policy. As regards the creation of a Canadian navy, you have apparently decided against that. In respect to contribution, does anyone imagine that you will have only one contribution?

He goes on to say that we have the question of defence to deal with, and he discussed that at some length, and wound up his speech by moving a very significant motion which I think should be within the memory of many members of this committee. The amendment he moved was:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out, and the following be substituted therefor:—

"This house declines to concur in the said resolution and orders that the same be referred back to the committee with instructions to amend the same in the following particulars, namely, to strike out all the words after clause (a) and substitute therefor the following:

The resolution provided for the expenditure of $35,000,000 for the construction of three dreadnoughts as an addition to the British navy, and he was moving to strike out all the words after clause (a) and substitute the following:

"The memorandum prepared by the Board of Admiralty on the general naval situation of the empire and communicated to this house by the right hon, the Prime Minister on December 5th shows that several of the most important of the foreign powers have adopted a definite policy of rapidly increasing their naval strength.

"That this condition has compelled the United Kingdom to concentrate its naval forces in home waters involving the withdrawal of ships from the outlying portions of the empire.

"That such withdrawal renders it necessary that Canada without further delay should enter actively upon a permanent policy of naval defence.

"That any measure of Canadian aid to imperial naval defence which does not employ a permanent policy of participation by ships owned, manned and maintained by Canada and contemplating construction as soon as possible in Canada, is not an adequate or satisfactory expression of the aspirations of the Canadian people in regard to naval defence, and is not an assumption by Canada of her fair share in the maintenance of the naval strength of the empire.

"This house regrets to learn the intention of the government to indefinitely postpone the carrying out by Canada of a permanent naval

"It is the opinion of this house that measures should be taken at the present session to give effect actively and speedily to the permanent naval policy embodied in the Naval Service Act of 1910 passed pursuant to the resolution unanimously approved by this house in March, 1909.

"This house is further of the opinion that to increase the power and mobility of the imperial navy by the addition by Canada under the above act of two fleet units, to be stationed on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of Canada, respectively, rather than by a contribution of money or ships, is the policy best calculated to afford relief to the United Kingdom in respect to the burden of imperial naval defence, and in the words of the admiralty memorandum, to restore greater freedom to the movements of the British squadrons in every sea and directly promote the security of the dominions; and that the government of Canada should take such steps as shall lead to the accomplishment of this purpose as speedily as possible."

An acute difference of opinion between the government of Sir Robert Borden and Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal party was first as to there being an emergency. An hon. gentleman in this house a few days ago suggested that no member of the House of Commons at that time could have foreseen the possibility of a war. I do not know whether that hon, member was present in the house or not, but I think no man who visited England in 1912 and was familiar with the conditions had any doubt in his mind that with the completion of the Kiel canal and the changed methods of construction of battleships, the great German empire found herself practically on a parity with England, because England had begun the construction of dreadnoughts, thereby making obsolescent a great number of her ships, and thus enabling Germany to be more nearly on a parity with her than theretofore; and having regard to the provisions of what was known as the Cawdor report, it was quite clear that a new condition had arisen. When the imperial conference of 1911 met, with Sir Wilfrid Laurier and others representing the Dominion of Canada, it will be recalled that some discussion took place in respect to these matters and that Sir Wilfrid in the resolution he moved made the declaration to which I referred. So far as I know there was no change in those declarations, and the agreement that was made by the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier for the creation of North Atlantic and South Atlantic areas which would be protected by a Canadian fleet still stood.

It is true beyond peradventure that the action taken by the government of Sir Robert Borden in 1912-13 made it impossible for the moment to continue the policy which had been outlined by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. But he did outline the policy, which was an agreed policy, and my reading to-night to the Minister of National Defence and the members of the committee who are of the Liberal persuasion of what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said is done with the hope that there may be some measure of unanimity with respect to the action we take in connection with our naval defence. I have outlined the attitude which Sir Wilfrid Laurier then took and which he maintained even until the end. When parliament met in 1914, in connection with the war, on the 19th day of August, 1914, Sir Wilfrid Laurier used these words:

This session has been called for the purpose of giving the authority of parliament and for the sanction of law to such measures as have already been taken by the government and any further measures that may be needed to ensure the defence of Canada and to give what aid may be in our power to the mother country in the stupendous struggle which now confronts her. Speaking for those who sit around me, speaking for the wide constituencies which we represent in this house, I hasten to say that to all these measures we are prepared to give immediate assent. If in what has been done or in what remains to be done there may be anything which in our judgment should not be done or should be differently done we raise no question, we take no exception, we offer no criticism, and we shall offer no criticism so long as there is danger at the front. It is our duty, more pressing upon us than all other duties, at once, on this first day of this extraordinary session of the Canadian parliament, to let Great Britain know, and to let the friends and foes of Great Britain know, that there is in Canada but one mind and one heart, and that all Canadians stand behind friends and foes of Great Britain know, the mother country, conscious and proud that she has engaged in this war, not from any selfish motive, for any purpose of aggrandisement, but to maintain untarnished the honour of her name, to fulfil her obligations to her allies, to maintain her treaty obligations, and to save civilization from the unbridled lust of conquest and domination.

We are British subjects, and to-day we are face to face with the consequences which are involved in that proud fact. Long we have enjoyed the benefits of our British citizenship; to-day it is our duty to accept its responsibilities and its sacrifices. We have long said that when Great Britain is at war we are at war; to-day we realize that Great Britain is at war and that Canada is at war also. Our territory is liable to attack and to invasion. So far as invasion is concerned, I do not see that there is any cause for apprehension, for it seems to me obvious that neither Austria nor Germany, our foes in this war, can command any force able to make an attack so far from their base.

It will be remembered that Germany did lay mines from Cape Breton to Halifax.

But no one pretends that our maritime cities on the Pacific and the Atlantic are free from the possibility of insult by an audacious corsair, who, descending suddenly upon our shores, might subject them to an insolent raid and decamp with his booty before punishment could reach him. This is not an unfounded dread of danger; this is no mere illusion; it is a real and indeed a proximate danger, since it is a matter of notoriety that both on the Pacific and on the Atlantic there are German cruisers whose mission is to inflict all the injury they can upon our commerce, and even to raid our cities should they find our harbours unguarded. We are aware that the government has already taken measures, and very appropriately, to guard against this danger. We know that one of our battleships on the Pacific has been seeking the enemy, and if she has not yet engaged him it is because the enemy has eluded her pursuit.

Then he said:

Upon this occasion I owe it to the house and to myself to speak with absolute frankness and candour. This is a subject which has often been an occasion of debate in this house. I have always said, and I repeat it on this occasion, that there is but one mind and one heart in Canada. At other times we may have had different views as to the methods by which we are to serve our country and our empire. More than once I have declared that if England were ever in danger—nay, not only in danger, but if she were ever engaged in such a contest as would put her strength to the test—then it would be the duty of Canada to assist the motherland to the utmost of Canada's ability. England to-day is not engaged in an ordinary contest. The war in which she is engaged will in all probability—nay, in absolute certainty—stagger the world with its magnitude and its horror. But that war is for as noble a cause as ever impelled a nation to risk her all upon the arbitrament of the sword.

He concluded his address by declaring that the union of hearts which exists in the United Kingdom exists also in Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, and that it was the inspiration and the hope——that from this painful war the British Empire may emerge with a new bond of union, the pride of all its citizens, and a living light to all other nations.

That was at the beginning of the great war. So far as I know until the time of his death Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as leader of the Liberal party, always held the sentiments to which I have alluded. He believed, as I believe, and as I think thoughtful Canadians everywhere believe, that if possible there should be a unity of purpose with respect to the policy of naval defence. I see no reason to qualify in any sense the approval which on more than one occasion I have given, for myself, of the words used by Sir Wilfrid Laurier at the time he supported and enlarged the resolution of Sir George Foster. The observations he made as to the position which Canada occupies with respect to the British Empire were observations which I think, in the light of his great experience and his age of seventy years at that time, are worthy of every consideration by the Minister of National Defence.

I suggest to the minister at this time that in dealing with the problem of naval defence he should bear in mind the provisions of our Naval Service Act and the language of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, which I have taken the trouble to read at some length in order that there may be no misapprehension as to the position which he then took; that we should so coordinate our efforts in naval activity with those of the motherland as to ensure the defence of the British Empire as a whole. That was the opinion which Sir Wilfrid Laurier presented to the House of Commons and which received unanimous support when the resolution of 1909 was adopted. Sixty-five members from Quebec united with some eighty members from Ontario and all the members from the west and the maritimes to pass unanimously the resolution upon which in 1910 was based the Naval Act.

I do plead that we might again endeavour to forget some of the animosities and differences that have too frequently been manifest when dealing with a problem of the magnitude of the naval defence of this country, and that the memory of a past which is now ancient might be overcome by the memory of the stirring words to which I have alluded. I can remember, as I heard some of them, the impression they made upon my mind at the time. I suggest that the minister, when he goes to England to deal with problems of imperial import-and I use the word "imperial" in the same sense that Sir Wilfrid Laurier used it-should keep in mind the desirability of there being unity of purpose and unanimity in point of fact. I think there will be no difficulty about unanimity and unity if we bear in mind the fundamental considerations which, in the opinion of the veteran leader of the Liberal party, were the source of his views and his policies with respect to such matters.

There were differences in 1912 and 1913, arising out of the question whether or not there was an emergency. Subsequent events indicated that there was indeed an emergency; but that need not now be discussed. We can forget that, as we pass this appropriation to-night for the purchase of two destroyers.

The minister says he contemplates calling for tenders for four mine sweepers; and we have the training ship now being built for which we made provision in place of the Aurora, the magnificent ship we obtained from the admiralty at the end of the war and which went out of commission. Now, in the face of the admitted danger to which Sir Wilfrid Laurier referred in 1913, in view of the admittedly disturbed conditions in Europe, in view of the threats that have been directed at the very life of this empire, I do not see why by displaying a unity that would indicate to all the world that we had forgotton ancient grievances and animosities that had sprung out of the war, we should not hope that when the Prime Minister and his delegation go to England and confer with the admiralty they might be able to arrive at a common understanding which would look not merely to the defence of our own shores but, in the words of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, more to the defence of civilization and the maintenance of world peace by the defence of the British Empire itself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, at this hour of the night, at this stage of the session, and after having spoke on defence policies at considerable length on the main estimates I do not wish to say more than a few words at this time in reply to my right hon. friend. Perhaps I would more accurately describe my own feelings at the moment were I to say a few words in association with what my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) has just said.

It would be impossible to have heard from the lips of anyone a more complete endorsation of the Liberal policy with respect to naval defence than that which has been given to-night by the right hon. leader of the opposition. He has quoted the records with respect to naval defence, from the time the policy was introduced in 1909. With one possible exception, which I think ought to be mentioned, namely in reference to what he said as to emergency being the cause of any change of policy which took place, I believe he has fairly stated the significant facts.

The Laurier policy, so-called, was a policy of the defence of Canada's coasts by Canadians, by ships made as largely as possible in Canada and manned by Canadians, a service controlled by the government of Canada, and one which could be placed at the disposal of the British admiralty whenever this parliament decided it was desirable that the service should be placed so as to act in cooperation with other services within the empire.

I was a member of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government at the time it was decided to introduce the Naval Service Act, and I remember quite vividly the discussions which took place both in cabinet and in parliament with respect to the measure. In considering what it was advisable to do by way of an initial step, the choice lay between making provision at the outset for destroyers and cruisers, and the purchase of dreadnoughts. I recollect that as stated the complete policy was for a fleet unit on the Atlantic and on the Pacific, such service when finally constructed to consist of destroyers, cruisers and battleships. It was thought advisable to begin with the smaller ships, aiming ultimately at a service which would embrace the different classes I have mentioned.

My right hon. friend's observations tonight with respect to tenders not having been awarded prior to 1911 brings back to my mind how scrupulously honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in dealing with public matters. He sought to avoid even the appearance of questionable dealings with respect to any public matter and more especially transactions of national significance, and the defence policy was in that category. I well recall tenders being placed before the cabinet for consideration prior to the election of 1911, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier taking very strongly the position that while for many reasons it might be advisable to award tenders before the election so that there might be no question about the government's intention of going on with the naval service, nevertheless to award contracts of the magnitude involved on the eve of a general election would mean taking a step which in the minds of the public might be misinterpreted. On this ground he held that it would be preferable to leave the awarding of tenders until the election was over. For that reason the date upon which tenders were to be awarded was fixed, as my right hon. friend has pointed out, at a date shortly after that fixed for the election itself.

Hon. members will recollect that 1911 was a year of a general election in which political contest the main subject of controversy was the question of reciprocity. Those who participated in the campaign in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec will recall that in addition to the question of reciprocity the whole question of the naval service, and what it suggested in relations between Canada and other parts of the world, and the British Empire in particular, was very fully discussed. In Ontario Sir Wilfrid was bitcriticized throughout the campaign what was termed his separatist policy and his tin pot navy. What was being attempted was described as something absolutely useless and having a separatist tendency. In the province of Quebec a different campaign was waged. There it was stated that the Laurier policy was intended to force Canadians into European wars, that it was a species of jingo imperialism, that Sir Wilfrid had become a jingo imperalist, that a jingo imperalist was at the head of the Liberal party and must not be supported any longer as leader of the government of the country.

Hon. members will also recall that out of the agitation in the province of Quebec a third party, a new party developed. That party was not known as the Conservative or the Liberal party, but was called the Nationalist party. That party, as subsequent disclosures proved, had been financed during the campaign by the Conservative party and was in alliance with it. There was a secret understanding that if the Liberal administration was defeated in the campaign by the Nationalists in the province of Quebec and Conservatives in other provinces, the two would unite after the election to form a government to control the affairs of the country.

As results proved, from the standpoint of political strategy the course which had been adopted was successful. A large number of candidates returned as Nationalists were seen to be Conservatives, when it came to their being seated in the house and arrangements for government were in the making. The two parties combined, the Conservative and the Nationalist, were sufficiently large in numbers to defeat the Liberal administration.

What I want to say this evening is that there is something in the nature of poetic justice in the fact that at the end of a little more than a quarter of a century, after all these divisions have taken place and, fortunately, have been largely forgotten, it should remain to the leader of the Conservative party, the party which defeated Sir Wilfrid Laurier on his naval policy, to be the one to pronounce a strong eulogy with respect to every aspect of the policy put forward by Sir Wilfrid at that time. I want to express to my right hon, friend my appreciation of his manliness in standing up as he has to-night, and crediting Sir Wilfrid Laurier with wisdom and consistency from beginning to end with respect to his policy of naval defence, a consistency which the Liberal party as a whole can also claim. I say that, because we have never at any time departed from our belief that the Laurier policy was the wise and the sound one.

More than that, looking back on the events of the great war, we have reason to know that had the Laurier policy been continued, as it should have been, and had there been that same feeling of loyalty of all parties as has been expressed by my right hon. friend, the fleet unit on the Pacific coast would have played for Canada a part comparable to that which one or two of the ships of the Australian naval service, created at the same time, played for Australia in the course of the great war.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe they were a little ahead of us.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As a matter of fact, the two services were decided upon at the same time, but the work of construction of the Australian naval service commenced at a date earlier than that on the Canadian naval service.

Mr. BENNETT: They had their ships afloat when the war began.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, that is correct, and we would have had our ships afloat when the war began had it not been for the attitude of those who opposed Sir Wilfrid Laurier's policy at the general election of 1911. That is the point to which I wish to draw attention. That concerns the one representation in what my right hon. friend has said to-night to which I take exception. He said that the reason for the change in policy was because of an emergency.

Mr. BENNETT: That is so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was not the reason. The reason was that after the Conservative party came into power because of the attack on the Laurier naval policy, it found it could not unite on any naval policy. There was a wide division in the party which made it necessary to find some other means of dealing with and at the same time shelving the question of naval defence. Unfortunately there are not many in the house to-night who were here at that time, but there will be some who will recall that when Sir Robert Borden formed his cabinet he took in the Hon. Mr. Monk, who was one of the leaders of the Nationalist party. Mr. Monk was a leading Conservative, but he left the party assumedly to lead the Nationalist party in the province of Quebec. There was Mr. LaVergne and others who claimed they were entitled to seats in the cabinet for the part they had played as Nationalists. For a year nothing was done with respect to defence but Sir Robert Borden was ultimately obliged to take some action with regard to naval defence. The minute that he took any action, that minute Mr. Monk resigned from the government and a serious situation was created for the administration.

In order to do something, Sir Robert Borden determined upon the policy of making a contribution in the form of three of the largest dreadnoughts in the world, to cost $35,000,000. How was that action construed? Was it construed as being a policy of Canadian defence or was it construed as being a policy of imperial defence? The answer given to that question depended upon the part of Canada in which the question was asked. When it was asked in the province of Quebec the answer would be: We are making a contribution to get rid of this business of defence once and for all; that is what Sir Robert Borden has in mind; he does not want to start a naval service in Canada and have a navy on our Atlantic and Pacific coasts as a result of which Canada will certainly be drawn into European and Asiatic conflicts that may take place; he wants to get rid of what has been begun, so he makes this contribution. On the other hand, if the question was asked in Ontario, the reply would be that this was to meet an emergent condition; that the situation of the empire was so serious that we could not wait to construct a Canadian naval service; we had to make an immediate contribution.

Mr. STIRLING: Surely reference should be made to the great difficulty connected with the manning of the two cruisers which had been provided under the 1910 act; they were undermanned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I must say that I regret having to bring this matter into the discussion because it relates to something that is not creditable and that fortunately belongs to the past. I am crediting my right hon, friend with having given a true outline of the policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier with regard to Canadian defence and imperial defence. He has stated it very clearly and fairly, but it must not be forgotten that Sir Wilfrid Laurier suffered political defeat at the instance of the Conservative party for taking the stand he took at that time. He suffered defeat in his own province and lost the confidence of men who were dearer to his heart than those in any other part of the dominion. He suffered defeat and his policies alike of trade and defence suffered defeat-because he was so completely misrepresented. I feel it due to his memory to recall the circumstances. It is now said that it was simply a question of emergency; but that is not so. The political warfare of that time created a chapter in our political history which I am sure many of those who figured in it have often wished might never have been written.

However, let the past be past. May I say again that nothing could have vindicated Sir Wilfrid Laurier's memory and his position with respect to the defence of Canada, and the relations of Canada to the British Empire, more splendidly or eloquently than the words uttered this evening by my right hon. friend. I join with him in his view that so far as the future of the naval defence of Canada is concerned, the policy cannot be better expressed than it is in the Naval Service Act. That act was passed during the administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and as my right hon. friend has said, it has remained upon the statute books up to the present time with very little, if any, material change.

The act contemplates the gradual development of fleet units on the Atlantic and the Pacific. It looks to Canada taking an increasing share in the protection of her own coasts. This is why, in bringing forward the defence measures which the government brought forward this year, we stressed as strongly as we did the fact that these measures were for the defence of Canada. At the close of the debate I was very careful to say that one of the reasons why it had been necessary to stress so strongly that these measures were for the defence of Canada was because it had been represented in many quarters that they were not for the defence of Canada, that the government was taking the action it was in order to be prepared to send another expeditionary force overseas. That was a ground of opposition to our defence policy.

I may be entirely wrong, but I doubt very much if the British government itself will ever send another expeditionary force to Europe. I think it is extremely doubtful if any of the British dominions will ever send another expeditionary force to Europe. Were war to come on suddenly, I think we would find that the conditions of a world conflict would be so different from what they were in the last war, that anything in the nature of expeditionary forces to be sent from one continent to another would occasion a good deal more than second thought.

However, that is apart from the question. What I have risen also to say is that the minister in asking for this appropriation to purchase the two destroyers is doing so to enable us to increase the Canadian naval service under the Canadian Naval Service Act. The Canadian Naval Service Act has since the time it was passed until to-day stood consistently as the expression of Liberal policy, now Canada's policy on naval defence. It will continue so to stand.

Mr. BENNETT: I may suggest to the right hon, leader of the government that section 20 of the Naval Service Act provides:

In case of an emergency the governor in council may place at the disposal of His Majesty, for general service in the Royal Navy, the naval service or any part thereof, any ships or vessels of the naval service, and the officers and seamen serving in such ships or vessels, or any officers or seamen belonging to the naval service.

That action by order in council would indicate an emergency. However, that is a matter of unimportance in one sense as parliament would be called in any event within fifteen days. I think it is highly undesirable to discuss that disputatious matter in connection with this question. There should be some effort at coordination and cooperation between the government of Canada and the government of Great Britain at the approaching conference. We are replacing two worn out destroyers which were loaned to us with two which we are buying at a cost of one million dollars each. Four destroyers and four mine sweepers are insignificant compared with what was contemplated by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In that regard it might be well to point out that the initial action was taken by Sir George Foster. It is a little difficult to understand how the replacement of a couple of worn out destroyers by the purchase of four-year old destroyers can be regarded as in any sense coordination or cooperation in the sense in which Sir Wilfrid Laurier intended.

My purpose in speaking, however, was rather to invite the government to avail itself of the opportunity than to engage in contentious discussion with respect to these matters. It is a sharply contentious question whether or not there was an emergency. I thought in 1912 that there never was a greater emergency-with the completion of the Kiel canal, the beginning of the construction of dreadnoughts, and the passing of the naval act in Germany. That was my view then; it is my view still, and we could not have had a fleet unit ready had we let the tenders in September, 1911, for that purpose. But there are matters which have to do with what you might call the narrow and contentious side of what is after all an issue far larger than individuals or parties, affecting as it does so supremely the preservation of civilization and the peace and happiness of the world. My object was to avoid as far as possible any contentious element and keep within the language used by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, to which I have given adherence on so many occasions, and to which I still adhere, because it met with the approval of the Conservative party in 1909 and 1910; in 1909, when the resolution was brought forward and accepted unanimously by the House of Commons; and in 1910, when the Naval Act was passed in furtherance of the resolution passed in 1909. That is why, instead of using my own words, although it is painful to the house to listen to so much reading, I have quoted from the speeches of Sir Wilfrid in 1912 to indicate the history that brought about the passing of the Naval Act.

I do not desire to get into any discussion of nationalist issues or the difficulties that were experienced, but I again urge upon the Prime Minister and his ministers the great necessity at this time, in view of the similarity of the conditions now existing with those to which Sir Wilfrid referred, of coordinating if possible our effort with the larger effort, and of cooperating by every means within our power with the British government for the purposes indicated in the speeches to which I have referred, and which fully express my opinions with respect to this matter.

Mr. MacNEIL: Would the minister indicate when these destroyers will be commissioned in the Canadian Naval Service?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Oh, they have been commissioned since some date early in March, and they are now on their way to Canadian shores. I believe that yesterday they were in Barbadoes.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Could the minister tell us how old these destroyers are, and what they cost when originally built by the British admiralty?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are a little over four years old. They were completed in 1932 at a cost of $1,384,300 each.

Mr. MacNEIL: Are they classified as obsolete by the British naval service?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, they are absolutely modern and in first-class condition.

Mr. MacNEIL: What refitting was necessary before their dispatch to Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Just a general observation of their condition as regards engines and other equipment, in the dockyards in England.

Item agreed to.

Governor General's Warrants—To provide for direct relief expenditures in the drought areas of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta (Governor General's warrant of October 7, 1936): $7,300,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: These are governor general's warrants. My right hon. friend said the other evening that he thought it was quite proper to use the governor general's warrants for the purposes of drought relief, so he might be prepared to let this item pass.

Mr. BENNETT: No. The point upon which I want information is the extent of the expenditures and for what purposes they were made, up to and including the present month, so that there may be on the record a memorandum of what money has been spent. I have regard to what the Prime Minister has often pressed very strongly upon us, namely the desirability of keeping within the terms of that section with respect to the expenditures themselves. It will not take long.

Mr. DUNNING: Under feed and fodder expended under governor general's warrants—this is up to March 23, and my right hon. friend will understand, of course, that expenditure is going on continuously—

Mr. BENNETT: I do.

Mr. DUNNING: With respect to the feed and fodder agreements, if we add together the [Mr. Benuett.]

total disbursements already made, and commitments registered with the comptroller, we reach a total for the three provinces of $4,060,000, which is expected to be the total to the end of the fiscal year, as against the warrant amount of $4,700,000. With respect to direct relief agreements for the three provinces, including disbursements already made and commitments registered with the comptroller, we reach a total of $5,325,000 as the estimated cost to the end of the year, as against warrants of $7,300,000.

Mr. BENNETT: By what method was the fodder and feed purchased?

Mr. GARDINER: The method under which it is distributed?

Mr. BENNETT: No, purchased.

Mr. GARDINER: The provincial government made the actual purchases of the feed and fodder.

Mr. BENNETT: In all the three provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, in all three provinces. The federal government did the grading of the hay in all three provinces; that is, we had graders grading the hay in the parts of the provinces where the purchases were made. The payments of freight, of course, were made by the provincial government to the railway companies, shipping from the northern parts of the province to the southern The distribution was made at the areas. point of distribution through the municipal council, and again the distribution was checked by federal inspectors, and the payments when made were on the basis of prices that were established in the agreements entered into. That is, maximum prices were established for the different grades of fodder; the prices paid for grain were the market prices plus the freight. I think the way in which it is stated is this: It is the market price at Fort William less the freight from the shipping point to Fort William, plus the freight from the particular point at which the grain was purchased to the point at which it was distributed. plus a premium of three cents per bushel. That, I think, pretty well covers it.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the particulars of the $7,300,000 and the $4,940,000 appear in the auditor general's report, or just as lump sum distributions to the provinces?

Mr. DUNNING: So many thousands of accounts are involved that I doubt if particulars can be given. I appreciate the desirability of doing so.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister sees the point, having regard to the terms of the statute regarding governor general's warrants.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be glad to take up that point. I may tell my right hon. friend that, in order to cover the matter as fully as possible, the comptroller of the treasury was instructed at the commencement to put his whole organization in to control expenditures, having regard to the fact that we were through the provincial governments, even under the regulations that the Minister of Agriculture has already described, expending funds under governor general's warrant. There is, of course, pre-audit continuously going on by the comptroller general's agents at the various provincial capitals.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I should like to take this opportunity of drawing to the attention of the government something which I have already referred to the Minister of Agriculture; I allude to the very pressing need at the present time of seed and feed for seeding.

Mr. DUNNING: If the hon, member was in the house he must have heard the Prime Minister indicate to-night that one of the measures to be brought down this session is with respect to the guarantee of seed grain. If my hon, friend would be good enough not to confuse that issue with this, it will make it a great deal easier for all of us.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I am not intending to confuse it. I understand from the statements of both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture that a bill is being brought down to that effect. I merely wanted to touch on the fact that while this is going to provide for feed and fodder for the year which is just about completed, there is at this time a very great need of seed and feed, and immediate action in that respect is necessary. I have had a number of letters and telegrams particularly from municipal bodies, who are usually responsible men and who are feeling the pressure of circumstances. I have one here which I would call to the attention of the committee:

Council R. M. Weyburn very much opposed to reduction seed and seeding supplies revised schedule of distribution wholly inadequate feed situation deplorable ratepayers enraged by government action reversion of reductions imperative to forestall otherwise probable drastic outbreaks seriousness of situation cannot be over estimated immediate action dominion government absolutely necessary.

L. D. Kusch, Secretary Treasurer.

I shall have something further to say when the actual legislation is before the house, but I do think that the present situation in the drought area ought to impress upon the house the necessity for the money that was spent last year and the importance of keeping in mind the necessity for a large grant when we come to discuss this matter in connection with the minister's bill.

Mr. QUELCH: Can the minister say where the responsibility lies for defining a drought area? It is hard to draw a line and say that drought relief shall be given on one side and not on the other. Several instances have been brought to my attention where injustice has been done. I drew the matter to the attention of the provincial government and they referred me to the federal government as the responsible authority. I then took it up with the representative, Mr. Chester, who informed me that the provincial government was responsible. I found it almost impossible to get either side to take the responsibility.

Mr. GARDINER: The responsibility can scarcely be said to rest wholly either on the provincial government or on the federal government. The representatives of all three western governments came to Ottawa last September and conducted negotiations with the federal government for assistance. At that time we made a check of the conditions in the west, and the provincial governments also had a check made. They presented to us a list of the municipalities which they estimated would require feed and fodder and direct relief during the winter months. We checked up on their representations with regard to municipalities, and I believe the number presented first by the government of Saskatchewan was in the neighbourhood of a hundred and fifty municipalities, and in Alberta one hundred and twenty-five; in Manitoba there was a group that represented probably about thirty or forty municipalities to begin with.

After we had made our final check, both federal and provincial, the province of Alberta was inclined to the belief that about eighty would have to come in before the end of the season, Saskatchewan about one hundred and twenty-five, and Manitoba about twenty-five.

Then we went over the entire list again and reduced the number for Alberta to about sixty-eight or seventy at most, the number for Saskatchewan got down to about one hundred and four or one hundred and five, and the number for Manitoba to eight and a half municipalities.

It was undertaken in the agreement—I have copies of these agreements—that these municipalities were to be admitted immediately, and they were so admitted as from the first of the relief year, that is the first of September; and the federal government took responsibility for any relief that was necessary in that year, either direct relief or feed and fodder, down to the end of the fiscal year, March 31, a few days hence.

. We then entered into an arrangement whereby any municipalities that desired to enter in addition to these, might make application to the provincial government, which application had to be accompanied by all information with regard to the amount of feed and fodder that was in the municipality, the number of people who were there, the number requiring assistance, and all other information with regard to the financial position of the municipality. There was a regular questionnaire that had to be filled out by any municipality desiring to come in. The province then formed its judgment in the matter, and the information it had obtained from the municipality it passed on to our office, the P.F.R.A. office in Regina, which was placed in charge of the inspection When Mr. Mann of that office obtained a request, whether it came by way of Ottawa or direct from the provincial government, he sent out our inspectors to check up on the municipality so as to find out whether or not the information that had been sent in was reliable and in accordance with the facts, and we made the final decision whether any other municipality was to be admitted. But all parties to the arrangement took some responsibility in the matter and I believe there was a fairly unanimous agreement with regard to the admissions that were finally amade.

Item agreed to.

To provide for expenditures for feed and fodder, freight charges on shipment of cattle, etc., in the drought areas of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta (governor general's warrant of October 7, 1936), $4,940,000.

Mr. DOUGLAS: What arrangement was made for the disposal of cattle in the southern part of the drought area of Saskatchewan? Was it done through the packing houses?

Mr. GARDINER: Three plans were followed. One was to pay the freight on the shipment of cattle to the abattoirs, guaranteeing the abattoirs at least a cent a pound on any meat that was shipped in under that arrangement. That provided for getting rid of the poorer classes of cattle. These were to be canned or otherwise processed and shipped out of Canada for marketing. I understand it was impossible to market it all in that way and a small proportion has been marketed inside Canada by permission of both the federal and the provincial governments.

By another arrangement we were to pay the freight on cattle to be shipped out of the drought area into any other part of western Canada where feed could be obtained, the province and the federal government sharing fifty-fifty the cost of shipping the cattle.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

There was a third policy. We paid half the freight on fodder cattle shipped out of that area if purchased in the area and shipped anywhere in eastern Canada. The province paid the other fifty per cent of the freight, making it possible for persons going from the province of Quebec to the west to buy cattle and have the freight paid outright from the west to Quebec.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Has the minister any idea of the number of head of cattle under each of these classifications?

Mr. GARDINER: About 18,000 cattle came down to eastern Canada under the arrangement, as far as we have been able to check to date. There is no payment due on them until three months after they have been shipped. That three months is about up; most have been checked, and I think about 43,000 head of lambs came under the same arrangement.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Are there any figures as to the other two?

Mr. GARDINER: The numbers were comparatively small this year as compared with 1934. I have forgotten the number but there was not any large shipment.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I had a number of complaints as I went through the southern part of the province concerning the packing companies handling cattle. I cannot vouch that the statements are accurate, but farmers who spoke to me said the representative of the packing houses went through and said: Canner, canner, canner—occasionally feeder, here and there—and they were compelled to accept their grading, and they got a cent a pound for feeders.

Mr. GARDINER: The fact is that one of the reasons the number was so low was that very few went in at the beginning of the season, for persons went out and paid more for cattle than was being paid under the cannery policy. In addition there was opportunity to dispose of cattle under other policies which tended at least to obviate any such difficulty.

Item agreed to.

SOCKEYE SALMON FISHERIES

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the house adjourns, hon. members will perhaps grant their unanimous consent to my presenting a resolution to advise the Senate that we passed two resolutions to-day in relation to external affairs, and to ask their honours if they will unite with us. I need not read them.

Mr. BENNETT: The usual form.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The orders of the day for the next meeting of the Senate I believe have already been made up. I move, Mr. Speaker:

That a message be sent to the senate informing their honours that this house has adopted ing their honours that this house has adopted a resolution approving of the provisions of the convention between Canada and the United States of America for the protection and preservation and extension of the sockeye salmon fisheries in the Fraser river system, signed at Washington, May 26, 1930; attached hereto being the understandings set forth in said resolution; and requesting that their honours will unite with this house in the approval of this said resolution.

And that the clerk of the house do carry

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. McINTOSH:

- 1. What flag will Canada display as a distinct national emblem at the coronation ceremony of His Majesty King George VI, on May 12, 1937?
- 2. Has Canada, a self-governing community within the British commonwealth of nations, a recognized distinctive national flag?
- 3. Have Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, the Irish Free State, all self-governing communities within the British commonwealth of nations, recognized distinctive national flags?
  - 4. Has India a national flag?
- 5. What colonies, with or without some degree of representative government, have their own distinctive flags?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

- 1. It is proposed to display, as the Canadian standard, the Arms of Canada granted by royal proclamation dated November 21, 1921, with the royal crown at the staff.
- 2. Canada has not a recognized distinctive national flag. The red ensign with the Arms of Canada in the fly is used on vessels of the Canadian mercantile marine. The blue ensign is used on vessels belonging to the dominion of Canada. By order in council of the 26th January, 1924, authority was given for the flying of the red ensign with the Arms of Canada in the fly on suitable occasions from all buildings owned or occupied by the Canadian government and situated outside Canada. This flag is flown from the high commissioner's office in London and the Canadian legations abroad.
  - 3. Yes.
- 4. From the information available at present in the Department of External Affairs, no specific national flag has been laid down for India. As a matter of administrative practice the flag authorized for the viceroy is used as the distinctive flag of India. This flag is the union jack with, in the centre, a badge containing the Star of India and the Royal Crown. In addition, India makes use of the red and blue ensign with appropriate badge.
- 5. All colonies have distinctive badges which are applied to the union jack. In addition they make use of the red and blue ensign with appropriate badge.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION-ADDRESS

BY MR. GLADSTONE MURRAY

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the attention of the government been called to an address delivered before the Canadian club at Montreal by Gladstone Murray, general manager of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, on Monday, March 22, reported at length in the Montreal Gazette of Tuesday, March 23, announcing the new national policy of the commission?

2. Was he then speaking with the authority of the commission or of the government or of both?

3. Will a copy of said address be laid on the table of the house?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

EXPORTS OF CANADIAN HAY

Mr. LALONDE:

1. How many tons of Canadian hay were exported in each month of 1935 and 1936?

2. To what countries was such hay exported?
3. What is the average price paid per ton f.o.b. Canadian ports by foreign importers?

Mr. ROGERS: 1. and 2.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO PEACE RIVER COUNTRY

Mr. PELLETIER:

- 1. How much money has been expended by the federal government directly in the form of direct relief in the Peace river country, since October, 1935?
  - 2. How was this money spent?
- 3. Has any money in any form, calculated to assist unemployment, been spent in the Peace river country since October 15, 1935?
- 4. Has the government given any assistance to farmers in the Peace river country because of drought conditions, since October, 1935?
- 5. What financial assistance, if any, has been given the citizens of the Peace river country in any form, since October 15, 1935?
- 6. Has any grant been made by the federal government to the province of Alberta as a contribution to road work in the Peace river country?
  - 7. If so, how much, and when was it paid?
- 8. Was any road building or road improving project within the Peace river country submitted to the federal government by the government of the province of Alberta?
- 9. If so, was it approved or was any project approved?

FEDERAL LOANS TO WESTERN PROVINCES

Mr. PELLETIER:

What amounts have been loaned directly by the federal government or what loans backed by a federal guarantee have been made to: (1) the province of Alberta; (2) the province of Saskatchewan; (3) the province of Manitoba, since October 15, 1935?

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT STAFF

Mr. MULOCK:

- 1. How many of the 11 returned men under forty years of age on the lay-off list in the Interior department were on the staff at Ottawa, and what are their names?
- 2. How many of said returned men were employed in provinces other than Ontario, and in what province or provinces?
- 3. How many of these men were seasonal or part-time employees; what are their names, and what province do they come from?
- 4. What are the names, the departments assigned to, the date of permanent appointments of each of the 78 persons who received permanent appointments in the calendar year 1936 by the Civil Service Commission from the Department of Interior lay-off list?
- 5. How many of the 78 permanent appointments made from the Interior department layoff list by the Civil Service Commission during the calendar year 1936 were holding temporary positions before being appointed to permanent positions?
- 6. How many individuals are involved in the 69 temporary assignments made from the Department of Interior lay-off list by the Civil Service Commission during the calendar year 1936?

[Mr. Rogers.]

- 7. How many individuals from the Interior department lay-off list lost their temporary positions during the calendar year 1936?
- 8. What amount of money has been paid in each calendar year as superannuation to each of the 11 returned men under forty years of age on the lay-off list of the Interior department who have not been assigned to any position and are shown to have been superannuated?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

BEAR RIVER, N.S., PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. BROOKS:

For a copy of all payrolls showing money expended and to whom it was paid on certain undertakings made by the federal Department of Public Works at Bear River, Annapolis county, Nova Scotia, during the year 1936.

YOHO NATIONAL PARK MINING CLAIMS

Mr. NEILL:

For a copy of all correspondence, evidence, reports and agreements between the dominion government, or the Department of the Interior, and A. B. Trites et al., or Base Metals Mining Corporation Limited, relating to certain mining claims in the Yoho national park during the period between the 18th day of February, 1935, and present date.

KOOTENAY PARK MINING CLAIMS

Mr. NEILL:

For a copy of all correspondence, evidence, reports and other papers and documents, passing between any member or official of the government, and any other parties, relating to the staking, recording, assessment work, or in any other way, to the Albion group mining claims, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 in Kootenay park, British Columbia, such return to cover the period from February 18, 1935, to date.

VERDUN, QUE., POSTMASTER

Mr. MASSEY (for Mr. Wermenlinger):

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, documents, reports of inquiry and judgment regarding the dismissal of Mr. J. Raymond, 5365 LaSalle boulevard, Verdun, Quebec, as postmaster of that city, and also concerning the removal of the said post office to a building located on Verdun avenue, in the same city.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—BRITISH COLUMBIA SERVICE

Mr. GREEN:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, reports, memoranda, and other documents passed between the dominion government or any department thereof and the government of the province of British Columbia or any department thereof relative to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police taking over the policing of the said province from the British Columbia police.

DOMINION ATLANTIC RAILWAY COMPANY Mr. PURDY:

For a copy of order in council dated 6th August, 1914, and copy of agreement with the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company attached thereto, both documents being referred to in sessional paper 241.

LOANS TO WESTERN PROVINCES

Mr. PELLETIER:

For a copy of all orders in council passed since October 19, 1935, concerning the renewing, granting or authorizing of any loans to: (a) Alberta; (b) Saskatchewan, and (c) Manitoba.

Mr. DUNNING: The copies of orders in council mentioned in this motion are already in possession of the house, having been tabled from time to time, in accordance with the law; therefore there is no necessity for the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MORNING SITTINGS ON AND AFTER WEDNESDAY, MARCH 31

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Wednesday, the 31st instant, and every sitting day thereafter until the end of the session, the house shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning, and that in addition to the usual intermission at 6 o'clock p.m., there shall be an intermission every day from one to three o'clock p.m.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-UNITED STATES HALIBUT FISHERY CONVENTION

On the order, "Government Notices of Motions":

The Prime Minister—In committee of the whole—The following resolution:

Resolved,—That it is expedient to introduce a measure to confirm and sanction a certain convention between Canada and the United States of America for the preservation of the halibut fishery of the northern Pacific ocean and Bering sea, signed at Ottawa on the 30th day of January, 1937, and to provide for the carrying out of the provisions thereof.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Stand.

Mr. BENNETT: Might we not put it through a stage?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not the bill with me. My right hon, friend will notice that there is a bill founded on the resolution. If it is agreeable to the house to pass the resolution, the bill can be brought in later. The convention is attached to the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Inasmuch as the expediency or inexpediency of the measure cannot be considered until such time as it is before the house, I have suggested, without prejudice to our position or that of any hon. member, that the resolution might go through committee stage and the bill be introduced and given first reading. The bill would then be printed and hon. members would be aware of its contents.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The bill is not ready; therefore the motion had better stand.

Motion stands.

MAIL DELIVERY ON GOOD FRIDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to ask a question of the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott). A few days ago an order was issued from Ottawa providing for only morning postal delivery on Good Friday. Why was the order rescinded on Thursday, March 25, and a full, regular daily service carried out on Good Friday?

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Postmaster General): I shall make inquiries and give the hon. member an answer to his question Has he any particular place in mind?

Mr. LENNARD: I know of two places, Toronto and Hamilton.

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Further to the question asked of the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) by the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Lennard), I should like to ask the Postmaster General to inquire into what took place at the post office in St. Catharines. I was home over the week-end and I was told that some of the men had arranged for an outing on the following afternoon; it was only at five o'clock on Thursday that they received the message that they would have to work on Good Friday.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY COMMISSION

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO APPOINTMENT OF PUBLIC PROSECUTOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are proceeded with I should like to ask a question based on a number of letters received from merchants throughout Canada. Is it the intention of the government at a very early date to appoint a public prosecutor as provided by the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The matter is under consideration.

NEW WESTMINSTER PENITENTIARY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on March 24, the member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) drew my attention to an unusual occurrence in connection with the administration of the penitentiary at New Westminster. His statement was to the effect that some person or persons had broken into the penitentiary, over the high wall surrounding that institution, and had got away with some valuable material.

The facts are that veterinary supplies of the organization valued at $24 were stolen from the piggery during the night of March 16, 1937. The piggery is a detached building outside of the penitentiary walls, situated on the reserve about two hundred yards to the west of the southwest gate. The drugs referred to are used for inoculation purposes and were not considered as being articles likely to be stolen. However, necessary steps are being taken to prevent a similar occurrence in the future.

PRIVILEGE-MR. GLEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. GLEN (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) referred to some statements which I had made as reported on page 2097 of Hansard. I was referring to remarks made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross), as reported on page 1872 of Hansard. The hon. member said:

We in western Canada do not want any dole; we never did want any—

Mr. Spence: You are taking a lot of it.

I was protesting against that remark and, as reported on page 2097 of Hansard, I said:

That remark was made in reply to the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross).

It is clear, therefore, that the reference was to the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) and not to the hon. member for Greenwood. I am glad to make this correction and to take this opportunity of repeating my protest against the words used by the hon. member for Parkdale.

[Mr. Barber.]

PRIVILEGE-MR. COLDWELL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to correct a statement appearing in Hansard. I have received the following message from Mr. E. M. Culliton of Regina, Saskatchewan:

Hansard of March eleventh reports you as stating, "The same paper reported a protest meeting at Mossbank at which the Liberal M.L.A. for Gravelbourg, Mr. E. M. Culliton, indulged in strong criticism of the government's action." I attended meeting but did not criticize the actions of the government or of the wheat board regardless of report.

I am glad to make this correction.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY SECURITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday last I inquired of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) regarding a return which had been ordered by the house some time ago. The minister was indefinite in his reply. He said:

It deals with a delicate legal situation, and it is necessary to obtain very complete legal advice before we answer the question.

As the session is approaching rapidly to a close, I should like to ask the minister whether he can indicate—if he cannot do it to-day, to-morrow will be all right—what the attitude of the government is with regard to this return. It has been ordered by the house and I am therefore entitled to it. Of course there are certain reservations which are recognized by the house. I should like to have an indication as to whether or not I am to get this return.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): I shall follow up the matter and try to make a statement to my hon. friend.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REVISION OF ACCOUNTING SET-UP

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved the third reading of Bill No. 12, to provide for revision of the accounting set-up of the Canadian National railway system.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to restate as clearly as possible our objections to this measure as it now stands. I laid down what I conceived to be a sound principle, that is, that the balance sheet of the Canadian National Railways should show every item constituting the assets and liabilities of that institution. Since we were last here I have looked up the great standard works upon the subject, and I find that according to them a balance sheet should give a true and correct statement of the position of the enterprise to which it refers, indicating clearly its assets and liabilities. I am particularly anxious that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) should be here because I cannot think that with his scrupulous regard for money votes and matters that affect accounting he can give the approval of his governmental majority to the enactment of the measure now before this house, a measure which does not comply with the definition of balance sheet which I have just given.

Several reasons were given why certain changes should be made. The first referred to certain misconceptions, but this is no longer heard of because the misconceptions can be explained away. In the memorandum which he read to the special committee, the minister dealt with what he conceived to be duplication. That argument has also gone by the board; for there can be no such thing as duplication if the accounts of the country indicate that borrowings have been made, and the accounts of the company or institution to which the money is lent indicate the receipt of that money. Finally, the minister made this statement in his closing remarks:

Canada's financial structure as a whole is of first importance to the people of Canada. Nothing should be allowed to continue that would in any way weaken the position that Canada at present holds in the financial world. The people of Canada are rightly entitled to know what is their true financial position at all times and to have access to information that will enable them to understand the situation and to judge therefrom what their real responsibilities are. This being so, the elimination of duplication is of vital importance.

That statement involves an exact negation of the measure now before the house. As a result of the changes that have been made in the balance sheet of the railways, the particulars which are essential if the people of Canada are to understand the true position of their enterprise have disappeared. As the minister points out, it is highly important for the credit of this country that those who read may understand exactly the position. The measure now before the house indicates that, notwithstanding the consolidated audit act or any other act referring to matters of this kind, we are to deal with the accounts of the railway in a given way. The balance sheets which have been offered from time to time by the auditors of the Canadian National railway system clearly indicated the exact position of the enterprise and the amount of money the Canadian people had put into it. I suggested the other day two or three reasons why it is important that this information should always be made available in the accounts of the railway; let me briefly review them.

First, this is a public utility owned and operated by the people of Canada through an instrumentality which they themselves created, and it is essential for the purpose of determining whether or not we have administered it as successfully and as well as we should that they should know exactly what it has cost us to maintain it in its present position. Second, the question of freight rates is affected. In the past the question of rates largely has been directed to the consideration of what the traffic would bear for the purpose of making some return on the capital investment. Third, the question of wages and salaries and emoluments paid to those who administer the property is very peculiarly affected. For instance, it has been held from time to time that in certain conditions we were not able to pay as much as we might have liked to pay because the wherewithal was not being earned. It was then a question of closing up the enterprise or operating it on a scale of payments to those engaged in it which were not as generous as they otherwise might be. These are only some of the reasons which to the average man make it important that the accounts of the railway should contain a true statement of the situation.

During the progress of the discussion, both in committee and in the house, I think it was clearly indicated by all parties and by every individual that statements of value applied to shares and stocks of the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern which were fictitious and admittedly incorrect should be eliminated, and the balance sheet proposes to do that. But it does not stop there. In the annual report of the Canadian National Railways for the year 1936 we have on page 8 the assets, and on page 9 the liabilities of the road: the profit and loss deficit is stated to be $904,655,718.05, and the assets are given as $2,300,368,968.75. It therefore follows that the liabilities as shown on page 9 amount to the large sum of $3,205,024,686.80. Those figures are under the certificate of the auditors. The new set-up as indicated by the minister will be found in the appendix to the bill before the house, on pages 14 and 14A. As a result of the operation which has now been performed upon this balance sheet we have total assets of $2,037,597,996.72; in other words the assets have been cut down by $262,770.-972.03. The arbitrary cutting down by $262,-000,000 of the cost of the property is an operation which should not, in my judgment, have been performed without very clear evidence as to the reasons therefor. It is admitted that in the figures appearing on the balance sheet we have the sum total or the aggregate of the moneys that have been expended upon the property. We are now reducing that by $262,000,000. I have agreed, and every member of this house will agree, that part of that sum is properly cut out, but you have no more right to remove them from the assets of the enterprise money that has been actually expended than you have to eliminate the remaining billion dollars.

The new set-up on page 14 shows the investment in the road and equipment as being $1,832,343,031.85. The figures appearing in the balance sheet issued the other day, certified by the auditors, show the investment in the road and equipment as $2,095,114,003.88. There is no doubt that that amount should be reduced by the excess value attaching to the shares as shown on the balance sheet of the Canadian Northern Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway. Nor would I quarrel with the minister if he eliminated interest as applied to government advances. But with the removal or elimination from the assets column of this road of the money that came from the government of Canada and went into the enterprise I cannot agree. It is a deceptive balance sheet which is offered to the people of Canada. It is deceptive because it eliminates the moneys that were borrowed by the people of Canada and loaned to the railway. The question whether they have real value must be determined in another column altogether and under another set of figures, but for the purpose of assets and liabilities, the matter of what moneys were expended becomes of the utmost import-The one method is correct and the other is not; the one is true and the other is false; the one violates the statute, the other conforms to it. By the statute about to be enacted we are taking out of the operation of the general law this particular portion of our enterprise.

Now turn for a moment to the report of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which came to our hands the other day, and refer to their consolidated balance sheet as of December 31, 1936, which will be found at pages 20 and 21. On the assets column is shown the entire cost of their property, and the sum total is $1,362,000,000. The stocks, bonds and securities of other roads are shown. The liabilities column includes, of course, their ordinary stock and preference stock and the face value thereof—not the value at which it is being sold on the market to-day; not a price of $15 or $16, for which you can purchase a $25 share, or $60 or $65, which is quoted for a $100 share in which $123 of cash has been invested—the figure for the ordinary stock being $335,000,000, and for the preference stock, non-cumulative, $137,256,921.12, a total of $472,256,921.12. That is the sum total of the outstanding share capital of the railway in common and preferred shares, and is stated regardless of the fact that these shares upon the market have not any such value. In other words, the ordinary shares which are shown at a value of $335,000,000 are worth sixty per cent of that amount, as reflected in the maximum price at which they are selling. Then comes the perpetual four per cent debenture stock, the amount issued, the amount pledged, the amount that the public holds; bonds and equipment obligations, sinking fund secured note certificates, current liabilities, deferred liabilities, reserves and unadjusted credits; and, as was pointed out the other day, the land accounts appear in the balance sheet and the amount of the credit surplus is there stated, together with the profit and loss balance as it is. I point that out because in this respect there should not be a variance as between the accounting systems of these two enterprises.

The Interstate Commerce Commission prescribes a form of balance sheet. I took the trouble, although I could not get the last one, to look up the figures in connection with what is known as the Soo line—the Minneapolis, St. Paul and Sault Ste. Marie Railway. It owes the Canadian Pacific Railway Company a large sum of money which was paid by the company on its interest guarantee of the securities of the Soo line, and they show there as liabilities just in the amount of the face value of them. We know they are liabilities that cannot be paid; we know at least that although the Canadian Pacific Railway Company show them in the balance sheet they cannot be paid at the moment and on any reorganization they will not be paid-in money, in any event. But the Interstate Commerce Commission wants the picture disclosed in detail, and insists that it shall be done in this manner. One of our enterprises, namely the Grand Trunk Western, part of the Canadian National system, will have to make its accounting in accordance with the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission Act; it will have to show the amount of liability of the Grand Trunk Western to the Canadian National for moneys advanced for securities which enabled that property to be put in the condition in which it now is. The same is true with respect to the Central Vermont. When the floods destroyed that road, where did the money come from to put it in its present shape? We sold our securities on the guarantee of the government of Canada and put in our treasury Central Vermont securities in respect of the moneys we thus invested. The Interstate Commerce Commission Act will insist upon the Central Vermont showing all this. But where are we? We claim to do it in another way. We claim that these transactions shall be recorded in another manner altogether. I protest against such a course. I cannot think that we are doing any service to the railroad itself by creating a situation which leaves with the average reader an impression wholly at variance with the facts.

I come now to the second point, that is the second section of the liabilities column of the new set-up, page 13a of the bill as considered by this house: "Proprietor's equity, dominion government," and the star indicates that these amounts are included in the net debt of Canada. That, of course, is duplication, in the sense in which the minister used the word and in which the officials have used it all through. Naturally it had to be in the public debt, because the different accounts show it, being certified by the auditor general as constituting a correct statement of our accounts. There is no change there, inasmuch as that would require that the public accounts should be dealt with on a basis entirely different from the present one. The public accounts are not being changed, and the indication here is clearly that these amounts are included in the net debt of Canada.

I am afraid that no words of mine will influence the minister, but I do plead with him. Do not let us get into this question of a securities trust company. I do not mind the use of the words "proprietor's equity," nor do I believe anyone else does, because the meaning is simply that such equity represents the money we have now in the enterprise, what it may be worth. I do not know what it may be worth, and the minister was quite frank when he said that no one does. But certainly proprietor's equity should show what we have in the system.

I would direct the minister's attention to page 13a. Instead of showing proprietor's equity, as indicating outstanding securities in money, what does the statement on that page indicate? Here we find:

1,000,000 shares of no par value stock of the Canadian National Railway Company issued in exchange for the residual value of Canadian Northern stock, $18,000,000.

Tell me, why do we want to be fooling around with one "million shares"? Why should we complicate the balance sheet by leaving in the mind of anyone the impression that a million shares of this kind have any particular value? It costs us on the basis of $18,000,000 and that is all it is necessary for us to say. All we need say is—proprietor's equity, so many shares in the Canadian National Railway Company, vested in the Minister of Finance, in whom they have always been vested. Then the second item:

5,000,000 shares of no par value capital stock issued by Securities Trust to the government in consideration for the securities, advances, claims for unpaid interest and collateral security now held by government.

I wonder if the minister has taken the trouble to realize what that means. It means that the government of Canada is going to transfer to securities trust, which company is not even incorporated by this statute, all these claims against the Canadian Northern and the Canadian National in the way of direct securities of the railways, which we now hold. We are going to turn them over to this organization and they will arbitrarily give us five million shares in return. Why could we not simplify the matter? Why could we not avoid the necessity for a trust company? Why could we not deal with it as business men would, preserving priorities, preserving our rights, not subrogating them in any sense, or lessening their vigour or value. Surely we could do that merely by saying: Securities, advances, claims for unpaid interest and collateral security now held by the government, vested in the Minister of Finance. Why could we not have done that? Why have we done it in this way? I have asked that guestion in vain; no one has answered it. Why should we create this enterprise? I do suggest to the minister that he eliminate this feature entirely. Then comes the other item:

Dominion government capital expenditures for Canadian government railways, $388,290,294.40.

If ever there was a right in any owner or proprietor to reduce an amount outstanding for capital, that right is ours with respect to this amount. It involves expenditures made on the National Transcontinental and the Intercolonial railway. It involves these expenditures made on these government roads, and certainly if we were to rewrite our capital structure we would write down that item in any event. But for the very reason that this is mentioned, the maritime provinces will always be faced with this item. That represents what we have in the Intercolonial railway and what we have in the road from Winnipeg down to Moncton, $388,000,000. I am not complaining about it; it represents proprietor's equity, as the minister says. But I do complain that we have set up a securities trust organization which is to come into being later. It is to be an organization with five trustees who are to be permanent civil servants, deputy ministers and the like, and they are to hold these securities and be the company. The company is to issue five million shares which are to represent securities, advances and claims on which an arbitrary value of $270,000,000 is fixed.

I suggest once more, with all the force at my command, and certainly with no party consideration in my mind and from no partisan point of view, that we do not transfer these securities to anyone; they are now vested in the crown and the crown should continue to hold them. Instead, we should vest the title to them in the Minister of Finance, in whom, as a matter of fact, the title to most of them is now vested. The question of value to be placed upon them is a matter of argument, and in my opinion it should be argued from another angle, from which it has been already discussed. Leaving that aside, however, I plead with the minister to simplify this whole matter and not let the Canadian people, looking at the balance sheet of this enterprise hereafter, read any statement about one million shares of no par value stock of the Canadian National Railway Company and five million shares of no par value capital stock issued by Securities Trust, a company which is to come into being for the purpose of preserving priorities which would never be disturbed unless we transferred those priorities to them. They are, as they always have been, unchanged, untouched; they remain in the name of the Minister of Finance, representing the proprietor's equity in this enterprise. Surely that is fair. Why call into being an enterprise for the purpose of holding something that we now own? Why vest in a third person, a new entity, property that is now ours? It represents our equity as proprietors to-day, and we are proposing to turn it over to somebody else and have the balance sheet hereafter talk about one million shares and five million shares.

I know what would be said about that if it were done by a private enterprise; if a private corporation tried to do the same thing there is no question about what would be done. The language of the courts is clear on that point. But here we are disturbing priorities and equities for the purpose of preserving them and we are getting back to the same position in which we were before by the use of the words "proprietor's equity"; for to-day they are vested in the minister or the government. I am not sure whether they are all vested in the name of the Minister of Finance.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. DUNNING: Practically all.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and we are going to take them out of his hands and turn them over to a new enterprise comprised of five civil servants who are to represent the proprietor's equity. It was not by accident that they were vested in the Minister of Finance. I recall a little conversation I had many moons ago with the predecessor of the Minister of Finance when I learned for the first time that he was the holder of these securities, and the reason was obvious. These are a potential asset. As a potential asset they are vested in the Minister of Finance and Receiver General of Canada. He holds them for the crown. They are not held by him in his own name; they are held by him as persona designata, the Minister of Finance and Receiver General of Canada. There are changes in occupancy; the office goes on forever. Here we take the chance of calling into being something new to hold the proprietor's equity, something new to get something from the Minister of Finance, something new that has a local habitation and a name and is to issue five million shares arbitrarily because the statute says so, to represent the equity of the people of Canada in their enterprise, the proprietor's equity. It is not only a retrograde step but a step at variance with all sound business principles. It is something that would not be permitted or tolerated in a private enterprise, something which no auditors would for a moment permit a private enterprise to do. As it now stands I think that is quite clear.

I am glad the Prime Minister is in his place; if he takes the trouble to look at the bill, commencing at section 12, he will see that a corporation is to come into being to be known as The Canadian National Railways Securities Trust, consisting of five trustees, namely the Deputy Minister of Finance, the Deputy Minister of Transport, the Deputy Minister of Justice, the chairman of the board of directors of the national railways, and the vice president of finance of the national railways. They shall serve without remuneration, and the object of the corporation shall be:

. . . to take over and hold as authorized by this act the indebtedness to His Majesty, together with the collateral securities held by the minister in respect thereof as set out in schedule A of this act.

Later it says that this company shall be one of the many companies that together constitute the Canadian National system.

If that is not making it a little worse than it otherwise was, I cannot understand anything about business. To-day the Minister of Finance holds practically all these securities in trust for the crown. To-morrow if this bill comes into force there is to be created a corporation to which he must turn them over from time to time as he receives them. There are now five million shares to be issued representing the proprietor's equity, and as the securities increase and the debts go up next year the figure will be perhaps five million five hundred thousand or five million two hundred thousand, and so on, as loans are advanced from time to time. When the Prime Minister desires to look at the consolidated balance sheet of the Canadian National Railways to see how it stands, instead of being able to ascertain, as he could before, all the indebtedness of this road to the crown in detail, he will have to look away over here and on page 14A he will find a little statement of the proprietor's equity showing 1,000,000 shares of no par value stock of the Canadian National Railway Company, owned by the securities trust, and 5,000,000 odd shares owned by the securities trust. He may say: "Where are the particulars?" Well, the statute says that is a matter to be settled between the securities trust and the government, and that is all there is about it. The form has been settled after a good deal of trouble; the minister said the other day, very properly, that there are some particulars in which it can be improved. In the United States they have now what they believe to be a very fair form, and they insist on its being complied with by all railways, including the parts of the Canadian Pacific which run through Maine and Minnesota, and that part of the Canadian National system known as the Grand Trunk Western and its allied and associated lines in the United States, largely branch lines which have independent corporate existence.

I summarize all I have to say, then, in these two submissions: that we should preserve our balance sheet in such form that the Canadian people will be able to ascertain by looking at it exactly what money they have invested in their enterprise; that nothing should be done that will divest the Minister of Finance, who now holds them as trustee for the country, of the various securities that constitute the proprietor's equity, and that that proprietor's equity should be indicated in detail in the balance sheet of the enterprise as it has been heretofore, although I will not quarrel with any effort the minister may make to determine a value that he may place upon it for balance sheet purposes, provided the details of it are set out. In the annual report of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, on page 24, the property investment of the company is set out in detail, that is, the total amount put into the road, which they show to be $1,173,263,612. Then on page 25 and following they give a list of all the stocks. bonds and securities of controlled railway companies that they own, and what they cost as distinguished from what they are worth. They show, for instance, on page 29, that the par value of miscellaneous investments at the end of last year was $18,853,324.75, but that they cost only $27,000,000. Wholly-owned companies with a value of $10,347,723 cost $10,125,708; and then there is a summary of it all. Surely we should not by statute declare that we are satisfied that less particularity should be given to the Canadian people in relation to their enterprise than we by statute require a private enterprise to give to its shareholders.

That is the submission which I make. I am afraid it will have no effect upon the government; I only wish it would. Because I have no other purpose to serve; surely that is quite apparent. I am not making these contentions in any hypercritical sense; I am merely advancing reasons which I think will appeal to the intelligence of business men of the country-and I am sure hon, members do not desire to be classed in any other categoryfor the following of a course which will enable us at all times hereafter to know what we have invested in our government enterprise, which may be represented by liabilities classified partly, if you will, as proprietor's equity, and partly in another sense; I am not quarrelling with that if it please anyone so to do. But what I contend for is the great principle which underlies accounting as defined by Palgrave's Dictionary of Political Economy, namely, that a balance sheet should disclose to everyone who reads a full and complete statement of the condition of the enterprise to which it refers. If it fails to do that, it is deceptive; if it does it, it is accurate. If it fails to do that, it is misleading; if it does it, it directs and informs. This as it now stands will not only have the effect of evading the provisions of the Consolidated Audit Act, but will mislead, misinform; will in fact deceive those who read; because reading hereafter no one will be able to understand what is meant by the five or six million shares representing proprietor's equity, securities held by the Minister of Finance in trust for the people of Canada, now to be held by a securities trust, which is called into being for a purpose no one can explain. To proceed in this way serves no useful purpose but departs from well settled principles and cannot do other than mislead and misinform those who

I have made these observations with the utmost candour and with no desire to animadvert upon the motives that lie behind the action, but merely to present the situation as it stands on the record. I urge upon the government with all the power at my command that they reconsider before it is too late a plan which, as no one can deny, will have the effect I have just indicated upon the minds of those who are vitally concerned with all that affects the well-being of the enterprise they own and control and in which they have invested so many hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. W. A. WALSH (Mount Royal): I hope that the members of this house will not consider it presumption on my part to take part in the debate on third reading of this bill. I do so only because of the importance of the question and because I endeavoured to take an active part in the discussion when this bill was before the railway committee. I want to consolidate the arguments I presented before the committee in opposition to certain clauses of the bill, and for that reason I deem it necessary to take part in the debate.

Some of the issues that have been raised by this bill might be expressed in the following way: whether there is any reasonable justification for the claim that the debts in question really represent mere bookkeeping entries, figures that never should have been on the railway balance sheet, that they do not mean anything and are unfair; whether the general public are being given an honest and proper description of the obligations from which the railway is to be relieved; whether the real intentions of the proposers of the bill in seeking to effect these changes are being frankly and clearly stated to the public; whether the Canadian National accounts are to present a fair and reasonable picture of the results of operations or whether only a partial and incomplete portrayal is to be given the public; whether that adoption of these proposals will lessen the financial drain on the government or whether they will encourage a repetition of past extravagances. In short-

Mr. YOUNG: May I ask the hon. gentle-man from what he is reading?

Mr. WALSH: I am just giving a summary of what I propose to discuss during the next few minutes—in short, whether the proposals are in the public interest or are merely an expedient in order to improve the apparent results of the operations of the Canadian National. These were the features of this bill that presented themselves to my mind as I read the various reports on railway matters that have been presented to this house on previous occasions, and I think these features crystallize the substance of the opposition to the various details appearing in this bill.

We could show at the present moment exactly how the financial responsibility of the Canadian National was built up. We could show that when the railway was first taken over an obligation was assumed of roughly $1,329,000,000. We could go further and show that most of the branch line and other railway construction carried on before the lines were taken over took place from 1900 to 1910. We could show that the greatest extravagances indulged in by the railway took place during the years from 1921 to 1929. It is not necessary to go into these details, which no doubt already have been presented to the house; I am sure hon, members who are at all interested in the railway problem are as familiar with them as I am. This afternoon we could also discuss the arrangements that were made from 1917 to 1920 which brought into being the Canadian National Railways as such. Whether we agree or disagree with what was done during those years is a matter of very little importance, in that it is now an accomplished fact, and we are faced with something far more serious than a discussion of the whys and wherefores of the taking over of these various lines and consolidating them into one system known as the Canadian National Railways.

We could also go back, Mr. Speaker, and discuss the various features of the Drayton-Acworth report, laying particular emphasis, of course, on the optimism therein expressed. We could also discuss the extravagances that were indulged in under the management of Sir Henry Thornton. When I make that statement I do not desire to detract in the least from the good work that Sir Henry did in connection with the Canadian National railway system. I quite realize that Sir Henry Thornton was one of the greatest railway men we ever had in this country. I appreciate the fact that he did a great deal of good work in consolidating and welding the various sections of the road into a unit, and that he improved the morale of the employees so that they appreciated the fact that they were working for a great national system. Despite all those good attributes that he possessed, however, and despite all that he did, I do feel that he put the Canadian National system into a debt position which is very largely responsible for the condition with which we are confronted to-day, and which makes it necessary to introduce some kind of bill in order to bring some sort of order out of the financial chaos that exists in connection with that railway. I need mention only one particular item that is still a matter for discussion. I refer to the large and elaborate hotel in the city of Vancouver, which is not yet open, and which I understand in its unfinished condition is costing this country upwards of $50,000 a year in taxes paid to the city of Vancouver for which not one cent of return is received by the system. That is one example of the many that could be quoted in this connection.

The Duff report brought before the people of Canada three main features of the railway difficulty and emphasized them so that we in Canada had a better understanding of them than we had before. The outstanding findings of that report could be condensed into three statements. Canada did not have a population commensurate with its railway development-with that I think we all agree. Canada could ill afford the extravagances incident to bringing the Canadian National property to the standard achieved under the regime of Sir Henry Thornton-with that I think most of us would be in agreement. It should be clearly understood that substantial sums invested in the Canadian National system must be regarded as lost—with that some are in agreement and some are in distinct disagreement.

In connection with this bill and the new financial set-up of the Canadian National, I have in my hand a booklet, from which I do not propose to read, which contains two reports made by officials of the Canadian National railways, recommending new financial set-ups. One report is dated June 20, 1933, and the other April 10, 1934, both preceding the Touche report of 1935. In comparing these two recommendations with the Touche report I noticed that they were almost identical in their statements, differing only to a very slight degree. I want to make this suggestion, and it is on this premise that I want to carry on my discussion a little later: What we have before us in this bill in the nature of recommendations is in reality the recommendations of the very officers of the Canadian National who helped put the system in the chaotic financial condition that exists at the present time, and that the minister is endeavouring to remedy by means of this legislation. We could analyse the Touche report very carefully, but I do not wish to take the time of the house to do so because its contents are well known. They make certain recommendations, and I am firmly convinced that those recommendations are made on faulty premises. In order further to substantiate my opinion in that respect I suggest that the poorest kind of argument one could use to substantiate his claim is to set up prospective criticisms or suggestions and then proceed to argue against them. In other words, it is the practice of setting up straw men and then knocking them down. That is almost as weak a method as the often referred to argumentum ad hominem, which very few in political life use, and which is not recommended as a fair and reasonable method of supporting a cause which you consider just. For these reasons I lose confidence in the Touche report and the recommendations contained therein.

One of the first provisions of the bill is the abandonment of certain claims against the Canadian National Railway Company, and a revision of the accounting set-up of the Canadian National railway system. Where no actual cash is concerned I believe all hon, members can be in complete harmony. Where the minister is seeking to wipe off the books of the Canadian National Railways and the Dominion of Canada items which do not represent cash that has been put into the railways by the Canadian people, we can all agree with his procedure. But I am sure that very few hon. members can agree with the suggestion that we take out of the balance sheet of the railways sums of money which represent actual cash paid into that railway by the people of Canada.

The second proposal in the bill is the setting up of a securities trust corporation for the purpose of preserving the priority rights of the dominion, and for its protection against future contingencies in respect of potential interest and other savings. I was going to deal with that point at length, but my right hon, leader has already done so, and to such advantage that it is not necessary for me to attempt to support the arguments he has put forward. His arguments are worthy of the attention of the house, and I feel that not only the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) but the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will give due consideration to his suggestions regarding this most recent innovation in connection with the railway systems of Canada. I consider it a vicious principle, and one likely to lead to difficulties and troubles which we do not now anticipate with relation to the financial set-up of the Canadian National railway system. From the financial point of view, I do not see that the securities trust corporation is going to play any real part in the final rehabilitation of the railways. In fact I am persuaded it is a step which, again from the financial point of view, will make the railway's prospects more difficult than they now are.

May I again suggest to the Minister of Transport that which I have suggested on so many occasions, that the people of Canada are entitled from year to year to a clear and definite picture of the financial condition of the Canadian National Railways, and that yearly picture should show not only the condition in a particular year, but the condition from the time of inception. The balance sheet of the Canadian National Railways should show the people of Canada exactly the amount of money they have put into the railways, and give them a clear and concise picture of what the roads have cost and what they mean to our citizens.

Certain general principles should be followed in adjusting railway and government accounts. The entire railway loss, including all interest, should be taken up each year in the government budget and be clearly earmarked as such. The full amount of advances by the government should be shown on the railway balance sheet, according to the specific uses made of the funds. The railway balance sheet should record the cumulative loss of the railways. The net results of government railway operations should be clearly portrayed, after charging a fair interest on government investments, and then the necessary cross references should be made in the government and railway accounts so that no misapprehension could exist as to the relationship between the finances of the two.

The suggestion was made in committee that when through the medium of this bill, or in any other way, we criticize the Canadian National Railways, we are naturally antagonistic towards them. I want to make it clear that I do not regard that as fair treatment of anyone who criticizes government measures, even if they pertain to the railways. I look oack to discussions which took place in committee, and to the fact that this particular phase of the matter was referred to by a Liberal member, if other hon, members will permit me to refer to him in those terms. He made reference to that type of criticism, because on that occasion he was criticizing certain features of the bill and there was the mild suggestion that he was somewhat of an opponent of the Canadian National Railways. In my own mind I know that he was no more an opponent of the Canadian National Railways than I am. The hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Vien) is reported to have made the following statement before the committee on railways and shipping:

I resent a little the insinuation that either Sir Edward Beatty or any member of the committee should, when they are trying to find their basic fact, to use my hon. friend's own parlance, that there should be any particular interest other than serving the public interest.

[Mr. Walsh.]

On my own responsibility I wish to express myself this afternoon in terms similar to those used by the hon. member for Outremont. It is on the ground of the public interest that I criticize any measure brought in by the government, whether it pertains to the Canadian National Railways or to any other phase of government activity. I criticize the principle involved. I am not an opponent of the Canadian National Railways; I am a supporter of anything that is good for that system, and I believe I am working in the best interests of the railways and of the people employed thereon when I oppose certain features of Bill No. 12 now before the house for third reading. I wish to make my position perfectly clear, so that there may be no misunderstanding as to where I stand with respect to the Canadian National Railways.

The bill before us cancels a profit and loss deficit balance totalling $904,655,718. There is a credit balance to the proprietor's equity of $676,327,701. This is done by wiping out liabilities amounting to $1,580,983,419. I do not know whether I have the figures exactly right; I have tried to bring them down to date, and they may be a little out, but I think they are close enough for the purposes of the point I wish to make. Speaking to this measure on February 5, the minister is reported on page 597 of Hansard as follows:

I believe a schedule can be set up that will preserve the historical record, and this schedule can be made part of the annual report of the Canadian National Railways.

That is the statement the minister made in this house. However, it was suggested that that was not what was being done by the amendments made to this bill. The minister drew our attention to the fact that he said it could be done, not that it would be done. I think we should have a clearer conception of what the minister means and not be quibbling as to whether "can" or "will" was used. The meaning I took from that state-ment, and the meaning taken from it by all hon. members, is that an amendment would be made to the bill so that more definite information would be furnished than is provided by the bill in its present form. When I made my contention for a clearer balance sheet I referred to the evidence given before the committee by the president of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Henry Morgan. The meaning I took from his statement was that he was in favour of the balance sheet of the Canadian National Railways showing a full and complete picture of the financial expenditures on that system.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Is it not a fact that Mr. Morgan said it was immaterial to him whether that statement appeared in the public accounts or in the balance sheet of the Canadian National?

Mr. WALSH: I was just coming to that point. I should like to read just what Mr. Morgan said in order that hon, members may draw their own conclusions. He is reported on page 46 of the evidence given before the committee on railways and shipping as follows:

The executive of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce welcomes these authoritative assurances.

He was referring to the statements made by the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Finance. I continue:

First, because we believe with the ministers that the proposed adjustment of the capitalization of the Canadian National Railways should not remove from the knowledge of the Canadian people the accumulated costs of the national system. Rather there should be carried forward on the balance sheet itself,—

These are Mr. Morgan's words:

—a complete and continuous record of such accumulated costs from year to year. Secondly, because the clauses of the bill, as now drafted, do not make provision for that intended clarity, which both the ministers and we emphasize.

To carry out the expressed intentions of the government, therefore, it will be necessary to amend the bill, so that no doubt will be left in the mind of the layman that such provision has been made. The executive of the chamber makes this submission in accordance with the principles of sound public finance as approved by the chamber's general membership.

Of course I am in agreement with that statement. The conclusion I drew from it was that the Canadian Chamber of Commerce accepted the amendment which was proposed at that time, which was that this information should be shown on the balance sheet of the Canadian National Railways and not as is proposed by the bill as at present amended. Mr. Morgan continues:

The Minister of Transport has intimated that the proper way of presenting annually this complete financial picture rests with the railway committee. We feel confident, therefore, that the committee will wish to see to it that an adequate clause is inserted in the bill and the desire of the government thus fulfilled.

He continues further on page 50, as follows:

Now, in the case of a government, the people of Canada, no matter what they do with the Canadian National balance sheet, still have to pay the amount that has been guaranteed by the government on the railway situation and on the advance the government has made to the railways; and, therefore, whereas it is quite appreciated that a new set-up for the Canadian National may be quite correct, all I am trying to submit is that we show in a footnote, or in some manner which you are better able to judge and work out than we are—I do not propose to make a suggestion—but the footnote should show the yearly deficit and the accumulated deficit so that I as a taxpayer or as a business man in checking up the balance sheet of the Canadian National Railways will be able to see exactly the situation for that year and previous to that year.

I can draw no other conclusion from that statement than that Mr. Morgan supported the contention I made before the committee that the balance sheet of the Canadian National Railways, rather than the balance sheet of the Dominion of Canada, should contain this clear and concise picture. It is use-less for the Minister of Transport to suggest that there will be a footnote in the balance sheet of the Canadian National Railways to the effect that if further particulars and details are required, reference should be made to the balance sheet of the Dominion of Canada. That is not what we want; that is not what the people of Canada want; that is not what the business men of Canada want, and that is not what the railway employees want. They want to be able to turn to the balance sheet of the Canadian National Railways and find there a clear and definite statement, not only for that one year but for all the years the system has been in existence. That is one point I want to emphasize in particular.

There is another point to which I should like to direct the attention of this house. I am inexperienced in so far as government work is concerned, but in my opinion the principle of this bill was changed in committee. I am subject to correction, but I have always understood that when the house agreed to the second reading of a bill, it agreed to the principle of the bill. When we gave second reading to this bill we understood it was to provide for the revision of the accounting set-up of the Canadian National railway system. In my opinion that is no longer the principle of this bill. The minister has changed it so that now it provides for the revision of the accounting set-up of the balance sheet of the Dominion of Canada. The principle behind the bill was altered in some degree between the time it left this house after second reading and the time of the return of the bill to the house. I brought this point to the attention of Doctor Clark, deputy minister of Finance, who appeared as a witness before the committee; I suggested that it was not in our power to make so vital an alteration in a bill as that proposed by the minister. Doctor Clark replied that "we cannot actually write them off unless parliamentary authority is given for such writing off." The sums now to be written off were advanced to the Canadian National and its subsidiaries as loans and should not now be eliminated without specific authority of parliament. And how, I asked, are we to give this authority? I assume the authority should have been given by parliament, as has been done heretofore in connection with deficits of the Canadian National Railways. We are now proposing to give this authority on third reading of a bill to amend the financial set-up of the Canadian National Railways. The Prime Minister, I know, is an authority on constitutionalism; he has used phrases which would lead us to believe that he stands pat on principles of constitutionality. I suggest to him that it is not constitutional to change in committee the principle of a bill, or to adjust the balance sheet of the Dominion of Canada. In this case the largest adjustment that has ever been made in the public accounts is proposed to be done by authority of an amendment tacked on to a bill dealing with a matter other than the finances of the dominion. If that is constitutionalism it is contrary to my conception of the meaning of that term. My own experience may have led me into an error of judgment, but I make this statement in the hope that the point will be cleared up by, perhaps, the Minister of Transport. Either he is wrong or I am. As a new member, naturally I am willing to learn, but as I have said this proceeding is not in accord with my conception of constitutionalism.

When we were in committee I urged that we should get further evidence. I stated that I was not competent, on the strength of such evidence as we had already heard, to pass upon every phase of the bill, and I asked that another accountant be brought in, not to make an accounting of the Canadian National Railway system but to give evidence upon the principles involved in the changes that the minister has proposed. That was a very simple request. Of course I was asked by the chairman to make a motion, but had I done so it would have been defeated. I threw myself, so to speak, upon the mercy of the chairman and the minister and requested that they call an expert accountant, preferably one versed in railway matters, to come before the committee so that we could ask him specific questions which would enable us to form a judgment on the principles involved in this bill. Some members interpreted this request as meaning that another firm of accountants should go over the books of the railway. That was not what I had in mind; I wanted merely to ask a dozen or so questions in order to find out whether the accounting principles involved in this bill were the accepted practice among chartered accountants, particularly those concerned with railway accounting. The request was refused, but I contend that I had a right to make it and [Mr. Walsh.]

that it should not have been rejected. I have noticed in reading the reports of other committees of this house that they call in expert witnesses of all kinds to deal with the matters that come before them. By refusing my request the government closed the door of opportunity to me to find out whether I was right or wrong in the opinions that I had been expressing in connection with this measure.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I hope the hon, member wishes to be fair in this matter. He knows very well that when he made his request before the committee it was the hon, member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) who explained why the request was not to be granted. It was not granted because the officials of the Canadian National Railway Company who appeared in the capacity of experts before the committee gave information in writing and otherwise in reply to all questions that were asked by the members, including the hon. gentleman, and the committee therefore thought that it was not necessary to bring before the committee some other expert who had never had anything to do with the subject matter.

Mr. WALSH: In reply to the hon. member may I say that I think my request was refused largely through a misunderstanding. I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North was under the impression that I wanted another accountant to come in to check over the books of the Canadian National Railway Company. All I wanted was an accountant to give information on the principles involved in this bill; I asked for nothing more and nothing less. The hon. member for Winnipeg North had his own opinion, and he was entitled to it.

May I add that the chairman of the committee and the minister gave me a fair and reasonable opportunity of presenting my case. I do not want to speak in terms of prejudice against their attitude. They gave me every possible latitude in criticizing every feature of the bill; in that respect I have no criticism to offer. My only regret is that I was not given an opportunity of having an expert accountant—and, not solely for my own benefit; for I have no doubt that I was not alone in desiring advice in this particular matter.

I intended to draw attention to certain other features of the bill, but I doubt whether time will permit. I was going to reemphasize that one of the worst features appears in section 24. We are asking that a complete picture of the Canadian National Railways be placed in the balance sheet of that system, and what do we get? We get a kind of picture placed in the balance sheet of the Dominion of Canada, and a reference made to it in the balance sheet of the Canadian National Railways; we also get this, that everything that has been given, that is, all grants made to the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific, will appear as a footnote in the balance sheet of the Dominion of Canada. We ask for bread and we get a stone. It is on that ground that I oppose section 24; it is an intrusion. Not only does it not belong to the bill, but it shows one side of the picture only. It is incomplete, in that it shows no quid pro quo; there is nothing to indicate what Canada received in return for the various grants that were made by this country to the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railroads.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon member, but he has exhausted his time.

Mr. WALSH: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the house for having allowed me to present my views.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I rise now only to correct a statement made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Walsh). He tried to blame Sir Henry Thornton for the building of the Canadian National hotel in Vancouver. I happen to know something about that because I was a member of the Vancouver city council at the time that the building was started, and I can tell the hon. member and the house that Sir Henry Thornton was not in favour of building that hotel then. Many years before he was appointed president of the Canadian National Railways an agreement had been made between the city of Vancouver and certain railway companies-I do not know whether it was the Canadian Northern or what railway it was-in connection with certain property in Vancouver, and a part of that agreement was that at some time a hotel would be built in the city to cost a certain amount. In 1926 or 1927 the Canadian National Railway Company was asked to carry out that part of the agreement. The management, under Sir Henry Thornton, did not wish to carry out that part of the agreement because they did not think the time was opportune, and after some negotiations between the Canadian National Railways and Vancouver the city threatened to sue the company to enforce the contract between the railway and the city. These are the facts, and I do not think it is correct to say that the building of the hotel was due to Sir Henry Thornton or to unsound business on the part of the management of the Canadian National Railways. But even if it were, is that the only mistake that was made between 1925 and 1929? What private company in Canada did not over-develop in that period? Why, then, hold up this particular company as extravagant in this regard? The other railway is equally guilty. I have heard the statement made in the house on several occasions and I think it is my duty to make the correction.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): This bill has been fully discussed in the house and in committee, and in closing the debate I shall confine myself to discussing a few criticisms that have been offered on second and third readings. The chief attack on the bill is that it destroys the record of the cost of the Canadian National Railways to the people of Canada. We are told that the record is to be found in the balance sheet and that when the balance sheet is revised as proposed by this bill that record will go. There is a record of the cost of the Canadian National Railways to the Canadian people but it is found in the public accounts of Canada. You cannot find that record in the present balance sheet of the Canadian National Railways. To include that record in the present balance sheet, some $300,000,000 must be added to the indebtedness as shown in the balance sheet.

In 1933 the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act was placed on the statutes of Canada by the government of that day. That act provides that the deficits of the Canadian National Railways shall not be funded, and that provision was made retroactive to take in the balance sheet of 1932. From that day, beginning with the balance sheet of 1932, the record of deficits was ended.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not like to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but at page 18 he will find: "Dominion of Canada. . . income deficits, Canadian National Railways, contributed by dominion, 1932-36, $277,521,-384.49."

Mr. HOWE: That may be so.

Mr. BENNETT: That is this year's report.

Mr. HOWE: It is in the report but not in the balance sheet.

Mr. BENNETT: That is part of the balance sheet, receipts and expenditures; it will be found on page 18.

Mr. HOWE: The main object of this bill could be achieved by making retroactive the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act of 1933. Let us see what we are really doing in this bill—because it is being lost sight of in the criticism of details. We are setting up a balance sheet that eliminates the duplication of debt as between the present railway balance sheet and the net debt of Canada. We are including in the new railway balance sheet all the debt of the railway that is not carried as part of the debt of Canada. That is the full test of what shall be retained as debt in the balance sheet. If it is in the net debt of Canada it is eliminated as debt from the Canadian National Railways balance sheet. What was formerly debt as between the dominion government and the railway is continued in the balance sheet as proprietor's equity. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has said that the proprietor's equity items are a duplication of the net debt of Canada. Of course that is so, but it is not a debt duplication because a proprietor's equity is not debt but is simply equity, as the term implies.

Mr. BENNETT: But it is in the liabilities column.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, just as the common stock of any ordinary enterprise is in the liabilities column. It is not bonded indebtedness. Now what is the test by which we arrive at the amount to be retained as proprietor's equity? The test is this: Was the money invested in the property? If so, it is retained in the proprietor's equity, provided it has not all previously been included in the new statement of funded debt. On the liability side of the new balance sheet will be shown every dollar that was ever spent to create an asset of the railway. It is all there.

What have we eliminated? We have eliminated, first, the losses of the railway, money advanced by the dominion government to make up operating deficits. Surely a loss is a loss and should be treated as such rather than as a liability or as an investment of the dominion. It is money lost, it is gone; and in paying that money back to the railway we have simply replaced the capital that was lost in that year through operation. Then we have also eliminated the interest on these losses. Under the legislation governing the accounting of the Canadian National Railways that interest was required to be carried by the railways and set up each year, but it never was set up in the accounts of the dominion government. There is in the public accounts of Canada no such statement of assets represented by interest charged on loans by the government to the Canadian National Railways. So there we have a perfectly logical elimination. It is significant that everyone who has had to do with the Canadian National Railways has urged the necessity for the procedure which is being followed in this bill.

The authorities have been cited. We have first the Drayton-Acworth commission of 1917. Then we have the two firms of chartered accountants who were appointed by the government to make a report on the accounts as between the government and the national railway. Those accountants recommended the step which is now being taken.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not in terms. They recommended reductions in the capital stock, but not in the terms of this proposal.

Mr. HOWE: They recommended that the practice of capitalizing operating deficits be discontinued, and that government advances of such deficits be not added to the investment account, but be absorbed in the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the Duff report?

Mr. HOWE: No, that is the report of 1925 made by Edwards, Morgan & Company and Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Company.

Mr. BENNETT: That only covers deficits, as I pointed out.

Mr. HOWE: If we accept their recommendation it takes care of practically all the write-off contemplated by this bill: that government advances for such deficits——be not added to the investment account, but be absorbed in the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Then we have the report of the Duff commission of 1931-32 under the chairmanship of the Right Hon. Sir Lyman P. Duff, which made two significant statements on the writing down of the capital liabilities of the Canadian National Railways. In considering the earning power of the railway the commission said, at page 30:

It is obvious that on this basis of earnings the capital liabilities would require a very drastic writing down.

In recommending the early attention of the board of trustees to the whole matter of the capital structure the commission further emphasized the need of liability adjustment as follows:

. . . . this commission is of the opinion that it must be frankly recognized that a very substantial part of the money invested in the railways comprised within the Canadian National system must be regarded as lost and that its capital liabilities should be heavily written down.

Then we have the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act of 1933, passed by the late government, which provided that "income deficits shall not be funded." We have the financial legislation since 1932 which specifically limits the borrowing powers of the railway to capital expenditures and refunding, and which specifically declares that deficit appropriations should be applied against the accountable advances. Then we have a very interesting letter from which I think I might take time to read a few lines, addressed to Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, then Prime Minister of Canada, by Sir Joseph Flavelle, Bart., dated Toronto, August 12, 1921. This letter was printed at the time and was circulated. At the time Sir Joseph was chairman of the board of the Canadian National Railways. He pointed out his idea of the proper capital structure for the railway. On page 7 the letter says:

The new national railway company to be formed shall have a nominal capital of say five million common shares and two million five hundred thousand six per cent preference shares—

Mr. BENNETT: Is that the whole letter?

Mr. HOWE: No, it is a very long letter, and I was just reading the part dealing with capital structure. It is not important if my right hon. friend objects.

Mr. BENNETT: No, but the point is that the various paragraphs are interrelated. The letter deals with the whole transportation situation and was written before the system was in its present shape, as the minister probably remembers.

Mr. HOWE: I am not particular about reading it, but I think it is interesting.

Mr. BENNETT: I am quite content if the minister puts the whole letter on Hansard.

Mr. HOWE: The total share capital would thus be $750,000,000, with the government taking common shares at par in payment of its existing advances to the various systems. These, as of December 31, 1920, were $320,000,000 of loans and $33,000,000 of Grand Trunk Pacific debentures.

The figure would no doubt be increased by December 30 next, or whatever date was fixed for taking over. The government would turn over to the company the equity in the system—

There you will observe the securities trust.
—subject only to the bonds and debentures and guaranteed stock issued to the public, and to the fixed charges which may result from the Grand Trunk arbitration.

In other words, the debt of the railway was to be made a closed book, and advances from the government were to be covered by common stock. The paragraph continues:

Thus, the existing government advances, excluding the capital cost of the Intercolonial and Transcontinental, were to be represented by common stock ownership only, and no part of the interest on it would be a fixed charge or would be cumulative.

Then we have the precedent of the accounting practice of the state owned railways of Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. In connection with the Victorian railways, legislation passed December last provides for writing down of the railway loan liability by £30,000,000 sterling.

Mr. BENNETT: That was in lieu of depreciation.

Mr. HOWE: Nevertheless it is a forty per cent write-down, which is very heavy depreciation. The interest on this capital write-down will no longer appear as a charge in the railway accounts. There is no accumulation of prior years' deficits in the 1936 balance sheet.

In the annual report of the South Australian railways for the year ended June 30, 1935, the commissioner suggests a capital writedown of £10,800,000 sterling and the elimination of interest on that sum. Deficits accumulated up to 1927 were written off by parliamentary authority in that year.

The 1936 balance sheet of the Western Australian railways shows no accumulation of prior years' deficits. The Queensland Railways had a capital write-down of £28,000,000 sterling under parliamentary authority in 1931. The interest on this capital write-down no longer appears in the railway accounts. There is no accumulation of prior years' deficits on the 1936 balance sheet. The New Zealand Railways had a capital write-down of £10,400,000 sterling under parliamentary authority in 1931. The interest on this capital write-down no longer appears in the railways accounts. There is no accumulation of prior years' deficits on the 1936 balance sheet.

Mr. WALSH: Are not those state owned railways merely a department of the government? They do not bear the same relationship to the government of the country as our railway does to the government of this country?

Mr. HOWE: They are exactly the same, wholly owned by each province just as the Canadian National Railways is owned by our federal government.

Mr. WALSH: I thought they were administered as a regular department of the government.

Mr. HOWE: They are run as separate enterprises.

Mr. BENNETT: It operates through a commission.

Mr. HOWE: Quite.

Mr. DUNNING: A difference in name only.

Mr. HOWE: In the debate on second reading a point was made both by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) about the proviso:

Notwithstanding any provision of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, or any other act—

I thought it important to point out in just what way this bill does violence to that act, and I obtained a statement from the chief treasury officer which I shall read.

Mr. BENNETT: Who is that?

Mr. HOWE: "F.M.M." That is our own treasury officer.

Mr. DUNNING: The officer of the treasury in the transport department.

Mr. HOWE: He says:

The inclusion of this proviso was simply precautionary in order to overcome any technical objection that might develop in the application of the act. It is difficult, when drafting legislation such as this, to analyze all existing legislation to the point of certainty that no obstacle existed in any previous law. However, nothing has since developed to indicate that the clause is essential.

I have reviewed the amended act as it stands for a third reading, and am of the opinion that no serious difficulty need now be apprehended if the proviso were to be dropped.

The inclusion of similar omnibus clauses in existing legislation is evidenced in, for instance:

The act of 1935 respecting relief measures which contains the following wording in section 2—

"Notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law, the governor in council may,"

Chapter 22, 1935, an act to amend the War Tax Act, section 9A, subsection (1) contains the following words—

"Notwithstanding anything contained in this act or in any other statute or law."

The Salary Deduction and Continuance Act, 1935, section 3, subsection (1) contains the following wording—

"Notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law."

While it is, of course, not possible to foresee what technical objections may develop when the act is applied, the proviso in question could, I believe, be dropped without risk of occasioning any serious difficulty.

That clause, of course applies only to section 8, and I am told that the only possible effect it could have would be where some slight adjustment is to be made as between the accounts of the Canadian National Railways, the Hudson Bay Railway and the harbours board, and that the whole sum affected is about $1,600,000.

[Mr. Bennett.]

On the second reading the question was raised whether clause 12 of the bill really constituted a corporation to be known as the Securities Trust. In that regard I have an opinion by Mr. W. Stuart Edwards, deputy minister of Justice, as follows:

Dear Sir.

I understand that you require to be advised as to the form and effect of clause 12 of the bill to enact the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act. In the first place I beg to advise that the dominion Companies Act has no application since that act relates to joint stock companies, that is to say, companies formed on the principle of having for their members the holders of shares of the capital stock and no other persons. The corporation to be established by this bill is not a joint stock company since the members of the corporation are the trustees and I may say that in adopting this scheme we followed the scheme of the Canadian National Railway Company. By section 1 of that company's act of 1919, the directors, who are not shareholders, are incorporated as a company and by section 3 provision is made for vesting the capital stock of the company in the Minister of Finance.

Exactly the same as the Securities Trust. He goes on:

The Securities Trust acquires the attributes necessary to enable it to function as a corporation as a result of section 30 of the Interpretation Act rather than the Companies Act. That section, amongst other things, enables the corporation to sue and be sued and limits the liability of the members of the corporation.

The future tense was adopted in clause 12 of the bill to provide for the continuation of the corporation into the future and I beg to advise that since nothing is required to be done or is contemplated to be done under this or any other act to create or complete the corporation convinces me that the corporation will be established by the operation of clause 12 with out more.

Yours truly,
W. Stuart Edwards,
Deputy Minister of Justice.

Mr. BENNETT: Although there are no words saying that the corporation is created? Usually I have a great deal of respect for an opinion by Mr. Edwards.

Mr. HOWE: As I say, in these matters I defer to our legal talent.

Now let us discuss for a moment this bogey which has been raised in connection with the Securities Trust. We are eliminating from the present indebtedness of the railway several items which I think we all agree properly should be eliminated. One item is some $373,-000,000 of accumulated deficits; another amounts to some $530,000,000 of interest. We wish to retain the item of some $288,000,000, representing money invested in the railway. All these securities have the same relative value so far as priorities against the railway are concerned. Perhaps for practical purposes we could say that these advances for deficits and these interest claims are worthless and might be thrown away, and we will keep only those securities which represent the actual investment in the railway, amounting to some $288,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: You could not do that except by statute. No trustee of the crown could give away property of the crown in any other way.

Mr. HOWE: That is true, but nevertheless we have undertaken to set up this balance sheet in order to show the money invested in the property, which after all is only $288,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: No, over a billion dollars

Mr. HOWE: No, $288,000,000 as far as this particular item is concerned. We have claims here totalling about $1,100,000,000, of which only $270,000,000 was actually invested in the railway property. That $1,100,000,000 has a value in that it establishes certain priorities in connection with any claims against the railway property made by anyone other than the dominion government, and for that reason we have thought it worth while to preserve those claims. Nevertheless we do not wish to burden our balance sheet with more than the amount of those claims representing the actual investment in the property. Therefore, as a matter of convenience only, we have set up a company to be known as the Securities Trust, which will hold all the claims, totalling something over a billion dollars. But we will put a value on the Securities Trust representing the $270,000,000 so invested in the property, and that amount we wish to include in the balance sheet of our railway as part of the proprietor's equity. Therefore we set up this company in a form which will permit it to be consolidated in the balance sheet of the railway, and we make the provision that this Securities Trust is a company within Canadian National Railways.

On the other hand, we place the stock and ownership of the company in the hands of the Minister of Finance, in lieu of the claims he formerly held totalling over a billion dollars. We then say that we will issue five million shares of stock representing ownership of the Securities Trust. After all, five million shares does not seem to be out of line with claims having a face value of over $1,100,000,000. So there we have our Securities Trust, a company wholly owned by the Minister of Finance, a company within the Canadian National Railways in order that its stated value can be consolidated with the railway balance sheet.

That is the whole story, and it seems to me that this company, set up as a convenience to maintain priorities and to give a stated value to securities which will allow them to be brought into the structure of the railway as we require, is being unduly criticised.

The question arises what the net benefit of all this may be. It seems to me that it can be put concretely in a few words. In the first place, we put a value on the property, the Canadian National Railway, which represents the total money invested in that property. Surely that presents a fairer picture to the public and the world at large than the present structure, enlarged as it is by operating deficits and interest thereon. It seems to me it is going to give the officers and employees of the railways a more reasonable objective to attain. Surely the earning power of a property must bear some proportion to the investment in that property. And setting up as the capital the investment in the property rather than a largely inflated sum will, I believe, put new hope in those responsible for the operation of the property.

It also shows to the world a consolidated balance sheet of Canada and its wholly owned subsidiary which will give a real picture of the total indebtedness of the two. With this balance sheet we can say to the investor in the securities of Canada "We have a certain debt which is shown in the net debt of Canada. We are responsible for a certain other debt, the funded debt of the Canadian National Railways, as shown in her balance sheet. If you add one debt to the other you have the total indebtedness of Canada, and when you buy a security of either the government of Canada or the Canadian National Railways you are buying your proportion of that consolidated debt." When that picture is shown I believe we will be better able to say to the investor of Canada, "If you buy a bond of the Dominion of Canada or a bond of its principal subsidiary, the Canadian National Railways, you will be buying an obligation of the dominion which, when due, will be met in full, in the future just as it has been in the past."

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. BENNETT: I wish to point out that under the rules of the house there is no reply on the third reading. I did not raise the issue, however, because I desired the minister to proceed. It is a fixed rule, and on one occasion I found myself embarrassed by it. The rule in May about the minister not having said anything when he makes a motion has no application in this particular, because we provided otherwise by special rule. It is an ordinary motion, a matter of course, and it is not a substantive motion. There is right of reply on a substantive motion. On other than a substantive motion, there is none. If the minister merely rises in his place and moves third reading he has exhausted his right, although in England, for another reason, the rule is somewhat different. They have specially provided a prohibition against it. On one occasion I endeavoured to make a reply, and found myself confronted with the rule as interpreted by the clerk at that time, namely that it was not a substantive motion. I only point this out to show what we met with on that occasion.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My right hon, friend is not quite correct. I understand the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) did not speak when presenting the bill for third reading, and therefore he is entitled to speak at any stage during the debate on third reading. That is the rule, according to May.

Mr. BENNETT: That is laid down in May; but he does speak, the minute he makes the motion. Mr. Speaker said, "The Minister of Transport moves," and that settles that. Then, we went on. Another minister might have moved, as I had to have done on another occasion. However, I waited until the minister had finished his observations, because I did not wish to take advantage of the rule. I direct attention to it, however, as it is a matter of some importance to all of us.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the motion carried?

Mr. BENNETT: On division.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would direct the attention of my right hon. friend to Redlich, Volume III, page 57:

A further exception is the right of reply enjoyed by the member who has proposed a substantive motion. He is entitled to a second speech at the close of the debate. The right does not extend to the mover of a formal motion, such as a motion for adjournment, or to a member who has moved an order of the day. In the case of moving an order of the day a member may reserve his right to intervene in the debate at a later stage by signifying his proposal of the order by merely raising his hat, without saying a word.

Could it not be interpreted that such was the intention of the minister?

Mr. BENNETT: No; the difficulty is that that is the English rule; but we have a prohibition here. We have a rule, standing order 43, to which I would direct the attention of the house. That was the difficulty I experienced. I am quite familiar with what is [Mr. Bennett.]

laid down in May, but I must say we have no such rule, but rather a prohibition. We shall have to amend the rule, or face the situation as it is and let another minister make the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. BENNETT: On division.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADA-UNITED KINGDOM TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 79, respecting a certain trade agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Sections 1 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On section 5—Repeal of United Kingdom Trade Agreement Act, 1932.

Mr. BENNETT: The provision inserted in the old act dealing with the dumping of goods in the British market from countries which were not maintaining a capitalistic or profit system, has disappeared. Has any thought been given to the matter? Is the change made by arrangement, or how?

Mr. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, it was done by arrangement between the two governments. It was thought that the circumstances of to-day render it undesirable to retain the clause.

Section agreed to.

Section 6 agreed to.

On the schedule—Trade agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom.

Mr. BENNETT: In view of the time which has elapsed I should like to know if the minister can give us further information with respect to black sheets. I have had several further communications from other quarters stating that there have been further increases in the price. Is the minister in a position to give us any further information? The committee may be amazed to know that one of our Canadians has received an order from Africa for sheets for galvanizing, owing to the fact that under existing conditions there is such difficulty in getting supplies of raw material from Great Britain.

Mr. DUNNING: He was not able to accept the order.

Mr. BENNETT: He is unable to accept the order unless this government is prepared to permit him to go into the United States to buy raw material. I submit that it is abundantly clear that the only market in which supplies can be obtained is the United States. In view of the constantly rising prices, I suggest that black sheets should be made free without further delay for a period of two or three months so that the Canadian fabricators may obtain the raw material for the galvanizing of sheets.

Mr. DUNNING: Make them free?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, considering the present market price and the fact that they would be subject to the three per cent excise tax. If they could have been put on a basis of five per cent two months ago, well and good; but even if they are permitted to come in free they will cost something like 12½ per cent more than they would have cost at that time. I am not sure but that the figures are higher than that, because they have changed since I last made myself familiar with the price list. We should permit our fabricators to get raw materials and the only place they can get them is the United States. Since we last discussed this matter there has been an increase in price.

Mr. DUNNING: As the leader of the opposition intimated in a former discussion on this matter, it must be made the subject of discussion between this government and the government of Great Britain. I do not want to prejudice the approaches that are being made in this connection by discussing the matter any further, except to say that approaches are being made.

Mr. MASSEY: In further substantiation of what the right hon. leader of the opposition has said, I would say that I have received several communications in regard to this matter which have stated that men have been prevented from going to work as a result of this raw material not being available at the present time. I have been urged to raise my voice to see that something is done, at least temporarily, by way of suspending the duty on these articles.

Schedule I agreed to.

Schedules II and III agreed to.

On schedule IV.

Mr. BENNETT: This schedule includes the vegetable oil items. I did not take part in the discussion the other day and I desire to make only one observation. It seems to me to be extremely difficult to understand just what can be accomplished by a reference to the tariff board in view of the fact that the agreement is completed before the reference could be made.

Mr. DUNNING: They can ascertain the facts.

Mr. BENNETT: What facts?

Mr. DUNNING: I can assure my right hon. friend that the situation is most complicated. I am desirous of having a report from the tariff board upon which I can rely with respect to statements of fact, rather than having to rely upon statements made by either side of what is a very deep-rooted difference of opinion as between the interested parties.

Mr. BENNETT: I appreciate the minister's view and I agree with him as to the undesirability of endeavouring to arrive at a judgment on partially complete statements. My difficulty is understanding what the tariff board can do that will affect this matter, in view of the fact that we have provided already by this agreement for a ten per cent preference.

Mr. DUNNING: A minimum preference of ten per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: There does not seem to be any dispute as to certain facts. One undisputed fact is that the importations last year amounted to 250,000,000 pounds. This is a tremendous increase over any figure we have ever had before. The increase is so great as to warrant the conclusion, to put it mildly, that to wait until the next session of parliament for any action would appear to be creating a somewhat serious situation from the standpoint of Canada. These importations totalled 125,000 tons, which struck me as being a tremendous quantity. Any facts which may be ascertained by the tariff board would not modify that essential fact.

Mr. DUNNING: As in the case of steel, but to a lesser degree, the price factor in connection with these vegetable oils must be considered. It may sound remote, but as a matter of fact the glycerine content has made many of these oils valuable for war purposes. The need for vital chemicals has been such as to affect the price structure of these commodities. I do not say that this will be a determining factor, but it may have the effect of changing the bearing in the immediate future.

Mr. BENNETT: Prices certainly have gone up during the last few months or even weeks.

Mr. DUNNING: I have been forced to rely upon the advice of one side or the other of a controversy in connection with which I am bound to say that both sides have made extreme statements. I am not referring to the sides as represented in this house, but to those presented by the business interests of this country. I refer notably to the baking interests, as representing the consumers, and the animal fat producers, as representing the producers, supported to a degree by certain other elements including the National Dairy Council. Extraordinary statements have been made and I do not think we should dogmatize about what is to happen in the near future. I can only venture to say-I am again basing my statement upon the advice of one side only-that the price factor has been such as to prevent forward ordering to anything like the degree that it took place last year.

Mr. BENNETT: In other words, the imports will be lessened.

Mr. DUNNING: That is what is represented to me.

Mr. BENNETT: I certainly appreciate the difficulty the minister faces in dealing with this or any other item so completely affected by war conditions, using those words as indicating a state of mind on the part of many people rather than an actual condition. I represent a locality which is interested in vegetable oils and I bring the matter to the attention of the minister at this time because I did not participate in the discussion the other day. If a report is received from the board, we have no power to deal with it by executive action.

Mr. DUNNING: By agreement only.

Mr. BENNETT: It may not be desirable to initiate such a discussion in the light of the representations which I know have been made to the minister. So far as I am concerned, these representations do not affect my judgment when I realize that 125,000 tons of these materials have come into this country and in view also of the statement made before the price spreads committee as to the tremendous effect it had upon the profits of Canada Packers.

Mr. DUNNING: Certain ones only.

Mr. BENNETT: Certain ones of which?

Mr. DUNNING: Of the packers.

Mr. BENNETT: I said Canada Packers; I mean the firm.

Mr. DUNNING: Western packers, of course, have not access to this commodity on an economic basis.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. BENNETT: I am thinking about the firm known as Canada Packers. The representations that have come to me have probably been made to the minister himself by western packers, who feel the situation extremely keenly.

Mr. DUNNING: Because they cannot get it economically.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. DUNNING: It depends upon whose ox is gored.

Mr. BENNETT: It may be that the minister has some warrant for his assumption that the interest is because they cannot participate, but at any rate the interest is very great and the representations are very strong. I suggest to the minister that the matter may become so overwhelmingly important if certain factors continue to operate that it might be desirable to initiate discussions without delay.

Mr. DUNNING: The chairman of the tariff board advises me that seldom has he had before him a matter which requires such extensive research as this one. I questioned him about it, of course, following the representations which were made, and the representations themselves followed the agreement with Great Britain with respect to this particular item, which, as my right hon. friend knows, is viewed by Great Britain as very important.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not quite sure on that point. I was going to ask the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: But I do know this, that the relations at present existing between Canada and Great Britain with respect to these matters, especially having regard to the disturbed world conditions in many commodities, ensure sympathetic consideration by either government of any difficulty which is made known by the other with respect to the working out of the agreement. I feel sure that if the facts as disclosed by the tariff board indicate a situation demanding remedy we can secure a reasonably good hearing-I would go so far as to say favourable consideration from the British government in connection with anything we may find it necessary to propose in the interests of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. I understand there has been a hearing before the tariff board; is that so?

Mr. DUNNING: I beg your pardon?

Mr. BENNETT: A hearing has commenced before the tariff board?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not in the country, but I read some newspaper clippings which indicated that quite a bit of evidence had been given with respect to the matter here in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: But the inquiry was adjourned, as I understand.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. BENNETT: And there is nothing to indicate that any inquiries have been prosecuted outside of this country. Presumably it does involve some inquiries beyond Canada altogether.

Mr. DUNNING: I would not definitely say so.

Mr. BENNETT: When the minister spoke about the complexity of it as indicated to him by the chairman of the board, I was wondering whether or not the question of subsidiary interests that might be affected was included. Soap makers, for instance, are interested.

Mr. DUNNING: I can assure my right hon, friend that if he had been in the country he would have been inundated with representations by soap makers and bakers and—

Mr. BENNETT: Candlestick makers.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: The immediate pressure appeared to be, judging from what I read, from the soap makers.

Mr. DUNNING: And the bakers and the laundrymen, but strongest from the bakers.

Schedule agreed to.

Schedules V to VII inclusive agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: Having regard to the various schedules and the negotiations as to the time at which the agreement is to come into force, it is desirable that some portions come into force at one time and other portions at another time? I mention this having regard to the tariff resolution.

Mr. DUNNING: That is all covered.

Mr. BENNETT: No. The sentence might read: This act shall come into force at a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council.

Mr. DUNNING: In the meantime, under the provisions of the existing agreement—I think it is article 17Mr. BENNETT: It is not very important, because it is being repealed.

Mr. DUNNING: —a great deal of thought has been given to the matter and considerable negotiations have been carried on between the two countries. I should like to reassure my right hon. friend upon this point and perhaps if I read my whole note on the matter, which is very carefully prepared and represents the understandings of both governments in respect to it, my right hon. friend will understand the position:

The agreement as a whole will come into force on a date to be agreed upon by the governments of Canada and the United Kingdom after the necessary legislative action has been taken in both countries. British action yet remains to be taken. As far as Canada is concerned, the bill before the house giving the agreement the force of law in Canada from a date to be fixed by proclamation will enable the Canadian government to implement its undertakings in their entirety. Similar legislation is being introduced in the United Kingdom and when it has been passed, both countries will be in a position to fix the date for the coming into force of the new agreement and the consequent termination of the 1932 agreement.

I call attention to the last words. The 1932 agreement remains in force until terminated by understanding between the two countries.

In the meantime, in accordance with the third sentence of article 17 of the new agreement, and under authority of article 23 of the 1932 agreement—which remains in force—the two governments agree that as from February 25, 1937, article 9 of schedule E of the 1932 agreement would be replaced by articles 6, 7 and 8 and schedule 4 and 5 of the new agreement, with this exception: the provisions of the 1932 agreement remain in force and will operate until they are superseded by the new agreement from the date to be agreed upon between the two governments.

That, I think, answers my right hon, friend's question. We are utilizing a provision of the old agreement to keep it in force until the proclamation.

Mr. BENNETT: And of course the old agreement remains unrepealed until the proclamation.

Mr. DUNNING: That is true.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING ACT

AMENDMENTS TO CLARIFY DEFINITIONS OF GOLD PLATED AND SILVER PLATED ARTICLES AND TO SUPERVISE DATE LETTERS AND ADVERTISEMENTS

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour) (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act, 1928.

Mr. BENNETT: Explain, please.

Mr. ROGERS: The proposed bill provides for three minor amendments to the Precious Metals Marking Act. I think I am quite safe in saying that no one of these amendments is likely to prove contentious. I had proposed to take up the several amendments when the bill was in committee. I doubt if they call for any extended statement at this time.

Mr. BENNETT: No principle is concerned?

Mr. ROGERS: There is no principle concerned.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Gold plate, gold plated, silver plate, silver plated.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the real commercial effect of this?

Mr. ROGERS: I understand that the addition here of gold plate and gold plated and silver plate and silver plated in section 10 is designed to enable the purpose of the act to be carried out with respect to articles of this kind manufactured from precious metals. It has been found, for example, that when an article was described as being of gold plate or silver plate it did not come within the safeguards provided in the act. As the leader of the opposition is aware, the purpose is to prevent fraudulent misrepresentation by providing for certain markings which will be a guarantee to the purchaser that he is receiving what he expects to receive.

Section agreed to.

On section 3-Date letter.

Mr. ROGERS: I am going to ask my colleague the Minister of Agriculture to move that this section be deleted. Certain differences which have occurred over this section account for the fact that though the bill has been on the order paper some weeks, it has [Mr. Dunning.]

not been possible to proceed with it. The original intention was that the Canadian manufacturers of fine articles of gold and silver might be enabled to use the current date mark as used by the Worshipful Company of Goldsmiths of London, England. However, it was discovered on further inquiry that the company of goldsmiths had certain objections to their date letter being used in Canada, and for this reason it is not proposed to proceed with this clause of the bill.

Mr. STIRLING: No date letter will be used in Canada?

Mr. ROGERS: The current date letter of the Worshipful Company of Goldsmiths of London will not be used. As I understand it, they use twenty letters of the alphabet, placing them in certain shields, or other designs, and those in the trade, by means of these letters, are able to determine the exact year of the manufacture of the article so marked. Some Canadian manufacturers thought that it would be of advantage to them to use the same current date letter and it was felt that where the date letter of the Worshipful Company of Goldsmiths was known there might be some advantage in following that particular date letter. That company, however, has intimated that it would prefer that we should not use the same date letter, and for the time being it is not proposed to proceed with this section.

Mr. HEAPS: Was any reason given for the objection?

Mr. ROGERS: The latest communication from the goldsmiths' company, through the High Commissioner for Canada in Great Britain, reads:

Your telegram March 11th Metal Marking Act. Goldsmith Company regret unable to accede to request. They feel it should not be impossible to attain object without making use of London hall mark in the same way as other assay offices in the United Kingdom have distinguishing date letters, and they suggest that there would appear to be no reason why Canada should not adopt similar course. Goldsmith Company further suggest that it would be of advantage to accompany date letter which may be adopted with an additional mark representative of Canada which could not be copied elsewhere.

That is the objection made on their behalf.

Mr. BENNETT: When I first saw this amendment I thought there would be some difficulty about it. In my opinion it is highly desirable that we should have some way of identifying the date of our silver. There are three marks on English silver: first, the mark indicating its quality; second, the mark of the city in which it is manufactured; and third, the letter that gives the date. The word sterling rarely appears on English silver. The Edinburgh marks are different from those of Chester or Birmingham or Sheffield. The London marks are the ones that we are most familiar with. The date letter for 1937 is capital A on the shield. That was given when the distinctive mark expired on the death of George V, and it covers both Edward VIII and George VI. The leopard's head indicates the quality and the place of assay.

Many times I have heard doubts expressed as to the quality of some of our silver that bears the word sterling. The quality of sterling depends, of course, on the amount of alloy mixed with it; 975/1000 being usually perfect alloy for silver. It does seem to me that we should have some such provision as this, and I had hoped when the bill stood so long on the order paper that the minister was taking the opportunity to arrange with the British authorities that there should be no confusion. I think we might have a beaver, which it would not be difficult to place on silver, and that would indicate the quality. The question of location would have to be determined by subsequent conference between the body of the trade and the government. The date letter is a matter of arbitrary arrangement. In point of fact the oldest date goes back to the 1400's.

I do not think it would be difficult for us to arrange our letters in such a way as to avoid the possibility of conflict with the English. As it stands now, the difficulty is very real. If, for example, our letter were the same as the English, and if the same form were followed, one might look at a piece of silver and conclude that the date was 1700 and something, when in fact it was 1935. It would be highly desirable to work out some plan whereby from a letter or some arbitrary symbol we might be able to determine the age of our silver. The practice is quite interesting; it also adds to the value of the silver. It is only for a year, of course. The date on which the new letter is promulgated is not always certain, but it continues for twelve months, during which period the particular letter chosen is impressed. Once you get your place of assay, then you have no trouble in fixing your date from that letter.

Mr. ROGERS: Time of identification.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it identifies the year exactly. If you have your other two marks and can define them, then you know where it was assayed, and you know it is what is called sterling because that other mark indicates it is sterling silver according to the English definition, which I think is 975/1000. In the United States they are exactly as we are. You have the initials of the firm that manufactures, for instance, Gorham's is "G. & Co." stamped on the bottom of a silver tray. But that does not help because there will be the word "sterling" put somewhere in the corner. You do not know what year it was done. In England you can take your magnifying glass and read that letter on a piece of silver and fix the year, if you are familiar with the symbols. I hoped the minister was going to be able to carry this through, because I think everyone realizes it would be a distinct advantage to us all.

Mr. GARDINER: I move: That section 3 be deleted.

Mr. HEAPS: Is anything going to be substituted for this clause?

Mr. ROGERS: Nothing to be substituted at the present time. The final communication from London was under date of March 19, and it was not found possible by the Department of Trade and Commerce in the interval to provide a substitute for the clause it is now proposed to delete. I might say, however, that it is strongly the view of the Department of Trade and Commerce that there are advantages on the side of having a date letter as was proposed in this clause, and I shall certainly bear in mind what has been said in support of that view by the leader of the opposition. I might at the same time direct his attention to the fact that the Precious Metals Marking Act does provide for national marks.

Mr. BENNETT: But we have not got far with it.

Mr. ROGERS: No, but they may be authorized by the governor in council.

Motion agreed to.

On section 4-Advertisements.

Mr. BENNETT: Does this stand in its present form in view of the deletion of section 3?

Mr. ROGERS: There is to be a slight amendment of the form of words.

Mr. GARDINER: I move:

That subsection (d1) be deleted and the following be substituted therefor:

"(dl) in any printed or written matter of the nature of an advertisement of an artcle to which this act applies uses any mark or description the application of which to such article is prohibited by this act." Mr. BENNETT: I wonder if the minister regards that as the best expression. It is difficult to suggest that an advertisement uses anything.

Mr. ROGERS: I think perhaps the explanation lies in the interpretation section of the act. The word "applies" is given a restricted meaning; that is, a description applied to an article would mean a description attached to the article itself, either by some form of impression or by a label or tag. But it has been found that the purpose of the act has been frustrated through false advertisements. That is, there may be an advertisement saying that certain described articles of silver will be sold at a certain section of a store at a certain date, and that may very well operate to induce a purchaser to go to that particular place believing he is receiving these articles.

Mr. BENNETT: Would it not be better to put it another way? As it is now you have—

Mr. STIRLING: Two verbs contiguous.

Mr. BENNETT: Not only that, but you assume that an inanimate thing is capable of an act, that an advertisement uses something.

Mr. ROGERS: I might quote the original section:

(d) imports or otherwise brings into Canada any such printed or written matter;

And this would follow:

in any printed or written matter of the nature of an advertisement of an article to which this act applies uses any mark or description the application of which to such article is prohibited by this act.

That is, there is another section which expressly forbids—

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I know exactly the case they are after.

Mr. ROGERS: I have no desire to insist on this particular form of words.

Mr. HEAPS: In making the goods designated in a previous clause is any firm allowed to mark the goods themselves without having the permission of the governor general in council?

Mr. ROGERS: Provision is made in the Precious Metals Marking Act for the use of marks of quality on articles of precious metals.

Mr. BENNETT: Similar to the hallmark, so-called, in England.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. HEAPS: Are the firms who mark the goods given permission or licence to do so?

Mr. ROGERS: No licence is necessary, but if marks are used and if there is misrepresentation they fall under the penalties provided in the act.

Mr. HEAPS: Is there such a penalty as revoking the right to use the mark?

Mr. ROGERS: Section 13 deals with offences and penalties under the act:

Everyone is guilty of an offence, and liable, on summary conviction thereof, to a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars and not less than twenty-five dollars for each article or part of an article in respect of which the conviction is had, who being a dealer,

(a) applies to an article any mark not authorized by this act, or by regulation made under the authority of this act, to be applied thereto:

(b) applies to an article any mark in a manner not so authorized;

(c) omits or neglects to apply to an article any mark required by this act, or by regulation made under the authority of this act, to be applied thereto.

My hon, friend's question related to the nature of the penalty. The penalty provided in this particular section is a fine.

Mr. HEAPS: I thought the government might regulate or control the privilege of marking these goods. I think the revocation of the right to use a certain mark in cases of infraction would be a greater deterrent to fraudulent practices than a fine.

Mr. BENNETT: That part of the statute is not in force yet.

Mr. ROGERS: It comes under the Unfair Competition Act. The trade marks have to be registered.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): What shall we take tonight?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Immediately after recess we shall take up the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) respecting unemployment and agricultural distress; then the resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) with regard to the indebtedness of the Canadian National Railways, and after that supply.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the Prime Minister any particular department in mind?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The remaining supplementary estimates for the current year. If we get along with those we shall take up the Trans-Canada Air Lines bill.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT

PROVISION FOR ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT
AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress and for such payments appropriated by parliament as may be necessary for all or any of the purposes of the proposed legislation.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Chairman, this resolution precedes the introduction of a bill to provide for the continuance of federal assistance to the provinces, and through the provinces to the municipalities, in their efforts to deal with unemployment and agricultural distress. The present act, namely the Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936, expires, as no doubt hon. members are aware, on March 31 of this year. Although it is generally recognized that economic conditions have improved considerably during the past year, and we trust are continuing to improve. still the improvement has not yet reached the stage where federal assistance can be withdrawn.

The bill which will be founded upon the resolution is in terms very similar to the present Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act and, like it, provides (1) for the initiation and carrying on of works by the federal government for the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress; (2) for federal assistance being extended as in the past few years to the provinces, under agreement with the latter in their efforts to relieve unemployment conditions and also the very serious conditions which have existed in certain areas of the prairie provinces; (3) for the continuance of assistance by the dominion to the provinces by way of loans towards the provinces' costs in connection with such measures; and (4) a further provision by which the province is required from time to time to furnish the dominion with certified statements as to its financial condition in such detail and in such form as the dominion may require; also that it shall furnish such other information and permit such examination and audit to be made by the dominion as may appear to be necessary.

Those, Mr. Chairman, are the main features of the bill which will be introduced following approval of the resolution.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Chairman, before the resolution carries, I suggest that we ought to have a more extended statement from the Minister of Labour. He speaks of the greatly improved conditions which prevail to-day as compared with last year and possibly the year before. I should have liked to hear more from the minister in that respect. He may say that he is prepared to give that information when the bill is in committee after it has received second reading, but in view of what has happened in past years I am asking that the information be given now. I can remember occasions in years past when days and days have been spent in committee on the resolution in a discussion of the general situation, but very little opportunity is afforded in committee on the bill to ask questions on details. I believe the minister would not be doing anything out of the ordinary if at this time he were to give a little more information than he has done. After all, there is no question so important to the house or the country as this one respecting relief and unemployment.

Personally I should like to know the government's policy for coping with the situation. It will be of no use for the minister or hon. members to say that a commission has been appointed to deal with the question, and use that as a cushion upon which to fall every time the matter is raised. After all, the government must assume responsibility for dealing with unemployment. We would like to know what the policy will be, because the granting of relief to persons out of work and the creation of additional public works are in themselves no solution of the unemployment problem. I believe the minister will be one of the first to admit that no form of capital expenditures initiated by the government is in itself a long-range solution of the problem. In my opinion capital expenditures ultimately tend to aggravate the situation. If the government has a definite policy for dealing with unemployment, I should like the minister to state it at this time, rather than later when we are in committee on the bill.

The government admits that at this time there are 400,000 out of work. One of the tragedies we must face is the vast number of young men and women who are leaving school or have been out of school for some years and are still unable to find a means of livelihood. The problem of the government to-day is either to find employment for the rising generation and those members of the older generation who may be out of work, or so to adjust the economic life of Canada as to make it possible to absorb these people into useful and productive occupations.

So far this government has done nothing different from what has been done in the past six or seven years. We have been told, and probably will be told again, that it has adopted the policy of attempting to expand our foreign trade. Well, every country is attempting to do that, and if there has been any expansion in our foreign trade it has been not so much the result of the policy adopted by the government as the result of world conditions over which the government and probably parliament had no possible control.

Let us suppose that within the next few months the great rush of manufacturing armaments ceases, through some agreement among the nations of the world. Canada would be one of the first countries to feel the effect of such a stoppage, and our numbers of unemployed would be greatly increased. Today our wheat is moving to Europe because of the war scare. Our factories are running longer hours and more men are being employed on account of the increased spurt in the manufacture of armaments. If for any reason the manufacture of armaments stopped, what would happen to us? To-day we have about 400,000 people out of work. We are unable to provide them with any form of employment, and we are told again to-night that for the next twelve months all they can hope for is further relief from federal, provincial or municipal authorities.

I have a strong objection to the giving of relief to those men and women who unfortunately find themselves out of work, because instead of making useful citizens of them we are doing the reverse. If at all possible I should like to see the government, represented by the minister, place before the house some concrete proposal just as is being done in other parts of the world, so that we may go back to our constituents and tell them that the government is attempting to deal in a fundamental way with the problem of unemployment. In my humble opinion ours is one of the most backward parliaments in the world in dealing with this problem, and I do not think any person would deny that. Look to any country within or outside the empire and you will find that in some fundamental way it is grappling with the problem of unemployment.

In this country we seem to be at a complete standstill. Sometimes we say it is the result of the British North America Act, sometimes that it is the result of the policies adopted; but whatever the excuse may be, the fact remains that in this country we are doing less to deal with the problem of unemployment than is being done in any other country. I do not want to see us take a backward step; I should like the government to bring down a forward-looking policy which would commend itself to all parties and all members and permit our young people and the older generation to look forward to the future with some hope.

I ask the minister and hon, members of this committee, with what degree of hope can those who are out of work look forward to the immediate future? We are in the second session of this parliament, and if it goes the usual length of four years, its life is half over; yet nothing worthy of mention has been done to deal fundamentally with the problem of unemployment. I ask the Minister of Labour to inform the committee and the people of this country whether the government has in contemplation any plans outside of what he has enumerated?

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Chairman, as my honfriend is aware, a bill will be founded upon this resolution. Ample opportunity to discuss the unemployment question in all its aspects will be afforded while the bill is before the house in committee. A further opportunity of discussion will be afforded when specific proposals dealing with certain aspects of the problem are before the house in the form of special supplementary estimates. I have no desire to withhold any information which any hon. member of the committee may desire at this time, but it does seem to me that there might be a danger of duplicating discussion.

The bill itself will be similar in terms to the Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act of last year and will open up the whole field of the problem for discussion. Perhaps it would meet the desires of the committee if I made a statement with respect to each of the Department of Labour special supplementary estimates when they are before the house in committee. That would enable us to focus attention upon the particular measures designed to relieve unemployment and agricultural distress. If we have a discussion now there is a possibility that it might range over a wide field and not be so focussed as to bring criticism or possible approval of particular measures.

I share the view expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) that the task before us is one of great magnitude. However, it seemed to me when he was speaking that he seemed to exclude two of the methods adopted of providing additional employment. The first is the expansion of foreign trade and the accompanying stimulation of our own industries, and, second, the expansion of public works. I do not think I am distorting what he said when I suggest that he excluded the public works remedy as one which afforded any permanent hope of dealing with this problem. With that view I am in complete accord. I would point out to him, however, that due in part to the trade policies of the present administration and, I am bound to admit, in part to conditions over which no government has any control, there has been an expansion of employment during the past year. That expansion is reflected in the figures which have been discussed quite recently in this house. For instance, there has been an improvement of some 56,000 employed gainfully in this country during the past year; that is to say, some 56,000 more of our people were employed in January of this year than in January of last year. You will find that the 1936 figures represent a considerable improvement over the figures for January of the previous year. To be quite fair, I must also say that the figures for January of 1935 indicated a considerable improvement over the figures for the same month of the previous year.

May I say at this point that if one is going to have a reasonable understanding of this problem, if one is going to present it to the country in terms which can be readily understood, it is of the utmost importance that statistics should be presented in their proper setting and with proper explanations and qualifications. For example, would anyone suggest that in a country of seasonal employment it is proper to compare figures of employment in July of one year with the figures of employment in February of another year? I suggest that the only way in which a fair estimate of the improvement in employment in a country of seasonal occupations can be obtained is by taking the figures for the same months in successive years. If I am correct in that suggestion, then perhaps I am guilty of a degree of condemnation of some hon.

members of this committee who, I am willing to concede quite inadvertently, have given a misleading picture by taking the employment or unemployment figures for one month and comparing them with the figures of another month in previous years.

When we look over the industrial conditions obtaining in Canada at this time I think we are justified in saying that there has been a very marked improvement in employment in the province of British Columbia. During the past year and a half there has also been a notable improvement in employment in the maritime provinces.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister is giving employment figures; would he give us the unemployment figures?

Mr. ROGERS: I have the figures of those who were on relief.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is only part.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could shorten the discussion as far as we are concerned by making a suggestion at this time. We do not desire to duplicate the discussion, but at this stage of the session I am sure we all desire to obtain the maximum information with respect to this problem with which we have to deal. It is a question whether or not it might not be more advantageous if the minister would supply the information asked for now. In the very nature of things, when the bill is before the committee the chairman may limit the discussion to a particular section and thereby prevent a general interrogation of the minister which would be quite permissible on the resolution. If the minister will not misunderstand me, I suggest that it might be well for him to make a statement indicating the exact problem with which he is faced at this time. We are now at the end of March. He might tell us what the position is with respect to the farm side of the problem; then he might proceed to tell us the number of unemployed and the number on relief at this time as compared with the same time last year. Perhaps he could indicate in a general way the measures which he proposes to take to deal with this problem. As he says, he has the information there, and I am inclined to think that in view of all the circumstances it might expedite business if he dealt with it in that way. That is my own personal opinion only.

Mr. ROGERS: As I explained at the beginning, I am entirely in the hands of the committee. It is a question simply of when the information can be given with the greatest advantage. The hon, member for Winnipeg North asked as to unemployment figures.

As he is aware, we do not have any exact census of the unemployed in Canada. In saying that I am simply traversing ground which is familiar to all hon, members. The bureau of statistics, however, has for some time past made an estimate of unemployment in Canada, and upon the basis of comparisons which, I believe, were derived from the census figures of 1931 they inform me that they have reason to believe that their estimate of unemployment is quite accurate. It is, however, an estimate and nothing more.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the same estimate based on consideration of the same factors as heretofore?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Well then, you have something that is comparable anyway.

Mr. ROGERS: Quite. It does not differ in any particular. Referring to the question put by the hon, member for Winnipeg North Centre I have the figures—that is, the estimate-for unemployment as given by the bureau of statistics: for January, 1935, 572,000; January, 1936, 556,000; January, 1937, 500,000. That does indicate, I suggest, at least a steady improvement during that period. I should also like to repeat what I said a few moments ago, that one also finds that there was an improvement as between January, 1934, when the number stood at 598,000, and January, 1935, when the number stood at 572,000. At the same time the improvement in the unemployment figures during the past year is greater than in any previous year, as will be seen by the figures I have given. There is an improvement indicated here during the past year of 56,000.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister inform the committee which particular industry shows the greatest gain in employment?

Mr. ROGERS: I am sorry but I have not that information. As I explained to my hon. friend, this estimate comes from the bureau of statistics. Perhaps I should say this, that the figures as prepared are based upon (1) the records of the trade unions; (2) the returns of the employment services of Canada; (3) the bureau's index of employment in firms; and (4) the population trend. Those are the several factors upon which this estimate is based.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Did not the employment commission secure any accurate statistics?

Mr. ROGERS: Two reports have been tabled of the registration of the unemployed on relief. Again I would remind my hon.

[Mr. Rogers.]

friend that the registration was confined to the unemployed on relief, and for reasons which I think were given quite fully a year ago to this house.

Mr. MacINNIS: Has the bureau of statistics recourse to any figures other than those on relief, so that they can take into account unemployed who are not on relief?

Mr. ROGERS: As I just indicated, the estimates of the bureau of statistics are based upon a number of factors—returns from the trade unions, returns from the employment services of Canada, the bureau's own employment index, and finally the population trend. That is to say, the figures of the bureau of statistics are worked out independently and they cover a larger field in that they go beyond the unemployed on relief. These figures are supposed to represent as an estimate the total of the unemployed in Canada.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister understand that the estimate covers men, women and children down to the age of sixteen, or something of that sort?

Mr. ROGERS: I have no information which would indicate that. I assume that it would cover all those who would otherwise be employable, but I think that one can only infer from the factors used how extensive it would be.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon, member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) should be satisfied with the information given, because it comes from that well of information which has the high approval of his leader, the right hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Bennett). The minister obtained these figures from the bureau of statistics, and if the bureau cannot go any further, well, then it must be O.K.; the exminister of national defence cannot ask any more: the bureau is an encyclopedia of general information about unemployment. Where did they get it? They got it from this association, from that association, from a hundred and one other associations who do not know anything about it; they brew it with algebra and geometry and every other kind of mathematical science, and here you have the approximate data about unemployment; you must be satisfied with it; it is a full course meal of knowledge about unemployment. I regret very much to have to dissent in that particular.

It was not my intention to have spoken at this time; I purposed to wait until the bill was brought in, and I so informed the minister. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) inquired about what had been done, and other hon. members may be interested in practical suggestions with regard to the relief of unemployment. I have full confidence in the minister in charge, provided that the members of his staff go to the proper sources for information. It is very easy for an employment commission to get it. They have only to communicate with the provinces and tell them that they want that information to be secured from the municipalities. And there is this sanction, that if the information is withheld the minister can tell the provinces: You will get no relief unless we receive the data we have asked for.

The idea underlying the classification of the unemployed is the drafting of a proper policy for the relief of unemployment. How can this be possible unless the government knows what can be done with the unemployed; what has been their previous trade or occupation? So far as the building trade is concerned, openings may be offered to those carpenters, plumbers and other artisans who have been on relief for some time-some of them, in fact, for years. Some of these men were out of work while the last government was in power, and now that there is improvement in that field, so much the better. But, as has already been said, the idea must not be to give an opportunity to people who have no money to go considerably into debt in order to install new plumbing fixtures and other improvements in their homes. Rather the purpose is to inspire confidence among people who have money, in order that they may spend more of their own money. If the Canadian people understood that, we should soon see larger expenditures in the repairing of existing homes and the building of new Theoretically speaking, I am against the granting of subsidies by the dominion government for this, that and the other thing. The dominion gives regular and statutory subsidies to the provinces to help them to manage their own business; this parliament does not interfere in the expenditure of that money. But if the provinces have an exclusive jurisdiction in one matter and the federal government is without jurisdiction in the same field, I do not see how they can clasp hands to do cooperatively work which one of the parties has no right to do. I cannot understand such a system. When two parties agree to do something, in order that they shall work together, each of them must have some jurisdiction. As things are, however, this kind of help is extended as a means of showing good will, as evidence of tolerance, and also on account of the emergency.

I have investigated the condition of the settlers who have been established on rocky lands and the committee will be surprised to learn that many of them have not a single animal. They have not a horse or a cow or an ox, and in some cases their hens have died of hunger. It is incredible but true. These men have been put on this rocky soil which is anything but fertile by various organizations—the provincial government, and especially the colonization department of the Canadian National Railways, at the head of which was Mr. Laforce. To my great astonishment this man was elected president of the St. Jean Baptiste Society of Montreal by the credulous members of that society, and after that was loaned by the Canadian National Railways to the Quebec government. He is now deputy head of the provincial Department of Colonization. It is a real shame, because he is entirely ignorant; he cannot speak properly either French or English. He was formerly in the immigration department of the Canadian National Railways, and when he lost his job there, he began to organize a department of colonization which is absolutely useless. He nas been replaced by another useless individual, who praises Laforce so as to show that he himself, Lanctot, is useful.

The poor men who are on this land have written to me stating that they have no relief. But, more than that, if these poor settlers, many of whom die of starvation, happen to make a little money by working on the roads, or if they have a premium of some sort from the provincial government, they receive no more direct relief. They get $3 or $4 a month as relief, and sometimes $5. I thank the minister (Mr. Rogers) from the bottom of my heart for the interest he has taken in them. It is not my business as a member of parliament to look after the colonization schemes of the province of Quebec, but it is my duty as a Canadian citizen and as one who knows the sufferings of these people, to give full information to the dominion government about what is going on. I have been laughed at in this house and called many names because I defended the poor men who have been suffering in the north. They sent me affidavits in support of the statement that the mothers had no milk to give their babies. A permanent official of the Quebec Department of Health told me some time ago that the reason why infantile mortality has not been decreasing in that province was that the children were underfed, even the babies being given, not milk, but simply the juice of pork and beans, and sometimes the beans without the pork. That is why infantile mortality has not been decreasing there. I learned that from no less an authority than Doctor Lessard, who was supervisor of the Department of Health in Quebec. It is time there was a readjustment.

I do not understand how people could be credulous enough to accept Laforce as deputy head of the Department of Colonization in Quebec. It is shameful. That man should be sent back home. An official of the Canadian National Railways told me the reason why he is reputed to be an expert. Someone said "We know he knows nothing but he talks so much about colonization that we have come to believe that he does know something about it." In the civil service, in the Canadian National Railways, and outside, there are many men receiving fat salaries and doing their best to keep their jobs at the expense of the poor fellows who have to pay for it all.

I know these settlers; I see them every day in the recess when I am at home; I visit them. I should like the members of this committee to see their plight-four families with only one ox, and sometimes not even that. I could mention names; I could let the minister have the information I have received. He can check it at any time. There are families of five, six, seven, and eight young children, settled by the Quebec government on certain lots through the cooperation of Laforce, as Mr. Hungerford admitted on March 18 in the committee on railways and shipping. These people are on rocky soil, the timber having been destroyed by fire; on many lots there is no construction timber, and the fuel trees have been burned down; and they have not a single animal. How can they live except by direct relief?

That is why on principle I am opposed to the policy of duplication. The employees of the Quebec government have informed these settlers that they have suffered so much through the fault of the dominion government, that it is the fault of the dominion government that they do not receive direct relief. It is a shame. Provincial governments should take the responsibility for what they are doing. I do not know anything about colonization in Ontario but I know a great deal about it in Quebec, and when I visited the settlers during the last election I was moved to tears by their condition—and I was the more amazed at the reception I got in the House of Commons when I spoke on their behalf.

I am inclined to believe that the reason these men have no roads is that there is a desire to prevent people from seeing them and the conditions under which they have to live. The condition of these settlers in the new parishes of my constituency is incredible; the [Mr. Pouliot.]

committee would not believe me if I told them how these people are treated. I protest strongly and I hope that Mr. Duplessis will read what I am saying to-night and will soon fire Laforce, who has been an exploiter of the Canadian National Railways. He is one of those responsible for the martyrdom of these brave settlers, their wives and children. It is time the people of the province of Quebec woke up and realized what has happened in these new colonization districts. I am sure the minister knows enough about it to realize that I am not exaggerating. I invite anyone to come with me next summer and see these settlers. They will be found to be very good and worthy people who deserve something far better than they have received from men like Laforce.

Mr. HEAPS: As the hon, member has referred to the unemployment situation in Quebec, will the minister tell us whether in recent weeks he has had any complaints with regard to maladministration of unemployment funds in respect of the city of Montreal?

Mr. ROGERS: From time to time we have had complaints about the distribution of relief in particular municipalities. Someone may send in a complaint, suggesting that relief has not been administered without discrimination. Whenever a complaint of that kind is received an inspector is sent to the locality and a report is made. If the report confirms the complaint the matter is brought at once to the attention of the provincial government, and I think that I can say that in general the condition has been remedied without delay.

I do not recall that we have had any formal complaints with regard to the general administration of relief in Montreal. Actually the dominion government has not in the past interfered and does not now interfere with the relations existing between the provincial governments and municipalities. I doubt very much whether, even if the provincial government of Quebec had reason to condemn the administration of unemployment relief in Montreal, they would bring their complaint to the attention of the dominion Department of Labour. It would be more natural to expect a provincial government to take its own measures to correct that situation.

Mr. POULIOT: I wish to thank not only the minister but Mr. Hereford, Mr. Carter and the other members of the department who have helped me in my work on behalf of the settlers.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. MASSEY: I was very much interested to hear the minister's comments in connection with the subject matter of the forthcoming bill, and also his answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg—

Mr. ROGERS: An answer which is not yet completed.

Mr. MASSEY: I fully understand, but I was referring only to the part which had been concluded, that is that there has been in the past year an increase of 50,000 in the number employed, to which we all say hear, hear. On the other hard, let it be remembered that that increase of 50,000 is only 2 per cent, approximately, of the number of those gainfully employed.

Mr. ROGERS: But as against the base, about 10 per cent improvement.

Mr. MASSEY: About 10 per cent decrease in unemployment, and 2 per cent improvement in employment.

Mr. ROGERS: Well, I think that for the committee to get the proper picture you have to use the same base.

Mr. MASSEY: I agree with that, but let it be remembered that an increase of 50,000 is an improvement of 2 per cent in employment and at the same time a decrease of 10 per cent in unemployment. We in this country are concerned with two great controlling factors; one employment, and the other unemployment. As employment increases we would naturally assume unemployment would decrease, and here we have a case in point. We have a 2 per cent increase in employment and a corresponding 10 per cent decrease in unemployment.

Let it be remembered further that this year there will reach the age of sixteen over 200,000 Canadian young men and young women. Of this 200,000 a very substantial percentage will be seeking employment. This is the fresh crop of Canadian youth, ready to follow the occupation perhaps of their choosing or that which perforce they must accept. There is, of course, a substantial number each year—I do not wish to go into figures at this stage of this debate—who drop out of occupations, and their places must be filled by others, these men whose places are vacated as the result of death, injury, old age or whatever it may be.

We must further bear in mind that the change which has taken place in the operations in factories and such places in the last few years has been very extensive; mechanization has been carried forward to a great degree, and operations which heretofore required hand labour in great part now require it to a very much less degree.

Further there are to-day many firms working overtime, which instead of employing an extra man or two, or three or four, or one hundred, are working their regular force extra hours. In one department of government that is the case. My friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) knows full well, I imagine, that in many places there are those "temporarily employed" who are working far longer hours than they are supposed to do in such employment. That is certainly true of the city of Toronto. In a return made just the other day it is shown that temporary employees engaged in the sortation of mail who are supposed to work from say 7 o'clock until nine or nine-thirty in the evening are working until one, two, three, four or five o'clock in the morning. That simply means that they are taking jobs that might go to others; that the number employed in the post office might reasonably be increased without additional expense. Also in the same return the Postmaster General shows that the amount of mail handled at station "A" in Toronto is practically up to the 1929 level. I simply cite Toronto as typical. In fact, the Christmas

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The criticism by the employees in Toronto and elsewhere is that they are not permitted to work more time and get the extra pay that someone who would otherwise be out of a job is now receiving.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes, I agree that there are some cases of that sort, but there are two sides to the story. Some have come to me and complained bitterly because, being employed on a temporary basis, they cannot get the permanent rate, and they never know when they are going to have to work until three or five o'clock in the morning. The result is that they get a large amount of pay one week and a small amount the next, and they do not know where they are at; it is an entirely unsatisfactory state of affairs. However, I did not rise to bring the Postmaster General to his feet, but simply mentioned the post office as an illustration of what is happening in many places.

It seems to me to be peculiarly important that the minister in drafting his bill should bear in mind a factor to which I have spoken in this house on many occasions. In the speech from the throne, page 3 of Hansard, I read:

Measures will be taken, in cooperation with the provinces, to assist in the establishment of unemployed young people.

There is a National Employment Commission, which I do not wish to discuss tonight. There is a youth committee of that commission. That committee, according to the minister's own statement in a return, has reported on several different occasions. Legislation for the benefit of unemployed youth is forecast in the speech from the throne. Where is that legislation? Where is the value of those reports that have been turned in by this youth committee, which we will assume has done its work conscientiously and well? From the speech from the throne we who are peculiarly interested in the youth of this country took heart; we thought something might be forthcoming.

Mr. ROGERS: If I may be permitted to interrupt, while I do not believe it is in order to discuss estimates at this stage, I am sure my hon, friend is aware that a sum has been placed in the estimates for the specific purpose of providing training projects for unemployed young people. When it is stated in the speech from the throne that measures will be taken to carry out a certain object, that does not of necessity mean that the measures will assume legislative form. In fact, the bill which will be founded upon the resolution now before the committee will grant authority for the dominion government to enter into agreements with the provinces touching this and other aspects of unemployment relief. That is to say, this bill, the unemployment and agricultural assistance act, when finally approved will provide means by which the dominion government can cooperate with the provincial governments in order to deal with the establishment of unemployed young people. I take it my hon, friend is concerned with the object, and not particularly with the means by which the object is achieved.

Mr. MASSEY: Both, Mr. Chairman. After all, there is an object to be attained; there is a result to which we are all looking. The means towards that end are matters which have been discussed in this house many times. I do not think an original suggestion has been made to the minister this session in regard to possible ways in which the young people of this country can be given an opportunity to find gainful employment. The minister, that is to say, has in his possession to-day all the necessary information which he needs to build up concrete, specific, direct and constructive plans for the employment of those among our youth who are seeking employment. The minister knows perfectly well, for instance, that if there is an increase in the building trades as a result of this, that or the other thing that may be done to stimulate building, there is bound to be a scarcity of skilled mechanics. Here is a situation which this country is going to face if this improvement takes place.

I cannot help but smile when those who sit opposite speak of the efficiency and effectiveness of this administration, what it has done to improve conditions, and how much has been done by its trade policy. The improvement in this country, Mr. Chairman, is not because of, but in spite of this government. Those of us who sit on this side realize that literally nothing of a wide and constructive nature is being done by this government, and at the moment we are not speaking from the point of view of his majesty's loyal opposition; we are speaking from the point of view of those throughout this country. One does not wish to become political in a matter of this sort; I am speaking as one who has a very keen interest in the future welfare of Canadian youth. Weekly I come in contact with a great many of our youth, not only in this province but in other provinces as well, and I know perfectly well the spirit of hopelessness that is possessing our youth because this government is not doing anything progressive or showing signs of doing anything. There are youth organizations, not merely local or municipal or confined to one province, but of a national character. The minister knows what they are, and what they are doing. Many of these young people are meeting night after night, discussing this problem, trying to that will be formulate some suggestion approved by this government. Some of us have brought forward these suggestions both last session and again this session. The minister has always received them with the courtesy that is characteristic of him; but what has been done? Nothing.

It may be said that I am anticipating what may be contained in the bill. We have yet to see this bill, but I do think it incumbent upon those of us who are peculiarly interested in the problems of which I have spoken to-night at least to raise our voices in an effort not merely to criticise but to criticise constructively, and to impress upon the minister that this great body of youth throughout the length and breadth of Canada are looking to this parliament to give them if nothing else, at least a ray of hope. Day after day goes by; we come to the dying hours of the session. What has been done in any shape or form that will give the young man or young woman who is out of a job and cannot get a job the assurance that, after all, we are progressing in the right direction and that this government is fully seized of the responsibility that rests upon it at least to give the youth of this country a feeling of distinct encouragement and hope after conditions have been so discouraging and so hope-

Accordingly, Mr. Chairman, I rose to-night to do what I could in this direction. I am not speaking politically; I am speaking as an individual in this house; I am not even speaking as one who is in opposition to the present government. I am speaking to the minister irrespective of politics or anything else on behalf of the youth of this country who are deeply concerned not with to-day only but with the to-morrows and to-morrows, and I sincerely hope that before this session is over something may be done which will at least indicate to the youth of Canada that the government is alive to the situation with which it must deal, for surely nothing has been done so far to give the slightest indication that the government is aware of what needs to be done.

Mr. ROGERS: Perhaps I should say that this special problem of youth did not suddenly come into existence in October of 1935. It has been a special feature of the unemployment situation from 1930 onward. I quite agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Massey) that the government must recognize it as a special aspect of the larger problem, but I should have thought my hon. friend would feel that some progress had been made when, for the first time since 1930, a definite sum was set apart to deal with the reestablishment of unemployed young people.

There will be an occasion for the discussion of this matter more properly, I think, when the estimates are before the house, but I should like to assure the hon. member that we do have in mind the importance of this question. I do not suggest for a moment that the amount appropriated will do all that he may think should be done, but I think it will permit us, in cooperation with the provinces, to make a definite beginning towards reestablishing unemployed young people in private industry, and I am quite sure he will agree that this must be the ultimate solution. Simply to arrange for a special public works program for the unemployed within the youth age group would not meet the situation at all.

Mr. MASSEY: Public works only-no.

Mr. ROGERS: What my hon. friend has in mind, I am quite sure, is the increase of the employability of unemployed young people in order that they may find their way into private industry, in order that they may be prepared for an opportunity and seize that copportunity when it comes. I agree that conditions during the last few years have not been favourable to that kind of preparation of our young people for specific tasks. I am entirely in agreement with my hon. friend when he suggests that something should be done along the line of preparing these unemployed young people for particular tasks and then, through what I hope will be an improved employment service, eventually bringing them into private employment. The whole matter is one which raises questions of jurisdiction. I do not bring this in as an obstacle; I think the obstacle, such as it is, can be overcome to some degree, but I would remind my hon. friend that apprenticeship is not a matter in which the dominion government has legislative powers. There is no question whatever on that score.

Mr. MASSEY: I admit that, but the government can do much to inspire industry to establish apprenticeships.

Mr. ROGERS: Precisely, and the government proposes to do just that.

Mr. MASSEY: It "proposes," but it has done nothing yet.

Mr. ROGERS: The provision is in the estimates for this year and, as I said at the beginning, there was no reason why the dominion government should have waited this long.

Miss MACPHAIL: I should like to make one or two suggestions to the Minister of Labour with regard to the subject touched upon by the hon. member for Temiscouata. I do think that in land settlement schemes of the future the greatest possible care should be taken to see that families are not settled on land so far north as to be beyond any connection with community life, and that they should not be settled on unproductive land or without sufficient equipment and farm animals to be self-sustaining. Particularly do I urge that when it is a fact that in the southern portions of all our provinces-and I am thinking particularly of Ontario—there are plenty of unoccupied farms with fairly good buildings, in the midst of communities where all the necessities for civilized living are available, together with the friendship and contacts with people that are necessary for happiness. I think a very great error has been made by pushing the land settlement into new areas, when in the older portions of the provinces there was land that could have been utilized.

There is one other thing I think we ought to do in relation to the unemployment of youth. I believe we should make it possible under some arrangement for the sons of farmers who want to farm and who are skilled farmers to begin on land of their own. I know there is a federal loan scheme at five per cent, but that interest rate is too high. No young farmer to-day starting in with almost nothing-maybe a team of horses or a couple of cows from his parents-can get along on land on which he has to pay five per cent. It is hopeless from the beginning. If the federal government wants to take a great number of young men out of the cities or prevent them from going into the cities, or in some cases take them off the unemployment rolls, that is one way it can be done. I personally know, and every hon. member must know, of dozens of young farmers who want to farm; but it is no longer true that the father can retire to the market town near the farm and give the farm over to the son. Although he, his wife and children, may have worked hard for many years, the farmer cannot accumulate enough to retire from his farm and leave it to his son.

And so all through rural Ontario we find this problem of young farmers not being able to establish themselves; or the other problem of two families having to live under one roof, which in many cases is not roof enough. Much could be done, and I believe at not very great expense, by doing everything possible to settle farmers' sons on the land. They are the logical people to put on the land. It is hopeless putting people on land who do not know anything about it. Those who are skilled in the art of farming find it difficult enough in these days to make a living on the land, but it would be impossible for people who know nothing about farming, and still more so if they are put on land where even the most skilled could not exist.

I do not think the stupidity of the land settlement policy could be matched, it is a masterpiece. There have been terrific blunders. I am not blaming the minister or the government, but I do think it is time to call a halt. If we are going to have a land settlement policy, let us use people who are skilled, let us put them on land where they have a chance, and at a rate of interest which they can pay.

Mr. HEAPS: I had expected the minister to inform the committee in more detail.

Mr. ROGERS: I was going into another phase of the matter.

Mr. HEAPS: If the minister intends to speak, I shall take my seat.

Mr. ROGERS: I had already dealt with the figures of unemployment as they come to us from the bureau of statistics, and had indicated that there had been a very substantial improvement during the past year, following a marked improvement in the previous year.

[Miss Macphail.]

I should like to turn from that to the figures of unemployed on relief. It has often been said that improvement in employment has not been reflected as it ought to be in a reduction in the number on relief. I quite agree that there is not always the close approximation which one would expect to find between an improvement in employment and the reduction in the number of unemployed on relief. For this lack of approximation a number of reasons may be given. I believe there can be no doubt that when industries are increasing their staffs after a period of prolonged depression employers of labour are most likely to call back those who have been unemployed for perhaps only a short time, and whose savings have been sufficient to carry them through the crisis. It is also natural for employers faced with an opportunity of expanding operations to bring in a number of younger people. I believe there can be little doubt that a situation such as has developed in the past year in many of our industries is more favourable to younger people of marked physical vigour than to older members of the staffs who have been previously let out. At all events I believe we would find that a very considerable proportion of the increase in the number of those employed during the past year would be accounted for by those who, while unemployed. at the same time were not on relief.

I should also like to point out that total relief figures are most misleading when placed side by side with figures intended to represent an improvement in employment. For example, total relief figures in Canada include those in the drought areas who are receiving relief. I believe no hon. member will suggest that the condition in the drought areas is likely to respond to normal processes of economic recovery. That is to say, those receiving relief in the drought areas are receiving it because of climatic dislocation.

Mr. BENNETT: How many do you estimate there are now?

Mr. ROGERS: The number would be somewhere in the vicinity of 200,000. I say that subject to correction.

Mr. STIRLING: Are they included in this half million?

Mr. ROGERS: The half million does not include them. That figure is confined to industrial employment. I am now referring to what is sometimes called the total relief figure, and I wish simply to point out that in any total figure, actually there are elements which are intractable in that they do not respond to normal processes of economic recovery. I have indicated those in the drought areas as composing one of the elements. I might have taken the dependents, those under sixteen years of age. No one would suggest that the number under sixteen years of age receiving relief would be reduced by an improvement in economic conditions, except in so far as the head of a family might be released from the relief rolls and be thus able to carry his dependents with him.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. ROGERS: There is still another intractable element in the total relief figures, namely the unemployables. I am not going to suggest that it is possible to indicate the exact percentage. We sought to have the municipalities indicate the number of unemployables in connection with the re-registration of the unemployed on relief, but when the figures came in there was a marked diversity. I believe there can be little doubt that in the case of some municipalities there was a natural surrender to the temptation to reduce the return on unemployables, on the assumption that if the number were put in at a larger figure it would represent a greater burden, which would fall primarily upon the municipalities in any ultimate readjustment of the financial burden of relief.

Mr. HEAPS: What would the minister call an unemployable?

Mr. ROGERS: I know of no definition of unemployability which is not based upon physical grounds. That is to say, I am quite sure that in sending us in a list of unemployables municipalities would send us a list of what were formerly known as charity cases, those who by reason of ill health or physical disability would be unable to engage in gainful occupation.

Mr. HEAPS: In checking over the figures, has the minister come across such instances in any marked degree?

Mr. ROGERS: What does strike one in going over the figures is the diversity in the number of unemployables given by the different municipalities. That is to say, there is no uniformity, which I suppose is to be expected. We have variations running from five per cent up to fifteen per cent, so I would be inclined to think that ten per cent would not be far out of line. However, there is no standardized definition of unemployability and no means of distinguishing the unemployable from those who are employable, other than the test of physical fitness. Perhaps my hon. friend has in mind the increase in unemployability on what might be termed psychic grounds.

Mr. BENNETT: There is an increase due to the use of machines and the unwillingness to employ men of advanced years. This is particularly so in some municipalities.

Mr. ROGERS: Undoubtedly in some industries there is an increasing tendency to discharge employees at an earlier age, but I cannot say whether the municipalities would take that as an indication of unemployability. However, I began by saying that the unemployable represent still another element in the total relief figures which could not be expected to respond immediately to an improvement in the economic conditions.

Having made these observations, I should like to place before the committee the latest available figures of relief totals, and particularly the improvement as indicated by percentages in the number of those on relief as compared with those on relief in February of the previous year. The families on relief, exclusive of the drought areas, in February, 1936, totalled 253,376. In February of this year this number had dropped to 209,978, or a decrease of seventeen per cent. The total numbers on relief, exclusive of the drought areas, decreased from 1,212,129 last year to 1,021,615 this year. In the drought areas in February, 1936, there were 28,908 families and a total number of 154,160; this year the numbers were 31,992 and 162,475 respectively.

Mr. STIRLING: There has been an increase in the total?

Mr. ROGERS: There has been an increase in the drought areas. When the drought areas are included, the percentage of decrease is fourteen per cent in respect of families, and over thirteen per cent in respect of the total numbers. That improvement is particularly gratifying at this time because in other years there has not been that improvement in the figures over February of the preceding year.

Mr. COLDWELL: Do the figures given by the minister include the number of men who have been placed under the farm placement plan?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not that information before me, and I should prefer to answer that question when the bill is before the house.

Mr. COLDWELL: That would make a material difference in the numbers on relief.

Mr. BENNETT: A very material difference.

Mr. HEAPS: And in the number of employed.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the minister made allowance for the 10,023 Canadian workers who left this country in 1936 to return to work in the munitions plants of England?

Mr. ROGERS: Until my hon. friend has mentioned the figure, I was not aware of it.

Mr. BENNETT: The figures were given the other day in the papers, but I do not know how accurate they are.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not know how they could have been obtained except from the steamship companies.

Mr. MacNICOL: A return was tabled on February 23, in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). The figure given in that return of those who arrived in Canada from England during 1936 was 2,197. A Canadian press dispatch dated London, March 27, refers to a return made in England stating that during 1936, 7,826 more people came to England from Canada than went to Canada from England. The two figures added together give 10,023 who went back to England from Canada.

Mr. ROGERS: But not necessarily for employment.

Mr. MacNICOL: In the part of Toronto from which I come certain things have happened which cause me great distress. Many machinists, tool makers and other experts in the iron and steel industry whom I know have returned to work in the munition plants of Sheffield, Manchester, and other British cities. They are the kind of men we want in this country.

Mr. BROOKS: I was very glad to hear the minister say that the number of employed in the maritime provinces had decreased, but I wonder whether the facts will bear out that statement. Last year the premier of New Brunswick announced that the province was going off relief and great credit was given to the provincial government for being the first in Canada to go off relief. Shortly after that announcement was made, the city council of Saint John stated that it was ridiculous for the premier to have made such a statement, as there were many people on relief in that community. The same was true of Moncton, Northumberland and many other municipalities in the province. I am satisfied that there is great need for unemployment relief in that province.

I know the dominion government did grant further aid to the province by way of public works, and I know also that the province has employed more men in its public works department and in its public garages, which is another form of relief. I should like to know from the minister just what the situation is in the province of New Brunswick, and whether he considers he has had adequate returns from that province to assist him in compiling his figures. I feel that he has not.

Mr. ROGERS: In answer to the particular question raised by the hon. member, I may say that last year the government of New Brunswick did indicate its desire to abandon direct relief. In presenting that policy to the dominion government there was also the suggestion that the grant in aid which had been received previously by the province might be used by the provincial government to supplement the proportion of the amount available for joint works in the province, in order that a greater degree of employment might be given to those who otherwise would be on direct relief. In view of that arrangement the province of New Brunswick did not. if my memory serves me, make a return to the registration of the unemployed on relief in the month of September. Subsequently, in order that our records might give a better indication of the situation over the entire dominion, some returns have been coming in. The position taken by New Brunswick, is as I understand it, that while occasional aid is now being given to certain municipalities, they still desire to maintain their policy of remaining off direct relief as a continuing system of granting public assistance.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will the minister state whether the young men in the prairie provinces who are placed on farms are included under those on relief?

Mr. ROGERS: That question was put to me by the hon, member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I said that rather than give a possibly inaccurate statement I would secure the information and place it before the house in committee when the bill is introduced.

Mr. MacNEIL: Are those engaged on forestry projects included?

Mr. ROGERS: The same answer applies.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then the figures which the minister has given may not convey anything like a correct picture of the whole situation, because apparently New Brunswick is not included—

Mr. ROGERS: New Brunswick is included in those figures.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —and we do not know whether or not the thousands who are on farms and forestry projects are included.

[Mr. Heaps.]

There is yet another class. Here in Ontario thousands of men are drifting about the country and not receiving regular relief. I do not see how they can be said to be registered. Some of them go to a cheap lodging house, such as a mission, and get one night's room and two meals; they then drift on to the next place, travelling sometimes by freight trains, sometimes on the roads, getting lifts when they can, often having to walk. When they reach the next town they get a bed. perhaps for one night, and two meals, and then pass on. Sometimes they beg on the streets for several days: some of them even beg in this building, and others on the streets nearby. They can be seen around the station house, remaining there until they are put out. They can be seen in some of the cheaper restaurants until they are ejected. Sometimes they commit crimes in order to be put in gaol over-night, that being the only way they can exist. They have no proper provision for sleeping, no way of keeping their clothing clean, no resources with which to provide the odds and ends which every man must have. Thousands of men exposed to conditions such as these are drifting about the country: they get no relief excepting in these very casual ways, by missions and other charitable institutions, through the goals, and by means of private donations.

It seems to me highly desirable that first of all some information should be secured with regard to this class of people. Some of us remember the almost impassioned plea which the minister made a year ago, that he could not do anything about this great problem until he had information. Well, it does not seem as though we have much more information than a year ago about large areas of this problem. Not only should we get information, but above all else we should be prepared to tackle the problem.

I shall not accuse the minister of trying to mislead the house—he rather complained that certain figures which had been mentioned were not quite accurate or fair—but I do suggest that he is falling very far short of giving us an adequate picture of the whole situation. He may not have the figures before him, but when the bill is presented we should have, if not statistics as accurate as could be provided by a census, at least a very much closer estimate than has been given to-night.

Mr. BROOKS: Just to clear up one point. I understood the minister to say that New Brunswick is reporting at the present time regularly as to its unemployed,

Mr. ROGERS: I say they were certainly included in the figures for February which I gave a moment ago.

Mr. BROOKS: Were those who were receiving assistance through grants in aid last year included as being on relief?

Mr. ROGERS: Those who were receiving public assistance from the municipalities and the province were normally included in the totals for direct relief in that province.

Mr. BROOKS: My understanding was that last year $173,000 was granted the province under the heading of "grants in aid of," and those who were receiving that were not included as on relief.

Mr. ROGERS: I think that must be incorrect.

Mr. BROOKS: The province was off relief as far as the record shows.

Mr. ROGERS: The grant in aid to the province of New Brunswick, as to other provinces, is paid in a monthly lump sum, and it is indicated that that monthly lump sum shall be used for the relief of necessitous persons within the province. Up to the time that the government of New Brunswick announced its intention to go off direct relief, that sum of money would have been distributed, together with an additional amount by the province concerned, to the municipalities where relief was being granted. After the province went off direct relief, the grant in aid was used to supplement the amount made available to New Brunswick for a joint works program. In other words, the province during those succeeding months believed that it would be possible to take heads of families off direct relief by giving them employment on public works. As it happened, the number was not large.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): The minister does not appear to have attached any importance to the increasing mechanization of industry and to mechanical aids in clerical work in connection with commerce and industry.

Mr. ROGERS: I do attach importance to it.

Mr. TAYLOR: (Nanaimo): Has any effort been made to gather figures in connection with that development?

Mr. ROGERS: I have no figures which would indicate the degree to which unemployment has been due to the cause just mentioned. If I remember correctly, this question did receive some attention at the last session. I know of no way by which the dominion government can obtain that information.

Mr. BENNETT: Except through the census.

Mr. ROGERS: Except possibly through the census.

Mr. BENNETT: The census of 1931.

Mr. ROGERS: For that time, yes, but not for the intervening years. It would require a continuous census to present the problem in its changing phases.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The minister said that those on relief in New Brunswick were included in the figure he gave. Does that figure include those engaged in joint works programs, who really could not be said to be employed in industry but are only temporarily engaged on government work? Are they included in the figure, or does it represent only those who are absolutely dependent on the municipality?

Mr. ROGERS: The figures are compiled precisely in the same way as they have been in other years. The question was raised as to those on farms, particularly in western Canada under the farm employment plan, and I undertook to find out whether those engaged are included in the totals. Perhaps I ought to give the same undertaking with regard to those who have been employed on joint works programs. Naturally I am most anxious to get the greatest degree of accuracy possible in the figures. I am sure that all of us would be willing to recognize an improvement if it did occur, and my belief is that there has been an improvement. If any corrections are necessary I shall see that they are made.

Mr. DOUGLAS: We are not unwilling to recognize any improvement that has taken place.

Mr. ROGERS: As far as the joint works program is concerned very little can be done in New Brunswick in the winter months.

Mr. COLDWELL: But is it not a fact that in the fall the people were told that there would be no more relief forthcoming in the large cities? When I was in Saint John in November I saw a statement to that effect. That was official from the government.

Mr. STEWART: While we give every possible weight and favourable interpretation to the figures presented by the Minister of Labour it must be perfectly apparent to the committee that there is, after all, comparatively little improvement in the unemployment situation when we consider the very large number still in that category; and the next conclusion that must be drawn irresistibly from the minister's statement is that after a [Mr. Rogers.]

year and a half this government in dealing with this question is following practically the same lines that were followed by the former government and which were the subject of such severe and incessant criticism by those on the other side of the house. In view of the statements of the minister himself, I think we had a right to expect something different from a mere continuation of the methods of dealing with this problem which were so roundly condemned by hon. gentlemen opposite.

The minister did not refer to the closing of the relief camps. As I remember, when these camps were closed he intimated that some substitute for them would probably be found in the nature of training camps. Undoubtedly the closing of the camps resulted in scattering these homeless men from coast to coast. The minister in the security of his home in Ottawa perhaps does not know it, but I can tell him that if he lived in one of the towns he would find his doorbell being rung many times a day by men who pass up and down the streets begging, and who were formerly in camps where they were comfortable. I am sure they would be much better off there than they are at the present time.

One hon, member has referred to that unascertained number of people who are drifting up and down the country without employment. I am sure I am not astray when I say that the minister has not included those in the figures he has given the committee. We knew exactly how many men were in the camps; they were included in the figure for relief. Now they disappear.

Mr. ROGERS: Not necessarily.

Mr. STEWART: I contend that they do necessarily disappear because they are moving and you cannot count them.

Mr. ROGERS: I will deal with that later.

Mr. STEWART: There is no way of ascertaining from time to time how many there are because they are in one town to-day, another town to-morrow, and somewhere else the next day. As far as I know there is no way of ascertaining how many men are in that position, whereas formerly we knew exactly. The minister said there were approximately 500,000 on relief, as reported by the bureau of statistics.

Mr. ROGERS: No.

Mr. STEWART: I mean unemployed. That was the number in January, 1937. Down to what age do they go?

Mr. ROGERS: It is purely an estimate; no breakdown is possible.

Mr. STEWART: I am not asking for a breakdown. In making up these figures what is the minimum age taken—sixteen?

Mr. ROGERS: There is nothing to show that, but I shall be glad to find out.

Mr. BENNETT: The bureau of statistics did put a limit.

Mr. ROGERS: It is not indicated here.

Mr. STEWART: As I recall it, the basis of age which was taken in the calculation at all times was sixteen, and I presume it has been continued.

Mr. ROGERS: That was the age in the relief figures and I suppose it would be the same.

Mr. STEWART: Another criticism I would make, although I do not wish to be severe, is that we are getting this important legislation at this late date of the session. I suggest that it should have been one of the first things submitted to the house, and we should have had ample opportunity to discuss it in all its aspects. In years gone by there was most severe criticism because similar legislation was not brought down earlier in the session.

Another item to which the minister refers is a million dollars in the estimates for some training of youth, or for some scheme for finding employment for them. In view of what he has said, I take it that he would prefer not to outline anything in that connection but to leave it until the estimates are before the committee. I do not think it would be out of place, however, for him to give some outline of what is proposed to be done with that million dollars, because after all it is a part of that larger plan for the relief of unemployment and the improvement of conditions.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: As a representative from New Brunswick, representing in this house the very constituency represented by the premier in the local house, I think it is only right that I should say a few words. I think that my friend, Mr. Dysart, is to be commended for having had the moral courage to abolish relief when he did. He is a pioneer in this direction and has shown the other provinces the way, and to my mind the sooner the other provinces do likewise the better it will be for this country.

Relief is mostly a matter of psychology. As county secretary of my county for twenty-one years, I have had a lot to do these last few years with relief; in fact, I have had everything to do with relief, and with preparing statistics and so on. And may I say to the minister that the preparation of those statistics for his department last year was a terrific undertaking. In the first place it took a Philadelphia lawyer to understand what was wanted; then it needed about ten Philadelphia lawyers rolled into one to explain to about forty distributors of relief spread all over the county, some of whom could hardly read or write, what was needed. It was some job. But I believe we furnished very good statements.

Two years ago, in spite of relief contributions from both provincial and federal governments, the municipal council of my county, at my suggestion I might say, decided to abolish relief, which they did by resolution of council. And, gentlemen, it may surprise you, but during the months of January, February and March we were off relief. People who needed assistance were assisted by the overseers of the poor, as they used to be before there was any mention of relief. But in April we were practically forced on relief—by whom? By the premier of the province, who denounced us in the legislature because we did not have relief.

I have in mind a certain parish in my county which in January got along with $280, in February $283, and in March $215, and in April when we went back on relief it cost that parish $1,239. So when they were paying 100 per cent, they were in pocket. I had been advocating abolishing this dole for the last two years, and I think I can take some credit for the decision taken by my good friend the premier to abolish relief.

As I say, this relief question is mostly a matter of psychology. Last year we went back on relief. Of course, we were getting 75 per cent from the other government, and they thought it was a great thing; it was bringing money into the county, Last year we spent $33,000 against $6,000 for the year before, and if we had been on relief this year I am satisfied we would have spent another $33,000 or $35,000, and we are not going to spend one cent. Yesterday I got a letter from a councillor of one of the parishes that spent most on relief last year, and he said "Thank the good Lord we have no relief this year and there is no need of it. Everyone who wants to work has found work." To my mind the less we talk about relief and unemployment the better it will be for the country. I listened a little while ago to the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) asking: what has the government done? And replying himself: the government has done nothing. It is by that kind of talk that we put false hopes in the minds of young people or any unemployed people, and perpetuate this psychological condition in their minds.

Mr. MASSEY: Has the government given them any hope?

Mr. ROBICHAUD: The best way is the way that has been followed by this party since we came into power. Open up the channels of trade, increase prosperity, and unemployment will take care of itself.

Mr. HEAPS: The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Robichaud) said it would be better for this house if we did not discuss unemployment and relief questions. I wonder if he gave that advice to his party three or four years ago, and if he had done so, whether they would have accepted it. A few more speeches like that would be deplored, I am sure, by no one more than the Liberal party themselves. In the industrial centres, of which the hon. member evidently has no cognizance, the question of relief and unemployment is the biggest problem. There is no hon. member in any part of this house who can go back to his constituents and not deal with the problem of unemployment and relief. No question was more paramount in the last election campaign than that of unemployment and measures to end unemployment. But lo and behold, a member of the Liberal party now says we should not discuss unemployment and relief, and is applauded by members of his party. I am wondering whether they are so anxious to forget the problem. But let me say they will not forget it until it is finally and adequately dealt with by the government. When the minister himself informs this committee that some half million people are out of work, we are not supposed to discuss it; we are to forget all about it! This half million cannot forget about it. Probably many of them are not on relief. I know the unemployed, have known them well for years, and a great many of them even to this day are too proud to ask for relief. What they are anxious to obtain is work. I had hoped that the minister to-night would explain to the committee the policy of the government in attempting to provide employment for the half million who are out of work at the present time. So far the minister has not given the committee any inkling of the government's intention.

Mr. ROGERS: If you exclude public works and trade stimulation what is left?

[Mr. Robichaud.]

Mr. HEAPS: I do not exclude foreign trade: I referred to the increase in foreign trade, but I said it was not a solution of the unemployment problem. And I go further. I say that public works is not a solution of the unemployment problem. See what has happened in the United States during the past three or four years; they have pumped, not millions, but billions upon billions into the economic structure of the country, and in spite of that they are still faced with the problem of unemployment. Then there is the vast amount of public works undertaken in the United States. But in spite of that vast expenditure, and the amount that has been lent to private industry, they still have a vast army of unemployed there.

Nobody objects to public works and the expansion of trade. We are all anxious for it; I am most anxious to see the expansion of trade between this country and other parts of the world, and I am willing to vote money for public improvements to any amount that the government cares to propose in this chamber; but I contend that in themselves these are not solutions of the problem of unemployment. The minister may bring down recommendations for the youth of this country to be taught certain trades; but, speaking in a general way, what is the use of teaching trades to youth when in a year or two the trade may no longer exist? A vast amount of the work to be done is not skilled work. You can go into factories and find that perhaps 80 or 90 per cent of the men employed are not doing skilled work. Most of the work to-day is unskilled or semi-skilled, work which can be taught in a couple of hours. One goes into a motor factory and sees men working at the conveyors; they perform a few evolutions with their hands, in an hour or two they are expected to become skilled in that kind of work.

Then if you go into a railway shop you will find that the great majority of the men employed there are unskilled mechanics. The same thing applies to other branches of industry, which have become so specialized that to a large extent the skilled mechanic is a thing of the past. In connection with the trade at which I formerly worked, a number of years ago I was told that the trade had practically disappeared; that it had become specialized, and numbers of boys were engaged in particular branches of the trade.

So if the government hope to solve the youth problem of this country by having young people become apprentices in certain lines of industry I say they are doomed to disappointment, and in years to come they will find they have only aggravated the unemployment situation without coming any closer to a solution of it. The solution lies much deeper, and will not be found in merely training young people in particular trades or even in expanding our foreign trade, and least of all by providing public works in this country.

To-day, Mr. Chairman, it is not a question of providing employment, which, useful though it may be, is perhaps a thing of the past. We can produce to-day in such abundance that by putting men to work for five or six hours a day we can make available more than enough goods to satisfy all our requirements. Now we must give the vast masses of our people an opportunity to enjoy the benefits of that production. The question in my mind, and the question I direct to the government, is this: What are we doing in order to see that the people of this country, both employed and unemployed, may reap the benefits of that which is produced? In that direction the government are doing nothing; they have not even started to tackle the problem. Year in and year out we in this corner of the house have suggested that at least we should increase wages, thereby increasing purchasing power among the people, and decrease the hours of work so that great numbers of those unemployed may be absorbed in industry. We are always met with the reply: This is not a question that comes under federal jurisdiction; it is a matter of provincial jurisdiction. We always meet the obstacle of jurisdiction as between the federal and provincial government. I remember when the Minister of Labour spoke in this house a little over a year ago on the question with which he is dealing to-night. At that time he said he wanted to take a long-range view of this problem and deal with it from that aspect; but to-night we are not getting a long-range view. We must infer from what the minister has said that the government are merely going to continue with the policy-or lack of policy-they have pursued for the last couple of years.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the policies which have been pursued by various governments since unemployment became a factor in this country have not in any way improved or even alleviated the unemployment situation except, may I say, as far as the granting of relief is concerned. I dislike seeing ablebodied men, good Canadian citizens, compelled to be the recipients of public relief year in and year out. It saps their vitality; it destroys the manhood and womanhood of these good Canadian people. Yet in what we have been told to-night what hope is there for that vast army of unemployed that we have in Canada? Earlier in the evening I mentioned a figure of 400,000 people out of work. Immediately after I had spoken, the Minister of Labour rose in his place and said people were using figures a little too glibly and that they were making wrong comparisons. I do not know why he should have mentioned that when I was so conservative in my estimate that I was a hundred thousand below the estimate the minister himself gave as to the number of those actually out of work.

Mr. ROGERS: I had no reference to my hon, friend at all.

Mr. HEAPS: I am very glad to hear that. Evidently I made a miscalculation when I quoted four hundred thousand instead of five hundred thousand. The exact figure, of course, we do not know. It would take a good deal of calculation and research work to ascertain the actual number out of work, but I had hoped by this time our employment commission might have been able to give us something concrete in regard to the number of persons out of work in Canada. Up to the present, however, we have not had even that.

Here is the position in which I find myself, together with dozens of other members in all parts of this chamber. Soon we will be going back to our constituents; at least it is the hope of the government that the session will be concluded within a short time and that our labours will be ended for this year. Members will be going back to their constituencies. My hon, friend from Fort William, for example, will be going back to his home city. I wonder what he will tell his constituents when they ask what this government has done to deal with the unemployment problem. The hon, member applauded a moment ago when the hon. gentleman who preceded me said we should not discuss unemployment relief in this chamber. I wonder if the hon. member for Fort William will tell his constituents that he is in favour of a hush-hush policy in dealing with the problem of relief and unemployment.

When I go back to my constituents I have to tell them something of what has happened in this chamber, and something with regard to the policy of parliament apart altogether from the policy of the government. They come to me and ask what parliament has to offer to the men who are out of work. What shall I say? What can I tell them? All I can say is that the government, or parliament, is going to continue along the lines that have been followed for the past number of years; relief will be granted, and it is hoped that something will turn up that will in some way relieve the difficulty.

Personally I would like to see the government come forward with a more concrete policy than so far has been suggested to the house. The granting of relief and the construction of public works do not offer a solution to the problem, and I believe the minister knows that as well as I do. Must we trust that something will turn up-just trust to luck that conditions will improve and that the improvement in economic conditions will absorb more people into industry? I think it has been established beyond doubt that even if we could get back to the figures of 1929, which were the highest in the history of Canada, there still would be a vast army of unemployed, almost as great as the army we have out of work at the present time. If such is the case, Mr. Chairman, it proves beyond the shadow of a doubt that far more radical treatment is necessary in connection with the unemployment than anything so far undertaken by the government.

I would plead with the government to undertake such measures as will meet the situation. If I thought for a moment that the establishment of closer trade relations with other nations of the world would be a solution of the problem I would hold up both my hands and give thanks to the government for what they have been able to do along this line. But in spite of what has been done and in spite of what the government may attempt along these lines, we reach a certain stage beyond which we cannot go, and then we find ourselves still as badly off as we are to-day. I think it is the duty not merely of this government but of parliament as a whole to face this situation.

As I said before, practically half the term of this parliament is over. We expect to prorogue in the near future. When we meet again the government will have been in power for more than half the usual term of a government. What will happen? Probably we will have the same unemployment situation to face, the same number of men knocking at our doors asking for help. The situation aggravates itself from the standpoint of those men who have been out of work for one, two or three years. As the Minister of Labour suggested earlier in the discussion, they become unemployable; and then the difficulty is to rehabilitate them and help them to become useful citizens. The greatest waste we have in Canada to-day is the men and women who are out of work. I know the minister's heart is in his work, but I am not appealing so much to his heart as to his head, because I believe he has as good a head as any hon. member. I feel that if he would apply his talents, his energy, and his knowledge of [Mr. Heaps.] economics to the problem of dealing with unemployment he could give us at least some hope that if not at this session, then at a later one, there will be some radical, remedial legislation which will give hopes to the vast numbers now out of work in Canada.

Mr. McIVOR: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Winnipeg North has asked if I an in favour of a hush-hush policy. I certainly am not, and I do not believe the Minister of Labour is practising a hush-hush policy. The hon. member has asked how I could go back to Fort William. My reply to him is that our problem is not that of permanent unemployment, but rather occasional. We have seasonal unemployment when the men come off the boats, but I can say to the house that we were in a far better position last fall than ever before.

I am not in favour of relief work. I think it is demeaning to manhood to put a man on relief, and I am hoping that our Department of Labour may bring about work with wages, so that a man can give an honest day's work for an honest day's pay. My position is that we should not have relief in any form, and if any part of the dominion can show us that it can do without relief, then let it lead the way.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, my chief concern is that we will not delude ourselves into too great a sense of security. I have said very little by way of condemnation, censure or criticism of the government. I am inclined to think that under the present system, according to orthodox principles of finance it has done practically everything that can be done. But at the same time I am decidedly alarmed by the rumours I hear to the effect that we are going to let this matter take care of itself, that we are going to cut down relief, and all that sort of thing.

I do not know whether I come in contact with more suffering men than do other people, but the contacts I make are certainly anything but reassuring. A little experience I had this summer might be worth mentioning. I had not intended to tell this to the house, but in the circumstances I believe I should. minister in one of our western towns wanted to go to England, and instead of going in the regular way he decided at first hand to try the conditions of the unemployed. With that in mind he dressed himself in overalls and a working shirt and set out to cross Canada just as he would have done had he really been out of employment. I will not tell all the details the man told me, because I believe it would not be in the public interest to do so, but I will say that since hearing his story I have been bitterly ashamed that I have had to admit conditions such as those he described are permitted anywhere under a British flag. The treatment he received at the hands of various people was, to say the least, shameful.

Men simply cannot get work. I believe it would be a good thing if, before talking so glibly about conditions, about two-thirds of the hon. members of the house would simply follow that man's example. Let hon. members go where they are not known, forget their fine positions and their salaries, and see how long they can carry on hunting for these jobs they know so much about. Let them approach relief officials and experience some of the things concerning which strong men have wept in my room in this building. So long as such conditions exist in a city right under the eaves of this building I maintain that surely we are not speaking in the public interest when we talk about cutting down relief. We are going about the problem in the wrong way entirely.

I hesitate to say anything by way of condemnation. If I cannot take time enough to offer a solution, I do not say anything. It is very easy for us to tell when a line is crooked; our task is to tell how to make it straight. That is what everybody wants to know. But while we are learning to make it straight, let us not neglect to leave all the remedies which might be necessary for those who have to travel that line.

I do not know whether or not the minister has attended to the matter I have in mind, but I would suggest that first we ought to have a means whereby every man who wants a job and cannot get it may step into one of hundreds of depots throughout the dominion and register the fact that he is without a job. He should not be treated unkindly because he does that. He could state that he wants a job; he could tell the kind of job he would be willing to do, and the amount of money he would be willing to take. If we did that, I believe we would begin to find out the number of people who really want work.

Next we ought to find out the number of jobs available. Twenty years ago a man could step into any community, go to the employment bureau and find work. He could step into the blacksmith shop of any community and make it known that he wanted a job. The news would spread, and before very long he would receive work. That condition existed ten years ago, but it does not exist to-day. I have personally gone to two or three employment bureaus; 'he last thing they want to see is anybody looking for a job.

Mr. ROGERS: Surely that cannot be true.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It has been, wherever I have been. In the little experience I have had I have not yet found one single employment bureau which was ready to take a man on. The first advertisement I have seen in the papers since the depression asking for labour is the recent one having reference to the farmers of Ontario.

Mr. ROGERS: Would the hon, member give me the name of an employment office where, when one applied for a job, there was any lack of effort on the part of the head of the employment office to place the applicant? Although we do not effectively control it, we are contributing to the employment service, and if there are complaints of that kind I want to know about them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am sorry the minister did not get my meaning. What I said was not that they were not willing to do all they could, but the last person they wanted to see was someone wanting a job. In other words, it is not that they were not willing to do all within their power to get a man a job. The only thing they can say is: We just cannot do anything for you at all.

Mr. ROGERS: That is a better explanation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is exactly what I said before. I said the last thing they wanted to see was a man looking for a job. I have not found discourtesy in employment bureaux, but men have shrugged their shoulders and by other means indicated that it was just utterly hopeless. That is the pathetic condition. In almost every mail, I receive two, three or four letters from people who are pleading for something to do. I have to write back and say I can find nothing for them to do. If there are jobs to be had in this country, it seems to me we ought to know about them. Surely they could be advertised in the press in order that the unemployed would know where they are.

A man who comes from one of the mining areas told me not long ago that one of the most pathetic things he had to face was the number of men who had hitch-hiked, walked and suffered other deprivations in order to get into that area to try to find a job. But there were no jobs and these men were hungry, tired, discouraged, foot-sore and cold. He told me that every day at least ten or fifteen came to his door pleading for something to eat. They told him they were ready to do anything. While there may be no use railing against these things, I submit that while they exist-I know they do exist in my province and in my constituency-it is simply shameful for us who are well fed and are receiving considerable incomes to rise in this house and speak disparagingly of the people in need of relief.

The first thing to be done is to register the transients; and then we should know what jobs there are, where they are, and how to get to them. When that is done we will be getting somewhere. A young man came to my room the other day in complete despair. He was here in the city last year and I gave him some advice as well as a little money. He came in to see me again and told me how anxious he was to go to work. He asked me to advance him enough money to enable him to go to a certain store in the city and buy a supply of needles, pencils, pins and other trinkets which he could sell and make his way. There are a number of people doing this same thing in the different cities. While they are "getting by" they cannot be said to be employed. They are not employed, according to my definition of the word. You cannot imagine a young man who is doing that sort of thing establishing a home. You go into the homes of this city and people, will tell you how they have bought pins, needles, pencils, shoe-laces and such things until they cannot buy any more. This is simply another form of relief. It is another kind of begging.

I do not know the experience of other hon. members of this committee, but I have found I cannot walk six blocks in this city where the labouring men are without being asked for the price of a meal. As long as this sort of thing exists in Canada, it is no time to talk of cutting down relief or closing it off entirely. I refrained from taking part in this debate largely because of my anxiety to see this measure go through, but after what had been said I felt it was my business to say something. There is a distinct alarm in the different municipalities in my province over the proposed revision in relief. I do not think the government should go forward with this idea. If conditions are picking up, let us prove it by advertising where jobs can be had.

There must be tens of thousands of people in Canada in the same position in which I find myself. I have five young people in my home who are ready to go to work and I cannot even buy jobs for them, much less find them. I have put them through high school and I could put them through normal school, through technical school, or even through university; but still there would be no work. What is the use of talking about the improvement in conditions when there are tens of thousands of young people in this position? Their parents would not admit or make known that they were unemployed, but the fact is they have no jobs. If conditions like this continue we will have no young people in the future. They simply will not be born. These young people will not marry and we will have a wastage, instead of splendid men and women for our future generations.

This is perhaps the greatest calamity which has faced us as a British race. I feel very much concerned about it, and I am sure others feel likewise. I hesitate to say anything about this to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), because I feel they are worried just as much as I. The reason I speak now is to submit that we should not delude ourselves into thinking that all is well when all is not well.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member referred to the number of men selling shoelaces. The other day I bought a pair of shoelaces from a man and I had paid him my money before I noticed that his breath was strong enough to knock me down. The hon. member (Mr. Blackmore) says that he cannot go down the street without being stopped for the price of a meal. Apparently he is too easy. I had the same experience when I first came here last year, but I finally made up my mind that it was a racket. I realized that the word was being passed from mouth to mouth that I was good for a quarter any day. Finally I told one man that I was getting sick and tired of it, and I have not been bothered since.

Mr. BROOKS: I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but I think I should not let the statement of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Robichaud) with respect to relief in the province of New Brunswick pass unchallenged. He has said that this is largely a matter of psychology. The Premier of New Brunswick, the Hon. Mr. Dysart, represents the same constituency in the provincial house as the hon, member represents in this house. Last year I noted that the constituency of Kent was a literal hive of industry due to the provincial and dominion moneys being spent in that district. You could hardly get along the roads because of the numbers of men being employed. I am not surprised that the hon. member comes to the assistance of the premier. as most of the money was spent in his constituency. Unfortunately the other parts of the province did not receive the same consideration. I may say that the opinion held by the hon. member (Mr. Robichaud) with reference to the cutting-off of relief in New Brunswick is not the general opinion throughout that province. I should like to quote an article which appeared in the press about that time. It states:

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Relief Crisis Approaches in Cities of N.B. Municipalities Feel Pinch of Carrying Relief Burden

Statements made at Montreal by Premier Dysart, that New Brunswick is the first province to "go off relief," are termed "ridiculous" by Councillor George E. Barbour of Saint John. Councillor Barbour told the city council he did not understand how the Premier could make such a claim in the face of figures showing the amount which relief is still costing New Brunswick municipalities, even though the province has not been contributing for the last few months.

He goes on to say:

Government contribution toward relief in New Brunswick terminated in the early fall. Provincial road development projects were intensified at that tme with the view of absorbing the unemployed. This program did take care of quite a number of jobless—550 in the Saint John area, for instance—but hundreds were still left to be cared for. The men on the roads received $2 a day and were unable to put anything aside for the winter. Now the road jobs have ended.

Councillor James A. Whitebone, of Saint John, in making a statement at that time said:

"Something has to be done and done quickly."
He predicts that further delay in facing the issue squarely will lead to "a very serious situation."

I would counsel the hon. member (Mr. Robichaud) to go to the fishermen along his own coast and ask them if there is no need for relief, or let him inquire of the fishermen on the southern coast of New Brunswick, or up in Gloucester county along the Caraquet coast. In our own province, very much to our sorrow, there is yet need for relief. My purpose in rising is to say that New Brunswick went off relief when it was no more justified in doing so than any other part of Canada would have been, and the credit which the premier of that province tried to take to himself on that account is not deserved either by him or his government.

Mr. RYAN: A short time ago I listened to a remark by the hon. member for Rose-town-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I understood him to say that in Saint John last fall the announcement was made that so far as the cities were concerned the government would have no more to do with the people.

Mr. COLDWELL: No.

Mr. RYAN: If I misunderstood the hon. member I shall be very glad to withdraw my remark, but that is the impression I got.

Mr. COLDWELL: If I might just explain: I said that while I was in Saint John I understood an announcement was made that there would be no more relief in New Brunswick. That is what I said; at least that is what I intended to say.

Mr. RYAN: An announcement along that line was made; that is, the premier announced the relief offices would be closed. He did not, however, intend to intimate that assistance would not be given to those who were in the category of relief recipients, for following that announcement a works program or an arrangement was instituted to take care of those who had been on the relief rolls. For instance, considerable work was done in the way of preparing roads for paving, leading out of Saint John.

As regards what has been said by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) in connection with press reports as to public statements made by members of the city council, I think the gentlemen referred to wanted to give the province the idea, and correctly so, that the situation so far as unemployment was concerned was still serious in the municipality of Saint John. I should like to say, in fairness to those who are unemployed in my constituency, and particularly in the city and county of Saint John, that among them are very many deserving persons who are anxious for work and there is a continued need of employment. And I would impress that upon the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers).

If any further grants in aid are to be given I hope that the provision for New Brunswick will not be reduced to any extent by reason of statements that have been made that the province has gone off relief. The policy which the provincial government has adopted is not to give direct relief but to assist by works projects such as road building and the like. The need for assistance remains, particularly in my own constituency. I cannot speak for the county of Kent, for the hon. member who represents that constituency is familiar with the situation there. But I know that in Saint John we have very few slackers. Those who are out of employment are only too glad to go to work if useful work can be given them.

When the government adopted the policy of ceasing to provide direct relief, the municipality ran into a special difficulty, in that a large number of what are called borderline cases, that is men who had not been listed on relief rolls but who from pride or some other reason had refrained from giving in their names, wished to participate in these works projects but found it difficult to get employment because they had not registered. This caused some trouble in the municipalities, and the result in Saint John was that the municipality had to take care of very many who were still unable to find work. So I repeat that, in fairness to those who are out of employment to-day in the constituency of St. John-Albert the Minister of Labour might well take these circumstances into consideration when the time comes to give additional grants, because I can assure him that there is still much need and that the people are most deserving.

Mr. STIRLING: Could the minister give the committee information with regard to the reopening of the relief camps, and in which provinces they have been reopened?

Mr. ROGERS: I would hesitate to accept that version of what has happened. In certain provinces where supplementary schemes have been in operation to provide for single homeless unemployed there has been an arrangement whereby some of the old camps were made available. But the conditions are quite different. There is no connection whatsoever with the Department of National Defence. They are conducted wholly as provincial construction camps.

Mr. STIRLING: I quite understand that.

Mr. ROGERS: The camps are no different in that respect from any other highway camps that have been operating during the period. Men are either receiving regular wages, as in some camps, or payment on a deferred pay basis, which applies in the forestry camps in British Columbia. When the bill is in committee or the estimates are before the house I shall be glad to furnish detailed information on that point.

Mr. STIRLING: I am not suggesting that the dominion has played its part in reopening any of the camps, but my information is that in British Columbia, on the highway camps that were the relief camps under the dominion government, relief projects have been reopened.

Mr. ROGERS: That is so.

Mr. STIRLING: What I want to know is, how is the cost of these camps defrayed by the provinces? Does the cost come entirely from provincial funds or does it come out of money paid by the dominion government to the provinces for certain purposes?

Mr. ROGERS: In the case of some of the provinces, application was made for the use of some of these camps, and where they were in remote places and could only be used for that purpose, arrangements were made to transfer these camps to the provinces. As to the precise financial arrangements, I shall be glad to take note of the question and give my hon. friend that information.

Mr. STIRLING: Perhaps the minister would. I should like to have it.

[Mr. Ryan.]

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to say a word or two about the way this relief policy has been carried out. There have been a great many complaints. Under the act the minister is empowered to make agreements with the provinces—not with municipalities. But a large part of the unemployment in this country is not in the provinces as such; it is to be found in the larger municipalities; they are the ones that are suffering and they have got nothing.

Last year there was a long debate when the relief act was going through committee. It provides that within fifteen days after the opening of parliament the minister shall lay on the table the agreements which are made with the provinces. What do these agreements show? The sum of $2,750,000 was handed to the government of Quebec and was distributed in various ways. For example, Three Rivers got a court house, public buildings and certain municipal institutions. The money was parcelled out in that province. I am not objecting to that; but when it comes to Ontario, where unemployment is acute, what do we find?

Last September following a meeting between the Ontario government and the ministry here, an agreement was drawn up. I got a return to an order of the house replying to certain questions I asked, and it shows that not one cent of the $2,700,000 that was given to the province went to the municipalities. Instead, roads were constructed, uneconomic roads which no one could by the widest stretch of imagination regard as coming properly under the act.

The city of Toronto sent a delegation to wait on the Minister of Justice, who was acting Prime Minister, and I must say he received them with great courtesy, but he said they would have to wait until his leader came back. That deputation had a program for playgrounds and other undertakings that would have provided employment. But what happened? They were told that they would have to go and see Mr. Purvis, and when they called on him he referred them to the provincial government, and by that time the unemployed had already been taken care of under the city's budget. As a past president of the association of Canadian municipalities I contended then, as I contend to-night, that there should be equality of treatment in these grants. The larger municipalities across Canada, from Halifax right through to Victoria and Vancouver, should receive grants from this parliament, because the municipality is the dumping ground for the unemployed.

Last week there was a meeting of the mayors and there was general complaint about the difficulties encountered under the act of last year. Talk about people taking the coppers off a dead man's eyes! The provinces will take all the revenue they can get and leave none for the municipalities, because there is too much politics in the distribution of funds. If there is one thing that should be avoided in the effort to relieve unemployment it is politics. Let us keep the whole thing clear of politics. In my opinion the money should be distributed among the municipalities according to population, instead of leaving the provinces to take it all. They even take income tax, though it is true that they give a large part of it back.

One thing I object to most vigorously is the use of the money handed to the province for the construction of roads which at the present time are altogether uneconomic. During the by-election men were working on roads in East Hastings and some in Norfolk and Elgin. The construction of these roads does not help city unemployment; it simply represents a direct cash subsidy to the oil and motor industries. Here we have railways building their own roadways and at the same time we are subsidizing, through the construction of these uneconomic roads, the oil and motor industries to compete against the railways.

Under the former government the agreements worked satisfactorily, though the difficulties were ten times greater. A mayor in Toronto could telephone down to Ottawa and get some relief, a third or a half, at any rate something to go on. To-day we find $17,000 being spent for dredging in Toronto, and we have a lot of revolving doors in the post office. But what is being done in connection with the level crossings? The matter was discussed the other night by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) and the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey). To-day in Toronto I saw many places that are simply a dumping ground, and last summer, from the train, I saw similar places in different parts of Canada.

I am not here to criticize the minister, but I am sorry that last session he did not incorporate in the act a clause giving him power, in making these agreements, to deal with the municipalities, leaving politics out of it. There should be a clause in the act providing for agreements with Montreal, Winnipeg, Regina, Vancouver and the larger municipalities, instead of compelling them to go to some bankrupt province which, if the money is given over to it, will make deductions for overhead and other expenses. I have looked over the legislation in the United States and I find that there the money is given to the municipalities on a definite standard plan. This old method of making agreements with the provinces has been weighed in the balance and found wanting.

The present plan of building roads ought to be discontinued. Uneconomic roads should not be built at all in these days, because the money could be used to better advantage if it were given to the cities themselves for municipal institutions. That is what is being done in Italy; they are putting up municipal institutions to meet the requirements of the next forty years, schools, breakwaters, and other works that make employment. Ninety per cent of the money should be spent in wages, but that is not done when the money is handed to the provinces. The municipalities can run their business as well as the provinces, indeed a lot better; and if they had had the same help from the banks that the provinces have had they would not be in difficulties to-day, at any rate, not to be same extent.

If this money is handed over to the province of Ontario for relief work the larger cities will get nothing; it will be spent on roads. Hamilton, Brockville and other towns are badly in need of funds. The municipalities have been starved in the last six years, with the result that they can scarcely put a coat of paint on their buildings. The boards of works in the cities and towns of Ontario are starved for urgent public works as a result. The school board has no money for new schools. There is no money for normal expansion to take care of school children. The result is they are housed in portable buildings and that kind of thing. The same is true of municipal institutions generally. The minister has tried the provincial system; why not make it fifty-fifty and this year try to make some agreement with the larger cities and towns? He will get better value for the money, more will be spent in wages, and it will be better in every way than the haphazard system by which one province gets a large sum and others, which do not vote right, get none. If relief is going to be handled in that way we shall have unemployment forever.

Mr. MASSEY: Some time ago in answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) the minister referred to what he considered to be some reasons why those who are on relief fail to find reemployment. It seems to me there is a further point in that connection which must not be overlooked. These men who have gone on relief did so perhaps only after a protracted period of endeavouring to make both ends meet without suffering the humiliation of relief, and the result in many cases has been that not only they but their families have suffered stark want and deprivation.

The physical condition of these men must be remembered. Many men who were capable of doing a hard day's work now find themselves completely out of condition. As one said to me the other day; "I am absolutely soft. I got a job, was tickled to death to get it, but after working three days I was absolutely done, could not hold it, could not keep the pace. It was something I could have handled easily a couple of years ago." The minister in his consideration of these problems should, I think, give some consideration to the question of physical reestablishment of those who have been on relief for long periods and have suffered what that entails.

While I am on my feet may I ask whether the reports of the youth committee are to be tabled, or is the house otherwise to be made acquainted with their contents? Perhaps I am premature in asking that question in view of the fact that we have not seen the bill, but I am extraordinarily interested, as I know other hon. members are, to learn of the findings of the youth committee.

Mr. ROGERS: It is not the intention to table the reports, inasmuch as the reports of the youth employment committee were made to the National Employment Commission. The government received recommendations from the National Employment Commission based upon the reports. I may say that the report of the youth employment committee was of such a character as to indicate a real need for some assistance along the lines that were discussed a few minutes ago; and it is upon the basis of that recommendation that the amount is provided in the special supplementary estimate.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rogers thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 80, to assist in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR EXPENDITURE, INDEBTEDNESS AND THE REFUNDING OF MATURING OBLIGATIONS

The house in committee on Bill No. 73, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain expenditures made and indebtedness incurred by the Canadian National Railways during the calendar year 1937, and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railways—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: This bill was referred by the house, following second reading, to the [Mr. Massey.] special committee which deals with Canadian National Railway matters, and has been favourably reported on by that committee. It is similar in its terms to bills previously passed each year dealing with the financing for the year of the Canadian National Railways.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Power to issue securities for refunding and capital expenditures.

Mr. BENNETT: It might be well if the minister could place upon Hansard, so that it will be there as a record, how these sums are made up, as the proceedings of the special committee are not permanently on record.

Mr. DUNNING: The sums in subsection 2 (b)?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. If that could be done there would be upon Hansard a short concise record for future reference.

Mr. DUNNING: Referring to paragraph (a) for retirement of maturing capital obligations, miscellaneous maturing or matured notes and other obligations, secured or unsecured, and payment of sinking funds, the total provided is $7,114,000.

Under (b) the railway's budget comes into the section:

Additions and betterments including coordinations and acquisition of real or personal property, not exceeding $23,607,700.

These amounts were outlined in full detail in the company's budget which was submitted to the house.

Mr. BENNETT: But it is not on record in Hansard, and anyone who wants to get it cannot do so. Can a short statement of that be put on Hansard?

Mr. DUNNING: Of how the figures are made up?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, a very short and simple statement.

Mr. HOWE: I am sorry to say I have not the budget here. It was all discussed in committee and fully passed there.

Mr. BENNETT: I know, but the difficulty is that frequently in this house, two or three years hence, someone discussing this matter is unable to point to the figures making up that budget because they are the record of a special committee and not on Hansard. I intended to speak to the minister about it before. I think it is desirable, personally, having regard to my own experience in matters of this kind.

Mr. DUNNING: I hardly expected to reach this to-night, so did not advise the Minister of Transport to bring his budget with him. The summary contained in paragraph (b) is only partially what my right hon. friend desires?

Mr. BENNETT: It does not touch it at all; it is simply the aggregate.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. Paragraph (b) reads:

(b) Additions and betterments including coordinations and acquisition of real or personal property, not exceeding $23,607,700, estimated as follows:

General additions and betterments. $11,289,999 Less: Equipment retirements. . 7,389,999

Acquisition of securities..... $ 3,900,000 561,000 New equipment purchases.... 19,396,700

Less: Available from working capital..... 250,000

$23,607,700

If it is desired that a more complete statement from the railway budget should be placed upon Hansard I will ask that section 2 stand until to-morrow. Unfortunately the minister cannot get the information at this late hour of the evening.

Mr. BENNETT: I see no reason why the bill should not be proceeded with and perhaps on third reading the Minister of Transport could place a short statement upon Hansard. I think it very desirable to have that information. Frequently when I have had to turn back to some page of Hansard I have found only a summary which did not give the desired details. What is given here, of course, is the aggregate, and what I should like is a little more detailed statement. Then three years from now the Minister of Transport, when he asks a question from this side of the house, will be able to turn up Hansard and obtain the information.

Mr. HOWE: I shall be very glad to prepare such a statement.

Mr. DUNNING: And we will leave third reading until to-morrow.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6-Form and terms of guarantee.

Mr. BENNETT: This raises a question which I think is of some importance, and which was just touched upon last year. There should be some understanding as to the extent to which guaranteed securities, as distinguished from direct obligations of the country, are to be issued in connection with the enterprise. Since deficits now are taken care of by direct appropriations and not by guaranteed securities, I submit to the minister that there should be some rule as to the extent to which guaranteed securities may be issued from year to year as against the securities we issue for the purposes of the railway.

Some people contend that we should not issue guaranteed securities any longer in connection with any of these matters except to refund or for the purposes of equipment, that capital expenditures in their entirety should be found by the country. Equipment securities, of course, being properly retired out of the operating revenues of the companythough it will be noted that in this instance that is not entirely the case-would be a proper charge against guaranteed securities, and the same would apply with respect to ordinary operations the cost of which is repayable out of the operating revenues of the enterprise. But it is felt that other sums should be found by the country itself, and that there should be some established relation between the two. I only mention this to the minister because I think one of the financial journals has been directing some attention to the fact that we are accumulating guaranteed securities very rapidly, and at the same time the further question of a limitation upon our own direct liabilities bears no relation to the extent to which we are issuing guaranteed securities.

Mr. DUNNING: There is, of course, a point in what my right hon. friend has said that goes very deeply. My right hon. friend will agree at once, I think, that the issuance of guaranteed securities against definite capital betterments is unquestionably a good practice, and that if we were at a stage where this system could apply proper depreciation, that of itself would very largely answer the question.

Mr. BENNETT: It would.

Mr. DUNNING: I think we, like my right hon. friend, are still a little hopeful of the future. At any rate, I could not indicate this evening where the line should be drawn, but I appreciate the force of the point mentioned by the right hon. gentleman.

Section agreed to.

Section 7 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. BENNETT: Third reading can be given to-night.

Mr. DUNNING: The minister can put on record a short statement when his estimates are under consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, or at any other time.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.58 p.m.

Tuesday, March 30, 1937

The house met at three o'clock.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to lay before the house a report and communication of the civil service commission respecting revision of the compensation of the editor of French debates and the chief of the French reporting staff.

HON. W. D. EULER

WELCOME EXTENDED TO MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE ON HIS RETURN FROM AN EXTENDED TOUR

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I am sure the house would desire to welcome back the returning traveller, who, since last we saw him, has visited most of the countries of the world, and can give us first-hand information as to the various types of government now functioning in those countries. Particularly he could give us first-hand information regarding dictatorships that are not dictatorships and soviet unions that are not soviet unions; and, above all else, he could inform us regarding great overseas dominions which, with this country, constitute the British commonwealth of nations. I am sure we are all glad to see him back so vigorous and healthy and strong in mind to meet the onslaughts which have been made upon protection during his absence. I am sure he has been invigorated and helped by the report which I read last week and which I need hardly mention. If it is quite in order I know we all would be delighted to hear from one who has seen so much of the world in the months that are past and who can give us his impressions to brighten our days which have been made dark by the attention we have had to pay to our parliamentary duties while he has been enjoying the sunlight.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, while the remarks of the right hon. gentleman are in some respects not entirely unexpected, I have to thank him for the kindly way in which he has spoken of my return to Canada. I wish also to thank hon. members of the house for the generosity with which they responded to what he had to say.

My right hon, friend made reference to my having travelled practically to all parts of the world, but I think that statement will have to be modified considerably. Of course I could say a great deal about what I saw in Russia. I did not see the dictator of that country personally, but I did see the dictator in Germany. Perhaps I am not quite as well qualified to speak with regard to dictatorships as are some others to whom I might refer.

Mr. BENNETT: You are returning to the leadership of one.

Mr. EULER: It is not my intention at this time to give an extended account of my peregrinations or pilgrimages, but I shall refer briefly to my mission to Australia and New Zealand. Of course the house will understand that as the negotiations are not complete it is obviously impossible for me to give any detailed statement with regard to them. Our conferences were carried on—quite naturally, since I was the leader of the Canadian delegation—in the most amicable manner. Perhaps I could say just this with regard to the negotiations. In my opinion sufficient progress has been made to enable me to say with considerable confidence that I believe a satisfactory arrangement will be the outcome. In the meantime the present agreement will continue in force.

I should like to take this opportunity to express briefly my appreciation of the general courtesy, kindness and hospitality of the prime ministers of Australia and New Zealand, the members of the governments of the two countries, and the people themselves. I think I might quite appropriately refer to the lengthy visit made by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) to the British dominions, more particularly to Australia and New Zealand. I hope my own leader will not find any fault with me when I tell him that sometimes I described myself as a follower of the right hon. gentleman opposite—that is, I followed him throughout New Zealand and Australia.

Mr. BENNETT: You always have on fiscal matters.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps I can say this to him without embarrassing him: the right hon. gentleman made a number of public addresses, all of which were good, and everywhere he left the best possible impression. Of course that was to be expected. I think it would be well worth while for hon. members of the house and of the government to visit the overseas dominions, even if it is not for the purpose of negotiating trade agreements. They would thus be able to get the viewpoint of the people of Australia, New Zealand and elsewhere, and try to convey to them something of the viewpoint of the Canadian people. This cannot be done at a distance of ten or eleven thousand miles; it can be accomplished only by personal contact. I am quite sure that what the right hon, gentleman did in Australia and New Zealand went a long way toward cementing the feelings of good-will that exist between the people of those countries and the people of Canada.

I must say I was surprised at the extent of the resources of Australia and at the variety of climate to be found there. The climate varied from the tropical to be found in Queensland in the extreme north to that of Tasmania in the extreme south, which is much like that of this country. No one can see the resources and extent of New South Wales, Victoria and the other states and New Zealand without being convinced that a great future is in store for these countries. At a later date I hope to go further into the details of the negotiations which took place while I was there.

MAIL DELIVERY ON GOOD FRIDAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Postmaster General): Before the orders of the day are called I should like to answer the questions asked yesterday by the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Lennard) and the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) with regard to mail delivery on Good Friday. I might remind my hon. friends that when the supplementary estimates were being considered on Wednesday evening the question was asked as to whether or not there would be a delivery on Good Friday. I indicated that the regular delivery would take place on that day. On Thursday I learned that through some misunderstanding directions had been given for only the morning delivery, and I had instructions issued that the regular delivery should take place on Good Friday.

TRANSLATION OF QUESTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Before the orders of the day are called I should like to direct attention to the poor translation that has been made of certain questions. I have given private notice twice of this fact; this is the third time, and if it is necessary to bring it up the fourth time I will have to say much more about this matter. I am referring particularly to the questions appearing in the Votes and Proceedings for to-day.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

He said: In making this motion perhaps I should explain that the immediate object is to secure assent to interim supply, it being near the end of the present fiscal year. The amount to be asked for is one-sixth of the amounts to be voted. There is the usual provision that the rights of discussion will not be prejudiced. I make this explanation lecause I understand that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) intends to speak on the motion that you, [Mr. Euler.]

sir, do now leave the chair. If my hon. friend will defer his speech for the moment I shall undertake, after we have been in ways and means and the interim supply bill has passed, again to move that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Of course it is understood that in granting interim supply no hon. member, at least of those associated with us, can be taken as agreeing to the items by reason of the fact that one-sixth supply is being granted. That is the usual provision made on an occasion of this kind.

Mr. DUNNING: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $37,395,179.14, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1938, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1938.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNNING moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $16,010,551.17, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted as set forth in the special supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1938, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1938.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1938, the sum of $53,405,730.31 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 81, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1938.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY—CURTAILMENT OF CIVIL LIBERTIES

STATEMENT OF MR. WOODSWORTH ON MOTION OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to call the attention of the government and of the house to some recent occurrences that endanger the liberties of Canadian citizens and deny, especially to labour, certain fundamental rights. A few days ago, in answer to a question with regard to "sit-down strikes," the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) made quite a farreaching statement, as contained in Hansard page 2114. The minister did not, in this instance, wait for the courts to interpret the law, but stated that a "sit-down strike" in Canada would be entirely illegal. He further made the statement that there were legitimate means of redressing grievances already existing in Canada; in his own words:

Legitimate means of redressing grievances already exist in Canada.

Further, he stated that all the resources of the dominion should be utilized against such a strike; using his own words again:

. . . the dominion government is prepared to utilize all the resources and agencies at its command and to the extent of its legal powers to the end of restraining and eliminating this illegal mode of procedure in Canada.

It seems to me that this statement cannot be dissociated from the recent Sarnia riot in the Holmes Foundry on March 3. As far as I can ascertain the outstanding aspects of that strike were these. The shop committee had asked and were granted an increase in the weekly wage rate. The company however stepped up the schedule of work required, thus more than nullifying the increase. I ask the minister, what legal means had the men of redressing those grievances? I would like him to make this specific. The men, rightly or wrongly, resorted to what is known as the sit-down strike. I am not going to discuss the merits or demerits of that procedure. It may be wrong. Let me call attention to what actually happened. With the knowledge, if not the connivance, of the management a gang of men armed with axes, iron bars and rods made an attack on the factory and later, according to press reports, on their homes. Have the employers no legitimate way of settling their troubles, of securing control of their own factory? The employers apparently contented themselves with having the foremen distribute to the mob, as they entered the doors, certain mimeographed sheets requesting the invading gang not to be violent. That is a serious state of affairs. Apparently the whole affair had been a frame-up, with the management itself to a greater or less extent responsible.

Where were the police? It seems that there was one policeman in the municipality, at Point Edward. Just across the road the Sarnia police confined their efforts, as they said, to directing traffic and so on. After the riot they conducted the beaten up workers to the gaol and some to the hospital.

As far as I can ascertain the only indictable offence under which the criminal sit-downers could conceivably be charged was petty trespass with a maximum fine of $10. At it turned out, only one of them was fined even this amount. The rest were dismissed under suspended sentence but they were first held three days in gaol without bail and incommunicado. I ask the Minister of Justice: Does this kind of thing, in his own words, not tend to undermine all respect for law and order? It would seem as if in Canada the protection of property was much more important than the protection of human rights and even life itself. I know that is a serious charge, but events of this kind would appear to substantiate it.

Now I turn from Ontario to the province of Quebec. In recent weeks there have been three outstanding instances of high-handed action on the part of the provincial government. The first I mention in passing, the ejection of Brigadier-General Panet by provincial constables who showed no warrant, and the seizing of all relief commission records. I would refer the house to the Montreal Gazette of March 17. I have no doubt the municipal counsel and General Panet can take care of themselves, but I instance this as illustrating the way in which things are being conducted in that province at the present time.

I am interested in another matter, the arrest of seven clothing workers in Montreal. Most of these were officials of what is known as the Montreal Joint Board of Amalgamated Clothing Workers. This organization, a legitimate trade union, has been in operation for some thirty years in Montreal. These men were arrested in the dead of night by special provincial officers. They were dragged from their beds and held in gaol overnight, incommunicado, on a warrant issued by Mr. Justice Tetrault, a magistrate, who endorsed the said warrant "no bail until appearance." The men were charged with conspiracy of different kinds—conspiracy to prevent others from working; intimidation; injury to business, and forcing employees to join a foreign organization.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is that from a newspaper report?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That last statement was taken from a memorandum given me by counsel appearing for these men.

Mr. DUPUIS: Has the hon, member the names of those arrested?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have the names but I am not in court. They were given to the press at the time. I do not think I will take the time to read them; I have them here. Under section 497 of the criminal code the right of trade unions is supposed to be safeguarded. That section reads:

The purposes of a trade union are not by reason merely that they are in restraint of trade, unlawful within the meaning of the last preceding section.

Yet it would seem as if these men's crime was primarily that they sought to organize a trade union and to carry out its purposes. I am glad to note that in the provincial assembly in Nova Scotia, Colonel G. S. Harrington recently introduced a bill formally legalizing trade unions. I should like to read one clause:

(5) It shall be unlawful for any employer hereafter to insert any clause in any written contract of employment, or to impose any condition in any verbal contract of employment, or to continue such clause or condition heretofore in effect, where such clause or condition seeks to restrain any employee from exercising his rights under this act, and any such clause or condition shall be of no effect.

Did our own Minister of Justice, upon these arrests in Montreal, hasten to interpret the law as he did in the case of the sit-down strikers? Did he offer to use all the resources of the dominion to the end of protecting trade unionists? I do not think so, even though the welfare of large numbers of workers in the province was definitely at stake.

Now I come to the third event to which I referred, the most important of all, and that is the so-called "padlock act" to protect the province from communist propaganda. In protesting against this action of the government of Quebec I am protesting not merely in the name of trade unionists, certainly not in the name of communists, but in the name of all British subjects who love liberty. In the Free Press published in my own city of Winnipeg there appeared on March 27 an article under the heading, "Red hunting in Quebec." The Quebec legislation is characterized as—

One of the most savage assaults upon freedom which Canada has ever seen.

Premier Duplessis in introducing the bill stated, according to the Gazette of March 18, that since the parliament of Canada repealed section 98 of the criminal code, there was no means of preventing communist meetings. I submit that that statement in itself is an admission that that legislation is an indirect attempt to legislate in the field of criminal law, and as such it is in reality ultra vires. The important sections are 3 and 12. Section 3 reads:

It shall be illegal for any person, who possesses or occupies a house within the province, to use it or allow any person to make use of it to propagate communism or bolshevism by any means whatsoever.

And then section 12:

It shall be unlawful to print, to publish in any manner whatsoever or to distribute in the province any newspaper, periodical, pamphlet, circular, document or writing whatsoever propagating or tending to propagate communism or bolshevism.

I would point out that communism is not defined in the act. In the upper house in the course of the debate one member sought to identify communism and socialism. The premier said there would be little difficulty in making decisions, for communism could be "felt," and it was not advisable to have a definition. Surely that is a most curious statement for any premier to make; "not advisable to have a definition of what communism is." Someone suggests that not only could it be "felt"; it could be smelt. Just as sensible! It means in effect that anyone whom the premier does not like may be termed a communist. For example, the premier stated in the chamber that Mr. Joseph Schubert is a communist. Now Mr. Schubert is an alderman of the city of Montreal. He has again and again opposed the communists and been opposed by them. I am informed that he is at present in charge of the bureau enforcing the Arcand law in part of the garment industry. He says he proposes to go ahead proclaiming his doctrines as he has been doing in the past, so I presume that under this act the Montreal city hall might be padlocked, since "communism" is being propagated there by Joe Schubert.

I should like to ask what the Minister of Justice has to say with regard to a situation of this kind. I recognize that disallowance may not be a very wise procedure. Yet the power of disallowance exists in Canada. But there is another course which might be adopted. The governor in council under the Supreme Court Act (R.S.C. 1927, chapter 35, section 55) has the power to refer any dominion or provincial legislation to that court for a test of its validity. Seeing the government were so anxious to find out whether the social legislation enacted by the Bennett government was valid they might try to find out whether this law is valid. Thus they might accomplish the end without resorting to disallowance. On unemployment insurance legislation the government immediately ran off to the supreme court and then carried it to the judicial committee of the privy council.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Is the hon. member criticizing that?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not for the moment, but I say that the government, having done that, should not hesitate to act when the rights and liberties of people resident in the province of Quebec, and others who may be passing through, are thus imperilled.

May I point out that not only is communism not defined but the phrase is used, "propagating or tending to propagate communism." According to my way of looking at things this very act, in its repressive character, tends to propagate communism. I think undoubtedly communism is propagated when people are denied the right of expressing their views. Yesterday I listened to a statement of conditions in certain outlying portions of his constituency as described by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot); such conditions tend to propagate communism.

Let me read a passage which is familiar to every hon. member of this house:

And all that believed were together, and had all things common; and sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all men, as every man had need.

That passage is from the second chapter of the Acts, verses 44 and 45, and certainly tends to propagate a certain type of communism. There is no definition whatever in the act, and I suggest it would not be going altogether too far to say that if the act were rigidly enforced all bibles might be seized and destroyed and all the churches be padlocked. Of course someone will say that that is absurd. It may be carrying the application to an absurd degree, but I point out that such a procedure would be in accordance with the law. The danger is that those in authority will use the law against some helpless individual who cannot defend himself.

When I was a younger man I had occasion to read what we used to call patristics, that is, the writings of the early Christian fathers. May I point out that in these writings again and again occur certain passages which would come definitely under this law. May I point out also that in the province of Quebec, as elsewhere, there are Catholic communities which are perhaps the best examples we have of communism within certain limited bounds, among certain classes of people.

Mr. MARTIN: Not Marxian communism.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is the very point I wish to emphasize; communism here is undefined. In our reading of history we recall the peasant revolt, Wycliffe, Thomas More and his Utopia, John Ball, William Godwin, Robert Owen, the struggle of the chartists, and Christian socialism as expounded by Kingsley and Maurice; all these men and movements may be said to propagate or tend to propagate communism. I submit that you cannot teach history or literature or economics without getting into this realm. So I would suggest that if the law is to be rigidly enforced McGill university and most of our schools might be padlocked.

I come to modern socialism and its leader, Karl Marx. I think all who have read anything of socialism will concede that modern or so-called scientific socialism is largely founded on Marx's communist manifesto. Undoubtedly then any teaching of Marx or of the many schools of socialism which have drawn inspiration from him may well be said to tend to propagate communism. It is indeed fortunate that the House of Commons is situated in Ottawa rather than in Hull, or I am afraid that our library might be padlocked by Mr. Duplessis, because there are shelves of books there which deal with communism.

How about the British Labour party? How about the present French government headed by M. Blum? How about prominent Britishers such as Lord Passfield, or the Webbs, or Professor Laski, or Bernard Shaw? Under a strict interpretation of this law not one of them could speak in Montreal, because if they dared to do so the man who had rented them the hall might find it padlocked for a year. In fact I am inclined to think that there are some of my political enemies who might think that my speech to-day would tend to propagate communism. If that is so I suggest that this day's issue of Hansard might be seized in the mails when it reaches Quebec, and all the post offices be padlocked.

Probably this time the Quebec government have overreached themselves. Even the financial papers are concerned. Let me read a paragraph from the Financial Post of March 27, under the caption:

Personal liberty worth preserving. Communism is an economic and social theory which is offensive to a great many people. But those who believe in communism have as much right to present their point of view to the public as those who believe in capitalism, a competitive economy, or state socialism. . . . There are some things worse than the propagation of new and even unpleasant and unsound doctrines. Among them are the tyranny of the state and the loss of personal liberties.

I think all hon. members will agree with such a statement. I turn to select a few paragraphs from an editorial in the Ottawa Journal of March 24, under the heading "Another measure that strikes at liberty." Referring to this law the editorial says:

Its threat is against freedom of opinionagainst freedom of print.

The editorial proceeds:

The Oxford dictionary defines communism as: "A theory of society according to which all property should be vested in the community and labour organized for the common benefit.

Are these theories to be made a crime? With those who hold them liable to arrest, to with those who hold them hable to arrest, to imprisonment, to have their premises padlocked? If so, and if anything even "tending toward Communism" is to be made a criminal offence, then a Franklin Roosevelt would have small chance in the province of Quebec. Even Mr. Bennett, with his radio speeches, would have been in danger. Not to mention Mr. Woodsworth worth.

Actually this bill is not aimed against lawlessness. It is aimed against liberty. Against liberty to write and speak, to discuss and debate. It is a vicious law because:

I gladly quote these reasons because I believe they put in a few words what I myself would like to charge against the law.

1. It enables an executive officer to punish a man (by padlocking his house) before any court has found him guilty.

2. It puts the burden of proof of innocence on the person thus attacked.

3. It bars any appeal from the decision of a single judge of the Superior court.

4. It enables any peace officer to seize literature, not only of a Communistic sort (with interpretation of what constitutes Communism left to the government) but also of a sort "tending to produce Communism."

The editorial concludes:

That isn't freedom. It isn't freedom as we have known it in British countries for two hundred and fifty years. . . . .

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

I do not like often to refer to the classics, but perhaps I may be permitted to quote two or three sentences from Milton's Areopagitica:

Give me the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conscience, above all liberties.

And again:

And although all the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth, so Truth be in the field, we do injuriously by licensing and prohibiting to misdoubt her strength. Let her and Falsehood grapple; who ever knew Truth put to the worse, in a free and open encounter?

And again:

For who knows not that Truth is strong, next to the Almighty; she needs no policies, nor stratagems, nor licensings to make her victorious; those are the shifts and the defences that error uses against her power.

I would ask in closing: What might we expect from the Minister of Justice in a Liberal cabinet? First of all, I think a declaration that the Quebec act is ultra vires and as illegal as a sit-down strike. In the one instance the minister undertook to interpret the law; why should he not do so in this much more important case?

Second, we might expect a statement that there are legitimate means of protecting Quebec against lawlessness and violence. We have that, as I think he will tell us, in the criminal code. That ought to be told to Mr. Duplessis.

Third, there should be the emphatic assurance that the resources of the dominion will be used to protect the rights and liberties of all Canadian citizens-even in Quebec. Such a statement was made most emphatically the other day when the minister was dealing with a few people who had gone on what they termed a sit-down strike. In this instance, where liberty is at stake, might not the minister assure the people concerned that all the resources of the dominion will be available to protect the rights and liberties of all Canadians? Fourth, I suggest that the minister should assure us that there will be a reference to the supreme court in order that we may know what rights we have. I point out once more that such action was taken by the government in respect to certain social security measures. Surely similar action might be taken in the present instance.

In presenting this matter I feel that I am appealing to a minister who fundamentally is a Liberal at heart and to whom an appeal of this kind could not be made in vain but must meet with a favourable response.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth) for the compliments conveyed in his last words. I hope I shall always deserve to be known fundamentally as a Liberal. The hon, member has covered a good deal of ground, and as briefly as possible I shall try to answer some of the points he has raised. I shall not be able to do it with his vigour and his power, but he may be sure I shall do it with as much sincerity as he has shown.

The hon, member spoke first of the statement I made a few days ago in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. McLarty) regarding the stand of the government on sit-down strikes. I have not been able to gather whether or not the hon. member favours that mode of expressing grievances. The sit-down strike, as I indicated the other day, is certainly an illegal mode of procedure. I repeat that statement, and could not do otherwise. The hon, member has said that my statement was directed against some poor strikers in Sarnia. I did not know anything about that. I have no knowledge of proceedings which may have been instituted against those men. Those proceedings were instituted, as they must be, in provincial courts, and under the control of provincial authorities. What I stated about the legality of the sit-down strike had no relation to the incident at Sarnia. The hon, member related certain incidents in connection with the strike with which I was not familiar, and of which I have no knowledge; I surmise he is basing his information on newspaper reports.

The hon. member said, "The Minister of Justice has stated there are legitimate ways of redressing grievances; what are those legitimate ways?" What are they? We have in Canada a piece of legislation which for many years has benefited labour as well as employers. The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act has been cited elsewhere as a model of legislation. Let me tell the hon. member we have just had one example of what a legitimate means may do to redress grievances if they exist. A momentous threatened strike of all railway employees in Canada has just been settled by the legitimate means we have at our disposal. It was not settled by a sit-down strike or by listening to agitators; it was settled because the railway labour unions were able to present their case in a legitimate way. There were negotiations; there were understandings; and I say the fact that the threatened strike has just been settled is a feather in the cap of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), who was so largely instrumental in bringing about the settlement. That is the legitimate means I had in mind when I spoke the other day.

Apart from the instance in Ontario, the hon. member spoke about the province of Quebec and what he termed the ejection of Brigadier-General Panet from the offices of the unemployment commission in Montreal. I am not as free as is the hon. member to pass judgment upon the action of other governments in Canada. I cannot pass judgment until the matters are officially brought to the knowledge of the government and in one way or another are before me for adjudication. I have nothing to say about the matter. I do not know what the circumstances were. If they are as the hon. member has described them I would say with him that that is not the way to act with regard to a gentleman of the ability, the calibre and the integrity of Brigadier General Panet. But we have had nothing to do with that.

The hon. member also spoke of the arrest of the seven leaders of a union in Montreal, in connection with the strike of the amalgamated clothing workers.

Mr. HEAPS: There was no strike.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Well, they have been arrested for conspiracy. The laws of the land are there; we have nothing to do with that matter. What has the Minister of Justice to say about it? Nothing, except that if those men are not guilty they will be found not guilty by a tribunal in the province of Quebec, where laws are administered as in the other provinces. I have no judgment to pass upon the matter, in any way, shape or form.

Then the hon, member spoke about a bill which last week passed through the Quebec legislature. All I know about it is what I have read in the press. Again I say I cannot speak on a matter of this kind with the same freedom as the hon, member can.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Here is the bill,

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have not the bill, but when the bill comes to me it will come in an official and regular way, not through the agency of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Under the constitution, any law enacted in a provincial legislature has to be sent by the lieutenant governor of the province in question to the Governor General of Canada, and that law is reviewed or considered by the Minister of Justice. Then there is a report as to whether or not the law shall be allowed to stand. There is that power of disallowance, as the hon. member has stated. The law to which he has referred has not reached the governor general or the Minister of Justice; I do not know what it is, beyond what I have read in the newspapers. Therefore I must accept the hon. member's statement. I believe his observations in that respect are premature, and certainly any comment on my part would be premature. I cannot comment on the law before it is sent officially and regularly through the channel established by the constitution.

With regard to disallowance, I am surprised that the hon. member should suggest the disallowance of provincial legislation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not suggest it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Ordinarily the hon, member is very much opposed to arbitrary measures.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I say I did not suggest it. I said there was a power of disallowance, but I made another suggestion.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): For many years the power of disallowance has not been resorted to by the government of Canada. The same power of disallowance existed in connection with federal legislation in the hands of His Majesty the King, represented of course by the imperial government. That power has not been exercised, for many years. In fact at the imperial conference of 1926, and later in 1930, it was formally declared that this power no longer constitutionally exists, and that the imperial parliament has no constitutional right to disallow laws of the parliament of a dominion.

I would not say the same condition would apply to provincial legislation, but it has often been stated by the courts that within the sphere of their own jurisdiction the provincial legislatures are sovereign. I do not think that in a federation such as this the power of disallowance could easily be exercised by the central government. I believe the provincial legislatures feel that they are still supreme and sovereign within the sphere of their jurisdiction.

I understand the act has been assented to by the lieutenant governor. If, as the hon. member suggests, it is ultra vires, then the courts will so rule. The courts will declare that it is ultra vires, and it is better that the courts so declare than that the Minister of Justice do so, because there would be no appeal from disallowance by the minister. On the other hand, there would be appeal from a court decision, and there would be a final judgment as to whether or not it is within the powers of a province to legislate in the matter.

The hon. member suggests that there should be a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. As I have said, I was surprised to hear him make that statement, because he criticized the government for having referred to the Supreme Court of Canada acts of our own parliament; now he wants us to take an act of the legislature of Quebec and refer it to the supreme court. All I can say with regard to his suggestion—and the hon. member certainly does not expect me to say more—is that it will receive the most serious consideration.

The hon, member spoke of communism and the way to fight it. He asked what our stand against communism would be. I am pleased that the debate gives me an opportunity to express my views as to the doctrine of revolutionary communism. I have never concealed my views on the subject. I am opposed to everything that they teach and preach. I am against their doctrine on moral, religious and sociological grounds. With the exception of a few individuals, I think our whole population is opposed to the spreading of this doctrine. I believe the best way to fight communism is to eliminate the causes of discontent which exist among many classes of our population. We should try to give justice to everyone, to the poor the same as to the rich, to the humble the same as to the powerful. We should endeavour to eliminate the grievances and abuses which now exist in our system. But while that system may need reforming, we still want to keep it.

The second method we should adopt is that of education. If communism is bad, it should be fought with something that is better. If it is wrong, we must provide something that is right. I agree that hatred will not eliminate communism. I wonder if many hon. members of this house read the recent encyclical of Pope Pius XI on communism? He indicated that justice and charity were the two best agencies with which to combat communism. I believe that is so. All Canadian citizens should unite to preach the true doctrine. I have been thinking about this matter for some time and if I find support for the idea I should like to organize a league of Canadian citizens for the purpose of spreading education throughout the length and breadth of Canada. All democratic people, the labourer and the employer, the church man and the public man, should join hands in helping to spread the right kind of education throughout Canada. The purposes of this organization would be, first, to preserve the democratic state in Canada; to combat communism and fascism and to counteract the activities of all subversive and revolutionary forces which seek to overthrow the democratic state by force and violence; to guard the religious heritage of Canada from the protagonists of foreign and atheistic doctrines and to assist the state in every lawful way to the end that Canada may remain a place of safety, that the welfare of her citizens, that men and their wives and children, may be guarded, and that peace, order and good government may be maintained in our dominion.

Mr. BENNETT: Peace, order and good government?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes. I think such a method would be more effective than the use of guns, prisons and other arbitrary methods. I am quite willing to try to get such an organization started in Canada, and I hope my hon. friend will join in fighting that against which he protests. Those who believe in order, religion and liberty make the best bulwark against communism. They are more effective than prisons.

I should like to relate an incident which happened a few months ago. A municipal election was to be held in Sudbury. As hon. members know, there is a considerable labour element connected with the mines in that district. A gentleman from Sudbury came to my office one morning and told me that three or four communists were in the field. He asked that these men be arrested and prevented from taking part in the election. He claimed that the entire population of Sudbury had sent him to make this request. I told him that I had no right to do it, that the best way to fight these people was to beat them at the polls. He accepted my views and persuaded his friends that that was the best method to adopt. The communists received about 110 votes as compared with the 5,000 and 6,000 received by the other candidates. I think that was the best way to show the people of Sudbury that the teachings of these men were wrong. If they had been put in gaol they would have been treated as martyrs. They would have claimed they were persecuted because of their ideas.

By the way, whoever heard of Tim Buck before he was put in gaol? Because he was put in gaol people go by the thousands to attend his meetings. He is teaching the same bad doctrine, but I would prefer to attempt to destroy his arguments rather than put him in gaol. I would rather adopt the Hyde Park method than force conspiracies in cellars. I would rather know what is going on than suspect that meetings were being organized in cellars and other places. Experience in religious and political matters has shown that arbitrary methods of repression have always failed. But law and order must be maintained. If those men do or say things which are prohibited by law they must be treated accordingly, and as far as I am concerned, they will be.

I saw in the press a suggestion that the definition of the crime of sedition should be widened. It comprises, however, everything that is an element of trouble. In the famous English case of Burns, Judge Cave gave the best definition of sedition that exists. He said:

Sedition embraces everything, whether by word, deed or writing, which is calculated to disturb the tranquillity of the state.

The law of sedition-and we have it under our common law as well as in other lawsis at the disposal of every good citizen to be invoked against those who are guilty by act or word or conspiracy wherein there is an element of sedition. The dominion government will help the provincial authorities to enforce internal peace and order in Canada, within the sphere of our own jurisdiction; and let it be understood that we have the means of doing it. We have a very fine Canadian mounted police force. Sometimes it is criticized; I do not know that I have not myself criticized it in the past, but it is my experience that in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police we have the best police force which exists; it is straightforward, honest, courageous, and a fine agency for peace and order in Canada. This session we have taken means to increase another force we have available to maintain internal order in case of emergency, as well as to defend our coasts. I do not know whether it will astonish the house and the hon, member who has just spoken if I tell them that these increases in the estimates have been bitterly criticized by communists and those associated with communism in this country. I hold in my hand a circular which has been sent throughout Canada. One side is in English, the other side in French. It is the work of the association controlled by the communist party in Toronto, and is directed against those estimates.

Miss MACPHAIL: I was against the estimates, and I am not a communist.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I know; this does not apply to my hon. friend. But it is strange that these people should be so strongly opposed to the provision I have mentioned. They circulated this document throughout the province of Quebec; they even sent around a form of resolution to be adopted in that province by associations which are far from friendly with the organization that started this movement. This resolution has come to members of the House of Commons from a movement in my province organized by the Canadian League against War and Fascism and other associations of the kind. Why are the communists so strongly opposed to Canada having even the skeleton of an army for defence, when they seem to be wholly in favour of Russia having the greatest army in the world? They want Russia to be armed, but Canada, and other nations as well, to be disarmed.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose they have been listening to the speeches of the opposition during the last five years.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I do not know. More than that: when I announced in parliament that I was about to introduce a law to enforce in Canada the Foreign Enlistment Act, I received hundreds of telegrams from people describing themselves as communists or friends of liberty or friends of all sorts of other things—

Mr. BENNETT: Sons of Freedom.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East):—and indicating that the communist party was opposed to that measure. They do not want Canadians to have a militia of any kind, but they want Canadians to go away and fight for their doctrines in Europe. The two ideas are closely associated. I have with me two letters, in exactly the same words, from two French-Canadians in Montreal. I am going to read them to show the propaganda which was going on while these matters were before the House of Commons. I will read one of them—because the other is precisely the same—in French, and will then translate it.

M. Lapointe,

ministre de la Justice.

Cher monsieur,

Je proteste contre l'embargo et l'interdiction de porter secours au gouvernement démocratique légal d'Espagne, et contre le réarmement canadien.

(signé) .....

It is better that I should not give the name of the writer. The translation is as follows:

Mr. Lapointe, Minister of Justice,

Dear Sir,-

I protest against the embargo and the interdiction to go and help the democratic legal government of Spain, and against Canadian rearmament.

(Signed) .....

All this was the result of a propaganda.

To summarize what I have said, I believe that our best way to fight these doctrines is, first, to try to eliminate the causes of dis-[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

content and friction; second, to organize for the dissemination of good ideas to fight bad ideas; third, to see that order and peace are maintained in Canada. But with all that, I am a strong believer in the British way of administering justice. I believe in the majesty of the law. I do not think that it is a good thing to fight illegality by other illegalities. Arbitrary methods, which are not strictly according to the British practice, do not appeal to me, and I do not believe that their effect is what those who use them have in view. It is my opinion that no power, whether federal, provincial or municipal, should usurp the powers of other bodies, but that they should all confine their activities within what the law and the constitution permit. If we observe these principles I have no doubt that we shall keep Canada free from the disastrous doctrines and deeds which are the plague of other countries; and to that end it is the duty of all citizens, wherever they are and to whatever class of society they belong, to contribute their share.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

FURTHER SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1936-37

Write-down of assets-

To authorize—as the dominion's contribution to a program of adjusting the indebtedness of farmers living in the drought area of the province of Saskatchewan which program has been sponsored by the government of that province and involves appropriate adjustments in debt or tax claims on the part of the provincial government, the municipalities and certain mortgage lending institutions—the writing off and cancellation of certain treasury bills of the province held by the dominion, provided (1) that said treasury bills be transferred in the books of the Department of Finance from "active assets" to "non-active assets" as at March 31, 1937; (2) that final writing off and cancellation of said treasury bills be subject to the approval of the governor in council and in accordance with such terms and conditions as he may approve, including the nature of the evidence to be submitted as to the adjustments made by the provincial government, the municipalities and the mortgage lending institutions aforesaid; and (3) that the amount of treasury bills to be written off and cancelled shall not exceed the amount advanced by the dominion government to the provincial government by way of loan to assist in financing expenditures incurred for relief, seed grain and seeding purposes in the said drought area during the period from May 1, 1931, to January 1, 1935, plus such accrued interest thereon as has been capitalized, and shall not in any case exceed in the aggregate the sum of, $17,959,606.51.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a most extraordinary item. We lent Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba certain sums of money and they gave us their promise to pay. We now propose to take $17,000,000 of this money and call it a non-active asset and under certain circumstances to write it off altogether. This is a procedure the effect of which is to deprive the people of Canada of $17,000,000, for in the one instance they had to find the money either by borrowing or by taxation, which means the same thing, and then they are to lose it for all time; and it is to go to one particular section of one particular province, although there are other parts of Canada that are afflicted by drought. Alberta nearby is in that position and nothing is being done for that province, but $804,000 is being written off with respect to Manitoba. I should like to have some reason for the selection of these provinces as against the other.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps I had better make a brief general statement covering the whole matter.

Mr. BENNETT: That might shorten it.

Mr. DUNNING: In so doing I shall cover the points mentioned by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). Saskatchewan is the province immediately before us, Manitoba being in vote 392. During the summer of 1936 various conferences were held between the government of Saskatchewan and representatives of The Dominion Mortgage and Investments Association with a view to working out a cooperative program for the voluntary adjustment of farmers' indebtedness in the drought areas of that province. As is well known, the drought area of Saskatchewan is many times larger than the drought area in either of the other provinces and affects several times the number of people. At a number of these conferences the dominion Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was present, and he intimated on behalf of the dominion government that the dominion would be prepared to participate if a plan could be agreed upon under which the mortgage lending institutions, the provincial government and the municipalities would undertake to make appropriate concessions to the farmers in these areas who had suffered from prolonged drought conditions. Finally in September a plan was evolved as follows:

First, all government and municipal advances for seed grain, fodder and relief, made prior to January 1, 1935, to be cancelled to the farmer concerned.

Second, all municipal tax arrears to be adjusted as at January 1, 1937, so as to leave not more than an average of two years' taxes standing against any of the properties within the area.

The provincial government was also to cancel all arrears of provincial taxes down to January 1, 1935.

The mortgage companies agreed that the rate of interest on all mortgages throughout the province should be voluntarily reduced by the mortgage-lending institutions to six per cent per annum as at January 1, 1937. In the drought area, in addition to the reduction in the rate of interest by the mortgagees, all unpaid interest on the mortgage, accumulated down to January 1, 1935, was to be cancelled and all mortgage accounts were to be voluntarily adjusted as at January 1, 1937, on such a basis as to leave no more than the balance of principal money advanced and any interest thereon which might be due for the years 1935 and 1936.

A standard form of extension agreement, approved by the government of the province, provided that the account will be consolidated, that is, the principal and the two years' interest which I have just mentioned, and extended for ten years on terms that will provide that delivery of one-third share of crop in the first three years will keep the debtor out of default. Five per cent on principal is to be payable annually, with the balance due in the tenth year.

The standard form of agreement was also to represent a final adjustment.

In brief, this was a cooperative voluntary form of debt adjustment and I am bound to say, as representing one of the creditors, a large creditor, the dominion government, that I do not consider the debt in question a good asset, and I am reasonably sure that my predecessor was of the same opinion. The government welcomed the opportunity, through cooperation with other creditors, a large number of people throughout that area, of bringing about on all hands such a debt reduction as would afford the people of that area an opportunity to start again, should rain come, with a reasonable prospect of being able successfully to prosecute their calling of agriculture in the future, without having on their shoulders a burden of debt which no one expected that they could possibly pay off.

As to the amount involved, the language of the vote indicates that there cannot be any certainty with regard to the final amount that will be involved as written off by all creditors. Various estimates have been made ranging from $50,000,000 to $75,000,000 as being the total amount involved as a write-off by all of the creditors.

As regards the progress of the adjustment I am advised that it is proceeding with certain difficulties, as must occur in such a large transaction covering a large number of individuals.

Mr. BENNETT: How many people are involved? How many farms are affected?

Mr. DUNNING: There are 156 municipalities.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely we can tell how many farms are affected?

Mr. DUNNING: We can get that information.

Mr. BENNETT: I would not trouble to get it, but one would think it would be a very elementary sort of thing to have. We are dealing with a problem in which we know the number of municipalities. Surely we didn't buy a pig in a poke; we knew what we were doing.

Mr. DUNNING: As my right hon. friend knows, the government of Canada during his regime advanced these moneys to the provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely.

Mr. DUNNING: The province in turn loaned it to the farmers and took security from the farmers by way of a note. The debt, as far as the dominion is concerned, is a debt due the dominion from the province. But it has a further aspect as a debt due by the farmer to the province.

Mr. PELLETIER: In what form?— A direct loan to a farmer?

Mr. DUNNING: The farmer gave his note; the province holds the note of the farmer.

Mr. PELLETIER: For cash advanced, or what?

Mr. DUNNING: For seed grain and all the various purposes during the years, differing in some as compared with others, for which advances were made.

Mr. BENNETT: Not for relief, I think.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: They cancelled the notes for relief.

Mr. DUNNING: Not all of them. The relief notes for the years for which my right hon. friend arranged cancellation are not concerned in this adjustment; they were taken care of otherwise. Also my right hon. friend will remember that there was one year, I think 1934-35, in which the dominion government of that day dealt with the matter not by way of loan to the province, but assumed the position which this government has assumed in relation to the problem of 1936, that it was a national problem; and in that year the national government bore the cost. So that year does not enter into the adjustment.

Mr. BENNETT: They ultimately bore the cost of relief for the first year it was adopted.

Mr. DUNNING: And 1934-35. The amounts outstanding relate then to the intervening years, with respect to which up to now no adjustment has been made. By virtue of this adjustment being made, other creditors, namely the province, the municipalities and the mortgagees, are making the kind of voluntary adjustment to which I have referred, which results in removing a very considerable burden from the shoulders of those in that locality, and will I hope and believe, enable them under providence, to get a fresh start, relieved of a burden which would be all but insupportable.

My right hon, friend asked a question regarding the province of Alberta. The method made available to the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba has been and is available to Alberta. Up to now the Alberta government have not chosen to avail themselves of this method; they have adopted other methods which do not involve dominion participation in such a cooperative scheme as I have just endeavoured to explain. I may say however that this government stands prepared to apply the same principles to Alberta at any time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What is that method? Does it involve a loan council? Has the minister any idea why Alberta has not accepted it?

Mr. DUNNING: As my hon, friend knows, Alberta adopted a method which involved arbitrary dealing with all mortgage contracts in the province. I cannot describe it in detail. This method involved a cooperative voluntary arrangement, relating to the drought area in Saskatchewan, with the government of Saskatchewan and the municipalities there participating, as well as the mortgagees. And the same applied in Manitoba. They said to the dominion government: If all the creditors of these farmers agree to do this, will the dominion agree to come in also and write off to the same date the indebtedness for money advanced by the dominion government in former years? Our answer was yes. And I say to my hon. friend that at any time Alberta comes along with a similar proposal we shall be very glad to give it favourable considerMr. BLACKMORE: I am very much interested in this thing and would like to get it cleared up. Who initiated the movement which resulted in this request to the dominion government? Did the Saskatchewan government, or the Saskatchewan municipalities, or the mortgage companies, initiate the movement?

Mr. DUNNING: I should not like to award the credit to any particular individual. Naturally the minds of many men were applied to the problem in Saskatchewan and in Manitoba, and conferences were held long before conclusions were reached, at which the dominion was represented by the Minister of Agriculture. The official statement in regard to the method was made by Premier Patterson in the case of Saskatchewan and Premier Bracken in the case of Manitoba. Perhaps I can clarify the matter to my hon. friend in regard to that phase by reading an official letter which I wrote to Premier Patterson with regard to it, under date of October 24, 1936:

I have given careful consideration to the various questions involved in the determination of the amount of Saskatchewan's indebtedness to the dominion arising out of loans for relief expenditures prior to January 1, 1935, which is to be written off as our contribution to the general debt reduction program which is under way in your province.

I might explain that this letter followed a report by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). The scheme was first announced by the Minister of Agriculture and then by Premier Patterson. This letter followed with respect to working it out:

There are apparently a number of matters which will require investigation, and perhaps adjustment. However I am convinced that for reasons which will be apparent to you any write-offs which are made must be confined to loans made for relief and seeding assistance in the drought area. For this purpose the term "drought area" should be defined as consisting of the 156 municipalities which I understand were regarded as constituting the drought area in the agreement which has been reached between your province and the mortgage and loan companies.

Furthermore, I believe that the general principle to be followed should be that the dominion should cancel your treasury bills to the extent that the funds received therefrom by the province were loaned to farmers in the drought area either directly or through the municipalities, and the resulting obligations taken by the province are now being cancelled by the province.

I think my right hon. friend had an almost similar problem with respect to the cancellation of the former notes.

Mr. BENNETT: No, the commission took those notes, not the provinces.

Mr. DUNNING: The letter continues:

I am prepared to recommend to my colleagues that action be taken by the dominion in the above sense when appropriate assurance has been given of the action taken by the provincial government and the mortgage and loan companies.

You understand, of course, that it will be necessary for the dominion government to introduce legislation at the forthcoming session of parliament to authorize action on the part of the dominion in this regard, and it is therefore of the utmost importance that the principles on which the legislation is to be based should be determined as soon as possible so that we may proceed with drafting.

I have referred to the details of the negotiations. The dominion minister who was responsible for negotiating from the dominion's point of view was the Minister of Agriculture. In respect to anything having to do with that phase of it the minister is now here and will I know be glad to give any information he can.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that the whole letter?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, the whole letter.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): That is dated prior to the announcement made by the Minister of Agriculture, of course.

Mr. DUNNING: No, it is after that. The announcement was made in September. This letter is dated October 24.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Was Premier Patterson aware of the announcement to be made by the Minister of Agriculture—at Calgary, I think, was it not?

Mr. GARDINER: No, the announcement was made in Regina, on the day the conference was held at the parliament buildings at Regina between representatives of the loan companies and representatives of the government of Saskatchewan. I spoke that day at the Canadian Club luncheon. We discussed the matter all forenoon and I made the announcement at the noon hour.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I was under the impression that the minister made the announcement in Calgary.

Mr. GARDINER: No, I made the first announcement in Regina. I also spoke of it in Lethbridge and Edmonton. I discussed it with the government of Alberta in Edmonton two or three days later.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Was the minister invited into Saskatchewan for that occasion?

Mr. GARDINER: As a matter of fact negotiations in connection with debt adjustment in the western provinces had been going on for about two years prior to the time final conclusions were reached. Discussions had also taken place at Ottawa. I do not know personally whether any discussions took place before the present government was formed, but since then from time to time, as provincial ministers were in Ottawa and as representatives of mortgage companies and banks and municipal organizations were meeting with us, the question was brought up and discussed. The final discussions here before I went west took place early in September, in the office of the Minister of Finance. By arrangement between the provincial government and the creditors concerned a conference was held in Regina, and I attended that conference representing the government of Canada. All the members of the Saskatchewan government were present, and representatives of the creditors.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Was any effort made on the part of the Alberta government to negotiate with the minister at the same time, or were they neglecting it and only Saskatchewan's representatives prosecuting it?

Mr. GARDINER: There never were any representations made by the Alberta government to the present dominion government with regard to any form of debt adjustment which involved cooperation from here. But after meeting the representatives of the mortgage companies and discussing the matter, even before I came down here, I discussed the matter with the municipalities, and discussed it shortly with them while I was in Regina on the occasion referred to. I was in Alberta also and I took occasion to meet the government in the council chamber of the parliament buildings at Edmonton, and indicated to them what was being done in Saskatchewan. I did not suggest to them that they should follow any line of policy in connection with their debt adjustment matters, but indicated what was being done in Saskatchewan, and I think they have been fully aware of it from that time to this.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I am under the impression that the scheme in detail as we have it laid out here was announced by the Minister of Agriculture in Edmonton after the Canadian Club meeting in Regina. I remember well the headlines in the western press. When he made this announcement a great many people in Saskatchewan were surprised that the premier of Saskatchewan had not made the announcement at the same time. The premier of Saskatchewan I think made his announcement the following day.

Mr. GARDINER: The details of the arrangement were announced by Premier Patterson I think the same day that I was in [Mr. Gardiner.]

Edmonton. But the general trend of the arrangement was announced previously. proposal of that kind was discussed for eighteen months in Saskatchewan before that announcement was made, and most of the people of Saskatchewan were fairly familiar with it. There was an arrangement working in Saskatchewan for at least twelve months prior to that, which takes in part of the present understanding that exists as between the two governments and the creditors. A proposal similar to this was made very early in 1935, I think about March or April, by the provincial government to the creditors. But at that time the creditors did not feel that they could go as far as the government was asking them to go, partly because they had to show on their books for their annual statement at least two years' back interest, in order to show a balance which did not endanger the position of some companies.

The proposals had then been considered fairly fully, and as a result of the discussions an arrangement was entered into whereby the mortgage companies agreed to go into three municipalities in Saskatchewan and indicate to the people of those districts the extent to which they were prepared to reduce the claims which those companies had against individuals in those municipalities. The municipal councils were called in and they agreed to forego taxes to a similar amount, and the provincial government came into the picture and agreed to relinquish any relief claims, and other amounts such as provincial revenue taxes that were due from the municipalities, or individuals in the municipalities to the provincial government. That had been working all the summer of 1935 and on into 1936. I think some twenty municipalities in the drought area had been dealt with in that way. So that the negotiations that started in September, 1936, were for a return to the original suggestion. Suggestions for the opening of those negotiations came from the province and the creditors to the federal government, asking the federal government to release debtors in the area from any amounts that might be owing to the federal government.

I have the map before me, but I do not think the figures are actually on it as to the number of municipalities. Speaking however from memory I think there were 158 that came under the scheme which has just been outlined by the Minister of Finance. In addition there are eighteen that are still being dealt with under the previous arrangement. That is, the creditors and the province go into those municipalities and arrange for debt adjustment more or less on a blanket scale within the municipality. Meetings are held between the local government board of Saskatchewan and the municipal councils and representatives of the creditors before those adjustments are made.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Would the eighteen municipalities include those which are considered as in the semi-drought area?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes they would. I can give the numbers if the hon. member desires.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): We would not be able to identify them by the numbers.

Mr. GARDINER: There are three south of Moosomin; one south of Grenfell; one directly south of Regina, that is No. 99 just on the border of the heavy lands; there are two just east of Saskatoon; one just south of Elrose, and ten south of Battleford, making up the eighteen.

Mr. PELLETIER: The Minister of Finance stated a moment ago that he considered that these debts were really not very good debtshe called them bad debts-and that he felt he could assist the province and the municipalities by cancelling the amounts which were owing to the dominion government either by the province or the municipalities, which must in turn come from the farmer. If I understand the position it is this. A farmer owning a quarter section would have certain indebtedness against it, such as taxes due the municipality, relief received from the provincial government and assistance given by the dominion government. On top of all this the farmer owed money to the mortgage companies. As the claims of the municipalities, the province and the federal government took priority to the claims of the loan companies, it seems to me that the only logical conclusion we can come to is that the government have bettered the position of the mortgage companies and at the same time have destroyed any possibility of return to the governments on account of these bad debts. Instead of improving the condition of the farmer in Saskatchewan, it seems to me, following the matter to its logical conclusion, that we have turned him over to the mercy of the private loan companies, and at the same time destroyed whatever opportunity there might have been for future cancellation of his debts. That is done simply because of the fact, which cannot be denied, that the claims of the municipality and of the provincial and federal governments were prior to all claims held by any bond company. The final result therefore has been that you have helped the scheme of the loan companies, and at the same time lost a great deal of revenue.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member is entitled to his opinion.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Would the minister give us the opinion of the association of rural municipalities? I believe they have made representations to the government along the lines expressed by the hon, member.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, I would not attempt to give the opinion of the council of the association of rural municipalities in this particular matter. The council of the association probably raised some objection as to the extent to which they had been consulted in the matter, and probably they had some grounds for their objection at the time the arrangements were entered into. But they had been consulted earlier, and I believe they are fairly well satisfied with the general working out of the scheme. They may have some objection with respect to details.

Answering what has been said with regard to the general position, I think it is well to have in mind, in so far as it is possible to do so, what actually does happen under the scheme. Mortgage companies write new agreements under which any arrears of interest down to January 1, 1935, are eliminated from the agreement previously held. In some cases additional adjustments are made with regard to principal.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no obligation.

Mr. GARDINER: They are not required to go further under the agreement; but there is nothing in the agreement to prevent loan companies or other creditors from going further than the agreement provides.

Mr. PELLETIER: Have they done so in many instances?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, in many instances they have done so.

Mr. BENNETT: They have done so under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, and under the debt adjustment legislation of the province. I think, too, it should in fairness be said, because it has actually happened, that in many cases without coming before any tribunal set up either by the province or the dominion creditors went out and made very important adjustments of debt all through the drought area of Saskatchewan.

The present arrangement makes necessary debt adjustments on the part of the municipality, the mortgage companies, the provinces and the federal government. The provinces have gone into the matter more carefully than we have been in a position to do, and in so far as provincial and municipal amounts are concerned they are in a better position to know the facts. They estimate the interest on first mortgages and agreements of sale at $21,500,000.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the amount that has been cut off?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, that has been cut off. Then, the municipal taxes are estimated to be reduced by $8,325,000; school taxes by $6,300,000; telephone taxes by $1,800,000; public revenue tax and wild land tax by $2,475,000; municipal hail by $1,800,000. That makes a total of taxes of one kind or another including municipal hail, school, provincial and telephone of $20,700,000. So far as relief is concerned, the provincial government has wiped off about $5,000,000, and the proposal here for the federal government is, in round figures, about $18,000,000. That makes a total of $65,200,000.

In addition to that, it is estimated that the lower rate of interest results in an annual cutoff of $4,000,000. Of course, over a period of ten years, multiplying the figure by ten you get $40,000,000; but just for the one year it is $4,000,000. I have seen estimates which ran as high as $100,000,000, but that includes the $4,000,000 per year for the ten years. If we take the actual amounts wiped off on the day this comes into effect we get the figure of about $65,200,000. Out of that the federal government is dealing with about $18,000,000.

I do not know that it is just fair to all parties concerned to leave the impression that all the amounts owing the governments stood in a position ahead of the first mortgage. Probably they did technically, but in actual practice they very seldom did. As a matter of fact, most of those who owed debts to the extent these people did expected the governments to step out of the way and allow them to make their payments to other creditors. Municipal governments, provincial governments, and perhaps to a lesser degree the federal government were in a position where they practically had to do that. So that it is hardly fair to say that these amounts were in a position of preference over the creditor who held the first mortgage. I think the better way to put it is that the creditor who held the first mortgage, the creditor to whom taxes were due, and the federal government cooperated for the purpose of reducing the indebtedness of persons, in so far as it was possible to do so, for amounts for which they were involved through no fault of their own. That was the principle underlying it.

In 1930 these people owed a certain amount of money, and from 1930 on they have had no crops. The governing bodies and the mortgage companies thought it was somewhat unjust to ask individuals in that position to pay the full amount of interest which had been piling up in those years in which they had no opportunity to pay and for which they received nothing. That was the main reason behind the wiping off of the interest. The municipalities were asked to take the same position with regard to taxes, and I believe I can say that the great majority of them were more than willing to do so. The provincial governments were asked to do the same thing in connection with relief amounts and public revenue taxes; and the federal government was asked to deal with the one thing in which they had had an interest, namely, the amount of relief which had been put on during those years, and the amount of seed grain which had been issued. But it does not deal at all with seed grain from January 1, 1935, to the present.

Mr. PELLETIER: I should not like to leave the impression that I do not approve of any procedure which would reduce the debt of the farmer in western Canada. My views in that connection are well known. I believe that anything we do to help them is simply helping ourselves in the long run. But the point that has not been made clear is this: I asked a definite question of the Minister of Finance and he replied simply that everybody is entitled to his own opinion.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not understand that the hon. member was asking me a question; I understood him to be stating his own views. If he will restate the question I shall try to answer it.

Mr. PELLETIER: Does or does not the minister agree with me that the taxes against these lands, as well as other evidences of debt held by the various governments, were prior to the claim of the mortgage companies?

Mr. DUNNING: The Minister of Agriculture has just answered that question.

Mr. CHURCH: Ever since the present Minister of Agriculture has been in the house he has been getting preferred and special treatment for his province. A royal commission has been appointed to investigate in all the provinces these very matters. If we do not look out we are going to have another problem like the railways; we will be paying forever like the railways; we will be paying forever like the railways the deficits of bankrupt provinces. Nearly $19,000,000 treasury notes of active assets are being transferred to non-active assets. It is upon such things as this that the credit of the country is based. The financial institutions base their credit advances to the government upon these things.

In one sweep about $19,000,000 of these treasury bills are being transferred into non-active assets.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was premier of Saskatchewan for many years. The other day he presented a bill providing for the payment of $10,000,000 for a drought relief program down to 1940. The people in Saskatchewan are not the only ones who are suffering. How is it that no provision is being made for the other provinces? How is it no mention is made of Alberta, British Columbia and the maritimes? I have been trying to find out what is to become of the two industrial provinces and what is their place in confederation. They are the principal taxpayers and there is no reason why these other provinces should receive preferred treatment in advance of the report of the royal commission. If we go on like this there will be little left for the royal commission to investigate. I am not objecting to reasonable treatment being given to Saskatchewan, but we are being asked to provide $18,000,000 as the dominion's contribution to a program of re-adjusting the indebtedness of farmers living in the drought area of that province. Have any banking experts, outside of those in the Bank of Canada, reported on this matter? The Bank of Canada made a report which was laid on the table the other day.

This is hitting at the very roots of confederation. The industrial provinces of Ontario and Quebec have been carrying the peak load of taxation to such an extent that unemployment has resulted. They can no longer carry the burden of debt. These active assets are being turned into non-active assets on the books of the treasury department. This program involves appropriate adjustments in debt or tax claims on the part of the provincial government, the municipalities, and certain mortgage lending institutions. It provides that these treasury bills are to be transferred in the books of the Department of Finance from "active assets" to "non-active assets" as of March 31, which is to-morrow. They are to be written off and cancelled.

Other municipalities in central Canada are carrying tremendous loads of taxation. Some of the people are starving and yet we cannot get one cent from this parliament. I suggest that we change our name and call ourselves the parliament of Saskatchewan. Saskatchewan appears to be the only province that can get any relief, due mainly to the fact that two or three ministers, including the Prime Minister, represent that province. We wrote off the debts of Saskatchewan in connection with our railroads, the stabilization fund, and the relief for drought areas. We are being asked to maintain protection for that province. The Minister of Agriculture has been a free trader first, last and always. The free traders have stated that the enemies of the prairie provinces were to be found east of the great lakes, not west of the great lakes. They were referring to the industrial provinces, from one of which you come, Mr. Chairman.

This is a peculiar way of financing. There has been some criticism in the old country as to our method of financing. I cannot see why Saskatchewan should receive this preferred treatment when similar treatment is not being given to Alberta, British Columbia, the maritimes and the central provinces. Why is this one province singled out for preferred treatment? This emergency has been taken care of by another statute. All I can say is that we are stirring up a lot of trouble for the future. We should wait until we have the report of the royal commission. The government is simply relying on the single report it has. I am surprised that this sort of thing is being done by the government of the day as a gesture toward one province.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt that if this adjustment had not been made, many farmers in this area would not have been able to carry on. When this adjustment is made the securities held by the loan companies will be worth something. Reference has been made to the writing off of the relief notes taken by the commission. No adjustment can be fair and equitable if consideration is not given to this phase of the matter. Many people who took relief have since paid it back. Many people in Saskatchewan were forced to go on relief against their will, but they have managed to pay back what they were advanced. I believe that some adjustment should be made in these cases. In other cases the advances are being written off, and those who made an honest effort to pay back what they were advanced now find themselves in a different position. Has the minister received any requests to have adjustments made along this line?

Mr. GARDINER: That is a provincial matter. So far as this government is concerned, they would not be a party to any adjustment made in that regard. Where the province collected cash, it has been returned. I would not say that that is so in every case, but that is what has happened where applications have been made. When I left the province these payments were being returned. Either the present leader of the opposition or the then minister of finance, speaking from this side of the chamber three years ago, stated that where cash had been collected—up to that time I think it was only $8,000—it would be returned. The provincial government has attempted to carry that out. Where cash had actually been collected, cash was in the process of being returned at the time I left the province.

Other cases which gave more difficulty were those where the municipalities had permitted persons to work out on the roads the amount of the grant. If I remember rightly, an objection was raised at that time by the Minister of Finance. He claimed that they were actually using moneys supplied by the federal government to pay taxes in the municipalities, which was really not a proper thing to do with funds provided for relief. This has been got around to some extent by the provincial government allowing substitutions to be made for road work done within the municipalities. As is well known, according to the system they make road grants to the municipalities. They are trying to make some adjustment by relating this matter to the grants that are paid. I am not familiar with all the details because this has been carried on since I left the province.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I know of several cases where the relief was worked out, and these particular parties are very annoyed about the matter; no adjustment has been made so far as they are concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a most extraordinary transaction. It does seem to me that to do this in the estimates, instead of by a bill, violates every rule of responsible government. I was amazed when I found by a study of the details just what is involved. I listened with care to the explanations that have been given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). What have In the ultimate analysis this is what happened. The dominion government advanced money to the province of Saskatchewan, for which it received the treasury notes of that province. Those loans carried interest at various rates. When the interest fell due, the province did not pay, but gave treasury notes for the interest thus due. Altogether the moneys amounted to a large sum, none of which was expended by the federal government, but was spent for various purposes by the provincial government. There were some checks with respect to the matter, and certain difficulties were experienced.

Let me point out that the notes to which reference has been made in connection with relief were notes about which the federal government did not, at the start of things, know anything at all. Although I am seldom surprised at anything that transpires in connection with relief matters, when I was told that some people who were receiving relief could not bring themselves to accept it unless they gave notes for the amounts advanced, I thought very highly of my fellow-citizens, and admired them for their high standard of obligation to the state. I supposed that the notes they had given were held by the commission. But we took the view, as we were advancing these moneys without getting notes from Saskatchewan-at the time we were not given anything by Saskatchewan -that this was a national obligation. On July 1, 1931, I made the statement, standing in my place on the other side of the house, that we would treat the situation in that province as a national disaster, and we at once proceeded to advance money from the dominion treasury for the purpose of taking care of that national emergency. We never expected to get notes back, nor did we anticipate that the people who received the money would give notes. But other transactions immediately arose, and among them, applications by the province of Saskatchewan for loans for many purposes. For example, they applied for money to lend to municipalities. Rightly or wrongly, we did make advances to the province, and the responsibility for having initiated that policy rests not with the present administration, but with the old one. The government advanced the money to the province, and the province lent funds to the municipalities and used the money in various other ways. But I repeat that so far as the relief which we extended in 1931 was concerned, it was provided in face of what we regarded as a national emergency. We never expected to get it back; it was a free gift of the Canadian people to the citizens of Saskatchewan, who had been without a crop for many years and found themselves in a position bordering upon absolute ruin. That part of it is simple. From that time on we advanced money and took treasury notes.

Mr. DUNNING: Until 1934-35.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. In 1934-35 the question came up in connection with seed grain, which is another matter altogether.

Mr. DUNNING: The whole thing, from 1934-35.

Mr. BENNETT: No, the federal government never made advances to the municipalities for relief.

Mr. DUNNING: No, but to the province.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly, to the province but not to the municipalities.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: As far as I know there never was a time when we undertook in any sense to advance money to the municipalities.

Mr. EULER: Was there not an advance to Winnipeg?

Mr. BENNETT: No, that was done through the province. In no case did we make an advance to a municipality. As regards Winnipeg, since the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) has mentioned it, an agreement was made whereby certain public works were to be constructed, including, latterly, a sewer, and the federal government made a grant for labour costs up to a certain sum of money—I think it was $80,000.

Mr. EULER: That would not go through the province, would it?

Mr. BENNETT: It went through the province, yes.

Mr. DUNNING: The whole Winnipeg transaction went through the province. In that case it was intended for a specific municipality.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, quite; as it was, in Alberta, for Calgary and Edmonton.

Mr. GARDINER: Regina and Saskatoon.

Mr. McCANN: And in Ontario, too.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and Nova Scotia. Rightly or wrongly, the position was this: The provinces made applications and said they were prepared to carry on during the year undertakings at a certain point, if the federal government would advance them certain sums of money to enable them to pay their share, and make a contribution as well. This we did. I am not going into the details. It suffices for my purpose to say that any moneys which went in Saskatchewan to farmers for any purpose did not go direct from the federal government, and there were no contractual relations between the government of Canada and individuals in that province.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the position. Nor were there relations with municipalities except in so far as it might be said that the agreements made with the provinces mentioned the names of municipalities which were beneficiaries; but that was not a matter direct between the municipality and the crown in right of the dominion. All that the dominion did with respect to Saskatchewan was, first of all, to discharge its contractual obligations to the province in connection with public undertakings such as road work and work done in urban municipalities; and secondly, to loan the province on its treasury bills sums of money to enable it to function as a government. Things got as bad as that, that the province did not have revenue enough to enable it to function as a government. I remember the criticism that was made at that time by some of my colleagues-unjustly, as it seemed to me. I realized that we had to advance money to Saskatchewan to enable it to carry on as a government because its revenues were so small that it could not even pay salaries. Agriculture was the basis of its ability to collect money, and where there was no agriculture there was no taxation whereby they could get revenue.

At any rate we continued to advance money for which we received treasury bills, and bills were also given for the interest, because the province was unable to pay the interest when it came due. It endeavoured to float securities, and did so by means of a bond house in the east. I objected to the terms of the prospectus under which the securities were sold, because, as I stated, and I still maintain the opinion, from looking at the prospectus it seemed that there had been no default, when as a matter of fact they had not paid the interest on the loans made by the dominion except by compounding the interest and giving new treasury bills.

Mr. DUNNING: In part.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it was in whole, at that time.

Mr. DUNNING: In part. They have paid some interest.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend's statement is, in general, true.

Mr. BENNETT: I am talking about the time I was in office.

Mr. DUNNING: The province right through paid some interest, although not much, in cash.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly nothing was paid with respect to many notes that came due.

Mr. DUNNING: Right.

Mr. BENNETT: And thus compound interest was set up.

Mr. DUNNING: And is going on still.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the position. It is not quite correct for the Minister of Finance to say that I looked on this as a doubtful asset. For one thing, we had the amount awarded to the province of Saskatchewan by the commission, which would go to extinguish the debt pro tanto. In addition, we believed that when better conditions returned Saskatchewan, with a population the third largest of the provinces in confederation, would be able to pay its obligations. Certainly I was still an optimist with respect to all of the western provinces.

Now we are confronted with a situation in which, with a multiplicity of detail, we are to cancel part of that debt in the case of Saskatchewan and of Manitoba.

I submit at the very start that this should have been done by a bill. To do it in this way, by means of an estimate, as a particular of an estimate, is wholly wrong and violates the essential rules which we laid down in connection with the Canadian National. Why is it that we discontinued certain practices in connection with the Canadian National and introduced bills? Because it was felt that the other course was wholly unsound and that there should be a bill setting out the conditions. Let us look at this and see what we have. We have in an estimate, in fine print, these words:

To authorize—as the dominion's contribution to a program of adjusting the indebtedness of farmers living in the drought area of the province of Saskatchewan which program has been sponsored by the government of that province and involves appropriate adjustments in debt or tax claims on the part of the provincial government, the municipalities and certain mortgage lending institutions—the writing off and cancellation of certain treasury bills of the province held by the dominion, provided (1) that said treasury bills be transferred in the books of the Department of Finance from "active assets" to "non-active assets" as at March 31, 1937.

That is to-morrow. If the minister will look up his precedents he will find that this is something that should never be done as part of an estimate; it should be done by direct and unequivocal legislation. What we have done is to take part of the debt of Canada and, describing it as an active asset yesterday, declare that the day after to-morrow it shall not be; and the Department of Finance, by something contained in an estimate, is instructed to change on its books the status of its securities. It goes on:

(2) that final writing off and cancellation of said treasury bills be subject to the approval of the governor in council—

Now listen to these words:

—and in accordance with such terms and conditions as he may approve, including the nature of the evidence to be submitted as to the adjustments made by the provincial government, the municipalities and the mortgage lending institutions aforesaid.

[Mr. Bennett.]

That, I submit, should be a matter of statute. It should not be left to the elastic attitude of mind of a purely political body; it is too serious a matter to be dealt with in that way. It demands in my judgment rigidity of treatment by statute, and the statute should be clear and unambiguous in the statement of the terms and conditions under which it should be done.

and (3) that the amount of treasury bills to be written off and cancelled shall not exceed the amount advanced by the dominion government to the provincial government by way of loan to assist in financing expenditures incurred for relief, seed grain, and seeding purposes in the said drought area during the period from May 1, 1931, to January 1, 1935, plus such accrued interest thereon as has been capitalized, and shall not in any case exceed in the aggregate the sum of $17,959,606.51.

Now all that, I repeat, should be the subject matter of a statute. It seems to me to be reasonably clear that that is so, for reasons that are public in their character. You are dealing with the country's assets and you should not leave it to a little note of appropriation in the supplementary estimates. There should be a statute embodying the conditions under which possibly $17,000,000-of promises to pay in the province of Saskatchewan become of no value at all and are written off. The right to do it is one of the functions which the government cannot exercise without legislation. This legislation is in the nature of a statute and has the effect of a statute, being embodied in the supply bill, and when it is assented to it is to all intents and purposes a statute of Canada known as the supply bill. That is all I haveto say in that respect. I am satisfied that it is a very dangerous precedent to establish, to deal as we are doing here with a matter of this character involving relations between a province and the dominion-not a corporation created and set up by the dominion, but one of the sovereign states of the country, a province. We are dealing with the matter in a way which is contrary to sound parliamentary practice in any event.

The second point is what the effect of this is. The effect is that the sum of money advanced by the Dominion of Canada is wiped out; it is no longer a debt; and in the process the municipalities abandon taxes; the province abandons its claim for taxes, and other rights it has against individual farmers' lands; and the mortgage companies abandon interest up to a certain point, while as a matter of law, as a matter of contractual obligation, they retain their right to their principal. And protanto their securities improve by reason of this transaction.

The answer suggested by the Minister of Agriculture is, however, a complete one. It is this, that if drought continues they have no value anyway. That is the obvious answer. Personally I should have preferred to see the action taken when it was demonstrated that the position had become such as to warrant some hope for the future. I cannot see that because we hope that a certain condition has ended, we are warranted in taking an extreme position which will at once create a new situation for the lenders of money, whereby their security will become enhanced in value to the extent to which the claim for taxes has been abandoned and the claim for relief and seed grain, if it stood in the name of the crown, has ceased to exist. That is the effect; there is no getting away from it.

It is certainly desirable that some action of this kind should be taken. When the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was passed the purpose was to keep the farmers on the land. It was passed to enable a body presided over by a judge to formulate proposals that did involve the cutting down of principal on the part of the lending institutions.

Mr. DUNNING: It involved the possibility.

Mr. BENNETT: It contemplated the possibility, and that statute was framed after a conference in the office of the Minister of Finance over which I presided. The lending companies of the country were present and we outlined the proposals to them, and when the bill was finally settled the section that has given so much trouble-I do not claim any credit for the authorship of it-was written into it by myself and sent to these people as it was introduced into parliament. That was done in order that they might see it as it was introduced into the house. Some of them complained that it conferred too large a power on the judge, and I am bound to say that some of the decisions of the judges defy description. I cannot use any word that explains my reaction to them, for some of them I cannot understand at all. They are at variance with the principle on which the whole act was framed, and reach a conclusion which certainly is not warranted. I propose to discuss the point further when the estimates are before us in that connection. Down in Prince Edward Island they have appointed a lot of inspectors who are paid fees and they are drumming up business.

Mr. DUNNING: Under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: No, there are no inspectors.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the title. There is an official receiver and he is drumming up business. I can give instances. Now obviously with such a thing going on in a province like Prince Edward Island, an extremely difficult situation is bound to develop.

Mr. DUNNING: That is one of the abuses that were complained of when I first took office, and I took the strongest action possible in all such cases. If my right hon, friend will give me the particulars, I can assure him that the administrator of the act comes down very hard on such abuses; in fact, men will be dismissed who do that sort of thing.

Mr. BENNETT: An appointment made in Prince Edward Island would not seem to indicate that appointments are based in any way upon merit. I shall speak to the minister about that matter personally; it involves the appointment of a man of whom one may read in the law reports, who at one time was a member of the legal profession. That is quite beside the question, however.

I only desire to point out that the effect of this is to accomplish a purpose to which this parliament gave its assent when it passed the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. This is an arbitrary accomplishment of that end. It involves possibilities that are very great, having regard to some recent history. That, I think, is one of the difficulties that any reasonable person would say should have been avoided by a statute, because this is a statute, but it is a statute in which the terms and conditions are not adequately or clearly stated. They are left to the governor in council.

If the government are interested in the matter, some time they might look up the statutes that have been passed since they came into office. Look at the powers that have been left to the governor in council; countthem, and I am sure they will come to the conclusion, which will delight them, that never has such power been left to the governor in council as since this government came into power, bearing in mind the number of occasions upon which the governor in council has been vested with discretion. In the end it is left to the governor in council to determine the terms and conditions, and also the nature of the evidence to be submitted in connection with the adjustments to be made. That is why I asked as to the number of cases. I thought probably in different municipalities the government would have ten, twenty, thirty, a hundred or two hundred, so they could say there were X cases involving the amount of money that has been mentioned by the Minister of Agriculture, for relief and various forms of taxation. It appears that the taxation which has been remitted on the one hand amounts to about $20,200,000, while the amount remitted by us is in the neighbourhood of $17,000,000. I am only too glad to see any arrangement that can be made that will encourage the people in that area once more to look to the future with hope. But they have no money with which to put in a crop, and somebody has to find the money to enable them to put in a crop this year.

Mr. DUNNING: The Prime Minister announced that legislation would be introduced.

Mr. BENNETT: But that means that once more the land will be charged with the payment of the money for the seed, for the sixth or seventh year. That in itself is a reason why we might hesitate to take this action at this moment. Now the provincial government is going to find the seed again, and the provincial government can only do that if we assist them by some means, direct or indirect. When that is done and the seed is sown, we are once more at the mercy of the elements, but in the meantime we have written off $17,000,000 of our assets.

In view of the fact that a commission is being appointed that we hope will deal with the whole problem of the relations between the dominion and the provinces, it seems to me that by agreeing to write off $17,000,000 in the case of Saskatchewan we have certainly invited the other provinces to make demands to the same end, and have given cause for the very sort of observation that was made by one of the members from Toronto this afternoon, namely that the burden is being borne by those in central Canada who very largely contribute the taxes of the country. That is a position which I think the government and everyone else having in mind the interests and welfare of the west are endeavouring to avoid; but those are the facts.

I can only add that I am wholly sympathetic to the idea that we must deal with this situation on a proper basis. The Farmers' Creditors Amangement Act was passed to enable that to be done, and it has been, and is being done in every province of Canada. In addition to that, by our arbitrary act as a mere item in the supplementary estimates, we have provided for the remission of part of our assets, consisting of debts owing by one of the provinces, on terms that involve the surrender by the province of taxes which cannot be collected unless there is a cessation of the drought. It is admitted on all sides, as I understand it, that neither schools nor municipalities can be maintained unless there is a crop within these areas.

Mr. DUNNING: I will go further than that and include provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: I follow the minister; I think perhaps he is putting it somewhat stronger than I had thought was warranted by the situation, but the minister has studied the matter more closely than I have.

Mr. DUNNING: In its recent manifestations, I mean.

Mr. BENNETT: In the minister's view it means the disintegration of the provinces.

Mr. DUNNING: I would not say that, but their self-maintenance in the ordinary sense.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that they cannot function as provinces. That is even stronger than I had put it. In these extraordinary circumstances, while extraordinary remedies must be resorted to, I think it should be done in such a way as at least to preclude the possibility of this step being regarded as a precedent that would be injurious to the general national well-being and leaving the impression that in time of stress moneys loaned to these two provinces by the dominion need never be expected to be repaid. The effect of this, of course, will be to make it much more difficult to realize on the remaining obligations of the provinces to the dominion. Certainly it places the province of Alberta in an invidious position. Because they saw fit by legislation to cut interest rates and deal with their problem in another way, that is now treated as a reason why they should not share in the surrender of a part of their debt.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, not at all.

Mr. BENNETT: The fact is that there is no legislation that warrants a portion of their debt being treated as a non-active asset.

Mr. DUNNING: Not at present.

Mr. BENNETT: That means there is no power; therefore they must pay if they are able, whereas the other provinces need not. The answer is that the province of Alberta dealt with its situation in another way. That method has been declared illegal by the courts, and an appeal has been taken. But that is no reason why the federal power should treat one of the three provinces in a different way and deprive it of the benefits which accrue from the surrender of a part of the debt which they created, in lesser amount per capita than one of the other provinces, and which was expended, as the records indicate, not for agricultural purposes wholly, because it is not so great an agricultural province as its neighbours, but in other ways as well. Alberta has within its borders two large municipalities and a third of rather commanding proportions. They had to meet this situation: It was a case of either hunger and worse or they had to borrow the money to enable them to assist in the relief of the people within their province.

Under those circumstances I think the legislation should have been general in its character and should have enabled the dominion, under fixed conditions, to deal with this situation, in which active assets of the country were cancelled. I find it a little difficult to understand why we should say that an active asset becomes non-active and then say we cancel it. There is no difference between cancelling a liability that is non-active and a liability that is active. Probably, I take it, that means that it pays interest no longer; is that the idea? Of course, making it a nonactive asset cannot destroy the contractual obligation of the province to pay interest. You must have either a surrender of the security or an abandonment of the interest, which this does not contemplate except with respect to the contingencies that are the basis of the operation.

I confess that I find it difficult to follow all the ramifications of the situation. I have had no difficulty, however, in following the explanation given as to what is to be done. I think it is somewhat more difficult to say that it is based upon a sound reason. I find it much more difficult to say that it is a proper method to follow to deal with the situation, merely to mention it as an item in the supplementary estimates rather than to embody it in a statute, in which the various contingencies that are contemplated might be dealt with properly.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question with reference to the voluntary debt adjustment. In entering into this agreement did the federal government make the cancellation of these obligations dependent upon any action by the mortgage and loan companies with reference to their obligations?

Mr. GARDINER: The whole arrangement was entered into at the gathering which I described a moment ago. The intent, of course, is that the carrying out of one party's obligation is conditional upon the other party's doing likewise, although there was no pressure required or anything like that. It was a cooperative arrangement, but it is conditional on all parties carrying it out.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Were the loan companies represented at the meeting to which the minister has referred?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS: And at that time was the standard renewal agreement introduced?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, that matter was discussed. The agreement was not there, but at that meeting it was agreed that there should be a standard agreement, which has been drafted since.

Mr. DUNNING: I should like to add just a word. I desire only to remark on one phase of what the right hon. leader of the opposition brought out, if he will be good enough to listen to me. This is a very complex and difficult problem, not merely because of its present position but because of the sequence of events created by succeeding years of difficulty, in connection with which the government headed by my right hon friend brought to bear its best judgment, I believe, in the circumstances prevailing at the time. But the various obligations created during those years differed in character because of the different policies adopted. My right hon. friend has mentioned that in 1931 the situation was dealt with through the medium of a commission.

Mr. BENNETT: A commission appointed by the province.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite so. As far as relief for that year is concerned, after a great deal of grief we can say that 1931 is practically out of the books of the finance department.

Mr. BENNETT: And there has been no repayment.

Mr. DUNNING: None from the province, and no security was ever taken from the province.

Mr. BENNETT: Nor asked.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite. Then we come to the following two years, during which sums were loaned to the province and treasury bills of the province taken as security. Then we come to 1934-35. In the circumstances prevailing in that year my right hon. friend decided upon another course. He decided to advance moneys to the provinces, which were to be accounted for; in the meantime taking their treasury bills, not in the same sense.

that they had been taken in previous years, but as security, I take it, for the due carrying out of certain methods that had been agreed upon between the two governments to meet the situation.

Mr. BENNETT: No, as promissory notes for loans made.

Mr. DUNNING: No, it is quite clear that it was the intention of the government to return the treasury bills with respect to 1934-35. I assure my right hon, friend that that is so.

Mr. BENNETT: They were to repay the money.

Mr. DUNNING: No, not with respect to 1934-35.

Mr. BENNETT: It divided itself into several branches, but loans that were made at the request of the province for definite purposes were to be repaid; that is, for the purposes of government, in various ways. Seed grain, for instance, to all intents and purposes was a gift.

Mr. DUNNING: But treasury bills were taken for it.

Mr. BENNETT: They were included in the treasury bills given for the whole amount.

Mr. DUNNING: And the great bulk of the treasury bills given that year were for advances which the government of the day did not contemplate ever would be repaid.

Mr. BENNETT: I would not go that far.

Mr. DUNNING: I think there is no question of that. In any case, what I want to point out is that the accounting and auditing with respect to 1934-35 has not as yet been completed to a point where we can carry out the arrangement made by my right hon. friend to give those treasury bills back to the province. So while with respect to that year there is on our books no loan charged against the province as such, but instead an accountable advance, yet in the debt of the province, when they have to account for their treasury bills in their public accounts, they have to show these treasury bills outstanding.

I indicate that in order to carry my right hon. friend's mind back to the time when he was wrestling with these difficulties himself, and to assure him that the drought of 1936 was more extended in area and affected more people than any previous drought. Coming on top of all that has gone before, it created a set of conditions which demanded strong action on the part of the government by bringing to bear all the force at its command to have an adjustment made of the indebtedness of individuals, which had grown entirely too large for the machinery of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act to cope with at sufficient speed.

Mr. BENNETT: We had 330,000 people on relief in the winter of 1931, the largest number we ever had in Saskatchewan.

Mr. DUNNING: The Minister of Agriculture assures me that now there is a larger number of municipalities in the west on one hundred per cent relief than ever before.

Mr. BENNETT: The commission had some 330,000 on relief, as a maximum.

Mr. DUNNING: In any case my right hon. friend can appreciate the situation when I tell him that 1936 came after five years of drought, and the situation developed to a point where it was felt that all the force the government could bring to bear, by way of cooperation with other creditors, should be exerted to reduce this burden to reasonably manageable proportions. I agree that it has not yet reached manageable proportions from the point of view of the individual, and will not do so unless there is rain in western Canada in June and July. After all, that is the real point.

Mr. BENNETT: And quite a lot of people had left between 1931 and 1936.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. DOUGLAS: It is six o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DUNNING: We are in committee; there are two minutes left, and if the hon. gentleman has a question he might ask it.

Mr. STEWART: In addition to what my leader has said with regard to the extraordinary character of this item in the estimates, I wish to point out that according to all our practice an estimate is an authorization for the expenditure of money for the specific purpose mentioned in the estimate. That, I think, takes this item altogether out of the category of an estimate, because this money has been spent. This is not a contemplated expenditure or the payment of money by this parliament. It is not an authorization of the payment of money for any specific purpose, as is the case with regard to the preceding items, which have to do with the construction of buildings and so on. An estimate contemplates and authorizes the future expenditure of money. This money was loaned long ago. This item does not contemplate the expenditure of any sum of money by parliament. It seems to me that the argument of my leader has remained unanswered; I do not think any person has given an effective reply.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

WELLINGTON FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 23, consideration in committee of Bill No. 50, to incorporate the Wellington Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City)—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 6—Classes of insurance authorized.

Mr. TOMLINSON: Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the sponsor (Mr. Macdonald), who is unavoidably detained and unable to be with us to-night, I shall present to the committee an answer to the criticisms made by the hon. members for Broadview (Mr. Church), Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps).

In the first place, each of the two companies has in the past been carrying on a distinct business and they intend to do so in the future. It is true that certain directors of one company are also directors of the other, but I must point out that there are differences in the two boards of directors. In a few moments I shall place on record lists of the directors in each company. While certain shareholders are shareholders in both companies, taken as a whole the shareholders are entirely different. In each case we have made the applicants the same purely as a matter of convenience, having picked out as applicants five men interested in both companies. There is no thought of amalgamation of the two companies. Each wants to continue its own business under federal authority.

Their fields of operation are different. Both are provincial organizations, having obtained incorporation from the province of Ontario. In Ontario at the present time the Federal Fire Insurance Company carries on the business of fire insurance, plate glass insurance, residence burglary insurance, and liability insurance. In Ontario the Wellington Fire Insurance Company carries on the business of fire and automobile insurance. The only business these two companies have in common in Ontario is that of fire insurance.

The agency organizations of the two are entirely distinct. Each company to some extent has extended its operations beyond the province of Ontario; but there again they are quite different. The Federal Fire Insurance Company has extended its operations into Quebec and British Columbia; but in British Columbia it does business in only fire insurance and plate glass insurance. As an Ontario company it has had to maintain desposits under three provincial jurisdictions, and desires in its future operations, after approval by the federal authority, to come under one central control, namely, that of the superintendent of insurance at Ottawa. This will simplify matters a great deal for the company in extending its operations into other provinces in which it does not now operate. It also greatly simpli-fies matters from the standpoint of reporting as well as supervision.

The Wellington Fire Insurance Company has extended its operations beyond Ontario to the provinces of Quebec, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. In Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia it writes only fire insurance. In Ontario and Quebec it writes both fire and automobile insurance. Under its present provincial organization it has to make provision for deposits in all of the provinces in which it operates and, like the Federal Fire Insurance Company, desires to organize under federal authority and to bring itself under the supervision of one central authority, namely, that of the superintendent of insurance at Ottawa.

The Wellington Fire Insurance Company is one of the oldest companies operating in the Dominion of Canada. Its shareholders have neither the desire nor the intention of permitting it to amalgamate with any other company, but seek to attain the position of a company operating under federal authority, under the jurisdiction of the superintendent of insurance at Ottawa.

I am sorry the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) is unable to be here, but I thought it well to place these facts before the committee, as requested by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) a few nights ago. I believe I should place on Hansard the names of the directors of both companies. The board of directors of the Wellington Fire Insurance Company is as follows:

W. R. Begg, Esquire; W. H. Buscombe, Esquire; H. C. Edgar, Esquire; E. J. Hayes, Esquire; Hon. Jacob Nicol, K.C., D.C.L.; Colonel S. C. Robinson and E. B. Stockdale, Esquire.

In order to differentiate between the boards of directors of the two companies, the board of the Federal Fire Insurance Company is composed of the following:

W. R. Begg, Esquire; Colonel the Hon. Herbert A. Bruce, M.D.; H. C. Edgar, Esquire; Colonel K. R. Marshall, C.M.G., D.S.O.; Leigh McCarthy, Esquire; F. K. Morrow, Esquire; Frank Shannon, Esquire; E. B. Stockdale, Esquire.

I just want to point out that the directors of the one company are in no way connected with the directors of the other. I think that answers the question.

The CHAIRMAN: I would remind the committee that sections 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 have been agreed to and that we are now on section 6.

Mr. HEAPS: As I understood it, Mr. Chairman, this bill was held over in order that the committee might be given some explanation why certain incorporators were seeking incorporation for two separate and distinct companies to do the same business across Canada. I do not think the hon member has given what I would call an altogether satisfactory explanation of the points raised last week.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but I repeat that sections 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 have been agreed to.

Mr. HEAPS: If the discussion is to be restricted at this time, it will take place later on. This bill was held over for a specific reason, which we are now discussing. If we cannot get the explanation now, there was no reason for holding it over.

The CHAIRMAN: I am in the judgment of the committee, but five sections of the bill were carried the last time it was before the committee.

Mr. HEAPS: I think we have a right to discuss the point I am raising.

[Mr. Tomlinson.]

The CHAIRMAN: I have no desire to restrict the discussion; I am simply pointing out that five sections have been carried.

Mr. HEAPS: Section 6 deals with the classes of insurance authorized. I am discussing that and pointing out that section 6 of this bill is exactly the same as section 6 of the bill we passed last week.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 6 has not been carried.

Mr. HEAPS: We are discussing it. As I say, section 6 of this bill is exactly the same as section 6 of the bill passed last week for the Federal Fire Insurance Company of Canada. The question was raised last week why there should be two measures exactly the same, asking for two separate and distinct charters from this federal parliament.

Mr. TOMLINSON: That is not correct; the directors are different.

Mr. HEAPS: I said the incorporators were identical in both companies. There may be different directors, but the objection raised last week was against two companies being incorporated by the same set of incorporators to do the same business under separate and distinct charters. In giving his explanation this evening the hon. member has stated that it is the desire of the people who are seeking this incorporation to centralize authority under federal control, instead of having it under provincial control. Why propose centralized control for two companies having the same set of incorporators?

Mr. TOMLINSON: The same people are not seeking incorporation.

Mr. HEAPS: The names appear to be the same.

Mr. TOMLINSON: Oh no.

Mr. HEAPS: I will read them. The names given in connection with the Federal Fire Insurance Company of Canada are Herbert Begg, William Robert Begg, William Henry Buscombe, John Gordon Hutchinson and George Alexander Gordon, all of the city of Toronto. Then for the Wellington Fire Insurance Company we have Herbert Begg, William Robert Begg, William Henry Buscombe, John Gordon Hutchinson and George Alexander Gordon. The names are identical.

Mr. TOMLINSON: I gave the board of directors for each of these companies and except for the odd one the names are different.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon, member is re-* ferring to the applicants.

Mr. STEVENS: Surely the hon. member does not ask the committee to accept the statement he has made. The names he has read belong to some of the most distinguished citizens in Canada, but they are not the directors of these companies as the companies are not yet in existence. If this bill passes. then the directors of these companies will be the directors mentioned in the bills, as far as parliament is concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are the provisional directors.

Mr. STEVENS: There is a provincial company, with which we have nothing to do. After this company is incorporated, it will take over the provincial company. As far as this parliament is concerned the directors are those referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps). I take no great objection to these bills as they are what are known as model bills, but the fact is they are identical. The explanation given to the committee for these identical bills asked for by the same group of incorporators is that they propose to carry on one type of insurance in British Columbia under one bill, and another type of insurance in Ontario under the other. The committee must take cognizance of the fact that under section 6 of both bills these companies have the right to carry on certain classes of insurance. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I will read the section. It is as follows:

The Company may undertake and transact and make contracts of insurance for all or any of the following classes of insurance:

(a) accident insurance;

(b) automobile insurance; (c) aviation insurance;

(d) bond insurance;

(e) burglary insurance; (f) civil commotion insurance; credit insurance;

(h) earthquake insurance; (i) explosion insurance,
(j) fire insurance;
(k) falling aircraft insurance;
(l) forgery insurance;

hail insurance;

(o) inland transportation insurance;

(p) machinery insurance;

personal property insurance; (q)

(r) plate glass insurance; (s) sickness insurance;(t) sprinkler leakage insurance;

(u) steam boiler insurance;

(v) tornado insurance.

The classes of insurance indicated are identical in both bills. Either company may, according to their desires, use one part of section 6 in one part of the country and another part of the section in another part of the country. So the explanation that has been offered that these companies are necessary in order that a certain group of individuals may carry on one class of insurance in one part of Canada and another class in some other part of the country has no weight or justification.

The hon, member (Mr. Tomlinson) offered a further explanation, that they desired to come under the supervision of the federal insurance department. That, I think, is desirable, because I have a very high regard for the insurance laws of the dominion as distinguished from those of various provinces, and it is my view that corporations doing insurance business should operate as far as possible uniformly throughout Canada. But parliament should subject to careful and close scrutiny the granting of charters incorporating groups of individuals and enabling them to carry on an insurance business wherever they choose, even though, as in the case of both of these bills, that business is restricted. After all, the insurance business is to-day a semi-public enterprise. That fact is recognized in the very great care that parliament has taken to establish statutory control over it. Not a bill can pass this house that is not in strict accord with the general act. I admit that the two measures now under consideration fulfil that condition, and I take no objection to them on that ground; my point is that we should be very careful not to incorporate insurance companies without due care, close study and full consideration.

I gather that the official incorporators, who will be the first boards of directors of these companies, are identical. It is for that reason that some of us have taken objection to the passing of these two bills. It may be and I gather it is argued, although the matter is not very clear, that these are two companies provincially organized and that they now wish to come under federal control; but it is rather strange that they should come before parliament through the agency or personality of identically the same incorporators and ask for two bills, when one bill providing these very wide powers would amply cover the requirements of both these provincial companies. My own view is that parliament should not multiply insurance companies in this way.

May I remind the committee of what occurred many years ago—a condition into which, under the present general insurance laws of this country, we are in danger of drifting again to-day? Prior to 1919 the accepted practice was, whenever a group of citizens came before parliament asking for the incorporation of a railway company, to grant the charter as a matter of form; to employ a term then used very widely, there was free trade in railway charters. The view held at that time was that it was desirable to have as much competition in railway construction as possible. Well, we certainly know now the mistake that parliament made in adopting that principle. We found out to our sorrow, and at a cost to the federal treasury of fifty or sixty million dollars a year for many years, that that policy was in part, perhaps in very large part, responsible for the railway mess into which this country has drifted. I submit that there is a danger, and I would add, knowing parliament as I do, a very real danger, that if we accept these bills with very little scrutiny upon the assumption that they comply with the general law, we shall have such a multiplicity of companies doing business in Canada that this great semi-public business will drift into a condition similar to what the railway situation has been in for the last fifteen or seventeen years.

For these reasons I am strongly opposed to the passing of the second of these bills. The first bill will give these companies all the powers they require to do business in any section of Canada. As a matter of fact there is no weight to the argument that one company will transact a certain kind of business in British Columbia and some other line in Ontario, because, as has been stated, clause 6 gives ample power with respect to any class of insurance, and they can use their powers as they wish; that is, the one company can do plate glass and automobile business in Ontario, and some other class of business on the prairies, and still another class elsewhere, if they so wish. We shall establish an unwise precedent if we pass rather carelessly these bills which have been more or less rushed through the house this session.

Mr. CHURCH: I would not have spoken in this debate had my name not been mentioned by the hon, member for Bruce (Mr. Tomlinson). He is not the sponsor of this bill; the sponsor is the hon, member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald). I do not object and have not objected to the principle of this bill. I used to go to school with the first two gentlemen mentioned; they were friends of mine; I have said that they were good people. But I object to the powers that parliament is conferring on this company, contrary to the British North America Act, which is the same company incorporated by another bill, with the same promoters, the same stockholders, and the same directors.

I wish to point out to the committee that the powers conferred on this company are very largely copied from England and from [Mr. Stevens.] the state of New York, where the insurance laws are altogether different from those we have in this country under the British North America Act.

I desire also to direct attention to certain clauses of the bill which in my humble opinion are ultra vires of this parliament. I think the Minister of Justice might very well give his opinion as to the constitutionality of paragraphs (c), aviation insurance; (g), credit insurance; (h), earthquake insurance; (i), explosion insurance (l), forgery insurance; (n), hail insurance; and (o), inland transportation insurance—which includes buses.

Among the classes of insurance authorized we find personal property insurance, which affects property and civil rights in the provinces. Legislation of this sort may be all right on the other side of the line; it may be all right in England; but I doubt very much whether under the British North America Act the great majority of the classes of business enumerated here are within the powers of this parliament. I do not think we have any jurisdiction to incorporate a company to deal in some of these classes of business.

I did not oppose the bill in committee, but merely asked for information. In any event, notwithstanding that certain people may be friends of mine, I have to do my duty as a member of parliament. There are other risks which are not mentioned in this bill; no mention is made of battle, murder, sudden death, famine and pestilence, or of losses sustained at poker; these might as well be given too. The Minister of Justice is not here to-night -he may have gone to the hockey matchbut if he were here I would suggest to him that we might as well include in the classes of insurance authorized, losses in gambling and on sporting events; we might as well insure against the weather and loss of gate receipts in sport and elsewhere when parliament is in session. I notice that they have also omitted insurance against defeat in elections. I do not know how they came to overlook that.

This bill has not been very carefully considered. The young gentleman who has spoken in favour of it to-night, the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Tomlinson), is an excellent young lawyer; but the hon. member for Brantford City is the sponsor of the bill, not the member for Bruce,

Some time ago there was a conference between the provinces and the dominion government with regard to the powers of parliament touching insurance.

As I say, I doubt whether the powers I have enumerated can be properly granted within the jurisdiction of this parliament.

There is no control over the rates of these companies, and they are going to solicit insurance among the industrial workers of Canada. What safeguards are we going to provide? Is this house going to become an insurance factory with all these new powers? It seems to me that is all it is. I object to this bill; I do not care whether those interested are friends of mine. The industrial worker may get the worst of it, and therefore I protest against any such legislation passing this committee without some satisfactory explanation from the Minister of Justice and an assurance that the bill is within the jurisdiction of parliament.

Mr. HEAPS: I have no objection in principle to a measure of this kind. As a rule I have never objected to the passing of insurance bills once they have been before the standing committee, but what I do object to here is that we are duplicating the powers we are conferring upon two separate companies, though they are identical in character. In the absence of any statement that will satisfy the committee, I do not think it is good policy for parliament to duplicate powers granted to two separate companies doing the very same work. Let me quote what the Minister of Finance said when these bills were last before the committee:

The sponsor of the bill evidently cannot give the definite reasons why the incorporators are the same in both these bills.

The hon, member for Bruce, speaking for the sponsor, has not been able to tell us tonight why the incorporators are the same in both bills.

Mr. TOMLINSON: Perhaps the hon, gentleman will allow me to answer. These companies, it is true, have the same incorporators, but that is only for convenience; and the bills are brought in at the same time for the same reason. The directors and the shareholders are different.

Mr. DUNNING: I understood the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) to say something about the Minister of Finance having asked for some explanation. The explanation I asked for has been given, and to me, at any rate, it is perfectly satisfactory. It was explained that the shareholders of the two companies do differ, and that the boards of directors are not identical. As a matter of fact, if these two companies had desired to secure for the bills an easy passage through this house, they could easily have named different incorporators. I have no doubt that does happen occasionally in connection with such bills. We find that one of these companies is one of the oldest in Canada—a hundred years old—and that it has been operating under provincial charter. That is the one we are now considering.

Mr. BENNETT: Pre-confederation.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. This one before us is a pre-confederation company. It may be that some of the shareholders of the two companies are identical, but that is the case with a great many companies throughout the dominion; and if we are to bar federal incorporation to a company because a number of its shareholders are also shareholders in other companies, we are establishing a new precedent for this parliament. In any event these are only provisional directors, and I cannot see where the public good is at all prejudiced by giving federal incorporation to this company. In any case the company will still carry on business. No public interest is being injured. In fact, there is improvement to this extent, that one more of our old companies in Canada has chosen to come under federal jurisdiction, and that is a distinct advantage from many points of view.

Mr. BENNETT: There is only one matter that has been overlooked. These are two companies now carrying on business, and when this legislation is passed they will still be two companies in business. The two companies have separate policy holders scattered all over the country, and they are merely seeking a local habitation and a name under a federal statute to take the place of the provincial and pre-provincial charters which they have and under which they are now issuing policies. I thought there was something in the point raised the other evening by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), but there is nothing in it. It will still be the same companies, doing business in the same way, only attorning to federal instead of provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. DUNNING: And we could not force them to amalgamate.

Mr. HEAPS: The explanation that has now been given removes the objection that was raised last week. That objection, however, was justified, because no reasons had been given for having the same incorporators in both cases. We must make sure that when people come to parliament for charters they will not be granted indiscriminately as in years gone by. Last Tuesday night when the bill was before the committee the sponsor was not in a position to give the information which we have had to-night, and we felt that at least there should be some explanation.

The explanation has been given that it is done as a matter of convenience, that the two companies are completely different although both carrying on the same business, and as far as the two charters being identical in character is concerned, it is just a coincidence. We have to accept the explanation, and as far as I am concerned I have no objection to allowing the bill to pass the house.

INDUSTRIAL LOAN AND FINANCE CORPORATION

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 23, consideration in committee of Bill No. 57, respecting Industrial Loan and Finance Corporation—Mr. Vien—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1-Loans of $500 or less.

Mr. POULIOT: I shall probably not scandalize you, Mr. Chairman, by telling you that in principle I am against all private legislation; for this simple reason, that the law is supposed to apply to all, and private legislation is an exception for the privileged few. In England it is entirely different, because there they have no provincial legislatures. In this country we have separate domains, and the federal power has exclusive jurisdiction on certain matters and the provinces are supposed to have exclusive jurisdiction in other fields. This cannot be denied although sometimes in a jocular vein men of experience express themselves otherwise.

Private legislation is always dangerous. It is dangerous, as one of our lady friends said the other day, on account of lobbying. I am surprised that the corridors of the House of Commons are still in good condition, in view of the amount of lobbying that is done here for private legislation. Someone may answer that the lobbyist pays so much for a licence or card which empowers him to go around to the rooms of hon. members and canvass them on any kind of private legislation. Unquestionably this is their right. But an argument advanced to me once by one of those gentlemen was, "Why don't you support the bill? You know it is my way of living." That was said to me by a barrister of the city of Ottawa years ago. He may earn his livelihood that way very properly, but have I to vote for or against any private bill because Mr. So and So who has a card as a lobbyist earns his fees in that way? I find it absurd. It does not make the bill good or bad. A bill is good or bad in itself, not because it serves the interest of a lawyer who is a lobbyist and goes around to the rooms of hon. members; that is not sufficient reason for me to vote as he wishes me to do. We must consider the bill in itself.

Is the present bill good or bad? I put aside all considerations of friendship. One of our colleagues who is the sponsor of this bill in the house is a very close friend of mine, the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Vien); but is that sufficient reason for me to disregard what the bill is in itself? My answer is no. I must act on my own judgment whether the bill is good or bad. Whether it suits my best friends or my worst enemies is no consideration. These preliminaries being settled, let us look at the bill.

This bill is relatively short. I started to read it the other day. But it is only one side of the picture, and not even that; it is only one angle of one side. The whole picture is found in chapter 68 of the statutes of 1930. This is the whole product, plus this appendix which is to be added by the bill now under discussion. There is one clause in the act of 1930 to which I strongly object. It is the one referred to by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) the other day:

. . . . notwithstanding anything contained in the Interest Act or in the Money Lenders Act or in paragraph (c) of section 63 of the Loan Companies Act—

Each one of those three enactments is a law of general application, supposed to apply not only to all companies but also to all When they lend money, money lenders. which is a commodity and has a certain value, and therefore brings a certain return in the form of interest, that return must not be exorbitant. It shall be fair to both parties, to the one who lends the money and to the one who borrows it. The spirit of the law in all these enactments is that the one who lends the money shall have a fair return in the form of interest, and that the borrower shall pay a fair amount for the use of the money he has received from the lender. Fairness on both sides. This is applicable to all, to moral persons, I mean companies in the legal sense, because very often companies are moral persons which are highly immoral. It applies to moral persons and it applies to private individuals. Everybody knows that, and if I repeat it, it is not to tell this committee something new; it is to prevent them from forgetting these simple fundamentals.

There is the law of the land. In 1930 the company which is now asking for a new charter came before this parliament and asked for an exception. An exception to what? An exception to the provisions of those three enactments of general application throughout the land—the Money Lenders Act, the Interest Act and the Loan Companies Act. Now they come like the burghers of Calais, with ropes around their necks and in sackcloth, telling us they are acting in the public interest by virtue of a federal charter. They forget to tell us that if these exceptions in their favour had not been made by this parliament the directors of these companies would be liable to fine and imprisonment, as others not so favoured have been treated. The directors of these companies escape imprisonment and fine, thanks to the legislation of exception that was passed by this parliament. No member of this chamber can be blamed for that legislation, because as was said not long ago very often legislation goes through this house with the speed of moving pictures, and it is pretty hard for members to scrutinize it. But, sir, I take this opportunity to scrutinize this bill because hon. members are interested in this legislation now, and I congratulate them upon that interest. They have not been impressed by those who earn their living by passing poems and silly jokes around the rooms of this building and make a perfect nuisance of themselves. These people have cards; they have a right to do what they do, but they are like phantoms of the opera, and members are tired of being bothered by these lobbyists for we can form our own opinions without their help. If it pays these lobbyists to do so let them argue cases in the police court or any other court, but I wish they would give hon. members a chance to think for themselves without the benefit of their ready-made views with regard to matters of this kind.

I hope the committee will not mind if I have expressed my humble views in the clearest possible way. My idea is that the law should be respected throughout the land, but in order that such an end may be attained the law must be the same for all, for the rich as well as for the poor, and there should be no exceptions for the privileged few. This is an exception, and a very bad one. This bill is supposed to reduce the interest chargeable, to a rate twice that allowed under the Usury Act. Let me repeat that. This bill seeks to establish a reduction of the abnormally high rate of interest which this company may charge so that the interest may be only more than twice the maximum allowed under the Usury Act. Any member who votes for this bill will be asked by those in his constituency who have been exploited by such companies "Why did you let that legislation pass when it came up in the House of Commons in March of 1937?"—and perhaps in April as well, if the bill is discussed another day.

Hon, members must remember one thing, and that is that this legislation will permit the company to charge nearly thirty per cent interest on a loan. What does that mean? If a civil servant here in Ottawa or anywhere else, receiving a salary of $1,000 a year. goes to one of these companies for an advance on his salary, from that time on he will not receive $1,000; he will receive only $700. If his salary is $2,000 he will receive only $1,400, and if his salary is $3,000 he will receive only $2,100. In other words the loan company will obtain nearly a third of his salary. Easy money! Why do not the members of parliament organize a company like that and become its directors? We would be millionaires in a short time. But we will never do that, because we are not Shylocks. We have read Shakespeare; we know the story of Shylock and his pound of flesh. This company does not ask for a pound of flesh; it exacts a hundredweight of flesh from each of its borrowers, and for that reason I am strongly opposed to this measure.

I am against privilege; I believe in the same rules for all. I will tell the sponsor of this bill that I am ready to support it if he will accept an amendment repealing paragraph (b) of section 5 of the original act, which appears at page 48 of the private legislation section of the statutes of 1930.

Mr. STEVENS: What statute?

Mr. POULIOT: Paragraph (b) of section 5 of chapter 68 of the statutes of 1930, the first lines of which read:

. . . notwithstanding anything contained in the Interest Act or in the Money Lenders Act, or in paragraph (c) of section sixty-three of the Loan Companies Act.

If that is done I am ready to withdraw my objection to this bill until next year, when the Minister of Finance will bring in new legislation. If that suggestion is not accepted, however, we will continue to fight this measure to the limit.

Mr. STEVENS: Nine o'clock.

Mr. VIEN: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The CHAIRMAN. Nine o'clock.

SUPPLY

FURTHER SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1936-37

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Write-down of assets-

To authorize—as the dominion's contribution to a program of adjusting the indebtedness of farmers living in the drought area of the province of Saskatchewan which program has been sponsored by the government of that province and involves appropriate adjustments in debt or tax claims on the part of the provincial government, the municipalities and certain mortgage lending institutions—the writing off and cancellation of certain treasury bills of the province held by the dominion, provided (1) that said treasury bills be transferred in the books of the Department of Finance from "active assets" to "non-active assets" as at March 31, 1937; (2) that final writing off and cancellation of said treasury bills be subject to the approval of the governor in council and in accordance with such terms and conditions as he may approve, including the nature of the evidence to be submitted as to the adjustments made by the provincial government, the municipalities and the mortgage lending institutions aforesaid; and (3) that the amount of treasury bills to be written off and cancelled shall not exceed the amount advanced by the dominion government to the provincial government by way of loan to assist in financing expenditures incurred for relief, seed grain and seeding purposes in the said drought area during the period from May 1, 1931 to January 1, 1935, plus such accrued interest thereon as has been capitalized, and shall not in any case exceed in the aggregate the sum of $17,959,606.51.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Would the Minister of Agriculture tell the committee on what basis the area was set to which this scheme will apply? I noticed that there was considerable confusion last summer when talking about provincial and federal drought areas, and those areas did not coincide. In fact, there were three maps circulating throughout the province, one from the federal department, which said that a certain area marked on the map was recognized by the federal government as the drought area in which relief would be given; then there was a provincial drought area; and there was this debt adjustment drought area, coming under the legislation with which we are now dealing. It was indicated that certain areas would have the benefit of the debt adjustment, and that other areas would not. I am wondering who drew up the arrangement, on what basis it was drawn up, and why the areas do not coincide.

Mr. GARDINER: The first two maps to which the hon. member referred had nothing to do with debt adjustment, but rather with the movement of live stock from one area to another. Of course, naturally that area was [The Chairman.]

larger than the one to which assistance was given by way of feeding. The object was to get the live stock out of the marginal areas into other parts, and thus avoid having to ship in feed. The principle followed in dealing with the matter was one of crop failures, and the amount of grain produced per acre in an area over a term of years.

The federal Department of Agriculture was asked to draft a map which would set out prevailing conditions. In the first instance, we took as the basis an area in which there had been a crop production of not more than six bushels to the acre over a term of three years. When that map was completed I found that it took in about 158 or 160 municipalities. Further information gathered with regard to the area, and we found that in the total area over a period of six years the average yield per acre had been only five and a fraction bushels. That area was accepted as the drought area in so far as this debt adjustment was concerned. It is composed of 158 municipalities-

Mr. BENNETT: I thought someone said there were 156.

Mr. GARDINER: That may be correct. It is composed of the 156 municipalities that come under the full debt adjustment, on the blanket basis. Eighteen of them were admitted under the other scheme.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Eighteen on the margin, in addition to that?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. Eighteen, in addition to the 156, were admitted into the scheme under which arrangements are made by municipalities, rather than blanketing all the municipalities under a similar arrangement. That is the basis on which the map was drafted. It was submitted to the creditors and accepted by them as an area which should be given this consideration, and was also accepted by the provincial government.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I am not prepared to say anything about the technical aspect of the question, whether this matter should have been dealt with by statute or by a supplementary estimate—I am not competent to say anything about that—but I should like to say something with reference to the whole question of voluntary adjustment of debt.

It appears to me that this condition arose out of the bankruptcy of agriculture. That is, in this affair no one actually gave anything, because there was nothing to give. It was a matter of trying to salvage what was left. The creditors could not get anything for the simple reason that agriculture had gone bankrupt and the people of that particular portion of southern Saskatchewan had found their whole means of subsistence taken away. I should like to draw the attention of the committee to the fact, however, that there were four creditors, namely the federal government, the provincial government, the municipal authorities, and the mortgage and loan companies.

So far as I can see, this is what happened: The federal, provincial and municipal governments in effect gave up their equity, recognized their loss and decided to call it a day. The mortgage and loan companies involved, which also had an equity, first of all agreed to cancel all interest prior to 1935 in certain select areas. They agreed to do that, in the main, in the area where they stood to lose the interest anyway, if not a great deal more than that. In other words, where there was nothing they agreed to take nothing. But where there was something it was a different story. I have in mind, for instance, Scott municipality, which will be familiar to the Minister of Agriculture. That municipality, with the exception of a very small crop last year, has had conditions just as severe as those in the territories on either side of it. Its debt condition, as worked out some years ago in the university of Saskatchewan, showed an average of $14,700 per farm. That municipality cuts like a great V into the area in question. It was not to be given special consideration because in it there was still the possibility of getting something. Where there was anything, there was no willingness indicated on the part of loan and mortgage companies to surrender whatever equity they thought they might obtain out of a bankruptcy.

It seems to me that those companies received two very definite benefits. In the first place they tightened their hold upon the farmers who were indebted to them, because as a result of making the debt adjustment and cancelling the interest prior to 1935, the farmers were now asked to enter into a new agreement in which the principal of the mortgage was taken and the interest for 1935 and 1936 was added, so that the new agreement was for a larger amount, and arrangement was made for payment over a period of ten years.

Mr. BENNETT: At a reduced rate of interest.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Yes, at a lower rate of interest. There is no need to read all the agreement. It was reduced to six per cent. But I draw attention first to two clauses that tightened the grip of the mortgage and loan companies in the province on this particular area in a way which could never have been done under any other circumstances. The first clause is this:

For better securing the punctual payment of the moneys payable under these presents and said mortgage, and pursuant to the Land Titles Act, the farmer does hereby agree to become and does become tenant to the mortgagee of the said land, and the mortgagee does hereby lease the said land to the farmer for a term of three years from the 1st day of January, 1937, at a yearly rental of one-third of the whole crop of grain of the different kinds and qualities grown on the said land in each year, to become due and payable at the time of cutting of any of the said crop. The mortgagee may at any time after default under these presents determine the said tenancy without any notice to quit.

I refer to another paragraph:

From and after the expiration of the tenancy herein provided the mortgagee leases to the farmer and the farmer becomes tenant to the mortgagee at a yearly rental equivalent to the annual interest secured by these presents, the same to be paid on each day appointed by these presents for the payment of interest, and if any attachment, execution or judgment shall be issued against any of the goods or lands of the farmer, then such rentals shall if not already paid be payable immediately thereafter. The mortgagee may at any time hereafter upon default under these presents determine the tenancy in this paragraph provided without any notice to quit.

Those are paragraphs contained in the standard renewal agreement which the farmers in the area mentioned by the minister must sign in order to get the benefit of this debt cancellation. In order to get rid of debts owing to the provincial, municipal and federal authorities, the farmer in many cases has become a serf to the mortgagee. By the passing of this legislation and the signing of these standard renewal agreements agriculture has disappeared, and peasantry has taken its place in the province of Saskatchewan. The minister states that the reason Alberta was not included in this scheme was because that province had put some other system of adjustment into effect. If agreements like this are the price that the farmers are called upon to pay in order to get rid of relief debts, then I think the province of Alberta is to be commended for resisting such pressure.

Mr. LANDERYOU: By how much was the capital of these debts reduced?

Mr. DOUGLAS: There was no reduction of the capital by legislation. In some cases the farmers obtained a reduction under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and under the provincial debt adjustment legislation. Mr. GARDINER: There has been no reduction by legislation.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I mean that the agreement did not call for any reduction of principal; it only called for the cancellation of the creditor interest prior to 1935, and the reduction of interest in the new agreement. The minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I have been told that the signing of these standard renewal agreements prevents the farmers from taking advantage of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Mr. GARDINER: Not necessarily.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I am very glad to hear that. These mortgage and loan companies came out of this deal, not only with a tighter grip upon the farm debtor, but with an enhanced security in that the land which was held as security has had removed from it a burden of debt in the form of relief notes, et cetera, which had been signed during the past five or six years. I direct the attention of the committee to the fact that of the four creditors who went into this meeting to which the minister referred, the only one who came out with more than what he had when he went in was the mortgage and loan company. The other three creditors stand to lose. The mortgage and loan company came out of the whole affair with a much better bargain, while the government bodies and the farmer debtor came out with a much worse bargain.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, there are one or two points raised by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) with which I cannot exactly agree. His first statement was that these farmers were bankrupt and had nothing to lose or gain by any agreement that might be made. I would rather put it in this way: These farmers went into this area in comparatively recent years, that is, since 1908, which is not a very long period in the lifetime of a district. Ninety per cent of them, or perhaps a larger percentage, went into the area without having anything at all. They paid a $10 fee to file on their homesteads and began developing the district. The present drought period, which began in 1931, struck this district a comparatively few years after these people had started to build their schools and their roads and to put in the telephone and other conveniences. While it is true that during part of this period they had fairly good crops at fairly good prices, it stands to reason that no matter how good the crops were or what prices may have been received, it was absolutely impossible for these people to convert the indebtedness which was ahead of them when they entered the district into an asset against which there was no debt.

In my opinion it is wrong to say that there is more debt on this district to-day than there was in 1908. When those people went in there in 1908, they had nothing at all. There had been no development of the land, the plough had never been put into it. These people have developed the district largely on borrowed money, in the hope that it would be able to pay its way. Right in the middle of their activities they were struck by this drought. Not being able to get crops, and still being faced with a considerable part of the obligations they had undertaken to pay -they were in no position to pay cash for anything-they found that year by year the interest piled up. After six years the result has been that on a mortgage of $1,000 placed previous to 1930, and still in effect when this arrangement was entered into, there has been an increase to $1,700 odd at eight per cent. In other words, when a man assumed a debt of $1,000 which he expected to pay, he found himself at the end of six years, and in some cases seven years, faced with an indebtedness of $1,700 odd. For the last $700 odd he received nothing. He did not buy anything with it; all he got for it was the accommodation. In spite of everything which that man could do there has been an increase of $700 in his debt. The creditors and the government decided that it was not fair to put that man in the position of having to meet the whole obligation when he came into a period of good crops. The loan companies agreed to wipe out everything down to January 1, 1935, and from that date on the interest was reduced to six per cent and is consolidated in the original debt and spread over ten years.

Mr. BENNETT: What would that leave the liability on that thousand dollar loan that he would then pay?

Mr. GARDINER: I have forgotten the exact amount. It reduces it very considerably. Of course, the last two years you naturally pay the higher amount.

Mr. BENNETT: Eight per cent computed on the $1,700 would, of course, increase it to a large sum of money as it was compounded, but I gathered from what the minister said that it was six per cent commencing January 1, 1935.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And that the $700 that was mentioned disappears?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Leaving only the principal $1,000?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought that ought to be made clear.

Mr. GARDINER: The last two years interest is left, and the six per cent is consolidated with the original debt.

Then in connection with the municipalities, there are arrears of taxes on practically all of this land. Anyone who has lived in the west knows that municipal taxes are raised almost wholly for the purpose of building roads; there is very little service outside of that. The telephone and school taxes are separate from the municipal tax. If the money was not collected it was not spent. Down in that country the municipalities have not been able to borrow money during the last five or six years, with the result that no road work has been done, so no injury is inflicted upon the municipality as such by a cancellation of arrears of taxes that were never spent.

It is assumed that to leave the last two years' taxes in effect will pretty well take care of requirements. It is proper that in so far as there are debenture issues to be met, arrears of taxes should be collected in order to cover the amount necessary to pay the carrying charges on those debentures. But as regards making provision in connection with road building which has never been done, there is no hardship upon the municipality in cancelling those arrears of taxes. It will place the individual farmer in a very different position after being confronted one day with four or five years' arrears, in addition to the two years' taxes that will remain, to find next day that the four or five years' arrears of taxes have been wiped off. He at least feels better when he looks at his next tax account; at the same time the municipality is not losing very much by this concession.

In connection with the school taxes, reductions have also been made. These have been reviewed very carefully by the local government board of the province, and care has been taken that no injury shall be done in so far as the handling of the schools is concerned. In addition to that, the provincial government have made some appropriations this session for additional assistance to school districts in that particular locality.

So far as the provincial government is concerned, they of course had given guarantees in connection with certain amounts of relief and certain amounts for seed in the earlier years of the depression, to a total of about five million dollars. The provincial government is assuming that obligation.

So far as this agreement is concerned and the clauses that have to do with the lease, the lease clause, as it is called, is a very common thing all through western Canada and, I think, in other parts of the country as well. A person who has not made his payments in connection with the purchase price of a piece of land is assumed immediately upon his default to be a renter rather than to be in his former position of owner, and he is more or less under the direction of the individual who sold him the land. That same thing is more or less true in connection with certain clauses in land mortgages in western Canada. In regard to this new agreement, it was explained to the house this afternoon that provision is made whereby a man does not become in default if he delivers to the creditor one-third of his crop during the first three years of this agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: If he has no crop there is no—

Mr. GARDINER: If he has no crop he does not pay anything.

Mr. DUNNING: And is not in default.

Mr. GARDINER: And is not in default. By a special clause in this agreement it is provided that during this first three years all he needs to pay is one-third of the crop, and no matter how light the crop is, he cannot be compelled to pay anything more. In other words, he does not become in default unless he refuses to turn over one-third of his crop to the creditor. At the end of that three years, provided he does not meet the terms of the agreement, the position that he occupied as a renter can be declared to be at an end. That does not mean that possession is thereby taken of the land. It simply means that under common law the individual is put back in the position of owner of the land against whom action can be taken in court. In other words, all the action that would have been necessary had this agreement never been entered into at all in order to dispossess the individual, has to be taken even after that declaration is made. Many people in Saskatchewan seem to have been convinced that the common law did not apply. and in order to make it absolutely certain in the minds of everyone-although from the legal point of view it was not necessary to do it-that that was the condition, legislation was put through the Saskatchewan legislature this session that made it part of the statute law that that was the condition that existed. So that it is hardly correct to say that if at the end of the three-year period a man has failed to make the payments that are required under the agreement he is immediately dispossessed of his land and becomes a serf, and is in the position of the peasantry of some European countries in relation to mortgage companies; he is simply back in the position where he would have been had this kind of thing never been done.

Mr. DOUGLAS: He can be dispossessed, though, at the end of that time.

Mr. GARDINER: He cannot be dispossessed in the manner indicated by some of the opponents of this measure, namely, by being given notice without any time expiring at all. He simply reverts to the position of an owner of land against whom there is a mortgage registered. The mortgage can proceed in the courts to foreclose the mortgage, but he must go through all the process of foreclosure before he can obtain possession of the land. I do not know how anything could be very much fairer than that. I do not think there is very much reason for criticism.

Just to indicate the manner in which this kind of thing spreads, I might say that while I was home to dinner I happened to pick up the last issue of the Regina Leader which has come to my house, and I found on the third page a reference to an enlargement of this plan, in the following terms.

Banks have agreed to a blanket form of adjustment of municipal debts in 131 rural municipalities of the 156 municipalities in the "red" area, Hon. J. W. Estey, K.C., minister in charge of the drouth area debt adjustment bill, said Thursday.

In 25 municipalities in the drouth area, classified as being in worse financial condition than the other 131, the banks have agreed to adjustment on an individual basis.

It is presumed that the adjustments offered to these municipalities will be on a broader scale than the adjustment offered the 131 municipalities.

Basis of the blanket adjustment provides for spreading the amount owing by the municipalities to the banks over 10 years, with interest for the first year at one per cent, for the next two years at two per cent, the next two years at three per cent and for the remaining five years at four per cent.

That is, the banks themselves, through negotiations with the provincial government and the municipalities, have followed up what has been done by other creditors. They have gone to the municipalities direct and made arrangements whereby the indebtedness of a municipality to a bank is spread over ten years, at these much lower rates of interest that I have indicated. All we claim for this kind of thing is that it is very much better for a group of creditors to sit down and arrive, by some voluntary method of cooperation, at conclusions which are going to be of assistance to everyone.

It has never been claimed that the individual farmer got all the benefits, but I do venture to say that while the security of the creditor has been improved, the credit of the farmer when he gets a crop—if he gets one this year or next year—has been very much improved by the action that was taken by the municipality, the province, the dominion government and the creditors. His equity, too, has been enlarged by very considerable amounts.

I read this evening a special dispatch to the press from the municipality of Weyburn indicating that ninety per cent of the farmers of that area affected by this arrangement have signed the agreement in spite of the discussion that has taken place in the province in regard to the sections that have been read in the house to-night. I am sorry that I did not bring the article along because it shows that very considerable amounts have been cut off the indebtedness of individuals in that municipality, and I am sure that is true of many other municipalities in the province. We do not claim anything extraordinary for this, but the dominion government has been trying to cooperate with others in that area in removing a sufficient amount of their obligation to give them at least some hope of being able to meet the situation in the future.

The federal government—not merely the present government but the government back over the years—and the provincial governments have been doing a great deal for that group of persons who are in such great difficulty that they are constantly faced with the threat of foreclosure and all that kind of thing, and it is perhaps proper that we should. But we have not previously found a way of dealing with the man who never appears before a tribunal but goes on shouldering his obligations, carrying on to the best of his ability, trying to meet all his obligations even if it takes him a lifetime to do so. Under this arrangement we say to him: We are not going to ask you to go before any tribunal, we are not going to ask you to go into court and plead your case; we will not even suggest that you ask for something. But the loan companies and all governing bodies will come and offer you the privilege of a new agreement whereby much of your indebtedness will be wiped off. A group of individuals are being served by this action who would not be served under any of the pieces of legislation that have been placed on the statute books either by the federal parliament or by the provinces.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. DOUGLAS: The minister's statement that ninety per cent of the people in Weyburn municipality are signing the agreement, I presume, is correct; indeed, I fancy the percentage will be higher. People have written to me and I have given them the same advice that other members have given, namely, that under the circumstances the farmer has no choice but to sign. In order to have his accrued interest wiped out he must sign the agreement or avail himself of one of the other debt adjustment facilities. Under the circumstances I am not surprised that ninety per cent of the people have signed the agreement. But what I do point out is that when they have signed it, when the period of three years or six years has passed, the chances are that they will be in exactly the same plight they are in to-day, or worse, simply because this whole scheme has played, I believe, very nicely into the hands of those who have ridden on the backs of the farmers of Saskatchewan for a good many years.

Mr. PELLETIER: I believe that, as the leader of the opposition said this afternoon, we are establishing a very dangerous precedent, and I would ask the Minister of Finance whether this can be regarded as a precedent. The government will be called upon to supply money again this year to enable the farmers to put in a crop, and right away there will be new indebtedness. These debts having been cancelled in the past, is it not logical to conclude that the same thing will happen in the future? If the Minister of Finance would make a statement, it might clear the situation. If it is the intention of the federal government to cancel all these debts in western Canada whenever the occasion arises, it will be entirely in line with the easy credit policy which the Minister of Finance is always advocating, and if he will make a statement to that effect it will clear the situation.

Mr. DUNNING: I have been asked to do a great many things but never before has it been suggested that I should enter the realm of prophecy, particularly with respect to a problem like this. I can assure my hon. friend, however, that it is the intention of the federal government and of the three provincial governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, to see to it that the people in that area have an opportunity to sow another crop in 1937. That is the intention. These negotiations are under way, and the Prime Minister intimated a few days ago that among the pieces of legislation which had yet to be brought down was legislation covering that provision. I think there will be general agreement that having regard to the present situation we should again give that opportunity.

My hon, friend asks me to say what will happen if drought again strikes that area. I cannot say. I can only say to the people in that area that the people of Canada have stood by them up to now, and I have reason to believe that the people of Canada will be willing to stand by the people of any part of the country who are affected by a disaster of national proportions. I do not think I can make a plainer statement. I do not think there has been a more difficult problem to wrestle with than this, and it has been faced both by the previous government and by this. Our best thought is being given, and will continue to be given to the problem so long as it exists. In the meantime I am sure it is the earnest prayer of every good Canadian who has t'e interests of his country at heart that this awful scourge of drought may cease in the year 1937.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I am pleased to hear the minister's statement that a bill will be introduced providing for seed for the seeding of the 1937 crop, and I think I can assure him that he will not meet with the opposition from this side of the house which the former government had to face on one occasion when it had to resort to closure in order to provide seed before the first of April.

Item agreed to.

Expenses of the royal commission on the textile industry (governor general's warrant of November 26, 1936), $45,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This item is a wholly improper use of the power under the statute for a governor general's warrant, because the commission was actually appointed last year. This gives an opportunity to ask some questions, as to what sum has been expended on this commission; whether or not the $45,000 completes the expenditures; what was the estimate of what was required at the time this money was advanced in November 1936, and as to why the commission should have lasted over 100 days and no report be made after two sessions of parliament have been held.

Mr. DUNNING: The particulars of the expenditure with respect to the textile commission are as follows: There was a governor general's warrant on February 1, 1936, of $20,000—

Mr. BENNETT: That is before the house met last session?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. Then in the supplementary estimates for 1936-37, vote 510, there was $100,000, and then the warrant now submitted of $45,000, making a total of $165,-000. The expenses up to March 23, 1937, total $143,618, plus $16,300 expended in the previous fiscal year.

Mr. HEAPS: Has there been any money collected from anyone as a result of the investigations made by this commission?

Mr. DUNNING: In the absence of the Minister of National Revenue I cannot give any statement as to the amounts collected. I know that pursuant to certain matters which developed during the inquiry the Department of National Revenue is expecting to make, and is in the process of making, considerable further collections.

Mr. BENNETT: I heard the contrary the other day. A gentleman told me that on readjustment of accounts they found they were entitled to a refund.

Mr. DUNNING: I think that gentleman will be disappointed.

Mr. BENNETT: He was not connected with the industry.

Mr. DUNNING: I believe this will be one of the few royal commissions which will pay dividends to the government.

Mr. BENNETT: The difficulty is in finding justification for the governor general's warrant. There is the statute. There was the provision in the supplementary estimates, and the duty, of course, was to wait until the house met and vote the money. The use of the power under the statute for this purpose cannot be justified. This item of $45,000 was in November last, making a total of $165,000, and the total expenditure up to March 23 is only $159,918, including $16,000 from last year. I should like to know how the estimate of $45,000 was arrived at when the governor general's warrant was passed, because the law requires that to be done with great particularity.

Mr. DUNNING: I am advised that the amount provided at the last session of parliament was exhausted and the inquiry was still proceeding. The chairman was asked to indicate as closely as he could what would be required to continue the work, and the governor general's warrant for $45,000 was passed upon that basis. The overlapping of time comes about in this way; I have no doubt the $45,000 warrant would have been largely expended before parliament met but for the fact that the commissioner, as I think is well known, was engaged on other work, and pending the preparation of argument of counsel on both sides there was a considerable intermission while other inquiries were being prosecuted by the commissioner.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. BENNETT: Are further expenditures contemplated?

Mr. DUNNING: The hearings are completed; all that remains is the preparation of the report by the commissioner. Further expenditures are not contemplated.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the evidence be printed?

Mr. DUNNING: It is very, very voluminous. I cannot answer my hon. friend's question with certainty.

Mr. CAHAN: Does this estimate cover the prospective printing and publication of the evidence?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. HEAPS: When does the minister expect the report to be submitted to the government?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not accurate information in respect to that.

Item agreed to.

To provide an additional amount for the administration of the Annuities Act (governor general's warrant of January 6, 1937), $82,800.

Mr. WARD: Could the minister give the committee the purpose for which this amount was required?

Mr. ROGERS: This amount obtained by governor general's warrant was required to meet expenditures entailed by commissions on the sale of annuities. As hon. members are no doubt aware, the sale of annuities increased during the past year to a degree that was not anticipated. This was due in part, I believe, to the inquiry into annuities which took place in the other house, and to the belief which appeared to be quite common that there would be an increase in the rates. At any rate, we found that if the agents were to receive their commissions it would be necessary to obtain this governor general's warrant. The actual expenditures under the warrant to date are $45.508.88, and the estimated requirement to March 31, 1937, is $15,500, making a total of $61,008.88. The warrant was for $82,800.

Mr. WARD: Do I understand that the annuities business is not on an actuarial basis, that it does not carry itself?

Mr. ROGERS: I do not think that point arises in this connection. For the sales they make the agents receive remuneration by commissions. They give their full time to this work. In other words the only remuneration they receive is from commissions on the sale of annuities. Due to the increase in the sales we found that the appropriation of $150,-000 was inadequate to pay the commissions upon annuities actually sold. Therefore if the money was not obtained in this way the agents would have had to go without their remuneration for a period of two or three months.

Mr. WARD: Are we to understand that the premiums paid for annuities just go into the consolidated revenue fund?

Mr. ROGERS: That is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: I point out that the warrant was dated January 6, and the house met on January 14.

Item agreed to.

Expenses of the royal grain inquiry commission (governor general's warrant of November 18, 1936), $103,000.

Mr. BENNETT: There are a few questions that have to be asked about this. The first is, why was it necessary to have a governor general's warrant in November when we had in fact already provided for this commission last year? That certainly would bring it within the prohibition. Second, how is the $103,000 made up? Third, how many days has the commission met? Fourth, what are the particulars of the daily expenditures?

Mr. EULER: I am not sure that I can give a definite reply to the statement regarding provision having already been made prior to the obtaining of the governor general's warrant.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, we made a recommendation last year.

Mr. EULER: But provision had not been made. I know that the committee which had been appointed, of which the right hongentleman was a member, and of which I had the honour of being chairman, had made a recommendation, but there had been no provision made. The governor general's warrant was issued June 27 of last year, for the sum of $103,000.

Mr. BENNETT: The date given here is November 18.

Mr. EULER: It was the order in council that was passed on June 27.

Mr. BENNETT: That was just about the time the house rose, which makes it that much worse.

Mr. EULER: As a matter of fact, the matter was delayed for the reason that I think was given by the Minister of Finance; the same gentleman, Mr. Justice Turgeon, was chairman of both commissions. His work was very heavy, and he was not able to begin his duties until quite late in the year. For that reason also, of the $103,000 only $41,445.07 was expended up to March 15 of this year, leaving an unexpended balance of $61,554.93, which of course will be transferred to the receiver general. Then a new note will appear in the estimates this year for $111,000.

Mr. BENNETT: The statute makes special provision in that connection. It says that a special account must be maintained and that the estimate shall be based on some appreciation of the facts. If in June last an order in council was passed and the warrant was not issued until November, and of that amount only $41,000 was spent, it is pretty difficult for this to come within the provisions of the law respecting governor general's warrants. In addition, and what is even worse still, why should we have an important commission such as this, and an important commission such as the one dealing with textiles, dealt with by only one man? Is there only one person in Canada who can adequately reflect the mind of the government in these matters?

Mr. EULER: That is rather gratuitous and uncalled for, I think.

Mr. BENNETT: I just asked the question, and I meant it exactly as I asked it.

Mr. EULER: The reason Mr. Justice Turgeon was selected was that he was felt to be a specially qualified commissioner. He had done similar work before and perhaps, without casting any aspersions upon anyone else, there was no one else so well qualified for this particular work. He began late in the year; only the sum I have indicated was expended, and naturally the balance will goback to the receiver general. The work has not been completed, and later an additional amount of $111,000 will be asked for. I do not remember precisely what other questions my right hon friend asked.

Mr. BENNETT: What are the daily costs of the commission? What is the commissioner being paid?

Mr. EULER: Does my right hon. friend desire that I give the names of all those connected with the commission?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, please.

Mr. EULER: Hon. W. F. A. Turgeon, commissioner, per diem living allowance, $35. Doctor Grindley, secretary, has drawn $1,-261.94 in travelling expenses. He is an official of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

R. H. Foster, assistant secretary, has been paid $730.32 in salary at the rate of $200 per month and travelling expenses of $497.20. Perhaps my right hon. friend does not desire the travelling expenses.

Mr. BENNETT: It might as well be on record.

Mr. EULER: J. L. Ralston, counsel: per diem allowance, $20; legal fees, per day, $200; per diem living allowance paid, $1,105; legal fees, $13,274; travelling expenses, $567.05. J. E. Coyne, assistant counsel: living allowance, $10; legal fees, per day, $50; per diem living allowance paid, $100; legal fees paid, $5,125; travelling expenses, $51.05. P. H. Shelton, official reporter: 33½ cents per folio; the cost of his services, $2,916.27, and travelling expenses of $470.15. Joseph L. Donovan, replacing Mr. Shelton as official reporter from January 18, 1937; 33½ cents per folio; paid, $1,488.47. W. W. Buskard, reporter: travelling expenses, $477.05. I presume he was paid at the same rate as the man he replaced.

Mr. BENNETT: He was perhaps an assistant.

Mr. EULER: J. A. Thomson, clerk-stenographer, $100 a month; paid $310, travelling expenses, $527.21. A. L. Burgess, clerk: $200 a month; paid, $400; travelling expenses, $351.22. Miss McLaughry, stenographer, salary paid, $21; Miss McHale, stenographer, paid, $60. Miss M. Hydes, paid, $70. Miss L. Stewart, paid, $20. Miss Hackett, travelling expenses, $465.05. Mrs. McPhaden, typist; travelling expenses, $280.70. Then there were witnesses: L. H. Newman, paid, $99.56; Charles F. Wilson, witness, $141.25; Doctor H. S. Patton, $117.80; and miscellaneous expenses, $916.25.

Mr. BENNETT: How many days has the commission been sitting?

Mr. EULER: In the memorandum I have before me it is stated that the commission has already taken the evidence of forty witnesses in hearings covering thirty days, twenty-six of which were spent in Winnipeg and four in Saskatoon. I regret that this memorandum is not dated; I only had it placed in my hands this afternoon. At the present time the commission is recessing while Mr. Justice Turgeon hears the argument in the textile inquiry. I understand the commission now is in Vancouver, but this memorandum states that the textile inquiry will be concluded about March 12 and as soon as possible thereafter the grain inquiry commission will resume in Vancouver. It is intended that hearings will be held in Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Regina, Winnipeg and some eastern city.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the commission propose to go abroad?

Mr. QUELCH: Why was it necessary to pay Colonel Ralston $200 a day, when no doubt there were many men who could do the work just as efficiently for a much smaller remuneration?

Mr. EULER: I presume that is a matter of opinion. I suppose we are paying a man a good salary because he is a good man. As to the question of the right hon. leader of the opposition as to whether or not the commission will go abroad, I do not think so. I understand that the commissioner was in England.

Mr. BENNETT: And in France.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I desire to make one or two observations with regard to this commission. I may say I was never in favour of it. Ever since it was first mentioned in the committee last year I have been opposed to it; I see no reason for it. I think the expenditure so far is greatly out of line with any results that have been accomplished. The commission has sat for thirty days, during several of which evidence was given by witnesses from different branches of the service in Ottawa. Some witnesses gave evidence with respect to trade, tariffs and matters of that kind, which really was of no great value. I was very much interested to hear the minister say that the commission are now in the west, which means that they have pretty well covered Canada. I should like to know if they propose to go to the United States or take another trip abroad. I think it important that we should know the itinerary of this commission, and I think we should have some report before the next crop is harvested. It is impossible, of course, to have a report upon which we can base legislation. But this government has done things by order in council, and they might take some action in that way in order to implement a report, whatever it might be.

May I go back for a moment or two to the first mention of the commission. I believe that came about in the committee which was appointed last year to investigate matters with respect to the wheat board. I believe the last session of that committee was on May 4. At that time there was a general discussion and witnesses were heard. A day or so previous there had been some discussion with respect to referring the matter to a commission. That was in compliance with the order of reference to the committee.

A few days ago the hon, member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) made reference to the report brought in to the house on June 11, and said that that report had been unanimous. It recommended that the order of reference to the committee be referred to a royal commission. There was a reason for the unanimous report, because the last part of the second paragraph stated the committee found it impracticable to get conclusive evidence on the reference made to it. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was chairman of the committee. He, along with two other members of the cabinet, sat in at one sitting at which there was general discussion with respect to the evidence. It was agreed that the matter had not been satisfactorily cleared up, and in answer to a question from me one of the ministers agreed that the matter had not been satisfactorily cleared up and that the evidence was not conclusive. As a result, the committee in drawing up its report suggested a royal commission.

Now we have that commission, and I should like to know whether or not the order of reference, which was enlarged, is now wide enough to investigate one or two matters in particular. Probably the minister would assure me now that the reference is wide enough to investigate a matter which is disturbing the minds of some people in Saskatchewan, namely the question of the purchase of seed oats for the spring of 1935.

Last year I asked the Minister of Finance respecting the liability the government had with respect to the losses sustained by the provincial government of Saskatchewan in the purchase of seed oats. At page 1810 of Hansard for 1936, in reply to my question headed "Saskatchewan Grain Purchases" the minister replied, in part, as follows:

3. A contingent liability exists so long as any bank advances made under P.C. 975 of 12th April, 1935, are outstanding.

Again this year, at page 1236 of Hansard, the Minister of Finance stated in his budget speech that:

The government's guarantee of bank advances for the purchase of oats by Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited for account of the province of Saskatchewan is also still outstanding. As at February 1, 1937, the amount of bank loans outstanding subject to this guarantee was $384,760.

If that is the same liability that was referred to last year, I think this matter with respect to the responsibility of the loss that was taken on the oats deal in 1935 should be referred to the commission, and a thorough investigation be held so that the matter could be cleared up.

There is another matter which I hope the reference of the commission will be wide enough to cover. If not, I hope that the order of reference may be enlarged to cover it. I refer to a thorough investigation of the question of the marketing of barley and of the corner that was manipulated in barley last year in the province of Saskatchewan. I believe to some extent the racket was carried on in Manitoba.

In some of the evidence taken at Winnipeg I noticed reference was made to the corner on barley, but the evidence would not indicate that the commission intended making further investigation in connection with that matter. I believe it should be considered.

There is another matter which has not yet been brought to light. I refer to what I might describe as a racket which was perpetrated last year in Saskatchewan with respect to the purchase of malting barley. Last year we were fortunate in having a high grade quality of malting barley and a larger percentage for export than we had had in previous years. In the last day or two I have received a statement from the bureau of statistics showing that in the first seven months of this crop year we exported 12,641,208 bushels of malting barley to the United States, as against 179,000 last year.

I should like to tell a little story in this connection, but before doing so I shall read a statement appearing in the Regina Leader Post under date of March 16, relating to the quality of barley harvested in Saskatchewan last fall. This is the report of a statement made by A. T. Elders, the representative of the organization which was buying malting barley. He states that 79 per cent of extract has been found in the barley shipped to the United States, as against only 71 per cent in the barley produced in that country. This statement would go to show that Canadian barley is of a high quality and wanted in the United States. I have already given the export figures.

Representatives of certain interests in Minneapolis came over to Saskatchewan and Manitoba and got in touch with crop reporters who were familiar with the different districts where good malting barley was grown. The reporters drove through the districts with the men in question, visited the farmers and purchased barley from them at the farms. Of course, the farmer had to load the barley into cars, and attach bills of lading to drafts on the Minneapolis firm. I know some of the men who escorted the representatives from Minneapolis through the districts; and I learned that those representatives bought hundreds of cars of barley in that way.

The Minneapolis firms had no direct interest in elevators, and I do not think they were associated with the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. Some of them might have been members, but the men who did the work were the direct agents of Minneapolis firms. They went to the farmers, examined their barley, inquired as to the price of barley in the town, and offered the Fort William price. That is, they would offer the farmer a premium of three or four cents over the Winnipeg price for six-rowed malting barley. They started to purchase this barley at fifty cents per bushel and continued right up to eighty cents, the farmer having to load it over the loading platform and ship to the firm in Minneapolis. He could do it through the elevator, and bill it to the firm in Minneapolis.

I want to point out that at no time in the months of August, September, October and November-I secured the figures from the bureau of statistics—was the price in Minneapolis for malting barley less than $1.26 per bushel. The prices in August ranged from $1.25 to $1.35, making an average in the neighbourhood of $1.30. The cost of shipping this barley from the northern parts of Saskatchewan via Moose Jaw, including commission, would be practically the same as shipping to Fort William. There was a duty of twenty-five cents per bushel to be paid. The other costs would amount to about twelve cents, so you would have a total cost of thirtyseven cents per bushel. Deducting that from the average price of $1.30 would give you a net return of ninety-three cents per bushel delivered. I was told by one man connected with this Minneapolis firm that they received at least $1.34 for the barley they bought from the farmers. During that period the price for six-rowed malting barley at Fort William was eighty-four cents per bushel, so the farmer lost anywhere from twenty-five to thirty-five cents per bushel. Hundreds of thousands of bushels were bought last year under those conditions.

Mr. BENNETT: How could it have been stopped?

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): This grain commission should have inquired into it. Mr. A. T. Elders made a statement with respect to the value of this malting barley that was purchased in western Canada. He should be called to review the organization that was buying this barley. I think some means could be found of investigating this matter and preventing the farmers from being subjected to such a racket. I know when the farmers heard of it they were quite sore; but there was no redress they could obtain. I think the thing should be investigated.

The grain commission was set up last year following an investigation by a committee of this house into the actions of the wheat board. I was hoping that the commission would meet early enough so that a report could be presented in time to cover the marketing of last year's crop, but it looks now as though any report that may be presented will not be of any value as far as next year's crop is concerned.

I agree with the leader of the opposition when he says that there must have been some other man in Canada who could have made this investigation. Mr. Justice Turgeon has been busy with another commission and it was regrettable that some other man was not appointed. I do not intend to criticize the personnel of the commission so far as the counsel and the other persons named by the minister are concerned. However, I think it should be noted that Mr. Ralston has received in the neighbourhood of $15,000, and the commission has sat only thirty days. Of course, it first commenced its work on November 18 last. year. If these salaries are to continue I think we should see that the work is proceeded with more quickly and a report made in time to permit some action being taken in connection with the marketing of the next crop.

I can assure hon. members that the farmers of western Canada are not going to stand being kidded as they were last fall. In the dying days of the last session, on June 22, the minister made a statement in reply to some remarks I had made. He said that the government would take steps before certain members went overseas to decide upon a policy in connection with the marketing of the 1936 crop. But the announcement was not made until August 28, and the action they took simply meant that the act was not operative last year. I trust that things will be different this year and that the farmers will know in good time what is to be done.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I rise to protest against this expenditure of $103,000. I can remember when I first came to this house that great protectionist newspaper, the Toronto Telegram, spent $20,000 to investigate the grain business and the operations of the grain exchange as carried on under Liberal premiers in the three prairie provinces. I want to protest against this commission roving all over Canada. This commissioner has completed his work on one commission without making a report, and then this other travelling minstrel show starts off. It is going to travel all over Canada to investigate the grain business. I can remember when Mr. Ralston, the counsel who is receiving $200 a day on this commission, sat in this house during the discussion on the grain bill. This multiplication of committees and commissions is causing the people of Canada to lose respect for this parliament. It represents the decay and decline of the House of Commons. This is the seventeenth commission to investigate grain since confederation. I have the greatest respect for the chairman, as well as for Mr. Ralston, both of whom I have known for some time.

I can remember the discussion which took place when a new grain act was proposed on July 4, 1935. If there is one piece of legislation that redounds to the credit of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), it is the grain legislation of 1935. Sixteen reports had been received from royal commissions since confederation down to that date, and this was the first real effort made to assist the farmer in fighting the grain exchange, the transportation combine, and the elevator combine. The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) was in the house in 1924, and he will remember the investigation carried on at that time by the Toronto Telegram. That investigation covered operations in England, in the United States and in Canada. I was never an enthusiast for the Union government, but they made an honest effort in this connection. I should like to quote the words I then used. They were;

The hon member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and others combined courts and lawyers and injunctions into a prohibitive tariff against inquiry into the methods of the big interests that handle wheat—

That was about the thirteenth inquiry, at that time. Continuing:

. . . not excepting the big interests in this country represented by the hon. member for Marquette. I was never an extremist in my enthusiasm for Union government. But the Union government honestly tried to protect the western wheat producer against the big interests. The western wheat producers have fulfilled in their experience with the hon. member for Marquette and his followers in this house, the words of Scripture, "A man's foes shall be they of his household." The worst enemy of the western wheat growers is the policy of the Progressive party, its leaders and its representatives in this house. The next opponent of the western wheat grower is the present policy of the Liberal party, its leaders and representatives in this house and in the capitals of the prairie provinces. The best friend of the western wheat grower is the policy of protection.

What did Mr. Justice Turgeon's report show? It showed, as I charged in this house, that there was bootlegging in grain. I went to the harbours of Buffalo, Baltimore, New York and Boston, and I found them mixing Canadian No. 1 with American grain and shipping the product overseas, with great loss to the people of this country. They milled the mix in Buffalo as a No. 1 grade of flour and exported it to Europe. The first Turgeon report showed these charges were proven, and it was expected that some results would follow. What was done? Not one clause of that report was adopted.

Now the government is going to spend another $103,000 for political purposes—that is all it amounts to. It is just carrying on the debate from back in 1935. One of the greatest services ever performed for this country by the present leader of the opposition was when he exposed in all its forms the shallow nature of these inquiries and when he brought down a measure of public ownership, because the grain business is a public utility which should be operated by the country, getting rid of the middlemen, the grain exchanges, and of the gamblers in futures. But all these conditions continue in the industry, with the result that the poor farmer is fleeced out of a fair price for his cropthe best grain grown in the world.

Mr. Ralston, who was then the member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, took part in this debate. I do not understand why he was appointed as counsel for this commission. If you look over the list of clients for whom he has appeared, not only at that time but since he has ceased to be a member of this house, I think it shows that he is disqualified automatically from acting on behalf of the commission. I doubt whether we shall get five cents worth of value for this whole $103,000 of expenditure. Not one red cent shall we get. You will have a report made by the same respected chairman of the commission who functioned ten years ago. His report of that time was pigeonholed and was made a scrap of paper. Mr. Ralston disqualified himself as counsel for the commission by a speech which he made in the house. In the course of the debate on the grain board on July 4, 1935, he used very strong language; I have never heard him use such terms as he expressed on that occasion, and I was astonished at what he said. At that time I referred to it in these words:

The hon, member for Shelburne-Yarmouth the other night used some strong language which I think was unworthy of him; referring to the leader of the government he used the words "bluff" and "bluster." Well, if there is bluff and bluster anywhere it is to be found in the support now of protection on grain as a policy of the Liberal party to-day.

The present commission is to be a travelling inquiry all over Canada to dig up facts about the grain trade, to consider protection versus free trade, and all that kind of thing.

Well, if there is bluff and bluster anywhere it is to be found in the support now of protection on grain as a policy of the Liberal party to-day. After professing free trade they have been veering round to all sorts of protection, supporting now stabilization, subvention and subsidies and bonuses. After going through the country denouncing the Conservative party as the enemy of the grain grower, what did they say in Ontario? They said that the greatest enemy the grain growers of the prairies had was to be found east of the great lakes in the manufacturers. Let me tell them that the greatest enemy the western grain growers had was west of the great lakes; that enemy was in the grain exchanges, the Winnipeg grain exchange, the elevator combines, the transportation combines and all the middlemen and profiteers who for many years past have had the poor grain grower by the throat. I say, therefore, that if this government has done nothing else to win the support of the people, it will merit that support for the progressive stand it has taken with regard to the nationalization of the grain industry. It has taken a national patriotic stand. There is no doubt that an emergency and a necessity had been created and the government could not have done anything but follow the course it has; it has "hedged" the grain and brought the whole credit of the country to the support of these "hedges" or bankruptcy faced Canada. Every part of the country is interested in the bill, and the other night in my constituency, referring to this legislation, I said that it would forever eliminate the operations of the middlemen, profiteers, the grain and elevator and transportation combines and all the other gamblers in futures who have had a strangle-hold on the poor grain farmer. It will remove the middlemen and the profiteers and give the farmers a higher price for their wheat.

I doubt if any value will be obtained for the whole $103,000. We are merely duplicating the work which was done years ago. One of the greatest things ever done for the farmer came with the announcement by the then Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), when Mr. Ralston was sitting on this side of the house, that there would be a minimum price for the grain sold. If the then Prime Minister had not hedged the grain, the country would have been bankrupt.

As far as the sales of grain were concerned, they were handled admirably. The other day I was at the opening of the new Toronto stock exchange, and I talked about this matter with a number of bankers, some of whom were Liberals from the maritime provinces, and they said history would show that the present leader of the opposition had met the crisis of that time in a manner which reflected the greatest credit upon him.

I cannot see why all this duplication of work and waste of public money should go on. We are elected to parliament to administer the affairs of the country. As I said on May 5, 1924, when opposing one of these commissions:

It cannot be too plainly stated or too often repeated that the United States is now a relatively small factor in making world wheat prices. Canada is a much larger factor and European markets are receiving large quantities of wheat at lower prices than even Canada is making. [Mr. Church.]

Moreover, Canada and other countries are able to produce wheat at lower costs than those ruling in the United States. The wheat council in the United States bases its appeal for a higher tariff upon a showing that costs are much lower in Canada.

I also said, when discussing in 1935 the policy of the present leader of the opposition:

Every part of the country is interested in the bill . . . it would forever eliminate the operations of the middlemen, profiteers, the grain and elevator and transportation combines and all the other gamblers in futures who have had a stranglehold on the poor grain farmer. It will remove the middlemen and the profiteers and give the farmers a higher price for their wheat. I said further that the day was not far distant when we would have a national policy in connection with our hard wheat, a milling policy, a policy that would handle our wheat right through this country and mill it in Canada, ship it overseas and place it on the markets of the world. It is fortunate for this country that we have at the head of the government to-day a statesman who has brought about this reform. I have every respect and great admiration for the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, whom I have known for a great many years; I knew him and his partner before coming into this house. But when the hon. gentleman advocates an inquiry into this particular Canadian cooperative wheat association let me say this to him and to the Liberal party in this house. Years ago they were not so anxious to have a grain inquiry. What did Mr. Crerar do? When the Union government made a strenuous and brave effort in 1921 to come to the support of the prairies to help the poor grain grower who was being fleeced out by the middlemen and profiteers, out of a fair price per bushel for his grain, where were the Liberals and the Progressives?

They were standing together to combine courts and injunctions against free trade in grain.

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. member for Broadview to confine his remarks to the resolution.

Mr. CHURCH: I am well aware of all this, Mr. Chairman. I know the rules just as well as you do.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: Take that back.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I have not concluded. I am opposed to the vote of this $103,000. Though I am not prepared at present to move to strike it out, it should be struck out. It is throwing money away. With all the multiplying of committees and commissions, parliament has no powers at all. We have a committee on agriculture which can go into these matters; why is it not allowed to do so? I wish to protest against the encroachment upon the powers of parliament, and to say that while I have respect for Mr. Ralston as a lawyer, I believe him to be prejudiced in relation to the subject matter of the inquiry.

Mr. BENNETT: There are a few questions I would ask the minister. Will the commission investigate the grain and elevator companies that acquired stocks of grain at the lake ports, and their profits, as was done in the case of the textile companies, and ascertain what happened in connection with the rest of the crop that was sold, in connection with which there was a loss of $15,000,000, though there appears now to have been a profit of $8,000,000. Will these matters be investigated?

Mr. EULER: The hon, member for Qu'-Appelle (Mr. Perley) was anxious to know whether certain matters would be investigated, and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) also inquired with regard to other specific questions without making any very definite charge. I think it will be found that the order of reference covers practically anything that the commission might desire to investigate. I have it before me and could read it if the committee desired, but that is hardly necessary.

I am surprised that my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle should criticize the appointment of the commission, as he has done. He was a member of the committee of last session, and that committee was unanimous in its recommendation to the house that an investigation should be held; and the house unanimously adopted the committee's report, so that there seemed to be unanimity all round on the desirability of holding an investigation.

I must disagree with the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) when he says that there is no value in the work that is being done by the commission. Conditions have changed greatly in the grain business, and particularly in wheat, in the past few years, and it was the unanimous opinion of our committee that the commission could do very valuable work which would be in the interests of the producers of wheat and other grains.

My hon. friend (Mr. Perley) made some

My hon, friend (Mr. Perley) made some reference to an alleged corner in barley. I am informed that some evidence was taken at Winnipeg during the sittings of the commission there.

With regard to what the leader of the opposition said a moment ago, constituting certain more or less veiled charges, though I am not saying that in any spirit of criticism, I cannot say at the moment whether the investigation will cover that particular point, but I am willing to pass on to the chief commissioner the remarks made both by the leader of the opposition and by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps I had better amplify the statement I have made. Inasmuch as the commission presided over by Mr. Justice Turgeon in the textile inquiry investigated several companies engaged in the industry, it is desirable that he should investigate the various grain companies that acquired from the grain board, presided over by Mr. Murray, the wheat that was at the lake ports and should ascertain who owned that wheat, the visible wheat in Canada at the present time.

Mr. EULER: Any particular time?

Mr. BENNETT: At this time, before the opening of navigation. The commission should ascertain who owns the wheat and should investigate the accounts, showing the profits with respect to these transactions, and if possible account for the statement made in this house by the Minister of Finance that $15,000,000 was lost last year, notwithstanding that he shows in his budget this year a profit of $8,000,000 from that same wheat. It seems to me that these are matters that should be investigated, and ultimately they will have to be investigated by some authority, having regard to the position occupied by Mr. Murray. and the fact that the advisory board was swept out of office by the government and a committee of the cabinet substituted for it.

The question of a combine that brought about the position in barley is a matter that can be investigated under the combines act. If the evidence given in part in Winnipeg is to be relied upon, I take it that the commissioner will investigate that matter as well.

I desire to associate myself with the statement that the report suggesting the appointment of a commission was unanimous. That statement is undoubtedly correct. But I do object to the appointment as commission counsel of one who made the remarks that were made by Colonel Ralston in this house in 1935 with respect to the conduct of the grain business in this country, and as to the character of someone engaged in that business. He thereby unfitted himself to act as commission counsel, however well he may be qualified to act for those who took a certain attitude towards the matter. Certainly the attorney general of England took the view that under similar circumstances one would be precluded from acting in a case of this kind

Mr. DUNNING: With respect to any investigation of what the Minister of Finance said, I can perhaps remove the necessity for that in a moment. The facts are clear with regard to the budget statements both of last year and of this year. At the time, provision was made for an estimated loss of $15,000,000. That loss was shown to exist in connection with the then holdings on the basis of the then value. Subsequently the price went down so much as very largely to increase that loss, and still later, prices improved; and as I indicated in the budget, I was very glad to be able to say that we should receive during the fiscal year approximately $8,000,000, which would be an offset against the $15,000,000. It was not a case of a loss turning into a profit, but of a loss being less than that which was provided for a year ago. I will take the responsibility for the error in making such provision, if responsibility there be. There is no need to place that responsibility on anyone else, for it was wholly mine; Mr. Murray had nothing to do with it.

Mr. BAKER: Why was the loss estimated before the sale was made?

Mr. BENNETT: The order in council provided that the ultimate sale when made should determine the loss, and the loss was estimated by Mr. Murray, not the Minister of Finance, according to his sworn testimony. He made the estimate, and he did it having taken the wheat over under duress. There was a threat that if it were not handed over on a certain day, credit would be shut off and the authority of the government used for that purpose.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I want to make my position clear. I agree that the report of the committee was unanimous, but it was so only because there was incorporated in it a clause that rendered it practically negative. Furthermore, as far as I was personally concerned, I never favoured the setting up of a commission for a further inquiry. I will admit that no vote was taken on the report and that the report was unanimous; but it was unanimous for the reason I have stated. It was on that understanding that I agreed to it. It was agreed further that there would be no discussion on it when it came into the house. The minister will remember that.

Mr. EULER: Which again proves that it was unanimous.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Not necessarily. I agreed in the committee that there [Mr. Bennett.]

would be no discussion on the report in the house, but only when the minister undertook to arrange with the Minister of Agriculture that on a certain item in his estimates I should have an opportunity of discussing the question of marketing coarse grains. The report was tabled on June 11 and I sat here every day. I was here until thirty minutes before my train left on the second last night the house was sitting before prorogation. I had the report about fifteen minutes only. That is the reason I agreed to that unanimous report.

Before I sit down I should like to have an assurance from the Minister of Finance that this commission will investigate the question of the loss on the oats purchased in 1935 by the provincial government.

Mr. DUNNING: It is my distinct impression that the matter is before the commission.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I wish to associate myself with those who have expressed the feeling that the appointment of Colonel Ralston as commission counsel was an unwise move. I say that not in any spirit of criticism of the gentleman personally, whose integrity is well known, but in view of the fact that his prejudices are known to be quite strong, as shown not only in the debates that took place in this house, but for years past.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh that is not correct. That is all wrong.

Mr. BENNETT: In 1935.

Mr. DOUGLAS: It is not unfair to say that the associations of Colonel Ralston for the past few years have been with those who have decided views on this question, and the appointment of anyone who was prejudiced on either side was decidedly unwise. Whatever the findings of this commission may be, whether in favour of competitive marketing or cooperative marketing, there will be a feeling in certain quarters that the decision was based to a large extent on the point of view taken by Colonel Ralston in this house before he was appointed to this position.

Then in respect to salaries, the minister in reply to someone down here said that a good man deserves a good salary. That may be true. Nevertheless this commission is in the public eye in western Canada, where people on the land at the present moment are very fortunate if at the end of the year, after they have met the actual cost of taking off their crop, they have two or three hundred dollars left. To them a sum of $103,000 for a thirty days' sitting, and the payment of $15,000 to one man for thirty days, seems preposterous. While it may not seem excessive to certain gentlemen who are in the habit of dealing in terms of lawyers' fees, which I suppose in certain quarters are phenomenal, nevertheless to the farming population it seems like flying in the face of providence. I can assure the minister that while this $220 a day for salary and expenses may not seem a large amount to him—

Mr. EULER: I did not say that it did not seem like a large amount.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Well the minister said "Good pay for a good man."

Mr. EULER: That is entirely different.

Mr. DOUGLAS: So he must be entirely satisfied with it. But in many quarters it will not be viewed in that light.

But the main criticism is that the whole purpose of the commission will be defeated by the fact that there has been brought to it, not a man who is considered to be impartial by the farming population, but one who is known to have a decided prejudice in the matter. The farmer feels that instead of getting a new deal, he is getting a deal in which the cards were stacked before the deal began.

Mr. FAIR: I also want to register my protest against the engagement of Colonel Ralston and the salary being paid him. While I am only a new member of this house, Colonel Ralston's name is by no means new to me, nor is it new to a number of those who sent me here. As was pointed out by the hon. member who spoke last (Mr. Douglas), his appointment is not at all favourable to the commission nor to those who set it up. I am afraid the effects will not be very good even though the commission may bring in the kind of report which we do not expect it to bring in.

Mr. KINLEY: Is the salary paid to Colonel Ralston out of line with salaries that have been paid by this and other governments of Canada in years past for the same kind of work?

Mr. EULER: At the moment I have a recollection of only one. One does not desire to make comparisons, especially between lawyers, for there are so many of them in this house. But I think the counsel who was retained for the price spreads commission received $150 a day, and for quite a long period.

Mr. KINLEY: How long was he at it?

Mr. BENNETT: Some months.

Mr. EULER: Yes, he drew a large sum. Perhaps I can satisfy the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) by quoting from the order of reference as it is contained in the order in council regarding the matter of seed oats in Saskatchewan:

All transactions to be investigated since the year 1930 pertaining to the handling of grain for relief and seed purposes in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta under dominion government guarantee or otherwise.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the further supplementary estimates for the fiscal year 1936-37 adopted in committee of supply on March 24 and 25 instant be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

SUPPLY BILL

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING moved:

Resolved that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1937, the sum of $40,903,880.76 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 82, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1937.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Sections 1 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On the schedule.

Mr. DUNNING: I just want to make sure, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment suggested the other day by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) in connection with the national defence vote is in your record copy.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, it is.

Schedule agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Mackenzie King moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. DUNNING: I should intimate that with respect to the reports of the tariff board which were tabled a few days ago, the government now have had an opportunity to give consideration to them, and the resolutions to be introduced in committee of ways and means with respect to the various matters will be printed in the votes and proceedings of to-day so that hon members will have ample opportunity to study them.

Mr. BENNETT: You are giving notice of intention to move them?

Mr. DUNNING: Quite so.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.58 p.m.

Wednesday, March 31, 1937

The house met at eleven o'clock.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following letter:

Ottawa, March 30, 1937.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Sir Lyman P. Duff, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber on Wednesday, the 31st of March, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be, Sir, Your obedient servant,

> F. L. C. Pereira, Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

BANK OF CANADA-INTEREST ON LOANS

Mr. PELLETIER:

What amount is owing to or has been paid to the Bank of Canada for interest in respect of loans to the dominion government, the provinces and the municipalities, since the last day of February, 1935?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: Information as to the payment of interest to the Bank of Canada by the dominion government is being tabled to-day in a return to an order moved by the member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). No information in regard to the payment of interest by the provinces to the Bank of Canada is in the possession of the government. The Bank of Canada Act does not empower the bank to deal with municipalities.

NATURALIZATION OF ORIENTALS

Mr. REID:

- 1. In what year and at what date did Canada decide not to grant certificate of naturalization to orientals or Japanese subjects otherwise qualified, unless Japan agreed to their expatriation?
- 2. How many Japanese subjects applied for naturalization as British subjects during the ten years preceding such date?
- 3. How many certificates of naturalization were granted during the ten said years?
- 4. How many Japanese subjects applied for naturalization as British subjects following said date?
- 5. How many certificates of naturalization were granted during the said ten years?
- 6. Since the regulations were changed, how many Japanese in this country has Japan agreed to expatriate and so allow them to become citizens of Canada?

Mr. RINFRET:

- 1. 1931, June 17.
- 2. Records of naturalization are kept only in respect to the issue of certificates and not in respect to applications received.
  - 3. 602, to Japanese.
  - 4. Same as in reply to question 2.
- 5. 109 certificates were issued to Japanese from June 17, 1931, to December 31, 1936.
  - 6. Statistics not available.

INTEREST ON HOUSING LOANS

Mr. MUTCH:

- 1. What was the rate of interest charged the province of Manitoba by the federal government of the day on housing loans in each of the following years: 1919, 1920 and 1921?
- 2. Has the federal government in any instance reduced interest rate to any of the provinces on any of these housing loans?
- 3. If so, what provinces and what percentage of interest reduction in each case?

Mr. DUNNING:

- 1. 5 per cent.
- 2. No.
- 3. Answered by No. 2.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

CONTRACTS WITH A. STIRLING MACMILIAN AND MACMILIAN CONSTRUCTION AND LUMBER COMPANY

Mr. LAWSON:

- 1. What contract or contracts, if any, were entered into by any department of the government of Canada with A. Stirling MacMillan, contractor, Halifax, Nova Scotia, during the years 1925 to 1936 inclusive, and what was the amount of each contract?
- 2. What contract or contracts, if any, were entered into by any department of the government of Canada with the MacMillan Construction and Lumber Company, Halifax, Nova Scotia, during the years 1925 to 1936 inclusive, and what was the amount of each contract?
- 3. What sums of money were paid to A. Stirling MacMillan, Halifax, Nova Scotia, in connection with each of the contracts mentioned in question No. 1?
- 4. What sums of money were paid to the MacMillan Construction and Lumber Company, Halifax, Nova Scotia, in connection with each of the contracts mentioned in question No. 2?
- 5. What contract or contracts were entered into by the Canadian National Railways with: (a) A. Stirling MacMillan, Halifax, Nova Scotia, and/or (b) the MacMillan Construction and Lumber Company, Halifax, Nova Scotia, between 1925 and 1936 inclusive, and what was the amount of each contract?
- 6. What sums of money were paid to: (a) A. Stirling MacMillan and/or (b) the MacMillan Construction and Lumber Company in connection with each of the contract or contracts mentioned in question No. 5?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

MCDONALD HILLS-DYSART MAIL ROUTE

Mr. MacNEIL (for Mr. Coldwell):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and other documents in the possession of the Post Office Department, relative to the McDonald Hills-Dysart mail route, from October 14, 1935, to March 15, 1936?

UNEMPLOYMENT

PROVISION FOR ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT
AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 80, to assist in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1-Short title.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Is the minister in a position to reply to the question I asked the other night with regard to the larger municipalities? These agreements are only with the provinces; the municipalities are receiving nothing. The province of Quebec got $2,750,000, some of which was spent on roads but ninety-five per cent of which was expended inside of the cities, towns and municipalities. I would like an answer to my question. Does the government propose to give some recognition to the appeal of the municipalities, cities and towns, who carry so heavy a burden through taxes on real estate? I think the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) should give an answer as to what has been done with regard to the application of the city of Toronto for four million dollars, and similarly with other cities. We are entitled to the courtesy of a reply. I do not come here for fun; I come here to speak for the municipalities I represent, and I am not going to accept such an answer as "See No. 1" which I got the other day from the Minister of Transport. It seems to me that in connection with this large vote the government should consider the point I raised the other evening on behalf of a city in which there is so much unemployment and such a heavy burden on the taxpayer for relief. There should be an amendment that agreements may be made with other large municipal units beside the provinces. Four of the provinces are in a state of bankruptcy; what is the use of municipalities going to them? The dominion has to pay the shot anyway. I ask, will the government extend the provisions of the act of last session so that the dominion can deal with large cities like London, Montreal, Ottawa, Vancouver and Halifax? I am entitled to a reply, and the bill will not pass until I get a reply.

Mr. ROGERS: The question raised by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) is one of a number which I had undertaken to answer when the bill was before the house in committee. The question he has raised is quite a proper one from his point of view. I would remind him, however, that under the present as under the previous administration, the dominion government in dealing with unemployment and relief matters has negotiated agreements with the provincial governments. I do not think I need emphasize the fact that, though it is physically possible to deal with nine provinces in this matter, it would be physically impossible to deal with some 3,000 municipalities. I take it that the matter in which the hon, member is really interested is the measures that can be taken in municipalities to provide joint works which will assist in relieving unemployment. There is no reason why in our agreements with the provinces arrangements may not be made, as they have been made in some cases, to provide works within cities and towns. In general that has been done upon the basis of contributions from municipality and province and dominion; it has not been done, to my knowledge, on the basis of the dominion making an outright contribution for works to be done within a particular municipality. I can only assure him that in our negotiations with the provinces with respect to unemployment and relief I shall bear in mind what he has said with regard to the importance of having more work done within our larger cities for the relief of unemployment.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not wish to detain the committee, but may I say that that was the same reply we got on Bill 62 last March. Surely the time has come when the government can see the futility of expending this money by handing it to a province. I can tell the minister that Toronto has not had one red cent towards relief works from the province of Ontario. The financial affairs of Toronto represent four times the turnover of the province. The city is willing to give a third for relief works, yet it is asked to apply to the province, which has already taken so much by way of income tax from the city that now, when anyone is considering the purchase of real estate, he finds that the taxes are a rent in themselves. Look at the favourable treatment which Saskatchewan got yesterday. The time will come when the municipalities will have to obtain some federal aid, either under this or under some other bill. The present act is unfair. When a deputation from Toronto came to interview the minister he was, unfortunately, sick from overwork and they saw the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), both of whom, I may remark, receive with respect and deal patiently with every deputation which has occasion to visit them; the same can be said of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). But I think the Toronto deputation was entitled to better treatment than to be told to go over and see Mr. Purvis. When they saw Mr. Purvis, after he had addressed the Canadian Club and told them how many thousands of men had been taken off the pay-rolls, they were told to go up and see the government at Queen's Park. I do not wish to discuss or interfere with provincial affairs and have never done so. I recognize that in the province another government deals with provincial business and that ours here is a federal jurisdiction, but I would point out that if we are voting these moneys to the province we should have something to say as to where they shall be spent.

I can tell the minister how this relief money is now being spent. In Quebec, municipalities get government aid for court houses, sewers, street widening and pavements-right within the four corners of the municipalities -and the same thing is done in other provinces. The federal government hands money to the province of Ontario, and how is it spent? On a road program, for which, under the British North America Act, the province is financially responsible. Not by the widest stretch of the imagination can one of these roads be regarded as a federal work. But as I have said, the federal minister last fall could not see his way to discuss the matter with the Toronto board of control, and told the deputation to see Mr. Purvis; he in turn told them to go to Queen's Park; and there probably, if the bill should pass in its present form, they will be told to go and see the man in the moon.

An hon. MEMBER: Or Santa Claus.

Mr. CHURCH: Or the minister who answers questions by "See answer to No. 1." I wish to protest against this kind of thing. We have got literally no value for these federal funds. They are handed over to people who spend them sometimes for political not economic purposes. As I said yesterday, the roads they are constructing are uneconomic. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence), who is present to-day, can tell the house how the deputation I have mentioned was received, because he was present and knows what happened. If the present system goes on unchecked we may look for the disappearance of the municipalities. The provinces will have to take over the municipalities, and finally the federal government will be required to step in and take over the provinces.

Where do the cities stand in relation to this vote? We shall have to make returns by the end of next month in respect to income taxes, and Toronto will pay nearly thirty million dollars income tax and contribute ninety million dollars to the federal field, yet Toronto cannot get one cent for relief. Thousands upon thousands of our workers are out of employment and have lost their equities in their homes. I am here to protest against the present system of relief distribution, and I tell the minister that it may be good politics but it is bad practice to hand all the money over to the provinces. The government of the day had some experience in 1919 of the results of paying money direct to the municipalities. At that time $25,000,000 was voted for housing reconstruction, and the municipalities to whom it was loaned handed back every dollar excepting five per cent. Has Saskatchewan paid back what it received? Has any other province paid back its loans from the do-None that I know of. Yet in this minion? bill we have preserved the same bad principle which appeared in the bill of last year. I look around me and see on both sides of the house men who have come up from the municipalities; they know the burden that the folks back home are carrying, in trying to balance the tax rate. Surely they will agree with me that a clause should be added to the bill enabling agreements to be made with the municipalities where necessary. People could telephone Mr. Gordon, the exminister of labour, and get relief "over the telephone," because the minister wanted to provide relief where it was needed.

The unemployed cannot go up to Queen's Park to see the provincial government: if they went there they would soon be put out. The unemployed are flocking to the town hall every day asking questions, and throughout the country they are beseiging all the town halls. I do not wish to criticize the minister personally; I have never done so and I do not intend to do so now; but I believe the time has come when some permanent measure should be adopted to deal with and to solve the unemployment problem. The mayors of Canada from coast to coast were here about ten days ago, Liberals and Conservatives alike, to present the facts to the government. They know what the condition is. I do not know of anyone in this house who to-day is really anxious to own real estate, for federal and provincial taxation is getting higher all the time. Something ought to be done to deal with this problem in a fundamental way.

Mr. ROGERS: I share the hon. member's regret that I was unable to meet the deputation from Toronto. The deputation wished to interview a number of ministers at that time, and I did not feel that my own inability to be present was sufficient warrant to postpone the meeting. Had I not been ill I most certainly would have been in my office, and I think I can assure the hon. gentleman that I would have tried to give that courteous hearing to the deputation which it deserved. I wish to repeat, however, that in our dealing with unemployment and relief we cannot do otherwise than deal directly with the provincial governments. After all, the provincial governments are in a better position to know the relief needs of the various municipalities than is the dominion government. Not only that, but the municipalities are in a very real sense the creation of the provinces; and while, as I have stated before, there is no reason why certain moneys may not be available for works to be performed in the municipalities, I am still of the opinion that in any arrangements made towards that end we must deal with the provincial government and not separately with the municipalities.

Mr. BENNETT: There is one comment to be made in that respect. Why should not the government in the agreements provide specifically for the earmarking of certain funds for the municipalities? I am bound to say that the situation in some instances beggars description. The truth is, the municipalities have exhausted themselves in paying relief for those who have come in from the country, and a little employment would do something to relieve the strain. As a matter of fact, in our time, it was done specifically by providing that certain sums of money advanced to the province should be applied to work in, say, municipality A for the purpose of defraying half or one-third or whatever proportion of the cost might be determined. It is true that the government can make agreements only with the provinces, inasmuch as the municipalities are really and truly the creation of the provincial authority. On the other hand, to overlook the claims of the municipalities would be a great mistake in view of the burden they are carrying, a burden which is really not theirs; it is a burden imposed upon them by reason of the fact that they are municipalities to which people flock from all sections of the country. That is true of Vancouver, of Calgary and Edmonton, and it is certainly true of Winnipeg. We did make an agreement there in connection with the sewer, which was a highly necessary work having regard to what had occurred in the river, and that work relieved them of a portion of the burden. It provided employment, to which the dominion made a real contribution. The same thing happened in Montreal and, as the minister knows, in Kingston and in various other communities throughout the country in the last few years.

While I agree entirely with the view that you cannot make bargains with the municipalities, I would urge that in connection with these matters the minister should see that certain moneys that are appropriated for this branch of relief shall be earmarked for the municipalities in the agreement made with the provinces.

Mr. ROGERS: I am impressed with the importance of carrying out such a measure as is suggested by the leader of the opposition. That was emphasized quite strongly at the mayors' conference which met in Ottawa a short time ago. It will be understood, however, that in this matter we cannot proceed unless the two governments are agreed. We contribute fifty per cent and the province contributes fifty per cent, and it is necessary to secure an agreement between the two governments with respect to a particular program of works that is to be carried out. I assume myself that the provincial governments would be impressed with the importance of having some work performed in the larger cities, and I can assure the committee that this aspect of the question will be given serious consideration when we meet with the provincial governments.

Mr. HEAPS: The bill was allowed to get its second reading without any discussion whatever and now that it is before the committee I suggest that the minister ought to give us some idea of what the government intends to do to cope with the unemployment situation in a broad and general way as well as in matters of detail. The other day when the minister spoke he told us about half a million unemployed in the country. We ought to know what the government intends to do not only to alleviate the conditions that prevail to-day but to deal with the unemployment problem in such a way as to bring about a permanent solution of it. The house and the country as a whole will be getting tired of handing out relief in the form of occasional public works. I do not know whether I am asking too much when I ask the minister to tell us what the government's policy is. We have usually discussed this subject at great length in other years, and at this stage of the bill it would not be out of place for the minister to give us the information I ask for. I have no doubt that the government has been working hard at the problem during the past twelve months, and a commission has been at work for several months delving into various aspects of it. I would ask the minister to be good enough to tell us what the government's policy is in dealing with the problem in an effective and permanent way.

Mr. ROGERS: The hon, member made a similar suggestion when the resolution was before the committee. At that time I proposed to him that it might meet the convenience [Mr. Bennett.]

of the house if, when the supplementary estimates were under consideration at a later date, I made a statement with respect to each item. Having regard to the discursive debate we had when the resolution was before the committee I have been confirmed in that opinion. It does seem to me that there would be a decided advantage in having our criticism focused upon some particular measure which is being discussed with respect to unemployment and relief. In the estimates of the Department of Labour as given in the special supplementary estimates there will be found a number of distinct items of expenditure which will be authorized by parliament in connection with unemployment and relief. I would suggest to my hon. friend therefore that we are more likely to get a reasonable and intelligent discussion of the whole subject if that course is followed. In other words when each of these items is called I propose to make a statement as to the progress made in respect to each measure as it is repeated in the estimates of this year, and also to indicate what reasonable expectations we may have as to the progress that may be made under a new or similar measure during the coming year.

Mr. LAWSON: When the minister refers to items does he mean items in the estimates?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. This bill is really an instrument under which we work, under which agreements may be made with the provinces to carry out measures with respect to unemployment and relief. The special supplementary estimates will provide the means by which those measures can be realized. Therefore the special supplementary estimates will indicate definitely the measures which will be taken by the present administration with respect to unemployment and relief during the coming fiscal year.

Mr. HEAPS: In the supplementary estimates there are probably two classes of provision being made; provision for certain public works, and provision for relief. Beyond that has the government any intention of taking any other action?

Mr. ROGERS: There are some half dozen items each relating to measures being taken to deal with particular aspects of the problem of unemployment and relief.

Mr. MacINNIS: In what respect, if any, does this measure differ from the one of last year?

Mr. ROGERS: There are very slight changes in this bill as compared with the Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act of last year. As I mentioned a moment ago, the act is an instrument under which we make agreements with the provinces with respect to particular measures to deal with unemployment and relief. There are some minor changes, and I shall indicate these as we proceed with the various clauses of the bill.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): The minister suggested, in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps), that it would be better to leave detailed discussion of this measure until we come to the estimates provided for relief and unemployment. It seems to me that if we cannot have a discussion on relief and unemployment under this measure, the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act, 1937, we cannot have a real discussion on the matter at all. When the minister last year introduced the resolution to create the National Employment Commission he said that commission was necessary in order that we might get a general policy in regard to unemployment and employment and associated questions. This is the seventh consecutive year that we have had a measure of this kind before us. This year's bill is not greatly different from the acts of other years. Yet we have had this National Employment Commission for a whole year to do what the minister suggested must be done before a policy on unemployment and relief could be developed. I should like to refer briefly to the minister's own words as found in Hansard for March 19, 1936, at page 1257:

Mr. Rogers: As the resolution indicates, the purpose of the legislation which is to follow is to create an agency which will facilitate cooperation between the federal government, provincial governments, municipalities, industrial corporations, labour organizations and social welfare agencies in dealing constructively with the problem of unemployment and relief.

If that was the purpose for which the National Employment Commission was appointed, a commission which has now been in existence for a year, surely we should have something more than the same bill that we have had for the past seven years.

Then I quote from the Prime Minister, speaking on the same date and on the same subject, as reported at page 1259:

Mr. Mackenzie King: May I say to the hon. member--

He was replying, I think, to the member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol).

—that the late government tried to deal with unemployment in the manner he has described, namely, through the agency of the Department of Labour and the minister at its head. In each of five consecutive years they found that they could not by that means obtain satisfactory results. Obviously it cannot be done, because the Department of Labour like other government departments is formed to carry on the business of normal times, not to deal with such abnormal and exceptional conditions as the unemployment problem in Canada has presented. If this method of dealing with an extraordinary condition had been followed five years ago there might not have been the necessity for this legislation.

And here we have the same old bill again, the same old treatment for the unemployed, the same old treatment for those on relief, as we had in those other years. Why then appoint a costly national employment commission? I have here sessional paper No. 128, tabled on February 3. I have looked through it and I am satisfied that there is nothing in that report from the National Employment Commission that could not have been had by the Department of Labour by merely writing to the municipalities and asking for it. It is merely a tabulation of those on relief in various categories, and the information was received from the municipalities. Nothing new has been brought out. In every year since 1931 when this question of unemployment relief was brought up we had a great deal of discussion. I have before me an excerpt from the speech made by the present Prime Minister, then the leader of the opposition, as reported in Hansard of February 24, 1933, at page 2472. He said:

Dealing with the question of unemployment, there are two natural main divisions, one which concerns temporary unemployment due to an emergent situation, and measures necessary to meet it, and the other which concerns unemployment as an inevitable incident of industry and the permanent measures essential to meet a situation which unavoidably arises in connection with modern industrial organization. With respect to the first, the present government's policy is that of the dole—

Has that been changed?

—and, with respect to the second, they have no policy at all. Such policies as they have with respect to trade and the like, their fiscal policies, are all of a nature to strangle trade instead of encouraging it, and more than anything else are responsible for unemployment in Canada reaching the proportions it has to-day.

After such a statement I thought that when the present Prime Minister came into office the first thing he would do would be to put into effect a policy to deal with the emergent situation, and then he would bring forward a policy to deal with what he termed "unemployment as an inevitable incident of industry and the permanent measures essential to meet a situation which unavoidably arises in connection with modern industrial organization." But in the two sessions that we have had there has been no attempt to deal with either the emergency situation or the other, differing from the way the old government dealt with them; and there is certainly nothing before us now that deals with what the Prime Minister rightly called at that time unemployment as "an inevitable incident of industry....which unavoidably arises in connection with modern industrial organization." Now that is the question before this house, and until we face that question, and realize that we have passed from one stage of industrial development to another, and that the methods and means of the past will not suffice for to-day, we shall not make any progress in dealing with this matter.

The other evening the Minister of Labour referred to the improvement that had taken place, that is, to the smaller number of unemployed and the smaller number on relief this year as compared with last year. If one looks at the record appearing in the Labour Gazette for each year it will be seen that the change this year has not been materially greater than the change in other years. There may be a slight change for the better, but the difference is very small. Let us take the index number of employment as at March 1 of each year, as given in this report which is published by the Department of Labour, as follows:

1937	 							102.8
1936								98.9
1935								96.4
1934								92.7
1933								76.9

So we find that each year since 1933 there has been a gradual increase in employment, and that increase has not changed materially from year to year. This year the improvement is very little greater than it has been in other years. As I have already said, again this year we have the same bill that has been brought forward every year since 1931, and the minister cannot give this house any information as to what the government is going to do during the coming year to ease this burden which is becoming intolerable to an increasing number of our people.

Mr. JAMES J. McCANN (Renfrew South): I am glad the Minister of Labour is remaining firmly behind the policy of the government of dealing with the provincial governments directly as against dealing with the municipalities. I can readily understand that there may be peculiar difficulties in some cities, in Toronto perhaps in particular, but I see no reason why Toronto should be dealt with differently from any other municipality throughout Ontario. They may have some special projects in mind for relief purposes, but if they have none better than the project suggested a few years ago, that of constructing a tunnel from Toronto to an island out in lake Ontario, perhaps they are not entitled to any special consideration. I have no doubt that if the hon, member for Broadview and the controllers and city council of Toronto would approach the provincial government at Queens Park, certain projects would be commenced in that city which would help relieve the situation there.

A few moments ago the right hon. leader of the opposition made reference to the fact that a great many unemployed flock from the rural municipalities to the large centres, where they become a heavy burden. The policy of the federal government initiated last year in conjunction with the provincial government in connection with road building should help meet that very situation. If that policy is continued this year I am sure it will be a very important factor in providing work in rural sections and helping to alleviate the condition of which the right hon. gentleman has complained.

With reference to projects that might be carried on in municipalities other than large cities, I have in mind one or two undertakings which I should like to bring to the attention of the government for consideration. I refer particularly to rural schools. Everyone in this house knows that throughout Ontario and the other provinces the rural schools are in a very serious state of dilapidation, and the municipalities are not financially able to undertake the reconstruction of these buildings. I suggest to the government that they might well consider granting to the provinces a million dollars a year for the next five years, pro rata to their population, and earmark that money for the reconstruction of rural schools. We are all concerned about education. We all know the rundown condition of these schools and the poor facilities they offer the youth of Canada. We have heard a good deal with reference to the necessity of doing something for the youth of Canada, and I respectfully suggest to the Minister of Labour that he could do nothing better for them than to provide modern schools, with up to date lighting, heating and ventilation. These are the buildings in which our young people spend a great part of their time until they are fourteen or sixteen years of age, and in their present condition these buildings are a disgrace to the country. If we are looking for constructive work I cannot suggest anything which should be given greater consideration or which would be more to the public good.

Then if we go to the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) in order to have a new public building constructed in a small place we are told, "Well, the revenue from that municipality is not sufficient to warrant the construction of a public building there." That policy has been in effect in this country for thirty or forty years, and it is high time to bring it up to date. Twenty-five or thirty years ago it may have been considered that a municipality of eight hundred or a thousand people did not produce revenue sufficient to warrant the construction of a public building, but that policy should not be followed indefinitely. I submit that a great many of these small communities need modern public buildings costing anywhere from $8,000 to $10,000. Those buildings will be there as long as this country remains, and at least those communities are the centres of agricultural districts. I think we could well afford to change the policy of the government in that regard and put up many of these small public buildings throughout the country.

I hope the government will give consideration to these two suggestions, and that the policy put into effect last year of constructing feeder roads to the Transcontinental railway will be followed again this year. The policy of road building probably is not fully appreciated by those in the cities, but let me say that it is doing very much more for the newer parts of Ontario than appears at first sight. For instance, we have a city tell us that it must have a public building costing half a million or a million dollars. After that building is completed how much employment does it give? It may require a janitor, a stoker and two or three elevator men, which means that there may be five or six people employed in a building costing perhaps a million dollars. When we open a road into a country, and particularly into a mining country, and that country makes good, we probably add hundreds of millions of dollars to the wealth of the dominion, give employment to thousands of people, create building projects, build towns and bring into that community hundreds of people who will carry on business in all its ramifications. All the work, and the benefits accruing therefrom, in connection with the opening of a new country by means of a road, are incalculable at the time it is undertaken. But in the north country it has been proven over and over again that the wealth, the number of people and the amount of business carried on in newly developed regions have repaid many times over the initial cost of road building.

In the older part of Ontario, and particularly in the upper Ottawa valley, money has been spent in road building. That expenditure has not only helped to relieve the unemployment situation but has opened an avenue for tourists, of which we have had a great many in these last few summers, due to our road building policy. I suggest that the Minister of Labour continue to follow the policy in that regard which he has already inaugurated, but I would urge that he take particular care to earmark some of the money for particular purposes. When we are paying fifty per cent of relief expenditures, it should be the privilege of the federal authority to have some say in earmarking some of the money and designating some of the works which should be done in the way of relief. If that is done we will relieve unemployment in rural districts and stop the rural people from going to the cities, thereby indirectly relieving the condition in the more congested municipalities.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): With the latter part of the speech of the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) I heartily agree, but it seemed to me that in the first part of his speech there was some little confusion with regard to what is involved in the present policy of the government. In the latter part of his speech the hon. member suggested certain kinds of work which might be undertaken, among others the building of schools. Of course education is entirely a provincial matter, and yet the hon. member quite rightly suggested that some of the relief moneys might go towards improving school buildings. He suggested further that certain sums should be ear-marked for definite, needy works. With that statement I quite agree. But I do not think that is the point at issue.

Most of us would be willing to agree that the government should deal with the provinces rather than directly with the municipalities, but the point at issue is that to a large extent the present policy of the government is to hold the provinces financially responsible. Then in turn the provinces hold the municipalities financially responsible. It is that policy to which I personally object. We say to the provinces, "We will give fifty per cent if you will give fifty per cent." Then the provinces go to the municipalities and they say, "We will give a certain percentage if you will become responsible for a certain percentage." Whatever may be true in Ontario and Quebec, it is pretty generally known that a number of the western provinces are almost on the verge of bankruptcy. It is well known that a number of the municipalities are in a similar position.

Under these conditions the present arrangement is not at all satisfactory and fails to meet the needs. What is the good of going out to ask a province, such as my own province, to increase its public works? It cannot be done. What is the good of my province going to the rural municipalities and asking them to do something to give relief? It cannot be done. What is the good of going even to my own city of Winnipeg and asking the authorities to care for the unemployed, when in that city the problem has been so great in past years that the municipal administration has been staggering under the weight? The same could be said of Saskatchewan, and perhaps even with greater force.

The fact is that to-day we face a national emergency. Under the present set-up the federal government has access to financial resources which are denied the provinces and municipalities. That fact is so generally recognized that the government is appointing a royal commission to go into the matter with a view, I take it, of relieving to a certain extent the provinces and the municipalities of some of their financial burdens. Under those conditions it seems to me absurd that the federal government should follow the same old practice of holding the municipalities and provinces primarily responsible for the relief of unemployment. It simply cannot be done.

Meantime the provinces and municipalities are sinking further into debt, rendering a crisis almost inevitable. What is much more important, we are imperilling the social security of our communities, because of the growth of a great many evils which inevitably attend unemployment. I was very sorry indeed when yesterday the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) towards the close of his speech almost entirely undid what he had said in the earlier part of his observations. He referred to the facilities of the dominion government to keep down unrest. That is what we are being forced into. We are asked to accept a bill to create a reserve to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and yet all this time by our dilatoriness we are producing the very unrest which afterwards we must try to re-

For many years the party in office has taken the ground that unemployment is primarily a municipal or provincial matter. It was because of its insistence on that stand that the Liberal party was thrown out of office.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It has not been the Liberal party only; all governments have taken the same view.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: When the other government took office it did proceed to take a great deal more responsibility. I agree, as I have said on former occasions in the house, that it failed fully to meet its responsibilities. I believe for purely academic reasons the Liberal party has been insistent that this is [Mr. Woodsworth.]

primarily a provincial or even a municipal problem. I utterly repudiate that contention. In the earlier days unemployment was due to local causes such as improvidence, drunkenness and that sort of thing. Naturally the local people might be expected to look after it. But to-day no one can say that that is true. Every person must admit that the unemployment we have had in the last six or seven years is due to great economic causes which are not merely dominion-wide but which are world-wide. Why then reiterate the old slogan about this being a local problem and about our having to hold the municipalities and provinces responsible?

The fact is that if we propose to deal at all adequately with the matter, it must be a dominion problem, and the finances to a great extent will have to come from sources open to taxation by the dominion. Let us consider one practical question which has come up again and again-I mentioned it the other day-the care of transients. In the governmental scheme where do they come in? It is all very well for the government to say, "Well, let the provinces look after them, and then for the provinces to turn around and say, "Let the municipalities look after them." As a matter of fact this country has been built up largely through the efforts of the great body of transient unskilled labour which was available. Our railroads were built with this class of labour. Our mining districts have been developed with this class of labour. Our western cities were built largely with this class of labour. In the past it was comparatively easy for this transient labour to go back and forth across the international boundary. Some hon, members will recall that a few years ago we used to have these labourers following the seasons. They would start in the southern states and gradually work up northward until they reached the wheat fields of western Canada. Until the combine came into general use, as well as other modern machinery, the western farmers were almost dependent upon transient labour. Most hon. members will recall the time when we used to have 10,000 or 20,000 young men come to the western provinces from Ontario, Quebec and the martimes, some of them returning home after the harvest was over. It will be recalled that our immigration policy was based largely upon the idea of introducing unskilled labour into this country. As I say, it was this class of labour which was to no small extent responsible for the founding and development of Canada.

Now that the depression has come on, where are these people? The majority of them have not been able to establish any fixed abodes.

Most of them have not resided long enough in any one place to become what would technically be called established residents. They have drifted about from place to place. Last year I met personally hundreds of these men in the city of Winnipeg. I had many of them in my home where I talked with them and got their stories. Of the number I interviewed, I do not think more than three or four had been born in Winnipeg or Manitoba. Most of them had been born in Ontario; some had been born in Quebec and others in the maritimes. Many of these men had been working in the logging camps in British Columbia and at various odd jobs about the cities. Some of them had been engaged for part of the year in the harvest fields of Alberta, for another part in Saskatchewan and for another part in Manitoba. They were stranded in Winnipeg. For several years there have been about 5,000 of these men in the city of Winni-

Where do they belong? I would say that nearly fifty per cent of the group I saw in the city of Winnipeg would be almost unemployable. Many of these men have suffered almost as many disabilities as those who went through the great war. They have endured great hardships in carrying out their work and the result is that they are practically unemployable. It is certain they could not do the hard day's work they would be required to do if they went out on the farms. Many of these men have not been trained in any way and they cannot establish a residence anywhere. What is to be done for them? I think the citizens of Winnipeg have been as generous as the citizens of any other municipality, but they are overloaded with responsibilities. They say that these people do not belong to them, We had that they belong to the province. hundreds of these men camped in front of the provincial parliament buildings urging their case upon the provincial government. But they do not belong to the provincial government. We cannot very well deport them to the provinces from which they came. It would require more mounted police than we have at the present time to keep these men off our railroads and our highways. They tend to shift from place to place; they drift from town to town, they get a meal or two here and then move on to the next town. Their wanderings know no provincial boundaries.

Only the other day, I discussed this matter with a number of this class of men from Ontario. If I am not misinformed, the minister was good enough to hear a deputation made up of some of the men who had been to see me. How are these men to get anything like a decent livelihood? They are not the responsibility of the municipalities, they are not the responsibility of the province, because they are here one day and away to-morrow. There are tens of thousands of these people, and who has a good word to say for them? Undoubtedly a number of them are becoming tramps and undoubtedly a certain proportion of them will become criminals. Society has not done the fair thing by them, and I think it is almost too much to hope that they will do the fair thing by society. It is this class of people who I feel are in a particularly difficult position in that under present conditions they cannot establish residence.

I come now to another class, the people who have drifted into the cities from the outlying country because the cities had organized charities. Many of the rural municipalities had no organized charity whatever and hundreds of these families, whose residence was technically in the outlying districts, have drifted into the cities. If the cities say, "Go back to the county from which you came," it would seem an almost heartless attitude to take, but I believe that attitude is being taken by some Ontario cities. The fact remains that many cities are finding them-selves hard pressed. Many of the rural municipalities are practically bankrupt. These families moved into the cities because they were actually starving and they hoped to get enough to keep body and soul together. What is the use of sending them back to bankrupt municipalities where they would have no hope at all? I have often said that there seem to be too many lawyers in this house, and in addition too many members look at things from the purely legal aspect. Technically it may be said that these people belong to the different rural municipalities, but in reality that is not so.

Only the other day someone called my attention to a passage in Carlyle. I have not looked it up recently, but it referred to the earlier days in Great Britain when the poor laws were being rigidly enforced. An old woman came into a village and asked for help which was refused. It was during a time when smallpox was epidemic and as this woman had the disease, after she had stayed around the village for a few days she managed to infect a number of the residents. As Carlyle put it, this was to show that she really did belong. I think that thought ought to sink into the minds of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour. I am sure they do think about it, but it ought to produce action. As ministers they are the ones we have to hold responsible. These neglected people will bring crime and trouble upon us just to show that they do belong. Technically they do not, but in reality they do and we are responsible for them.

What is the government proposing to do in the matter? Precious little. It came into office pledged to do something. First of all we had an employment commission set up. The minister said he could not act intelligently unless he knew the facts. As my colleague said a few minutes ago, I do not know that we are in possession of more facts to-day than we were then. We then had the general picture before us and what facts we have since obtained have not come to us because of the appointment of this expensive commission. We have been able to obtain facts that might have been obtained through the efforts of the departmental officials.

It is not facts that we need so much as it is some policy based upon those facts. Such a policy has not been brought forward by the government. In fact, in recent days we have had confusion worse confounded. We have had "the passing of the buck," to use a slang phrase, from dominion to province, from province to municipalities, and from municipalities to private charities, and then back again. In addition we now have this "fifth wheel," if you like to call it such, of the employment commission. It does not report to this house; we cannot tell in detail what it is doing; we do not know what its suggestions are; we are not informed, at least officially, whether those suggestions are being acted upon. The minister on his part takes more or less the attitude, "Wait till we get further recommendations from the employment commission." That is not good enough in view of the situation which has obtained for the last seven years. We now find statements even in some of the financial papers that it is understood that the government is not going to do anything this year. Why? Because, forsooth, the government will have to wait until a royal commission is appointed and has reported on the respective jurisdictions of the dominion and the provinces. It is the old game of wait, wait, wait-wait and see, in the hope that something will turn up; or, as my colleague very well puts it, wait and do nothing. The minister may say, here are the estimates. But let me point out that these estimates are essentially the reflection of the old policy and they do not adequately meet the situation.

The hon. member for Renfrew South made a very good suggestion when he pointed out that there are a great many community institutions which might usefully be developed.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

In my judgment that would be a far better development than the erection of great "white-elephant" federal buildings. There are many other things that might be done. Take the housing question. I want to make this as a constructive suggestion, though of course it is nothing new. I notice, in the Free Press of March 29:

Utterly disgraceful housing conditions exist at the present time in Winnipeg and in every other large Canadian city. They are very injurious to the health of the people who are crammed into congested quarters, and they lead to rapid moral decline. These are slum conditions, and the world knows their extremely harmful effect. It has striven to replace them by housing of a much better character. The United States is doing so, Great Britain has been doing so for years, and so has practically every other country in Europe. Canada alone has lagged behind. She has neglected this basically important health and social problem and has done virtually nothing. Are Canadians really so helpless or callous that they cannot improve on this record and end the interminable delay in providing decent housing accommodation for an unfortunate class in the urban centres?

Not only is a vigorous attack on the housing problem long overdue in this country, but there never was a time when the employment that would thus be created was more needed. It is an ideal means of providing employment, since about 85 per cent of the expenditure on house construction goes to workers in the building trades and to workers in the industries producing the building materials. And there are thousands of men waiting for jobs in all the larger centres where the better housing is so urgently needed.

And still further:

This cannot be done without the active interest and financial cooperation of the federal government. In all the other countries, the national governments have played a large part in the slum-clearing programs. The present government at Ottawa has shown that it is aware of the problem and apparently it has good intentions. But good intentions do not always lead in the right direction, and in this case they have led nowhere. With the end of the session in sight at Ottawa, there has been no evidence that the government feels the necessity of doing anything in this matter now.

And then the editorial, written by one who has been a strong supporter of the present administration, goes on to point out that something better might be expected because of the promises given by the Prime Minister and other members of the government. This is what the Prime Minister said during the election campaign of 1935:

What I believe the country would welcome above all else would be a comprehensive scheme of urban and rural improvements. Such a scheme would appropriately include the clearance of slum areas, housing programs,

And so on. The Minister of Labour made a somewhat similar statement when he spoke in Winnipeg not long after his return to Canada.

According to reports, he suggested that next summer something might be done. Mr. Purvis, apparently, is in favour of a national housing program. In a recent broadcast he referred to the disgraceful housing conditions in the large cities, and the great advantages of a house-building program in providing employment. It is true that a measure has been brought down this session which provides for loans to people to help in reconditioning their own homes, but that is a mere bagatelle; it does not touch the problem to which I have immediate reference. That problem yet lies before us; and let me repeat, you cannot expect, Mr. Speaker, that that kind of work will be done by our municipalities-in the west, at least; nor can you expect that the provincial authorities can undertake it. If it is to be done at all it must be done by the federal

To the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour let me say that I feel confident—if they will permit me to put it this way-that no better political move could be made on their part than to provide work and at the same time supply decent housing for the tens of thousands of our citizens who are living to-day under what are virtually slum conditions. Why not? The only answer we can get is that we must wait until the royal commission decides the respective jurisdictions of dominion and province. I do not think that kind of an answer will satisfy the Canadian people at this time. It is positively ridiculous that after seven years of this great problem we should now be asked to pass a bill that provides for what is virtually the same policy as we have had for years past. I suppose we shall have to vote for the bill, clause by clause. What else can we do? But before doing so I am glad to have had at least this opportunity of voicing a protest against the inadequacy of the provision that is being made, and of urging upon the government, even at this stage, that they take another point of view and deal in a constructive fashion with this problem, which is bound to be with us for years to come.

Mr. J. J. KINLEY (Queens-Lunenburg): I think it is a sound principle that if you have something you want done you should secure somebody who has local knowledge of conditions. In respect to the matter under consideration there is no body with better knowledge of requirements, especially in the rural districts, than the municipal council. It is true that these councils may tend to be too skimpy, but they are dealing with a dangerous matter, something which may well give rise eventually to difficult conditions for the municipality. As regards the municipalities I represent, we have relief as such.

There has been some cooperation in the building of roads and in other public works; and I think it is correct to say that the government should be guided by the principle that there should be no payment of money for relief unless, if possible, work is done to pay for it. With regard to the cities the opposite is true, and there is considerable merit in the suggestion of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). It may be that the government should deal directly with the cities, where of late unemployment has been so prevalent that a city council can be maintained by the vote of the inefficient people in the community. For that reason, as this is a national problem, it may be that the government should take this attitude with regard to the cities, with their artificial civilization and special conditions, "We are not going to let this originate with the municipality, but we are going to direct it from above, in the interests of the general welfare of the people of this country."

In my riding there is very little unemployment but our industries are so depressed that our people cannot earn enough to make a decent living. You naturally ask, what is the reason? The government told us that they have extended foreign trade and relieved unemployment. Let me tell the house that if the conditions would enable our fishermen to get the American market for our fish it would be of great advantage to the industry. We do not need any government help if we can have our export markets. Restore our market in Santo Domingo. We have lost that market, and have not bought a dollar's worth last year from that rich island. But European countries are dealing with the islanders, selling them various products, because they have made trade treaties with them. The island of Cuba is a potentially rich country producing goods that we could use in Canada. It exports natural products that we could make use of here, and it is a good market for our fish. To-day we are putting a dumping duty on sugar coming into Canada, imperilling one of our very best markets, because we are buying from Cuba less than fifty per cent in value of what we sell to them. The problem is to restore to the fisherman the export markets that he has lost. Some of the particular competing countries that sell their fish products in those markets are not in a position to make as satisfactory reciprocal agreements as Canada can, because they have not the same consuming capacity.

This bill speaks of the distress in the farming industry. Well, there is no better way of making an industry prosperous than by providing a market for it. Provide a market for the fishing industry in Nova Scotia and you will provide a market for the farmer. If fishing is prosperous the farmer in the back country is able to sell his produce to the fishermen, those engaged in the timber business can sell their timber for the building of vessels; in other words, the man on the soil has a local market, which is the best market he can possibly have. Activity in our section of the province depends upon the primary industry of fishing. There is a splendid farming community in my riding; the valley of the La Have river and the Caledonia back country form a splendid agricultural area, but these farmers do not produce enough and are not sufficiently organized to enter world markets except in a few commodities such as potatoes, apples and one or two other things. The local market is important for them. If the primary industry of fishing is The local market is important for successful, then the little industries that produce the things which the fishermen require can also be kept going, thus sustaining the life of the community. I say therefore that the export trade in fish is the best thing we can possibly have for Nova Scotia.

I do not see very much in this bill for fishing but there is some provision for public works. The opinion is sometimes expressed here that money spent on public works is often wasted. It is not so in Nova Scotia, because the fishermen who live along the coast are in a depressed condition, and while they are not unemployed they do not earn enough to make a decent living. Supplement what the fisherman earns by his fishing, give him some work on roads or on public works which are necessary, and you will improve his lot. You will thereby give him enough money to get by in hard times. For that reason I believe that public works are eminently desirable in Nova Scotia. Let me impress upon the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) that the people down there do not believe that they should get something for nothing; they want to work for whatever they get, and they are satisfied with very little. So that public works there are clearly needed. We have not drawn upon the treasury of Canada for relief as some other parts of the country have done, not because we are not in need but because the people there try to live within their means and are content if they are able to make a decent living. I trust therefore that the government will give serious consideration to the question of restoring the lost markets to our fishermen. We should have reciprocal trade relations in which our fishermen should be given adequate consideration. I never could understand why pickled and salt fish were not acceptable to the United States under our trade agreement, because they do not produce these commodities. I suggest that there is a possibility in this direction which the government should pursue. Let us not forget that Cuba and Porto Rico consume more salt fish than the whole of Canada exports. Ten years ago the county I represent exported twice as much salted codfish as the whole of Canada exports to-day. Other countries have expanded their trade by means of treaties and the adoption of modern methods. Why should we be left out of the picture? Some of our members have hardly ever been to the seashore. Do not let us forget that after all the boundaries of Canada are on the sea, and even from the point of view of national defence it is important that we should sustain on our shores a virile prosperous population. Moreover, the people along the shores contribute to the general prosperity of the country.

I have said that other countries are stimulating their export trade. For instance, the republic of France gives a two-dollar export bounty on codfish; and even the island of Newfoundland, whose government some time ago got into financial difficulties, gave thirty dollars a ton towards the building of vessels. That island last year absorbed a part of the loss incurred in deep sea fishing. They produce about one million quintals of fish as compared with 225,000 in Canada. Newfoundland cannot make any independent treaties but under the wing of the British government, who have assumed the responsibility for the island's affairs, Newfoundland benefits in some instances by trade treaties made by Great Britain. France, Norway and other countries have stimulated their export trade. Why should we not also adopt modern methods? I say to the government, cooperate with those who know the business. If there are people down there who know the fishing business, people who have been successful in it, cooperate with them and help them to install modern machinery and to follow modern ideas. They are willing enough to do this but they have not the capital. They are not looking for a dole; they are simply asking for credit. Let us enable them to borrow cheaply and they will do the rest. Give them some encouragement, help them financially, and they will be eminently successful.

The fishermen should get a fair share of the consumer's dollar. In Nova Scotia the buying of fish is becoming centralized. I have under my hand the reports from vessels in which I am interested. These men are not getting their fair share of the consumer's dollar. The duty on fish going into the United States is only one cent a pound. Over half the fish from Nova Scotia goes to the United States. A lot of it is hauled by rail to Detroit and goes in that way. I read in the papers the prices paid in Boston to the fishermen; I see haddock at seven or eight cents a pound when the Nova Scotia fisherman gets two cents a pound. If he could get three cents or two and a half, remember that the extra is all profit; it means that much more for the fisherman. The United States fisherman with the same amount of fish shares about three times as much as a fisherman in Nova Scotia; I have the statements here of individual vessels which I may put on Hansard some time when opportunity offers. I do not know just how we are going to get this fair price for the fisherman. Some people talk of a minimum price, but it is dangerous because it is apt to be considered the fair price, the price that should be paid. Furthermore the fish business is hazardous because of the perishable nature of the article. So that may not be the best way to deal with the matter. At the same time there should be some control over the price paid to the fishermen in this country in order that they · may have their fair share of the consumer's dollar and make a decent living.

Now we have been here two years, and while we try to keep the interests of our industry before the government in an orderly and fair way, the provision that has been made for fishing, in comparison with other industries, has not been adequate. For instance the fisherman is not conceded a loan on floating property It is of no use to provide for loans to fishermen on real estate; the fisherman's estate is upon the sea. He may have a humble cottage; suppose you lend him money on his cottage, and some day he loses his boat. He has borrowed money on his cottage, so he loses his cottage as well and his last condition is worse than the first. There is legitimate need, and it is good business to lend money to certain branches of the fishing industry on floating property. It is being done now, but the resources of private industry have been depleted and they cannot continue doing it. The fisherman with real estate of value does not need to come to the government for money. He can get it elsewhere. He may have $5,000 in his boat and nets and equipment, and his house may be worth only $300 or $400. I think that the act introduced some years ago providing for loans to fishermen on real estate should be amended so that loans up to $2,000 or $3,000 could be made on floating property. It can be insured. Do it through the banks; allow the banks the fifteen per cent margin that you allow them on home improvements. The banks know to whom money should be lent; they are good auditors for this purpose. The fishing industry deserves capital to extend its operations.

With regard to relief money, I hope our people will still keep their individualism and their independence so that they will rather be poor than come to the public for money. I am told that in my riding only a few loans have been made under the farm loan board. The Farmers' Creditors Relief Act is hardly a benefit. It tends to destroy the credit of ninety-five good farmers in order to give five farmers who are not so good some relief from their obligations.

I hope the government will recognize that in taking the time of the committee at this hour for the benefit of the people I represent I regard it as necessary to the fulfilment of my duty to them.

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale): It is not my purpose to criticize the Minister of Labour severely for not eliminating unemployment. I realize that no government can do that hurriedly. But they can at least govern the country in a way that will save considerable money, and spend money where it is most necessary and will create the most employment. I criticized the appointment of the National Employment Commission, and I think my contentions have been proved right. However I shall not press that feature, for no doubt the minister thought he was going in the right direction, although I think it has proven unsatisfactory both to the government and to the people. What we need to-day is a policy of "Do something." If the attempt to do it one way does not succeed, try another. The hon, member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) has been talking about the same old bill and the same conditions that have prevailed over the last few years. We hear so much about prosperity and increased employment but we have not heard yet from the minister what he proposes to do to eliminate unemployment. We should like to hear something of that.

Just a word in connection with the remarks of the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann). I appreciate and agree with most of what he said regarding public buildings. I realize that public buildings are of little consequence so far as relief is concerned; they do not give much employment in construction and do not make much after they are finished. They just create a sore spot during the time of construction for the member in whose riding they are built. There are better ways of spending money than that. Building good roads is one way of eliminating unemployment, because a large proportion of the money goes to labour, unless too much up to date road-making machinery is introduced. Nothing pays this country better than good roads, because tourists follow the good roads, and we all realize that tourists bring a greater revenue to this country than any other industry. We cannot give too much encouragement in the way of good roads to that great revenue-producing industry.

Another suggestion made by the hon. member for Renfrew South was in connection with schools all over the country. I think money could be spent wisely in making schools habitable and putting them in good condition as to light, heating, ventilation and so on. I suggest that for the minister's consideration. The hon. member for Renfrew South touched one point on which I do not agree with him. He said that in Toronto we thought that when we got the measure through to build a tunnel under the western gap it would create no employment. I differ from him; $750,000 out of the $1,000,000 would have been spent on labour. However this government very unwisely cancelled the contract, and I think it cost them $150,000 to settle with the contractor, who probably had not done $50,000 worth of work, so that it was a waste of at least $100,000. We have a committee in Toronto trying to advise the city council where we should have an airport, or whether we should have two. It is known, I think, beyond a doubt that the airport will be built on the island, at Hanlan's Point. This tunnel would not lead from the city to the lake but from the city under western channel and then to the island, where this airport will be located. I do not think anyone in this house would suggest that the city of Toronto should be isolated as far as that airport is concerned. Some day that construction will be carried out, and some day this government, the city of Toronto or some other body will still have to construct this tunnel, because there will be no other means of providing access to the airport unless a bridge should be constructed, and a bridge would cost just as much as a tunnel. So I think you can make up your minds that you wasted that $150,000 when the previous contract was cancelled, because the tunnel will have to be built some time, and no doubt it will cost more than it would have if the project had been carried out some years ago. We could have had a really cheap job done at that time.

Mr. POULIOT: Why not build an underground terminal?

Mr. SPENCE: All right; anything my hon. friend suggests will be all right with me. I [Mr. Spence.]

think it was the greatest mistake in the world to cancel the contract for the construction of the tunnel.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Why not build the airport where you can get at it?

Mr. SPENCE: We will be able to get at it if the tunnel is built, and some day hon. members sitting on the other side will be glad to vote for the construction of a tunnel there. You cannot turn Toronto down all the time; you are getting too much revenue from that city. You can no longer vent your spleen because you do not get any Grit members from Toronto; you have two members from that city now, and you should pay some attention to them. If you do not give us something you will not get any Grit members at all from there the next time, because you are antagonizing the people of that city. All the time we are told to go to the provincial government. Let me tell you that this year the city of Toronto prepared a program calling for the expenditure of some $4,000,000. We were told, and we believed, that we would get at least fifty per cent of that amount from the federal and provincial governments. The money was to be spent in the widening of roads in Toronto. As hon, members are aware, the streets of that city are narrow; they were laid out when horses and wagons and buggies were on the streets. To-day the roads have become dangerous, and this money could have been spent usefully in making the streets of Toronto safe for motor traffic. The city was willing to spend at least fifty per cent of the money, and probably a good deal of employment would have resulted, but nothing has been done as yet.

I think the contentions of the hon. member for Broadview are perfectly sound and that this government should give special consideration to large centres such as Toronto and Montreal, to which the unemployed flock by the thousands. We have been feeding them for years at our own expense, and today the taxpayer is about broke. As the hon. member for Broadview said, no one wants to own property in Toronto to-day, beyond one's own home; everyone is trying to get out from under the burden of carrying either vacant land or other property.

I do not wish to prolong the debate or hold up the bill, but really it is a bad thing for a government to adopt a laissez faire policy and do nothing. I am not condemning this government for not entirely eliminating unemployment, but something should be done at once and the minister should say definitely what policy he intends to pursue. Let us know something about it, because everyone is asking what is going to be done by the federal government. And if the minister has any influence with his good friends in the Ontario house I hope he will use it to see that the provincial government is a little kinder to the city of Toronto, because I do not think we are going to get a square deal otherwise. The harbour board has been looking for some $400,000 from this government for the improvement of Toronto harbour. So far no such sum has appeared in the estimates. I hope when the supplementaries come down they will include an amount of $400,000 for that work, or at least as much as the government can possibly give, because if that is not done the citizens of Toronto will have to find the money themselves, and to-day they are pretty well broke.

Mr. J. A. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I do not think sufficient stress can be laid on the position in which the cities of the country find themselves in connection with the matter of unemployment and relief. No doubt our positions and our views are bound to be coloured considerably by the different parts of the country we represent in this house, but I should like to take this opportunity of saying here what I have already said elsewhere with regard to the peculiar situation of the city of Edmonton, part of which I have the honour to represent.

Possibly because of the lure of the prospective dividends in the province of Alberta, and possibly for other reasons, there has been a very great increase in the population of that city. Formerly it ran second in size to Calgary, but recently it forged ahead of that city, and during the last year or two of the depression period its population increased by several thousand. To become eligible for relief in Edmonton a residence of twelve months is required. People are going on relief in large numbers every day. They come to Edmonton from the rural portions of Alberta and from other provinces; they are maintained by friends and charitable organizations for the necessary period, and then they obtain unemployment relief. The situation is very serious, and sound thinking people of that city have been actually considering a tax strike. To own property, even one's own home, in that city means that one pays a sizable rental by way of taxes, and that situation cannot continue indefinitely. The city of Edmonton cannot expect to receive a reasonable and proper share of the money that is given to the provincial government; I might as well be frank in making that statement. So I should like to impress upon the minister that in providing money for the province of Alberta some effort should be made to designate or earmark a certain portion of that money for relief in the city of Edmonton.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): In various manufacturing journals I have read that the riding which I represent contains perhaps more manufacturing establishments than any other riding in Canada and consequently has a larger number of what are known as ordinary factory workers than any other riding. I am convinced therefore that unemployment among factory workers there is as great as, if not greater than, similar unemployment in any other riding, and I am very sorry to have to make that statement. I want to do what I can to assist the minister and to help him provide work; this is not a time for us to quibble over what should be done and who should do it. I have been thinking that while no doubt cooperation already exists, if there were greater cooperation between the Department of Labour, the Department of Public Works and the marine department so that works could be planned by all three in harmony, a great deal of worth while employment might be provided that at the same time would add to the national wealth.

For instance, the Department of Public Works has already asked for a vote to cover the dredging of the St. Lawrence river, the harbour of Montreal and so on. That is a yearly expenditure amounting to anywhere from $2,000,000 to $5,000,000. Many eminent engineers say that money is really wasted, that while it may remove temporary obstructions in the channel it does no permanent What is the cure? How can it be good. cured? The Montreal harbour and the St. Lawrence river have to have more water. Constant dredging of the river merely lets the water run so much faster. I am convinced that government engineers are qualified to produce plans to ensure a regular flow of water into the St. Lawrence river which would obviate much of the annual work done there-something in the nature of an annual pork barrel—and the money thus saved could be spent more advantageously elsewhere.

Flowing past this city we have undoubtedly one of the greatest rivers of the world so far as the possibilities of conservation of water are concerned. I have made a personal survey of most of the river, and I believe it has great opportunities for the creation of reservoirs on land which at this time is non-productive and to a great extent not occupied.

That would permit the storing of water to provide the necessary increase for St. Lawrence navigation. I maintain a great many thousands of men could be put to work on a project of that kind.

I could deal with the matter at length, but time will not permit me to do so. In the long run the work they would do would cost the country nothing because it would be adding to the national wealth. Hon. members will have noticed what is now proposed by the United States government as the result of the Ohio flood. Those floods, according to a conservative estimate, have meant a loss of at least half a billion dollars. The government is voting many hundreds of millions of dollars to compensate those who suffered as the result of the floods, and are initiating works to the extent of over $800,000,000 to give to the people along the Ohio river the defence afforded those along the Tennessee river, as a result of the great works undertaken on the latter river. Can we not do a similar work in Canada? I had hoped that in the bill we could find some useful work indicated, perhaps something in connection with flood control, a field with which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe), an expert engineer, would be thoroughly familiar. He would be competent to discuss matters of that kind. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) would be in a similar position. Throughout the country flood control projects are necessary. On a former occasion I mentioned the rivers in question and gave an estimate of the cost, using the figures of United States army engineers in connection with their work on flood control in the state of Wisconsin. I also indicated to the house the numbers of thousands of men who could be employed on works on five rivers in Ontario.

May I point out to the minister that that is a field which the Canadian public would endorse, because eventually it would cost the country nothing and in the interim would give a vast amount of employment to Canadian workmen. I must confess that when I go home and meet many young men, representative of thousands of others, who are asking for something to do, I find it most depressing. No doubt the minister and other hon. members have been in the same position. I sympathize with the minister in the problem he is facing. A young man who about the beginning of the depression in 1930 was thirteen years of age, one of thousands such, is now twenty years of age. From the age of sixteen his search for work has not been satisfied; for four years he has not done a tap of work. Then there is the other side of the question to consider: while out of work, what is he doing? He is not learning anything. He is not studying any useful vocation; he is not being trained technically. I am convinced that the country would support a vote which had for its purpose the training of young men to fill useful positions. It is being done in England, where training schools have been set up to train such young men as I have in mind.

A day or two ago I said that to my knowledge scores of expert machinists and tool makers, the need for whom is great to-day, are returning to England. Those men could be used advantageously in the training of the younger men here. The returns show that about 10,023, mostly workmen, returned to England last year, and many of those workmen were experts in their line. On the other hand the young man is not learning anything because no opportunity is afforded him. The result will be that when these expert workmen are needed, those who should be available to design and make the necessary equipment will not be at hand, with the result that the country will not be in a position to compete. I believe these observations indicate another field in which the government might spend money.

The young man who in 1930 was eighteen years of age is now twenty-five, and the probability is that he has not done a tap of work. On the other hand, many who found they could not obtain relief as single men were married so as to get it. As married men they are now on relief and, when there are families, the situation is made even worse. That is a tragedy; it is a situation for which I should like to have seen the bill offer a remedy. The federal government could put these young men to work, but the provincial governments cannot.

On the other hand there is the tragedy of the man who was forty or fifty years of age when the depression came. Meantime many have lost their homes, and now find that they cannot get employment. Why is that so? Thoroughly organized industry has planned insurance schemes. If there were a government scheme of unemployment insurance, perhaps the conditions I am about to describe would not be as serious as they are. Owing to the insurance rates applicable to such industrial schemes, industry with insurance schemes cannot take a man on after he has reached the age of thirty-five. Just imagine a man of only thirty-five years being barred from obtaining employment! That is a side of the question which I am afraid is not being fully considered.

I shall conclude my observations in a minute or two, because I have no desire to hold up the bill.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. MacNICOL: When the committee rose I was pointing out one of the reasons why industry could not employ men over thirty-five years of age. Many of the larger industries have organized insurance schemes, to which they and the men contribute. The rates paid are based upon an age limit of thirty-five and in many cases they do not want to disrupt the scheme by taking on men over forty years of age.

From his past speeches I believe the minister is well acquainted with the activities of previous governments in connection with unemployment matters. Lord John Russell was the proponent of a scheme in England to alleviate unemployment during the late forties or the early fifties. I am not just sure that he was prime minister of England at the time, but he introduced these measures. This is referred to in Blackwood's Magazine of August, 1868. Apparently at that time the old country was facing the same conditions with which we are faced to-day. I feel that unemployment in a large way is beyond any one government's control and it certainly does not warrant too drastic criticism by other parties. I read the following on page 378:

All this while the condition of Ireland was becoming day by day more alarming. The repeal of the corn laws had done nothing for the cottier class, destitute of money as they were wherewith to purchase; while, by lowering the price of home-grown oats, it inflicted severe damage upon the farmers. Distress bordering upon destitution became the universal condition of things in many quarters.

Schemes were introduced in the British parliament to try to tackle this matter of unemployment in a large way. I hope to be able to persuade the minister to do the same thing. He should grapple with this matter in a big way and formulate schemes to provide employment. Here is what they did:

A labour act was likewise passed, which the Whigs, when they came into power, greatly extended, and under this the baronies were enabled to obtain aid from the public treasury, and to employ, chiefly in road-making, men who could find employment nowhere else. Of the gross abuse to which these arrangements led.—

Personally I am not interested in abuses.

—it is not our intention on the present occasion to speak at large. Enough is done when we state generally that the numbers employed on road-making increased from 30,000 to half a million;—

I believe the first number was the number Sir Robert Peel had put to work at road-making. I continue:

—that the monthly expenditure by the government rose from £40,000 to £800,000;

Those schemes provided employment in a large way. If England could do that in the late forties or the early fifties, we should be able to take similar action. Many of our roads take the longest distance between two points. If I want to drive from Toronto to Pembroke I have to go to Brockville or Kingston, then across to Smiths Falls and Carleton Place. This is perhaps only one of scores of similar roads to be found throughout the country. Road-making on a large scale would provide a considerable amount of employment. Another scheme which was put into force in England at that time is recorded as follows:

In the course of the recess he called to his councils men most experienced in such undertakings, and, aided by his colleagues, arranged, with their assistance, a measure for intersecting Ireland with railways, the expense of constructing which should be shared between private companies and the government. It was calculated that an advance of £16,000,000 from the exchequer would bring out £8,000,000 from private capitalists;

We do not want to build any more railroads in this country, but we do need highways.

I should like to sum up in a word or two my recommendations to the minister. I know he will consider them as being offered in the best possible spirit. In the first place, I would include as members of the employment bureaux proposed by the minister some former industrialists. At the present time these bureaux are manned only by former leaders of labour unions, for which I have the highest regard. At times in Toronto I am pressed by men to find them jobs and I have been able to do this occasionally by getting in touch with former employer acquaintances. The advice of these men would be worth while. They are ready to assist the country in its distress and I am sure good results would accrue by their being included in this organization.

I am convinced that we should increase the facilities for technical training. While I realize that all the young men who are without employment to-day would not want technical training, the fact is that many would take advantage of these facilities if they were available. I am mostly acquainted with the iron and steel industry and I know that there are many sons of machinists, blacksmiths, tool makers and other tradesmen who would like the opportunity of this training. If these young men had the right training they would be better able to find employment when we get around this corner and the old world is once more on her feet. The trouble is that when a young man of twenty-seven years of age applies for a position in a factory the employers must take note of whatever insurance scheme they may have in effect. If he happens to be totaly untrained they will be chary about taking him on. If he is able to show that he has been trained in a government technical school they will be more inclined to give him a position.

Then I should like the minister to consider the question of water conservation on the Ottawa river. This scheme would provide additional water for Montreal harbour, which is needed badly, as well as a needed increase in the level of the St. Lawrence river east of Montreal. It would give an immense volume of work at not too large a cost. Large areas along the upper Ottawa river lend themselves readily to water conservation: the necessary dams, of course, could be constructed, and, as in the case of the Tennessee river project, would give a very great amount of hand work in the mixing of cement and the making of earth fills round about. That is scheme number three. Then I suggest flood control measures. I do not wish to repeat what I said on a previous occasion, but all over Canada there are great openings for projects of this kind.

Lastly, there is the making of important roads, the shortest distance between two points. to encourage more rapid transit. I hope that at least some of these suggestions will be regarded by the minister as of a constructive nature. My only purpose is to be constructive. I have no higher opinion of the employment commission than I had before. I should like to see the minister take the problem in his own hands, and with the assistance of his engineers, who are thoroughly qualified, and other departmental officials who must have a wide knowledge of labour conditions, evolve schemes that would provide employment for the largest possible number. Such action, I am sure, would go a long way to relieve the difficulties we are experiencing to-day.

Mr. H. G. CLARKE (Rosedale): I wish to say a few words with reference to unemployment in Toronto. The district I represent [Mr. MacNicol.]

has, I believe, as large a number of unemployed as any area of the same size in Canada, and therefore I urge upon the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) consideration of the construction of an airport in Toronto. Toronto is the centre of one of the most thickly populated sections in the dominion; it has an observatory which furnishes weather reports; there is a good natural location for an airport, and it is the centre to which most of the mining operators of northern Ontario come for their requirements. In this connection I may quote from an article by Captain Boyd, an eminent flyer, and a contributor to the Toronto Weekly Star, in that newspaper of Saturday last. He says in part:

This time, nobody is fooling about Toronto's new airport; it's coming this year; it's going to cost about $1,500,000, and it is going to be finished before the end of 1937—I wonder how long the gullible public will listen to these fairy tales.

Certainly it is becoming absolutely necessary that a real airport be established in Toronto. The government is now expending large sums of money in Trenton on a project of this kind, and it seems to me, considering how much Toronto contributes to the federal treasury, we are entitled to favourable consideration of the construction of one of the finest airports in the country. Later in the article Captain Boyd says:

Airports cannot be built in a day. As a pilot who has flown 800,000 miles, I feel competent to state that one of the finest airports in the world can be built here with far less expenditure than it would cost other cities of the same size. And it could be within ten minutes of the business section of the city.

He also states:

We read about building an airport on the waterfront and an emergency field up north of the city. Why not let us do one thing at a time? All this talk about not being able to land on the bayfront in fog is the bunk.

According to the rate we are going, by the time the airport is ready, landing fast commercial aeroplanes in a fog will be an everyday occurrence.

I suggest that this deserves action by the Minister of Transport in cooperation with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). Also there is a real need at the foot of Parliament street for the construction of a commercial dock. The work could be done at no very heavy expense, and it is a necessary improvement to the harbour of Toronto. I should have thought that these matters would deserve favourable consideration, but, looking through the estimates as well as the supplementary estimates I cannot find that any amount has been set apart for expenditure of any kind in the city of Toronto.

Mr. McIVOR: I would submit two suggestions to the Department of Labour. In our youth we were taught to set our own house in order, and I would say that in the best interests of this house, including those who sit in the galleries, this chamber should be properly wired so that every man can hear what is going on without having to move from his seat. That would give some employment to the unemployed electricians of Ottawa. Another suggestion I would make, looking forward to the opening up of the great centre of Canada, is that the St. Lawrence waterway be started as soon as possible. I think it would be in the national interest to begin work immediately, and I may add that I have great hopes of action by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), because I found last year that, as far as our constituency was concerned, he did more than he said he would do.

Mr. LAWSON: This morning, in reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps), the Minister of Labour suggested that discussion in detail of expenditures should remain over as there were several items included in the special supplementary estimates whereby the total expenditures to be authorized by this bill were broken down. May I ask the minister, preparatory to something else I have to say, if he referred to items 301 to 311 inclusive of the special supplementary estimates?

Mr. ROGERS: Those were the ones that I had in mind. In other words, each of these items refers to an expenditure contemplated to deal with some particular means of attacking the unemployment problem, and my suggestion was that it would contribute to a more concentrated discussion or criticism if, before each of these items were called, I should make a brief statement of what had been done under a similar item, if one existed, during the past year and also explain our reasons for inserting any new item under those supplementary estimates.

Mr. LAWSON: Then, with a view to getting information in order that I may relate it to these items, I would ask the minister to inform the committee now with respect to a subject matter over which there seems to be a good deal of controversy. When one makes a statement as to the number of unemployed now as compared with some given date in the past, there always seems to be some contention about it—that it is not accurate, or that it is accurate. What are the total numbers of unemployed in Canada as of the last date for which there is a return, and what is the date of that return? Do those figures reflect the actual number of unemployed, or the number of unemployed after adjustment for seasonal unemployment? I should like to have the corresponding figures for the same date of 1936 and 1935 so that we may have something for comparison to see where we are going.

Mr. ROGERS: I am not sure whether the hon, member was present when the resolution was before us, but on that occasion I tried to do the very thing he is now asking.

Mr. LAWSON: Are the figures on Hansard?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. We have not what might be described as actual figures of unemployment in Canada, but we have an estimate which is issued from time to time by the bureau of statistics and which does not purport to be more than an estimate.

Mr. LAWSON: But it is an estimate based on the returns of some nine thousand firms.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, and on a number of other factors. That information is set out in Hansard.

Mr. LAWSON: As of what date do the figures in Hansard reflect the situation?

Mr. ROGERS: They are for January or February, or both, of 1937 as compared with 1936, and I believe I gave some figures for previous years. I did take special pains to point out that if we were to obtain an accurate understanding of the situation in a country of seasonal occupations the only way to proceed was to take precisely the same months over a period of years.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are the men under the farm placement and forestry projects included in these figures or will that information be brought down later?

Mr. ROGERS: They were not included in the direct relief figures nor were the number of those in relief camps included in the figures given last year. The figures I give as representing an improvement in the situation are correct as far as direct relief recipients are concerned, inasmuch as comparability is established.

Mr. COLDWELL: How about New Brunswick?

Mr. ROGERS: The figures sent to us by New Brunswick are included in the totals I gave for February of this year.

Mr. MacNEIL: What is the total number of those now under the farm placement scheme?

Mr. ROGERS: The number of placements made according to the most recent report is around 46,000 or 47,000. That does not mean necessarily that all of that 47,000 can now be said to be located on farms. Our information is that possibly there has been a turnover of 20 per cent, so that it would be at least reasonable to conclude that on the basis of the information given to us by the provinces about 80 per cent of the total of 47,961 would now be located on farms.

Mr. MacNEIL: How many are engaged in the forestry projects in British Columbia?

Mr. ROGERS: Under forestry projects in British Columbia there are 4,147. That figure is not confined wholly to forestry projects; there is also a supplementary plan of public works that can be continued during the winter months. All these projects are designed to meet the situation created by the concentration of transients and single unemployed in the larger cities. I am sorry that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is not here because I had intended making some observations upon certain statements he made this morning. I shall reserve them for another occasion. This figure for British Columbia is in addition to the number of farm placements.

Mr. MacNEIL: Will the minister give the number of those engaged in similar projects in all the provinces—that is in addition to farm placements?

Mr. ROGERS: Under the supplementary plans designed to provide employment for single unemployed the latest figures are: Manitoba, 1,128; Alberta, 1,509; British Columbia, 4,147.

Mr. MacNEIL: Not included in the general figures?

Mr. ROGERS: Not included in farm placements.

Mr. LAWSON: Does the farm placement figure of 46,000 reflect the total number of placements since the scheme has been in operation, or only for a particular period? I understand that this act has been in effect for three years.

Mr. ROGERS: No. This particular arrangement has been in operation since October of last year. It has succeeded and is based upon an earlier scheme known as the farm placement scheme.

Mr. LAWSON: Does the figure of 46,000 include those placed under the similar scheme?

Mr. ROGERS: No, only those placed during the past few months beginning in October.
[Mr. MacNeil.]

Mr. DOUGLAS: How many are actually placed on farms now?

Mr. ROGERS: The provinces inform us that there were 46,575 actually on farms at the end of February.

Mr. MacINNIS: Did the minister say that these were not included in the figures given as representing direct relief?

Mr. ROGERS: They were not included this year or in other years, so that the figures I gave as indicating an improvement in respect of the number of those receiving direct relief were accurate in that the comparability was established.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have here the figures put on Hansard by the minister last year. He gave them on March 30. We have the number of homeless persons cared for in federally operated camps and by the western provinces, then the number cared for by farm placement. The numbers are given for each year.

Mr. ROGERS: That was in a statement I made in the house dealing with all aspects of the unemployment problem.

Mr. MacINNIS: That statement gives the total number for 1935 as 1,310,423. Do the figures given this year include the categories I have just read?

Mr. ROGERS: In the figures I gave when the resolution was before the house, which indicated a very definite improvement in the number of direct relief recipients in February of this year as compared with February of last year, the categories which the hon member has just referred to were not included. There is a clear comparability between the two totals I gave as indicating an improvement in the situation.

Mr. MacINNIS: The two sets of figures would not be the same.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): There has been a difficulty for the very reason mentioned by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. Surely we are entitled to know what factors are considered in reaching the totals stated to this house. The other evening the minister said that some are not included, and I am going to make a statement which will clear that up. What I want to know, and think we have a right to know, is, how many unemployed there are according to the records of the department. I would like to know the factors that constitute that category. Certainly the figures we have been getting lately are not the figures we used to get; I can say that frankly. There are some not included in the total that used to be included; and it is the same with respect to relief. Surely the minister can say, we have a record of the unemployed in this country.

Mr. ROGERS: Only an estimate.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, an estimate made by the bureau of statistics. I will tell the committee the reasons why we did not have any record prior to 1931. We might as well clear that up now. In 1930 we estimated the unemployed at 117,000. The number was much larger but it was estimated at 117,000 for one reason only, that being the number that reporting trades unions and firms sent to the bureau of statistics as compared with the numbers that had been employed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In 1930.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, showing 117,000, before the government of that time went out of office, as perhaps the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) will recollect. Then came the census of 1931 and from that census we were able to secure a reasonably fair indication of the number of people actually unemployed, because a column was added to the schedules to provide for that. I think all those above a given age were recorded, the exact age being, I believe, eighteen.

Mr. ROGERS: Probably sixteen.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it was not sixteen, but the minister can obtain that information.

Mr. ROGERS: I will find that out.

Mr. BENNETT: Based on that census the bureau of statistics worked out a formula which they have applied ever since to obtain the estimated number of unemployed. They have the births and deaths and ages and matters of that kind, on which they work out a computation, which is the computation we had in 1932, 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936 and I assume 1937. The other day the minister said the number of unemployed as estimated by the bureau of statistics was 500,000. It is true that is only an estimate, but it is an estimate worked out-or should be; I assume it is, but I should like to know whether it is or not-by the bureau on the same factors and applying the same rules as they did in the years between 1932 and 1936.

Mr. ROGERS: Surely the leader of the opposition is not suggesting that the bureau of statistics either by its own volition or by instruction would change the factors on which that figure is based.

 $31111 - 149\frac{1}{2}$

Mr. BENNETT: I said I should like to know, and factors have been changed so frequently in this country in determining this question that I have a right to make that statement.

Mr. ROGERS: Let me assure my right hon. friend that there have been no instructions of that kind.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not suggest that there were instructions, but I did suggest that factors entering into indices and matters of that kind have been changed. And the change has been stated. I want to know whether the same factors are applied in arriving at the figures for 1937 as in preceding years. The minister says the factors are the same. That means that 500,000 is the estimate of the number of unemployed in February, 1937.

Mr. ROGERS: As against 556,000 in the previous year.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so; that is the position. We have no estimate later than that. Now we come to the question of relief, how many are on relief? We asked the other day whether in making up that number the minister had included those who had formerly been in camps and were treated as being on relief, but who are now dispersed and in some instances in camps in the provinces and in other instances have been placed on farms and cared for in other ways. We wanted to know what was the corresponding total relief number and how that total was arrived at. The minister said the information had been placed upon Hansard. I confess that I heard him make the statement that he would give the details, but I did not know he had placed it on Hansard, because it was not on Hansard the other day.

Mr. ROGERS: I think in answer to the hon, member for York South (Mr. Lawson) I said I had put upon Hansard the unemployment estimates for the same months of two successive years, and also the relief figures.

Mr. BENNETT: That very question was raised the other day. When we asked how that number was arrived at and whether or not it included certain categories the minister's answer was: "I am not in a position to answer that at the moment."

Mr. ROGERS: I answered that question a moment ago.

Mr. BENNETT: I was trying to follow what the factors are that enter into the relief totals. Perhaps the minister will state that, and whether or not the farm placements are included, and whether all the others who have been cared for, who used to be in the camps, are also included. That information is what we desire to secure if possible, because the minister said twice the other day that he was not in a position to give it. Therefore I was waiting for the information which a moment ago he said he gave. Frankly I was not able to catch what he said, but I want to make sure that the information we were to secure is made available.

Mr. ROGERS: In the first place I am advised that the figures of direct relief recipients as given this year are on precisely the same basis as those given from time to time in the annual reports of the Department of Labour.

Mr. BENNETT: They could not be, because in other years unemployed men were in the camps, and now the camps have been abolished.

Mr. ROGERS: They are compiled in precisely the same way. The point is the number of direct relief recipients in other years did not include those who were in the camps.

Mr. BENNETT: But it did.

Mr. ROGERS: They were a separate classification.

Mr. BENNETT: But they were included in the total.

Mr. ROGERS: They were included in the section called "other than direct relief." I was speaking of direct relief recipients.

Mr. BENNETT: But when we were asked how many people were receiving relief for some part of a day, a short or a long time, the figures given included those in the camps, because they were treated as being on relief; they were called relief camps. When we stated the number of people to whom the Dominion of Canada was affording relief, in making up that number we included those in the camps. Now the camps are abolished, therefore those who were being cared for in camps no longer enter into the aggregate of those receiving relief from the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): This question is not merely a matter of tweedledum and tweedledee; it is more serious than that. It is not only a matter of figures; it is mostly a matter of facts. The figures we know; the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and the provincial governments can tell what amount has been spent for unemployment relief in each province. This is known, so let us drop it. The main question, the most important question, is to secure facts about the unemployed. I remember distinctly when we were on the other side of the house and when the right hon. gentleman was prime minister and when he had as minister of labour the dumb Mr. Gordon, it was impossible to get any information about unemployment. Moreover I say that the order given by the government of the day was to refuse to members of parliament any information about unemployment and only to give information about employment, in order to deceive the public and the country. Not only that, sir, but false utterances were put in the mouth of the governor general in each speech from the throne and each prorogation speech, stating that conditions were always better and better when they were worse and worse all the time. And as one who has been deeply interested in the unemployed, because I consider them all as my brothers, in spite of the fact that they are not millionaires and do not belong to the Rideau Club. I say that they deserve some consideration from this government and the provincial governments. I took the trouble to classify them. I did not go to the bureau of statistics for information because they had only partial and very incomplete information resulting from the census. The only way to secure proper information with regard to the unemployed is through the municipalities themselves, and this was done by a member whose name I shall not mention because I do not like to say "I" too often. But what the right hon, member for West Calgary said he would do he did not do, and what I do not boast of having done I have done. This is the difference between us. The right hon. gentleman was always talking of ending unemployment when his silly policies were the cause of unemployment throughout the country. This is the fact; everybody knows it, and I am sorry that the only one to ignore it is the right hon. gentleman himself.

Not only that, sir, but at the time I blamed the director of relief, Mr. Hereford; I said we could not get any information from that department. Later I acknowledged my mistake. It was not his fault; he is a very able man, as I have since said in the house. Mr. Houston, of the same department, is also a very able man, and the best forms for the securing of information with regard to relief were drafted under the supervision of the present Minister of Labour with the assistance of Mr. Hereford and Mr. Houston. Why did they do nothing previously? Because under the former government the order was to give no information at all to members of the house or to the country as to the degree of unemployment throughout this country, and for that reason these able men were misjudged. Now they are getting along fairly well.

I am not strongly in favour of the employment commission; I do not believe in it, but I believe the staff of the Labour department under the very able minister could accomplish marvellous results first by devising a way to obtain proper information with regard to the unemployed and then by advising the minister correctly in the formation of a sane, practical policy with regard to unemployment. We are sincere in that. Why is it that the one most responsible for unemployment in this country is the one who says, "You do not give proper figures"? Has he no memory? Is he suffering from am-Does he remember when I was in the corner of the chamber asking him for information? He could not answer me at all, and his minister was just as dumb as a stone. Once he said, "We are doing our best to get the information," and later I supplied him, as I supplied all my colleagues, with a full report on the classification of the unemployed on relief in half of the largest cities of Canada from coast to coast. That was done once; it could be done again, and it is the only way a proper policy for the relief of unemployment can be drafted.

We have been discussing only the unemployed on relief, but that is just one part of the problem. There are those who are employed part time but who are not paid sufficient to enable them to live properly, to feed themselves adequately, to clothe themselves and their families and to provide proper shelter, even with all the advantages of the home improvement plan. Something must be done in regard to those who are employed only part time. In addition, how many fathers and mothers are anxious about the future of their children, not knowing what will happen to them? The parents can do no more for their children, but those people are not considered at all. It is impossible to get complete information with regard to those employed part time, and it is impossible to get any information concerning those who are unemployed but who are not on relief. It is time we considered these classes, and the only way we can get that information is from the municipalities, through the provinces. In turn, the only way this government can force the provinces to obtain that information from the municipalities and pass it on to the federal Department of Labour is to say, "If you do not give us the information for which we ask we will not contribute a cent towards the cost of relief in your province." Then the information will come forward right away. I suggest to the minister, who is an able man, that he have an iron hand in a velvet glove, and not be afraid to use very strong language to Mr. Aberhart, Mr. Duplessis and any other premier, as well as the treasurers of the provinces; who will say to them that if they do not give the federal government the proper information there will be no federal contribution towards the cost of relief, could obtain quite readily the necessary information. May I add that the minister will not have to use such strong language with the province of Ontario because they have already made the classification of all unemployed who are on relief in the province, according to their trades and occupations.

In addition to that we should have a proper classification of the unemployed. I do not mean only a registration in order to ascertain the actual amount disbursed for relief, but a classification which will show exactly who are Jim the unemployed and Tom the unemployed, where they are from and what they can do. We would save a good deal of money through the fact that duplication in relief would disappear; the same man would not receive two cheques, and relief payments would be made only to those who are in need of them. This is quite clear. Moreover, by that means the government would save more than enough to cover the cost of having such a classification made. Are we to continue in the footsteps of the right hon. member for Calgary West without showing more ability than he showed, when he was Prime Minister, in relieving unemployment? Something courageous must be done, without fear or favour. It is not a matter of discussing this comma, that semicolon or that period and saying, "Well, the balance sheet of the unemployed is not in the condition I should like to see it, with my great knowledge of finance and business." It is not that at all. You must know Jim, the unemployed; you must know Tom, the unemployed; you must know their children. You must know the children of Joe. who has a job but whose sons are more than twenty years of age and without work. This was done in the United States, with great success. The idea was to not only look at the figures showing millions of people in distress but to take them one by one and see what could be done to relieve them. This work takes a long time, but the dominion government is not alone; it must rely on the help of the provinces, if the provinces are sincere in their desire to assist the unemployed. The municipalities should cooperate also.

It takes a very long time to hammer an idea into the head of a stubborn fellow, according to my own experience. Very often my speeches would have been cut short but for that fact. My experience in this house is that an idea must be repeated, expressed in different ways, brought forward time and time again in order to direct the attention of hon. members to important matters. Then, after the idea has been repeated many times, hon. gentlemen start to think about it. And, sir, there is no greater triumph than the triumph of an idea. When a humble man finds that one of his ideas is successful and can be adopted with advantage to the country, he can say that he is satisfied that he has done something. I have won some cases at the bar, but when the Minister of Labour told me that the government would adopt a policy of classification of the unemployed I was satisfied with myself, because it was a policy entirely different from the one followed by the right hon, member for Calgary West and his dumb Minister of Labour, Mr. Gordon. We must have progressive ideas. Those who have been responsible for hard times must realize their responsibility in the matter, and instead of making petty criticisms should offer constructive suggestions.

The idea of the bureau of statistics being a well of information may be all right, but the hon, member for Calgary West did not use that information when he made his famous speech on social insurance. I told him that, and I repeat it, in order to hammer it into his head. It is strenuous work, but I am sure I will succeed, because I will show great stubbornness in the matter. The bureau of statistics is all right for certain matters; it supplies information about money, trade, and matters like that, but when it comes to unemployment we must have information from the unemployed themselves, through the municipalities and the provinces, in order that we may know what will be done with them afterwards, and in order that they may be taken from the lists of unemployed and placed in the lists of employed. That cannot be done only by the dominion government; it cannot be done only by a provincial government, nor can it be done by only a municipal government. But it can be done by all working together, with confidence restored by a sane and progressive policy. The people of Canada will realize sooner or later that collectively they can do more than can any government or a combination of all of them.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. SPENCE: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word or two. I object strenuously to the hon. member for Témiscouata—

[Mr. Pouliot.]

The CHAIRMAN: The minister has the floor.

Mr. ROGERS: I am quite willing to give place to the hon. member, but I am obliged to leave the house early this afternoon and I wished to make a brief statement before going.

Mr. SPENCE: Does the minister object to my making a statement now?

Mr. ROGERS: Certainly not.

Mr. SPENCE: One would think the hon. member for Témiscouata would control himself a little bit, and not harass the house with such statements as he has been making. He has been selected as one of the delegates to attend the coronation, and a man of that calibre should be more courteous than he has been.

Mr. POULIOT: I am uncrowning your leader, that is all.

Mr. SPENCE: We appreciate his entertainment at times, but sometimes it goes too far. We cannot let it go on all the time. The hon member used a word he had no right to use—if it is parliamentary, I am not aware of it.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course it is not.

Mr. SPENCE: The hon. member referred to the ex-Minister of Labour as the dumb Mr. Gordon, and repeated it two or three times.

Mr. POULIOT: He did not answer my questions at that time, and therefore he was dumb.

Mr. SPENCE: I want to say that Mr. Gordon was not dumb when he sat in the house. He was one of the brightest lights in the house, and probably had more friends than the hon. member for Témiscouata. If the hon. member's language was not unparliamentary, at least it was ungentlemanly and should not have been used.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a question of privilege. The hon member for Parkdale has no right to say that I used ungentlemanly language, and therefore I ask him to withdraw.

Mr. SPENCE: You are doing it all the time.

Mr. ROGERS: In order to relieve any uncertainty regarding the figures, I believe I should place on Hansard those for the month of February in the years 1936 and 1937, under the headings which I am informed have been followed from 1932 to the present time, without alteration whatsoever. I am quite sure the leader of the opposition will recognize that certainly I would not be a party to any change in the manner of presenting the figures, in order to produce a result which did not actually exist.

Mr. BENNETT: I would not even suggest it.

Mr. ROGERS: I am quite sure of that. Then, we will follow through the various headings for the month of February, 1936. The first broad classification is that of direct relief. Direct relief figures have always been kept separate from figures connected with "other relief projects." I deal first with direct relief. Under that heading, in the division which is exclusive of the drought area, I find the following figures for February, 1936.

Heads of families	 	253,376
Dependents	 	904,764
Individual cases	 	53,989
Total	 	1,212,129

I now come to the division headed "dried out areas," and for the same month I find the following:

Heads of families	28,908
Dependents	122,018
Individual cases	3,234
	154,160

The figures give a grand total under the heading of "direct relief" of 1,366,289. I now come to the division described as "other relief projects."

Mr. BENNETT: Does that include the dried out areas?

Mr. ROGERS: The total includes the dried out areas. These are the further headings and figures for February, 1936:

Single homeless	 	 39,470
Provincial works	 	 1,897
Trans-Canada
Municipal works	 	 1,895
Farm placement	 	 -13,287
Federal works	 	 799
Relief settlement	 	 18,586
Total	 	 79,805

The figure 79,805 for other relief projects added to the direct relief total of 1,366,289 gives the grand total of 1,446,094.

I now come to comparable figures under the same headings for February, 1937, as reported by the provinces. In that month, under the division "not including dried out areas," we find these figures:

Heads of families Dependents Individual cases		209,978 755,494 56,143
Total		1.021.615

That is the figure, exclusive of the dried out areas. Then, for the dried out areas we have the following:

Heads of f	amilies	 	 	 31,992
Dependents		 	 	 125,603
Individual	cases	 	 	 4,880

This gives a grand total under direct relief of 1,184,090 this year, as compared with 1,366,289 in February of last year. I am sure those are the figures I placed on Hansard the other day.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister said the other day, "I have not that information before me, but I am prepared to answer the question when the bill is before the house."

Mr. ROGERS: I am speaking of the totals. Then, under the heading "other relief projects," in February, 1937, we find these figures:

발생 하는 경험에 가장 없는 것 같아. 아무리를 가장 하는 것이 없는 것이 없다면 없다.	0
Single homeless	5,689
Provincial works	10,128
Trans-Canada	265
Municipal works	418
Farm placements	46,575
Federal works (at date of reporting)	nil
Movement and assistance of settlers.	426
Relief settlement	18,334
Total	81.835

The figure 81,835 for "other relief projects" added to that of 1,184,090 for "direct relief" gives a grand total for February, 1937, of 1,265,925, as compared with 1,446,094 in February, 1936. That again bears out the percentage of decreases I indicated to the house the other day, and which I had previously given in a public statement. That is to say, if we consider only the direct relief recipients, excluding the drought areas, there is an improvement of about sixteen per cent over last year, including the drought areas there is a decrease of over thirteen per cent. Taking all the figures, which would include farm placements and other projects, there is an improvement of about twelve per cent compared with February last year.

If I may ask the indulgence of the committee, I am obliged to leave the chamber early and would therefore move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PROVISION FOR RESERVE CONSTABLES AND NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act to provide for the appointment, calling up for training and duty, and payment of a certain number of men as reserve constables, to be known as the "Royal Canadian Mounted Police Reserve," and for the appointment from among such constables of reserve non-commissioned officers; to provide also that time served in the permanent forces of Canada may be included in the term of service of an officer or a constable for pension purposes; and to provide further that any person who ceases to be a constable shall have the right to continue the payment of instalments for pension purposes or the right of withdrawal of all such contributions.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Chairman, the bill which will be introduced after this resolution has been agreed to by the committee will relate mainly to a force to be known as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police reserve. There is already a provision in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act providing for the creation of a Royal Canadian Mounted Police reserve. Under the provisions of that act this reserve was composed of former members of the force, and because of the age of the men who would be qualified as members, it has never been acted upon. The object of the proposed amendment is to replace section 28 of the old act with a new section to authorize the creation of a reserve of men between the ages of eighteen and forty years. This reserve will be trained each year for a period not exceeding three months. The intention is to have the training period extend for two months in the first year, and for only one month in the following year. It is suggested that a reserve of 300 men be created, at a cost of $80,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Per annum.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): For the first year, and possibly a little less for the other years. If these 300 men were placed on the permanent force the cost would be over $500,000 per year. It will be recalled that when there was a need for more men in the force two or three years ago because of conditions then existing, it was found necessary to add 200 men to the strength. These men were kept on and have been absorbed into the force. The policy has been to retire those who could be retired in order to create positions for those who were engaged at a time of emergency. With this reserve we would have a number of well qualified men upon whom we could call in cases of emergency and not make it necessary to add to the permanent force. This reserve would offer trained recruits for the permanent force when vacancies occur.

I believe this reserve force is necessary and in the long run I think it will prove economical. I might mention that last year, because of the reduction in our estimates, it was found necessary to decrease the strength of the permanent force by fifty men.

Mr. BENNETT: No governor general's warrants?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Apparently those do not circulate when it comes to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The result is that there are no reserve officers and the permanent force has been overworked because of this decrease.

The other features of the bill are purely matters of routine and perhaps it would be better to wait until the bill is before the house before explanations are given.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Chairman, I do not think the minister has given sufficient reasons for increasing the strength of this force. He has told us that because of a reduction in the estimates the force was decreased by fifty men last year. If the strength of the permanent force is not sufficient, the logical thing to do would be to increase the estimates in order that the permanent force may be maintained at its full strength. Apparently the minister does not want to do that. He is now asking for an additional 300 men to form a reserve force. The only reason the minister has given for creating this reserve force is that some emergency may arise. He has not been good enough to inform the committee what that emergency may be. I know the minister knows what I have in mind, and I know what he has in mind, but he has not been frank enough to state it. When he referred to an emergency which occurred a few years ago, we all know he referred to the Regina situation. There were not sufficient police to take care of that situation. Whether it was handled as it should have been handled is quite another matter, but there was considerable criticism from the opposition benches, upon which the present minister was sitting, of the way in which the situation was handled.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Another reason why I object strongly to this resolution is the fact that only a few weeks ago the home defence force of this country was increased considerably. If the home defence force was increased, what logical reason is there for increasing the mounted police force?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is not correct. It was not increased.

Mr. HEAPS: I think it is quite correct, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. HEAPS: Then I do not know what the increase of several million dollars in the estimates of the defence force was for if it was not to add to the home defence force of Canada. My recollection is that when the estimates were before this chamber it was stated that they were for home defence purposes, and I believe that, should any emergency arise in this country, when the increased estimates have been utilized for the purpose for which they were passed, there will be a greatly increased force to be called upon for that purpose. The defence force already in existence is capable of taking care of any condition which may arise, and why we are asked to provide for three hundred men as a reserve force of the mounted police is beyond my comprehension. If it is to be employed against subversive elements, I would repeat what the Minister of Justice said in the house yesterday, that there are other ways of dealing with unrest than by a show of force on the part of the government. Let them get at the root cause of that unrest. If it arises from unemployment, then let the causes of unemployment be examined, and when remedies are found and applied much of the existing unrest will disappear. We are sometimes regaled in this house by references to what may be called the communist bogey —for to a large extent it is a bogey. To some extent communism exists in Canada, and possibly there is no part of the country where the communist element is stronger than in the constituency I have the honour to represent. Outside of Winnipeg and a very few other constituencies there is hardly any communist sentiment in this country, but it seems to serve at times as a very convenient bogey or excuse for bringing in legislation of the kind suggested in the resolution which is now before the committee.

I repeat that I cannot understand why these three hundred men are to be added to the mounted police force. I am satisfied that the ordinary good sense of the people of this country, as the Minister of Justice suggested yesterday when he referred to the case at Sudbury, can be relied upon to deal with situations of that kind. Even the small minority of communists of whom some people seem to be so much afraid may be more mild-mannered than is sometimes supposed. Within the past few days the one communist who sits for a Manitoba constituency in the legislature of that province was invited to a social function given by the lieutenant governor. He gracefully and willingly accepted; with his wife he attended the function, and no one would have recognized, I think, any difference between him and any other person present.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is no new thing.

Mr. HEAPS: If the minister has in mind any reason for expecting that there will occur in the immediate future some event in connection with which the services of these men will be needed, I shall be glad to hear from him. Up to the present all he has referred to is something that occurred in Regina; he spoke of that as an emergency which arose a few Can he tell me of any other years ago. Can he tell me of any other emergency? I doubt if he had any other in mind. It is my conviction that if the government desire to do away with the possibility of such situations they can do so by bringing in social legislation of the right kind. There would then be no necessity to provide estimates for additional police.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My hon. friend referred to what I stated yesterday. I have not a word to change.

Mr. HEAPS: I referred to the Sudbury incident.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I adhere to what I said; but if my hon. friend will read my remarks he will see that, having made the statement to which he referred, I said that order will be maintained in Canada and that all necessary steps must be taken to ensure our continuing to live as we have done so far. The hon, member says that we are increasing the force by three hundred men; that is not so. He said, if you reduced the force last year by fifty men, why not reappoint those fifty; but if we did that it would cost over $100,000, or a good deal more than the pay of these reserve men will amount to while they are in training. It is to avoid an increase of the regular force that we are proposing to take the action that is now recommended.

The hon, member seems to think that the mounted police have no other purpose than to deal with riots or disorder. The mounted police have to see that all the federal laws, the rules and regulations of every department of the government, are observed; every day they are receiving from various departments of governments instructions to act for the purpose of enforcing federal laws in all parts of the country; and the hon. member knows that the business of the dominion government and its departments, so far from decreasing, is increasing all the time. I do not know what else I can tell my hon. friend. He says that I have not given enough explanations. He asks me what emergency I have in mind. But emergencies, unfortunately, are usually unforeseen; they happen when we do not know that they will happen. It is hard for me to tell the hon. member what may or may not occur. I hope that no emergency will arise which will require any additional force, but if it should come, as the one who is in charge of the Department of Justice, and in that capacity controls the Royal Canadian Mounted Police force, I shall take the responsibility of asking parliament to add to the force such reserves as are needed.

Mr. MacNEIL: In spite of the explanation made by the minister, I am still at a loss to understand why the government should take this indirect method of increasing the personnel of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I quite admit the force of the minister's remarks. I have carefully studied the report of the activities of the force, and much may be said by way of commendation of their activities, particularly with regard to dealing with the drug trade, the marine section, the patrol work, the work in the Northwest Territories; in fact the sum total of their activities is quite impressive. But great uneasiness will be caused throughout the country by the explanation made by the minister that the force is to be increased by what may be described as more or less of a subterfuge in order to deal with some imaginary emergency. Immediately we have the right to assume that that emergency is one arising from industrial unrest.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. MacNEIL: Thus this reserve presents itself as a sort of federally-authorized committee of vigilantes, men whose standing may be indefinite until that emergency arises, and then, at the call of the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, they are to be brought into action to suppress any disorder arising from industrial struggles. That will cause grave uneasiness.

I plead with the minister that if an addition to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police [Mr. E. Lapointe.]

is required, he should take the frank and straightforward method of increasing the force. The duties of the force are clearly outlined with regard to ordinary activities-the agreements with the various provincial governments, the work in the northern part of the dominion, the suppression of the traffic in narcotics, and patrol work on the coast. Surely the requirements of all this work can now be definitely estimated, and if it is necessary to increase the personnel of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, let estimates be submitted providing for such increase; I do not think that parliament would be reluctant to deal with the ordinary requirements of the force in that regard. But to suggest, as the minister has done in his remarks, that in the event of industrial unrest, men who are half trained, men with regard to whom we cannot be certain that they are under the control and discipline of the force, may be called out in a time of emergency to deal with such conditions, implies a radical departure from the methods hitherto employed in policing the dominion, and instead of increasing the prestige of the force, will certainly lay it open to even graver criticism than has been levelled against it in the past.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The Minister of Justice said that his reason for not accepting the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North, to the effect that those men who have been removed because of lack of money should be reenlisted, is that it would cost over $100,000. The estimates show that the vote for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police this year has been increased $400,000 I have before me the estimates for the past few years, and though there was a cut last year it has been more than made up by the increase this year.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is for other purposes. I will give the particulars when the estimates are before us.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The figures are:

	-			1535	-	70	-77	0	-	-10
1934-35.											$5,745,595
1935-36.											5,905,595
1936-37.											5,594,800
1937-38.											6.017.000

It would not be difficult to find another $100,000 in order to reenlist fifty men who have been displaced. If the minister intends to come to the house later on and ask for an increase of $400,000 in the estimates it should not be difficult for him to persuade the house to make it $500,000 so as to enlist these extra fifty men. Instead of that he is establishing a dangerous precedent in setting up in Canada what will amount to a group of storm troops or reserves whose exact relationship to the state is not clearly defined. It seems to us that the sane and sensible thing to do would be to increase the legitimate force.

Mr. CHURCH: It is apparent to everyone that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has been a credit to the parliament of Canada from the time it was established. There is undoubtedly a certain amount of overlapping between one force and another—the civilian police, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the immigration police, the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific police. Taking all these forces together we have a considerable organization in Canada. I was chairman of a board of police commissioners for seven years in a time when there was a great deal of trouble in the country and I can speak with some knowledge of their efficiency. I believe that the act should be amended to provide that in any emergency the permanent militia in Canada might be called upon to serve as reserve mounted police officers. If a riot breaks out the mayor or the sheriff must appeal to the minister and to the general officer commanding the district in order to have the police called out. That is the procedure under the criminal code and a great deal of time is lost.

As regards any suggestion of giving away the secrets of the force, obviously that is something that cannot be contemplated for a moment. The police cannot be expected to lay their cards on the table; their secrets are vital to life and property in the country, and the minister's department should not be called upon to divulge anything. Did anybody ever hear of a civilian police force going around with a brass band broadcasting all its secrets?

The fault I have to find is that the number provided for here is not large enough; instead of three hundred the minister should make it five hundred or one thousand, and take in some of the returned men who are out of work. Some of the finest policemen in the larger municipalities are graduates of our universities. I have in mind two young men, graduates of Queen's who made short work of the panhandlers in Toronto. I know of another recruit, also a graduate of Queen's, who was taken from north Toronto to clean up the panhandlers there near the union station. The inspector had him placed in station. The inspector had him placed in charge of that work and he made a good job of it; many of the men were thieves and pickpockets, and there were even some bandits in the gang that he got rid of.

This is one of the most important departments of government. In one sense it is the most important, because the protection of all life and property in the country depends upon it. It operates in every part of Canada from coast to coast. I wonder what the minister thinks of further coordination among the various forces. I would direct his attention to certain striking remarks of Major General MacBrien the other day in Toronto in an address to university of Toronto graduates at their annual dinner, in which he said that the time had come when the federal authority should take over the provincial police system. I believe there is something to be said for that suggestion. At the Union station in Toronto, at the station in Hamilton and in other large cities one can see representatives of the various police forces of the countryimmigration police, mounted police, railway police and others. In my opinion some of the work done by the immigration officers could be taken over by this department. The time has come for coordination. I suggest to the minister that young men from our high schools, out of work for some time, and returned men might be taken into the force; they would make excellent policemen. In Canada we have been fortunate so far in our freedom from the terrors of the kidnapper, but kidnapping is not altogether unknown even in this country. The more we can do, therefore, in the way of coordinating our various forces and strengthening a common police organization for the dominion as a whole the better it will be for Canadians. Representatives of the chief constables associations, both federal and provincial, are unanimous in commending the work done by this department, and I believe that the force should be given increased powers all along the line. At any rate there should be an adequate force available as a reserve in every military district in Canada. I would commend to hon, members the report of the proceedings of the chief constables association, who have advocated greater cooperation, though I must admit that there is a good deal of cooperation at the present time. But the work should be extended, and I hope when the minister is in the old country, he and the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition—they have always been good friends of the police-

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CHURCH: Well they have been good friends of all our police systems and eager to help them. I hope something may be done along the lines of Major General Mac-Brien's suggestion. I believe there is considerable overlapping of the different systems, five different departments looking after police work and bandits and kidnappers. We found a few years ago on two or three occasions in Toronto that there was no cooperation, there was not the coordination there should be between the county and provincial and city police and the mounted police, although they were all there but they cooperate now very well.

Mr. MacNEIL: Will the minister inform the committee of the number on the reserve of the force, if any, under the existing provision of the act?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is none. The existing provision says that the governor in council may from time to time authorize the commissioner to appoint by warrant under his hand such officers and men who have served in the force as a reserve to be known as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Reserve. My information is that that provision has never been acted upon. One of the main reasons is that ex-members of the force are rather of an age which would not permit them to render the services required.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister give the numbers in the mounted police force from the time they were amalgamated with the provincial services?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I shall try to get the figures for my hon. friend when the bill is in committee. I can tell him that to-day the effective strength of the force is 2,550 men.

Mr. BENNETT: I think some of my friends to the left are labouring under a misapprehension. The vote for the mounted police pays for the whole police, but we get a substantial sum from the various provinces with which we have an agreement under which we discharge police services within their area. The total we vote does not indicate what we as a dominion spend on the service, because part is reimbursed by some of the provinces, six in all I think. The minister might have pointed out also that the police discharge the very onerous task of looking after the enforcement of the customs act and the excise act, dealing with smuggling and matters of that kind.

Mr. DUNNING: Narcotics particularly.

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to speak of that separately. These duties were especially onerous during the time of the operation of the prohibition law in the neighbouring republic, because liquors were brought to our [Mr. Church.]

shores—but that need not be discussed now. I understand that the present strength is 2,550. The late government increased the force, for reasons which were misunderstood by many; the principal reason was that by agreement with the provinces the Royal Canadian Mounted Police was to discharge certain duties for the provinces. Certainly the method which the minister proposes to adopt is far better than adding 300 men permanently, when they might not be required. This merely creates a body of 300 men between the ages of eighteen and forty—I thought the age was thirty-five—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No, forty.

Mr. BENNETT: These 300 men will be selected in the same way as recruits for the force, but they will not be in uniform and will not be paid. They will get training, the reserve will be partially trained men who, united with fully trained men, will be able to discharge the duties, if I have followed the minister aright. I think that instead of adding to the financial burden, as apparently my friends think, it will lessen the financial burden by creating a reserve which will be available if necessity arises, without making a permanent addition to the force. Instead of making it 2,850 it leaves it at 2,550. Possibly it would be better to wait now until one sees the bill, but that is what I understand will be the effect. In two years these reserve men will get three months' training, two months the first year and one the second. Are they to go into uniform at once and be attached to the depots?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No.

Mr. BENNETT: There are two other principles involved in the resolution to which I did not refer. With one of them I am not at the moment in accord, but I reserve my right to express my views at a later stage.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Which one?

Mr. BENNETT: The final one, the question of making the force a continuing insurance company. I have some doubt about that.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time and concurred in. Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 83, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPREME COURT ACT

AMENDMENT TO CLARIFY PROVISION RESPECTING APPEALS

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 78 to amend the Supreme Court Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the whole bill. Perhaps the minister will make a statement.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Section 37, which is to be amended, is the section of the Supreme Court Act which deals with per saltum appeals. The other sections deal with appeals de plano. When in 1930 the section was amended the intention was that the leave of the court of final resort in the province should be required, as well as the consent of the parties, precedent to an appeal being permitted without going to the court of appeal of the province. But the language of the section does not express the intention as clearly as it should have been expressed. Perhaps I had better read the present section 37:

Where the amount or value of the matter in controversy in the appeal exceeds the sum of two thousand dollars, subject to section thirty-eight, an appeal shall lie directly to the supreme court from any final judgment of a provincial court, whether of appellate or original jurisdiction, other than the highest court of final resort in the province, pronounced in a judicial proceeding, which is not one of those specifically excepted in section thirty-six,

(a) by leave of the highest court of final resort having jurisdiction in the province in which the proceedings were originally instituted; and

(b) by consent in writing of the parties, or their solicitors, verified by affidavit and filed with the registrar of the supreme court and with the registrar, clerk or prothonotary of the court to be appealed from—

This amendment was made in 1930 at the request of the judges of the supreme court themselves, and the intention was that the two conditions should be fulfilled, namely, the consent of the parties, plus the leave of the court of final resort; but apparently it has been considered by some that it was in the alternative rather than that both conditions were required, and cases have come to the supreme court here. Although the supreme court have maintained that it was intended that both conditions should be required, it is thought better to clarify the situation so that no ambiguity might continue to exist.

The purpose of the amendment is—and this time it is expressed very clearly; the judges of the supreme court had a hand in its preparation-first, that no suitor who has obtained judgment in his favour in a provincial court should, without his consent, be brought by way of appeal before the supreme court without the opportunity of having judgment pronounced upon his case by the court of last resort in the province; second, that on public grounds the consent of the parties should not in itself be sufficient to entitle either of them to come before the supreme per saltum, but that such consent should be supplemented by leave of the provincial court of final resort; third, that there should be no right of appeal per saltum except upon some question of law, for it seems obvious that questions of fact before coming to the supreme court should be pronounced upon by the court of last resort in the province; and fourth, that there should be no appeal per saltum from provincial tribunals presided over by persons appointed by authority of the provincial legislature. Such tribunals as a rule are mainly concerned with controversies relating to matters which are solely administrative in their character. Of course, this applies only to appeals per saltum and not to appeals de plano, when there is a final judgment by the court of last resort in the province.

The main purpose is to provide that when there is no appeal to the court of final resort in the province there should not be an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. There should not be leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada when, under the statute that exists, there is no appeal to the court of last resort in the province. I think this is merely to clarify the situation that already exists, and which has created some difficulties and been the cause of some litigation.

Mr. BENNETT: There has been a great deal of controversy about the section, as the minister knows, and the registrar of the supreme court has held that there must be both the consent of the parties and the leave of the court of last resort in the province before an appeal would lie per saltum. Personally I have another view with respect to the last two clauses, which go beyond anything we have thus far done. The first reads:

No such leave shall be granted by the highest court of final resort unless an appeal would lie to such court of final resort and also to the supreme court from the judgment of such court pronounced in such appeal.

Inasmuch as this applies only to cases in which over $2,000 is involved, it follows that the right of appeal is the right of the litigant as far as that last section is concerned, and also "to the supreme court from the judgment of such court pronounced in such appeal," for the first words of line 10 are:

-where the amount or value of the matter in controversy in the appeal exceeds the sum of two thousand dollars—

This brings it within the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada, and I find much difficulty in understanding the additions at line 23. The third subsection certainly is a somewhat restrictive clause as compared with what has prevailed heretofore. It states:

-no appeal shall lie to the supreme court except from the highest court of final resort having jurisdiction in the province in which the proceedings were originally instituted.

That is the law at the moment; and why it should be expressed again in those restrictive terms, having regard to the fact that an appeal lies as of right, as the minister says, where there is over $2,000 in controversy-and this section only applies to cases in which the amount involved is over $2,000 and therefore the jurisdiction of the court attaches-I cannot quite follow.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I think the first two lines of the subsection are the most important for they indicate the purpose. The rest of the subsection merely says that it must, as well, be appealable to the court of final resort.

Mr. BENNETT: To the supreme court; that is the one I am directing attention to.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It would be appealable in any case.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, if it came within the provisions of the section at all. I had a note about the matter the other day which I have not before me at the moment. If the minister would move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day, it would give me an opportunity to look at the note, and third reading could be given this evening. I had a communication from a member of the profession; I looked up the matter and made a note, and I should like to make sure that I have correctly stated the objections to the statute as indicated by the communication I received. The legislation will not be delayed, because third reading can be given to-night.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Very well. I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Mr. BENNETT: In the meantime the section may be carried. If it is necessary to speak to the matter again I can do so.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If the section is carried, should not the bill be reported?

Mr. BENNETT: No, the committee can ask leave to sit again this day.

Section agreed to.

Progress reported.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

REPEAL OF PROVISION RESPECTING GRATUITY IN LIEU OF LEAVE ON RETIREMENT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 55, to amend the Department of National Revenue Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know that I need add very much to the explanation I gave on the first reading of the bill, but perhaps I might go into it a little further. The provision which it is sought to repeal was enacted in 1928, and reads:

Whenever any officer in the service of the department may be granted a period of leave of absence with pay on his retirement from the absence with pay on his retirement from the service, he shall, in lieu of such leave of absence with pay, be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund, a gratuity equal to the amount of pay which he would have received if he had been granted such leave of absence, and the position occupied by him that and the position occupied by him shall become vacant as from the date of such payment.

Of necessity the practice under the section is that just before an officer of the Department of National Revenue reaches the age of sixty-five years, instead of being given leave of absence with pay to which he is entitled, he is retired from the service and paid a gratuity equal to the amount of pay he would have received had he been granted such leave of absence. But it will be noted that his position becomes vacant when he retires from the service, and superannuation begins from the time of the vacancy. The result is that he is being paid a gratuity in lieu of his ordinary remuneration for the same period for which he is receiving a pension.

That practice does not prevail in any other department of the service, and it is to remove such discrimination that the bill is introduced. It could be done in another way, namely, by extending the rule to all other departments of the service; but there does not seem to be any good ground for making such extension. It seems to be in accordance with fairness and justice to pay a civil servant until his service expires and then-and only then-place him upon a pension. That is what will be done.

The objection may be raised that on occasions it is desirable to render a position vacant and to make a new appointment immediately.

Mr. BENNETT: That can be done.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that can be done by order in council. In other departments of the government where it is found desirable to do that, orders in council are passed on recommendation of the treasury board, by which positions are rendered vacant and then filled.

Mr. BENNETT: And the man retired gets six months gratuity, with his pension.

Mr. ILSLEY: The civil servant retiring under those circumstances gets his pension, plus a gratuity equal to the difference between his pay and his pension for that period. That is just, and will be the position in the present instance, hereafter.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

VALUES FOR DUTY PURPOSES—DRAWBACKS IN RESPECT OF CONSUMABLE MATERIALS AND EXPORTED GOODS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Customs Act to provide for certain conditions in estimating the value for duty of goods imported into Canada, also for the ratification and confirmation of certain values for duties heretofore fixed, and further to provide for drawbacks in respect of consumable materials and for drawbacks in the case of certain exported goods.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it would be more convenient for everyone if the bill were before the house before much discussion were to take place on the subject matter of the resolution. The bill contains a variety of amendments to the Customs Act, some of which might not and some of which might be described as important. It is impossible to give any comprehensive idea of the subject matter of the bill without dealing with each section in detail. I am willing to answer any questions at this time, but I do suggest that if the bill were before the house it might be more properly dealt with.

Mr. LAWSON: The difficulty in following the minister's suggestion is that very frequently one desires either to seek information or to look up a previous statute or correlated information, and if we wait until the bill is before the house there is no time to do that.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister is asking only for first reading, and will leave second reading until a later time.

Mr. LAWSON: Oh, I understand. The minister has said some of the provisions are not important, while others are. Would he indicate the amendments which he considers important, and which in any way change the principle upon which valuations have previously been made, or the method of making them?

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, there is a section of the act authorizing the fixing of values of fruits and vegetables in certain areas of Canada. That was the practice followed by the late administration and by the present one; and questions having been raised as to its legality, it is the desire of the government to place the matter beyond doubt. I believe that amendment is of some importance.

Another section of the bill deals with the legality and regularity of certain values which have been fixed in times past by ministers of national revenue. I believe those values relate entirely to fruits and vegetables. Certain importers who are seeking refunds from the department allege that values fixed by the last administration in one way or another have been faulty, because certain technicalities have not been complied with.

Mr. BENNETT: The practice has been continued by the present administration.

Mr. ILSLEY: But the petitions of right which have been filed, and the refunds claims, are based entirely upon alleged irregularities under the last administration; I say that only as a matter of information. It may be that under the present administration the same practice has to some extent been followed; but as a matter of fact, I believe all the complaints relate to administration by previous ministers.

Mr. LAWSON: Does the present bill propose to validate the steps which were taken?

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 3 of the bill proposes to validate those steps and the collection of duties thereunder, exempting, however, petitions of right which are now outstanding.

There are a few miscellaneous amendments, including a provision whereby collectors or examiners need not examine one package in ten, which practice has been found impossible of performance. Further, there is a change in the section relating to the payment of drawbacks, but the change merely makes the section conform to the practice and is not of vital importance. There are two or three minor amendments which it is not necessary to mention.

Then there is a somewhat important amendment relating to the exportation and importation of arms and munitions and other articles that may be used in war. This amendment provides for the repeal of the two sections of the Customs Act which relate to that matter. It has been carefully drafted to meet what are thought to be the requirements of the present day.

Mr. CHURCH: When the Canada-United Kingdom trade agreement was being considered some questions were asked in connection with items 427 and 427a, covering machinery. Certain classes of machinery when imported for use in mining come in duty free, but when imported by small manufacturers they pay a duty of from 15 to 35 per cent, plus an eight per cent sales tax and a three per cent excise tax. Will the minister consider what was said in connection with these items, as reported at page 2068 of Hansard, when he deals with the bill to be based on this resolution? The Minister of Finance promised to bring it to his attention.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will do that.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 84, to amend the Customs Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS PROFITS WAR TAX ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PROCEDURE IN DEALING WITH APPEALS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to revive and amend the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, to validate any actions which may have been taken since the coming into force of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, and to provide that the procedure for dealing with appeals from assessments under the said act shall be similar to the procedure for dealing with appeals under the Income War Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Chairman, at the request of my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), I am making a brief explanation of this bill.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

The Business Profits War Tax Act was enacted in 1916 and was in force in respect of accounting periods ending in the years 1915 to 1920, both inclusive. By chapter 10 of the statutes of 1924 it was enacted that all taxes, interest and penalties payable under the said act should remain a tax owing to His Majesty until fully paid and satisfied. This was the situation up to the time when the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, came into force and effect on February 1, 1928, by proclamation. The effect of the coming into force of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, is set forth in chapter 65 of the statutes of 1924, being an act respecting the Revised Statutes of Canada. The said chapter 65 of 1924, after providing for a certified roll of the acts or parts of acts which are to be included in the Revised Statutes of Canada, provides in section 2 for a schedule of repealed enactments as follows:

2. There shall be appended to the said roll a schedule A similar in form to schedule A appended to the Revised Statutes of Canada of 1906; and the commissioners may include in the said schedule all acts and parts of acts which though not expressly repealed, are superseded by the acts so consolidated, or are inconsistent therewith, and all acts and parts of acts which were for a temporary purpose, the force of which is spent.

Then by subsection 2 of section 5 of the said chapter 65 of 1924 there is a provision for the repeal of the enactments contained in the said schedule A on, from and after the date when the Revised Statutes of Canada are proclaimed to have come into effect. Subsection 2 of the said section 5 provides:

5. (2) On, from and after such day, all the enactments in the several acts and parts of acts in schedule A abovementioned shall stand and be repealed to the extent mentioned in the third column of the said schedule A.

In the said schedule A appended to the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, and all the amendments thereto are noted as "spent" in the third column of the said schedule. Other acts dealing with other subjects which were not repealed or consolidated are noted in the said column of schedule A as "not repealed or consolidated." Other acts which are included in the Revised Statutes of Canada are noted in the said third column as being consolidated. Still other acts which were repealed by enactments of parliament prior to the coming into force of the revised statutes are noted as being repealed by the chapter number of the year of such repeal.

In no case, however, is an act such as the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, the force of which was spent in so far as current years assessments were concerned at the time the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, came into force, noted as being repealed in the third column of the said schedule A; but by reason of the provisions of subsection 2 of section 5 of chapter 65 of the 1924 statutes, referred to above, an act which is noted as being "spent" in the said third column is deemed to be repealed and as no longer having any force or effect. I may say that there is some doubt whether an act which is merely described as being "spent" is really repealed, but my own opinion is that it is repealed by being so described in that column.

Apparently it was the intention of parliament, at least in 1924, to enact that taxes which actually fell due between 1915 and 1920 should remain taxes and be paid. I suggest that it was never contemplated in 1927 that the mere inclusion of this measure in the "spent" column meant that a person who owed taxes due in the period between 1915 and 1920 should not thereafter have to pay those taxes. This act revives the Business Profits War Tax Act of 1916 in so far as taxes which fell due during the period between 1915 and 1920 are concerned.

There are two other provisions which relate to those parts of the Business Profits War Tax Act giving a right of appeal to the tax-payer. The procedure for appeal under the Business Profits War Tax Act is very cumbersome. If a matter is at all complicated, as certain matters which will have to be dealt with under the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, may be, appeals will prove very expensive. The provision in the Business Profits War Tax Act with reference to appeals is for the appointment of a board of referees. Then there are appeals from the decision of that board.

Mr. BENNETT: It followed the English practice, unfortunately.

Mr. ILSLEY: The provisions for appeal in the Income War Tax Act are much more direct and much cheaper, both for the crown and for the appellant, and it was deemed advisable to get rid of this board of referees provision. The referees, I might mention, are appointed by the government. To conduct an appeal under those provisions the government has first to appoint a board of referees, who will have to be paid, and they would have to select, I suppose, counsel, who might work for months in conducting the appeal, only to find at the end that there would be another appeal. So this act that I am introducing substitutes the appeal procedure in the Income War Tax Act for the appeal procedure in the Business Profits War Tax Act.

Mr. BENNETT: They can get to the exchequer court quicker, if they so desire.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Going to the minister and then to the court; is that it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Only one point arises which involves a question of principle, and that is the effect upon the law of indicating as an appendix to the Revised Statutes of Canada that the operation of the act was spent. That is the whole issue as far as the first part is concerned. I would construe that to mean that it was spent for the purposes of imposing taxation; but for the purpose of the lien of the crown for taxes I should think it is still in force and effect, because the right of the crown in any event to claim a lien is one of its prerogatives, apart from every other consideration. I do not think we should even take time in discussing it, because it is desirable to remove any doubt that there may be upon that point.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: If there is any doubt, then remove it by a short statement, by an enactment in appropriate words, indicating that doubts have arisen and it is desirable to resolve them; and that is all there is to it. So far as the second point is concerned, I do not think that anybody who might be interested would have any doubt as to this being a better method.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose that as a practical matter this arises from what we have seen in the press about the textile industry?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I assumed so, because I remembered the agitation that took place on more than one occasion to have a time limit fixed beyond which taxpayers could not again be harassed in connection with business taxes. I thought that some time before 1930 an amendment was made fixing a date behind which you could not go, but I realized that it had no application to this particular act, because the period of time during which the old business profits war tax operated was 1915 to 1920, and I do not think it was extended beyond 1920.

Mr. ILSLEY: There were certain enactments—

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but that is another thing.

Mr. ILSLEY: —but the tax itself died in 1920.

Mr. BENNETT: I should not think there would be any difficulty about the act being speedily passed.

Mr. LAWSON: I take it that the act which the minister proposed to introduce is sufficiently broad in terms that, even although the assessment had not been made against some one alleged to be liable to be taxed under the Business Profits War Tax Act, he could now go back and make the assessment.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh yes.

Mr. LAWSON: Or will it merely revive the old act in so far as assessments which had been made and in respect of which money was owing?

Mr. ILSLEY: Assessments may be made at any time for the tax that arose that is payable for that period.

Mr. LAWSON: Then you are going to revive the right of assessment?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh yes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 85, to revive and amend the Business Profits War Tax Act. 1916.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

ARRANGEMENT WITH CORPORATION RESPECTING LINES AND SERVICES FOR TRANSPORT OF PASSENGERS, GOODS AND MAILS

The house resumed from Thursday, March 25, consideration in committee of Bill No. 74, to establish a corporation to be known as Trans-Canada Air Lines—Mr. Howe—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1-Short title.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I suppose the minister is well aware that the bill of which he moved the second reading the other day, and the bill that is now before the house, are entirely different. He said that the printed bill did not express what the government proposed as its policy. It is now clear that the proposal is that the Canadian National shall own fiftyone per cent of this enterprise. As the bill originally appeared it was not in that form, but the minister indicated that that change was proposed, and the reprinted bill indicates that it is the purpose of the administration. [Mr. Bennett.]

I cannot think it is probable that the fortynine per cent will be subscribed by the companies that are operating air lines in this country. It is just possible, of course, that it will be. I had suggested that in view of the present position and of the observations made the other day as to the close relationship between the railways and air services, the Canadian National Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway might own the enterprise, and might follow the course that was adopted in the southern hemisphere. It is a course well worthy of consideration, where you have two enterprises owning the same interest in an enterprise of a public character, that each should elect an equal number of directors and that those directors should select the fifth or the seventh director, or as the case may be. If there were four directors, two would be elected by one group and two by the other group; and the fifth would be elected by those four. The result in practice, I was told, was that you secured the services of excellent business men, who devoted themselves to the enterprise and secured an even and equitable distribution of whatever you may be pleased to call it, between the two groups that owned the enterprise.

In this case, supposing fifty per cent were owned by the Canadian National Railways and fifty per cent by the Canadian Pacific Railway company, and that there were seven directors; three would be elected by the Canadian National Railway group, three by the Canadian Pacific group, and those six would elect the seventh, and that seventh man would necessarily be a person of outstanding qualifications or he would not be selected. I am told that in practice the arrangement has proved eminently satisfactory. I endeavoured to speak to the minister afterwards, and I mentioned the matter to his deputy, who, I think, told him of it, but the minister advised, I understand, that I should be informed that nothing came of the negotiations which were carried on looking to some ownership arrangement betwen the two railway companies; so the matter stands in the form in which it is at present, and there are no suggestions before the minister that will enable any other view to be taken than that which is expressed here.

Perhaps the minister will give us some idea of the situation. I confess that I cannot contemplate it without some concern, because, I repeat, if fifty-one per cent of the enterprise is owned by the Canadian National Railways, it is not probable that any of the air lines will desire to become proprietors of the other forty-nine per cent. It therefore follows that the government will find itself the owner of the whole, because it is really the government's money which is involved.

The minister has met the difficulty I mentioned the other day by providing that guaranteed securities may be issued by the railway company for the purpose of acquiring the whole of the shares, namely, those having par value amounting to $5,000,000; and thus becoming owners of them, they are authorized to sell 49 per cent. It is not probable that they would be acquired by the air line but would remain with the crown; for after all the Canadian National, where we are finding the money on our guarantee, as we do, really means the crown. The question which I suggested the other day is therefore whether or not, under the circumstances, it would be desirable for us to retain ownership of the whole. There is no purpose served by dealing with it in the way proposed except that we divest ourselves of the direction, while at the same time we are responsible for the financial operations, both by the guarantee of the money, which is the capital, and of the deficits for a period of two years.

I seriously suggest that the minister should consider whether it is not desirable under these circumstances that he should recast his bill and retain control in the crown, provided that he make arrangements for the operation of the property by the appointment of a commission, if he deems that desirable, or by some other method or in any other manner that may be appropriate, in the same way as we provided for the operation of our railways. For if we are to hand over the company to the railway, it is clearly an instrumentality of the crown inasmuch as the crown is finding the money. Might it not therefore be desirable-I simply put it in that way to the minister-for us to retain complete and absolute control of the whole, rather than place ourselves in the position we shall be in if we contemplate the possibility of 49 per cent being sold to other interests, whether they be air line companies or whatever they may be. I gather that some discussion has taken place in connection with the other line of railway, though nothing has come out of it. Therefore, so far as we are concerned, we must contemplate the Air Lines as an enterprise that will be wholly owned by the Canadian National, which as I say is an instrumentality of the crown because we find the money, or by the Canadian National and other shareholders who may be willing to subscribe stock in an enterprise as to which in the very nature of things they will have nothing to say either as to direction or as to policy.

I really think that the matter is of so serious a character that it would be desirable for us to have an opportunity to consider it before a committee. I felt that at first, though I hesitated to press the view because of the lateness of the session. But frankly, this measure should not be put through the house in this way, without an opportunity being afforded for the hearing of evidence before one of our committees so that the whole situation might be carefully canvassed. The minister sees that, after all, it places upon the taxpayers of the country the burden of finding capital amounting to $5,000,000; that is number one. Number two is the question of the deficit; number three, contracts for carriage of mail, and undoubtedly the linking up of our system with Imperial Airways.

Imperial Airways is a joint venture of the crown or government of Great Britain and private shareholders. I suppose it is not too much to say that one hears a great deal about this matter and has done so for years, for their plans have not been secret in a general sense. I have no authority for the statement, but judging from discussions I have heard from time to time in England I do not believe that they contemplated that this was to be a publicly owned airways service so far as we are concerned. I say that frankly to the minister. The only reason I urge that it should be a publicly owned enterprise is that, after all, the public are finding the money. We cannot get away from that; they are finding the money, and inasmuch as they are putting it up, it seems to me that we had better hold the shares. Then we still have the difficulty of overcoming the problem of administration and operation. Though the Prime Minister must be convinced of the anxiety of all of us to assist him in closing the house, nevertheless this is a measure which I cannot help thinking is of first-rate importance, and I say with all candour that it should be considered by a committee. In my opinion a standing committee of this house should have an opportunity to hear witnesses.

One leading airman who used to be associated with one of our air companies was here the other day and I had some discussion with him about the situation. It had not to do with this particular bill, for I did not know then what the bill was going to be, but I could see that he had views which I thought might be useful. We have a number of airmen of such transcendent worth and merit that expressions of opinion from them would be quite useful in connection with operation; and the experience that has been gained by our friends to the south is also important. Recent accidents that have happened there indicate that certain difficulties will have to be overcome in connection with provision for safety and many other problems of the first rank.

I have made inquiries, as naturally the minister would expect I should, with regard to this matter in years past, because it is not something new; it is not as though the subject arose yesterday. I do repeat to the Prime Minister and the minister himself my earnest wish that it were possible to have a committee hearing so that an opportunity might be afforded to secure the views of those who are certainly much better able than most of us in this house to pronounce upon the matters involved. I know the minister has given a good deal of attention to the subject, and he is an engineer; but this is a very special form of engineering, a special form of transport, and the problems involved not only affect the mere carriage of freight and mails and passengers but are of vital import to the life of the nation as a whole. We have spent a good deal of money putting up beacons. In days when my friends opposite were over here, and when we were subject to great criticism, the unemployed prepared excellent landing fields, which were a great surprise to the Minister of National Defence when he saw what had been done under the direction of that particular department in the days to which I refer.

Without further trespassing upon the time of the committee, I will simply say this. I cannot say that I approve of the measure, because I do not; but I shall be convinced if it can be shown that it is the only method that can be pursued. But, alas, there is no method by which members of this committee can secure the requisite information except through a special committee; and if we pass this bill and send it to another place, they may desire, as they have frequently done in connection with other matters, to have a committee deal with this whole question. In that event we should be deprived, except by reading, of much of the information which this commons house should have before embarking upon a policy that will have very far-reaching consequences with respect not only to air transport but to the very existence of the country itself.

Aerial transportation is of primary importance in connection with defence and allied questions, and it is for that reason I think a committee of the house should consider it. If the minister thinks that is out of the question, I can only place my views before this committee as strongly as I can, and leave it at that.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): As my right hon. friend has intimated, we expected almost until the day when we introduced this bill that our two principal railway companies would be shareholders in the enterprise. We learned at the last moment that the directors of one large company decided not to take up the enterprise, and therefore we had to make a very quick change in the bill. I have always been of the opinion that the railways were the proper bodies to lend stability to this enterprise.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. HOWE: As I said before, they are in the transportation business, and it would be a tremendous advantage to the enterprise to have the use of their facilities in selling tickets and in various other ways that I have already mentioned. At the same time we certainly want the very best aviation experience available in this country, and therefore in my opinion it is important for us to have ownership representation of companies now performing aviation service in Canada.

I am unable to share my right hon. friend's doubts about aviation companies taking up 49 per cent of the stock. I have had a number of telephone calls since this bill was brought down, saying that they are most anxious to discuss the matter; in fact, I have had to be rather rude to two or three of them because I did not care to discuss it until the bill was finally disposed of. I think there is nothing to fear about that feature.

As to putting the bill before a committee and hearing all the interests which might appear, I feel that nothing of great importance would come of that; I have been in a committee for months now, listening to every one who cared to make representations. I came to the conclusion that the corporation must be set up before we can deal with the aviation companies. I found them most unreasonable in maintaining a position against other companies in the same field, and until we are able to deal with a definite set-up, so that we can say to them: Now this is the company; what part do you like and what have you to offer?-until we can get all those facts I do not think we are going to be in a position to deal with the individual aviation companies. I am satisfied that this is the best way to go about the matter. True, we must have a board of directors for this corporation, and I think that the board should represent the ownership of the corporation. The government is entitled to representation because the government has a very great responsibility to ensure that this company is operated efficiently. I think that the railways should be represented in the ownership, and I believe that the other interests should also be represented.

In regard to having the best technical advice that we can get, I have explored that field very thoroughly. I have told companies with American interests that they could not participate. But they tell me frankly that one of their great interests in this line is that it shall be efficiently operated. They point out that a crash in Canada is just as serious to them as a crash in the United States, and they have offered to put all their technical advice at our service; they have offered to send officers here and give me the benefit of their organization in order to get this off to a proper start. That assurance I have. But before making use of that, we must have a company with a board of directors; we must know the extent to which we have technical assistance available in Canada. After that, we can decide what technical advice we require from the United States or elsewhere. I am satisfied that the first step is to set up a corporation, and have a substantial underwriter. My right hon. friend says it is the government itself, and I will not quarrel with that view; but notwithstanding that, it is the agency of the government that specializes in transportation and I think that they, rather than the government, are the proper people to do this underwriting.

As to whether this legislation should go through at this session or be held over, I think it is most important to pass the bill at this session. Our air fields are ready and finished; the whole organization is set up from Winnipeg west. Before this summer is over we expect that the entire system from coast to coast will be ready for operation as far as the main line is concerned. We are under pressure from Imperial Airways, if you like, or the government of Great Britain, and the government of the Irish Free State, in the matter of a connecting service with flights that they are starting almost immediately across the north Atlantic. I have undertaken informally with them to be ready to take the mails as they deliver them on the east coast, and to carry them across to the west coast. It is important that the service be conducted through Canada rather than across the United States-

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOWE: —because once the service is established it is difficult to change the route. We should be ready to meet that need and obtain that business for Canada. I regret that the lateness of the session does not seem to admit of the submission of this bill to a committee, but I am satisfied from my own experience that very little would be gained by bringing in the very numerous aviation companies in Canada to appear before a committee and give their views. I am satisfied that those views would be exceedingly conflicting, and that in the end the committee would find it necessary to do what I have to do, form my own opinion.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister will observe that I was very careful not to suggest that the bill should not be proceeded with this session; I did not even hint that. But I think I have a just right, as has every hon. member of the House of Commons, to complain that this bill should be submitted so late.

Mr. HOWE: Quite.

Mr. BENNET: I recall the wheat bill. We sat here until July, and the government yielded to the view then suggested that it should be sent to a committee, and we sat during the long hot days of early July and the committee heard witnesses on the billon the bill, not on the general question. The only question that is at issue is whether or not it would be possible to submit the bill to a committee. That is what was done in that case. I think, in a matter of such very great importance—not to traverse the ground again-this measure might have been submitted to the house earlier. I know that if we had undertaken to submit a bill of this importance so late in a session which is necessarily brief, we would have been very strongly and vigorously denounced in language that, if it were to emulate some we hear, would certainly be that of the gutter and not of this house; but that is not a matter of importance, I suppose, at this time. I do suggest, however, that as apparently we cannot deal with it by a committee, and as there is an acute difference of opinion with respect to some of these clauses, we might proceed now to get rid of the clauses about which there should not be any difficulty, and then, either later this afternoon or tomorrow, we could proceed to discuss the clauses about which I fancy there must be considerable difference of opinion in the house.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, we expect the Black Rod in a moment to summon us to the senate, and I believe the Speaker wishes to make some announcement from the chair, so I would move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1937.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Harbours and rivers, Quebec-Under contract-

Boucherville-protection work, $7,000.

Cape Cove (Anse du Cap)—wharf reconstruction, $9,000.

Dune du Sud, M.I.—breakwater, $6,200.

Havre Aubert, M.I.—strengthening and widening wharf, $13,000.

Hull-protection work, $5,000.

Isle aux Grues-extension to north wharf, $12,500.

L'Islet-wharf reconstruction, $13,000.

Little River St. Lambert-dredging-the provincial government to contribute a like amount, Manicouagan—wharf extension and repairs—one-third of cost to be contributed by the Ontario Paper Co., Ltd., $27,400.

Rivière Cachee—dredging—the provincial government to contribute a like amount, $4,000.

Rivière du Loup-wharf enlargement, $16,800. Rivière Laguerre-contribution towards completion of improvement, the provincial government to bear a like amount, $15,000.

Sept Iles-wharf repairs and extension, $7,000. Harbours and rivers generally-for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken, $300,000.

Mr. BENNETT: These are all presently under contract?

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works): Yes.

Item agreed to.

Saskatchewan, Alberta and Northwest Territories—harbours and rivers generally—for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken, $15,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Could the minister tell us where there are any harbours in Saskatchewan?

Mr. CARDIN: This vote is to cover improvements in the rivers.

Mr. MacNICOL: It says harbours, and I was wondering where they were.

Mr. CARDIN: That is the general description applied to all these votes.

Item agreed to.

Dredging—maritime provinces, $300,000. Dredging—Ontario and Quebec, $320,000. Dredging—Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, $96,000.

Dredging-British Columbia, $185,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister give some particulars of the dredging to be done in the maritime provinces?

Mr. CARDIN: This amount of $300,000 for the maritime provinces is required to carry out dredging operations in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island by contract, day labour, and departmental plant, and to provide for the repair and maintenance of this plant during the fiscal year 1937-38.

This is a regular annual appropriation, and the expenditures chargeable to this are mainly for works which can be more economically charged to this vote, and any larger works which require to be done by contract where no departmental plant is available and for which there is no special appropriation. A tentative program covering the season's operations is made out for each dredge from the list of works requested, according to the locality in which the plant is located, but very often this program cannot be carried out on account of the necessity arising during the season for some other urgent work to be performed first.

The plant we propose to operate this year consists of dredge No. 5, Northumberland, $50,000; dredge No. 9, Montague, tug Fredericton and plant, $45,000; dredge No. 2, $25,000; dredge No. 13, tug Lisgar and plant, $50,000; dredge No. 14, $6,000; dredge No. 15, $8,000; dredge No. 16, $7,500; dredge No. 17, $8,000; dredge No. 18, $5,000; dredge No. 19, $5,000; contingencies and travelling expenses, $4,500.

The plant which will not be operated this year but which will require a certain amount of maintenance consists of dredge No. 1, dredge No. 4, dredge No. 115 and the tug Canso. It is proposed to build ten pontoons for dredge No. 5 at a cost of $27,000. These items make up the total vote.

Mr. MacNICOL: The next part of the item covers dredging for Ontario and Quebec. How much will be spent in Ontario and how much in Quebec?

Mr. CARDIN: Under this vote it is proposed to put six dredges into operation, which will leave three not in operation this year. We propose to build a new steel scow for dredge No. 117. I have not the division of the amount as between Ontario and Quebec. If the hon. member desires that information I shall have to give him a list of the places in Ontario and Quebec where it is proposed to use these dredges. I can venture the statement that the amount is generally divided equally between the two provinces.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the dredging under this item correlated with the dredging under item 72 on page 27 of the estimates—dredging in Montreal harbour and the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. CARDIN: There is no relation between the two items.

Mr. MacINNIS: Where will the appropriation under the item for British Columbia be spent?

Mr. CARDIN: It is on the Fraser river that the grant will be expended.

Mr. MacINNIS: All of it?

Mr. CARDIN: All of it, yes.

Item agreed to.

Roads and Bridges

Burlington channel bridge—maintenance and repairs, $15,000.

Calumet-Bryson bridge—improvements and repairs, $11,500.

Dominion roads and bridges—generally, $5,000. Kingston wharves and bridges—maintenance and repairs, $10,100.

Ottawa—maintenance and repairs to bridges and approaches, $7,100.

Matapedia bridge—repairs and improvements,

$13,400.

Perley bridge over Ottawa river at Hawkesbury, $6,700.

North Temiskaming bridge—improvements,

$3,500.
Portage du Fort bridge—improvements and repairs, $4,600.

Selkirk bridge—maintenance and repairs, $3,500.

Delta—repairs to bridge, $3,000.

Mr. BARBER: What is the policy of the department with regard to construction and maintenance of bridges? Is it confined to interprovincial bridges?

Mr. CARDIN: Interprovincial and international.

Mr. BARBER: The reason I asked is that we have under construction at Westminster a very fine bridge, costing a considerable sum of money, and the people understand that the federal government has been approached for a grant of two million dollars towards that bridge. If that grant was made it would perhaps eliminate the necessity for tolls, and the residents of the immediate neighbourhood would benefit considerably. Has the minister any information to give about this matter?

Mr. CARDIN: It is true that representations have been made to the government with a view to obtaining some assistance towards the construction of that bridge, but a decision has not yet been reached.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the Calumet-Bryson bridge, from the mainland over to the island, an interprovincial bridge? It may be for all I know.

Mr. CARDIN: Of course, there is always an exception to any rule. This bridge, I am informed, is very old; and during the last ten or fifteen years, bridges here and there have been built in whole or in part with the assistance of a federal grant. In only a very few cases, however, has the federal government undertaken to put up bridges within a province or to contribute to their construction. The rule that we do not contribute except to an international or interprovincial bridge has been pretty consistently followed by the department and the government for many years.

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, is the Matapedia bridge an interprovincial one?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: How is it interprovincial? Is it from Quebec to New Brunswick?

Mr. CARDIN: It is between Quebec and New Brunswick.

Item agreed to.

Saskatchewan and Alberta — Saskatchewan and Alberta telegraph and telephone lines—repairs and improvements, $24,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: What has the federal government to do with telephones in Saskatchewan and Alberta?

Mr. CARDIN: This service was established by the federal government before the provinces were organized, at a time when there was no possibility of inducing private companies to establish either a telephone or telegraph system in that country, and it has since been kept up by the government in many [Mr. Barber.]

cases, I might say, because we could not dispose of the services. We could find nobody willing to accept the responsibility of operating a telegraph line in a locality where there was not very much business to be expected.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is there any business?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, some business, but not enough to meet the expenditures.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous

Architectural branch—salaries of architects, clerks of works, inspectors, draftsmen, clerks and messengers of outside service, $72,000.

Engineering branch—salaries of engineers, clerks, etc., of outside service, $396,000.

For operation and maintenance of inspection boats, $11,400.

Maintenance and operation of water storage dams on Ottawa river and tributaries, $35,000.

National Gallery of Canada, $75,000.

National monument on Connaught place, $100,000.

Surveys and inspections, $65,000.

Balance of expenditure for works already authorized, provided amount for any one work does not exceed $200, $5,000.

Miscellaneous works not otherwise provided for, not more than $3,000 to be expended upon any one work, $50,000.

Mr. STIRLING: What progress can the minister give account of for the national monument on Connaught place?

Mr. CARDIN: The monument is ready to be put in place, but there are so many conflicting ideas as to the site upon which it should be erected that up to the present time the government has been unable to decide. We shall have to make up our minds one way or the other pretty soon, because the monument must be erected during the summer.

Mr. STIRLING: Where is it now?

Mr. BENNETT: Stored, the last I knew about it.

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that the figures are in England at present.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where are the water storage dams located on the Ottawa river and its tributaries, and for what purpose are they now used?

Mr. CARDIN: There is the Temiskaming dam and the Quinze dam on the Ottawa river. The object of these dams is to store the spring floods and augment the low water flow, thus equalizing the run-off in the Ottawa valley throughout the year.

Mr. GRAYDON: Referring to the item for surveys and inspections, does the aggregate include anything with respect to Port Credit harbour, in the county of Peel?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, the amount that might be necessary for the survey my hon. friend mentions could be taken out of that vote.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I point out to the minister, as I have done on occasion before, that in view of the importance of this some money should be spent to improve its facilities. I will give the minister plenty of time to consider the proposal. He will not be pressed for time between now and next session, and I urge upon him once more the importance of carrying on the undertaking which was begun through a vote in 1935 for harbour improvement facilities at Port Credit. I know that the far-famed courtesy and consideration of the minister assures that my proposal will receive some kind of favourable attention when the next estimates are brought down.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I trust the minister will permit me to make a few observations without considering them in any degree critical of the department; nor would I have my remarks construed as critical of the former Minister of Public Works. It seems to me there is great need for more coordination of effort in meeting the demands of other departments upon the Department of Public Works for public buildings and other works. There should be more cooperation between the Post Office Department, for example, and the Department of National Revenue. There is one instance of the need of cooperation. I think the officials of the Department of Public Works can in many respects be absolved of blame, because they have a great task in trying to satisfy what are perhaps unreasonable demands by other departments -demands far in excess of the immediate requirements, providing as they do for cities of three and four times the present population.

There is room for improvement in the construction of buildings. I suggest that buildings in the majority of cases should be erected on lots deep enough and constructed so as to allow for extension when greater accommodation is needed. In many buildings, too, the lighting system is defective; in some post offices the lights are not well placed to serve properly those who sort and distribute the mail. One cannot help criticizing also the type of doors found in some of these buildings. Some doors are so massive and heavy that it is impossible for a frail woman to open them, and when she stands on the step trying to pull one of these doors open some able-bodied man may be pushing the door open violently from inside. If there have been no accidents from that cause there certainly will be.

I strongly recommend that an effort be made to keep the space provided more nearly in line with the requirements. There is great opportunity for saving money in this direction. In my contacts with the Department of Public Works I have found that the officials have been giving these matters careful consideration, but unfortunately they find themselves up against a stone wall in the form of demands made upon them by other departments.

Mr. MALLETTE (Translation): Is the hom. minister of Public Works in a position to tell me whether the item of $75,000 for the National Gallery of Canada is to provide only for the upkeep of the gallery or whether there is also included therein an amount for the purchase of paintings?

Mr. CARDIN (Translation): I understand that part of the amount is to provide for the purchase of paintings.

Mr. MALLETTE (Translation): Does the minister know how much has been spent for that purpose in 1937?

Mr. CARDIN (Translation): I am not in a position to give the information asked for by the hon. member, because I have not got it before me, but if he would like to have it, I shall give it to him to-morrow.

Mr. STEWART: What is the total amount of the main estimates for public works last year, the total of supplementary estimates for public works, and the corresponding figures for this year?

Mr. CARDIN: The main estimates for 1936-37 amounted to $13,411,570; the special supplementaries, $14,956,585; the regular supplementary estimates—that is to say, the supplementary estimates in addition to the main estimates—$2,835,700, or a total of $31,203,855. For the present year the main estimates amount to $12,504,420; the special supplementaries, $12,550,000; or a total of $25,054,420. That represents a decrease of $6,149,435.

Mr. STEWART: What are the figures for the previous year?

Mr. CARDIN: In 1935-36 the main estimates amounted to $14,530,320; the supplementary estimates, $2,906,150; further supplementary estimates, $2,000,000; and special estimates, what was required under the Public Works' Construction Act, $7,992,243.

Mr. STEWART: I gather from what the minister said when these estimates were up before, that practically all the undertakings under the two Public Works' Construction Acts have been completed and that none of them appears in these estimates. Is that correct?

Mr. CARDIN: There are only three items that have not been put through—the Cobalt public building, the Guelph public building, and the Toronto tunnel. All the other undertakings have been carried out.

Mr. STEWART: Guelph public building; that is not the new public building, is it?

Mr. CARDIN: No, that is the installation of an elevator in the old building, for $15,000.

Mr. STEWART: Approximately what would be the total of those items?

Mr. CARDIN: For Guelph, $15,000; Cobalt, $53,000; and the Toronto tunnel, $1,000,000.

Mr. STEWART: Apparently those have been dropped.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: They are not provided for anywhere in these estimates?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. STEWART: Have any representations been made recently in connection with the tunnel at Toronto? The airport question seems to be very much alive there now.

Mr. CARDIN: No representations have been made to the department recently.

Item agreed to.

Graving Docks Champlain graving dock, $72,000. Esquimalt graving dock, $90,400. Lorne graving dock, $48,400. Selkirk—repair slip, $4,300.

Mr. STEWART: There seem to be some increases there; they are not large. Is it just a matter of maintenance, or some extensions or additions? If there are no extensions, if it is just an increase in maintenance-

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, it is only maintenance and operation.

SPECIAL SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1937-38

Public Buildings-Nova Scotia Halifax—new public building, $45,000. Halifax—ordnance buildings, $200,000. Halifax—Rockhead hospital—reconditioning and improvements, $30,000.

Lunenburg public building—repairs and improvements, $7,500.

[Mr. Cardin.]

Louisburg—public building, $20,000. Mulgrave—public building, $26,000. Springhill public building—alterations and improvements, $3,500.

Stewiacke—public building, $14,500.
Sydney Mines public building—addition,

Trenton—public building, $20,000.
Wolfville—purchase of land adjacent to public building, $1,500.

Mr. CARDIN: Possibly it may appear to hon. gentlemen opposite that the list of these supplementary estimates is long. There are a number of pages of different items, but I am sure my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) understands exactly the position the department is in when called upon to prepare the main estimates. There is always a large number of reports which have not been made by the different engineering branches all over Canada, and after we have prepared the main estimates we always receive many requests from the engineers and from different constituencies in Canada.

There is nothing exceptional so far as the number of items is concerned; I think there are fewer items in these supplementary estimates than I had in last year's list. They all relate to the same class of work and undertakings covered by the main estimates; the repair or reconstruction of a wharf or pier, or a certain amount of dredging here and there; and I venture to say that these expenditures, which do not amount to very much in all compared with the whole expenditure of the country, are to a large extent incurred in practically the same regions. It is easy to understand that, because ports and rivers are not as numerous in some provinces of Canada as in others.

For example, the number of requests received from Ontario, Quebec, and the maritime provinces for the development of little harbours which might help commerce generally or the fishermen is larger than from other provinces, which accounts for the large number of items found in these supplementary estimates. I am doing what my predecessor did and what his predecessor did in the old days in that regard. It has been the practice in our country since confederation to give as much help as possible to these small places where fishermen are earning their living by the hard work of fishing; governments have always been inclined to come to their help even when in certain cases there was not a very strong justification from a purely business point of view. The sentimental element has always entered into the consideration of the requests made by these localities for aid from the federal treasury. So in reality I am simply following in the footsteps of those who preceded me and continuing what has been the practice in Canada since confederation.

Mr. STEWART: I can understand the position of the minister owing to the fact that the session started rather early this year, which perhaps accounts for the comparatively small number of items in the main estimates and the larger number in the supplementaries. The minister said that he is following in the footsteps of his predecessor, but I hardly recognize my tracks. It seems to me he is blazing a new trail in some directions. He says there are many demands; I can understand that, and I venture to think that even with the considerably extended list he has not met all the demands for public works that have been made upon him.

Mr. BENNETT: There are forty constituencies he overlooked.

Mr. STEWART: It might be interesting to know the particular constituencies where the minister's tracks may now be found, to say nothing of those of the former minister. I venture to think they are not in just the same constituencies.

I notice that the largest public building item is at Halifax; ordnance building, $200,-000. Would the minister explain that item? I thought those buildings were in fairly good shape.

Mr. CARDIN: This amount of $200,000 is required towards the construction of the following ordnance buildings at Halifax: stores building, a work shop, and two buildings for vacant stores. The estimated cost of the stores building, a five-storey brick structure, is $277,-000. The work shop, a one-storey building, is to cost $78,780. The vacant stores buildings are to cost $55,000 and $22,000 respectively. Fittings for the stores building are estimated at $41,800; overhead crane in work shop, $1,100, and supervision and contingencies, $23,858. This has been requested by the Department of National Defence.

Item agreed to.

Public Buildings—New Brunswick Minto—public building, $24,700. North Head—public building, $31,000. Rogersville—public building, $11,000.

St. Stephen—building for customs and immigration purposes, $110,000.

Mr. BROOKS: I notice this vote provides for a public building at Minto, New Brunswick. I should like to ask the minister if that building is for use as a post office.

Mr. CARDIN: The building will be used for postal purposes.

Mr. BROOKS: Has the site been selected yet?

Mr. CARDIN: Nothing has been decided as yet; the site has not been acquired.

Mr. BROOKS: I understand one site under consideration is in Sunbury county. Minto, as the minister may not know, is a town located in both Sunbury and Queens counties. The post office has always been considered to belong in Queens county, and when the question of the site is under consideration, I presume by the Post Office Department, I hope they will consider the most central location to serve the needs of the people in that town, located as I say in two constituencies.

The people in that section are quite concerned over a rumour that the proposed site is near the liquor store in Minto, and for that reason a good many of the citizens are opposed to that location. I am sure my hon. friend from York-Sunbury, who is noted as a very strong temperance man, will use his best endeavours to see that a site near the liquor store is not chosen. I am also satisfied that he will endeavour to see that the building is located in the centre of the village, where it will serve most of the people to the greatest advantage. If he does that, I am satisfied that the site chosen will be in the constituency of Royal, and not in the constituency of York-Sunbury.

Mr. CLARK (York-Sunbury): This public building in Minto, which is in Sunbury county—

Mr. BROOKS: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; it is not in Sunbury county. It is not an incorporated town at all, but the main stores and business places are in Queens county. I am surprised the hon. member does not know more about that end of his constituency.

Mr. CLARK (York-Sunbury): Minto is a mining town in Sunbury county, and this vote is very much appreciated because it will mean the first dominion public building to be erected in the county of Sunbury.

Mr. BROOKS: Has the site been decided upon?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BROOKS: May I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon, member may ask a question if the hon, gentleman who has the floor permits him to do so.

Mr. BROOKS: My hon. friend says this will be the first public building to be erected in Sunbury county, and I should like to ask him if the site for that building has been selected. I understood the Minister of Public Works to say it had not yet been chosen.

Mr. CLARK (York-Sunbury): I have no doubt that is correct; the site has not been chosen, but when it is selected, certainly it will be in Sunbury county.

Mr. STEWART: I should like a little additional information with regard to the St. Stephen building for customs and immigration purposes. Has the site of that building been definitely determined as yet? As I recall it, there was some question as to the exact location of a bridge there.

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that the building has been completed, and that this amount of $110,000 covers the estimated cost of a concrete retaining wall, rough granite facing, balance of purchase of property, foundations for customs warehouse, superstructure for customs warehouse, grading and fencing, supervision and contingencies.

Mr. STEWART: As I recall it, there is pretty heavy traffic at that point. Will this provide complete equipment for that building?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes; that is my information.

Ste. Anne de la Pocatière-public building, $12,000.

St. Johns—customs building, $38,000. St. Charles de Bellechasse—public building, $13,500.

Scotstown-public building, $15,000. Temiskaming-public building, $20,000. Weedon-purchase of building for postal purposes, $12,000.

Mr. STEWART: I should like some information with regard to one or two items in this list. I notice that several armouries are included; I will pass those by, but there is an [The Chairman.]

expenditure of $300,000 for a postal terminal building at Quebec. Would the minister give us some explanation of that item?

Mr. CARDIN: The accommodation that is to be provided in Quebec will be of the same type that has been provided in Montreal, for example, and Ottawa. It is to be a central building where mail will be handled right from the train. It is proposed to erect this building in the vicinity of the station.

Mr. STEWART: The last item provides for the purchase of a building at Weedon for a building for postal purposes; would the minister explain that?

Mr. CARDIN: This $12,000 provides for the purchase of a building for postal purposes. The estimated cost of the property is $10,100, and the repairs that will have to be made include repairs to the roof, chimneys and porches; improved heating, plumbing and wiring systems and so on, at a cost of $1,900. In view of the report made to us and the study made by the architect it was thought advisable to buy this building, which is very suitable, rather than begin a new construction. The building is in the centre of the locality and we expect to get it at a favourable price, because not many people around there are in the market to buy property of that value.

Vankleek Hill—public building, $12,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: What kind of machine shop is to be erected at Kingston? A machine shop costing $45,500 would be an extensive plant. Out of the $2,424,000 provided for Ontario I notice the city of Toronto is to get the magnificent sum of $26,500. Is there any need for the first item in the list, the public building at Arthur? It has been rumoured that if the proposal of the hon. member for Wellington North (Mr. Blair) had carried, a lethal chamber might have been erected in that village. However, since no action is to be taken on his proposal the lethal chamber will not be required, and the expenditure on a public building at Arthur seems unnecessary.

Mr. SPENCE: Let us have some information about the building at Kingston.

Mr. CARDIN: The sum of $45,500 is provided for the erection of a machine shop requested by the Deputy Minister of National Defence. He says the machine shop is necessary for making major repairs and overhauling guns and other militia equipment. A plant capable of undertaking and maintaining a repair service for the R.C.A. and other local units should have about 10,000 square feet floor area, and the necessary equipment should be adjacent to the premises in which the guns are stored. The request has come from the Department of National Defence.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does it include the machinery for the repair of the guns?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why is the term "machine shop" used?

Mr. CARDIN: I understand the Department of National Defence will place their old machines in it.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is just a storehouse.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: I notice provision made for a public building at Arthur, another at Burlington, and another at Oakville. Can the minister tell the committee what kind of buildings they are. Will they be post office buildings?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: A lethal chamber at Arthur.

Mr. GRAYDON: They are post office buildings?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Not a place to store guns?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. GRAYDON: All three places I mentioned, Arthur, Oakville, and Burlington, are close to the boundaries of the county of Peel. I was wondering if coming events are casting their shadows before, and that we might expect something within the next year or so in the constituency of Peel.

Mr. BENNETT: Philanthropy stops at the county boundary.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I should like to make an inquiry in connection with the total amount of expenditures in the province of Ontario. It would seem from the vote that Ottawa receives a fairly substantial amount of the expenditures for this province. As a matter of fact, out of a total vote for Ontario of $2,424,000, expenditures in Otttawa will amount to $1,986,000. That leaves for the remainder of Ontario the large sum of $438,000, to be distributed in the different places mentioned, Burlington, and so on, and for the expenditure on the odd revolving door mentioned by the hon, member for Broadview. That is very good! They are taking good care of Toronto!—Toronto which is supplying a great part of the dominion's revenues. I am indeed thankful for the great expenditures and the consideration the government is giving to Toronto! While on my feet may I say that politically I do not think the government is playing the game. Toronto is and has been for many years known as Tory Toronto.

Mr. MacNICOL: And will be so known.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): I will discuss that later. The fact is, as the last election returns show, that the Liberal party scored one hundred per cent in that city in returning Liberal members to parliament, but I warn the government to take care and to pay some attention to Toronto in giving favours, or else it will send back a solid Tory representation.

Mr. MacNICOL: It will do that anyway.

Mr. STEWART: In the item I notice these words: "Ottawa post office—removal and replacement, inclusive of site." Could the minister give some information in connection with that item?

Mr. CARDIN: The item covers the proposal to replace the Ottawa city post office, when the present building is demolished. We have not yet reached any conclusion as to the site or the class of building to be erected to meet the requirements of post office service in Ottawa.

Several proposals have been made, and among others that we develop the Langevin block along Elgin street. There is another suggestion that we erect a separate building elsewhere in the city. The proposal forms part of the general scheme of beautifying the city by the development of the park where the monument is to be placed. Before reaching a decision we wish to consider all representations as to the best way of meeting the exigencies of Ottawa, and at the same time to adopt a plan which will have the effect of beautifying the capital city of our country. The item provides for whatever moneys may be required in connection with the building of a new post office for Ottawa. However, nothing definite has so far been done and I am free to say that I welcome all suggestions hon, members may have to present. This is a matter which is above politics. We have no intention of controlling the whole matter, and are ready to listen to any representations made to us, before reaching a final decision.

Mr. STEWART: I notice an expenditure of $250,000 for a new departmental building in Ottawa. I assume this will be another unit on Wellington street adjacent to the one recently completed, known as the Justice building?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: What is the total estimated cost of this unit?

Mr. CARDIN: Between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000. This proposed building is shown in the model layout now located in the building here. I am informed that there is no immediate necessity of erecting this building in its entirety, and we could proceed with the construction of only a part. The whole building in any event could not be completed in the one year.

Mr. STEWART: I assume the site has not been selected?

Mr. CARDIN: No, but it will be part of the general program.

Mr. STEWART: Would the minister explain this item of $260,000 for the Department of Mines and Resources?

Mr. CARDIN: It is to cover the erection of a building and the acquisition of additional property, as requested by the deputy minister of mines. He states that he has discussed with his minister the extension of the Booth street plant and is prepared to ask the Department of Public Works to prepare for consideration by the government a proposal for the appropriation of funds for this purpose. This vote is divided as follows:

Acquisition of lot 134 to the north of the Booth street site, $30,000.
Erection on lot 134 of an industrial minerals laboratory, $135,000.
Erection of an ore dressing laboratory building $25,000

ing, $75,000.

Construction of additional storage at the fuel research building, $20,000.

Mr. STEWART: Is any revenue obtained by this department in connection with any of these activities?

Mr. CARDIN: I am not in a position to say.

Mr. STEWART: The next item for records storage building, $489,000, also requires some explanation. This project has been under way for some time.

This building is under Mr. CARDIN: contract.

Mr. STEWART: Where is it being erected?

Mr. CARDIN: On the experimental farm property.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Mr. Chairman, we are about to pass a vote of $2,424,000 after only a few minutes consideration. I am sure hon. members will agree that the present form of presenting estimates for all departments is totally inadequate. They are not presented in such form as to afford due consideration of the justification for and wisdom of the expenditure. While I do not intend to enlarge upon this matter at this time. I think it would be helpful to place on record some comments which appeared in the Sunday Times of London, England, of March 14, 1937. This article appeared on the editorial page:

It is most important that the responsibility of ministers should remain unimpaired; and to give the House of Commons the right to propose new expenditure would open the door to endless abuse and destroy the stability of government, which is the chief advantage of our own system as compared with the French. The cabinet must continue to govern—not par-liament. But it would be an immense gain to the efficiency of parliamentary criticism if it were allowed some nearer approach to the prob-lems that are now settled by discussion between the ministers and their departments.

It is one of the paradoxes of parliamentary procedure that its control of estimates should be so perfunctory. There is endless reiteration of debate on how the bill should be defrayed, or debate on now the bill should be derrayed, but the amount of the bill, which is more important, is fixed in the estimates and these may, theoretically, indeed, be rejected or reduced, but in practice cannot be without defeating the government and, if the matter is important enough, risking its resignation and compromising dozens of other interests which the house may have near to its heart.

There will never be effectual control over finance until a finance committee of the commons has some insight into the estimates before they are in shape and can present an independ-ent report on the issues of policy involved.

[Mr. Cardin.]

That would make for sounder criticism, a better appreciation of the points that matter, and a control closer to the events. It would also be a valuable training-ground for able also be a valuable training-ground for able men who now eat their heart out for lack of opportunity. Too much importance is attached to the act of speaking on the floor of the house. The sort of work that most needs doing at Westminster is the deliberation of a board meeting; nor need the extension of this work impain the respectifility of ministers. impair the responsibility of ministers.

Mr. SPENCE: Mr. Chairman, I should like to have some information about the item of $39,500 for a public building at Sioux Lookout. I am utterly opposed to making large expenditures in these small places. Probably $10,000 would purchase a public building adequate to the needs of Sioux Lookout. The construction of these buildings does not provide much labour. A few mechanics are given jobs for a few weeks, and that is all. We should be going on with the construction of something that provides work for thousands of labourers. The erection of many of these public buildings is an absolute waste and I think even the minister will agree with me in that.

We find a considerable amount being voted for Quebec, which no doubt contributes something to the revenue of this country, but I ask hon, members to look at the expenditures for Ontario. It is all to be spent in We realize that Ontario is the milch cow of the dominion, and Toronto the milch cow of the province. The government should be ashamed of the way that city is being treated. We are not asking for public buildings. At one time we thought we should have a large general post office, but we decided that substations would fill the bill. Some of these public buildings that are put up are nothing but a shame and a crime. The government is spending $14,000 or $15,000 to erect public buildings in towns containing only 500 to 1,500 people. I hope the minister will give some consideration to this practice and see that it is not continued in the future. I admit it has been done before but that is no reason why it should be continued.

Also I would suggest that these buildings should be of concrete instead of using expensive steel as they do now. Such a building would be just as strong and durable, and just as easy to keep clean, and it would cost much less than the present type of construction. I should like a little information about the Sioux Lookout building for $39,500.

Mr. CARDIN: In reply to my hon. friend, the fact that $39,500 is provided in the estimates does not preclude the minister when deciding upon the building from authorizing a less expensive structure than the full amount of the estimate would provide. I am not compelled to expend the whole amount that is voted, and I frankly say that to a large extent I agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence). There is no justification for putting up very expensive buildings in small localities where the revenue is not very large. Naturally we need public buildings even in the smaller places, but the building should be in proportion to the population and the revenues that are being derived from customs or post office. The postal revenue for Sioux Lookout for 1934-35 was $11,195; that is a pretty good revenue for that locality.

Mr. SPENCE: Was that the net or gross revenue?

Mr. CARDIN: That is the gross revenue. I repeat, I have much sympathy with the observation that my hon, friend has made, that we should be careful to proportion our expenditures to the importance of the localities and the revenues derived therefrom.

An hon. MEMBER: We are spending far too much on public buildings.

Mr. BARBER: Will the minister explain this vote of a quarter of a million dollars for the improvement of the Plaza?

Mr. CARDIN: This is for the widening of the bridge over the railway tracks in front of the present post office building in Ottawa. The development that has been contemplated for the park where the monument is to be placed will necessitate if the plan is not changed, the widening of the bridge. It covers the larger portion of the railway tracks going south and the development of that section into a park, as it is partly developed at present. That is what we contemplate with the proposed expenditure.

Mr. STEWART: Just one other item, "Parliament building, $70,000." What does that

Mr. CARDIN: This amount is divided into the following: to provide for continuance of the works of carving—as my hon. friend knows, there is a lot more carving to be done in this building before it is completed-

Mr. SPENCE: You ought to forget about it.

Mr. CARDIN: And each year a certain amount has been spent for carving in the building. Other items are: painting iron sash and window frames, repairs to roof and flashing, redecorating halls and rooms, repointing stone work, repairs to marble floors, refinishing library floor-

Mr. STEWART: It is just general repairs? Mr. CARDIN: Just general repairs, yes.

Mr. STEWART: I thought it might be something in the east block.

Mr. SPENCE: Was there not a large item for the same thing in the estimates last year? Are we never to be through carving stones in this building?

Mr. CARDIN: There was a similar item.

Mr. SPENCE: Just destroying the building, that is what you are doing—wasting money.

Mr. CARDIN: The same amount was voted last year.

Item agreed to.

Public Buildings—Saskatchewan
Eastend—purchase of and alterations to building for postal purposes, $10,500.
Foam Lake—public building, $10,000.
Meadow Lake—public building, $15,000.
Moose Jaw armoury—reconstruction, $75,000.
Regina—new public building, $12,000.
Wadena—public building, $12,000.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I think this is one time where Saskatchewan and Manitoba, those two banner provinces, have been discriminated against a little. I am rather surprised at this, considering that on the government side there is almost a solid bloc from those provinces. In my opinion $134,000 is a very small amount to spend on public buildings in Saskatchewan, when Quebec is being granted over a million dollars, Ontario over two million dollars and the city of Ottawa over a million and three quarter dollars.

Mr. SPENCE: And all that is taken out of Ontario.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): There are also the other expenditures on public works of the nature of improvements to harbours and rivers and so on. Saskatchewan and Manitoba are not faring very well. However, would the minister give us some information with respect to the purchase of a building for the postal service at Eastend? What is the character of the building they are purchasing there?

Mr. CARDIN: It is the Royal bank building.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): What amount is to be spent for improvements and alterations of the building?

Mr. CARDIN: For the building and land the provision is $6,500; for fittings $3,500; for general repairs $300; and contingencies $200. As regards the complaint made by the hon. member, I noticed, for my sight is good, that he was smiling when he made the comparison between the small amounts that are being granted to the western provinces and the large amounts allocated to Ontario and Quebec. Of course, if he runs through the list of all expenditures made by the government he may find that a balance is pretty well established as between the provinces.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): It is not often that out in Saskatchewan we have the chance to smile over anything. I assume that the buildings at Foam Lake, Meadow Lake and Wadena are for post offices, are they not?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I assume also that the item for Moose Jaw is for the repairing of the building that was burnt.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Rebuilding and repairing. Was there any provisional estimate made of the amount that would be required, or was the estimate $75,000? What is the contract price?

Mr. CARDIN: The amount we are providing is supposed to be what is required to make the repairs to the building.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Has any contract been let?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I inform the hon. member that the contract price was $105,973, and the expenditure since construction began is $37,674.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to support the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perlev) in his criticism. I have noticed that in the last several years the western provinces have not received very much for rural improvements. Of course, they have received considerable assistance for rural relief. I well remember that when the minister introduced his main estimates in January he made the statement-I think I remember his wordsthat there was something very dear to his heart, and that was that he thought that along with the back-to-the-land movement we should endeavour to do something for rural communities. Now in western Canada there are a number of good towns. I might sayand other members represent localities with the same sort of towns-that in my own constituency we have two larger towns, Rosetown and Biggar. Rosetown particularly is situate in one of the best agricultural areas of the province and Biggar is an important railroad point. In years gone by these places have been overlooked.

I am glad to see that some buildings are going into three or four places in the rural areas of Saskatchewan, but I do think the minister is right when he says that the people who beautify such towns are entitled to some consideration in the way of public buildings. I raised the question generally on the main estimates. I was hoping that when the supplementaries came down, even if I did not see anything for the places I had mentioned specifically, at least there would be a larger provision for public buildings that are necessary in some of the well established areas in the western provinces. I am somewhat disappointed. I support what the hon, member for Qu'Appelle has said in that regard.

On a former occasion I pointed out that owing to the way in which we were paying for some of these buildings-armouries, for example—it might prejudice the situation, and the minister's remark that on the whole the western provinces were receiving some consideration would seem to imply that after all there is something in the feeling I had then, namely, that the payment for a building like the Regina armouries, spread over twenty years and requiring an appropriation of $30,000 a year, does prejudice smaller places. I should like to see such public buildings as the Regina armouries removed from public works and placed under militia, so that the amount may not prejudice other desirable estimates for western rural undertakings. We may not be getting much this year, but I hope that another year the minister will remember the communities that are near his heart—and there are a number of them in western Canada.

Mr. SPENCE: When the member for Qu'Appelle was speaking about the small sum spent in Saskatchewan I made no complaint about the expenditure in Ontario. As a matter of fact, only $434,000 is going to Ontario, so that all the money is not being spent in that province.

Public Buildings-Alberta

Calgary barracks—guard room, meter building and airplane hangar, $140,000.
Cardston—public building, $42,000.
Fort McMurray public building—addition,

$2,500.

Innisfree-purchase of building for postal purposes, $3,000.

St. Paul-public building, $12,000.

Mr. FAIR: Will the minister give us the break-down of the $140,000 for Calgary city?

Mr. CARDIN: To complete the contract for the hangar, $123,698; roadways and grading $3,000; supervision, $3,000; contingencies, $10.202;

Mr. FAIR: Has the building at Innisfree been purchased?

Mr. CARDIN: The $3,000 is for the purchase of a building for postal purposes in the 31111-151 town of Innisfree, Alberta. The building is of brick construction, built about ten years ago, and has a frontage of 30 feet on First street and 26 feet on First street west. It is equipped with hot air furnace, fireproof roof and concrete vault.

Mr. FAIR: From whom has it been purchased?

Mr. CARDIN: I do not know at the moment but I will get that information.

Mr. FAIR: There is an old saying that an Irishman is allowed to speak twice, and believing that saying I think the hon, member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) ought to speak again, in justice to eastern and western Canada. I suggest that instead of comparing the central provinces, including the city of Toronto, to a milch cow, he should reverse the simile and make the eastern and western provinces the cow and the central provinces the calf; because, looking at these estimates, I think that is about the size of it. The sort of milk cow the hon, gentleman has in mind is represented by the maritimes and the west, and where the milkers are not farmers they are getting all the cream.

Vancouver, winch building—alteration -alterations, improvements and repairs, $9,500.
Victoria public building—restoration, $46,000.

Mr. GREEN: Which is the building referred to as the Vancouver public building?

Mr. CARDIN: That is the new building under construction designed as a federal building.

Mr. GREEN: It is to be known as the federal building.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. TOLMIE: What is the condition of the dockyard office building at Esquimalt?

Mr. CARDIN: The amount provided contemplates the erection of a new office building to replace the existing structure, which is antiquated and beyond repair. This is a request from the Department of National Defence.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is the item "Victoria Public Building-restoration" to replace the post office that was destroyed?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. TOLMIE: Has work been started on it yet?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. TOLMIE: When will it begin?

Mr. CARDIN: We are now preparing plans.

Mr. NEILL: Last year and the year before a requisition was put in for a small public building at Tofino. I did not press the matter then because I knew the finances of the country would not stand it, but now my attention is called to the vote before us and I find that there are five buildings in British Columbia that are to be placed in districts represented by members of the opposition. That is all to the credit of the government, but I notice that some of the members concerned have asked where these buildings are and what purpose they are to serve, so that it does not look as if the need is outstanding. I notice also that the totals for these five buildings is $216,500, or 35 per cent of the vote. The total vote for British Columbia is $678,000, practically three-quarters of a million. Does not the minister think that out of that large vote, and in the circumstances I have indicated, there may be some hope of getting the building I have asked for at Tofino, when the final supplementary estimates are brought down?

Mr. CARDIN: I must admit that my hon. friend has been pressing for a public building at that point, but so far I have not been able to convince myself that we should go on with it. Possibly I have not all the information but I am prepared to look into the matter and give it my best consideration.

Mr. BARBER: There is an item here "New Westminster public building-addition." New Westminster is a very important port in our province, and I was in hopes that instead of an addition we would have a new building. Is it the intention to repair the old building to the extent of $100,000, or to construct a new one?

Mr. CARDIN: It is to build an addition to the building they already have. It is proposed to erect a one-storey addition, 130 by 65 feet on Clarkson street, and 50 by 22 feet on Columbia street.

Mr. BARBER: Is that for postal purposes?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. BAKER: Does the minister think that we really get fair value, or any fair percentage of value, for this expenditure of $733,000?

Mr. CARDIN: I guess we get fair value from that, not in the form of cash revenue to the customs or post office, but by helping to develop the facilities in all these places in the maritime provinces, and in Nova Scotia particularly, we help the trade of our country. To-day we are practically all in favour of the new plan for the improvement of houses by individuals; we induce home owners to make repairs and betterments, by guaranteeing a certain part of what they borrow from the bank-

Mr. BAKER: That has nothing to do with this.

Mr. CARDIN: —with a view to providing employment, and by developing harbours and rivers and all facilities for trade, the country is doing practically the same thing. It provides employment for the people residing in these localities, and gives them opportunity to develop.

Mr. BAKER: Does the minister really think, in connection with the item of $60,000 for dredging Yarmouth harbour, that we get $60,000 worth of work there?

Mr. CARDIN: The tourist service there is very great.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what was asked.

Mr. KINLEY: More people come into Yarmouth than any other port in Canada!

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WALSH: I notice that in the special supplementary estimates last year this amount read $275,300. This year it is $733,200. In the regular estimates the amounts are almost the same, so we can disregard them. Can the minister give any reason for such a radical increase in the amount to be expended in that province this year?

Mr. CARDIN: I think the figures given by my hon. friend are not correct. The amount we are providing this year is about the same as that provided last year for Nova Scotia. It is even a little less than last year.

Mr. WALSH: I have in my hand the special supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1937, and I find in it, harbours and rivers, Nova Scotia, $275,300. This year the amount is $733,200.

Mr. CARDIN: I have not before me last year's estimates but I remember very well when the estimates were presented to me I observed that the amount was practically the same as that provided last year. It may be we had less last year in the supplementary estimates, but the amount in the main estimates was larger. Taking the two together I think the amount we propose to spend this year in Nova Scotia is about the same, or a little less than the amount spent last year.

Mr. WALSH: I have the main estimates here also, and the amount in the main estimates looked to me to be very much the same. I may be confusing the items. The point I want to make is this: is there any connection between this tremendous increase this year and the prospective provincial election in Nova Scotia?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh. 31111-151½

The CHAIRMAN: Is the item carried?

Mr. WALSH: No, Mr. Chairman. I ask this question seriously. I do not object to this expenditure in Nova Scotia, particularly when my own constituency gets nothing, although as the minister himself knows it deserves consideration; but due to the peculiar report of a subordinate officer in the Post Office Department at Montreal we get nothing. I do not object to Nova Scotia getting this increased grant if it is warranted, but the question is: Is it warranted under the circumstances, when the government could not afford to spend in my constituency an amount of thirty or forty thousand dollars, yet could so radically increase the amount to be spent in Nova Scotia? To me it looks a little suspicious.

An hon, MEMBER: That shows a suspicious nature.

Mr. WALSH: Being of a suspicious frame of mind I draw it to the attention of the minister to see whether there is any foundation for the suspicion.

Mr. CARDIN: I think my hon. friend is not fair to himself when he says he is of a suspicious mind; I know him better than that. I say sincerely that there is no connection at all between these estimates and the possibility of a provincial election in Nova Scotia, and the proof of it is what I said a moment ago, that the amount is not larger this year than last year. That is a complete answer to the argument of my hon. friend.

Mr. SPENCE: We have been spending money on breakwaters in and around Nova Scotia for the last fifteen or twenty years, and every year there seem to be the same items. Do these breakwaters all fall down each year? We must have built enough breakwaters there to cover the whole shore line. I have said before and I still think that we are building breakwaters at summer resorts and private homes. For instance, you have an item of $25,000 for harbour improvements at Digby, and there is no harbour there. One boat runs from Saint John every other day; that is probably all. There is $75,000 for a breakwater at Brooklyn; what kind of a place is Brooklyn?

Mr. KINLEY: The only public works in my county since I have represented it are those in operation at the time of the last federal election; ever since they have been finishing them up. As to Brooklyn, it is near Liverpool in Queens county, where the only paper mill in Nova Scotia is situated. I never heard that they were friends of mine, but they get the biggest item in the whole county, $75,000, to repair the breakwater, which was carried away by a storm. It had to be repaired because there is a fleet of steamers running from there carrying paper to New York, and it was absolutely necessary. I am in favour of it; I think it is eminently in the public interest.

Prince Edward Island
Basin Head—boat harbour, $31,000.
Southport—wharf repairs, $4,000.
Victoria—wharf repairs, $2,300.
Wood Islands—harbour, $200,000.

Mr. STEWART: Could we have some particulars with regard to this item of $200,000 for a harbour at Wood Islands?

Mr. CARDIN: This amount of $200,000 is to be devoted to the cost of creating a boat harbour at Wood Islands, Prince Edward Island, to permit the operation of a ferry service between this place and a point in Nova Scotia. This harbour would also serve as a place of refuge for some seventy fishing boats. I am informed that a resolution has been passed by the provincial legislature requesting this expenditure.

Mr. STEWART: Could the minister say where it is located?

Mr. CARDIN: My information is that the present ferry service at Borden, at the west end of the island, provides the only entrance to and exit from the island, and that in the eastern portion they have to contend with inadequate transportation facilities for the marketing of their products in Nova Scotia. The distance is practically doubled, with a corresponding increase in railroad rates. The value of the traffic to be served by the proposed development is estimated at $200,000 annually, consisting of exports of live stock and farm produce, totalling $110,000 and imports of coal and general merchandise, $90,000. Wood Islands is situated at the southernmost point of Queens county on the Northumberland straits coast of Prince Edward Island. The establishment of this ferry service will enable the government to dispense with the subsidies now given in connection with the steamship service on the Charlottetown-Pictou route, amounting to $30,000, and also the service between Sydney and Bras d'Or lake ports on the west coast of Cape Breton, amounting to $22,500.

Mr. BENNETT: Who will supply the ferry for the new harbour?

Mr. CARDIN Probably it will be a private enterprise. We are preparing the harbour.

[Mr. Kinley.]

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister mean to say there is a possibility of that being done and the subsidies being dispensed with, down in the maritime provinces?

Mr. CARDIN: That has been represented to me.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a $30,000 subsidy now in connection with the service between Charlottetown and Pictou, and a subsidy of $22,500 for the service from Cape Breton to Prince Edward Island. Now we are to build a $200,000 harbour where there was no harbour before, and establish a ferry service, and the minister says there will be no subsidy. Will they ask the railway to build the ferry? This seems to be the beginning of an expenditure that may run to half a million dollars. All who have been there know that Prince Edward Island has a great many harbours and a population of about eighty thousand. Now we are going to start a new harbour that will involve annual expenditures but will do away with the necessity of spending money on the Pictou route and the Cape Breton island route. I suppose they will call this new harbour Cardin, and on the Nova Scotia side I suppose the port will be called Hope's Desire. I should like to know how this ferry is going to be maintained.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I should like to say a word in regard to this Wood Islands ferry. The right hon. leader of the opposition has spoken about it, but when he made his tour in the last election he forgot Prince Edward Island entirely.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, we put the present ferry there and put through a road to Charlottetown.

Mr. SINCLAIR: We are establishing a national park on the island this year, something that was not thought of by the previous government, and we felt that the ferry at Wood Islands would take care of the congestion of freight at Borden. There is one thing I should like to bring out in this connection. At the time of confederation we were promised continuous communication with the mainland, but to-day a person wishing to leave the island with a truck-load of produce is unable to do so. This Wood Islands ferry would give us communication with the mainland, particularly with the mining districts of Nova Scotia, where we could ship our produce.

Mr. BENNETT: Who is to maintain the ferry?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Well, it is going to be a private enterprise. We are going to subsidize it, and private enterprise will run the ferry.

Mr. BAKER: May I ask what is the population of Wood Islands?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Wood Islands is only a rural community.

Mr. BAKER: What is its population that it is to be accommodated at this tremendous expenditure?

Mr. SINCLAIR: It is the entire eastern end of the province.

Mr. BAKER: But the population of the whole island is only eighty thousand.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Yes, but they are real people, you know. Section 10 of the imperial order in council under the British North America Act stated that we should have an efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers between the island and the mainland winter and summer, thus placing the island in continuous communication with the railway system of the dominion. That has been carried out to a certain extent, but I wish to direct the attention of the committee to section 12, which says:

And such other changes as may be incident to, and connected with, the services by which the British North America Act, 1867, appertain to the general government, and as are or may be allowed to the other provinces.

We have not the privileges that have been given to the other provinces, where you can go from one border to the other without difficulty. If we want to take a truckload of produce from Prince Edward Island, we have to load the truck on a flat car, and it costs $12 or $14 to take it across. This new ferry will give us direct communication with our trucks. The car ferry has not the capacity to take them. That is what we are looking for to-day, and that is why we want this ferry between Wood Islands and the mainland.

Mr. BENNETT: How many miles across would it be?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Fourteen miles.

Mr. MacNICOL: This vote has to do with Wood Islands harbour, and that is what we want some information about.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Wood Islands is the eastern end of the province.

Mr. MacNICOL: The whole eastern end of it?

Mr. SINCLAIR: It takes in the whole eastern half of it.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is out in the ocean somewhere?

Mr. SINCLAIR: No, it is not; it is the eastern end of the province. People in the maritimes go down to Sackville, turn off and go down to Tormentine and to the Cape Breton national park. Then they take a run through the Annapolis valley, and that is the only way we can establish any tourist traffic in Prince Edward Island. We have been voting millions of dollars for the west and other places; now we are looking for something for Prince Edward Island, and this is what we want. If this is established in Prince Edward Island we will have something which will bring tourist traffic. That is what we want to see.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the hon. member be good enough to tell us from what part on the mainland the ferry will run?

Mr. SINCLAIR: From Wood Islands to Pictou Island.

Mr. BENNETT: That is fourteen miles.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member says the ferry is to be operated by private enterprise. What is the cost of it?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I do not know the cost of it; it is a private enterprise. But we are going to build it here, and—

Mr. BENNETT: I have frequently been in Pictou harbour, but the point is that the ferry must cost a large sum of money, because on the ferry we have now, running from Borden, we spent something in the vicinity of a million dollars or more. Then we had to provide that the old ferry be repaired so that there would be continuous operation of the new one. This ferry, which will carry trucks and passenger cars cannot be built for less than a million dollars, if it is to run in the winter. I do not know whether or not it is to run in the winter.

Mr. SINCLAIR: No, just in the summer months.

Mr. BENNETT: Then it will be an inexpensive ferry costing perhaps $100,000 or $150,000. The hon. member said the landing place was Pictou Island. I would point out that Pictou Island is not on the mainland, so there would have to be a ferry from the east coast of Prince Edward Island to Pictou Island. Now, how are you going to get from Pictou Island to the mainland?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I may have made a mistake there; it is Pictou landing.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh yes, that is different; it is on the mainland. The hon member said something about a subsidy to maintain the ferry; what does he mean by that?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I would like to inform the leader of the opposition that the idea is that, instead of a boat running from Pictou to Charlottetown, as at present, it will run from Pictou to Wood Islands and so far as I know, the subsidy will be given to this boat.

Mr. BENNETT: Now at last we have the story, because a few minutes ago the Minister of Public Works said we would escape payment of the subsidy on the line from Charlottetown to Pictou. But the member is frank about it, and says "We propose to exchange that subsidy and put it on the line from Wood Islands to Pictou landing." That amounts to $30,000 a year. As a matter of fact, it is one of the things which engaged the attention of the late government. The contract was made under circumstances which we will not discuss to-night, but there is no more justification for $30,000 a year to run from Pictou to Charlottetown than there is for a fifth wheel on a coach. The sum was out of all proportion to the service rendered.

Now we get the whole story. I point out to the minister that this is the beginning of a project which ultimately will cost hundreds of thousands of dollars. It is the beginning of another enterprise to establish another ferry between Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, not New Brunswick. At the present time the ferry which traverses the narrow sea from Borden to Charlottetown serves the wants of that community, and there is a provision whereby the old ferry is maintained in condition, so that there will be constant communication. Now the member is frank about it. They have in the summer time communication by the old vessel Hochelaga, which is owned by a firm in Montreal. They bought her for a reasonable sum to carry out the contract for a number of years, with a subsidy sufficient to pay for her a little more than once, and in the meantime she operates in the dear old summer time between Charlottetown and Pictou. Now that is to be discontinued, and we are going to have a ferry which will run the fourteen miles between Pictou and Wood Islands, and the subsidy heretofore paid, amounting to $30,000 a year, is being relied upon for this operation. The sum of $30,000 is the capitalized value of $750,000 at four per cent; that is all that means. And with the cost of $200,000 to put in these piers at Wood Islands, without any explanation given by the minister as to why it should be done, and without any detail being furnished as to this new enterprise, we are now embarking upon it regardless of what the ultimate cost will be.

Undoubtedly, on the story which we now have by the member, we are embarking on a [Mr. Bennett.]

new enterprise to establish a new line of communication between Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia,-not New Brunswick, as at present-to meet the line of railway. The next demand will be to increase the wharfage and facilities at Pictou. We did repair them once before, when they were not good enough for the Hochelaga. Those who have been at Pictou harbour know that it has great historical background. It has magnificent history, but it has very little industrial wealth, and the wharves have now fallen more or less into a state of disrepair. The next thing will be to repair the wharves for the new ferry, and then increase the subsidy, and altogether we will have established a new claim upon the public treasury, without any explanation having been given when we started it. After it starts, we know perfectly well that the reason given hereafter will be: Well, it must be finished. That is the case in connection with a dozen of these items-it must be finished.

I think it my duty to point out that this contemplates an expenditure which certainly will involve this country in an outlay of many hundreds of thousands of dollars. The total population of the island is 80,000, and nearly half of it lives in the city. Therefore the entire rural population, producing new wealth, is limited to about 40,000 people. That is the story. I should like to have the minister's explanation of it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am glad the leader of the opposition has got up and told us about the sympathy he has for Prince Edward Island. But I want to tell him that there is one thing we are glad of, and that is the tourist traffic. While the leader of the opposition may not think Prince Edward Island is on the map at all, we are looking for tourist traffic down there this year in connection with the national park. We have a ferry running from Borden to Tormentine which cannot carry all the traffic. Last year on occasions there were from twenty-eight to thirty cars left on the island, which could not go across to the mainland because of the congested traffic. This other service will be the means of getting away from that difficulty. As I said before, they are going around to the Cape Breton national park.

Some people down on the island were asking for a new car ferry at Borden, but this will do away with the necessity for that ferry. However, I am glad that the leader of the opposition has put himself on record to-night against having any interest in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. BENNETT: Now, Mr. Chairman, that is the sort of cheap politics which meets any criticism made on a fair basis with respect to a public expenditure. The hon, member for Wellington South (Mr. Gladstone) directed attention to a matter which has had the consideration of this house on more than one occasion, namely, the question of pork barrel estimates. The hon. member for Queens (Mr. Sinclair) says I do not know where Prince Edward Island is. Well, the late administra-tion provided a highway from Borden to Charlottetown. It also made provision for a road to reach the sea. It made large expenditures on highways on the island, because the soil is very rich and they have no stone or gravel with which to build roads. received extensive assistance for that purpose.

My colleague directs my attention to the fact that there is an expenditure of about $36,000 to be made at Pictou landing. There is your next start. Just look at the sequence of events. This matter, if properly considered by the committee, would at least involve some thought as to what the ultimate end will be. There is (1) $200,000 for Wood Islands; that is the start, an expenditure for the piers; then there is (2) a ferry, which is to be subsidized to the extent of at least $30,000 per year; (3) repairs totalling about $36,000 to the wharf at Pictou landing-and I do not know what number 4 will be. Because I direct attention to it I am said to be the enemy of Prince Edward Island.

That province has a population of 80,000 people, and it was represented in this parliament by eight members. That action was taken in days gone by; their representation in the House of Commons could not be less than that in the Senate. When they came into confederation they were given four representatives in the Senate, two being taken away from New Brunswick and two from Nova Scotia. Under these circumstances it ill becomes the hon member to say that when one draws attention to certain facts he is an enemy of the province.

That is exactly the trouble with our democracy in Canada at the present time. That is what is cursing this country. Let me tell the committee what they did in Australia when they discovered that a similar condition existed. Any estimates over a certain amount cannot be expended until a committee investigates the necessity for the expenditure. The committee hears the evidence of engineers and other people affected, and then makes a report.

Mr. NEILL: A committee of the house?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, of all the parties. The secretary of that committee happens to be a gentleman who has been attached to the prime minister's office since the days of the first prime minister, Mr. Barton. I had the privilege of having him with me for a period of six weeks, and I learned a great deal of the conditions under which they operate government. I was struck with this fact. Due to the depression, all capital expenditures were suspended and the committee did not meet, but while I was there they were discussing whether or not it should not be set up again.

I have asked the minister, but what has he told me as to whether or not he is warranted in pledging the credit of this country for thousands of dollars in connection with expenditures on Wood Islands harbour? The minister says that the subsidy is to be abandoned, but the member says they are relying upon getting this money. I am not unmindful of what will be said everywhere, that Bennett is the enemy of Prince Edward Island.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: An hon. member says "hear, hear," which shows the national outlook he has upon a question of fact. Can we afford it? We have been denied the right to spend money in many places where it is needed badly; we have been told we cannot afford it; yet we are starting here with a quarter of a million dollars and not knowing where it is going to end. A total of $200,000 is asked for this harbour, and $36,000 is being asked for Pictou Landing. As the minister says, this is the first appropriation. The hon. member tells us that this is for the piers. I say quite frankly that we have no intelligent appreciation of the necessity for these expenditures.

I wonder if the hon. member took the trouble to look at the figures to see what it is liable to cost us to manage this ferry? We lost over $300,000 in operating the other ferry. The prices for handling traffic were reduced during the time of the previous government, so that it would be less costly to carry automobiles across and there were heavy expenditures to construct a road up to Charlottetown. The people of Prince Edward Island insisted that we separate the ferry from the railway in order that they might have a clear understanding of the situation. So they were separated, and any losses are now borne by the people of Canada as a whole.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Should that not be?

Mr. BENNETT: I am only pointing out the facts. I am not complaining, as we yielded to the requests which the province made. The hon. member has stated that he has been successful in inducing the government to make these present and future expenditures, but because I dare to suggest that the matter might be considered, he says that I am the enemy of the people of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. BOULANGER: He did not say that.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what he said. There is the record of what has been done during the last seven years, not by one government but by successive governments. If the minister had had a clear appreciation of what is involved in this, I am sure he would not have done it. I have crossed to Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, on the Hochelaga on more than one occasion. I know the situation. That vessel carries very little traffic, and a fourteen mile ferry is a long ferry.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It is in a different section of the province.

Mr. BENNETT: It is at the eastern end. In my judgment a fourteen mile ferry will require a better boat and better facilities if it is going to carry loaded trucks in any number.

I mention these things not in any sense of hostility, but because I believe they should be mentioned in fairness to everyone who desires to understand the situation This is something that touches the very life of the country. This is one of the difficulties with which we are faced at the present moment. I am not saying for one moment that one government is any different from another; I only say that this is one of the troubles of our institution at the present time.

The hon. member talks about the extent to which Prince Edward Island is used as a tourist resort. The present ferry involved the building of complete terminals at Borden and the construction of a hard-surfaced road to Charlottetown. We have a large investment in the hotel at Charlottetown, upon which we lost a lot of money last year. That is what was done in order that the people might be able to get their traffic to the sea. These people were producers of new wealth agriculturally, but the total population at the present time on the farms of Prince Edward Island is less than 65,000.

Mr. DUPUIS: They deserve to be considered.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely the hon. member does not mean that seriously. They are not only being considered; they are being provided with every facility. What I am saying is that when we ask questions in order to ascertain why the country should be involved in future expenditures, we are charged with a lack of consideration for the people of this province. We know of many people in this country who have to do without the things they would like to have. Prince Edward Island is fairly well to do. In my judgment it is one of the best areas in this country in point of material wealth and in having those things that go to make people happy. It is true it is an island—and I suppose the previous government is responsible for that? It is true that the distance across the Northumberland straits is fairly long—and I suppose the late government is to blame for that?

I have stated the practice in Australia and what would be done there in a case similar to this. I know that in many cases, although provision had been made in the estimates for certain works, they declined to proceed with them after the committee had visited the spot and heard the evidence of engineers and others, on the ground that the expenditure could not be justified under the conditions existing or as being necessary for the peace, happiness and prosperity of the people. There are many things the people in the west would like to have; there are many things the people in the east would like to have; but we cannot have everything.

I suggest that the minister has given no adequate explanation why we should embark on this enterprise at this time, especially in view of the fresh knowledge we have obtained. There is a variance between himself and the hon. member representing that district as to how this thing is to be carried on. The Hochelaga is to lose its subsidy, and that news will be received with glee. That subsidy is to be transferred to this new private enterprise, the details of which we do not know as yet. However, I have no doubt in due season we will know if we faint not.

Mr. CARDIN: Mr. Chairman, I hope the right hon, leader of the opposition does not think I attributed any motives to him because of the observations he made. It is not very often a Minister of Public Works is placed in the position in which I find myself in connection with this item. It is not very often, when proposing an expenditure in the house, that one can support the item with a resolution of the government of the province where the expenditure is to be made.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister know of any time that he could not?

Mr. CARDIN: In the present case we have representations by the legislature of Prince Edward Island. I have under my hand a long resolution which very strongly requests the federal government to undertake that expenditure, and establishes, at least from their point of view, that it would be very beneficial.

Mr. BENNETT: Are they contributing?

Mr. CARDIN: No. But there are many undertakings all over Canada to which provincial governments do not contribute, although the importance of the expenditure is very strongly pressed upon us.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh yes.

Mr. CARDIN: In this case, as I have pointed out, the legislature has passed a strong resolution requesting that the expenditure be made.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the Department of Public Works undertaken an investigation of the subject-matter of this proposed expenditure?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, we have a report from the engineers as to the cost.

Mr. HEAPS: Not the cost—the necessity.

Mr. CARDIN: As to the necessity, we have been largely governed by the representations made to the government by the legislature of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. BROOKS: Any province would urge that.

Mr. CARDIN: We have investigated the cost of the proposal, and according to information supplied to me by the departmental engineers, it will cost $240,000 to establish the harbour at Wood Islands. I think we should give some consideration to representations based on the fact that this ferry will help very materially tourist traffic; it is going to be more convenient to reach the park, and a larger number of tourists is expected on account of the better facilities that will be provided by the new ferry. Besides, I do not think anybody can successfully deny that at the present time the farmers of the island are poorly provided with facilities to sell their produce on the mainland. The present ferry is far from being adequate; it costs them more than it should cost, and there is a long delay, so that most of them cannot advantageously visit the mainland to dispose of their products. But with this new ferry, according to representations received by the department, there will be much better facilities for the farmers of Prince Edward Island to dispose by means of their own trucks, of their produce on the mainland. In my opinion we are justified in asking parliament to vote this expenditure to meet the request made by the provincial legislature, based on these two particular considerations, namely, helping to develop a greater tourist traffic on the island, and giving greater facilities to its farmers to dispose of their products over in Nova Scotia.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the minister tell us the tonnage of the boat that will serve as the ferry?

Mr. CARDIN: That has not been considered yet. All we have been asked for is to provide a place where the boat can dock. In this estimate we are not providing for the boat itself.

Mr. BROOKS: Do that later!

Mr. CARDIN: We are only providing a landing place for the boat. I can assure the house that the expenditure will not be undertaken unless the province or a private company undertakes seriously to establish a ferry which will be satisfactory and will meet the requirements. It is not our intention to spend this amount of money on building a wharf or landing place for a ferry without communicating with the provincial government and ascertaining that a ferry is going to be established, and that there will be a guarantee that the service will be continued for a number of years at least.

Mr. STIRLING: Supposing the legislature sends to the minister a resolution?

Mr. CARDIN: I am not bound to accept the resolution.

Mr. SPENCE: I had the pleasure of being in Charlottetown last fall at a dominion good roads convention, and I met a number of the important people of the island at the hotel.

An hon. MEMBER: Were they all there?

Mr. SPENCE: Pretty nearly all were there: there are not so many on the island. I do not know why people make so much of a place like Prince Edward Island, although it is lovely and the people very hospitable-never in my life did I meet better. But let it be understood, contrary to what my hon. friend has said, that the people did not expect to receive this service; they only hoped they might get it. I know this because I discussed it with many of them. Naturally, like the inhabitants of every other small place, they are out for everything they can get. It has been said that my honoured leader was unpopular in the island, but nothing has been said about their appreciation of what he has done. I met the most important people who were there-

An hon. MEMBER: Naturally.

Mr. SPENCE: —and we had a good time too; everybody was delighted with the fine road that was constructed while my leader was in power from Borden to Charlottetown, and from there to the sea. I can hardly believe the statement as to the number of wagons that could not get on that ferry, because I got a lot of information about good roads, and road building, and traffic, and I understood there were very few wagons or trucks that could not get on that ferry to return to Tormentine from Borden.

As to improving tourist traffic on the island, I hope they are able to do so, because it is a lovely spot and the people are fine people; and many of them were very disappointed at the ingratitude the island showed to the Conservative party at the last election.

The ferry from Tormentine to Borden covers a long distance and it is difficult and most expensive to keep it operating in the wintertime. I think Prince Edward Island has been treated very well by the dominion, and I doubt very much if this proposed expenditure is wise; in fact, my own view is that once you have built a landing place for this ferry, they will come back next year and ask for the ferry itself. So I advise the minister to be careful and not start it.

Mr. HEAPS: Before this item carries I should like to say a word or two, because a year or two ago when I discussed in committee the extent of the deficit on the ferry, I was dubbed reactionary by certain hon. members from Prince Edward Island; yet all I had done was to seek a little information. Anybody who asks any question about expenditures in Prince Edward Island is looked upon as an enemy of the island, although I am just as much interested in helping the people of that province as I am in the wellbeing of any part of Canada. At the same time there is no minister, present or past, of public works who can say that at any time I ever requested one cent of public expenditure for any sort of public works in this country. I do not believe in that kind of politics, nor do I go around looking for a little patronage for my own constituency. When public works are to be carried out, I want them to be only such as are necessary and to the public advantage, not primarily for political purposes.

Personally I do not believe that the minister could honestly inform this committee that the purpose centemplated under this item is worth the amount which it is proposed to vote. The minister has no information which he can give to this committee other than the fact that the provincial government have asked for this public work. Is the government going to adopt the policy of acquiescing in any expenditure for which a provincial government asks? I do not think they would; I do not think they could. If a request is received from a provincial government for the construction of certain public works, the first thing that ought to be done by the Department of Public Works is to undertake a complete and exhaustive inquiry into the subject matter of the application, and then judge it on its merits. That has not been done in this particular case and I think it ought to be one of the first things the Department of Public Works should see to.

Evidently this is what has happened. The provincial legislature has requested certain public works to be constructed there, and no doubt the members from Prince Edward Island have been to see the minister and have impressed upon him the necessity of going ahead. I believe the Minister of Finance represents that particular district, and I have no doubt he has a good deal of weight with the Minister of Public Works. In justice to the Department of Public Works, to the finances of the country and to the people of Canada, the minister ought to give us more definite reasons why these works should be proceeded with. He has not convinced me at any rate of the necessity of spending this money, more than a quarter of a million, in that part of the island on something that is going to be of doubtful benefit, something at any rate that will not be commensurate with the expenditure.

Will the minister tell us whether a survey has been made, and how many people are likely to use the ferry? How many tourists were in this part of the island in the last two years, and how many are likely to avail themselves of the ferry when it is in operation? These are questions with regard to which the minister has not given us any information, and I feel that until he is in a position to explain fully the reasons for this expenditure he ought to leave the matter in abeyance.

Mr. CARDIN: The engineer has reported that a population of 25,000 will be affected by the proposed ferry service.

Mr. BENNETT: Affected by it?

Mr. CARDIN: It has been carefully estimated that the section of Prince Edward Island directly affected by the proposed ferry service has a population of 25,000, and there is an additional 20,000 very closely concerned. The whole province will benefit indirectly; that is what the district engineer says in his report. The probable value of the commercial traffic is estimated at $256,000 made up as follows: inward—coal, 10,000 tons, $65,000; general merchandise, $25,000; outward—live stock, $14,000; farm produce, roots, $10,000; dairy and poultry products, $20,000; hay and oats, $28,000; mixed fertilizer, $20,000; miscellaneous, $18,000; local fishing stations, 70 boats, at $800 per boat. The total estimated annual business is $256,000.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not catch what the minister said about the boats.

Mr. CARDIN: The estimate is $800 per boat on 70 boats.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there any indication of the amount of new traffic to be developed?

Mr. CARDIN: No. It would be difficult to estimate that because one cannot say exactly what use will be made of the new ferry.

Mr. HEAPS: How much will the government have to spend each year in connection with the ferry?

Mr. CARDIN: I do not see any other expenditure as far as the department is concerned. Nothing is anticipated in addition to what we are proposing now for the establishment of the landing place.

Mr. SPENCE: You will have to buy the ferry next.

Mr. CARDIN: We are not providing for the ferry.

Mr. SPENCE: I know that, but they will ask you next year to do it.

Mr. CARDIN: Maybe, but we are not bound to accede to the request.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I am very much interested in the discussion of this estimate for Prince Edward Island and I am gratified to know that members from different parts of the dominion are pretty well acquainted with the situation down there. I was pleased to hear the remarks of my good friend from Parkdale (Mr. Spence), who visited us last year, and whom we were glad to see.

I do not intend to discuss the merits or demerits of this particular item because it is not in the county I represent. It is at the other end of the province, and no doubt the people in that part of Prince Edward Island know their own requirements better than anyone else.

As regards our good friend the leader of the opposition, I should not like the impression to go abroad that anyone down there thought that he was an enemy of the province in any respect. We greatly appreciate what all governments have done for Prince Edward Island. It is a small province, and if it is an island that is separated from the mainland, that is not the fault of the people of the province. Nature placed the island in the straits, and we were at one time in the happy position of having a continuous and profitable trade with the United States. At the time of confederation Prince Edward Island was induced to join the other provinces in the formation of the Dominion of Canada, and the province came in on one distinct understanding, which was that we were to have continuous steam communication with the mainland. I want hon, members to know that after a fight extending over fifty years that goal was finally attained when the car ferry steamer service was established between Tormentine and Borden. All governments have contributed to that service, and we have had the second boat built. The leader of the opposition and the hon, member for Parkdale said a few minutes ago that it was doubtful whether any additional boat would be needed to carry the traffic. The captain of the steamer was in this building the other day, and he informed me that on fifteen different days last year they had to leave some twenty cars either on the mainland or on the island while they made the trip.

Mr. SPENCE: You mean automobiles?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Yes, automobiles, and they had to wait from two and a half to three hours while the car ferry made the round trip.

Mr. SPENCE: That would not hurt them in a slow place like that.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Well we are beginning to speed up since you were down there last fall, we have been trying to follow the pace you set while there. So in view of that congestion last year, there is no doubt that with the increased tourist traffic that we expect to attract, the congestion is going to increase. Different suggestions have been made as to the best solution. Some think the best thing would be an additional boat for the summer months, equipped to carry automobiles to run in conjunction with the present boat. But the time has come when something has to be done or else we shall have to try to prevent people going to the province. If the transport service is not sufficient to carry the tourists, I do not think it is fair to invite them to go there and be held up.

I never could see the advantage of the transfer of the car ferry accounting from the Canadian National estimates and placing it in an item by itself, possibly it is a disadvantage.

Mr. BENNETT: I think so; it always has been.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I do not think it is an advantage. We see the effect of it here to-night in this house, because anyone can pick up that item and say: Here is a loss of $300,000 on the car ferry. That is really not a fair comparison, for it must be remembered that the distance is only nine miles, and the car ferry is only credited with that nine miles haul, whereas the bulk of the traffic originating in Prince Edward Island is long haul traffic, through to Toronto and all over the dominion and to the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: And they get the 20 per cent freight rate reduction besides.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Certainly the province of Prince Edward Island is not getting a fair deal, and we are shown up as costing this country a great deal of money, which is unfair. Therefore I think it was a mistake to have this accounting separated from the main operating costs of the Canadian National Railway.

As I said, whether this is the best solution for the problem which is developing there, it is not for me to say; but the time has arrived when something has to be done, and I believe better accommodation should be given in connection with the car ferry we have there. The accommodation on the piers is not sufficient, and there should be improvements to give a better service. We entered confederation on the direct understanding that we were to be given continuous steam communication, and we should not have any complaints from other parts of the dominion about that provision. We know of the millions spent to build a railway to Churchill on Hudson bay, and to establish a port there, where probably very little traffic will ever go, and which will never be a paying proposition, but we do not hear any hon. member from western Canada say a word in complaint of that expenditure. I believe Prince Edward Island is entitled in all fairness to consideration from the rest of the dominion, not only on account of the position we are in, but also because of the terms of confederation we are entitled to everything we have got, and possibly something more.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MacNICOL: Hon. members cannot expect this vote to carry so rapidly. There is one item in it to which the house should give careful attention: I refer to that pertaining to the Richelieu river, $500,000. Last session when this same amount was voted, if my memory is correct, the minister said that the matter of increasing the size of the Richelieu canal would be referred to the International Joint Commission. That commission held many meetings; I attended quite a number myself; some were held at New York, also at Albany, Plattsburg, Burlington, and Montreal. I believe I spent three days at the session at Montreal. A vast amount of information was submitted by eminent engineers and thoroughly competent men for and against further canalization from the St. Lawrence to the Hudson. I took my time and made a careful survey myself all along the Richelieu river, along lake Champlain and south to where the proposed canal would enter the Hudson river. I am convinced that the time has come when this whole project should be laid to one side until the International Joint Commission has reported on it.

There were three main proposals in reference to this work, and as far as I know not a single one of them has been endorsed. Certainly the engineers from the United Statesand there were quite a number of them at these meetings-and representatives of the railways and of business organizations all along the route were not at all in accord with the proposal for canalization via the Richelieu river.

From the United States side there were two proposals that might be considered; one was to commence a canal six miles east of Montreal, I presume from part of Montreal harbour, across to Chambly basin. That was not at all supported. The main United States proposal was to run a canal from lake St. Francis fifty-four miles overland to lake Champlain. I cannot see how any Canadian government could support such a proposal as that. They proposed to divert 5,000 cubic feet a second from lake St. Francis, which is 152 feet above sea level, run it across country, which is fairly level, and drop it into lake Champlain by either one or two locks, a drop of 52 feet. It is proposed to make the level of lake Champlain 100 feet.

I asked some engineers a number of questions about the volume of water and such matters, and it came out that this proposal was to take 5,000 cubic feet a second from lake St. Francis. What would they do with it after they got it to lake Champlain? They could not allow it to run down the Richelieu river; I believe the footage there is from 4,000 to 5,000 cubic second feet to 7,000 or 8,000. It is not to be expected that the Richelieu river bed would take in an additional 5,000 feet per second. And they do not propose to send it that way. Their proposal was to take it through the height of land, which I believe is about 47 feet, south of lake Champlain; in other words, send the St. Lawrence water south into the Hudson, at Northumberland, through one or two locks. That is out of the question; this government could not support that. And all the other proposals that Canada might entertain are out of the question, because the Americans are all against them.

Mr. BENNETT: They would have to widen and deepen the Richelieu river to carry this additional water.

Mr. MacNICOL: It was shown at these meetings that there are many private rights on the Richelieu that the government would have to buy, such as dam sites or present dams which are there. The engineers submitted figures showing that the cost would be staggering. In 1900 they figured the cost at $60,-000,000, but they now figure it at $200,000,000 if they run the canal from lake St. Francis.

Mr. DUPUIS: Oh, yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: O.K.? It is not O.K., and I say no Canadian can support a canal running from lake St. Francis that diverts 5,000 cubic second feet from the St. Lawrence, which would injure the harbour of Montreal, as the hon. member knows. Therefore that is totally out of the question.

Now I will go back to where I left off in dealing with two or three other proposals. If the United States engineers are asking for anything, they are asking for a twenty-seven to thirty foot canal, for if the canal were to go through from the Hudson river to lake Champlain—that is, if the height of land were cut down—that would be the depth of the canal. They are opposed to anything less than that; they say a twelve foot canal is not of much use. I believe the present lake Champlain—Hudson canal is a twelve foot canal, with a potential capacity of over 8,000,000 tons per season. How much traffic goes over it? Only 351,000 tons. Why? Because the traffic is not there.

Mr. DUPUIS: It has not twelve feet yet.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am talking of the lake Champlain-Hudson canal, from the south end of lake Champlain to the Hudson river, which is a twelve foot canal. I went over it and photographed it from one end to the other. I photographed the boats on it, though there were very few. There were two or three steel barges carrying oil, which were pushed along by a steam barge. The figures that were submitted were very striking as to the value of the present canal on the Richelieu river. These figures, I believe, were submitted by the Chambre de Commerce of Montreal in opposition to the proposal; that is my memory, though I speak subject to correction. In any case it was a very representative body. The report I have in my hand was prepared by Mr. Graham for M. Lefebvre, whatever body that gentleman is connected with. It was pointed out that in 1935 the Richelieu river canal, from lake Champlain to Sorel, carried traffic in hard coal amounting to 2,114 tons. That is a mere bagatelle, showing a tremendous drop from the high point of 124,000 tons in 1917. The traffic in hay amounted to only 880 tons, though if my memory serves me right, last year we were given figures showing heavy traffic on that canal.

Mr. DUPUIS: The canal is not deep enough; that is the reason for the light traffic.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is plenty deep enough to carry all the traffic that is offering on that canal, and I say that, after having made a thorough survey.

[Mr. Dupuis.]

Mr. RHEAUME: Has my hon, friend the figures before 1930?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes. Hard coal carried amounted to 23,935 tons and hay to 2,087 tons. Coming back to where I left off, in 1935 no ore, pulpwood or sawed lumber was carried over this canal from Canada to the United States. The total traffic dropped from 669,299 tons in 1910 to the figure I gave a few moments ago, 45,000 tons in 1935. The traffic is not there. I saw the blueprints indicating what is proposed to be done; I went to Montreal in order to look them over, and then I travelled all over the canal. In my opinion it would pay this country forever to carry free any traffic going over that river rather than to launch upon this scheme which will call for a tremendous expenditure of money.

Last year something was said about lands being flooded, and I made a careful survey in that connection as well. By far the major portions of the flooded lands, the engineers tell me, would be in United States territory south of the international border. I asked the engineers where the flooded lands were on the Canadian side.

Mr. RHEAUME: They cover an area about twenty-five miles long on both sides of the river.

Mr. MacNICOL: The banks on both sides of the river are high enough to take all the water flowing in.

Mr. RHEAUME: No, sir.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have not the photographs here, but I can show them to my hon. friend, and my eyesight is pretty good. In any event it was not the river flooding we were told about; it was the flooding of the lands around lake Champlain, and those lands are largely in the states of New Hampshire and New York. By far the larger portion of the water that flows down the Richelieu river originates on the United States side, and if they have floods there, they can take care of them.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I take this stand. Last year we voted half a million dollars, and this year we are asked to vote another half million.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. CARDIN: This is a revote.

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, I am mighty glad to hear that. I hope this will only be revoted every year and never expended. If that is all that is to be done I have nothing more to say.

Mr. CARDIN: I cannot promise that; but this is a revote.

Mr. DUPUIS: O.K., then.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, O.K., if it is a revote and continues to be a revote. But before even a revote is placed in the estimates, I think the minister should wait for the report of the International Joint Commission. He will remember that last year he said in effect: Well, we will have the International Joint Commission make a survey. If the International Joint Commission O.K's any proposal to canalize the Richelieu river at twenty-seven feet, I say the International Joint Commission ought to be abolished. But I am convinced that their engineers will never recommend any such proposal.

This whole thing should be left over until we have the report of the engineers, and then the country can fairly determine what policy should be pursued, whether we should canalize the Richelieu, or run the canal from a point six miles east of Montreal, which are the only two proposals that can be considered. As far as the United States are concerned, they have definitely made up their minds so far as I can see, to deepen the Erie canal to fourteen feet if they can find the water to operate it. They now have it deepened to fourteen feet for part of its length, but so far they cannot find water to operate it the whole length at that depth. They have constructed two large reservoirs, but they were prevented from going further because of the uncertainty of finding additional water in New York state with which to operate a fourteen foot canal. If they can get that water they are ready to forget all about the Richelieu or the lake Champlain canal, because that would not be of any convenience to them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no!

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, I discussed it with engineers at Albany and all up and down the series of canals, as well as in Washington, and so far as I am concerned I am certain that they are not interested in a twelve foot canal, so any expenditure by this country on a canal of that depth would be of doubtful value.

Mr. CARDIN: I probably should say a word in reply to the hon. member. The large amount of money he has mentioned in connection with the development of the Richelieu river refers to a development at a depth of twenty-seven feet.

Mr. MacNICOL: I said from twenty-seven to thirty feet.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes; it would be equivalent to the proposed development of the great lakes-St. Lawrence system. The proposal for the development of the Richelieu river to a depth of twelve or fifteen feet may not interest the United States, but it may be of interest to Canada. It may be of interest to that section of Canada through which the Richelieu river flows.

The reference made to the International Joint Commission is not for the purpose of obtaining the approval of that body of the development of the Richelieu river through its canalization. We have referred to the International Joint Commission the proposal with respect to the dam we propose to build with this sum of money between St. Johns and Chambly. That dam may have the effect of raising or lowering the water on lake Champlain, because it is being built between Chambly and St. Johns in order to permit the regulation of the flow of the Richelieu river during the navigation season.

The banks of the Richelieu river from St. Johns to the boundary are low. In fact, about a mile or two above St. Johns, one would think that the Richelieu is not a river but rather a lake.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is partly a lake.

Mr. CARDIN: The river is very wide, because the banks are low. All the land is flooded by high waters in the spring, and those high waters do not disappear soon enough in most years to permit cultivation of the low lands on the Canadian as well as the American territory.

In order to dispose of that large amount of water each spring, it was proposed as far back as 1907 to dredge the river between the town of St. Johns and the boundary. But when parliament voted the money and we began dredging that section of the river, the Americans intervened and said, "By dredging the river between St. Johns and the boundary you are going to increase the section of the river. It is true that the water would flow more rapidly in the spring, but it would also flow more rapidly during the summer, and you are going to lower the level of lake Champlain."

That was their objection. It was as a result of that objection that Canada and the United States discussed the proposal of building a regulating dam between St. Johns and Chambly. That dam would be open during the spring, when the water is high, and the river having been dredged between St. Johns and the boundary, the water would flow rapidly in the spring through the openings of the regulating dam. But when the high water of the spring had passed the regulating dam would be closed and the level of the water on the Richelieu river as well as on lake Champlain would be preserved at its normal point. That is the object of the construction of the regulating dam.

Mr. MacNICOL: At what normal point?

Mr. CARDIN: I have not the figure in mind, and I would not risk a guess. However, the level of the water would be maintained by that regulating dam, even if the river is dredged between St. Johns and the boundary at the normal level of lake Champlain. At that time the International Waterways Commission as it was then called agreed to the proposal of a regulating dam between Chambly and St. Johns, provided the dam were built with openings sufficient to dispose of the high water in the spring, but which would maintain the normal flow of the Richelieu river during the navigation season.

The project was not carried on, on account of the difficulties in which the country found itself as a result of the war. All I propose at the present time is the construction of the dam which was agreed upon by the American and Canadian authorities, and approved by the International Waterways Commission as far back as 1907, or a little later.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there an order issued by the commission?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, a resolution has been passed by the International Waterways Commission approving the construction of the dam. It was not proceeded with later on, and now we are asking that there be a confirmation of the order given in 1907 for the construction of the dam.

Strictly speaking, that does not affect the project of canalization of the whole Richelieu river. It covers more particularly the reclaiming of these low lands on Canadian territory also, to a certain extent, on United States territory.

Mr. BENNETT: Between St. Johns and the boundary?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, between St. Johns and the boundary. Besides there is going to be an advantage even if we do not decide to reconstruct the Chambly canal. The dam is going to be built half way between Chambly and St. Johns. The present canal is between Chambly and St. Johns. The dam being built half way will reduce by half, the length of the present canal, which is going to be an advantage to navigation. Instead of having to go through a canal twelve miles long, the boats will travel through a canal only six miles long, because the dam between Chambly and St. Johns will raise the level of the water so that from Friars Island it will be open river navigation.

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. BENNETT: What is the distance between St. Johns and Chambly?

Mr. CARDIN: Twelve miles. This would reduce by six miles the present length of the Chambly canal, a point which is advantageous so far as navigation is concerned. I repeat, that for the present this does not commit us to the canalization of the Richelieu river. It is true the question was raised before the International Joint Commission when they studied the different projects mentioned by the hon. member. Their meeting was not organized with a view to considering the Richelieu river. They had three projects which would have left out of consideration the Richelieu river from St. Johns or from Chambly right through to the St. Lawrence.

The suggestions which were made by the United States interests were (1) for a canal entirely on American territory; (2) from St. Johns, inland, right through to Laprairie; and (3) from Chambly, at the foot of the present Chambly canal, right through to St. Lambert, in front of Montreal. A fourth proposal was suggested by Canadian representatives for study. The International Joint Commission discussed and studied more particularly the twenty-seven foot canal—

Mr. MacNICOL: Twenty-seven to thirty.

Yes, twenty-seven CARDIN: thirty. We admit the proposal for canalization at twelve feet does not appear to interest the Americans very much. It might interest us later on, but that question is not raised at the present time. We are not now discussing the reconstruction of the Chambly canal. That would be the most expensive part of the whole project and would cost in the neighbourhood of $8,000,000. We propose only to build a dam, in order to help reclaim the low lands, and in the second place to better the present navigation system by reducing the length of the Chambly canal by half. That will be of great advantage.

It is no argument to say that there is no traffic at the present time. When there is no railroad between two points there is no traffic. Did we wait for traffic to build our railroads? No, we built our railroads to develop traffic, and we succeeded in developing traffic where there was not one dollar's worth before. In the present condition of the canal we cannot expect to show the same results that are being shown in other sections of the country where the canals are up to date. Forty or fifty years ago when the St. Lawrence canals were the same depth as the Chambly canal—

Mr. BENNETT: That is twelve feet.

Mr. CARDIN: -they were carrying just about the same amount of traffic as is being carried by the Chambly canal. The St. Lawrence canals have been put in better condition to carry traffic, and they show better results. Where is the man who will contend that you can carry on a transportation business to-day with the old type of canal boat? It would not be profitable. Where are the small ships that used to ply our rivers twentyfive years ago? Why did the big shipping companies build the large boats they have on the lakes? Because small boats are not profitable, and large ones are. The same thing applies to the Richelieu river and the Chambly canal. We must be able to use larger boats and carry greater quantities of merchandise if we want to show a profit.

The best example of this is the condition of this ditch which runs through the best section of the province of Quebec which has been forgotten for a number of years. The paper companies have built special boats to navigate this ditch and transport paper and pulp to the United States. Last year the International Paper Company built two boats and this year they are building two more. These boats had to be specially constructed to navigate the shallow depth of about five feet and a half during the summer. Why has this company tried to accommodate itself to the present conditions? Because the traffic is there; because they find it more advantageous to ship by water than by rail. If it had been advantageous to ship by rail, they would not have gone to the expense of building special boats to navigate the canal, as they have done.

I am not asking the committee to commit this country to the canalization of the Richelieu river. I am simply asking for a vote to build a regulating dam and reclaim certain lands which I contend will prove profitable. In doing this, the Chambly canal will be improved. It is proposed to dredge the Richelieu river from the St. Lawrence to the foot of the Chambly canal, and from the proposed dam to the boundary line, a work in which different governments have been interested over a number of years. It is intended to straighten the channel which now exists. Considerable low-lying land along the river will be reclaimed for the benefit of the farmers.

We should not forget that from Sorel to Chambly, and to the boundary, there are many important localities which have no proper railway facilities. The present railroads cross the Richelieu river at right angles, and there is no line running parallel to it.

Mr. MacNICOL: There are good highways. 31111--152

Mr. CARDIN: Important centres like St. Johns should be considered and proper facilities provided. With this explanation I hope my hon. friend will not continue to fear that I am placing the country in a hole. All I am doing is endeavouring to better conditions in that locality, and I think the vote is quite justified.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the dam to which the minister referred north of St. Johns?

Mr. HEAPS: I would point out that it is eleven o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it is eleven o'clock. It is quite clear that any country represented by the Minister of Public Works can never be spoken of as the forgotten country.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

It being ten minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, April 1, 1937

The house met at eleven o'clock.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to present the report of the joint librarians of parliament.

CANADA-GERMANY TRADE AGREEMENT

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I table herewith copies of the following documents:

1. Provisional trade agreement between Canada and Germany, signed at Ottawa October 22, 1936.

2. Payments agreement between Canada and Germany, signed at Ottawa, October 22, 1936.

3. Exchange of notes dated October 22, 1936, concerning the application as from November 15, 1936, of the provisions of the provisional trade agreement between Canada and Germany relating to the customs treatment of goods.

4. An exchange of notes with a representative of the German government, dated October 22, 1936, concerning the intention of the government of Canada to invite parliament to pass legislation necessary to give the governor in council authority to fix the rate of exchange for any currency in computing the value for duty of goods imported into Canada from any place or country the currency of which is appreciated in terms of the Canadian dollar.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Are these documents printed?

Mr. EULER: No.

INTRODUCTION OF BILL

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 89, respecting a certain provisional trade agreement between Canada and Germany.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADA-URUGUAY TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 86, respecting a certain trade agreement between Canada and Uruguay.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 87, to amend the Judges Act (privy council appeals).

He said: This bill adds a clause to the Judges Act. The judges appointed under this act are federal judicial officers and are bound by the provisions of the act. The bill provides that all such judges, whether appointed or to be appointed, shall in their decisions be bound by the decisions of the judicial committee of the privy council, or if a matter before them does not go that far, by the court of final adjudication. It is based on the principle that under our constitution, by British law the courts are subservient to the legislature, and that parliament makes the law and judges interpret it. The bill provides that this is to be the law for Canada, notwithstanding any law, custom, usage or doctrine of law to the contrary.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

PROVISION TO CONSOLIDATE STORES DEPOTS AND TO SIMPLIFY PURCHASING

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 88, respecting Department of Transport stores.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide the Department of Transport [Mr. Euler.]

with facilities for the consolidation of stores and stores depots and a simplified stores and purchasing control similar in effect to the facilities provided for the king's printer under section 38 of the Public Printing and Stationery Act as amended by chapter 5, statutes of 1928. At the present time the Department of Transport have some sixty stores depots in Canada, of which as many as three are in the same city. In a single stores depot it is necessary to keep as many as three or four separate stocks. The net result is that, with purchases of some three million dollars per annum, our stores to-day have an inventory of a million and a half dollars, which of course is far in excess of the proper amount. The passage of this bill will simplify the bookkeeping, considerably reduce the staff required to attend to these stores, and make for a much more efficient management.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—STATION CJCA

Mr. HALL:

- 1. Has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation been requested by the mayor of the city of Edmonton to investigate alleged broadcast of misleading or false election returns, over radio station CJCA on the night of the last Edmonton civic election?
  - 2. If so, has the investigation been made?
  - 3. What are the findings?
- 4. If the investigation has not been made, why not?

Mr. HOWE:

The following information has been supplied by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation:

- 1. Request forwarded to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation by the office of the Minister of Transport.
  - 2. Yes.
- 3. Preliminary returns broadcast by radio station CJCA not obtained from official source.
  - 4. Answered by No. 1.

TARIFF RULINGS UNDER "NOT MADE IN CANADA" PROVISION

Mr. MAYBANK:

1. Since January 1, 1930, how many applications for tariff rulings have been made under the "Not made in Canada" rule by the Aluminium Company of Canada, year by year?

2. Since January 1, 1930, have any payments in the nature of rebate been made to the Aluminium Company of Canada? If so, what were the dates, amounts, and reasons for same?

3. Since January 1, 1930, how many applications for tariff rulings have been made under "Not made in Canada" rule by the Page-

Hersey Company, year by year?

4. Since January 1, 1930, have any payments in the nature of rebate been made to the Page-Hersey Company? If so, what were the dates, amounts, and reasons for same?

Mr. ILSLEY: For the reasons I gave the other day I would ask that this question be dropped.

Question dropped.

WAR PENSIONERS' TAXATION

Mr. LENNARD:

1. What is the amount of revenue the government derived from taxing pensions of veterans of the great war during the year 1936?

2. Has the government ever considered putting such pensions on a tax free basis?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Information not available.

2. Pensions were tax free up to May 22. 1933, section 3 of chapter 41, 23-24 George V repealed the tax free provision.

VALUE OF CANADIAN MAPLE PRODUCTS AND EXPORTS, 1935-36

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. What was the total value of maple products in Canada: (a) during 1935; (b) during 1936?

2. What was the value of our exports of maple products to the United States of America: (a) in 1935; (b) in 1936?

CORONATION DAY OBSERVANCE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What arrangements are being made by the government for a suitable observance Coronation day in Canada?

2. Will it be a public holiday, and have any requests been made to the municipalities and boards of education to get ready and arrange for a national celebration in Canada?

3. Will government offices, banks and other business organizations be requested to close?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. A proclamation was issued 19th March, 1937, and published in "The Canada Gazette" March 27, 1937 (page 2446) appointing Wednesday, May 12, 1937, to be observed as a day of general thanksgiving. The proclama-31111-1524 tion also requests religious services either on May 12, or on the preceding Sunday, May 9. The proclamation makes May 12, a public holiday within the meaning of the Interpretation Act, the Bills of Exchange Act and the Civil Service Act. The government notified the provincial governments of the intention to proclaim May 12 as a public holiday and suggested that the provincial governments might advise the municipalities that the celebration in each community be organized as may be most appropriate to local conditions. This is in accordance with practice followed on the occasions of the coronations of King Edward VII (1902) and King George V (1911) and the silver jubilee of King George V (1935). The defence forces have been requested to cooperate with local authorities in celebrations so far as may be practicable. Salutes will be fired on Coronation day at the regular saluting stations and at all provincial capitals. Arrangements will be made for appropriate decoration of public buildings.

- 2. See answer to No. 1.
- 3. Since the proclamation makes May 12 public holiday within the meaning of the Bills of Exchange Act and the Civil Service Act, it will be a bank and civil service holiday and no doubt will be generally observed throughout Canada.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

GOVERNMENT DREDGES ON THE ST. LAWRENCE

Mr. LAPOINTE (Matapedia-Matane):

1. How many dredges will the federal government operate in the St. Lawrence waters during the next season of navigation?

2. What are their names or numbers?

Mr. RINFRET: Tabled herewith.

HALIBUT FISHERY

AMENDMENTS TO CONVENTION BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to confirm and sanction a certain convention between Canada and the United States of America for the preservation of the halibut fishery of the northern Pacific ocean and Bering sea, signed at Ottawa on the 29th day of January, 1937, and to provide for the carrying out of the provisions thereof.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As the house is aware, a halibut convention between the United States and Canada was agreed to in 1923. That convention was replaced subsequently by a new convention in 1930. The present convention is largely a reenactment of the provisions of the convention of 1930, with some slight changes in phraseology and two important amendments which relate more particularly to procedure. The procedure under the 1930 convention was discovered to permit of advantages being gained by dishonest fishermen to the detriment of fishermen who were honestly complying with all regulations. The commission itself recommended the amendments to overcome this handicap and suggested to both governments that it would be preferable to frame a new convention rather than simply to enact amendments to the existing convention. The few alterations in the new convention which relate to drafting do not in any way affect the principle. I might give in more concrete form an exact statement of the two amendments now proposed.

As I have said, the experience gained by the International Fisheries Commission during the years since the 1930 convention came into force has disclosed certain defects in the existing procedure, and in their report to the two governments of January, 1936 the commission made specific recommendations for new provisions to remedy these defects. For this purpose the commission submitted a draft of a new convention. It was considered that a complete new document, replacing the existing one and incorporating the new amendments, would prove a more convenient procedure than the conclusion of a supplementary convention. After careful consideration the two governments decided to adopt the commission's recommendations, and accordingly they signed at Ottawa, on January 29 last, the new convention which is set out in the schedule to the bill.

As recommended by the commission this 1937 convention will, if ratified, supplant the existing convention of 1930. This follows the procedure of 1930, when the 1923 convention was completely replaced. The 1937 convention incorporates, however, all the provisions of the 1930 convention except to the extent of the few amendments which were recommended by the commission.

It may be noted here that the commission, upon consulting the fishing fleets concerned, found that they largely urged the revision; indeed the changes originated with the fishing fleets as being desirable to facilitate their operations and the enforcement of the law.

The amendments do not establish any new principle. Their purpose is, in two main particulars where the commission had found results somewhat unsatisfactory, to improve the carrying out of the original underlying purpose, namely, the preservation and extension of this great fishery. In other words, they may be regarded as amendments of administrative procedure.

The first main amendment concerns the circumstance that during the closed halibut season fishermen may, in halibut areas, fish for other species of fish and that in so doing they may incidentally catch some halibut. Under the existing convention halibut caught incidentally in this manner may be retained and used for food for the crew of the fishing vessel; but any portion not so used must be landed and turned over to the proper officers of the two governments, who sell them to the highest bidder and pay the proceeds into the respective public treasuries. The commission found that, since fishermen object to throwing away good halibut caught in this mannerwhich is in fact a waste of good fish-there has been considerable violation of the law. It also appears that fishing for less valuable varieties of deep sea fish, such as black cod and red cod, would likely be encouraged if regulations could be made to permit the fishermen under certain conditions to retain such halibut as may be caught incidentally. The commission, in their report, sum this aspect up by stating that:

The existing provisions are therefore, in effect, penalties on the honest fisherman without restraining the dishonest, and are productive of wastage of needed food, when there is no good reason why such small quantities of halibut, probably not exceeding 150,000 pounds for the whole fleet, might not be made legitimate, certainly during the season when halibut is being taken on other parts of the coast.

Accordingly, as recommended by the commission, the retention by the fishermen of halibut incidentally caught is being made lawful, subject to such limitations and prohibitions as the commission may prescribe with the approval of the two governments. The new wording in this respect will be found at the end of the second paragraph of article I of the new convention.

The second main amendment concerns a practical detail as to the method of fixing the limits of the closed season. The convention in its general scheme lays down a certain closed season—from November 1 to February 15—but gives the commission power, subject to approval by the two governments, to suspend or change this season. Under the existing convention, however, it is possible only to fix the date when halibut fishing must cease in any year. The result is that a vessel may be out on the fishing bank with only a part of its normal load taken when the closure date arrives. If fishing is stopped then, the voyage will entail a loss to the fishermen, while if the vessel remains to fill up, a violation of the law occurs. Halibut vessels must leave port well in advance of closure in order to reach the fishing grounds, and after ceasing to fish they may take a week or more in returning to port. The commission, after pointing out that it is difficult to detect law violations by patrol along a broken coast of over two thousand miles, sum up their opinion on this aspect as follows:

The present condition is again one that penalizes the honest fisherman when there is no need. There is again no reason why a full, normal last trip cannot be allowed the honest fisherman as well as the man who breaks the law to get it. This can be done by setting a date for last departure for fishing in any area which is to be closed. As at present, this date can be forecast approximately and warning given in order that all may have equal opportunity to adapt their movements to it, but the setting of such a date would allow a normal trip for all vessels which have been in time to depart.

Accordingly, as thus recommended, the new convention, instead of authorizing the commission to fix a date for the cessation of fishing, authorizes it periodically to fix a date for the last departure of fishing vessels for any fishing area concerned.

That summarizes I think the effect of amendments to the existing convention. As there is a bill founded on this resolution it may be that further discussion can best be deferred until the bill itself is before the committee.

Mr. NEILL: I have not the halibut treaty of 1930 under my hand, but I have that of 1923. I see that the Department of State at Washington made it an understanding for the ratification of that treaty that none of the nationals and inhabitants or vessels or boats of any other part of Great Britain shall engage in halibut fishing contrary to any of the provisions in the treaty. I understand that was accepted by Great Britain. I understand that the British ambassador also signed it. I do not know what took place in 1930, but I rather think that provision was left Therefore I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it would not be advisable to obtain the consent of Great Britain to this treaty in order to prevent a contingency which has arisen since, of a British ship, a mother ship carrying fishing boats, etc., going around to our Pacific coast waters and engaging extensively in halibut fishing, not being subject to this treaty at all. If all vessels under the British flag are allowed to fish there, this treaty would go by the board, because they of course would be subject to no restriction whatever. I have no doubt the Prime Minister has considered that. I should like to ask whether he has it in his mind to have the consent of Britain to that feature of this treaty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will find that the bill itself contains a clause to meet what he has in mind. The clause will perhaps be of wider application than simply to Great Britain. The endeavour has been to prevent ships of any country other than Canada and the United States taking advantage of a situation that arises through Canada and the United States in an effort to preserve and extend the fisheries being restricted by the provisions of a convention and others not being governed thereby. The clause has received very careful consideration, and will I imagine meet what my hon. friend has in mind.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie King thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 90, respecting a certain convention between Canada and the United States of America for the preservation of the halibut fishery of the northern Pacific ocean and Bering sea, signed at Ottawa on the 29th day of January, 1937.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

LORD'S DAY ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I gave to the Minister of Justice notice of this question. It relates to the enforcement of the Lord's Day Act in the cities and towns, in relation to drug stores, where the police are stopping the sale of cigarettes, tobacco, cigars and many small articles which are more or less necessary on Sunday. This act was passed in 1845 and is not in accordance with modern conditions. Is it not advisable that either during the recess of parliament or in a criminal code amendment there be a revision and reconstruction and consolidation of this statute? As it is now we may not swim or fish on Sunday, because the act of 1845 is still in effect, and the Toronto police magistrates say while it is there these things may not be done on Sunday. I am asking that the Minister of Justice be kind enough to consolidate and revise that statute and bring it up to date.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The suggestion of my hon. friend will be very carefully considered. I may say that from other sources also I have been asked that certain amendments be made to the Lord's Day Act. There is a bill on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Brunelle) which would stiffen the provisions of the act and provide for heavier penalties. I am afraid, however, that this bill will not be considered this session because the place it occupies on the order paper will not permit it to be reached. But during the recess of parliament I shall certainly do what my hon. friend suggests—consider all the representations that are being made by my friend himself and by others, and the question will come up for decision at the next session of parliament.

Mr. CHURCH: That is all very well so far as it goes, but the provinces have jurisdiction also and the enforcement of the law is with them. The magistrates and police commissioners say that as long as this statute is as it is, they have to convict. It is making a farce of the law. An eminent chief justice told me he spent a whole month in Toronto on a Sunday, and if it had not been for me he might have spent two months there.

WAINWRIGHT BUFFALO PARK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar). On March 9 the minister tabled sessional paper No. 206 concerning an investigation held at Wainwright in September last. That sessional paper was supposed to contain the evidence given at that investigation. It does contain the report of the commissioner, but does not contain the evidence asked for, and I should like to ask the minister if this evidence can be produced in the very near future.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I shall look into the matter. I am not sufficiently familiar with the question my hon. friend has directed to me to answer it at the moment.

GRAND TRUNK PERPETUAL STOCKS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I promised to make a statement with regard to the order for return moved for by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr Stevens) relating to perpetual preference stocks of the Grand Trunk Railway.

These questions are to a large extent questions of law requiring the expression of legal opinions for their proper answers. Moreover, answers given to these questions might prejudicially affect the trial of the action pending in the Supreme Court of Ontario between Lovibond and the Canadian National Railway Company. For these reasons in my opinion these answers cannot be furnished. I make this statement on the advice of the Department of Justice.

WAR PENSIONERS' TAXATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): I should like to direct an inquiry to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley), who to-day answered a question which I placed on the order paper. The second part of that question asked if the government had ever considered putting soldier pensions on a tax free basis, and the minister answered that part of the question by stating that such pensions were tax free until May 22, 1933. I was aware of that fact, but what I want to know is whether this government has ever considered putting these pensions back on a tax free basis.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): So far as I know the matter has not as yet been before the government for consideration.

SUPREME COURT ACT

AMENDMENT TO CLARIFY PROVISION RESPECTING APPEALS

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 31, 1937, consideration in committee of Bill No. 78, to amend the Supreme Court Act—Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East)—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Appeals from other than court of last resort.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, this section was allowed to stand through the courtesy of the Minister of Justice to enable me to look into a question that had been brought to my attention by two legal practitioners. The question was whether or not the government had considered the advisability of restoring old section 41 of the Supreme Court Act, by which there was an appeal from a judgment of the court of last resort in the province on a question that had been adjudicated upon by either a tribunal or a person named under a provincial statute, or a municipal authority, which would be under a provincial statute in any event. At one time there was provision for an appeal to the supreme court if the amount involved was more than $10,000, and there were certain limitations placed upon the right of the court to adjudicate upon the question, by sending it back to the court in the province for the purpose of having it dealt with along the lines suggested by the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to the legal principles which should govern in dealing with it. I purposed asking the minister, when this bill was before the house, whether he had considered the advisability of reenacting that section. I had the privilege of speaking with him a short time ago, however, and I gathered that he had considered the matter and concluded not to do so.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I thank my right hon. friend for what he has said. There is no doubt, as he says, that parliament could reenact or create this right of appeal in such circumstances, but it was considered advisable to repeal that old section. This is a question of policy, and having considered the matter and discussed it, even with the judges of the supreme court, I believe it is better that the section should remain as it is.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

PROVISION FOR ADMINISTRATION BY COMMISSIONER UNDER MINISTER OF LABOUR

The house resumed from Monday, March 1, 1937, consideration in committee of Bill No. 41, to amend and consolidate the Combines Investigation Act and amending act-Mr. Rogers-Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 2-Definitions.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Chairman, section 2 of this bill contains, by way of definition of a combine, all its material enactments with the exception of two or three, and in discussing this section I should like to refer casually at least to the other two or three sections which must be read in connection with it in order to obtain a clear understanding of section 2.

The act purports to provide for the investigation of certain matters by a commissioner appointed by the governor in council, who shall report to the Minister of Labour. It is within the legislative competence of the parliament of Canada to enact a statute authorizing an inquiry or investigation into any subject or class of subjects within the legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada or necessarily incidental to such inquiry. If the subject or class of subjects into which such an inquiry purports to be authorized is not within the legislative jurisdiction of parliament, in such case the attendance of witnesses, the giving of oral evidence or the production of papers cannot be compelled by the commission or commissioner conducting the inquiry. Therefore in order to ascertain how far an inquiry and investigation of this kind is within the legislative jurisdiction of this parliament it is necessary to consider the subject of the investigation or inquiry.

The acts that are to be investigated are all, in their civil aspects, matters of property and civil right which normally are within the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces, but which parliament has declared or is now about to declare to be criminal acts and which, by such declaration of criminality, are brought or are to be brought within the legislative jurisdiction of this parliament. The declarations which have already been made by parliament are found in sections 498 and 498A of the criminal code. Section 498 reads as follows:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding four thousand dollars and not less than two hundred dollars, or to two years' imprisonment, or, if a corporation, is liable to a penalty not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and not less than one thousand dollars, who conspires, combines, agrees or arranges with any other person, or with any railway, steamship, steamboat or transportation company,

(a) to unduly limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing in any article or commodity which may be a subject of trade or commerce; or

(b) to restrain or injure trade or commerce in relation to any such article or commodity; or

(c) to unduly prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any such article or commodity, or to unreasonably enhance the price thereof; or

(d) to unduly prevent or lessen competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, transportation or supply of any such article or commodity, or in the price of insurance upon person or property.

2. Nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to combinations of workmen or employed to the contract of the c ployees for their own reasonable protection as such workmen or employees.

This section was in effect amended by the addition of paragraph A in section 9 of chapter 56 of the statutes of 1935, amending the criminal code. The amendment is as follows:

498A. (1) Every person engaged in trade or commerce or industry is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding one thousand dollars or to one month's imprisonment, or, if a corporation, to a penalty not exceeding five thousand dollars, who

(a) is a party or privy to, or assists in, any transaction of sale which discriminates, to his knowledge, against competitors of the purchaser in the company of the company of the purchaser in the company of in that any discount, rebate or allowance is granted to the purchaser over and above any discount, rebate or allowance available at the time of such transaction to the aforesaid com-petitors in respect of a sale of goods of like quality and quantity;

The provisions of this paragraph shall not, however, prevent a cooperative society returning to producers or consumers, or a cooperative wholesale society returning to its constituent retail members, the whole or any part of the net surplus made in its trading operations in proportion to purchases made from or sales to the society;

(b) engages in a policy of selling goods in any area of Canada at prices lower than those exacted by such seller elsewhere in Canada, for the purpose of destroying competition or eliminating a competitor in such part of Canada;

(c) engages in a policy of selling goods at prices unreasonably low for the purpose of destroying competition or eliminating a competitor

Sections 498 and 498A of the criminal code have been found by the judicial committee of the privy council to be within the legislative jurisdiction of Canada. I respectfully submit that if any other civil acts, matters or things are now to be declared criminal, such declaration should properly take the form of a criminal enactment by way of amendment to the existing criminal code. The criminal code should contain the material provisions constituting crimes in Canada, and providing the penalties for crimes. Bill No. 41 contains provisions in the nature of criminal enactments which are far more extensive than the provisions of the criminal code. The material provisions of the criminal code are extended by the definitions expressed in paragraph 2 of the bill, the material parts of which are as follows:

2. In this act, unless the context otherwise requires,

(1) "combine" means

- (a) a combination of two or more persons by way of actual or tacit contract, agreement or arrangement having relation to any article or commodity which may be a subject of trade or commerce and having or designed to have the effect of
- (i) limiting facilities for manufacturing, producing, transporting, supplying, storing or dealing, or
- (ii) preventing, limiting or lessening manufacture or production, or
- (iii) fixing a common price or a resale price or a common rental, or
- (iv) enhancing the price, rental or cost of any article, storage or transportation, or
- (v) preventing or lessening competition in or substantially controlling, within any particular area or district or generally, manufacture, production, purchase, barter, sale, storage, transportation, insurance or supply, or
- (vi) otherwise restraining or injuring trade or commerce;

I suggest that in a consolidation of the existing law, as this act purports to be, if a combine is to be defined in new language it should be defined in language corresponding to the provisions of sections 498 and 498a of the criminal code, and that in fact the provi[Mr. Cahan.]

sions in section 2 of the bill are necessary only if it is intended to set up in respect of certain dealings a new criminal code, collateral to and to be administered separately and differently from sections 498 and 498a, which are the substantial enactments.

The bill proceeds in section 2 to define the words "merger, trust or monopoly," and to extend the criminal provisions of the existing act by enlarging these definitions so as to establish new crimes with respect to which the bill will provide penalties. Paragraph (b) of section 2 is as follows:

- (b) a merger, trust or monopoly which combination, merger, trust or monopoly has operated or is likely to operate to the detriment or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or others; . . . .
- (4) "merger" means the combination resulting from the consolidating or amalgamating of the whole or part of the businesses of any two or more persons, or resulting from the purchase, lease or other acquisition by any person of any control over or interest in the whole or part of the business of any other person;

The new definition is of trust and monopoly, and reads:

- (7) "trust" and "monopoly" mean one or more persons who, within any particular area or district or generally,
- (a) substantially control any class or species of business, or
- (b) have such control over the supply or distribution of or the demand for products of any class or species of business as to enable such person or persons to maintain, enhance or substantially modify or control prices of such products.

In the 1935 act, which is the existing law and which this bill proposes to amend, the definition of "combine" as contained in section 1 differed very materially from the definition in the present bill. I quote from the existing act:

- (1) "Combine" means a combination having relation to any commodity which may be the subject of trade or commerce, of two or more persons by way of actual or tacit contract, agreement or arrangement having or designed to have the effect of,
- (a) limiting facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing, or
- (b) preventing, limiting or lessening manufacture or production, or
- (c) fixing a common price or a resale price, or a common rental, or a common cost of storage or transportation, or
- (d) enhancing the price, rental or cost of article, rental, storage or transportation, or
- (e) preventing or lessening competition in, or substantially controlling within any particular area or district or generally, production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, storage, transportation, insurance or supply, or
- (f) otherwise restraining or injuring trade or commerce, or a merger, trust or monopoly, which combination, merger, trust or monopoly has operated or is likely to operate to the detriment or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or others.

It will be noticed that the words "merger, trust or monopoly" in clause (f) of section 1 of the existing law, which is now to be repealed, were qualified by the words "having or designed to have the effect of" clauses (a), (b), (c), (d), and (e) and they were also qualified by the words "has operated or is likely to operate to the detriment or against the interests of the public." In other words, in constituting a crime under the existing act the combination formed or organized must have been designed to have the effect of violating the material provisions of section 498 of the criminal code, and it must have operated or be likely to operate to the detriment or against the interest of the public. There was not only a criminal intent implied in its being designed to have a certain effect which would be a violation of section 498 of the criminal code, but it must also have operated or have been likely to operate to the detriment or against the interest of the public. In the present bill the words "merger, trust or monopoly" are no longer qualified by the clauses of section 2, subsection 1 of the existing act which I have just read. The merger, trust or monopoly, which is declared by this bill to be criminal, is not defined as it is in the existing law, nor are the provisions relating to criminality expressed in the same terms. The definition of "merger" is also changed substantially in subsection 4 of section 2.

Mr. THORSON: Will the hon. member elaborate further?

Mr. CAHAN: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will permit me to proceed; we will have the whole forenoon for elaboration. Subsection 4 of section 2 of the existing act provides:

- (4) "Merger, trust or monopoly" means one or more persons
- (a) who has or have purchased, leased or otherwise acquired any control over or interest in the whole or part of the business of another; or
- (b) who either substantially or completely control, throughout any particular area or district in Canada or throughout Canada the class or species of business in which he is or they are engaged;

and extends and applies only to the business of manufacturing, producing, transporting, purchasing, supplying, storing or dealing in commodities which may be the subject of trade or commerce: Provided that this subsection shall not be construed or applied so as to limit or impair any right or interest derived under the Patent Act, 1935, or under any other statute of Canada.

The words which limit the extension and application of this definition and which appear in the existing act, are eliminated from the present bill, as is the provision that subsection 4 shall not limit or impair any right or interest derived under the Patent Act, 1935. To the last mentioned elimination I shall refer later.

The definitions of "trust" and "monopoly" in subsection 7 of section 2 are changed materially by the addition of paragraph (b). The subsection in the present bill provides:

- (7) "trust" and "monopoly" mean one or more persons who, within any particular area or district or generally,
- (a) substantially control any class or species of business, or
- (b) have such control over the supply or distribution of or the demand for products of any class or species of business as to enable such person or persons to maintain, enhance or substantially modify or control prices of such products.

In my judgment that change is not in accord with sound public policy. Is the producer a criminal because he alone has scientific knowledge or practical experience to enable him to produce a certain commodity, and because he alone is qualified to produce that commodity? Should he be stigmatized in a statute of this kind with criminality?

Mr. ROGERS: Is this not solely a definition? Is my hon. friend not dealing at this time with the definition of "trust" and "monopoly"?

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so, and this bill is to extend crime by definition—that is exactly what it does.

Mr. ROGERS: Only if the operation is against the public interest.

Mr. CAHAN: We will assume, for example, that one or more persons own or control a factory for producing and refining sugar from beets which are produced by farmers in the district in which the factory is located, and that the factory so located is the sole market for sugar beets in that district. This factory was admittedly designed to operate; but it was never designed to operate and never has operated to the detriment or against the interests of the public, whether producers of beets, or consumers of sugar, or any other persons whomsoever. Yet, I suggest, if it is conceived that this factory is likely at some future time to operate against the interests of the public, whether consumers of beet sugar or producers of sugar beets, that mere likelihood constitutes the factory a monopoly within the meaning of this clause, and its owners, who are privy to the establishment of the factory, are liable to a fine of $25,000 and imprisonment for two years or to both fine and imprisonment under the penalty clauses of this act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not because it is a monopoly.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly, because it is a monopoly, and so defined as a combine.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is there not the further circumstance that the monopoly must be shown to operate to the detriment of the public?

Mr. CAHAN: No. That is one of the contentions I am making; that is not necessary under this bill. I will risk considerable on that assertion. Each and every owner of a patent right by reason of the exclusive nature of that right is liable to indictment under the definition given in this section 2, subsection 7, clause (b) of this bill.

Section 45 of the Patent Act, 1935, provides:

45. Every patent granted under this act shall contain the title or name of the invention, with a reference to the specification, and shall, subject to the conditions in this act prescribed, grant to the patentee and his legal representatives for the term therein mentioned, from the granting of the same, the exclusive right, privilege and liberty of making, constructing, using and vending to others to be used the said invention, subject to adjudication in respect thereof before any court of competent jurisdiction.

That is, subject to adjudication as to the validity of his patent. Each patentee is granted by the law of this land, and by the laws of other lands with which we have entered into a convention, and has exclusive rights and privileges as provided by the terms of his patent, similar to the exclusive rights and privileges which are mentioned in our statute. Yet section 32, subsection 1 of this bill provides:

32. (1) If the owner or holder of any patent issued under the patent laws of the Dominion of Canada has made use of the exclusive rights and privileges which as such owner or holder he controls so as to contravene the provisions of section thirty-four of this act, such patent shall be liable to be revoked.

I should like to know how it is possible for him to exercise his patent right without infringement of section 34. I will admit that section 34 is confused drafting such as one seldom sees; nevertheless it will require clarification if we are to preserve the exclusive patent right of the individual holder of a patent.

Mr. BENNETT: And discharge our international obligations.

Mr. CAHAN: And discharge international obligations.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. ROGERS: I might say that that matter has been looked into. An amendment will be offered when we reach that section.

Mr. CAHAN: Then, subsection 2 of section 32 provides:

(2) If the commissioner reports that a patent has been so made use of, the Minister of Justice may, on the application of the minister, exhibit an information in the Exchequer Court of Canada praying for a judgment revoking the patent; and the court shall thereupon have jurisdiction to hear and decide the matter and to give judgment revoking the patent, or otherwise, as the evidence before the court may require.

I will not proceed further with the discussion of that clause until the amendment is proposed as suggested. But section 34, which applies to the whole bill, provides:

34. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a fine not exceeding twenty-five thousand dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or to both fine and imprisonment, or if a corporation to a fine not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars, who is a party or privy to or knowingly assists in the formation or operation of a combine within the meaning of this act.

What is the meaning of the provision in section 32 of the bill? When will an owner of a patent contravene section 34? Certainly, as the minister has suggested, these two sections require further clarification. I will admit that subsection 3 of section 41 provides that no prosecution under section 34 of this bill can be commenced otherwise than at the instance of the Attorney General of Canada or of the attorney general of a province, but so wide is the application of the provisions of the bill that its terms may be used for an entirely different purpose, namely for purposes of intimidation to effect other indirect purposes. A bill with such wide and extensive application as is given to this bill by the definitions which are to be enacted is an attempt to enable this government to investigate a wide range of subjects which are within the exclusive civil jurisdiction of the provinces and which only becomes subjects of investigation by parliament when those civil rights are made criminal wrongs by declaratory amendments of the criminal law of the country. Therefore either the object is to make civil rights criminal which have never before been deemed to be criminal in the history of our own criminal law, or it is an attempt to introduce into this act certain civil rights which are not criminal, ostensibly for the purpose of permitting an investigation by a commission or commissioner appointed by this government.

In fact, so complicated are the provisions of this bill that in my opinion it should have been referred upon its introduction to a special committee of not more than seven or nine members of this house before whom persons interested might have been given an opportunity to be heard, and the committee might have clarified its terms after hearing the witnesses or their counsel. I suggest that it is impracticable to discuss and to amend a complicated measure of this kind in committee of the whole house. It affects every business interest in the country no matter how honourably that business is being conducted. It affects it in the sense of making the owners or official managers of that business criminals, though operating without any criminal intent or without any prejudice to the public interest, if the minister, or the commissioner acting under his direction, conceives that they are likely at some future time so to operate. It seems to me to be in the nature of criminal legislation and might be compared to a psychological examination, by the medical authorities, of all the youth of the country, from which it is concluded that one or more are likely to be guilty of offences in the future. Thereupon they are convicted of crime by the fact of not being quite up to the standard. or, if up to the standard, of being in such mental and physical health that they are likely at some time in the future to commit criminal offences and should therefore, be decapitated at once or be sentenced to imprisonment for all time.

Mr. ROGERS: If they carry firearms it is a criminal offence.

Mr. CAHAN: That is a criminal offence, yes. But here you are providing that business honestly conducted, with respect to which there is no criminal intent, shall be a criminal offence under this statute, to be investigated and punished with the penalties I have indicated.

I, for one, am perfectly willing and anxious to frame laws imposing heavy penalties upon every business which in fact is found to be acting in violation of the law, or every business which is founded with the design or intent of violating the provisions of the law. But I certainly suggest that this bill goes farther than that; it provides for a star chamber investigation under the supervision of the Minister of Labour, an investigation that may be used for ulterior and indirect purposes, which should not be possible. In fact, to express an opinion without any disrespect to the Minister of Labour, I think that, in view of the conditions that now prevail in Canada and the magnitude and ramifications of the several branches which are under his administration, it would have been far better to place the administration of this act where it belongs, with the Department of Trade and Commerce, because in so far as its object is legitimate it deals with and attempts by criminal law to regulate the domestic trade and commerce of the country.

Mr. ROGERS: I should like to take up in order the several points raised by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. In doing so I think he will understand that, in dealing with the purely legal questions to which he has referred, I shall speak with deference to his own wide knowledge of that phase of the subject.

As I understand it he questioned first the propriety of our proceeding in the way now proposed, namely, to create a criminal offence by a statute of this parliament and not by an amendment to the criminal code. I have no doubt he will recall that in the historical evolution of anti-combines legislation in Canada, we did at first proceed precisely in this way. In 1889 parliament passed an act for the prevention and suppression of combinations formed in restraint of trade. Three years later the present section 498 of the criminal code replaced the act originally passed in 1889. But the real purpose of the combines legislation from the very beginning has been not so much to create a new offence as to provide the means, through investigation, by which the evidence could be determined with respect to the commission of the offence.

In this connection I might very well quote the words of the present Prime Minister as reported at page 988 of Hansard of 1923:

The legislation which the government is introducing proceeds on the theory that the reason why section 498 of the criminal code is of so little effect is not that there are no combinations that are detrimental to the public or that such combinations are rare, but rather that the existence of these combinations, and their method of operation is difficult to discover; that what is needed is effective machinery of investigation which will disclose the existence of combines operating to the detriment of the public, and afford the information whereby proceedings under the criminal code can be made really effective in the case of individuals who are violating its provisions, or who are associated with combines that are operating to the detriment of the public.

That, I take it, is the purpose behind the original legislation with respect to combines, and certainly no change is contemplated in the bill now before the house. As a matter of fact—and of this I believe the hon. member is well aware—when criminal proceedings have been taken in regard to offences under the combines act it has been customary for the information to be laid under both the combines act and section 498 of the criminal code. That procedure I believe, has been followed as a general rule. But the real underlying purpose of the legislation is to provide proper machinery of investigation through which evidence may be obtained upon which the information may be laid for a criminal proceeding.

My hon, friend proceeded next to deal with the definition of a combine in the proposed bill, and as I understood him he drew a distinction between this and a similar provision in the combines act of 1935. I have read the two sections and it does not appear to me that there is the significant distinction which he sought to emphasize. As I recall it, his point was that in the act of 1935 it was necessary to prove that a combination was designed to operate to the public detriment

Mr. CAHAN: Either that it did or was designed to.

Mr. ROGERS: Actually, in both the 1935 act and the present bill, the word "designed" occurs in the definition of a combination. I quote first from the bill now before the committee:

2. (1) (a) a combination of two or more persons by way of actual or tacit contract, agreement or arrangement having relation to any article or commodity which may be a subject of trade or commerce and having or designed to have the effect of—

And then follow a number of operations.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so, but that did not apply. my contention was in respect to a merger, trust or monopoly mentioned in subsection (b).

Mr. ROGERS: But even here, as I understand, there is nothing to suggest that there must be design. And it is not found in the act of 1935. Certainly both in the 1935 act and in the present bill the word "designed" is related rather to particular operations, which were so to speak to constitute a combination in the sense given in the act.

Mr. CAHAN: No, certain operations which are deemed criminal in the criminal code and are summarized here.

Mr. ROGERS: But you proceed in each case to the clause which actually creates the offence, and in each case, as I have the act of 1935 before me and the bill before me, it appears that an offence is created when either a combination or a merger or a monopoly has operated or is likely to operate to the detriment of or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or others. For that reason I am bound to say that I cannot follow the distinction made by the hon, member between the act of 1935 and the bill which is now before the committee.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Then my hon, friend proceeded to the definitions given in the present bill of monopoly and merger, and as I understood him he sought to leave the impression that the mere fact of a particular type of organization falling within the definition of one of these terms would of itself stamp that organization as of a criminal character. Surely that is not the intent of this section. Surely that is not a proper construction of these provisions; although in saying that I speak once more with great deference to the legal knowledge of my hon, friend. You have here a number of definitions of particular types of business organization. For example if this were confined solely to combinations it might mean that a number of distinct business units, industrial or commercial, could organize and agree among themselves to do certain things which would be criminal either under this act or under section 498 of the criminal code, but that these same identical industrial or commercial units could form themselves into another type of organization, a monopoly or merger, and by that means through the ingenuity of legal counsel, evade the provisions of the act. Surely the purpose of this is rather to prevent just that sort of thing occurring.

Mr. CAHAN: Is the purpose of this to make the organization a criminal organization?

Mr. ROGERS: No, the purpose rather is to bring it within the ambit of the act.

Mr. CAHAN: That is what I mean.

Mr. ROGERS: But a combination of itself is not declared to be illegal under this bill. It is only when it operates to the public detriment.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, when is it illegal under this bill?

Mr. ROGERS: A combination operating to the public detriment, a monopoly operating to the public detriment, a merger operating to the public detriment; all these become criminal only to the extent that they operate to the public detriment.

Mr. CAHAN: That is not in this bill. I will risk anything on that. The wording is, "has operated or is likely to operate to the detriment . . . ." According to the statement of my hon. friend, a monopoly once formed, if there is any likelihood of its operating to the public detriment, is criminal before it actually does so operate.

Mr. ROGERS: Only if so determined by the courts, that it is likely to operate to the public detriment. Surely that is a matter to be determined by the courts. The act does not say it is criminal before either an investigation under this act or proceedings following upon such investigation have declared that such operations are against the public interest or are likely to operate against the public interest.

In speaking of this phase of the question I should like to emphasize that there are various provisions of the criminal code which declare to be illegal acts which of themselves are perfectly innocent, but which create a reasonable inference that if they are committed they will lead to consequences which it is desirable in the public interest to avoid.

Mr. BENNETT: That is too broad a statement.

Mr. ROGERS: I am going to refer to particular sections, and if my statement is too broad perhaps the sections I quote will serve to modify it.

111. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life who wilfully causes, by any explosive substance, an explosion of a nature likely to endanger life or to cause serious injury to property, whether any injury to person or property is actually caused or not.

I should like to emphasize that phrase, "whether any injury to person or property is actually caused or not."

Mr. BENNETT: That has no relation to this.

Mr. CAHAN: He must at least cause the explosion before he becomes a criminal.

Mr. ROGERS: Section 122:

Everyone who, without lawful excuse, points at another person any firearm or air gun, whether loaded or unloaded—

Mr. CAHAN: That is criminal intimidation.

Mr. ROGERS:

—is guilty of an offence . . . 221. A common nuisance is an unlawful act or omission to discharge a legal duty, which act or omission endangers the lives, safety, health, property or comfort of the public, or by which the public are obstructed in the exercise or enjoyment of any right common to all His Majesty's subjects.

Mr. CAHAN: There it endangers life.

Mr. ROGERS: I have a number of these here which I might read—

Mr. BENNETT: I hope they have more applicability to the case.

Mr. ROGERS: —but I do not know that it is necessary to place them on Hansard. But surely these touch upon the point raised by the hon, member for St. Lawrence-St. George.

We do recognize that there are acts which of themselves are innocent but, due to the special character of those acts, there is a reasonable and probable consequence that if they are committed there will be some further harm to the community. I might even mention something with which we are all familiar, namely the penalties that attach to traffic passing a red light. It does not matter whether the street is clear; if you pass a red light you are doing something which under ordinary circumstances would be harmful to the community.

Mr. CAHAN: You are violating an ordinance of the city.

Mr. ROGERS: Speaking particularly of that expression "likely to operate," it is not new; it does not appear in this bill for the first time. It was in the board of commerce act; it was in the combines act of 1923 and the combines act of 1935. There is nothing new attempted here.

Mr. CAHAN: But in the act of 1935 the corresponding words were "having or designed to have the effect."

Mr. ROGERS: Let me read, if I may, clause (f) of both acts. First, I will read clause (f) of the act of 1935:

(f) otherwise restraining or injuring trade or commerce or a merger—

I should correct that. The latter part of this section applies to all preceding clauses, and it is the latter part of the section that really creates the offence. The first part deals with a combination, and then follow these words:

—or a merger, trust or monopoly, which combination, merger, trust or monopoly has operated or is likely to operate to the detriment or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or others.

I direct attention to the fact that the word "designed" does not appear anywhere in that clause.

Mr. CAHAN: If the minister would permit me to interrupt for a moment, this illustrates the difficulty of discussing in a committee of this house a complicated measure such as this. The minister is dealing with the act of 1935. In that act you have section 1 and then you have clauses (a), (b), (c), (d), and (f) under that section. Under the other provisions of section 1, having relation to any commodity which may be the subject of trade or commerce, these words appear:

—of two or more persons by way of actual or tacit contract, agreement or arrangement having or designed to have the effect ofThose words apply to all the branches of that section.

Mr. ROGERS: Surely that applies only to combinations.

Mr. CAHAN: But you are defining a merger as a combination.

Mr. ROGERS: Certainly my understanding of it is that the phrase used by my hon. friend attaches rather to the definition of a combination. Let me read it:

"Combine" means a combination having relation to any commodity which may be the subject of trade or commerce, of two or more persons by way of actual or tacit contract, agreement or arrangement having or designed to have the effect of—

Mr. BENNETT: That is the old definition?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. Then follow paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d), (e) and the first part of (f), "otherwise restraining or injuring trade or commerce." Then follow these words:

—or a merger, trust or monopoly, which combination, merger, trust or monopoly has operated or is likely to operate to the detriment or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or others.

Mr. CAHAN: It is a combination and, being a combination, these words "having or designed to have" apply to it. However, I beg my hon. friend's pardon for interrupting.

Mr. ROGERS: I am informed that there was a defect in the printing of the act of 1935, and that brings very close together clause (f) and what follows, as relating to the entire section. But surely it is a proper construction of this that the offence is created not by particular design but rather by evidence showing that a combination, as so defined, or a merger, trust or monopoly has in fact operated or is likely to operate to the detriment of the public.

Right Hon, R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Unfortunately that is not what it says. I do think this measure should be before a committee. I listened with extreme care to what was said by my colleague from St. Lawrence-St. George and by the minister. No one can take the second section of this bill without realizing that it never should be dealt with and disposed of in this way as it now stands. We had the act before 1935, and the interpretation or definition was entirely different from what it now is. If the minister will be good enough to look at his own explanatory notes he will find that there he gives the definition of a combine as it was in the old statute. That definition in the old statute is clear and plain. Just let us look at it. It defines the word "combine" to start

In this statute the word "combine" with. means a combination; that is the first part. Then, having relation to any commodity which may be the subject of trade or commerce; that is the subject matter with respect to which the combination must exist. Then it states how many people must combine; two or more persons, by way of actual or tacit contract. That met the sort of case that developed in the United States, where there was nothing in writing but just an understanding or agreement, as they called it. Then follow the words "agreement or arrangement," but they all refer to the words "having or designed to have the effect of."

Let us keep those words in mind. Under the old agreement they had to have the effect or they must be designed to have that effect; in other words the court, in construing the facts before it, might not have the whole thing in the one document, but by taking everything together, acts and documents, it might conclude that they were designed to have the effect.

There on the one hand they must have the effect or on the other hand they must be designed to have the effect, and what must they have the effect of doing or be designed to have the effect of doing? That is the next question, the relevant question, the important question, the gravamen of the whole. Under paragraph (a) they must either limit or be designed to limit facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing in a commodity of trade or commerce. That is the subject matter we must keep in mind. Or, under paragraph (b), they must have or be designed to have the effect of preventing, limiting or lessening manufacture or production of a commodity of trade or commerce. Or, under paragraph (c) they must have or be designed to have the effect of fixing a common price or a resale price, or a common rental, or a common cost of storage or transportation of a commodity of trade or commerce. Or, under paragraph (d) they must have or be designed to have the effect of enhancing the price, rental or cost of article, rental, storage or transportation. Or, under paragraph (e) they must have or be designed to have the effect of preventing or lessening competition in or substantially controlling within any particular area or district or generally, production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, storage, transportation, insurance or supply, or be designed to have the effect of otherwise restraining or injuring trade or commerce.

Mr. FACTOR: Stop there.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. BENNETT: No, no; it must have the effect or be designed to have the effect of a merger or monopoly; otherwise it is senseless.

Mr. FACTOR: This is a separate paragraph.

Mr. BENNETT: Not at all; the words are definite, and they are these: "having or designed to have the effect of a merger, trust or monopoly, which combination, merger, trust or monopoly has operated or is likely to operate to the detriment or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or others."

Mr. FACTOR: Does not that all mean that a combine means a combination or merger?

Mr. BENNETT: No, because it is governed by the words contained in the subject; no one in court would argue it for five minutes. What are the governing words?—"arrangement... having or designed to have the effect of... a merger, trust or monopoly." All you have to do is to look at the definition, and then we will have it settled.

The draftsman has said that this is an amendment and consolidation of the two acts. but when he comes to the second section he says: "This is section 2 (1) of the existing act, further divided into paragraphs for convenience in reading. The words in the clauses vertically lined have been transposed." And in the transposition we have the result to which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George referred. That is the result of this transposition. "Unless the context otherwise requires," according to the section now before the committee, the word "combine" meanswell, what does it mean? It means (a) divided into (i), (ii), (iii), (iv) and (v). That may make convenience in reading; but if anything is calculated to make confusion it would be to take the paragraphs under the letter (a) and divide it into (i), (ii), (iii), (iv) and (v). That is what you call simplicity and clarity, but in court lawyers would have to say paragraph (i) clause (a)-no, it is not even that: it is clause (i) of clause (a) of subsection (1) of section 2. That is the clarification and simplicity of it. That is the trouble with this act as it is now designed.

The word "combine" is defined and, mark you, what is the definition of "combine." It is "a combination of two or more persons by way of actual or tacit contract, agreement or arrangement having relation to any article or commodity which may be a subject of trade or commerce and having or designed to have the effect of"—and there is where the word "designed" comes in again—"having or designed to have the effect of" (i), (ii), (iii),

(iv) and (v). Then we come to (vi), which refers to restraining or injuring trade or commerce.

Then (b) is a subdivision, not of (a) but of the definition of the word "combine," as it is now arranged.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And as so declared it is at variance with the old statute.

Mr. FACTOR: The same as the other statute, except that it is clarified in the transposition of the words.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member's mind must be more susceptible to clarification than mine. I suppose it is, because of his wide experience in the matter.

Mr. FACTOR: Oh, no.

Mr. BENNETT: All I can say is this, that when you suggest that the definition is clarified, you could not even cite the new section, as you could before. If you had to argue it before a judge, how would you do it? Let us look at the old section, under the word "definitions." We find paragraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d). Now you get another (b). Mark you, that is what a combine means. Combine means (b), not as stated here; combine means "(b), a merger, trust or monopoly."

Mr. DUNNING: As well as (a).

Mr. BENNETT: As well as all this in (a); that is what it says.

Mr. ROGERS: The right hon. gentleman has suggested that a combine means all in (b) and (a).

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, all of this in (a).

Mr. ROGERS: But surely the clauses refer—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Plus (b).

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. ROGERS: But under (a) are the various operations of a group of units which would bring them within the definition of a combine.

Mr. BENNETT: No; the word "combine" is arbitrarily defined by the statute. A combine means (a) a combination "of two or more persons by way of actual or tacit contract, agreement or arrangement having relation to any article or commodity which may be a subject of trade or commerce and having or designed to have the effect of"—and then follow (i), (ii), (iii), (iv), (v) and (vi).

Mr. CAHAN: Violations of criminal statutes.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, violations of criminal statutes. "Designed" is the whole point there. That is, it is designed to have the effect, and so on. The difference between "effect" and "designed to have the effect" is this: If from the evidence it is clear to the court that the effect of it is to be seen in the result, that is the end of it. But if the result has not yet accrued and the design is there, there is still guilt.

Mr. ROGERS: But that does not create an offence.

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that. You come to the word "combine" in (a) and the subdivisions of (a). But combine also means something else; it means "a merger, trust or monopoly."

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: But it says "which combination"—now, that is inaccurate drafting. It should be "which combine, merger, trust or monopoly" because the word "combination" has not been used heretofore with respect to it, except in (a). It says that a combination of two or more persons—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Surely the word "combination" can be used in two connections.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is not exclusively to be confined to one. It seems to me the leader of the opposition is only tending to make this matter much more complicated than it really is.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon, member is entitled to his opinion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Surely.

Mr. BENNETT: And I am delighted to have it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Surely. I believe we are supposed to be considering this matter, and since a number of other speakers have been checked, I fancy that although some of us may not be lawyers, at least we can understand the English language.

Mr. BENNETT: I will now proceed with the discussion on the point. The next definition of "combine" is "(b) a merger, trust or monopoly; which combination, merger, trust or monopoly has operated or is likely to operate to the detriment or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or others." Now, keep in mind that these words should be made applicable, as my colleague reminds me, to (a), if they are to have any meaning at all. But as it stands now, they do not. That is the difficulty he pointed out in [Mr. Cahan.]

nis remarks. As they stand now (b) is "a merger, trust or monopoly; which combination, merger trust or monopoly has operated" and so on. If that makes it as clear as it is written in the statute at present, then I cannot understand the language. It combines at the present time, under inappropriate heads, what was clearly stated in the act which was put through the house by the present Prime Minister. This may be an improvement; the gentleman responsible for it says it is, but I cannot see it.

Now let us go a step farther in the matter. That is how you define a combine, under this measure. Under the old statute the situation was entirely different. We then get the definition of the word "commissioner" and of the word "corporation." Then we come to the definition of the word "merger." After we have declared that a combine is a merger-keep in your mind that section 1 (b) says a combine means a merger, trust or monopoly—in subsection 4 we have "merger" defined. The principal word "combination" in that definition is the word which is used in paragraph (a). There is a confusion in the use of words. Whether or not an hon. member be a lawyer, I think he will be confused with the use of the words in paragraph (b) and subsection 4. He will see that the word "combination" is the governing word.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The governing word is "combine."

Mr. BENNETT: That is the word being defined. Subsection 4 gives the definition of a merger as a combination resulting from the consolidating or amalgamating of the whole or part of the businesses of any two or more persons, or resulting from the purchase, lease or other acquisition by any person of any control over or interest in the whole or part of the business of any other person. That definition must be read into paragraph (b) which follows as a part of subsection 1. I do not think it makes sense when it is put that way. That is all I have to say as to that.

Then you come to the definition of "trust" and "monopoly," which is given in subsection 7, as meaning one or more persons who, within any particular area or district or generally, substantially control any class or species of business, or have such control over the supply or distribution of or the demand for products of any class or species of business as to enable such person or persons to maintain, enhance or substantially modify or control prices of such products. This definition of "trust" and "monopoly" is then applied to paragraph (b) in the light of the attempt to define the word "combine." It is wholly misunderstandable, despite what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has said. There can be no such thing.

I shall not discuss the question of patent rights, as the minister says he intends to deal with that by amendment. I am glad that is so, because it certainly would put us in a most difficult position if he did not do so. We are parties to an international convention which confers upon a patentee the exclusive right to do certain things. This provision provides that by so doing he would be violating the law, which, of course, cannot be the intention of parliament in dealing with this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To see if I understand what my right hon. friend has in mind, is it that it would remove the obscurity if the words 'combination, merger, trust or monopoly" in line 29 were removed? The section would then read:

In this act, unless the context otherwise requires,

(1) "combine" means
(a) a merger, trust or monopoly;
(b) which has operated or is likely to operate to the detriment or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or others.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I had in mind. Whether that change would be sufficient, I am not quite sure, but it looks as though it would.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the taking out of those words would clarify the matter. Is not the other matter to which my right hon. friend is directing special attention the use of the words "likely to" rather than "designed to."

Mr. CAHAN: They should both go together.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The words "designed to" appear in paragraph (a) and refer to all that follows.

Mr. BENNETT: In line 12.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then that the words "likely to operate" in paragraph (b) be changed to "designed to operate."

Mr. BENNETT: I think that would help, but I cannot say how far it would go.

Mr. CAHAN: Section 2 (a) deals with a combination having or designed to have the effect of doing certain things which are declared by the criminal code to be criminal. There must be an agreement between two or more persons by means of a tacit contract, agreement or arrangement designed to have the effect of a breach of the criminal law. Either when introducing this measure or some time to-day the Minister of Labour stated that the words "merger, trust, or monopoly" were introduced because it had been found that two or more persons, without making such a contract, agreement or arrangement as indicated in (a), by forming a merger, trust or monopoly might effect the same end. But it must be the merger, trust or monopoly which makes the breach or is intended or designed to make the breaches of the criminal law referred to under the Roman headings (i), (ii), (iii), (iv), (v) and (vi).

Mr. ROGERS: Are those breaches of the criminal law?

Mr. CAHAN: We have made them breaches of the criminal law in section 498. As my hon, friend has said, the whole basis of this act is investigation.

Mr. ROGERS: Under 498 it is a criminal offence only when it has the effect of unduly lessening competition. There is nothing here which of itself creates a criminal offence.

Mr. CAHAN: But you make them criminal offences. You say designed to have the effect of preventing, fixing, enhancing and otherwise restraining or injuring trade or commerce.

Mr. ROGERS: That establishes it as a combination.

Mr. CAHAN: Then you provide by section 34:

Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a fine not exceeding twenty-five thousand dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or to both fine and imprisonment, or if a corporation to a fine not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars, who is a party or privy to or knowingly assists in the formation or operation of a combine within the meaning of this act.

You make these things criminal offences, and you make the organization of a trust of any kind or the organization of a monopoly, so-called, criminal offences, but they can only be criminal in essence and effect when they are designed to operate or are operated in breach of certain provisions in Roman numerals which you include in paragraph (a) of subsection 1.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I am disposed to be in agreement with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) in his objections to the construction of clause 2, and I venture to make a suggestion which may preserve the grammatical sequences and probably put the matter right. It is that in subclause (b) the line "a merger, trust or monopoly" might read "a combination, merger, trust or monopoly"; then follows "which combination, merger, trust or monopoly," and so on. It seems to me that that will clarify the whole thing and preserve the idea that was in the mind of the draftsman of the paragraph.

Mr. ROGERS: I thank my hon. friend for his suggestion. It will be remembered that this morning a number of objections were taken to the wording of this clause. Naturally we are anxious to make progress to-day with the bill. I suggest that clause 2 might stand while the objections mentioned this morning are being given consideration by the law officers of the crown.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is reasonable, but perhaps one or two other objections had better be stated so that they may be considered at the same time.

The suggestion made by my colleague that a bill of this kind would be better administered by the Department of Trade and Commerce is a sound one. It has been made before, of course. The Department of Trade and Commerce touches the whole commercial fabric of the country as the Department of Labour does not. I understand how the metter came in the first instance to the Department of Labour, but it seems to me it would be better in the Department of Trade and Commerce.

It seems to me that the suggestion made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to delete the words "combination, merger, trust or monopoly" in the third line from the bottom and to carry it forward in the way he indicated would certainly greatly improve it. The First Minister gathered the point I was trying to make, although I am afraid I did it very abstrusely. On the point of construction, if you consider the definition in subclause 4 in the light of the rest of it, the rearrangement of the clauses would seem to be desirable.

One other point. When the bill came down I mentioned that subsection 7 would be capable of grave abuse; it gives the meaning of "trust" and "monopoly" to one or more persons who within a particular area substantially control any class or species of business. That might mean a lumber yard. As a matter of fact one case of that kind did arise. It might mean a bank, or any other particular class or kind of business that one person had in the community. And when you begin to talk about controlling it, in view of the fact that nobody else is there, and that one person does mean control, surely some words must be necessary for the purpose of preventing abuses. You can easily get people to allege, when there is only one business in a community, and that, probably, not making any money, that it is highly desirable that that business should not operate alone, that there should be two or more businesses for the purpose of meeting the wishes of some who cannot receive at the hands of the one business accommodation to which they are not entitled. The cases I could give the committee on that point are, I think, voluminous.

I looked casually at the suggestion with respect to patents. I put this to the committee, and I think the Prime Minister will realize in the light of his own experience how important it is. When we grant a patent we do so in accordance with a commitment which this country made at an international convention. Practically all the more important countries were parties to that convention. In our relevant control act we have provided that if a patentee does not commence operations within a given time he runs the risk of losing his patent. I am not now going into details, but putting the matter in a general way. That being the general international arrangement which we have accepted, to make it possible that a man should lose his patent because he exercises exclusive control under his patent is the very negation of the idea of the patent itself. The whole theory of patent is that he shall have exclusive control; the negation of it is that he may lose it because he exercises that exclusive control, and this bill contemplates his losing it if he does exercise it.

Mr. ROGERS: Against the public interest.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but every time a man gets a return on his investment in a patent there are many who say that it is against the public interest. The other day I bought for twenty-five cents a small article -I will not mention what it is, because it is patented. As a matter of fact it represents an investment, I should think, of about two cents. You can argue that it is against the public interest that a man should make a profit of twenty-three cents on an investment of two cents. Nevertheless it will be remembered that the privy council, dealing with the question of express rates on the bridge across the Niagara, where certain tolls were fixed which appeared to be out of all proportion to the return on the money invested, said that there are some services which must be considered in another way altogether; it is the character of the service rendered having regard to the effect it has upon the general conditions of living, and all that sort of thing. There are patents and patents around about us everywhere, and the use of them creates benefits out of all proportion to the small sum we pay for the articles. But, people will say, it is against the public interest that a man should pay twenty-five cents for something which can be manufactured at a cost of only two cents. For instance, hon. members probably know the circumstances under which Gillette blades first came on the market and how that patent was first presented to the public, the prices that were charged and the obstacles the company had to overcome. The actual cost of production of that article bore no relation to the price which had to be paid for it, and of course there were people who contended that it was not in the public interest that they should pay so high a price. Putting the problem on that ground, it involves a difficulty; but when one remembers that we have an international code dealing with patents, it seems to me that we are certainly striking a blow at the integrity of our country with respect to these matters, because we did become a party to the convention. It was not the late government that did it, but the previous government. Where was the convention held? The Hague?

Mr. CAHAN: The last one was at the Hague in November, 1925.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that covers the whole field. To make this the subject matter of a possible violation of the law of combines is to negative the very idea of a patent.

Mr MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my right hon. friend a question on this patent matter? My recollection is not very clear, because what I am referring to now goes back some thirty years. But as I remember the matter, in the case of the United Shoe Machinery Company, which held a patent for certain machinery used in the making of shoes—

Mr. BENNETT: Goodyear Welts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —it was discovered that the company would not sell that particular device to any concerns unless they bought other machinery from the same company. Now would my right hon. friend say—

Mr. CAHAN: Under our present patent law that would be impossible.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was the case at the time the action was brought against that company, because they were abusing their patent in that way.

Mr. CAHAN: We have amended our patent law to overcome that, absolutely.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The case was investigated under the original combines act. 31111-153½

It was found that the combines act served to remedy the condition complained of. It may be that out of the remedy at that time the patent law itself has been improved and the possibility of a further like condition removed. But what I was asking the leader of the opposition was whether in his opinion, in an instance of that kind, there was a right use of the patent.

Mr. BENNETT: I can answer that at once; it would not be. The right hon, gentleman is dealing with facts within his own knowledge, and I recall the Goodyear Welt case, which ultimately went to the supreme court of the United States. I would answer the question at once in the negative; I would not consider it proper that a patent should be utilized for the purpose indicated; but our law has already remedied that situation. We have made the necessary improvements by reason of the action that was taken, and there is a general recognition of that fact to-day.

While the convention does not go into details it does deal with what I might call the general acceptance of patents throughout the civilized world. We passed our statute in 1935. The Prime Minister will no doubt recall that when that act was before the house a long argument took place on the question of patents not being used by the owners. The relevant sections of our statute, which are found in the patent acts of all countries, ensure that patented goods will be manufactured in this country; and there are also provisions to deal with any case in which the consumer is being rooked, to use the ordinary colloquial language of the day. The patent can then be cancelled under conditions provided for in the statute itself. The difficulty to which the Prime Minister refers was at one time a real one but it no longer exists, having been already met by legislation. I do think that to insert in the combines act a provision dealing with the patent situation is, to say the least, anomalous and creates a state of affairs which, in my opinion, cannot but be injurious to our own position and the development of our industrial life.

Mr. GLEN: Could the monopoly established by a patent continue to exist if the owner, in conjunction with someone else also owning a patent, operated it to the detriment of the public interest?

Mr. BENNETT: All patents operate to the detriment of the public interest—

Mr. GLEN: I mean, so as to bring it under the act.

Mr. BENNETT: Then you have a conspiracy, and that is covered by the criminal code as it stands. There is no punishment because one of the parties to the conspiracy happens to be a patentee; the punishment ensues because he happens to be conspiring to something that is illegal. But I am talking about a particular person, a patentee, who has secured from the Dominion of Canada and all other nations that are parties to the Hague convention a patent which gives him the exclusive right to produce a given commodity for a given period of time. The limitation as to time is the safeguard of the public on the one hand, and the limitation of time within which he shall begin production is the public's safeguard on the other. In other words it ensures that the public shall get the benefit of the invention within a limited time, and, secondly, that the public shall not be oppressed in respect of price beyond a given period. That is to say, the idea is no longer an idea that can find expression solely through one particular means, but one that anybody can use.

Mr. GLEN: Suppose the owner of a patent, in conjunction with the owner of another patent of a similar type, carried on some particular business; would he not have destroyed the monopoly created by the grant of the patent and have become subject to the provisions of the combines act?

Mr. CAHAN: Under the statute, any third party interested in such a case may secure a licence to use the patent at a royalty to be determined by the commissioner. If my hon. friend will look at the Patent Act of 1935 he will see that sections 65 and 66 deal with the exclusive right.

Mr. GLEN: My hon, friend has not got my point. When a man is operating under a patent and someone else has also a patent of a similar kind and they combine to operate both patents, each having an interest in his own, but one patent supplementing the other, is not that a combination under the provisions of this act?

Mr. BENNETT: It is punishable, not because they are patentees, but because they have combined. That, however, is beside the question at the moment.

Mr. THORSON: I listened with interest this morning to the discussion of the definition section. With regard to the expression "likely to operate" I would point out that it has been in our law since 1919. It was in the Board of Commerce Act of that year.

Mr. BENNETT: Which was held invalid.

Mr. THORSON: Yes; and it has been in the Combines Investigation Act since 1923. The term has been in our law since that time. [Mr. Bennett.] In the session of 1935 Bill No. 79 came before the house, and that bill contained the same expression, "likely to operate" to the detriment or against the interest of the public. That bill passed the house on June 20 and went to the senate. The senate made an amendment, substituting for the words "likely to operate" the words "designed to operate." When that amendment came back from the senate the House of Commons adopted a motion of non-concurrence in the amendment, pointing out that the expression "designed to operate" would make it very difficult to do anything with the statute for the reason that intention would have to be proved and that it would be hard to prove any such intention. That motion of non-concurrence was intimated to the senate and the senate did not insist upon its amendment, with the result that the phrase "likely to operate" was restored to the law. In other words, that phrase has been a part of the Combines Investigation Act ever since 1923. Why then should hon, members opposite at this stage seek to change that part of the act?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): I wish to say a word or two on this question as it may be affected by the interpretation clause. All that has been said regarding the wording of the Patent Act and the protection of the public, with respect to patents, against failure to manufacture, appeal to the commissioner, and so on, is perfectly sound and I quite agree with it. But there is another phase of the question which I think has not been present in the minds of the committee, at least this afternoon. There is for instance one group in this country, the electrical group, comprising I think five large firms, who manufacture a great variety of electrical equipment and own hundreds of patents. These firms have combined-I am not saying illegally at present; they have one firm of solicitors which acts for the associated firms, and when a merchant attempts to bring goods in from outside on which they have patents in Canada they invoke the terms of the patent act and contend that such goods are illegally offered for sale in this country. The firm of lawyers representing these five large electrical firms will notify such an importer, and there have been cases in which actual action has been taken against the importer. The theory of course is that the patent act grants to the owner of the patent the right to manufacture and distribute those goods. But this patent law is the outcome of an international agreement to which we are parties. This international agreement provides that the goods may be manufactured in the various countries where the patents are registered. Assume that certain electrical equipment, say a lamp globe, is manufactured legally and properly in the United States under the patent, paying a royalty to the owners of the patent in the United States. My contention is that there ought to be nothing in the patent law which would prevent anyone from bringing those goods in from the United States, provided the patent laws of the United States have been complied with and the required royalty been paid. But that cannot be done; is prevented. The patent therefore tends to operate as a super-tariff against the importation of the goods. The facts can be easily ascertained; there are records of cases in the courts, and I have a file giving many illustrations. Such simple things as ordinary electric light bulbs can be brought into this country, all the rules regarding payment of royalty complied with, and the duty paid, and they can be offered for sale in Canada at twenty, thirty, forty and sometimes as much as fifty per cent below the price charged by the owners of the patent in Canada. In such cases it is obvious that the owners of the patent here are using, or usurping I might say, their powers under the patent act in order to impose a restrictive duty against the importation of these goods. Assuming this statement of the position is correct, and I submit it can be demonstrated, I say there should be some power such as this law might give which would enable the proper department of the government and the officers of the crown to examine into the matter and see whether or not those who control these patents in Canada are committing an offence likely to operate to the detriment of and against the interests of the public, as described in this bill. My contention is that we ought to have some law which would make that practice impossible. That is one of the reasons why I welcomed the Board of Commerce Act, I think it was called, which is still on the statute books, because under that act we were supposed to set up a board before which merchants who might think they had been badly treated could appear and have their complaint heard. I sincerely hope that the government will not overlook the bringing of that board into active operation at the earliest possible date. But I submit that, inasmuch as such a condition may arise, and indeed exists to-day, it is highly desirable that there should be provisions in this law which would enable those who administer it to act in case such a matter is brought to their attention. I want it to be perfectly clear that in saying that I am not criticizing the general provisions of the patent act, which, properly interpreted, I think are just and fair. It is these abuses that I have mentioned that I seek to stop. I am not a lawyer; I do not presume to pass any opinion on the law, but I say that the practice now in vogue under the provisions of the patent act is an abuse of privilege and operates to the detriment of the public. Therefore I suggest that before this provision is abandoned or changed that situation should be considered.

Mr. CAHAN: I understand that this clause is to stand.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: In the meantime the minister might consider dealing with the provision in section 65, subsection (2) clause (c) of the Patent Act, 1935, which declares it to be an abuse of the patent rights if the demand for the patented article in Canada is not being met to an adequate extent and on reasonable terms. If there is an abuse, not only has the commissioner the right to intervene, but my memory is that the attorney general has the right of intervention in certain cases in order to have the patent declared void by the Exchequer Court.

Mr. ROGERS: Then section 2 will stand for the time being.

Mr. BENNETT: It might be well for the minister to keep in mind the proviso that was inserted when these bills were submitted to counsel, as well as to the law officers of the crown in 1935:

Provided that this subsection shall not be construed or applied so as to limit or impair any right or interest derived under the patent act, 1935, or under any other statute of Canada.

That was put in there deliberately on the advice of counsel to whom these bills were referred. Answering the question of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) I am quite aware of the fact that the senate made the change along the lines suggested by the Prime Minister this morning, and for the simple and obvious reason that we were endeavouring to maintain the act just as it stood, except that it should be dealt with by a commission rather than a commissioner. That was the real reason behind it. If the hon, gentleman will look at the Combines Investigation Act as it was passed, he will find that in every instance we endeavoured to maintain the sections as they stood for the purpose of preventing purely political attacks, it having been alleged that we had endeavoured to weaken the provisions of the combines act when we provided that a commission should deal with them and not a commissioner. Some ten or fifteen changes were made by the senate, to one of which reference has been made. I had not remembered it until this morning, when I saw the word "designed" again, and when it was mentioned by the hon. gentleman I recalled the circumstances.

Section stands.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4-Trade unions not affected.

Mr. BENNETT: I have no doubt that the minister has received certain representations which were mimeographed and sent out; all the members of the house have received them. There were no signatures attached but I assume they came from the same source. It did seem to me that there was something in the point made with respect to section 4. We have provided for fair treatment by what we call fair trade practices. Should there be objection to a combination of employers for the purpose of maintaining fair trade practices, any more than there is to workmen combining for their own reasonable protection? That, it seems to me, is not unreasonable. That point was contained in the memorandum sent to all the members of the house by one of the chambers of commerce or boards of trade. The amendment suggested, which would include combinations of employers for the reasonable prevention of unfair trade practices, seems to be reasonable. We have by statute provided against unfair practices, and certainly it is desirable that employers should unite for a common understanding in this regard just as much as it is desirable that workmen should be permitted to form combinations for their own protection. In the one instance the purpose is to ensure uniformity of fair trade practices and in the other case it is for the protection of the workmen. Is that not just and right? It struck me that the board of trade or chamber of commerce that made the suggestion had arrived at a sound conclusion, and I am asking the minister whether he would be prepared to accept an amendment to section 4 looking to that end, that is, providing that employers might combine for the purpose of preventing unfair trade practices. We have the law as it now stands, which the privy council said was sound, under which we have made it a criminal offence to do some of these things, and surely it is desirable that both employers and employees should be permitted to form a combination. As a matter of fact that is the case at the present time; there are combinations for the purpose of preventing unfair practices. We know that one such combination went to the courts of this country some years ago on the question whether or not it was a valid exercise of their power when they tried to fine some of their members who did not comply with the provisions of the law. I merely ask the minister whether or not he would be prepared to consider such an amendment.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not feel that an amendment of that kind ought to be accepted. This section is inserted for the protection of employees in their capacity as employees. It does seem to me that the amendment suggested by the leader of the opposition goes beyond that. It does not consider employers in their capacity as employers of labour but rather in relation to the whole business of the production and sale of their commodities.

Mr. BENNETT: No, unfair practices have to do with wages and all that sort of thing.

Mr. ROGERS: But unfair trade practices, as I understand it, do not relate or in the past have not related to the matter of wages but rather to matters of prices and business practices. This section has been inserted, as my right hon. friend is aware, from the beginning in order to prevent trade unions from coming under the normal prohibitions with respect to restraint of trade.

Section agreed to.

On section 5-Commissioner.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I have been in parliament a few years, and from my experience I have very little confidence in this whole act. I remember when one of the predecessors of the present minister was dealing with the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. I told him the whole act was ultra vires and he said it was not. Well, that act went to the privy council and the whole thing was upset.

Just see the roundabout way in which we are going to attack the combines. As far as we have gone in this bill it is all built around sections 496, 497 and 498 of the criminal code, which was the law for many years and under which many decisions and judgments were rendered. As I see it, under this act the combines will continue to flourish like the green bay tree, as they have in the past, with this sort of administration. A commissioner is to be appointed. We have had a commissioner for a long time now, and many complaints have been laid before him in regard to the milk combine, the coal combine, the bread combine and many others. What did this investigator do? All his reports went back to the minister, and you will notice that the same provision is made here. The governor in council may appoint an officer to be known as a commissioner of the combines act, and then the act sets out the details of his administration, his appointment, his duties and so forth. You see that he is to report to the minister. Canada will never get anywhere in attacking combines as long as this administration is in the hands of a political department, because that is all the Department of Labour is to-day. It is not a judicial department; the commissioner is not independent. He has to report to a political minister, and we heard something about what this particular minister said last night at Pembroke. Certain similar legislation which was passed by the late government, and which is to some extent copied in this section, he termed counterfeit legislation. What kind of judicial body is this going to be, when a responsible minister of the crown makes such remarks as that? What investigating powers will the commissioner have? I have nothing but the utmost regard for Mr. McGregor, but what can he do?

Why do we not attack this problem as it has been attacked in the United States, which provided the model for some parts of this act? The government have tried to revamp this section in accordance with the recent decisions of the privy council. I can tell you that this section was before the senate last year; there was a little difference of opinion, and they reported it back with amendments. The Prime Minister did not see fit to accept those amendments, and as as a result nothing was done, though I thought the two houses might have got together with regard to this administration by the commissioner, and his powers. For the last twelve months they have fallen back on the old legislation, the Inquiries Act, under which three or four investigations have been held. What has been the result? In the coal case Mr. McGregor reported a whitewash. Then they had a commission conducted by Mr. Tory-Tory in name only, so far as I know-who never mentioned the consumers in his report. During the recess of parliament he was supposed to investigate the cause of the increase in the price of coal from $5.50 in 1905 to $14 or $15 to-day. What can the proposed commissioner, Mr. McGregor, do? I have laid complaints before this very gentleman and before his predecessor, when Mr. Murdock was the minister. I complained about the combines in respect of coal, milk, bread and other things, and what was done? They sent a man to Toronto and some sort of investigation was held. I went to see the judge presiding at the York county assizes when there was a scarcity of milk and the health officer was complaining about the way infants were dying off. The judge consulted with the crown officer representing the province, and then said that in view of this act, which we are now amending, he believed the whole question of administration had been taken out of the old law under the criminal code.

I have very little faith in this bill. I was head of the municipality of Toronto for some years, and I had a good deal to do with such administration as is proposed under this measure. I have no faith left in it. The other day the Minister of Justice was complaining about communism. Communism would not exist in this country if we broke up these combines. I can tell the Minister of Labour now that the money spent by the late government in connection with the price spreads inquiry was money spent to the very best advantage in the interests of this country. It showed the rotten state of affairs in Canada and the things these big interests have done. These interests were summoned before the commissioner and they refused to give evidence. They read all the cases, and they argued for days about the conflict of power and jurisdiction as between the federal and provincial governments. We will never get anywhere so long as we have this multiplicity of commissioners and commissions trying to attack a problem they do not know anything about. I can tell you this, that these combines will affect confederation if they go much farther.

I have referred to some dealings I have had with the Department of Labour regarding combines and with the commissioner. It is now proposed to appoint a commissioner in place of proceedings under the criminal code before a judge presiding at an assize court who could deal with offences against the criminal code. We know that Judge Landis fined the Standard Oil Company $50,000,000, and was going to put some of them in gaol. I only wish the commissioner or the Minister of Labour would bring to the bar of the house some of these people who have been treating our statutes as scraps of paper.

In my opinion, after a careful study of the act of 1935, I believe that with the exception of a few words here and there it is almost perfect. Further, in my opinion the social legislation introduced in that year will in years to come redound to the credit of the present leader of the opposition. He and his minister of labour, Mr. Gordon, were the first people to attack the problem in a sensible way.

I should have liked to say more, but will not detain the committee. I predict the law courts will upset the act and that its administration will be a glorious fiasco and trusts and combines will still flourish like the green bay tree. The price spreads commission showed them up. There has not been a word said since. The Minister of Labour is complaining about the provinces. He wants to leave things to the provinces. I will tell him that some three or four provinces are bankrupt and cannot give a cent to help legislation. How can they contribute, as he suggests? What is there to prevent him bringing the combines into the law courts? Why does not the minister wield the big stick, summon these people to the Carleton assize court, and try out the legislation? What has the minister done about child labour and sweat shops? Not a thing. What has been done about the Purvis commission? A man was sent there, and he was told to mind his own business. This roundabout way of doing things is just like something to which I referred the other night. I would advise the commissioner to lay a bill of indictment against Mr. Purvis and his industry. They are the biggest trust or combine on the North American continent, and nothing is done about it. No wonder we have communism in Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: I wish to say one or two words on this section. Unfortunately I have to attend a committee which meets while the house is sitting, and I shall be here only a minute or two more. I am not going into a detailed analysis, but in my opinion this is a retrograde move. May I say with the greatest politeness and kindness to the Prime Minister that I have a full appreciation of the merits of the act as it was originally designed by him. I believe he deserves all the credit he wishes to take in that connection. But a long period of time has elapsed since. Business conditions and business methods to-day are entirely different from what they were twentyfive, twenty or even ten years ago. There has been a metamorphosis in the methods of doing business not only in Canada but throughout the world. Originally the act was designed for certain purposes; we are now returning to its original form, and though some of the amendments may be improvements, it does not measure up to present day requirements. I believe that parliament took a forward step when in 1935 it placed the administration of the act under a board of trade and industry. I think it was a mistake to assign those duties to the tariff board, but that is something which could easily be corrected.

If a board of trade and industry were erected in Canada I believe it would be a most progressive, effective and useful means of dealing with modern business problems. For my own information I have made a study of the court of commerce of France. Many hon, members will be familiar with that court, and will recall that about three hundred years have passed since it was set up. Now, after a long time, it has developed into a definitely [Mr. Church.]

established method of dealing with commercial disputes. The records indicated to me that in France commercial disputes of all kinds would be taken to the court of commerce and there, with less formality than would be required in the regular law courts, decisions would be promptly arrived at.

I had hoped that when we established a board of trade and industry it would have gradually developed a practice and would have established certain decisions and courses of action which would serve as a guide along decent and proper lines for the large businesses in Canada. The present bill takes the powers away from the board and returns them to a commissioner. I am not in any sense reflecting upon any commissioner or any person; rather I am referring to the system. We could have had a commissioner, a secretary or some other officer to handle the bill and to deal with administration. I must say however that the establishment of the trade and industry board was one of the wisest things parliament ever did. It was a progressive, up-to-date and modern move, and an effort to meet the requirements of modern commerce.

Another point is this: The Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice and I hope the Minister of Labour-with his knowledge of economics, although he has not been long in practice as a minister-must know the difficulty which in all these years the federal government has had in securing effective action against combines which have been fairly well established as such, because nothing could be declared to be a combine until the ultimate end of the legal proceedings had been arrived at. In many cases there was a conviction in the hearts of the people, and, I would say, in the minds of ministers and government officials, that a combine of an injurious character did exist, but the difficulty always was to get a conviction under the criminal code, through the courts. First, there was a private investigation, then possibly a public commission investigation, and then there would be an approach to the attorney general of a province to obtain his leave or to turn the matter over to him for prosecution. That is a long, tedious procedure. If we could bring a case quickly before a court of commerce we would

There is another phase of the matter to which I should like to direct attention. So long as we have this controversy between federal and provincial jurisdiction, to which the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) referred, we shall have interminable delays in cases which naturally would fall under this law. If a matter were brought before a court of commerce, in public hearing, the publicity connected with the public examination of the cold facts would perhaps have more effective results than even a decision in a law court, which may be carried through the various courts to the privy council, a procedure which sometimes occupies several years before it is brought to a conclusion; whereas in the other case almost immediate results would be achieved.

I may say to the Prime Minister that I am not at all desirous of reflecting upon the excellence of his work during past years in connection with this class of legislation, but I think that by again putting this matter under the administration of a commissioner we are taking a retrograde step which will not in any sense meet the demands of modern business or effectively control the intricate and very often far-reaching problems which are prevalent in the commercial and industrial world.

Mr. BENNETT: Why does the minister find it necessary to make a change in the existing condition? The statute passed in 1935 placed the administration of the act in the hands of a commission. The Dominion Trade and Industry Commission was appointed in accordance with the recommendations made to this parliament by the price spreads committee. The administration of the combines act was placed in the hands of this commission. and appropriate amendments were made to the legislation. This commission has done some good work. Since I came back to Canada I have found evidence of communications which have been made to the commission. I find that numerous inquiries have been made about various matters and steps taken which brought about the proper adjustment of more cases than one. Why should not the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission continue to function in the manner provided for by the statute, without the creation of a new and expensive board?

The former commissioner is still acting and we would have the benefit of a trained legal mind. The minister knows as well as I that as business has progressed the main complaint to-day is against unfair competition. This is one of the matters engaging the attention of economists everywhere. How can we overcome unfair competition as distinguished from a combine pure and simple? Why is it necessary to set up a body separate and distinct from this other organization in connection with which you would have the benefit of a highly trained legal mind as against an untrained mind whose curiosity and desire to ferret out things for any purpose becomes no longer a merit but a fault? After all, this country must compete with all countries of the world if it is to maintain its export business. We have to maintain a decent standard of living and by the supervision now provided by the statute to which I have just referred we have endeavoured to prevent what might be called cut-throat competition which might result in the creation of a monopoly far worse than any possible combine. This has been one of the most marked changes during the last fifteen years.

I suppose the minister has read what Adams described so clearly as the cause of our present condition. He referred to the creation of corporations, holding companies and matters of that sort. But leaving that out for the moment, you have the fact that cut-throat competition is an evil which nations are endeavouring to combat. This must be done to prevent a monopoly being created in a single business. Without going into details, which might be regarded as unfair, I think it can be said that we have had cut-throat competition in this country which resulted in the establishment of monopolies. The minister has been a student of these things and he must know to what I refer. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) referred to some of them. If the minister wants to know just who they are I can give him a list.

Mr. DUPUIS: We should like to have a list from the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think I will gratify my hon. friend's curiosity.

Mr. DUPUIS: We want to see how it compares with ours.

Mr. BENNETT: If he will take the trouble to look up the books himself, he can find out who they are. They were referred to in this house on one occasion many years ago. A change has been brought about by unfair methods of competition. One only needs to read the economic history of the United States to discover how powerful enterprises have acted in different communities. We may have three people in business in a community and a large enterprise wants to buy them out. They offer very good prices, sometimes more than the business is worth. However, sometimes the proprietors reply that they do not want to sell, that it is a family business. They are told that the corporation is coming in anyway and if the unfortunate people do not sell they are squeezed out of existence. That is the condition with which we are faced to-day. That cannot be called a combine because there is only one company in the business. Through the elimination of competition they have become a monopoly. They have not increased prices in every case, but their profits have been increased through the elimination of wasteful competition.

What is the tendency in this country today? Unfortunately when people see that one business is making money they all want to get into it in order to make some too. That is what happened in connection with our pulp and paper business. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) was receiver for one of these enterprises and he knows what happened. It was wasteful competition, it was the trading off of an old dollar for a new one sometimes not worth a hundred cents. That is the condition we have to meet. We endeavoured to meet it with the 1935 combines act but it was not designed to deal with that phase of the question at all. It cannot deal with it in the very nature of things because it is not a combine. I know of industries in this country which are not combines, but which have monopolies of their particular business. They have obtained that monopoly through buying out their competitors or forcing them out of business. They offered a price and if it was not accepted the competitor was put out of business. That is the situation with which we are confronted.

We must prevent these things if we do not want a lower standard of living and reduced wages. But to do so it is not necessary to set up this costly machinery. The necessary authority had been placed in the hands of the tariff board under the previous act. Continue with the same investigator if you will, only give some supervision. He is now without supervision and is free to pursue his own course. He has a mind untrained in law, but he is empowered to make investigations that will harass and not help business. If you carry out some of the provisions of this bill that is what will happen. I do not think that is the intention of the government, but that is what will result.

Some of the sections of this bill go farther than we have ever gone before; they make a judge out of a man who is not a lawyer. This is not the first time a judge has been made out of a man who knew no law, but it is the first time we have made a judge out of one who is not a lawyer. I think it was James who made the observation that you could easily get twelve judges to agree, but you could not get twelve lawyers to agree. That is what is happening here. The minister should give us some reason why he finds it necessary to take the administration of this act out of the hands of the commission and appoint a commissioner and invest him with the authority that is proposed. The reason the president of the privy council was made administrator of the act was that it was felt to be a matter of high policy that the Prime Minister, who in this country is usually the president of the council, should have before him at all times knowledge of what was being done that so vitally affects the economic policy and life of the country. But if you are not to have the president of the council, then it does seem to me that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, whose one job is to keep in touch with trade and commerce, should administer the act. What I am asking for at the moment is some explanation as to why we should not utilize the tariff board, so as not to involve additional expense until such time as its duties become so great as to necessitate an additional commission. Why not let them carry on the work instead of setting up the costly machinery of another branch of government?

Mr. ROGERS: The question of the administration of the combines act was dealt with when the bill was before the house on second reading.

Mr. BENNETT: Very slightly.

Mr. ROGERS: Perhaps the leader of the opposition will feel that it was not dealt with adequately. At the same time I think there is some cogency in the reasons given at that time for the change contemplated in this bill. Under the trade and industry commission act, the combines act was placed directly under that commission, and the members for the time being of the tariff board of Canada were declared to be the members of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission. The result was to place an additional duty, and, as I think all hon, members will agree, an important additional duty, upon the tariff board. According to my reading of the debate at that time, it was contemplated even then that the additional duties imposed upon the tariff board would in the nature of things require some additional staff, and that some separation of functions would be necessary if the work were to be performed efficiently. At the present time what we are doing is detaching from what is already an over-burdened tariff board a function which at any rate does not relate of necessity to the tariff board as such. I would not say for a moment that the present members of the tariff board, or at any rate the chairman, are not competent to deal with the questions raised in the administration of the combines act. On the contrary I feel confident that the chairman of the tariff board would approach such a duty with every fairness and with great ability. But I think it must be agreed that the administration of a combines act does not of necessity have anything in common with the work of a tariff board.

Mr. CAHAN: Why not constitute a new board under the act, chapter 59 of 1935?

Mr. ROGERS: It was called the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission. The members—

Mr. CAHAN: Were declared to be the members of the tariff board.

Mr. ROGERS: That was a temporary provision.

Mr. CAHAN: It may have been temporary, but at any rate there has been no change up to this time, and there was no undertaking, as I understand it, that the work would be given to another commission.

Mr. ROGERS: I think at the time there was a general feeling, which was expressed at this session by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), that we were setting up too many commissions and that it would be better to combine the work of the two. At all events what we are doing now is ensuring that the administration of the combines act will receive the undivided attention of one commissioner, or, if the work should require it at some later date, a commission of possibly three members. Here again I give no undertaking, and obviously cannot; but to enlarge the commission to three at some future time if the work demands it would seem to be the obvious course to follow.

Mr. BENNETT: But the commission has been with the other commission ever since, administering this act.

Mr. ROGERS: It is not really administering the act, if I may say so; because while some questions arose as to the legality of the trade and industry act, the combines act has not been administered by that commission. I think that undoubtedly the tariff board, in assuming that additional function, has found itself severely handicapped. There has been no effective administration of the combines act in the past year and a half.

Mr. BENNETT: And no director of prosecutions has been named.

Mr. ROGERS: No director of prosecutions has been named. That of course touches a point that goes beyond the administration of the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. BENNETT: But it touches the whole matter.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. I think there is very much to be said for so arranging the administration of the combines act that it will come under the continuous supervision of one man or one group of men, and certainly, if combines exist to the extent suggested by some hon. members, there is every reason why the administration of the combines act, apart entirely from the other duties imposed upon the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission, should be administered by one commissioner. There is much to be said, I think, for some continuity in the working out of the provisions of this act. In times past, and I am speaking now of the period before the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission was set up, the actual investigations apart from preliminary inquiries were conducted by ad hoc commissions. The result was that the country was put to the very considerable expense of appointing ad hoc commissioners, and there was none of that continuity of experience which is valuable in carrying on this act.

Perhaps I ought to say something about the transfer to the Department of Labour. Certainly this does not imply an appropriation by the Department of Labour of a field that was not once its own.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not suggested that that is so.

Mr. ROGERS: I quite agree. It is a question rather of a return to the Department of Labour after a temporary transfer to the president of the privy council for the reasons suggested by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). I would however like to express my own view that there is much to be said in favour of having the administration by the Department of Labour as against the Department of Trade and Commerce. After all the Department of Trade and Commerce is set up primarily in order to provide facilities for the industries and commercial firms of this country-and properly so. But I question if it would be wise to have the administration of this act designed to prevent abuses among industries and commercial firms placed in the department which at the same time had, and was intended to have, a very intimate and close relationship with those firms. I submit again that there are strong reasons why the administration of the combines act should be placed under a separate commissioner, and I believe there are good reasons, which perhaps will not be considered as such by hon. members opposite, why the administration of the Combines Act should be placed in the Department of Labour rather than in the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister knows it had no personal reference.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, quite.

Mr. CAHAN: I wish to make one remark in connection with this discussion, and that is that the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act, which was chapter 59 of the statutes of 1935, has been declared by the judicial committee, with the one exception of section 14 which was not referred to it, to be intra vires of the parliament of Canada; and section 14, which had been held by the Supreme Court of Canada to be ultra vires, did not come within the reference made to the judicial committee. But there was a significant suggestion by his lordship in delivering the opinion of the committee, that if it had come before the committee the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada might not have been upheld. So that it is the intention of the government, apparently, to maintain an administration of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act of 1935, because in the bill which we have before us only sections 13 and 14 of its provisions are repealed, section 13 of that act being the provision which charged the commission with the administration of the Combines Investigation Act. It is significant, therefore, that the government have undoubtedly decided, in repealing two sections of that act, to retain the act as it now stands, with these exceptions; and if the government has decided to retain the act and to administer it with the exception of these two sections, then there is no reason why one body of commissioners should not administer both acts-no reason in the world. There is nothing in conflict between the administration of the combines act and the administration of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act. What the minister is doing now is to set up an extra commission assisted by numerous assistant commissioners and provided with counsel, a whole bureau which is unnecessary if the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission is to be retained.

Mr. ROGERS: But additional personnel was contemplated.

Mr. CAHAN: The government have decided that members of the tariff board should not be the personnel of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission. But they were temporarily appointed, and in the meantime the act was submitted by reference to the court to ascertain its validity. It has been declared valid in every section except one, and by repealing that section the government impliedly admit that they will continue the administration of this new act of 1935. Why not, then, change the personnel of the commission, if that is desired, but maintain the act and include in it the administration of the combines act? That would place it outside both the Department of Labour and the [Mr. Rogers.]

Department of Trade and Commerce. As between the two, frankly I prefer the Department of Trade and Commerce. I do not think that the Minister of Labour ex officio is necessarily the person to have charge of the administration of the combines act. But by changing the personnel of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission and leaving with that commission the administration of the combines act, you do procure what is so essential to business in Canada, confidence in the stability and integrity of the administration of these acts. At the present time the government are appealing to industry to give employment to the unemployed; they are appealing to every class of industry to extend its operations in order to provide additional employment. If that is so, if the government are dependent upon industry to give employment to the unemployed, then industry must have a certain peace of mind in order to extend its operations and comply with the demands of the Minister of Labour in that respect. I believe that no better effort could be made in that direction, no more efficient effort, than by placing the administration of the combines act under a thoroughly competent and independent board such as is provided by the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act, so that there may be complete reliance upon its impartial, judicial and legal administration of that act.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): The leader of the opposition has emphasized very strongly the benefit that would accrue if the administration of this act were under a trained legal mind. I wonder whether it has ever occurred to him that possibly it might be a great advantage to have it under a commissioner who has not a trained legal mind. The leader of the opposition speaks as if all judges were united on matters of law even if lawyers are not. But I submit that almost every judicial decision, even in the highest courts, shows that judges differ very materially even in what are strictly matters of law. If I understand the situation rightly, the president of the United States is doing his best to get away from the dominance of trained legal minds in the supreme court. The Minister of Justice shakes his head. Well, I shall have to take the attitude that some have already taken in this debate, that of course I am not referring to any individual.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): He wants an addition of legal minds there.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is an old saying, "Blessed is he that bloweth his own horn, for verily it shall be blown."

Mr. CAHAN: That is a misquotation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is it? Some of us apparently have to sit under the continual blowing of the horns of those who belong to the legal profession.

Mr. CAHAN: The quotation is, "He that bloweth not his own horn, for him shall no horn be blown."

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Possibly that is the reason for the activity of the lawyers in the house. Seriously, while undoubtedly there are benefits from a legal training there are also some things about legal training that make it very difficult for those who have had that training to realize new needs as they arise and to interpret some of the old principles as they relate to modern developments. We have, for example, the modern development of the corporation. The corporation is a purely artificial body created by law. It has nothing of human characteristics about it. As we often say, it has no soul; and yet we endow it with a certain immortality. It can live on and on even if the members who originally composed it have died. There seems to have been a beneficent provision in nature whereby individuals, once they have reached a certain age, pass off the scene and allow others to come along. Not so with corporations. So again and again we find corporations persisting when their usefulness has passed, and able to exploit the community because of the different circumstances that have arisen. These corporations are given privileges along a great many lines which would not be accorded even to individuals. We had an example in one or two of the statements made this morning.

What about "intent"? We insist that there must be intent to do so and so, and we get into prolonged casuistical discussions as to exactly wherein lies intent. Using an illustration that occurred to me before the Minister of Labour spoke, if a man carries concealed weapons, he is, I understand, thereby committing a crime. If someone is killed, the carrying of weapons may be used to show intent; but in any case simply to carry concealed weapons is a crime. But we apply no such simple procedure as that when it comes to corporations; that is another matter altogether.

Again the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) spoke of not making crimes where crimes did not exist. But surely with the coming of the automobile there have to be new crimes constituted because there is a new source of danger to human life and welfare, and what would not have been a crime on the road fifty years ago may become a crime with the modern automobile. I can readily understand how one with a trained legal mind will persist in thinking in terms of the horse and buggy age fifty years after the horse and buggy have ceased to exist; that is a danger to which the trained legal mind is subject. Combines give an opportunity for new crimes; they may themselves be crimes.

Again, we are told that we should not have investigations of private affairs, of a corporation's affairs. I suppose that goes back to the idea that a man's business was his own individual affair. But to-day can anyone really believe that business carried on by corporations is in any sense a personal affair? It is a matter that should be of interest to the public at large. I think it was when Woodrow Wilson ran his first presidential campaign that he gathered his speeches together into a book called The New Freedom. In that book there was an illustration that I remember. He said that in the old days it was not considered right, on the principle that a man's home was his castle, that anyone should be allowed to enter it without his consent. That is all very well. Then in the age of great corporations it is said, by analogy, that no one must as it were enter their premises-no one must be given the right to investigate what goes on in the corporation. Woodrow Wilson suggested the illustration of a great apartment block. In the United States, authorities were still considering the apartment block to belong to the owner simply because, though it might contain fifty homes, they were all under the one roof. In England, he said, they were adopting a wiser attitude. There the authorities took the position that although these fifty homes were under the one roof, each apartment was in reality a unit by itself. The corridors, on the other hand, the lighting and everything of that kind concerned the public, because the corridors corresponded more or less to the streets; and the corridors ought to be taken care of, lighted, kept sanitary, and policed just as a street. So Mr. Wilson said that we ought to have at all times the fullest publicity with respect to the business of great corporations. I heartily agree with that. But now, all these years afterwards, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George still keeps to the old position and the old fiction. If I may say so I think this is very largely because of his legal training. He thinks that the public ought not to be permitted to enter the sacred portals of corporation offices.

Whether or not this bill is the best way of accomplishing the end in view, I think something more will have to be done than has so far been done to check the exploitation which has been carried on by these great monopolies and trusts and mergers. The price spreads commission report, and the evidence published more recently in the daily papers of the hearings of the textile commission, make the people of this country generally realize that there should be some way of protecting the public.

Personally I think this legislation is a characteristic Liberal way of doing it—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am sure that a good Liberal like my friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) should take that as a compliment. I can conceive that, if the competitive system is a good thing, we must in some way seek to avoid unfair competition. But it strikes me that the Minister of Labour will find it very difficult in practice to decide where fair competition ends and unfair competition begins. As the committee know, from our standpoint it is next to impossible to do this, and we believe that the competitive system must ultimately give way to a cooperative system. But I suppose we cannot hope for a change in the present system so long as the Liberals are in the saddle.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is giving an entirely wrong interpretation of Liberalism. Liberalism is not necessarily identified with the competitive system.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I thought it was.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is mistaken.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have heard in this house for sixteen years what Liberalism was, and I gathered the idea that it is very closely tied up with the competitive system. I am glad that apparently Liberalism is changing in that respect. This encourages us in this corner to renew our efforts in the days to come.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is getting worse.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But in the meantime I simply say that I believe that legislation of this kind is distinctly in the right direction, if for no other reason than that it may show how difficult it is to administer in a society founded upon a competitive system.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In a Liberal direction.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Very well then, we will hope that Liberalism and socialism will not ultimately be so far apart. I have always taken the view that if you travel far enough in one direction, say eastward, you are bound to reach its extreme—you come to the west.

As to the protection of the public, while in theory it might be possible to maintain an absolutely neutral and unprejudiced position, in practice we have to remember that these great corporations have huge funds at their disposal; they are well organized, compact, and engage the ablest counsel in the country to plead their case; whereas on the other hand the consumer or the labouring man who works for the great corporation is comparatively unorganized and without any very great resources. Some special effort ought to be made-shall I say by a Liberal government?-to see that the interests of the unorganized public are very specially safeguarded.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): I am sure the government are well aware of the very general complaint throughout the country that we have too much governmental machinery; that there is duplication, overlapping and waste; and that from time to time additional and unnecessary commissions are created in connection with the carrying on of government both in the provincial and the federal field.

Under the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act passed in 1935 the duty of investigation under the Combines Investigation Act was imposed upon the tariff board, an organization already in existence, with a trained and competent staff, and one which in the course of the discharge of its duties acquires a vast fund of knowledge relating to trade and industry in all its branches, including the effect of the tariff upon business.

There are those, of course, who contend that the tariff is responsible for many of these combinations. I submit that it would be hard to find a more competent organization than the tariff board, an organization better equipped, with a better background or with a greater command of information of the very sort that would be useful under this act. On the ground of expense alone I submit that we are making a mistake when, under this section, we contemplate the setting up of what appears to be a duplicate organization, with a duplicate staff, for the discharge of duties which I think might be well and properly discharged by this existing organization.

Perhaps that is putting it on the lowest ground, that of economy, which of course is important even at this time. I do urge upon the Minister of Labour, however, that this commission must possess a fund of information and an accumulation of knowledge in connection with the trade and industry of this country that would be very useful in connection with investigations of the character outlined by this act. In addition to saving the expense of a duplicate organization, there would be action along parallel lines; there would be no inconsistent action as between an investigator or commissioner under this act and the tariff board. It does seem to me that there should be for this purpose some organization with the standing of the tariff board, an organization more or less set apart, rather than one directly under the control of the minister. Since the tariff board has been put on a permanent basis I am sure that it has established its usefulness, its capacity and its competence to deal with the matters that have been referred to it, and I believe it is winning the confidence and respect of the people of this dominion.

As has been said already, it seems to me that the proposed procedure is a retrograde step, that we are not putting it on a sufficiently high plane; we are not giving the commission that standing and authority which will command the respect of those who are concerned in the administration of this act.

Section agreed to, on division.

On section 6-Assistant commissioner.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely section 6 is unnecessary if we are to have a commissioner whose sole duty it will be to look after these matters. Do not let us magnify this office also.

Mr. ROGERS: The provision is that an assistant commissioner may be appointed in the manner authorized by law. It may very well happen, for example, that while the commissioner is carrying out one investigation, an application may be made for an investigation of a somewhat urgent character. This would give the requisite authority, to prevent delay under circumstances of that kind. I do not think it goes beyond anything that has been possible under the act at any time. That is to say, under the old combines act it was quite conceivable that you might have two or three commissioners working at the same time on separate investigations.

Section agreed to, on division.

On section 7—Special commissioners.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think this section should be here. The very purpose stated by the minister, the preservation, that is, of some general system of uniformity and continuity, should preclude the necessity of appointing special commissioners to investigate these matters. We still have the general powers under the Inquiries Act to take action in regard to matters that the crown thinks should thus be dealt with; we have the tariff board, and now to say that under this act you may appoint expensive special commissioners is in my judgment unnecessary. I only mention that to the minister; I do not think it serves any useful purpose except to invite, wherever there is trouble, an application for a special commission, at great expense to the country and without any uniformity of treatment or continuity of policy in connection with the administration of the act itself.

Mr. ROGERS: I wholly agree with the right hon. leader of the opposition that it would be undesirable to depart from the practice of having most investigations conducted by the commissioner. At the same time it is quite possible that a number of applications might come in at the same time, and that it would be desirable to proceed with them at the same time or at any rate without serious delay. There is nothing of a mandatory character in the section, of course; it simply gives us a power which has been given by the other combines acts in previous years. The intention is that investigations will be conducted whenever possible by the commissioner, and that investigations by special commissioners will be made only when the immediate investigation of an important case cannot be conducted by the commissioner owing to pressure of other work. That is to say, the power is here.

Mr. BENNETT: You have the general power under the Inquiries Act, of course.

Section agreed to, on division.

On section 8-Legal counsel.

Mr. CAHAN: I submit, of course, that if the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act is to be administered, provision is made there for a representative of the Department of Justice who may act as counsel in these matters. But I should like to say to the Minister of Justice that I am instructed that in connection with all commissions appointed in England, if counsel are appointed to assist the commission or commissioner, they are under instructions to elicit the facts with impartiality and are absolutely prohibited from using their position as counsel to disseminate political or economic doctrines or their personal opinions. I think the time has come when it will be necessary for the Minister of Justice to prepare a set of instructions of that kind, because at present the opinion is very prevalent throughout this country that the conduct of commission counsel is due to special instructions which they must have received in regard to these matters; otherwise it is inconceivable that they would have acted in the manner in which they have acted.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I may assure my hon. friend that the instructions received by those who act as counsel are to act with the strictest impartiality for the purpose of attaining the end which the governor in council has in mind in ordering the inquiry.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not casting any personal reflections, but that is not the point. I have no doubt that the Minister of Justice believes in counsel acting with strict impartiality in eliciting the facts. The old traditions prohibited even counsel for the prosecution from acting in other than an impartial manner, because he was believed to act, and according to the traditions of the court did act, not as prosecutor for one side but in such a way as to elicit the information necessary for an impartial decision of the court. I had under my hand a whole pamphlet dealing with that phase of the question, but I do not intend to refer to it. The mind of the government should be expressed, I think, in the order in council appointing counsel, to the effect that his duty is to act impartially.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Of course, as the hon member knows, the parties whose actions are being investigated are always very well represented before the commission.

Mr. BENNETT: They cannot be, in some of these investigations.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But I have in mind investigations to which my hon. friend refers. Necessarily the actions of counsel for the commission seemed to be somewhat opposed to those of counsel for the parties investigated. I agree entirely with my hon. friend, however, that their attitude ought to be that of a crown prosecutor trying to bring out the facts, without taking sides against any party to the issue.

Mr. BENNETT: I wholly agree with the minister's view, but I was surprised to learn that during the meetings of one of the committees of the house at this session, counsel appointed by the government actually said "No, we will not do that; it would be favourable to the company." There it is on the record, and it is rather a bad thing. I will be perfectly frank with the minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): A committee of this house?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, sitting in this house. I must say also that I took strong objection to the attitude of leading counsel for the price spreads commission. The attitude taken was not of that impartial character which, in my judgment, counsel assisting a commission should show; and what is more, I told that gentleman so. I asked him to come to my office, and told him that his duty was to assist the commission impartially in getting the facts, and not to treat the witnesses as though they were in a police court; rather he should treat them as witnesses giving evidence before a commission. I think the minister's statement of it should perhaps be embodied in written instructions to be given to counsel who are appointed, because the condition is becoming bad in this country. It reached its zenith the other day—I should like to show it to the minister, and I may have to refer to it in the house—in the committee where counsel said "That would be helpful to the company."

Mr. FACTOR: Does the right hon, gentleman remember action of counsel on the price spreads commission?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I was talking about.

Section agreed to.

On section 9-Temporary assistants.

Mr. BENNETT: One of the greatest abuses is found under the procedure embodied in this section. What happens is that you constitute a commission, and then begin to call in your experts. I wonder if the minister has looked at the bills paid to auditors in connection with this matter? Last year the minister had occasion to direct attention to the amount of money being spent in connection with some of these transactions. One of our difficulties was that the commission had directed, without regard to anything else, that a very expensive audit should be taken with respect to various businesses, and the result was that in the aggregate we spent nearly $100,000—the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Factor) can correct me as to the exact amount; I know it was a very large sum of money. I believe there should be a clear limitation upon that. I have felt that for some time, not now, but while head of the government. I had to direct attention to what I considered to be an abuse of the words "the commissioner may, with the approval of the minister, employ such temporary, technical and special assistance, as may be required to meet the special conditions that may arise in carrying out the provisions of this act."

As the Prime Minister said this morning, this is an investigating statute. It is not intended to have somebody delegate to half a dozen other people the right to pry into every transaction in connection with an organization's affairs. Especially is that so with respect to the financial side of the matter. I do suggest that there should be at least an order in council authorizing the employment of any such assistants. I say that in the light of my own painful experience. I believe there is an abuse of the authority conferred and—I do not make this statement as a reflection upon the government—sometimes these jobs have a habit of lasting a very long time, once begun. I say the government should exercise control, and say "No; we are not going to spend $25,000 for this particular purpose. We are not getting balance sheets ready. What we are investigating is whether or not there is cause for criminal investigation."

For instance, I would direct the minister's attention to the Nash fruit case; from that he will get an idea of what I mean. The investigation took place before the late government took office. He will find the same thing in connection with the price spreads commission, and in connection with one other commission. I have thought, and still think, that the amount of public money expended in this way was out of all proportion to what was necessary. A trial is not involved. The enormous sums of money spent in this way were brought to our attention before we went out of office. I think it would be desirable to have the governor in council exercise control before such expenditures are incurred.

Mr. KINLEY: Does the right hon. gentleman not think that the preliminary inquiry is a great protection for industry, and that in order to have a complete preliminary inquiry there should be complete investigation before publicity is given and before possibly irreparable harm is done?

Mr. BENNETT: But the preliminary investigation takes place after the investigation we are now considering. From a legal standpoint, the preliminary investigation takes place after this one, which is a departmental inquiry as to whether or not there is a prima facie case made out. Then complaint is made, the attorney general takes proceedings, there is a prolonged investigation, and the matter is sent on for trial.

Mr. KINLEY: It all contributes to the decision as to whether or not the minister and commissioner will hold a public inquiry?

Mr. BENNETT: It may be part public and part private, or both.

Mr. KINLEY: But the committee can see that premature public inquiry into a business may do harm. A special commissioner looks into the matter first; the preliminary inquiry comes next, and the minister and the commissioner may decide that it is not necessary to have a public inquiry. I believe in order to have a complete preliminary inquiry it is necessary beforehand to have all possible evidence.

Mr. BENNETT: That part of it has been settled. The question now is as to whether or not the commissioner shall employ costly help, with or without the consent of the governor in council.

Mr. KINLEY: The word "costly" is assumed; it is not used in the section.

Mr. BENNETT: I use that word in the light of experience. I do not like to move amendments, because they are not received with great favour, but I do suggest that the section should read: "with the approval of the governor in council" instead of "with the approval of the minister." I make that suggestion out of my own experience.

Mr. ROGERS: I am agreeable to that suggestion. I believe section 11 does bear on the same point, but applies only to remuneration.

Mr. ESLING: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me there should be a more direct way of bringing these matters to the attention of the department. Reference has been made to radios. This is one case where it does not need any stretch of the imagination to know that a monopoly exists. No one can manufacture radios in Canada without first obtaining the consent of Radio Patents Limited, which is a holding company controlling every patent which enters into the construction of a radio. I suggest that the Department of Labour and the Department of National Revenue take steps to give the general public more intimate information in connection with the conditions surrounding the control of these patents. The Minister of National Revenue is probably aware that the difference in price in the United States and Canada for exactly the same radio is about 100 per cent. That difference against Canada is caused solely by the control of the patents. It is not as though the manufacturer had to deal with only one patentee; he must deal with this holding company which controls every patent.

I have a complaint from a man who purchased a radio in the United States for $35, which he said would have cost him $80 in Canada. He brought it back under the $100 exemption clause, declared it and received a clearance. Shortly after, he was served with a notice that he was infringing certain patent rights by reason of the fact that he had brought the radio in from the United States, and he was called upon to pay a royalty. It is such incidents as this that cause discontent. I think the government would go far towards relieving this discontent if they made a clear statement, say in the Labour Gazette or the National Revenue Review, explaining the conditions imposed by this holding company. I think the government should go further and take steps to remedy a situation which permits a monopolistic control over all these patents.

I suggest that more direct action could be obtained in connection with certain matters by the Department of Labour, under which the combines act is administered, if these special commissioners were directed to investigate. Take gasoline, for instance. We have had dominion royal commissions and provincial royal commissions, costing thousands of dollars, investigating gasoline prices; but nothing has happened. You can go into any community in the southern part of British Columbia and you will find the wholesale gasoline companies selling at a fixed price, for resale at a fixed price. A commissioner would not need affidavits and so on to find this out. He can go to any service station and he will be told that the wholesale price of wholesale companies is exactly the same, and that the service stations are required to sell at a common price. If they do not sell at that price they are penalized. Surely such a practice is a violation of the intention of the combines act.

Why should the price of gasoline in the interior of British Columbia be more than the price in Vancouver plus the freight? The same provincial taxes are paid, and there is the same spread between tank car and station. The price of gasoline is exactly the same at all service stations in any one community in the interior, and the wholesale price is exactly the same. The selling price to the public should be the same as the price on the coast, plus the freight.

There are other matters which enter into the determination of whether or not there is a combine. Sometimes the financial position of the man who is complaining enters into the question. The minister will recall that a few years go there was an inquiry into the Famous Players company, instigated by a competitor who was unable to secure films. Mr. Peter White was the royal commissioner, and he found that the charges were well founded. The matter went to the grand jury, which returned a true bill. The provincial government of British Columbia did not bring a separate action. The joint action brought by Ontario and British Columbia was fought by a battery of able lawyers acting for Famous Players, and they were able to show that the indictment was faulty.

The fact is this man wanted to get films. He and his solicitor went to every film agency [Mr. Esling.]

in Vancouver, but they were unable to secure any films. Mr. Peter White, the royal commissioner, was satisfied that this was the case. When conditions such as these are brought to the attention of the commissioner of combines, why should it be necessary to go through a lot of red tape in obtaining the affidavits of half a dozen people? Surely a commissioner who possessed any ability or common sense could visit a community and ascertain that certain facts were so. He could then make his report to the department, and any prosecution could proceed from that point. I think if such steps were taken it would go far toward restoring the confidence of the people, not only in the present but in future administrations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister has accepted the suggestion of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and I would move for him that section 9 be amended by substituting the words "governor in council" for the word "minister" in line 21.

Amendment agreed to. Section as amended agreed to.

On section 10-Duties of assistants.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that all the words after "commissioner" in line 30 to the end of the section should be struck out, the reason being that it is very unusual, and certainly against precedent, to have a commissioner delegate his powers to any employee or person who may be engaged for special purposes. If we end at the word "commissioner" we say that:

Any technical or special assistant or other qualified person employed under this act shall, when so authorized and deputed by the commissioner, inquire into any matter within the scope of this act as may be directed by the commissioner.

Surely we cannot have auditors going out and exercising punitive powers and the like. The old rule was, delegatus non potest delegare; this is a delegated power, and I think the Minister of Justice will admit that it is highly improper that somebody else should exercise those powers.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be glad to accept that suggestion and to have the words struck out. I will ask my colleague the Minister of Justice if he will make the amendment proper in the circumstance.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I move: That all the words after the word "commissioner" in line 30 be deleted.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 11-Remuneration and expenses.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East) moved:

That subsection 2 of section 11 be amended by adding after the word "expenses" in the first line of the subsection the following words "of the commissioner and."

Mr. BENNETT: I think that makes it wrong.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The remuneration of the commissioner is provided for under section 5.

Mr. BENNETT: This dealt only with the special commissioner.

Mr. ROGERS: Section 5 simply states that:

The commissioner shall be paid such salary as may be from time to time fixed and allowed by the governor in council.

Amendment agreed to. Section as amended agreed to.

Section 12 agreed to.

On section 13-Offices and equipment.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am sorry, but I no not like this clause at all. It looks as though some one were trying to build up a great organization as a special branch of the Department of Labour. I see no possible reason or argument why the commissioner should have offices anywhere else than in Ottawa. If he has in hand an investigation which requires some place in Winnipeg to carry it on, perhaps a room in some building, it surely would be proper for him to engage it and be reimbursed as part of his expenses. But to suggest that there shall be officesinnumerable, if the commissioner so wishesall over Canada, is extraordinary, and I submit that there is no necessity for this clause. We have had too many examples in governmental administration of officers building up an organization for the purpose of increasing their own importance and spending money unnecessarily. All that a commissioner could ever need when away from Ottawa would be a room, which could be paid for as part of his ordinary expenses. But to set up regular offices-

Mr. BENNETT: Stationery and equipment.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yes, there is no necessity for it whatever. The offices should be in Ottawa. All the business could be carried on here excepting when, in the case of some particular investigation, the commissioner went to another city.

Mr. ROGERS: This particular section as it appears in the present bill is not new. 31111-154\frac{1}{4}

Mr. BENNETT: We took it out, deliberately, in 1935.

Mr. ROGERS: It appeared first in the Board of Commerce Act, and was continued in the Combines Act of 1923 and in the revision of 1927. I understand that this section with a number of other sections of an administrative character was omitted from the act of 1935, because the Combines Act was placed under the direct administration of the tariff board. I am informed that actually it has seldom been invoked in the past, and when offices have been opened elsewhere they have been opened temporarily, for the matter of a few weeks. I can assure the house that there is no intention to set up anything in the nature of a permanent organization outside Ottawa. It is quite obvious that there would be no purpose served by doing that. The section is here rather to authorize the setting up of an office which might be needed during a prolonged investigation at a distant

Mr. BENNETT: You will observe that the word is "establish."

Mr. CAHAN: A temporary office would be a part of the commissioner's expense.

Mr. BENNETT: It would be part of his job.

Mr. ROGERS: He may:

. . . establish at any place or places in Canada such office or offices as are required for the discharge of the duties of the commissioner and of any special commissioner under this act, and may provide therefor the necessary accommodation, stationery and equipment.

I do not think there is anything in that which suggests of necessity the setting up of a permanent office. Certainly nothing is further from my own mind.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The minister's statement confirms me in my opinion. If temporary quarters are required at any place in Canada for the purpose of carrying on an investigation by the commissioner, they can be rented by him and the cost put into his ordinary expenses. There is nothing to prevent that from being done; it is a common practice in business. But this section definitely contemplates permanent offices in other places than Ottawa.

Mr. ROGERS: Would it meet the situation if the word "temporary" were inserted before "such office or offices"?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is there not sufficient authority in the bill for the commissioner to rent quarters in Winnipeg or elsewhere temporarily for the purpose of carrying on an investigation and to include the cost in his ordinary expenses? Mr. ROGERS: I suggest that it stand until we see whether there is another section of the act which will cover expenses of that character. Obviously that is the only point at issue.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Would the minister consider whether the rental of space in Winnipeg or elsewhere to carry on one of these investigations is not evidently a proper expense, just as much so as the commissioner's railway fare for getting there, or his meals while he is there?

Section stands.

On section 14-Application for investigation.

Mr. THORSON: I have one suggestion to make. In section 11 of the existing act the terms "attorney, solicitor or counsel" are used. In the amending bill the term used is "other person." I wonder whether it might not be better to use the terms "attorney, solicitor or counsel or other person," to ensure that notice might be sent to any attorney, solicitor, or counsel or to any other person who did not answer to any of these descriptions.

Mr. BENNETT: An attorney is a person. Perhaps you will recall, Mr. Chairman, the story that O'Connell told of a case that was not so good. The judge directed that the court should be cleared, and the crier called out "All ye blackguards that are not lawyers leave the court." Attorneys will come under the term "other person."

Mr. ROGERS: In view of what has been said, I do not think it is necessary to add other words. The words "other person" would seem to be broad enough to include an attorney. There is no desire to exclude any attorney, nor is there any reason why he should be excluded because of the present wording.

Mr. BENNETT: At the end of the old section there appeared after the word "public" the words "whether consumers, producers or others." I am curious to know why they are omitted from the present section.

Mr. ROGERS: The intention here is to relate this to the earlier definition of the type of activity which is regarded as constituting the offence; that is, the offence against the interest of the public.

Mr. BENNETT: But the minister will see, if he will look at line 31 of section 2, these very words "whether consumers, producers or others." Why was it not thought desirable to reproduce them in section 14 so as to maintain consistency? The offence must be shown to be against the interest of the whole public, and if you add the words I have quoted you will preserve that consistency as between section 2, the interpretation clause, and the section now before us.

Mr. ROGERS: That might very well be done. I would ask the Minister of Justice to move an amendment to that effect.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I move that after the word "public" at the end of section 14 there be added the words "whether consumers, producers or others."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 15—Preliminary inquiry.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Does the minister consider this clause really necessary? I am not a lawyer, but this section seems to me to give power to the commissioner to make investigations into charges with respect to combines. Would he not properly make some preliminary inquiry into any allegation before proceeding with an investigation?

Mr. ROGERS: The commissioner acts under the direction of the minister, and in the past it has been found that there is much to be said for a preliminary inquiry. It will be understood that sometimes vexatious applications are made, and it appears desirable that there should be a preliminary inquiry of this sort to determine whether or not there is sufficient evidence to justify a further investigation.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I see that; it is quite evident. But would he not have power in any case to make some investigation before he started the inquiry?

Mr. BENNETT: Before the minister answers that question I would ask him to look carefully at the language of the section: (a) the commissioner "shall on application made under the last preceding section" or (b) "on direction by the minister." I doubt the wisdom of that; I say so with all deference. I am not speaking in any personal sense but I doubt whether it should be for the minister, without anybody making an affidavit or a declaration, to say: Go ahead and hold a preliminary investigation regarding these people. And (c) "or may whenever he has reasonable cause to believe that a combine may exist." That refers to the commissioner. Surely that is not quite the proper way to put the investigating powers of this statute into operation. What we start with is the presumption that the public interest is affected. Six citizens have directed attention to a condition and given reasons for their belief that a combine exists, and then the commissioner acts. Now we are adding a section which declares that when he does get that complaint he may make a preliminary investigation, and with that, as the member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) has said, we are wholly in accord. But we add two other things. We say that the commissioner himself, of his own motion, may act, which is putting into the hands of one man a power that is certainly not consistent with our general conception of judicial fairness.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But the commission could do it under the existing act.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; but what I say is that now we are dealing with the act in the light of present day conditions and we should deal with it as of 1937. I say that it is not consistent with our general conception of judicial fairness that we should put that power into the hands of one man.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is now only two years since 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but look what has happened; you are there and I am here.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is something in that.

Mr. BENNETT: And according to the Minister of Labour a great public good has accrued. Be that as it may, I do not think it is sound to place in the hands of one man, whether he be a minister or anyone else, the power of his own mere motion, because he thinks that a certain condition exists, to start the machinery of investigation. I believe that the general principle that six citizens should make complaint is a sound basis on which to put the machinery into operation. I must say that I protest strongly against this method, despite the fact that it may have been adopted a year or two ago. I did not have leisure then to examine statutes as I have now, and I daresay the minister's experience will bear that out.

Mr. STEWART: The previous section concerned a commission of more than one person, three or five, or whatever the number of members of the tariff board may be. It is altogether different to say that one person shall move in the matter. There is a great deal of difference between the action of one person and the collective action of three or five.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister look at the difference in language between the old section and the one now before us. The old section provided that the commission should act "whenever it has reason to believe that a combine exists"; this section merely says "has reasonable cause to believe that a combine may exist." There is a distinct difference there. One was a commission of three, presided over by an ex-judge, and the other is one man without legal training, who will arrogate to himself the right to say that in his opinion there is a combine and then start the machinery of the law. He might do it for any reason in the world except the public interest; he might be annoyed about something.

Mr. CAHAN: He can act without the minister's knowledge or approval.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, just because he had a bad night.

Mr. ROGERS: In the past these preliminary inquiries have been initiated in the manner indicated; that is to say, prior to the setting up of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission the minister did have power to initiate a preliminary investigation. I do think there is something to be said for the retention of that power of initiation on the part of the minister. It may not be possible at all times to find six persons who are willing to make the application. It is possible that evidence may come to the minister which convinces him that a situation does exist which calls for preliminary inquiry. In that case he must take the responsibility for instituting the inquiry.

Mr. BENNETT: That is governmental responsibility, which I fully understand.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What about the next part:

or may whenever he has reasonable cause to believe that a combine may exist.

Mr. ROGERS: That has been a power exercised prior to 1935 by the registrar under the combines act, and not a few preliminary inquiries were carried out in that way. I might read section 12 in the act of 1923:

Whenever such application shall be made to the registrar, or whenever the registrar shall have reason to believe that a combine exists or is being formed, or whenever so directed by the minister, the registrar shall cause an inquiry to be made into all such matters, whether of fact or of law, with respect to the said alleged combine as he shall consider necessary to inquire into with the view of determining whether a combine exists or is being formed.

I think, as a matter of fact, that the use made of the machinery for preliminary inquiry has been very salutary. That is, it has in some cases avoided further inquiries which would not have disclosed that a combine actually existed. Probably the registrar, or in this case the commissioner, who is in constant touch with the act and its administration, would be better able to determine the wisdom of carrying out a preliminary inquiry than anyone else. If it is done under the direction of the minister, then obviously the minister must take full responsibility.

Mr. MacLENNAN: I am more apprehensive of the power placed in the hands of six persons under section 14. Possibly six competitors of some business firm may make application; then, by section 15, this preliminary inquiry must be instituted. The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr Kinley) said that there ought to be a good deal of circumspection in regard to starting an inquiry into anyone's business. Suppose nothing detrimental to the public was found, the very fact of an inquiry being started does not look well for a firm or corporation. I prefer that the minister or someone responsible to the people should start an investigation rather than some six men who possibly are not responsible.

Mr KINLEY: I think the preliminary investigation is for the protection of industry, and there should be no publicity connected with it. If six persons make an application, the minister will have a preliminary inquiry. No one is hurt much by a preliminary inquiry, but he is hurt by a public inquiry, because business is based upon confidence and credit, and there is always a certain stigma about a public inquiry. I think the preliminary inquiry is for the protection of industry more than anything else, so that trivial and vindictive reports may be thrown out—

Mr. ROGERS: No preliminary inquiry has ever been held in public. I think that does bear on the point raised by the hon, member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacLennan). I think there is something to be said for making it possible for a preliminary inquiry to be instituted by a commissioner. It is conceivable that you might have a minister who was not sympathetic to the administration of the act, and if his direction were required he might prevent preliminary inquiries which obviously were desirable.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is the whole basis of responsible government. Surely the minister with his wide knowledge of constitutional government would not put that up. The minister, whoever he is, would have to take the responsibility for it before parliament and the people.

Mr. ROGERS: Many commissions operate without going to the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: I suggest that the minister consider seriously striking out all the words between "minister" in line 37 and "cause" in line 39—"or may whenever he has [Mr. Rogers.]

reasonable cause to believe that a combine may exist"-for this reason: all he has to do is to speak to his minister, and as the minister directs, that is the end. The responsibility becomes the responsibility of the government and is thus a public matter. That is the proper course. The question of ministerial responsibility is the basis; the government takes the responsibility. The commissioner should not be a law to himself. This bureaucracy should not be set up; the matter should be under the control of the minister. The commissioner comes to the minister and says: I believe a combine may exist here. The minister asks: What is your evidence?-Well, I will not consider that at all. And that ends

Mr. ROGERS: The trade and industry commission had just that power.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a commission of three people presided over by a judge.

Mr. ROGERS: But I take it the constitutional point is not affected by the difference between one commissioner and three.

Mr. BENNETT: No, but the difference is that in the one case it is: "there is reason to believe," in the other it actually may exist. You have a commissioner appointed who holds office and is not responsible to anybody, and he says: I exercise my best judgment. He goes to his minister, or writes him a letter or telephones him, and makes a memorandum of it afterwards, and he says: I have reason to believe a combine exists here. Then the minister says: I direct a preliminary inquiry. But this is widely different. To give the commissioner power to do it of his own volition is a negation of our whole theory of responsible government. It is an arbitrary exercise of power arrogated to one man who is not responsible to anybody. I think that is wrong, and if the minister will just give it a moment's thought I am sure he will say it is wrong.

Mr. KINLEY: Under this section the minister has nothing to do with the preliminary inquiry if six people make an application.

Mr. ROGERS: That is true.

Mr. KINLEY: But if an investigation is to be started by the department I think the minister, who is responsible to the people, should take the responsibility for commencing that inquiry, and the commissioner should not be able to start inquiries of his own volition.

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Chairman, I quite see the weight of the argument in support of the contention made by the right hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg. I do think, however, that if it would be a breach of constitutional responsibility to allow this in the case of one commissioner, it would be equally so if the commission consisted of three members. I really cannot see the material distinction there. You might have three members of the trade and industry commission just as much under a temptation as a single commissioner to carry out inquiries which ought not to be instituted. I take it the leader of the opposition would also accept that view of it.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not say for a moment that the fact that any such provision is there made it right in the one case any more than it is now; but here we are dealing with a single commissioner. I simply say that it is a negation of ministerial responsibility to create a situation such as this, which I think the minister would be the first to condemn. From what I know of the two hon, gentlemen who sit to his immediate left there is no doubt about what they have always thought.

Mr. KINLEY: If six people in Canada want an inquiry, the commissioner goes ahead and holds one; the inquiry must go on. But if it is to be a matter of departmental or governmental policy, surely the man to take the sole responsibility for that is the minister, who is responsible to the people. He should say whether or not that inquiry should proceed.

Mr. ROGERS: I will ask my colleague the Minister of Justice to move the amendment suggested.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I move that all the words in line 38 of section 15, and the words "a combine may exist" in line 39 be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 16 agreed to.

On section 17-Investigations.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a very real difficulty in connection with this section. Under section 16 the minister may review the decision of the commissioner before anything is done. Under section 17 it will be seen that if it is decided that further investigation is justified the commissioner, not the minister shall cause an investigation to be made. First the commissioner must hold the preliminary inquiry, and this again leaves it to him without any control by anybody. I suggest that the words "with the approval of the minister" should be inserted, which would cause this section to read:

If after a preliminary inquiry the commissioner decides that further investigation is justified, with the approval of the minister he shall cause an investigation to be made—

I think that is the basis of this whole act, judging from what has been said from time to time. I should like the minister to consider it from that angle.

Mr. KINLEY: The point is that the commissioner must get the consent of the minister to stop, but he can go ahead on his own responsibility.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so. Before the minister deals with that, may I point out to him what I consider to be one of the most difficult features of this bill. This section provides that the commissioner shall make inquiries concerning all such matters, whether of fact or of law, and so on. There have been real difficulties in this connection. What capacity has the commissioner to deal with questions of law? I think what the Prime Minister said this morning is the essence of it; an investigation is an inquiry into the facts, and when we say that the commissioner is going to investigate all such matters, whether of fact or of law, at least we should have someone who is qualified to do so. From what was said this morning by the Prime Minister I gathered that in his judgment this was essentially an investigation of facts, and that was my judgment always. When you talk about a commissioner untrained in law investigating questions of law, I wonder if you are not going just a bit far. It is bad enough, as the Minister of Transport would say, to have these high-powered lawyers investigating these matters, but when we have someone without any legal experience charged with the responsibility of investigating matters whether of fact or of law, where do we land?

Mr. KINLEY: Does not the minister take responsibility under subsection (2) of section 16 in any case? That subsection reads:

On written request of the applicants or on his own motion, the minister may review the decision of the commissioner under this section, and the decision of the minister shall be final and conclusive and shall not be subject to appeal or review.

Mr. BENNETT: The power to stop is in the hands of the minister, but the power to start is solely in the hands of the commissioner, after a preliminary inquiry. Perhaps it would be well if the minister would look into that section also.

Mr. ROGERS: Quite so. Perhaps this section might stand.

Section stands.

On section 18—Requirement of written returns.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. BENNETT: I wonder if the hon. gentleman who sang out "Carried" so loudly has looked at this section. He is a man of business, and I wish he would just look at it.

Mr. ROGERS: There is no change in the principle.

Mr. BENNETT: The last part is the essence of it, with respect to contracts or agreements. I have heard complaints made about the character of the information required not being of any value. I speak now from the standpoint of experience. The last part certainly is essential.

—a full disclosure of all contracts or agreements which the person named in the notice may have at any time entered into with any other person, touching or concerning the business of the said person named in the notice.

That is clear. The very essence of a combine, as defined by section 2, there becomes the issue. But look at the rest of it. It is a very arbitrary power to hand to one man. Consider what the consequence may be.

Mr. ROGERS: But is this not relevant to the point? Quite true that when you are dealing with a combine or combination as outlined in the earlier definition, there would presumably be evidence of contracts and agreements; but if you are dealing with a monopoly, trust or merger, that would not necessarily be the case. Surely in order to prove activities against the interests of the public it might be necessary to have access to documents other than agreements and contracts concerning the particular business in question.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 18 carry?

Mr. BENNETT: No; but I am not going to waste more time about it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Carried on division.

Section agreed to, on division.

On section 19—Investigation after requiring written returns.

Mr. STEWART: This is a new section.

Mr. ROGERS: This, and section 20.

Mr. BENNETT: Part of it is new, and part of it is a combination. If the Minister of Justice will look at section 19 he will see how contrary to some of the general views of jurisprudence it runs. A commissioner is to do all this. He is now investigating a question of fact and law and he says: If after receipt of these returns made in compliance with the act I consider the circumstances so justify I may do so and so. What does that mean? If he considers circumstances so justify, he may enter and pick up my books. He may do that, after he gets the return. If no return is made,— —within a time set in the notice requiring such return or within such further time as the commissioner may upon application allow, the commissioner may investigate the business, or any part thereof, of the person making or failing to make such return, and may enter and examine the premises, books, documents and records of or in the possession or control of such person.

That puts a direct premium on not making a return. If he makes a return they take his books; if he does not make a return, they take his books. Therefore it would be better not to do it. That would be the obvious conclusion with respect to that section. That did happen, as a matter of fact.

Mr. ROGERS: This would appear to be a question of policy in connection with the administration of the act. Section 19 provides for the investigation of the business and the records of persons who have been required to give information. I might say that this section is to the same effect as section 15 of the former act. It was repealed by the amendment of 1935. In the present instance the word "commissioner" is used instead of the words "registrar" and "registrar or the minister".

Mr. BENNETT: I have given some reasons why it was repealed in 1935. I do ask the minister and members of the committee to look at the true significance of the section. It enables a man, one person, without reference to a minister or to a court to take possession of books of any person who has not made a return which he thinks is satisfactory. He arrogates to himself this right, and may say: "This is not satisfactory; I will take the books and he may go and take them.

Mr. KINLEY: He has to find them first. I have heard of them being lost.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but I am leaving that out for the moment. The Minister of Justice will surely admit that this is an extraordinary power. In my observations I have known of no such power being placed in the hands of a layman clothed with a little brief authority, and without regard to anything except his own judgment, his own discretion and his own state of mind. He may say: I am not satisfied. Is that fair?

Mr. ROGERS: There is his oath of office and his sense of public duty.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. As it stands, section 19 was not included in the 1935 act for the reasons I have given. I cannot stand in my place as a member of the house and place in the hands of one man, without reference to his minister or reference to anybody, the power to say: I am not satisfied with what these people have given me, and I am now going in to clean out their books—with all the publicity incident thereto. That was done in this country. The mounted police did go and take books, because the commissioner was not satisfied.

I must say I think the minister would be well advised to reconsider any such power as that being granted in this twentieth century to any person who, for the moment, is clothed with the position of commissioner.

Mr. ROGERS: In order to disclose the existence of a combine under the act, obviously it may be of the utmost importance to have access speedily to all documents in possession of the person or persons whose activities are being investigated. We will assume that the minister initiates the investigation; he takes the responsibility for that.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. ROGERS: I take it that all that is contemplated here is pursuant to the investigation, and in order to determine whether or not evidence exists upon which a full inquiry may take place. Is it out of the way that a commissioner who is under instructions to carry out a preliminary inquiry of that kind should not have these full powers in order to obtain access to documents, so that he may determine whether or not there is sufficient case for further inquiry?

Mr. BENNETT: The minister has asked a fair question, but he has overlooked the section with which he is dealing.

Mr. ROGERS: Section 19.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it states that if, after the receipt by the commissioner of a return made in pursuance of his power as a result of a request made by him to the party,— the commissioner shall consider that circumstances so justify, or if after a return under this act has been required none is made, or none is made within a time set in the notice requiring such return or within such further time——he may do so and so. He may go in and take possession of the books, documents and records in possession and control of such person, and may examine them. Now, mark you: What founds his authority? His mere state of mind. In other words, just because I say: I am going to do it; circumstances justify it.

What are the circumstances? If you go so far as to say that he may do so with the consent of the minister, and let the minister exercise his authority, then we have ministerial responsibility. But if you say that this man, who may possibly have ill feeling towards someone or may be dissatisfied with someone may say: Well, the circumstances justify it; I am going to walk in and take possession—you have a different position. He may walk in and take possession of the books. I do not think that is the twentieth century way of doing it.

Mr. ROGERS: May I suggest that this section stand for further consideration?

Section stands.

On section 20—Investigation into business of alleged parties to combine.

Mr. BENNETT: I mentioned to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) this afternoon what is involved in this section. This is a delegation of power to somebody to enter and examine the premises, books, documents and so on of any person who the commissioner believes may be a party or privy to or have assisted in the formation or operation of a combine. The section reads:

The commissioner shall have authority to investigate the business, or any part thereof, of any person who the commissioner believes may be a party or privy to or have assisted in the formation or operation of a combine, and he or his duly authorized representative may enter and examine the premises, books, documents and records of or in the possession or control of such person, and make copies of or retain any of such books, documents or records which the commissioner or his duly authorized representative believes may contain information relating to an offence against this act.

There is no gainsaying the general rule that a man is not bound to go into a witness box and incriminate himself; but now we are giving the commissioner authority to take his books and make copies therefrom. The reason given for this is that the circumstances are not satisfactory; and all the time you have in mind the desire to prosecute him for an offence made criminal by the statute. I think the minister will agree that that is going too far. It is going even farther than we regarded as sound when we were a bit hysterical at times

Mr. ROGERS: I can appreciate the difficulty created for the leader of the opposition by the wording of this section, but it seems to me that possibly he is exaggerating the likelihood of a commissioner carrying on an investigation of this kind in a vexatious manner.

Mr. BENNETT: It has been done.

Mr. ROGERS: We must also guard against going too far in the other direction and frustrating the purposes of the act: and I am a little fearful that if we should take the action suggested, we might bring about that effect. A commissioner would be acting in a quasi judicial capacity. In connection with many inquiries of this kind we have had to confer very wide powers upon those who conducted the investigation. We must not underestimate the organized ingenuity of those who set up combines, monopolies, and mergers for the purposes indicated. I think we must recognize that unless wide powers of this kind are made available, it may lie within the power of those who have got control against the public interest in the manner contemplated by this bill, to escape entirely the consequences. I do not wish to take an unreasonable view of this. Other sections have been allowed to stand for further consideration, but I should like to guard against weakening the bill.

Mr. KINLEY: The purpose of this bill is to protect the public interest, but sometimes it is hard to designate just what is the public interest. Many times the public interest is a divided interest as between different elements in the community. What I might think was eminently in the public interest, some one else might think was not. The whole thing is left in a fog of uncertainty. The minister said this morning that when you saw a red light, you stopped. But a red light is a definite thing; you know what it is. Who is going to determine beforehand what is the public interest? I realize that this is only an investigating act; but we must not forget that what might be considered at one time to be in the public interest might not be so considered at another time. It might be regarded as hard sometimes for a business concern to decide just what is not in the public interest.

Mr. ROGERS: In the last resort it would be for the commissioners who undertake the investigations, and more definitely for the courts which will give judgments when informations have been laid, to decide what is in the public interest. A series of decisions have been created which indicate the kind of business practices which are against public interest. I do not say that that body of law is rigid and unyielding, I agree with my hon. friend when he says that it may be subject to change under certain conditions. There may be a change in our own sense of public obligation as it affects business. Perhaps it would not be too far-fetched an analogy to suggest that under a bill such as this there might be developed a body of business equity which would be considered as rules in the governing of business, particularly with regard to those organizations which, because of the tremendous power they have acquired, are affected to a great degree by their obligations to the public. I do not think it would be possible to indicate in advance precisely what would be against the public interest, except possibly in the extreme cases of price control, wage exploitation or other matters of that kind.

Mr. KINLEY: To cite a specific case, suppose the fish companies on the Atlantic coast decided that a higher price should be paid to the fishermen for the fish they delivered. Some one in Canada might say that that was not in the public interest. Coming from the district I do, I would say that anything that would raise the price of this commodity would be in the public interest of my constituents. We have only to listen to the discussions in this house to see where the public interest lies. "Where a man's treasure is, there will his heart be also." Anyone who can define public interest with certainty is doing something which business men find it very difficult to do. There is an added difficulty in the fact that if ultimately an act is found not to be in the public interest, very drastic penalties are incurred; so it is well to know beforehand.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the minister has not followed me with respect to section 20. The section is divided into two parts. The first part authorizes the commissioner to carry on the investigation of a business, and the second part enables the commissioner or his duly authorized representative to enter and examine the premises, books, documents and records. I once saw an effort made to take books from a solicitor's office.

Section stands.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I be given the permission of the house to make this motion, which relates to business near the close of the session:

That, for the remainder of the session, all private bills from the Senate, when received from that house, be read a first and second time, and referred forthwith, and that standing order 105 respecting the posting of bills be suspended in reference thereto.

Mr. BENNETT: The effect of that is to send them to the committee at once?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have one other motion: I move:

That, on Tuesdays and Fridays for the balance of the present session, unopposed private and public bills shall have precedence during the hour devoted to private and public bills.

That is merely to prevent one bill blocking all the others.

Motion agreed to.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

ARRANGEMENT WITH CORPORATION RESPECTING LINES AND SERVICES FOR TRANSPORT OF
PASSENGERS, GOODS AND MAILS

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 31, consideration in committee of Bill No. 74, to establish a corporation to be known as Trans-Canada Air Lines—Mr. Howe—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1-Short title.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain the present condition of the Trans-Canada airway, giving some idea of the different types of airports and landing fields, and of the services that are to be supplied; also, and more particularly, some idea of when he expects the air line to be in operation and the time required for flying across Canada?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): At present we have airports at intervals of forty or fifty miles from Vancouver to Halifax. These fields are in various stages of completion. From Winnipeg to Vancouver they are practically completed, having a minimum landing strip of 3,500 feet. Most of the fields have two way, and some three way, strips. Farther east the landing fields between Montreal and Winnipeg are now completed sufficiently for smaller craft. Some additional work must be done on these fields this summer, but I believe that by autumn the fields in that area will have been completed. From Montreal to Halifax many of the fields are under contract, but I am not sure when they will be sufficiently completed to permit the landing of larger aircraft. I do not know whether it will be this fall, but certainly we shall have these fields in operation early next year.

The beacon equipment, that is the radio beam equipment, has been purchased for the line from Winnipeg to Vancouver and is in different stages of erection. Equipment has also been ordered for the stretch between Winnipeg and Montreal. As regards the weather service, we have a skeleton crew trained and ready to establish the service on that route on very short notice. We have trained key men, and it is only a matter of expanding the service to take care of the various points that need to be covered. We intend to install teletype between fields so that the weather service can be carried on from any observation station, and the condition of the weather telephoned to the aeroplane wherever it may be.

We have laid the foundation for a firstclass service which will be put into operation just as soon as the corporation can be set up and the necessary flying equipment delivered.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister tell us approximately when it will be started, which parts of the route are to be flown first, and also the times from Montreal to Vancouver and from Montreal to Halifax?

Mr. HOWE: It is difficult to state a definite date because that is entirely dependent upon the delivery of the necessary flying equipment. The demand for aeroplanes for military purposes is taxing all manufacturers to capacity so I cannot be very definite about the date. Possibly September, I should think.

Mr. MacNICOL: What about Ontario?

Mr. HOWE: I believe the scheduled time from Montreal to Vancouver is sixteen hours; passengers leaving Montreal at eight in the evening will get into Vancouver at noon the next day. I have not seen the schedule from Montreal to Halifax, but I presume the time will be about five hours.

Mr. CHURCH: I cannot refrain from making a few remarks about this particular corporation to be known as Trans-Canada Air Lines, in view of the bitter experience which this country has had with the Canadian National Railways in every department of its service-railways, ocean service and hotels. The Canadian National system is composed of some thirty or forty different entities, and there has never been public ownership of railways in Canada. The national system is the embodiment of all the mistakes of private ownership. As soon as we have got rid of those mistakes, all those combinations in restraint of trade, the government launches a new system, and Canada will live to regret the day it ever set up a corporation like Public ownership under the present minister has not a chance, whether on land, on sea, or in the air. The Canadian National was never a public ownership organization; on the contrary, it is anti-public ownership, for everything has been moved to Montreal.

I have given some study to this bill and I cannot see the use of all the strange language the minister has put into it. The country is going to put up the money but is going to have practically no control over the corporation. I cannot see why the government wants to create a transportation system of this sort, for the Canadian National has not been such a glorious success in transporting people on land or on the ocean, nor has its hotel service been so very successful. Every one can plainly see that the people of Canada are sick and tired of the way in which the road is run under public ownership, and now the government is going in for an air service. Such a service may be all right in England and the United States, but I can tell the minister that he will make the mistake of his life if he puts this service under the control of the national system. It should be completely owned by the public, a thoroughgoing public ownership venture, because the public will have to put up the deficits. Wait until you see the cost next year. Who is the vice-president anyway? Are we going to have a lot of office boys, clerks and students converted from laymen into vice-presidents? Who is the technical expert? Are there going to be in this air service any of the airmen who served in the war? I venture to say that politics will be rampant in the system just as it has been in the Canadian National. I wonder whether any of our great pilots like Bishop and some of our other Canadians will be employed?

This corporation system should not be embarked on; it has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. Take the ocean services, costing $1,500,000; the boats were put on the scrap heap for $50,000 when, with a little vision, they could have been used to carry coal from the maritimes to Ontario. Now the minister is going to launch a system in the air; he is going to build castles in the air, and there will be nothing left of public ownership. They are going to launch this system with its high-sounding name, Trans-Canada Air Lines, and what will happen after that? Parliament divests itself of all control over the money invested; parliament will be told by this high-sounding commission that it has nothing to do with it at all.

I have been in parliament longer than the minister, and I was surprised the other day when he replied to a polite question that I asked: "1. No information. 2. Answered by No. 1." That will be all the control that we shall have over this air service which he is going to establish, with presidents and vicepresidents, and secretaries, and a whole retinue of people. I venture to say the minister will not go up in the air in it himself. I would not, if they run the air service the way they run the land and hotel services. The people of Canada are sick and tired of this hide-andseek corporation business, this multiplicity of commissions and committees, gambling with the taxpayers' money, and with parliament divested of all control.

What about the rates? Does no one control the rates? We have a railway commission; is it going to have any control? What about damages? If the airships are run the same as the railways, who is going to pay? The country spent hundreds of millions on Canadian National branch lines almost to the sun and the moon and the stars, under the highpowered Sir Henry Thornton in the big-eye days of this country. This Canadian National Railway bought out the Central Vermont, and what was the experience in connection with that bankrupt concern? What happened to the corporation? What became of the rolling stock? Hon. members know from bitter experience something of the history of the thirty or forty corporations composing the Canadian National Railways; what became of them all? Political administration and bankruptcy and all that kind of thing.

Do hon, members think Mr. Hungerford is going to administer these air lines? His work with the railway has not been such a great success, and now are we going to have him control these air lines, and castles in the air?

I have no faith in the present bill. It is too full of metaphysical language which the ordinary layman cannot understand. "Just as they do in England" is the cry. So far as the stock is concerned, the country is going to have a vaster system of speculation. Who wants to take stock in a concern like that, in which the government has 51 per cent, when they should own 100 per cent? It is funny to see how the government shifts its position from day to day, doing everything by fits and starts, and nothing long. They wanted 100 per cent control of the Bank of Canada; and then they got down to a corporation system.

As to the experts, I should like to know whether the air marshal and Colonel Bishop were consulted about this. Did any experts recommend such a set-up? If so, I should like to read their report. If this is public ownership, the quicker we get rid of it the better. Public ownership has never had a chance under hon. gentlemen opposite, and never will have. They set up a committee known as the committee on railways and shipping; if this bill goes through, are the air line estimates to come before the house or before that committee?

We have a radio broadcasting commission, and they will not tell you who the officers are. The minister declined to give that information; but then the Prime Minister came back and the information was forthcoming. That committee on railways and shipping is the biggest whitewash concern on this continent. They sit around a table and call the first item. Then they say: Now let us get on to number two-no information given at all. When the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) was Minister of Railways he told me in the house: You can go to the committee and they will answer your questions. I went there; but could I get any information? No, the officers of the railway declined to give me a copy of the budget. That is all the control parliament has got.

This bill means going in for a vaster system of deficits than ever. The present minister is going to set up a sort of nambypamby commission that will be up in the air, because the railways are up in the air all the time. This will result in increases in income tax and sales tax; and who pays? The industrial provinces, which do not want this kind of thing. Ontario is for public ownership of this system. We have seen the results of private ownership of the railways, and are sick and tired of the way our province has been used. Our assets have been squandered, and we have seen huge votes of money passed, so much so that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) said the other night that all the provinces would have been bankrupt if they had had to pay their guarantees and the cash advances and the other hand-outs and land grants which have been given to this railway.

This corporation would be all right if the country owned it, but it does not. We are told that we have 51 per cent; well, the politicians will own the other 49 per cent, and they will control those who own the 51 per cent, namely, the government of the day.

I am absolutely opposed to this bill. It has no redeeming features at all. I would not want to travel on these airships, and I do not think anyone would who knows the way the railways and the ocean services are run. I am absolutely opposed to this bill, as I believe every public ownership man in this country is. We shall not own anything at all; you will have a commission and a committee of ground officers who will just do as they are told by the government of the day-if they do not, their job will be in jeopardy. The Minister of Transport is not an air man. I do not know whether he has ever been up in the air, except that he was the other day when he replied to me "Answered by number one." In Toronto the city owns the street railway, and if that system is good enough for the municipalities it should be good enough for Canada.

This proposed air line is a private corporation. It is under quasi-government control, and competing against the land services of the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National. When it was proposed in 1923 that the railways should be permitted to issue commutation tickets to give them a chance to compete with motor traffic the administration of the day declined, and the result was that the business went to the motor trucks.

Mr. BARBER: I should like to ask the minister a question in regard to the western area, say from Lethbridge to the coast. Have sufficient test flights been made to convince him that he can maintain a year-round service through to Vancouver, having regard to weather conditions? The minister is no doubt aware that during certain times of the year there are storms in the mountains and fog conditions on the coast, and I was wondering if enough test flights had been carried out to enable the minister to say that a service can be maintained during twelve months of the year. I should also like to remind the minister that I understand consideration has been given to the establishment of an airport at Chilliwack, which is just outside the fog area. Negotiations have not been completed, but I believe he would find an airport there extremely useful. No doubt he will consider that in the near future; at least I hope so.

Mr. HOWE: We have tested that route through the mountains very thoroughly, and we believe we have one of the best of the four transcontinental routes now being used. We are studying the question of an alternative landing field to take care of fog conditions on the coast, and before autumn I think we shall have that problem solved; we have not come to a final decision about it as yet. We expect to be able to fly twelve months in the year.

Mr. BENNETT: What pass are you going through?

Mr. HOWE: The Crowsnest pass.

Mr. GREEN: In order that we may have the whole picture before us in considering the bill, would the minister explain the present position with regard to the trans-Atlantic air service? The other night he said that Canada's share of the capital required, for the present at least, would be $1,250,000. I should like him to tell us just how Canada is interested in the trans-Atlantic air service; when it is expected to be inaugurated; whether or not it will be a year-round service, and what length of time this trans-Atlantic flight is expected to take.

Mr. HOWE: A tentative arrangement has been discussed between Great Britain, Ireland and Canada, which provides that Imperial Airways at their own expense will pioneer the route from Great Britain. After regular services have been established and operated for three months, the proposal is that a company will be formed in which Great Britain will have fifty-one per cent, Ireland and Canada twenty-four and a half per cent each, and that company will take over the service. Imperial Airways have already built the equipment necessary for the route, and initial flights are expected very soon. A reciprocal arrangement has been entered into with the United States under which Pan-American Air Lines have joint rights with Imperial Airways to fly this route. The president of Pan-American Air Lines was in Ottawa some two weeks ago to discuss one or two details in this connection and told me that he fully expected that the service would be carrying passengers and mail by next autumn, which is rather more optimistic than the view of Imperial Airways. However, I think the inauguration of regular services across the Atlantic will come certainly within the next twelve or eighteen months. Those who are expert in flying have no doubt whatever that a regular service for passengers and mail covering twelve months of the year can and will be established across the north Atlantic.

Mr. GREEN: Will Pan-American Air Lines fly via Montreal, or will they go direct from New York to Newfoundland?

Mr. HOWE: The arrangement provides that Montreal is to be the port, with Shediac, New Brunswick, as an alternative port to be tested.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. GREEN: What time is expected to be required for the trans-Atlantic flight?

Mr. HOWE: It is still in the experimental stage, but it will be somewhere around twenty-four to twenty-six hours.

Mr. REID: I wonder if the minister has any information regarding the inauguration of a proposed air mail route from Japan to California with landing fields in British Columbia. An article appeared in the press not long ago stating that Japan was about to inaugurate an air mail service to the United States, using the lower Fraser valley as a stopping-off place. I wonder if the minister has any information on that.

Mr. HOWE: I have no information whatever, except that I saw the same article in the press. No negotiations whatever are pending for the landing of the airplanes of foreign countries on the west coast.

Mr. PURDY: May I ask the minister if he is in a position to make any statement with regard to the proposed extension of the line from Moncton to Sydney? If he has anything discouraging to say I hope he will not answer me.

Mr. HOWE: At the moment we are concentrating on a main line from coast to coast. There are several problems having to do with branches such as the one mentioned by my hon. friend, but the development of those will have to wait until we can get the service established on the main route. After all, that is the most important feature; branch line operation would be of no value in any event until the main service is established.

Mr. GREEN: Are any negotiations under way for a British trans-Pacific air service?

Mr. HOWE: None.

Mr. PELLETIER: Before we embark upon this project, has the minister made any sort of canvass to find out what patronage he can expect for this line. Has he any statistics, or any idea of how many people will be using this service?

Mr. HOWE: A very careful analysis has been made of the air mail revenue which, after all, is the basis of all aviation revenues. It is a regular revenue, and there must be a regular service to meet the conditions of carrying the mails. Our Post Office Department has estimated that by the third year, under present traffic conditions, this line will pay for itself through the carriage of mail alone, without any revenue from passengers or express. As to passenger revenue, I can say that the three air lines now crossing this continent have been unable in the last year to provide sufficient equipment to accommodate those who wish to travel in that manner. It is necessary to book passage some two weeks before you expect to board the plane in order to travel from one coast to the other; so I think we can look forward with confidence to a very considerable travel on our own line.

Mr. PELLETIER: I do not know whether the minister can answer this question, but has he any reason to believe that the cost of air transportation in Canada will at least compare favourably with the cost in the United States?

Mr. HOWE: We are basing our initial plans on the theory that the costs in Canada will be entirely competitive with those in the United States. At the present time the fare in the United States is six cents per mile, and we have every reason to believe that unless that rate is changed, that will be the fare in Canada also.

Mr. CHURCH: Will there be any control over rates? Will the railway commission have jurisdiction over rates and the safety of the public? Will there be any passes in connection with this air line? Will it be like some parts of the Canadian National, over-run with deadheads? Who will have control of it? Will this corporation be subject to the rules and regulations of the railway commission in regard to rates, equipment, safety devices and passes?

Mr. HOWE: The setting up of this corporation has been full of disappointments, and one of them is that we are unable to place it under the jurisdiction of the board of railway commissioners, through an unhappy accident to one of our bills. There will be no free passes; that is not done on airways.

Mr. FAIR: Would the minister inform the committee if it is the intention of the government to establish feeder lines in the various provinces to link up with the trans-Canada air mail service, and if so whether these contracts will be made with private companies; or does the government intend to establish other lines in the same way as the one under discussion at the present time?

Mr. HOWE: This line has to do purely with the trans-Canada service. So far as connections from the north are concerned, I feel sure they will be operated by private services which are occupying that territory to-day. So far as international connections are concerned, I presume that for national reasons we would wish to have those services operated by the Trans-Canada Air Lines. But the main purpose of Trans-Canada Air Lines, is to set up a trans-continental service.

Mr. FAIR: My reason for asking is that a few days ago I had correspondence from the Lloydminster board of trade. Lloydminster is a town situated partly in Saskatchewan and partly in Alberta. Apparently it is quite awake, and has been for the past number of years, to all the possibilities connected with trade and industry. At a recent meeting of the board of trade the following resolution was unanimously adopted and sent, I believe, to the Minister of Transport, the Postmaster General, and to myself:

Whereas it is desirable in order to encourage the training of pilots in Saskatchewan, and Whereas it is still more desirable that these pilots when trained should be able to secure employment; Therefore be it resolved that the board of trade go on record as favouring the granting of contracts for the carrying of air mail on feeder lines to the main route of the transanada air mail service to Saskatchewan companies only in the form of the saskatchewan companies only in the form of the saskatchewan companies only in the form of the saskatchewan companies. panies only, in so far as Saskatchewan mail service is concerned

And be it resolved that copies of this resolution be sent to the Minister of Transport, the Postmaster General at Ottawa, and also to our local member at Ottawa.

I might add that there is the same request from the province of Alberta. I think it only fair, when we train pilots in the provinces, that we should make use of them there instead of bringing in others from outside.

Mr. CHURCH: In the event of an accident on the Trans-Canada Air Lines, as it is crown property and carries insurance, will passengers have the right to sue the corporation without a fiat?

Mr. HOWE: This will not be crown property.

Mr. FAIR: Is it the intention of the government to use pilots trained in the various provinces for the service in those provinces? I am referring to the feeder lines.

Mr. HOWE: This being a Canadian line we will use the best available Canadian pilots we can find.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Interpretation.

Mr. BENNETT: Would you call the paragraphs separately, Mr. Chairman?

Paragraphs (a) to (e) inclusive agreed to.

On paragraph (f)-Gross revenue.

Mr. BENNETT: Should not the term "gross revenue" be defined as the total revenue earned by the corporation from all sources? It is difficult to understand why the definition should be put in its present form.

Mr. HOWE: Trans-Canada lines refers to lines running across Canada, and the mail subsidies set out apply only to those lines. That safeguard is inserted in case other services should be undertaken. It is to make it quite clear that the provision refers only to the trans-Canada air mail services.

Mr. BENNETT: That is why I asked the question. What follows subsequently deals with the "gross revenue" of the enterprise. Later on there is a description of "operating expenses," and it is provided that there will be——an allowance equal to five per centum per annum on the capital invested in the trans-Canada lines, an allowance for depreciation to be determined in accordance with the terms of the trans-Canada contract, premiums for the insurance of passengers, goods and equipment and such other items of operating expense as may properly be allowed in accordance with the terms of the trans-Canada contract aforesaid.

The difficulty I see is that if you use the the terms "gross revenue" and "operating expenses" in the interpretation section dealing with the corporation as a whole, you are going to do violence to company accounting, as distinguished from that section. Surely "gross revenue" means everything the corporation receives from every source, as it does with respect to any other corporation. But in the present instance it is being separated for a particular purpose. What should be said is "gross revenue," for such and such purposes means so and so; for with respect to the enterprise as a whole it would be absurd.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I point out that it is the revenue earned by the corporation from the operation of the trans-Canada lines. That is specific and definite.

Mr. BENNETT: But under the Companies Act that is not the gross revenue, and the provision of the Companies Act would apply. The gross revenue of a corporation is all its resources—all its income from all sources. But for the purposes of this particular measure the minister says: I desire to limit the term "gross revenue" as applied to the trans-Canada lines to such and such a definition, and "operating expenses" in the same way. Now—

Mr. HOWE: May I point out there is a distinction in the measure between Trans-Canada Air Lines, which is the name of the corporation, and trans-Canada Lines. We wish [Mr. Howe.]

only to subsidize or to provide a mail subsidy to trans-Canada Lines. It may be that for reasons peculiar to the situation this corporation may engage in other services. If so, we wish to have nothing in the way of guarantee on that operation.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not as though this matter were complicated or difficult. This is a corporation, and it comes within the terms of the Companies Act. Part III of the Companies Act as applied to the gross revenue of this corporation means its income from all sources. But the minister has said, quite properly, that for certain accounting purposes and for the purposes of our obligation to make good the deficit for two years, he desires to limit the use of the words "gross revenue" and "operating expenses" to a special meaning in connection with trans-Canada Lines, and not more than that. Then, if he is going to do that, his own experience as a business man must tell him at once that the words "gross revenue" for the purposes of section 14 of this measure mean so and so, because you cannot take away from the ordinary meaning of the word "corporation." I do not care what is said about it-"Gross revenue" means all its income, and "operating expenses" means its expenditures. But for the specific purposes of trans-Canada Lines the minister desires to limit it, and he should use appropriate words for that purpose. Otherwise he will have trouble.

Mr. HOWE: For the purposes of this act "gross revenue" has the meaning we give it. Anywhere it occurs in the bill it has the particular meaning in this definition. It may have other meanings in other places, but for the purposes of this bill it means what appears in the definition.

Mr. BENNETT: Part III of the Companies Act applies to this company under section 18.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Wherever the words "gross revenue" are used in this bill they have the meaning as given in the interpretation clause. If my right hon, friend will refer to paragraph (b) he will see that "Corporation" means Trans-Canada Air Lines. "Gross revenue" means the total revenue earned by the corporation, that is by the Trans-Canada Air Lines, from the operation of the Trans-Canada Lines. Where the words "gross revenue" are used in this particular bill they have a specific definition which relates to a particular purpose.

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister will refer to section 3 he will see that certain persons are to comprise a corporation to be known as Trans-Canada Air Lines "Corporation" is interpreted as meaning Trans-Canada Air Lines. Therefore, it means the corporation created by this statute. Surely we cannot get beyond that. "Gross revenue" means the total revenue earned by Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Correct; Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the name of the company. It says "earned by the corporation."

Mr. HOWE: From the operation.

Mr. BENNETT: From the operation of the Trans-Canada Air Lines. Section 14

The governor in council may authorize the minister to enter into a contract with the corporation (to be known as the trans-Canada contract) for the organization, operation and maintenance by the corporation of lines of aircraft (to be known as the trans-Canada lines) for the speedy and efficient transport across Canada and between and within the several provinces of passengers and goods.

That is clear, is it not?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 14 provides for the operation under this contract. Surely all the revenue derived by this corporation through the carrying out of that contract is to be part of its revenue.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, but it is contemplated that this corporation may undertake work outside of the contract.

Mr. BENNETT: They may carry passengers, but the earnings would constitute part of their gross earnings.

Mr. HOWE: They may undertake services outside of the contract.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not going to worry any more about it.

Paragraph (f) agreed to.

Paragraphs (g) and (h) agreed to.

On paragraph (i)—Operating expenses.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the intention of the government to guarantee that this company shall make five per cent on the capital invested?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Paragraph (i) agreed to.

Paragraphs (j), (k), (l), (m) and (n) agreed to.

Sections 3 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

31111-155

On section 6, subsection 1.—Board of Directors.

Mr. BENNETT: This is an extraordinary provision. The directors do not have to be shareholders in the enterprise, neither do they have to have permanent residence in this country. All they have to be is British subjects ordinarily resident in Canada. Having regard to the interpretation by the Department of Justice of what constitutes an ordinary resident of Canada as applied to taxation, we have no assurance of the directors of the company having a fixed residence in this country. Why should we not say that they shall be British subjects resident in Canada for a period of not less than blank years?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There would be no objection to that.

Mr. BENNETT: Otherwise we will have a situation which the hon, member knows occurred in one case.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): This subsection states that the corporation shall be under the management of a board of directors composed of nine persons. Is there any significance to the number of directors? Is there to be a director appointed from each province?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Would the minister explain this subsection?

Mr. HOWE: We expect to appoint as directors men whom we think are best qualified to direct an aviation enterprise.

Mr. HEAPS: Do I understand the minister to say that the investment in the company is to be guaranteed by the government to the extent of five per cent?

Mr. HOWE: The rates for air mail after the initial period will be adjusted to cover the operating expenses and provide a return of five per cent on the capital. I may say that the profits are also limited to very much the same amount. The feeling is that in the long run the cheapest way is to pay the cost of the service, and this bill is designed to that end. There is a very slight margin of profit provided for in case the operation improves from year to year, but the general plan is that to begin with we shall pay the cost of the service.

Mr. HEAPS: Assuming that after three years there is an operating deficit, will the government still pay five per cent on the capital invested?

Mr. HOWE: That is necessarily so, as in the event of there being a loss in the next two years there is no provision that it can be recovered at a later period.

Mr. HEAPS: That means that if after three or four years there is a deficit in the operations of this company, the companies which have invested to the extent of fortynine per cent of the stock will be guaranteed five per cent on the amount they have invested. Either that, or the cost of air mail transportation will be increased to meet the deficit.

Mr. BENNETT: The government does not pay the five per cent. What the government does is to provide that operating expenses shall include five per cent return on the capital investment, and the deficit would be the difference between the operating expenses and the gross revenue.

Subsection 1 agreed to.

On subsection 2—Director British subject resident of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The suggestion of the leader of the opposition would be met, I think, by moving this amendment, which I now do:

To delete all the words after the word "subject" on line 40 and substitute the following, "who has been resident in Canada for not less than five years preceding the passing of this act."

Is that satisfactory?

Mr. BENNETT: Anything is satisfactory that removes the uncertainty about "ordinary residence."

Mr. HOWE: I suggest that twenty years from now that would mean that he must have been resident in Canada for twenty-five years. Should it not be, before the date of his appointment?

Mr. BENNETT: I was not following the details of it.

Mr. HOWE: "Before the date of his election or appointment."

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment is:

To delete all the words after the word "subject" on line 40 and substitute the following, "who has been resident in Canada for not less than five years preceding the date of his election or appointment."

Amendment agreed to.

Subsection as amended agreed to.
[Mr. Heaps.]

On section 6, subsection 3—Election and appointment of directors.

Mr. YOUNG: I was going to ask the minister why the six directors should be elected by the shareholders. Provision is made for at least fifty-one per cent of the stock being owned by the Canadian National Railway. We appoint the directors of that railway—after all, it is government-owned—and I wonder whether it would not be in the best interests of the transport corporation if the directors were named by the government rather than by the shareholders.

Mr. HOWE: We are too prone to say that because we own the Canadian National Railway we operate it. That is not true.

Mr. BENNETT: There are striking evidences of it.

Mr. HOWE: We placed a body of business men in charge of the railway and we expect them to operate it. The Prime Minister is apt to say that the Minister of Transport rups it.

Mr. BENNETT: He should know.

Mr. HOWE: As a matter of fact, if I run it, it gets very little attention.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a good deal of force in what was said by the hon, member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young). It will be remembered that when this bill was drafted it did not provide for fifty-one per cent being owned by the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. HOWE: That was always the intention; the unexpressed intention.

Mr. BENNETT: It is these unexpressed intentions which give rise to the view that the Canadian National Railway is being run by the government. But the expressed intention of the government now is that fifty-one per cent should be owned by the Canadian National Railway. That was not so when the bill was given its second reading. It strikes me that if we are now put in that position, the reverse of that position might not be unsound, and that the six directors should be appointed by the governor in council.

Subsection agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 7—Capital shares. Subsection 1 agreed to.

On subsection 2—Shares offered to C.N.R. and others.

Mr. HOWE: I will ask my colleague to move an amendment to subsection 2.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move:

To strike out from subsection 2 all the words after the word "company" in the third line of the subsection, and add the following proviso to subsection 4: "Provided however that the Canadian National Railway Company shall not sell or dispose of more than 24,900 shares except with the approval of the governor in council."

Mr. BENNETT: I think that if the Minister of Transport and the minister who moved this amendment will give me their attention, they will see that a rather difficult situation is created by this amendment. The capital of $5,000,000 shall be divided into shares of one hundred dollars each—usually the wording is five thousand shares of one thousand dollars each or fifty thousand shares of one hundred dollars each, but that is unimportant. These shares shall be offered for subscription to the Canadian National Railway Company; "at par" I think should be added. I believe that is usual in a case of that kind.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: We come to subsection 3: "when the capital stock of the corporation has been fully subscribed." For our purposes it is fully subscribed at once when it is handed to the Canadian National Railway, because there is a subsequent provision in the bill providing for them finding the five million dollars, and subsection 3 will now have no relevancy in view of the change that is made in the later sections of the bill. That I think is quite apparent.

Then the Canadian National Railway Company is hereby authorized to subscribe for, underwrite, purchase, hold, and, subject to the provisions of this act, sell and dispose of the shares of the capital stock of the corporation, provided that it shall not sell more than 24,900 shares except with the approval of the governor in council. I suggest seriously to the minister that it would be better for him and better for this country, and would prevent any possible misunderstanding if we merely said, "except with the approval of parliament." This is a national enterprise, and it is not fair to the minister or to the government to put them in that position.

Mr. HOWE: I will ask my colleague to move accordingly. As a matter of fact I thought it was that way.

Mr. BENNETT: It seems to me that subsection 3 has no further purpose. Is the minister going to move to add the words "at par"?

 $31111 - 155\frac{1}{2}$

Mr. HOWE: I agree with my right hon. friend that subsection 3 should be omitted, and will ask my colleague when we come to it to move an amendment accordingly.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move to amend section 7 as follows:

To strike out from subsection 2 all the words after the word "company" in the third line of the subsection and to add the following proviso to subsection 4: "provided however that the Canadian National Railway Company shall not sell or dispose of more than 24,900 shares except with the approval of parliament."

The CHAIRMAN: This takes the place of the first amendment?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: And it is intended to add the words "at par" in the underwriting section?

Mr. HOWE: And that the words "at par" be added at the end of subsection 2. I would ask my colleague also to move that subsection 3 be stricken out.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GRAY: Subsection 1 provides that the capital is one hundred dollars par.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but it does not say that the underwriting shall be at par. It is the underwriting that I am providing for.

Mr. GRAY: Surely subsections 1 and 2 must be read together, and subsection 1 provides that the par value is one hundred dollars.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but the idea is that the underwriting shall be at par; that is, there is no discount on the underwriting.

Mr. GRAY: Yes, I see. The only point is, supposing the underwriting is not possible at par. Does the right hon. gentleman say that that must be compulsory?

Mr. BENNETT: It is not only possible, but it is secured by a further clause in the bill that enables the Canadian National to raise the $5,000,000. That is to say, the underwriters are authorized to raise $5,000,000 by guarantee of the government, and that is the reason I suggest that the underwriting be made at par so as to remove any question about the company having the whole $5,000,000 in its treasury when the shares are underwritten and taken over by the railway.

Mr. YOUNG: The object which the leader of the opposition has in mind is a laudable one, that the company should secure the full amount mentioned. But suppose we sell bonds carrying a certain rate of interest; that might have to be variable if we are to get par out of it. I do not see how you can put the shares on the market in the way the right hon. gentleman proposes, because the words "at par" might be embarrassing.

Mr. HOWE: This is a subscription of money; the Canadian National subscribes the money. Where that money is obtained is something else.

Amendment agreed to.

Subsections 2 and 3 as amended agreed to.

Subsection 4 agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 8-Money subscribed for shares at the call of directors,

Mr. BENNETT: The minister's legal advisers will realize, I have no doubt, that this section is misplaced. The section provides:

The directors of the corporation may call for and demand from the shareholders thereof respectively all sums of money by them subscribed . . .

And so on. The directors of the corporation have nothing to do with the calling of shares. They have sold their shares to the underwriters for $5,000,000, and this section, which is copied from the usual clause of this kind, has no place here.

This transaction is a simple one. The Canadian National underwrites the enterprise for $5,000,000 and provides the cash, and after that the matter is between them and the people who have subscribed, subject to certain approval by the minister.

This section has no place in the present set-up; it never has in a set-up of this kind. It is taken from the standard form that applies to companies that are organized and offer shares to the public. We have underwritten our shares and that is the end of it, and we have nothing to do with calling up and buying old, played-out truck from companies. That is something to be done by the directors with the money they receive from the Canadian National, as provided for subsequently in this bill.

Mr. HOWE: It is intended that while the capital shall be fully subscribed up to $5,000,000 it will be called only as needed; that is to say, we expect that for the service contemplated by the bill about $1,750,000 will be required. Later—we have no idea when—a further $1,250,000 will be required to take over Canada's share in the ownership of the transatlantic service. The additional $2,000,000 is reserved for future expansions and may never be called. The shares will be sold on the basis of paid-up value.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; but the minister has overlooked the amendment he put in yesterday, which appears on page 5 of the reprinted bill:

To enable the Canadian National Railway Company to proceed forthwith to purchase the capital stock of the corporation, the governor in council, pending the issue, sale, pledge or other disposition of the aforesaid securities, may authorize advances to be made to the said company from the consolidated revenue fund, such advances to be reimbursed to His Majesty by the said company from the proceeds of the sale, pledge or other disposition of such securities.

That is to purchase forthwith the capital stock of the company. We are not providing for the payment of this by instalments; the agreement is to purchase the capital stock. If it is to be proceeded with in the way the minister now indicates, and I certainly appreciate his point, we have to have a different section from the one now before us.

If I follow the minister, he has provided by this bill that the entire capital stock issue shall be underwritten by the Canadian National Railways. That underwriting is in fact a purchase, as provided by the amendment of yesterday and now set out as subsection 4 of section 12, which I have just read. The minister makes it abundantly clear that the whole of that purchase price is not required at this moment, and I suggest that appropriate words will have to be used in the various sections to show that the purchase price can be payable in such instalments as the directors may from time to time require. That, I gather from what he has said, is the purpose the minister has in mind. If he will look at the clause which was adopted yesterday, appearing on page 5 of the reprinted bill, he will appreciate the reason for the observation that I have made with respect to the section now under consideration. I do not think there is any doubt about that. Provision will have to be made for what I call instalment payment of the purchase price by the underwriters.

Mr. HOWE: The section my right hon. friend refers to is the usual section placed in branch line legislation giving statutory guarantee for the securities required. In connection with branch lines these securities are sold as the funds are required. It seems to me that the position here is the same. There is a continuing statutory guarantee for the funds required for the enterprise up to $5,000,000, but there is nothing in the provisions of the bill to prevent $2,000,000 of bonds being sold, or $1,500,000 if that is the amount required.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not for me to say. The minister assures us that he has highpowered lawyers to advise him. All I can say is, I should like to see any man go into the market with a set-up like this and try to obtain money. See what would happen to him. Even his high-powered lawyers will tell him that I am right.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry? Mr. BENNETT: On division; I cannot bring myself to vote for it.

Section agreed to, on division.

On section 9-Shares only transferable with approval of minister.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a power we object to, but we won't waste time over it.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Ownership of shares.

Mr. HOWE: Is this satisfactory to my right hon, friend?

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to say something about it, but I don't think it makes any difference.

Section agreed to.

On section 11-Minister may acquire all shares.

Subsection 1 agreed to.

On subsection 2-Book value.

Mr. BENNETT: Would it not be well, in view of the case referred to by certain members the other evening, to say that no value shall attach to any franchise? Because this franchise might be held to have value. There have been cases in which franchises were held to have value; some of the cases which have caused the most trouble in this country have been in connection with matters of that kind. I think that is desirable because of the experience of other companies when it came to a question of arbitration. But I am not going to waste time discussing it.

Mr. HOWE: I think if section 11 is allowed to stand an amendment an be drafted. We will attempt to do so.

Section stands.

On section 12-Power to issue securities.

Mr. HOWE: I will ask my colleague to move a new clause 12, to make the bill correspond with the reprint.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move a new clause 12, as follows:

12. (1) Subject to the provisions of this act, the Canadian National Railway Company act, the Caladran National Rathway Company may issue notes, obligations, bonds and other securities (hereinafter in this Act called "securi-ties") not exceeding the sum of five million dollars for the purpose of purchasing the capital stock of the corporation, and the governor in council may authorize the guarantee of the principal and interest of such securities.

(2) The governor in council may, subject to the provisions of this act, approve or decide, (a) the kind of securities to be issued and guaranteed, and the form and terms thereof;

(b) the form and manner of the guarantee or guarantees; (c) the time, manner and amount of the issue or issues;

(d) the terms and conditions of any sale, pledge or other disposition of the securities;

(e) the securing, if deemed desirable by the governor in council, of the securities by mortgage, deed of trust or other instrument, and the form and terms of any such instrument and the trustee or trustees thereof.

and the trustee or trustees thereof.

(3) The guarantee or guarantees may be signed on behalf of His Majesty by the Minister of Finance or by such other person as the governor in council may from time to time designate, and such signature shall be conclusive evidence for all purposes of the validity of such guarantee and that the provisions of this act have been complied with.

(4) To enable the Capadian National Rail.

(4) To enable the Canadian National Railway Company to proceed forthwith to purchase the capital stock of the corporation, the governor in council, pending the issue, sale, pledge or other disposition of the aforesaid securities, may authorize advances to be made to the said company from the consolidated revenue fund, such advances to be reimbursed to His Majesty by the said company from the proceeds of the sale, pledge or other disposition of such securi-

Mr. BENNETT: I should like the minister to look at this for a moment. While again I have no desire to take the place of the high-powered lawyers, I think if he looks at the section he will ask, guaranteed by Mr. HOWE: This is the standard wording.

Mr. BENNETT: But there are definitions in the general clauses which cover that, but in this case you have injected into a special act a provision which deals with power conferred upon the railway company. Surely you have to state by whom the guarantee is given. It may be by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, as far as this is concerned.

Mr. HOWE: Given by His Majesty.

Mr. BENNETT: You have to say they are guaranteed by someone:

(3) The guarantee or guarantees may be signed on behalf of His Majesty by the Minister of Finance or by such other person as the governor in council may from time to time designate . . .

This is taken from an act in which you have in a preceding section definitions that cover points not dealt with here, namely, the person who guarantees. "May authorize the guarantee by His Majesty" is all you want. Then subsection 3 covers the way in which it is done.

Mr. HOWE: We have reworded clause 1 to read:

Subject to the provisions of this act, the Canadian National Railway Company may issue notes, obligations, bonds and other securities (hereinafter in this act called "securities") not exceeding the sum of five million dollars for the purpose of purchasing the capital stock of the corporation, and the governor in council may authorize the guarantee of the principal and interest of such securities on behalf of His Majesty.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. While the minister is at it may I point out that when his high-powered lawyers copied this section, instead of saying "in this act called securities," they should have said "in this section called securities." It will be observed that the language in section 8 is that it is for the purpose of purchasing the capital stock.

Mr. HOWE: Would "subscribing to the shares" be better?

Mr. BENNETT: No, it is not that point, but the clause providing for payment of the purchase price by such instalments as may be determined by the directors. All through the legislation we have dealt with it as a purchase by the Canadian National Railways.

On subsection (d)—Business within and outside Canada.

Mr. GREEN: We understood from the minister the other night that the new company would have the exclusive right to fly this trans-Canada airway. There seems to be nothing in the bill making that provision. I should like to know whether it will be possible for other companies to fly the airway.

Mr. HOWE: The intention is to give this company the exclusive right to fly this route. No interurban route can be flown by any service without special licence from the aeronautics branch.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. GREEN: The exclusive right will be brought about, then, by means of licence under another act?

Mr. HOWE: Quite.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister be disposed to give a little further information with regard to the flying of this route, particularly with regard to the length of the jumps? It traverses my riding; there are three or four aerodromes in the riding and I know that as soon as I get home I shall be asked exactly where the planes are going to stop and from what places they are going to be guided.

Mr. HOWE: It is not possible at this time to give that information, because it has not been worked out. We must have expert operating officers, and they must consult with the post office officials to work out the requirements of the service before anything can be determined.

Mr. STIRLING: Will there be considerable jumps?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, it is the intention to have as few stops as the requirements of the post office will permit.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is it the present intention to have a connection between Vancouver and Victoria?

Mr. HOWE: As I said before, the matter of branch line service and feeder lines has not been considered up to the moment. Obviously the main line must terminate at Vancouver.

Mr. McNIVEN: I notice this company is authorized to carry on business throughout Canada. Does that mean that they could operate feeder lines as well, and engage in commercial flying in competition with other companies which have been in the business for many years? I am thinking more particularly of the northern country, northern Ontario, northern Manitoba and northern Saskatchewan, where these companies have pioneered. It does not seem fair that they should be subjected to the competition of a government subsidized company. Is it the intention of the minister that this company should be allowed to enter into competition for commercial business with companies that have been established and have been giving service for some time past?

Mr. HOWE: While this company is given power to operate anywhere in Canada or outside Canada, it can operate only on services designated by the government. I have stated already that it is not the present intention to operate any feeder lines north of the main line. Because of the fact that some of the feeder lines to the south involve international connections, for national purposes it may be considered advisable to have this company operate such lines; but it will not be allowed to interfere in any way with present northern operations.

Mr. MASSEY: May I ask whether the Trans-Canada Air Line, that is the line itself, has been mapped out as yet?

Mr. HOWE: The line, as defined by the airfields, extends from Vancouver to Lethbridge, to Winnipeg, to Kapuskasing, to Ottawa, to Montreal, and to Halifax. There is a branch for which airfields have been provided from Toronto to Scotia Junction; that part of the line is considered part of the main trans-Canada line, and is being treated as such.

Mr. MASSEY: Will there be any service between Toronto and Montreal, and Toronto and Ottawa?

Mr. HOWE: Those are branch line services and not part of the main operation. Later they may be made part of it, but as I said before, services that are not essential to the main service must wait until this main line has been developed.

Mr. MASSEY: Then at present there is no plan to tie Toronto into the main line except through Scotia Junction?

Mr. HOWE: That is the only route that has been laid out to date to bring Toronto into the main line.

Mr. MASSEY: And you will be able to fly only north from Toronto?

Mr. HOWE: That is all at the moment.

Mr. MASSEY: I should like to ask the minister also what plans he has afoot to train pilots for beam flying. He will fully realize. of course, the hazards of beam flying by a pilot who has been accustomed to flying by a map, by compass, and by guess. Of course, we have developed that type of pilot to a higher degree than any other country in the world. We have made a marvellous job of it, and have been peculiarly fortunate in the type of men we have had doing this flying. It is generally estimated, I think, that the Canadian flyer is without a peer in the world. But flying blind or flying a beam is a different story, and the early experience in other countries has not been exactly happy. I was wondering what plans the minister had developed to train our pilots in beam flying.

Mr. HOWE: I quite appreciate that a successful pilot on this route must have a very considerable training. Fortunately some ten pilots, I think, have been through the training schools in the United States and have followed that up by flying either as pilots or co-pilots on one of the transcontinental services there, and I think those men are available to us. Also I have ascertained that for a consideration we can send as many men as we please from Canada through either of the two aviation schools in the United States. and that these men can be put on air liners there to gain experience for our service. That is a temporary makeshift, of course, until we have our own service sufficiently developed to be able to carry on our own training in Canada. We realize the need of it, and of course the first thing to do in setting up this service is to get the directors, and then to get the management. The rest must follow. but we do know that this training can be obtained.

Mr. MASSEY: Of course, the minister realizes that the success or failure of this air line depends upon how airminded the people of Canada become. At the present time we are not airminded by any manner of means. In some of the urban centres smaller companies have set up good services but in many cases they have failed miserably because of the fact that we were not at all airminded. The experience of the Handley-Page line and the Daimler line in the earlier days of British air lines was of that nature, and the experience in the United States was exactly the same at the beginning. Airmindedness is a state of mind brought about through dismissal of fear, to a very great degree. Once a person has flown in a plane and realizes the convenience, comfort and safety of that method of transportation he becomes airminded. Fear is caused through accidents more than anything else. If in the beginning of our experience we should be so unfortunate as to have some rather bad accidents, the future of the trans-Canada line will be at stake. That situation will have to be overcome in the early days, by some means, and we should go the limit in the prevention of accidents. Hence my questions in regard to the training of pilots.

Apropos of the safety factor, I should like to ask what provision the minister is making for emergency landing fields in a territory such as northern Ontario, for example. Will land be cleared, or will pontoons be flown and lakes used through that particular area? Will one plane fly right across Canada, or what has the minister in mind?

Mr. HOWE: We have well developed emergency landing fields, full size, brought level, on an average not more than fifty miles apart all the way from Montreal to Vancouver.

Mr. MASSEY: Will the beam be available to private companies at a fixed fee, or will they pay for the beam as they use it? In other words, is it dependent upon the mileage flown? Is it a fixed service charged for accordingly, or is it a free service?

Mr. HOWE: There, again, we are initiating a new service. We have provided that for the initial period we will supply the beam free, and for that period I presume it will be free also to other companies who may use it. Of course, they can only fly it for special trips; they are not allowed to fly it on schedule, because as far as that goes we are giving this company a monopoly. After the initial period is over, however, fees will be set for that service.

Mr. MASSEY: Will the use of the beam be compulsory or can a man fly between Winnipeg and Calgary, for example, willynilly, just taking a chance?

Mr. HOWE: If it is a scheduled flight carrying passengers, he must fly the beam. If it is only a tourist flight or a private plane being flown, of course the pilot can fly as he pleases, just as he can to-day.

Mr. MASSEY: If a pilot has a small plane carrying, say, four passengers and is operating a chartered service out of Winnipeg or Regina, or wherever it may be, and intends to continue his chartered service, if he takes a hop from Regina to Calgary he will have to fly the beam, will he not? In case he uses the beam he will of course have to equip his machine with radio, if it is not so equipped at the present time. Is that the understanding?

Mr. HOWE: That is not the regulation at present. A man can take a chartered flight anywhere, but it is not his privilege to set up scheduled flights. Any licensed pilot in a licensed plane can take passengers on chartered flights at the present time with no requirement in regard to flying on a beam, because there is no beam. That may be amended later.

Mr. MASSEY: Will the requirements for pilots flying these chartered services be in accordance with the requirements for pilots flying the Trans-Canada Air Line?

Mr. HOWE: I really cannot say. The act, of course, will be amended to keep up with the development of flying in Canada.

Mr. MASSEY: The reason I am asking so many questions in this connection is that at first there was so much difficulty in the congested areas in countries where beam flying [Mr. Howe.]

has been instituted. Some pilots, unaccustomed to beam flying, took up their ships and perhaps followed some circuitous route, then came back on to the beam and perhaps got in the way of regular traffic. This danger is particularly acute in fog or cloud when the ceiling is low, and accidents have been caused by planes wandering on to the beam because the pilot was inexperienced and did not know where he was. That is not a reflection on the pilot; it is simply a result of his lack of training in this particular line. It seems to me particularly important that in the drawing up of the regulations all of these matters be kept in mind, and accordingly I am wondering if the minister has in mind the setting up of a Canadian school either under the Trans-Canada Air Lines or by some private source, or whatever it may be, so that pilots flying the short chartered trips and those taking the schedule trips may receive exactly the same training. In that way they would be working together, and would not be at sixes and sevens in the air.

Mr. HOWE: I will bring the remarks of the hon, member to the attention of the officers now engaged in drafting the regulations.

Mr. MASSEY: I should like to ask the minister a further question referring back to the question I raised a few moments ago with regard to the airmindedness of the Canadian people. As the minister knows, it will not be sufficient simply to put the Trans-Canada Air Lines into operation and expect passengers to patronize the service. Considerable advertising will have to be done, of a certain definite and specific nature. The advertising which has been done by Imperial Airways, for example, has been amazingly effective. But when you are dealing with a country such as this, with its great areas, an adequate advertising campaign will be exceedingly expensive. Has the minister in mind the possible necessity of spending several hundreds of thousands of dollars in order to make his air lines attractive to those who are not now airminded?

Mr. HOWE: I think the hon, member underestimates the airmindedness of the Canadian people. A friend of mine came east from Vancouver about two weeks ago, and he said that travelling with him on the plane, all the way from Vancouver to Chicago, were eight Canadian passengers. I believe the people of Montreal use the plane service, and especially travelling westward, as much as the people of any city of its size in the United States. As I pointed out originally, one of the benefits of having the Canadian National Railway interested in the service is that they are advertisers in any event, and I am sure their advertising will carry air passenger service and air express service, just as it advertises rail service.

Mr. MASSEY: Is it the purpose of Trans-Canada Air Lines to carry passengers and mail only, or will it carry freight as well?

Mr. HOWE: I presume the freight will depend upon the carrying capacity of the machines. It will be their object to get a full load of mail, first; passengers will come second, and freight third.

Mr. MASSEY: I had particularly in mind the area in northern Ontario where there is more freight carried than in any other two countries of the world put together. Would the Trans-Canada Air Lines enter into competition with the companies that are so successfully operating in that area, and doing such a magnificent job?

Mr. GREEN: The section gives the new company power to engage private flying companies to do the actual flying. Will the Trans-Canada Lines be flown by a private company, or will the new company do the actual flying?

Mr. HOWE: The new company will do the actual flying, but it is usual to give a company of this kind powers which they might reasonably use.

Mr. GREEN: Can the planes be purchased in Canada, or will they have to be purchased in the United States; and about what do they cost?

Mr. HOWE: I am sure I cannot say, Mr. Chairman, it will depend upon the type of planes which the directors and management decide will be suitable for the service.

Mr. GREEN: A fairly well standardized type is used in the United States; I presume ours would be of the same type?

Mr. HOWE: There are several types in the United States. There are the Douglas, the Lockheed, and the Stinson for the smaller services; then there is the Boeing, which has a factory in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: And Fairchild and Vickers.

Mr. HOWE: Vickers build planes, but at this time they are not building standard passenger planes.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the intention to have a daily service across Canada?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, that is the intention.

Mr. RYAN: In describing the route from Vancouver to Halifax the minister said the flight would be from Montreal to Halifax. In view of the fact that the planes will carry mail, is it the intention to fly directly from Montreal to Halifax, or will there be stopovers between those two points? I have in mind the city of Saint John, where there is an excellent airport in connection with which in the last few years the Dominion of Canada has spent a considerable sum of money. That airport is now in a position to afford excellent facilities by land, and if necessary by water. I was wondering if any intermediate site had been selected in the event of a stop-over between Montreal and Halifax?

Mr. HOWE: As I said before, the expert operators of the line will determine the stops, but personally I would be disappointed if they overlooked stopping at the city of Saint John.

Mr. RYAN: Thank you.

Mr. MASSEY: Is it in the mind of the minister that the service will commence at Montreal and work east and west, commence at Halifax and work west, or commence at Vancouver and work east? In other words, will there be a main terminus for the lines? The reason I ask the question is this: The time-table factor is important in acceptable service, and in answer to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) the minister said it was the plan to schedule one plane per day. One cannot fly from Halifax to Vancouver in a day. Therefore, I was wondering what plans the minister had in mind to carry out that schedule.

Mr. HOWE: As I said, the schedule has not been worked out. We have to work out our estimate of costs, based on a provisional service. We have made our plans, generally, for a service leaving Montreal early in the evening, and arriving at Vancouver next noon; and on the return leaving Vancouver at noon, and arriving at Montreal the next morning. The maritime services have not been worked out yet, because not as much work has been done on that section as has been done in the western part. I think the hon. member will appreciate, however, that it is the duty of the board of directors and the management of the corporation to work out the operation details of the route.

Mr. MASSEY: I had this in mind: If there is just one plane, will it be a sleeper plane or a day plane with some system worked out between the railways and the Trans-Canada Air Lines, as was first done before the sleeper planes were put in service in the United States?

Mr. HOWE: The management will work out the type of planes. I sincerely hope they will be sleeper planes, because that is a very comfortable way to travel.

Mr. GREEN: Is the government doing anything to equip the northern air routes with aids to navigation; I refer to routes off the Trans-Canada Line?

Mr. HOWE: We have a few wireless stations in the country, but we have never developed any part of the northern routes.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the intention to provide any of those aids to navigation?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say. We are not doing it; that is about as far as I can go at this time.

Mr. MASSEY: Does the minister feel it will be possible to fly the year round?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon, member for Regina has the floor.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): The minister told a moment ago about the schedule between Montreal and Vancouver. Has he immediately available the times of arrival and departure at intermediate points?

Mr. HOWE: The times I mentioned are purely tentative. No detailed schedule can be worked out until the expert operators of the company decide upon it.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): Has the minister any idea how soon the services will be inaugurated?

Mr. HOWE: Just as soon as we can get delivery of the necessary equipment, and make the necessary preparations. I sincerely hope it will be some time this autumn.

Mr. BENNETT: Might it not be desirable to place a limitation upon the borrowing powers of the corporation? It is usual in a company of this kind to make such a provision, and it would prevent the government from getting into trouble hereafter. The expression used is "to borrow money for any of the purposes of the corporation" without placing a limitation upon it.

There is another phase: There is nothing to indicate what the fiscal year of the corporation is. That becomes important in view of what is to be done in January of each year. Further, the rates fixed in January are to be effective from the first day of January. That would be during the current year, and it would be rather difficult to do in connection with a postage rate, for instance.

Mr. HOWE: You will notice that the rates of the succeeding year are based on the operating result of the previous year.

[Mr. Massey.]

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. HOWE: And I think if we have that result at any time in the current year it would work out, because subsidies are usually not paid in advance.

Mr. BENNETT: It might be desirable to provide what is to be the fiscal year of the corporation. Part III of the Companies Act does not touch that phase of its activities.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: Should not paragraph (b) of section 14 contain the word "aircraft"?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It covers hangars, aerodromes, sea plane bases, landing fields, beacons and mooring masts.

Mr. HOWE: I think it is covered in an earlier section.

Paragraph agreed to.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—Minister may contract with corporation.

Mr. BENNETT: Why not put a limitation on borrowings?

Mr. HOWE: It is not contemplated that the company shall borrow any money other than for temporary accommodation.

Mr. BENNETT: If that is so, all right.

Mr. ESLING: Have the ports of call been determined upon between the Alberta border and Vancouver?

Mr. HOWE: No ports of call have been determined upon. We must first set up the corporation and obtain a management. The ports of call would then be an operating problem which would be worked out in conjunction with the post office. Their selection will call for a good deal of consultation, and it is impossible at this time to say where they will be located.

Mr. MASSEY: A short time ago the minister stated that it was not intended that the Trans-Canada Air Lines should operate between Toronto and Montreal, for the time being at least. Would the opening of this service be dependent upon the success of the transcontinental line, or will it be simply a matter of waiting until there is a demand for this service?

Mr. HOWE: We are quite seized of the fact that there must be a service between Toronto and Montreal, but it is physically impossible to develop routes faster than we are doing at the moment. The decision by the directors of whether that route should be covered as part of the trans-Canada air line or should be regarded as a feeder line is a matter for future determination.

MASSEY: To regard the service between Toronto and Montreal as a "feeder line" would be ridiculous. The two largest cities in Canada are only 300 air miles apart, an hour and a half by air, and six hours by fast rail. The minister claims that Canada is more airminded than I had thought; then surely he will admit that a service between Toronto and Montreal should be productive of considerable revenue for the Trans-Canada Air Lines. Here we have two urban centres with large populations, with very considerable passenger traffic between them, much of which could be expeditiously and very satisfactorily carried by air. I think it is extremely unfortunate if these two large centres are to be deprived of a connecting service. I can understand the difficulty of having Toronto on the main transcontinental route in view of the fact that it is situated well to the south of the "crow-flys" line and thus the minister has in mind a feeder line from Toronto to a junction point in the north. But it seems a great and unnecessary blunder not to have a regular route from Toronto to Montreal. It may not be profitable to put Douglas or Boeing transport planes on this run for the time being, but there is certainly sufficient traffic for Stinson, Vultees, or other smaller planes carrying six, eight or ten passengers.

Mr. HOWE: No doubt that would be a very important route, but it is not on the trans-Canada route. No matter if it should prove to be the best route in Canada it can only be a feeder to the trans-Canada line.

Mr. MASSEY: I am not objecting to that word because after all Toronto is a "feeder" to the rest of the dominion in many different ways.

Mr. McIVOR: We have great hopes at the head of the lakes that the humming centres of Port Arthur and Fort William will provide dependable feeder lines for this trans-Canada line.

Section agreed to.

On section 16-Mail transport contract.

Mr. GREEN: Subsection 2 of section 17 provides for "an increase in the sum total to be paid on account of the said rates equal to the deficit in the preceding year." Will the result be an increase in the postal rates or will the deficit simply be charged up to the Post Office Department?

Mr. HOWE: This bill contemplates that after the initial period, which is taken care of separately, the mails will be carried at cost. That is, the cost will be adjusted on the basis of the cost of the previous year. If it costs thirty cents per mile to carry the mails in the previous years, thirty cents will be the rate for the next year. If the rate for that year proves to be only twenty cents per mile, the rate for the succeeding year will be fixed at twenty-five cents. The corporation will get only half the amount of the saving.

Mr. GREEN: At the present time we pay six cents for sending a letter by air mail. Will that rate be changed to five cents, seven cents or eight cents according to whether or not there is a deficit?

Mr. HOWE: No. The surcharge of three cents over the regular rate is universal all over North America and cannot be changed except by agreement with the other countries.

Mr. BENNETT: In one section we mention mails, passengers and goods, while in other sections we refer only to passengers and goods. In looking over the bill some days ago, it occurred to me it would be better to include the word "mails" in the various sections where passengers and goods are referred to. It will be noted in section 14 passengers, mails and goods are referred to. In the final provision with respect to the contract it will be seen reference is made to mail, passengers, express and other traffic. Express and other traffic would be covered by the word "goods". Would it not be well to include the word "mails" throughout so that no question would arise?

Mr. HOWE: The definition of "rates" refers to the rates paid for the transport of mails. The rates on mail are used to determine what you might call the operating subsidy, which is really not a fair name for it as it is a payment for a service. But mails seem to be differentiated throughout, because as far as goods and passengers are concerned the company can charge competitive rates for those as determined by actual experience. The rates are set automatically.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not made myself clear to the minister. In section 14 we provide for the establishment of an air service, and that air service will transport passengers and goods by air. Later on we provide for the transport by air of mail, passengers and goods; and inasmuch as the rates are to be fixed on the basis of the cost of carrying mails, it occurred to me that it would be better to have the purposes of the corporation stated throughout in similar terms, namely "mails, passengers and goods." It will be noted that section 14 says "the transport of mails, passengers and goods by any means," but just before that the word "mail" is left out.

Mr. HOWE: Is not that clause limited to contracts?

Mr. BENNETT: No. May I make myself clear? Section 14 recites:

The corporation is authorized,—
(a) to establish, operate and maintain air lines or regular services of aircraft of all kinds, to carry on the business of transporting passengers and goods by air, and to enter into contracts for the transport of mails, passengers and goods by any means, . . .

You use in that particular line the words "mails, passengers and goods," and my suggestion is that for the purposes of the act it is desirable to use those three words all through. I think it would strengthen the position. If sometimes you use the words "mails, passengers and goods," it may be taken that in other places you intend to exclude the word "mail" because you do not use it, when as a matter of fact you intend to use it everywhere. Difficulties may arise over that.

Section agreed to.

Mr. HOWE: I will ask my colleague to move that in section 14, line 16, the word "mails" be inserted before "passengers." In the old act it is section 13, in the new act it is 14.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 17—Fixation of rates.

Mr. GREEN: Subsection 3 of this section states:

Provided, however, that the rates so fixed shall not be lower than rates payable for other similar coast to coast transport of mails in North America.

Why are our rates tied up with American rates for the transportation of mail?

Mr. HOWE: It is felt that there should be some objective for the company which, having been reached, it will be allowed to make a profit, and we feel that when they are operating on a basis of efficiency such as will bring the mail rate down to the rates of the same service to the south, they should be permitted to obtain a profit.

Mr. GREEN: Then if the American rates go very high, our rates, of course, would go up too? Would not that be detrimental to the interests of Canada?

Mr. HOWE: I think there is very little danger of the American rates going higher. At the moment they are exceedingly low.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister think it desirable that the contract shall be for not less than ten years? Why, in the experimental stage? He has a reason for it. I should like to know what it is.

Mr. HOWE: The reason is that a great deal of expensive equipment must be purchased. It is to give the company time to amortize at least the cost of its purchase of original equipment.

Section agreed to.

Section 18 agreed to.

On Section 19-Part III of Companies Act to apply.

Mr. HOWE: In the original bill there was an error in the printing by which the second line of what was section 18 was omitted. That has been inserted in the reprint, and I will ask my colleague to move to provide for the insertion.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a section 19, is there not?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, we inserted a new section. Section 18 of the old bill is number 19 in the new bill.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a section left out of this. I sent for the new Companies Act of 1934. This section says that part III shall apply, that is the new part III that was put in in 1935, except section 145. Section 145 relates to the application of part I, and we need not consider that. Then section 158 is mentioned here, which deals with preference shares; that of course does not apply; section 159 relates to the change of the chief place of business, by bylaw; that does not apply; section 163 is the section that deals with interest on the amount unpaid at six per cent per annum on calls on shares; section 162 deals with the calls on shares, and that is not to apply, nor the provision for interest. Then you go to section 180, which is the section that deals with preference shares; and also section 181, saving of creditors' rights.

No provision in this part as to the creation of preference shares and no bylaw authorizing the creation of such shares and nothing done under or in pursuance of any such provision or bylaw, shall affect or impair the rights of creditors of the company.

Obviously that has no application. obviously sections 180 and 181 are to be added. I have not time to go over the rest of them, but I assume they are all right. But certainly section 181 should be added.

I think the minister would find it desirable to add a clause indicating what is the fiscal year of this corporation. In dealing with the other matter he uses the term "current year." I dare say it can be done adequately by the bylaws, but in view of the provision in the statute I thought it might be desirable to clarify it.

Mr. HOWE: The fiscal year is intended to be the calendar year.

Mr. BENNETT: It would be easy to add that the fiscal year of the corporation should be the calendar year.

The CHAIRMAN: There is an amendment to section 18, now section 19, which has not yet been passed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move that the old section 18 be amended.

By inserting after the word "act" in the first line, the following, "1934, except sections one hundred and forty-five, one" . . .

Mr. HOWE: There was a line left out. Amendment agreed to.

Mr. HOWE: I will ask my colleague to move as subsection 2 of section 19:

The fiscal year of the corporation shall be the calendar year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I so

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 11-Minister may acquire all shares.

Mr. HOWE: I have an amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move as a new subsection 3 the following:

Trans-Canada contracts shall not be deemed to have any value or be an asset to be taken into consideration in determining the book value of the shares.

The present subsection 3 should be renumbered as subsection 4, and I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose it is contemplated that the machines will be combination machines such as are being built by the great nations of the world and that they may be converted into bombers if necessary?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, they are all convertible nowadays.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 14-Establishment, operation and maintenance of air lines.

Mr. HOWE: I will ask my colleague to move that this section be amended by inserting after the word "transporting" in line 16 the word "mails."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move accordingly.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to make another comment or two on the vote for the Richelieu river improvements. I can assure the minister that I am not opposing this vote for any other reason than that I am not convinced that the proposal is a sound one. That, of course, is only my opinion; the minister has a right to his own. Before the house rose last night the minister said that the reason there was not much traffic on the canals was that the Chambly canal is too shallow. Having gone over the canal from one end to the other right down through the state of New York to the terminus of that waterway I am convinced that there are two other major reasons why the traffic is small and, indeed, why it can never be large. The distance from Sorel to St. Ours is fourteen miles, and is the first lock there. From Sorel to Chambly is forty-six miles, that is the commencement of the Chambly canal, which at present has nine locks. Those nine locks overcome a rise of eighty feet in the river. At the head of the canal any boat ascending that canal to lake Champlain would enter practically at lake level, I presume, outside of the current allowance. The minimum lake level is 93 feet and the maximum 102 above sea level, so that from the lake to the head of the canal, if there is a difference of a foot or so, it would be the current allowance in the river. Then to the international boundary is eighty-one miles, and to the Champlain canal 192 miles-that is the total distance from Sorel in each case. To the junction of the Erie canal is 258 miles and from there to tidewater at Albany the total distance is 265 miles, and to New York 441 miles.

But in addition to that very great distance, a ship leaving Canadian waters south of St. Johns and entering the lake, after having ascended the said ten locks, approximately 90 feet, has to enter the Champlain canal and rise another 43 feet or thereabouts through three locks, and after passing over the height of land—where by the way there is difficulty in getting water; they have to bring it from storage dams in the adjacent hills-the ship would have to descend from the summit level approximately 140 feet, through nine locks, down to the Hudson river and sea level at Albany. Now that requires a great deal of time. On the Canadian side there are ten locks, and twelve on the American side. In the American canal, that is the lake Champlain-Hudson canal, there is a depth of twelve feet. I did not see any boats of any magnitude there, just barges with a pusher, nothing but oil boats when I was there, but I know other boats do travel that canal. But the total traffic for the whole year was only some 351,000 tons, in a canal which has a potential capacity of over 8,000,000 tons.

The minister said that the proposal is to erect a dam approximately half way between Chambly and St. Johns. My memory may be wrong or I may have mistakenly judged the height of the bank at that point; I got the location in the department offices at Montreal, and I went to the point where I was informed the dam was to be erected. The banks there perhaps do not exceed 25 or 30 feet; I judged about 25 feet. If a dam erected at that point is to be of any benefit whatever south of St. Johns it would have to be more than 25 feet high. The minister said that approximately half of the Chambly canal locks would be cut out, six locks, and those six locks I presume are equivalent to half the rise from Chambly to St. Johns, which is 80 feet. Therefore if half the locks are going to be cut out that dam would have to be somewhere between 35 and 40 feet high. It would be impossible to erect it with the banks as they are now, if my memory of the height is correct. I cannot grasp at all how a dam at that point can accomplish what is expected of it.

The United States engineers' proposal was to build a dam south of the international boundary, I presume across from Stony Point to Windmill Point—

Mr. DUPUIS: Does the hon. member mean in lake Champlain?

Mr. MacNICOL: North of the main outlet. While it is called river, it is nothing more or less than an extension of the lake, of considerable width. The banks at that point are not high. I presume that is where the minister referred to some flooding taking place during high water, when the lake level was at about 102 feet. The United States engineers proposed to build the dam between Stony Point and Windmill Point. In that way they would control the lake level, and they would not have to ask Canada's permission, as I understand, that water being wholly within the United States.

But in our case if the dam at the point where this government proposes to erect it raises the lake level—although personally I cannot see how it can unless large dykes are built alongside the river—what right have we to raise the level of water in a foreign country? I believe the Prime Minister made a trip to Washington recently, and I presume one of the subjects discussed there, although I am not asking that to be admitted here, may have been the proposal of the Ontario government to pour water into lake Superior from the watershed of Long lake.

The Ontario government decided, it is said, to allow United States lumber interests to dam the Kenagami river and take the water out of Long lake watershed and pour it into lake Superior. If the Ontario government had thought for a moment, they would have known they cannot do any such thing. And in this case, if a dam at the point proposed would have any effect on the level of lake Champlain we could not do it without an international agreement. Perhaps that has been obtained already.

Something was said last night about the traffic on the Champlain canal, and I referred to a submission made by the Montreal chamber of commerce. I should have said the chambre de commerce; I presume that is the French-speaking section of the Montreal chamber of commerce. When I got to my room I found that the submission had been presented by Mr. Paul Beique, and had been signed by M. René Morin. I presume they are associated with the chambre de commerce. The Montreal chambre de commerce submitted a brief in opposition to the proposal to carry a seaway through from the Hudson to the St. Lawrence. Last night the minister pointed out that the proposal he has in mind has nothing to do with the United States proposals, of which the main one was from lake St. Francis to lake Champlain. In discussing that I mentioned the United States figure of $200,000,000, and when the minister was speaking he gave the cost of what the government had in mind as about $8,000,000.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, if we decide to reconstruct the Chambly canal.

Mr. MacNICOL: But suppose the final decision should be to carry the 27 to 30 foot canal down the Richelieu river, which is the only canal depth the United States might consider at all, because their proposal is to have no locks at all on the Champlain-Hudson canal, with the exception of two at Northumberland where the boats will drop down to tidewater. To do that, they would have to cut through the height of land to a depth of something like forty-five feet more or less, a foot or two either way depending on the height to which they could raise lake Champlain. If the channel went directly north from lake Champlain to Sorel at a depth of 27 to 30 feet I question whether it would cost much less than the estimated cost from lake St. Francis to lake Champlain. $200,000,000, because between those two lakes it would run across a more or less level country, and only two locks would be required very close to lake Champlain. On the other hand, if a canal should be constructed according to the wish of the United States, namely 27 to 30 feet in depth down the Richelieu river, that would be a tremendous work.

The point I wish to make is that from their point of view a canal that will not permit ships of ocean draught to pass from the St. Lawrence river to the Hudson river would be of little worth. That is their proposition, and it has been demonstrated that a twelve foot canal is not of much value, since it only carried 351,000 tons of freight in 1935. According to the submission of the Montreal chambre de commerce the traffic on our own Chambly canal ranged from 99,998 tons in 1930 to 44,219 tons in 1935.

I assure the minister that if any reasonable argument in support of the expenditure of so many millions of dollars as $8,000,000 could be brought forward, showing that this would be of any practical benefit to Canadian commerce, I would not oppose the expenditure. So far, however, I am not aware of anything that has been presented either before the International Joint Commission or this house that would warrant me in supporting any expenditure of that sum on this river. There are concrete roadways running beside the river; I motored over some, though not all, of them. I found a road down one side of the river from Chambly to near St. Johns, where I crossed on the other side. It is a fine old historic country which I would be pleased to assist in any way possible; but all the commodities that are produced in the immediate vicinity of the canal can go by truck to Montreal and elsewhere, and would be transported in that manner instead of down the canal. During my survey I learned that the only traffic on the canal was pulp from Three Rivers, coming south, and perhaps a little oil moving in the opposite direction; but according to statistics the traffic carried amounted to very little, not nearly enough to warrant any such expenditure of money.

I hope the minister will not take it that I am opposing him personally. He is one minister I would be very happy to support. I think a good deal of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin); I should like to support his proposals, and the very fact that yesterday he got through so many of his items without opposition is proof that we on this side think a good deal of him. But it will take more than I have heard as yet to get me to support this expenditure.

The finest thing the minister said yesterday, to my mind, was his statement that this is a revote. So long as he brings in this amount as a revote each year, I will not have [Mr. MacNicol.]

a word to say. Next year, the year after, and the year after that, if he brings in a long list of items including an item for the Chambly canal, and states that that item is a revote, I will not say a word about the canal. But I will have to oppose this item until I am shown actual trade available or in prospect very much greater than is the case to-day. I cannot see it in prospect now. I have spoken to those in Montreal and Three Rivers who should know the facts, and I have learned that practically all the traffic offering is what comes to and from Three Rivers. The Montreal traffic would not go that way. If the minister will just continue this as a revote all the items for Quebec will go through safely.

Some hon, MEMBERS: Carried,

Mr. LENNARD: No, it is not carried. I not only wish to voice my own objection to this particular item of half a million dollars for the Richelieu river improvements, but also to present the very strenuous objection of the Hamilton chamber of commerce. On December 9, 1936, the following resolution was sent by the Hamilton chamber of commerce to Mr. Lawrence J. Burpee, secretary of the International Joint Commission:

"Resolved, that in the light of information before us at this time that this board express its strong opposition to the proposals placed before the International Joint Commission during the meetings from the 19th to the 27th of November."

This attitude is adopted not only because it is not considered wise or desirable, under present financial conditions, to support any plan of this nature which would mean the ultimate expenditure of the sum of two hundred million dollars as outlined in the proposal, but taking into consideration as well the large annual deficit of our government railway, the substantial cost of the maintenance and operation of our present canal system and the almost lack of advantage to Canada in the building of this canal.

Further, our understanding is that there is a 160 lift from the St. Lawrence river to lake Champlain, all of which is Canadian territory, and as it is proposed that this canal would be toll free the major portion of the cost of construction, maintenance and operation would fall on Canada.

I should like to say a further word with regard to these estimates generally. How are we to know how many of these amounts included in item 342 are revotes? This particular item was attacked last evening, and it happens to be a revote. Can the minister say how many of the others are revotes?

Mr. CARDIN: The next item, "Rimouski—harbour improvements, $475,000" is largely a revote. Practically half of this amount is a revote. The second following item, "Riviere des Hurons—contribution towards dredging, $75,000" is also a revote in full. Then the item of $170,000 for dredging in the Saguenay river is largely a revote; the work is under contract at the present time. These are the main amounts which are revoted.

Mr. LENNARD: Can the minister tell me how many of these items are for the county of Bonaventure?

Mr. CARDIN: The list does not show it by counties, but I know what the hon, member has in mind and I can relieve him of his apprehensions. The total of expenditures for the county of Bonaventure in the main and supplementary estimates is less than it was last year.

Mr. LENNARD: What was it last year?

Mr. CARDIN: I cannot tell the hon, member at the moment, but I can assure him that the expenditures in that county last year were larger than those we contemplate this year. I regret not being able to give the detailed information, but I can give my word to the hon. member that that is so.

Mr. LENNARD: I understand that in this vote alone $225,000 is earmarked for Bonaventure.

Mr. CARDIN: I would not say that is not correct, but last year the amount was larger than that.

Item agreed to.

Mr. FACTOR: I notice that the only expenditure for Toronto is for the Toronto island breakwater, $125,000-"the city of Toronto to bear a like amount." As the minister is aware, accompanied by the hon. members for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton) and York North (Mr. Mulock) I had occasion to make representations in connection with the harbour improvements for the city of Toronto. An item totalling $400,000 with respect to certain harbour improvements in Toronto harbour was presented to him. What progress has been made in connection with recommending the item for consideration by the government?

The same delegation also urged upon the minister the extension of the Toronto post office, terminal A, for city delivery. The minister is aware no doubt that the facilities in terminal A are very crowded, and that it is necessary to have the building extended. I would appreciate it if the Minister of Public Works could give me some assurance of what the government intends to do about these two matters?

Mr. CARDIN: I have well in mind the representations made by the hon, member for Spadina (Mr. Factor) and his two colleagues with respect to additional works for the city of Toronto. Their case was strongly and ably presented to the government, but at the time of presentation the supplementary estimates with which we are dealing had been prepared and printed. My answer to the hon, member and his colleagues, and others who made representations along the same lines, was that personally I was very much inclined towards agreeing to the request made for expenditures in Toronto harbour and for the extension of postal facilities in that city. But it was then too late to give consideration to the recommendations because the supplementaries had been prepared. However, the door is not definitely closed—

Mr. MASSEY: The "revolving" door?

Mr. CARDIN: The open door. However, I feel that before the session closes there will be an opportunity of meeting, if not in their entirety, at least in part, the requests which have been made. The amount of expenditures provided for the city of Toronto is going to be somewhat larger than that provided in these estimates, which means that part of the recommendations made will probably be favourably considered if the hon. member can help me convince my colleague the Minister of Finance that we ought to do something more for Toronto. So, although I am making no promise, I am ready to shed a little ray of hope in the mind of the hon. member.

Mr. MASSEY: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add my voice to that of the hon. member for Spadina in connection with this item. I fully realize that hon. members are at times apt to regard the city of Toronto as being somewhat ambitious for its own development. In speaking to this item to-night I am sure the hon. member for Spadina will support me when I urge upon the minister the need for this work, not only for the purpose to which the work is to be put, but also in view of the fact that within Toronto there is probably a larger number of unemployed than in any other urban area in Canada, with possibly one exception. Relief work has been and will be done. One is not anxious to develop improvements, or whatever we may wish to call them, solely through relief works.

The request which was made to the minister through the proper channels, a request which the minister states was made arduously, was for a very legitimate purpose. Those of us who are interested in the development not only of the harbour of Toronto but of Canadian harbours generally, feel very keenly that this work should be put forward. We notice that in estimate number 343 there are some substantial votes. One sees, for example, that the city of Port Arthur is to have harbour improvements costing $260,000. Port Arthur, of course, has some very honourable sons, and is a splendid and important port in Canada. On the other hand, Toronto gets only $125,000, or about half that of Port Arthur. If improvements go forward in connection with transportation facilities—even though we have been relegated to the position of the end of a "feeder line" so far as air transportation is concerned—no doubt there will be an increase in traffic to and from Toronto and resulting in greater demand on the harbour.

Bearing in mind not only the necessity for this work from the point of view of Toronto's harbour development but also its importance from the point of view of providing work, I am sure that those of us who have at heart the interests of those whom we earnestly and sincerely attempt to represent in this house feel we would be derelict in our duty if we did not raise our voices at this time and earnestly urge the minister fully to take into consideration, and if at all possible, to follow to a conclusion, the perfectly legitimate requests which have been made, and to see that the full amount of $400,000 be granted for the purpose for which it is asked.

Mr. LENNARD: I wish to direct the minister's attention to the item "Burlington channel, dredging" and "Burlington channel, reconstruction of south pier." Are these revotes?

Mr. CARDIN: The $25,000 for dredging is a new expenditure, but there is a revote of $35,000 out of $108,000 provided for the construction of the south pier.

Mr. LENNARD: The minister will remember that when the reconstruction of this south pier was being considered last year, he said the work would be let by contract.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. LENNARD: I understand the work has since been changed to a cost-plus basis.

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. LENNARD: Who has the contract?

Mr. CARDIN: The Russell Construction Company Limited, of Toronto.

Mr. LENNARD: This work is still under contract?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. LENNARD: How many government inspectors are there on this job?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed by the deputy minister that usually there are two inspectors on jobs of this size, but I would not be too sure about this as I have not definite information before me.

Mr. LENNARD: When similar work was carried on at Burlington channel some years ago, the contractor continued working throughout the winter. Work could have been carried on very easily this winter as it was quite open, but I understand that only four workmen have been employed throughout the winter. But there were two inspectors on the job all the time, and they had a truck driver and a truck at their disposal. This work was being done for the relief of unemployment and I think, therefore, a full force should have been kept on all winter.

Mr. CARDIN: I cannot answer the charge made by my hon. friend, but I am surprised that such a thing has happened. I shall be glad to make proper inquiries and remedy this situation if it exists.

Mr. BROWN: This item includes $250,000 for harbour improvements at Hamilton. Is this to be part of a more comprehensive scheme?

Mr. CARDIN: This amount is to provide for an initial portion of a proposed development in Hamilton harbour as requested by the harbour commission. The whole scheme calls for the construction of a revetment wall 4,417 feet long, surrounding an area owned by the harbour commission north of Burlington street and east of Wellington street. After the wall has been completed the enclosed area is to be filled in, which will reclaim 2,159,500 square feet or 50 acres of land. It has been represented to the department by the harbour commission that the present pier is insufficient to take care of the traffic, and it is proposed to develop the facilities in order to reclaim land next to the present pier.

Mr. MASSEY: Is the $125,000 for a breakwater at Toronto island to be earmarked for any particular work?

Mr. CARDIN: This is a revote to provide for the federal government's share of approximately one-half the cost of constructing a breakwater 6,408 feet in length, along the south shore of Toronto island from Ward's island to Centre island.

Mr. MASSEY: It is not part of the $400,000 scheme that was suggested?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. MASSEY: Is there any time limit to when this work must be finished? Are there any strings attached to this vote?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that this work is under way.

Mr. MASSEY: Quite, but when does it have to be completed?

Mr. CARDIN: It will be completed this fall.

 $31111 - 156\frac{1}{2}$

Mr. LOCKHART: I am told that certain breakdowns occurred in the harbour of Port Weller and Port Colborne on the Welland ship canal, and I do not see anything in this item to cover this work.

Mr. CARDIN: We have not received any report covering that.

Mr. LOCKHART: The hon, member for Welland (Mr. Damude) perhaps would be in closer touch with this than I am, but I understand that this work needs attention.

Mr. CARDIN: It may be that the matter my hon, friend refers to would come under the Department of Transport. The Department of Public Works has received no report on this matter.

Mr. LOCKHART: Would not harbour work come under your department?

Mr. CARDIN: It would be the Department of Transport.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I notice that the largest amount in this vote is for harbour improvements at Port Arthur, $260,000. That is a large amount of money. Could the minister tell us what is the nature of the improvements to the harbour at Port Arthur?

Mr. CARDIN: The amount is to provide for work under contract. Of this $260,000, there is a revote of $153,000. The contract has been awarded to the Canadian Dredge and Dock Company Limited. It is part of a scheme of improvement of the harbour which was commenced a number of years ago. The following is the work under contract and the cost at contract prices: completion of 1.000foot section of breakwater immediately south of New Central entrance. That requires 11,000 tons armour stone, $38,500; 150,000 cubic yards of core stone, $135,000; rectification of 1,200 feet of breakwater, 13,200 tons armour stone, $52,800; and 1,200 cubic yards of core stone, $24,000. That, with inspections, surveys, et cetera, represents the amount of $260,000.

Mr. DAMUDE: In connection with the harbour at Port Colborne, I understand that estimates are in the Department of Transport to the amount of $86,000.

Mr. LOCKHART: Mostly maintenance, I think. I happen to know something about the region of Port Maitland, and I notice there is only $2,700 in the estimates for work to be done there. May I have some information as to just what that breakwater consists of? I was under the impression that there was considerable work to be done there.

Mr. CARDIN: The explanation given to me is that the amount is to provide for the construction of a rubble stone protection wall 200 feet in length along the shore, at the inner end of the existing sheet pile wall at Port Maitland. The sheet pile wall built from 1929 to 1931 extends up stream along the west bank of the Grand river, and is to prevent erosion. The district engineer reports that waves are following up this wall and are eroding the bank at its upper end, and he recommends the placing of rubble stone to prevent further damage.

Mr. LOCKHART: That is not a revote? That is new work, is it?

Mr. CARDIN: That is new work.

Mr. PURDY: I wonder whether the minister could reassure some of my friends to the left. They have been murmuring among themselves that the $250,000 for Hamilton has something to do with the recent election. I am sure the work will go on just the same.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I think the vote should have been enlarged on that account.

Mr. PURDY: In other words, the Liberal party did not promise this without the intention of fulfilling its undertaking. It was no Indian gift.

Mr. MASSEY: Rather, Greeks bringing

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I want to draw the attention of the committee to this magnificent vote-$69,500 in all for the province of Saskatchewan-$45,000 of which is for the Ceepee bridge. Is this for the completion of that bridge?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, that is for the completion of the bridge.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Has the work been going on during the winter?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): There have not been any inspectors, then, on that job?

Mr. NEEDHAM: Will the minister give particulars of the $9,500 for dredging at Waskesiu lake? It is in the national park [Mr. Lockhart.]

north of Prince Albert. There is no traffic on that lake, so far as I know, except pleasure boats, so why this $9,500 for dredging?

Mr. CARDIN: The amount is to provide for the deepening of the enclosed harbour at Waskesiu, Prince Albert national park, by the removal of approximately 17,900 cubic yards. The proposed work is requested by the parks superintendent. He reports that this area is silted in very badly, and that during the periods of low water it is almost impossible to use even a row-boat without fouling sand bars. The lake is used for boating by some residents of and vistors to the park, and the district engineer reports that unless the proposed dredging is carried out, boats cannot use the harbour.

Mr. HEAPS: Are there any row-boats there?

Mr. CASSELMAN: Two.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There are many launches there.

Snagboat Samson-reconstruction, $57,000.

Tachi river—improvements, $3,000.
Trail—retaining wall, $10,000.
William Head (quarantine station)—wharf repairs, $25,100.

Mr. NEILL: Referring to the item, Port Alberni, extension to assembly wharf, $4,100; should not that be "repairs"? You could not make much extension of that big wharf for

Mr. CARDIN: It has to do with the construction of a 400 foot extension to the assembly wharf. The amount of the contract was nearly $73,000.

Mr. NEILL: This is an addition to that sum?

Mr. CARDIN: An addition, to complete it.

Mr. NEILL: Then the next item, Port Alberni, dredging at floats, $12,500. I understood it was intended to provide $9,000 for dredging, and $6,000 for new floats. Are the floats left out? I think the original amount was $15,000. Apparently no provision is made beyond the dredging. The floats have to be taken out, then the ground dredged, and the floats put back again, with some extra ones. But apparently there is no provision for the floats.

Mr. CARDIN: That is a revote, providing only for the dredging.

Mr. NEILL: It is no use dredging unless you put the floats in. The original estimate, I think, was $9,000 for the dredging and $6,000 for the floats, but as I have said, there does not appear to be any provision for the floats, or for renewals.

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that the dredging is being provided for in these estimates, and it may be an advantage to use the floats that are there already.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, but the original recommendation, and in fact last year's vote, included $6,000 for taking out the floats—that is necessary before the dredging is done—and putting them back again, and supplying some additional ones necessitated by the increased area provided by the dredging. There should be an item somewhere for this, of some $6,000, unless you are going to take it out of the general vote.

Mr. CARDIN: The information is that somebody must have opposed it, although we have nothing definite before us. However, the matter deserves consideration.

Mr. BARBER: Where is the Ahousat wharf located?

Mr. CARDIN: In Comox-Alberni.

Mr. BARBER: Can the minister give any particulars of the Mayne island wharf improvements, $7,200?

Mr. CARDIN: This is required to reconstruct and extend the wharf head and to provide two landing places instead of one. The request has come in the form of a petition from the residents.

Mr. BARBER: Is it not true that the request was for a ferry wharf? The federal government undertook to build this wharf for ferry purposes, but another wharf was built on the opposite side of the river.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is Mayne island on the Fraser river? The last time I saw it, it was in the gulf of Georgia?

Mr. BARBER: I noticed in the local newspaper that provision had been made for this wharf and I understood that it was at a point on Mayne island, because a bridge was built to this island, and from the island the ferry was to run across the Fraser river.

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that that is another matter.

Mr. BARBER: There is no provision for that ferry wharf in the Langley district?

Mr. CARDIN: I understand that is another matter.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the minister had an opportunity to give attention to the request I made a short time ago to have the union jack replaced over the Port Credit post office? I have had complaints about the condition that flag has been in for some time.

Mr. CARDIN: It has been attended to.

Item agreed to.

Public works—salaries, $509,450; contingencies, $56,000.

I hope that in future they will be more careful and will not suggest putting timber on rotten boards, as they have done in the past.

Mr. CARDIN: I wish to express my appreciation of the kindly disposition shown by my predecessor, the ex-Minister of Public Works, and by the opposition in passing my estimates generally. In fact hon, members opposite including all groups have been very kind and I do greatly appreciate the consideration they have shown.

Mr. STEWART: I believe the minister left one item open.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, item 17.

Mr. STEWART: I see no reason why that item should not be passed.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Fifth and final report of the standing committee on railways and shipping.—Sir Eugene Fiset.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the recommendation submitted by the Civil Service Commission under section 12 of the Civil Service Act for the change in the compensation of the editor of French debates and chief of French reporting staff, laid on the table of the house on Monday, March 29, 1937, be approved.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the Prime Minister will explain this.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The title of this position was changed by resolution of the house in the session of 1929 from associate editor of debates and reporter (French) to editor of French debates and chief of French reporting staff. The civil service commission has classified the position at the salary mentioned in the report laid on the table of the house. This classification involves an increase of $180.

RADIO BROADCASTING

ADDRESS BY MR. GLADSTONE MURRAY AS REPORTED IN THE PRESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish to ask a question based on an article in the Montreal Gazette of March 23, in which it is reported that Major Gladstone Murray said:

There is a very important development connected with public service broadcasting in Canada, and the whole of Canada must realize that we have two parent languages. We must be ready and willing, and we should be anxious to accept the heritage of these parent languages with their storehouses of literature and history. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is pledged to make Canada bilingual, to eliminate all these differences of onlying. all these differences of opinion.

I should like to ask the government whether that is the policy of the government, and was the head of the commission speaking for the government. The other day I got no reply but "no." The extract from a newspaper article in the question as drafted had been struck out.

Mr. HOWE: That question was answered the other day—

Mr. BENNETT: No, it was not answered.

Mr. HOWE: —that the government had no knowledge of the speech.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a serious issue involved in connection with this. The hon. member showed me the answer he received, which was not an answer to his question at all. He submitted to the clerk before placing it on the order paper a question which contained an extract from a newspaper. The clerk struck it out and put on the order paper a question of his own making, which was not satisfactory to the hon. member; however that has nothing to do with this. But the answer does not deal with the question. The hon. member has shown me the extract from the newspaper, which is in quotation marks, a declaration of policy by the head of the broadcasting commission, for which the government now assumes full responsibility, in view of what was said last session, and the question whether or not that policy is authorized by this government is a proper ques-

Mr. CHURCH: It is contrary to the British North America Act.
