POETRY.

Three Doves.

Seaward, at morn, my doves flew free.
At eve they circled back to me.
The first was Faith; the second, Hope;
The third—the whitest—Charity.

Above the planging surges' play,
Dream-like they hovered, day by day,
At last they turned, and bore to me
Green signs of peace through nightful grey.

No shoes forsook, no loveliest laid,
Their gentle eyes had left unshaded.
'Twas love of twilight helicopters
Or daybreak fires by heaven-breath fanned.

Quick visions of celestial grace
Neither wafted from earth's broad space,
Kind thoughts for all humanity,
They shone with radiance from God's face.

Ah, since my heart they choose for home,
Why loose them—forth again to roam!
Yet look; they rise! With loftier scope
They wheel in flight towards Heaven's pure dome.

Fly, messengers that find no rest,
Save in such toil as makes man blest;
Your home is God's immensity;
We hold you but at His behest.

SELECT STORY.

The Shadow of Nobility.

CHAPTER VIII.

ONE thing confirmed the Countess's decision, and even hastened its accomplishment: the effort made by her former gay acquaintances to draw her into fashionable society once more. This was pushed beyond the limits of decorum, and subjected her to considerable annoyance. After the first two or three months of seclusion proposals of marriage reached the beautiful young widow, which might have been flattering to a vain nature or less preoccupied mind. With a thrill of indignation she construed these epistles to the flames, only replying to one or two in the coldest and most formal manner, as a check to further pursuit. Other letters of a better tone there were, and among them one kind, sympathetic, brotherly; but no more. It was dated from Florence, and signed, "Your cousin George." Lady Noelthorne read it without a sigh; then opened an espartaco and placed it with other correspondence she wished to keep. She meant to reply to it some day.

But not a regret for the past assailed her now. It seemed as if, after being tossed about on a sea of wild alarm and restless striving, a great calm had settled down upon her spirit. And then, "come what come may," her lot was cast, her path in life was plain.

She forgot that to prolong life would be to prolong misery for her darling. One carriage had attracted her, though plain and quiet as any, and there was a momentary gleam of a face at the window, which seemed as a beautiful vision. The next minute she was clinging back from the foot-steps of nobility, yet, true to habit, plucking her trade with all the professional pleading. Now was this over and gone. There was nothing left her but a memory.

Mrs. Lamphrey, the late Earl's niece, understood the Countess better than any one else did at that time. One glance at the infant Earl sufficed to tell her the truth; the mystery was solved. But she felt too deeply for the young mother to betray this knowledge in any way. She never asked to see the boy, and Anais secretly marvelled at her want of interest. She forbore even to comment on the sudden departure from England, feeling that change of scene would be as beneficial for the watcher as the watched.

"I shall have the hardest part to bear," she said one day, as they talked together of this contemplated change. "If 'no man is a hero to his valet,' it is surely as true that it is hard to be a Christian in one's own family."

"You would not think of coming abroad with me?" put in Lady Noelthorne a little dubiously.

"No, my dear; my part is here. It would be a sorry beginning to run away from one's duties."

"Do you think I am evading mine?" she asked somewhat anxiously.

"I do not. I believe it is your duty to stay here."

The questioner secretly wondered how much her visitor knew. Mrs. Lamphrey was clever enough to suspect a great deal, she was aware.

"I never thought I should come to love you so well, Laura," said her ladyship sweetly.

her solicitor and bankers, saw her agent and the work was done. There only remained to write a farewell letter to her parents, for which her conscience smote her not a little. She could not consent to a personal interview with them, however, dreading her mother's plotting and planning, and the endless schemes to which a disclosure of her intentions would give rise. A goodly sum was paid to their credit in the bank, as which she made reference. After all, they were open to consolation.

There were few in England, large as her circle of acquaintances was, from whom the young Countess parted with pain. One was the late Earl's niece. She must say "good-by" to her; and—yes, to Faith Hailyard also.

The poor flower-girl was stricken to the heart at the prospect of her loss. It seemed to her that the sun must cease shining; the great pulse of London life would cease to beat.

"O, my lady!" she exclaimed, as the truth dawned upon her. "O, my lady!"

There was untold sorrow in the ejaculation. The disappointment and distress were so genuine that the Countess was moved. She little knew how desolate the young life would be.

"Faith," she said at last, "I have known a great sorrow. I would forget it—forget myself as much as possible. God has comforted me—you will be glad to tell your mother that—and I think I can serve and praise Him better in some other place than here, where there are so many people I know. I want to get away from people, Faith—away with God."

It was strange that she should venture an explanation to such a child,—a child not of her own rank and standing, but gathered out from the drops of the people, out of the mire of her surroundings. But this child had a heart and a conscience, and a soul which must be saved as her own had been. So the Countess was not too high of mind and station to lay her soft palm for a moment upon the bare, brown fingers of the flower-girl, with a whisper, "Do not forget me, pray for me still! When Fe recovered her self-possession, she found herself in the street, unconsciously clasping a tin packet, in which lay three gold sovereigns.

Poor Faith! She thought of the first time she had strolled into this hideous unknown grand quarter, partly because business in other places was overdone, and slack, and partly because she wanted to survey the mansions of the great. One carriage had attracted her, though plain and quiet as any, and there was a momentary gleam of a face at the window, which seemed as a beautiful vision. The next minute she was clinging back from the foot-steps of nobility, yet, true to habit, plucking her trade with all the professional pleading. Now was this over and gone. friend here."
"You will write to me, Anais?"
"Constantly, dear. O, Laura, what changes have come to us both!"
"It is the dawn of life," remarked Mrs. Lamphrey thoughtfully. "What will the outcome be? There must be development and progress, if it is real!"
"I used to think life was all a cheat," replied Anais. "I see now that it derives its value from its use alone, and it is indeed given us for a noble end."
"You speak of the term of natural years," returned Mrs. Lamphrey. "I have lately heard, only living 'sons' possesses."
"Ah, Laura, you know a great deal more than I do!"
"Yet it is my knowledge little, dear aunt. We have but just learned, as children might do, the Source whence wisdom flows. Still, Anais, you underestimate your intelligence. I often notice that you seem to have read a great deal, and that not altogether what is usually called light literature."
"I have read a good deal," was her ladyship's somewhat evasive answer. She was going to add, "It beguiled me when in trouble"; but, instead of this she said "I formed the habit when young."
"And you are old now?"
"No; I feel I have just begun to live."
"I met with a book of old proverbial sayings the other day," Mrs. Lamphrey said. "The motto of the Emperor Nerva was, 'A good mind possesses a kingdom.' We need not be less rich than he, Anais. At all events we are yet young, and may give our young lives to God to shape and use."
"Ah! such young lives are not 'idle ore.'" Out of the "central gold," out of the "fears and tears," comes forth true metal moulded to the Master's will.

"Laura," remarked the Countess with a smile, ere they parted, "do you know what is said to be the most curious thing in the world?"
"A woman who is not curious," was the laughing response. "Fair aunt, does it not say something in the Bible in commendation of a woman who has discretion?"

Then Lady Noelthorne knew that her secret was held by one at least beyond the narrow circle of physician and nurse.

CHAPTER IX.

The Urb—the City of Cities—Rome

The Countess of Noelthorne had come thither to please herself; to muse amid the ruins of fallen greatness or on the sunny slopes of the Campagna. On the latter she had her child; in the nave of St. Peter's she stood alone. Not the presence of worshippers or idlers disturbed her rapt security of soul. She could feel nought but the vastness, the sublimity, the awful Past the dread Unseen. She gazed with wonder and awe upon the creations of genius. Even the Mosses of Michael Angelo became to her earnest contemplation a living, sentient being, wondrous she dreaded to approach.

She had been in Paris with her husband soon after their marriage, but he had not gone to Italy. The Earl was suddenly recalled to town, and the intended tour out short. It was never completed; the birth of the heir and his alarming seizure precluded all thoughts of pleasure. Now for the first time she was to gain some practical knowledge of foreign cities and people.

Rome modern had few changes to the ancient and "Eternal" City transcended any previous conception. She did not know till then what a fervid imagination she possessed, what an intense love for the beautiful was in her nature. It was not the art of man that awakened and called it forth; it was rather Nature, which is "the art of God."

She was because "breathing Nature lives in every line" that the pictured treasures of palaces and churches possessed her fancy, and lived in her memory for years to come.

"Have you seen the St. Cecilia?" asked a lady whom she met at her hotel.

A look was sufficient answer. The Countess's mind was full of the sweet prostrate figure, with its hidden face and crown of martyrdom.

"How the presence of those vulgar tourists does annoy one!" continued the lady.

"Nothing annoys me," replied Anais simply.

It was literally true. She seemed to be living above every worry, even the nuisance of the beggars.

The next day she might have retraced her words; for, leaving a chamber of the Palace of Colonna, she came upon an English acquaintance.

"Sir Guy Hilbert!" she exclaimed, with that impulse common to all young travellers to greet any one from the fatherland as a friend.

"Lady Noelthorne!" was the eager reply, as the gentleman bowed low. "I did not hear that you had left town."
"A clear proof that I am not a notable person," was the smiling rejoinder. The gentleman might have looked a compliment; he certainly did not utter one, and this told in his favour. The next moment he was walking by the Countess's side, talking gravely and quietly, but not with obtrusive attention, and greatly contributing by his remarks to her enjoyment.

He was a man of noble bearing and distinguished presence, in the prime of life, a lover of art, and a painter of a mean merit. He knew where to touch the fine points and bring them out for her benefit.

"Beatrice de Canet," he said as his fair companion paused to gaze at the beautiful face upon the canvas. "I shudder to look at it. Let us pass on."
"Why?"
"To interest the Countess, to be allowed to linger by her side, was an object of the first importance to Sir Guy. He continued:

"You do not know her story? She endured the most cruel torture, and imprisonment in a frightful dungeon, protesting her innocence of a crime of which she was guilty. She even forced the innocent who had accused her as the instigator of the crime to retract his words, and preist in the denial to his death."

"But she was guilty?"
"Undoubtedly. But it is not from her guilt we shrink, but at the thought of her horrible endurance."
"Women can endure a great deal," remarked the Countess quietly.

There was nothing in the tone to give it a peculiar meaning, nevertheless Sir Guy Hilbert mentally made a note thereof. The beautiful young woman beside him, with her saintlike purity of mind and innocence of expression, had one thing in common with the guilty beauty in the picture—both had suffered. He looked down with a tender pity upon the one whose wrong he did not fathom.

Both were profoundly ignorant of church history, and knew nothing of Blaudina, the poor slave-girl of Rome who met a fearful death with a smile sooner than accuse her brethren and sisters in the Gospel. "We have done no wrong!"—the piteous protest was a noble utterance of truth, which it cost the most child bodily agonies to sustain. There came a time when the Countess of Noelthorne considered Romo Pagan and Pupal as "drunk with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus," but not then. Not with the first glamour of its art relies upon her did she realize the horror of its iniquity. Afterwards she visited the Catacombs, where the early Christians found a refuge and a tomb, and stood on the awful site whence so many professing her faith, beaten and stoned, and out of the midst of the fire, saw, like the first martyr, the "heavens opened, and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God."

But to return from our wandering.

"Have you seen the Farnese Palace and La Farnesina, Lady Noelthorne?" Sir Guy Hilbert is asking. "They are about the finest in Rome."

"Yes."

Then ensued some conversation about the genius of Michael Angelo, and the frescoes of Raphael and his compeers.

"Is there nothing I can have the pleasure of showing you? What about the fountains?"

"I have not seen those in the Borghe Gardens; only that of Trevi."

"Ah, that huge mass of rock-work and shell! Its lispid waters are reported to have curative powers."

The Countess did not reply. Of course she did not believe in their efficacy.

"German Syrup"

J. C. Davis, Rector of St. James' Episcopal Church, Bufala, Ala.

"My son has been badly afflicted with a fearful and threatening cough for several months, and after trying several prescriptions from physicians which failed to relieve him, he has been perfectly restored by the use of two bottles of the

An Episcopal scribe's German Syrup. I can recommend it with out hesitation." Chronic severe, deep-seated coughs like this are as severe tests as a remedy can be subjected to. It is for these long-standing cases that Bosche's German Syrup is made a specialty. Many others afflicted with this lad was, will do well to make a note of this.

J. F. Arnold, Montevideo, Minn., writes: "I always use German Syrup for a Cold on the Lungs. I have never found an equal to it—far less a superior."

G. G. GREEN, Sole Man'fr, Woodbury, N.J.

"Then you have not been to Fivoli?" went on her companion. "May I have the honour of acting as your guide to the Cascatelli?"

"Not having a valid excuse to offer, and rather glad at the prospect of escaping from the professional guide, the Countess assented.

She was thankful for the position in which he had placed her next day, and showed her appreciation of it by entrely forgetting him—by entirely forgetting herself, as she once had so wished to do.

ating class as usual occupied the front seats in college uniform. Revs. President Sawyer, Dr. T. A. Higgins and S. McC. Black, editor of the Messenger and Visitor, occupied the pulpit.

On Wednesday afternoon at 2:30 began the closing exercises of the Academy. The essays on the whole were well prepared and all delivered.

Mr Rogers described the great pyramid of Egypt its antiquity, its structure, its inner passages. In considering the purpose for which the pyramid was built, Mr Rogers adopted the theory that it was constructed by the guidance of Providence, solely from its symbolism.

Mr Tuffs took up in an interesting way the Chinese problem in U. S. He showed their history as citizens and laborers concluding from his investigation that the Chinese would justly be excluded from America.

out the rescuing power of temperance and its promotion by means of the systematic education of children. At the close of her essay Miss Prizelle received a handsome basket of flowers from the audience which she showed in the manner which her remarks were received.

The usual French essay was delivered and the subject was "Les Victimes Royales de la Revolution." Miss Annie M. Frazier of Penobscot, N. B., was the essayist.

On Friday evening a grand event took place in St. John's church on Wednesday afternoon at 4 o'clock, the occasion being the marriage of Mr. John Harvey (father of the Rev. Mr. Harvey) and Miss Susan Pratt, daughter of Mr. Geo. Pratt, of Wolfville. The bride-maid was Miss Mary Pratt, sister of the bride, and the best man was Mr. Percy Starr, of Starr's Hill. The bride looked charming in a dress of white silk, complemented with gold, while the bride-groom, also in white, with white bow tie and flowers, was very smart. The floral decorations in the church were most tastefully carried out by the many friends and well-wishers of the bride.

The Anniversary. SENIOR COLLEGE GRADUATION. At 11 o'clock, Thursday morning, the services, headed by the Faculty and other members of the Alumni, marched to the Assembly Hall. A large number had gathered to witness the Anniversary exercises of the College. Out of the twenty-five members of the class, eleven were selected to deliver orations. These were fully up to the mark and reflected the greatest credit upon the class. While Mr. Harvey was rising to call upon the first speaker, Rev. A. Chabon stepped to the platform and said that he had an announcement to make. He stated that the Senior class had presented the Governor with a fine portrait of Mr. Harvey, and on being unveiled drew forth bursts of applause. The portrait hangs in the center over the platform.

The first oration was on "The Athlete of the Greek" and the speaker was Mr. Ernest O. Chipman, of Tapperville. The Greeks were a people inspired by the spirit of the beautiful. The respect of the Greeks for athletics was compared with that of the present time. The development of an athletic sense depended upon moral constitution and not upon surroundings. The growth of the Hellenic sense of the beautiful was fostered by religion, scenery, athletic contests and political freedom. The result was a nation of poets, painters, architects and sculptors.

Mr. Arthur P. News-ome, of Wolfville, spoke on "Increase of Popular Influence in British Government." Englishmen inherit a love of freedom. Their ancestors, by vote of the people, elected their sovereign, not to rule, but to represent the nation. Popular influence extinguished by the Normans, reasserted itself and secured the Great Charter, established the House of Commons, and under the Stuarts became the preponderant power in Government. It began to assume its present form in the early days of George III by securing the freedom of the press, the right of free speech, and establishing organizations to consider political questions. Self-government has kept pace with general enlightenment. Hence popular influence promises to increase proportionately with the growth of public intelligence and uprightiness.

The third oration was on "Roman Imperialism." Mr. A. J. Crockett, of Hopewell, was the speaker. The original Roman government was municipal and fitted only for the affairs of a single society. As the people became wealthy, luxurious and debauched, they became unable, with this system, to cope with serious difficulties. They required a firmer rule and a more centralized government. Dictators were appointed, thus giving rise to a series of all-powerful military leaders. The new system developed into a vast military organization which defended the empire, controlled public affairs, and thus promoted peace, prosperity and happiness. The degeneracy which had come upon the people was not a result of imperialism. It was a terrible disease for which this was a necessary remedy.

Mr. J. B. Ganong, of Colling, N. B., spoke on "Education and Religion." He said that the most famous productions of antiquity, the grandest conceptions of the human mind in every age have found their origin in religion. Religious belief and morality had moulded the life and thought of nations of earlier days as well as those of modern times. Poetry and painting, sculpture and architecture, first developed their powers in the service of religion. Education and religion had wended their way through the centuries hand in hand. Completeness of life is not fully found in philosophy, in art or in science, but only in Christianity, in God.

"The New Way to the Orient" was the subject of the oration delivered by Mr. A. Y. Platon, of Wolfville. Trade between the East and West has been important and continuous. By the construction of the Suez Canal Europe obtained a short water route to the East. Canada has solved the problem of escaping the long sea voyage to the Orient by the construction of an inter-oceanic line of transportation—the Canada Pacific Railway. In view of past success and future promise, this railway and its line of steamers may well be termed "The New Way to the Orient." Historic lines of commerce and travel well in accord with the hurrying spirit of the age. It has opened for development the world's great remaining granary, and made a real union of the Canadian provinces. There is a bright future before Canada's great national enterprise, which assures the growth in stability and influence of our Canadian nationality.

The next speaker was Mr. Isaac Crombie, of Turbuck. His subject was "The Inventor." Mr. Crombie maintained the position that man is an inventor. The most primitive modes of life are replete with inventions as well as the highest degree of civilization. Industrious nations are most inventive because of the accurate observation in the sphere of labor and the specialization of the work. Our best gifts in a material or mental sense are the direct or indirect offspring of inventions. Necessity always finds inventors ready at her call. Circumstances make inventors of every one. Connected thought is possible to a larger degree because of the influence of inventions.

Mr. W. F. Blackhouse, of Bloomfield, N. B., gave a brief account of the life and labors of Mr. Spurgeon, touching the points relating to the work of the Pastor College, Blackwell Orphanage, almshouse and the organization of mission work. He spoke briefly on the points relating to Spurgeon as an author; to his supreme confidence in the Bible as a divine revelation, to his love of truth, his denunciation of the false and to the permanency of his doctrine and the place it will fill in history. Mr. Blackhouse said that the true spirit of Spurgeon's power was found in the fact that ever since his conversion he was a dweller "in the secret places of the Most High." He also maintained that since the world needs more men possessing the spirit and power of Spurgeon, and since the same spirit that immortalized his life is accessible to all, it is not too much for the Christian world to expect that others will be raised up to carry forward the work as recently laid down by the Prince of Preachers.

THE CONCERT. The concert given under the auspices of the Graduating Class last evening was one of the best ever given in Wolfville. Every seat in College Hall was occupied. The programme was an excellent one and rendered in an artistic and highly pleasing manner. We regret that our space will not permit a fuller description this week. The Olio Troupe Concert Company is a high-class musical combination, and the class of '92 are to be congratulated in securing them.
