ANNIE DEER

By G. P. R. James.

(Concluded.)

The matter went on as simply as it is possible to conceive. His partner, seeing that Mr. Deer was now convinced that he had trusted once too far, grew angry, resisted the interference which might have saved him, hurried recklessly on in the frong course, and, ere four months were out, the house of Deer & Co. were bankrupts to the amount of more Amid all this distress, no one was so kind as Mr. John Pocock. Though at his period of life much locomotion was not agreeable. hope.

Annie Deer then found how little could be pocured by those means to which she had speculations which were then not uncome trusted for support. Mrs. Deer bore all patiently, and she and her daughter consulted and deliberated long with Mr. John Pocock as to him to extend far more than his own limit to extend far more, than his own limit to extend far more than his own limit to extend far more, than his own limit to extend far more than his own l what they could do in the terrible strait to capital would have permitted; that, contents which they were reduced. His hair was nicely powdered and adjusted to letters of bancrupts, public and private alike a line, his pigtail was tied up with a new piece of riband and his best blue coat and white waistcoat shone without a speck. Mr. Deer was somewhat better, and sitting in a chair by the fire. Poor Mrs. Stanhope had come by the fire. Poor Mrs. Stanhope had come in to the parent's misfortune; the agony of the parent's misfortune; the agony of the parent for the downfall of his child; the sweet in to the error them as far as her sad heart would communisms and consolings of kindred affective. in to cheer them as far as her sad heart would communiage and consolings of kindred affection; the counsel and the confort, the care a gayer air, blew up the last spark of hope that lingered in their hearts. Mr. Pocock looked at Mrs. Stanhope as if he could have wished her away; but he was full of what he William Stanhope had very likely been se had to say, and would not delay it.

'My dear Mr. Deer,' he said, advancing into their little circle, 'and you, Mrs Deer, sent. And thus, for three long days, the least sent. And thus, for three long days, the least sent. Co. were bankrupts to the amount of more than a hundred thousand pounds. By the wise and strenuous efforts which Mr. Deer had made during those undappy four months to retrieve the affairs of his fiem, they were enabled to pay very nearly twenty shillings in the pound. But the beautiful house under the castle was advertised for sale: and the form her face towards it, rich furniture and plate were disposed of by auction; and Mr. Deer retired 3 asmall containing the foundation of the widow Stanhope.

The tears streamed from Mr. Deer's eyes, and the cried in a feeble voice, 'Anne, Anne, Anne, Anne, Annie had ever been; and the same gentle, unassuming, affectionate being she had ever been; and the good ing she had ever been; and the good of the little town where she continued to live called her, with great reverence, Mrs. Captain Stanhope—to her husband and here the castle was advertised for sale: and the door behind her opened, and Mrs. Stanhope—to her husband and here the castle was advertised for sale: and the face towards it, mined Annie dear to the last day of her life.
