That it is expedient to introduce a measure to constitute the department of forestry and rural development to be presided over by a minister of forestry and rural development who shall be appointed under the Great Seal of Canada; to authorize the appointment of a deputy minister by the governor in council and of such other officers, clerks and employees, as are necessary for the proper conduct of the business of the department, in the manner authorized by law; and to provide for the transfer of certain members of the staffs of the departments of forestry and of agriculture to the new department.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PROVISION FOR REVISION OF FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND TAXATION PROVISIONS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the revision of certain fiscal arrangements with the provinces and to provide adjustments of fiscal arrangements and taxation provisions consequential upon the provision of youth allowances to parents resident in certain provinces.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—REPORTED SECRET LANDING OF GREEK TROOPS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to bring the house up to date on the Cyprus situation. In particular, is there any foundation for press reports to the effect that 4,000 Greek troops have landed secretly on the island? If this is so, will this unexpected development have any effect on the continuance of the United Nations force and the Canadian presence in that force?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the situation in Cyprus is certainly not free from serious concern. The secretary general of the United Nations was in touch this morning with our representative at the United Nations. I was in touch with the secretary general before Sunday last, following the talks I had with the prime minister of Greece and the prime minister of Turkey. The secretary general of NATO is in Ottawa today and we are glad to have the opportunity of discussing this matter with him, particularly in view of his visit on June 4 to the governments of Greece and Turkey.

I cannot say whether the press reports mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition are exactly in accordance with the facts. There are reasons for believing, however, that there have been importations of one kind or another. Beyond that I do not want to go at this time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When I say I do not want to go beyond that, the right hon. gentleman will know in a matter of this delicacy that there are some things which should not be said until there has been complete verification. In view of my responsibilities I do not propose to make statements unless I am sure they represent the facts.

However, I will say that the introduction of regular army units by one or both sides involved in the Cyprus dispute would be contrary to the security council resolution of March 4, which calls upon all member states to refrain from any action likely to worsen the situation. It would be contrary also to the obligations undertaken by all members of NATO. If such regular forces from the mainland were introduced on Cyprus a new and dangerous situation would be created for the United Nations peace keeping force, as it has neither the mandate nor the strength to interpose itself between large, well equipped forces if hostilities should break out. Indeed, the force was not established for that purpose.

In my discussions with Prime Minister Inonu and Prime Minister Papandreou last week I stressed our concern over the possibility of such a development. I stressed the responsibilities of both Greece and Turkey to abide by their obligations to the United Nations and to NATO.

Our mission to the United Nations in New York has been instructed, as I have already indicated, to keep in close and continuous contract with the United Nations secretariat in order to make known our concern about the position of the Canadian contingent in the peace keeping force, because of the possibility that additional troops are being landed on Cyprus from the mainland. The Canadian forces participating in the United Nations peace keeping operation are under the command of the United Nations commander pursuant to the security council resolution of March 4. Any action taken by Canada will be as a member of the United Nations force.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, not only apparently is the matter very delicate, but after the verbose explanation by the minister I am sure the house knows less now than it did when the question was asked.

I should like to ask the minister this. When he had the conversation with the prime minister of Greece, did he have any indication that the Greek government intended to send any troops into Cyprus? I am rather surprised that the minister, after 48 hours, was unable to give any information as to whether these troops are there when all the influential press indicate that they are. However, I should like to ask the minister again, what was said in this regard? Was there any suggestion that such an eventuality would arise that would cause the Greek government to send troops?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am not going to be tempted in a matter of this importance to reply in kind. I regret that the right hon. gentleman should seek to ask questions which I do not believe are in the national interest or in the interests of preserving peace on that island.

Mr. Monteith: Oh, come off it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is utter nonsense.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend may not agree, but I must say that the hon. gentleman surprised me, particularly having in mind that he once held the post of prime minister of this country. There was nothing in our conversation in the way of an admission that Greek soldiers were participating or were infiltrating into Cyprus, as is implied in my right hon. friend's question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In view of the gratuitous observation, may I say to the hon. gentleman that the manner in which he carries out his responsibilities in parliament is not in keeping with his responsible role in this government.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he ascertained from the prime minister of Greece or from the secretary general of the United Nations the exact status of General Grivas, who states he is not accepting any official post in the Cyprus government and who is attached to the defence department of Greece, yet who the other day addressed a mass rally in the presence of Archbishop Makarios and announced what was virtually an ultimatum to Turkist Cypriots. What is General Grivas' status, and is he there with the consent and agreement of the secretary general of the United Nations?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The secretary general of the United Nations has, of course, no authority over the movements of an individual from one country to another. General Grivas is not in Cyprus with the consent of the United Nations, nor has his presence been formally opposed. The relations between General Grivas and Archbishop Makarios may be a matter of conjecture; I have my own views, but I do not believe that at this time it would be in the public interest to state those views.

Mr. Douglas: Could I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the intervention of General Grivas, who I understand is attached to the national defence department of Greece, is consistent with the resolution of the security council of the United Nations.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would not wish to answer that question specifically at the moment. I do not believe the general's statement is contrary to the resolution as such. Whether it is conducive to tranquility on the island may be a matter of opinion; there are arguments both ways. General Grivas has made an appeal not only to the Greek but also to the Turkish Cypriots involving an assurance of amnesty. This could be conducive to a relatively more satisfactory situation. It remains to be seen, however, what will be the full consequences of his statement.

The hon. gentleman will understand, I am sure, that in a matter of this kind it is neither possible nor desirable to expose fully one's knowledge and information or, what has been done in the situation. I assure the hon. member that the government is deeply concerned, as are members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the secretary general of the United Nations. Every step is being taken by all these bodies to avoid exacerbating a difficult situation in Cyprus.

Mr. Douglas: Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell us whether the Canadian government has expressed its concern about the activities of General Grivas to the secretary general of the United Nations for transmission to the government of Cyprus?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There has, of course, been the fullest consultation in all matters involving the maintenance of peace on the island.

MALAWI—CANADIAN ATTENDANCE AT INDEPENDENCE CELEBRATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will Canada be represented at the independence celebrations of the new state of Malawi next Saturday?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, sir.

CONGO—SAFETY OF CANADIANS FOLLOWING UN FORCE WITHDRAWAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question. Has he any further word to give the house concerning Canadians in the troubled area of the Congo? I understand the minister has constituents who have relatives in this area, as have I, and I was wondering whether there was any further information available.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I regret there is no further information. I am happy to say that some of those who were missing have been located in Albertville, but the exact location of the others has not been determined.

PARLIAMENT HILL

REQUEST THAT R.C.M.P. IN ATTENDANCE BE BILINGUAL

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, my question is intended for the Prime Minister and follows up two questions I have already asked on the same subject during the past month.

Could the Prime Minister tell us what progress has been made in his investigation concerning the bilingualism of R.C.M.P. officers on parliament hill and whether he will try to get bilingual officers to attend to the many tourists who take in the house sittings every day?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I must say that, having already been asked a question about that, I had a talk with the commissioner of the R.C.M.P., who told me that, inasmuch as it would be compatible with priority assignments of members of the mounted police, every effort would be made to ensure as complete and consistent a bilingual service as possible.

Mr. Grégoire: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware that, yesterday, as thousands of tourists came to parliament hill, the majority of members of the R.C.M.P. who were there to greet them did not speak a word of French?

[Text]

USE OF WORD "DOMINION" IN DESCRIPTION OF HOLIDAY CELEBRATION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Secretary of State. Can he tell us why the official program of yesterday's brilliant celebration on parliament hill had in it the words "celebration of Dominion day" when Canada is no longer a dominion?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I shall inquire of the people responsible for that publication and report later.

[Text]

[Later:]

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. If I might, I should like to congratulate him and through him his other colleagues who were involved in the very interesting Dominion day ceremonies yesterday. Can he say whether he and his colleagues have been able to arrange that the spectator stands be allowed to remain in position for the summer so that visitors may watch the colourful and entertaining changing of the guard ceremony?

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PROVINCIAL PARTICIPATION IN CURRENT ECONOMIC STUDY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Does the government intend to invite the provincial governments to take part in the investigation which he is planning on the economic ties uniting the various parts of Canada?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. This inquiry is being made by certain experts of the Canadian government for the Canadian government.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—U.S. MEMBERSHIP ON BOARD OF REVIEW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the announcement by Dr. Hugh Keenleyside, chairman of the B.C. hydro and power authority, that a five man Columbia board of review is being appointed to review the designs, sites, selection of construction material and plans for Mica, Arrow and Duncan dams in the Columbia basin, and in view of the fact that three of the members of this board of review are United States citizens and none are B.C. citizens, has the minister any information to give the house with respect to this most unusual announcement?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): This is obviously a question which should be addressed to Dr. Keenleyside and the government of British Columbia.

Mr. Herridge: A supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does the hon. gentleman agree with this type of action on the part of the British Columbia hydro and power authority as a result of which three senior engineers of the United States will be in a majority with respect to all these considerations affecting the Columbia?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure that, as a distinguished citizen of British Columbia, the hon. gentleman would be the first to criticize me if I were to comment on actions taken by the government of British Columbia in matters which come within its exclusive competence.

[Later:]

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I wish to address another question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the assurances given by him to the committee on external affairs that the sites of the dams were the best, that the construction costs were definitely known, and that the safety of the dams was known and satisfactory, would the minister inform the house whether he thinks it is necessary for the government of British Columbia to call in three United States engineers to clarify his assurances and to make sure he was giving the committee the facts?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, whatever might be my views or those of the hon. gentleman, this is a matter that does not arise under the responsibility of the government of Canada or the parliament of Canada. This is a matter for the province of British Columbia under section 92 of the British North America Act.

Mr. Herridge: As one more supplementary question, does the committee appointed by the B.C. hydro and power authority supersede the permanent engineering board on the Columbia?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course not, Mr. Speaker. The one is an obligation that arises out of the treaty and the protocol. The other is a subject that arises out of the discretionary use of the provincial authority.

[Mr. Herridge.]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour?

Could the minister tell the house whether it is true that the federal government, in conjunction with the Liberal government of the province of Quebec, directly supports the management of the newspaper La Presse in its dispute with the employees, in order to make that newspaper the official organ of the Liberal party?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is surely out of order.

INDUSTRY

TIMMINS—PROCESSING OF ORE FROM NEW MINING DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I would like to direct to the Minister of Industry. I regret not having sent him notice, but my secretary is on holiday; I have not had a replacement, and I am not a very good typist myself. My question arises out of the recent announcement with regard to the ore strike in Timmins, to the effect that this ore will be shipped to North Carolina for processing.

In view of the fact that the Timmins area has been listed by the government as a designated area, and in view of the growing need to encourage and stimulate employment in Canada and more particularly in such designated areas, could the minister inform the house what action his department or the government is taking to ensure that a smelter will in fact be built in the Timmins area to process the ore from this strike, which has been estimated to be in the neighbourhood of 300 million tons?

Mr. Speaker: This is a question for the order paper.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance and urgency of this matter I would like to have it transferred for debate at 10.30 tonight.

LABOUR RELATIONS

NON-OPERATING RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—INQUIRY AS TO CONCILIATION BOARD REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the meeting today of the presidents of the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. with the Prime Minister, could the Prime Minister tell the house whether the railways have rejected the recommendations of the conciliation board in the dispute between them and the non-operating railway brotherhoods; and if so, what action does the government propose taking to avoid a railway strike?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there was no question of rejection, in the discussion with the railway presidents, of the award made by the Munro commission.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question I would like to ask the Minister of Labour. Have the railways informed the government whether they have rejected or accepted the conciliation board report?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have received no notification of rejection or acceptance from the railways.

DISMISSAL OF CANADIAN SAILORS BY IMPERIAL OIL CO.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has his attention been drawn to the case of the ship Imperial St. Lawrence belonging to a wholly-owned subsidiary of Imperial Oil, which plies between Venezuela and Canada, which apparently docked at Portland, Maine and laid off the entire Canadian crew of 28 men, 14 of whom have been absorbed on other ships of the company and the remainder dismissed on the ground that their salary of $300 a month was too high and West Indians could be hired for $140 a month? I want to ask the minister whether he will look into this case and what action, if any, the government proposes to take to deal with such vicious treatment of seamen on a Canadian ship.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this case has been drawn to my attention, and I have asked the officers of the Department of Labour to investigate to see whether any constructive steps have been taken in the situation.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question. Will the minister be reporting to the house as to what action the government proposes to take in regard to this matter?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I will determine through this investigation whether there is any possible way in which we can intervene.

CANADIAN FLAG

REPORTED SUGGESTION BY FINANCE MINISTER RESPECTING DESIGN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Yesterday in London the Minister of Finance, when questioned about the proposed new flag, suggested that it would be a three maple leaf design on a white background with gold bars. I am wondering whether the colour and the design have been changed.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether the navy flag, the army flag and the R.C.A.F. flag are going to be replaced once the new flag is adopted by this house, or are the services going to continue flying the same flags that they have at the present time?

Mr. Pearson: That question surely is premature, Mr. Speaker, until we reach a decision on what the national flag will be.

FISHERIES

REPORTED U.S. INTENTION TO CALL WORLD CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. It is based on an Associated Press dispatch from Seattle in this morning's Globe and Mail covering a statement made by Senator Warren G. Magnuson. I would like to ask the minister whether the government has been informed of plans by the United States to call a world fisheries conference, including the Soviet union, for March or

April of next year; and if so, has Canada been invited to participate in such a conference?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, we have no knowledge of any such proposal. If the government received such a request from the United States, it would have to be considered.

SHIPPING

MEASURES TO CONTROL WATER LEVELS IN GREAT LAKES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Is the government prepared to take the steps required to regulate and control the water level in the great lakes in agreement with the provinces and the American states, as advocated by his parliamentary secretary in Montreal last Tuesday?

[Text]

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, what was indicated by my parliamentary secretary in Montreal was that discussions are going to be stepped up in this very important matter. It would be entirely premature to say now what action will be taken, but certainly this matter is before the public, it is regarded as a matter of urgency, and I think the I.J.C. probably will be taking a leading part at an early date.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In view of the intention of the government to refer general problems of water levels to the international joint commission with a view to examining the whole problem of the great lakes basin, will the government consider independent action with relation to the problems of lake Huron, which the conference assumed were much greater than those in other areas?

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, all these matters are under active survey at the present time, and have been for several months.

[Mr. Barnett.]

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

PROPOSALS RESPECTING ASSISTANCE TO UNDERDEVELOPED COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, with the approach of the commonwealth prime ministers' conference I should like to ask the Prime Minister what attitude he will take on behalf of the Canadian people regarding the suggestion made by Prime Minister Douglas-Home that the commonwealth should develop a system of technical assistance for underdeveloped countries within the commonwealth on a general rather than a bilateral basis. Also, what would be his attitude regarding the setting up of a commonwealth loan and development fund to enable assistance to be given to countries within the commonwealth, and thereby assure their economic advancement?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as to the first question, as my right hon. friend knows there is already effective machinery for technical and other forms of assistance within the commonwealth, and proposals which may be made at London to increase that assistance or to increase the effectiveness of the machinery will be given very sympathetic consideration by the Canadian government, having regard to the fact that we are already committed to assistance through the United Nations and in other ways.

As far as the second question is concerned, this proposal will certainly be given very sympathetic consideration, but again we would have to relate that to the forms of assistance we are already giving through the United Nations and through other sources.

REDISTRIBUTION

INQUIRY AS TO REPRESENTATIONS FROM SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether the government of Saskatchewan or Premier Thatcher has shown any concern or made any representations to him regarding the effect of the proposed redistribution on the representation from Saskatchewan?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Not to me, Mr. Speaker, but I will have to make inquiries whether he has made any representations to any of my colleagues.

SOCIAL ASSISTANCE

SASKATCHEWAN—PROPOSED REQUIREMENT THAT RECIPIENTS WORK FOR AID GIVEN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, might I ask the Prime Minister whether Premier Thatcher has made representations to the government to the effect that unemployed people should be engaged in profitable work; and what is the attitude of the federal government to the latest view enunciated by the new premier of Saskatchewan in this regard?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No such representations have been made to the government, Mr. Speaker.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

SUGGESTED STAMP DEPICTING RED ENSIGN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Millar (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Will the government give consideration to producing a Canada postage stamp depicting the red ensign?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will be glad to discuss this with the Postmaster General, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Millar: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the government used this method of advertising their own design, does the Prime Minister not think they should do this, in fairness to the people of Canada?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is out of order.

THETFORD MINES, QUE.—CONTRACT AWARDED TO HIGHER TENDER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My question of privilege at the moment is twofold. First of all, I do not want to cast any reflections on the house but I would ask the Speaker to cast his eye a little further over this way, because I have been trying to get recognized for three quarters of an hour. I have been the only one recognized in our group except the hon. member for Lapointe, and I was not recognized on three supplementaries.

My question of privilege arises from the statement of the Postmaster General on Tuesday, June 30, 1964, relating to a question I had raised in this house the day before. The Postmaster General has asked me to withdraw the words I used, namely:

> I agree, Mr. Speaker; the only thing I should like to get clear is that if the minister does not clarify the point he either lied to me or he is completely incompetent to do the job—

I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that the minister has clarified the point, and I hope no more contracts will be transmitted from father to son when they are on crown business.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

PENSIONS

CANADA PLAN—ADOPTION OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT—PRODUCTION OF WHITE PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the government ascertained whether the parliament at Westminster has yet passed the amendment which we requested to the British North America Act with respect to the inclusion of survivors' and other benefits in the Canada pension plan?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, but as a result of inquiries made over the week end we have been informed that the cabinet at Westminster are considering the matter this week with a view to finding time in their parliamentary schedule so this matter can be dealt with before the end of July.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Prime Minister give this house the firm assurance that the legislation respecting the Canada pension plan will be proceeded with and concluded during this session of parliament?

Mr. Pearson: It will certainly be proceeded with during this session of parliament, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot give an assurance that it will be concluded. We will certainly attempt to have it concluded.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Bring it on before the flag question.

Mr. Knowles: Will it be called early in any fall part of the session which may take place?

Mr. Pearson: That is our intention.

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question along the same lines for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister tell us whether a target date for the issuance of the white paper covering the national pension plan has been set and, if so, what that target date is?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it will be introduced in the house just as soon as it is available. We anticipate that this may well be next week, although I cannot give a definite date at the moment.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO REVISION OF BANKRUPTCY ACT

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice.

Are the officials in his department considering at the present time the amendments that could be made to the Bankruptcy Act?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Bankruptcy Act is being actively examined by the Department of Justice.

YOUTH ALLOWANCES

PROVISION FOR PAYMENT BETWEEN AGES OF 16 AND 18

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the payment of allowances of $10 per month to parents in respect of dependent youths between the ages of 16 and 18 years who are maintained by such parents and are attending school or university or are precluded from so attending by reason of disability.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Miss LaMarsh thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-108, to provide for the payment of youth allowances.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 30, consideration of the motion by Mr. Pearson:

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves joined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, at 10.30 p.m. on Tuesday I had suggested to the house a formula for the selection of a flag by means of a plebiscite, giving to the people five distinct choices. I contended that by this formula the final choice would be the design that received the largest number of votes. That is the preferential system. I also suggested that by using this method no hint of partisanship would remain like a dry and bitter ash once the fires engendered by this debate had died away.

In the remaining time left to me I wish to comment on a letter sent by special delivery mail and addressed to the Prime Minister, from 12 distinguished Canadians of varying academic disciplines and the professions. I suggest their views have been dismissed out of hand by the Prime Minister as being of no consequence. Their position, however, has been endorsed by the editor of the Canadian Commentator and also by several other academics and people of good will.

I suggest that the core of the trouble with the way the Prime Minister has attemped to foist his flag upon us is that little or no attention has been paid to the thoughtful efforts of interested Canadians to remind the government of the traditions which should be embodied in any design for a flag. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that rather than engendering in Canada any fervent feeling of patriotism and pride, the new flag will only produce a yawn of indifference.

Patrick Duncan, in writing of Jan Christian Smuts, the last statesman of South Africa, said something which I think might be applied with remarkable exactitude to the Prime Minister. He said:

I only wish I thought that his fine sentiments were more intimately hitched on to the springs which govern his actions. They do sometimes get turned on, but they spend much of their time in the cupboard of his soul.

The cupboard of the Prime Minister's soul has been a crowded and confused place of late as he repudiates those traditions of scholarship which were his first vocation.

I want to be very frank, Mr. Speaker. I am not at all convinced, or have not been convinced as yet by any argument I have heard, that the new flag will be a source of national unity; and if it is not that it is nothing. I am not all convinced that by tearing up the past we will in fact be adopting any formula which will bring inspiration to most Canadians in the future.

Most of the letters which have been sent to me by hundreds of my constituents are very reasonable about the flag. These letters show a remarkable desire for compromise, in that they indicate support for any flag which would include symbols representative of the best traditions of both the founding races. Obviously in my part of Canada these symbols would include the union jack, but are we about to turn our backs on this evidence of good will and select a flag which is neither a source of national unity nor unmistakably Canadian in character? Are the people I represent to be deprived of all their traditions and find a substitute is not even acceptable to their partners in other parts of Canada?

The letter to the Prime Minister puts it this way:

> The very essence of this country's history, and the reason for our national distinctiveness, has been the long and often turbulent marriage of French and English heritages. We have faith that in their depths Canadians pride themselves on this union, and on its parliamentary and non-revolutionary tradition. Canada has a continuous history of 350 years of French speaking and English speaking life together in North America, and 200 years of union. The creative tension between the two founding peoples has been a guarantee to other racial groups of their continued identity, in contrast to the American concept of the melting pot. These are the positive facts of our history; we cannot change them; they give Canada its sinews. The nation is strong enough to face its own past proudly, and to assert it. Whatever may be said about the use of the maple leaf as a Canadian emblem in the past, it has never gained anyone's vigorous allegiance, and it involves no commitment to the human fact of Canada.
> We believe that Canada has a distinguished culture of its own. We believe that this is a positive culture. We believe that the basis of this positive culture is a frank acceptance of both the English Canadian and French Canadian civilizations. We believe that a distinctive Canadian flag should reflect this positive fact.

It is not enough, I suggest, to use a flag to get rid of something, to repudiate the task or to deny the facts of history. We in Canada are becoming a nation of jellyfish, to use an expression of the late Dr. Sidney Smith. In an interesting speech at the University of New Brunswick in 1962 Dr. Frank Underhill recalled the suggestion made in 1865 by Henri Joly de Lotbinière, who proposed the adoption of the rainbow as our emblem. Dr. Underhill said that he himself "sometimes played with the idea of submitting his own design for a national flag to the authorities. It would consist of a green maple leaf in the centre, surrounded by Joly's multicoloured rainbows, the whole upon a background of pure white to signify our Canadian innocence of colonialism, imperialism, unitarianism, Americanism, capitalism, socialism and all the other 20th century sins."

The design proposed in the resolution before us, Mr. Speaker, is neither positive nor affirmative. It is an artificial attempt to honour an election promise hastily made. It is devious in that a palliative or sop is being offered in an obscure way by means of a second resolution to those whose views on flags can never be reconciled to the otherwise acceptable position taken on various aspects of policy by the government. Perhaps in the short run the new flag will find acceptance in Quebec but I predict that before too many years have passed it will be ridiculed and turned aside because of its utter failure to incorporate anything of the French heritage in its design. Pierre Elliot Trudeau is quoted in the Toronto Star of June 12 of this year as having said:

> Quebec doesn't give a tinker's damn about the new flag. The flag is a matter of complete indifference in Quebec.

The Prime Minister must bear the heavy responsibility of forcing the flag to become a contentious party issue. His sense of timing, I suggest, is little less than appalling. His sense of history is non-existent. His sense of magnanimity is totally absent. So, Mr. Speaker, both the founding races are going to be the ultimate losers if this new traditionless and septic flag is adopted, a flag proposed by a minority government because the latest techniques of opinion making falteringly urge it on.

What a sordid place this parliament has become. How denuded of any sense of relevancy. We who are asked by the vast majority of our constituents to stand by and honour our heritage are derided as somehow being against Canada itself.

I wish to end by recalling again the appeal to realism in politics by the group of seven young French Canadian intellectuals who are able to understand a concept beyond the narrow provincialism which is so much and so unfortunately a part of our land. They say:

> The most valid trends today are toward more enlightened humanism, toward various forms of political, social and economic universalism. Canada is a reproduction on a smaller and simpler scale of this universal phenomenon. The challenge is for a number of ethnic groups to learn to live together. It is a modern challenge, meaningful and indicative of what can be expected from man. If Canadians cannot make a success of a country such as theirs, how can they contribute in any way to the elaboration of humanism, to the formulation of the international political structures of tomorrow? To confess one's inability to make Canadian confederation work is, at this stage of history, to admit one's unworthiness to contribute to the universal order.

Miss Jewett: May I ask my hon. friend a question with regard to the earlier part of his remarks on Tuesday? I was very interested in his proposal to have five questions on a referendum. I wanted to ask my hon. friend if he would envisage the use of some kind of preferential voting system whereby one would knock off the least popular, the one that received the fewest first choices, then give the second choices to the others and gradually in that way build up to the one most popular choice.

Mr. Fairweather: If my hon. friend had been gripped as she should have been by my first remarks this afternoon she would have noticed that I used the phrase "preferential system". That is what I implied in my suggestion.

Miss Jewett: May I ask one more question?

An hon. Member: Not an argument.

Miss Jewett: No, just a question. I am really interested in knowing what the hon. member would do if some people only put down one choice. As my hon. friend knows, the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia used a preferential voting system, and that was why they abandoned it. People tend to plump for one thing. They only give one preference, with the result that you might get 20 per cent, 15, 15, and 20, with no majority at all. What would my hon. friend do in that case? How would he get them to put down their choices?

Mr. Fairweather: I cannot presume to speak for the people of Canada on how they would vote or not vote on what to me is a reasonably simple selection of five alternative choices. If people want to use the system known in New Brunswick as the plumper I have no real criticism of that system.

[Mr. Fairweather.]

Mr. Joseph P. O'Keefe (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have been a Canadian for just over 15 years, and my feeling is that too much has been made in Canada of issues that tend to divide when the emphasis should be on the things all Canadians have in common, the things that should help, even impel, us to unite. If I did not believe with all my mind that a truly Canadian flag would help to unite all Canadians, particularly all future Canadians, I could not in conscience support this resolution. We must look at this flag not only with our eyes but with our intelligence and our imagination.

I feel that new Canadians in Newfoundland see this flag situation in a better perspective than may be available to others; and these new Canadians, nearly 80,000 of whom are my constituents, are asking this question and are waiting for an intelligent and satisfactory answer. Should the flag be an issue? I think it should, even although this government's decision and solution may be regarded by some as a political compromise. Even if that view is correct, what is wrong with this kind of a solution? It has been tried successfully all through history.

A distinctive flag is adopted for the purpose of international recognition. I am confident that it will, in time, become a truly national symbol. There is a good argument in favour of this resolution which those who prefer the red ensign and the union jack may acknowledge, since they are not denied the right to fly a flag of their own sentimental preference. On May 20 I signed a telegram addressed to my Newfoundland constituents which read:

> I am prepared to support a national flag which cannot be mistaken for the emblem of any other country, provided official recognition is also given to the union jack as a symbol of Canada's membership in the commonwealth and of our loyalty to the crown.

I believe, with all the sincerity of which I am capable, that now is the time for Canadians to fly a flag that is truly distinctive; a flag easily recognizable as Canada's own, easily identifiable; a flag that cannot be mistaken for the symbol of any other country; a flag for our Canadian future which recognizes and honours the past; a flag that has little new but contains all the best of the old. This, I believe, the new flag does.

May I emphasize that when I made my decision on this matter it was not necessarily my own, personal preference. I attempted to make a choice, not for myself, indeed not just for my constituents in Newfoundland but, as a member of parliament should, for the whole of Canada. I have always accepted and indeed, as a Newfoundlander, supported the union jack and, as a Canadian, the red ensign. But when there was, as there is, presented to parliament a flag which I believe to be more representative of Canada and Canadians as a whole, especially when looking into the future, then I gave, and I am giving my support to the adoption of this flag.

I happen to be a Roman Catholic of Irish descent. Despite the quietening effect of the passing years, memories of old world strifes, of wrongs and of bitter oppression are not easily forgotten. We still read history. There are those of us who remember. My Irish forebears gave up most of their possessions to live in rugged Newfoundland, where living has never been easy. In many cases, even here oppression and bigotry followed them. Where indeed, a little more than 100 years ago it was a crime to even live. Great and heroic men took part in the early colonization of my island, and the glory which their names shed on its history should never be forgotten. A knowledge of the changes, the struggles and the suffering through which my people of Newfoundland passed can never fail to be one of deep and abiding interest.

It may be of some interest to our Quebec friends to know that there was a time when Newfoundland actually helped to save not just Quebec but Canada. It was late in the eighteenth century, when in a moment of crisis, with the American invaders at the gates of the city of Quebec, Captain Colin Campbell of the volunteer force known as the royal highland emigrants sailed to St. John's. There, in spite of other demands on the island's manpower for the defence of the port, he succeeded in rallying 180 men to his cause. Quebec was then only a town of 1,000 people and was defended by 100 volunteers. They faced much superior forces from the United States led by Benedict Arnold and Richard Montgomery. Talk of surrender filled the town; in fact all seemed lost until 130 of the Newfoundlanders arrived on the day before Arnold's men appeared at Levis across the river from Quebec. History records Lanctot as saying:

> Without the added strength of these 130 fighters —the recruits were all such to a man—the town might have capitulated for an active movement was on foot advocating friendship with the Americans.

The Newfoundlanders made all the difference and Lanctot ended his paper by saying:

> Now that Newfoundland has joined the Canadian confederation, it is doubly worthy to recall that the two oldest British colonies have in common the pride of having joined and fought to save Canada from foreign domination.

No one would deny that we have a tradition and a responsibility to the past. But we have also a greater responsibility to the present and to the future. I suggest that responsibility to the past would be best fulfilled by our being true to its real substance and its meaning. Like many others I am concerned about this whole question of national symbols, national anthems, a national flag and all they mean to our country. Yet I am far more concerned with making Canada the kind of country where injustice, grinding poverty, and so on to the best of our ability have been vanquished and where freedom, social justice and equal opportunity for every Canadian can be found, the kind of country which may be proud to have a flag fly.

The union jack will not be abolished, any more than the union jack was abolished when the red ensign was adopted. Canadians, Newfoundlanders or anyone else, cannot be forced to fly any flag. I expect to see the union jack flown now more than at any other time in our history. I can understand the British feelings of the wonderful ladies of the I.O.D.E. I can understand the intensity of the emotion of our gallant war veterans, so honoured in war and so often forgotten in peace. I am not a war veteran. I did enlist, but I was rejected.

I might point out, too, the experience of one of the newest states of the United States, Hawaii. This state, as you know, was at one time British. It is now part of the United States, yet the union jack still proudly flies over all the public buildings in this state.

In my opinion the flag issue will move along these lines. Our new flag will be adopted. This resolution will be passed. Within 50 years, or perhaps much sooner, it will be considered rather odd, rather quaint that Canadians ever lived under a flag that could be confused with that of another country. What will be remembered is that this Prime Minister, Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, of whom so many of us are so very proud, did the job when Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir John J. Abbott, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Arthur Meighen, Mackenzie King, Alexander Mackenzie, Sir John Thompson, Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Robert Borden, R. B. Bennett, Louis St. Laurent and John Diefenbaker did not. It is no easier for him now than it would have been for them. It is my earnest hope, indeed my sincere conviction, that under this distinctive and truly Canadian flag, in which is contained little new and only the best of the very old, Canadians will eventually, at long last, unite.

Canadian Flag

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Speaker, I deem it my duty as a member of this house and as the elected representative of the constituency of Wellington-Huron to speak against this resolution and in favour of the amendment calling for a plebiscite.

First, however, I should like to take this opportunity to join other members in the house who congratulated the Minister of Public Works and his department on the beautiful arrangement and display of flags we saw about the lawns of parliament hill for our Dominion day celebration. I cannot but feel that any Canadian who saw that display was proud of that beautiful flag flying as it was yesterday and the day before. I cannot really believe there are many Canadians who would not like to see that display left for the summer period during which the guard is changed in that fine ceremony every morning of the week. Those flags make a beautiful background to the ceremony. The red ensigns, the red coats of the guards and the green grass make a combination of which we can be very proud. I cannot but think that a great many of the people who saw that flag flying did not have in their hearts the hope that it would fly permanently as Canada's distinctive national flag.

Therefore I should like to add my views to those of all hon. members who have spoken before me to plead with the Prime Minister and the government to reconsider the course of action which has been advanced. That course was outlined in the words of the right hon. gentleman when he said "In any event, when the matters I have mentioned are dealt with we shall return to the flag resolutions, and the debate on those resolutions will be continued until a decision is reached".

This reminds me very much of another parliament and another extended debate. I refer to the defence production debate of 1955. Those of us who were here at that time will have vivid recollections of that particular debate in which one of the very distinguished cabinet ministers in this house, a man who had proven himself as a wartime administrator and as one of the greatest organizers of wartime production this country has ever seen, showed that he was not able to change from wartime to peacetime ideals. During the war he had been given extraordinary powers so that he might harness the facilities and production machinery of this nation for military purposes, and his political downfall was due to his failure to adapt to peacetime circumstances. I refer to the late Right Hon. C. D. Howe who, I repeat, was a distinguished member of this house. The attitude of the Prime Minister, as exemplified in the words I have just quoted, is the attitude which helped bring about the political downfall not only of that fine gentleman but also of the Liberal party in 1957 and 1958.

We all remember some of the phrases coined at that time, and one of the outstanding ones was "If we want to do it, who is going to stop us?" Does this not smack of the words used by the the Prime Minister just the other day? Another well known phrase I can remember the Liberal benches repeating in those days was "We shall let the people decide". This is what is involved in the amendment now before us, that in this great debate we should let the people of Canada decide.

I am reminded of a story I used at that time. It is the story of a traveller who was lost on a back concession of one of our townships one wet, rainy night. He saw a light in the distance, headed for the light, and found refuge in a farmhouse for the night. In the morning he woke up, looked out of the bedroom window and was amazed to see the whole countryside covered with water. He was also amazed at an occurrence which he could not understand; when he looked out the bedroom window he saw a straw hat going up and down, back and forth, in front of the house. When he went downstairs he asked his host for an explanation. The reply was "Oh, that is just grandpappy. Last night before he went to bed he said 'Come hell or high water I am going to cut the grass tomorrow.'" That is the attitude this government is displaying in relation to this flag debate; come hell or high water we are to stay here, whether there is a summer recess or not, until such time as this flag debate is completed.

We also remember how that debate was finally brought to a conclusion. The minister of trade and commerce—the minister of defence production—was conveniently away on government business for two or three days, and during that time the prime minister brought in an amendment limiting the duration of the emergency powers contained in the bill to three years. I am happy to say that when this period expired our party was in power, and nothing more was heard about emergency powers after that.

Mr. Speaker, this is an important debate. It is a debate in which I feel every member of the house should participate. It is a debate in which all the people of Canada are interested. It would appear that despite all appeals to his better judgment by Canadians of integrity, as well as by many organizations, the Prime Minister intends to proceed to a conclusion with the threat of "no summer recess" hanging over the heads of all members.

My feelings in connection with this issue are well known both in this house and in my constituency. My feelings in favour of the red ensign are well known, because I had a resolution on the order paper last year indicating that I was in favour of the red ensign as Canada's distinctive national flag. I have had tremendous support from my own area in favour of this stand, as is indicated by the many letters I have received from Legion branches, I.O.D.E. groups and other organizations, editorials in weekly newspapers and a resolution from my own county council in the county of Wellington. I may say the council passed the following resolution. I will not quote the entire document; the important part is:

> Be it therefore resolved that the council of the corporation of the county of Wellington hereby recommend that the "Canadian red ensign" with the shield of the Canadian coat of arms in the fly be adopted as the national flag of the dominion of Canada and that copies of this resolution be forwarded to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada, the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. Maurice Lamontagne, Secretary of State, and that further copies be forwarded to the lieutenant governors of all the provinces in the dominion, to Mr. Alfred Hales, M.P. and Mr. Marvin Howe, M.P., to Mr. C. C. Sparline, dominion president of the Royal Canadian Legion and to all county councils in the province of Ontario.

I am happy to say this resolution was endorsed by the other county I represent, the county of Huron. That is an indication that I have the backing of my own people in connection with my stand. However, after talking to many of these people at home I have come to the conclusion that had the Prime Minister carried out the decision he made on May 12, 1964, members of the Legion, members of the I.O.D.E. branches and even my county council would not take precisely the position they do today. I will quote the right hon. gentleman's words. He said:

> When the time comes to submit the decision of the government in this matter to the House of Commons I would hope every member of the house would vote as his conscience dictates and that there would be no question of confidence or of non-confidence in a party sense.

As I say, after talking to people in my area I believe that had the Prime Minister agreed to a free vote on this question in the house, and had the new flag which he endorses been approved by the house on that basis, then all the people I have mentioned would have accepted the decision because they believe in the traditions which are associated with those grand old flags, the union jack and the red ensign and, for this reason, they would have accepted a flag which had been approved after a free vote.

However, that is not to be. As has happened so many times, the vacillations, the changing attitudes of this government have been of such a degree that we never know what is coming the next day. Those who talk about the new flag and are in favour of it indicate that there is something in particular in the design for new Canadians. They say that the new Canadians who have come to Canada within the last number of years are not in favour of the flag we have at the present time. Once again I can refute that statement with evidence I have from my own riding. I am very happy to say I have received a letter from a lady in one of the communities of my riding. This letter is from Harriston and is dated May 22, 1964, addressed to me:

> I am not in the habit of writing to my member of parliament unless the issue is important. This one is.
> It is the issue of a new flag versus the red ensign. It looks like we shall not be given a chance to express our opinion on the flag, because Mr. Pearson intends to keep that one of his election promises.
> I am therefore writing to you as the only chance to vote on this issue. I am very much against any new flag and sincerely hope that we will retain the red ensign as our national flag.
> As a former German citizen I have not found it difficult, upon becoming a Canadian, to swear my allegiance to this flag and can see no reason for desiring a new one.
> My husband also thinks this way. We have no intention of ever flying anything but the red ensign.
> Yours very sincerely,
> Rita Bedell.

That is a letter from a former German citizen who came to this country in the last few years. I also have before me a petition that was circulated in the village of Drayton. In that village there are a great many people from the Netherlands who have settled there. A great many of the names here endorsing the red ensign are of people who came to this country realizing that this is our national flag. The petition reads as follows:

> To: The honourable the House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled
> The petition of the undersigned humbly sheweth:

That because a meaningful national flag demands the broadest possible acceptance, recognition, and respect

That in the interests of the greatest possible measure of national unity,

They do most earnestly and urgently beseech that the question of a national flag be democratically resolved by granting every Canadian the right to vote on this vital matter by means of a national plebiscite.

And your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray.

This is a petition signed by a great many people, as I said, in one of the communities of my riding, and a great many of the names appearing in the petition are of Dutch immigrants.

In connection with this immigration problem and the fact that it has been suggested that these people might be in favour of a new flag, it is interesting to note that all prospective immigrants to Canada have been informed by the department of immigration as follows:

The flag used as distinctive of Canada is properly described as the red ensign with the shield of the coat of arms of Canada in the fly. The flag consists of a red field, with the union jack in the first quarter next to the staff. The inclusion of the union jack signifies Canada's association with the other members of the British commonwealth of nations. The coat of arms bears the emblems of the four countries from which the original settlers of Canada were chiefly drawn—the three lions of England, the lilies of France, the lion rampant of Scotland, and the harp of Ireland, together with a branch carrying three maple leaves, the special emblem of Canada.

As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, that is the information given to all prospective immigrants to this country. The Prime Minister has put forth many arguments to condone his actions, one of which is the idea of keeping an election commitment. There were many commitments made, and I am just wondering whether the commitment made by the Minister of Agriculture is going to be kept one of these days. I refer to the commitment to bring in quarterly deficiency payments for agricultural products, which is something that would be of great assistance to the egg producers of Canada at the present time. I well remember how during the election campaign candidates ran up and down the side roads and into the small communities of my area talking about another commitment made on behalf of the Minister of Industry. This was that the Department of Industry was going to bring industry into all the little towns that had been crying for it for years. That was a commitment made by this government, and I wonder when it is going to be kept.

As the hon. member for Marquette said the other day, the highways leading to Ottawa are paved with election commitments which have never been kept. So the argument that this is an election commitment does not hold any more water than do a great many of the arguments which are being put forward in connection with this flag. This is the reason the Canadian people all across this country are wondering why this legislation is being given such importance at a time when more important matters should be considered. This was pointed out over a year ago in an editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail of May 22, 1963, headed "A silly issue":

Prime Minister Lester Pearson promised the House of Commons last week that his government will propose the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag within two years. And so, once again, the issue of a national flag has been grasped and promises made—to what end?

Surely we are not so politically immature as to think that keeping or discarding the red ensign or creating an entirely new design is in any way related to the practical degree of our independence. It would be dispiriting to think that people still believe that the loyalty of Canadians would in any way be affected by the colour arrangement on the flag flying on parliament hill.

There are muted suggestions that the separatist tendencies in Quebec might be curbed if the red ensign were replaced by another flag, perhaps with a fleur-de-lis on it. Mr. Pearson should know by now that Quebec cannot be bought, and certainly not with a new flag.

In this age of internationalism the question of a national flag is irrelevant, time-wasting and more than somewhat silly. Mr. Pearson has more important things to deal with than the various ways in which crosses, stripes, and assorted animals and other symbols can be arranged on a piece of cloth.

That article was written over a year ago, and the same thing holds true today. Yes, Mr. Speaker, there is a time for doing things and a time for leaving them alone. The autocratic manner in which this resolution was introduced has definitely created a feeling of animosity throughout the whole country. I was reminded of the debates in 1955 and 1956 when the Prime Minister spoke the other day at the beginning of this debate. I could not help but remember what had been said about trained seals when I heard the regulated applause on that side of the chamber every time the Prime Minister made some announcement in connection with this flag. It reminded me, as I say, of the autocratic, overbearing attitude of that former government, which led to its downfall.

Then there is the question of unity. How much will this new flag add to the unity of Canada? I feel that the actions of this government have not in any way improved the conditions of disunity which seem to have become more grievous since this government came into power. The royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism, by the very nature of its proceedings and meetings, has done nothing to bring about unity in Canada. This flag debate has aroused feelings of animosity throughout this land which will take generations to heal. I would like to quote from an editorial which appeared in one of the newspapers of my riding. In the issue of the Drayton Advocate for Thursday, May 28 there is an article entitled "The great-grandsons of confederation". This article reads as follows:

> Unity should be the ideal of every nation. A disunited nation is an impotent one. Here in Canada the Prime Minister has given as his reason for repudiating the Canadian red ensign that by so doing we will be a more united nation. As his choice of a national flag he tells us it should contain no reference to the British and French founders of this nation. When he talks on the flag issue, Mr. Pearson is emphatic that unity demands a national symbol that makes a clean break with our past.
> At other times, and especially in the appointment of the royal commission on biculturalism and bilingualism, he tells us we must recognize our great British and French traditions. It is little wonder that the Canadian people find the Prime Minister's assertions confusing. Almost in the same breath he is telling us to recognize our past and at the same time to dismiss it.
> The strongest possible reason for retention of the Canadian red ensign is that it recognizes our national roots as an inspiration for the future. Canada has been too unaware of its history. A visitor to our newspaper office the other day looked up at the picture of the fathers of confederation that has long hung there and said, "It isn't even in our school books now".
> However, if everything goes amiss at Ottawa, by the time this is printed the Canadian red ensign will be headed for oblivion in the belief that "unity" will come from a switch in heraldry.

This editorial speaks for itself, Mr. Speaker, and substantiates my argument that this new flag will in no way bring about greater unity in this land of ours.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I appeal once again to the Prime Minister to alter his course of action and allow a free vote to the representatives of the people of Canada, rather than to pursue an overbearing and autocratic course of action which, by promoting symbols which deny our historical, spiritual and national traditions, will not improve the unity of our nation.

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I have to speak on this resolution concerning the flag, because I have received more than 5,000 letters from my voters on this matter, asking me to stand up for an exclusively Canadian flag.

As an hon. member said here, at the start of this discussion, we are now living historical moments, which will be written in the great book of this country's history as the crucial minutes in which the survival or the agony of Canadian confederation was decided.

In order to place this discussion in its historic context—which, for some, may be somewhat sentimental, but which we all recall with a certain nostalgic feeling—this country was without a flag for many long years and, during the last conflicts, 28 nations pooled their arms, their resources and their human potential for what was called the fight for civilization and freedom.

Each of those countries had its own identity, each was proud of its regiments, its personality and the symbols by which it was represented.

Alas. Canada, a political embryo, England's ill-nurtured offspring, had no distinctive flag. Yet, Canadians were as proud and brave as the other soldiers of other nations. Our feats in battle prove that we were right there in the fray so that other countries might preserve their freedom and their flag, and not be overpowered by the enemy.

When victory came, every country hailed by the crowds carried its own flag, muddy and torn, but the more cherished by the people. Glory and valour took shelter underneath that standard which remained to bear witness.

Canadians, where were we? Did we have the right to remain incognito, when so many sacrifices had been made by the nation as a whole? Should not our politicians have been conscience-stricken when, on parliament hill, among all the flags of the United Nations, the Canadian flag was conspicuous by its absence?

The union jack led Canadians into battle. But the union jack is Great Britain's flag. Salute it proudly, if you wish, but Canada is not England. The union jack cannot be Canada's flag.

As Canadians, we have all paid our debt to our mother countries, and it shows no lack of respect toward the institutions that have guided us to give evidence of maturity today, to show that we have learned our lesson and that, on our own, we are able to organize our structures and our national life at all levels. If we recognize "God Save the Queen" as the royal anthem in Canada, why not recognize "La Marseillaise" or the national anthem of the U.S.A.? If we recognize the union jack, why not recognize the American star spangled banner as a friendly flag and a tangible evidence of the American economic presence in our country? It is enough for the American people to know that we respect their symbols; it is not necessary to impose them on us to satisfy the fanaticism of some, the ancestral nostalgia of some others and the immaturity of all of them.

But we know that the flag will not be the wealth of the country.

We also know that it will not help Canadians who have run into debt, that it will not give bread to anyone, that it will not protect Canadian families from cold or want, that it will not raise family allowances, and that it will not have any bounteous effect on the country.

The flag will not settle the problem of our farms which are mortgaged up to the hilt, so much so that farmers have to find other employment besides farming. Big landowners will still exploit the people and small landowners will still be money collectors for the exploiters.

We will have, once again, with more determination than ever, under the shade of the flag, to undertake the economic reconquest of Canada; otherwise political reconquest, symbolized by the proposed flag, will only be a faked Canadian emancipation.

We, Canadians, hope that this flag will offend the oppressors, the mealy-mouthed and sanctimonious governments and politicians, the unscrupulous zealous and make them more respectful of justice, so as to restore their rights to the people and their cultural and ancestral heritage to individuals.

We are proud to endorse the resolution concerning a distinctive flag, but we are determined to discard the union jack.

We want "O Canada" as an anthem, but we are unwilling to recognize "God Save the Queen" as Canada's anthem on any score. We shall always honour this flag and this anthem only as those of England.

For us, this new flag is a symbol of hope in the triumph of freedom, and we reject any attempt to hold us back and to compel us to take one step forward while looking back.

In a country where people understand democracy, the problems of the multitude are tackled before the individual interests. We hope that this flag will be a symbol of freedom, security and a vital minimum for all.

[Mr. Latulippe.]

Many Canadians who are living here remain fond of other countries. To accept two flags and two national anthems in Canada would justify the stand of separatists and many Canadians who cannot bear a compromise not to say degradation.

For a thing to be distinctive it must be without any connection, independent, free and a complete whole in itself. Such is not the case of the proposed flag, since the acceptance of two flags suggests the idea of dependence.

It is useless to try to deceive the people. With that second flag, we dress up the Canadian political skeleton which remains without substance. Until we repatriate the constitution to break any direct link with England, our symbols of an adult Canadian life will remain only smokescreens in front of a half dead colonial reality which still has some trembling movements.

We have proven today to the other countries of the world that we lack political maturity, that our initiative is limited to motherly instructions, that we are still only colonials dreaming of national unity but who, caught at their own game, do not have the necessary maturity to get for themselves the essential tools to acquire that unity, namely the conscience of a Canadian entity without ties and without compulsion.

Let this flag be the hope that our common efforts to build a united Canadian nation, in line with international and national realities, will be put in concrete form, a symbol that could endear itself to all Canadians regardless of their origin.

Adapting to this debate the words of the late President Kennedy, I say: Let us ask ourselves not what this flag can do for us but what we can all do for the flag, particularly for what it must stand for, a proud and united Canada, a Canada aware of her national life.

For some years now, French Canada has been playing an increasingly greater part among modern nations. New responsibilities must therefore be assumed by our people.

It must cultivate the wisdom to give without vexing others and to receive without giving up any of itself. For a nation which has reached adulthood, it means taking conscience of itself before others. It means going on with the dialogue between equals, starting new exchanges.

Since the French Canadian nation has decided to develop more than ever its numerous resources and to expand as much as possible, while taking into account its collective responsibility, it must show great respect for the whole of mankind while doing it; to become what we are, we must be attracted by what we are not.

One is different only with regard to others, and to serve them the whole of Canada must develop its own personality so that its human values can express themselves for the greater benefit of all after everyone's contribution has been added to them.

Therefore, the love of the nation for that flag must be actively encouraged. The progress of institutions working for the advancement of other nations must also take place in that concept.

Of course, we must first of all be charitable to our neighbour.

That flag should help us to remember all those underdeveloped nations where man lives under conditions which are indeed a denial of his dignity.

That noble flag should really fulfil the true yearnings of the nation, but justice does not simply mean to refrain from doing wrong to others; it means also to help them to the best of our ability.

If a nation really wants to be strong and respected, it must serve at all times the cause of justice, claiming its rights with energy and respecting with equity the rights of others.

The Canadian nation, because of its particular political situation, cannot turn a deaf ear to the cause of justice.

On that score, an investigation of the exact nature of our cultural and political community is required as a necessary preamble. We must also try to establish and take advantage as clearly as possible of the legitimate aspirations of the nation.

Highly qualified men must try to discover all the implications and possibilities of unalienable rights and strive for recognition of those that have not been asserted, regain those which may have been withdrawn. Everyone must strive always to respect the dignity of others in this fight for one's rights.

A true and authentic patriotism which respects justice requires that each citizen honestly accomplish his daily task.

Any claim respecting rights which ignores the corrective duties may end up in a frightful hoax. It is only when each individual carries out his work with competence, when his intentions are pure and when his work is continuous that a people can claim its rights. Justice cannot be established in passion and confusion.

This, hon. members, is of perspective in which we should envisage this matter of establishing a distinctive Canadian flag, as a serious-minded member should do, a member who wants a flag that will represent something true to his people, that will symbolize all the greatness and the nobility of his heart and mind.

We should stop being bellowing politicians, hungering for votes, and we should try to be statesmen, hungering for the welfare of our people and the greatless of our country. Is that not, for each one of us, the mandate entrusted to its representatives by the nation?

[Text]

Miss Pauline Jewett (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my personal feelings about the flag are quite simple. They are summed up in those immortal words we used as school children: "The maple leaf, our emblem dear, the maple leaf forever". I shall not however break forth into song on this occasion.

Mr. Mandziuk: The old version?

Miss Jewett: Whether the flag should have one maple leaf, as has been suggested, a cluster of three maple leaves or something that has not yet been widely canvassed, 10 leaves, is of less moment than the basic maple leaf concept itself. Ten leaves actually might be rather good. For one thing, such a flag would enable us to add more leaves should the spirit of manifest destiny seize this nation once again. For another thing, I think, 10 leaves would give greater scope for artistic expression, although I realize that members of parliament should not go too far in the sphere of artistic expression after our world fair symbol experience.

I am quite happy, very happy in fact, with the cluster of three maple leaves. The fact that it has historic and heraldic significance, as has been pointed out many times in the house, the fact also that it has the sanction of nature, seem to me decisive. However, the fact that I personally prefer the maple leaf concept, and in particular a cluster of three maple leaves, is not of course really relevant. Like all of us, I have been getting a great number of letters both pro and con on this subject, and the fact that a great number of my constituents prefer and favour the maple leaf concept is surely not the main point either. As has been stated by speakers on both sides of the house in this debate, the main point is surely that we adopt in this house that flag which will unify and not divide us as a nation. This is the crux of the whole issue it seems to me, and indeed so many speakers have referred to this that my feeling is that the majority of members regard the basic question as what will help most to unify Canada, what will least divide us—

Mr. Mandziuk: Drop the subject.

Miss Jewett: —as by far the most important question. We as members of parliament are here to make a decision on this matter, as we try to do on all other matters in the economic, social and other spheres. It is particularly important in a matter like the flag because, as we all know, a flag is and must be a national symbol. It must say something to all parts of the nation. Above all, it must not go totally against the grain of any significant part of the nation.

I submit that the new maple leaf flag does not go totally against the grain of any large part of the nation. I realize that it is not universally loved. Many of my constituents have written to tell me that they would prefer to have the red ensign. My constituency is a largely Anglo-Saxon one. Indeed, my own people on my mother's side settled there in the late 18th century as United Empire Loyalists. But what I have noticed from my correspondence and from my conversations, and they have been many, with the supporters of the red ensign in Northumberland is that, with the exception of a very few, they are prepared to accept the new flag rather than have a flag which is not acceptable to a large, significant and important part of our nation.

I must confess that there are a very few who are rabidly anti-French, almost rabidly raceistic, if there is such a word. As the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Gundlock) pointed out the other day, and I entirely agree, the concept of racism can be carried dangerously far. We have people in English speaking and French speaking Canada alike who have this kind of herrenvolk attitude. However, except for a very few in this category the red ensign supporters who have written me about their feelings in regard to the flag have invariably said that it is true they love the red ensign and would not like to have to switch their allegiance, but would rather do so than to have a flag not acceptable to a large and important part of our nation.

Surely it is better to choose the flag that will divide us the least. It seems to me this is the only really important point. I am not suggesting that the only Canadians who favour the new flag are the five and a half million French speaking Canadians to whom I have referred. Indeed, as we all well know, this is not the case. Judging from my correspondence it is obvious that a large majority of young people prefer the new flag. I have also found that new Canadians, although not universally, generally feel the same way. If we read the ethnic press carefully we can ascertain that they would prefer a new flag. But above all the young people, the people of tomorrow in all parts of Canada, feel strongly about the maple leaf concept, and they are the ones who will be waving the flag when we are all dead and gone from this chamber.

An hon. Member: You will be gone before you are dead.

Miss Jewett: In other words, Mr. Speaker, to adopt the new flag rather than the red ensign would not, it seems to me, deeply alienate any large cultural group in Canada, whereas to adopt the red ensign or some modification of it would. Let us face it. We all know that to do so would alienate deeply and permanently, I fear, a large and important section of this one Canada. We do not need a referendum to tell us that. All a referendum would do would be to exacerbate our cultural diversities.

In the last 97 years Canada in my view has moved a long way toward becoming a strong and united nation. We have become much more an economically integrated nation. We have found increasingly that our social problems are ones that touch us from coast to coast. I am not suggesting that we have become a uniform nation either in the social or economic spheres, but we all know that we have increasingly moved a very long way toward a national unity, toward a unity which does have, as I say, common problems in the economic and social spheres right across this nation.

In one area, however, we have not it seems to me, and I am glad we have not, found ourselves becoming entirely nationally integrated. This is in the area of cultural traditions and outlook. One of our trouble spots, it is true, but surely one of our great strengths, something that enriches us all, has been and is our cultural diversity. I suggest that we could go on and have an even greater expression of cultural diversity, not only amongst those who came here in the 18th century or earlier but amongst the many who have come to Canada since. We could have a great deal of cultural diversity, and at the same time move toward trying to achieve those things that all Canadians need and want in the social and economic spheres.

We must, however, take special care when it comes to discussing any matter that is directly within the cultural arena. Such a matter is, of course, a national flag. It is on this ground, and on this ground alone therefore that I think we, as members of parliament, should look at this whole question, regardless of our personal feelings in the matter, regardless even of what we think the majority of our constituents want. In English speaking Canada, most of us find that our constituents are sharply divided on this matter. Regardless of these things, important though they are our personal feelings and the divided views of our constituents the important thing for all of us as members of parliament, it seems to me, is to pursue that policy which, as I have said, will divide us least and will help, I am convinced, to unify us even more in the future.

A referendum, Mr. Speaker, is only really suitable in a culturally and socially homogeneous society. I, personally, do not object to it so much because it is contrary to parliamentary democracy—although in fact it is. As important as this is, I object to a referendum because all it will do will be to reveal more sharply our cultural diversities, our strong feelings on this matter. All it will do will be to alienate still further a very large number of Canadians, French speaking Canadians. Whether we like it or not, French speaking Canadians are people who have lived in this nation a long time; are people with whom we share this nation and who are particularly strongly of the view that a distinctive, new Canadian flag is the right thing for us. They are not the only ones who feel this way, as I have said. I feel this way and many others feel this way too. But the fact that they do, the fact that to go against their feelings would be to split our nation asunder, seems to me to be the only really crucial point.

Mr. Lambert: May I ask the hon. lady a question?

Miss Jewett: I have just about finished.

Finally, there is the question, why act now? We all know that the problem of a national flag is not a new one. We all know that whenever it has been discussed it was difficult to reach a decision on it. We all know that all parties in this house have spoken about it for some years. It is really not new. We all know, too, that there is going to be a substantial amount of time for discussion in this house, and for all the groups in society that have strong views on this matter to get their views across. One cannot deny that the groups in society that do have strong views on this subject have had enormous opportunities, and are continuing to have those opportunities, to get their views across. This is important. I think it is vital in any democracy. It seems to me that if we make this decision this summer, given the time we have for debate, given the time there is for those outside interests to present their views to us, we ought surely to be able to make our decision here which we feel is in the best interests of this nation. After all, it was this nation for which we fought in the second world war, and the values for which it stands. It was not a particular flag for which we fought; it was for freedom, tolerance and understanding, and a respect for minority rights. These are the things for which we fought. These are the things we maintain, and I hope will continue to maintain.

Mr. Lambert: I wonder if the hon. lady would permit the question I wished to pose earlier?

Miss Jewett: Yes.

Mr. Lambert: Does the hon. lady feel the same sentiments in regard to the acceptance or non-acceptance of the red ensign should apply to the union jack, as provided for in the second portion of this resolution?

Miss Jewett: Mr. Speaker, this is not a debate on the second part of the resolution. The second part of the resolution is not to create a national flag for Canada. All I am concerned about is the creation of a national flag for Canada.

Mr. Mandziuk: May I ask the hon. lady a question? What evidence has the hon. lady that the ethnic press is clamouring for this new maple leaf flag?

Miss Jewett: I have not got it here, but I will be glad to send it to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Mandziuk: Has the hon. member any clippings or quotations?

Miss Jewett: Yes, and I will be glad to send them to the hon. member later.

Mr. Mandziuk: I think it would be worth while to put them on the record, as I did.

Miss Jewett: I shall be glad to do that if I get another opportunity in the course of the debate.

Canadian Flag

Mr. Jack A. Irvine (London): I should like to say a few words at this particular time in this debate in support of the amendment and in opposition to the resolution before the house. I think, Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss if I did not, at this time, say a few words on behalf of the constituents of the London riding. It is not the largest in Canada, but it is one of the largest. It is a completely urban riding. I know that the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. Millar) and the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas) have made surveys in their respective ridings which adjoin mine. These surveys have not produced results exactly the same as mine, and this is understandable because they are different types of ridings.

However, I did make a survey through the medium of broadcasting. I sent out word to the people of my riding that they should communicate with me by letter, telephone or whatever means suited them best, and let me know what their feelings are with regard to the flag. I received some 842 letters. Of that number, 824 were opposed to the new flag as proposed. The vast majority were in favour of the retention of the red ensign. I know that some of these letters I have received may have reached me as a result of the efforts of an organization, a group of people who got together and decided they would make representations. So I will cut the number I gave in two. Suppose half these letters were inspired. If we do that, then the majority is still 23 to 1 in favour of the retention of the red ensign, and on that basis it does not take much imagination for me to establish exactly which way I should go in the interests of the people who have elected me as their representative here.

Of the remaining 18 letters, 17 were in favour of a new flag. Perhaps I might say that even the 18 were. Nine of these were not in favour of the flag as proposed. The other writer I mentioned told me what he thought would be a good flag; he described it to me, but parliamentary language does not permit me to tell the house exactly what it was.

However, I would say this: Before we have another national flag—and I think I should say "another" because we already have one—it would be a good idea if we approached full nationhood. There are some things which are lacking. I had occasion recently to pick up a passport on the inside of which were words to the effect that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) and Queen Elizabeth II grant the passport and offer the bearer certain privileges. If we look further into this passport—which is not a Canadian passport; it is a British passport—we find the words "A Canadian subject is a British subject". These are some of the details to which we should address attention before we lay claim to complete and full nationhood and go on to change the flag we already have for something new. Then again, on the applications for employment we have in this country, some of them governmental, appears a column asking details of nationality. If you put down "Canadian" in that column, in most instances the application is returned because they want to know the racial origin. This is one of the things which I contend is causing great disunity in this country and it is something we are condoning. As I say, we must first reach the point of complete and legitimate nationhoood.

To think in terms of hyphenated Canadians is I think completely wrong. I do not think we should refer to people as Ukrainian Canadians, Dutch Canadians, German Canadians and so on. I do not think anyone should be considered in that way. Once people have taken out citizenship papers in this country they are Canadians and we should do everything we can within our power to make them proud of this country. I feel I am a Canadian, not a hyphenated Canadian in any sense of the word. After six generations I feel I am almost as Canadian as a full blooded Indian, and I am very proud of the fact. On the other hand, these people who come to us from various countries for the protection—I was about to say of the red ensign, but I will not say that—these people who come to our shores for the protection they receive in Canada so that they may live in peace and harmony, all bring to us a certain amount of their culture. We are pleased to have this so that eventually we may be in possession of aspects of all these cultures, put them together and, as a result, have our own distinctive Canadian culture.

I feel that one of the things which is incensing the people of Canada today is the manner in which this resolution has been presented. I think this is something the people are concerned about. We have a freedom loving people in Canada and they do not like to see this sort of thing shoved down their throats and enforced in a dictatorial manner. One of the other things which I feel is puzzling the people of Canada at this moment is the fact that members on the other side of the house do not have an opportunity of voting freely on this issue. They cannot have the opportunity of a free vote. The Prime Minister said recently that he hoped everybody would vote as they pleased. On the other hand he said later that the government stands or falls on the fate of this particular resolution. In such a situation how can those on the other side of the house vote against their leader, vote against the government and bring about the dissolution of this parliament? These are things to which the people of Canada take severe exception.

The Prime Minister was once considered to be one of the greatest diplomats in the world. He was a man of whom we were particularly proud in that capacity. Indeed he received a high award for the services he rendered in that field. I know that hon. members on the other side of the house, as well as some who sit elsewhere—and I am going to count myself among them—were proud of him. But, Mr. Speaker, what has happened? There is no diplomacy in the manner in which this resolution has been presented. There is no democracy about the way in which it has been presented. On the other hand, the Prime Minister gave us all an invitation to speak on this subject in the house and I am just wondering whether, after what could run into a great length of time, someone will have the temerity to turn round and say: "This is a filibuster". It cannot be. This was an invitation addressed by the Prime Minister to each and every one of us to get on our feet and express our views on behalf of our constituents.

What was the right hon. gentleman looking for? What was in the back of his mind? Let us think about this for a moment. Was this a way out? Was he looking for some way to back out of this, or was this a smokescreen to cover up the ineptness of the present administration? Was it possibly because of trouble in the commission on biculturalism and bilingualism? Did he want to cover that up in a cloud? Was it put forward as a smokescreen to cover up the increasing economic difficulties of this country? We could cite many possibilities. Was it to force an election before it was too late? Maybe the right hon. gentleman thought the sands of time were running out. Maybe he thought the proverbial chickens were coming home to roost and that he had better have an election now, because in the spring it would be too late. I am wondering about these things and I think we should give them careful thought.

There are three ways in which this flag proposition could have been approached, in my humble view, and I will list them though not necessarily in order of importance. The first is by way of a federal-provincial conference to which the premiers of each of the provinces and select small committees could have been invited, to sit with a full committee representing all five parties in this house around the conference table to produce something which would be acceptable to at least a majority of the people. Then the people, through their representatives, would have the opportunity of exercising a freedom of choice. I submit this freedom of choice is being denied.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, there is an educational approach to this question. In the last general election campaign the Prime Minister mentioned that there would be 1,000, 10,000—it does not matter about the figure, because we have not had them, anyway—awards for students. Why did we not turn this whole problem over to the educational authorities in this country and say to each educational district, "Have the students in your area submit what they think would be the proper design for a distinctive Canadian flag". They could then have selected two or three of these designs, sent them to the central headquarters of the district, and the committee of the house I have mentioned could have picked out the six best designs. We could have awarded $1,000 each to the students who submitted what we thought were the best designs. That would have been a great deal cheaper than spending $100,000 a day for this house to sit in the discussion of this problem and we would have given the students an opportunity to take part in the choice of a flag, to express themselves in this connection, to become more patriotic and better Canadians.

The third manner in which this question could be handled is by a plebiscite or referendum. I would like to suggest a few words that could be put into the questionnaire on this particular subject, although I do not suggest the questions should be asked necessarily in this order. The questionnaire could be worded something like this:

1. Are you in favour of the design of three maple leaves joined on one stem, on a white background?

2. Are you in favour of retaining the red ensign as Canada's national flag?

3. Do you favour a change in the red ensign by removing the coat of arms and substituting therefor a maple leaf and fleur-de-lis?

4. Do you favour a national flag with neither union jack nor fleur-de-lis thereon?

There could be added one or two more questions. But at least, Mr. Speaker, we would get a true expression of the opinions of people on this matter and they would have the opportunity of saying what they wanted by way of a flag. In this way we would be getting back somewhat to democracy. On the other hand, why should we be treated like children? This is a most unreasonable thing. Why should the hammer be placed over our heads in the form of, "You pass this resolution or you get no summer recess". As far as I am concerned, I am prepared to sit here all summer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Irvine: I do not care whether we have a recess or not. But let us put before this house some legislation which we can handle, and let this issue sit for a while. Then we could come back to it later, when it could be considered a little more dispassionately. The way this issue has been thrown at us is indicative of, "You be good boys and you will have a holiday", and it reminds me of the little boy who had a ball and bat and went up to the playground, gathered all the other boys around him, and wanted to be the pitcher. They did not want him to be the pitcher, and he said, "All right. I will take my ball and bat and go home". I cannot see the wisdom of the manner in which this matter has been handled; it is very difficult to understand.

There is something else we must face, Mr. Speaker. We cannot go around like the proverbial ostrich, with our heads buried in the sand forever. There are some things we have to face. One of the things we have to face, whether we like it or not, is the separatist movement in Quebec. I know this is not indicative of the feeling of the majority of people in Quebec by any means, but still it is there and we have to face it. I think we would find the majority of these people to be in the age bracket 18 to 24. So six years from today, if we are still together then, these people will be in the age bracket 18 to 30, and this represents a great proportion of the population of Canada. This is something that is very serious; it is of major importance—and we cannot afford blindly to look away from it.

I think it is time our Prime Minister—who is known for his diplomatic prowess; who is known to be a great statesman: we will not say anything about his ability as an administrator—approached the premier of Quebec and obtained a commitment from him that they are going to be with us in 1967 when we have our centennial celebrations. If we do not obtain that commitment, I say let us get a new site, and get it now, before we start pouring millions and millions more dollars into this particular site.

Mr. Prud'homme: Get back on the flag.

Mr. Irvine: What is the result? Confusion; complete and utter confusion. Two new flags have been suggested to the house. We have one old flag which we have been using for some time and which was officially endorsed. There is a move afoot whereby the province of Ontario may opt out of this flag, just the same as Quebec opted out of the pension plan in its original form. If they opt out, we will get four flags. And there could be other provinces that will decide they want their own flag. Perhaps the province of Quebec will decide to fly their provincial flag. We could end up with 12 flags. What confusion and what disunity.

This is a real problem, one that cannot be handled on the spur of the moment. This is a problem on which we will have to take a little time and perhaps do a little compromising. What we are doing now is continually driving wedges between groups of people, driving them further and further apart. This is nothing new, and I would like to refer hon. members to the House of Commons Debates of 1900, 64 years ago. I shall read from from volume 1 of the debates of that year, page 1842, half way down the right-hand column. These are the words of a very outstanding man of this house at that time, the first officer of this house, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I might preface this by saying that these words were spoken in reply to a statement made by, I believe, the attorney general of that time. This was in the debate on supply with regard to sending troops to South Africa. The prime minister said this:

> It is only too true, sir, that if we had refused at that time to do what was in my judgment our imperative duty, a most dangerous agitation would have arisen—an agitation which according to all human probability would have ended in a cleavage in the population of this country upon racial lines. A greater calamity could never take place in Canada. My hon. friend and I have long been on terms of intimacy. He has long been a political friend and supporter of mine. He knows as well as any man in this house knows that if there is anything to which I have given my political life, it is to try to promote unity, harmony and amity between the diverse elements of this country.
> My friends can desert me, they can remove their confidence from me, they can withdraw the trust which they have placed in my hands; but never shall I deviate from that line of policy. Whatever may be the consequences, whether loss of prestige, loss of popularity, or loss of power, I feel that I am in the right, and I know that a time will come when every man, my hon. friend himself included, will render me full justice on that score...We are a British country and a free country, and every man in it has the right to express his opinion.

Those were the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1900.

In the Montreal Gazette for October 22, 1963 there is a letter which contains a quotation from Sir Wilfrid Laurier which is as follows:

I am proud of the country that gave me birth—

—and the letter indicates he was referring to Canada—

—and I am proud of the country that gave me liberty—

—referring to Britain. Mr. Speaker, this is the kind of Canadian, one of the greatest of all times, that the Liberal party presented to the house in 1900, or a little before then. What a change we have today; times have changed. We have a flag now which I am sure is acceptable to the vast majority of the people of Canada, so why change it? After the next election when we have a new government another flag resolution may be brought in, and then we will have more confusion and the same trouble all over again. I do not think a new government would do that but it could happen. We should remember that we are all Canadians and that we should get together in a spirit of unity, and in a spirit of compromise work something out which would be satisfactory to the vast majority of our people.

I should like to quote another item which I think is very interesting. It originates from "Viewpoint", a show with which I am sure all are familiar. On June 16, 1964 this statement was made by Mr. Robert Needham of the press gallery:

But, whatever the merits of the tri-leaf, the red ensign or any other flag, I cannot conceive of poorer circumstances under which a supposed emblem of unity is being presented to the nation.

What other conclusion is possible, when a splintered house is held hostage by a minority government. A distinctive flag now—or a general election. That's the choice. That's the ransom demanded of a captive commons.

Such is the birth and baptism in bondage decreed for a flag of freedom.

Now let me go to another man whom I presume some people have heard about. His name is Newman; I think his first name is Peter. He has written other articles, but the one to which I wish to refer is in the July 4 issue of Maclean's magazine. He starts off:

Just after Lester Pearson became the fourteenth prime minister of Canada, he described his stewardship, in a television address, as "a time to excite the daring, test the strong and give new promise to the timid"...

Now, 14 months later, it is evident even to the Liberals that their administration has yet to earn the title to these brave words. What may be less evident, althought here in Ottawa it seems clear enough to me, is that in the day-to-day business of governing the country the Liberals are falling short of even the most basic demand made on any government: that the administration control events and shape the course of national affairs... But it seems to me that on almost any afternoon of this session there has been some evidence to be seen in the house of vacillation and retreat... in my opinion the domestic policies of the Liberals have been a grey, quiet failure.

My point, Mr. Speaker, is this. Why should we be wasting so much time when there is so much legislation we should be getting on with? Why do we not set this measure back for a while, give it a chance to simmer and let the people look at it from a sensible sort of viewpoint rather than push it through now? Let us debate this question of the flag later. Our present flag or any new flag which might possibly be, I will not say forced upon us, but any new flag we might acquire through a pressure medium, should stand for justice, for freedom and for liberty. But most of all it should stand for unity, and I do not see where this proposed measure will inspire any unity in any part of the country. It should represent further the sacrifices which were made by our forefathers when they forged for us from a vast continent a new country where we might live together as individuals in freedom; where we might enjoy freedom of choice, freedom of worship and freedom of speech regardless of race, colour or creed. I say long may this freedom live, Mr. Speaker. Let us proceed slowly. What we do today we have to live with for a long time. Let us go back to the days of trade and barter and perhaps we can compromise a little and get together on this matter. But whatever we do, let us not break faith with the people of Canada. Let us give them an opportunity to express themselves individually, in line with the amendment to the resolution before us today. Let us shelve this question temporarily and look at it from a dispassionate point of view. Meantime, let us get on with the business of Canada. Our constituents sent us here to legislate, so let us go to work on legislation, and let the flag sit so that we may get together on the matter a little later on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills, notices of motions (papers), public bills.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SECURITY PROCEDURES AND INVESTIGATIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North) moved:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all government statements and directives to government departments during the past year regarding security procedures and investigations.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am not only surprised but I admit I am bitterly disappointed that I have to move this motion. On a number of occasions since I came to this house some two years ago the house has discussed the whole policy of security matters, the rights of people who work for the government to know what they are accused of—if they are accused—and their right to an opportunity to give their side of the story, in other words an opportunity to defend themselves.

This matter has been raised not only by members of parliament but by organizations such as the Canadian association of university teachers and the Canadian union of students representing all the students in Canadian universities. Last session we thought we had finally got a policy from the government, a policy which was fair, which would protect the rights of government employees and which would ensure that justice would be theirs.

I wish to quote a couple of paragraphs from what I thought was a very important statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in this house on October 25, 1963. Members will find this on pages 4043 to 4046 of Hansard for that date. In it he said:

If our security policies ignored, or did not take sufficiently into account, the basic rights of the individual, they could operate not to defend but to destroy the liberties which are our first concern.

Later he said:

The first of the new requirements is to inform the person involved when his security or reliability is in doubt and may have to involve his dismissal. Employing departments and agencies will in future be required to tell an employee everything that is possible of the reasons for the doubt, if there is a doubt, and to give him an opportunity to resolve that doubt...

The second new requirement is to ensure that a second look is always taken by a separate body before dismissal is finally decided upon. Once the individual is told of security doubts he will have the opportunity to give his side of the case.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Finally he said:

I feel confident that the procedure which we are now adopting will assist us in making judgments concerning loyalty and reliability in a manner which will protect individual rights as well as national interests.

That was an excellent statement. The Prime Minister always makes excellent statements when he talks in broad generalities, but when you try to pin him down to anything you find there is not much in it. He made this statement and he met with representatives of the Canadian association of university teachers. I see the hon. member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett) here. She was at that meeting. The Prime Minister gave that organization assurances that the government would work out satisfactory policies, that it would keep in touch with the organization, and hold discussions with it in future. I am told that as of today the members of that organization have not heard a further word from the Prime Minister.

On May 7 of this year I asked the following question:

1. Has the new policy regarding security investigations promised by the Prime Minister last session been established and, if not, how long will it be before it is ready?
2. If it has been completed and approved, have its terms been made known to the employees of the government and their associations?
3. Will a copy of the policy and its regulations be tabled in the house?

The answer to that question came down on May 25 last and was as follows:

1. Yes.
2 and 3. The terms have been formally communicated to all government departments and organizations. It is not customary to send directives such as this to employees or associations, nor are administrative directives normally tabled in the House of Commons.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, this is precisely the reason we have had this kind of difficulty, because security is not just the business of the government ministers and their departments. Security is the business of the people involved. It is the business of all members in this house, and if the members of this house and the people in the Canadian association of university teachers and the Canadian union of students had been satisfied with the former ring-around-a-rosy which we had between the government, the R.C.M.P. and other people, we would never have had these discussions; but the fact is that the policies have not worked out, and many mistakes were made.

I refer hon. members to the Knott case, raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Cameron) in which the government, because of the evidence presented to it, was forced to admit that a mistake had been made. It admitted Knott had been dismissed from the navy because his uncle was a member of the communist party, and then it admitted a mistake had been made because in fact the person in the communist party was not his uncle.

I want to ask the Minister of Justice this question. Supposing his uncle had been a member of the communist party, what had that to do with the man in the navy? Have we reached the situation in this country when a person is judged guilty not because of what he does himself but because of what his relatives may have done or may be arguing?

If that is the kind of procedures we have, then we have taken a leaf out of the book of nazi Germany, because it had this kind of law. Nazi Germany enacted a law which, in rough translation, was entitled a law dealing with the clan responsibility. Under that law when a person committed a crime against the security of the state every person in his family, his father, his mother, his sister, his brother, his uncle, his aunt and his cousins to the 'nth degree were adjudged to be equally responsible. I am not saying we have that kind of law here. If we had, then we could fight it, but what we have had are administrative procedures exactly like those which were followed in nazi Germany.

I have talked about the Knott case which was settled satisfactorily, and following that we had the Petersen case. Eric Petersen of Esquimalt, B.C., had been a member of the navy for ten years and, according to himself and his counsel, he was dismissed from the navy. The reason given was that his father-in-law was a communist, but the fact is that his father-in-law was a communist when Petersen was one year old.

I asked questions about this in the house and got the usual run-around which always takes place when one gets into security matters because, after all, an ordinary backbencher cannot be expected to understand the fine points of security. This is for that select group, the Minister of Justice, his assistant, other people around him and the R.C.M.P. When I did not make any progress I went to see the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) who told me very plainly that this was not the reason Petersen had been dismissed from the navy. He said they had other reasons, good reasons; but I can tell the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) that the Minister of National Defence did not tell them to me, and I am satisfied that until today Petersen has not been told why he was dismissed from the navy, so that he could really defend himself. He has to take the word of some faceless accuser that they have information which makes it necessary for him to be dismissed from the navy.

Last session I had a letter from a young man in my constituency, who told me he belonged to the naval reserve for three years and when he and his friends, with whom he had served in the naval reserve for three years, went to reinlist, his friends were taken back in but he was turned down. I asked him to call on me and I spent an hour with him in Winnipeg going over the possible reasons. I got the assurance from him that he had never belonged to any organization which could possibly be classed as subversive. He told me all the organizations to which he belonged. However, having had some experiences in these cases, which I would be very happy not to have had, I asked him about the members of his family, and it came out that his father worked for an organization which I am sure the government would consider to be communist dominated.

Let us assume for the moment that his father was a communist 20 years ago or even that his father is communist today. Is there anybody here who is going to suggest that because a person's father is or was a communist that person therefore ought not to be able to be a member of the naval reserve? We are not talking about atomic research or nuclear bombs. We are talking about an ordinary seaman.

I am not going to mention this person's name because he did not authorize me to discuss the matter publicly, but what about the person who wanted to work for the C.B.C. and who was turned down because his father allegedly is a comunist? This is precisely the kind of thing that has gone on and I am satisfied it is still going on. I will believe it is going on until the government realizes that if they really have a new policy there is nothing wrong with telling the house about it, and also telling the organizations representing employees and the people of Canada what that policy is.

I never wanted and I do not want today to know the details. I do not want to see the actual questions which are asked. I am not really concerned about the answers. I am not concerned about every position in the government which requires security clearance. But surely to goodness there can be nothing wrong with the government making a clear policy statement in a broad way of what the requirements are, what departments require security clearance, what the reasons are and what kind of matters are involved in security. Until we have this type of procedure there are going to be complaints and members of the house and people outside the house are going to continue to ask questions and to be critical.

We have heard all the arguments why there cannot be an independent group to look into these matters. We have suggested such a body. We have suggested that if the government is going to lift the security clearance of any person employed by it that person should be told first of all that he is losing his security clearance. Second, he should be given some indication of what the general reasons for such action are. Third, he should have an opportunity to explain, to make a defence.

If such a practice should be adopted I will not be satisfied and the members of this group will never be satisfied if the only people to whom the employee can make his explanation are people in his own department. These is no reason at all why there cannot be an independent semi-judicial review committee. I point out to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) that during world war II when the defence of Canada regulations were in effect, not in a time of peace but during a war when thousands of people were interned—I am not questioning the necessity of that for a moment—provision was made for a review committee to which people who had been interned and thought they had been unfairly treated could make representations. I understand that committee had on it a representative of the judiciary and it was empowered to hear not only the government's side of the story but to hear the defence, the explanations of the people involved. It also had power to recommend that people who had been interned should be allowed to go free. If we could do that in wartime surely we can do it in peacetime.

I want to say that the kind of answer the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) gave to my question was most unsatisfactory. I had been assured before by the Prime Minister's office that he was sympathetic to my motion to produce this material but that the security people were unhappy about it. It is obvious that the security people persuaded the Prime Minister that he could not do this. That is precisely the sort of thing to which I object.

The Prime Minister and the government indulge in fine talk, though in generalities, when they want the support of organizations like the Canadian association of university teachers. The question of security procedures at universities is a separate one which we will also be pressing. But we got this very nice answer from the Prime Minister who likes to think of himself as a liberal with a small "l". When the chips are down, however, when it comes time for action, when it comes time to tell the security people and the R.C.M.P. that maybe they are going to have to explain to somebody besides themselves, the Prime Minister loses his courage and we get the kind of nonsense we had in the refusal of the government to table these directives. If the Prime Minister could not table the directives he could have made a statement explaining to members of the house and the public what the situation is with regard to security.

I said in opening my remarks that I was sorry I had to raise this matter. I assure the Minister of Justice that unless we receive a good deal more information that we have got up to now this matter will be another one on which we will have to spend a lot more time at this session than it should take simply because the government has not got the guts to take the people into its confidence.

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that during the consideration of the estimates of the Department of Justice on October 25, 1963, the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) said, as reported on page 4043 of Hansard for that day:

> The security measures which have been developed here in Canada, through sometimes bitter experience, are intended to be preventive and not punitive. Their purpose is to protect the safety, interests and indeed the freedoms of all Canadians. They are under constant and continuous review, with the purpose of striking the balance I have referred to between the protection of the state and the protection of the individuals who, in a free society, alone give the state its direction, its purpose and indeed its meaning.

He said further, as reported on page 4044:

> The granting or the denial of a security clearance is an administrative matter, one of managerial responsibility. In making a decision that an applicant or employee may not safely be given access to secret and confidential information, the head of a department or of an agency is not denying an individual a right. No person, of course, has a right to see official secrets. The department head is merely exercising the judgment he is expected to apply on the basis of all the information available to him in the way that any sensible person would exercise such judgment in hiring a secretary, a cashier, a lawyer or a doctor, ensuring that such person could be trusted with his property, his private business or his physical health. The government also has an obligation to provide itself with every reasonable assurance that those of its employees who require access to the government's, the nation's secrets are loyal and trustworthy and not vulnerable to persuasion, coercion or blackmail.

I feel confident that the procedures which we are now adopting will assist us in making judgments concerning loyalty and reliability in a manner which will protect individual rights as well as national interests.

Following the statement which the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) made at that time the then minister of justice went on to outline in some detail the security screening arrangements which had been devised. At that time he said, as reported on page 4046 of Hansard:

I do so with some reluctance because the effectiveness of even these measures is usually reduced in providing information about them. At the same time, I fully appreciate how frustrating it is to members of this house as well as to the public generally, who are rightly concerned that individuals be treated fairly, to be faced with official silence on this vital subject. There will always be matters in this area which cannot be discussed fully in public if our defensive arrangements are to have any effect at all. I am sure all members of the house will agree with the principle of that statement. On the other hand, the effectiveness of these arrangements does not depend solely upon the measures or the individuals involved with them. They depend too upon the understanding and cooperation of all Canadians on whose behalf, in the last analysis, these measures have been instituted.

It was the purpose of this statement, Mr. Speaker, to explain to the house, and to all Canadians, in as much detail as was consistent with national security and the general interest, the means by which the government intends to safeguard these vital secrets as well as the rights and interests of its employees in this regard. These statements were, I believe, the fullest which any government of Canada has ever made on this difficult subject. They were made in the knowledge that they would probably lead to demands for further information. It is my firm impression that they have assisted materially in achieving the purpose which I have described. The statements were completely in accordance with the administrative directive which has been sent to all departments and agencies.

The motion before the house is that an order of the house do issue for a copy of all government statements and directives to government departments during the past year regarding security procedures and investigations. There has been only one such directive, Mr. Speaker, and after the most careful consideration the government has decided that it must, in the public interest, decline to accept the motion to provide a copy of the directive. The hope was expressed that, for this reason, the hon. member might be prepared to withdraw his motion. However, as was his right, he has not seen fit to do so.

In declining to accept this motion, the government has taken into account and essentially agrees with the stand taken on this matter by every Canadian government which has had to face this difficult problem. It is essentially this: To divulge publicly the means by which the government instructs its agencies to counter the efforts of those who would steal our vital national secrets and subvert our institutions, would have the effect of impairing the effectiveness of these counter measures. As it was very aptly put in the white paper presented to the parliament of the United Kingdom by the secretary of state for foreign affairs in 1955:

Espionage is carried out in secret. Counter-espionage equally depends for its success upon the maximum secrecy of its methods. Nor is it desirable at any moment to let the other side know how much has been discovered or guess at what means have been used to discover it. Nor should they be allowed to know all the steps that have been taken to improve security. These considerations still apply and must be the basic criterion of judging what should or should not be published.

From our experience, and I am sure the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) from the experience he has had will agree, there is no reason now to change the view that has always been taken in this respect. As one of my predecessors in office, Hon. Davie Fulton, minister of justice in the previous administration said on April 29, 1959, as reported on page 3152 of Hansard:

The government has consistently followed the policy of complete reticence concerning security work—

The government which preceded that of which Mr. Fulton was a member also consistently upheld this principle. The present government has gone further in modifying the principle in the interests of supplying information on security matters than any previous government. We fully recognize that it is the government and no other body or individual which has the heavy and undeniable responsibility of advising and administering security policies and procedures which have been agreed upon after years of study based upon our Canadian experience and the collective experience of our allies. We are convinced that to open these detailed procedures to public debate further than has already been done would seriously reduce the effectiveness of these procedures and would lead inevitably to the injury of individuals who have committed no offence under the law. We cannot believe that either of these results would be in the public interest.

This is in no sense, Mr. Speaker, a partisan matter. I am sure that hon. members on all sides of the house would be deeply relieved if we did not have to deal with these harsh, complex and difficult matters. But deal with them we must, and in a manner which, based on the best possible knowledge of the circumstances, will afford the best possible protection to the people of this country. In this connection I would ask that hon. members do not underestimate the weight of the responsibility that rests upon the Prime Minister in facing these problems. Indeed I was deeply gratified to hear the right hon. Leader of the Opposition express his recognition of this fact when he said on October 25 last:

> Mr. Chairman, the matter under discussion is one of the most difficult problems that faces a government today. It is understandable why the Prime Minister should have made a statement this evening as to the policy of the government, for the responsibility of national security rests primarily on the Prime Minister.

A little later, he went on to say:

> From time to time these matters are brought before the people. He carries in his head information in respect to the subject of security that he is almost frightened at times of revealing. The Prime Minister has spoken of the difficulties.
> How are you going to maintain security while at the same time preserving and maintaining the fundamental rights of the individual? It is a difficult problem. It is so easy to criticize, but it is so much more difficult, having that responsibility, being desirous of maintaining those freedoms, to be able to carry out one's wishes. Loyalty is expected of all Canadians. It is imperative as a quality of public service.
> The maintenance of security is of prime importance to the survival of the state. How often do cases come before a prime minister and he cannot go into the details in the House of Commons? You have the evidence. Often it is secondary evidence; sometimes it is hearsay. The accumulation of hearsay placed before one has an effect, no matter how one endeavours to adopt a judicial attitude.

At the conclusion of his speech, the right hon. gentleman said:

> I know the weight of the responsibility that is on the Prime Minister in matters like this—this matter above all. He cannot put it off on somebody else. He in his person has the custody of our survival and our security. In the views he had placed before the house he has been given the benefit of the study that was made by dedicated public servants whose purpose was to assure that justice shall be done. Fiat justitia ruat coelum—'Let justice be done though the heavens should fall'.

The responsibility is, indeed, a heavy one and not a pleasant one. I am sure it would have given the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) great relief when he was prime minister to have been able to be open and public about all of these things. It is contrary to the principles on which our society and nation is based to have to maintain secrecy about actions that can, at times, affect the careers of individuals. Yet it is essentially for the protection of our nation, based on those principles, that these measures regretfully have to be taken. Other free nations are faced with the same unpleasant facts of life and recognize that the strong light of publicity cannot be admitted to every detail of security precautions if they are to be effective. It is for this reason that the Prime Minister and the government had to take the position that it would not be in the public interest to publish the current directive on security in the public service. I can however assure hon. members that the new and improved measures to protect the rights of individuals, as described in this house on October 25, are covered in the directive and are in effect.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I had thought at the last session of parliament that we had made some progress in this matter of security investigation, but after listening to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) I am convinced we are right back where we started.

The minister has treated the house to the usual parade of the mystique of security—something so secret, something so mystical that it cannot be disclosed to the uninitiated. He tells us of the great burden of responsibility which, he says, the government alone must bear. I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that this is a democratic country in which the government is responsible to parliament and parliament is responsible to the people. The government has responsibility for conducting these security programs. The minister says this is not a partisan matter, and we agree. We have never suggested it was. This is a matter of human justice; it is a matter of deciding whether or not persons who are labelled as security risks and who, in consequence, are either denied employment or dismissed from employment shall have, first, the right to know what they are accused of and, second, an opportunity to present their cases. That is what we are arguing.

All this talk of the minister about the fact that many of these security questions cannot be opened to the light of day is not in dispute. We know perfectly well that security investigations cannot be carried on in a glass house. We are simply contending that people who are accused and who, as a result of the accusation, made, as in some cases, as the minister himself admits from pure hearsay, shall have the right to face those who accuse them, the right to defend themselves and to know with what they are charged.

Instead of facing up to this problem the Minister of Justice trotted out the old slogan "Father knows best". I have been listening to this for a quarter of a century. Ministers of justice say: You must leave it to me; you must trust my good judgment and good sense; I am very busy, so this means trusting the good judgment of the officials of my department or of some other department. As a matter of fact we have brought up case after case to show that neither the ministers of the crown nor their officials are infallible. The Gordon Knott case has already been referred to. A number of other cases came before the house in the last session of parliament. I myself have taken up cases with ministers, cases in which the individuals concerned were either being dismissed or threatened with dismissal upon grounds so flimsy that when the ministers themselves looked into them they discarded them and managed to have the cases cleared up. But supposing no one had brought those cases to the attention of the ministers concerned. Supposing the deputy minister or the head of a branch, acting on the report of a security panel, had dismissed the persons in question or refused to hire them. These individuals would then have suffered a great injustice. I pay tribute to the ministers to this extent: In many cases when certain matters have been brought to their attention they rectified the situation and saw to it that justice was done. But the number of cases which come to our attention and which we can discuss with ministers amounts to only a small proportion of the cases which occur.

It is not enough, as the old English slogan says, that justice should be done. Justice must appear to be done. It must be clear, beyond doubt, that injustice is not being done. It must be worked into the warp and woof of our government administration that people cannot be unjustly dismissed or discriminated against on the basis of hearsay evidence, on the basis of malicious gossip or on the basis of mistaken identity—and there has been plenty of that—but that the individuals in question shall know why they are being dismissed and what is the case against them, besides having an opportunity to present their cases and, I think, an opportunity to be represented by counsel while a case is being conducted. This is all we are arguing.

Last year, the former minister of justice for a while gave us the "Father knows best" routine, and we were relieved when on October 25 the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) made the speech to which the Minister of Justice referred this afternoon. The Prime Minister was very generous in saying this:

> Since they were introduced in this country in 1947, the so-called security screening procedures adopted have, on the whole, worked well, though of course, Mr. Chairman, there have been mistakes. But I believe we have for the most part avoided excesses both of over-caution and over-confidence. There are nevertheless admittedly certain flaws in the system and it is to these that the government has been directing its attention recently. It is also to these that members have been addressing questions to the government in the House of Commons.

The Prime Minister admitted there have been mistakes and that the system is not without its weaknesses. So he went on, as reported on page 4044, to say this:

> After careful consideration the government has come to the conclusion that the essential advantages of these procedures can be achieved within our system by requiring all departments and agencies of government to do two things which they have not previously been required to do. The first of the new requirements is to inform the person involved when his security or reliability is in doubt and may have to involve his dismissal. Employing departments and agencies will in future be required to tell an employee everything that is possible of the reasons for the doubt, if there is a doubt, and to give him an opportunity to resolve that doubt.

That met the first objection. The individual was going to have a chance to know wherewith he was charged, and was to have an opportunity to present his side of the case to the official of the government under whose direction he came. The Prime Minister went on:

> The second new requirement is to ensure that a second look is always taken by a separate body before dismissal is finally decided upon. Once the individual is told of security doubts he will have the opportunity to give his side of the case. The employing agency will consider it, consult the staff of the government security panel, and arrive at a conclusion.

I will not bother reading the rest of it; it simply says that if after making his case in the department, the department still abides by its decision, certain things may be done. Then the Prime Minister went on:

> But if it is that his dismissal must be recommended, the individual will be given a second hearing, this time by the deputy minister or head of the agency. If that interview does not resolve the doubts, and if the agency head agrees with the view that dismissal is necessary, the whole case and the relevant information, including anything that the employee himself has submitted, will be submitted to a board of review.

That was the second thing we wanted. We wanted a quasi judicial board of review. We did not get a quasi judicial board of review; we got an administrative board of review made up of deputy ministers. We are willing to settle for that as an experiment. Therefore the Prime Minister's speech really said two things: First, a man was going to have a right to know what evidence there was to suggest that he was a security risk, and be given an opportunity to answer the charges; second, he was going to have an opportunity of appeal, first from his immediate superior to the deputy minister and then to a board of review. On page 4045 the Prime Minister said:

> I feel confident that the procedures which we are now adopting will assist us in making judgments concerning loyalty and reliability in a manner which will protect individual rights as well as national interests.

The Prime Minister said he was confident that this system he was proposing would work. The Minister of Justice has told us today that the government has gone much further than any other government in setting up these two requirements outlined in the Prime Minister's speech. If the Prime Minister is confident that these two procedures are effective in eliminating any possibility of injustice, and if the Minister of Justice really believes that by these procedures the government has gone much further than any other government, why should the government now refuse to make public the material requested in the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North? All this motion asks for is a copy of all government statements and directives to government departments during the past year regarding security procedures and investigations.

The Minister of Justice says there is only one directive. If this directive contains the two proposals outlined in the Prime Minister's speech of October 25, 1963, why should the government hesitate to make it public? If on the other hand it does not carry out the Prime Minister's commitments, I can understand the government's hesitancy about making it available to the members of this house.

Mr. Speaker, on the basis of this directive members of the public service and the armed services in Canada can be dismissed. These people's jobs depend upon the terms of that directive. It is a basic precept that people have the right to know the law. Individuals have the right to know the terms of a directive which affects their security, their jobs, their reputation and their future. The minister has not given us any reason at all why this directive should not be made public. He has told us that there are a great many security matters which cannot be discussed fully in public. We agree. We are not asking the minister to make public all the facts about any particular security case; we are merely asking him to table a directive sent out to the departments of government setting forth, we hope, in detail the commitments which the Prime Minister of Canada made to the House of Commons on October 25 last.

I know of no reason whatsoever why we should be denied access to this directive. What possible secret information can there be in it? If this directive follows the speech made by the Prime Minister, it should be saying two things: First, that any person about whom there is some doubt as to his or her security status will have the right to know on what that doubt is based and will have an opportunity to resolve the doubt; and second, that directive, if it follows the Prime Minister's commitments, will say that there shall be available to that individual the right of appeal, so that he can go to the deputy minister and can go finally to a board of review and present his case and seek to remove any doubt upon which his dismissal has been recommended. That is all this directive can contain. What is secret about it? What mysterious formula is contained in the directive that is not to be disclosed to the eyes of poor, ignorant members of parliament?

Mr. Speaker, this is just too ridiculous for words. This is part of the mystique of secrecy that has beclouded security in this country for years. The Prime Minister said, when he wound up his speech last year, that he was confident the procedures he was promising would clear up the situation. The Prime Minister having confidence is not sufficient; this house has to have confidence that the procedures have been established and are rectifying the situation which it was all too clear obtained last year. We have not that confidence; we have not been shown anything that would give us that confidence. If the government wants us to have confidence that they have kept faith with the commitments the Prime Minister made on October 25 last, they will give us a copy of this directive. After all, I presume, this directive has been sent to deputy ministers, maybe to branch heads, and to certain personnel in the armed services. Is there any reason why the House of Commons, the members of which are concerned about this question, should not see the directive? The minister has not given us any reason at all. We are not asking for confidential information; we are not asking for classified material. We are simply asking for a simple directive sent out to guarantee that the ordinary, basic precepts of justice are being adhered to in so far as the public service of Canada is concerned. Surely, Mr. Speaker, that is not too much to request.

I hope the minister will give this some further thought and will come back and give us a frank reason for this directive being denied us. I ask him not to treat us like children and expose us to another talk about the difficulty of security measures and the burden this places upon him. We are not asking him to disclose classified data. We are only asking him for a simple directive, a directive which will either prove to us that the government in good faith has carried out the procedures which it promised this house it would implement, or it will show that the government has welshed on its commitments to parliament and has not instituted those procedures. Until the government discloses such directive we have to draw the conclusion that they have failed to implement the procedures the Prime Minister promised would be implemented when he spoke in the house last October.

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who just sat down stated two alternatives; one from which he drew a conclusion favourable to the government, and the other unfavourable. The first alternative is that the directive referred to today by the minister contains no more than was outlined by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in his speech last October; the other alternative is that the directive failed to carry out the procedure referred to.

I think on reflection the hon. member will realize in all intellectual honesty and fairness the existence of a third possibility, namely that the directive in question would contain not only reference to the procedure which was set out in this house on October 25, but would also contain additional confidential material, material which could prejudicially disclose the nature of the security structure itself, which would be very prejudicial to our security system as well as prejudicial to the people of Canada and to this parliament to make public at this time.

Mr. Douglas: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Macdonald: Certainly.

Mr. Douglas: Could I ask the hon. member whether that is purely hypothetical conjecture, or is he making the statement on behalf of the government that it does contain such material? If so, why did not the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) say so?

Mr. Macdonald: I would point out to the hon. member that this is what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) has said, and said in his statement a few minutes ago, that there was content in this particular directive which, if disclosed, would be prejudicial to the public interest acting through the security system. I think that is a fair observation to make and one which the hon. member in a spirit of fairness would accept.

The hon. member and before him the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) cited examples which spokesmen for the government in October, and again today, have acknowledged as representing a breakdown in the security system. They referred to the Knott and Petersen cases, and I do not think anyone makes the pretence that there was not a definite failure there. It was to meet that particular failure that the procedure set out on October 25 was invoked. I do not think that anyone in any honesty pretends that there may not be some circumstances, very marginal circumstances, in which it might be possible, even through the screen of the new procedure, for some injustices to be done; but I think we recognize that those particular measures which are now being applied would have caught the examples referred to by the hon. member.

I think it is significant to point out—

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, might I just ask a question. Did the hon. member say, as I thought I heard him say, that there had been an error in the Petersen case? Second, is the parliamentary secretary saying that the procedures now are such that in a similar case the person concerned would be told what were the difficulties so that he could answer them?

Mr. Macdonald: No, Mr. Speaker, I did not say that. What I said was that the hon. member referred to examples; and I was referring particularly to the Knott case when I said that the problem which arose there in my opinion would have been adequately caught by the present procedures. As to the second part of the hon. member's question, I am not saying that even now it would be possible to do this under all the circumstances. As the hon. member requested before, the actual nature of the complaint in some circumstances was that the security officer responsible be presented for confrontation.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I have never said on any occasion that the actual person making the charge against an employee should be brought forward. What I said, and what I will continue to say, is that the nature of the charge should be told to the person concerned. In the Petersen case, Petersen should have been told that it was because his father-in-law was thought to be a communist that he was discharged from the navy. But in his case he was never told what were the reasons for his discharge. I have never said personally, either today or any other time—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I suggest to the hon. member that he is arguing his case rather than raising a question of privilege.

Mr. Orlikow: No, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member said—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that the correction of a misstatement is not a question of privilege. The hon. member has the opportunity later on in debate to correct a misstatement.

Mr. Douglas: On that point, Mr. Speaker, he certainly has the right to correct some misquotation of what he said, and this is what he has done.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Absolutely; but that should not be done under the guise of a question of privilege.

Mr. Douglas: The hon. member cannot speak again in the debate, so how else can he do it?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes, the hon. member is entitled to speak a second time during the debate to make a correction.

Mr. Macdonald: I would point out that I have absolutely no intention of misrepresenting the hon. member's opinion, but I have a genuine belief from having heard him before and having heard him again today that that is what he was calling for, namely the right of confrontation in a proceeding similar to a judicial proceeding. If that is not his intention, then I thank him for making clear to me what was not obvious before.

What I was saying when I was interrupted was that hon. members have not come forward with any instances in which the procedure set out by the Prime Minister and which is now invoked with regard to security matters has failed. The examples which they brought before this house are examples which arose before this procedure, and I suggest that this is a good indication of the effectiveness of the government's measures at meeting this particular problem.

In the course of his remarks the hon. member for Winnipeg North made reference to the procedure which was established under the defence of Canada regulations. I would suggest to him that there is a very substantial difference between the basic merits being decided under those regulations and the very delicate issues being decided by the particular security tribunal concerned. I would point out that the defence of Canada regulations have been promulgated for the purpose of determining the status of someone in Canada during wartime so as to decide whether or not that person would be entitled to be free in our society. They do not determine whether that person would be entitled to access to restricted government information. I suggest, just as was suggested in the speech on October 25 by the Prime Minister, that you have in connection with these security regulations a much more difficult and subtle problem, the problem of determining in a particular case the reliability of a particular employee. That problem would have arisen in Canada in wartime apart altogether from the requirements of the defence of Canada regulations.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A to inform the house that the question to be raised at ten o'clock this evening is as follows:

The hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin), shifting of ore from Timmins to North Carolina for processing.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker.

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, it is with very close attention and indeed with respect that, the other day, I listened to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) when he introduced a project for a national flag—three maple leaves on a white field with two vertical sections—and told us, at the same time, the significance for our country to have a truly national flag.

If, on some occasions, I do not always approve of the economic and especially of the financial policy of the government which, in many respects, I consider as retrograde, because it is not in keeping with the needs of more than three million Canadians who are living in want, it gives me pleasure, on this occasion to offer to the right hon. Prime Minister, my most sincere congratulations for the speech—transcendent on many scores —which he made on that occasion when he asked parliament to adopt the proposed national flag so that Canada may be given an emblem which will create a new patriotic climate in favour of our country a mari usque ad mare, because it will contribute to unite all Canadians, since it is a model or a design free from any foreign figurative symbol, and it will mean at long last that our country has attained its majority, that is the age when our bicultural nation reaches adulthood. By adopting that flag, we will give proof of our national maturity.

It is most amazing to see in this house and even outside some parliamentarians who have not yet cut the umbilical cord binding them to another country and who prefer to stagnate in a state of colonial immaturity. Their fanatic opposition to that flag design, typical of Canada in 1964, indicate that they are not true Canadians because even if they live in Canada their mind is elsewhere.

The right hon. Prime Minister, in his speech, said this:

The flags we have used for Canada have already changed as Canada has evolved from colony to self-governing dominion to independent nation, to a sovereign state respected among the states of the world.

In this evolution, the time has now come for another change by the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag which cannot be mistaken for or confused with the emblem of any other country but Canada.

Those are the words of a prominent Canadian, more logical than those of a certain provincial premier who stated, in the last few days, that as long as he would lead his province, the government would fly the red ensign.

Such a statement, like others almost identical to it, reveal the worst kind of separatists that can be found in Canada. Ordinarily, I am a very accommodating man, but faced with such fanaticism and prejudice, I become uncompromising.

The Prime Minister proved with facts that the three maple leaves have a historical and heraldic importance. But, in my opinion, other reasons dictate the choice of the three maple leaves. At all times in history and ancient times, the figure three has been a good number. The three maple leaves express in fact a historical trilogy which marks the development of Canada: the French administration, the English administration, the Canadian administration.

On the other hand, from the viewpoint of natural resources, three leaves make a perfect trio and would show that Canada is a land of plenty, while one leaf would indicate a still life.

In science, three maple leaves could symbolize a triode, for in this automation age, a three-electrode electronic tube plays a major role in quite a number of electronic apparatus.

In music, the three maple leaves could represent a triplet, or three notes of equal value: French Canadians, English Canadians and new Canadians, all of them having equal rights under a bicultural confederation.

From the viewpoint of Christians, who represent the majority of the Canadian people, the Trinity symbolizes unity and, therefore, it is the most beautiful symbol which could grace the future national flag.

For all those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I approve of the proposed design unreservedly. Besides, as matters stand at present, this is no time for quibbling over this matter, for if we were to pick out a design to suit every member's taste, we would have to approve of 265 different designs.

In concluding, may I add that having advocated for 25 years the establishment of a Canadian republic and called for the red ensign and the union jack to be set aside and replaced by a distinctive flag, I will vote for the three-leaved flag with great patriotic earnestness.

[Text]

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I must say that it has been years since a more important matter than our flag has been brought before the parliament of Canada. In many quarters of this house it is being treated too lightly. We have a flag in our country that has flown for many years. There may be reasons why we may need a more distinctive one. However, first, it must be shown to me that over 50 per cent of the people in this country desire that. It must be shown to me that there are good reasons for changing our flag.

This afternoon the hon. member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett) said the young people would like this new design and we should please them. I am glad they like this new design. However, there are many who were brought up to honour the design we have today. I have children, and they were taught to honour the flag that flies over our country today. I am sure there are many other young people throughout this country who have the same feeling as my children. We must remember our young people, but at the same time we must not forget the older generations, our fathers, our mothers and our grandfathers and our grandmothers, who lived under difficulties in the pioneering years to build Canada for the younger generation.

I rise, Mr. Speaker, to support the amendment for a referendum on this flag issue. We heard the hon. member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett) say she was not in favour of a referendum. I may say there are some referendums of which I am not in favour. As an example, I may cite the one held at the exhibition in Winnipeg last Saturday when the Liberal party held a referendum on the question of a sales tax in Manitoba. This is the type of referendum I do not favour, because as I stood there watching these people who were controlling the referendum, one young fellow said to the fellow worker in the booth, "I voted five times today". The other fellow said, "I voted 14 times". I am not in favour of a referendum under those conditions. I want an honest referendum held across this country by means of which the people can speak their minds.

I object, Mr. Speaker, to the way in which this resolution was put before this house and the dictatorial manner in which the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) refused his party a free vote. He held a hammer over the head of the opposition parties by saying, "You either vote for my design or we have an election". I am not in favour of that design. Before I resume my seat tonight, sir, I shall place evidence upon the record which I am sure should cause the Prime Minister to drop his head in shame. I am sure that every Liberal in this house and throughout the country will drop their heads in shame. I am sure this evidence will give those who are supporting this design something to think about.

This flag resolution, Mr. Speaker, is not the type of legislation which can be introduced in this parliament and amended in the next parliament. This is a moral issue across this country, an emotional issue. Speaking for myself, I may say I represent 58,000 people in this House of Commons. I have been sent here on three different occasions to represent these people, the last time with a majority of nearly 10,000. However, I do not feel I have the right to stand in this house and vote on behalf of the people on such a moral and emotional issue as interfering with our flag.

Some people might ask, how would a referendum work? I brought this up before in the house. I feel, sir, we should have a committee of all parties in this house to pick out three designs to put before the people of Canada. The first design would be the red ensign. No. 2 would be an alteration of the red ensign and No. 3 could be a green maple leaf on a red background. The people of Canada would then have an opportunity to choose No. 1, 2 or 3. By a process of elimination of the third and second choices, we would come to a decisive decision of 51 per cent, and whatever that 51 per cent decided I, as a true Canadian, would be glad to support. We understand that at the exhibition in Winnipeg last week, the New Democratic party held another poll. What was the result of that poll? Fifteen thousand people voted, and 75 per cent of them voted for a referendum on the flag. I wonder why there should be such a hurry about getting this flag. What's the hurry all of a sudden? On May 15 the Prime Minister listed the urgent business before the house and there was no mention of a flag. Then, suddenly, we have a flag resolution on the order paper. It appears as though the flag resolution is nothing more than camouflage to cover up the mess this government has got itself into. The question of a flag should not be mixed up in politics in this way, or used as a means of covering up the weakness of the administration. We have a great deal of urgent business in front of us and we should set about choosing a flag in a better, more democratic way.

We have been united in this country for 96 years. No issue which has been before us has caused so much disunity across this country from ocean to ocean as this flag resolution we are now considering. It is a burning issue across the country. In my opinion it should be shelved so as to give the people a chance to think the matter over. Then it could be brought back into parliament in a more democratic way.

The main reason for the present confusion over the flag issue is that no one has taken the time to study the red ensign and teach it to our children. Let us look at the history of our Canadian red ensign. I should like to thank the Canadian Legion for much of the information I shall be giving in the course of the next few minutes. The Canadian red ensign has gradually grown up with the dominion until today it is the symbol of Canada's place of importance not only among the great dominions of the commonwealth but also among the nations of the world. By common custom the Canadian red ensign has been recognized as a distinctive Canadian flag, and this position was tacitly acknowledged and confirmed publicly by prime minister Mackenzie King, who in 1945 when welcoming General Crerar to the city, turned to the peace tower where the Canadian red ensign waved, and stated:

> And that, general, is another problem which your Canadian army has solved for Canada—the matter of our national flag.

Flags, national anthems, and other expressions of a united country grow out of the true history of a people, and the Canadian red ensign has grown out of Canadian history. Next to the staff, the red ensign has the union jack—the emblem which links together all the Queen's subjects. All the dominions use this jack in their flag, proclaiming themselves to be members of the great family of nations who, standing shoulder to shoulder in the last great struggle, sacrificed themselves to aid the oppressed peoples of the earth and who, by announcing to all the world that they will remain firm in that unity, can do so much to stabilize world affairs in the future, in peace as in war. Are we as Canadians ashamed to be known as a member of this great family? The union jack is a union of crosses of three saints—St. George, the patron saint of chivalry; St. Andrew, one of Christ's apostles who was martyred for his faith; and St. Patrick, a missionary who spread among the Irish the civilization learned in France. It is the union of these three crosses which gives special significance to the red ensign as a national flag for Canada.

It is not generally known that in 1921 the Canadian government especially requested His Majesty King George V to order a new coat of arms for Canada. This coat of arms is in use today, and the design of the shield has been displayed on Canada's flag. The Canadian red ensign is a distinctive flag of Canada. These emblems represent the early pioneers who were instrumental in laying the foundation of this great country—English, Welsh, Scottish, Irish and French—all branches of one great race who, coming together in the land of the maple leaf, built a nation of which all may be proud.

So the shield on the flag, while essentially as "new" as the young nation it represents, has its roots firmly in the past and speaks of the very beginnings of our race. The emblems on the shield date back to very ancient times. The couchant lion came to us from France and was the emblem on the flag of William of Normandy, and ever since 1066 has been incorporated in the heraldry of the British kings. The red lion rampant on the golden field is even more ancient. It was the emblem of the Scottish kings and came to them from ancient Ireland, where it had arrived from the east about 580 B.C. The harp emblem is equally ancient and was taken to Ireland by ancient Greek warriors. The fleur-de-lis of the fourth quarter of the shield is well known as the lily of France and held a proud place in the arms of the British kings from the time of Henry II down to the time of George III proclaiming the French ancestry of the sovereigns from the distaff side of the house. It should be remembered that it was this emblem, not the tricolour, which came with the French settlers into this country long before the tricolour was used in France. What we want in our flag, and what we have in our flag today, are the symbols treasured by the people who built Canada. The Pearson pennant is a pretty trade mark but it does not represent the sources of this great country.

In 1924, the Canadian parliament enacted legislation providing for the use of the Canadian red ensign on any Canadian building abroad. Canadian troops fought proudly under the Canadian red ensign in world war II. The Canadian red ensign was carried by Canadians in Korea, and is carried today by them in Cyprus. All Canadian teams at the Olympic games carry the Canadian red ensign. The Canada Shipping Act states: "The Canadian red ensign is hereby declared to be the proper national colours for all Canadian ships."

An hon. Member: Until when?

Mr. Smallwood: I hear those trained seals yapping away there. They will have plenty of time to make their speeches when I am through. Until then they can sit down. When I am finished they will be able to make their own speeches.

The establishment of the Canadian red ensign through history, tradition and custom, was formalized on September 5, 1945, when our governor general signed an order in council which stated this:

> The red ensign with the shield of the coat of arms of Canada in the fly may be flown from buildings owned or occupied by the federal government within or without Canada... and it shall be appropriate to fly the Canadian red ensign within or without Canada wherever place or occasion may make it desirable to fly a distinctive Canadian flag.

It will be noted that the order in council stated quite clearly "a distinctive Canadian flag". Those who say Canada has no distinctive flag are either very careless with the truth or they are ignoring Canadian history.

I should like to put on record a letter which came to me here at the House of Commons. It states:

> The enclosed article is both interesting and informative. The red ensign has been authorized as our flag by four governments of Canada during the past 70 years, the latest being by order in council (PC 5888) September 5, 1945.
> The statement that our flag is not distinctive is, to say the least, erroneous. There can be no doubt in the minds of the Cypriots, Greeks and Turks, when they see the Van Doos and the red ensign, as to where these troops come from.
> In the Olympic games the whole world is represented and when Canada sometimes wins a gold medal everybody knows, when the red ensign is raised to the masthead, that Canada has now a world's championship.
> With the continued world wide success of Canada as a country, and the extraordinary individual feats of Canadians under this flag, it might not be amiss to wonder who or what is behind this movement to haul down our flag. We should be on our guard that we as Canadians are not being led up the garden path.

That is signed by "Conn" Smythe of the Maple Leaf Gardens.

An hon. Member: Where is "Red" Kelly.

[Mr. Smallwood.]

Mr. Smallwood: I will just give the trained seals a few minutes for a breather, Mr. Speaker. Since the order in council was signed in 1945, immigrants applying for Canadian citizenship are told by the department of immigration:

> The flag used as distinctive of Canada is properly described as the red ensign with the shield of the coat of arms of Canada in the fly. The flag consists of a red field, with the union jack in the first quarter next to the staff. The inclusion of the union jack signifies Canada's association with the other members of the British commonwealth of nations.

Outstanding French Canadians such as George Étienne Cartier demonstrated their grasp of British constitutionalism as they helped launch the young Canadian nation. Lafontaine, Lemieux, and Laurier drew upon the foundations of British political ideas. As Lemieux expressed it:

> If you ask me why I am a British subject and why I wish to remain one, I reply...that I prize most those institutions that secure me most strongly in our rights and liberties—

Many non-British immigrants have made it clear that they support the retention of a flag symbolizing a history in which they now want to participate. Writing as "a refugee from communist tyranny" Mr. Alex Bloschinsky of London, Ontario, states in the pamphlet: "The Canadian Red Ensign" distributed by the Canadian Legion:

> In Canada I have found freedom, law, and justice. I and other non-British migrants realize what we owe to the British institutions—constitutional monarchy, parliamentary government, and the rule of law. These are the great bastions of law, order and freedom.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Speaker, I am now quoting from this pamphlet circulated by the Canadian Legion. While I am speaking on this question of a distinctive Canadian flag, it will not hurt to hold up this pamphlet to show the house the banner that is depicted thereon. Two million men served under the red ensign and 111,000 died for Canada under it. This is no time for us, as Canadian citizens, to be kicking this flag about as we are today. The pamphlet says, further:

> It is obvious that members of parliament who neither care about nor understand the great Canadian heritage which the Canadian red ensign symbolizes, or who perhaps will vote whichever way they think will further their political future in their party, cannot safely be left to themselves to make one of the most momentous decisions in Canadian history.
> This is not a party political question at all: it is one which concerns the very soul of the nation; it is one upon which every Canadian is entitled to have a say now that the government has insisted that it is an urgent national question. If Canadians are not prepared to act in defence of the symbols of their heritage today, they are inviting the destruction of the very substance of that heritage tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Speaker, now that the trained seals have again had a little relaxation, I will continue. I would like to put on record an editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail of June 15 last, written by Mr. Bruce West. It is a very fitting editorial and should be put on the record on this occasion:

Of the hundreds of letters on the flag question which have come to my desk in the past few weeks, a good 90 per cent are from correspondents who solidly support the retention of the red ensign. As I mentioned here before, it is difficult to individually acknowledge each one of these welcome notes or even to deal with many of them in this space. There are some writers who object to the idea of a national referendum being held on the flag issue on the grounds that this is a question which should be dealt with only in parliament by the representatives of the people. Yet, as the curtain rises on the flag debate in Ottawa, we are already being told that the adoption of the proposed maple leaf flag is a foregone conclusion. Under such circumstances, it seems that we who support the use of a referendum on this matter could hardly be blamed for wondering just how free and democratic will be the process by which the red ensign is being abolished as the flag of this country. There are others who say that a referendum might cause serious division and dispute in this nation. Yet, if the many who support the retention of the red ensign are ignored and legislation to provide a new flag is virtually railroaded through parliament, how much unity will such an action promote? Still others say that the whole question of what kind of flag we should have is a silly argument in the first place. I don't happen to believe that it is. I believe that the impatient efforts of many to discard a banner which symbolizes almost a century of our history may be a symptom of something gravely unhealthy in the affairs of Canada. I believe such an action might be one more large step toward the day when, stripped of our ancient background and heritage, we may stand as hardly more than another banana republic against the already powerful magnetic pull of our huge neighbour to the south. I hope I'm wrong. But I can't help feeling it, just the same. I feel that upon the day the red ensign is discarded, some vitally important threads are going to be removed from the already strained fabric of this country.

An hon. Member: Now you ought to read the Bible.

Mr. Smallwood: It wouldn't hurt you to read the Bible a little bit. The flag issue in its present form is bringing great disunity to this country. French and English people who have lived side by side, who have intermarried and intermingled over the last 200 years, are now saying they are being forced to split and take sides against each other on the issue. In western Canada we have many French settlers. Many are in my neighbourhood, and we live together and are good neighbours. These people say to me: "What is wrong down east? What is all this talk about? What is all this dissension about? We came west and were welcomed and are happy". Although the founding races of the country were French and English, Canada today is a country of many races. Other ethnic groups came to this country under our present flag looking for political refuge, and got it. Under our present flag today we have freedom of speech, freedom of religion and freedom of the protection of the law.

An hon. Member: You will change all that.

Mr. Smallwood: You would like to change it but you have not changed it yet, and there will be a lot of snow on the maple leaf before you do change it. Because of our history our Canadian flag must contain an emblem representing both English and French races. Therefore, if we should change our present flag we must retain the union jack in one corner to represent the English and the fleur-de-lis in the other corner to represent the French, with a large green maple leaf on a red background.

Now I come to the important point of my argument tonight. We have heard the argument that we need a new flag because our present flag is too easily mistaken for the British merchant flag; the Prime Minister and others have used that argument. I should like to turn to page 4319 of Hansard, where the Prime Minister is reported as saying:

Mr. Speaker, I believe that a national flag of the kind described in this resolution, that will be exclusively Canadian—

Remember those words "exclusively Canadian". On the next page the Prime Minister is reported as follows:

—I believe that the time has now come for another change by the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag which cannot be mistaken for or confused with the emblem of any other country but Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Smallwood: Hon. members are applauding now but they will not be in a minute. Mr. Speaker, you have heard those remarks. Hon. members opposite are concerned because the red ensign may be confused with the British merchant navy flag. I should like to refer to "Flags of the World" by H. Gresham Carr which I obtained from the parliamentary library. On turning to page 190 reference is made to the flags of the Soviet union. There appear to be a lot of flags in the U.S.S.R., and this is what is said about the merchant flag of the U.S.S.R.:

> The ensign is white, and has a light blue border one sixth the depth of the hoist along the bottom of the flag. In the white portion are the star and crossed hammer and sickle in red—

I suggest that this proposed flag of the Prime Minister is not distinctive from any other flag. We want to destroy our red ensign because it is the symbol of the British merchant marine and replace it with a flag with the white background, the blue trim and the red of the Soviet union.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Smallwood: This is a serious matter which should be considered.

[Translation]

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

I should like to point out to the house that the hon. member has had the floor for 33 minutes. I interrupted only to point out to the Chair that the time of the hon. member should be checked.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member again state his point of order, as I was unable to hear it?

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Speaker, this hon. member has had the floor for 34 minutes. He started speaking at 8.15 p.m. I want to mention that the time must be checked.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I may point out to the hon. member that, according to the rules of the house the hon. member is entitled to 40 minutes.

Mr. Bélanger: Mr. Speaker, to us it seemed as if he had been talking for 60 minutes.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Speaker, I remember when the former minister of agriculture was speaking in this debate and said that we know what we get when we cross a jackass and a horse. We have just heard them braying. Before I was interrupted I was drawing the attention of the house to the colours of the proposed new flag and its similarity with the Russian merchant marine flag, which has a white background, a blue border and the red emblem of the Soviet union in the centre of the white. I wonder why the Prime Minister wants to destroy our present flag and force on the people of Canada this design with colours the same as those used by Soviet union merchant vessels. This creates some doubt as to the judgment of the Prime Minister and his advisers and should make the blood of every true Canadian boil. This should give every young Canadian who is supporting this new flag concern for deep thought.

Mr. Speaker, the situation is even more serious now, and in view of what is taking place today I say with all sincerity that there are only two alternatives for the Prime Minister. One is to put this flag issue before the people of Canada by way of a referendum; or else he should resign.

Mr. Reynald Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my modest contribution to that of the numerous speakers who have already taken part in this debate. But I shall be very brief, for it is urgent that our country should have its own flag.

In my humble opinion, there is no point in delaying the passing of the measure now before us by asking for a referendum, indulging in obstruction or suggesting that other bills should have priority, because the people want a flag and find ridiculous the objections put forward by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), and the way he is wasting the time of the house by trying to delay the vote on this resolution.

Could it be that the Leader of the Opposition is afraid of the way some members of his party will vote, especially those from Quebec? Or is he conscience-stricken because he never did bring that measure before the house, despite the huge number of 208 members he had in his group then, when it would have been so much easier for him to give our country the flag for which it has been yearning for so many decades?

Our country needs this emblem to strengthen its national unity and to prove its sovereignty once and for all to the whole world.

As far as the referendum is concerned, I must say to the mover of this amendment that he missed his finest opportunity to conduct a public survey early in 1961 when he was prime minister. Allow me to quote from La Voix de l'Est:

> Mr. Diefenbaker has tried lately to advocate a referendum on the flag and the national anthem issue. He reproaches the Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Lester Pearson, with introducing a resolution in the house on the subject and he maintains that only a referendum could reflect the views of the Canadian people on the selection of a flag and an anthem.

Is Mr. Diefenbaker sincere? Let us ask ourselves, first of all, if he held such a referendum during the six years his government was in office. The answer is no. Mr. Diefenbaker did not hold a referendum on the flag or the national anthem.

You can be sure that if he did not think about it, somebody made the suggestion to him in 1961.

Seeing that the Conservative government had been in office since 1957 and that no decision was apparently being taken in regard to a distinctive flag and a national anthem, a Liberal member placed a bill on the order paper of the house on January 24, 1961.

The bill was tabled on that day by the member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville, Mr. Yvon Dupuis. It was Bill No. 60, "to amend the Statistics Act".

Mr. Diefenbaker had in that bill everything needed to hold a referendum which would not have cost the government anything and would have revealed what the people thought about giving our country a distinctive national flag.

Mr. Diefenbaker had in the house the largest majority ever and there was a proposal he could easily have implemented himself while he was in office, which he is blaming Mr. Pearson today for not doing.

There we are. In 1961, an hon. member pointed out to Prime Minister Diefenbaker and his government how easy it would be to hold such a referendum at the time of the national decennial census, and that project which would have cost the country nothing and would have established the Right Hon. Diefenbaker in the people's mind was discarded.

We must therefore conclude that the present Leader of the Opposition was guilty of two glaring mistakes when in power.

1. He did not make any decision on the choice of these symbols.

2. He refused to ask the opinion of the people on the matter at the most convenient time during the last ten years, i.e. during the national census.

He is therefore unjustified to call for a referendum.

I have noted a very strange thing in the speeches of the members of the opposition, namely that almost no member has dared to say that he was in favour of a referendum.

We, Liberals, have promised the people in 1963 a distinctive national flag. The Prime Minister himself during the election campaign promised that such legislation would be passed within two years.

And, so far as I can see, the Canadian public trust our judgment. Besides, I feel a referendum is useless since, as representatives of the people, we have all received a clear mandate. It is up to us to take our responsibilities. If we fail to do so, the electorate will remember it at the next election and they will say and justly so that those who have tried to turn this important question into a political issue no longer deserve their confidence, and their judgment will be without mercy for those irresponsible members.

Consequently, let us pass this resolution as soon as possible; let us stop this childishness; let us act as responsible politicians and the people will be happy and proud of their elected representatives. The public expect a great deal from us; let us not deceive them. If we do not put an end to this, we will be ridiculed by the people and by the rest of the world and we will have deserved it.

I should like to quote this editorial which appeared in La Tribune of Lévis:

The government kept its word; the party now in office had promised in the last federal electoral campaign that if it were elected, it would take the necessary steps to give Canada a truly national flag, which, from sea to sea, would be the symbol of a true country.

From the Atlantic to the Pacific, indeed, but also in foreign countries. For, at the present time, it is not exaggerated to say that there are many people, throughout the world, who think that Canada is purely and simply a British colony. Evidently, the red ensign does not help them to think otherwise. For some years, we have been witnessing the birth of many new nations, especially that of the African countries, and we never heard of any particular problem when it came to selecting a symbolic representation which would be agreed upon and recognized everywhere.

As it seems, that in spite of "last minute" delays, the goal is at last within reach, we should rejoice, while just feeling sorry for some members of the "old guard" who refuse to admit what reason, logic and the example of other nations should impress upon us as an unquestionable fact.

Of course, those people may, for some obscure and hidden reason, have a secret preference for a Canada which would not be free but would have to continue "in vitam aeternam" to solicit from a foreign (though friendly) government the ratification of bills and legislation which concern no one but Canadians.

Traditions are a fine thing, but when, to maintain them, national honour, and, by that very fact, part of everybody's individual honour have to be sacrificed, would it not be better, once for all, to abolish those traditions replacing them by mutual goodwill, a spirit and atmosphere of freedom and total respect for the sovereignty of others?

To act, and even to think otherwise, would be to counter progress, to regress, to go backwards, in brief, to do the opposite of what the peoples of the world and individuals everywhere seek to attain.

In respect to the suggested referendum, the very fact that there have only been two plebiscites in this country's history and, I understand, none at all in the whole history of the United Kingdom, would indicate that such formula is not part of our governmental system.

We have here a symbol around which all Canadians, new and old, Canadians by birth, or naturalized Canadians of every racial origin may rally, and which may be the centre and the core of their loyalty to Canada.

I think therefore that the content of this resolution is daring, logical, wise, and that it deserves the support of the house and of all Canadians.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would like now to quote the speech made by the Prime Minister when he introduced this motion in the house:

> Mr. Speaker, I believe that a national flag of the kind described in this resolution, that will be exclusively Canadian. will bring us closer together; give us a greater feeling of national identity and unity. Today especially, as Mr. Massey has reminded us, we need faith and confidence in ourselves as Canadians, with pride in Canada, devotion to our country. I believe that the adoption of this resolution will help to produce that result. If I did not deeply and sincerely so believe, I would not be introducing it into this House of Commons.
> Mr. Speaker, this flag, if it is adopted by this parliament, will stand for one Canada; united, strong independent and equal to her tasks. It will recognize that we cannot be saved or sanctified merely by the valour and devotion of our ancestors. It remains to us in each new generation to do our own duty in changing conditions.

To conclude, I want to tell the house that I will vote against the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition, but I will be very proud to vote for the resolution, because I will be happy to tell my children in later years that in 1964, I voted for this flag which is our pride, because I was not afraid to assume my responsibilities and to act as a true Canadian, a true member of parliament and a true representative of the people.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the hon. member for Lévis?

Mr. Laniel: Is the question in order?

Mr. Guay: Yes.

Mr. Pigeon: The hon. member said that he would vote for the maple leaf flag. I should like to ask him whether he will vote for the union jack.

Mr. Guay: Mr. Speaker, I would answer that question, since the hon. member—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I suggest that the hon. member's question is out of order, since we are not discussing the union jack resolution.

Mr. Pigeon: You saved him from the rope, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I think it might be safe to say that students of parliamentary government, and I think all members of the house are that, generally regard as a sort of bible of the duties and the functions of a member of parliament Mr. Edmund Burke's very famous speech delivered to the electors of Bristol well over a hundred years ago. In this speech he set out what the duties of a member of parliament are, and the reasons that he gave are just as valid today, even with radio, television, increased literacy, the press, magazines and other media of public information, as they were when he first set out his dicta. In his speech, as I am sure many hon. members will recall, he points out the difference between being a delegate of the people in the constituency and being a member of parliament, and I think this is a very important distinction to make.

I have had a number of letters, and I am sure other hon. members have had letters as well, saying that it is the duty of parliament and the members of parliament to make a decision on the flag matter. In most cases when I receive such letters I would most certainly agree because that is what members of parliament are sent here to do. As Burke pointed out in his famous speech, members of parliament are sent to parliament to do a number of things. They are sent to parliament to approve the government spending program, to pass legislation and to bring matters to the attention of the public. A great many people, particularly, I am sorry to say, some of those in the field of public media and communication, seem to have forgotten what the function of parliament is. The purpose of parliament is to discuss matters, not to sit apathetically by and accept without proper discussion any proposition that any government puts forward.

To get back to the question of the duty of a member of parliament and what his function is, Burke pointed out very well that since a member of parliament has at his or her disposal the essential facts on any public issue he or she is in a much better position to make a decision on that matter than most of the constituents. There may be some instances where some of the constituents are very well informed but, speaking in general terms, when a public issue comes up a member of parliament is informed or has the opportunity to be informed on the matter to a greater degree than his or her constituents, and it is for that reason that he or she must make the decision.

In 99.9 per cent of all cases this is undoubtedly true, but like most other things that affect human relations and behaviour there are always exceptions because human beings, thank fortune, are not things of metal or stone or computer machines. They have their idiosyncracies, and the exception when a member of parliament is not in a better position to decide certain matters is when he runs into matters of a deep moral or emotional character such as the question of capital punishment, for example. People have very strong personal views on this matter. Matters such as capital punishment are not matters that can really be made political issues because there are enormous differences of opinion even in any political party on such matters, and since these are moral or emotional issues any individual in the country has just as much right to express his or her view on the matter and can do it just as well and just as sincerely as an elected representative.

In my opinion such is the case in the very unique and unusual situation we have before us today, namely the choice of a national flag. This is not a question where a member of parliament has any additional or better information than any of his constituents. This is a moral and emotional matter, one of deep emotional feeling, and every individual in the country has just as much right as a member of this house to express his or her views, because no special knowledge is required to make a decision. This is a moral and emotional issue, one about which there are very deep feelings, as has been made all too evident in the house to date.

Mr. Brown: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Nesbitt: Certainly.

Mr. Brown: Would he explain to us in what way this issue is a moral matter?

Mr. Nesbitt: I said moral and emotional. The hon. member for Brantford may not regard it as a moral issue but I have had correspondence indicating that a great many people do. Maybe he does not, but that of course is his business. So far as the flag is concerned, I think the people should be able to express their views on the matter.

It has been pointed out that in the history of this country we have had two plebiscites or referendums. One was on the consumption or non-consumption of alcohol and took place in the last century.

Mr. Byrne: That is a moral issue.

Mr. Nesbitt: That may have been regarded as a moral issue, as the hon. member for Kootenay East points out. That matter was decided by a referendum. Then there was the question of conscription. I do not think that issue was exactly a suitable one for a referendum or plebiscite, but this again is arguable. My view is a personal one and I point out that in that case the government and the members of the house had knowledge at their disposal which their constituents did not and could not have because of security reasons. In that case, the government was in a better position to make a decision. As all of us know, there were other matters involved in the question of conscription. There were racial matters and other things involved, and for that reason it is arguable that it was probably a good idea to have a referendum.

However, I do not believe the case for a referendum on the matter of conscription during the war is the same as the question of a flag. Apparently some of those who supported a plebiscite on the question of conscription are not at all anxious to extend the same courtesy to people from other parts of Canada who feel equally strongly on this matter of the flag.

What do the people of Canada think about this question of a referendum? One hon. member who spoke a short time ago pointed out that a poll was conducted recently in the city of Winnipeg in which 15,000 people cast ballots. I understand the poll was conducted as a public service by the New Democratic party.

Mr. Herridge: Free.

Mr. Nesbitt: Free, as the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) points out. I understand from press reports that 65 per cent of the 15,000 favoured a referendum on the subject of the flag. I requested a daily newspaper in my city to conduct a plebiscite in a small way in my constituency. I might point out, Mr. Speaker, that contrary to some views I have heard expressed privately around here, my constituency is not one with a solid Anglo-Saxon background. There are a large number of ethnic groups, if I may use that word, particularly those of German extraction as well as Belgian, Hungarian, Polish and other extractions. Recently a large number of people from the Netherlands settled in this area and became citizens of this country. These people have told me they favour retention of the red ensign because this was the flag they remembered helping to liberate them from the Germans during the last war. It is for this reason many of these people favour this flag.

However, the newspaper was kind enough to print a ballot showing a picture of the red ensign and a picture of the flag proposed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). The people were told to mark an X opposite the one they preferred and send the ballot to their member of parliament. The result was very interesting. I have all the ballots here. Those preferring the red ensign totalled 988, while those preferring the maple leaf design advocated by the Prime Minister totalled 184. The people were not required to sign their ballots, but a good many did. I was interested to note that, strangely enough, the majority of those preferring the maple leaf flag seemed to be of Anglo-Saxon extraction, while a large proportion of those favouring the red ensign were of non-Anglo-Saxon extraction. This is something which surprised me a bit.

Many members here believe that as a result of reading newspapers and letters they know what the people are thinking about in Canada. However, I do not believe any of us really know as much as we think we do. It takes a method such as this to find out what the public really are thinking. In addition to these ballots, of course, I have received about 400 or 500 letters from persons. Making a rough calculation, I think I have received about 1,500 representations on the matter from the centre part of my constituency. This comprises the city of Woodstock and the town of Ingersoll, approximately 34,000 persons. Assuming there was one ballot per household, I think this gives a fair cross-section of public opinion on the matter.

Someone may say, well, we have listened to your speech and you have pointed out that in this case a member of parliament should be the delegate of his constituents. Why would it not be all right then for every member of parliament to conduct a sort of referendum in his own constituency and then he would know the views of these people? A national plebiscite would then not be necessary. This argument might have been very well a short while ago, but this procedure is no longer possible because of the manner in which the issue has been presented. After speaking to a great many people, I would say this, that while there are differences of view about the flag design I found no difference of view about one thing. All these people were very critical of the method used by the Prime Minister in presenting this matter to parliament.

If the Prime Minister had suggested this design and said, "This is a matter of conscience, this design of the flag, so let members vote as they wish on it", I do not believe many people would have had too much objection to that method at all. It would have been quite agreeable. Instead of that, the Prime Minister said, in effect. "This is the flag I am proposing and if it is not adopted by this house there will be an election, the third one within two years". Nobody in the country, but nobody that I can think of, wants an election. The public certainly do not and I do not believe many hon. members in this house do. The Prime Minister made quite certain that the members of his own party would not dare to withhold their support on the matter, although I think perhaps one or two are not going to support it. Some other groups in the house feel that they must support the Prime Minister's flag, for various reasons, one of them being they realize the public do not want an election.

Another reason that I think the method that has been chosen to deal with this matter is unfortunate is that we hear around the country the new flag being called the "Liberal flag". I cannot think of anything more unfortunate than having a political label attached to a symbol which, at some date, may well become our flag. This is a very unfortunate thing, and I am very sorry to hear this reference being made. I say that very sincerely. However, the situation has been precipitated by the Prime Minister and his advisers as a result of the method used to present this flag to the house.

I do not believe the Prime Minister or anyone else should arrogate to themselves the right to design one of our national symbols and place it before parliament. Then, because of the unusual voting situation in this house at the moment, and because of the fact we have had two elections, he virtually forces it on the house. He says, "My design will be accepted or there will be an election." I do not think it is fair; I do not think it is right. Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I am most surprised to find the Prime Minister doing this because he has a great reputation in the field of foreign affairs.

It was because of his ability to make compromises and see different points of view. This way there is no compromise possible. There is no consideration whatever for those who wish to express their views, or who do not agree. They are being trampled on. It seems to me to be out of character for the Prime Minister to do things like that in this country.

An hon. Member: May I be permitted a question?

Mr. Nesbitt: I have had one question already. Time is getting on, I see. At the conclusion of my remarks the hon. member may ask all the questions he pleases.

I suggest it would have been better if the Prime Minister had formed a committee of members of all parties in this house and the other place and had requested that committee within a set and limited time to recommend a design for a Canadian flag. I remember a judge saying to counsel in court during discussion of a damage action settlement, "Have you two gentlemen reached a mutually satisfactory agreement on the amount of damage?" One counsel replied, "Mutually unsatisfactory, my Lord". I imagine if a committee were formed and told they had to make a recommendation within a certain time probably the decision would be mutually unsatisfactory but there would not be just one point of view; at least there would be a compromise of viewpoints in the design.

There are many of us who feel strongly that something in this flag should represent our traditions and institutions. I of course mean that the union jack should form part of our flag. It forms part of the New Zealand flag, part of the Australian flag, and part of the flag of the Union of South Africa, and I am sure my friends from Quebec would hardly call the Union of South Africa a British colony. Yet they retain it and do not find it offensive. The state of Hawaii in the United States retains the union jack as part of its flag because of its traditions, and no one would think that the state of Hawaii was a British colony. Other people think there should be no connection with our institutions or tradition in the flag, urging that we should have something new, regardless of whether it is good or not. I agree, having heard the speech of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) and of the Prime Minister that there is some connection in some of our traditions about the three maple leaves. That we know. But to most people those three leaves do not mean very much; they have to dig around in history books to find where they came from, and I am sure most of us in this house when we learned their origin from the hon. member for Leeds and the Prime Minister were rather surprised to find this out, though I agree it is quite accurate.

We have heard many speeches saying that the flag of Canada should be a distinctive flag and I quite agree. Again we run into a little problem of semantics. Distinctive means one thing to one person and another to another. Certainly to my friends in the province of Quebec, distinctive means one thing—anything as long as it has not got a union jack in it. To people in other parts of the country distinctive means a flag of unique design which cannot easily be confused with another flag, not even with the Russian merchant marine flag as was pointed out a few moments ago. In that regard I am not at all convinced that there is a strong opposition to the use of the union jack in the province of Quebec as has been pointed out. You may ask what I know about the province of Quebec. I do not know much about it, except that last March I made a speech in this house on the subject of a flag, long before this debate started, and I took the liberty of submitting to the house a proposed modification of the red ensign which I considered might be suitable as a compromise. It was a white ensign with a green maple leaf on the fly and three fleur-de-lis, because I felt strongly that not only the union jack should be retained as representative of our institutions but also that some symbol representing French Canada must be on the flag because, after all, it was the settlers from France who really started this country in the first place and I certainly feel some equally strong representation should be on the flag we have. I feel very strongly and sincerely about that.

In any event the flag was drawn up. A design was made by the Montreal Star and it was published on the front page of the second section. I received a great many letters from people living in the province of Quebec, a good many of them in French which, while I do not speak it very well, I can read as well as English. Much to my surprise the only objections I had then to the flag design were from ultra old school tie Anglo-Saxons. I did not have any objections from French speaking Canadians. All the letters I received from Quebec on this matter were favourable, stating it was a good design and a good compromise. I am not at all sure that a number of members are not being influenced by a minority view in the province of Quebec. It is true that since the Montreal Star is an English newspaper perhaps a number of people would not have read it, but apparently the Montreal Star has some circulation in the French speaking parts of Montreal because as I have said quite a number of my letters were written to me in French.

The next question, and this is perhaps the biggest question of all concerning the flag is, why now? Why is this matter being placed before parliament at this time and why do they tell us we shall have no chance to get back to our constituencies and find out what our constituents' problems are until this measure has been passed. I have heard it said by members of the Liberal party that this is one of their election promises and they are only carrying it out. That is true, but I do not think it was one of the principal promises made during the election campaign. As far as that goes there were a great many other promises made by the Liberal party in the last election which have been completely broken but which are far more important. I refer to the Canada development fund. And how about those students' free bursaries which were going to be given away? That has been watered down and changed to something else, like a good many other things about which I do not intend to take the time of the house at the present time. I say these other promises are not being kept and are being forgotten, promises as important as this one. Yet there has been no adequate explanation of why this must be dealt with at this time.

In any event the Prime Minister in his election promises said there would be a flag within two years. Well it is just a little over a year. There is plenty of time to appoint a committee of all parties in this house to arrive at a design, or a committee composed of representatives of each province which would probably be equally acceptable, equally good. There would be plenty of time to have a plebiscite on the matter to allow the people to express their viewpoints—lots of time, and still be within his election promise of two years. There is no reason at all why this should not be done. Then, as has been pointed out many times, only last month the Prime Minister told us of the urgent business which must be completed before any summer recess. In the first instance the flag was never mentioned, and then it was suddenly there. Why this indecent haste? Because there has been no adequate explanation from the government a great many people are beginning to wonder. Throughout the country, certainly the parts of the country in which I travel around, one hears this: Oh well, it is pressure from Quebec which has forced the government to bring this issue on. That is one thing being said. It is also suggested that it is a cynical attempt by the heads of the Liberal party to try to get votes in Quebec, because they are going to have an election fairly soon. That is being said. Then there is another thing that is being said—that it is a quid pro quo obtained by Mr. Lesage and Mr. Lévesque for agreeing to the constitutional amendment to bring in the Canada pension plan.

These are the things that are being said. If the government does not know it, it is high time they found out; because I can think of nothing more divisive to this country than the type of talk that is going on. And the reason for it is that no explanation has been given to this house or to the people of Canada as to why this particular design must be forced through—and I repeat this—in such indecent haste. There is no reason for it.

We talk about the flag becoming a symbol of national unity; that is what the last speaker, the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) said. It is becoming—and in fact has become already—a symbol of national disunity, because there has been no explanation in this regard. When people do not have explanations, they begin surmising; and what the people of Canada are surmising are those things I have mentioned. Nothing could be more destructive of our country than this. I sincerely dislike hearing things like this, because for years we may have to live with the dissension created by this particular matter. This morning the Globe and Mail in an editorial pointed out that the representation bill, which will re-allocate the federal constituencies, is a most important thing and asked why it is being shelved and put away. We do not hear any more about that particular measure.

Mr. Deschatelets: Don't tell me that you don't know the answer.

Mr. Nesbitt: I know that my hon. friend will say that the opposition has filibustered. I have heard it said that this is what the opposition are doing. This did not seem to worry the Prime Minister over the flag, but apparently it did worry him over the redistribution bill, which is something very much more important. This debate is engendering a great deal of bitterness all over the country, which is most unfortunate. To be perfectly fair, I do not think the Prime Minister intended this to happen; I do not believe for a moment that he did. But he has received some awfully bad advice from some of his advisers, who should have been able to foresee what would happen. This question is now turning into a regular donnybrook all across the country, and it is not helped by some of the remarks that have been made in this house. In addition, it is not being helped by some of the extremist views expressed on this subject, and letters sent to the newspapers.

It certainly has not been helped by a couple of things that have been said recently in what I have always considered to be a reputable and responsible newspaper. I refer to the Ottawa Citizen. First of all there was that shocking cartoon libelling all the ex-servicemen in Canada, and then only last Tuesday they printed another editorial calling everybody a vigilante who dared stand up in this house and make any remarks that were not favourable to the Prime Minister's flag design. The implication of "vigilante" is that one is a lawless thug, and when a newspaper such as the Ottawa Citizen refers to members of this house, by implication, as lawless thugs because they dare to get up and express the views of their constituents, it is a very shocking thing indeed. I would hope that this newspaper would reconsider its remarks very carefully. It has been said that a plebiscite on the matter of the flag would divide the country. That is all I have ever heard said. Nobody ever said why. This has been done already. Most of the people I have talked to who are in favour of the red ensign have said, "We would be perfectly content, if a plebiscite were held, to accept the results of it; but we do not like the way this thing is being forced down our throats by the Prime Minister and his party. If there were a plebiscite taken, regardless of the result we would accept it." I am quite certain that the people of Canada would do that.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say this. I have already said that I think the Prime Minister was badly advised when he decided to bring this matter before parliament at the present time. It has already created great disunity, great bitterness in this country; and it will create more. I do not think anyone would criticize the Prime Minister at all if he changed his course of action and withdrew his flag resolution at this time and chose one of the many courses of action that have been proposed by members of this house. It has been suggested that this matter be referred to a parliamentary committee. Others have suggested that it be referred to a committee of the provinces, putting a time limit on it so that no one could say it was being stalled. A number of suggestions have been made. It is not for me to say which is the best one, but I do not think anyone would blame the Prime Minister if he took one of these courses of action.

I have heard some of my Liberal friends say, "If we did that, we would be accused of retreat". Well, the Prime Minister has retreated on a good many other things, and I think he would have some very good reason to change his viewpoint on this matter. I do not think anybody would criticize the Prime Minister if he said, "Because of the great row that has been stirred up in Canada, quite unexpectedly, over this flag issue, I would like to reconsider the matter, refer it to a committee and see if we cannot arrive at some kind of compromise design for the flag". A design could be arrived at that all members could support, and would support. Then the government could get out and sell it, and after a period of six months a plebiscite could be held to see whether the people of Canada were prepared to accept the new design. I think the people would accept a new design if this course of action were followed. The thing which people resent is that only a minority of this house and a minority of the representatives of the people of Canada, those who support the Liberal party, have had any say in this matter. I rather gather, from what I have heard, that very few people of the Liberal party had any say in the designing of this flag, either.

Mr. Pugh: Or even support it.

Mr. Nesbitt: I think the thing that really bothers people is that they have not had any chance to express their view or have any say as to what they consider should be the design of this flag. All of us want a distinctive flag, but it is the method that has been used to go about it that has chiefly concerned the people of this country. I would appeal to the government to change their present course of action and try to work out a design that is acceptable to everybody. They should consult with all the members of this house on this question. Surely the members of the Conservative party, the New Democratic party, the Social Credit party and the Creditistes have as much right to express their views as to what our design should be as has the Prime Minister or the Liberal party. Surely it is to be our flag, and we should have some right to express ourselves. But no; the position the government takes is this, "You can talk all you like, but we are not going to pay any attention to what you say". That is the attitude that is adopted. Therefore I can truthfully say that I think everybody is very justified in resenting this method of approaching the problem.

I would certainly hope the government would decide to change its course of action and let the rest of us in Canada, who are just as good Canadians as those who sit on the government benches, have some say in the choice of our flag.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Nesbitt: Certainly.

Mr. Prud'homme: Was the red ensign, which the hon. member and many of his colleagues favour and want to retain as the national flag of Canada, chosen by a referendum or a plebiscite?

Mr. Nesbitt: As I recall, Mr. Speaker, it was chosen by a Liberal prime minister of Canada, Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Vincent: And approved by St. Laurent.

Mr. Moreau: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member reconcile, for the benefit of the members of the house, a statement that appeared in his column of May 30 in the Sentinel-Review, in which he stated that his personal choice for a Canadian flag is the red ensign, with the speech he made on March 2 of this session, as reported at page 443 of Hansard, in which he said:

> Is the red ensign a distinctive flag? In some ways you could say it is, but outside of Canada it has been my experience, Mr. Speaker, that despite the coat of arms on the fly the red ensign of Canada is confused with the merchant marine flag of the British navy; to foreigners it looks very much like the old "red duster" of the British merchant marine; and in some cases it is even confused with the Bermudian flag.

How does he, speaking earlier in March for a distinctive flag, reconcile that with his comments on May 30?

Mr. Nesbitt: Very simply. I still prefer the retention of the red ensign. I agree that in some ways it is sometimes confused abroad. I would favour, as I have already said, making some modification to make it more distinctive, but I prefer the red ensign, and infinitely prefer it to the present design proposed by the Prime Minister.

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I take my turn in this debate following many of my honourable colleagues in discussing what I feel is one of the major issues and events of this century. In doing so, like a few others I wish to be brief on the subject. Above all I will endeavour to indicate throughout my remarks the respect I have for those in the house or elsewhere who do not necessarily share my views on this great Canadian problem.

First of all, I should like to make reference to my file on this matter and indicate to the house that it goes back to the early thirties. However, I should like to refer specifically to matters of more recent date in it which will definitely bear more on this debate.

I believe I can honestly say that approximately 200 personal letters have been received by my office. I must admit I have received a great quantity, 40 or more perhaps, consisting of printed matter and to which I attach less importance, because anyone could print a letter and send a copy to each hon. member or have other people send the same printed letter to all hon. members. Over and above the 200 letters, I have received 50 personal letters enclosing a flag design, which is an indication to me not only that the writers favoured for our country a distinctive Canadian flag but that they also tried to indicate what in their view may distinctively represent the will of our nation and its soul abroad. Obviously these 50 letters are in favour of a distinctive flag. Also amongst the 200 letters I have counted approximately 20 which definitely indicate the wish to retain the red ensign.

As I followed the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) I recalled that last November I had the good fortune to represent the Canadian government at the commonwealth conference in Malaysia. At the opening of the lovely parliament buildings there I had to notice the flags flying in front of these new parliament buildings, and like every other member of the delegation I looked at these flags flying at a distance because their arrangement did not permit closer examination. I recall that I indicated to some member from another nation which of the flags was the Canadian flag. At that time I presumed that the red ensign was being used for that purpose. A few days after the conference opened I was told by one of the personnel in charge of the bands and other matters of that nature that the flag to which I had pointed on a few occasions as being the Canadian flag was in fact the flag of Bermuda. As we all know, Bermuda is a colony of England, and one of my good friends at the conference, Colonel Tucker, who was the Bermudian representative, indicated to me that they are very well satisfied to remain a colony of Great Britain. This just helps hon. members to realize the importance of having a flag which would be truly Canadian and distinctive as such.

I should like to pay tribute to many people in this nation who have helped this parliament to bring about the discussion now taking place to provide a distinctive national flag for Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, allow me to extend well-deserved congratulations to the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay), my colleague on this side of the house who spoke before me, for his very wise remarks.

I would like also to congratulate the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Côté) who, speaking for the Social Credit party, expressed so well a little earlier his views on the distinctive flag proposed for our country and his decision to support it.

[Text]

I think we owe thanks to many groups in Canada for the many years work they have done to make sure that the Canadian people and the representatives of the people realize from decade to decade the importance of adopting a distinctive national flag. I am sure hon. members will appreciate it if I make special reference to the Native Sons of Canada. I carried on correspondence with this association in the early thirties and they are the type of group which have presented their views on this matter. I should also like to make reference to the league for a Canadian flag of the province of Quebec, which has done great work in making sure that all people who want to be informed on the values and significance of flags should be so informed.

It has been said that the proposed flag would either bring about unity or disunity. I am one of those who feel certain that Canada can be united, and in a way which would be permanent, by the adoption of a distinctive flag, which would mean that every Canadian from sea to sea could point to the insignia which would be the flag of Canada and could say: "This represents me. I am a Canadian".

I should like to recall the words used a moment ago by the hon. member for Oxford, who apparently found occasion to indicate the wishes of the Anglo-Saxons, the French, and others. I feel all Canadians could find in a national flag, a flag which is distinctive, a flag which is unique, a flag which caters to no one in particular, something whereby they could unite.

Mr. Churchill: That is right; it means nothing.

Mr. Godin: I respect and appreciate the view that we should adopt the red ensign because certain people feel it should be retained. I admit the sentiments behind this. I appreciate and respect them; but surely it is a different matter when the government offers an emblem to every Canadian, an emblem which can represent each and every one on equal terms.

I know there are people who will say, "Accept this one; it is most favourable to us. It may not necessarily appeal to you but please conform to our wishes." While I respect their wishes I believe that something which is not Anglo-Saxon or French, and that does not pertain to any other national group, should be used to unite our people. In bringing this proposal before the house I trust no one will blame the Prime Minister by trying to indicate that those who favour a truly distinctive Canadian flag are disloyal to allies from whom we have received so much and whom we respect. That should not be the case.

I recall being invited to speak to a branch of the Canadian Legion in my riding, and I told the members I would indicate to this house what happened at the end of the meeting. The president of the meeting requested a standing vote on the red ensign and the great majority of the members present, some 75 or 80, stood up in favour of the ensign. But I must also tell the house that some members did not stand. I also recall speaking to a meeting at the Carl Nesbitt school in my riding, and these were but two instances during recent times when I was invited to speak on the flag question. At that second meeting somebody indicated that it was disloyal to, shall we say, put aside the red ensign, and I had occasion to tell the group an incident which took place some years ago when a gentleman came into my law office seeking advice.

He was what we sometimes refer to as a new Canadian and he was asking me how to go about changing his name. His name was Sienkiewicz, I recalled that was the name of the author of "Quo Vadis", a book which I enjoyed reading very much. I asked him if he were related to the author and he told me his family considered they were. He told me of his parents who were still in his motherland and how he would like to see them here in Canada enjoying the liberty which Canada gives to Canadians. I ask you, was this gentleman pushing aside his family in wanting to change his name? Not at all; I recall he took pictures of his family from his wallet and showed them to me. Notwithstanding his love and affection for those he left behind he was trying to give himself something that would be more suited to the country he was now enjoying. Therefore I say let us not try to play on words. indicating that because we want something which will be truly ours that we are pushing aside others whom we have always respected and will continue to respect.

Some people say that a referendum should be held on the flag issue. The hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), who preceded me, seemed to be surprised by the fact that the Canadian parliament is discussing a national flag. He seemed to think that this was something which has come about suddenly; but I can tell him that as a Liberal for many years, and more specifically during the last two election campaigns, my program and that of my party has always included a distinctive Canadian flag. In fact I believe that all parties in this house have included a distinctive flag in their election platforms.

I have heard some hon. members especially those on the Conservative side, say that we do not seem to know what a distinctive Canadian flag would really mean. Nevertheless as I have said, it is part of the platform of all parties and it should not be any surprise that parliament is now being asked to decide the question; it should not be surprising that we who begged votes are now being asked to do what we promised to do. It is in the fulfilment of promises that in a democracy such as ours we are able to give the people those things for which democracy stands. Our people know, through the democratic evolvement of our parliaments, that they will obtain a full degree of maturity.

Before closing I should like to say a word or two about an official flag which, according to the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, would be the red ensign. I have heard many speeches in this house and elsewhere which would lead one to believe that we do have an official Canadian flag at this time, but I believe the case was very well put by the Prime Minister, on the opening day of this debate, when he indicated exactly where the law stood, and that permission was given in 1944 or 1945 permitting the use of the red ensign until parliament took action. That is what we are now doing in 1964.

If it were so, that the order in council really meant granting a distinctive flag for Canada, how could the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, the man who was the author of that order in council, proceed the following year to demand that a committee be established to study the flag which Canada might give itself?

I have had occasion to travel throughout Ontario recently and was asked to speak to the children at the Carl Nesbitt school in my riding. I had been invited to speak on the flag question and I first congratulated the students for their interest in this great national problem. I said I should like to start by asking them this question: Have we an official flag in Canada? A little girl in the front row got up, as did a young lad in about the tenth row. I said, "Yes, young lady", and she said, "No, we do not have an official flag in Canada". I said to the young man, "What is your opinion?" He said, "Mr. Godin, we do have an official flag." I said, "You say we have. Which flag is it?" He said, "The red ensign". Then I said, "We can now start the discussion. I should like to indicate my views to you, and my views are those of the young girl." I told them that I must prove my views just as I must prove them to the house tonight. I said to them, "The best proof I can give you is that as I drove up to the school I looked up at the flagpole and saw the union jack flying there, which we all know is the flag of another nation."

Mr. Grafftey: It is in the second resolution.

Mr. Churchill: What are you going to do about the second resolution?

Mr. Godin: It is out of order to discuss the second resolution now, but I might make this remark. The second resolution does not pertain to the flag of Canada, which is what we are now discussing. We are now considering the resolution which, if passed upon favourably, will grant Canada a distinctive national flag. I have no quarrel with granting respect to the attachment that some people may have for the monarch of Canada and the relationship that has existed between our two countries.

When I told these school children what flag was flying over their school it was in the presence of the members of the school board, the principal of the school and 17 or 18 school teachers. I said to them, "Young children, surely if we had an official distinctive national flag the school board would not fly the flag of another nation over this school".

That surprised the principal and most of the people there, I am sure. Therefore with regard to the question of one flag being official I think that the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), based on facts, based on the history of the flag situation portray the true picture.

Today in 1964 we are doing precisely what people in 1944 thought we should work toward. I trust that members of this house, accepting their responsibility to represent the people who elected them, will decide this question on the basis of the evidence presented to the house and that Canada will be favoured with a distinctive national flag through which and by which, I am sure, all groups will be able to progress because I believe that in a few years from now all Canadians, no matter what their beliefs are today, will honour the flag chosen by parliament in 1964.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, could I direct a question to the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Godin) who has just sat down?

I know that he will vote for the flag with three maple leaves but I would like to ask him if he will vote also for the union jack?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion today, July 2, is a very appropriate time to resume the debate on the resolution which would take away our Canadian red ensign and all the history and tradition associated with it. I say that July 2 is a very appropriate day for this flag debate because, of course, it follows immediately after Canada's 97th birthday and the celebrations connected with this long period of very proud history.

From the ruddy glow of health on the faces of many members of the house I judge that they had the same experience I had on July 1, the experience of participating as a spectator in the formal celebrations of Dominion day. It was a well rehearsed Dominion day observance and I congratulate those responsible for the planning and rehearsing. In the years I have been here Dominion day has always had great significance for me in connection with my parliamentary duties and obligations.

This Dominion day of 1964 had particular significance. I am sure this was impressed on all of us in each part of the day's program. There was the changing of the guard, the artillery salute of 21 guns in honour of Dominion day, the carillon recital, the presentation of folk songs and dances by groups representing each of the 10 provinces, martial music by the central band of the Royal Canadian Air Force and then the ceremonies by the armed forces with the royal salute to His Excellency the Governor General.

The ceremony by the armed forces was staged on the front lawn of parliament hill before at least 10,000 people, with 66 Canadian red ensigns, to which some members of the house object, fluttering in the breeze. I am sure this was a sight which must have thrilled all of the 10,000, including the Prime Minister himself. Naturally it was not possible for me to obtain the impression of all those present but I did speak to as many as I could after the celebration and the general reaction was: Let us keep the flag we have now.

I mention the Dominion day crowd because the amendment to the resolution before us proposes that we have a plebiscite on the flag issue. If a poll could have been taken of the 10,000 watching the Dominion day ceremony, I am sure the Prime Minister would have been told in no uncertain terms that this most certainly is not the time to try to impose his three maple leaves design on Canadians as a new national flag.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, that we could have held this flag debate out on the lawn in the presence of those 10,000 people as part of the Dominion day observance. If this were possible, I am sure we could have shown clearly to them the logic of the situation as it actually exists in this house, and shown them why we take the stand we do against the three maple leaf design, and why we are calling for a plebiscite to let the Canadian people decide the issue.

I wish all Canadians could be present to hear this debate, then they would not have to read the newspapers or hear over the radio and television the comments of the writers who so often present their personal views as though they were actual fact. I take strong exception, Mr. Speaker, to the biased opinion of one of these commentators who used an entire C.B.C.-T.V. audience to work out some personal spite on opposition members who are presenting the views of their constituents against the three maple leaf design. I will not mention the name of this writer, commentator, editor or whatever he wishes to call himself because I know he dearly loves publicity. However, I will mention that "Bark" is part of his name and that is what he did during most of his comments. The whole theme of his comments was a defence of the Prime Minister's ultimatum that we must forget our responsibilities in parliament and allow the Canadian red ensign to be removed without further argument.

This "barking" commentator, of course, is a friend of the government. You have here a double-barreled ultimatum to the opposition. On the one hand, the Prime Minister says, pass my flag design now or there will be no summer recess, and on the other hand this commentator friend says, the opposition members who are presenting their constituents' views are, and these are his words, pettifogging politicians, trouble makers and irresponsible members who are holding parliament up to public contempt. I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that my indignation at the biased and unfair remarks of the television commentator have taken me from my reference to Dominion day.

Each item on the July 1 program had a history and a tradition behind it, as symbolized by the 66 Canadian red ensigns waving so proudly. It is this Dominion day tradition behind the red ensign that we are emphasizing in this debate. This tradition can be expressed in no better words than those appearing in the last issue of the United Church Observer. I quote:

> A hoop rolls on only if given a regular tap. Just so the stories of a nation travel down the years if occasionally touched upon. July first is a good time to brush off the dust and bring to light the story of the naming of Canada and also the story of the word "Dominion".

This is the quotation from the United Church Observer to which I should like to call the attention of the house. There is also a great tradition behind Dominion day. Last Wednesday in this house the Prime Minister stated, as reported in Hansard for June 24, at page 4651:

> This attachment to tradition is an important element in a country that wishes progress.

In this flag debate the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) said, as reported in Hansard for June 30, at page 4912, that we must retain those things of our past for which we have so much genuine affection and loyalty. Where is all this history and tradition in the proposed three maple leaf design? The member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson), as reported on page 4884 of Hansard for June 30, asked, what is better than this long established sprig of sugar maple to portray us to ourselves and to the world? Then, he commented on what he called, the flag about to be born, about to flutter on our plains and on our mountains. I come from the plains, the plains of Saskatchewan, where there are no sugar maple trees, no tradition regarding such a tree or the maple leaves on it.

In this connection, if I may, I should like to quote briefly from an article written by Patrick Nicholson on February 23, 1960 when he was concerned about this flag question. I quote:

> Many would build the flag around the maple leaf, the adoption of which would make us appear as a colony of the state of Vermont, or perhaps of Rhode Island or Wisconsin, which have already adopted the maple leaf as their symbol.

Apparently some areas in our country have a greater maple leaf tradition than we have on the prairies, and the proposed three maple leaf design might have more appeal there. I was surprised, Mr. Speaker, to hear the hon. member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett) say that we are here in parliament to make decisions regardless of what our constituents want. I do not subscribe to this view. I want to put on the record some of the views of my constituents, views that I personally support, but even if I did not I would feel obliged, as the representative of these people, to express them in parliament. I ask members opposite to do the same. I am sure many of them have received letters supporting the Canadian red ensign. I have three full files of letters from constituents on the flag issue. I have not the time in this debate to read them all, but I want to place representative comments on the record. I shall just take pertinent comments from several of these letters. This one is from Stony Beach in my area:

> Everyone we contacted and that really included the five school districts and outside districts as well were 100 per cent in favour of the red ensign. Even the staunchest Liberal supporters were in favour of the red ensign. We have approximately 90 families in Stony Beach area and contacted them at school field days, 4H achievement days, sales and meetings.

You will see, Mr. Speaker, this was a fairly good canvass of that area. Here is a letter from a farmer now living in Moose Jaw:

> We have a distinctive flag in the red ensign. Let them add a large maple leaf if they wish but let's not toss it aside. Most of the people of Moose Jaw feel this way and we hope you can help us express our wishes.

This letter is from Regina and concludes as follows:

> Therefore I ask that you consider voting against the proposed maple leaf ensign, and exert influence where possible to have an amendment proposed designating the red ensign as our flag.

This letter is from my own city of Moose Jaw, and reads in part as follows:

I do believe the flag issue has caused a disquieting feeling among a number of people, for they express an opinion that there are more pressing things by way of problems in Canada that parliament should be dealing with, and the flag issue should be set aside for the time being and these more pressing problems dealt with.

There we have an expression of opinion about the problems of this country.

This letter is from Lumsden, Saskatchewan, and reads in part as follows:

Seeing that this country was won for the British Empire under the union jack, and seeing also that Canadians fought under the red ensign (which of course incorporates the union jack) in two world wars, and further as I myself am a veteran of both world wars I could not accept or respect any flag for Canada which did not incorporate the union jack in its design.

Here is a letter from Semans, in my area, and this has a direct bearing on the question of the plebiscite.

As for the people around here, whether they are for the red ensign or not, the vast majority feel that a new flag should not be imposed on us without a national referendum. They feel that if the majority of the Canadian people want a new flag then a new flag it should be, but if the majority want the red ensign then the red ensign should be maintained.

Just a line from Craven:

Our old flag, the red ensign, will always be my flag, and the majority of the people in this area have the same opinion including a lot of the Prime Minister's own supporters.

Another from Watrous:

Most of the people I have spoken with are in favour of the red ensign and those who are lukewarm on the subject at least feel there should be a vote on the matter.

The next one expresses an opinion of many people in Canada. It refers to the situation in Moose Jaw where it says there are six to one in favour of the red ensign, and adds:

The other one is the Liberals who are so disgusted with the manoeuvring of their party in Ottawa that the flag issue is the only red herring they have left, so they favour the new flag.

I have dozens of these letters and I will take no more time to put them on record. But I did go through the list and I have here a summary. There are 30 of the important towns and districts in my area represented in this file, and they all express the same comment as I have given so far.

Now if I could just turn to the city of Moose Jaw. As I said before, they have had a survey there which I think would be along the lines of what would happen in a plebiscite, and here is the last comment on it in the Times-Herald of June 15, 1964. The heading is: "Flag Decision Settled in City".

Members of parliament today began the battle of the flags in Ottawa, but Times-Herald readers have already decided the controversial issue.

Final results of the Times-Herald flag poll show overwhelming approval for the red ensign... this makes a more than 80 per cent majority on the side of the old flag.

They held a street survey, stopping people and asking them what flag they preferred, and the pictures of the people they asked are shown on another page under the heading "Six to One for the Red Ensign".

So far I have dealt mainly with individual letters I have received. Of course, I also received a large number of letters from organizations, principally from branches of the Canadian Legion in my area. Concern in Moose Jaw is so strong that they have had a petition circulated and I understand the Prime Minister received this signed petition recently asking for the retention of the Canadian red ensign. Then I have letters from various lodges of I.O.D.E. and the ladies Orange benevolent association. There are a number of these; they are all on the same theme, the retention of the Canadian red ensign. There is one from the Royal Canadian Legion Semans branch beginning:

We strongly deplore the arbitrary action of your minority government in dictating to the people that they shall have a new flag. This contravenes the democratic rights of every Canadian. We respectfully urge that the government call a national plebliscite and restore to the people their democratic privilege of deciding whether they want the red ensign or a new flag.

That was sent to the Prime Minister. It adds that copies were being sent to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), to myself, and to the leaders of the other parties in this house. This is accompanied by a petition signed, I would think, by a representative of every family in Semans. They all ask for the retention of the red ensign.

The army, navy and air force veterans in Moose Jaw through their secretary-manager also sent in a statement as follows:

We, 756 members of the army, navy and air force veterans in Canada, Moose Jaw unit No. 252, do petition you for the endorsation of the red ensign as the national flag.

The comrades who answered the roll call for the last time would not have it changed to any other flag and we, the living, shall maintain and uphold their sacred pledge.

This flag represents the Christian way of life, the aristocracy of achievement of the four freedoms.

Then I have received a letter from the sons of England benefit society along the same lines. Also, I have one here from the Royal Canadian Legion in Saskatoon. May I say that I understand the newly elected member for Saskatoon arrived in Ottawa tonight and will probably be in the house tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pascoe: This letter from Saskatoon says:

> In view of the fact that at present there is no sitting member for the Saskatoon constituency the members of our branch request that you give your consideration to the following resolution:
> Resolved that we urge delay in the proposed legislation for the adoption of the new flag and propose retention of the red ensign as Canada's flag until more assurance is obtained that this legislation has the consent of the nation.

That was written before the by-election.

As I say, the newly elected member for Saskatoon will, I imagine, be in the house tomorrow and she will probably take part in this debate. I just wanted to bring this matter to the attention of the house now, and I hope to be able to amplify my remarks later.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it 10.30?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

(Subject matter of questions debated under adjournment motion).

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved:

INDUSTRY—TIMMINS—PROCESSING OF ORE FROM NEW MINING DEVELOPMENT

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): In the seven minutes at my disposal it will be difficult for me to deal in any detail with the subject I wish to raise; I shall only be able to cover it in what might be called skeleton form.

I am raising this matter tonight because of two things. The first is the recent announcement by Texas Gulf that the intention is, until such time as the product of the big copper strike in Timmins gets really rolling, to export the ore to be processed outside this country. My second reason for raising this matter now is a remark overheard by a Timmins businessman who was attending a meeting in New York when this matter was discussed. An executive of Texas Gulf mentioned they would like to ship the ore to North Carolina but they did not know what the people of Timmins would think about this. And Mr. Jules Timmins who is, I believe, one of the top men in the Hollinger organization, made the statement that they did not have anything to worry about as far as the people of Timmins were concerned because the business people of Timmins were a bunch of jellyfish and you could walk all over them.

There are only two ways in which this ore can be shipped at the present time. One is by getting an export permit from the government of Ontario, and the second would be by getting a special freight rate over the Ontario Northland railway, which is owned by the people of Ontario, to ship this ore over the great distance contemplated. It might be said that this is a purely provincial matter, but it is not entirely so because the people of Canada as a whole have a great interest in this development. In the first place, the Timmins area has been designated as one of the designated areas of Canada that is in need of attention from the federal government. In fact, a conference was held as recently as June 17 last at which the officials of the Department of Industry explained the benefits that can be obtained under this program. I attended that conference, along with some 80 or 90 businessmen of that area.

To bring to the attention of the house the magnitude of this situation, I would like to point out that in 1926 when Noranda decided to build a smelter they had ore reserves of one million tons. Some 37 years later, in 1963, after being in production for that period of time, they had reserves of some 11 million tons. In Murdochville, Quebec, when they started in 1952 they had ore reserves of some 67 million tons in the three properties there. Today, 11 years after, they have ore reserves of some 55 million tons. With regard to the strike in Timmins, when the diamond drills reached 800 feet they estimated there were some 25 million tons of ore, at 1,400 feet the estimate was 55 million tons. I am now told that the drills are down to the 2,700 foot level and they have hit ore that is the richest deposit yet, and it is broadening out. I was told by a man who works in the field and has prospected for many years that a sensible estimate of this ore is some 300 million tons.

In the June 27 issue of the Financial Post the picture is traced as follows: 55 million tons averaging 4.85 ounces of silver, 1.33 per cent copper and 7.08 per cent zinc. This tonnage is contained in a body 1,800 feet long and 200 to 500 feet wide. One of the 26 holes drilled has probed to 1,400 feet and is still in ore; and they are now at 2,700 feet and it gets richer as it goes along.

My point is that the jobs which the federal government should be interested in are involved in the smelting and processing of this ore rather than the actual mining of it. If we lose the smelter, all we will have is a great big hole in the ground and the jobs this great find should be providing will be provided in another country rather than our own. The second point is this. If the smelter is not built there will be no opportunity to establish secondary industry such as copper wire production, electronic fixtures and things of this nature. A whole industrial complex could be built around this project. Another thing which the federal government should interest itself in is that of exchange between the United States and Canada. This is a very important aspect of this operation. A smelter must be built for this operation, regardless of where it is built. The smelters of Sudbury and Rouyn-Noranda can possibly handle the copper production, but they cannot handle the zinc. A plant will have to be built for this purpose, and it should be built in this area. Timmins has everything that is required. There is the mighty Mattagami river; there is everything that is needed for industrial purposes. There is power at Abitibi canyon, the Little Long rapids, and everything that is needed for this industry. There is natural gas running through to southern Ontario and thousands and thousands of acres of land that could be bought at a very reasonable price, rather than going into southern Ontario or some other place where you might have to plow up fruit orchards and things of that sort.

Another important point, Mr. Speaker, is that the smelter should be a custom smelter. If Texas Gulf builds a smelter it could only be for their purpose and other operators will have to ship 100 miles or more, which will mean a difference of $5 or $6 a ton in trying to exploit their production. I would suggest that the government—I see that my time is running out, Mr. Speaker—look into this matter and should if necessary offer to build a smelter on their own. I think it would be a wonderful investment in Ontario for this government and would greatly assist the employment situation in the area.

Last, but far from least, action should be taken, and taken now, because once this ore starts to be shipped out the plans will have been made beforehand and it will be too late to turn the clock back.

Business of the House

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I am not exactly sure of the question the hon. member was addressing to the government, but I would observe this, that while the government is eager, especially in the designated area of Timmins, to see the maximum of industrial growth, and at the greatest possible rate, the action the hon. member has recommended or is suggesting seems to lie principally in the hands of the government of Ontario, and it would be inappropriate for me to comment on action or inaction on the part of another government.

The hon. member has drawn to my attention that one of the advantages of Timmins is the availability of large quantities of natural gas in the area. This represents initiative taken by the previous Liberal administration and I hope that we will be successful in the present instance in providing further advantage to Timmins.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: I should like to ask the acting house leader if he has any announcement for us tonight.

Mr. MacNaught: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, during routine proceedings the Secretary of State for External Affairs will move that the estimates of the Department of External Affairs be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs. The main item of business tomorrow will be the debate on the flag resolution.

On Monday we will resume the committee stage of Bill C-90, to amend the National Defence Act. When the committee stage and third reading stage are concluded we will consider the second reading stage of the bill relating to youth allowances.

Mr. Churchill: I wonder whether the acting house leader has considered that in other years it has been customary for two days of discussion of external affairs before the estimates are referred to committee. This year we have had only one day for that very important subject.

Mr. MacNaught: The sending of the estimates to the standing committee on external affairs is to enable us to get on with the study of the estimates as soon as we can.

Motion agreed and the house adjourned at 10.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, July 3, 1964

The house met at 10.30 a.m.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED

Mrs. Eloise Jones, member for the electoral district of Saskatoon, introduced by Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker and Hon. Alvin Hamilton.

MARINE AND FISHERIES

Third report of standing committee on marine and fisheries—Mr. Granger.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That the items listed in the main estimates and the supplementary estimates (A) for 1964-65 relating to the Department of External Affairs, presented to this house at the present session, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and be referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

STEPS TO IMPROVE POSITION OF EASTERN FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture possibly I could direct this question to the Prime Minister. In view of the serious and worsening emergency in eastern agriculture, could the Prime Minister say what action, both emergency and permanent, the government intends to take? Under the circumstances will the government give consideration to having immediate action taken in this regard by the house?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to give consideration to my right hon. friend's suggestion and discuss it with the Minister of Agriculture, who will be in a position to make a statement early next week.

SASKATCHEWAN—REPORTED CRITICAL SITUATION RESPECTING LIVESTOCK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture. Reports coming from northern Saskatchewan, and in particular from the Melfort-Tisdale area, indicate that the crop situation there is deteriorating badly and that farmers are being forced to sell their livestock, as a result of which prices will be forced down. I should like to ask whether the Prime Minister could implement legislation similar to that of 1961 under which feed grain was stored in the province so that livestock coming to livestock yards was held back in order not to flood the market and depress the price.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put this on the order paper.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if I might, this is a very serious matter of immediate importance. As pointed out by the hon. gentleman, because of drought conditions farmers are being forced to sell their cattle and liquidate their herds. In consequence cattle prices have fallen very greatly. This is a matter of immediate importance, not to be dealt with next week or next month. Would the Prime Minister give consideration to the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman; because I am told that all over northern Saskatchewan liquidation of herds is taking place and farmers are finding themselves being forced to accept large reductions in price which would otherwise not be the case.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): If I may be permitted to answer this question, Mr. Speaker, I expect to see the Minister of Agriculture tomorrow and I will be very glad to discuss this matter with him. I know the government will want to do everything that the situation requires.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

In view of the fact that the situation is the same for the Quebec farmers with regard to agricultural products, could the Prime Minister give the same consideration to this problem in Quebec as in Saskatchewan?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: Of course, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a related question of either the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture or the acting minister. In view of the question I asked a week ago, has there been any contact by the new minister of agriculture in Saskatchewan with the Minister of Agriculture in Ottawa about this critical livestock situation?

Mr. B. S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take this question as notice and bring it to the attention of the minister. I am not aware of the answer.

LABOUR RELATIONS

NON-OPERATING RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—DISCUSSIONS WITH RAILWAY PRESIDENTS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can he inform the house as to the conclusions of his discussions with the presidents of both railways?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, some of my colleagues and I had a useful discussion yesterday with the presidents of Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway. I am confident that as a result it will be possible without delay for negotiations between the railway companies and the unions to be resumed, and I hope the resumption will result in a satisfactory arrangement.

[Later:]

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister in view of his expected prolonged absence, and in view of the absence of the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Labour. Has the government taken any direct steps or has it been in direct contact with the 15 labour unions that are involved in this threatened railway strike, about which he has had meetings with the presidents of the two railways?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, there has been contact.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—FULFILMENT OF U.S. FINANCIAL OBLIGATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I always enjoy doing this. Is the minister confident that the United States will fulfil its financial obligations in connection with the Columbia river treaty to permit ratification of the treaty, as arranged, on October 1?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, just as Canada expects other nations to believe Canada would fulfil its treaty obligations, so too Canada, of course, fully expects that the United States will live up to its commitments.

Mr. Herridge: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister been informed of a statement by Mr. Udall, secretary of the interior, that there are difficulties in connection with raising the money, and that delay may occur owing to the necessity of placing a bill before congress to provide funds to build a connection with California before the money can be raised?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I may be wrong, but I think Mr. Udall made reference to raising some $650 million for the purpose of providing a vehicle for the transfer of power. However, if Secretary Udall was referring to the money due Canada on October 1 pursuant to the arrangement made, I can only say that the raising of the money in the United States is expected to be successful. I have no reason for believing that the money which the United States is to pay on October 1 will not be paid.

Mr. Herridge: May I ask one more supplementary question. In view of the statements appearing in United States newspapers, statements appearing in the Canadian press and various reports, would the minister go into this question very carefully and give the house a full report of the situation up to date?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, there is no further report to be given. I think my hon. friend should have greater faith in the newspapers.

[Later:]

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources on a subject that is somewhat related to earlier questions. In view of the United States government's obvious intention to work toward a high voltage transmission line from the southern part of California to the Canadian border, ostensibly to take the downstream benefits of the Columbia in the first instance, then the Peace and finally the Yukon, what is the minister doing about pushing the study on a national transmission grid for Canada to make the power sources of the Peace and the Yukon, the largest undeveloped hydro power in North America, available to the power-short industries of Ontario?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, we have already had a report on phase 1 of these studies. We are now proceeding to set up within Canada stage two studies which will be extensive, and we expect to be making an announcement with respect to the selection of an engineering firm to direct the work. It is our intention also to use as far as we possibly can the co-operation of the electrical industry in Canada in the studies with the engineering firm selected.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED APPOINTMENT OF HON. ROLAND MICHENER AS HIGH COMMISSIONER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister confirm the rumour that Hon. Roland Michener has been offered and has accepted the post of high commissioner to one of the commonwealth countries? If so, can he tell us which country is involved?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, I cannot confirm that rumour.

NATO—CANADIAN POSITION RESPECTING MULTILATERAL FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As a result of his conversations with the secretary general of NATO, can he advise the house whether the government has come to any decision with respect to either approval or disapproval of the multilateral force and, if so, whether Canada has any intention to participate in this force that is under organization within NATO?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government's position with regard to participation in the multilateral force has not changed.

Mr. Lambert: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May we have a clear indication of what the government's position is in this regard?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This position was outlined some days ago, I think, in the house. I reaffirmed the statement made by the Prime Minister some time ago that it was not Canada's present intention to participate.

CYPRUS—REPORTED SECRET LANDING OF GREEK TROOPS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I have just noted a change on the part of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in that he now puts a great deal of trust in newspapers. I now ask him, has he looked into the reports in the press and on the radio regarding the alleged intrusion of a large number of Greek soldiers into Cyprus, and has he been able to secure the information that the press carried earlier?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman yesterday gave a figure of some 4,000. I could find no justification whatever for that figure. The information I already have obviously implies that there have been importations of arms and of bodies, and we have taken strong exception to this.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Possibly the minister, with his usual capacity for elucidation, might tell us how many bodies. Has the approximate number been ascertained?

An hon. Member: Were they live bodies?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If I had the capacity for humour, which I do not, I would say that having determined the number of arms, one could determine the number of bodies.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is now becoming a mathematical problem. How many arms does the minister say were imported into Cyprus in this way?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As this is a serious matter, I would say there have been importations of arms contrary to the security council resolution. It is also contrary to obligations under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The most serious view is being taken of this.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That serious view being taken, is the minister not going to let the house know approximately how many men actually came in under the circumstances?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, there can be no way of determining the exact number.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one asked by the Leader of the Opposition of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister advise whether the United Nations forces were restrained by Cypriot police from observing the actual debarkation of what he calls the armed imports?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the full question.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, my question is related to reports from usually reliable newspapermen that the United Nations forces were actually restrained from observing at close range the debarkation of what have been described as armed imports.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, there have been suggestions from sources other than the public media that this was the case. However, the matter is now being reviewed by the United Nations authorities, and I expect that before too long, I will be in a position to say whether or not this has been confirmed.

[Later:]

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

As a representative from Quebec, a province that supplied most of the troops now at the service of United Nations on Cyprus, I should like to ask the minister if he would be good enough to indicate whether the number of Greek troops landed on Cyprus are counted by tens, hundreds or thousands?

I think that matter is causing concern in some quarters in the province of Quebec and also all across Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I share the concern of the hon. member, but I could not give any figures, since I do not know exactly what they are; but I can give him the assurance that we are keeping a very close watch on the situation.

Mr. Balcer: I think I gave a great deal of latitude to the minister when I asked him to indicate whether the troops could be counted by tens, hundreds or thousands. Surely, the Department of External Affairs must know whether there are tens or hundreds of soldiers.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not known. That is an answer I cannot give. However, I can say that it is not the figure mentioned yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition.

PARLIAMENT HILL

CONDUCT OF MOUNTED POLICE DURING JULY 1 CELEBRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. As mentioned on the C.B.C.'s French network, does the Minister of Justice intend to investigate the matter and to discipline, if necessary the R.C.M.P. officer who, on July 1, on parliament hill, told a photographer: "Don't you speak French to me"?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm gave me notice of his question and I read an article in the newspaper Le Droit of July 2 to that effect.

I will, of course, order an investigation, but I should like to point out that the article in question also added:

> —the officers maintaining law and order did their best during the whole ceremony to answer in French questions asked by the large number of bilingual people who, following the official invitation, had come to celebrate Canada's national holiday.

In any case, I will order an investigation into this particular incident.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): I would have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the Minister of Justice tell us who informed him that the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had answered in French inquiries made by French Canadian tourists who visited parliament hill on July 1?

Mr. Favreau: I got this information from the newspaper Le Droit of Thursday, July 2, 1964.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask another supplementary question. Then, can the minister make a full inquiry in order to know how many members of the R.C.M.P. on parliament grounds are bilingual? He will see that there are not many.

USE OF WORD "DOMINION" IN DESCRIPTION OF HOLIDAY CELEBRATION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, in reply to a question put to me yesterday by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Côté), I merely wish to refer him to section 2 of the Dominion Day Act, which may be found in chapter 88 of the 1952 Revised Statutes of Canada and reads as follows:

[Text]

2. Throughout Canada, in each and every year, the 1st day of July, not being a Sunday, shall be a legal holiday, and shall be kept and observed as such, under the name of Dominion Day. R.S., c. 49, s. 2.

[Translation]

I must add that the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) has already put on the order paper a bill to amend the present situation.

[Text]

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PROVINCIAL PARTICIPATION IN CURRENT ECONOMIC STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Could he tell the house whether he has received an official or unofficial communication from the premier of Quebec concerning provincial participation in the inquiry into economic relations within confederation and, if so, is it the government's intention to accede to this request and call in participation of the other provinces as well?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have received no such communication, official or unofficial.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question. Does the right hon. Prime Minister still persist in refusing to ask the provinces to participate in this investigation?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, as I tried to point out yesterday, the inquiries are being made by officials of the federal government for that government, and when those inquiries are completed then the federal government will be in a position to decide how best to proceed further in this matter, and may decide to bring in the provinces for consultation.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): As a supplementary question, would the Prime Minister say what are the instructions given to these civil servants? What is the ambit of their authority? Would he place on record the instructions given as to the course they are to follow and the subjects they are to consider; because there has been a great deal of uncertainty since the Prime Minister made his statement a week ago today?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I shall be very glad to give some thought to that and see if a further statement can be made.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the right hon. Prime Minister ask the members of his inquiry commission on the civil service to submit their report to the members of the Laurendeau-Dunton commission so as to complete the work of this commission?

[Text]

TRADE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON TRIP TO U.K. BY FINANCE MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance, whom I am sure we all welcome back to the house on his return from the United Kingdom. My question deals precisely with his trip to the United Kingdom where he had talks concerning trade problems. I wonder whether the minister would give the house a report on those talks, and particularly will he explain the technical difficulties which he said beset trade between the two countries, to which he referred in one of his talks, and which has been described as "cold comfort" by some of the British authorities?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his kindly words, although I do not know about the references to cold comfort. The British government through its officials did complain some time ago about the application of our anti-dumping procedures and, I think it was last February, the Minister of Trade and Commerce undertook that we would make a study of their complaints. This we have done.

Inquiries of the Ministry

When I was in London I reported to various ministers of Her Majesty's government there and also to a number of industrialists, and during a course of a speech I made a statement. I said that we have concluded that these obstacles, or alleged obstacles, did not in themselves, in our view, constitute a major difficulty but that there were some justifiable grounds for complaints and we intended to do something about these.

I pointed that this would require legislation. I also pointed out that we were very anxious that in the process of correcting the difficulties in question we did not do something which would create new ones, and that this would take some time to work out. I said also that Canada had complaints about certain non-tariff barriers to trade as applied to us by certain other countries, and that we hoped this whole matter could be dealt with in the context of the negotiations leading to the Kennedy round.

Mr. Martineau: Will the minister tell us what remedial legislation he plans?

Mr. Gordon: I will be glad to do so when the remedial legislation is ready for the house.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Did the minister have talks with anyone in the United Kingdom relating to the possible adoption of the union jack as Canada's flag in the commonwealth?

Mr. Gordon: No. I thought that was a matter for discussion in this house.

FORMOSA—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH TRADE MISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I should like to ask him whether he would care to report to the house respecting the discussions had yesterday with the trade mission from Formosa, and whether we can expect to come out of these discussions with some firm orders for wheat, flour and perhaps some other commodities.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I had some useful discussions with the governor of the Bank of China, who came to my office along with the ambassador for China. We discussed in a general way the promotion of trade between Canada and China. Whether out of this will emerge firm orders I am not yet in a position to say, but I am hopeful.

[Mr. Gordon.]

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): A supplementary question. I should like to ask the minister whether he has received a request on the part of nationalist China to become an exhibitor at Expo '67, and whether he has accepted this request.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, when these Chinese gentlemen were with me yesterday they were very interested in exhibiting at Expo '67; but it it my understanding that they have not yet applied.

SOCIAL INSURANCE

APPLICATION OF SYSTEM TO PROPOSED PENSION PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour or, in his absence, to his parliamentary secretary or to the acting minister. In the light of the decision by the government of the province of Quebec to use the present social insurance numbers, subject however to a criticism that the present system presents problems when applied to the present or proposed pension plan, has the government any intention to modify the registration plan or to ask all the provinces to join in a discussion so as to establish a system which would be acceptable to all of them, since they are going to participate in the pension plan?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): There is no present intention to make any modification to the system. It appears to be satisfactory to all provinces at the moment.

SHIPPING

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON STUDY OF GREAT LAKES WATER LEVELS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Does the minister intend to report to the house about the study made earlier in the week, in Toronto and in Montreal, as regards the water level in the great lakes and in Montreal's harbour?

[Text]

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I am certain that the discussions which took place would not lend themselves to the making of a statement with respect to decisions. Out of these discussions will come, I hope, a reference to the international joint commission and, in addition, it is our hope within the next week or ten days to refer the matter of the levels of the lakes to the standing committee on mines, forests and waters with the intent that the facts, many of which will be of value to the I.J.C. later, may be made known to the public. We shall attempt to build up a quantity of evidence in respect to this problem which I think will be most beneficial to all concerned.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources whether he intends to go himself or send representatives to a similar conference that will be held on July 28 in Michigan?

[Text]

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, I have not received any invitation, nor have I heard of such a conference being held.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister whether he could explain why the chairman of the Canadian section of the international joint commission did not attend any of these important conferences.

Mr. Laing: I have no explanation, Mr. Speaker, unless he was otherwise occupied.

HOUSING

SUGGESTED CHANGE IN LOAN POLICY TO AID FALL CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Québec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General.

Can the minister tell the house whether he intends to ask Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to change its policy regarding loans to builders in order to promote the "house fall parade" prepared by the national builders association across the country?

[Text]

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): This matter is under consideration, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BRANTFORD, ONT.—DESIGNATION AS DEPRESSED AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry. In a list of 66 Ontario cities just published with regard to average income, the city of Brantford is well up the list in 32nd place, whereas the neighbouring city of Guelph is down to 36th place and Galt is in 41st place. Would the minister now consider removing Brantford from the list of depressed areas?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, some time ago it was announced that a review would be carried out this summer of the appropriateness of all the designated areas. This review has not yet been undertaken.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

VANCOUVER—POSSIBLE USE OF FORMER R.C.A.F. BASE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I raise this matter at this time because of the fact that the Prime Minister will be absent for some time. I would ask him whether complaints have been received from various organizations in Vancouver regarding the attempts being made by the C.B.C. to secure possession of 11 or 12 acres of the Kitsilano Indian reserve, formerly controlled by the R.C.A.F. This is a matter that I bring to his attention because Mr. Ouimet has stated that regardless of the feelings of the people there he intends to take over this property for the C.B.C. I ask the Prime Minister, will he have this matter looked into, to the end that one department of government will not be providing park land in Vancouver to the C.B.C. when other properties are available in the commercial area?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this matter is already under consideration. I participated in discussions with the mayor of Vancouver on this matter. I am confident that an amicable solution will be reached, and I will be glad to see that a statement is made on the matter next week.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Can I take it from that, Mr. Speaker, that the government is not going to allow one department of government to transfer to another a property so necessary for park land purposes in Vancouver?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I said I thought a solution would be reached that would be agreeable to all concerned. I can assure my right hon. friend that no one department of government would be permitted to do what he suggests, nor does it desire to do it.

PENSIONS

CANADA PLAN—REQUEST THAT CONSIDERATION BE CONTINUED TO CONCLUSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the very firm statement that he made on Tuesday evening, as reported in Hansard at page 4907, that the debate on the flag resolutions will be continued until a decision is reached, could he not do better than he did yesterday in reply to a question of mine with respect to the Canada pension plan? Could he not give the house an equally firm assurance that debate on the Canada pension plan at its various stages will be continued at this session until a conclusion is reached?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm what I have already said, namely that the matter will be introduced and it will be proceeded with. I certainly hope and expect that a decision will be made before the end of this session.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Why does the Prime Minister use one form of words with regard to the flag, making it very definite—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Knowles: —yet leave it conditional with regard to the Canada pension plan?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the reason I make the distinction is that the pension legislation will be a very long and complicated piece of legislation which will go to a committee, and I would hope that the committee would deal with it expeditiously and send it back to the house so the house can decide on it. Surely my hon. friend will realize that there is some difference between a resolution—a short and simple resolution, however important—and a long piece of legislation which is to go to a committee and on which the committee will hold hearings.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I think we had better discuss the timetabling of the Canada pension plan in the next overtime period.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I am wondering whether the Prime Minister could not be somewhat more flexible than that in this regard, and before he leaves for the prime ministers' conference—give us some indication that the Canada pension plan could be proceeded with at the conclusion of the present legislative program; that is, in the course of the next week or possibly the next two weeks, at the conclusion of interim supply, shall we say. Could we not deal with it at that time and possibly get it into the hands of the committee?

Mr. Pearson: The order of business has already been indicated to the house. I am sure my hon. friend would not wish me to continue chopping and changing that order of business.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Winkler: It is not a question of chopping and changing. We are prepared to proceed with this matter, and if the Prime Minister has the legislation ready we are willing to discuss it.

An hon. Member: It isn't ready.

Mr. Pearson: Surely, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend must know that the legislation could not be introduced until the constitutional amendment has passed the parliament of Westminster; and that has not happened.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Now will the Prime Minister say whether the legislation in its appropriate form for presentation to parliament is ready, and awaits nothing more than the imperial parliament passing the constitutional amendment?

Mr. Pearson: I can assure my right hon. friend that he will not have to wait five years for the legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I seem to recall that ever since 1919 we have been waiting for promises to be carried out by the right hon. gentleman's party. However, let me ask him this. This pension legislation is important. Is this legislation ready or is it in some state of suspended animation, as are most of the legislative proposals?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I can assure my right hon. friend that when the time comes to discuss the legislation it will be ready.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Which year?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROVISION OF NUCLEAR MISSILES FOR EUROPEAN BRIGADE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether nuclear missiles have been provided for the Honest John battery with the Canadian brigade in Europe.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not think they are operational yet but I expect they will be shortly.

Mr. Churchill: A related question to the minister. Are negotiations proceeding with NATO authorities in relation to Canada's proposal to withdraw from a nuclear role?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I think the policy has been clearly set out in the white paper, which forecasts a reduction in Canada's nuclear commitment in the period ahead.

Mr. Churchill: Would the minister mind answering my question? Are negotiations proceeding with NATO authorities in relation to Canada's proposal to withdraw from a nuclear role? It is a simple question; let us have a straightforward answer.

Mr. Hellyer: There are constant negotiations proceeding involving many subjects, and I am sure my hon. friend is aware of them from his vast experience in government.

Mr. Churchill: A supplementary question. Could I get a direct answer from the minister? Are negotiations proceeding with NATO for Canada to withdraw from a nuclear role in accordance with the promise made by the Prime Minister over a year ago?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, there have been many discussions covering all of these subjects. This is just one of the subjects which were discussed with the secretary general. Discussions and negotiations are going on all the time, and I am sure my hon. friend will be pleased to know of any new developments when they are announced in the normal course.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROVISION OF SIMULTANEOUS INTERPRETATION IN GALLERIES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Could the minister inform the house whether it is anticipated that the public galleries will be equipped with a simultaneous interpretation service soon, so that our distinguished visitors will be able to listen to speeches in the language of their choice in our bilingual parliament?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I must tell the hon. member that this matter does not come under my jurisdiction. However, I shall endeavour to obtain the necessary information and I shall pass it on to him as soon as possible.

TRANSPORT

RICHELIEU WATERWAY—STUDY BY INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Since the boundary waters commission has completed its survey concerning the deepening of the Richelieu river, does the government intend to carry out shortly that important economic project?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Surely this is a question for the order paper.

REQUEST FOR HOUSE DISCUSSION OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he would arrange to have a day set aside in the house soon for a discussion of matters affecting his department, particularly after he gets adequate information with regard to the situation in Cyprus concerning which he seems to be somewhat ill informed.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Of course I do not wish to comment on the hon. gentleman's appreciation of my own shortcomings. The external affairs committee is to be set up next week and there will be the fullest opportunity for asking questions and giving information in a way which is not available under the procedure followed on orders of the day.

With regard to the other question of debate in the house, I will be glad to refer that matter to the leader of the house.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

CONSIDERATION OF PROPOSED STAND-BY FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of reports that at next week's prime ministers' conference a suggestion will be put forward to set up a commonwealth stand-by force, I wonder what the reaction of the right hon. gentleman will be to such a proposal, having regard to the plan to which he has already subscribed, namely the establishment of a United Nations stand-by force.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Any discussion of this matter at the commonwealth conference will, I think, be in the light of our obligation to the United Nations in regard to peace keeping. I know of no request that it should be discussed in any other context.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I do not know whether the Prime Minister intends to be here on Monday or not. Do I understand that he will not be here on Monday?

Mr. Pearson: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, I might be allowed to say a word if the house will permit me. The Prime Minister will be leaving at the beginning of the week to attend the commonwealth prime ministers' conference in London. It is a great experience, and one which—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am interested to see that this subject is meeting with frivolity on the part of hon. members opposite. I thought it was a serious matter, but that group thinks otherwise.

I rise to express—and I wait now for the jeers which will come—the best wishes of myself and the house in general to the Prime Minister as he leaves our country.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are happy to join in this expression of our very best wishes to the Prime Minister on this occasion.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): It is a source of satisfaction to know that the Prime Minister is to attend this very important conference. I am sure we all recognize the importance of this particular association. Therefore we join in the expressions of good will as he goes.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, we are happy to join with other groups to wish a pleasant trip to the Prime Minister as well as a profitable discussion with other commonwealth countries.

We shall try to take advantage of his absence to give him a surprise on his return, so that when he comes back he will see on the peace tower in Ottawa the new flag with three maple leaves, the symbol of the Canadian fact. We hope that the Prime Minister will support this Canadian nationalism and this Canadian fact where he is going, that is among representatives of other commonwealth countries.

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: I am most grateful to the right hon. gentleman for his good wishes and to the representatives of the other parties who have associated themselves with those good wishes. The last commonwealth conference was attended by the right hon. gentleman who was then prime minister and is now Leader of the Opposition, and he is aware of the importance and the interest which attaches to these meetings.

While there are no subjects of specific and immediate import on the agenda, I think the matters to be discussed in London next week will be of far ranging significance. They will deal in particular with ways and means of bringing the commonwealth nations closer together, and especially we shall be considering developments in Africa. I hope that as a result of our discussions and as a result of the atmosphere in which these discussions are traditionally conducted this meeting will make its contribution, as others have done in the past, to the bringing closer together of this great multiracial association spanning all the continents, which has played and is destined to play a very important part in the world in the search for peace and security.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed, from Thursday, July 2, consideration of the motion by Mr. Pearson:

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves joined on one stem —in the colors red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker.

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Before I continue the remarks which were interrupted by the adjournment last night I want to welcome to this house the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mrs. Jones) who has just taken her seat.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pascoe: We greet her as one of our colleagues, and we know she will be a fine representative of Saskatoon in parliament.

Before the house adjourned last night I had placed on record some—I emphasized the word "some"—of the views of the residents of the constituency of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre on this flag question. Of the hundreds of letters I have received on this subject over 90 per cent are in favour of the retention of the Canadian red ensign. Those constituents who did not definitely state an individual preference called for a vote on the question, thus supporting the request before us for a plebiscite. Not one of the letters or cards sent to me supported the proposed three maple leaves design.

As I stated in my earlier observations, I was amazed at the statement of the hon. member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett) that we were here in parliament to make decisions regardless of what our constituents want. I am even more amazed now, after reading her statement in cold print. She has headlines in the morning press. "Don't pay attention to what your constituents want," she says.

This is not my concept of the duties of a member of parliament. I consider that we were elected to parliament to represent our constituents, and I am doing just that when I support the request for a plebiscite. I placed the views of my constituents on record, and I intend to be guided by them as I think a member of parliament should. These views from home emphasize the need for a plebiscite on the flag question.

Now I wish to refer to a few comments from people who are not residents of my constituency. These views from outside strengthen my request for a plebiscite. I have a page here from the Ottawa Journal of May 27, a whole page of letters to the editor.

I will not read them all, but I should like to refer to a few of them because they certainly support the views I am expressing on behalf of my constituents. I will refer to the headings and then read some excerpts. The first one certainly supports a plebiscite. It is headed "Committee" and reads in part as follows:

... I suggest a committee of expert heraldry and flag designers be formed to choose in their opinion the three or four best designs and the people of Canada given the right to vote for the flag of their choice. This would be the true democratic way.

Here is one headed "No Change". Another one is headed "Limp Symbol". That is the way this writer feels about the three maple leaves design. Here is an interesting one headed "Pied Piper", reading in part as follows:

Mr. Pearson is like the pied piper of old, piping the tune with the new flag as its theme, to lure the people away from thinking about his government's serious mistakes and inadequacies during the year he has been in office.

Here is another one headed "Spineless". I think that is a very good heading. It reads in part as follows:

There is perhaps no more spineless and craven personality in all Canada than the English speaking Canadian of British origin who is ashamed of his background.

Then there is another one headed "Surrender", reading in part as follows:

The national flag we are having forced on us is a red maple leaf on a white background. White is the colour of surrender.

Another is headed "Won't Change". Here is another supporting our request for a plebiscite. It reads in part as follows:

A government that takes upon itself to choose a flag.

Mr. Macdonald: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Pascoe: Not until I am through. I have only a few minutes left, and I do not want to waste my time now.

A government that takes upon itself to choose a flag without consulting the people that elected it will smear its reputation for generations to come.

Here is another headed "Political Expediency", reading in part as follows:

Canadian Flag

Are we to stand idly by and make no attempt to reason with these men? Can they not be made to understand that a nation's flag transcends even political expediency?

These are a few of the letters to the editor of the Journal. They are not from my constituents, but I believe they represent the views of a great many Canadians and that they support our call for a plebiscite. There has also been a great deal of editorial comment in various newspapers. I think a few of these comments should be put on the record at one time and in one place so we can read them together. The Fredericton Gleaner comments:

Far from creating national unity, the Prime Minister's flag seems bound to create greater dissension than the ensign.

The Charlottetown Guardian:

Many Canadians will wonder why there should be urgency in deciding a matter of this kind, especially when there is so much other business of importance to be dealt with.

The Quebec Chronicle-Telegram:

But the question that is being asked all round, particularly in this part of the country, is why the sudden haste?

The Vancouver Province:

Bullheadedness on the new flag. Some of Mr. Pearson's supporters may call this political courage, but cooler heads must know it is blind stubbornness.

The Regina Leader-Post:

A useful purpose is to be served by discussion.

That is what we are doing now.

But that is as far as the matter should go at the present stage.

The Welland Tribune:

Ottawa is being flooded with opinions of many individuals and organizations. It would be well to allow time for these opinions of average citizens and representative organizations to be assessed before parliament is asked to make a decision. A national flag is a symbol which all citizens should be proud to respect.

The Kingston Whig-Standard, whose owner is a very prominent Liberal:

Mr. Pearson has issued a challenge to Canadians. He is betting on the weakness of parliament to sustain him in his decision to sell us out. This is a bitter day for Canada.

The Toronto Telegram:

Prime Minister Pearson has been dangerously reckless in daring the members of parliament to call for a vote of confidence on this emotionally charged issue. This is a form of blackmail.

The Saskatoon Star-Phoenix:

Mr. Pearson is prepared to make flag an issue on which his government would stand or fall. We think in this he has used questionable judgment. Mr. Pearson would be well advised to back out gracefully at this stage.

[Mr. Pascoe.]

The Vancouver Province:

We suspect Mr. Pearson has done a little nose counting in the House of Commons. But he has not been able to count the noses of Canadians who are outraged at the thought of abandoning a flag sanctified by the lives and the blood of thousands of our countrymen in two great wars.

The Toronto Globe and Mail:

In his haste to give Canada a distinctive national flag Prime Minister Lester Pearson has set his government and the nation itself on a collision course. There is still time for him to alter it. But there is not very much time.

Here are a few editorial comments with direct emphasis on the need for a plebiscite. I refer to them at this time to emphasize our request for a plebiscite on this question. The Sarnia Observer comments:

Because this is an emotional and highly personal issue we believe that the effective way to deal with the problem would be to call a plebiscite some time next year.

That is our suggestion, Mr. Speaker. The Toronto Telegram comments:

The people of Canada should be allowed to decide whether or not they wish to live under the flag of their forebears or discard it in favour of a new emblem.

The Moncton Times:

There is only one sound solution: That is for there to be a national referendum embracing all voters. The selection of a new flag should be left to the people and the majority choice should be accepted.

Mr. S. J. B. Sugden, co-ordinating director of the committee of one million to defend the Canadian flag, comments:

One way we can be effective is to demand a plebiscite or national vote on the flag issue.

I think these editorial comments are very enlightening on the need for a plebiscite. I draw the attention of the house to this report in the Ottawa Citizen of June 29. It is a dispatch from Winnipeg headed "41 Per Cent Like Ensign, Poll Shows", and it reads as follows:

A flag poll at the eight day Red river exhibition here saw 41 per cent of 15,000 persons indicate a preference for the red ensign as Canada's national flag. The poll, sponsored by the Manitoba New Democratic party, showed 32 per cent of those polled favour a tri-maple leaf flag, 15 per cent a new flag with one maple leaf and 12 per cent a new flag with some other design.

Here is the point I want to emphasize:

Seventy four per cent of those polled favoured a national referendum on the flag.

Before concluding, Mr. Speaker, I have a proposal in regard to the flag debate which may find favour with you and with the house. You will recall that the original government resolution proposed the three maple leaves design and the union jack. It was commonly referred to as the two flag resolution before Your Honour ruled that it should be divided into two parts for two separate votes.

My proposal is that before the final vote is taken on the first half of the resolution there should be a debate on the second half in regard to the union jack. I think the attitude of this house concerning the union jack should be made clear by debate before a final vote on the three maple leaves design. I offer this suggestion in the hope that it will be accepted by you and by this house.

Mr. Macdonald: The hon. member asserted the proposition that a red emblem on a white background is a flag of surrender. Does he therefore say that the Royal Navy and Royal Canadian Navy white ensigns are flags of surrender?

Mr. Pascoe: If I have time.

Mr. Macdonald: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pascoe: I did not make that suggestion. I just read the comments in an editorial.

Mr. Macdonald: You read the comments but did not take responsibility for them as part of the whole speech?

Mr. Pascoe: I made them part of the record.

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West): In participating in this debate in a week which has seen the 97th anniversary of confederation, an anniversary marking the beginning of our history as a nation, one cannot fail to be conscious of the fact that those who now speak are taking part in an event which in future years may well be looked upon as among the more significant in this history. This government's proposal to parliament for a national flag for Canada is but one part of the evolutionary process that began with confederation and continued with the imperial conference of 1926 and the statute of Westminster in 1931. In fact it might be said that this proposal is basically a reflection of the status that has been ours completely, at least since 1931, a status which many today feel should now be clearly evidenced by the symbols we use to identify our nationhood.

As a younger member of this house, Mr. Speaker, I consider that the opportunity to participate in these debates is perhaps one of the greatest honours and privileges that can come to any Canadian. I am deeply conscious of the responsibilities that must fall upon everyone who is given this opportunity. One of these responsibilities is the duty to make decisions on matters of national importance, a duty which none of us have any real right to cast aside or shirk because we find there are strong differences of public opinion on the question. It is true that members must give very serious consideration to the views of all those who may call upon them as their representatives to oppose this proposal. However, members must also consider no less seriously the views of those who call upon them, also as their representatives, to support it. Being asked to make decisions on matters of national importance upon which there is not already any complete agreement amongst the people is the very essence of our parliamentary system. This system, to paraphrase the words of Edmund Burke, demands of members elected by the people that they bring to parliament not only their industry, not only their efforts on behalf of their constituents, but also their judgment which they must be prepared to exercise in the national interest.

If we are not really willing to take our responsibility to make a decision as members of parliament and as a parliament on this question, how can we refuse those who may insist on a referendum on the Canada pension plan or a national health plan? These are also issues of great national importance that touch the lives of all persons in Canada in a direct way that even something as important as a national flag can never do. Those favouring the referendum have not given any compelling reason as yet, and I do not believe they can, as to why this procedure should be suitable and, in fact, is needed for this flag proposal and at the same time should not be used for other matters of national concern.

Those opposing this government's flag proposal have spoken often of tradition, of its importance, of its value for our present day existence. They say, quite wrongly I think, that in making this proposal our traditions, our heritage, particularly those parts coming from Britain, are being cast aside. Yet at the same time, by moving this amendment calling for a referendum they are urging in fact that we cast aside the concept that lies at the very core of our British political traditions. I refer to the basic concept that members of parliament, once elected by the people, have a duty to make decisions on matters upon which there is no unanimity of public opinion. The official opposition is, in fact, asking us to cast aside that part of our British tradition that says the making of decisions on matters of public importance by referendum is not a part of our political institutions, political institutions which have evolved over the centuries, first in Britain and later here in our own country. In rejecting this tradition they would follow one that is still essentially foreign to us, that of the republican system in the United States, in some parts of which the referendum is an accepted part of the process of government.

I was very impressed with the words spoken over 20 years ago by the present Leader of the Opposition when he opposed the plebiscite in 1942 and asked that the parliament of Canada be allowed to decide the issue. Surely those words are no less applicable today.

It has been suggested also that a referendum or plebiscite on the flag issue would enhance national unity. The experience of this country with the plebiscite of 1942 would indicate that it would do exactly the opposite, emphasizing possible divisions between sectors of our country and in fact creating them where they might not have existed before.

The tradition of our parliamentary system against deciding issues by referendum is reflected and followed by the approach taken by various national organizations. I, and I think most people in this house and in the country, have been very impressed by the wonderful work of the Canadian Legion for physical fitness and in looking after the interests of veterans of all our wars. But I have also been impressed by the fact that the Legion did not take a referendum amongst all its members before substituting the maple leaf for the union jack on its own badge. Instead, this decision was made by the elected delegates of the membership in convention assembled, even though many individual legionnaires, I understand, were strongly opposed to this move. Nor was a referendum of all its members taken to see whether they approved its current official stand on the red ensign. Instead this policy, which I respect, was again adopted by a vote of the delegates assembled in convention, and again even though it is apparent that not all its members support this stand.

I say this since men like Colonel Keiller MacKay, a co-founder of the Legion, support the proposed maple leaf flag. In so far as I am aware, none of the organizations that are urging the adoption of the red ensign or a national referendum on the flag issue have themselves held a referendum among their members to gain prior approval of their position.

Tradition has often been referred to in this debate. Various opposition members have wrongly suggested that in adopting the maple leaf flag we will be adopting a flag bearing a symbol without any tradition. The maple leaf is also a central part of our Canadian tradition. The speeches of the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Leeds among others, illustrate this very well. If it is important to have our traditions reflected in our flag, then let us choose a symbol which is part of this tradition but which will enable us to have a flag which cannot be mistaken for that of any other country. Perhaps most important of all, it should be a symbol which all Canadians, no matter what their origin may be, can hold equally as their own.

The three maple leaves conjoined on a single stem, I suggest to this house, is in fact such a symbol. The maple leaf is rooted deep in Canadian tradition. It has been used by the people living on this northerly half of the North American continent to distinguish themselves from others in the human spectrum, to identify themselves as something different—as "Canadians"—since the visit of the Prince of Wales in 1860, eight years before confederation.

The maple leaf has been the symbol that Canadians have been using to identify themselves to friend and foe alike in the battles in two world wars and since then in the peace keeping operations of the United Nations in the far corners of the world. There is no other symbol that is as readily understood as saying "I stand for Canada", by people both within our country and around the world as clearly and as unmistakably as the maple leaf.

Traditions of Britain, especially those involving our political institutions, traditions of France and of other countries as well, all form part of our heritage and therefore of our own traditions, but they form part of our heritage as Canadians. They have all been shaped and altered by the buffeting winds of Canadian conditions and events. The three maple leaves on one stem are clearly a key part of our tradition, and a national flag for Canada based on this symbol will reflect this tradition and therefore all our heritage, but it will do so in a way that is distinctively Canadian.

I know there are those who are troubled over the prospect of a Canadian flag which does not bear in some part the union jack. I respect these views and the sincerity with which they are held, but let it not be forgotten that this government has also proposed that parliament declare that the union jack may be flown as a symbol of Canada's links with crown and commonwealth.

I feel that approval by parliament of a national flag based on an emblem which all Canadians can hold equally as their own, no matter what their origin or ancestry, will be a major step toward creating a greater degree of national unity. It will be a major step toward creating a spirit of positive Canadianism that up until now has not been sufficiently developed in all aspects of our national life; a spirit of Canadianism such that a citizen of our country, whether he speaks English or French or both these languages, will consider himself first and foremost a Canadian and will also be considered as such by all his fellow citizens no matter what his ancestry might be.

I am proud to be able to participate in an event which may stand out in our national history. I know that in doing so it is not my wish, or the wish of those on this side of the house who support this proposal, to destroy or take anything away. Instead, we want to raise higher on the foundations of the past, the already imposing structure of Canadian nationhood, and take a step which I am convinced will soon result in a stronger and more united Canada. We are the inheritors and guardians of our country's past but we cannot be its captives, for we have equally important responsibilities to build our country's present and its future.

I am told that the grave of each Canadian who fell in battle in two world wars is marked with the maple leaf. We, the living, have given them this symbol so the world would know the country and ideals for which they died. Mr. Speaker, we the living, for ourselves and for those who will come after, can do no less than to adopt this same symbol and these ideals for this country today and for the ages.

Hon. A. J. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I have noticed that several hon. members who spoke in this debate during the past few hours, including the last speaker, have quoted Edmund Burke. I too intend to quote him and to point out that in 1769 he said:

> There is, however, a limit at which forebearance ceases to be a virtue.

I use that as an introduction to what I have to say, not because I wish to take part in this debate from any rancour or bitterness, nor is it my intention to cause offence to any member of this house or to any group in Canada regardless of the views they hold. Although I may not agree with their views I will defend their rights to express them. I ask only for myself and for the people for whom I speak that same right, not only in this debate but in the flag under which we are expected to live.

I believe in all sincerity that this statement of Edmund Burke has application to the present situation. I believe in all sincerity this point has now been reached in Canada. I believe that we English speaking Canadians—and I do not speak for all English speaking Canadians, but in this regard I speak for a very large number of them—have been guilty of a disservice to our country and we have been unfair to our French speaking Canadian compatriots because we have been too silent for too long. We have been too long suffering in the face of attacks on many of the things that most of us hold dear, and I have come to believe that we have remained silent in an attempt to prevent giving offence to our fellow countrymen of French extraction.

We have followed this course because we refused to believe that the great majority of French speaking Canadians are truly represented by the loud and often hysterical voices of extremists. However, the voices of moderation and reasonableness in French Canada have been largely ignored, at least in the news media of English speaking Canada. It is the René Lévesques and the other extremists who are the delight of the C.B.C. and of those in the newspaper business whose stock in trade it is to sell newspapers with headlines screaming of intolerance.

By our silence we have implied approval of extremists who would divide us, and we have discouraged those of temperate attitude who would unite the country. On this question there are many people from all parts of Canada and many voices from Quebec—though largely ignored so far as news media are concerned—who recognize the reasonable rights of English speaking Canadians. They realize that English speaking Canadians have symbols that they hold dear, but these voices have been largely submerged by other more extreme views, leaving the impression in English speaking Canada that nothing brings satisfaction to French speaking Canada except that which will cause pain and anxiety to English speaking Canada.

This is a most unfortunate situation, and I for one do not believe for one moment that this is the true voice of French speaking Canada. It has been made to appear that the demand of French Canada is not to have in our flag a greater representation of the things it holds dear, but the impression has been created that French speaking Canadians want one thing and one thing only, the removal of the union jack and other symbols, whether of French or British origin, from our flag.

That has caused a polarization, a reaction as natural as day following night. When that has been put forward as the official attitude of French speaking Canadians there has naturally been a reaction and the unfortunate thing is that there is polarization of opinion around the proposal of the government on the one hand, because it excludes the union jack from our national flag, and on the other hand there has been a rallying around the red ensign because it is something around which to rally and is the status quo. I think the wrong approach has been taken in the handling of this whole matter.

I support this amendment, of course. I rise to support the amendment to the resolution, not because it is the ideal thing but because it would be an improvement on the proposal of the government if the house would accept it.

I consider that I have a duty to put on the record and bring to the attention of the government not only my own views on this matter but also the views of the vast majority of the people I represent, because I am informed that these are views of large numbers of my constituents. In my constituency at the present time the people are occupied with celebrating the 100th anniversary of the first meeting of the fathers of confederation in Charlottetown, which led up to confederation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I am proud to represent the constituency in which that first meeting took place. The people of my constituency are, at the same time, worried that there is evidence of tendencies which will not assist national unity at a time when we are reaching the 100th anniversary of a very important date. Large numbers of my constituents—almost all of them—feel strongly that the union jack should be retained in any Canadian national flag. Most of them would support the red ensign. Most of them would agree with Mackenzie King's point of view which is expressed in an article which I read just recently written by Mr. James McCook and appearing in the Ottawa Journal, Mr. McCook says:

> Just after the last war this reporter went through Belgium and Holland with Mr. King and in the evenings, after the honours of the day had been done him at meetings large and small, he used to tell us that if Canadians could see the respect given the red ensign in Europe they would have no doubt about what their flag should be.

Most of the deep trouble we are now in as a nation over this very important and potentially divisive problem is due to political deception and deceit. No party in this house is free from guilt in this connection. I am one who believes that you can never arrive at honest and correct conclusions if you do not at least attempt to start with valid premises. As I said, no party is free from political deceit in this matter, and it is a sad commentary on this state of affairs that at the present time the strength of the various parties in this house is roughly in direct proportion to their guilt in this matter.

I hope this is only coincidental. Both major parties bear more responsibility in this connection than do the others, because they are national parties and seek support in all parts of Canada. Both major parties have passed resolutions within their ranks supporting a distinctive flag, and I sincerely believe that the only reason these resolutions could have passed at the annual meetings of either of the major parties is that the word "distinctive" is deceitful in itself, because it means different things to different people, depending on what part of the country they come from.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): In English speaking Canada we believe that we now have a distinctive flag. The order in council that established it says so. The prime minister of the day, Mr. Mackenzie King, believed so. The order in council says in part:

> —and that it shall be appropriate to fly the Canadian red ensign within or without Canada wherever place or occasion may make it desirable to fly a distinctive Canadian flag.

That is one end of the spectrum of the various interpretations of the word "distinctive". At the other end of the spectrum is the view that a distinctive Canadian flag means anything as long as it has not on it the union jack or any other symbols of European countries from which we derive our origins, regardless of what groups may be involved.

Mr. Moreau: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): When I am finished. I do not propose to allow myself to be interrupted at this time. The Prime Minister has said that he insists upon parliament dealing with this matter at this time because he was given a mandate by the Canadian people in the last election campaign; because the establishment of a distinctive flag within two years of assuming office was one of the planks of their platform.

Nothing could be more unreal than that contention. I am certain that in many parts of Canada the people voted for the present government in spite of that item in their platform and not on account of it. Never on any occasion, to my knowledge, did the Prime Minister stand up and say what he meant by a distinctive Canadian flag. I am as certain as I am that I am standing here that there are constituencies in Canada that would have taken a very strong line had the Prime Minister done this. If he had stood up in public with the design which the government proposes and said "If I become prime minister this will be the flag, and there will be no reference to the union jack or other symbols on it", I am sure that many of his supporters now in the House of Commons would not have been elected.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): In other parts of Canada, if the Liberal candidates had stood up and proclaimed this they would not even have been nominated by their party. In addition to this, the flag issue was a minor issue in that campaign; it was interwoven with many other isues. The government does not know whether it was elected partly on account of the flag or partly in spite of it. In point of fact, only 42 per cent of the Canadian people saw fit to vote for this government, and the majority of our people decided not to do so.

Has the government a mandate? No. If proof is required I could refer to letters I have received from people in my constituency who have been traditionally Liberal and all their lives have supported the Liberal party. Their views on this matter would convince any reasonable man that the government has not a mandate in this connection. I should like to quote briefly from one letter. The reference is to the Prime Minister:

> An election now, with feelings hot about the flag, would see many diehard Liberals voting away from his party.

That is referring to the Prime Minister. The letter continues:

> He undoubtedly will be replaced and put out to pasture. Goodness knows, he has done enough harm already.

That is the reaction that this flag question has stirred up in my riding. In addition, Mr. Speaker, can it be contended, for example, that the premier of Newfoundland worked hard to bring this government to power because it was going to eliminate the union jack and other symbols from our national flag? Of course not. Mr. Speaker, back on May 15—I remember the date because it happens to be my birthday—the Prime Minister gave this house a great, long list of important legislation which we should deal with before a summer recess. There was no mention of the flag debate at that time. On May 12, prior to that, when there was still no indication when the flag issue would come up, the Prime Minister said that members of the house would be allowed to vote according to their conscience. The following week, on May 19, it was a question of confidence in the government, and he indicated that an unfavourable vote would bring on an election. On May 26 he said that the resolution would be on the order paper the next day, I believe it was.

Now, what happened in the interval to change this attitude? The only thing that happened of which we know was that the Prime Minister went to Winnipeg and addressed the Canadian Legion. I do not know what he expected the result of that address would be. I would draw no conclusions, but it does remind me of something which happened on December 29, 1170 when another petulant person in power said, because he was miffed, "Will nobody rid me of this insolent priest?" So four retainers galloped off to Canterbury and murdered Thomas à Becket.

The situation here could be explained by somebody saying: "Will nobody rid me of these insolent Royal Canadian Legionnaires?" So somebody came up with this resolution, to stuff it down the throats of Canadians who stand for all they believe in and what they wish to have in their flag without trying to exclude the things anybody else believes in.

Even if the government had a mandate and a majority—and it has neither—to pass far reaching legislation, this is no ordinary legislation. A flag should be as permanent as a country itself. No parliament can bind future parliaments, so that if this parliament by a simple majority can decree what is to be our national flag, each future parliament in turn can replace that flag with one of its choice. What a dismal precedent; what a dismal and divisive prospect this holds out for us.

Democratic government as we understand it presupposes an understanding by those in power of the rights of minorities. The notion that a ruler has the moral right to do anything that he has the technical power to do is the philosophy of a despot. A flag should have in it symbols which will lift the pride and inspire the patriotism of all groups who live under it, especially those who feel strongly about the symbols they hold dear. It should be a unifying force, not a divisive one. This is no age for anyone to issue a sort of ukase, forcing down the throats of the Canadian people the personal choice of any man or small group of men. Such action will split this country from sea to sea, not unite it. It is not important to me whether the split is down the middle, to one side or to the other; it is the split itself which Canada cannot stand at this time.

There are many Canadians in French speaking Canada as well as in English speaking Canada who recognize that the most important thing Canada needs at this time is unity, and there should be a unifying force in the symbols under which we live. Excellent suggestions have been made that it should be a matter of compromise. For example, there is the very attractive approach to this question of the flag suggested by Mr. Jean Dubuc, 730 Talus, Ste Foy, Quebec; another from Paul E. Marcoux, 9054 St. Hubert street, Montreal 11, Quebec, and another from Mr. J. D. Davidson, of Debert, Nova Scotia, all of them recognizing that there is a need for symbols in a flag which will represent the various groups that make up this Canada of ours and give each group a reason to have pride when that flag is flying.

It is my sincere belief that minority groups have rights in this matter, but this is not to say that minorities alone have rights and that the majority has none. I believe that minority groups have a right to have the symbols they love and cherish represented in our flag. But just as emphatically I believe that no group has the right to dictate to any other group what that group cannot have in its flag. I think this applies whether the groups concerned are majorities or minorities.

I am a member of a very large group of Canadians who passionately believe that the symbols of our origin should be retained in any flag chosen to fly over us. France has given us much; but I am a Canadian of other than French extraction so I do not believe it is my right even to suggest to French speaking Canadians what they should have to represent them in their flag, much less to suggest what they cannot have to represent them in their flag. I am speaking, of course, of the national flag.

I will, however, speak for the people I do represent. These people come from many racial groups—Scottish, English, Irish. There are also many Acadian French. Then there are lesser numbers of Germans, Dutch, Danes, and even smaller numbers from other nationalities, including Chinese, Lebanese, etc., plus a few native Indians. No priority is attached to the list except in terms of numbers. With the exception of the last named all these people, or if not they their ancestors, as the case applies, came to live under the union jack out of choice. If I am asked whether I include the Acadian French, I do; because at the capitulation at the fortress of Louisburg when Prince Edward Island was covered, the terms of the capitulation provided were that French settlers in Prince Edward Island should have the right to be repatriated to France in ships sailing under cartel free from molestation by either of the combating sides.

The ancestors of the Acadians I represent chose to stay and live under British rule. They made great contributions in all fields, in the professions and in government. For example, at the present time the mayor of Charlottetown is of Acadian extraction, as is also the minister of welfare and labour, to cite only two. The flag which these people have chosen to live under is known all over the world as the flag of freedom. Everywhere the union jack is flown it has left legacies of values which we all cherish regardless of our racial background; freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom of the press and freedom to elect a legislature in a fully democratic way.

Now, it is fair to ask: If the government has taken the wrong approach to this matter, what is the right approach? My belief is that the right approach is to assess in some democratic way the wishes of the various groups in Canada as to what symbols they want to have to represent them in their national flag. This could have been done by members of parliament had they been given the right to freely express the opinions of their constituents in a free vote. Or it could have been done by a committee composed of members of all parties represented in this house. But the door has been closed on that. There is, of course, the possibility of a plebiscite such as this amendment proposes, and there are other ways. One would be a federal-provincial conference at which the provincial governments could assist the federal parliament by expressing the views of the people they govern as to what they would like to see in a flag.

I do not maintain that the provinces would have the right to select a national flag. I suggest such a meeting only as a source of valid information. The Prime Minister says why call on the provinces? The provinces have developed provincial flags of their own without reference to the federal government. That is true, but I am sure the provinces in selecting those flags ascertained the wishes of the people in the various parts of those provinces and had those wishes reflected in the flags which were chosen.

Another way of proceeding would be to call a national conference on this matter, at which various organizations would have the right to make representations as a means of channeling up to the government the real wishes of the country in regard to this matter. After all, a flag is a thing of the heart. There are millions of Canadians who want the union jack retained in the flag in some way. At the present time many of them who would not otherwise do so support the red ensign simply as a reaction to the demand of the government that the union jack be removed from the flag. But these are reasonable people. They would be willing to compromise. It is true they want the union jack, but many of them would not care if it were in lengthwise or sideways or even edgewise, as long as it was there. They put great stock upon the union jack. They know it to be a flag of freedom, a flag of Christendom. They feel that any move, especially by a minority government, to deprive them of it would be an infringement of their rights even though the government estimated it had the power to do so.

Prime ministers come and go, but the flag should be a permanent thing. Only last Saturday one of my constituents in conversation with me summed up the attitude of many of my constituents by saying "We are approaching a deadlock on this matter, but there is a a perfectly simple solution. Leave the flag alone and change the Prime Minister."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Then, when the wishes of the various groups in this country as to the symbols they hold dear have been appraised and measured, a committee of all parties in the house, including representatives from the Senate, could work on a design for a flag incorporating those symbols. Such a committee should have with it to assist it a group of advisers, a panel of heraldic experts. One such who comes to my mind is Dr. Conrad Swan, a Canadian who has achieved preeminence in this field. I suggest the assistance of this panel of experts because the final design of a national flag is a very intricate thing, not simply as a pennant but because of the many and various uses to which it has to be put. A flag should be suitable for all these variations.

We are now considering a resolution which would proclaim this particular pattern as the national flag. There is no indication what result this would have on not only the Canadian red ensign but on the Canadian blue ensign which is flown by all government ships. There is no indication what will become of the air force flag of Canada, a beautiful flag which has come to be loved especially by those who have served in the Royal Canadian Air Force; and almost a quarter of a million people served in that force during the second world war alone.

Mr. Grégoire: That is repetition.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): That may be true, but I have a right to repeat this on behalf of the constituents I represent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I have no objection to the maple leaf as a symbol to be included in a Canadian flag. It has been used as a trademark of Canada, usually in conjunction with some other symbols, for many years. But to me a maple leaf by itself is not adequate for a flag, whether there be three leaves or one.

An hon. Member: What do you want?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I will tell the hon. member; just give me time. I believe a flag should not be a pictorial representation of the flora or fauna of any particular geographic region. It should stand for something much more significant than that. I have no objection to the maple leaf being used in addition to the symbols we hold dear. The three crosses in the union jack represent, for example, England, Scotland and Ireland. They also represent the Christian heritage which we all pretend, at least, to support. The union jack was arrived at by a reasonable process of compromise. Had the flag of either Scotland or England been imposed on the other, there would not have been such a relatively easy blending of two nations which were at each other's throats for centuries.

An hon. Member: What about Ireland?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): We of Anglo-Saxon, Scottish and Irish origin put great stock in this because these crosses go back to the days of the crusades, the time when the west was threatened by a growing wave of Mohammedanism. At the time of the French revolution France discarded Christian symbols from its flag, but in the dark days of 1940, 1941 and 1942, when France had been overrun and was represented only by the free French expatriots, they returned to a Christian symbol in the form of the cross of Lorraine.

Mr. Grégoire: That was not the flag of the French, and you know it.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): The hon. member will have many opportunities to take part in this debate and correct any errors he believes I have made.

Mr. Grégoire: I am correcting one now.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I must say that now, when our way of life is threatened and our very civilization is in jeopardy from those who would engulf us, to see the symbols of Christendom struck from our masthead would give those forces nothing but cheer.

I am astonished at so many of those who look on themselves as champions of Christendom but who are dupes in such a process. Those who would submerge us in this world struggle for men's minds know full well that a rootless people cannot survive. Edmund Burke again has said that people will not look forward to posterity who never look backward to their ancestors. The way of subversion is to bring into disrepute by any means the system of government; respect for law and order; to erode the values by which we live; destroy the symbols of our history, weaken our resolve to defend the principles for which we stand. Once these things are accomplished the rest of the course is easy for those who would subvert us.

Unfortunately there has been let loose in this land in recent times a trend to intolerance which gives ready will to use the opposite race as a scapegoat for all the ills that any single group feels are theirs. It is so simple to blame it on the English or blame it on the French when in actual fact this is not the cause of the trouble at all.

The intemperate demands of one segment against the whole, this vicious, ever-accelerating frenzy in which the maximum demands of yesterday become the minimum demands of today, can lead nowhere but to destruction. The ignorance of our history in some parts of Canada is pathetic, and I am not speaking of any particular racial group now. I saw recently that among high school graduates there were only 10 per cent, I believe, who knew who was the first prime minister of Canada, and they did not know who any of the others were.

What disturbs me is that we have these unfavourable trends which are becoming accentuated and which will divide our country. I say sincerely and without recrimination that as far as I can see the government's approach to this problem is to feed this crocodile well in the hope that it will eat them last.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I believe sincerely, like millions of other English speaking Canadians, that our compatriots in French Canada are not represented truly—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member have the consent of other hon. members to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I understood I had agreement, Mr. Speaker, and that is why I proceeded. I am nearly finished. I want to make one personal observation at this point. I wish to say that I have the highest regard for French speaking Canadians. I have associated with them closely. I have lived with them for years. For two years I had the honour to command a little R.A.F. unit overseas which was made up of officers from New Zealand, Australia and Canada. I was proud that the Canadian representation in that unit were all French Canadians except myself. We worked together with the greatest and closest harmony. There has been no loss of the mutual regard we had for each other, with the result that even to this day we exchange our children in the summertime so that our children will have the opportunity to learn something of the opposite language and to see that people of the opposite race in Canada do not have horns.

I know the Prime Minister is not present at the moment but the Secretary of State is here, and there is something I should like to say. I say it in no sense, believe me, of any party taking political advantage of anyone. But I plead with the Prime Minister at this time to reconsider, to back away from this course of action, because I am sure it will have a divisive effect on Canada and cause wounds that will not be healed for many years.

An hon. Member: That is what you are doing now.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): That is not what I am doing now. My proposal is that all racial groups in Canada, especially the two founding races, have symbols in our flag of which we can each be proud. I contend that neither race has the right to say what the other cannot have on the flag. In effect that is what is being said to us at the present time, and we resent it. I should like at this point to substantiate what I have said by reading a brief letter addressed to me. It reads as follows:

W/C. The Hon. J. A. MacLean, D.F.C.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir:

There has been a great deal of controversy recently concerning the proposed distinctive national flag and our association feels that we should make known to you our preferences in this regard. The united services officers club of Charlottetown includes in its membership nearly all of the officers of the armed forces resident in Prince Edward Island—

I might interject that it includes all retired officers as well as presently serving officers.

—and it seems to us that, as leaders of Canada's military forces in war and peace our opinion should be of assistance to you in resolving this difficult problem.

A special general meeting of all members of the club was held the evening of May 29 in the club rooms and the following motion was passed: That we are opposed to any Canadian flag which does not incorporate the union jack.

May we respectively solicit your support in this respect?

Yours truly,
Ian G. Kerry
President of U.S.O.C.

May I say that this is not some minor club. It has among its membership nearly all the leading citizens of Prince Edward Island by virtue of the fact that they have held commissions in the services at one time or another. I ask the Prime Minister to put patriotism ahead of party, or whatever the motivation is in this case. Give time for consideration. This is a great issue. It is not fair to parliament or to the Canadian people to expect it to be resolved in a headlong rush at a time when we are all under tensions and frustrations and when another look at this matter would be of great advantage.

The Prime Minister should realize that Canada is not a monolith that has to conform to the specifications of any one man or any one group. Canada is a mosaic contributed to by all the various groups. Only the day before yesterday this was so well depicted by the very fine program on the front lawn initiated by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I congratulate him on it. There you had a representation of the contribution of all the ethnic groups and the various cultures that go to make Canada into one worth while mosaic.

I will not go into it now, but I would refer the Secretary of State to the fact that problems of this very type arose in South Africa in the 1920's. The government of the day there started out with exactly the same technique, but they had the good sense to retreat from it and not to divide the house on the matter on second reading of their legislation. Eventually committees were established and a compromise was reached in which all parties and all the people represented in that parliament could at least acquiesce.

This is the only way, Mr. Speaker, that we can work toward unity in this country. If you want evidence in support of that fact I would say that in spite of the difficulties experienced by the whites in South Africa, who were so disturbed about this matter in the twenties, they are now more united than they have ever been before. I say that if the Prime Minister is a man, and I believe he is, he will not divide the country on this issue. If he is a statesman, I believe that he will not even divide this parliament on this issue.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, in rising in this debate on the amendment moved by the Conservatives to have the matter of the flag settled through a referendum, I must admit that one thing amazed me. While I listened to certain Canadians, certain English speaking representatives, one after the other—especially those from the Conservative group, although there were some from the New Democratic party and even from the Thompsonists—I noted that members of that little group which is somewhat like the Tory spirit brooding over parliament to sow discord, in a quite desperate effort, wept their last tears in an incoherent language, always the same, mourning the loss of the red ensign.

Canadian Flag

Mr. Speaker, do you honestly think a man could lose what he never had? Is it even possible to regret what you have never owned?

Indeed, in 1945, our troops could never be told from British troops. Other countries could not single out our troops who were always at the line of fire in all British wars. Canada having no identification flag, her government decided, in September 1945, since they could not succeed in making one of their own, to borrow the ensign from the British merchant marine.

Is it because the United Kingdom considered our Canadian troops merely as mercenaries of the proud Albion? Were our troops considered as mere merchandise that could be sold to a country at war? True Canadians are still puzzled in regard to the spirit which inspired this selection. Since then questions are constantly being asked that give rise to much controversy. For lack of a sounder argument we were told that the situation was temporary.

However, Mr. Speaker, we find that what was to be temporary is taking a permanent character, and our men continue to fight for liberty, under the auspices of mercantilism.

However, it was indeed mentioned in the house that such loan was only temporary. Hence I am surprised to hear this group clamouring to appropriate an object which had only been loaned. In life I was always taught that other people's property had to be returned; this property may have been very useful to us since many French Canadians today have gone to meet their Maker, after having been good servants during their lifetime.

In my opinion the red ensign now deserves to be returned to its owners.

The government offers us the design of a new distinctive flag, of a really Canadian flag, in the true sense of the word. This government has certainly not selected this design lightly. We ourselves presented a distinctive design, but we bowed before the opinion of the majority, and, in order not to delay any longer the debate on the various designs, in the interest of the country, we have foregone our own selection so that the design proposed by the government would be unanimously endorsed.

Now that the debate on the design has come to a close, the official opposition demands a referendum on the acceptance of this same design, and pretends that the people have not been consulted.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

Stop making us laugh with your ridiculous buffooneries which mean nothing, but still the country has to pay for such unheard of childish debates.

The Canadian people have requested a distinctive flag for a hundred years. Indeed, in 1945, in order to satisfy the desires of the people, the government decided to borrow the ensign of the British merchant marine, pending the time it would be in a position to decide on its own design.

To ask a popular consultation is precisely the Conservative way of sending into oblivion a proposal which that party was never honest enough to present to the Canadian people, when 98 per cent of the province of Quebec and almost 80 per cent of the people in Canada as a whole instructed us, at the last election, to give Canada a distinctive flag.

In such a case would we be going back to our constituents to get permission they already gave us? This is sheer nonsense. In my opinion, to ask for a referendum on a question when 100 per cent of my electors gave me a clear and precise mandate would be evidence of obvious inefficiency.

What are the motives of a group of Anglo-Saxons and a few new Canadians who do not understand yet the meaning of the words "Canadian-bi-ethnical", who have not understood yet that it is time to get out of mythological colonialism and have not realized that Canada is now an adult country?

Perhaps we will never know, it is probably because they remained in Canada without really belonging here.

They are somewhat like the husband who could never leave his mother for his wife. The story goes on to say that he finally divorced.

I do not even dare to think that any group among them could take action to kill right off a measure of such importance to Canada, because they would show the whole world that they are traitors to their country.

I was listening the other day to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) who was saying how the government of the day had held a plebiscite concerning conscription in 1942. He added that that plebiscite had done justice to Canada. I will not discuss that question which the hon. member for Qu'Appelle fully outlined, because 76 per cent of Quebeckers voted against conscription.

This means that the 1942 conscription did not do justice, as mentioned by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. Indeed, a plebiscite or referendum, just like the popular vote, is very much influenced, not to say more by all the political factors.

However, with regard to the comparison made in the house by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, I maintain that the present question is not at all the same as the situation which existed in 1942. In fact, in 1942 the government of the day had explicitly promised, with the evident purpose of being elected, not to impose conscription. After being elected, it remembered that finance had its rights and that it was stronger than governments. Reneging on their most solemn election promises, this government, admitting defeat before the giants of finance, had no alternative but to go once more to the people asking to be freed from its undertaking.

Indeed, the people had not voted for the military and the government which was elected in 1942 was not committed to impose conscription. On the contrary, its terms of reference being quite clear, it had to promise the people not to launch this country into the blazing furnace of war.

That is why a referendum was called for at the time. Whereas today this government made the flag one of the main planks of its platform in the last election.

We, of the Ralliement Créditiste promised our voters to support without reserve any government which would have the courage of presenting a distinctive flag to the house. We now have this distinctive flag design, for which we were elected. What else do we want, Mr. Speaker?

Our party is in favour of immediate and concrete decisions. We are not a group of puppets, but a group determined to do something for Canada, if it is not too late.

We say that now is the time for Canada to have its own flag, and not a borrowed one.

We are proud to see that 75 per cent of the members, Anglo-Saxon, Canadian or new Canadian, are prepared to support the proposed flag. I say to the house that this may be the first indication that we are really on the way toward achieving Canadian unity.

It may be argued that there are still some opponents in the house. This only proves the rule. We should not take offence at that fact, because there will always be some opponents, even if it is only to preserve the seed of colonialism planted in Canada 300 years ago. We should not give them more importance than they deserve.

Similarly, we, from Quebec, hear with some satisfaction the loud protests of a small group.

In fact, for years Quebeckers have been accused of being separatists, of wanting to destroy confederation and now with the introduction of a really distinctive flag, the true enemies of Canadian unity come out of the shadows. Now the country will know who does not want any understanding in Canada. And you can imagine that it is not French Canadians.

What a scandal to have thus shown their petty secular game. You can see those who have always remained riveted to one-way traditions, without ever officially considering the two ethnic groups making up Canada.

That is why I was very sorry to hear a new Canadian who claimed the other day that he was speaking on behalf of his group. Poor fellow. As a latecomer, he still has a lot, not to say everything to learn, since he has not yet grasped the meaning of the democratic system in Canada. Imbued with the socialism of countries behind the iron curtain, they are unable to understand the democratic freedoms, because in a democratic country they live without realizing it, like socialists, like integrationists.

I fear there are still too many of those new Canadians, and even some Anglo-Saxons, who are unable to take their adult life seriously. It would be time for them to examine their conscience.

Speaking on the amendment, the hon. member for Victoria, Ont. (Mr. Lamb) expressed the fear that each province might have its own flag.

Earlier an hon. member stated that the new flag might favour especially the French Canadians, which is totally incorrect since, at the present time, many more Anglo-Saxons than French Canadians are in favour of that flag which pleases me greatly. It indicates that this flag design will foster unity in Canada and that we are fighting for the recognition of the two great ethnic groups in our country.

Someone said earlier that in his province French Canadians faced no problems. I quite believe it; it is forbidden to speak French on the labour market. Look at what goes on in those provinces and you will see that the English and the new Canadians do not dare to try to understand the difficulties experienced by those French Canadians who want to keep their language. And then they come to us and tell us matter of factly: We have no problems with French Canadians in our province. Of course not because they have been integrated for 50 or 60 years; we have seen it in the case of the Acadians who have become integrated. The French Canadian does not want to become integrated and I wonder if that will be understood some day.

I suggest to some people in those English speaking provinces to reflect briefly at night on the situation of that ethnic group. We have a Canada made up of two ethnic groups, and I wonder if the new Canadians will finally understand that country because when French Canadians are obliged to attend English schools, to use English at work and before the courts, where everything is done in English, they tell us: We do not have any problem with French Canadians in our province. Of course not, because they are patient, much more patient than some groups which today are up in arms because there is talk of adopting a national flag for the whole of Canada.

It will be necessary to search our souls, to come back to our senses and to ask ourselves what is a Canadian, a true Canadian? A true Canadian, as I said a little earlier, is somewhat like a husband. He must leave his mother, his father, in short his native land.

If we want to build a Canada worthy of every Canadian, whatever his origin may be, as long as you keep on creating here mother-country images, you will not be true Canadians. And that might be because you never had the opportunity to make sacrifices to deserve this Canadianism. We shall have to dispel those images and get down to work, because there has been enough talk about such myths. It is high time to think like the true Canadians that you are and that you should all be in this house.

Frankly, I am shocked to see those groups hanging on doggedly to the red ensign, which they admire because it was loaned to us, because it served our purpose and it was all we had. However, we should decide to give it back. It is all very well to be patient, and I think England has been very patient, but today she must be given back what belongs to her. Today we have a government that had the courage to offer a flag to the nation. Although we do not agree that it is 100 per cent representative of Canada, we abide by the decision and say: this is our flag and we shall fully support it.

[Text]

Mr. Webb: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question. With regard to those of us who have spoken for the retention of the red ensign in this debate, the hon. member has said that we do not understand their position and he cannot understand our taking a position in favour of the retention of the red ensign. He has also said he is for the unification of all parts of Canada. I would like to ask him if he ascribes to the views of the leader of his party, who said when making a statement not too long ago:

> Réal Caouette, the deputy leader of the Social Credit party, admitted that he admired Adolf Hitler and Benito Mussolini for their political qualities. Mr. Caouette said also that he had refused to fight in the second world war because "...I didn't think Canada had given me anything worth fighting for".

Mr. Langlois: I rise on a question of privilege—

Mr. Webb: I want to finish my question. Does the hon. member not agree that the very principles he is putting forth are those used by the dictators in this world to conquer other countries?

Mr. Langlois: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: I am very glad that, at last, that voice should make itself heard. I am asked why we blame supporters of the red ensign. I thought I had made myself clear, but they still do not understand.

I maintain that we have no right to take what belongs to somebody else. We may borrow it, but we cannot keep it for ourselves. It would be an insult to Great Britain to keep her merchant marine flag as we are doing now. I feel it is a mere question of justice to hand it back to her, since today we are being offered a distinctive and exclusively Canadian flag. We do not want the red ensign, but we want a symbol to represent us, something truly Canadian. It seems to me everyone should understand that.

As far as Hitler and Mussolini are concerned, I want to point out to the hon. member that he is absolutely out of order. I think the hon. member is only trying to call attention to himself. If he had only read the whole statement of the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette), when he spoke about Hitler and Mussolini, he would have understood but in my opinion, he will never understand. He should have read the complete text instead of taking two or three sentences out of it—because you know that you can have somebody hung for two or three words taken out of context. I will go even further and say that in the better days of Mussolini, priests made us kneel down and pray for his victory. And today we would condemn him because he made a mistake? Mr. Speaker, if we were to condemn every person in this house who has made a mistake, there would not be a single member left.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I appreciate that the hon. member for Roberval is trying to reply to the question put to him by the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac (Mr. Webb), but since the discussion between the two hon. gentlemen is not related to the resolution under consideration, I would suggest that he limit his remarks to the subject of the present debate.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, you allowed the question and I thought that I was entitled to reply. Since I have to give a complete answer, I wonder if you would permit me to finish.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I say to the hon. member that his reply is quite adequate in my opinion. Consequently, I would suggest that he does not pursue the discussion any further.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, you are a better judge than I am. I felt that my reply was incomplete but you do not think so. That is not too bad.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I certainly will not tolerate being called in any circumstance a "follower of Mussolini and Hitler", especially if it is the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac who does the name-calling. May I say that that is usually known as a dirty blow, a punch below the belt. To my mind, there is but one way to protect oneself from such attacks and such name-calling tactics, and I advise the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac to look up the dictionary for the meaning of the words "distinctive flag", which really mean distinctive in the first instance.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that other members do not resort to such name-calling tactics as I feel that there is not a single member of this house who deserves such treatment, not even the member who indulged in this practice.

[Text]

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, there are possibly two main reasons why I hope my remarks will be somewhat brief today. One is the fact that there has already been considerable debate on this issue, and many times it has become rather acrimonious. The second reason is that nothing that has been said in this house these past days will be likely to change anyone's opinion particularly. I think that possibly each and every member has studied the matter for himself or herself and arrived at the point where he or she knows what the decision will be as far as they are concerned. Therefore there may not be too much to be accomplished by lengthy debate.

Thinking back over the last few weeks it is easy to remember all of the questions which have been asked relating to the flag issue; the intention of the government with respect to the introduction of the resolution, the nature of the designs they were going to advocate, and the objective as far as its place on the agenda of the house was concerned. Therefore I think that even though the debate has possibly been of short duration as far as the formal debate is concerned, it has already occupied a considerable part of the attention of the house.

I appreciated very much the interesting remarks made by the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) this morning. I would say that I agree with him. I think the implication of his remarks was to the effect that the silence on the part of many with respect to certain trends in Canada today has given undue encouragement to extremists who do not appreciate the feelings and the convictions of Canadians from coast to coast. When hon. members rise in this house and insinuate that those who are opposing this particular resolution and the adoption of a new flag are not true Canadians and prefer to remain in a state of colonial immaturity, I think it indicates a complete lack of understanding of the basic concepts of Canadianism. The purpose of the resolution before us, no matter what may be said to the contrary, is to change our national symbol.

I was somewhat disappointed by the words the other day of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) when he said in concluding his remarks—I have already indicated that I have the highest regard for the hon. member and usually a great deal of respect for his judgment—that Canada has not got a national flag. Then he went on to give some quotations to substantiate that assertion. I do not believe that that is entirely so. Perhaps technically we can say that Canada does not have a flag, but in reality Canada does have a flag, and has had a flag always. And no matter what sneering interventions are made from my left—we are getting used to those here—that is a fact. The world recognizes that fact, for we know that wherever Canadians dwell and are represented the Canadian red ensign is recognized as the Canadian flag. It flies from national buildings, from our embassies, and, as I have said, wherever there is Canadian representation. Therefore to all intents and purposes Canada has had a flag and does have a flag.

Furthermore, if Canada does not have a flag, why is it that national organizations have taught our children the significance of the red ensign or the union jack? I received a letter from a scholar the other day, and he pointed out that in the various organizations to which school children belong they have been taught the significance of this flag. Therefore, if Canada does not have a flag, why is it that our young people have been reared with the idea in mind that we do have a flag and have been taught what it stands for? I am sure that those who have accepted Canadian citizenship in this country have recognized that we have a flag. It has been used at ceremonies and has been recognized and acknowledged as the Canadian flag.

I say again that this resolution is not to adopt a distinctive flag but to change our national flag. The question is asked: Where do Canadians stand on this question? We know where some stand. There are others who believe that we have to get rid of what to them are the objectionable features which they see as symbols of colonialism.

Mr. Langlois: Agreed.

Mr. Patterson: I hear hon. members to my left say "Agreed". Well, we know where they stand. They are speaking for the radical, fanatical element in Canada and we know what to expect from them. Nevertheless there are those who believe, on the other hand, that we should retain at any cost the present symbols which are indicative of our rich heritage, whether it be French or English or that of any other nation.

Mr. Gauthier: United Canada loyalists.

Mr. Patterson: Keep it up. I should think your stock is dropping considerably in the province of Quebec; so keep it up.

Mr. Gauthier: And yours.

Mr. Patterson: Well, we will see after the next election, no doubt. As I was saying, where do Canadians stand on this particular issue? I do not think there has been any attempt to ascertain what is the consensus across the country. Therefore, before we move in the direction of changing our national symbol, I think there should be some understanding as to what the Canadian people as a whole want. Whatever it is, I think we have the right to know.

What is the procedure which has thus far been followed in achieving this objective of changing our national symbol? We have been referred many times to the matter of the Liberal election promises, and some have suggested that the government were elected on the basis of this particular promise. I do not think that is absolutely true. There is no doubt that this promise was included in their platform, but nevertheless I do not think they can say that they were elected on the basis of their promise to provide a distinctive national flag for Canada. As pointed out by the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean), there is perhaps a difference of opinion as to what "distinctive" means. The order in council to which he refers does refer to the Canadian ensign as a distinctive national flag. Others would take it that it means something entirely different and that it does not show anything of our heritage. It does not show anything of our racial origin but is something strictly and absolutely indicative of Canada today. Therefore, that is the beginning of this particular issue, the Liberals having made this particular promise in the election campaign.

On April 17 the Prime Minister, in reply to a question which was asked of him, stated that the Liberals had promised that within two years Canada would have a distinctive national flag, and he said that the government had been in office for one year. I think anyone who is absolutely honest would have to say that the Prime Minister meant to leave the impression that there was not any undue haste to bring this particular matter before parliament. I do not think we should draw any other inference.

Then shortly after that we find there is a distinct change. I should like to refer to an editorial in one of my local papers, the Fraser Valley Record for May 22 last, and I will just read about two paragraphs from it:

> While, like the Royal Canadian Legion, we see no need to change Canada's flag, the red ensign with the Canadian coat of arms in the field, the objective viewpoint of a friendly observer below our border is of timely interest...
> "Mr. Pearson has been in no hurry to redeem his party's pledge to adopt a new flag. Caution is the word, and properly so.

A country's flag, no matter how aesthetically offensive it may be to some people, is something more than a design. It embodies, as can no other symbol, a nation's past, present and future even when, in Canada, it has never been officially adopted. It flies in the hearts of a nation."

Perhaps I should clarify that particular statement. It is a quotation from a newspaper published in Portland, Oregon. It says the Prime Minister is wise in taking his time because of the implications of this problem.

It was not too long after this that the whole situation changed. As we know, the Prime Minister introduced his resolution and the situation developed from there on. What happened to change the Prime Minister's intention so suddenly in this regard? This began as a matter which appeared to be of not too great urgency. It developed into one of urgent priority. I wonder who the right hon. gentleman's advisers were? I wonder where the pressure came from. I wonder what made him change his mind so rapidly and so abruptly.

We all remember the lengthy list of legislative items which he himself presented to us for consideration. Again, it was the Prime Minister himself who indicated his belief that these items should be disposed of as expeditiously as possible. I will not read that particular list; it is a lengthy one. Nevertheless, we found that suddenly the whole thing was reversed and an entirely new item of business appeared, one which was to take priority over practically everything else.

Anyway, the flag resolution was introduced. The Prime Minister said there was to be a free vote. What do we mean by a free vote? Everybody knows what a free vote is. It is a vote which gives every member an opportunity to present an opinion dictated by his conscience, without any serious repercussions attaching to the result of the diversion. We accepted that statement in good faith. We believed the Prime Minister meant what he said. But it seems he did not, because not too long afterwards he made it clear that though everybody, even Liberal members, could vote according to their consciences—they would not be read out of the party—the government intended to treat the matter as a question of confidence and, if it was repeated, there would be another general election. I suggest this is a complete repudiation of the principle of a free vote.

What came next? The right hon. gentleman came into the house and challenged the opposition to bring in a want of confidence motion based on the flag issue. My only comment is this: The Prime Minister for some reason reduced this issue from one which should have been maintained on a high level of debate to a political football by threatening members of this house and the people in general that they would have to face another protracted and expensive election campaign unless they agreed to the proposal he was making. The objective of this resolution may be distasteful to many but the procedures which are being followed are infuriating Canadians right across this nation.

I do not intend to make any personal attack on the Prime Minister. We have looked upon him as a diplomat and as a statesman. He has been recognized as such around the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Patterson: I am just going to say this—I think members opposite must be applauding what I am about to say now: I believe the image of the Prime Minister as a statesman and a diplomat will be badly besmirched because of the way in which this political issue is being handled. That is the opinion of a good many people. I believe this debate should continue for the present so that the pros and cons may be clearly set forth in this chamber. I believe every member should have the opportunity to present his views and the views of his constituents in this regard, whether they be for or against the motion. But, having said that, I believe that after there has been sufficient debate on this matter to bring out all the relevant facts there should be agreement to take no final decision but to allow time for reflection both by members of this house and by the Canadian people.

We ought to get along with the other matters the Prime Minister has mentioned. I do not think we can brag about what has been accomplished this session. We have made some progress, but I do not think we have made sufficient progress. In this connection I should like to read the first and the last paragraphs of an editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail of June 29:

Rarely in Canadian history has parliament presented such an unattractive picture of itself to the people who elect it, the people who pay for it, the people whose public business it is supposed to transact.

The voters are not amused, the voters are not at all impressed, with what they see in Ottawa. It is in the knowledge of this public distaste and disillusion—

This refers to the results of a proposal the Prime Minister made.

—that the various house leaders, when they meet today, should find some method to get parliament back on the rails.

As I said, I believe there should be every opportunity given for members to present their views on this subject, both for and against. Then, in my opinion, the matter should be shelved and we should proceed to consider other items of business. Later, perhaps in the fall, the Prime Minister could give serious thought to the suggestion of a referendum. This is, of course, the subject of the amendment, but I wish to point out that it is not original in any way because my hon. friend from Cariboo (Mr. Leboe) spoke as follows on February 27, as reported in Hansard on page 315:

I should like to make a few remarks about this business of a national flag. We really get into deep water when we start talking about a national flag, I realize that. I think the solution lies in having a committee set up which will choose perhaps four or five designs out of the some 2,500 or 2,900 designs that have been submitted, and put these on a ballot. They should include the red ensign, and should be put to a referendum of the people, with a transferable vote so that each individual would choose the first, second, third, fourth and fifth in the order he preferred and, by the process of elimination, we will then have over 50 per cent of the people voting in favour of a particular flag. That will take all of us off the hook and put the responsibility where it belongs, on the shoulders of the people.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment introduced by the official opposition represents nothing new because my colleague, the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe), suggested the same thing as early as February 27. If we are to have a new flag, Mr. Speaker, let us have one of which Canadians can be proud and not one about which the best thing that can be said is that nobody else has it.

I suggest there are scores and hundreds—I could go higher than that—there are multitudes of people in this nation who want a new flag but they do not want the one that is the choice of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). They agree that we should have something else, but with regard to the one he has put forward they wonder why in the world he chose it and submitted it for the consideration of cabinet and then to the House of Commons. That applies to Liberals as well as to a lot of other people. They just do not like it.

I am going to conclude by making the plea once again that, no matter where we stand on this issue, we should have ample opportunity to present our views and arguments, that there should then be a cooling off period or time for reflection, after which we can then come back and make a decision that will be intelligent and in the interests of the unity of this great nation of which we are all proud to form a part.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, at this historic time in our history I should like to take the opportunity as the elected representative of the cosmopolitan constituency of Parkdale to plead with hon. members to seize this challenge and unique opportunity to ensure the unity of Canada by showing a better understanding of our parliamentary procedures and by also demonstrating their good will to co-operate and show Canada that we here are responsible in the exercise of our duties.

Many speeches have been made in this chamber on this issue. Some of them, I am sorry to say, were not very praiseworthy. Some speakers preceding me have even demeaned the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) of this country or his intentions as far as the Canadian flag resolution is concerned. Let me remind these hon. members that we are proceeding in this debate according to our parliamentary rules, that the Canadian flag resolution of the government was put on the order paper on May 28 and that members of parliament have had time to read, study and reflect upon the resolution since May 28. It was not debated immediately. It was only on June 15 that the Prime Minister introduced the resolution with his historic speech and since June 15 we have had ample time to express our opinions on the government's resolution concerning a distinctive Canadian flag.

It is the Prime Minister, I am happy to say, who has proven his Canadian patriotism and his courage by his decisions and by the speeches he has made in this chamber and throughout our country in order to strengthen Canadian confederation and therefore our national unity. Since the Prime Minister's historic address in the House of Commons on December 17, 1962, when he declared that confederation was our declaration of faith in the destiny of a united Canada, he has rallied Canadians to the cause of renewing our efforts and rededicating ourselves to our greatest national cause, our national purpose, a strong and united Canada.

This government's enviable record of important bills and other proposed legislation now on the order paper demonstrates the sincerity and determination of the Prime Minister's goal which he described on April 23, 1963, to the Canadian nation in his first television address after taking office, that although our task in the second session of Canada's twenty sixth parliament is indeed complex, "it is time to excite the daring, to test the strong and to give new promise to the timid". He went on to say:

It will indeed be a time of direction and of decision, when our efforts are sustained, our purpose clear, and our faith high.

The Canadian government's decision in the flag resolution we are now debating is exciting, it is daring and it is testing many timid people. The beautiful design proposed by the government, consisting of three red maple leaves joined on one stem across a white background with blue vertical borders, has its historic and heraldic significance. I regret to say that many members of this chamber refuse to understand that there are elements of history and elements of heraldic significance in the design proposed by the Canadian government.

The historic element in this flag dates back to May 26, 1868, when Queen Victoria issued a royal warrant establishing the great seal of Canada and the arms of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. This seal, a sprig of three maple leaves, appeared twice. For Ontario the emblem granted was three gold maple leaves on a green background and for Quebec the emblem was three green maple leaves on a gold background. Later, Mr. Speaker, King George V also gave Canada other emblems and symbols of which we are proud.

I am certain that the proposed design, Mr. Speaker, has the support of the majority of Canadians. This majority is reflected also by majority support for this resolution as members of the House of Commons take their stand one after the other.

Many of my constituents have expressed their support of this distinctive Canadian flag. Every day young Canadians are enthusiastically expressing their acceptance and admiration of the maple leaf flag. Canadians of all backgrounds and origins have voiced their support for the new flag.

For the information of many hon. members who have requested it, and especially for the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mandziuk), may I say first of all that if they would take the trouble to read the reports of the ethnic press in Canada they would learn that the Estonian newspaper Meie Elu indicates that Estonians want to see Canada as a completely sovereign country with her own symbols, a flag and an anthem. The German weekly Der Courier states that it is hoped there will be a majority who will accept the government's design. The Ukrainian weekly, New Pathway, stated that Canada should have her own distinctive flag, and the design is certainly the right one. The Ukrainian Voice states that no damage would be done if the new flag were not adopted at present.

Beside this evidence from the ethnic press throughout Canada, there are also ethnic organizations which have expressed their support for the Canadian flag as proposed by this government. Last year a delegation of the young slavic alliance came to a hearing of the royal commission on biculturalism and bilingualism. They also voiced their support for the new, distinctive Canadian flag. The national executive of the Canadian Polish congress representing over 400,000 Canadians of Polish origin in this country came out strongly in a letter to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag.

This overwhelming evidence, Mr. Speaker, for a new Canadian flag proved also that a plebiscite on this matter is needless. As was so ably argued and proven by so many members in this house, a referendum or plebiscite is not in keeping with our British parliamentary system. A plebiscite on the subject would not serve national unity. We members of parliament were sent here to make decisions, to legislate and to carry out the mandate of the Canadian electorate. Canada must have her own and distinctive flag because Canadians want to rally round a symbol to pursue their national purpose across this country. I am sure we all want a flag that can qualify as a truly national flag. The maple leaf design of the Canadian government is a truly national flag, representing our historic past, representing our exciting present. I am sure it will also represent the glorious future of Canada.

In accepting a new Canadian flag, Mr. Speaker, we will accept also the union jack as proof of our loyalty to the monarch of Canada and our very close association with the British commonwealth of nations. We respect the union jack and we respect also the red ensign. We will respect a new, distinctive Canadian flag. I am sure that as responsible members of parliament we will respect the maple leaf flag if it is approved by parliament and that we shall do so, not only for ourselves, but for our beloved children and for Canada, our home and native land.

Mr. Grégoire: May I ask a question of the hon. member? I have heard him mention

"Canadian unity". Some Conservative members have used these words "Canadian unity". May I know what the hon. member's definition is of this word "unity"?

Mr. Haidasz: In response to the hon. member who asked this question I may say that, to me, unity means one national purpose designed to achieve the best life for all of us in Canada. Unity also means harmonious relationships between all the people in Canada, harmonious relationships between all the provincial governments in Canada. Unity, Mr. Speaker, also means unity of action in order that we may play a proud role in the international field.

Mr. Grégoire: Then, I conclude, that for the hon. member unity means only unity of purpose and not of races or groups?

An hon. Member: Why don't you make your own speech?

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this important debate I believe history is being made today in this honourable chamber. I cannot say that I agree altogether with the remarks of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) when he stated that it was an exciting debate. Indeed this morning when asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) about the resolution on the flag, the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) referred to it as a simple resolution. Far from being a simple resolution, I am sure it is a resolution that requires the utmost soul-searching for every member in this house.

Little did I realize that the day would come when I would have to rise in my place in this chamber and defend the Canadian red ensign as Canada's national flag. I have long looked upon it as Canada's national flag, just as thousands of other Canadians have. Here we have before us a resolution asking parliament to replace it with another flag. The day before yesterday, Mr. Speaker, many members of this house as well as thousands of Canadians had an opportunity of witnessing a display of pageantry on the lawn in front of the parliament buildings. This was as fine a display as has ever been held on the hill. This program was relayed to millions of Canadians by means of television so that they, too, would be able to fill their hearts with pride. The 66 Canadian red ensigns fluttering in the breeze made a most impressive appearance. I am likewise sure that my good friends from Quebec must have had their hearts filled with pride by this program.

Two days ago we celebrated Canada's 97th birthday. Birthdays are times when we look back over the past years. They give us a chance to realize those things which we in this country have done or have left undone. July 3 is a day on which Canadians like to fly the flag. I should like to quote from an editorial that appeared in the Telegram of June 30:

> Tomorrow—July 1—is a day for flags. It is Dominion day. It is a day when we honour the men who explored our challenging country, who cleared the land, who tapped its mineral riches and who fought with words and swords to keep it independent.
> These ancestors deserve honour, as do the men of today who are striving to make Canada a happy place for people who come from less favoured lands.
> Tomorrow is a day on which the Canadian ensign should be flown proudly and bravely. It is a good flag; it has served the nation well and the people of Canada have served it well.

The next paragraph is out of context, but I shall read it as it is:

> On the eve of Dominion day the Prime Minister has shown signs he will not press in parliament for the rejection of our national emblem—at least not before the summer recess. It is a wise decision.

I checked on this article with the editor of the Toronto Telegram and he said, "Yes, it is wrong. That paragraph is out of place now, but it was written by an editor who contacted the Prime Minister on his way from a cabinet meeting on Tuesday morning, the day before July 1, and he was given to believe that this resolution would not be put before the house before the summer recess."

Mr. Grégoire: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think we are supposed to be discussing the amendment concerning a referendum on the flag issue, but since this morning every speaker in the house has spoken about everything else but the referendum. I think the Chair should now make a ruling stipulating that the subject of debate is on the question of whether we should have a referendum or plebiscite, or not.

Mr. Winch: Your colleague was the worst offender in the house.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The Chair has already ruled on this question three or four days ago, and members will be permitted to speak on the main motion as well as on the amendment.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I appeal your decision.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I think the hon. member has no right to appeal a decision which was made three or four days ago.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I think that under the rules we are allowed to appeal a ruling when we feel that it was improperly made. That is precisely what we are witnessing today; the discussion is on everything but what we should be discussing.

Therefore, we appeal your ruling; in my opinion, the matter to be discussed is that of a plebiscite or referendum, nothing else. I appeal your ruling on that matter.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I should point out to the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) that the Chair at the moment is not making any ruling but only reciting a ruling made three or four days ago. If there was any objection then on the part of the hon. member to that ruling, the objection should have been taken at that time. I feel the hon. member is not quite in order in appealing a rule which is now some days old.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: I appeal the ruling. Mr. Speaker, I appeal that ruling.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): What decision is the hon. member for Lapointe appealing?

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: With regard to the ruling made three or four days ago and to the one you made today, namely that we can discuss any subject, I understand that the rules are strict but that as long as nobody appealed that decision, there was no problem. Today we appeal that ruling because the rules have been broken, since they require that we discuss the amendment and nothing else. The rules require that we talk about the subject matter indicated in the amendment, namely a referendum or a plebiscite. Since members talk about all kinds of subjects, are allowed to go from one subject to another, which is against the rules, I appeal your ruling.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I should point out to the hon. member for Lapointe that the greatest authority for rules in this chamber is the rules which are made by this chamber itself. A few days ago when this question was brought up there was a ruling from the Chair, a ruling to which the house gave its consent and agreement, a ruling that in the debate on the amendment a debate would be considered also on the main motion.

The Chair, at the moment, is not making a ruling. The Chair at the moment is only reciting a ruling made a few days ago, to which the house at that time agreed. I would again suggest to the hon. member that at this particular time he could not appeal a ruling which has not been made at this time. The Chair at this moment is making no ruling but is reciting a ruling which the house accepted a few days ago. I do feel that the hon. member is quite out of order.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I appeal against two things. First of all, I appeal against the ruling made by the Chair four or five days ago, as you said. But, at that time, the house was unable to express its views, because it was not called upon to vote on the matter. Second, I appeal against your ruling to prevent me from appealing today.

I think, therefore, that the house should be asked to come to a decision on the matter, namely whether all kinds of subjects will be dealt with so that this debate will drag on interminably, or whether it will be restricted to the subject of the amendment. I call for a vote on this question. I want the house to come to a decision on the matter, because otherwise the debate will last indefinitely, perhaps two months.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I should point out again to the hon. member for Lapointe that he is now asking the house to declare itself on a ruling that has already been declared upon.

Mr. Grégoire: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): When the ruling was made by the Speaker a few days ago no objection was taken to it by the house, and since no objection was taken to it I would consider that there had been concurrence and that the house had agreed that the debate which is now taking place would consist of any references which might necessarily be made to the main motion and also to the amendment itself.

That ruling was made a few days ago, and I feel the hon. member has no right today to appeal a decision made by the Speaker and accepted by the house a few days ago.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, we do not accept the ruling made three or four days ago, and in the light of what is happening today, we find that everybody is talking about everything and that is why, as standing orders permit such an appeal, we are appealing against the ruling, which you are in the process of making, and even if that ruling is to the effect that there can be no appeal.

[Text]

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, I submit that there is no matter for decision at this time except for you to rule that the hon. member has no point of order. There is no point of order at this time and therefore there can be no appeal.

Mr. Grégoire: Does Your Honour rule that I have no point of order?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I am stating to the hon. member for Lapointe that it is not for me to make a ruling on a matter which the house has already accepted. A few days ago the house accepted that the debate which is now taking place would consist of references to the main motion as well as to the amendment. That decision having been taken by the house I therefore declare the hon. member for Lapointe out of order, and I recognize the hon. member for Wellington South.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I appeal against Your Honour's ruling, namely that my objection is out of order.

[Text]

Mr. Hales: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your ruling. I would simply like—

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You stated that my objection was out of order. I appeal your ruling on that point, because I maintain that my request was in order, since the previous speaker has not talked about the question relevant to this debate. Therefore I appeal your decision.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I must point out to the hon. member for Lapointe again that he cannot appeal a ruling which has not been made. I have made no ruling at this particular time. All I have done is quote to him the decision of the house of a few days ago, and since I am making no new ruling therefore there is nothing for the hon. member to appeal.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, you have just ruled me out of order and I maintain that I am in order in asking you to restrain hon. members to the specific subject, and on that point I appeal your decision. I think you made a ruling a few moments ago and I appeal your decision.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your ruling, and I would like to say—

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There is an appeal against your ruling. I do not think another member is entitled to take the floor on the question we were dealing with previously, as long as that problem has not been dealt with by the house. That is why I ask for a vote on this.

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: On the point of order that the hon. member for Lapointe is raising, is it not a fact that the very point he is trying to raise has already been raised during the course of this same debate with respect to this very same amendment. Was a ruling not made some days ago—maybe some weeks ago—based on citation 201 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, that when an amendment has been moved the debate is not restricted to the amendment, but includes the motives of the amendment and of the main motion? If any appeal was to be made, that appeal should have been made three or four days, or two or three weeks ago, when that ruling was given. No appeal was made at that time, and it seems to me we are still operating under the ruling given by the Chair when this matter was raised some time ago.

Mr. Hales: If I may proceed, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Grégoire: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I feel the point brought up by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is very well taken. However, circumstances having changed, a member has the right to ask the Speaker for a new ruling.

Circumstances have changed in this way: first, the debate has been interrupted since that time; second, a new atmosphere prevails in this house. Although there is a standing order which says that you cannot make repetitions of the same subjects during the same debate, many repetitions have been made during this one.

Considering the change in the atmosphere, new attitude, the repetitions and interruptions, I rise again to ask for a ruling which would compel hon. members to restrict their remarks to the subject under consideration, that is the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition calling for a referendum.

Now, you have ruled that my point of order is ill-founded. Consequently, I appeal from your ruling and request that the matter be put to a vote. You cannot prevent us from asking for such a vote because, if you do, you will be denying us the right to express our opinion on that issue.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I must again point out to the hon. member that the soundest rules and regulations which this house can follow are the rules and regulations made by the house itself. Earlier in this debate it was decided by the house—

Mr. Grégoire: By the Chair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): —it was decided by the Chair, and accepted by the house, that the debate would include comments on the main motion as well as comments on the amendment. This was accepted by the house at the time. No objection was raised.

Mr. Grégoire: We raise objection now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I take the view that the objection now raised by the hon. member is out of order. I declare that the hon. member is out of order, and I recognize the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hales).

Mr. Grégoire: You have made a ruling now, Mr. Speaker, and I appeal the ruling you have just made.

Mr. Baldwin: There is no appeal.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, or the alleged point of order the hon. member for Lapointe is trying to raise, first of all citation 201 of Beauchesne, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has pointed out, is very clear. I think it was on the basis of this citation that the Speaker made a ruling a few days ago, and the house concurred in or agreed with the ruling that was made. This citation says, very simply, in the last part:

> In that case the debate that follows—

This is after an amendment has been moved:

> —is not restricted to the amendment, but includes the motives of the amendment and of the motion, both matters being under the consideration of the house as alternative propositions.

In addition to that, even confining one's remarks to the rule of relevancy in speaking to the amendment that has been moved, which asks that there be a referendum or a plebiscite to determine the question upon which the motion before us is based, surely the hon. member has the right to present arguments over the whole field of whether or not it is desirable to have a referendum on the flag issue. I have not heard the hon. member say anything that would not lead me to believe he was presenting an argument on the flag issue and that perhaps it ought to be referred to the Canadian people. Therefore the hon. member for Lapointe is not only out of order in trying to appeal a decision that was made several days ago by the Speaker of this house, but in addition to that he is out of order in questioning the relevancy of the remarks that have been made by the hon. member who had the floor.

Mr. Winkler: That is not unusual.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I want to deal directly with the appeal the hon. member for Lapointe has attempted to make. Having been properly instructed that there can be no appeal from a decision made by the Chair, a decision which the house has in fact accepted—because when there is no appeal the decision of the Chair becomes the decision of the house and has been acted upon by the house, and the speeches of hon. members since that time have ranged far and wide over the whole resolution and this has become an order of the house—the hon. member now attempts, as I understand it, by a subterfuge to do indirectly what he is prohibited from doing directly. There was an order of the Chair some time ago in this connection and, Your Honour having ruled that the hon. member is out of order in raising objection to that ruling, the hon. member now says Your Honour has created a peg upon which he can hang a further appeal.

My position, very simply, in this regard is that the hon. member is just attempting to do indirectly what he cannot do directly; he is attempting to obtain an opinion from the house by dividing the house on the main issue, because in effect it goes back to the root of the question as to whether or not the decision made by the Chair initially was the right decision. I submit that his last point of order, which Your Honour held was not a point of order, is no more appealable than is the original decision of the Chair given several days ago.

Mr. Rapp: And he has no right to speak.

Mr. Grégoire: Then, Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order regarding standing order 34, paragraph 2, which reads as follows, in French:

[Translation]

(2) Mr. Speaker or the chairman, after having called the attention of the house, or of the committee, to the conduct of a member who persists in irrelevance, or repetition, may direct him to discontinue his speech.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I maintain that the hon. member who had the floor keeps on repeating things that have already been said. Therefore I ask that you enjoin him to stop talking.

[Text]

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, if I may add my comments to this point of order; at page 107 of Beauchesne, with reference to standing order 34, it is said:

Any member addressing the house, if called to order either by Mr. Speaker or on a point raised by another member, shall sit down while the point is being stated, after which he may explain. Mr. Speaker may permit debate on the point of order before giving his decision, but such debate must be strictly relevant to the point of order taken.

I think that is the point the hon. member for Lapointe is raising at the moment; he is giving his specific argument on the point of order.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I believe the question raised by the hon. member for Lapointe is out of order for two reasons: First, if what he has proposed were followed, it would provide an inequity among members of the house, because a different rule would apply to those who have already spoken and those who have still to speak in this debate. The final remarks the hon. member made a few minutes ago amount to closure. I refer to the hon. member's words to the effect that a member should be instructed to take his seat and desist from debate.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, with regard to standing order 34, paragraph 2, to which the hon. member for Lapointe drew the attention of the house, I would say this. The hon. member speaks about irrelevance, which point has already been dealt with by the earlier ruling. With regard to the word "repetition", the experience I have had here indicates that this applies when a member is repeating himself. On that basis—

Mr. Grégoire: No, it is not that.

Mr. Churchill: —it would be repetition were he to repeat his own argument over and over again.

Mr. Grégoire: No.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

Mr. Churchill: Then a decision might be reached in that regard. I do not think the hon. member for Lapointe is on very sound grounds for his argument this afternoon, and I trust that the argument he puts forward will be rejected.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): The hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hales).

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, may we have your ruling on standing order 34?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I should point out again to the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) that the decision of the house given a few days ago was that the debate on the flag resolution would include comments on the main motion as well as any comments which may be made on the amendment itself. At that time a ruling was made by the Chair and the house concurred. At the moment the Chair is not making any ruling but is reciting the ruling made a few days ago at a time when there was no objection taken.

I take the view that there is no ruling being made now and therefore there is no ruling to appeal. If the hon. member for Lapointe disagrees with the ruling which was made a few days ago, that was the time he should have made his appeal; but I feel he is now out of order in appealing the decision which was made a number of days ago. I still feel the hon. member is out of order and I would suggest to him that perhaps this argument has gone far enough and that we might well recognize the hon. member for Wellington South.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, thank you for the clarification and I can assure you that my remarks will be kept within the bounds of the main motion and the amendment, as decided by the Chair and by this house a few days ago. I would simply like to say that the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) is the last one in this house who should start raising points about wandering beyond the resolution or the subject under debate, repetition and so on, because we all know whereof he stands in this connection.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

After the disagreeable remarks of the hon. member for I do not know what riding, I must say that his repetitions will get us nowhere, while mine may lead to something or to an understanding of certain problems which exist and which have not been understood so far.

[Text]

Mr. Hales: Well, Mr. Speaker, those remarks do not concern me because I am the member for Wellington South.

I should like to refer to an editorial in the Toronto Telegram, a paragraph which says this:

> On the eve of Dominion day our Prime Minister has shown signs that he will not press in parliament for the rejection of our national emblem—at least not before the summer recess.
> It is a wise decision.

That was written by an editor who had been speaking with the Prime Minister, I understand, on the way from a cabinet meeting on Tuesday morning, June 30. That same night shortly after 8 p.m. the Prime Minister rose in his place and said this, as reported at page 4907 of Hansard:

> In any event, when the matters I have mentioned are dealt with, we shall return to the flag resolutions and the debate on those resolutions would be continued until a decision is reached on them.

So, Mr. Speaker, in the interval between that Tuesday morning and that same evening the Prime Minister reverses his decision, to the point where editorial writers cannot keep up with his change of mind.

As I was saying before, the past year has been a year in which members of this house and the fortunate citizens of this country of Canada have wondered whether this country could find the unity to endure, or would it fall into separate parts only to be gobbled up by the great republic to the south? We have spent a year searching our national soul, and it is time to cement our ties with confederation. Amputation is not the answer; the several parts could certainly not survive. It is time to search for answers which will keep the family together, however quarrelsome—all families quarrel at some time or other. But instead of promoting national unity the Prime Minister continues to press the issue for a distinctive Canadian flag.

Mackenzie King in his wisdom knew better than to promote the idea of a distinctive Canadian flag. He did, however, proclaim the Canadian red ensign as the official flag to be flown from all federal buildings either within or without Canada. Our soldiers fought under it and died under it; and at the risk of it being said that I am repetitious I should like to refer to the words of the distinguished commander, General Crerar, of the first Canadian army when he returned to Ottawa at the close of the second world war and was graciously honoured by then prime minister Mackenzie King. When riding with Mackenzie King on the western driveway from the main entrance of these buildings, the following is reported to have occurred: "Pointing to the red ensign on the flagpole of this building Mackenzie King turned to him and said: 'And that, general, is another problem which your Canadian army has solved for Canada—the matter of our national flag' ".

Generally speaking, Canadians have appeared to be very happy to go along with the Canadian red ensign. But no, the Prime Minister, for political expediency and to fulfil a political promise, has pressed the issue of a national flag. I ask, Mr. Speaker, who is it who has pressed for this new flag? The people in my riding seem to be quite content with the red ensign, and I should like to put on record a few quotations which would substantiate just what I have said. The members of the council of the county of Wellington passed a resolution. I have received a letter which reads as follows:

> At their recent session, the council of the corporation of the county of Wellington passed a resolution recommending the adoption of the Canadian red ensign as the national flag of the Dominion of Canada.

This resolution was circulated to all the county councils in Ontario and I am told that over 50 per cent of them endorsed the resolution and showed their approval.

I think it might be worth while putting on record one or two observations made by constituents of mine, residents of the city of Guelph. An inquiring reporter of the Guelph Mercury took a tour of the main streets of the city and asked several people what they thought of the new flag, its design and its colours, and I should like to read a few of the replies. I will not mention the constituents by name although their names are given in this report. The first one said:

> "War ravished countries would put something like this out when they are trying to save paint"... She felt the new flag was very conservative and that because the English element is our strongpoint, the British flag should be kept flying.

Another said:

> "If Canada should have a new flag...it should at least have a definite Canadian identification and not maple leaves. Maple trees grow, among other places, both in Missouri and Yugoslavia. Moreover, why should the leaves be red? And they are of poor design".

A local medical doctor replied that he definitely did not like the new flag. The report continues:

He said from a heraldic angle it is incorrect. The blue bars should be horizontal and not vertical. He said that the unity that Canadians look for will not be achieved by producing a flag of this type.

"Ethnic groups coming to Canada were happy to accept Canada as they found her. There was no arrangement whereby they understood the flag would be changed. This act of expediency will not, in my opinion, lead to greater unity. If, at a later date, Quebec becomes independent, Canada will have gained nothing from this act, but will be left with a flag depicting three wilting maple leaves and a white surrender background."

As a Canadian citizen he acknowledged the need for a new flag but thought the decision had materialized too rapidly to take into consideration the feelings of the people.

I could read many more, but I think that will be enough. They are opinions from an average city in the province of Ontario where one third of the population of Canada resides. The Prime Minister claims he has pressed the issue of a new flag at this time in order to promote national unity. To me this seems nothing more than a big joke. He has succeeded only in creating disunity.

Here is another clipping. It is taken from the Guelph Mercury of June 8 and the heading reads: "Get Yer Program Here!" This is how it reads:

The great flag flap at a glance:

a. Press says P.M. has decided on flag with three red maple leaves on white, with blue bars at either side.

b. Government hasn't decided on any design: P.M.

a. There'll be a free vote, with party wraps off: P.M.

b. If "free" vote is against design, government will quit: P.M.

a. Flag to have three red maple leaves on white, with blue bands, P.M. announces.

b. Will also keep union jack.

a. Government to stand or fall on flag vote.

b. Government doesn't want election; P.C. filibuster could bring it on.

a. The flag debate has priority.

b. Other business comes first.

That describes the type of muddle in which we find ourselves at the present time. I cannot help accusing this government and the Prime Minister of partisan propaganda of the worst sort. He is attempting to use his power and the prestige of his office as Prime Minister to supplant an authorized national flag with a design which has neither the full support of his own party nor of the House of Commons and the people of Canada as a whole. By his arbitrary action, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the Prime Minister of this country is setting faction against faction, party against party and, I am fearful, region against region. This is the unhappy state to which the Prime Minister has reduced us and the people of Canada.

There has never been a prime minister since confederation who has caused so much strife, bitterness, disunity and confusion. I for one, and I am sure every member of this house must share this view and resent the Prime Minister's tactics in holding a club over the heads of members by saying: "No holiday or recess until you have passed my flag resolution; accept my new flag design or there will be an election". The right hon. gentleman must know that the people of Canada do not want an election at this time after two elections in a little more than three years. No one wants an election at this particular time. But this is the situation which confronts us. In these circumstances he proceeds to ram this new flag down the throats of Canadians. I should like to read in this connection an article which appeared in the Guelph Mercury. It says, referring to the Prime Minister:

He seems bent on bulldozing a new flag through the Commons in a frame of truculence worthy of C.D. Howe during the pipe line debate in 1956. Mr. Diefenbaker is not just playing politics when he warns that the flag question may add to national disunity rather than exert the unifying force Mr. Pearson told the Canadian Legion it would bring.

This is the way in which this once great diplomat and statesman has handled such a delicate question. Is this the way democracy should function? The dictatorial manner of handling this flag issue will long be remembered by the people of Canada. The Liberal government muzzled this parliament at the time of the pipe line debate but I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Canada are not going to be muzzled on this flag issue. The Prime Minister even took it into his own hands to fly his flag out on the front lawn on parliament hill. Four weeks ago, to the day, I rose in my place to propose a course of action under standing order No. 26. To adjourn this house so as to consider a matter of urgent national importance—not to debate the flag issue, because that was to be debated the following Monday, but to debate a question of principle, namely whether the No. 1 Canadian citizen, the Prime Minister of this country, should ignore, circumvent and sidestep a piece of legislation, a law, an order in council which was passed on September 5, 1945 and which definitely states that no flag should be flown from government property or on occasions or places until such time as the house should approve a new flag.

What did the Prime Minister do? Not only did he fly the flag between five o'clock and eight o'clock but at the request of some hon. members on my left he flew it from one o'clock to two o'clock in order that they might see it before catching the four o'clock train home. Why did the Prime Minister take the unprecedented action of flying his design in this way on parliament hill before the flag design had received approval from this house or from the Senate, let alone from the people of Canada? In my view his action in this regard was both arrogant and unlawful.

What about the clever manoeuver of printing a postage stamp with a replica of the new flag design on it weeks before that flag was introduced into this house? It was a clever manoeuver on the part of the government; a means by which this emblem was circulated throughout Canada. They flew a kite, and what a kite it was. What about the press party at 24 Sussex street where flag designs were shown to those present before they were shown to members of this house? Is this the way to select a flag to present to the people of Canada? I should like to read in this connection from the Toronto Star of May 20:

> As the drinks were served and the newspapermen nibbled on sandwiches, Mr. Pearson brought out several flag designs on cardboards, selected one with a cluster of three maple leaves and two blue bands and placed it on the mantelpiece as his choice. He said he was prepared to have the government stand or fall on the maple leaf flag. The Prime Minister was careful however to make clear that the flag on the mantel was his personal choice.

Is this the way to introduce a new flag into Canada? We are being asked to vote for the Pearson flag, a Liberal flag, a political design? Yes, political, because it was used in the last two by-elections as part of the Liberal propaganda. This is no way to introduce a new flag. How much more sensible and more democratic it would have been to have set up a non-partisan committee of this house charged with the responsibility of submitting to parliament a design for a new national flag, not one introduced by a political party but one chosen by parliament.

What do we have? We have a flag which appears to have been proposed by the government in the same light hearted manner as the original Canadian pension plan was conceived, in the absence of careful thought or the expert advice which is available to any government. Yes, if ever a serious matter was badly handled, this is it. It is thrust upon us. We are being put under pressure. We are told to accept it or else. We are pushed back into the corner with our hands tied behind our backs and unable to fight. I ask hon. members, is this the fair and democratic way? We are being railroaded into acceptance solely for the purpose of political aggrandizement.

What is the best way out of this Pearson muddle? That is the question we have to ask ourselves. What is the best way out of this muddle? I wish the Prime Minister were in his seat so that I could speak to him as person to person. I beg him, in the name of all that is good, for the sake of unity and to save this country from being split right down the middle, to withdraw this resolution and let the house proceed with important legislation. If he does not wish to do this, then I ask him and his supporters to follow the suggestion outlined in the amendment to the motion. I do not think it would do any harm to read the amendment once again. It is in these words:

> As the proposal to change Canada's national flag will affect the unity and destiny of Canada now and for years to come, the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to conduct a plebiscite prior to any other action being taken by the House of Commons, in order that all Canadians may be given their rightful opportunity to declare their choice concerning a national flag.

That is the amendment before the house. I realize that there are arguments for and against holding a plebiscite. The other day the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) gave some excellent reasons in favour of a plebiscite. He has done a lot of research on this matter and he presented good reasons why a plebiscite should be held in the case of an emotional issue of this nature. Plebiscites are often held at the municipal level in many communities when emotional issues are involved. The people of these communities appreciate the right to express their opinions through a plebiscite. I am quite sure they do not claim that the elected members of these municipal councils are derelict in their duty when they decide to hold a plebiscite. There are many examples of plebiscites on the municipal level.

I realize that as elected members of the house we are expected to vote not only as members for the ridings we represent but as members representing the whole of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hales: We all seem to be in agreement on this. The point is that we are here to vote as representatives of our own ridings and also as representatives of the whole of Canada. So far as the issue of a new flag is concerned and the viewpoint of my riding, I am prepared to vote against the new flag and support the Canadian red ensign. My decision was reached by consultation with many constituents. Out of every 100 letters I have received, 90 were in favour of retaining the red ensign and 10 in favour of a new flag but not necessarily the flag submitted by the government. The newspaper poll in my riding showed 66 per cent in favour of the Canadian red ensign. My other reasons, of course, involve my own personal choice or decision on the matter.

I think it should be of interest to the house to realize what the outcome was of a poll taken by 29 newspapers across Canada. Only two newspapers recorded a majority in support of a new distinctive flag. As of June 5 last these were the results. On the prairies 6 newspapers took part, gathering 9,968 votes, with 65 per cent supporting the red ensign. In Ontario and Quebec 14 newspapers participated, with a total of 53,424 votes recorded, 52 per cent being in favour of the red ensign. In the maritimes 5 newspapers took part with 1,466 votes being cast and 69.09 per cent being in favour of the red ensign. That was the picture across Canada on June 5.

Yesterday the hon. member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett) spoke in this debate and she brought up the question of voting according to the wishes of the constituency she represents. She gave us the impression that she had spoken to a good many people in her riding and that the maple leaf flag appeared to be the choice there. I did not believe that could be the case in that riding. I thought it rather strange and I made it my business to find out from the riding.

The Cobourg Sentinel-Star, the largest newspaper in Northumberland county, conducted a poll of its readers and published the results on May 27. The poll showed 24 in favour of the Canadian red ensign, 6 opposed to the red ensign and 5 undecided. In the opinion of Mr. Foster Russell, the publisher and editor of this journal, public opinion in Northumberland county is 65 to 70 per cent in favour of the red ensign. Yet the hon. lady said she felt the people there were in favour of the maple leaf flag. I think this is one of the greatest arguments there can be that a referendum or plebiscite should be held in view of such a divergence of opinion. I was surprised when she said in her speech yesterday, as found on page 4949 of Hansard:

> —I think we, as members of parliament, should look at this whole question regardless of our personal feelings in the matter, regardless even of what we think the majority of our constituents want.

I cannot imagine a member of parliament rising in his place and not voting the way the majority of his constituents want him to vote. I could perhaps understand the point if the design had been submitted by a committee but I think a different light is thrown on the matter altogether when the design has been approved and submitted by a political party. However, I give the hon. lady credit for rising in her place and speaking in this debate. I should like to hear from other members across the way. Could we not hear from the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Honey), the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Brown), the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. Greene)? I see he is with us today. I know he has many other irons in the fire these days but maybe he will find the time to speak in the flag debate. What about the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Francis)? I see him in his place. We are both members of the public accounts committee and are good friends, I should like to hear him speak in the flag debate. Then there is the member for my neighbouring riding of Wentworth and my other neighbour, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Harley). What about the hon. member for Hastings South (Mr. Temple)? I should like these gentlemen to rise and speak in this debate.

Have we heard from any of the front bench members on the other side? Have any of the cabinet ministers spoken in this debate? Why have they not risen in their places and given us their views? They should tell us now why they want this resolution and why they are supporting it. Let them rise in their places. I should like the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer), the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Laing) and the Postmaster General (Mr. Nicholson) to rise and tell us their views. We should like to hear from them.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that there are rumours going around Canada, rumours that do not do any good whatever. They are rumours that should be hushed. We hear rumours to the effect the flag is being pushed as a result of pressure from Quebec. These are things we hear. Is it to win votes in Quebec? We want to get answers to these questions. This loose talk is very harmful to Canada. It would be much better if these men would rise in their places now and set these rumours at rest.

However, I give the hon. lady full credit for rising in her place and speaking on this subject. I am at a loss to know why she would not be in favour of a plebiscite in view of the great conflict of opinion in her own riding. I dare say if some of these other members spoke and voted according to the opinion of their constituents they would have to vote, not with their party but with us.

Mr. Roxburgh: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Hales: Yes.

Mr. Roxburgh: What about the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), and some of these people?

Mr. Hales: They will have their turn, and no doubt they will take their turn. I think the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Roxburgh) might express his views as well. We agree on some things, but there are times when I do not agree with him. I do not agree with the great paradox we find when he is urging people to grow tobacco and his minister is spending money telling people not to use it.

I must proceed or my time will be exhausted. Mr. Abbott—and this might be repetitious—when he spoke in this house on the matter of holding a plebiscite on conscription in 1942, a very honourable member of the Liberal party, had this to say:

> It seems to me no useful purpose is going to be served by an interminable debate in this house or outside it as to the desirability or otherwise of this plebiscite. We are going to have it—

He talks like a real Liberal.

> —and in spite of what some people may say it is a thoroughly democratic procedure. I spoke a moment ago about responsibility and I suggest that the people of the country as a whole now have an opportunity to assume their responsiblity, to turn out and vote and show each other and the rest of the world, if you will, that democracy can be made to work even in wartime.

They took a plebiscite in wartime, so surely we can take time in peacetime to let the people speak. There is no excuse in that regard. We cannot ignore the many minority groups that have such strong views on this new flag for Canada. What right has a minority government, and I remind you a minority government is what you are, to railroad this flag through this house, ignoring the rights of those who feel very deeply on this matter? If this flag is pushed through now without hearing from them the rift will grow greater and greater.

It would be very simple and inexpensive to hold a plebiscite. It could be held at the time of the next federal election at little expense. You would simply walk in to vote, be given a ballot with the names of the candidates on it and you would be given another slip of paper with three or four flag designs in colour and you would simply mark an X opposite the one you preferred. I believe the method adopted in the province of Alberta, which is referred to as the transferable vote, could be adopted whereby you mark your choices first, second and third. There would be no problem in that regard. I know each Canadian would say, "I will be loyal to the flag which the majority of Canadians choose."

In conclusion, I review briefly what I have said. I suggest to the Prime Minister that if he is bound to bring in a new flag he should start over again with a clean sheet. He should set up a non-partisan committee to represent Canada and introduce a new design for parliamentary approval, not a government design. If he does not want to do that, he should withdraw the resolution that is before the house now. This is the last day of debate, at the moment. He should allow the members to reassess the whole issue during a summer recess. Let us go home to our constituencies; let us think about this very serious matter. Let it simmer a bit and then come back and decide where we go from there.

If these courses are not possible, then give the people of Canada an opportunity to express their views by means of a plebiscite. Surely out of these three suggestions the Prime Minister will find one that is acceptable, because he must understand the great damage that is being done to the country at this time. I hope he will choose the easiest course, and that is to pull this resolution off the order paper until next fall. Failing all this, surely a compromise is possible. A compromise can save this nation. A compromise is worth while. Let us do all we can to seek a compromise. I agree that the Canadian red ensign as it stands might not be entirely acceptable to everybody in Canada. I fully realize this. I think it is acceptable to the majority, but I may be wrong.

Surely the two great founding races of Canada can sit down and draft a flag design that will be acceptable to both. Each group will have to give up a little, this is certain. Each of these two great races is going to have to give and take a little in order to save this great nation. Surely a compromise can be reached in some way. In conclusion, I beg the Prime Minister and his government not to press the present design of a distinctive Canadian flag upon this house and the people of Canada.

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): I should like to say a few words in support of the amendment which is before us and for the conducting of a referendum or plebiscite on this flag issue. At the outset, sir, I would like to say that unlike most of those who have spoken to date in favour of the referendum and in support of the red ensign, I personally am not of that number. I support the proposed maple leaf design. I hope to vote for that maple leaf flag design in a plebiscite in which other Canadians who oppose it may express their democratic right.

I am supporting this amendment and I intend to vote for it, if and when it comes to a vote. I hope that will be soon so that we can get on with the plebiscite and have this decision made. I should like to commend the Prime Minister of this country upon the introduction of this maple leaf flag design. I think he has done well. However, I do not agree with his methods in trying to establish it as the flag of Canada.

I do not think that he or his government, or this parliament, has any mandate from the people of Canada to change the flag. So far as I know the nation is still uncommitted on that very important question. Therefore I feel that the amendment calling for a poll of the people on the flag is the very essence of democracy, and I support it.

I do not intend to spend much time in advancing my arguments in favour of the maple leaf design. I will simply say that I think Canada should have a flag which, when flown abroad, is distinguishable from all other countries' flags and which, when flown at home, will be an emblem which in time will function towards unifying the national community so that we can make Canada take a larger and better place in world affairs.

I should like to say a few words specifically in relation to the proposal for a plebiscite. In that regard I propose to discuss some of the arguments which have been advanced thus far against holding a plebiscite. One of these arguments is that it is not in the Canadian or British tradition for us to take a plebiscite or referendum on such a question. Well, Mr. Speaker, there are a number of things in this country which were traditional in the past and which we have changed. There was the tradition held until not so many years ago that women should not have a vote. This is one tradition we got away from and it is good that we broke with it.

I do not put any particular weight on tradition for tradition's sake. A tradition should be studied to see what merit it has. If it is a good tradition, if it is realistic in the light of modern circumstances, then I believe we should retain it. If it is not then, like the traditions we have changed in the past, we should modify or do away with it. Therefore, I do not put any great faith or force in the argument of those opposed to having a plebiscite on the flag on the basis that it is not a British or Canadian tradition.

Another argument against the holding of a referendum on the flag is advanced, namely that it would serve to create acrimony from one end of the country to the other. No doubt there are strong feelings in the country, as there are in this house, on the matter of the flag. There are bound to be, but I personally have more faith in the Canadian people and in their common sense than to go along with those who argue that we cannot afford to put this matter up to the people. I think we can well afford to do that, and in the long run there will be no hard feelings such as will be created if we 265 members in this house take it upon ourselves to decide the opinions of 19 million people.

I think we should go ahead and let the people of Canada have a poll on this very basic general question of the flag, which is not a matter of business, or economics, or anything we can put down in black and white and argue in a mathematical fashion. Whatever kind of flag we favour, we should agree that a flag is a matter of spiritual emotion to all of us, that it is something on which everybody in Canada has the right to express his or her opinion, and I hope they are given that privilege.

It is said, Mr. Speaker, that the holding of a plebiscite is something that is very rarely done, that it is a difficult matter, and that it has many troublesome factors involved in it. More particularly it is said it is not usually done in British commonwealth countries. In this connection I would like to quote from the "Encyclopedia of Parliament", by Wilding, at page 486, in regard to referendums:

> The machinery of the referendum has been used in a number of commonwealth countries—but not in the United Kingdom—to obtain for the government a direct decision from the electorate on a specific subject involving legislation, and parliamentary voters are entitled to express their opinion by voting for or against the government's proposition. The referendum has been used in Canada and New Zealand on the question of prohibition, and in Australia to introduce amendments to the constitution. A referendum was also held in Southern Rhodesia in 1953 which decided that the colony would form a federation with Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

From that we can see it is not an unusual thing in British commonwealth procedure to take a matter such as a flag or other major problem to the people and let them decide it themselves.

The idea of the plebiscite or referendum, or polling of the people, comes down to us from very ancient times. There is an old, old saying that goes something like this, "On minor matters the few decide; on great affairs the many." I think we should keep that in mind, that over many centuries many great problems, such as a flag issue, have been settled by putting the question directly to the people directly affected.

There is nothing difficult or particularly onerous about holding a plebiscite. I have in mind the instructions for the holding of a referendum prepared by the returning referendum official in 1942, explaining in detail how a plebiscite should be conducted, where, and who should be employed. It has been done, and can be done again.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote very briefly from a British statesman of some note, the late Sir Austen Chamberlain, giving his opinion on the virtues of referendums and plebiscites. He said:

I have often wondered that we have never adopted the principle of the referendum as practised in Switzerland, and also in many parts of the United States of America. It is the only way in which the decision of great national questions can be separated from all the complicated issues of party government. At a general election the voter is influenced partly by his desire to see his own party in office, and partly by his views on a number of special questions, many of them purely local or even personal.

If, in the case of a new policy, not necessarily political, it were possible to eliminate all side issues, we might have a national verdict which all sections would accept, and which would be given without reference to the perennial struggle between the "Outs" and the "Ins" which is at present the chief occupation of political life.

I think those words are very appropriate at this time and I am very happy to have the opportunity of putting them on record in support of my arguments favouring the holding of a national referendum.

In conclusion, I hope this amendment will pass and that a plebiscite will be taken. If this is not done, then I may say I, and some other members, are conducting plebiscites in our constituencies by mailing ballots to our constituents asking whether they favour the red ensign or the maple leaf. I have received some three to four thousand replies, and much to my regret the people voting to date are showing a preference for the red ensign on a ratio of about three to two.

My views on this amendment are not those of the majority of my party, but I hasten to add that we in the New Democratic party shall have a free vote in the house on this flag issue. I would like to see that free vote extended to all members in the house and to all people in Canada.

Mr. M. L. Klein (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, much has been said in this house in connection with this debate and there is not too much I would want to add, except to add to some of the statements that were made by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz).

I too represent a constituency that is comprised of representatives of almost every ethnic group in this country. They are vitally interested in the issues which we choose to term the flag debate. The ethnic groups favour a distinctive Canadian flag with symbols, or a symbol which will bring national unity to Canada; because they have lived through the ravages of nationalism. The ethnic groups that came to Canada ran away from nationalism, and they are saying that Canada needs a nationality and not sectional nationalisms. In short, they hope that the founding races will find themselves.

The present resolution has been termed, perhaps, "Pearson's pennant" and it has been stated—as has just been stated by the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hales)—that Pearson is trying to ram his flag down the throat of parliament and the Canadian people. The hon. member says that we have no right to do this, because we are a minority government. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that a minority government cannot railroad anything, because a minority government requires the support of members on the other side of this house in order to pass a resolution of this kind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Klein: And I have no doubt that even members of the same party as the hon. member for Wellington South will be voting in favour of this resolution.

Mr. Lambert: You haven't got a mandate.

Mr. Klein: If we were to give this resolution a subtitle, in my view we would not call it "Pearson's pennant" but rather "Pearson's penchant for peace".

Mr. Lambert: Come out our way.

Mr. Klein: The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) stated that the ethnic groups respect the red ensign—and this is true. I must say that I was impressed by the colourful display we had on parliament hill with the red ensign. But we must in my view face the facts of life; and the facts of life are these, that in addition to the ethnic groups there are thousands of people in this country, perhaps millions, to whom the symbols of the red ensign represent defeat and humiliation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Klein: I am not saying they are right, and I am not saying they are wrong; I am not taking issue with them. But the fact remains that there are thousands, or millions, of people in this country who consider that the symbols of the red ensign represent to them defeat, humiliation and domination.

Mr. Lambert: What does Mr. St. Laurent say in that regard?

Mr. Klein: If they say that the symbols of the red ensign have certain connotations at one end of this country, and other connotations at other ends of the country; that in other sections of Canada the connotations are victory and domination—

Mr. Lambert: No.

Mr. Klein: These are the facts of life. Some members have said that this resolution is appeasement to Quebec. May I point out one thing in this connection, namely that no member from Quebec, nor any editorial in any newspaper in Quebec, has set forth that it would like included in the new distinctive flag the fleur-de-lis or any other symbol of French Canada. French Canada wants a distinctive Canadian flag in order to be able to rally around some common denominator with the rest of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lambert: Have you ever heard of maple leaves out west?

Mr. Macdonald: We have a few silly asses around the west.

Mr. Klein: I believe that we not only need a distinctive Canadian flag but we have to revise our history books in this country and we have to stop fighting the battle of the plains of Abraham. Every successive generation keeps on fighting the battle of the plains of Abraham, and this is contributing to disunity in this country.

Mr. Alkenbrack: You are fighting it right now.

Mr. Klein: The history books should be factual, relating to what happened; but they should not dramatize and embellish the glories of a military commander. Mr. Speaker, I want to say just one more thing. The one issue upon which the entire house agreed—at least, in the time that I have been here—was the address to the Queen requesting the amendment to provide for survivors and disability benefits. In other words, every section of the house declared that it is a humiliating experience to have to go to another country in order to amend Canada's own constitution. If it is a humiliating experience—and this was agreed upon—to have to go to another country to amend our own constitution, is this not the greatest point in favour of having a distinctive Canadian flag? If the parliament of Great Britain to whom the amendment is addressed—I know that in practice they never refuse such amendments, but in theory they could refuse this amendment—refused this amendment there would be resentment throughout the length and breadth of this country. So, Mr. Speaker, I say in conclusion—

Mr. Alkenbrack: So you are still fighting that battle.

Mr. Klein: —let us stop talking in this country only about the things we are ready to die for. Let us talk about the things we are ready to live for in a great and united Canada.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, we have before us today a very divisive issue in this resolution on the flag. It is a two-pronged resolution. It was intended as a one-vote resolution; but following the skills of those of other days in calling sinners to repentance, the resolution was split. Le Devoir carried an editorial on May 28 in which they accused the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) of running with the hares and hunting with the hounds; or, in principle, of dividing Canada. You must ask yourself what madness prompted the Prime Minister to sponsor his own flag, revealed to others before it was even revealed to parliament, and then in the most dictatorial manner he held our noses and poured the castor oil into our mouths without our having even the opportunity of freedom of choice. The Globe and Mail of June 16 had this to say about this mess:

A bitter wrangle between the defenders of the red ensign and the crusaders for a new maple leaf flag has raged across English speaking Canada and shows no sign of abating. In French speaking Canada there is dissatisfaction verging on disgust at Mr. Pearson's attempt to compromise by retaining the union jack as a flag to be flown on royal and commonwealth occasions. Whatever the outcome of these disputes now, it seems inevitable that large sections of the population will be left aggrieved and rebellious.

This is the unhappy state to which Mr. Pearson has reduced us, and it would be very natural if the opposition parties in the House of Commons sought to drive the lesson home as they debate the flag issue this week. They have every reason to be resentful of Mr. Pearson's tactics in threatening them with an election unless they accept the design he has chosen, and plenty of ammunition with which to discredit him.

This is the Prime Minister who a few years ago was a diplomat of some stature. He has made the flag issue a personal issue, regardless of all other pressing social and economic ills of this nation and regardless of other election promises which were far more important. Yet he presses the flag issue, even though it was not an election promise.

The Prime Minister stated on May 15 in this house that there were 38 pieces of legislation which must be passed before a summer recess. There was no mention of the flag whatever. What changed his mind, Mr. Speaker? He stirred up a lot of strife and emotion in parliament, but that does not matter much because we are paid to take it. But what about the emotions he has stirred up from the Atlantic to the Pacific across the land? If you do not think this is so, Mr. Speaker, just look at the editorials. Canada cannot afford this. I wonder whether the Prime Minister has become emotional on his own resolution when he says that this flag goes through without a free vote or we have an election. I wonder whether this is subtle closure, Mr. Speaker. He wants to bring in this flag with little or no regard for history or tradition.

I should like to put on record what the Midland Free Press has to say about this. This is a semi-weekly publication and has won many awards for its editorial page. In an editorial it says:

It is argued that the favourite among the new designs—the three red maple leaves on a white background and two blue bars at the hoist and the fly—will promote unity in a divided land.

We seriously question this contention and we believe a description of the symbolism of the red ensign and of the presently favoured design will illustrate the point.

The proposed new flag does not have much to offer in this regard. Its heraldic significance is shallow. The two blue bars represent the seas on our eastern and western coasts. The significance of the white background in the centre escapes us. The three red maple leaves are emblematic of a tree that grows in Canada, but they also are found in other lands as well.

Now let's look at the elements embodied in the Canadian red ensign.

In the upper left hand quadrant is a union of the crosses of St. George, St. Andrew and St. Patrick—patron saints respectively of England, Ireland and Scotland, it is true. The three ancient saints, however, were not nationals of the lands of the British Isles. They were chosen because of their great deeds and high ideals. St. George was a Macedonian, the patron saint of chivalry. St. Andrew, a Jew, was one of Christ's apostles who was martyred for his faith. St. Patrick was a missionary who spread among the Irish the civilization learned in France.

The peoples of Britain consist of a melting pot of Britons, Angles, Saxons, Picts, Scots, Romans and French. This part of our flag then links us with our ancient forefathers in the islands and mainlands of Europe.

Later on I shall make some reference to what a previous prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, said on this very point. The editorial continues:

It is said that a flag should be emblematic of its people. The shield from our coat of arms, contained in the fly of the ensign, would seem to do a pretty fair job in this regard. Emblazoned in the five parts of the shield are the three lions of England derived from the standard of William of Normandy; the lion rampant of Scotland; the harp of Ireland; the fleur-de-lis of France; and the three red maple leaves.

Both symbols—the union of crosses in the upper quadrant and the great shield—were not originally chosen for nationalistic reasons. They were selected because they symbolized "unity by agreement and the abandonment of narrow nationalism in favour of the brotherhood of man. The red background denotes a position of honour.

As a spokesman said, "The ensign is a flag with great depth of meaning capable of representing our complex idealism, our varied traditions and cultures, things a new design could not possibly match".

We agree. And if we exchange the ensign for a proposed new flag of much lesser consequence, it seems to us we will be swapping our birthright for a mess of pottage.

Do we really want, Mr. Speaker, to get rid of those symbols?

The Packet and Times for Monday, June 8 last, offers some sage advice; it is a paper whose editorials have been quoted all across Canada.

In his proposed design for a new Canadian flag, Mr. Pearson is attempting to avoid any conflict between English speaking and French speaking sections of the country, by omitting any British or French symbol whatever. In doing so, of course, he has produced a flag which represents nothing whatever, and so has robbed the flag of the very function for which it is intended. For surely a flag has no meaning or value whatsoever, unless it be to represent heraldically the spirit of a nation, and so be an inspiration and source of pride to its citizens. A flag selected only because of its bland austerity and freedom from anything calculated to stir strong feeling, can hardly be valued for its inspirational qualities.

The whole issue of Canada's flag has blown up into ridiculous proportions, and has split still further a country already in need of all the unifying elements it can find. There is a dismaying tendency to value the symbol at the expense of the reality; it is Canada that is truly important, not the design of the flag it chooses to fly. In the bitter bickering over that design, some sense of proportion must be maintained. It is utter folly to speak, as some have done, of breaking up confederation if this or that design is not chosen.

Yet once the relative importance of the issue has been established, it is quite right that something should be said about the value of retaining in the national flag the symbols of this country's origins. The two great facts of our national existence are, first, our British heritage, which gave us our language, our laws, our form of government and indeed, all the principles and values which guide our way of life; and second, the empire of new France which was joined with British North America in full and equal partnership. Surely any flag purporting to represent this country must reflect this dual origin of all the institutions and outlooks which are uniquely Canadian, and which impart a distinctly Canadian character to people and nation. It is the measure of the total inadequacy of Mr. Pearson's proposed flag that its symbolism reflects not a trace of this rich and unique national heritage.

The objection to the existing Canadian flag, based on the red ensign, is that it does not sufficiently indicate the French partnership in this great nation. Surely this is capable of easy remedy, perhaps by the replacement of the existing Canadian coat of arms in the fly by large fleur-de-lis, singly or in a group, to share pride of place with the union jack on the traditional red background. Something of the kind could certainly be evolved which would be both heraldically correct and visually attractive, as well as truly indicative of this country's national origins.

A real Canadian ensign, so evolved, would perpetuate both a traditional design under which this country has grown and prospered and under which its troops have fought in two world wars, and reflect the long history of a unique racial partnership. Such origins are to be perpetuated proudly, not buried in the bland anonymity of a piece of white bunting. A flag is intended to stir emotion, not dampen it. Only an amended red ensign can truly reflect this nation's pride in its past and its aspirations for the future.

This sets out some compelling reasons why symbols of the past should be retained. I intend now to quote one of the great prime ministers of this land, a man who was in power longer than any other prime minister in the British commonwealth, Mr. Mackenzie King. This is what he said:

The new Canadian flag should certainly contain the union jack. It would be unthinkable to have a flag for this dominion which did not contain the union jack.

This was said by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King in a statement to the Canadian Legion in 1945. I also wish to quote what was said by prime minister Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent in the House of Commons in 1949. He said this:

The union jack is a symbol which represents much that is best in the heritage of all those who derive their tradition and their culture from western Europe.

I wish to say that part of my family ties are with western Europe. The quotation goes on:

The crosses that are part of the union jack represent much of what we in Canada, from whatever race we spring, all honour as precious and good in our heritage...I do not believe that any of us in this country regard the union jack as being a symbol of conquest or subjugation. It is under the union jack that the institutions of this Canadian nation have grown and developed and have brought us to the point where now the dominion is and has been an autonomous state subject in no phase of its domestic or its external affairs to any authority other than this Canadian parliament.

I should like to comment on a reference which was made by one of the previous speakers to the British North America Act. Let me say that the British North America Act was drawn up by Canadians, not by English people. It was drawn up at Charlottetown and in Quebec.

I have talked to several Canadians of French origin from Quebec and they have told me the flag is a waning issue for them. It is not very important any more. They said: We have our own flag, the fleur-de-lis; we could not care less about the flag; what is important is control over our own economy and we shall not brook any more interference from Ottawa on this point. This is what I gather after talking to important French speaking Canadians in the city of Montreal. This would imply that the question of the flag is not the big issue in Quebec we have been led to believe it is. Certainly, in my riding, of those who have written to me—and I have received more than 500 letters—over 90 per cent were in favour of the red ensign and the rest were divided in their opinions.

I believe a perusal of history would indicate a desire to retain symbols of the past in any new flag we might choose. When I see the three lions on the flag, I immediately think of William the Conqueror coming from Normandy, and I believe 90 per cent of all the people who come to this land, to the province of Quebec, are of Norman stock. That is their proud heritage. It was William the Conqueror who came to the throne of England after defeating Harold at the battle of Hastings. Let me remind the house that the parliament of England and the ruling class of that country used the French language for 300 years. The first income tax bill was written by William the Conqueror. The first census was taken by William the Conqueror, and I am proud that a man coming from Europe did that. It showed administrative ability, and I am also proud of the fact that it was by one of this line of Norman kings that the first great charter, the cornerstone of British democracy, was written. I refer to Magna Carta commonly known as the great charter. We honour that and we respect it, no matter what our country of origin, because it is a cornerstone of parliamentary democracy. It was a Norman king who was forced to sign that charter. It was drawn up by the Norman barons at Runnymede and it became the father, or the mother, or whatever you like of the great bill of rights which gave this country freedom of choice, freedom of election, freedom of religion and freedom of assembly.

Over those 300 years of history the English language became a melting pot of the Norman and the English tongues and out of that evolved the English language which is spoken today by the strongest and greatest nation in the world, just south of us. I am proud of that, Mr. Speaker. I am proud of the part the Normans played and I am proud of the fact that a great part of the English people belong to that Norman stock. Surely those of us who are of that stock do not want to throw it out the window or sell it for a colourless piece of cloth which does not mean anything to us.

In the course of history a few hundred years later a great event took place on the plains of Abraham. I am always proud when I read about it because many of the soldiers who fought there were soldiers from this melting pot of English, Norman and Scotch. There were also Norman soldiers under Montcalm. I read those pages of history and I am proud to learn that Montcalm was a man who loved his homeland and who, in his letters to his wife and daughters, said he hoped he would soon be able to join them back home. He was a home loving man and he was a great soldier of high moral principles. I am also proud to know that Wolfe wrote home regularly to his mother and that the night before the battle of the plains of Abraham, as they floated down the St. Lawrence, he pulled a copy of Gray's Elegy from his pocket and read it. When he had read it, he said: Fellow officers, I would rather have written that than capture Quebec tomorrow. Both these two great generals were killed on the plains of Abraham and I want to say that out of their ashes, out of the things they gave to Canada, has arisen a mighty nation of which we are all proud. We are proud of the part each of them played; we are proud of them. We are proud of the pages they have given to history.

I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that poor indeed will be the lot in tradition of the young people of this country when those pages are removed from their history books. Do we really want to give up the symbols of the past? As I go through the pages of history and come to the American revolution I think of the French, and how they stood nobly by with their brothers. Yes, the English were Normans, do not forget it; they were a mixture of Normans, Picts, Scots, and so forth. They stood nobly by; they were the staunchest of people, saying: We do not want any part of the American republic; we want to maintain our loyalty to the crown that will protect our rights and that gave us the Quebec Act.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, these same people fought alongside us in the first great war. Who make these differences? Is it the politicians? I wonder. It is not the people, because they fought alongside us in the first great war. I think also of the present Governor General of this country who fought in that war and was seriously injured. I come to the next great war and I think of another French Canadian, the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod of the other place, who was severely wounded. We have fought for the same causes and the same principles over the years.

What is wrong, Mr. Speaker? Do we want to change the flag? Do we want to retain our symbols? My feeling is that this country has done a tremendous task and nothing should be done now to divide the country. When the Prime Minister takes it upon himself to shove down the throats of members of parliament a flag which he says represents all that is good in Canada but which leaves out all our past history, then I think we would be derelict in our duty if we did not fight to the last ditch to retain those principles that have made Canada the great nation it is, and a part of any new flag.

Is there any good reason for shoving the flag through at the expense of much more important legislation left in mothballs, legislation that this country is crying for and needs? Does the Prime Minister not realize that he in effect is using a subtle form of blackmail or closure through the threat of an election? Or is there a feeling of divine right? This view was more or less expressed the other day by the hon. member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett) when she said it did not matter much what your constituents thought, that you should vote regardless of their wishes. I am one of those who have always felt that the people of one's riding are those who decide how a member should vote, because they elect the member as their representative.

Why is the flag issue the supreme issue before the house? Will it change the economy of Canada one whit? Will it improve the lot of any Canadian home the day after it is adopted? Will it put one more dollar in the pockets of the taxpayers? Will it improve the security of even one Canadian? As one writer noted, the Prime Minister may imagine that he is bold and daring but his armour is completely that of foolhardiness. On May 15 last the Prime Minister outlined 38 pieces of government legislation which he said must be completed before a summer recess and, as I said, the flag issue was not among them. Why the haste? Is it to conceal something? Is it to get off the hook on more important issues? I suggest that the most important issue confronting Canada today is automation and employment. If we do not solve this problem hundreds of thousands of young Canadians will be walking the streets in a few years.

The Prime Minister knows he is in trouble because of his two flag stand. Most people do not want a two flag nation. Passions are being roused across the country. I am one of those who try to carry out the wishes of my constituents as far as possible. Therefore I think the people of Canada should be allowed to express their opinion.

I want to remind the Prime Minister that he is the head of a minority government. Only 42 per cent of the people of Canada supported his minority government. If the Prime Minister will not let the people of Canada decide this referendum, will he consider setting up a dominion-provincial conference, provide the delegates with the assistance of historians and heraldic experts, and let them do the job? Then we will have a flag picked democratically and, above all, we will have one flag instead of ten. We will have a flag representative of Canada, not of only two provinces.

[Mr. Rynard.]

The Prime Minister has a unique challenge today. I say to him: Take off this foolhardy armour; get rid of this bold and daring approach and go back to the approach of Sir John A. Macdonald, William Lyon Mackenzie King—St. Laurent, Cartier, Lafontaine, Baldwin and others. Let him cease to be a despot, a dictator with a minority government. Let him again restore democratic principles to this parliament and respect the wishes of the peoples who make up the mosaic that is Canada, who are proud of Canada, proud of our past, proud of our history and do not want to trade these symbols for a mess of potage.

Mr. Jack Davis (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to make it quite clear that I am going to vote for both parts of the resolution. I am going to vote for two flags. I am going to vote for a distinctive Canadian flag and I am going to vote for the union jack.

I do not make any apologies for the fact that I intend to vote for two flags. I think that with the passage of time Canadians will be indicating loyalty to a number of flags. Foremost among these flags, at least in the minds of those who are international in their outlook, will be the flag of the United Nations. They will be looking also to the flag which denotes our connection with the commonwealth family of nations, the union jack, which is found in the second part of the main resolution presented to the house several weeks ago. They will be looking to a distinctive national flag for Canada, the maple leaf flag, the flag that will be passed during the current session of parliament.

There will also be provincial flags across this country. There are several in existence at the moment. There is one in Newfoundland, the union jack. There is one in Quebec, which most of us have seen flying. It is composed of a white cross on a pale blue background with four white fleur de lis, one in each corner. There is a flag in one of our other rather nationalistic provinces, the province of British Columbia. The flag prominently displays the union jack. There is also a flag in Nova Scotia. In heraldic terms at least this flag dates back to the early 1600's. It is essentially the cross of St. Andrew with a lion rampant representing Scotland on the centre of the flag.

These four categories of flags at least will be regarded as important by Canadians. I repeat that those who are internationally minded will tend to look more to the flag of the United Nations and to the union jack.

Those who are more provincially minded will tend to look to our provincial flags, club emblems and so on. But there will be more than one flag prominently displayed across this nation.

A flag is used as a banner to rally people together, to rally forces, to focus the interest and attention of the populace at large. It is used to identify groups, provinces, nations and peoples. It is also used to celebrate historic events and highlight recent accomplishments. These are the various purposes of flags, banners and coats of arms of different kinds. But these are merely the symbols. Underlying them are the basic ideas, the basic concepts for which a flag or coat of arms stands.

These concepts, these ideas are what is really important. They are the essence of our modern democracy and of any substantial crusade to get things done. The union jack means a great deal to many people. It means a great deal to members, like me, who come from British Columbia. To me and to many other British Columbians it signifies courage, confidence; it indicates compassion and it also is a symbol of Christianity and Christian ideals. I am certain that we will continue to fly it, that is the union jack, because of the basic ideas which it symbolizes, because of the history and tradition in which those various ideas have been displayed.

Now, we need a national flag as a means of identification of Canadians, particularly Canadians abroad. It would be particularly useful at this moment if the Canadian forces on Cyprus had a distinctive Canadian flag because they could be identified, not as forces from the United Kingdom, not as forces from other commonwealth countries, but specifically from Canada. Canada is thought by many countries to be unbiased, lacking in territorial ambitions, and so on. For these reasons I think it is important that our forces have this distinguishing mark.

I should like briefly to make reference to the concept of nationhood, of nationality. In this connection I should like to quote from the first chapter of a book which has recently been published, entitled, "The New Nationality". The author is Frank H. Underhill, and he states in this book—and I think interestingly—

> A nation is a body of men who have done great things together in the past and who hope to do great things together in the future. What makes them into a nation is not necessarily community of race, language and religion, though these are powerful forces when they are present; it is their common history and traditions, their experience of living together, their having done great things together in the past, and their determination to continue doing great things together in the future.

Now, Canadians in their history have not seen many sharp and dramatic changes. Most of the changes which have taken place in our great country have been gradual. I should like briefly to run over and contrast them with the histories of other countries. Throughout history, many of the great nations of the world have been in conflict when they were born, and they grew to maturity beset by danger and tribulation. Out of these circumstances rose strong and fervent feelings of patriotism and nationalism, fanned by difficulty and nurtured by opposition.

Under such circumstances, a feeling of national identity came quickly to the fore. National heroes were made. They were men who fought or died or faced prison or exile for the new nation. Great landmarks in the form of battles won or lost were stamped on the national consciousness. To these people, the Bismarcks, the Cavours, the Simon Bolivars, the Gandhis, the de Valeras, and to these historic events, new citizens could look for inspiration and for a spirit of dedication.

A great example of this of course is in our neighbour to the south. Born in desperate revolution, nurtured in the crucible of the civil war, the United States quickly established its national heroes such as George Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton, Lee and others; its historic landmarks; its character and identity. Its first citizens gained their independence in blood and toil, and the facts of history were starkly etched for future generations to see.

We in Canada do not have the advantage, if one may call it an advantage, or such a violent and spectacular birth. We came to nationhood through negotiation and consent. We reached independence without forfeiting the connection with our ancient motherland. We achieved maturity without hostility and identity without violence.

All this has left its mark on our national character. Most Canadians tend to be moderate in their decisions, unexcitable in their attitudes, slow to anger and not prone to extreme positions. So it is in this matter of national symbols. I do not believe that as Canadians we should regret the fact that we have to spend a few weeks of parliament's time to arrive at a national flag, a national symbol, when by contrast we look at the wars, the revolutions, the extreme emergencies out of which other nations were born, and as a result of which they established their own symbols.

I should like briefly to run over the reasons for choosing the colours in the distinctive Canadian flag, the colours red, white and blue. There are many historical reasons for choosing this grouping of colours. The first white men to set foot on North America, historians now tell us, were the Vikings. Essentially a northern, or a Norman people, from whom both our French speaking and English speaking ethnic groups are largely derived, these adventurers set foot on North America around the year 1,000. Back in those days, a flag of the type that we now know did not exist. One of the identifying marks was the sail—the colours of the sails of the ships in those days. The colours of the sails of the Viking ships were red stripes on a white background. The red and white were established there. The black raven of these northern people also was displayed on some of these ships, but the colours predominantly were red and white.

Cabot touched Cape Breton about 500 years later, in 1493. The flag he flew was the cross of St. George, red and white. In 1524, some years later, Jacques Cartier first arrived in Canada. Jacques Cartier flew the flag of France. Down through two centuries after that, variations of the flag of France appeared and were flown in what is now eastern Canada. They were substantially the fleur-de-lis and various groupings of the fleur-de-lis on several backgrounds, red, white and blue. Again therefore the red, white and blue colours appeared in our background.

Henry Hudson flew the first union jack that was shown in Canada in Hudson bay in the year 1610, a few years after the first union jack was struck. The union jack then was a combination of the cross of St. George and the cross of St. Andrew, red, white and blue. The union jack was again established on Canadian territory in Nova Scotia in the early years prior to the battle of the plains of Abraham. The union jack was raised on the plains of Abraham in 1759. It included the cross of St. Patrick after 1800 and it was the official flag of Canada down to the early 1920's, although a variation of the red ensign was flown by our merchant marine and occasionally from buildings both inside and outside of Canada.

In 1921, Canada's official coat of arms was struck. It was the result of careful deliberation and a careful review of heraldry. This coat of arms was introduced and confirmed by a Conservative government. It bears the historic emblems of England, Ireland, Scotland and France in the top part of the shield. Incidentally, the top part of the shield denotes the historic background of the nation or an individual. If one hires an expert in heraldry to go into his family background, he will find the history of his family is on the top part of the shield and the individual himself, the present, is on the bottom part of the shield. On the bottom part of the shield as introduced, formalized and finally adopted by Canada in 1921 are three red maple leaves conjoined on a single stem on a white background.

This was the first time on which the three red maple leaves on a white background were officially proclaimed. This is now Canada's official coat of arms and has been for the past 40 and more years. There was a cabinet minute passed in 1957 which further clarified the red leaves on a white background. Many red ensigns flying today still show green leaves, but this is not true to the legislation of the early twenties and the cabinet minute of 1957.

In 1963, in order to clarify matters further, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) asked a question of the previous government. He asked, "What are Canada's national colours?" and the answer came back, red on white. He also asked, "What is Canada's national symbol?" and the answer came back, "Three red maple leaves on a white background." Therefore during the life of the previous administration this was recognized officially, first confirmed and then officially recognized in answer to questions posed by the opposition, that our national colours are red on white and the official emblem of Canada is three red maple leaves conjoined on a single stem on a white background.

I would like to refer briefly to the form of the flag, but before doing so I shall make a reference to Canada's colours at the Olympic games. They have always been red on white, red maple leaves on a white background. Similar colour combinations have been shown at our national exhibitions, beginning back in 1905 at Turin, Italy; so that we have a long history of red maple leaves on a white background as part of our Canadian tradition.

As to the matter of form, there are various requirements of a distinctive emblem. These are that it should be easily recognizeable, that it should not be like the emblem of any other country. It should be visible at a considerable distance, as well as close up to those who are looking for its designation. It should also be symbolic of the country and characteristic of the nation.

These requirements are not met by many flags; hence those flags are not truly distinctive. I should like to indicate some flags of this type, flags of the red ensign type, and this information I obtained from the parliamentary library. They appear on a card headed "Flags of the Commonwealth," and I should like to describe these flags. There is, of course, most prominently the union jack, and under it the flags of Canada, Australia, New Zealand and many other countries. The flag that is typical of the colonies resembles the flags of Australia and New Zealand. There is the union jack up in the canton, next to the pole, and the distinguishing mark is on the blue or red background. The blue background, or blue peter as it is sometimes called, is more common in the case of colonies, but there are variations.

On the chart in front of me I see 33 different territories or colonies whose unique badges appear in the fly, in the same fashion or manner as the now official Canadian coats of arms appears in the fly of the Canadian red ensign, and for the record I would like to read out what these are. Their flags resemble the red ensign of Canada, with the union jack up in the corner, and the shield or circle down in the opposite corner, and they include Aden colony, Antigua, Barbados, Bahamas, Bermuda, British Guiana, British Honduras, British Solomon Islands, British Virgin Islands, the Caymen islands, Dominica, The Falkland islands, the federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, Fiji, Gambia, Gibraltar, Gilbert and Elice Islands, Grenada, Hong Kong, Kenya, Mauritius, Montsarrat, North Borneo, Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland, St. Christopher-Nevis-Anguilla, St. Helena, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Sarawak, Seychelles, Southern Rhodesia, Turks and Caicos Islands. Those are flags of various colonies and other territories around the world which are of the ensign type.

I should also like to put on the record a quotation taken from "Flags of the World", edited by Gresham Carr and published in London in 1956, and the remarks in it bear more particularly on the type of red ensign flown by the British merchant marine around the world:

> Some commonwealth merchant vessels—of Canada, the commonwealth of Australia, New Zealand, Cyprus, Somaliland, Western Samoa and Tanganyika territory, and of the British North Borneo Company—may, by admiralty warrant, wear the red ensign with the badge of the dominion, state, protectorate, or trust territory in the fly, but other colonial merchant vessels shall wear the red ensign free from any badge or distinctive mark.
> Any colonial merchant vessel may, however, wear a distinguishing flag with the badge of the colony thereon, in addition to the red ensign, provided that such a flag does not infringe the provisions of the merchants shipping act of 1894.

Again, still quoting,

> A few yacht clubs have permission to wear the red ensign defaced—

That is a proper term

> —by the badge of the club.

There are, in addition, numerous companies which over the centuries have been given permission—the Hudson's Bay Company is one of them—to put their own identification on the fly of a red ensign type flag, and hence around the world you have numerous territories, groups, other organizations and many private corporations which have official permission to fly a flag which at more than a few hundred yards distance cannot be distinguished from the Canadian red ensign.

I am reasonably certain that the vast majority of Canadians could not tell us what is on the shield of Canada, and hence what is on the badge of the Canadian red ensign. Indeed I would be surprised if the majority of members of parliament could quickly reel off what is on this distinctive badge in the fly of the red ensign at the present time. Therefore clearly the Canadian red ensign, which is officially adopted as our flag pending action by parliament, is not a unique emblem or flag for use in international gatherings such as at the United Nations.

Continuing on the form of the flag, the history of the three maple leaves dates back more than a century. There were a number of organizations which adopted the maple leaf as their symbol prior to 1867.

In 1860 a significant incident occurred when the then Prince of Wales visited Toronto. It was planned that all native Canadians would join in a procession, wearing the maple leaf as an emblem of the land of their birth. The Toronto Globe of that time tells us that they would therefore—> —be known to the world as such and as loyal subjects to Her Majesty.

It also expressed the hope that the—> —first public act of His Royal Highness, after presenting its banners to the Royal Canadian Regiment, would doubtless be that of sanctioning the adoption of the maple leaf as our national emblem.

The establishment of the coats of arms of Ontario and Quebec in 1868, immediately after confederation, is also of significance because three maple leaves conjoined on a single stem appear at the base of both of these coats of arms. The coat of arms of Ontario includes three gold maple leaves on a green background. Incidentally, these maple leaves appear much larger than on the coat of arms of Quebec, because in the case of Quebec the top part, the historical part, of the shield includes both three fleur-de-lis on a blue background and the lions passant, representing the English ethnic stock of Quebec. The Quebec shield has at the base three green maple leaves on a gold background.

In heraldry the top colours, the most distinctive colours, are rated as follows; red, white, blue, and so on down to the less easily distinguishable colours. It is significant that neither red, white nor blue were used in the coats of arms of Ontario or Quebec at that time, in 1868. So presumably red on white or white on red was reserved for the nation, as they take precedence in terms of distinctiveness and certainly in terms of heraldic value. In 1921, of course, the heralds of that day were able to take advantage of the more distinctive colours, red on white, and confirmed the three maple leaves on a white background as the Canadian portion of our official coat of arms.

From 1868 onward many military medals were struck and most, if not all, of them have shown maple leaves, frequently three maple leaves on a single stem on the reverse side of the medal. "The maple leaf forever" was written in the late 1860's by Alexander Muir. In 1939 the battle flag of the first Canadian division was struck. This flag has been described by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson); it contains three maple leaves prominently displayed on a red ensign-type flag and also shows three gold fleur-de-lis on a blue background. The service pin that veterans wore at the end of world war II is substantially a shield topped by a crown. It has a white background displaying three red maple leaves conjoined on a single stem.

In 1946 a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate sat for some considerable period of time and considered over 2,000 different designs for a Canadian flag. By far and away the most popular design contained one or more maple leaves. If that was any indication of the preference of Canadians of that day, the maple leaf was certainly at the top of the list.

Mr. Churchill: Plus the jack in the corner. What was the choice of the committee?

Mr. Davis: Since then there have been various insignia and symbols adopted by our armed forces. During world war II, as many hon. members will remember, the air force insignia was the rondel, the circles red, white and blue; but instead of the red circular core which appears in the Royal Air Force rondel, we had a red maple leaf. We now have a red maple leaf on the funnels of our destroyers and other naval vessels. We have maple leaves appearing as the distinguishing mark on our military vehicles in the army, and we now have on the official cars drawing up before the House of Commons three maple leaves prominently displayed as the distinguishing mark of Canadian sovereignty.

The Queen's personal flag, struck in 1962, contains on the top part, indicating our ethnic background again, the three lions passant of England, the lion rampant of Scotland, the three gold fleur-de-lis on a blue background, of royal France, and the harp of Ireland; but in the bottom half you have three maple leaves conjoined on a single stem, indicating the Canada of today and tomorrow, and printed on top of all this is "E.R.", "Elizabeth, Regina".

In concluding this portion of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to colour and design. Certainly one of the group of seven great Canadian artists, Mr. A. Y. Jackson, seems to agree that three red maple leaves on a white background is appropriate. Remarks to this effect have appeared in the newspapers recently and I will merely quote from the Montreal Star of June 28. He is speaking about a design which he had prepared some three years ago and which, incidentally, bears a striking resemblance to the present proposed design, the design described in the first part of the resolution. Mr. Jackson is quoted as saying:

"We had to decide either on an emblem or an abstract design such as a tricolour—

This is Mr. A. Y. Jackson speaking recently when he was interviewed by the press:

—and there's so many of those—

He is referring to abstract designs:

—it's hard to get a distinctive flag. We have no animal—the beaver looks like a rat—and so the maple leaf seems best.

"Having decided that, the government should have called for suggestions—

I will skip the rest of that paragraph. Then he said:

"You have to think how a flag will look through a telescope from three or four miles away".

Mr. Churchill: Who owns a telescope?

Mr. Davis: He continues:

"One maple leaf, from that distance, might look like a circle or something and the flag would not be distinctive. The three leaves would make it distinctive".

So this is the view of A. Y. Jackson.

Mr. Churchill: Get out your telescope.

Mr. Smallwood: It looks like the Russian merchant flag.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I would like to go back just for a moment to the matter of several flags. I mentioned the United Nations flag, the union jack which is essentially the commonwealth flag, our own distinctive national flag and the provincial flags. I am certain that more provinces will be striking flags with the passage of time. I think some, acting soon perhaps, will be inclined to adopt a variation of the red ensign. This may not be, heraldically, correct, but they could remove the Canadian coat of arms and add the provincial coat of arms; or, for example, in the case of Ontario you could have an ensign type flag with the cross of St. George next to the pole, in the upper left-hand corner, and the three gold maple leaves in the opposite corner, on the fly, the background being green. This would be in conformity with the coat of arms of Ontario and heraldically correct. Similar flags could be struck in other provinces, with the cross of St. George or the union jack frequently appearing next to the pole.

I would like to remark that all the parties represented in this House of Commons have at one time or another passed resolutions favouring a distinctive Canadian flag. I stressed earlier that a distinctive Canadian flag is not an ensign type flag—it is certainly not a red ensign type flag. I might also have added that an ensign type flag is rated below flags like the union jack. In other words, the union jack in an ensign is in the superior position, and hence flags with derivatives of the three maple leaves, for example, would have three maple leaves in the corner and variations down below on the remaining three quarters of the flag.

All parties in this house have passed resolutions at the grassroots level favouring a distinctive Canadian flag; hence they have a responsibility to face up to this issue.

Across the country we have a variety of opinion and I think most members have received a great deal of mail on this subject. I would like briefly to break down the mail which I have received in order to give an impression of the popular response, the popular participation, in this matter.

There is a middle group of people who, I suggest, may encompass three quarters of the population, perhaps 80 per cent or more. This middle group includes many English speaking Canadians. They would like us to have a distinctive flag, a flag which would not be confused with the flag of any other country in, for example, a United Nations ceremony. Many of these people are of British origin, who are what one might say British to the core, but they are Canadians first. Many English speaking Canadians with a sentimental attachment to the union jack or red ensign have a kindly understanding of the French speaking Canadians who would have Canada's flag distinctive and purely Canadian. Many a French speaking Canadian wishes a purely Canadian flag but wants this without any venom or disrespect to the English-speaking portion of our great Canadian community. These people in my belief make up the vast majority of Canadians; I would put the figure as high as 80 per cent.

There are two other groups, distinct minorities. One has certainly earned its right to speak up for a flag, and let no one belittle its right. It includes many of the men and women who are prominent in organizations such as the Canadian Legion and the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire. I think our job is to convince them that it was freedom, democracy and true British justice they were fighting for, not just for a flag. I think most of them on second thought will agree with this. They might account for 10 per cent of the Canadian public, but I doubt it.

Finally there is a small group of people who are essentially malcontents—separatists and the like. There are some French speaking Canadians who want no part of a Canadian flag which bears the union jack. They are not necessarily venomous but perhaps blind to a large part of our past.

There is a similar group of people in English speaking Canada. Its members are not very numerous but they feel very strongly that English speaking Canadians have the right, because of their majority, to dictate to the rest of the country. They are not thinking in family terms. They are not thinking of our neighbours or of relatives of other tongues as Canadians. They are thinking purely in a dogmatic fashion which knows no respect to the ideals and traditions which I believe are embodied in the union jack. Together these two small groups, this minority, if you like, of malcontents, may account for 2 or 3 per cent of the population of Canada. Their prejudices I think should be disregarded.

In view of this breakdown, Mr. Speaker, I can see little point in a national referendum. A national referendum would be overwhelmingly in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag. But what happens if we had a referendum? We have had two referendums in the history of Canada, and both appeals to the people over the heads of members of parliament have been frustrated because parliament, after the referendum results were in, refused to act and did not legislate. Hence the referendums in those two cases, in 1898 and in 1942, were purposeless.

Should we have a referendum, and the result be inconclusive? I doubt it. I think we would have a conclusive result. Hence a referendum is purposeless.

Mr. Winkler: It saves us from dictation.

Mr. Davis: Once the results of the referendum were in, assuming one were held, and parliament had acted, then I think we would have to petition the Queen to ask other countries not to use the red ensign-type flag. Otherwise we would not have a distinctive Canadian flag flying throughout the world. We would also have to petition that the merchant marine of the United Kingdom not fly the red ensign. I think our recent experience in having to refer the social security legislation in the form of an amendment to the British North America Act to Westminster is sufficient indication of the difficulties involved and its complications. As a sovereign nation we should no longer have to go through this procedure, and in order to establish a distinctive Canadian flag this would resemble the ridiculous. I have merely given this example, Mr. Speaker, in order to illustrate how difficult it would be to establish a red ensign-type flag as a distinctive national flag.

I think that a flag is something for here and now. It is something which basically looks to the future. Our coats of arms and our shields tell us of the past. We have nationally and provincially established our coats of arms. We have established our past firmly. Our flag should be more Canadian, a banner to rally the people of the country and to look ahead. I think basically it must present an idea or ideas. It is the ideas behind the flag which are important—the ideas of liberty and opportunity. This is the imaginative concept, the type of ideas, which can lift up Canadians, lift up their eyes and stimulate their imagination. It will help to unify this country, I am convinced. It will not deny our traditions. Here we have another step, adding to the emblems of the country instead of taking away from our emblems or destroying them. I believe Canadians of the future will fly United Nations flags, will prominently fly the union jack, they will fly our new national flag, provincial flags—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Chatterton: Mr. Speaker, may I have consent of the house to ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Churchill: Let him continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member should be allowed to finish his speech.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Davis: I was nearly finished, Mr. Speaker. I just want to drive home the point that our shield and coats of arms do indicate quite clearly our past. I think it is significant that it was Conservative governments which established these coats of arms which bring out clearly and distinctly our past. I think it is also appropriate that a Liberal government should bring in a flag which looks to the future; a living, moving thing, something which will inspire Canadians to work together to develop a national purpose. For these reasons I personally will vote both for a distinctive Canadian flag and for the union jack as one of the many flags which we, with our rich tradition, will fly in this country in the years to come.

Mr. Chatterton: May I put a question to the hon. member. Does he feel that the vote which he casts in the house for the new flag, as opposed to the flag that we have, should be guided by his own opinions or by the opinions of the majority of the people in the constituency of Coast-Capilano?

Mr. Davis: I think that my decision to vote for or against this resolution should be dictated by both considerations. I am convinced that the majority of people in my riding are for a distinctive flag. I have had at least one municipality display the new flag in its municipal offices. I have had it flown in many other parts of my riding, and I am convinced that if there was a plebiscite type vote in my riding today it would show at least two to one in favour of a distinctive flag, even though there is little knowledge yet of the traditions and background of this distinctive flag.

Mr. Chatterton: A supplementary question. If the hon. member is so sure that there would be two to one in favour in Coast-Capilano—and it must be an extraordinary riding in British Columbia—why would he not agree that a plebiscite would determine the question?

Mr. Davis: If I believe that the members of my exceptional riding already favour a distinctive flag by a great majority I am also convinced that this is a wise step for the country to take, and I have no doubt as to how I should vote.

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, no subject comes home more closely to the heart of a people or appeals more clearly to the intelligence of its citizens than the flag—its traditions, its history, its "prestige", its many and vital meanings.

On taking part in this debate I do so fully realizing that this past few days on the radio and in the papers, certain people have suggested that debating this issue is hopeless and wasting the time of the house. Sir, I suggest to you that no one knows this better than the Prime Minister himself and those who are helping to engineer and steer the passage of this resolution through the house.

I do not believe there has ever been an issue which has been so cleverly conceived by a government, knowing that it can win the vote in the house with certain members of the opposition playing a most important role and acting in co-operation with the government. The suggestion that parliament should make the decision is only another concealment, because these same proponents of the new flag know full well, if they let the people of Canada vote on this issue, what the result will be, and that they with their lust for power and dictatorship will receive in full measure the decision of the people.

Some days ago, the Prime Minister stated that only on two previous occasions had a plebiscite been carried out in Canada, once in 1898, on prohibition, and again in 1942, on conscription. I say, sir, that this, too, would be a plebiscite on prohibition brought on by a government drunk with power and certainly increasingly prone to dictatorship.

Also, when the Prime Minister introduced this resolution he stated that the red ensign was not acknowledged until the second world war; again, apparently the Prime Minister misinformed the house. I would like to read an extract from the Peterborough Examiner on this point; it has been referred to already by the hon. member for Victoria (Ont.) but I know there are some hon. members here in the house today who were not present at the time he read it. It states:

> In 1900 the Fenian raid medal was struck carrying the red ensign. This was the first Canadian military decoration to be presented veterans by the government of Canada.

A few minutes ago a speaker who has now resumed his seat said that one of the reasons he was against the red ensign was because it was not distinctive. It is evident he could not have heard the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Smallwood) last night when he spoke about certain other flags. I should like to refer to page 4967 in yesterday's Hansard when the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose said:

> Hon. members opposite are concerned because the red ensign may be confused with the British merchant navy flag. I should like to refer to "Flags of the World" by H. Gresham Carr which I obtained from the parliamentary library. On turning to page 190 reference is made to the flags of the Soviet union. There appear to be a lot of flags in the U.S.S.R., and this is what is said about the merchant flag of the U.S.S.R.:
> "The ensign is white, and has a light blue border one sixth the depth of the hoist along the bottom of the flag. In the white portion are the star and crossed hammer and sickle in red—"
> I suggest that this proposed flag of the Prime Minister is not distinctive from any other flag. We want to destroy our red ensign because it is the symbol of the British merchant marine and replace it with a flag with the white background, the blue trim and the red of the Soviet union.

The nub of the flag controversy seems to be the use of the union jack. Those who object to the prominence of the union jack do so because they feel it denotes subordination to a sovereign power other than Canada. I feel however that the union jack is much more than a flag of England or the United Kingdom. The truth is that it never was the flag of England alone. It incorporates what used to be England's standard, but it is made up of various traditions. Long ago, from Normandy, France, we brought the crusaders' emblem, the cross of St. George—England's patron saint—and it became the banner of the kingdom centuries later. Scotland and England were united under the Stuarts. Thus, the cross of St. Andrew—Scotland's patron saint—was linked to the standard of St. George, and as a result of a flag with two crosses came to represent the United Kingdom. It was this flag which flew over Quebec when the treaty of Paris was signed in 1763, and when the Quebec Act was passed. Years after, in 1807, as a matter of fact, when Ireland joined the union, the cross of Ireland's patron saint—St. Patrick—was added.

Thus the union jack appeared. It was never the banner of a single country. From the beginning it stood for "united nations". It was the flag of the United Kingdom and Ireland. With the expansion of the British empire went the union jack, carrying in its wake civilization and Christianity. It represents countless blessings to humanity.

The union jack is the symbol of our freedom maintained. It tells us of our explorers, reformers, and colonizers sailing the oceans of the world to bring Christian civilization, justice and liberties, the pioneering instinct, the benefits of science and a great literature, to the far flung corners of the earth.

French Canada, under the shield of the crown, was never held subject or kept servile, but carried on in the enjoyment of her ancient faith, customs, and language, and received its Magna Carta in the Quebec Act; and we have prospered and flourished into nationhood with the statute of Westminster in 1931.

Today the union jack speaks to us and our world neighbours of the commonwealth in a much broader way. It is the emblem of a free family of nations in which Canada is regarded as the mature daughter. What an example this family gives to the rest of humanity, and particularly to the United Nations organization. Do hon. members recall the conference of the commonwealth prime ministers in London at the coronation—a conference which had no treaty shackles, no rigid agenda, and no cold formality? It was a family gathering. Around that conference table sat a group of spokesmen for hundreds of millions of people of all races, colours, and creeds, drawn together by an act of faith and by the mysticism of the crown.

With Canada's active and predominant role in that commonwealth conference, and in world councils, there is no evidence that her right or power has been subordinated to any other sovereign power. Yet there is a segment of our population who apparently have an inferiority complex and believe themselves to be a servile race held in subjugation by another sovereign power, and are vassals. In the strange aberrations of their minds, they imagine that by the removal of the union jack from our flag they will be released from a mythical yoke.

One does not have to be of British origin or British in outlook to appreciate the British institutions of freedom. Distinction is something that is earned; culture is something that time creates. You do not build a culture trying to destroy another one or by trying to deny that another one exists. You give free vent to all worth-while cultural influences. We are what we are today because of these ideals and institutions, which have given us both distinction and culture.

It is the spirit we want, something we feel yet cannot touch. We have ridden through nights of a thousand perils and the spirit is still strong within us. The symbolism of the union jack is spiritual. It is something above and which should be above all politics. It would be a pity if there were no nation on this continent to carry the union jack on into the future and, with strength and vitality, to give it the prominence it so justly deserves.

In searching for a distinctive national flag for Canada there is much to suggest that we have such a flag in the red ensign, which has become recognized as a symbol of Canadian autonomy within the British commonwealth of nations. Flags, as symbols of the deepest emotions of a nation, arise from the hearts of the people and not from formal edicts of a parliamentary body. Certainly our Canadian way of life, rooted and grounded in the British parliamentary institutions, can be symbolized in no better way than by a flag which is rich in spiritual content and features prominently that which only flags in the British commonwealth possess, the Christian concept. The cross of St. George, the cross of St. Andrew and the cross of St. Patrick are symbols of our redemption. This flag, with the three crosses of Christianity flying on the four winds of the Canadian heavens, will wave us forward along that difficult path to the universal communion of the brotherhood of man. It is emblematic of the source from whence our greatness came.

Much has been said on the other side of the house about the correspondence that members have received from constituents and I should like to take five minutes to read into the record some of the correspondence I have received. Here is a letter from Winnipeg:

Dear Sir:

Please keep fighting for the red ensign. This issue will profoundly affect future Canadian generations and our whole place in the world. A recent poll taken by the Free Press here, whereby readers sent in a form from the paper stating their preference in the flag matter, showed over 60 per cent for the red ensign, 30 per cent for the new flag design, and the rest undecided.

I have here a letter from Mr. Donald Welch of Toronto which reads in part as follows:

Since good will and fellowship always make for unity, and unity is paramount for Canadians and Canada, we believe the issue should not be made into a political football to be kicked around by politicians whose actions sometimes make us wonder whether they respect or give a damn for our feelings and desires. We therefore say the flag issue should not be made a political one in the House of Commons. Each member must vote as an individual free from party politics. His own conscience as a patriotic Canadian seeking to do what is best for unity of Canada should be his only consideration and guide.

We do not believe in rushing tactics but the taking of plenty of time and consideration, keeping in mind that at all times the only successful conclusion that can be reached will be based on fairness and acceptableness to all groups. Newspapers and radio news and television commentators could be of real help in keeping our unity if they would co-operate, too.

This letter is from a retired professor and reads in part as follows:

I beg to submit a point that might be of some use in debate. The government is to be congratulated on their choice of a flag. Since it contains absolutely nothing that is British, it can be used without any change when our country becomes the republic of Canada. The Prime Minister with his great wisdom has probably considered this advantage.

Here is part of an editorial from the Peterborough Examiner which for two or three years now has been acclaimed one of the top newspapers in Canada by reason of its editorials:

Will Prime Minister Pearson be so misguided as to make the life of his government conditional on the acceptance of a new national flag? It is possible. If he does, and goes down to defeat, it will be difficult to muster any sympathy for him. Important though a national flag may be, it is not a suitable excuse for destroying the elected government of Canada.

Here is an excerpt from an editorial in the Winnipeg Tribune on June 6 last:

There seemed to be a deliberate policy of rooting out little by little distinctive terms and designations that bound the nation to its past. Years ago Dr. Eugene Forsey asked: "Where is it all going to stop? Are we going to wake up some morning and find ourselves citizens of the republic of Canada? It looks like it. But I think there are a lot of people who don't want it."—

The people of Canada have the right to ask this question and to expect an unequivocal answer from Mr. Pearson and his advisers. Is the Liberal party dedicated to turning this country into a republic?

I also have a telegram from the president of the Royal Canadian Legion endorsing the red ensign and asking all members to support it. I have a letter from a group of people in Toronto reading in part as follows:

The undersigned feel it is about time that some voices were heard in favour of our red ensign, which the vast majority of the people of Toronto respect and fly as our national flag. Why a change should be proposed by Mr. Pearson to appease a small but vocal group we cannot understand.

I have another telegram from the dominion command of the Royal Canadian Legion assembled in convention at Winnipeg. I also have a newspaper article reviewing the results of a poll taken by many newspapers across Canada. The headline is, "Ensign Takes Big Lead in National Flag Poll". The article reads in part as follows:

Toronto is backing the ensign more than five to one, with Telegram readers favouring it 12,838 to 2,530.

I have a letter from Rockcliffe park, Ottawa, reading in part as follows:

It is the kind of flag one would expect a minor dictator, having recently conducted a successful revolution in a small mid-European or South American state, to produce to a conquered nation with a view to wiping out any past heritage they may have enjoyed.

I have a letter from another branch of the Legion. Incidentally, some of these letters from branches of the Legion are from branches in ridings represented by members on the other side of the house who have said in their speeches that their people endorse the new flag. This one is from Trenton, Ontario, and reads:

Dear Mr. Webb:

I have been instructed by the executive council of branch 110 of the Royal Canadian Legion, Trenton, Ontario, to communicate the following to you: Trenton Ontario branch of the Royal Canadian Legion request your support of the red ensign.

That letter is signed by W. Lawson, secretary. Then I have a letter from a Mr. Vincent of Sydenham, Ontario, and I will read the first paragraph:

I feel very strongly that the Canadian red ensign represents so much common sacrifice that I cannot sit idly by and see some other flag forced on us by any minority group.

This letter is from the Hastings county black chapter and reads:

Hastings county black chapter passed a resolution at their annual meeting last night in the Orange hall Madoc very strongly protesting any change in the flag and also the national anthem.

This letter is from Mrs. Clancy of the town of Harold, Ontario:

I have been instructed by the members of Wellman's women's institute, north Hastings district, to express to you our desire to have, as the official flag for Canada, the red ensign with the union jack in the upper corner next to the mast and the dominion coat of arms in the field.

This next letter is from an old, respected citizen, a man who has devoted much of his time and talent to the needs of Canada. He says:

You may tell John Diefenbaker and the other parties not to press Pearson too hard, but for him to pay out the rope and eventually Pearson will hang himself, and then he will be hung for a long while.

This letter is from the zone commander of nine branches of the Legion, including Kingston, endorsing the red ensign. I have many other quotations here, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to read this little article. I am sure it has not been put on the record. It is entitled, "Leave Our Flag As Is". I quote:

There's a lot of fuss going on—again—these days about a Canadian flag.

Just whatinell's the matter with the flag we have now?

It's the flag under which Canadians fought in the past to keep today's Canadians free.

If it weren't for that flag, and what it stands for, the people who are yapping like miniature dogs who never will grow up surazell wouldn't have a chance to say anything about a flag nor anything else.

Canadians—real Canadians—are proud of our flag; proud of our young men, and young women, too, who fought under it and at times in front of it. Today's Canadians—real Canadians—look with pride on the sacrifice made by 100,000 of their number who died for what that flag stands for—freedom.

All this nonsense about the "English" flag makes me sick. It isn't England's flag. It's Canada's flag. It's representative of all of Britain, not just England; and of all Canadians.

Why ignore the French? We aren't. We are treating them as Canadians. Some million Canadians, and more, got into uniform to preserve freedom for them, as well as the Canadian-British, and all the other ethnic groups in our country.

If the Canadian French don't want to be treated the same as other Canadians, be they British, Ukrainian, Dutch, or what have you, that's their fault.

Now, Mr. Speaker, on two occasions I announced over the radio in my own riding that I had not received a single letter from my constituents in favour of the new flag. These announcements were made in order that people, if they so wished, would write me expressing their views on the flag issue. Even yet, Mr. Speaker, not one letter have I received from a constituent in favour of a change in the flag. I must say, however, that in the past few months I have received thousands and thousands of letters and names on petitions requesting that the government retain the red ensign as Canada's national flag.

In my own opinion, Mr. Speaker, the true number of names in favour of the red ensign has not been given to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) or I am certain he would not have proceeded with this resolution. Just the other day, sir, I attended the funeral of a veteran of world war II. On this soldier's casket rested the red ensign, the flag that he lived for and the flag that he died for. After the funeral, I was talking to his three sons, two living in Toronto and one in my own riding. They remarked that throughout their lives they and their parents had always been supporters of the Liberal party. However, if Mr. Pearson forced this flag issue, never again would they cast a Liberal vote.

I say to the people of Canada that the Prime Minister has betrayed the boys with whom he fought. He has betrayed the 100,000 Canadians who gave their lives. He has betrayed the boys that were fortunate enough to return home. He has betrayed the Royal Canadian Legion, the daughters of the empire, many women's institutes, municipal councils, municipalities and thousands upon thousands of Canadians who have spent their money and their time making representations for the retention of the red ensign as Canada's national flag.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, the just manner in which to deal with such an important issue is by referendum; let the Canadian people decide this issue. If such a vote were carried out, I am certain that all parties would be united in carrying out the verdict of the electorate.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that time is running out. One is reminded of the fact that whom the gods would destroy they first make mad. This situation stems from the selfish lobby for control under which liberty becomes licensed and responsibility is replaced by self-consciousness; the welfare of the greatest number is prostituted to the pressures of the few. In this direction lies madness and death. This is not the way of democracy in which the few sacrificed self for the welfare of the many, when the spirit of sacrifice gives birth to liberty, freedom and trust, out of which grows the greatest good for the greatest number. Surely this is the way of life, liberty and peace.

Mr. Habel: I wonder if the hon. member will allow a question?

Mr. Webb: The member in the corner wanted to ask a question and I agreed if I had time.

Mr. Habel: The hon. member knows well, and will admit, I am sure, that the red ensign was flown on all federal buildings after the order in council was passed replacing the union jack. Can the hon. member tell this house in what year the union jack was replaced by the red ensign on provincial buildings and schools in Ontario?

Mr. Webb: The hon. member's own prime minister proclaimed the red ensign the national flag of Canada in 1945. I can assure the hon. member that the province in which I live will always be proud to fly the red ensign on any school or public building in the future.

Mr. Habel: I am asking the hon. member in what year the provincial government replaced the union jack with the red ensign on schools and provincial buildings?

Mr. Webb: I would advise the hon. member that in Ontario there are no restrictions. The province of Ontario, and its leaders, want to fly either the union jack or the red ensign on any building at all times.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre-André Boutin (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out one thing to the hon. member: if, for many of you Conservatives the choice of a Canadian flag is a matter of sentiment rather than one of common sense and if, as English Canadians you want to keep the union jack, what would you say if we French Canadians, were asking, out of sentimentalism, that the French flag become the Canadian flag? As for me, I must say that being French Canadian, if I am not responsible enough to let go my mother's apron strings, I would rather be tied to the apron strings of my real mother, that is my motner country.

[Text]

Mr. Webb: I want to thank the member for that question because I intended to deal with that but I did not have time. I think we should retain some of our heritage. That should be left with us. I mentioned that in two or three paragraphs. That is what we would like. If you people in Quebec feel you want to get rid of your heritage and want nothing to do with your forebears, the people who built up this country, I can tell you we do not feel that way. We are proud of our forefathers and our heritage.

Mr. Grégoire: By heritage do you mean our Canadian heritage or foreign country heritage?

Mr. Pugh: Canadian, you stupe.

Mr. Herman Laverdière (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, during the few remaining minutes, I should like to make a few comments in support of this resolution, a support which reflects the attitude and conviction of the majority of Canadians about the adoption of a national distinctive flag.

I consider as a great privilege to support that resolution on behalf of my constituents. I also believe that the majority of the Canadian people are eagerly waiting for a distinctive national flag which will not be confused with any other flag throughout the world.

At the present time, Mr. Speaker, we live historic moments which will certainly etch the future of our beautiful country; the adoption of a new distinctive flag will show all the people of the globe, and in no uncertain terms, the sound determination of the Canadian parliament to take all the necessary means so as to be recognized everywhere as a mature nation, united and capable of self-government, able to command respect and provide for the welfare of its people, regardless of their ethnic origin.

Much has been written since the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) introduced this resolution on June 15 last; comments ranging from one extreme to the other, appeared in the newspapers. Even though I was only able to ascertain part of the views held by the main Canadian journalists, I think most of them are in favour of the prompt passage of this resolution.

However, I am more interested in the opinion of the average citizen. It is easy to realize that almost everybody, the young and the old, are greatly interested in the resolution. I find that most people were certain the resolution would be passed with a minimum of discussions and the majority wonder why this discussion must drag on for so long. I am happy to note that the younger generation especially, in every social class, is more interested in this resolution than in any other legislation now before the house. It is the most discussed subject among young people.

As a matter of fact, here is what a 12-year old boy told me in substance: When this resolution was introduced, I looked right away into my encyclopaedia to find out what emblem represented Canada; I saw the red ensign but that emblem is not a distinctive flag.

I feel that the interest shown by the people is a clear indication of the deep attachment each Canadian feels for his country; they show in their remarks that Canada is no longer, and has not been for a long time, a colony but is instead a free and autonomous country. For those reasons, the people favour the adoption of emblems which are typically Canadian and cannot be identified with those of any other country.

In my opinion, we have maintained long enough certain colonial ties which are humiliating for all those who believe in our country's maturity and independence; it is humiliating to be identified throughout the world by an emblem which is nothing but a replica of the British merchant navy's; it is humiliating to be obliged to go to the British government to amend our own constitution; it is humiliating for all Canadians who have faith in Canada to see the word "British" so often linked with the word "Canadian"; it is humiliating to be identified still as just a part of the British empire; it is humiliating not to be now just plain Canadian citizens.

Many seem to promote the retention of the red ensign because large numbers of Canadians fought gloriously under that flag during two world wars. Yet, if you question some of those gallant citizens who risked everything on the front, it is obvious that the red ensign meant nothing to them and that most regiments had to fight under the union jack, the flag of another country.

Our courageous soldiers did not risk or sacrifice their lives for a symbol but to put an end to the unscrupulous domination by a people who were considered by their leader as superior to all other men, a racial superiority which does not exist in Canada more than anywhere else. It was mostly for the cause of freedom that Canadians accepted to fight and die in large numbers on the battlefields of Europe.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills and private bills.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO REDUCE AGE OF VOTERS

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-42, to amend the Canada Elections Act (age of voters).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill which I have introduced to the house is very simple. If carried, it would reduce the voting age in Canada in federal elections from 21 years of age to 18 years of age. This measure is one upon which I do not intend to say very much, because it is a measure that has already been approved unanimously by the privileges and elections committee of this house. Last November the committee, although it has not as yet reported, unanimously approved an amendment of the act for this purpose; and of course in the house the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in response to a question of mine last fall said, "This party"—that is, the Liberal party—"has been committed to the reduction of the voting age to 18 years for some years, and we are anxious to see that it is done as quickly as possible".

[Mr. Laverdière.]

Therefore I introduced this bill in order that this change, which all parties in the house appear to agree unanimously is desirable, can be brought into effect without the necessity of waiting until the privileges and elections committee reports on the far more extensive changes that they are making to the Elections Act. The bringing into effect of this bill would add approximately 800,000 new voters to the rolls. If carried over until the next election, it would add approximately 1,100,000 to the election rolls.

An hon. Member: That depends on when the next election comes.

Mr. Scott: As one hon. member has just said, that depends on when the next election comes. But in any event, Mr. Speaker, it would add a very substantial number of voters. It is interesting to try and trace back to the origin of the idea that 21 years of age is the magic age at which young people pass from adolescence into adulthood. My analysis shows that this is a medieval belief. The idea of 21 years of age as the magic age for adulthood dates back to medieval times; it dates back to the days when the serfs were allowed to farm their own land at the age of 21. From that time stems the custom that has been perpetuated down through the centuries. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, it is time to get rid of some of these medieval customs that we perpetuate and bring them up to date and in line with the twentieth century.

I think it is a truism to assert that young people today 18 years of age are far better equipped to take part in public life than were the medieval serfs of centuries ago. Our young people today grow up in an entirely different environment. Attendance at school is now compulsory, and although our school curricula are very lacking in training in political and public matters, there are courses which equip our young people to take part in public life. Travel today is very swift and simple. Radio, television, newspapers and all the methods of communication and dissemination of news are very widely used on our young people are constantly exposed to current events and things that are taking place in the community. Therefore I think the 18 year old of today is far more knowledgeable than was his medieval ancestor and certainly ought to have the right to participate in voting for a particular government.

At 18 years of age, of course, one can marry without consent and can have children. At 16 years of age one may drive an automobile, which is potentially an instrument of death. If our young people 18 years of age are married and earn high enough incomes, we grant them the privilege of paying income tax, along with all the other people of this country, and their children receive the benefit of many welfare measures over which they have no control. I think the real basis of our concept of democratic government is that the greatest possible number of people who are going to be governed ought to participate in the method of choosing that government, as long as they are able to do so intelligently. I think this might encourage earlier voting habits, and perhaps these voting habits would be carried over into their later years.

This is interesting to note, Mr. Speaker. In making this change we timid Canadians need not really be worried that we are doing anything terribly radical or anything terribly different. In our own country, of course, we have examples of the voting age having been lowered. In the province of Quebec the 18 year old can vote, and this is also the case in Saskatchewan. British Columbia and Alberta both have the vote at 19 years of age. I happened to get in touch, with the help of our Canadian officials, with the United Nations and obtained an analysis of the countries in the United Nations which have already brought into effect legislation granting the vote to persons 18 years of age. There are some 32 countries in which the 18 year old can vote. So, as I say, Canadians would not be doing anything very spectacular, anything very different or anything very radical, in accepting this proposal.

The house might be interested to have these countries on the record. The following countries have the 18 year old vote: Albania, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Bulgaria, Byelorussia, Burma, Ceylon, mainland China, Costa Rica, Czechoslovakia, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Guatemala, Honduras, Indonesia, Israel, Mexico, the Mongolian People's Republic, Nicaragua, Pakistan, Paraguay, Poland, Rumania, Salvador, South Africa, Ukraine, Uraguay; Georgia, Kentucky and Alaska in the United States; the U.S.S.R., Venezuela, Yugoslavia, the Central African Republic, Congo, Brazzaville; Hungary, Iraq, the Ivory Coast, Laos, Ruanda, Somalia, Syria and South Viet Nam. Therefore, as I say, this practice has spread very widely in the world and it seems to me that a highly educated country like Canada ought to be prepared to adopt it. It is interesting, also, that in the United States a presidential commission appointed by the late President Kennedy has recommended that the 18 year old vote be put into effect in that country. This would add 9 million young Americans to the voting lists.

I should now like to deal with some of the arguments that are advanced against this proposal. The first is that the young people themselves do not want the 18 year old vote. One cannot find any evidence in support of this proposition; in fact, the evidence is all to the contrary. In a very interesting report prepared by an eminent member of the press gallery, Norman DePoe, and published in Weekend Magazine of April 11, 1964, this matter was dealt with. He reports on a survey conducted by Canadian High News, a paper with a circulation of 120,000 in our secondary schools, in which our students were asked the question as to whether the 18 year old should be given the vote. Sixty nine per cent voted in favour of this proposal. Several television programs have dealt with this matter. The C.B.C. program "Inquiry" conducted a survey and obtained roughly the same percentage in favour of it. So it is quite clear, Mr. Speaker, that these young people do want to have the vote and do want to participate in the choosing of governments and approving or disapproving of government policies.

It is also sometimes suggested that these young people are not adequately prepared for and are not ready to have the vote. It is argued that their level of judgment and their knowledge of public affairs is not as high as that of their superiors, their parents, and that therefore they should be deprived of this vote. But the Canadian peace research institute, in trying to evaluate the importance of this matter and obtain the opinion of all sections of the population, conducted a very carefully prepared and precise investigation. They put a series of what they called knowledge questions to a section of the population from 18 years old, up. After it had been analysed and interpreted the report said that there were no significant differences between the teenage and adult samples on the eight knowledge questions. So that any precise examination that has been made of this young age group indicates that they are as adequately trained and prepared as the older groups.

I do not want to go into this at any great length because I think it is clear that throughout the history of voting every time the right to vote has been extended to another group in the community it has strengthened and improved popular government. It is also clear that the young people of today have every right to vote, that they are capable of voting, that they want to vote and that they would make a valuable contribution to the general good of our democratic system.

For the benefit of my Liberal friends the survey to which I referred showed that 93 per cent of our young people are in favour of "O Canada" as our national anthem. If hon. members opposite want to add a very large group of ardent supporters to their cause they had better bring in the 18 year old vote as quickly as possible.

I will not go any further into this point. As I said at the beginning this is a measure which has been unanimously supported by all parties in the house, and therefore it would be my hope that we would not talk this measure out or refer it back to the committee which has already approved it. I hope we might be able to pass it tonight and to make these young people eligible to vote at the general election everyone talks about as coming this fall.

Mr. Joseph Macaluso (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a few remarks to those of the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott). I should like to align myself with his remarks. I am in favour of lowering the voting age to 18 years. As the hon. member stated, on Thursday, November 14 of last year, the standing committee on privileges and elections unanimously endorsed an amendment to section 14 of the Canada Elections Act to reduce the voting age from 21 to 18 years. Therefore, the 18, 19 and 20 year olds would be included and this would introduce some 750,000 to 800,000 new electors to the voting roll.

It may be fairly predicted that before long Canadians between 18 and 21 years of age will have the right to vote both in provincial and federal elections. This trend has already begun and its impetus is increasing. In the province of Saskatchewan the voting age is 18, in Alberta it is 19, in British Columbia 19, in Quebec it is 18 and in Newfoundland it is 19. In Manitoba it is interesting to note that the majority opinion of civic and provincial government officials supports 18 years of age as the voting age. The Winnipeg city council by a majority vote decided to ask the provincial government to change its city charter so that 18 year olds could vote in civic elections. Premier Robarts of Ontario has indicated that he will take similar action and give the franchise to 18 year olds in Ontario in time for the next provincial election.

In the province of Prince Edward Island the government has given an undertaking to amend the voting age in the province to conform with any change which is made in federal legislation.

As the hon. member for Danforth said, a move is afoot to lower the voting age in the United States for federal elections to 18 years of age. The President's commission on registration and voting participation which was set up by the late President Kennedy recommended to President Johnson on December 20, 1963 that all states consider dropping the minimum age for voters to 18 for state and federal elections.

Some people argue that the proposed step would mean the ruination of Canada. They say that the 18 year olds are not mature enough politically or otherwise to cast an intelligent vote. I think differently. The case for giving 18, 19 and 20 year olds the vote is realistic, sound and can stand on its own merits.

What are some of the arguments against lowering the voting age? First of all, it is said that an 18 year old's judgment is not as good on the average as it is at 21. I think this can be contradicted on many grounds. Second, it is said that the old-enough-to-fight argument is emotional because military standards are based on physical fitness and ability to learn, not on political awareness. Third, it is said that young drivers are more irresponsible; but some of the adults I have seen driving are more irresponsible than any person I have seen between the age of 18 and 21. Fourth, it is argued that the public should not be taken in by the aging platitudes of the political opportunists. Fifth, it is argued that under 21 years of age voters would not know what they were voting for, or would vote as society expects them to vote. I submit that this is a ridiculous argument.

It is interesting to note that the young Progressive Conservatives and the Progressive Conservative student federation voted against lowering the voting age. It is also interesting to observe that at the time the vote was taken at the meeting of February of this year there were not too many present, so perhaps that is one of the reasons for the vote. Many of the young Progressive Conservatives in my riding to whom I have spoken were in favour of lowering the voting age. It is also interesting to note that in a statement which I read Mrs. J. J. Henderson, the secretary of the Winnipeg South Centre Progressive Conservative women's association, stated in a resolution which was passed that "Young people are not fully informed and don't give enough thought to politics". That is another argument against.

Then it is argued that few of them pay taxes or own property, which is another argument against lowering the age, because it is said that they would not use their ballots with the sober responsibility of someone with a stake in the community. Another reason against is because the vast majority could not care less about government and political affairs. I disagree with this. The last argument which is made is that the new electors may be pulled in a radical direction, and there is good reason to believe that by and large this would be disproved.

Nevertheless the arguments in favour of the extension of the voting age to 18 remain strong. The advantage of reducing the voting age is manifest. For example, it would directly involve these young people in the country's affairs. Given a direct voice in their country's destiny at an earlier age they could be expected to take an even greater interest in the nation's life than they do now, which would be all to the good for it would mean an extension of the democratic process.

I should like to give a short quotation from the Toronto Star for February 20, 1964, which reads as follows:

> There is every reason to encourage young people to accept this basic obligation of citizenship at a time when its importance might be impressed upon them as part of their education.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that hundreds of thousands of young people finish high school at 18 and begin to earn their own living. At 18 they come into the armed forces. At 18 many of them participate actively in politics and political parties. Political clubs at universities are now flourishing as seldom before. In fact when I attended university not too long ago it was unknown to have a political club of any party. Today there are many active political clubs at universities, and there are many mock parliaments not only at universities but in our high schools.

An 18 year old today is probably better informed and more interested in government affairs than are some of the parents of today. Today's higher standard of education has seen to that. The proportion of people with a high school education has greatly increased. Enrolment at universities of young people between 18 and 21 years of age is growing each year. Less formal education, such as television and radio, is also bringing about a much earlier maturity. Improved educational facilities and wider experience are very good reasons for lowering the voting age. In maturing earlier, young people are taking an earlier interest in the political life of Canada, a political interest which must not be allowed to dissipate.

It must be captured, in the hope that it will be retained for life. Cited as the major argument for 18 year old voting by the United States presidential commission was the belief that by the time young people reach 21, they are—and I quote—"so removed from the stimulation of the educational process that their interest in public affairs has moved." It is in the late teens that an enthusiasm for political affairs often manifests itself; it is important for Canada that this be developed into constructive channels.

The right to vote is a valuable asset. It may help to crystallize an interest, to confer a sense of responsibility, and to give a better appreciation of the significance of the political process. Lowering the voting age is unlikely to bring any harm to the country. It would, rather, be taking advantage of assets of interest and enthusiasm which should have a helpful influence on Canadian political life. Whatever might have been true a few decades ago, today the great majority of young people have a degree of responsibility and of knowledge which would have been unknown to their parents until much later in their lives. A young person would be more inclined to turn out at the polls than his parents in response to the honour and responsibility he or she would feel on being given the franchise; he would probably shame his parents into going out to vote, too, since many of them now neglect to exercise their franchise.

With modern standards of education, most 18 year olds are much better prepared to vote than most of their grandparents were at 21 years of age. Andrew Robertson, chairman of the Winnipeg school board says—and I quote: "I have read some political essays written by high-schoolers and they show a better appraisal and understanding of government issues than their apathetic elders do." There is no reason to believe that Canada's young people are not mentally and emotionally equipped to vote at 18. It is significant that anyone serving in the armed forces, whether at home or abroad, is now entitled to vote in a federal election regardless of age and that he retains his voting rights on discharge even though he is still under 21.

A great many people in this country and elsewhere believed that the world would go up in smoke if women were ever given the right to vote. That is what they thought, but of course the world is still going on. If young Canadians were given the right and privilege of voting in national elections they would see it as an opportunity and as a challenge. And if they take, as they are now taking, an active part in politics they can make a substantial contribution to the Canadian democratic process. Canada is a nation of young people. Half the population is under 25 years of age and an estimated 67 per cent are younger than 40. In national elections young people can bring to bear a more objective, more detached and less self-interested judgment on party politics. Adoption of the lower voting age would recognize the increasing interest now being shown by Canada's young people in political activities. Participation by the younger generation in political affairs is symbolized in the makeup of this present parliament. The average age of members is somewhat lower today than the average age only ten years ago.

We should encourage our young people to take an earlier interest in public affairs for they will be the people responsible in the decades ahead for the maintenance and operation of our democratic institutions. As I stated earlier, the case for giving 18, 19 and 20 year olds the vote is realistic and sound and can stands on its own merits.

It is interesting to note that a move in this direction will not affect the course of the ship of state, since the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia and the others I mentioned earlier are still on solid foundations. It has not resulted in any dire consequences and I submit we should be realistic about the situation in which our young people find themselves. We give them every right except the right to exercise their franchise. The argument is often brought forward that legal responsibility is not recognized under the age of 21. I happen to be one of those who believe that legal responsibility might well be applied to young people at the age of 18, too, because more and more of these people are taking on commitments and increasingly it appears to me they should be legally responsible for them. However that may be, I endorse the remarks made by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott). I wish to support the lowering of the voting age from 21 to 18 and to recommend to this house that it should either pass the bill or refer it to the standing committee on privileges and elections for reconsideration, since it has already unanimously approved an amendment to section 14 of the Canada Elections Act. Perhaps it might be wise to wait until that report comes forward, but I sincerely hope the house will support the stand being put forward this afternoon, because all parties represented on the committee supported the reduction of the age as recommended.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I cannot quarrel in any way with the statements made by the two previous speakers in setting forth reasons why the voting age should be reduced to 18. All those reasons are valid. Furthermore, there is very little which can be said against reducing the voting age I cannot put forward an argument which has often been used in the past, because I think for example that a person who is 18 may be just as able to cast an intelligent vote as a person who is over 21. I agree with these views, yet I am not convinced we should reduce the voting age.

If this bill had been brought in a year ago I would have supported it because I could see no reason to object to it. But there are some basic questions which have been brought up today and which I think we should consider. I think one of the most important was summarized in a statement made by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Macaluso) when he said: It can do no harm. I think these were the words he used. Over the years, the right to vote, particularly in a national election, has been very jealously guarded. In the early days, going back even to Roman times, the right to vote was severely restricted. Down through the years it has been extended and on occasions this extension has come about because a group of people who wanted to vote went out and worked for it. We know that in the early days lack of social or economic status was a barrier to the right to vote. People in a state of slavery or servitude were, of course, never allowed to vote. Eventually such people were released and all adult males were permitted to vote. Much later, as has already been mentioned, the women's vote was brought in. We can all remember the history of the great battle which went on for the right of women to vote in the United Kingdom and in Canada. This was a right which was fought for and won, and rightly so. This was the second great move forward in this field.

I assume the hon. member for Danforth in bringing forward this bill has evidence that the time is ripe for the third stage in the extension of the franchise, that is, the stage of reducing the voting age. But the difficulty that I see, and I have tested this to the best of my ability, is that the young people do not really want the vote.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Aiken: My friends can make their arguments and I hope they will, but I have never seen a parade of students asking for the vote and I cannot say I have ever heard of one. Certainly no evidence was presented today of any great desire for the vote.

Earlier this year, as has already been pointed out, a group of members of the young Progressive Conservative student federation had a discussion on this matter. I was present along with several of my colleagues. I told them that if they really wanted the vote and felt that the young people of Canada generally wanted the vote and were interested in it we were prepared to support them. That particular group was not prepared to ask or press for the vote in national elections. They voted against doing so. I know the hon. member for Hamilton West was not there, and I was, but I do know that there was a good deal of discussion and feeling at the meeting.

An hon. Member: Let us have a referendum.

Mr. Aiken: I think not.

Mr. Macaluso: Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he tell us how many were there?

Mr. Aiken: I do not know how many were there or how many voted, but I do know that the recorded vote was 21 against and 6 in favour. I know that many did not vote on the resolution and that on another occasion to which I am coming the same thing happened. A large number of the young people did not vote because they said they did not care, that it meant nothing to them at all.

Before this rather shattering experience I thought I and my colleagues were really doing something for the young people of this country in supporting their request for the vote, but then I really got a shock when I found that they did not want it. Then I started to think about when I had ever heard of a request from a young people's group to reduce the voting age to 18 and I could not recall that there ever had been such a request.

However, Mr. Speaker, since this matter had been raised and discussed in the committee on privileges and elections I decided that I had better find out what the young people of my own riding thought. So I conducted a series of discussion groups. One was at the Parry Sound high school. I was asked to come and discuss the matter because the students there had indicated some interest in it. It was a perfectly voluntary arrangement. There was a substantial turn-out of the students and as best I could I put to them the arguments for and the arguments against which we hear in this house and elsewhere. I asked them to consider this matter and let me know.

There were about 75 students present at that meeting. Eighteen voted in favour of reducing the voting age, 17 voted against and the remainder would not vote. They said they were not sufficiently acquainted with the political situation or politics or national affairs even to express an opinion whether or not they should vote. We all know that there are young people who are really interested in national affairs to the extent of working for political parties, but on the average young people do not take that much interest.

I also asked some of these young people whether they would be more interested in national affairs if they were given the vote. In other words, would this be an inducement to them to find out who was running, what the issues were and so forth? Some of them said they thought it might be but the majority said that while they might have some interest they were more interested in passing their examinations. This was the attitude revealed in the answers I received.

We in this house seem to be doing a lot of thinking these days about what the people want. We are in the midst of a flag debate and many of us are trying to find out what our constituents really think and want. The same is true of the voting age problem. We would really like to know what our own constituents think, what the public think and particularly what the young people think. But I say we do not know. There has been no evidence one way or the other. I say also that until we do know we should not change. Change is only beneficial when it is for the better and until it is proven that change will be beneficial we should not change at all.

With this in mind I do not believe that the time has come to reduce the voting age in Canada. As I say, I am naturally in favour of reducing the voting age for young people if they want the vote. But I do not think it is good enough for us to say that it will not do any harm, that they will vote the same way as their parents and so forth. This is not a good enough reason to extend the franchise to another large group of voters.

I do not think anyone will argue against the fact that as you grow older you grow a little wiser. I think that at age 21 people have probably learned a little more about life than at age 18. I believe there is a definable difference between people at age 18 and at age 21, and I think we must recognize it. Until we can be shown that there is a great desire on the part of these young people to reduce the voting age I do not think we should do it.

This was not the only group to which I spoke. I spoke to several others and the results were about the same. In other words, some were for, some were against and just as many either did not care or would not express an opinion. This is not an indication of a great desire on the part of young people between 18 and 20 to have the vote in national elections. I think the right to vote is a right that must be fought for and won. It is not something we should give without being asked to do so.

I appreciate the fact that the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott) has brought this matter forward in the hope that we may perhaps run a little bit ahead of the feeling of the young people and give the vote to them before they want it, but in any aspect of life I do not think people appreciate anything given freely which they do not really want. For that reason I think we should move very slowly on this matter.

There is another problem which concerns the standing committee on privileges and elections. Technically I think there is nothing before that committee now because their proceedings came to an end when the last session finished, and their report was not adopted. I do not happen to be a member of that committee but I did read the evidence because I wanted to find out what had been said in the standing committee on privileges and elections which influenced the members to support such a move.

I found this subject had been introduced into this committee suddenly, and without notice, by a combination of a Liberal member and an N.D.P. member. The question was put and members found themselves on the spot. Members who were there apparently decided, well, we would be better off to vote for it than against it because if we vote against it we will be in an impossible position; but if we vote for it at least we will vote for something that will do no serious harm. I still go along with this view. It will not do any harm. There will not be any great catastrophe if we reduce the voting age. I merely say it is not going to do any great amount of good. It is not being requested by the young people and therefore the move has not reached the stage when it should be accepted.

The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott) who introduced this bill said he could not find any evidence to support the proposition that young people did not want it. I agree with him on that. I do not think there is any evidence. Any evidence I can gather indicates they are indifferent to the whole problem. I can say, Mr. Speaker, that if I were not fairly sure of my ground I would not be standing here and saying so. If I felt that young people really wanted the right to vote, that they really ought to have it, then I would be prepared to support this measure. I do not feel that way. I feel that if they did get it, those who would go to vote would do the best they could. I do not see any great harm arising. However I am not at all hesitant about standing in my place today and saying that the time has not yet come for a reduction in the voting age to 18 for national elections.

The hon. member for Danforth mentioned a large number of states which had reduced the voting age for national elections. Most of these states or countries were what I might call socialist states. This might not be the proper term, but except for three of the states of the United States, none of those states mentioned by the hon. member was what I would call a state of the western world—except perhaps Israel and one or two others. I was particularly looking for countries like the United States, Australia, New Zealand, France, Britain and the Netherlands. None of those countries has reduced the voting age to 18. I am not too much impressed by the list the hon. member read.

I will admit that in the state of Israel they are making great progress in bringing about social reform. They are making great effort to bring their young people into the national light. I think this is a good thing. They have, perhaps different circumstances than we have. With this one exception, and perhaps one or two others, I do not accept the list of nations which have reduced their national voting age as being impressive to the point of persuading us in Canada to reduce our voting age.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that is the sum total of my remarks. We are having a full consideration of the elections act by the standing committee on privileges and elections. I believe seldom, if ever, has it been the custom that while a committee is considering a certain matter, has gone through the motions at least of considering the whole of the elections act, that we in this house should introduce a bill anticipating the recommendations of that committee. It may be said that there was unanimous agreement in the committee, but when the report of the committee is introduced I am sure there will be considerable debate on many of the amendments proposed to the Canada Elections Act. For that reason, I do not believe this is the proper time to introduce this measure. In this respect, I agree with the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Macaluso). I took it that he was somewhat doubtful as to whether or not this was the proper procedure, to introduce this bill at this time. I agree with him. However, I am not going to hide behind that. I do not think it is time to reduce the voting age to 18.

Mr. Macaluso: Would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order; the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, the Social Credit party is on record as being in favour of lowering the age limit for voting. Back in the parliament of 1953-57, the hon. member who at that time represented the constituency of Wetaskiwin, a member of the Social Credit party, introduced a bill with this thought in mind. As I stated, therefore, we are on record as being in support of the principle of this particular bill this afternoon. As has been pointed out, the province of British Columbia has already reduced the voting age to 19. I believe there was considerable discussion and debate as to whether it should be lowered to 18. However, apparently there was a general feeling it would be wiser to leave it at age 19, and therefore this is the position in the provincial field.

Many arguments have been advanced from time to time in support of the idea that young people, about the age of 18, should be granted the franchise and would be well able to exercise that franchise in a responsible manner. It has been pointed out that they serve in the armed forces. They occupy positions of some prominence and responsibility in various fields and, therefore, should have the opportunity of casting their ballots and making their choice of a representative. We feel, therefore, it is a principle of democracy that, so far as possible, those who are subject to government should have a choice of the organ that governs them. We talk about the fact that democracy is government with the consent of the governed. It seems therefore, Mr. Speaker, that they should have an opportunity to indicate their willingness to be governed by a certain representative, and this would be in the interests of all concerned. We feel, again, it would encourage young people to take an interest in politics at an age when they are still in school. Therefore they would give themselves to a study of the respective platforms of political parties. They would seek to understand various political philosophies and inform themselves as to the issues confronting the country. If this could be done it would be a very worth-while accomplishment.

Young people just standing on the threshold of life have more at stake in the future than those who are older in age. If they are able to stand the stress of life they will live longer, and therefore will be longer affected by the activities and decisions of government. A lot of young people are taxpayers, many of them possibly at the age of 18 years. At a time when so much of the government's revenue is taken from ordinary taxpayers to meet the expenses of government, surely as many taxpayers as possible should have the opportunity of expressing their opinions with respect to those who will be legislating for them and imposing taxes upon them.

It has been suggested that young people are not qualified to express intelligently their views on matters of government. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, there are a great many young people aged 18 and 19—I am not going to be a sticker for either age, although I think possibly 19 might be better—who are more qualified than older people of a far greater age. Young people take a keen interest and are not afraid to make decisions while many older people tend to settle down and say, "So long as I can make a living I can get along. Leave it to the young people."

I do not intend to take up the remaining time as there may be other members who wish to speak on this measure, and I certainly do not want to talk it out. Reference has been made to the article written by Norman DePoe in Weekend Magazine of March, 1964. On page 3 of that article we find:

> The students union council of the University of Manitoba...passed a vote supporting retention of the voting age at 21.

It also referred to a meeting of the Progressive Conservative students federation which took a similar stand, but I do not think that it is indicative of the general attitude of young people. It may be in certain circles, but I am inclined to think most young people of this age would appreciate having an opportunity to make decisions and to cast their votes in an intelligent manner.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, this was passed by a committee last session. If the government sees fit to move that it be referred to a committee again we would support such a motion. Some consideration should be given to this matter with a view to lowering the age limit to allow a greater number of Canadian citizens to exercise the franchise in this enlightened age.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes remaining, I would not want—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): The hon. member for Beauce.

Mr. Gérard Perron (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to have the great honour of killing the bill. However, I would like to say, on behalf of our group, that we approve and support the bill introduced by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott).

Judging by the remarks made by various other members who spoke before me, it is quite obvious that, today, those who have reached 18 years of age have acquired enough maturity and emancipation to make up their own minds regarding the choice of their representatives.

It has been proved that 18 year old youths take an active part, through income tax and in other ways, in contributing to public funds. In such circumstances, it would be normal to give them the opportunity to choose their own representatives. Moreover, by allowing them to play the democracy game, they would perhaps be less prone to resort to violence which unavoidably leads to dictatorship.

I do not want to monopolize the time of the house but I want to add that the passing of this measure would give another opportunity for French Canadians to gain their freedom. Our past proves to us that youngsters want to integrate themselves to the adult population of Canada and take an active part in the political life of their province and their country. In short, it would be desirable to give our youths the opportunity to take part in national elections as soon as they reach 18 years of age.

[Mr. Patterson.]

Mr. Terry Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, before one of my friends on the other side of the house asks that question which is usually asked of a speaker when he rises a few minutes before the closing of the hour, I will answer it. Yes, I am aware that if I speak now I will kill this and, yes, that is exactly my intention, because I do not think for one moment that now is an opportune time in this country's affairs to lower the voting age to 18.

I may say I am quite aware of the very intelligent interest shown by many of that age, and I have had the benefit of their hard work in my own election campaigns. I may say they are just as serious as the 21 year olds; sometimes they are much harder working, but I think this is only a very small percentage of them. They make a very impressive mark; but the point I have made in this house previously on this subject is that voting is not just a case of intelligence and hard work.

Voting requires judgment, and judgment in this day and age requires an ever increasing amount of education to begin to comprehend the problems the country faces. It cannot be achieved while one is still encompassed with that very harsh problem of trying to catch up to this modern age. I say judgment is the result of education, intelligence and experience. Today if any change in the voting age is required, in keeping with conditions in the country, in keeping with the requirements of our modern technological society it would, if anything, be to raise the voting age.

A few years ago when comparatively little education was required a man could cope with life at 15 if he were full grown and had his full strength, but now it takes more and more education and experience and now, more than ever, if we are to run this country properly, if we are to have votes cast properly, there must be judgment. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in saying I hope this will go no further at this time. May I call it six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): The hour for consideration of private members' business has expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: I would like to ask the acting house leader about the business for next week?

Mr. MacNaught: On Monday we will resume the committee stage of Bill C-90, an act to amend the National Defence Act. When the committee and third reading stage are concluded we will consider second reading stage of the bill relating to youth allowances. We will then take up the committee stage of Bill S-17, respecting the territorial sea and fishing zones of Canada. This bill has been considered by the standing committee on marine and fisheries and referred back to the house.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, July 6, 1964

The house met at 2 p.m.

NEW MEMBER

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that the Clerk of the House has received from the chief electoral officer a certificate of the election and return of Mr. Carl Legault, member for the electoral district of Nipissing.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED

Carl Legault, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Nipissing, introduced by Hon. Paul Martin and Hon. G. J. McIlraith.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR FERRY CALL AT BURIN PENINSULA PORT

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present to this honourable house a petition on behalf of a large number of my constituents. This petition is signed by the president of the joint councils of the Burin peninsula and the president of the Burin peninsula chamber of commerce as well as by the five mayors of the municipalities of this area. Altogether they represent some 30,000 people.

This petition is in the same sense as the one with 2,500 signatures of which copies have been forwarded to the Minister of Transport and to my other Newfoundland colleagues. The petitioners pray that when the new east coast ferry goes into service between North Sydney and Argentia the government of Canada will issue instructions for this ferry to call at one port on the Burin peninsula, either Marystown or Burin, while en route between these two terminals.

PETITION REQUESTING RETENTION OF RED ENSIGN

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present to the house an amended and extended petition addressed to the honourable the House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled. This petition represents the views of something over 900 of my constituents who are members or supporters of all parties in my constituency. I might say we have not got a fifth political wheel there. The petition reads as follows:

Petition

To The Honourable The House of Commons of Canada

In Parliament Assembled

The petition of the undersigned citizens of the Dominion of Canada humbly sheweth:

We, the undersigned, believe Canada's heritage and future can only be symbolized by the red ensign, bearing witness to her origins and the fundamental cultures from which will stem her future greatness. No twig of leaves alone can achieve this.

And as in duty bound your petitioners will ever pray.

The petition is signed by the member for Kootenay West as well as by all these constituents.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ANNOUNCEMENT OF GRANT FOR HEALTH SCIENCES CENTRE

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to announce that the government proposes the expenditure of $4 million to assist in the design and construction of a health sciences centre at the University of British Columbia. This is a special pilot project, outside and apart from our health grants program, and will be provided for in my departmental estimates later this year.

The development of such a centre at the University of British Columbia has been under study for a number of years. It will establish a new concept in the training of the health professions and has been strongly endorsed by medical health educators.

The amount authorized by the government, which is conditional upon at least an equal amount being provided by the provincial government, will be made available in instalments as planning and construction progress. It is expected that up to two years' planning will be required before construction can begin.

Health Sciences Centre

The new centre will be primarily a teaching institution, but will also provide a 410 bed hospital with extensive research facilities. It is also to be used for the referral of patients needing the special services and facilities contained in such a unit.

In authorizing this provisional grant the government is aware of the importance of the teaching pattern developed at this university in providing common instruction facilities for all health provisions, doctors, dentists, pharmacists, physiotherapists, occupational therapists, social workers and psychologists.

This team approach to teaching is considered a major advance in medical education and should have an important impact on the quality of health care, particularly in the face of future developments regarding the provision of health services. The improvement in the method of teaching should also encourage the entry of more young people into the health professions.

This pioneer project may well establish an important pattern for future development and the government, for this reason, considers that a special grant for this important purpose is fully warranted.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): May I very briefly, as a representative of the city of Vancouver, express our great appreciation of the statement that has just been made by the minister. I personally have a great deal of satisfaction in the announcement that has just been made because some 15 years ago the members of this party, provincially, recommended the same thing, and there were aspersions cast upon us by both the medical profession and the university. Fifteen years later, sir, our intelligence and our foresight have been confirmed. I give honour to the minister that today I am in the House of Commons to say "Thank you ever so much".

Mr. Charles J. M. Willoughby (Kamloops): May I also add my thanks to the Minister of National Health and Welfare for this wonderful announcement. This is going to mean a great deal to the development of the University of British Columbia, particularly the medical faculty. I know that this, to a large extent, is the result of the wonderful work that has been done by Dr. John McCreary in promoting this particular project. I think he deserves the thanks of everybody in British Columbia, and the action taken by the department here has upheld his recommendations.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): May I very briefly state how happy we are with the announcement that has been made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. We appreciate the consideration that has been given to this matter. We note also the reference that has been made to the fact that the grant is conditional upon a similar amount being forthcoming from the provincial government. I am sure that with their interest in the welfare of the people, with their forward looking policies, they will be glad to co-operate in this important work.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, we associate with the members of the other parties in order to congratulate the minister for that undertaking at the University of British Columbia, not because we are citizens of British Columbia but because we are citizens of Canada. We believe that Canada has everything to gain by increasing research in the medical field as well as in all other areas of education.

We live in an era where science is making tremendous progress, where education must develop more than ever, and such undertakings, especially in a field as important as health, are sure to increase our country's well-being and expansion.

We hope the minister has already enlisted the co-operation of the government of British Columbia, because, as every member of the house knows, education comes under the provincial authorities.

TELEVISION

EXTENSION OF FREEZE ON APPLICATIONS FOR ALTERNATIVE SERVICE

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, in September, 1963, Mr. Stewart, Mr. Ouimet and Mr. Jamieson jointly recommended that applications for licences involving the extension of alternative television services should not be received or heard before July 1, 1964. That recommendation was subsequently implemented by the Minister of Transport.

On May 25, 1964 I appointed an advisory committee on broadcasting with terms of reference that included an inquiry into "the various means of providing alternative television services". Because this question is presently under investigation and cannot be separated from the other issues which are being reviewed by the advisory committee on broadcasting, the government feels that the freeze on the extension of alternative television services should be extended until a statement of policy is made shortly after the committee has presented its report early in 1965.

Questions

CURRENCIES ACCEPTED FOR EXPORTS

Question No. 1,063—Mr. Côté (Chicoutimi):

1. What countries have had commercial transactions with Canada during the past five years?
2. What arrangements have these countries made to pay for their purchases?
3. What currency does the Canadian exchange fund accept in payment for exports?

[Translation]

Answer: 1. Assuming that by commercial transactions is meant both Canadian exports to and imports from such countries, the countries and areas shown on the attached list have had commercial transactions with Canada during the last five years.

2. The government has no direct knowledge of the payment terms arranged for the bulk of these transactions as these are subject to private negotiation between buyer and seller. The government has knowledge of the transactions which have been insured under section 21 of the Export Credits Insurance Act and of the transactions financed under section 21A of that act. The orders in council authorizing the corporation to enter into these transactions have already been tabled in the house.

3. The exchange fund does not accept currencies specifically in payment for exports. Exporters and importers normally deal directly with the chartered banks to satisfy their foreign exchange requirements. These requirements may be in any currency in which the exporters and importers are dealing. To the extent that the chartered banks cannnot fulfill all of their foreign exchange needs from their own internal funds, they buy or sell in the foreign exchange market. The exchange fund deals in this market to fulfil its original purpose which is to aid the Minister of Finance in the control and protection of the external value of the Canadian monetary unit. In fulfilling this function, the minister is empowered to purchase the following from time to time, with the money in the exchange fund:—

(a) gold; (b) currency of the United States; (c) currencies of any country other than Canada or the United States that are freely convertible into gold or United States dollars.

The following countries and areas have had commercial transactions with Canada during the last five years:

United Kingdom, Gibraltar, Denmark, Germany (Federal Republic), Norway, Sweden, Bulgaria, Hungary, Union of Soviet Socialist Republic, Qatar, Iran, Israel, Libya, Sudan, United Arab Republic-Egypt, Rhodesia & Nyasaland, Uganda, Algeria, Congo, French Africa n.e.s., Ivory Coast, Mozambique, Togo, Hong Kong, Pakistan, Burma, China (Communist), Korea, Taiwan (Republic of China), New Zealand, United States (Oceania), Argentina, Chile, French Guiana, Surinam, Bahamas, Barbados, Trinidad and Tobago, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Mexico, Panama, Greenland, United States, Ireland, Austria, Finland, Greece, Italy, Portugal, Switzerland, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Yugoslavia, Cyprus, British Middle East n.e.s., Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Ghana, Mauritius & Dependencies, Sierra Leone, Republic of South Africa, Angola, French Equatorial Africa, Gabon Republic, Liberia, Portugal Africa n.e.s., Tunisia, India, British East Indies n.e.s., Indonesia, Philippines, Thailand, Australia, British Oceania n.e.s., British Guiana, Bolivia, Colombia, Paraguay, Uruguay, Bermuda, Jamaica, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Haiti, Netherlands Antilles, Puerto Rico, St. Pierre and Miquelon, Malta and Gozo, Belgium & Luxembourg, France, Iceland, Netherlands, Spain, Albania, Germany (East), Roumania, Bahrain, Kuwait, Ethiopia, Iraq, Lebanon, Somalia, Turkey, Kenya, Nigeria, Tanganyika, British Africa n.e.s., Cameroons, French West Africa, Guinea, Morocco, Spanish Africa, Ceylon, Malaya & Singapore, Afghanistan, Cambodia and Laos, Japan, Portuguese Asia, Viet Nam, Fiji, French Oceania, Falkland Islands, Brazil, Ecuador, Peru, Venezuela, British Honduras, Leeward & Windward Islands, Cuba, French West Indies, Honduras, Nicaragua, United States (Virgin Islands).

USE OF MAPLE LEAF INSIGNIA ON C.N.R. FREIGHT CARS

Question No. 1,068—Mr. Hales:

Has the C.N.R. management decided to withdraw the insignia of the maple leaf and the caption "Serves all Canada" from all C.N.R. freight cars and, if so (a) for what reasons (b) under whose instructions were these orders issued?

Mr. Pickersgill: The management of the Canadian National Railways advise that the company's decision on its trademark is contained in a press release issued on December 15, 1960, and from which the following extracts have been taken as explanatory information in reply to the question:

"The trademark, developed and tested during the past year, began appearing on the sides of box cars at the same time that C.N. employees were introduced to the symbol in the December-January issue of the railways' employee magazine "Keeping Track".

Designed by Toronto's Allan Fleming, the trademark is a continuous line forming the letters "C.N." to express movement—the movement of men, messages and materials.

The traditional "R" has been eliminated because the trademark must service C.N.'s multi-type business—hotels, communications, express, freight and passenger services. As well, "C.N." is bilingual; "C.N.R." is not.

The new trademark is the first step in a comprehensive redesign program launched by the C.N. in the summer of 1959. The decision to embark on the program followed a survey on public attitudes conducted across Canada. The survey showed that in spite of centralized traffic control, dieselization, modern electronic hump yards, new microwave facilities and other modern programs being carried out by the railway, the public still regarded Canadian National and railways generally as old-fashioned and slow about trying to find new ways of improving their operations and service to the public.

The program is built around the new C.N. symbol, but a great deal of attention is being given to the backgrounds against which the trademark will be applied: color schemes for trains, trucks, uniforms, signs, telegraph blanks, stations, letterheads, and all the many items involved in C.N.'s businesses."

CURRENCY OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Question No. 1,092—Mr. Côté (Chicoutimi):

1. What foreign countries have convertible currency, and what monetary units do they use?
2. What foreign countries have unconvertible currency, and what monetary units do they use?
3. What countries are members of the international monetary fund?
4. What countries are not members of the international monetary fund?

[Translation]

Answer: 1. The clearest standard of convertibility is adherence to article 8 of the international monetary fund. Countries adhering to article 8 undertake to avoid restrictions on current payments, avoid discriminatory currency practices, and convert foreign held balances of their currencies. Switzerland, although not a member of the international monetary fund, would also meet this standard. The monetary unit of Switzerland is the Swiss franc.

TEST EXAMINATION OF GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS

Question No. 1,110—Mr. Nugent:

1. What criteria determine the test basis for the examination of accounts by the Auditor General?

2. Referring to the Auditor General's report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1963, at p. 3, what in detail and with full particulars were the "too many instances where staff shortages result in the audit office being unable to carry out its test examinations with sufficient frequency or in sufficient depth to achieve even the minimum standard required by modern accepted auditing practice"?

3. What is "modern accepted auditing practice" referred to in this statement and in what particulars has it been departed from?

4. What is the minimum standard of such practice and in what particulars has it not been achieved in any department specifying such department?

5. In what departments or branches of departments were the test examinations carried out with insufficient depth?

6. In respect of each of these departments or branches of departments (a) what in particular was the lack of depth (b) what would have been a sufficient depth?

7. In what departments or branches of departments were the test examinations carried out with insufficient frequency?

8. In respect of these (a) what was the frequency (b) what would have been sufficient frequency?

Answer: 1. When the Auditor General states that his examinations of the accounts have included such tests as he considered necessary in the circumstances, he means that he has examined portions of the transactions, supporting documents and records to the extent that he deems necessary in order to form an independent opinion as to the correctness of the accounts.

The auditing procedure of testing or sampling represents an inspection of a sample of items selected from the transactions of the period under review with the object of judging the degree of reliability and quality of the whole on the basis of the sample. One of the most important factors to be taken into consideration in determining the extent of testing required is the effectiveness of the existing system of internal control which is reviewed by the Auditor General. Other factors include the reliability of the accounting records, the risk of the existence of signficant errors and the relative importance of the transactions to be tested. The extent of testing in any examination is a matter of the auditor's judgment which is recognized by the employment of the words "The Auditor General shall examine in such manner as he may deem necessary" in the Financial Administration Act.

2. The statement quoted from page 3 of the Auditor General's report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1963 to the House of Commons was also made by him in his report to the House of Commons for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1962.

It would not be in the public interest were the Auditor General to make known in detail and with full particulars those instances where his test examinations have not been carried out with sufficient frequency or in sufficient depth to achieve even the minimum standard required by modern accepted auditing practice.

3. Modern accepted auditing practice may be defined in general as the examination of accounting documents and supporting evidence for the purpose of reaching an informed opinion concerning their propriety. As in the case under (2) above, it would not be in the public interest to reveal the extent to which this has been departed from.

4, 5, 6, 7 and 8. As mentioned in the answers to (2) and (3) above, it is not in the public interest to disclose the extent to which the audit office has been unable to carry out its test examinations with sufficient frequency or in sufficient depth to achieve even the minimum standard required by modern accepted auditing practice.

TRANSPORT DEPARTMENT PUBLICITY FOR C.N.R.

Question No. 1,122—Mr. Latulippe:

1. What official of the Department of Transport is in charge of promotional programs carried out at airports, railway stations and hotels belonging to the C.N.R.?
2. What is the Department of Transport's policy with regard to publicity in railway stations, airports and hotels owned by the C.N.R.?
3. Who authorizes the various companies to advertise on billboards in railway stations, airports and railway hotels and what standards are followed for rates?
4. Are tenders accepted for renting space used for advertising by the Department of Transport?
5. In the last two years, how many advertising firms have been authorized to advertise in railway stations, airports and hotels and what are the names of those firms?
6. What revenue has the government derived from each publicity campaign carried out by advertising firms?
7. Have any advertising firms requested the job of handling advertising for the 1967 world exhibition in railway stations, airports or hotels belonging to the C.N.R. and, if so (a) how many (b) what firms (c) what place and what terms were involved in each case?
8. What promotional programs did the Department of Transport undertake in 1962-63 and what was the cost of each program and who handled them?

[Mr. Nugent.]

Answer: 1. Not applicable as the Department of Transport does not carry out any promotional programs in connection with airports, or with railway stations and hotels belonging to the Canadian National Railways.

2. Publicity has been taken as referring to advertising at airport terminals and in this regard the policy of the department is to process applications for advertising space as they are received. Consequently the tendering procedure does not apply since any party wishing to advertise at airports may apply. The department does not deal with advertising agencies as such on an exclusive basis. The department has no jurisdiction over Canadian National stations and hotels.

3. See answer to part 2. Advertising at departmental airports is authorized by the Minister of Transport under the government airport concession operations regulations.

4. See answer to part 2.

5 and 6. See answer to part 2. Within the last two years the department has not entered into exclusive agreements with advertising agencies. The department has entered into an agreement with a Montreal company (Marile Limited) permitting it to instal its advertising units in the terminal building at the Montreal international airport. The company is free to solicit advertising from interested parties, but this is not on any exclusive basis for the advertising in the terminal building. The department still accepts applications from parties wishing to rent advertising space in the terminal building.

The rental provision in the agreement with Marile Limited is $125 per month per unit or 10 per cent of gross revenue whichever is the greater.

7. No applications for advertising in connection with the 1967 world exhibition have been received by the department. As mentioned in the answer to part 2, the department does not have jurisdiction over Canadian National stations and hotels.

8. See answer to part 2.

*RECOMMENDATIONS OF UNIVERSITY TEACHERS RESPECTING FINANCING

Question No. 1,153—Mr. Orlikow:

Has the government given consideration to the recommendations made to the Minister of Finance by the Canadian association of university teachers in its brief on the financing of universities on January 27, 1964 and, if so (a) does the government, in concert with the governments of the provinces, and collaboration with the universities, plan to develop a systematic long range program for the planning and financing of university development, with respect both to operating and capital requirements, initially for the period 1964-65 to 1970-71 (b) does the government consider that the goal should be to enable the universities to discharge their extraordinarily great responsibilities on the scale required of them, in such a way that will place comparable universities in the different regions of the country on equal terms with respect to the payment of staff and the provision of facilities (c) has the government considered the appointment of a small consultative committee to aid in the formulation and development of the proposals in recommendations 1 and 2 and that there be strong representation on this committee from members of the academic profession who are actively engaged in teaching and research (d) does the government consider that in the interim period, pending the implementation of the proposed new comprehensive long range program of financing the universities, the federal operating grants be increased to at least $100,000,000 for 1964-65 and the federal government commit itself to bearing a minimum proportion, at least one third, of the universities' operating costs, the grant to be distributed on a new basis, using provincial populations in the age group 16-24, with adjustments for provincial differences in proportions of out-of-province students, and for differences in provincial fiscal capacity (e) does the government consider that a substantial increase should be made in the annual funds available to the Canada council to enable it to expand its program in support of research in the humanities and the oscial sciences and in support of research collections in university libraries (f) will the national research council and medical research council be provided with sufficient funds to enable them to sustain and expand their support of scientific and medical research in the universities and to make those areas of research now heavily dependant on research funds from the United States less dependent on these sources (g) will a federal contribution of $300 million be made toward the estimated capital requirements of the universities for the three-year period 1963-64 to 1965-66, as recommended by the Canadian universities foundation in its brief, and will the federal government commit itself to bearing a minimum proportion, at least one third, of the universities' capital costs?

Mr. Pennell: The government gave consideration to these recommendations but considers it necessary now to re-examine them in accordance with the answer given to the hon. member on May 20, 1964 by the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister as recorded on page 3388 of Hansard. In any event, most of this question relates to decisions of policy which, when taken, would be announced in due course.

VALUE OF SAINT JOHN RIVER

Question No. 1,312—Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton):

Has the Atlantic development board any information concerning the present and potential value of the Saint John river, especially that portion affected by the Mactaquac project, in its natural state?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am advised by the Atlantic development board as follows:

It would be extremely difficult to assign meaningful quantitative values to the various features and aspects of the Saint John river, present and potential.

The Saint John river is, of course, well known for its salmon fishery, both commercial and sport. There are, however, widely differing estimates of the real value to the economy of the salmon sport fishery.

The river and valley have great natural beauty. To date, commercial development for recreation and tourism has not occurred on any large scale. The control of pollution, a serious problem in the river at present, is essential to the full development of the recreational and tourist value of the river. There is reason to believe the potential of the river for tourism and recreation will also be greatly enhanced by the creation of a 50 mile lake above the dam consequent upon the Mactaquac power development, particularly if steps are taken to deal with pollution.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER FLOW

Question No. 1,318—Mr. Cowan:

1. How many cubic feet of water are the power companies on both sides of the St. Lawrence river at Cornwall, Ontario, authorized to withdraw for power purposes by the second, minute, day or month or whatever period of time is used in such calculations and, where may a copy of such authorization or authorizations be seen?
2. What is the normal inflow into the St. Lawrence river at Kingston, Ontario, from lake Ontario, in cubic feet per second, minute, day or month or whatever period of time is used in such calculations?

Mr. Laing: 1. With the exception of small quantities of water diverted past the Barnhart island dam for purposes of domestic water supply and the operation of the navigation channel and locks, the flow of the St. Lawrence river at that point is available for power purposes. This flow varies with many factors and is regulated in accordance with orders of approval dated 29 October 1952 and 2 July 1956 issued by the international joint commission. Copies of the orders are available at the commission's Ottawa office, room 303, 75 Albert street.

2. Based on long term average conditions and adjusted to present developments, an average of 241,000 cubic feet per second.

COST OF H.M.C.S. "PROVIDER"

Question No. 1,321—Mr. Fisher:

1. When was the original tender called for H.M.C.S. Provider?
2. Did the R.C.N. or any government department indicate at any time before the bids were in what the estimated cost of the vessel was likely to be?
3. How many companies tendered for the vessel?
4. What was the successful tender, made by whom, and how did it compare with the unsuccessful tenders?
5. What was the actual finished cost of the vessel, as given by the shipbuilder?
6. What was the actual cost of the vessel to the R.C.N. or the crown as it was received from the shipbuilder?
7. Has the R.C.N. any claims against the shipbuilder and, if so, for what and to what amount?
8. Has the shipbuilder any claims against the crown and, if so, for what and to what amount?

Mr. Drury: 1. Original tender, dated September 9, 1959, closed January 29, 1960.

2. Yes—the government was informed in September, 1958 that the estimated cost was likely to be $16,875,000. In addition, the then minister of national defence in his white paper April 1959, stated that the cost was estimated at $16,000,000.

3. Six.

4. The lowest basic comparative proposal for the vessel, and an initial small complement of "on board" spares, was $11,044,584 sales tax extra, submitted by Davie Shipbuilding Company Ltd. The company's actual bid was $11,040,960 but for comparison purposes this was adjusted upward by $3,624. Using the same basis for comparison, the unsuccessful tenders were as follows: No. 2, $11,261,173; No. 3, $11,793,750; No. 4, $13,177,981; No. 5, $16,218,904; No. 6, $17,666,076.

It should be noted that all tenders were subject to the following:

(a) Sales tax to be extra to contract price.

(b) Escalation to be allowed for labour and material.

(c) Additional spares specified by national defence to be extra to contract price.

(d) Construction and material requirements not covered by tender documents and specifications to be extra to contract price.

(e) Design changes to be extra to contract price.

[Mr. Laing.]

These factors have amounted to:

(a)	$1,537,510	(estimated)
(b)	1,300,000	(estimated)
(c)	806,000	(estimated)
(d)	1,194,944
(e)	503,490
Total	$5,341,944	(estimated)

5. The shipbuilder has stated that the total cost of the program to the company amounted to:

$15,654,000	ex. sales tax
1,537,510	est. sales tax
$17,191,510

6. Contract price agreed to by the shipbuilder when the vessel was accepted by R.C.N. is as follows:

	$12,739,394	Firm price ex. sales tax
Escalation	1,300,000	est.
Additional spares	806,000	est.
	$14,845,394
Sales tax	1,537,510	est.
	$16,382,904

Recapitulation: Initial tender	$11,040,960
Factors enumerated in question 4	5,341,944
	$16,382,904

7. The crown has an outstanding claim against the shipbuilder under the warranty clause of the contract. Following acceptance of the vessel, defects appeared in some of the vessel's winch pumps and motors. The great part of the remedial work is being done at the shipbuilder's subcontractor's plant at the latter's expense. Some initial remedial work was done by Halifax dockyard personnel, and a claim for reimbursement to the crown for costs involved is being prepared. The amount has yet to be established.

8. The shipbuilder has advised that the costs which the company incurred on the program were in excess of the contract price, and has requested an additional payment of $685,660 for work performed which, he claims, was not covered by the contract. The claim is being investigated.

The Department of National Revenue reports that two drawback claims for direct imports of parts and materials in the total amount of $313,259.41. The shipbuilder has advised that he expects to file a third claim for the approximate amount of $90,000.

3. What are the names of the researchers and the salary each one will receive?

Because the hiring of research staff is not completed and because we are negotiating other appointments, it is not in the interests of the public purse that these salaries, which will appear in public accounts, should be specified at this time.

4. (a) To undertake assigned research projects in one's field of competence and to submit reports of findings to the director of research. (b) Only one person already living in Europe is working for the commission on a retainer fee. He will be collecting data for comparative studies. NEW STAMP SERIES

Question No. 1,332—Mr. Macquarrie:

What consideration prompted the Post Office Department to commence its new stamp series with the emblems of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec rather than the senior provinces, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, which were established political entities prior to 1867?

Mr. Nicholson: The department has plans to issue a series of postage stamps bearing the floral emblems and the coats of arms of the ten provinces, the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories before the end of 1966. Our stamp issue program for 1964 made it impossible to issue the stamps honouring each of the four provinces which entered confederation on July 1, 1867. It was therefore decided to issue the stamps for the two largest provinces in terms of size and population, to be followed by the stamps for Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

2. Is the government giving consideration to the request of the consumers association of Canada that the food and drug directorate establish standards for fruit nectars, fruit drinks, fruit ades, etc., with regulations requiring the percentage of specified fruit juice in these drinks to be printed clearly and prominently on the label of the container in close proximity to the name of the drink?

3. Is the government giving consideration to the request of the consumers association of Canada that the food and drug directorate establish minimum standards for cream for manufacturing not less exacting than present standards for milk manufacturing?

Question No. 1,342—Mr. Orlikow:

Mr. Hays: 1. Yes. The development of grade standards for canned fruits and vegetables grown and processed in Canada was begun by this department a number of years ago. At the present time grades are established for the great majority of domestic canned fruits and vegetables. From time to time as they assume commercial significance grade standards are developed for these new products.

The finished products are under systematic inspection by the department to ensure that grade standards are maintained.

2. Yes. The question of label declaration of can contents is being studied by this department. There are other departments involved in this, and it is felt that the various departments in consultation with industry will arrive at a satisfactory solution.

LOS ANGELES WORLD FAIR IN 1967

Has the government of Canada been advised officially, or otherwise, of any requests by the promoters of a so-called world fair in Los Angeles in 1967 to the international body of which Canada is a member to have the proposed Los Angeles fair of 1967 qualify as a world fair and, if so, what representations has the government of Canada made, or does it intend to make in this regard?

Answer: There has been no advice, official or otherwise, presented to the government of Canada with respect to a so-called world fair in Los Angeles in 1967. The bureau of international expositions has, however, accepted for registration a special category fair to be held at Long Beach, California, in 1968. This fair is to be known as "The California world's fair on transportation and communications" and will be conducted, tentatively, from April 27, 1968 to October 27, 1968.

VACANCY

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a communication notifying me that a vacancy has occurred in the representation, namely: of Gordon Chaplin, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Waterloo South, by decease.

Accordingly I have addressed my warrant to the chief electoral officer for the issue of a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

VANCOUVER—POSSIBLE USE OF FORMER R.C.A.F. BASE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Secretary of State a question in connection with a matter I brought up the other day regarding the Kitsilano reserve in Vancouver. I asked him whether the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has made an application to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation for the land and buildings on this reserve. I am speaking of the area which was occupied by the airport. Second, I wish to ask the hon. gentleman whether this land is still controlled by or in the custody of crown assets, or whether it has been turned over to the C.B.C.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): As far as I am aware the C.B.C. intends to make an application to crown assets in order to acquire new facilities in British Columbia, but I do not know whether or not this application has been made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then I direct a question to the Minister of Industry in this connection; I think he is in charge of this. Has an application been made by the C.B.C. and, if so, would the minister give an assurance that no action will be taken to transfer this property, which is needed for parkland purposes in Vancouver, until the fullest consideration has been given to the objections which have been taken thereto by a large number of people in Vancouver?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): No; no such application has been made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Should an application be made, is the minister prepared to give that assurance; because the head of the C.B.C. when he was out in Vancouver indicated that he was going to get this property regardless of the wishes of the people.

Mr. Drury: I think I can reassure the right hon. gentleman. Full consideration will be given to all proper representations.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): It is awfully difficult for a member from Vancouver to get in a question on this subject in comparison with the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

An hon. Member: Get in earlier.

Mr. Winch: I have been on this for months, not just in the last week. May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry who is responsible for crown assets, and ask him if he can give the house any information as a result of a telegram, which I have made available to him, received from the Vancouver parks board commissioner this morning to the effect that this is the crucial week of decision. Can the minister state whether this is a crucial week? Are negotiations under way, or has a decision already been reached?

Mr. Drury: No decision has been taken. The president of the C.B.C. was himself out in Vancouver last week looking into this matter. He has since returned to Ottawa. Since then no formal proposal has been received from the city by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation in respect to this particular property.

Mr. Winch: Has any official representation been made to crown assets by C.B.C. officials?

Mr. Drury: I am not sure what "official representation" means. I repeat that no application by the C.B.C. to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation to acquire ownership of this property has been received.

Mr. Winch: Did the minister also say the city of Vancouver—

Mr. Drury: I said we had received no submission from the city of Vancouver since Mr. Ouimet's visit to Vancouver.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A further supplementary question. Did the minister give any authority to any other minister of the government to offer a deed of half the 40 acres providing the C.B.C. got the balance?

Mr. Drury: No, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—REPORTED SECRET LANDING OF GREEK TROOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and ask whether he has received any information from the secretary general of the United Nations as to what action that body intends to take with respect to the violation of the security council resolution, in view of the landing of Greek troops and the statement of General Grivas announcing a policy of enosis for Cyprus.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have been in touch with the United Nations over the week end and again today. The secretary general has reported to our ambassador at the United Nations that these matters are now under consideration but that he is not in a position today to make any statement or to give any indication of the course he intends to follows. I may say that there are important negotiations under way now in Geneva and elsewhere, but beyond that I cannot go.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): A supplementary question. May I ask the minister whether he has had any word as to what action is being taken to protect the water supply lines as far as British forces connected with the United Nations in Cyprus are concerned?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the United Nations command has advised us—and this was confirmed some time ago by the Minister of National Defence—that plans were naturally being prepared for any emergencies of that kind.

Mr. Thompson: Could the minister inform the house whether there is any truth in the report that Turkish troops have been landed on the island over the week end?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will perhaps recall the statement I made a week ago in this context with regard to the importation of arms. Beyond that and beyond what I said on Friday it is not desirable to go at this time.

LABOUR RELATIONS

NON-OPERATING RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—DISCUSSIONS WITH RAILWAY PRESIDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

As regards the problem the two railway systems the C.N.R. and the C.P.R., have to solve, that is, a salary increase for their employees representing a $57 million expenditure, could the minister reveal to the house the terms of the proposal the government is discussing with Mr. Crump and Mr. Gordon in order to help those two companies meet that situation? Could we have some information on the matter?

[Text]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): No, sir.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will that government proposal be submitted to the house so the members and the general public can examine it thoroughly before it is implemented?

[Text]

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the Prime Minister indicated in the house one day when I was not here that it was his impression that the negotiations between the railways and the unions were apt to be resumed very shortly. I think it would be very desirable to allow these negotiations to take their course before others intervene to anticipate their results.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport.

The government plans to help these two railway companies by subsidizing their rates which are now frozen. Are the rates frozen upwards as well as downwards, since rates are being reduced at this time and, consequently, the income. Are those rates frozen to prevent them from increasing also?

[Text]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I should seek to anticipate the ordinary course of events in this matter.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport.

Can the minister tell the house whether definite arrangements have been set forth between the Canadian government and the railway companies?

[Text]

Mr. Pickersgill: No, sir.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): A supplementary question. Have any assurances been given to the non-operating brotherhoods or to either of the railways that an increase in revenue to the railways will be granted by the government?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, sir.

AGRICULTURE

ARDA—INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSED CHANGES IN LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Forestry.

Following the speech he made in Mont Joli during the week end, could the minister tell us what amendments the government is considering with respect to ARDA and when those amendments will be introduced in the house?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, changes will be made to the agreements between the federal government and the provinces, but we do not know yet whether those changes will make it necessary to amend ARDA.

Mr. Martineau: Does the government intend to hand over to the provinces the full administration of that legislation?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, there will be no administrative changes in that connection.

[Text]

REQUEST FOR PRIORITY FOR CROP INSURANCE LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the serious drought situation in several areas in western Canada at the present time, would the government not consider it imperative to give priority to amendments to the Crop Insurance Act over the flag resolution in the proposed schedule for the latter part of July?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture will be back within two or three days, and I will direct his attention to this question when I talk to him later this afternoon. In the meantime I should like to inform the hon. gentleman that the Minister of Agriculture will be in Regina tomorrow to discuss the situation in that province with the provincial cabinet.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

APPLICATION FOR USE OF ANABLAST SERUM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address to the Minister of National Health and Welfare what on the surface may appear to be a borderline question as far as the rules are concerned, but it deals with a matter of national interest. Did a Mr. Gaston Naessens visit the director of the food and drugs division on June 29 with respect to an application for the use of anablast in the treatment of disease; what were the conditions he was informed he must comply with in order to obtain legal sanction for the use of anablast, and what procedure was he advised to follow to comply with the directorate's requirements?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member was kind enough to send me a copy of his question and I did not have much trouble in deciding that it was an excellent question for the order paper.

PROVINCIAL REPLIES RESPECTING CONFERENCE ON ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister, or perhaps it should be put to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Have the provincial premiers yet replied to the letter of the Prime Minister written on June 26, asking for their views on the holding of a conference on the Hall commission's report within six months? If so, can it be indicated what are the views of the premiers?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take this question as notice and give a reply tomorrow.

WORLD FAIR

REQUEST FOR PRESENTATION OF PROGRESS REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. First of all, I should like to compliment him on the excellent arrangements which he made for members of both houses to visit Expo '67 last Saturday. Would the minister consider having progress reports on Expo '67 made from time to time to the Canadian people by radio and television?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to give this suggestion very careful attention.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

ALLOCATION OF CONTRACTS IN MARITIME PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry. Is the minister now in a position to indicate the action to be taken by the Department of Defence Production with regard to defence contract allocations in the maritime provinces, and more especially for plants located at Amherst and Halifax?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Not yet, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Coates: A supplementary question. Might the minister be able to give us some indication when he will be able to make an announcement in this regard?

Mr. Drury: I think in the very near future, Mr. Speaker.

FINANCE

REMOVAL OF TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS AND EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance. Since the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials will cost $50 million to the Quebec hydro within five years, according to Hon. René Lévesque, is it the minister's intention to remove this tax which is prejudicial to the Canadian economy?

[Text]

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pigeon: Why, Mr. Speaker?

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question supplementary to the one put by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm to the Minister of Finance. Did the Quebec minister of natural resources ask the federal Department of Finance to exempt the Quebec Hydro from the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials?

[Text]

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I hope my hon. friends will not think I am abrupt in taking their advice and answering these questions in the "yes" or "no" fashion which they sometimes urge; but the answer again is no.

TRANSPORT

SASKATCHEWAN—REPORTED SHORTAGE OF BOX CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lawrence Watson (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, of which I have given him notice. In view of the critical situation with regard to box cars on the C.P.R. line, and particularly the Soo line between Moose Jaw and Weyburn, where a great many farmers have not been able to deliver their 8 bushel quota as yet, will the minister try to have this situation looked into at once so the farmers can have their supplementary quotas delivered before the end of the crop year on July 31?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the notice the hon. gentleman gave me I have already brought this request to the attention of the wheat board.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SEPARATION PAY OF PERSONNEL ACCEPTED IN OTHER BRANCHES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister in a position to inform the house whether a decision has been reached on a most important and immediate matter, namely the policy with regard to those who have received or will be receiving separation pay under the new plan of integration and who have been or anticipate being accepted into other branches of the armed forces?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker; I do not think I understand the question.

Mr. Winch: It is my understanding, sir, that under this plan of integration a number of servicemen have been given their separation allowances; I believe they are receiving up to ten months' pay. However, a number of them have made application to join a different branch of the armed services and have been accepted. What is the position with regard to their separation pay?

Mr. Hellyer: As far as I know, Mr. Speaker, there have not been re-enlistments, but I would be glad to check into that. We certainly will make every effort to see that no one is compulsorily retired in advance of normal retirement age who could be usefully employed in one of the other services. I will check into this matter as soon as possible.

TRADE

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER SHIPMENTS TO RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Could the Minister of Trade and Commerce give the house any further information regarding further shipments of wheat to Russia this season?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Well, Mr. Speaker, shipments to the Soviet union are now proceeding at an admirable rate. I do not think I need say any more about the prospects for the present season.

Mr. Smallwood: A supplementary question. According to a C.B.C. news report at seven o'clock last Friday night Premier Khrushchev was quoted from Denmark as saying that Russia would not be importing any further wheat this season.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I did make a statement in reply to a similar question either last week or the week before, and I would refer my hon. friend to it. I have nothing to add at the moment.

JAPAN—VOLUNTARY CONTROL OVER EXPORTS OF TEXTILES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Before the signing of the trade agreements between Canada and Japan, will the Canadian government provide a clause under which Japan would exercise a voluntary control on the export of textiles to Canada?

[Text]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, discussions on this subject have been proceeding for some time. I can assure the hon. gentleman that his concerns are shared by the government.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON FINANCING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Finance. I apologize for not giving him notice, but I know the answer is quite simple. Is it the minister's intention to make a statement with respect to the complexities of the financing of the Columbia river treaty on the introduction of the next batch of supplementary estimates?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the financing of the Columbia river treaty is a simple matter, as my hon. friend suggests, and it is my intention, when the supplementary estimates are before the house, to explain it in as simple a way as I can.

EDUCATION

LOANS TO STUDENTS—INQUIRY AS TO RESOLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the student loan legislation is one of the items on our agenda for this week, can the Acting Prime Minister say when the resolution preceding this bill will be on the order paper?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be making a statement on this matter tomorrow.

INCOME TAX

HOSPITALIZATION PLAN PAYMENTS BY EMPLOYERS TREATED AS INCOME

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue, and this might be a good opportunity for him to get off on the right foot. My question is this. Will the minister rescind the instructions, now coming into effect, to have company contributions to the Ontario hospital services commission computed as income received by the employee?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am having this particular matter looked into. I do not think this involved any change in the law as it existed, but rather an enforcement of the law. However, I assure the hon. member that I am having this matter investigated.

CANADIAN FLAG

REPORTED SUGGESTION BY FINANCE MINISTER RESPECTING DESIGN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I have a question—

Mr. Speaker: Is the question very pressing? We are making very good time today.

Mr. Pigeon: Yes, it is very pressing, Mr. Speaker. My question is to the Minister of Finance. Is it the intention of the minister to make a speech in this house on the maple leaves flag?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): I do not see why I should answer a question of that kind, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pigeon: You are evading your responsibility.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this raises a matter of some interest. I listened to the Minister of Finance delivering his speech in London, in which he described Canada's new flag as having three maple leaves and two bars of gold. Has there been some change in government policy?

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I had just come from a very excellent lunch at the Bank of England, and perhaps I was thinking in terms of more substantive things than colours.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING REPLACEMENT OF CHIEFS OF STAFF COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Monday, June 29, consideration in committee of Bill C-90, to amend the National Defence Act—Mr. Hellyer—Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

On clause 1—Duties of chief of the defence staff.

The Chairman: Order. The house again in committee of the whole on Bill No. C-90, to amend the National Defence Act. Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the bill before the committee provides for only one thing of importance; that is the abolition of the chiefs of staff of the navy, the army and the air force, and the substitution for them of one chief of defence staff. However, the debate on second reading, and particularly the proceedings and the evidence which we secured in the defence committee, show that a great deal more is involved than this; or rather, that a great deal more will flow from it.

What is actually proposed and what will result from the passage of this bill is a complete reorganization of the military side of defence headquarters. The present organization of defence headquarters is based on the existence of the three services, the navy, army and air force, each with its own head and its own definite line of command and communication running down to individual units. What is proposed is the disappearance of these three chiefs of staff and their headquarters staffs, and a substitution for them of a single defence staff which will take over all the functions previously performed by these three separate staffs. However, Mr. Chairman, the three services will remain.

This is provided for in the National Defence Act, and until it is changed we will still have the navy, army and air force.

One thing which was not made clear on second reading or in the evidence we secured in the defence committee was how the chain of command will operate. In particular, we received no evidence whatever as to whether the new system will not make for a great deal more confusion and will not be more cumbersome and less effective than the system we have at the present time. In my opinion this was one of the deficiencies in the evidence presented to the defence committee. Really all we had there was the unsupported word of the Minister of National Defence that in his opinion the new system would work better than the old. On the other hand we had evidence from people who had previously held important military positions that the reverse would be the situation.

One thing in particular I should like to draw to the attention of the committee is that under the new system it appears there will be at least four or perhaps five chains of command from the top down to the individual units, which in the final analysis will have to do any fighting or carry out other operations that may be required of them. I think this is clear from the chart provided to us in the committee showing the proposed new organization, in which under a chief of defence staff you have four main branches. As the minister indicated, this is an organization designed to operate on a functional basis rather than the service basis we have had in the past.

What we will have under this new system is a chief of operational readiness who will be responsible particularly for operational matters, for what used to be referred to generally as the "G" side or general staff side of any military organization. We have next a chief of personnel who will be responsible for recruiting, manning, personnel administration and services generally. Third, we have a chief of logistics and engineering, which function is again split into logistics generally on the one hand and engineering and development on the other. Under this would come, of course, transport, accommodation, the supply of food and all that sort of thing. Finally there is a comptroller general who is in charge of program management, establishment, organization generally and budgeting.

As I say, it would appear from this that as far as each individual unit or formation is concerned there will in effect be four bosses instead of one. You really have four distinct functions which are commanded by four separate people. So far as I can see you are going to have four channels of command and communication down to the people who in effect have to carry out the operation or do anything. Therefore I am doubtful, as I think a lot of other people are, whether this form of organization is not going to be more cumbersome, more difficult to operate and less effective and efficient than the one we have at the present time.

The basic purpose of the changes proposed is to secure unification of command and, from the minister's statements, the eventual unification of all the services. I have no quarrel with the idea of providing for unification of command. In fact, as I have said on other occasions, I think this is necessary and desirable. However, the method to be followed in order to secure this objective is a very different matter.

The United Kingdom, for example, has reorganized in order to secure unification of command, and various other countries have done the same thing; but they have done so on a basis completely different from the one proposed. I mention this merely to show that unification of command can be secured in other ways. The particular plan which has been put before us and which it is proposed to put into operation is by no means the only plan which could be followed in order to secure unification of command, and in the minds of a large number of people it is a considerably inferior plan and one not likely to work as effectively as, for example, the one that has been adopted in the United Kingdom.

In connection with the discussions we had in the defence committee in regard to this whole matter, the minister made out that one of the great virtues of his proposal was the cutting down of the channels of communication from the services to himself from six to three, in effect reducing his direct military advisers from four men to one man, from the present three chiefs of staff of the services plus the chairman of the chiefs of staff to a single chief of defence staff.

I submit this is a weakness rather than a strength. I think there is no question but that experience in this and in all other countries has shown that separate, independent military advice to the minister responsible for the defence activities of the country is an advantage rather than otherwise. For the minister in effect to make himself dependant on one source of military advice only handicaps his ability, I think, to get at the real situation; to get independent and frequently differing opinions as to the course of action which should be followed. Thus I believe that under this new system the minister will be in a much poorer position to assess what should be done and what course to follow than would be the case under the sort of system we have had, where he has had the benefit of advice from the head of each of the separate services on how a particular problem is going to affect them, whether the solution proposed is practicable and so on.

This really comes down to what is frequently referred to as the supremo concept, having one supreme commander. This has been tried in the past. In fact this system was in effect in Great Britain up to 1904, when the Esher commission reported that the inefficiency and many of the semi-military disasters and difficulties that the British had experienced over almost 100 years following Waterloo up to that time, the difficulties they had had in the Indian mutiny, in the Crimean war, in Egypt and in the South African war, had arisen to a large extent because of the inability of one supreme commander to effectively control the military organization and give the proper type of advice to the minister responsible.

You had the same situation in Germany, where the chief of the general staff was the supreme military commander. This situation prevailed in Germany, of course, before 1914 and again under Hitler. In that case you had really a separate power and authority within the German state, and I believe most historians will agree this situation was responsible to a large extent for the catastrophe of the first world war.

Now, on the basis of history—and it is only on the basis of what has happened in the past that we can assess a proposal of this kind—I submit that the proposal to revert in Canada to the concept of one supreme commander is not a reasonable one or a good one. It is not likely to work out or to give us as efficient or effective defence forces as a modification or a reorganization of the present set-up in order to give the advantages of unification of command.

There has been a lot of criticism of this proposal, particularly as to what the effect will be if you take away the three chiefs of staff. Air Marshal Curtis, who was one of the witnesses before the defence committee, a former chief of the air staff, had this to say as recorded at page 164 of the committee report of June 9:

> I feel that to do away with the chiefs of staff is a terrible thing to do to the services. I do not care what you do, you are not going to have one service immediately. You may get it in 20 years but, in the meantime, our services are going to go down hill both in respect of morale and spirit.
> I feel the three different services are like ships without a rudder; they are tossing around on the sea without a chief or a leader to lead them. That is what the C.A.S. is, the same as the C.G.S. and the C.N.S. And, you cannot substitute a chairman who is removed two or three times and who is bound to be from one of the other services. He cannot possibly have the same intimate knowledge of every service that the chiefs have.

I do not believe there is any question about it; that is the general idea that is held by most senior officers who have occupied the position of chief of staff at one time or another in the past. I have heard this same opinion expressed by an other former chief of air staff and by some former high ranking army and naval officers. I do not believe there is any question about it, that to place the amount of work which is required in the hands of one man by having a single defence chief on whom all of the responsibility for organization and operation of the military forces falls, is to impose too heavy a burden. It is not possible for one man, no matter who he is, to carry out that responsibility successfully. In my experience certainly the chiefs of the navy, army and air force were always fully occupied, as was the chairman of the chiefs of staff. Now it is proposed that the work formerly done by these four men will be done by one man. I doubt very much whether it can be done as well or as effectively.

If I may turn from that for a moment, Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps the greatest weakness in the proposal is that the minister has no idea as to what will happen below defence headquarters. The only thing about which we heard in the defence committee was what was going to happen in the reorganization of defence headquarters. When questions were asked as to what was going to happen below defence headquarters, how this so-called unification or integration was going to work out in the field generally, the minister's only answer was "We do not know yet; this will all fall into place. This will develop after we have reorganized the staff at defence headquarters. Then that staff will go ahead and get the rest of the services integrated", or unified or something else along that line.

It seems to me that this is an extremely naïve approach. It is starting to do something, starting to change a system completely, without any real idea where you are heading or how you are going to get there. I would say the minister is like a man who is starting out on an unknown sea without a compass, without knowing really where he is going to arrive when he crosses the particular body of water immediately before him.

There has been a great deal of talk about the integration of the services. However, we have had no definition of what the minister means by that term. One time he talks about unification, another time he talks about integration; and so far as the members of the committee are concerned I think some of the questions that were asked indicated the minister was not able to supply a clear explanation of what he means by these terms. He has no clear concept in mind as to what integration is going to mean to the defence forces of this country below national headquarters itself.

This, of course, makes for a great deal of uncertainty and confusion on the part of the people in the defence forces. In the meantime the minister has said that 500 air crew are being discharged or have been given their notice. Statements have been made that there will be a reduction of some 10,000 personnel in the forces, and naturally this has caused uncertainty and worry on the part of the people in the defence forces. At the same time you find that bases are being closed down and ships are being decommissioned, so naturally under these circumstances you are going to have a considerable reduction in morale.

Unfortunately this is exactly what is happening in our defence forces. I think generally the morale of our defence forces was as high as any in the world, but the uncertainty that exists as to the future of the personnel, as to whether they are going to get the axe some time in the future, what their function is going to be, whether their units are going to disappear—all these things have had an extremely serious effect on morale.

This was mentioned by more than one witness, but Air Marshal Curtis mentioned the experience he had in talking to both senior and junior serving and retired officers of the services. At page 180 of the evidence he is reported as saying:

> —I would think that a lot of our technical officers can go outside and earn twice as much money as they are getting in the service. I would not be surprised to see them start to go and take jobs which offer pay better than they can receive in the service.

Then I asked him this question:

> I am very much afraid not only about technical people particularly but also about the actual fighting units and those in command positions and so on who are sufficiently able that they can get jobs quite readily in civilian life and they will be doing this in large numbers unless the present situation is cleared up.
> Mr. Curtis: That is my feeling, yes.

I do not believe there is any doubt but that those who are acquainted with people who have served, and know personnel in the services, have had exactly the same experience as Air Marshal Curtis has had and as I have had. A considerable number of the people with whom I have talked in the services are very worried about the future of the services and about the future of defence in this country, as well as their own future. As a result of this, increasing numbers of them are looking about for outside jobs. We are in very grave danger of losing a considerable number of our best general service command officers and technical officers unless this uncertainty is brought to an end, and unless people can know definitely what the future is likely to hold for them.

The chief difficulty here is that the minister does not really understand the importance of morale, that you can quite easily destroy it and that it is extremely hard to rebuild. The course he has been following so far is one designed to break down morale, to destroy the spirit of the forces, and we are likely to get into a serious situation from that point of view, as I have indicated, unless something definite is done to reassure the men.

The chief difficulty along this line, as I have indicated, is that the minister seems to have no clear idea of what he means by integration of services or how this will take place. He was been unable to say what will happen so far as the services are concerned. On second reading I pointed out the distinction which must be made between the administrative and fighting units. I pointed out that the integration of administrative functions can take place and should take place, but integration or unification of fighting units will not work. It will destroy fighting effectiveness. You must continue to have a ship as a fighting unit, an air squadron as a fighting unit, an infantry battalion as a fighting unit, and so forth.

In that connection I gave two or three examples, one of which was that it would be impossible to send the commander of an artillery battery to command a destroyer escort. Anybody who has any knowledge of military matters knows that is the situation, but the reply the minister made on that occasion has caused a great deal of dismay to a very large number of people in the services. This is what he said, as recorded at page 3188 of Hansard for May 12:

> The hon. member said an artillery officer could not command a destroyer. That may be so, but I suspect that an artillery officer might find himself quite at home with a naval gun after a brief familiarization period. Certainly many of the basic skills involved are the same.

To anybody with any experience this was a very dismaying statement. The minister did not know what he was talking about. This is not a workable concept. It is one of the things which has added to the uncertainty, and to the idea in the minds of a lot of serving officers and other personnel that the minister does not know where he is heading or what he is doing. He went on to say:

> I think there should be no doubt left in anyone's mind as to what is intended. This unification of the command of the three armed forces is, as stated in the white paper, intended to be the first step toward a single unified defence force for Canada.

The only meaning you can take out of that is that all the present units, organizations and what not are going to disappear. But in giving evidence before the committee, at one point the minister said "Well, of course, the present naval units and army units and air force units will continue." As I have pointed out previously, it is essential that they should continue. You cannot have fighting forces unless you have units of this kind, but the minister's statements are contradictory and confusing to people. As a result neither the general public nor the people in the armed forces who are most affected, and whose general efficiency is at stake, know what the minister means or where he is headed. I hope this situation will be cleared up rapidly, and that a definite statement will be made as to what is going to happen below defence headquarters level.

If the minister still has any idea that by integration all the fighting units are going to be rolled into one shapeless mass, then the sooner he comes to realize that that is impractical and would destroy the fighting effectiveness of our forces the better off he, the government, the country and the defence forces will be.

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Chairman, in taking part in this debate on Bill No. C-90, I should like to point out briefly that the subject of the bill in itself covers a somewhat narrow field of action since it limits the debate, I think, to the appointment of a chief of defence staff, who would replace the committee which was presided over by the chief of staff of the armed forces.

This bill comes within the over-all project of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer), providing for the unification of the armed forces and a rather substantial reduction in the number of servicemen. I believe that the step we are taking today is a step in the right direction.

If this debate is to be rather limited in time, it is merely because the question has been discussed at length by the defence committee. In my opinion, we had at that stage the opportunity of getting the information we sought, even if the replies were not always quite satisfactory and in line with the ideas one might have on the subject.

I feel that the reduction of our military forces is a good way of saving Canadian taxpayers millions of dollars. However, I should like to repeat here what I said in committee. It seems to me that the chief of defence staff, who will make the decisions, under the minister, will still have to be surrounded by advisers because he will be unable to make all the decisions by himself. He will have to take into account the recommendations made by the experts around him.

When you consider the military development in this country and see the mistakes made time and again in the procurement of defence material, the efficiency of those people is doubtful, if they continue to have the same advisers as before, the same men who, for instance, favoured the development of the Arrow aircraft, or the construction of the Bobcat military vehicles, or those who encouraged the government to acquire submarines in England.

When, in the past, those individuals made some mistakes which, today, are deplored and criticized from all sides, I wonder what we can expect if, in the years to come, we continue to employ those supposed experts in matters of defence, who nevertheless, encouraged the government to buy equipment which proved obsolete, after being only a short time in use, involving considerable expenditure of the Canadian taxpayers' money.

Mr. Chairman, I think that this is both a most sensitive and delicate point, because in the rapid evolution which is taking place at this time in the technological field, it is certainly difficult to establish what result machinery which it is proposed to buy at this time may give in the years to come, and how long it may remain efficient, before being replaced. Indeed, if, today, we buy some equipment which will eventually be replaced tomorrow because it has become obsolete, I wonder again if we should not, at that time, simply avoid expenses as considerable as in the past, because Canada cannot afford to spend such considerable amounts as our neighbours to the south for buying equipment which, to all ends and purposes, will become obsolete the next day.

The minister will probably have to give special consideration to the recommendations he will receive from the military experts, because the general public is always asking itself certain questions. Indeed, the question is often asked: why did they buy that, if it will not be any good tomorrow? That is when it is rather hard to explain such expenditures to the taxpayers and to answer their questions, when we realize what is going on almost everywhere and we see how money is spent in the field of military defence.

Many taxpayers tell us about things happening in military camps, with special emphasis on the waste of public funds, the misuse of equipment and of everything available to the soldiers. Naturally, I do not intend to go into details, because I realize people are inclined to exaggerate some of the irregularities that may have been committed.

Moreover, I understand that, in the administration of such an important department, mistakes and squandering are unavoidable, but I think that the department should have a special committee, made up of people outside the Department of National Defence and whose members would not be responsible even to the chief of staff, who could go from one military camp to another to check on the spot what is going on and prevent abuses, if any, and see whether it would not be possible to save the equipment and the time of the men now in the armed forces.

Mr. Chairman, there is another point which I would like to discuss briefly and I think that I could do so now. I refer to our military colleges and our young people who are contemplating a career in the armed forces.

Since the total establishment will be reduced, the minister will have to rely on markedly improved equipment and on efficient men. I am not suggesting that our present military leaders have no knowledge or efficiency. Far from it. I feel that our military personnel is intelligent, but I think personally that our military colleges should be given more importance so as to train men with a broader outlook than that of soldiers who rose from the ranks and were promoted after many years of service or because of experience acquired in the armed forces. I know that experience is an excellent thing, that it is a supplement, but I feel that basic education is most important and will greatly help our future military men to take charge of rather large units to which they will have to give the training they received themselves.

In short, one might say that the army should insist on quality rather than on quantity and try to improve its efficiency.

In this connection, I cannot help thinking of our military colleges, and I hope that it will be possible to extend the curriculum in order to encourage our young people to stay there after they have received their training. As a matter of fact, we see that a number of them now leave the armed forces after their three years of service.

I know that the service term has been extended to four and perhaps even five years, and I feel that this is a good thing. In my opinion, the necessary steps should be taken to encourage young people to stay at military camps, and more especially those who go to university, since statistics establish that the majority of those who are trained in universities, thanks to subsidies from the Department of National Defence, leave the army afterwards.

Of course, this is not a total waste for the country, since those young people who come back to civilian life generally render to their fellow citizens services they might not have been able to render had they not received such training, thanks to the help of the Department of National Defence.

I heard a while ago the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) say that he is deeply concerned with the lower morale of our military men. He stated that they are worried about the future. I wonder, when he was responsible for the administration of the Department of National Defence, if he was so concerned about unemployment and the morale of the unemployed, because they could also be as concerned as the military people are today.

I do not think they have reason to be more afraid than any other Canadian citizens because through technological and economic progress they are affected in the same way as the factory worker who tomorrow will be replaced by a machine. As a matter of fact, I do not see why our soldiers' morale should be low. It should be as good today as it was yesterday because Canadian citizens do not see why the soldiers' morale could be good yesterday when they had guns but no ammunition. Would it be better to have more soldiers without guns and ammunition? I do not think their morale can have been affected to that extent.

Mr. Chairman, it is obvious that the public is wondering in this connection, but I feel that every Canadian must realize that momentous changes are taking place. We are not in the thick of a shooting war and the present hot or cold war, call it whatever you want, is subsiding, and I do not see why the military would want to keep an army of 200,000 to 300,000 men for the sole purpose of giving them jobs.

Mr. Chairman, some people would like to see the total strength boosted to 200,000 from the present 120,000. As far as I am concerned, I do not think that the reduction of the strength to 110,000 men, a reduction of 10,000 men, would affect the morale of the forces in general. As a matter of fact, I think the morale of our servicemen will improve when they know what action the Canadian government intends to take to maintain its military forces in Canada.

Will our military force simply be a police force, a peace keeping force, as some are advocating? Perhaps. In any case, if that is what is in store for our military forces, I think our servicemen would be happy to be informed about it, so that they may prepare themselves to play whatever role is to be assigned to them by the government and the Canadian people as a whole.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that with this Bill No. C-90, we are taking the first step that will likely result in a reduction of our military expenditures. Personally, I can but support this measure, because I always considered—and I never had any proof to the contrary—that the Canadian government was allotting too large a slice of its budget—26 per cent—to military expenditures.

There is hope that the amounts thus saved will be even greater in the future and that we can use them to bolster our economy in a more rational and practical way.

[Text]

Mr. Hellyer: During the course of the short debate we had on Bill No. C-90 last Monday a number of points were raised which had already been discussed during the hearings of the special committee on defence. The hon. member for York-Sunbury asked whether we considered the experience of other countries concerning integration of forces. Of course we did, Mr. Chairman. Steps have been and are being taken in many countries toward a more integrated organization. While it is true that other countries have not proceeded to the extent contemplated here, the trend is unmistakable and in my opinion inevitable. As far back as 1945 testimony given before the United States congress was of some significance on this subject. General of the army Douglas MacArthur had this to say:

> The great lesson for the future is that success in the art of war depends upon the complete integration of the services. In unity will lie military strength. We cannot win with only backs and ends. And no line, however strong, can go alone.

General Eisenhower, speaking of his experiences in world war II, said:

> Unity of command in the field, so vital to our success, was not easily achieved. When war came at Pearl Harbor we had joint command. It was not until we surprised the enemy in North Africa that the first large scale example of unified command emerged. But it was a new device and there were many difficulties which yet remained to be overcome. All of these had to be met and surmounted during actual operations when lives were at stake. In my opinion, those difficulties grew directly from the traditional separation of army and navy, which is the inevitable outcome of the present organization of our military departments. Separation at the top necessarily fosters separation all along the line.

In April, 1958 in a message to congress, General Eisenhower made his recommendations:

> Separate ground, sea and air warfare is gone forever. If ever again we should be involved in war, we will fight it in all elements, with all services, as one single concentrated effort. Peacetime preparatory and organizational activity must conform to this fact. Strategic and tactical planning must be completely unified, combat forces organized into unified commands, each equipped with the most efficient weapons systems that science can develop, singly led and prepared to fight as one, regardless of service.

The hon. member for Calgary North quoted the opinion of Air Marshal Curtis with respect to the discontinuance of the chiefs of staff of the single services, but I should like to quote from an even more senior air force officer. As far back as 1947 the former head of the R.A.F. bomber command, marshal of the Royal Air Force Sir Arthur Harris, wrote a book about his experiences, and in his conclusions he strongly urged one fighting force. He made the point that:

> There is only one answer to this otherwise inevitable tendency in each of the services to get tied to a particular and invariably obsolete weapon, and all weapons are obsolete as soon as they are in use. There must be only one service; the survival of three of them at this stage in the development of armaments is wholly idiotic, and there never was any reason or need for them at any time.

That is the opinion of one of the most senior officers, who played a very significant role in world war II. Field Marshal Montgomery has, of course, stated his views on this matter of unification on a number of occasions. Talking before the royal united service institution in October, 1955 he said:

> It is a grave question whether any large military organization which is not closely integrated and gripped tightly at the top can adapt itself successfully to the required speed of modern life. If this is not done, the lack of adaptability of the organization as a whole will tend continuously to promote individual service interests over those of the nation concerned. Under such conditions, politicians have to step in to keep things going; they do this in the only way they know, that is, by the creation of more committees and by additional bureaucracies for co-ordination and arbitration above those already existing.

Speaking in 1963 in the British House of Lords on the British government's plan for the integration of service ministries he said:

> The committee system of management is totally unsuitable in a fighting service in modern times.

Both the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre referred to the testimony given by Brigadier Malone before the special committee on defence. The hon. member for Calgary North also referred to this point of view. In particular their remarks concerned Brigadier Malone's reference to the Esher committee. This committee, which brought in its recommendations in 1904, concerned itself specifically with the organization of the war office. The committee had been established following evidence of a general breakdown in administration of the British army during the South African war.

It has been suggested that Lord Esher recommended the establishment of an army council as opposed to a commander in chief to administer the British army for the reason that it was dangerous to have one man in over-all control. This was not the reasoning behind the recommendation of the Esher committee; certainly there is no evidence in their report to indicate that it was. It must be remembered that at the time of the report the British empire flourished in all its glory and the British army had responsibility all over the world. In fact, to quote from the report, the extent of these obligations did not allow the commander in chief to have an intimate knowledge of all the operations and activities of the British army of that time.

The principal recommendation of the committee was in reference to the appointment of area commanders, to be responsible for the effectiveness of forces under their command. It is eminently sensible that a commander in the field is better situated to prepare his forces for combat than is someone hundreds or thousands of miles away. This principle was recognized and put into effect in the British forces. It is also a long established part of the organization of the Canadian army.

The Esher committee also recommended an army council to administer the service. A chief of the general staff would be appointed who "freed from all executive duties and those of peace routine would be required to supervise the training and preparation of the army for war, and to study military schemes, offensive and defensive". The Esher committee made a distinction between the army council and the chief of the general staff, although he was the first military member of the council. Over the years, and presumably based on experience, the chief of the general staff has become in fact the chief of the British army, and represents that service as a member on the present British defence council. The Canadian organization is similar. What is proposed at the present time is the application of the same system on a tri-service basis. With changing circumstances, especially the trend toward combined operations, military organization must be adapted to the times.

The suggestion that there is a clear relationship between the commander in chief of the British army in 1904 and the proposed chief of defence staff does not hold water. The British North America Act provides that the Queen is commander in chief of the Canadian forces. By letters patent, command is delegated by Her Majesty to the Governor General who exercises it on the advice of the cabinet and the Minister of National Defence.

Under the proposed section 19 only "control and administration" are given to the chief of the defence staff, not command. In command matters the chief of defence staff is the senior adviser, but is not a commander. May I also suggest that the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) is incorrect in respect to the responsibility of senior officers to parliament. Only the minister is responsible to parliament. Senior officers, whether or not their appointment is created by parliament, are responsible to the minister only.

The hon. member for Calgary North has stated that in his opinion we would have in the new organization at least four or five chains of command because of the functional organization. I have pointed out previously, Mr. Chairman, that this is not so. The system is the same as we now have. It operates in a similar manner to the present organization within each of the three services. As I have explained, the area commanders will report directly to the chief of defence staff, and the functional organization will be in support of the chief of defence staff in the manner similar to that of the present military organizations. The difference in our proposal is simply that we will have one organization for the whole defence force instead of three independent organizations.

Mr. Martineau: Four, instead of three.

Mr. Hellyer: The hon. member said that the three services, according to Air Marshal Curtis, will be like ships without a rudder. Naturally I do not agree. I think they will be like ships with synchronized rudders, whereas sometimes in the past the three ships had their rudders set on a different course and were headed, one would expect, for quite different destinations. The waters may be uncharted, but I can assure hon. gentlemen that we have a compass, we know where we are going, and we will keep a sharp lookout for rocks and shoals on the course.

The subject of morale has been raised by a number of speakers, in particular by the hon. member for Edmonton West and the hon. member for Calgary North. May I say, Mr. Chairman, that generally speaking morale in the armed forces at the present time is extremely high, particularly in the field. I have just completed a tour which involved visiting personally most of our units overseas, and I can assure hon. members of the house that their morale is excellent. They have no fear or apprehension whatsoever about their future or the future of the defence organization of Canada.

Mr. Pigeon: In Cyprus too?

Mr. Hellyer: In Cyprus too. I have never seen men with better morale than those.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hellyer: Naturally when there is a reorganization of the scale proposed at the present time there is uncertainty, and particularly at national defence headquarters there is some uncertainty. We have said that we are going to do the job with fewer people. Inevitably there is some wonderment as to who the people will be that will be required in the future. I think the best way to restore the morale in this situation and to restore certainty is to pass this bill and let us get on with the job.

The organization is proceeding, planning is proceeding, and we will be in a position to cut over to the new organization within a few weeks of the time parliament passes this bill. In so far as the cut-over is concerned, I can assure hon. gentlemen that there will be no diminution in our effectiveness. The fighting units will be kept in the same high state of efficiency that they are in at the present time. Special effort is being made in this regard, and I have no doubt whatsoever that our fighting units will be just as effective as they have ever been and that there will be no loss whatsoever in this regard during the period of changeover. I can also assure hon. gentlemen that we will proceed just as quickly as we can without at the same time making too many mistakes. We want to get on with the job, and at the same time we want to make sure that each step is carefully thought out.

I would like to repeat for my hon. friend for Calgary North something that I had thought would be self-evident to everyone, but which apparently is not. That is, we will still have, as I have said before, squadrons of ships, squadrons of planes, battalions of men, and it does not matter whether these are in three services or one in so far as their operational effectiveness is concerned, their effectiveness will depend on their commanders. They are well commanded now and they will be in the future. But in order to effect the maximum savings in the organization and the administration, which the hon. member subscribes to and supports, and to have a military machine which is most responsive to the needs of the second half of the twentieth century and best adapted to combined military operations now and in the future, a single, unified force is the best answer by far; and I am sure that history will prove this to be correct.

I think no one should vote for this measure who has any doubt in his mind as to what we propose to do. It is true that the bill is limited in the sense that it merely replaces the chairman of the chiefs of staff and the chiefs of the individual services with a chief of defence staff. But let there be no mistake about it; we are going to reorganize national defence headquarters on a functional basis; we are going to try to make it responsive to the special circumstances in which we find ourselves at the present time. Then after that we are going to make whatever savings we can in other areas, in logistics, training and area commands so we will have the maximum savings available for the purchase of new equipment for our armed forces.

We have stated categorically in the white paper—and this is at least our intention; this is our belief, and without it we would not be proceeding as far as we now have—that what we propose is a single, unified defence force for Canada, one which will be responsive, streamlined and effective to do the job now and in the future. In this regard we are, I think, ahead of some of our contemporary nations. But we have a responsibility to go ahead; we have an opportunity which is unique, and I think this house has a responsibility to pass the bill and make it possible for us to get on with the job, to show that we have the right solution, and to put it into effect just as quickly as possible.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, it is rather satisfying to have the minister make a full statement in this house and in the committee, but there is one thing on which I should like to comment. That is that the minister has been sort of going back on the many eminent soldiers, sailors and airmen who have made statements previously in this connection. I may say at the start that I am wholly for this integration, but it is the lack of information that the committee had and the wonderment all through the armed forces that has bothered me.

As a preliminary question I would like to know from the minister about the proposed change in staff. Has any information been sent down through the three branches of the services setting out what possible changes may be made in personnel? How many have already passed into civilian life as a result of these proposed changes? I am wondering whether the minister could give me that information now.

Mr. Hellyer: There have been very few, Mr. Chairman, in addition to the 500 aircrew who were given notice some time ago. In respect of orders having gone out, the orders are being prepared now, not in relation to reductions in personnel but the method of reporting. This information will be available, we hope, within a few weeks, so that when the time for cut-over comes it can be done without any disruption.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the minister whether the 500 aircrew who received their notice and have now gone were part of the over-all plan, or was this something that was thought of ahead of time? I am trying to jibe this in my own mind. Was this part of the long term, ten year plan about which we heard? Were these initial 500 aircrew part of the ten year plan, or was this something that was started ahead of time and just happened to coincide in timing with the change of staffs and the integration of the forces?

Mr. Hellyer: I think in fairness, Mr. Chairman, it can be said that the 500 reduction in aircrew was not directly related to the change in organization mentioned in the white paper. The surplus of aircrew resulted from two or three circumstances; first of all, from the build-up in personnel following the Berlin crisis, when a number of short service commissioned officers were re-engaged in order to provide additional aircrew if required. These were not required. Consequently they became surplus and have remained surplus throughout the months since that time.

In addition, some of the changes announced during the discussion of the estimates last year resulted in a reduced requirement for air traffic controllers and a few reductions in the establishment for aircrew officers. These made up the balance of the total. So as far as the 500 aircrew are concerned, although they have been retired at this time one certainly could have justified their being retired whether or not the proposed reorganization had taken place.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, I have no further thought on that point. Prior to the minister's statement just now, were the services made aware of the fact that this action was not a part of his 10 year plan but was just a general chopping off of 500 aircrew? Have they been made aware of the fact that it is not a part of the over-all plan he now proposes to bring forward, which may involve the removal of a great many more from the services? The minister says these 500 were signed on again for a period. Were they personnel who had indicated that they wanted to make the service their career? Were they taken on for a definite time, and have they been cut off before that time? What are the circumstances?

I think the minister can appreciate that I am concerned about the state of morale in the armed forces at the present time. It is all very well to say there is high morale among our troops in Cyprus, but that is a permanent force. It is all very well to say there is high morale throughout the services, but I have received a very different impression from correspondence and from talking to officers myself. It is my impression that the feeling is that what is being undertaken now is very bad for morale, and I am wondering how soon the services will be made acquainted with the situation. The minister mentioned the ship which has a tri-service rudder, and I say all the more power to it. He also mentioned uncharted shoals. Just how many uncharted shoals is he going to have to navigate around?

I am asking these questions because of my concern about morale in the services, and because there are a great many men in all three branches of the services who may receive notice tomorrow or six months from now. To what extent are personnel acquainted with the fact that soon they may be removed from the careers in which they thought they had set themselves for the rest of their lives?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I think there has been some uncertainty in respect of the reasons for the discharge of the 500 aircrew officers because of the timing. I think most of them probably know the reasons for it. They have simply been surplus to requirements and their retention could not be justified. The expense was very heavy. If any mistake has been made I believe it lies in the fact that this reduction perhaps should have been made several years sooner than it was. It could have been, and I can demonstrate that if you really want me to do so.

Mr. Churchill: Go ahead and demonstrate.

Mr. Hellyer: So far as the short service commission officers are concerned, they are chaps who in most cases are not making a career of the armed forces but who are in the services for stated periods of time. They were re-engaged by mutual consent for a further period of time on the expectation, of course, that they would be required for that period of time.

So far as the question of notices is concerned, it will not be possible to be too definitive for some time to come. There will be no large scale retirements for some time. We will have to work out the establishments one at a time, starting with national defence headquarters. I think adequate notice will be given to everyone. We will naturally proceed just as expeditiously as we can so that everybody will have the maximum amount of notice. This cannot be done overnight, however, because the establishment in each branch has to be worked out carefully, and you cannot give notice to individuals until you know who is required for future employment and who is not.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, I have a few questions to ask the minister. With reference to his previous answer, has he an overall estimate of the number of men who will be released or affected by the proposed integration? I ask that question because there have been conflicting answers.

Mr. Hellyer: Just the ball park figure that has been given many times of approximately 10,000 over a period of several years. May I reiterate that the great majority of these will be by attrition. I cannot say precisely what the percentage will be, but I have already indicated publicly that probably 75 per cent or 80 per cent of the total reduction will be by attrition, so the number of people who will be retired involuntarily in advance of the compulsory age is not too great, certainly not in relation to the total number and the total turnover.

Mr. Martineau: The minister said his purpose was to effect a single, unified force. Is the bill before the committee simply the first step in that direction? If so, what is the second step he has in mind, and will that also involve legislation?

Mr. Hellyer: We have stated that this is the first step. This was set out in the white paper. The steps which can be effected as a result of this legislation involve the reorganization of headquarters on the basis I have outlined. In order to proceed beyond this to the replacement of the three services by one, for example, additional legislation will be required.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, in the course of the minister's remarks he referred to the morale of the services, particularly on the continent and in Cyprus. I suggest that if the morale of these forces is not high, morale will not be high anywhere. Unfortunately I have not had the opportunity to visit these forces and see the conditions under which they are functioning at the present time. I will not deny the minister's statement with regard to the forces in those fields of operation, but I certainly do refute his statement with regard to the forces serving in Canada, on the basis of the conversations and communications I have had with members of these forces. They feel that a beginning could have been made by endeavouring to see what could be done with the existing organization before instituting the present plan.

I have my personal views in regard to the bill under consideration today. With reference to the quotations the minister read into the record from statements of chiefs of staff of previous years such as Bomber Butch Harris, I might say that I knew him personally because I had the privilege of serving under his command for quite a time, and I appreciate such views. I know fully what he had in mind, and so far as general thinking along these lines is concerned I would be inclined to be receptive to such views.

However, the one thing I must reiterate concerns the morale of the people currently in the forces. I do not believe that morale within the country is too high. I believe a clearer picture must be presented as to what the future will hold for the personnel in the services. The minister has just made an explanation of what will occur over a period of years. However, when the initial statement was made the public had the idea that an immediate saving of taxes was going to be made. Now we find that is not the case.

I had the privilege of returning to my home not too many weeks ago and speaking to a young man who was one of the 500 who had been discharged. He was lamenting his future and the future of his wife and family. Being a jet pilot in this age and being out of work is not the nicest thing that can happen. One does not change one's vocation in life without some misgivings or without a tremendous effort, and in many cases some sacrifice. The minister explained at great length that he felt the trend toward unification was inevitable. I must agree; I think that is most certainly the case.

Then we must ask ourselves, how do we start? Statements appeared in the press that so much money was going to be saved the taxpayers and that there was going to be a reduction in personnel during the course of time. The statement that so much money was going to be saved the taxpayers was somewhat misleading. We do not know precisely what the plan is. The white paper refers to the plan in general terms. I think it has been characteristic of this government to be rather misleading in this general field. If we co-operate with the other countries in the world with whom we must co-operate in the future, then surely we cannot expect we are going to save the taxpayers tremendous amounts of money. We should be given details as to where we are going to save it.

The general public should be told what the future plan might be. Are we going to reduce our navy by a number of ships? There are hardly any left now. Are our planes going to be effective in Europe when they are not at the moment, unless a great amount of money is to be spent on them? I suppose the army will finally fit into the picture when the bill is passed. Then we hear people in the country asking, what is going to be the role of the militia? Will there be any role left for them? I think the minister should give us some of this information, and he should tell us what this is going to mean to the various provinces of Canada.

Recently we have heard about the extraction from the maritimes of certain areas of industry which are extremely important to that part of the country so far as the economy is concerned. Surely these proposals might also have a tremendous effect on this part of the country. Let the minister tell us what this is going to mean to the maritime provinces. This reduction in the forces could affect their economy. The minister has said it is inevitable and must take place. Let him tell us what the effect will be on the provinces. Let him tell us what the role of the militia will be in the future, so people who have devoted a large amount of time to this phase of our military organization will know what the future holds.

At the moment, as the minister is aware, representations have come from my particular part of the country, not from my constituency but from my part of the country in regard to the role the militia is to play. I am not going to mention any names because I am not referring to this to embarrass the minister or the government in any way. The people are wondering if the forces are integrated whether or not these units will be available for service to the country in time of need, and even in peacetime. I think we are entitled to have these answers. I hope the minister is prepared to give us this information before the debate closes.

Mr. Fisher: Carried.

Mr. Lambert: It is obvious the hon. member for Port Arthur has little or no interest in this matter. He sits there and just mouths "carried" from time to time. However there are certain things I should like to indicate to the minister at this time. We are asking a number of questions at this time because after rereading the transcript of the evidence given to the committee I must say it was lamentable that the minister should withhold so much information. I was not present during all the committee hearings on this bill. However I have noted that there were many general statements made.

I believe this has become a general practice with the minister. When he was over here as the defence critic for the opposition, he used to cry to the heavens about the minister of the day being reticent in giving information. Well he was a chattering jackdaw compared to what this minister has become. The minister has become a sphinx. I have never seen a minister who held back so much information that properly should be the property of the house or the committee. Naturally we asked for reasons. It is not sufficient for the minister to merely say "Well, I think"—or "We thought", or "Based on information we had we did this"—or did that. We want the reasons because this is a far reaching change. The announcement of it was accompanied with the greatest amount of ballyhoo this country has seen for many years.

The white paper referred to savings of $100 million on a ten year program, although the ten years was never mentioned in the white paper. There were some very carefully prepared news releases in this regard and the newspapers generally swallowed them whole. We saw headlines to the effect that million dollar savings were projected for national defence. How misleading. It is true that subsequently the minister said, after he was pushed into the position, that this would be achieved over a period of years. The impression remained with the public that national defence budgets were going to be reduced by a billion dollars over the next ten years. We knew this was not the case. The minister indicated later on, quite properly, that what he was trying to do was to get some money out of the administrative side to spend for new equipment. He has not got a monopoly on that. His predecessors were trying to do that as well.

The minister knows that the former member for Esquimalt-Saanich, when he was minister, indicated to the defence expenditures committee of 1960 and the estimates committee of 1958 how this problem was worrying the government and the senior officers of the department. Therefore there is no latter day discovery made by this minister. There is here an attempt to find some money by a reorganization of the command structure and it is accompanied again with a great deal of ballyhoo as to unification. There is great confusion between unification and integration.

You can have unification of command down to a certain point, but integration of forces means everybody wears the same uniform. You may call them A, B and C units; you may call them numerical units of the defence forces, but when they all wear the same uniform this is the ultimate in integration. The minister would be very wise to make a definitive statement on how far he is going to go. This afternoon he waffled on both sides of the question. He made a statement about a former president of the United States and he gave us a quotation.

Frankly all that General Eisenhower, the former president of the United States, referred to was unity of command, citing his experiences in the European theatre where they had a supreme commander allied forces, a unified command; but surely it goes beyond the limitation of any reasonable comprehension to read into General Eisenhower's words that every sailor, airman, and soldier would be in the same uniform.

Mr. Hellyer: He said he would put them in the same uniform if he had his way. I think that is a direct quote. I can produce it if you want it.

Mr. Lambert: Then perhaps instead of having the minister in that cartoon with the highland soldier, with his kilt and shillelagh, we should have General Eisenhower. But in any event, referring to some of the problems of morale, there is a great deal of merit in unification of command but I have some reservations about the methods being used by the minister. There is something to be said for unification of command, but I have very definite reservations as to this so-called integration if it means one force one uniform.

The hon. member for Calgary North referred to this when he mentioned the minister's statement about the artillery officer serving on a destroyer. If the minister thinks his proposals and his statements have all that acceptance within the armed services, I do now know to whom he has been speaking. He must know that in his position as minister people talk to him a lot less than they did when he was just the hon. member for Trinity, on the opposition benches.

Mr. Hellyer: Just the opposite.

Mr. Lambert: I think the minister is wrong. He is patently wrong or else he is hearing those things he would like to hear, or the things people think he would like to hear, not the things that the men down in the ranks want to tell and do tell. If the minister thinks he is getting a true picture of the morale in the lower ranks, both at the officer and other ranks level, he had better get his head out of the sand because he certainly has it buried right there now.

At the beginning it was claimed that these proposals would result in a savings of $100 million, and would mean a reduction of about 10,000 in command personnel. Where is this $100 million going to be saved, and how? This is what I would like to know. It is not enough for the minister to say we are going to save $100 million. This whole program is so fundamental that the minister owes it to all members of the committee to say how he is going to do it.

I hope he has not just plucked this figure out of thin air because it looks nice and round. It has a resemblance to 100 days or 60 days. These are nice round figures and they look attractive, but surely the minister is working on something better than that.

He will not break any security or anything like that by saying it is their estimate on the basis of best judgment that they are going to save so much over the next few years on contributions to pensions, or payments out of the superannuation fund, or other housekeeping costs, because the saving has to be within the housekeeping. He cannot find it elsewhere, or else he is taking money from the wrong source. This has to be $100 million from housekeeping costs.

Why does he specify this 10 year period? We never heard anything about 10 years in the white paper, but it was mentioned in a press release.

Mr. Churchill: It is not in the white paper.

Mr. Lambert: I hope the minister will be able to correct me if I am wrong. On rereading the transcript of evidence taken before the committee I find it was definitely indicated there might be about 2,000 personnel compulsorily retired, that unification of command would be the first step. Then there would be recommendations and they would go at it step by step. But is this the way to do it? As recorded at page 73 of the transcript of the committee proceedings, a question was put to the minister by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. First of all the minister objected to the question by saying:

> I think you are getting into an area of questioning which we agreed not to take up because it relates to decisions yet to be taken as a consequence of reorganization. We deliberately decided not to answer all these questions before proceeding. We decided to amalgamate the high command and let them work out the answers to questions like the ones you are asking this morning.

Incidentally, this had to do with questions of basic training—would there be common basic training.

> I think it would be better if we waited until these things have been considered by the defence staff, and recommendations come forward and decisions are taken.

There are other statements by the minister to this same effect, that this unification is the first step toward a single united force for Canada; and then there is this indication that we are going to go at this step by step, that we will examine the field, go one step forward and then look around. It is as though a man who had decided to put up a building were to say: First I will put up the four walls and the roof, and then I will look at the building and decide what to put into it. Surely this whole program had to be considered in its entirety before arriving at the conclusion which the minister proposes as to the unification of command. I cannot conceive it otherwise. If so, why the withholding of information? We would like to have the reasons. We are not asking for names of officers or civilians who may have recommended this or that. But let us have a frank disclosure of what has motivated the government to propose this reorganization of the forces. If the reasons are given to us, I think the government has much more hope of finding a wholehearted acceptance of this proposal throughout the country and among the armed services.

We come to this question of morale. Here again, as a result of a question asked this afternoon by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary we find that these 500 aircrew are not part and parcel of this reorganization scheme they are separate. This is the first time it has been indicated that these men are not part and parcel of the reorganization. The minister was asked to give us reasons, and he said the previous administration could have done it. Pressed for reasons, he did not give us one reason why the previous administration could have brought about some reduction in aircrew. I listened to his words most attentively. He got on to something else. He did not tell us one reason; he tried to evade the question.

Mr. Hellyer: I was trying to be kind.

Mr. Lambert: The minister knows the Berlin crisis was in 1961. These aircrew were added as the result of a "beef-up" of Canadian forces from 120,000 to 135,000, part provided by the air force and part by the army and navy. Let us not hear this minister tell us that the number of these aircrew could have been reduced years ago by the previous administration. That is a lot of nonsense. The build-up only took place in 1961. If I remember correctly, it was in the latter part of 1961. Let us look back. The Berlin crisis and its consequences did not disappear overnight. Does the minister think one could have signed these men to serve for a period of years and then, six months later, said: The crisis is over; you are out. It could not possibly have been done. There is no chief of air staff who would ever dare say to the government: I need another 6,000 or 8,000 men for six months. He would not be able to get past the minister if he had the foolhardiness to make such a recommendation. So the minister's statement was patently wrong. He could not give any reasons to back up his remarks, and he knows it.

The minister says we are moving forward one step at a time. He admits there are many questions which remain to be answered because events cannot be foreseen. But what steps has he taken to guarantee that he will not run into some real shoals or troubled waters, to use his own phrase, which would materially affect the integration scheme? How does he know he will not run up against a blind wall?

The minister may smile. I seem to remember when he was over on this side of the house, and when things were explained to him it was not done with any supercilious air. I am very serious when I am discussing this subject. There are problems which come to mind, and the minister has no monopoly on genius in the working out of a plan for the defence department. If the hon. gentleman can tell us what problems were envisaged and what solutions have been thought out to deal with those problems, then surely there would be a quicker acceptance of this plan. There are people, whether in the service or not, who foresee problems. This gives rise to doubts. The minister may have answers to the majority of them. Why cannot he give them to us? We were promised a full explanation in our consideration of this subject earlier but I have never read one which was more barren of information or which would lead us to the conclusion that the minister was doing anything else but asking the house to accept something which he had recommended.

As a classic example, there was a carefully prepared brief put before the committee by Mr. R. S. Malone recommending a variant to the minister's proposal. It introduced a defence council within the hierarchy of command so that the chief of staff would not be the one and only adviser to the minister; the minister and the chief of staff were part of the defence council. I should like to refer to page 146 of the evidence before the committee where Mr. Malone, as reported, points out the dangers which might arise in connection with the proposal the minister is now making for the appointment of a single chief of national defence. I should like to hear the minister counter Mr. Malone's argument. He is obviously not prepared to accept them. Let us have the reasons. His present attitude is not good enough. With the committee's permission I should like to read the first two paragraphs on page 146 and then a further paragraph reported on page 147 of the transcript of evidence.

> May I also illustrate my point by the experience of Arthur Balfour one half century ago, when the British army was commanded by a single commander in chief. He held that having had no part, either personally or through his representatives, in the decision making process up to that point, the minister must either accept his experts' recommendations, in which case his superior authority is mere form, or he may enter into a debate on the pros and cons of the project and start afresh, in which case he has in effect rejected his experts' advice. Either way he has placed himself in a false position. The experts prevail over him, or he, a layman, overrules them, with consequent loss in time, effort, money and morale.

And I would add, confidence.

> Assume for a moment that we could find a paragon of all the virtues to occupy the post of chief of the defence staff; in fact, a commander in chief. Look at the position in which he would be placed. All his professional associates would be junior to him, accepting his directions and orders and therefore not likely to challenge his decisions and no power to veto his projects.
> Above this one, top expert or professional soldier are the amateurs or civilians—

And I am sure Mr. Malone in referring to them as amateurs or civilians did not imply anything derogatory, but the minister or the cabinet are not professional soldiers—> —in many cases not qualified or prepared to question his professional advice.

I think that is only fair comment.

> It is hard to believe that such a top chief would not have some blind spots, some professional biases, some personal prides or fixations which could cause disaster. Surely the matter of national defence and the huge costs involved should not be subjected to such hazards. Certainly from an individual standpoint it is much easier to operate by yourself and be the complete boss and not have the problem worked through a committee, but it is not the individual interest we are thinking of here but the question of what is the right thing for the country.

In addition to that, I would point out one further difficulty, and that is that the two persons involved are to be very dominant personalities. There we would have a clash of which a summer thunderstorm would be but a pale shadow. Because if the minister is not such a dominant personality but his chief of national defence is a very dominant personality—and we have had some in this country; Canadian services have not been without them—then the minister will be a mere tool in the hands of the chief of national defence. On the other hand, if the minister is a very dominant personality and his chief of national defence is but a run of the mill type, then I think we are in the position where the minister would be also chief of national defence, to whom we could apply the old adage: "Why hire a watchdog if you are going to do your own barking?"

I come now to a further statement of Mr. Malone as reported at page 147 of the report.

> For a minister to deal directly with individual military experts is to place both minister and expert in a 'false position'. The minister, he said, must either confirm the expert's decision, in which case his position as superior authority is a mere form, or he must enter into the reasons for and against and decide afresh, in which case the expert becomes superfluous. It is bad organization to have two men (the minister and the expert), one over the other, to do the same business.

Mr. Malone proposes that the defence council, instead of being an appendage and acting in an advisory capacity only—which is the proposal of the government at the present time—and composed of capable men who sit off to the side and are not in the chain of command, be replaced by a defence council presided over by the minister and composed of those same people but in the chain of command. Decisions shall be not those of the chief of defence made direct recommendations to the minister. The minister and his defence council, including the chief of national defence, shall formulate the decisions. The British have gone even further because they have introduced many more civilians into their defence council. I do not think I have to go into the details of that because the minister is quite well aware of which I speak.

Admittedly one may ask: How do you know their system is any better than ours? They have had experience of this supremo concept which is now being introduced and have got away from it. They are in the position of formulating a judgment decision on the basis of experience for the type of services they have had—ours are patterned on theirs—and they have decided that their organization is better suited to today's requirements. True enough, the minister has been able to quote from certain individuals who, based on wartime experience, feel they should have complete domination. Because who but himself would have been the number one in the eyes of marshal of the royal air force Sir Arthur Harris? I think with all due respect to Viscount Montgomery we all know who would have been number one there: He would have been. It is human to want to have it all under your own thumb. But surely to goodness the words I have read when citing Mr. Malone to the effect that it is for the good of the country rather than for the good of the individual are more important. We are not looking to the interest of the individual today but to the interest of the country.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I should like to hear the minister's real criticisms of Mr. Malone's proposals. Those criticisms may be perfectly justified but for goodness sake let us hear them, because we have not heard them yet. Mr. Malone's comments are dismissed as though the exercise before the defence committee was a matter of form.

The Chairman: Order. I have to interrupt the hon. member to say that his time has expired, unless he has unanimous consent to continue.

Mr. Lambert: If I may be allowed 15 seconds I can close off my peroration, Mr. Chairman. There are a few other matters, depending on the minister's reply and other items which may come up, which I may want to raise; but this is my initial reaction to the minister's statement and to the evidence given before the defence committee. Surely we can establish a greater degree of confidence by a greater disclosure of information. We are not asking for the impossible, as the minister knows. What we are asking for is actually somewhat less than what he felt was right when he was on this side of the house.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I will not take more than a very few minutes, but I do want to express the fact that I am at a loss to understand the ways in which this debate is proceeding, and to understand how the members of the official opposition who have spoken, the majority being members of the defence committee, are speaking in this way.

Mr. Lambert: You are wrong there.

Mr. Winch: The majority of them. When this bill was up for second reading I believe a full discussion was had by the representatives of all parties on the broad, general question of defence. There was no limitation of debate. When the debate was concluded the bill was referred to the special committee on defence. That committee met each Tuesday and Thursday for several weeks. A steering committee was appointed composed of members from all parties. From that steering committee unanimous reports were brought back to the general committee regarding the procedure to be adopted and the witnesses to be called. I, sir, was a member of that steering committee and I have no recollection of any witness being asked for who was not in fact called, whether it was the minister of defence, the associate minister, the deputy minister, former chiefs of staff, or someone from outside.

We heard the witnesses in the special committee. They gave their evidence. Committee members asked their questions and made their comments. There was no closure; there was nothing of that nature in the committee. Any witness whose attendance was requested was there, and any questions asked were answered. Any comments a member wanted to make, he made. Then after meeting twice a week everybody agreed about this, and as far as the steering committee knew no one else was desired to be called. The committee then sat down to consider the bill itself. Mr. Chairman, that bill was considered clause by clause. After our weeks of meetings, questions and answers—

Mr. Lambert: Four.

Mr. Winch: My hon. friend says "four". He was away for a while. We held more than four meetings on this bill.

Mr. Lambert: Read it in the proceedings.

Mr. Winch: I never missed a meeting. We held more than four meetings. This bill was considered clause by clause; it was accepted clause by clause. Finally the question was, "Shall the bill"—I am referring only to the bill—"be reported?" The bill was unanimously, without amendment, referred back to this House of Commons. I find it absolutely extraordinary that members of that committee are now asking questions in the House of Commons, and did when this bill was before us a few days ago, which are exactly the same as those asked in the committee. They are using the exact arguments and the exact protestations as were used in the committee. If we are going to have a bill before a committee, I am going to say for approximately one month, and if it is reported unanimously—I refer just to the bill itself and not to all the aspects that might flow from it eventually—and then in the House of Commons we have to go through exactly what was done in committee, what is the use of sending a bill to committee?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winch: What is the use of sending a bill to committee, on which there was all-party representation on the steering committee, and in the general committee, which unanimously recommended that the completely unchanged bill be reported, if this procedure is to be followed? I refer only to this bill. I think something amazing is taking place when we have time after time members, who were also members of that committee, rising and reiterating what took place in the committee itself.

I just wanted to make that statement, sir, because, much as I would like to do so, I am not going to go into all the aspects of defence and all the aspects of questioning. That was why the committee was set up; that was our job in committee. Then after all our consideration we recommended unanimously that as a first move this bill be accepted by all of us and pass this House of Commons. I hope that in the future, having done a job in committee, we will not have a repetition of questions and answers in the house with regard to a unanimous report. The time for general discussion on defence policy was on second reading, and we had it. The time, also, is on the estimates or on a policy statement made by the Minister of National Defence. But the time is surely not now, with regard to a bill that after study unanimously passed the defence committee.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I would like to take violent exception to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East. For one thing, with regard to the speeches made this afternoon, the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary is not a member of the defence committee; the hon. member for Grey-Bruce is not a member of the defence committee, and if the hon. member will remember—

Mr. Winch: I said the majority, on the two days.

Mr. Lambert: As I said, I have spoken twice. I was absent on all but the first day of the hearings of the committee. I re-read the evidence. Perhaps the hon. member has not done so.

Mr. Winch: I didn't have to do so; I heard the evidence.

Mr. Lambert: However, Mr. Chairman, I have this afternoon limited myself precisely to the question of unity of command, integration and retirement. In fact I did not consider the third report with regard to involuntary retirement. Perhaps the hon. member would indicate just where I went beyond these very narrow issues. I would say also, Mr. Chairman, that he has falsely represented the position. I am not going to say he has deliberately done so, but the hon. member has involuntarily misrepresented the position. In so far as this question is concerned, having re-read the evidence, and considering what the hon. member has said, I do not retract one word I have said about asking the minister to give us further information.

Mr. Smith: Mr. Chairman, I was and am a member of the defence committee. I attended I think as many meetings as did the hon. member for Vancouver East. I think I listened to the evidence with as much care as he did. I did not avail myself during the committee meetings of the opportunity of making so many statements about things. I think the hon. member misconceives the purpose of a committee. Surely we know in this house that there is no such thing as a minority report; that if a report is submitted, it is the report of the committee. When the bill which is reported comes to the house for passing, that is the time when those hon. members who heard the evidence have a duty to make statements and comments on the bill. They are required to do this.

The statement I am going to make shortly is in my opinion in the nature of a minority report. This is my feeling about the report that was made and about the bill, and I do not apologize to anybody for making these remarks. If we are going to reorganize our defence organization, we are going to reorganize it for a long time; and if the house has not a day or two to listen to the comments and criticisms of the proposed reorganization, I think some people who loudly protest their great love for democracy know less about it than they claim.

Mr. Winch: Why didn't you do it at the last meeting of the committee?

Mr. Smith: Because this is the proper forum; this is where that criticism should be made. The purpose of the bill is commendable, in a sense, if we are going to make the armed forces more efficient and better operated, or if we are going to effect real and substantial economies. Those are commendable purposes, and they have been loudly proclaimed in headlines and press releases all across the country. But when we look behind the headlines and the press releases we begin to wonder if the efficiency and the savings are not much more apparent than they are real.

The criticism with regard to the command situation has been that with the chiefs of staff committee there has been no effective head to translate their views or to arbitrate between them, and that the Minister of National Defence has had to listen to too much divided counsel and too many different views and has not had a good system of evaluating those views. So we now have the proposal for a single chief of staff who will evaluate the views of all the various heads of the services and then present them to the minister. I do not know that this will improve the quality of the advice the minister will receive. Nor do I think it will provide the proper civilian evaluation of the views that the chiefs of staff or heads of the armed services put forward, and that the minister should have before he acts upon them. Presumably that was the purpose of the reorganization but I do not think that high purpose will be carried into effect.

We are told that this new set-up is going to cut down the number of people reporting to the minister and to the chief of staff. In the committee we were given a chart showing that there would be a chief of operational readiness, a chief of personnel, a chief of logistics and engineering and a comptroller general and were told that these men would report to the chief of staff. Two meetings later we asked questions about what the position of the heads of the navy, army and air force would be and we were told that they too would report to the chief of defence staff directly. Therefore instead of having a committee of chiefs of staff composed of four people we are now going to have a committee of seven. This seems to me to be the first indication that in the battle to cut down the armed services Professor Parkinson is going to win, and not the minister.

The minister is very popular in United States military circles at the present time. As a matter of fact, he has just become the man in the purple suit in a well known American magazine. I suggest that when he was reorganizing the services he might have looked a little closer at the recent reorganization in the United States department of defence. If he had he might have made provision for a small group of civilian technical advisers who could weigh and decide on the military hardware that we are talking about buying with all the money we will have for such equipment if we reduce the armed services by 2,000 people. We are going to need very careful evaluation of such equipment, and I think this was the time and place for the minister to provide himself with a small number of adequate and highly trained civilian advisers to advise him as to the value of the various weapons and defence systems that are proposed for us.

The other criticism I have of the new command structure is that it gives little or no status whatsoever to the defence council. Indeed in the charts provided to us in the defence committee the defence council is not even enclosed by a solid black line but rather has dotted lines around it. Along with the rather casual attitude that the minister has taken toward the defence council, this indicates that little if any use will be made of it in the new organization and, indeed, there will be even less civilian advice for the minister in the future than there is now.

Brigadier Malone gave evidence before the defence committee. His main complaint about the Department of National Defence in the past has been that there is not enough civilian control. Indeed, he puts forward that very problem in his article in the Winnipeg Free Press of May 28, 1963, dealing with the suggested reforms in the Department of National Defence. In that article he said that too often civilian intervention has come too late in the decision making process to be effective, and went on to say:

> A good deal of the authority which was once exercised by civilians—most notably during the war when each service had its own cabinet minister and deputy minister—has gone by default to the chairman of the tri-service chiefs of staff committee and to the individual chiefs of staff. In the absence of civil leadership these officers have been forced to make policy decision which in a democracy should really be made at the political level.
> Under the present system, for example, it is not uncommon for the services to be working for months or even years on new weapons, spending large sums of money on investigation, research, design and so forth before seeking civil approval. By the time such a project reaches him for final approval, the Minister of National Defence faces the dilemma described by Arthur Balfour a half century ago, when the British army was headed by a single commander in chief: Having had no part, either personally or through his representatives, in the decision making process up to that point, the minister must either accept his experts' recommendations, in which case his superior authority is mere from, or he may enter in to a debate on the pros and cons of the project and start afresh, in which case he has in effect rejected his experts' advice. Either way he has placed himself in a false position. The experts prevail over him or he, a layman, overrules them, with consequent loss in time, effort, money and morale.

It would be very interesting if the minister would describe to us in detail how under the new organization he proposes to make good the lack of civilian control and supervision at an early enough stage. We have been given all sorts of glorious figures about saving $100 million and cutting 10,000 people from the armed services, and told how we are going to be able to buy a lot of new weaponry with all the money we are going to save. But I wonder whether we are going to save it. Each time one questions the number of persons who are being cut from the armed services the number is less than it was the last time. Each time the cost of living goes up, and surely it has gone up fast enough even for my friends opposite in the last year, the savings are reduced and we are able to buy that much less new weaponry.

The other ground to which the minister presumably would turn would be better buying and more efficient administration. In all his discussions he has been curiously reticent about the position of the Department of Defence Production in relation to the new organization of the Department of National Defence. I suggest to him this is where there should be some real reorganization and where there are some real savings to be made. On this fascinating chart with which we have been supplied we have a chief of logistics and engineering. Under him will come design, development, test, evaluation, inspection and quality control. In the six years I have been a member of the house those are exactly the things the Department of Defence Production has been supposed to be doing with regard to ships, airplanes and all other types of military weaponry. Is the Department of Defence Production going to be dropped completely or are we just getting more duplication here?

I could give the house some examples of places in which savings could be made because of bad administration in the past. I have to mention the Avro Arrow. I am not mentioning it from a political point of view because that is aside from the administration of the department completely. One of the things that forced the decision on the Arrow was the absolutely fantastic and uncontrolled costs in connection with the Arrow. What is the minister doing to change the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production in order to reduce the type of waste that occurred in connection with the Arrow?

Then there is the Starfighter. The decision to acquire the Starfighter was a political decision in the sense that it was a decision that had to be taken by the politicians. We hear now that it will have to be redesigned and that will cost another $50 million in order to make it work. These are administrative decisions made by the experts and no politician could possibly know about the design of the Starfighter. What is being done to make sure there will not be $50 million more wasted on the next weapon we buy? This is where the minister could make some saving.

Then I should like to refer to the naval drawing office. We find that the pumps on H.M.C.S. Provider do not work and that the hangars are not big enough to hold the helicopters. No politician designed those. No politician knew about them; he had to accept the advice of the experts. Let the minister tell us how he is going to correct these situations. Is he going to bring the aircraft procurement and naval procurement sections of the defence production department into his department? Is he going to put them under civilian control? This is where some real savings could be made, rather than in the lopping off of 2,000 men from the armed services.

These are the questions to which the committee would like answers. We deserve answers before passing this bill. We do not need any long statement about the good will of the minister. We need to know how he is going to exercise effective civilian control. How is he going to do it? How is he going to make our procurement more efficient, not just putting things on a chart, but what are his plans? These are the things we must know before we can have any hope of more efficiency in the armed services.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Chairman, I am going to announce at the beginning of my speech that I am not a member of the defence committee. I regret very much having to make that statement because I believe all members are elected to this House of Commons to state their views in this arena. The fact that they may or may not be associated with a committee does not in any way limit what they may wish to say in this chamber. I get quite upset and irritated by statements from members of the smaller parties who endeavour to cloak themselves in purity by trying to give the people of this country the impression the official opposition is endeavouring to obstruct the government. The official opposition is merely trying to do its job by endeavouring to secure the information that we should have before decisions are made about the legislation before us.

Certainly, this is the only thing the hon. member for Vancouver East endeavoured to accomplish when he spoke today. I, for one, am most anxious to discuss this bill and ask the minister certain questions to which I hope I may be able to secure answers, in an effort to understand better how I should vote on the measure when that time arrives.

I was impressed, Mr. Chairman, by the remarks of the minister concerning morale in the forces. Being a member from Nova Scotia, I am especially impressed because a large part of the Royal Canadian Navy is located there. If the minister feels that morale in our forces is excellent, I would suggest he take a trip to Halifax and talk to some of the men in that arm of the forces. I have found no high morale in the navy, and I do not think anyone else has who has been speaking to anyone in the navy. As the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg says, the situation is just the reverse. These men do not know where they are going and that is the reason we are asking questions today. We want them to have a better appreciation of what is happening. I see no reason why we should not continue to ask these questions over and over again until we get the answers. This will give personnel in the armed forces an opportunity to know what their future is, whether they are going to be employed in the navy, for instance, or on civvy street.

There is another matter which has only come up within the last few days to which I must refer, so that the people in the maritimes generally can appreciate what is happening. Ever since this government has taken office we have seen substantial cut-backs in our armed forces, in our defence contracts and in everything associated with national defence. It has been a case of cut, cut, cut and nothing more nor less. They talk about alternative programs, but we never seem to see them. We are most anxious to see them, or if we are not going to see them we are most anxious to know that so we will have some appreciation of what we are going to have to plan for in the future in order to replace what has been taken from us.

Today I asked the Minister of Industry to indicate to me what the plans are for the future in so far as defence contracts are concerned. He is not yet ready to tell the people who are unemployed in my constituency or in the constituency of Halifax. I certainly hope he will be shortly and that he will be able to indicate a long term program that will allow us to prepare ourselves for whatever is to come in this regard. I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence this question: Is there a change of policy on the part of the government in so far as defence establishments are concerned in the maritime provinces? May we still expect the preference, if you want to call it that, given by the former administration which resulted in the people associated with defence establishments in the maritime provinces having some certainty as to their continued association with these defence establishments? This is an area that is beclouded. It has been beclouded since the minister started to make statements of policy relating to the cancellation of the general purpose frigate program, the suggested elimination of the reserve base at Summerside, the elimination of the naval repair depot at Point Edward and the elimination of the radar station outside Halifax.

I would like to know what are future prospects in the field of new equipment for the navy. Are the shipyards in our area going to be given the same type of attention that they received in the past? We have suffered from the cancellation of almost $100 million in contracts.

The Chairman: I would like to interrupt the hon. member and ask him if his remarks are related to the clause before the committee?

Mr. Coates: They are related in this way, that the minister is talking about the unification of command and we do not know what is involved with this. We do not seem to be able to get the information from him. If he gives us an indication of the different things that are related to this, and how it relates to the R.C.N., the R.C.A.F. and the army then we will have a better appreciation of the effect unification will have on these various aspects of the forces.

Associated with this is a substantial decrease in the size of the forces, a reduction of 10,000 personnel. Though this is supposed to be associated with headquarters we would like to know if it is going to fan out so that it will affect bases in the maritime provinces. We have a substantial number of bases there. We have a large army establishment at Oromocto, in the riding of my hon. friend from York-Sunbury. We have the large bases at both Halifax and Cornwallis, and the repair depot at Point Edward. We have the R.C.A.F. at Greenwood, Summerside and Chatham. Therefore you can see that we are very much involved in what happens to the defence forces and how unification will affect them.

I would like the minister to tell us how his policy will be associated with the policy that was built up over the years, and which placed emphasis on the location of bases and men in the maritime area. When everything else is equal the economic factor is taken into account, and we would like to see no damage done to the economy by restricting any of the operations in this area. This is very important from the maritime economic viewpoint.

We in the maritimes do not expect the people in the rest of Canada to bear all the burden, and that we bear none. At the same time we would like some clarity in statements from the minister, indicating exactly what he is going to do. Basically the minister seems to desire to keep everyone in the dark. He does not seem to want to make the public aware of what he is doing. If he is as proud as he tries to indicate of the actions he is taking, then there should not be any reason for him to want to hide what he is doing. Instead there should be every reason in the world for him to let the public know. If he is so certain of public approval he should do everything he can to make the public fully aware of what is happening.

Certainly if he wants this bill passed he should be taking action to see that the members of this committee are fully informed of future plans, in so far as that is humanly possible. He does not do this by sitting in his seat. He can do it by answering questions as intelligently as possible. I do not have anything more to contribute to this debate. I was anxious to ask the minister these questions and I feel there are many other members in the same position as I am. I do not believe they should be accused, whether directly or indirectly, of endeavouring to obstruct the government by asking these questions.

Mr. MacEwan: Mr. Chairman, I want to endorse what the hon. member for Cumberland has said, of course keeping within the limits of the bill before the committee. The minister owes it to the Atlantic area to answer any questions put to him.

As has been said by other speakers this afternoon, the claim has been made that a great amount of money will be saved as a result of these changes, but the suggestion has been made in other quarters that a lot of these savings are being affected by transferring certain liabilities from the Department of National Defence to other departments. I am not prepared to go into that at length this afternoon, but I understand that is the case.

I think I should deal for a moment with an answer the minister gave to the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary regarding aircrew personnel. The minister stated that the 500 aircrew personnel released were not part of the 10,000 personnel who will go under the integration program. I believe the minister should go into detail on this, because in answer to a question which I placed on the order paper the associate minister—I am subject to correction on this—stated it cost approximately $85,000 to train aircrews. I suggest the minister should calculate this amount of $85,000 for training as against how much it will cost the treasury to let these trained personnel go.

The hon. member for Cumberland referred to defence establishments in the Atlantic area, and this brings in the matter of shipbuilding. I do not intend to go into detail, except to point out that when the minister announced these cut-backs in January last, these cut-backs which presumably were part of the unification and integration program, many newspapers in the Atlantic area reported that the cut-backs hit Nova Scotia hardest.

One picture which appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of January 10 this year, and which I have kept in my files, shows one of the ships that have been placed in mothballs, the H.M.C.S. Quinte, which was last refitted at the base in my riding, and under the picture it states:

> Halifax was home base for the minesweeper when this photograph was taken—soon it will become a resting place.

Many people in my area are a bit leary about this integration program. They feel that many things are coming to a resting place in mothballs, and that they may never be replaced.

The minister stated earlier that the study in connection with the provision of antisubmarine vessels would be ready in July and, as I understand from the press, about a week ago he said a final decision about what would be done with regard to antisubmarine warfare would be taken within 60 or 90 days.

Mr. Hellyer: I did not say that.

Mr. MacEwan: That is what I understood.

Mr. Hellyer: Then you did not understand it correctly.

Mr. MacEwan: I am subject to correction if that is not the case. In any event, when this study is produced I suggest the minister get off his fanny and start work on a new antisubmarine plan. If there are to be new submarines, too, perhaps he will tell us where they figure in his plans for the future. He knows well enough that it takes a long time to get ships off the drawing boards of the draftsmen in his department, and into construction. He should certainly be moving in this regard. He told the house in answer to the question I put to him that the ships study would be ready in July. Well it is July now, but nothing has come forward. Action should be taken in this respect. The minister owes it not only to the Royal Canadian Navy but to the shipbuilders of the nation. We know that when the general purpose frigate program was cancelled it was suggested that an alternative program would be put forward. It should have been put forward months ago and I suggest the minister should get moving in this regard.

It is part of this program to reduce the militia by several thousands. Speaking of my own area, I recall that when the Liberal government was in power it took the kilts away from the Pictou highlanders, amalgamated them with the Nova Scotia highlanders and gave them new kilts. I can tell the minister and the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice this: They will have a difficult time taking the kilts away from those highlanders. It may be they will issue them to the sailors on these new ships, if we ever get them, but I imagine it would be drafty in the north Atlantic wearing a kilt.

I know a study is to come forward with regard to the new program in this field, but let us not forget these fine units which are ready and active in case of war or whatever task may be set before them.

I think some of these points should be answered now, before the bill receives further passage. Integration means a lot to various parts of this country. Let us have some of the answers, and then we shall be prepared to deal with the bill as necessary when the time comes to vote upon it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know the committee has been waiting to hear from the minister of defence. He has sat in his place in supercilious silence except for one or two observations. The committee wants to hear from him an answer to the various questions which have been raised. It deserves that answer. The minister seems to have adopted the philosophy of so many of his colleagues—I can think of the Minister of Finance and I can think of others, also—who rushed into the house with a plan, and, when it came up for consideration, found it had to be altered or changed, or was a dismal failure.

All of us are in agreement that action should be taken to bring about economy and efficiency in the armed forces. The minister enunciated his plan some months ago in a white paper. However, what is before us is simply the question whether or not there should be a unified command, in other words whether the chairman of the chiefs of staff committee and the chiefs of the naval staff, general staff and air staff should be done away with and replaced by a chief of defence staff. It was mentioned this afternoon that following discussions which had taken place in the special committee there was no place in this committee for consideration of the matters which had received the vocal attention of the defence committee. I have read the evidence given before that committee. I have read it from beginning to end and, having read it, I cannot but be left in a position of deep uncertainty as to what will result from the plan which is before us in the amendments now being considered.

The purpose is efficiency and economy. The minister has said economies will be effected. He has not placed before us anything in the nature of evidence to support the generalization that the result will be beneficial economically. Certainly what has become apparent since he became minister is a deep sense of uncertainty and fear among members of the armed forces in every part of this country. They cannot understand the purposes and aims. They have not been given a full and complete elucidation of the minister's ideas and those of the government. It has simply been a case of generalization accompanied by failure to go into particulars which would give those who serve at least some reasonable approximation of what will transpire, of what will happen to them, and what benefits are likely to flow as a result of unifying the command. Certainly experience in the past, going back to 1904 in the United Kingdom when the Esher commission made its recommendations has never established that benefits commensurate with the hopes of the minister will be achieved. This follows from the consideration given to the question of unified command not only in the United Kingdom but in the United States. I know great stress has been laid on the economies which would be gained by cutting out duplication of services, duplication in command, duplication in procurement, in supply, and so on. But when we come down to examining what has taken place in the months since the white paper was brought in we can only fear for the future of our armed forces in Canada, particularly in the field of morale.

I said a moment ago that the armed forces have not been taken into the confidence of the minister. He has not given them the facts, he has simply generalized. Now he comes before this committee, after hearing evidence in the defence committee which was anything but unanimous among the witnesses produced before it, and would have us believe that the initial step is one of placing one man in command—a service superman who will discharge the responsibilities which were formerly discharged by the chiefs of staff of the various branches of the armed forces. Certainly we are entitled to have more information in this regard.

The uncertainty of the position was recently revealed in a meeting which took place in Washington. Much was made of the joint meeting between the United States and Canada. Great hopes were expressed as to what would take place. When the ministers returned from Washington they spoke in fulsome terms. The Canada-U.S. cabinet committee on defence had not met for four years, so the Prime Minister decided that it would be most beneficial if that committee were to meet. We have to depend on press references for information as to what happened. Mr. Bruce Phillips of the Washington bureau of the Hamilton Spectator said this, in part:

> The first meeting in four years of the Canada-U.S. cabinet committee on defence...created the impression that once every four years is far too frequent.
> The meeting apparently was a gross waste of everybody's time.

I am surprised at that, with the minister there and with the other ministers present at the meeting.

> By all accounts it consisted mostly of exceedingly general discussions which pointed nowhere in particular.

I am not surprised at that. One does not expect ministers to be any more pointed in their observations abroad than they are at home. The report goes on to say:

> But the question arises whether such meetings have any value if people leave with the feeling that they have wasted their time.

Then some of the matters discussed are referred to, and apparently the minister gave a most interesting dissertation on a unified command; but nowhere does the report indicate that anyone was overwhelmingly in support of the explanation he gave. The report continues:

> It is a subject of continuing interest in the defence department, which has tried unification...

The report might be summarized by saying that the members of the committee drifted away with nothing but a few listless assurances to give the matter of joint defence and production sharing some thought.

That has been the difficulty here, Mr. Chairman. I see the minister sitting in a pose with his right hand holding up his jaw, and his finger in the best Karsh fashion, forbidding all information to the house. He is decorative, attractive and appealing; I am prepared to say that of the minister, for whom I have a very large measure of respect. But his sitting in that pose I can only say means it is to take the place of information, apparently.

We should like to know what is being done. What is the evidence which came before the committee to which allusion was made this afternoon? The first point is that the proposal calling for a single defence chief must be taken in context with other proposals made by the government, which were summarized by the minister on May 26 before the defence committee. He ended up with a recommendation to replace the chairman of the chiefs of staff committee, and the three service chiefs. He was then asked by the hon. member for Greenwood to give a detailed analysis of the proposed savings, and the evidence then concluded pretty quickly because the minister could not give any such information. What the minister has done to date is to promise economies which have consisted in transferring expenditures from one department to another and in covering them up, whereas in point of fact he has not been able to bring before the house and the country any record in this regard.

What about the single defence chief? Is it appropriate in a democracy to concentrate all power and responsibility in defence matters, subject of course to approval, in the hands of a single individual? Will one person necessarily be familiar with the technical and military requirements relating to all three services? However estimable such a person may be who is designated to this position, this kind of concentration of authority has not worked anywhere in the world. There will be the blocking of direct contact with the minister from the heads of the three services. Information will be funnelled through a single channel. Where is the coordinated long range defence policy which was promised on May 8? Can it only be achieved by one person assuming these powers? To say that it cannot be achieved except by putting all power and authority in the hands of one person is contrary to the experience of any military power in the democratic world. Certainly people are beguiled by this plan. It is doing something. Economies are going to result. Five hundred aircrew are removed; they are not even part of the plan apparently, we learn today. Only the other day a young man was in conversation with one hon. gentleman in this house. He had been nine years in the force. He is an authority on jet propulsion and is a jet pilot. But he is out now. Where does he go? He says he got no notice but was just told he was out. Is this a system which will promote sound morale? Is this the kind of action to be given to those who joined the armed forces with the expectation of other treatment?

Mention has been made of the evidence given by Air Marshal Curtis. I am not going to repeat what has already been placed on record, but there is one matter not yet answered by the minister or by anyone else which will have to be answered by him. It concerns savings proposed in the white paper of $100 million a year. Air Marshal Curtis said, as reported at page 163 of the report:

> I understand this will call for a reduction of roughly 10,000 troops in order to make that possible because integration itself will not come anywhere near to doing that. Also, I would think it would take probably a reduction of closer to 20,000 troops to make a saving of $100 million a year possible.

What he said has been placed on the record. He said that our services are going downhill both in regard to morale and in regard to spirit. Then Air Marshal Curtis, who is fully acquainted with and knowledgeable of the position in the United States, went on:

> I was in Washington two months ago and the report I got from the senior officers there was that although this was an interesting experiment they were too polite to say what they thought but they are not going to attempt it.

I should like the minister to tell us, when he was in Washington meeting with this joint Canada-U.S. cabinet committee, those men of experience, what they thought of this plan, because I hope he told them more than he has told us.

Sir, the serious, searching and penetrating criticism from a former chief of staff, reading it objectively, cannot be disregarded, based as it is on a great deal of experience in both war and peace. The minister would simply brush it aside. We want to know the answers to these things. We want more than sophisticated silence; we want more than an attractive pose on the part of the minister. We want him to place before the house and the country the evidence that he has. Certainly General Macklin's views, too, were quite interesting when taken alongside the optimistic hopes expressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the troops sent to Cyprus. The hon. member for Vancouver East said we should not go into these things.

I wonder how many read what General Macklin said in regard to Cyprus:

> When we sent a battalion to Cyprus a few weeks ago, there was not enough airlift for its heavier equipment and so it went into that hostile island half equipped and half armed and waited two or three weeks for the rest of its armament and equipment to come by sea.
> What a risk that was to subject Canadian soldiers to.

We mentioned some of these things.

Mr. Hellyer: This is categorically denied.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We want to hear some categorical denials, Mr. Chairman, not from a seated, posed position but from a standing position in which the minister will review what has been said. General Macklin said as well:

> The third defect is that there are absolutely no reserves of any kind anywhere behind the formations of the regular army. If the NATO brigade got into a battle it would be into a manpower crisis in no time.

These are things that are concerning Canadians. This was evidence that was given before a committee. Is it not about time that the minister, if he is able to do so, has the knowledge to do so and the advice to do so, placed before the house and the country the facts? Certainly the placing of omnipotent power in one person will not meet situations referred to by Air Marshal Curtis and General Macklin. We ought to have this information because, as I said earlier, this government's approach in connection with defence has been an uncertain one. There have been many promises of what would be done; there has been a white paper that generalized—but these things have been followed by no effective action.

All we are asking is that the minister shall place before the committee the facts. What efficiency will result from this unification of command? What controls will there be, other than the committee that is being set up, over what I would call the omnipotence of one person? What is being done on behalf of those who are serving in the armed forces, to diminish—yes, abolish—the destructive, demoralizing concern of the armed forces? Simply to say "cut" for the purpose of being able to argue that effective action is taken, is not sufficient. What are the economies that will result? Those are questions to which we have a right to answers. The committee met. It is obvious, as the hon. member for Vancouver East said, that the committee had the fullest information. However, I submit that the house will not accept his conclusion, that this information covers in the detail it should the various questions that I have raised, that are merely by way of summary of the views expressed here this afternoon by one hon. member after another.

We are not here for the purpose of endeavouring in any way to embarrass the government. What we are here for is to endeavour to assure that when experiments are being undertaken, experiments that have no basis of experience, this house and the country shall receive fuller information than it has received in the past. Experiments there will always be; but I think that when an experiment like this is being placed before the Canadian people, unsupported anywhere in the free world by the approval of experience, the questions asked by hon. gentlemen this afternoon deserve an answer, and the fullest answer that the minister can give.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, could I ask a question of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. In view of the fact that my name has been mentioned twice by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, and in view of the fact that he stated more than once that he was to a great extent basing his statements on the evidence given before the committee, could I ask him if he will explain to this committee of the house why it was that at the final meeting of the special committee on defence in regard to this bill, when it was considered clause by clause, not one solitary Conservative member of that committee objected to any clause, and it was agreed unanimously that it should be reported to this house without change?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, the committee heard the evidence. The committee listened to the evidence. The bill was before the committee. The hon. gentleman very well knows that no dissenting report can be given. It is beyond the right of a parliamentary committee to do other than report favourably on any matter that is sent to it. We are not in that position when we come to the floor of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a supplementary question of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. The Leader of the Opposition is absolutely correct when he says that no committee of the house can bring in a minority report; we all know that. But I would like to ask him this question. Although it is impossible to bring in a minority report from a committee, is it not possible to register your objection in the committee? And that was not done by a solitary Conservative member of that committee when we had our final meeting.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, that is one of the weaknesses of committees. They are exercises in futility when it comes to summarizing the views of members following the hearing of evidence.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering whether the minister wanted to attempt to reply now, or does he want to consult with his advisers over the supper hour in order to see if he can get off the horns of the dilemma on which he is impaled?

Mr. Hellyer: I think you might raise some more questions in the meantime.

Mr. Churchill: I should like to raise some more questions. I should like to have answers to the questions I raised the other night when we were discussing this measure. With regard to the problem just mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver East, may I say that I was a member of the defence committee last fall and I objected to some of the things that were in the report of that committee. We were not permitted to bring in a minority report, but when I raised the point at the final meeting of the committee it was quite obvious that there was not unanimity in that several members were dissatisfied with items that appeared in the report. However, as a committee we could not show the various items with which we disagreed. So the report was made public.

I have read all the evidence presented to that committee. I noted that quite a number of members of the committee raised questions which were unanswered by the minister, and raised objections as they proceeded with the discussion of the bill as it was before them. I can quite understand why those members, having stated their objections once, did not bother to repeat them when they came to the last allotted day for consideration of the matter; but it certainly does not follow from a reading of the evidence that there was general agreement with the bill.

I am surprised at the casual attitude of the Minister of National Defence, and I use the phrase that the hon. member for Simcoe North used only a little while ago. That is the impression the minister is creating now. He has taken a casual attitude toward a very serious matter. The importance of national defence is something of which we in Canada are apprised and the subject merits more than just a casual attitude.

This minister has been in office almost 15 months. I ask him: What has come out of that 15 months of casualness? We have heard about study groups, seminars and appraisals of this, that and the other thing. But what has actually come out of that 15 months in office? Is there greater efficiency in our armed forces at the present time than 15 months ago? The answer I give is no. There is less efficiency than there was 15 months ago.

The minister has reduced the complement of ships in the navy. He wiped out the Sabre jet squadrons in Europe before the 104's were prepared for effective action. Even now that air division in Europe is not fully armed. He has reduced by two squadrons the Voodoos in Canada and has not armed the remaining Voodoo squadrons as he promised to do. What has he done for the army? What changes in the army has he made in these 15 months? Where is the mobile equipment he was talking about? He has not even provided a nuclear missile for the Honest John battery about which he made so much noise approximately 18 months ago.

The efficiency of our armed forces has declined under this minister and we cannot get from him the answers that are essential. There is a lack of confidence in the minister. He talks boldly and says that under the proposed reorganization the armed forces will be responsive. I do not know just what he means by that. He says they will be streamlined. This is supposed to encourage everybody to think they will be better forces. He gives us no evidence of how that will be brought about.

How can we have confidence in a minister who carelessly talks about an artillery officer, as the hon. member for Calgary North mentioned today, and says, to use the minister's words, that he "may find himself quite at home with a naval gun after a brief familiarization period", as if he could serve acceptably on board a ship just because he was a trained artillery officer on land? What confidence can we have in a minister who, in response to a question in the house last week, informed the house that a camera on a reconnaissance plane was a conventional weapon? This is the type of answer we are getting from the minister, and the confidence that may have rested in him 15 months ago has rapidly dissipated.

His responses to questions in the committee, his responses to our questions in committee of the whole house on the bill, have been inadequate. When we came to take up the bill the other night after it had been reported back from the defence committee I had to press him to get up and make a statement. He took about a minute and a half or two minutes, although I had asked him to give us a report on the type of evidence that was reported to the committee, general criticisms, if any, of the bill, and let us know what had happened. The minister dealt with none of these things. He simply made general statements and confined himself to stating, as found at page 4846 of Hansard of June 29:

> This bill implements government policy set out in a white paper on defence and is the necessary first step to bringing about integration of the three headquarters leading, we hope, to increased efficiency and a reduction in overhead expenditures.

That is all he said in the committee of the whole house when the bill was taken up the other day. That is not good enough. As he was urged to do today, the minister has to define what he means by integration and unification, and I propose to deal with those two points later. He has to tell us exactly how he expects to achieve a reduction in overhead expenditures and at the same time, which is his chief responsibility, retain the fighting effectiveness and efficiency of our armed services.

I see it is six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, and I will resume at eight o'clock.

The Chairman: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to announce that the questions to be raised at ten thirty o'clock this evening are as follows: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, pensions, Canada plan, request for consideration to be continued to conclusion.

[Translation]

Second, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon): A question concerning the deepening of the Richelieu river.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I started at just five minutes to six with a few introductory remarks and my intention was to give the minister the supper hour to collect his thoughts, return here to the house and give us answers to questions. I propose to give him a few more minutes to assemble his ideas, and I express the hope that when I have finished or perhaps when someone else has spoken, the minister will make a comprehensive statement on his plans for the future. Just before six o'clock I read out his basic statement which he made the other night, in which he expressed the intention of the government to bring about integration of the three headquarters, leading to increased efficiency and a reduction in overhead expenditures.

I point out, as others have pointed out, that he must give us proof that he will achieve increased efficiency by the major change he is making in the defence structure. We have no quarrel with him at all if he can effect a reduction in the overhead expenditures and transfer the money obtained in that way to the purchase of equipment. I realize that he has been placed in a strait-jacket by the Minister of Finance since he has been limited to a billion and a half in money to support the three services and provide equipment for them.

Mr. Grégoire: It is still too much.

Mr. Churchill: Now that amount of money may be too much. Someone in the far corner, I guess it was the hon. member for Lapointe who is constantly interrupting from his seat, has said that. It is open to question whether it is too much. It depends upon what you are getting for your money. When we consider the expenditures of money in which we were involved in the first and second world wars and in Korea, perhaps we are well advised to maintain our defences at the present time and spend some money that way rather than be plunged into a conflict in the future unprepared. Under those circumstances we are aware, from our experience in the past, that a great waste of money occurs.

However, within the limits the Minister of Finance has set for the Minister of National Defence, he is now attempting to divert some of the money to the purchase of equipment. If he can do that without impairing the effectiveness of the services, we are not in disagreement because modern equipment is an essential. I read in a newspaper not so long ago that the minister said he was embarking on a 60-day period of decision. I am not sure what date that started, but we will be watching very closely to see the effect of the 60-day period of decision because we have been through that once before. This is where we came in, in the movie. I wondered at his temerity in stealing from the Minister of Finance and from the Prime Minister a statement such as that. In this 60-day period of decision he is going to place orders, he tells the production industry, for military equipment. We will watch closely to see whether or not the services are kept in balance in the expenditure of this money or whether one is preferred over another.

We will be particularly interested in seeing whether the army, which has been doing a major portion of the active work during the last several years, is given the mobility it requires. I want to deal with the vagueness of the minister's ideas concerning his plan. On May 8, when we were discussing the bill, the minister was talking about the various choices he had before him, and he is reported as follows on page 3066 of Hansard:

> The third alternative, which was the one finally adopted, was the integration of the armed forces into a single unit.

Then on page 3188 of Hansard for May 12 the minister is reported as using these words:

> I think it follows logically that once the high command has been unified and once the armed forces of Canada are organized on a functional basis rather than along traditional service lines the complete integration of the armed services will follow as a natural evolution from this change in organization.

So, he told us what he thought, and again he used the word "integration". In the white paper on which he bases his whole case, page 19, he uses these words:

> Following the most careful and thoughtful consideration, the government has decided that there is only one adequate solution. It is the integration of the armed forces of Canada under a single chief of defence staff and a single defence staff. This will be the first step toward a single unified defence force for Canada.

The minister has been asked what he means by his use of the words integration and unification. This afternoon he quoted at some length from various prominent leaders in the second world war, who used words which he considered bolstered up his case. MacArthur spoke about the complete unification of the services. Eisenhower spoke about unity of command in the field and about one single, concentrated effort. Harris, the celebrated "Bomber" Harris, talked about one fighting force and one service, and Montgomery said that the committee system was unsuitable in a fighting service.

These are men of distinction and it is important to get their points of view. I notice in the defence committee report that Brigadier Malone interviewed some of these people after the war and had conversations with them as to their ideas about organization of the services.

General MacArthur, fighting the war in the Pacific, was faced with amphibious operations and he had to use combined forces, air, sea and land forces, in order to land on the various islands and establish a position. He found that it was a difficult operation unless the troops were trained for that type of combined work. The United States marines had more experience than the army units and set the pattern for the island hopping that was characteristic of the Pacific campaign. I think when General MacArthur was talking about unification of the services he was thinking in terms of amphibious operations where it is absolutely essential that the three services work together.

Similarly, when General Eisenhower was talking about unity of command in the field he was thinking of combined operations leading to landings in north Africa, Sicily, Italy, and on the beaches of Normandy where the navy, army and air force had to work closely together to achieve effective results.

I do not doubt for one minute that Air Marshal Harris was thinking in terms of a unification of command among the three services, although his activity was largely in the air, and much doubt has been cast upon some of his planning and his direction of strategy in the massive bomber assaults on Europe. It is the opinion of many military experts that under better direction some of the war effort of England and the United States might have gone into aircraft for close support of the army rather than be devoted to bombers.

General Montgomery was quite familiar with combined operations and realized the value of them, but it is not necessary to unify the three services into one single service in order to get successful combined operations. We saw enough of that in the second world war to understand what it means.

Even within an army itself you have combined operations, because not only have you infantry and tank formations but you have artillery and engineers, all of whom have to be welded into one striking team, and if you can combine with that striking team tactical air support then you have an effective fighting land formation. We have had the experience of that. It was done without putting all the personnel into one formation or one service. That is why we fail to understand what the minister is talking about when he leaves the impression that in time he will end up with just one service.

It is obvious to anybody with any military service at all that you cannot interchange as readily as that in the fighting formations. You may make changes in the administrative tail of an army, air force or navy. You can have the trained mechanical assistance, the electricians, the ordnance people and the supply people—there can be a change there, but how you can interchange people in fighting formations escapes me entirely. It just cannot be done. We had enough difficulty in the second world war effecting good co-operation between tanks and infantry, and between air force and infantry formations, to realize the problem.

What does the minister mean by his integration of the services? Is he going to put everybody together in one uniform? Are they to be interchangeable? How does he have an effective fighting force? His job as the Minister of National Defence is to have effective fighting forces whether they are on the sea, in the air or on the land. Judging by experience I would say this is best done along the lines familiar to us now, with good training on combined operations and with the high command thoroughly familiar with the three services. These are the people who carry the fate of the troops in their hands, and if the high command has knowledge of the functions of the three services then you can get proper results, but why you would need to go beyond that I do not see.

Some of the expert witnesses who appeared before the defence committee dealt with some of the factors I have been talking about. The other evening when I was talking on this bill I dealt at some length with Brigadier Malone's evidence before the committee, dealing with a study of the Esher report, and I was astonished today to hear the minister say that the chief recommendation of the Esher report was the setting up of area commanders. Having read the Esher report I could not reach that conclusion at all.

As the hon. member for Calgary North pointed out, and as has been mentioned by others, including myself the other evening, the Esher report was brought in to correct the deficiencies that had been shown up in the British army under the supreme commander in chief idea. With experience in two or three wars, and with experience in the Boer war—the South African war—the decision was reached that a change should be made. The Esher report advised and parliament finally adopted a council system whereby the commander in chief was not responsible for everything that went on and whereby the minister, with four military advisers and three civilian advisers on the council, was able to get better and more complete advice than from one supreme commander. This is what we think the minister should be doing here, rather than reverting to a system which was tried many years ago and found wanting. In 1904, when the Esher committee reported, the system was changed in England, and it was also changed in Canada, because the people here read the same report.

One man who was very largely responsible for the implementation of the Esher report was Balfour. He subsequently was prime minister of the United Kingdom. He served as head of the cabinet committee on defence. Later, when there was a change of government and Asquith became prime minister, Balfour was invited by Asquith to sit in on the meetings of the committee on imperial defence. Subsequently when a coalition government was formed he went to the admiralty, and later he became foreign secretary. So he was a man of vast experience whose interest, during a large part of his life, lay in this question of defence.

His sponsorship of the findings of the Esher committee was decisive. A council was set up and functioned with considerable success from then on. Had it failed in world war I and world war II, it would have been changed by now. But it was not. I suggest therefore, that our own experience plus the experience of other nations should be drawn upon in these circumstances, and when the minister tells us that the chief recommendation of the Esher committee was simply to appoint area commanders he shows he is not familiar with the report, for otherwise he would not have made such a statement.

I have here excepts from that report which I propose in the few minutes remaining to me to put on record for others to study. Part II of the report reads as follows:

> For the first time in the long annals of war office reform its intricate problems have, we believe, been approached from the point of view of war rather than from that of peace. The scheme we have laid before you is based upon the consideration that the preparation for war is the primary object of a war office, and that no military organization can be sound in time of peace unless it is applicable to the necessities of war.

I should like to interject here that, much as we hesitate to talk about war, our defence department nevertheless exists for the purpose of giving us adequate assistance and protection in time of war. It is not a peacetime organization. So anything which is done by way of reorganizing the Department of National Defence must be done with a view to what would happen in case of a conflict. We may be able to manage, having adopted the minister's idea of a supreme commander, when we are faced only with operations which Canada is obliged to perform, or agrees to undertake as so-called police actions in connection with United Nations peace keeping operations. But these activities are not war.

So in the light of our experience from the first part of the century Canada must look to the future. We cannot be sure we shall not be involved in some conflict where the lives of men are at stake, and if the lives of men are at stake there must be efficient handling of the service organizations. That is when the great test comes. Have they the equipment? Are they trained? Are they ably commanded? Or are their lives to be wasted? We have seen enough of that in the past to make us cautious about making mistakes in the future.

The committee report continues as follows:

> Bearing this principle constantly in mind, we have proposed—
> (a) A permanent nucleus for the defence committee, in order to ensure the continuous consideration of defence problems and to co-ordinate the naval and military forces of the crown. We regard this proposal as the keystone of the whole structure of reform.
> (b) An army council for the higher administration of the army.
> (c) The creation of a trained general staff, which is one of the most pressing military needs.
> (d) Divorce of administrative from executive military functions.
> (e) Complete decentralization of administrative work.
> (f) A thorough system of inspection.
> (g) Financial changes, in the interests of sound economy, and increased responsibility of the military administrators of the army.
> (h) Division of duties within the war office, to prevent overlapping to minimize reduplication of effort, and to ensure the smooth and rapid dispatch of business.

Those are the effective recommendations of the Esher committee report and it is on this basis that the reorganization of the British army was carried out after 1904.

Mr. Pugh: How many times has one to ask a question before he gets an answer? Today for the first time the minister finally stated that the 600 aircrew—

An hon. Member: Five hundred.

Mr. Pugh: Call it 400 or 300, it does not make any difference. The hon. gentleman stated they were not part of the new policy. Many questions have been asked touching morale in the forces but the minister has not given any adequate explanation. He said today that as far as the 600 were concerned, Berlin was the excuse, and possibly this action should have been taken previously. He indicated that these men were supernumerary to the number actually required. I wonder why the minister has not given an adequate explanation of this. I asked the minister the other day in the debate if he would say whether he had received any complaints from those who had been turned out and from those who might well be turned out, and I am wondering whether he would now answer that question, first as to the 600 who were turned out—the men who were not part of the program—and second as to service officers who may find themselves without jobs and without careers as a result of what the hon. gentleman termed the ten year plan. He has not made any real explanation of this.

Today for the first time, in answer to a question I asked he said: Those 600 men are not part of the plan; we just turned them out; we got rid of them. I think many people in Canada are asking questions about the expense in dollars and cents which the government bears in the training of men for the three services. I am asking the minister, now: What about our training colleges? What about university education? What are these young men to expect when they are through? Are the best of them going off into industry after their education has been paid for by the government? If they sign up they can get their education paid for, provided they meet certain requirements and, thank goodness, we have many young men who can meet these requirements, and who can in this way get a university education. The minister should be able to tell us how much it costs to put a young man through university and train him through the service and how many of them leave without having served at all or, having served three years, do not continue in the service. To my mind this is very important because it involves tremendous expenditure.

I do not see anything wrong but I am wondering what is the result. Would the minister care to give any figures relating to those who go and those who stay on in the services? I asked the other day in relation to the air force how many experienced flyers trained in depth to take part in any division of our armed services were going to be turfed out, and what would be the cost to Canada. The minister mentioned his 10 year program. Everyone is talking about a five or a 10 year program, or something like that, but I am wondering how far this integration is going to go. Personally I am for integration if it will cut down the costs of our armed services and will not spoil any of the efficiency of the armed services.

Mr. Hellyer: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pugh: The minister says "hear, hear", but we have heard nothing of this 10 year program. He refers to his great airy-fairy deal, his 10 year program. He has a white paper and a few other things, but he has not answered my questions. Someone asked: Shall this clause carry? Why does the minister not answer? Is there no answer? I am asking, as are other people, whether the minister has a program. Is there a program he can announce? Where is he trying to go? What is his object? The minister has not answered any of these questions. Why does he not get up and make a statement, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, this is becoming an exercise in futility. Here we have the Minister of National Defence occupying a very important position in the government and bringing before us a bill which he claims is the first step in his program of integration of the forces. He has had the most tremendous press build-up all over the country that I have seen. Yet we cannot get from this minister answers to legitimate and serious questions.

May I tell the Minister of National Defence that we are not treating this problem lightly. The question of the national defence of this country is of vital importance. It is an expensive proposition. From the point of view of the taxpayer we want to know whether the money is being properly spent. We have thousands of young men in the services. Behind those services there is a great tradition extending back throughout the whole life of this country. We, the Canadian nation, have put forth great efforts in wartime and are putting forth great efforts in peacetime. The minister has come along and is going to change things, and we want him to give proof that his proposed changes are for the betterment of Canada's national defence. We want him to give us proof that there will be no deterioration in the combat effectiveness of our services.

As I said a few minutes ago, I am not thinking in terms of a peacetime army. You can have a peacetime army which will never be called out for active service. But our experience in this world has been that Canadians have been called upon to go to war. A lot of people do not like that word, but that is what we have faced four times within the last 60 years. Canadians have been called upon to go to war, and they get killed in warfare. If the services are efficient, fewer men get killed; that is what it amounts to. If they are inefficient, lives are wasted.

What we are asking of this minister is this. He must demonstrate to us without shadow of doubt that his proposed changes will maintain unimpaired the fighting efficiency of our services. He must show us that his proposed changes will increase their effectiveness. Otherwise what is he about? Is he just building up a little empire for himself? Is he trying to make great claims for himself? This is too serious a matter for that. We are now talking about the national defence of this country, and as I pointed out from the Esher report, when you are talking about national defence you are making preparations for the war that you hope will not occur, but which may occur and for which you have to be ready. We are saying to this minister that his proposal for a supreme commander in chief is likely to weaken the effectiveness of the fighting services, and he has not given us any proof to the contrary. We are pointing out to this minister that some of the plans which he has underway, as the hon. member for Simcoe North I think it was pointed out, will enlarge the responsibilities of the former chief of the general staff instead of reducing them, and will make his work even more complicated.

The other evening when we were discussing this bill we pointed out from the evidence given by Brigadier Malone, who was quoting from the report of the Esher committee, the inherent dangers in having a supreme commander in chief who may become the dominant figure in the defence services of this country and put the minister in the shadow. Or if there is a conflict of interest between the two men, one of them has to go. If one has to go it is damaging, on the one hand to the government, and on the other hand to the services. Why is the minister launching on this uncharted sea? He himself is not a man of vast experience, yet he will not tell us who are his advisers who have put him on to this particular course, and he will not give us adequate reasons for the changes he proposes. Because we treat this matter as of the utmost seriousness, we are insisting tonight that we get adequate answers from the Minister of National Defence, and I will now give him an opportunity to give us some of those answers.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, I should like the minister to answer a question I asked on June 29. I asked it of the associate minister at that time because the minister himself was away on business. I asked whether he had heard any complaints about the cutting down of the armed forces, and he replied: "Not to my knowledge". Perhaps the minister read that statement, but I would ask him now whether he has heard any complaints, generally or specifically from certain people, from those under him in the armed forces in the highest capacity, people upon whom he must rely. I have not had an answer to that question.

Since I asked it we have discovered that the aircrew who have been turfed out are not part of his general plan. Therefore I am wondering in relation to the 600 men who were turfed out whether the minister has heard any complaints, specific or otherwise, from any of his advisers, or from those high up in the armed services, about the future of the armed services and about the great cut-downs. Obviously if it is necessary that there should be cut-downs, all right; but has he heard any complaints? The minister has not told us where the cut-down is going to be, and I think this committee of the whole house should have this information before they are asked to pass this bill.

We have here a bill which is based on integration. The minister himself this afternoon said this is only the start. He said, "We are going to save money. We are going to cut down." Obviously his first concept is completely wrong, because in cutting down the chairman is replaced.

There is one other question I would like to ask the minister. Will the new chief of staff have top-flight men in each branch of the services? If the minister sits there and does not answer, perhaps it is because he has not an explanation; but I want an answer. I have asked for this information previously; it is not a question that has been put to the minister summarily which he has to answer off the cuff. He has had since June 29 to look the matter over, and he has not yet answered the question. I ask him once again; first of all, has he received any complaints from those who were turfed out? Have any complaints been voiced to him—I refer to matters that would affect morale—from his senior service officers, those who are advising him?

[Mr. Churchill.]

I ask the minister this question, Mr. Chairman, and I would like an answer.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I have had one or two letters of disapproval, and the thing that has surprised me is that I have not had more. I think this is very encouraging and is an indication of how well received in the country have been the steps that are being taken in the department.

Mr. Pugh: The minister mentioned letters, Mr. Chairman. I would point out to him that he is not very likely to get a letter from a service officer who is now employed and who may be without his vocation if he voiced such disapproval. I am wondering whether anybody has been strong enough—that is, anybody within the armed services who is acting in an advisory capacity to the minister—to say to him, "Look here, we should tell these people. We should say what our policy is and how it is likely to affect the lives of these people". I am referring to members of the armed services. I ask the minister now, has he been in consultation with his senior officers in this respect?

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, surely to goodness the minister is not going to sit there as though he had been struck dumb. After all, various members of this party and of the Social Credit party put some fair questions to him. Does he think he is going to disregard these questions; or is he without any answers? It is not by sitting there with a smug look on his face that the minister is going to get any progress on this legislation. Actually there have been some very seriously thought out questions to which I think the people are entitled to answers.

I put some questions last Monday night, a week ago, to the minister, but he has not replied. Is he just going to shrug his shoulders and say, "You are not going to get the information?" I asked him simply, what was the basis or the criteria used for the selection of aircrew for discharge? We were told this afternoon that there happened to be some surplus aircrew; there happened to be some short service commission officers.

Mr. Pugh: We were told that for the first time this afternoon.

Mr. Lambert: There was also another category which the minister mentioned. But what were the criteria? I put to the minister, for instance, that I know of one operational training unit where seven out of eight instructors have received their release, and this has put a great strain on the operations of that unit.

What were the criteria applied for coming to this decision? Surely to goodness we are entitled to an answer. The minister is not going to get eaten alive if he gives the information. Surely this house is entitled to know. I can recall the minister when in opposition going through all sorts of agony and anger because he could not get a minor piece of information. Well I am not going to give him that satisfaction. But on the other hand, Mr. Chairman, surely his colleagues know that answers should be given to these things. The majority of his colleagues, when they are asked questions which are relevant and pertinent, try to obtain the information. If the minister does not know, for goodness sake let him say so. But a number of questions have been asked and we want answers. Surely it is the minister's duty to stand in this house and tell us the answers. I invite the minister to answer these questions and not just sit there with a smile on his face.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacEwan: Hurrah. At last.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the criteria used in the selection of the 500 aircrew for discharge were as follows. All flight lieutenants, aircrew list, and air traffic control junior officers due to reach compulsory retirement age between July 1, 1964, and December 31, 1966, to commence rehabilitation leave in July. Up to 250 of the short service commission aircrew officers now serving on extension, depending upon present employment qualifications and performance, were also released at the same time. Those were the criteria which were applied by the service in the selection of the surplus aircrew who would be retired.

The reason I have declined to engage in an exchange with hon. members opposite this evening is that no questions have been asked which were not asked either in the house at the time the bill was given second reading or in the committee at the time it was being given careful consideration there. If hon. members will check the record in Hansard and in the committee proceedings, they will find the answers to the questions that have been asked here this afternoon over and over again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hellyer: I stated this afternoon, and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has disagreed, that the chief recommendation of the Esher report was to put into effect a system of area commanders. The reason I say this is that it was the only, or at least the major, recommendation which has persisted, which has lasted, which has stood the test of time. The army council which was recommended and established then to have independent powers has had its powers eroded. My hon. friend, being an ex-minister of national defence, is thoroughly familiar with that. The chief of the general staff was then only one among equals, though the senior member of the council, through the passage of time had his powers augmented until he became in fact the chief executive officer of the army, and the council in fact became subordinate to him. This happened years ago, and I am surprised that my hon. friend is now suggesting an organization which went out of style years ago, presumably on the basis of the experience of skilled men in the army both in the United Kingdom and here in Canada. I think it is interesting, if not symbolic, that hon. gentlemen opposite would recommend an organization which is based on conditions that existed in 1904. I think they would be well advised to turn their attention to the conditions which exist in the world today and see if they cannot apply their ingenuity to a solution which is adequate to the second half of the 20th century, which is the time period we are really most concerned with at the moment.

Hon. gentlemen would not expect me, I am sure, to comment on the detailed plans in respect of bases, and so on, in the maritime provinces, because that would be out of order on this bill. Therefore I will try as best I can to confine myself to the considerations of the bill that is now before us. I have given the reasons for integration many times.

I have stated that in my opinion it would not be possible to implement a co-ordinated defence plan for Canada without integration of the high command. I think that is reason enough in itself. Under the present system, with three independent chiefs and three independent services, I do not think that any minister could in the long run implement a co-ordinated defence plan. That is my opinion based on my experience. In order to implement a plan over a period of time which is co-ordinated and objective for all the armed forces, I believe it is necessary to have a unified command. That is the reason that one has been recommended.

I have also stated, and I am firmly convinced that it is the way to achieve the maximum savings, that only with a single unified command can you effect the maximum savings at all levels, from headquarters in Ottawa to area headquarters, logistics support, engineering, training, supply. This can only be effected with a single administrative organization in charge of the three armed forces. We have tried integration the other way and there have been some derogatory remarks about it on the other side of the house. We have had some areas of integration and there have been some real problems. One of the reasons there have been real problems is the continuation of three independent services and the fact that it was possible for any one service to implement a veto or to put obstacles in the road of implementation of recommendations put forward by the personnel members committee or by the minister to integrate a particular area of our defence forces.

In respect of morale I have stated that generally speaking morale is good. Certainly it is good in our overseas forces. It is good amongst our field forces here in Canada. I have stated quite honestly that there is some uncertainty particularly at national defence headquarters, and I have also stated that in my opinion that is inevitable. You cannot have a major reorganization along the lines we have proposed without a feeling of uncertainty. This cannot be avoided. You cannot have a new policy involving the employment of less people in national defence headquarters without having this feeling of uncertainty which exists at present.

The way to end the uncertainty and to improve morale at national defence headquarters is to permit us to get on with our job. Our planning has proceeded to the point where we have done as much as we can do until this bill is passed, and every day that goes by now without the bill being passed aggravates the situation which exists at national defence headquarters. It not only aggravates the situation in respect of morale at national defence headquarters but it results in the postponement of potential savings involving tens of thousands of dollars. So my recommendation to the committee is that we get on with the job, refer the bill back to the house, give it third reading and make it possible for us to go on to the next step, to provide that certainty which I know the armed forces would like to have and to effect the savings which I am sure all Canadian citizens are interested in our achieving.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, the minister has just made two statements to which I should like to refer. He said that we should pass the bill and restore morale and he also said that every day we delay passing the bill we are preventing the morale of the armed forces from being re-established. This simply indicates one thing to me, that there is cause for the minister to say that. There is no question that the morale of the armed forces has received a severe shock. The minister has admitted that in two statements. I ask the minister once again whether those who are senior in the services have said to him: Look, Mr. Minister, you had better do something about this because morale is sinking. I ask him that question specifically.

Mr. Hellyer: No, Mr. Chairman, the senior officers of the department have the same confidence in me that I have in them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Please interpret.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I think that some of the remarks made by the minister a short time ago indicate that he does not understand what the present form of organization of the defence forces of the United Kingdom is. He stated that the basic recommendation of the Esher commission that ultimate command and power should reside in a defence council had been discarded years ago. All that anyone has to do is to look at the chart showing the organization of the defence forces of Great Britain at the present time to find that the defence council is still in the same position it has been since that report was made, namely of having ultimate control and the ultimate power of command.

Mr. Hellyer: It was the army council to which I was referring.

Mr. Harkness: In each of the forces you still have a separate board of some sort. You have the admiralty board for the navy, the army board for the army and the air force board for the air force, and each of these boards has its own staff, scientists and what not. The minister has either not looked at the organization existing there, which has produced unification of command as I have already indicated on two or three occasions, or otherwise he has not understood it.

He made a statement a few minutes ago which is completely at variance with the facts and which the merest glance at the organization chart for Great Britain, without reading how the system works there or studying it, is enough to convince anyone of the true facts. If you look at this chart you will see the secretary of state for defence and under him the minister for the navy, the minister for the army and the minister for the air force. Then there is the defence council consisting of the secretary of state for defence, the ministers for the three services, the chief of the defence staff and the chiefs of staff of each of the services, the chief scientific adviser, the permanent undersecretary of state and the deputy minister. This is the same sort of situation we have had here. Under this you have the chiefs of staff committee and the defence staff. It is all one staff as far as the operational end of things is concerned. You have the defence secretariat, the defence scientific staff, and then you have the admiralty board, the army board and the air force board all reporting directly to the defence council where the ultimate authority resides.

To say that this totally disappeared years ago and that we are talking about something that went out of date many years ago just shows a lack of knowledge of what the present organization is in Great Britain, which was only completed in the last two years and is really just getting into operation properly there.

Mr. Hellyer: My hon. friend is confusing the reference I made to the army council with the defence council, which I was not discussing.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, under the present organization in the United Kingdom the army council is still there and it is responsible to the defence council for the operation, administration and so on of the army. The same is true of the navy and the air force, and to say that this has disappeared is just not correct.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, the minister's statement a few minutes ago, to which the hon. member of Calgary North has drawn attention, is another indication of the loss of confidence in the Minister of National Defence. He made a wild, general, incomplete and untrue statement with regard to the situation in Great Britain, and he asks people to believe that. The hon. member for Calgary North has pointed out his error.

Miss LaMarsh: Is he back on the team?

Mr. Churchill: Earlier the minister indulged in a cheap remark about getting into the second half of the 20th century and forgetting all about 1904. This is where the minister gets himself into trouble. We are not playing around with this thing. As I said before, the question of national defence is serious.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: Oh, I know laughter from Liberal members and Liberal ministers of the crown is to be expected. They do not understand the situation and are attempting to howl us down.

I should like to point this out, Mr. Chairman. We were using the example of the Esher committee report in 1904 to show what a nation with very great experience in war found was necessary to correct the deficiencies under which they had been operating. We are accusing this minister of going back to an outmoded system. I cannot understand why he is doing it. Ever since the 1904 report the British system, and for a time ours, was organized with a council in authority and not a supreme commander in chief. Now the minister, without advancing arguments, is reverting to an outmoded system. He is the one who is living in the past. We want him to come into the present.

To reinforce what the hon. member for Calgary North has said, let me read come of the things Brigadier Malone said to the committee. This will be of guidance to people who are seriously interested in this subject.

Mr. Grégoire: Dispense.

Mr. Churchill: Brigadier Malone drew attention to the new British system and a chart is displayed on page 142 of the committee report. This is what he said, as reported on page 143:

> I would like to draw your attention to the fact that there they are not attempting to do what we are doing here. They are attempting to centralize the command structure only; they are not trying to unify the forces. In Britain three ministers are being maintained under a single secretary of state. Directly under the ministry level you will notice there is a defence council, not a chief of defence staff. The chairman of that council is the secretary of state himself.

This corresponds to our minister.

> The secretary of state must participate; he must be part of the decision; he cannot say, "The experts told me this"; he must be part of the decision and he must answer for it in parliament; and either he or his deputy must attend.
> Then, they are going to have the members of the three services, but in your case you will not have the three services but you will have heads of branches, that is the G branch, the administration branch and the supply branch—call it what you will, I prefer in my own chart to simply call them administration and supply as they are simpler this way.

Subsequently, Brigadier Malone produced a chart giving his ideas on how things should be organized. I should like to quote one more paragraph:

> Now then, the defence council breaks down into three services, in the case of the British plan, but it does not go to chief of staff, chief of air council, admiralty board, on anything, it goes to a board. At the bottom of the British chart you see the admiralty board, the army board and the air force board. In the old days it used to be called the army council, the air council and the board of admiralty. They are still maintaining that this board will have the authority, and not a single man.

The minister says to us, let us revert to the old system of 60 years ago under which they had one single commander in chief. Let us not adopt a modern plan of having a council where there are seven people or so on that council who have the authority and must bear the responsibility. Why the minister wishes to revert to an outmoded system escapes me entirely. He will not tell us from whom he got the advice. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the minister should either give us a fuller explanation than he has given or he should revise this bill because he is running into trouble. We are trying to help him. We want him to avoid difficulties with the services and with all the paraphernalia that goes with the services. Surely, sir—

Mr. Grégoire: Carried.

Mr. Churchill: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if you would call to attention and order to remain silent certain people down in the lower part of this chamber who are continually interrupting? I do not know why members in this house have to be interrupted by—

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Monkeys.

Mr. Churchill: —by these people who are chattering away in their seats. I would ask you to give me some assistance, Mr. Chairman. I respectfully request that some action be taken with regard to these people who are continually interrupting and who will not identify themselves.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps I should remind the committee that the hon. member who has the floor has the right to make his remarks without being interrupted. If there are remarks to be made by any group of members at the end of the chamber, perhaps they will await their turn and take part in the debate.

Mr. Churchill: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. I wish to point out that we are not creating any disorder, but that the Liberal members who come and sit across from us give the impression that members of our group are to blame.

[Text]

Mr. Churchill: I do not object to interruptions, but I do object to a continual stream of shouts of "Order" or "Passed" or something like that. They are just ridiculous.

Now, coming back to the Minister of National Defence—

Mr. Grégoire: Carried.

Mr. Churchill: Was that the hon. member for Lapointe? He has not enough courage to stand on his feet and make the necessary interruptions.

Mr. Grégoire: Do I understand the hon. member is now giving me the floor?

Mr. Churchill: I have the floor. Have you a sensible interruption to make?

I am suggesting to the Minister of National Defence, Mr. Chairman, that he has not given us the answers. We have specifically asked him about integration and unification. Let him tell us exactly what he means. I am interested in the fighting efficiency of our services. Is he going to get that fighting efficiency by a complete unification? Are we misunderstanding him with regard to integration and unification? Let him tell us and let him tell the services. This is what we are after.

I noticed, according to the committee report, that this disturbed Air Marshal Curtis. He wanted to know what would happen when we have to send people abroad to engage in conferences with our allies, whether at Washington or in the NATO organization. I quote his remarks on page 165:

> But, in two or three years time, when we are all mixed up and we do not know whether an officer is air, army or naval, we will be in an embarrassing position when appearing at joint commissions in Paris, NATO or down in Washington, and I think we will be at a very great disadvantage.

Mr. Chairman, we do not want the Canadian forces, Canadian senior officers, to be placed at any disadvantage anywhere when they are dealing with their counterparts in other navies, armies or air forces. He goes on to say, speaking of the chairman of the chiefs of staff:

> But, I do think we should have given him the authority he requires to force his views upon the other services rather than doing away with the other services and confusing the three services for a number of years to come.

Here is a very senior officer making this comment after a lifetime of service, and the last sentence he spoke to the committee at that time was:

I cannot express myself too strongly in my view that this is a terrible mistake.

This committee of the House of Commons cannot ignore the evidence given before that special committee on defence by people like Air Marshal Curtis, General Macklin and Brigadier Malone.

Has the minister an explanation? How is he going to answer this complaint of Air Marshal Curtis? I am sure Air Marshal Curtis is speaking for other people who have similar experience in the services. These are things we want cleared up, and the minister is adopting a strange attitude tonight in failing to be frank with the committee, in failing to discuss this matter, in failing to give us his reasons.

We are going to be very patient. We are prepared to wait for his explanation, but if he is as anxious as we are to get on with the business—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: —he will tell us exactly what is in his mind and make a straightforward statement in reply to these questions.

Coming back to the point I started with, he has been corrected by the hon. member for Calgary North, and by myself reading out the evidence of Brigadier Malone, with regard to his haphazard statement just a few minutes ago. I have now put before him the feeling of Air Marshal Curtis with regard to the proposed change. Again I ask him how he is going to improve the fighting efficiency of our forces by adopting the outmoded system of a supreme commander? What is he going to do about this problem of unification or integration? Does this mean one force all put together?

Mrs. Konantz: I think all members of the committee will recognize the wonderful contribution women made to our three services during the last war, and I would like to know something about the role that the women's auxiliary corps will be playing in our reorganized defence forces.

Mr. Herridge: To supplement the fortunate remarks of the hon. lady from Winnipeg South, would the minister include in that the Wrens and the women's division? It is unfortunate that no reference has been made in this debate to the contribution made by women to our defence forces.

Mr. Hellyer: I try to mention them every time I say what a wonderful job our men and women in the armed forces are doing, and I would like to take this opportunity to pay a compliment to the ladies who contribute so much to the three armed services. There are many tasks which they do very effectively, in some cases more effectively than their male counterparts. I can assure hon. members that this will be a continuing requirement in the women's division, and we will make sure that they have opportunities for advancement to use their capabilities to the maximum extent.

We have one lady officer in the air force, I just mention this as an example, who is in charge of the food services for the air force. She is doing a wonderful job and is an excellent example of the real contribution that women are making to the armed forces of Canada.

Mr. Weichel: My question can wait if the minister would like to answer the questions put by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. With regard to the 500 men who have resigned or been laid off, how many of these are on active reserve? What would be our position in case of emergency, with regard to them?

Mr. Hellyer: I cannot answer that question. I shall take it as notice, but I can assure the hon. gentleman that we still have in the air force more than sufficient pilots and aircrews to man all of the aircraft we would have if hostilities should break out, and not only at the commencement of hostilities but for some time to come. Not only do we have sufficient to man present inventory but we have an adequate reserve as well.

Mr. Pugh: I was particularly interested in the remarks of the hon. lady from Winnipeg South. I trust that the remarks the minister made in answering will apply to the nursing service which we had during the last war. I make mention of this because my wife was a nurse in the Canadian army during the last war.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pugh: The committee is now feeling in a much friendlier mood, as I trust the minister is as well. I am wondering whether he will let us in on his 10 year plan. He has said he will not have a thought on that subject until this bill is passed, but has he anything to tell us about his 10 year plan which he mentioned the other day? How far will this affect personnel? How far will it affect contracts for construction? How much material will be manufactured in Canada and how much will have to be imported from the United States? I am thinking of airframes as an example.

All we have had so far is the change in the chiefs of staff, but we have had a wide ranging discussion concerning personnel. Could the minister give some specific idea about his 10 year plan? Obviously he must have thought it out to some extent or else he could not get up here and say he has one. He has been backing away from questions.

He says the chiefs of staff or his advisers have complete confidence in him, as he has in them. Can he not take the committee into his confidence? It is all very well to say that if we pass this bill we will start to cure morale in the armed services, but the minister has not answered a number of questions. Has he borrowed this 10 year plan from the Russians or the United States? Is it just his idea that a 10 year plan would be twice as good as Russian five year plans, about which we have heard so much? I am wondering whether the minister could not enlighten us with regard to this 10 year plan. Where do we go from here? Has he anything specific to tell us? Where is he heading?

Mr. Hellyer: If the hon. gentleman will permit the bill to go through we shall proceed at once to implement section 5 of the white paper. There he will find the 10 year plan set out in the shape of Canadian forces, 1964-74.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I was called out this afternoon while the minister was making a brief statement. I did not hear him directly, but I understand he gathered from my remarks that I was under the impression that senior military officers were, or could be made, directly responsible to parliament. He wanted to correct me and inform me that it was the minister who was responsible to parliament. I am sorry if the minister misunderstood what I asked. Last Monday, when this matter was last under debate, I mentioned the subject and to clear the matter up I should like to quote a sentence. I said, then:

> The main question is this: Whether parliament will have, in effect, one individual, in this case the chief of the defence staff, who is to be answerable to the minister for the defences of the country, or whether you are to have a council each member of which is appointed as a result of legislation and whose duties are specified in that legislation so that he can be held responsible if a particular phase of defence is not up to par.

All I was saying was that in most defence acts, and in our defence act at one time, there was a council set up and the provisions specified the membership of that council and what their responsibilities were. This is all I was recommending. Of course, there was no suggestion—it would be absurd under our parliamentary system—that any military officer should be reporting directly to parliament.

Mr. Churchill: I do not wish to press the minister any further but I shall record my great disappointment that he will not give answers to this committee. I charge the minister with failing to carry out his duty as a responsible minister of the crown. We are entitled as members of parliament to get information from the treasury benches. We have asked legitimate questions and fair questions of this minister. He sits in arrogant silence and refuses to answer. I have never seen an example of this, to this extent, in my experience here in the House of Commons.

All we are asking this minister is a reasonable response to reasonable requests. Basically we have said to him: Advance your arguments for attempting to put into effect an outmoded system which was found wanting in the past. But he will not give his arguments. In the second place we have asked him to explain what he means with regard to unification and integration of the services. Does he intend to wipe out our three fighting services and attempt to make one out of them? If so, what is the experience and the evidence on which he is founding such a decision? Surely the House of Commons is entitled to an answer, and why cannot we get one from the Minister of National Defence? Of course we appreciate his attitude. We have seen it now, month after month. He thinks that nobody on the opposition side knows anything about defence. I recall asking him if he wanted to get advice from the special committee on defence last fall. He said: No, I do not require advice from the committee. Yet the committee was supposedly set up to give him advice. This is the type of arrogant attitude which the minister has shown, and it is regrettable.

What we fail to understand is why the minister, as a responsible minister of the crown, will not give answers to these questions. He sits silent with regard to the unification of the services. He has told us at other times, or his words lend themselves to this interpretation, that he intends to have just one service. Frankly I do not see how that is possible. I do not see how it is possible to combine naval, air and land services into one force. Men are not interchangeable to that extent. I can understand—and I have seen this in actual practice—a combination of services working together effectively. That has been the experience in various wars, particularly in the second world war. But what does the minister mean? Is he wiping out the infantry regiments and the tank regiments which have a tradition behind them going back almost a hundred years?

Mr. Hellyer: No.

Mr. Churchill: Is he retaining the highland regiments, for example? Why cannot he answer that simple question?

Mr. Hellyer: I already have.

Mr. Churchill: Is he retaining the artillery regiment or is he wiping it out? What about the engineers? Then where does the air force come in, and the navy? Are these men all to be in the same service or is there some misunderstanding of what the minister has been saying? I submit these are fair and reasonable questions and we should have from this minister reasonable answers. This silence of contempt is a shocking attitude to adopt toward parliament and, once again, I call upon the minister to give us a comprehensive statement in answer to our legitimate queries. He should inform the House of Commons of these things. Where else can we get information, if not here in this chamber? I make one final request to the Minister of National Defence. Let us have the answers.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Edmonton West.

Some hon. Members: Filibuster.

Mr. Lambert: Hon. members who sit in their places and make a lot of noise, calling "filibuster", show precisely how much they feel they know about this. They cannot stand up and replace the minister, telling us what is meant by integration and unification of command, and how far it is to go. There is but one of them who could do that. We are being asked to buy a pig in a poke. Unless the minister will come forward and give us an indication of what he intends to do, that is the situation.

A few moments ago the hon. gentleman said there had been some changes brought about at the level of the lower echelons but that each service maintained an effective veto over how far the process went. Does he intend to do away with that veto, and is there to be an elimination of the individual services consequent upon the elimination of that veto? These are matters which should be clarified. It would be simple for the minister to tell us what he thinks about this. After all, it is he who is proposing the changes. Let him who proposes the changes prove his case. That is the simple practice in everyday business and it should be applicable in parliament. If the minister wants to make changes, let him prove his case. This does not consist of making merely the flat statement: I think this is a better way to do things. If the minister is confident that what he proposes is correct, then surely, nothing should deter him from putting forward reasons for his attitude. They are not bound up in some great mythology. There is no one who has placed a "super confidential" stamp on them. They are not contained in any white paper. The statements the minister has made are general. He gave me a classic answer at the first committee hearing, and I must say that if the minister wants to think these words mean anything to anyone they certainly do not mean anything to me. He said, as reported at page 30 of the report:

> I think the motivation is simply this, to get the maximum amount of effective forces in the highest state of readiness for the least amount of money.

What a lot of gobbledygook. That was his answer to the question as to his ultimate plans and upon whose advice he had acted in this connection. What the minister has stated is certainly the motivation which is behind the actions of his predecessors. But who does he think he is? Is he some divinely inspired minister of national defence who has suddenly discovered the truth? It is nonsense to adopt the attitude he has.

Mr. Habel: It is you who are talking nonsense.

Mr. Lambert: Well, he has more sense than the hon. member for Cochrane. Surely the minister can be frank with us and give us these answers.

Mr. Grégoire: Carried.

Mr. Lambert: But he sits there silent. We know the hon. member for Lapointe thinks he is back in high school and is trying to draw attention to the spoilt brat he might have been. But once again I appeal to the minister to give us the real reason why he is going back to this system that he is asking the house to approve, and to indicate why he prefers it to other systems. Let him give us some hard reasons. Surely to goodness he has them, so why can he not give them to us? We would not have been spending at least an hour and a quarter trying to get him to give us some answers otherwise. And let no one say "filibuster". I am sure the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grâce brings a great deal of deliberation to this matter, sitting there as he does, muttering from his seat. Since he was a member of the defence committee we would have liked his observations in this regard, but we have not had them yet.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, this has been an interesting debate, one which recalls to my mind events of not so many years ago. Questions have been asked this afternoon and evening which parliament has a right to have answered. The minister has proceeded throughout the afternoon, with the exception of one or two more or less unimportant contributions, to remain silent and to follow a course of action which has been his since the time he became minister. One cannot but recall that no minister has since the year 1956 followed the course which has characterized this minister today and on previous occasions. His attitude is one which is in keeping with what took place in 1955 and 1956. It is that of a minister who refuses to give information; who regards his silence as something which is commendable; who refuses to furnish parliament with answers to reasonable questions; who sits and smiles and sneers when asked questions which are of pre-eminent importance to Canada.

I am not going to press him any further to answer these questions. I am simply going to point out that it is this attitude of insolent arrogance which brought about in 1957 a change of government. It is an attitude on the part of a minister who refuses to answer, having brought in legislation which will effect tremendous changes in the life and future of many thousands of Canadians in the armed forces. This is a minister who has been questioned by two hon. gentlemen who have occupied the portfolio of defence. The minister's answers have been proven—those which he gave—to be totally out of consonance with the facts and the course respecting defence organization in the United Kingdom. This is an example of the arrogance that so often in the past was the characteristic trade mark of those who now sit opposite.

I can only point out once more that the retribution that comes to those who refuse to answer is recorded in the history of our country constitutionally and on more than one occasion. It is an attitude on the part of ministers—and there are only a few of them sitting opposite who have this attitude—of treating parliament with contempt and with a cavalier disregard of the rights of members of this house. I look back over the years to some former ministers of defence. I think of Ralston, I think of Power, I think of Macdonald during the days of war. I hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce applauding because he knew them. Those ministers answered questions when they occupied the position of defence minister.

Mr. MacEwan: They knew the answers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, they knew the answers. I would not suggest that the minister today does not know the answers, but if he does he is the only one among many of the ministers who qualify for the descriptive phrase that was used in 1962—"We have the answers".

What, Mr. Chairman, are the answers in this connection? Silence, insolence, arrogance; an attitude of sitting tight and refusing to answer. I am going to conclude—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, it must please you to find that these hon. gentlemen opposite are still able to hammer their desks because this is the only contribution most of them make to the discussion of a matter of great importance to our country. The government represented by the minister has refused to give any answers. I leave it there; time will tell.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, they also serve who only sit and wait.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, the minister says, "They also serve who only sit and wait." If that were the qualification for membership in the House of Commons, the minister is pre-eminent among all the ministers who have occupied the portfolio of defence throughout the years.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time; now?

Some hon. Members: No; next sitting.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the intention of the minister to move that the said bill be now read a third time?

Mr. Hellyer moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would remind the house that it is not necessary that we have consent for third reading, because we did not have second reading today.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If I might be allowed to speak to this, Mr. Speaker, we have found ourselves in the position this afternoon and evening of having a minister who has refused to answer questions—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and who has followed a course of stubborn denial in regard to answering questions. I suggest that parliament and this house be not further bulldozed by having third reading tonight and that it be set over until tomorrow.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I might refer hon. members to standing order 78, subsection 2. If the minister wishes to make his motion now, we will vote on the motion; but it does not require the consent of the house to make the motion at this time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No; it just requires ordinary parliamentary consideration.

Mr. Dupuis: That is what you did for six years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time; now?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Hellyer, seconded by Mr. Martin (Essex East), moves that the said bill be now read a third time and do pass. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are now on third reading; is that correct?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is correct. There is a motion for third reading.

Mr. Churchill: Third reading is debatable, and this is the type of bill that deserves full consideration.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: We have had an exhibition tonight of the most unco-operative attitude on the part of a minister of the crown that I have seen since I have been here, with perhaps the exception of some episodes in 1956.

Mr. Grégoire: And in 1962.

Mr. Churchill: We fully expected from this minister, who has received such glowing press reports from time to time—inspired, I presume, by his own office—some first-class exposition of his policy with regard to national defence. But he has taken the attitude of silence; he has nothing to say with regard to the bill which he is putting before us. On the one or two occasions when he did attempt to make an intervention, we pointed out his error, his lack of knowledge of the subject matter.

Mr. Speaker, this bill deals with the setting up of a supreme commander in place of the present chairman of the chiefs of staff committee and the various chiefs who have been serving under him. We are now to have one single commander for the armed services of this country—a system outmoded, outdated which has been proved beyond peradventure to be ineffective; a method used in the past by the United Kingdom, which resulted in unnecessary losses to that country in warfare.

With that type of experience behind the minister, if he has any knowledge of the past at all, he has persisted in foisting upon this country this outdated, outmoded and inefficient system and he is going to hand over to one single individual the control of the armed forces of this country under the supervision of the Minister of National Defence. I have indicated already tonight that as far as we are concerned, we have no confidence in this Minister of National Defence; and if we have no confidence in him, what about the services generally? This is the weakness of pushing a man ahead too fast when he is unprepared for the responsibilities; a man without any great experience in government administration; a man without any substantial experience with the services—and yet this man, lacking this experience, is attempting to sweep away the fundamentals pertaining to the services. No man who had substantial military experience would do this; he would pause when attention was drawn to the problem. But this is what we get with a person who has been pushed ahead, pampered, raised up as—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I be allowed to bring to the attention of the hon. member who has the floor that on third reading the discussion is limited strictly to the bill itself. In the opinion of the Chair, when the hon. member is referring to the qualifications of the minister to hold his portfolio it seems to me he is going beyond the terms of the bill before the house.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I was referring to the lack of qualifications of the minister to hold his portfolio, and I think I have amply demonstrated that.

Mr. Winch: What were your qualifications when you had the job?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver East has asked me what my qualifications were when I held the portfolio of minister of national defence. At that time I had some experience in government, and I had some experience in warfare. Perhaps a similar experience was open to the hon. member for Vancouver East, if he had wanted to take advantage of the opportunity; I do not know.

Mr. Winch: The member for Vancouver East fulfilled the service he was allowed to according to law, and served in the armed forces.

Mr. Churchill: I am very glad to hear that, but before the hon. member interrupts again I suggest that he should be more sure of his ground before talking about qualifications.

Mr. Winkler: And have a look at the record.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Churchill: If we are to have these catcalls and cries of "carried" by people who have no knowledge of military matters, I am prepared to wait for silence in the chamber. It does interfere with debate and makes it difficult to continue. We will probably hear from some other people pretty soon whose opportunities were not grasped at the time.

As I was saying a few minutes ago before the interruption, the purpose of the bill is to replace the chairman of the chiefs of staff committee and the chiefs of the naval staff, general staff and air staff with an authority who will be charged with all the functions, powers and duties of the persons being replaced, to be known as the chief of the defence staff. That is the main purpose of the bill, and the other clauses of the bill are consequential because of that particular amendment.

We have endeavoured to point out the weaknesses of the system proposed by the bill. We have endeavoured to show that putting one man in supreme command is a weakness. We have suggested that it would be better to have a council charged with responsibility and that with such a council, consisting of a certain number of military advisers and a certain number of civilian advisers given power and not simply acting in an advisory capacity, two things would be accomplished. First, civilian control over the armed services would be maintained, which is essential under our democratic system. Second, the minister would have military advice over and above that which might be proffered by the supreme commander alone.

The idea of having a supreme commander is attractive to some minds and has been and still is used in some countries. But in some countries where there is a supreme commander in charge you get revolutions and undue influence on the part of the services with regard to the government of the day. This is something to be avoided. That is why in countries with lengthy democratic experience civilian control is emphasized, strengthened and maintained.

In considering this particular bill our suggestion was that it would be far better to have a council comprised of military and civilian representatives with authority to reach decisions with regard to a great many problems. The problem of procurement of equipment, in which taxation is involved, the problems of recruiting, mobilization of manpower, accommodation, transportation for troops, the allocation of equipment and money among the navy, army and air force, all these things are better decided by a council of military and civilian advisers working together with the minister than by one supreme commander on his own initiative.

It is all very well to say that an advisory council is being set up and that this council will provide the military and civilian advice requisite under the circumstances. That is entirely different from having a council charged with responsibility. If such a council consists of seven members, those seven members, acting somewhat like a cabinet, have to take collective responsibility for the decision they have reached. This would provide a more sensible method of looking after our national defence problems than the one man idea, because in that council you would have the benefit of the experience and advice of seven or eight people.

Under the bill now before the house the contrary will prove to be the case. The supreme commander will reach his decisions based, of course, on consultations with others of lower rank. He will consult with civilian advisers within the department, but in the final analysis he has to make a decision and give his advice to the minister. Then you can have a conflict between two people, the supreme commander and the minister. The minister is responsible to cabinet and to parliament and has to accept the responsibility.

We have tried to point out the dangers inherent in a system where you have two people who are obliged to agree or else one or the other has to go. What position will the supreme commander be placed in if his advice to his minister is that, for example, there should be a vast increase in one of the three services and the minister is of the opinion that this is wrong, and one of the other services should receive greater attention? What happens? If the supreme commander is adamant, what does the minister do? On the one hand, the minister becomes just a satellite of the supreme commander and has to take his word for everything. On the other hand, if the minister enforces his will on the supreme commander and tries to get him to do something contrary to his military experience, the supreme commander either becomes a tool or puppet of the minister or he resigns and you have an upset in the system.

I know it has been argued that the committee system is unsound, but this is not a committee system that we have been advocating. It is a council; it is a meeting of minds just as in the cabinet. It is a relatively small council but it carries responsibility and gives instructions to the forces.

Attention has been drawn to the fact that a supreme commander may have undue influence on subordinate commanders. He may tend to surround himself, and this is natural and characteristic of human nature, with men of like mind, men who have the same ideas as himself. Under those circumstances how can you get a proper decision? There is plenty of experience both in wartime and between wars to indicate what happens when people in military forces get fixed ideas. I can give one or two examples which come readily to mind. In between the two wars we continued in Canada cavalry formations. Yet in the first war the cavalry, except in Palestine and in the very early days in 1914, was a useless weapon. The cavalry massed on the front for the breakthrough which did not occur, and when the Canadian cavalry brigade did get through on August 8 and 9, 1918, they were mown down. About 80 per cent of the force was destroyed by machine gun fire in just a few minutes.

Well, that is one example of what happens when people have fixed ideas. The people who were in control in between wars still pinned their faith on horse cavalry and neglected the new arm, the tank. Canada went into action in 1939 and 1940 ill-equipped for modern warfare. Supposing you get a supreme commander whose mind is cast in a mould that favours an outdated method of conducting warfare, an outdated method of training troops or an outdated concept of how a war should be fought. We will run into trouble. The frailty of the human mind is such that this is what might well happen, and we have seen it happen in the past. It can be observed in a reading of history.

I well recall another example of the fixed military mind or the inexperienced military mind. At the conclusion of the second world war a meeting was held in London with regard to an armoured personnel carrier. Three officers of the Canadian army were summoned to the meeting in London to put forward a proposal as to the type of vehicle which should be used as an armoured personnel carrier. Within 20 miles of London I was resident in a camp, and I was the only officer with the rank of lieutenant colonel who had used an armoured personnel carrier in action, but I was not consulted. Three officers who had never seen one in action sat down at a meeting to determine what an armoured personnel carrier should be like. This is the result of the fixed military mind which sometimes cannot see the woods for the trees.

We have seen the situation here in Canada. Only now are we getting to the point where we will have an armoured personnel carrier for our infantry forces. Despite speech after speech I made when I used to sit in the back row of this house concerning the necessity for an armoured personnel carrier in order to save the lives of infantrymen, it is now 1964 and we still have not an armoured personnel carrier.

This is one of the problems that arise in the field of national defence. I have just given you examples from my own experience. I expect similar examples to be drawn from the navy. Supposing there is not a nuclear war, but another war in which transport vessels have to be escorted across the ocean. Supposing the man in charge is against the convoy system. We have been through that in the history of the last 40 years. This was the trouble in the first world war. There was no effective convoy system introduced against the threat of the submarine because of the fixed military mind among the admirals. The danger that you run into, therefore, is this danger of having one man in complete charge. If his mind is inflexible, if he is determined on his course, what can you do? It is for this reason we suggest that instead of one supreme commander there should be a council, mixing military people with civilians and retaining civilian control which is essential, because in a democracy the civilian control is paramount. The armed services must be given direction from the civilian authorities.

We are opposing this bill, Mr. Speaker, on the grounds that it represents a throwback to earlier times. It is bringing into Canada a system which was rejected many years ago both in Canada and in the United Kingdom. We think it is absolutely unsound. The minister, intent as he is on reform, should have moved more slowly, one step at a time. If in the Department of National Defence there were too many committees and subcommittees, too much duplication of effort, why did he not try the system suggested by Air Marshal Curtis of giving more authority to the chief of staff or make the chairman of the chiefs of staff, along with the other chiefs of staff, into a council and give them the authority? He could have tried it out to see how it would go. Oh no, this minister says this is a new idea. Not having read history and being bereft of any practical experience, he seizes upon this idea of a supreme commander and now is attempting to foist it upon our armed services.

He says that this is just a step toward unification of the services. I fully appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot deal with that particular subject but I refer to it because the minister has indicated that is his intention. This is step No. 1, the supreme commander, and then the unification of the services. We feel that in this instance the minister has made a serious mistake. We have expressed our regret that he has been unco-operative. I now believe his lack of co-operation is due to a lack of knowledge of his subject. We regret that he failed to answer our questions and to explain what is in his mind with regard to his proposals for the future. It is our intention to oppose this bill at the third reading stage.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I am happy for the opportunity provided by this debate on third reading to join my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) in making a few observations. Unfortunately, it was not possible for me to be in the house earlier in the day. I think the subject matter is of sufficient importance that we should take advantage of this opportunity which is not usually taken on third reading to add some further comments.

I cannot join in the criticism of my colleague who has indicated that during the course of the debate today many questions were not answered in connection with this important subject of the reorganization of the Canadian armed forces. However, there were general questions of policy that remained unanswered, and which I would like to bring to the attention of the house at this stage of the discussion.

First, as we heard during the debate, this is not a new method or technique of organization so far as the experiences of other countries are concerned. This leads to the question that having been tried in other countries, particularly a country like the United Kingdom with its wide ranging military responsibilities, is this sudden leap forward in reorganization in the best interests of efficiency at this critical juncture in our nation's history?

The bill before us, which provides for a supreme commander of the armed forces, is more concerned with the public relations aspect of reorganization arising out of the recommendations of the white paper on national defence than it is a realistic approach to reorganization in the interests of manpower economy as well as actual fiscal economy. When the white paper was produced I was one of the first to criticize it as more of a public relations document than as a concrete effort to meet the difficulties of Canadian armed forces organization, difficulties which are not new, because up until recent years, except in times of war, Canada's military formations have pursued a rather disjointed policy.

The whole idea of integration emerged gradually in recent years. It began actually with the advent of General Pearkes to the ministry, when he started a trend toward integration which was designed as a new approach to reorganization. Now suddenly in this bill we have abandoned the gradual approach and in one fell swoop, at least according to the public relations aspect, we are trying to unscramble all the errors of policy, or lack of policy, which had given rise to the difficulties of armed forces organization down through the years.

There has been a tendency on the part of the government of Canada to downgrade the importance and significance of our armed forces in peacetime. This was the pattern between world war I and world war II, and it was followed to such a disastrous extent following world war II that when the crisis of Korea came upon us Canada had to embark suddenly upon a crash program. In fact this was the name given to the program of recruiting and reorganization that took place at that time by the then minister, Hon. Brooke Claxton. He referred to the crash program that was necessary in order to gear the Canadian military formations to the demands of the struggle in Korea.

I suggest that the proposal before us has somewhat of the unplanned crash aspect that the hurried unplanned activities to meet the Korean crisis had back in 1950. But it goes even further than that. One of the reasons why we have had such extreme difficulty and extended debates on defence during the fifties and the sixties is because of the lack of consistency in policy until the advent of General Pearkes to the ministry. This lack of consistency created a perpetual crisis in defence planning, particularly in the air force sector of the Department of National Defence.

We had some momentous debates in this house when this party formed the government, when the first gradual move towards integration took place, when Canada embraced the NORAD system of defence after a long period of delay and hesitancy on the part of the previous Liberal administration. The Liberal party then in opposition were highly critical of even the gradual approach toward integration of the service aspects of the armed forces. They were particularly critical of some of the reversed decisions with respect to planning for the equipment needs of the air force arm of Canada's forces. I refer, of course, to the noisy debates that took place at the time of the cancellation of the Arrow program.

Why did it become necessary to cancel the Arrow program? It was simply because of the crash type of planning referred to by Hon. Brooke Claxton, which became necessary to meet the demands of the air force. All the resources of that rapidly growing air industry in Canada, A. V. Roe at Malton, were suddenly diverted from peacetime pursuits, such as work on the jetliner, and concentrated on producing the CF-100, which became quickly obsolescent and was superseded by the CF-105, because no careful long term policy planning to meet the hardware needs of the air force had ever been undertaken.

The former Conservative government was strenuously criticized for its decisive action in this regard. I am not going to revive the debate at this time other than to point out that decisions of that kind became necessary because there had been no consistent policy planning to meet the needs placed upon Canada's armed forces immediately following world war II. Not only did it become necessary, to meet the Korean crisis, to institute crash programming, but I can remember in the years 1946 and 1947 when Canada was asked to participate in the occupation of Europe, the Liberal government of that day had decimated our armed forces to such an extent that we were not able to take our rightful place, a place that Canada had merited by reason of her outstanding contribution in world war II. We were not able to take that place because of this tendency to proceed on a hit and miss basis in meeting our peacetime armed forces commitments. It seems to me that the desire of successive Liberal administrations has been to reduce our spending on the forces to an irreducible minimum, even though it came down from $2 billion in the early fifties to $1½ billion due to the economies of the former Conservative administration.

I feel that this bill which would place a supreme commander in charge of Canada's armed forces is putting the cart before the horse. Before we have a supreme commander to carry out the organization as outlined in the white paper I would suggest that the government and the Department of National Defence should proceed to more specific planning in the direction of integration than is outlined in the white paper. I presume that some of the policy questions which were asked this afternoon and which remain unanswered were related to some of these specifics which still have not been explained by the Minister of National Defence.

There is one further aspect of this subject which concerns me. It seems to me that having embraced the NORAD concept of continental defence—and I would remind the house that it was a Conservative government which first accepted the principle of continental responsibility for the defence of North America—the new administration is going to the extreme pole in this aspect of armed forces reorganization. They were hesitant to embrace the NORAD principle early in 1956 and 1957 because to a certain extent it meant the surrender of national sovereignty. But now—and this is the only possible manner in which the new top level structure of the armed forces organization as contemplated by this legislation could possibly work—it seems to me that we are surrendering the sovereignty of Canada's forces to another power.

Let me by way of illustration refer to the so-called Bomarc debate. This was an even more furious debate both in the House of Commons and across the nation than was the debate concerning the cancellation of the Arrow program. The essential point at issue in the Bomarc debate was the loss of Canada's ultimate sovereignty over her own armed forces. When I hear of the gradual disbandment of fighter squadrons such as 410 squadron, and more recently 414 squadron, it seems to me that this planning will reduce Canada's air force potential to complete dependence upon United States airpower. The essence of the Bomarc question was simply this: Is Canada to maintain ultimate control over her own armed forces or is she to surrender this control to a foreign power? We are reduced to three fighter squadrons—three all-weather fighter interceptor squadrons and two Bomarc squadrons armed with atomic warheads. It is still not known whether Canada has ultimate control over those warheads. It seems to me that these policy decisions have already been taken by the government in anticipation of the structural reorganization contemplated in Bill No. C-90 and if the government proceeds with this reorganization at the upper echelon of the officer level, the supreme commander will merely be accepting the policy put forward by the government which has already acquiesced in the ultimate and final control of the Canadian armed forces by the government of the United States.

This is a question which concerns other countries besides Canada. For example in the British House of Commons just two weeks ago the government came under fire from the Labour opposition for accepting submarines armed with the Polaris missile in much the same way as the former Liberal opposition criticized the Conservative government of the day for its acceptance of the Bomarc without the final decision concerning the atomic warhead. The defence of the British government, as was the defence of the Canadian government during that debate, was: The warhead is American; the Polaris is American; but ultimate control of the missile will remain in the hands of the British government. It seems to me this is the crux of the matter and it is of fundamental importance to Canada as a nation, because if we are surrendering military sovereignty it is a long step toward surrendering political sovereignty.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the desire of the house that I call it 10.30 and put the question? Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Churchill: No, Mr. Speaker; you have called it 10.30.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: I would ask the leader of the house what the business is for tomorrow and the next day.

Mr. Favreau: We hope to have third reading of Bill No. C-90 on national defence, after which we shall proceed with the second reading of the youth allowance bill. We would hope, because of the urgency of this matter and the public interest as expressed by all parties, that we could dispose of the committee stage and third reading in succession, after which we will proceed with the resolution preceding the bill revising certain fiscal arrangements. That would be followed by the committee stage debate and third reading of Bill No. S-17 respecting the territorial sea and fishing zones.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

(Subject matter of questions debated under adjournment motion).

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved:

PENSIONS—CANADA PLAN—REQUEST THAT CONSIDERATION BE CONTINUED TO CONCLUSION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, last Friday morning, July 3, as recorded in Hansard at page 4992, I drew the Prime Minister's attention to the very firm announcement he had made on Tuesday, June 30, at page 4907 of Hansard, with regard to the debate on the flag. As hon. members are aware, that announcement was in definitive language to the effect that the debate on the flag would be continued until it had been concluded. Accordingly I asked the Prime Minister whether he would not give the house an equally firm assurance that the legislation respecting the Canada pension plan would be continued in this session until it had been concluded. As hon. members will recall, the Prime Minister's reply was that the Canada pension plan would be introduced in the fall part of this session and that it would be proceeded with, but that further than that he could only say that he hoped it would be concluded.

My point in asking for this matter to be transferred to this overtime period is surely quite clear. I think it is a very reasonable request which we are making on the floor of this house that there be at least as definite an assurance regarding the Canada pension plan as has been given with respect to the flag. I would point out that the assurance about the flag debate is that it will be concluded before the house rises for a summer recess. All I am asking with regard to the Canada pension plan is for an assurance that it be concluded before the session ends; and it begins to look—I am not jesting; I am making a serious prediction—as though the session probably will not end until Christmas.

I think we have the right, Mr. Speaker, to have an equally definite assurance with regard to the Canada pension plan, and I hope that the house leader, who I understand will be answering on behalf of the Prime Minister, will give that assurance tonight. As hon. members know, we in this party—and I think this is true of members of other parties as well—would like to see the Canada pension plan brought on sooner. We would like to see it brought on this summer. Indeed, that was the original plan. But as announced by the Prime Minister when he spoke about the business of the house last Tuesday night, it is a fact that we have had negotiations respecting the business of the house to be dealt with during the summer weeks. The results of those negotiations, as I say, were announced by the Prime Minister last Tuesday night, so it is clear to everyone that dealing with the Canada pension plan has been put off till the fall.

It is an open secret that one of the reasons it is being put off is because it is taking time to draft the legislation in its revised form. In other words, the bill is not yet ready. I am accepting the result of those negotiations; indeed, I must accept them because I took part in them. But I am concerned as to what will happen in the fall. When the fall comes we will have a long list of items before us. One of the top items will be redistribution, which I think should have high priority. There will also be the legislation regarding the Bank Act, and that concerning the department of forestry and rural development. There will be legislation setting up the treasury board as a department of government; there will be legislation on periodical publications, the railway legislation, the national labour code, and 15 or 20 other items. In addition to all these items there will be practically all the main estimates.

Surely hon. members can see the terrific competition there is going to be for parliamentary time in the 12 or 14 weeks between our coming back here in the fall—or maybe we will still be here, with the flag debate having lasted throughout the summer—and Christmas. In those 12 or 14 weeks there will be tremendous competition for parliamentary time, as I have said, and I know what will happen because I have been through it a good many times. We will start to have meetings of house leaders and party representatives, and we will have to face the fact that we cannot deal with everything; therefore some things will have to be left over until next year. My fear is that if we do not get moving with the Canada pension plan, if we do not receive a firm assurance from the government, it is one of the pieces of legislation which may very well be put off until next year.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, we were going to have it last year, but it was put off until 1964. It has already been put off a couple of times this year. I say that in view of the importance of this piece of legislation, in view of the place it occupied in the government's election platform of 1963, it is not good enough for us to be told by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) merely that he hopes it will be dealt with at this session. I think we have the right to be given the assurance that it will be proceeded with, and proceeded with to a conclusion; and we should have an assurance that is just as strong as that which we have had with respect to the flag. We know that the Canada pension plan after second reading will be referred to a committee. That would be a good time to resume the debate on redistribution. But first of all let us get the Canada pension plan moving this fall, and let us have the assurance now that it is going to be stayed with until concluded; let it be just as firm an assurance as we have had with respect to the flag.

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, one thing that I must first make note of in this house is the interest of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken in the matter of the Canada pension plan, and the other matter which I must note, in due justice to him, is the genuine character of the interest which he bears to the question. I may assure him that the sincerity of the government and the government's desire to proceed with the Canada pension plan as early and as definitely as possible is just as genuine and intense as his own.

The government is, as the hon. gentleman noted, at the present time completing the drafting of the bill in certain of its technical aspects. In view of the discussions which have taken place in this respect and certain modifications which have been agreed to for the purpose of assuring that this country once and for all will have a nation-wide Canada pension scheme, of course certain adjustments had to be made and they must be reflected, especially the technicalities involved, in the actual drafting of the bill.

I can assure this house that it is the firm intention of the government to do everything possible so that the final stage of the legislative process with respect to this legislation can be achieved and completed before the end of the current session in the fall. But the Prime Minister of course could not state a date the other day. In this connection I want to say that the government does not have the same measure of control over the continuity of the legislative process with respect to the pension bill. It will, as the Prime Minister said, be sent to a committee and will have to go through all stages. But, given the full assistance and co-operation of the house at each stage, the government undertakes to obtain the completion of the legislative process with respect to the Canada pension plan before the end of the session.

Mr. Knowles: Keep us in session until it is done.

TRANSPORT—RICHELIEU WATERWAY—STUDY BY INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I asked the Prime Minister if the government was going to proceed shortly with the Richelieu deep waterway project.

In 1961, the Conservative government asked the boundary waters commission to make a survey in order to carry out, if possible, the Richelieu deep waterway project. That study must be over now, I am quite sure.

It would be of importance to connect Montreal and New York through the Richelieu river, which is the shortest navigable waterway. The route between Montreal and New York would be shortened by 1500 miles through that waterway, instead of going around by the gulf of St. Lawrence and the Atlantic ocean. By using that means of transportation, Canada would save $125 million a year.

Since Canada is ready to pay in full expenditures connected with its troops in Cyprus, without any help from the United Nations, I wonder why the government is delaying the implementation of that project which is of vital importance to our country's economy.

I would like to know if anyone is against it and why the work is being postponed.

Referring to the newspaper Le Devoir for September 19, 1960, I note that the hon. members for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) and Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin), both ministers now, met with their colleagues from the Quebec legislative assembly and approved a resolution asking Ottawa to carry out an investigation, which was ordered by the Conservative government. The government was also asked to proceed with the deepening of the Richelieu river in the fall of 1960.

Appearing before the international boundary waters commission and speaking on behalf of the chamber of commerce of greater Sorel, Mr. Henri Ollivier stressed the important economic advantages which could be derived from the deepening of the Richelieu river. Numerous steps were also taken in that connection by the late Dr. C. Robert Fiset, former mayor of Sorel, who worked intensively in that respect.

The St. John chamber of commerce submitted two briefs to the international boundary waters commission during the latter's sittings in the city of St. John in the riding now represented by the Minister without Portfolio.

Mr. Speaker, since the Associate Minister of National Defence and the Minister without Portfolio advocated the implementation of that project a few years ago, I wonder what they are doing now in this connection. That is why I am asking the minister to render them at least a service, to help with their re-election, if possible, while looking after the interests of the Canadian people.

Moreover, I ask the minister to tell us what serious objections the government would have to proceeding without delay, jointly with the United States, to the deepening of the Richelieu river?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asks about the progress of the studies concerning the Richelieu deep waterway project. I must tell him that since the governments of Canada and the United States asked the international joint commission to make an inquiry as to whether the project was feasible and beneficial from an economic point of view, it held public hearings in the area concerned on both sides of the boundary. The commission also appointed a board of experts which is now pursuing its work and technical investigation. The commission expects to receive from the investigation board a preliminary report on the feasibility of the project by June 1965. When it receives that report, the commission may take a decision as to the "form" of its own report to the two governments, and the date when it will be submitted.

We will consider seriously the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, who so efficiently supported the representations of various members on the government side.

LABOUR RELATIONS

NON-OPERATING RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—COMMUNICATIONS RESPECTING CONCILIATION BOARD REPORT

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the house would permit me to read a telegram I received just before coming into the house, which is signed by vice presidents of the two railway companies and has to do with the outstanding discussions between the railways and the unions. This telegram reads as follows:

The following telegram has been sent to Mr. Bernard Wilson, director of industrial relations, Department of Labour:

"In the matter of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and a dispute affecting the negotiating committee representing the associated non-operating unions—

Dear Mr. Wilson:

With your letter of May 26th, our file 761:325:64, you sent us a copy of the report of the board of conciliation and investigation which dealt with the above dispute. Since receipt of the report, the presidents of Canadian National and Canadian Pacific have had discussions with government. We are now communicating with Mr. F. H. Hall, chairman of the associated non-operating unions negotiating committee, to arrange a meeting for the purpose of negotiating an agreement on the basis of the conciliation board's recommendations."

Yours very truly,

D. I. McNeill, vice president, personnel, Canadian Pacific Railway Company

W. T. Wilson, vice president, personnel and labour relations, Canadian National Railways

Perhaps it might be convenient for hon. members if there could be agreement to have two further communications appended to today's Hansard. It is not necessary to follow this course in connection with the telegram I just read because it will be in Hansard itself. The other two communications are a letter dated June 22 addressed to the Prime Minister by the presidents of the two railways, and a reply, in identical terms, to the presidents of the two railways dated June 30, which refer to the matter mentioned in the report. In view of the very general interest I wonder if, when these are tabled, the house would consider giving consent to having them appear as an appendix to today's Hansard.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the nature of the letter, the substance of the letter?

Mr. Pickersgill: The letter from the railway companies sets out the position taken by the railway companies with regard to the conciliation board report, and the Prime Minister's letter is a reply to the letter.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to grant consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of documents above referred to see appendix.]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words concerning the statement just made by the Minister of Transport and the document he has tabled.

We all know the railway unions and the management of the two largest railway companies in Canada are now negotiating the renewal of their contracts.

All sorts of rumours are circulating at the present time—in fact, they are not just rumours, since the Minister of Transport, by the replies he gave yesterday, seemed to imply they were true—to the effect that the federal government would provide new subsidies to the C.N.R. and C.P.R. to offset the salary increase which will be granted to employees of those two large companies.

We have nothing to say against a wage increase for railway employees, on the contrary; however, we object to the government increasing its subsidies to the two railway companies concerned, because we note at the present time that the rates of those companies are much lower than those of trucking companies for the transport of similar goods. This is unfair competition, since the railway companies are using moneys granted by the federal government and the Department of Transport to cut down their rates. Taxes paid by private trucking companies are used to subsidize their competitors which can thus reduce their rates.

Mr. Speaker, this is something quite inconsistent and absurd. The private trucking industry in Canada is being jeopardized with the taxes paid by the people.

I feel that the Minister of Transport should give the house the formal assurance that there will be no further development in the granting of subsidies to railway companies until the matter is aired before the house and then referred to the committee on railways, airlines and telegraph lines.

The minister said that the MacPherson report would be considered in the fall. I suggest, however, that the Department of Transport should not grant any additional subsidies to the C.N.R. or to the C.P.R. until the standing committee on railways, airlines and telegraph lines has had an opportunity to look into this problem of cut rates.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport should take this request into consideration and he should not add to the uneasiness which prevails at the present time in the trucking industry.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): We all welcome, I think, the indication that the companies are accepting the majority report. But in the news reports about the meeting with the government last week—one can assume they were somewhat inspired since no official spokesman was named—the indications were that there was some quid pro quo promised, given or undertaken by the government with regard to the companies. I think it is unfortunate the minister has not given any information as to whether there is any substance in these rumours, or about the general position the government took in regard to the majority report. If there is a quid pro quo to the companies—and it is hard to imagine the Canadian Pacific Railway being so amenable without something like this—it seems to me we should know about it at the earliest opportunity.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF INTENSIFIED COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, Indian communities will be assisted in raising their living standards and improving their economic, social and cultural life by means of an intensified community development program which will supplement present government assistance.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

An investment of some $3,551,000 over the next three years is proposed for this aspect of Indian development, which will be conducted by the Indian affairs branch on its own and in association with various provincial and other agencies. This amount is the minimum needed for an intensive three year program. This is the price tag for the assembled skills, organizational instruments and operating techniques which constitute this new process.

In its application, the proposed community development program is designed to employ, to the greatest extent possible, all the available material and human resources in Indian communities and in each province. One of its effects will be to step up mobilization of Indian initiative and to further promote self sufficiency. One of its end results will be to accelerate transfer to Indian communities of responsibility and authority for the management of their affairs, with concurrent limitations in government controls.

In organizational terms, this program will provide one important framework for co-ordinating and enhancing the efforts of existing health, education, welfare and economic development services in Indian communities. In facilitating the development of Indian communities this program would fill a serious gap in existing programs and reduce costs in such palliative areas as welfare assistance payments.

The success of this latest self help program is expected to bring reserves closer to being self sufficient communities and thus reduce the need for reliance on relief and other welfare assistance. This will depend in large measure on the participation of the Indians themselves in efforts to improve their level of living with as much reliance as possible on their own initiative. The program makes provision for technical and other services which will help them to establish self sufficiency. It will be noted immediately that there are over 200,000 Indians in Canada, and that at the present rate of increase there will be around 250,000 in six years.

There is a requirement for a large number of persons skilled in the field of community development to work on reserves and, as the program develops, members of the Indian communities concerned will be engaged in developing local programs. In a number of cases community development workers will be engaged and directed by the department. In other cases, with the approval of Indian bands concerned, such workers will be supplied by arrangement with provincial governments. Canada has a shortage of qualified workers in the field of community development and it is hoped that university courses in this field soon will be established. Special courses now are being arranged for departmental staff engaged in this work to study the essential philosophy and techniques involved.

The community development program is being introduced in the three stages beginning in 1964-65 and extending to 1966-67. The stage beyond 1966-67 will represent an on-going program. Although the community development process will result in many tangible improvements on reserves, the very nature of the process is such that it is impossible to spell out in advance which specific projects and services are to be undertaken first. To preserve the effectiveness of the community development process, therefore, and particularly the decision making process at the local level, it will be necessary to make a general allocation of community development funds to each region. Under this arrangement, specific allocation will be controlled by the regional supervisor in relation to emerging needs and development on particular reserves.

As a general principle the community development program will recognize that it is neither desirable nor practicable to abolish reserves. A corollary to this is that the perpetuation or worsening of conditions on reserves will not provide incentives for people to leave. Such conditions tend to have the opposite effect in reducing mobility. Community development therefore implies acceptance of reserves as Indian communities. A community development effort will need to be sustained at least until those reserves which have the necessary potential are brought to approximate social and economic parity with neighbouring non-Indian communities. Where no economic basis for the existence of a reserve can be found, the community development process can be employed equally effectively in resettling people in other areas.

In essence, the community development program represents a conscious effort by the government to guide the forces of change in the best interests of Indian communities and the country at large. It is based on recognition that in the past purely technological approaches have frequently failed to achieve the desired results or have caused unforeseen damage to people. In undertaking this program I will remain concerned not only with the economic and technical prerequisites and consequences of change but also with its social and cultural dimensions.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): The statement made by the minister is most interesting. It is impossible, of course, to deal in any detail now with the representations he has made in respect to the changes designed to improve and elevate the position of Indians within our country. Any action taken in this connection is most commendable, giving the Indians a greater and ever increasing equality of opportunity while at the same time maintaining the treaty rights which are of the essence of our relationship with them.

This is a further step along the road we were endeavouring to map out when we were sitting opposite, giving to the Indians equality with other citizens of our country, providing them with the franchise heretofore denied to them and also ensuring representation in parliament by the appointment of Senator Gladstone to the other place.

Over the years the Indians have been of particular interest to me, beginning when we first went west in the area of Fort Carlton. I have seen the Indians passing from a position of great difficulty and squalid poverty to a state of gradual improvement and I am sure the present plan will do still more to equalize that condition of citizenship which all of us in our country must establish. Discrimination was removed in law through the bill of rights. Economic opportunity was provided through rising standards and the provision of technical schools for the Indian people who are, technologically, of a high standard of ability, but who had not possessed an opportunity to advance and improve their position.

I say to the minister that the action outlined in this statement will receive the full support of the opposition, for all of us are tremendously interested in assuring that the Indian population of our country shall attain the highest possible standards. I return to what I said near the beginning of my remarks. At all times we must preserve their treaty rights which are sacred in their sight and sacred, in their view, to the maintenance of the relationship between the Indian population and the rest of Canada.

I hope that at the same time the minister is proceeding to have set up the Indian claims commission so that their historic rights, which too often over the years have been violated and diminished, shall be given the full consideration of a semi-judicial body and, where wrongs have taken place, right will be substituted.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, we of the New Democratic party certainly welcome the statement which has been made to the house today by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. The statement, necessarily I suppose, was couched in rather broad and general terms, but as I listened to it I did feel that due consideration had been given to the need for a flexibility of approach in dealing with a community development program for the Indian people in various parts of the country. I have been feeling for some time that this session has been singularly lacking in the attention it has focused upon the affairs of the Indian people, at least on the surface of things. It is therefore good to know that the minister and his department have been doing some work behind the scenes which has resulted in this announcement today.

I was glad to note that consideration is being given to the retention of homes for the Indian people on their reserves and in their communities, because I am coming increasingly to feel that it is worth while in this country that an opportunity be given for the perpetuation of some of the contributions to our culture which can be made by the Indian people, and I think it is from their own communities that some of this type of development can stem. We certainly shall be studying the statement in detail, and probably studying with more attention and in greater detail the manner in which the proposed program is to be worked out. So often it seems that these high sounding programs, when it gets down to the brass tacks of working them out, do not meet in full the promises and purposes as announced by a minister.

Certainly as far as I am concerned, and I am sure as far as my colleagues in the New Democratic party are concerned, we do hope that this is not going to be another one of those cases where there was too little too late in dealing adequately with the situation as it affects the Indian people of Canada. I can say that we pledge our full support to the minister and the government in making this program something that will be very worth while for the Indian people of the country.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, we join in expressing appreciation to the minister for the statement he has made this afternoon with respect to the Indian community development program. We realize, of course, that this is not the time for debate, and we are looking forward to the estimates of the department being brought before us so we can get a more extended statement and also have the opportunity of discussion and debate on the matter.

We all know there is a wide divergence of opinion across the country as to the best way to meet the challenge posed by the problems of our Indian people. I feel there is a growing interest on the part of people generally with respect to this particular matter. I suggest that in conjunction with the Indian community development program it is essential that there also be an education program which will assist our Indian people to accept responsibility, to meet the challenge and to achieve the destiny which is theirs as citizens of this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, we approve of the intention of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Tremblay) to do something in order to improve the conditions of the Indians in Canada. It is not that we do not mean well in our country but often we do not know how to go about it. In this regard we want the department to consult the representatives of the Indians when decisions have to be taken which will affect them or when certain community development programs have to be carried out.

We believe that the Indian people should be consulted, that they should voice their opinions on those programs intended to help them. The department must also see to preserve their cultural heritage and their traditions, since they were, after all, the first occupants of this country.

First of all, the Indian people need to be understood in order to be assisted.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I realize it is not common practice for more than one member of a party to rise on occasions of this nature, but—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member will realize that if we start making exceptions, standing orders go out the window. It is customary for only the leaders of the different parties to comment on motions.

Mr. Nielsen: Then I must raise a question of privilege, since there appears to be a great omission from the statement made by the minister. As he is aware, reserves—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is surely raising a grievance, not a question of privilege, and he will have ample time to do this later on in the proceedings.

Mr. Nielsen: Sir, I believe—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Winkler: Same old gang.

Mr. Nielsen: If Your Honour will call the howlers to order so you can hear my question of privilege, perhaps a decision might be made on it. The minister in his remarks—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nielsen: —referred only to provinces, and I was simply going to ask him whether this program applied to the Indian people in the Yukon and Northwest Territories as well.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to be quite obvious that the hon. member has raised a question which he could ask on orders of the day. There is no question of privilege or grievance here; it is merely a question.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration concerning the announcement he made this afternoon. He made no mention of the Yukon and Northwest Territories, of the application of the program announced by him to those territories, although he made reference to the application of the program to reservations. As I am sure he must be aware, there are no reserves in either territory. Can he tell the house whether the program he has announced is applicable to the Indian people of the north?

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that, in the case of reserves, the community development program is carried out within the reserves, but we do not intend to limit our program to reserves.

Canadian Indians living in the Northwest Territories or in the Yukon will benefit by the program announced today.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ACCEPTANCE BY RUSSIA OF UN PEACE KEEPING FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether any representation has been made by the U.S.S.R. to the government of Canada, as apparently has been the case with Japan, to show the acceptance by the Soviet of a peace force under the United Nations whereby all the nations except the five permanent members of the security council would make a contribution. I would also ask him whether, other than the press dispatches, there has been any communication from the Soviet government in this connection to the government of Canada.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there has been no formal communication between the Soviet union and the government of Canada. The foreign ministry of Japan announced yesterday that it had received a proposal from the Soviet union, and an Associated Press dispatch indicated that this proposal would be circulated to members of the United Nations. That proposal has not been received yet, but I would say that, subject to careful further examination, we would regard this proposal as an important statement in principle by the Soviet union, and particularly so because of the Canadian interest in the principles of UN peace keeping.

The Soviet proposal seems to be a restatement by the Soviet union of its position with regard to article 43 of the charter of the United Nations. The proposal as reported suggests that the Soviet union would be prepared to support the financing of a permanent peace keeping force under the auspices of the United Nations; but that there is no indication, in anything which has yet been made public, that the Soviet union is prepared to meet the financial obligations which the international court of justice says are due from the Soviet union in respect of peace keeping operations already undertaken by the United Nations.

I can assure the right hon. gentleman that if this proposal is presented to Canada formally we shall give it very careful consideration.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the minister whether he has any explanation of the fact that the U.S.S.R. made this suggestion to Japan rather than to one or other of the nations which have made their contribution to peace keeping operations, or particularly direct to the United Nations. Is there any explanation of this rather unusual course?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can offer anything more than conjecture. However, Japan is a country which has given indication of its interest in peace keeping and I know that my right hon. friend did not single out Japan as a country that had not done so. I can offer no explanation of the fact that Japan seems to have been the initial recipient of the proposals.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, might I ask the minister a supplementary question. In view of the extreme importance of this proposal, will the minister communicate the contents of any actual proposal which is made to the house just as soon as possible?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, sir.

CYPRUS—REPORTED SECRET LANDING OF GREEK TROOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he has received from the secretary general of the United Nations any confirmation as to how many Greek troops were landed in Cyprus, whether it is true that Cypriot police kept the United Nations forces from viewing such landings, and what course the United Nations intends to follow in view of this violation of the security council resolution.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have been in touch with the United Nations today. There is a difference of view as to the extent and nature of these importations. Beyond that I do not think it is now desirable to go. The course the United Nations will follow is one that cannot be stated firmly at this time because, as my hon. friend knows, meetings are now under way in Geneva under the direction of the mediator. Until these negotiations are over I do not think it would be desirable to suggest what course might be followed.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am somewhat at a loss as to the minister's answer with regard to the degree of importations he mentioned. I ask the minister, has it been substantiated by the United Nations that Greek forces over and above the nominal establishment which is allowed on the island of Cyprus have been landed there, and is there any confirmation of the fact that Cypriot police kept United Nations forces from viewing this landing? I wonder whether these two facts have been confirmed.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sorry I did not answer the last part of the question. It is a fact that at least on one occasion at Limassol the United Nations force was restrained from carrying out its tasks under the security council resolution. There should be no confusion with regard to my observation concerning the extent of importations. I can only say that there is a difference of view as to the extent of infiltrations.

Mr. Douglas: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether it is not becoming increasingly apparent that, to use the language of the street, the United Nations is being played for a sucker by the government of Cyprus with reference to the landing of Greek troops and preventing the United Nations forces from viewing what is going on, and with reference more recently to the speeches of General Grivas calling for enosis, which is in complete violation of the security council's resolution? I ask the minister if the Canadian government intends to make representations to the United Nations with a view to having that body make clear to the government of Cyprus that these violations of the security council resolution will leave the United Nations with no alternative than to take steps to discipline those who are violating the resolution or to withdraw the peace keeping forces from Cyprus, which were put there in the first place to protect Cyprus from an anticipated Turkish invasion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the United Nations force was established by the United Nations primarily to assist in keeping the peace in Cyprus. It was not sent there for the primary purpose of preventing an invasion, but there is no doubt that the decision to establish the United Nations peace keeping force on the 13th of March did assist very considerably in making invasion from any quarter impossible or undesirable.

There is also no doubt that the operations of the United Nations force have been made more difficult by a number of the factors mentioned by the hon. member. The Canadian government, not only within the last few days but even before the NATO ministerial meeting at The Hague, has taken a firm position with regard to any action that adds to or complicates the work of the peace force. As I mentioned yesterday, there have been important negotiations this week, with one meeting going on in Geneva, another in NATO and discussions elsewhere.

I have had occasion to call in the ambassador of Greece, with whom I had a long talk yesterday, and I have made it clear, as has the secretary general of the United Nations, that these involvements that add to the task of the force are not in the interests of the United Nations peace keeping operation. I can say that, notwithstanding all these difficulties, the United Nations continues to serve a very important purpose on that troubled island.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker; I do not want to belabour this point. We are receiving some information from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but it seems to me that the newspapers have far more access to information than we have. I have before me four or five press headlines such as "Darkened Convoys Race Across Cyprus at Night", "Geneva Talks Opening Amid Arms Build-up", as well as a picture of General Grivas, official agent of the Greek government, being welcomed as a hero in Cyprus.

It seems to me that we need more specific information, and are deserving of having at least as much information as the press has. My specific question to the minister is, has he been in direct contact with the Greek government concerning the landing of Greek nationals in Cyprus? The other day the Greek foreign minister rebuked the minister for having made a statement about this. It seems to me we should have more information.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In answer to my hon. friend's question may I say that all the stories that appear in the news media are not necessarily correct. I may say to the house that Cyprus is one of the most serious problems to face us in many years, certainly since the end of the second world war. In a matter of such vital importance I would not be properly discharging my responsibilities as Secretary of State for External Affairs, if I did not weigh as carefully as I can what I say in this house and the possible effect of my words in certain other countries. Our position has been made known with regard to actions taken by particular forces and by particular personalities. I can say that, as a result of the position taken by Canada and other countries, an effort is being made to bring about a solution to this problem under conditions that I hope will not cause a serious situation on the island to further develop.

It is one thing to conjecture without responsibility. But I am sure my hon. friend will appreciate that I do not give all the details, because I cannot in these circumstances discharge my obligations if I speak in anything but the most general language. As long as I hold this responsibility I propose to take this course, and I am sure that the former minister of labour, who was a minister of the crown, fully appreciates that this is correct and proper.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister speaks of the necessity of generality of statement, of which there is no greater exponent than he. I ask the minister whether any further investigation has been made by his department relative to the question I asked over a week ago, in which I pointed out that according to the press some 4,000 Greek troops had infiltrated into Cyprus clandestinely. Has he had occasion to communicate with the C.B.C. regarding a report from London to that effect several days ago, broadcast over the air waves by Mr. Patrick Keatley, a reputable commentator? Has he looked into that question? Furthermore, realizing that a debate cannot take place at this time, and with 1,100 Canadians on this island, will the minister allow parliament a few hours tomorrow in which to discuss this matter? Certainly this is a question upon which the house should have the fullest information. We cannot get it through questions on orders of the day, and that is understandable.

Certainly Canadians as a whole want to know what is the position of our forces there. Are they in any way in great danger through any failure taking place or any action that is occurring from time to time, in particular with reference to the Greek underground leader? This is what Canadians want to know. They do not want the minister to go into particulars, but they want more than just generalizations to the effect that last March we sent forces there and that did a great deal. We want to know what the position is on July 7. What is the position of these forces? Are they, by reason of a failure of the United Nations, in any way in jeopardy in which they ought not to be?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the first part of my hon. friend's question I must say that I am not in the habit of taking or accepting as final, information that comes from news correspondents abroad.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The C.B.C.?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The C.B.C. or any source. Canada has a diplomatic mission in Cyprus and we also have diplomatic missions in countries that have a vital interest in this matter. I may assure my hon. friend that we are relying primarily on these sources. The story to which my hon. friend directs our attention emanated from Ankara. The story was repeated over the B.B.C. and appeared in an English newspaper. We have studied the allegation and the figure mentioned. This question has been investigated by the United Nations itself. The UN authorities do not agree with the figure.

With regard to the second suggestion, I will be glad to discuss that with my colleagues. The external affairs committee will be meeting I think on Thursday, and that would also afford an opportunity. In any event, I will give consideration to the suggestion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to thank the hon. gentleman for his very full statement. I simply suggest this to him, that the committee on external affairs cannot take the place of the house as a whole on a matter like this.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): May I ask a supplementary question. In addition to making a protest or statement in the press, did the Greek government make a protest or representations to the Canadian government or to the Canadian ambassador in Athens in regard to the statements made in the house last week, particularly the statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs with regard to the landing of Greek troops on Cyprus? If so, what reply was given?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We have had no report from our mission in Athens of any such protest. I may say that when the press story in question came to my attention, I at once asked the Greek ambassador to come to see me. This he did yesterday.

Mr. Douglas: The minister has said the figure of 4,000 Greek troops landing on Cyprus is considered inaccurate by the United Nations. May I ask the minister what is the United Nations estimate of the number of Greek troops landed on Cyprus?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure my hon. friend would agree that this is the kind of information which I should not be asked to give, and which I do not propose to give at this time.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): May I ask the Minister of National Defence a supplementary question. In the event that the peaceful solution of this Cyprus problem suggested by the Secretary of State for External Affairs does not work out in that way, can the minister tell us the location of the aircraft carrier Bonaventure at the present time, and how soon it could be sent to Cyprus in the event it may prove necessary to remove our troops? We do not want another Hong Kong.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my hon. friend that the Department of National Defence has fulfilled its responsibilities in this matter in all respects, and has considered any possible eventuality that may occur there. I can also assure my hon. friend in this regard that the whereabouts of the Bonaventure from time to time is not a relevant factor.

Mr. Douglas: May I just ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs one final question. In view of the fact that questions on orders of the day are of necessity unsatisfactory, and the very keen interest there is in Canada in this question, will the minister take into consideration the advisability of having a two hour debate or a half day debate on this question so the people of Canada will be fully satisfied that the situation is well in hand, and so the United Nations and other countries may know something of the views of the members of the House of Commons regarding this situation in which we have a very serious stake in manpower.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have already indicated I will be glad to consider that.

CONGO—SAFETY OF CANADIANS FOLLOWING UN FORCE WITHDRAWAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I hope in this case he will be able to be more lucid than he has been with questions over Cyprus. This question concerns Canadians in the Congo, and is further to a question I asked a week ago. Does the minister know how many Canadians there are at present in the Congo; who they are—are they missionaries or UN employees—what steps have been taken to remove them from the danger areas around Albertville, and finally, could he give us his latest word on their safety and whether they are in any danger?

Mr. Speaker: Important as the question is, surely it is one for the order paper.

[Later:]

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): I have been trying to ask a question supplementary to at least part of the question asked by the hon. member for Oxford. There is now a very dangerous situation existing in Bujumbura, the capital of Burundi, where a civil war is taking place. There are a number of Canadians there, both independently and associated with the United Nations. Does the minister have any word for us about the safety of those people?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was about to reply to the question when Mr. Speaker ruled it was a matter for the order paper. There are several people concerning whom inquiries have been made, and most of them have been found safe in various parts of the Congo. I know only of one individual whose name has been given to us and whose whereabouts have not yet been determined.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Joseph P. O'Keefe (St. John's East): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Is the minister aware that a Newfoundlander, Miss Mary-Lou Farrell of St. John's East, recently won the title of Miss Dominion of Canada, and that she will very soon represent all of Canada in the Miss Universe international talent and beauty contest in Florida, and later the Miss World contest in London?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): I was not aware of that fact. I am sure that the house shares in the pleasure of learning it. My colleague the Minister of Transport regards Newfoundland as the heart of Canada. It is now clear that there will be many, as a result of the information just conveyed, who will believe that Newfoundland could become the heart of the universe.

LABOUR RELATIONS

NON-OPERATING RAILWAY UNIONS— UNDERTAKING RESPECTING ADDITIONAL COSTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a question which does not arise out of the peculiarly important matter that has just been dealt with so succinctly and carefully by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I wanted to ask him about the contents of the correspondence that passed between the Prime Minister and the presidents of the railways which he so kindly made available to me.

I should like to ask him what undertaking, if any, was given by the Prime Minister to the presidents of the two railways concerning the added costs which will be assumed by them if they accept the wage increases. I do this because the letter states:

> —it is recognized that, while the resolution preceding introduction of this legislation—

That is a reference to the MacPherson royal commission.

> —is awaiting consideration by parliament, other items of parliamentary business must be dealt with first.

This statement is in the Prime Minister's letter. Later on he says:

> —so that the government would be afforded an opportunity to decide what additional temporary financial adjustments would be justified to assist the railways during the period up to the coming into effect of the proposed new railway legislation.

Has there been any undertaking, direct or indirect, that all or any part of the additional $57 million over a period of two years, I think, is going to be paid by the Canadian people? Was that conducive in any way to the attitude of the railways in agreeing to the majority report?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): No undertaking was given to the presidents of the railways beyond that set out in the letter addressed to the presidents by the Prime Minister on June 30, of which I have tabled a copy which is to appear as an appendix to Hansard today.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Whatever course the railways take will depend upon their interpretation of the hopefulness expressed by the Prime Minister in that letter?

Mr. Pickersgill: I only speak for the government; the railways speak for themselves.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether additional grants will be given to the Canadian National Railways until the new legislation is considered by parliament and the standing committee on railways?

[Text]

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, Mr. Speaker, that is a hypothetical question but I think the hon. gentleman, as an old and experienced parliamentarian, knows the government cannot pay money to the railways that is not voted by parliament.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to put the same question to the Minister of Transport but this time I would like to have a reply and to be told whether the government intends to increase the railway subsidy without the matter having been discussed by parliament as it is being done with respect to the $50 million which are paid to the railways even though they have not been passed?

[Text]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite apparent that no moneys can be paid by the government, for any purpose, that have not been voted by parliament.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether any commitment has been made to the Canadian truckers' association in regard to this subsidy, and whether he has told the association that it will not be on after September this year.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, sir, no undertaking of any kind has been given to the Canadian truckers' association. The president of that association met my hon. friend the Acting Prime Minister and myself this morning. We listened to their representations, and beyond assuring them that the present and proposed payments, which incidentally have been made to the railways for several years, were of a temporary character until such time as the MacPherson legislation might be passed and come into operation, no commitment of any kind was made to them; and it was explained to them that we could not make any statement to them before we made a statement to parliament.

POWER

PASSAMAQUODDY—POSTPONEMENT OF CONSIDERATION BY U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. J. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister and is based upon a press dispatch of this morning reporting that consideration of the Passamaquoddy project in the United States senate has been postponed until 1965. Has the Acting Prime Minister any additional information to give the house in connection with this matter?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have seen the report to which my hon. friend draws my attention. Of course this does not concern the Canadian government directly. There was an exploratory talk with representatives of the United States with regard to the United States position on this project. Beyond that there is nothing further to report at the present time.

INQUIRY AS TO CONSIDERATION OF MAIN ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice in his capacity as house leader. Inasmuch as the house is now more sensibly launched on a legislative program, could the minister inform the house when we might return to the consideration of main estimates?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there is to be a meeting of the house leaders tonight—at least I am attempting to call one—and I think I will be in a position to be more precise about the answer to this question tomorrow.

TRADE

BEEF—STEPS TO INCREASE EXPORTS TO GREAT BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the beef shortage in the United Kingdom, where I understand the price is $2 per pound for choice cuts as compared with the Canadian price of 79 cents per pound, and in view of the United States attempt to break into this market, will the minister inform the house what attempt Canada has made to capture any part of this market, and will he give the details?

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put this on the order paper.

Mr. McIntosh: I would like to discuss it at ten o'clock.

SOCIAL ASSISTANCE

SASKATCHEWAN—PROPOSED REQUIREMENT THAT RECIPIENTS WORK FOR AID GIVEN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Would she inform the house whether she has received any communication from the minister of welfare in Saskatchewan, and whether she answered that communication, concerning jobs for those on social welfare?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have a recollection that I did receive such a communication last week, but I am not certain whether it has been answered. I shall be glad to look it up and advise my hon. friend.

Mr. Hamilton: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, would the minister take immediate action on this matter; because the press in the west is full of complaints that no answer has been given by the federal government on this matter which is of political interest in Saskatchewan.

Miss LaMarsh: No doubt my hon. friend and the house know that this matter has been discussed over the years and that the position heretofore taken, as a result of the meeting of advisers from all the provinces, was that work for relief as such, as the phrase is generally understood, was not a matter which received the sympathy of the federal government. I am not certain whether the correspondence may indicate what type of scheme it is that the present government in Saskatchewan has in mind, but I shall be pleased to look up this correspondence and inform the house later.

[Later:]

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, who I am sorry is not still in the chamber, asked me a question with respect to correspondence with the province of Saskatchewan with regard to work for relief. I have just had brought to my attention that the recent correspondence of the department has not been on that subject. In fact there has been no correspondence on this subject.

CRIMINAL CODE

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS RESPECTING HORSE RACE BETTING

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice.

Is the minister considering amending the Criminal Code in order to legalize the situation regarding pari mutuel at horse races?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, that is a matter of government policy which will be announced in the normal course of the session.

[Text]

TRANSPORT

NORTHERN TRANSPORTATION CO.—ORDER FOR NEW SHIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Terry Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Does Northern Transportation Company now have on order, or under construction, a ship designed to do the job for which they purchased their L.S.M., or for a similar type of operation?

Mr. Speaker: This, it seems to me, is a good question for the order paper.

URANIUM

REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF STOCKPILING PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry. In view of the statement by Mr. Gilchrist, president of Eldorado, which appeared in last night's issue of the Ottawa Journal, that the experts in the uranium industry had not been optimistic enough in their forecasts of future demands for this fuel, would the minister and the government reconsider their decision to close down the uranium mines and end the stockpiling program?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the statement referred to and I am not aware of it, but I will undertake to have a look at it and see what can be done.

BANCROFT, ONT.—NEGOTIATIONS BY FRENCH COMPANY FOR MINERAL RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): On June 30 the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac asked me whether I was aware that the Mokta company of Paris, France, is now negotiating in the Bancroft area for the purchase of the mineral rights to properties with uranium deposits. I can inform the hon. member that both the government department and the government agency directly concerned are aware of these negotiations and all possible assistance will be provided. We are now awaiting a written request which will describe in exact terms the information and aid required.

May I also, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, refer to the question which was asked today by the same hon. member? He asked my colleague the Minister of Industry about a statement made by Mr. Gilchrist. I can tell him that when the decision was made with regard to stockpiling, the views of Mr. Gilchrist were well known.

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): I should like to thank the Minister of Trade and Commerce for his answer to my question. Does he not agree that these companies from other countries, are apparently showing more foresight than this government in now coming into Canada and buying up properties and rights to this precious mineral which, according to Mr. Gilchrist, is going to be in demand very soon?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker.

BRIDGES

CHAMPLAIN BRIDGE, MONTREAL— REMOVAL OF TOLLS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put an urgent question to the Minister of Transport.

Since we abolished the tolls on Jacques Cartier and Victoria bridges while we were in office, I would like to ask the minister if the same thing will soon be done for the Champlain bridge.

[Text]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Notwithstanding the urgency attached by the hon. member to the question, it concerns an area at least 50 miles from his constituency, and I think I will have to take it as notice.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REPORTED INVESTIGATION RESPECTING HANDLING OF FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has a report been received on this matter of misappropriation of funds by R.C.M.P. personnel, and will the minister give details to the house as he promised in order to clear up the misunderstanding and unfortunate criticism?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): I am not in a position to report to the house as yet.

Mr. Bell: Does the minister not think this matter should be accelerated, and that an indication should be given as to when the report will be made available to the house?

Mr. Favreau: I do not think it is within the propriety of my function to intervene in the disposition of disciplinary matters within the R.C.M.P., at a time when the independence of the R.C.M.P. in these matters ought to be fully respected.

Mr. Bell: Do I take it from the minister's reply that there is an admission that serious matters are under investigation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely there has been a full investigation.

FINANCE

POSSIBLE CONFLICT OF INTEREST RESPECTING BANK CHARTER APPLICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question either to the Acting Prime Minister or to the Minister of Finance. My question is asked in the light of an article by Bruce Macdonald respecting a conflict of interest, which appeared in this morning's Globe and Mail. Did a cabinet minister suggest to Liberal senators that they get on with the business of chartering certain banks, applications for which are before the other place, before a suspicion grows in the public mind that those charters are being delayed because of a conflict of interest on the part of certain members of the other place? If so, did such a cabinet minister make the suggestion on behalf of the cabinet.

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Not to my knowledge. I certainly made no such statement myself.

Mr. Knowles: Has the Minister of Finance received any protest from business, banking or other interests with regard to this alleged conflict of interest?

Mr. Gordon: I think—I am sorry, Mr. Speaker; I began to answer a question which the hon. gentleman did not ask. I have received a complaint that this matter ought to be speeded up, but it was an unofficial complaint. As to the question the hon. member asked, the answer is no.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Minister of Finance mind answering the question I did not ask? That answer might be more helpful.

An hon. Member: Ask it now.

AGRICULTURE

SASKATCHEWAN—REPORTED CRITICAL SITUATION RESPECTING LIVESTOCK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Some days ago I directed a question to the Minister of Agriculture regarding the critical situation faced by livestock in the northern areas of Saskatchewan. Have any steps been taken to alleviate the situation, and would the Acting Prime Minister have any reply to make to this question of mine?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): As I informed the house yesterday, the Minister of Agriculture is today conferring in Regina with representatives of the government of the province of Saskatchewan, and this is one matter which undoubtedly is under discussion.

EDUCATION

LOANS TO STUDENTS—INQUIRY AS TO RESOLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Is the hon. gentleman ready to make the statement which he said yesterday he would be making today regarding the placing on the order paper of the resolution preceding the student loans legislation?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): I hope it will be possible to do that by the end of the week, perhaps by Friday.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Acting Prime Minister be a little more lucid in his answer? Did he mean the resolution would be on the order paper by the end of the week or just that there would be a statement on the matter by the end of the week?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If there is any difficulty in this case, the lack of lucidity must be on the part of the hon. gentleman, because he asked me about the resolution. I hope the resolution will be on the order paper by about Friday of this week.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

PROVINCIAL REPLIES RESPECTING CONFERENCE ON ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Yesterday the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked a question about the number of provincial premiers who have replied to the Prime Minister's letter of June 26. The premiers of Alberta, Nova Scotia and British Columbia have done so.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

VANCOUVER—POSSIBLE USE OF FORMER R.C.A.F. BASE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Yesterday, as on previous occasions, I tried to get some information about the 40 acres of the Kitsilano Indian reserve at Vancouver, part of which the C.B.C. has been endeavouring to acquire. I now direct my remarks to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has he, within the last couple of days, made any suggestions to the mayor or other officials of Vancouver regarding a suggested settlement whereby 20 acres would be maintained as parkland providing the C.B.C. received the balance.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I thought yesterday it might be just as well if we started getting some news from home in respect of this property instead of so much from abroad. At one point it was my intention to intervene.

This property is a former Indian reserve purchased by the federal government of Canada. A large sum of money was paid to the Indians for its acquisition. It is the property of the federal government. It was used by the R.C.A.F. during the war and since, and has become surplus to their requirements at the present time. The C.B.C. indicated that it was interested in some of the property, namely five buildings in all. These are splendid concrete buildings of considerable value, and are estimated by our Department of Public Works to have an earning capacity of $200,000 annually; so they are substantial buildings.

The property has now been declared surplus, and reference was made first to the government of the province of British Columbia as to their probable requirements. I think they indicated that they had no desire to use any of the property. Then the matter was taken up with the city, and the city is interested in it, particularly the parks board of the city of Vancouver. In recent years a portion of the area was given to parks use by the city and it is the desire of the parks board—and, I think, of many of the people of Vancouver, too—to extend the park area there.

I was not present on the occasion of the visit of Mr. Ouimet to city council, though my colleague the Postmaster General was. I think Mr. Ouimet outlined to council the requirements of the C.B.C. in respect of five buildings and a requisite amount of land to be used for parking purposes. I have suggested since that it would be highly advisable for the C.B.C. to make a formal request for their requirements and the property they need. My colleague the Secretary of State is in agreement with this, and I understand that some time very soon the C.B.C. will be making that official request.

I have suggested that I would be prepared to assist in the allocation of the remainder of the property, not to the parks board of Vancouver, because we manifestly cannot deal with them, but to the city of Vancouver. I would suggest this could probably be done over an extended lease, and if it is their desire to have it used for parks purposes of course the city of Vancouver could negotiate with the parks board. However, I think the first requirement is to withdraw from the total property the requirements of the C.B.C., and we expect this will be done by way of a formal request in a matter of days.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it not a fact that there is strong objection to the C.B.C. having any portion of this property in Vancouver, particularly on the part of the parks board?

Mr. Laing: I must say, Mr. Speaker, that there was an objection, which I think was quite considerable, in the city of Vancouver to the C.B.C. going on the property. However, since a number of explanations have been made in respect to the proportion of the entire property and the buildings required by the C.B.C., the financial position of the C.B.C. in Vancouver as compared with going into a downtown property, and the limitation put by the C.B.C. on its requirements there, I am quite certain that I can assure my right hon. friend that opinion within the city has changed markedly.

While the members of the parks board would prefer to take all the property and return it into parks, I must say that the right hon. gentleman, if he knew the buildings, would agree with me—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know the buildings.

Mr. Laing: —that we cannot demolish those buildings, because they are extremely valuable buildings. The parks board might have uses for the buildings, but I would question whether they have uses for them in their entirety. They might put the buildings to some use. We think we can accommodate, to the extent of the majority opinion in Vancouver, the desires of both bodies.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it not a fact that the C.B.C. intends to demolish these buildings if they get the property?

Mr. Laing: Oh, no, not at all; not under any circumstances. It is the full intention of the C.B.C. to use these extremely valuable properties, and for a very extended period of time. As a matter of fact they have informed the council of Vancouver that they would like to be safely lodged there for a period of not less than 30 years; that is, in these concrete buildings. They are permanent type buildings able to carry two extra stories. This is the nub of the question. I think we simply cannot, in all conscience, have these extremely valuable buildings demolished. There are seven in all, and they desire five for their use.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, if the requirements of the C.B.C. were met, how much of the 40 acres would be left available to the parks board of Vancouver for parkland?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): Approximately 15 acres.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING REPLACEMENT OF CHIEFS OF STAFF COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Monday, July 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Hellyer for the third reading of Bill No. C-90, to amend the National Defence Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Churchill: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the third time and passed.

YOUTH ALLOWANCES

PROVISION FOR PAYMENT BETWEEN AGES OF 16 AND 18

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-108, to provide for the payment of youth allowances.

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, before this bill is given second reading I think we should have a fuller explanation than we have had so far. If it is not the minister's intention to speak at this time, I would certainly like to say something about it. We had considerable discussion on April 28 with regard to this matter of allowances to teen-agers between the ages of 15 and 18; in other words, those of 16 and 17 years of age. The discussion arose on that occasion over the changes in the Income Tax Act in anticipation of this legislation being passed.

The suggestion was made at that time by myself and others in this house that a simpler way of providing this assistance to the parents of Canada would be through an amendment to the Family Allowances Act extending family allowances to the age of 18 years. I still feel this suggestion should be given consideration before we go on with this bill. Therefore it seems to me this bill should be withdrawn and the government should take the other method of providing this assistance to parents of teen-agers attending school, namely by simply raising the age limit under the Family Allowances Act.

This becomes part of a larger question in Canada today, and is bound up with the efforts on the part of all Canadians to satisfy as far as they possibly can the special aspirations of the people of the province of Quebec. This was admitted by the Minister of Finance on April 28, when he was questioned about the feasibility of granting this special assistance to parents through raising the age limit under the Family Allowances Act. The Minister of Finance said this, as reported at page 2693 of Hansard:

> Theoretically, I suppose, if the federal government wanted to extend the present family allowance arrangements up to the age of 18 they could do so and this would apply everywhere in Canada, including Quebec; and the government of Quebec could in that event do one of two things: It could either continue to pay its present education grants, which would mean there would be roughly twice as much paid in the province of Quebec in respect to children aged 16 and 17 as would be paid elsewhere in Canada, or alternatively, it could say: The federal government is now paying these sums; we shall stop our payments. Either of these decisions would be perfectly logical, I suggest. However, the government of the province of Quebec says: We have been in this field for three or four years; we are doing it in a way which seems to us reasonable; a way which seems acceptable to our people, one which is well established; and we want to go on doing it that way; we would prefer it if you would pay to us the equivalent of what would have been paid by the federal government net, after income tax and so on, and if it were paid directly in respect of the children.
> Anyone could argue whether or not this was a good way of doing it. As I say, the federal government could charge right ahead, ignore the fact that this is an established program in Quebec and insist on paying the amounts directly to the mothers despite the fact that the government of the province does not want this done. Or the government of Canada could say: We recognize the fact that you have been in this field for three or four years. We are not going to pay any more than the citizens of Quebec would have got under our new scheme, but instead of paying them double and embarrassing everybody we shall pay the net equivalent to the government of Quebec. And this is what will be proposed when the legislation is presented in this house.

I should like to commend the Minister of Finance for a straightforward statement of that kind; it brings the matter quite clearly into focus. But as he pointed out, anyone can argue whether or not this is the right way of doing it. As far as I am concerned, speaking on behalf of the people in the constituency of Middlesex West, I think this is not the best way of doing it. It is not the best way of doing it because of our efforts to hold this land of ours together in unity and happiness. When actions are taken by the federal government which tend in any way to divide the people of this country I think it is a mistake, and I think this legislation as proposed by the government in relation to youth allowances has this effect of dividing rather than unifying Canada.

Let us just look for a moment, Mr. Speaker, at the various clauses and provisions of Bill No. C-108. Starting with clause 2 (c), we see that young people are placed on the same basis as children under the Family Allowances Act. Clause 2 (c) (ii) says that a "dependant youth" is a person who has reached the age of 16 but is not yet 18 years of age, and—> —is, by reason of any mental or physical infirmity, precluded from attending or attending on a full-time basis at a school or university;

Under the Family Allowances Act parents cannot collect family allowances unless their children are attending school. To put it in simple language, under the Family Allowances Act all children able to attend school should be at school. If those who are able to attend school are not at school, then their parents are not entitled to family allowances on their behalf. Clause 2 (f) defines "parent" in this way:

"parent" means a person resident in a province other than a province providing schooling allowances who maintains a dependant youth, but does not include an institution as defined by the regulations;

In other words, the reference in this clause to a parent resident in a province other than a province providing schooling allowances means that the province concerned is the province of Quebec. Therefore these allowances cannot under this legislation be paid to parents residing in Quebec. Then clause 3 says:

Subject to this act, there may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund to a parent, in respect of a dependant youth maintained by such parent other than a dependant youth in respect of whom an allowance is payable under any law described in paragraph (h) of section 2, a monthly allowance of ten dollars.

Again we come to the idea that parents in Quebec are exempted under this legislation. These youth allowances as provided in the act cannot be paid to parents in the province of Quebec.

Although there may be some in the house who can find justification for this, I suggest that this is wrong in principle. We are treating parents in different parts of Canada differently, and I think they should all be treated alike. Therefore I submit that the government should withdraw this legislation and this assistance to the parents of children who are going to school—our teen-agers—although I admit that this legislation will otherwise be very worthy legislation for the house to pass. I am quite willing to support the government in bringing assistance to parents of 16 and 17 year old students, but this should be done through the Family Allowances Act so that all parents across the country from coast to coast, as well as their children, would be treated alike.

I am hoping that the government can see its way clear to withdraw this measure and extend family allowances. While I favour granting assistance to parents of 16 and 17 year old children, I believe it can be done in a better way through an amendment to the Family Allowances Act. I feel I should oppose this legislation in view of the fact that there is a better alternative.

Mr. Monteith: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think the minister was going to make some opening remarks. As she moved the motion you may consider that she has spoken, but if she does have opening remarks I suggest that the house give permission for her to speak now without closing the debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Does the minister wish to make any opening remarks at this time? It is understood that the minister is not closing the debate on second reading.

Mr. Monteith: That is my point.

Mr. Knowles: That is right.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. member for Middlesex West, in his desire to get his remarks on the record, did not give me the opportunity to first set out the position of the government with respect to the bill. Indeed, if he had waited until he had heard the position of the government it might have changed his mind and led him not to exhaust himself on this warm afternoon.

The bill now before the house is not, as the house is well aware, an extension of the Family Allowances Act, which method of procedure was considered and for reasons which will be explained later was not followed, but is called a youth allowances bill. It is expected that hon. members will find this a more efficient way of doing what all hon. members have indicated they are desirous of doing.

Bill No. C-108, Mr. Speaker, represents a significant step forward, it is believed, in encouraging our young people to make the most of their educational opportunities. As hon. members are aware, the family allowances program, which has been in operation since 1945, provides assistance to parents of children under 16 years of age. In the 19 years since that program started the federal government has paid out more than $6½ billion toward the care, maintenance, education and advancement of these younger Canadians.

But now it is felt that it is time to move forward again. It has been felt for some time that 16 and 17 year olds should also be given incentives to continue their training and education to equip them better for employment in the modern world. That, stated very briefly, is the purpose and objective of the proposed legislation.

The extra $10 a month proposed in the bill is designed to help meet the higher costs of looking after children in this particular age group. It does not, of course, begin to provide full maintenance or assistance for such children, and no one would ever suggest that it would do so. It is, however, meant to provide an incentive to parents to persuade their children of the value of pursuing their education as far as they possibly can.

The government feels that it is money well spent to ensure that the country has an uninterrupted flow of young people coming into the labour force with the highest possible educational qualifications to meet the ever heightening demands of modern society. It represents one more advance in our continuing battle against unemployment. What is proposed in the bill is the provision of an allowance of $10 a month for the full 12 months of each year provided, of course, the youth, as defined in the bill, remains in school. Hon. members will note that in addition the government wishes to render assistance to parents of children who, by reason of a physical or mental impairment, are unable to attend school. This allowance will serve to partly close the gap for such children who, as all hon. members know, may not qualify for disability allowances until they reach the age of 18 years.

As has been pointed out, the province of Quebec has for some time had a schooling allowance program similar to the youth allowances set out in the bill. However, the Quebec provincial law provides only for a $10 allowance for each of 10 months of the year. Nor does that legislation provide for disabled children not at school. We are informed, however, that the government of the province of Quebec plan to introduce amendments which will bring their provincial program of assistance to students into line with the proposed federal program, so there will be equality in all ten provinces.

Because the province of Quebec already has its own similar program, arrangements will be made whereby instead of paying these allowances in that province, as has already been noted by the hon. member, a financial equivalent will be provided in order that the wider benefits of this bill will be available to children of the province of Quebec. All hon. members will notice that the equivalent provisions are not contained in the bill, but I am sure they will have already noted that they are contained in a resolution appearing as order No. 61 on the order paper, which deals with fiscal arrangements with the provinces.

Apart from the province of Quebec, Mr. Speaker, it is estimated that there are now in Canada some 502,000 persons in the age group 16 to 18, of whom some 350,000 are attending school. It is hoped that the incentive provided by the allowances may prove sufficiently attractive to bring many other children back to school or otherwise cause them to pursue job or career training. Only experience will tell us how many additional children will benefit from this program, but the government hopes that large numbers will do so. Sometimes even this modest amount of assistance is enough to make the whole difference between children leaving school too early and staying on for further training.

Assuming that 375,000 children will participate initially, it is estimated that the cost to the federal government for the remaining seven months of the present year will be in excess of $27 million. This will not, of course, include the additional amount for the province of Quebec, which will be based on the number of children in that province for whom comparable provision has been made.

I should also point out, Mr. Speaker, that an important feature of this program will be to provide comparable assistance to parents who are unfortunate enough to have children in this age group who, by reason of mental or physical infirmity, are precluded from attending school or university. There are in Canada some 25,000 children aged 16 and 17 who are mentally or physically afflicted, or both. Fortunately most of them are not so disabled as to be unable to pursue their education, and they are continuing to do so.

It is estimated, none the less, that of these 25,000 children there may be 4,000 or perhaps 5,000 who will benefit from the allowance as their infirmity is such to rule out their attendance at school. The government feels it would be unfair to provide assistance to parents with children in a position to enjoy the advantages of advanced schooling and deny it to those whose children are, for physical or mental reasons, unable to do so.

As I also mentioned, this allowance will help bridge the gap to care for youngsters who are in receipt of family allowances to the age of 16 and who, under present circumstances, are unable to qualify for any further allowance until they have reached the age of 18 when they may qualify under the Disabled Persons Allowance Act.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the object of the program is to assist Canadian parents with children in the age group specified if those children are furthering their educational opportunities, as well as those who by reason of infirmity are unable to do so.

Apart from the relatively few children who are precluded from attending school, we do not propose to assist parents in supporting children who do not go to school. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the legislation will not provide for assistance to parents of children who do not go to school for whatever personal reasons they may have. I should perhaps point out that the educational requirements of the provinces do not require any child to attend school beyond the age of 16. Some of the provinces provide even a lower age at which children may discontinue compulsory schooling. Across the land schooling is compulsory to the ages of 14, 15 or 16. It is my understanding that in British Columbia the age at which a child may leave school is 15; in Alberta it is 15; in Saskatchewan, 15; in Manitoba it is 14 and 16 depending on certain conditions which must be decided by the locality municipality; in Ontario, 16; in New Brunswick, 16; in Nova Scotia it is 14 in rural areas and 16 in urban areas; in Prince Edward Island, 15; and in Newfoundland, 15.

We feel, therefore, the program should act as an incentive to children to pursue their educational opportunities even though they are not legally required to do so by provincial laws. As was stated by my colleague the Minister of Finance in his budget speech of March 16 last, the government believes that the expenditure involved will be an important investment in raising the level of skills and ability of our labour force, and thus will improve the growth and development of our economy. This measure is one we can afford this year. It will help young Canadians to fit themselves for better jobs.

We are hopeful, Mr. Speaker, that the allowances can become effective with the beginning of the next school year in September. It will be necessary, of course, to forward application forms to parents throughout the summer. Hon. members will realize this is not an automatic payment, but there must be an application to have the children qualify under the act. We are prepared to send out these application forms and set the machinery in motion as soon as parliament will have approved the legislation. Since all hon. members have heretofore indicated their approval in principle, it is hoped that there remains ample time for a thorough discussion of the details of the bill. I therefore respectfully move the adoption of this bill to provide additional allowances for young children.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have urged for some considerable time that a measure such as is now before us, in one form or another, should be presented to parliament. Therefore we welcome this legislation, and we hope it will not take very long for parliament to deal with it so the application forms might be sent out, and so the payments to be made under this legislation to the parents of 16 and 17 year old children might be in their hands commencing in September of this year.

All of us in the house agreed readily to the proposal that there be no debate at the resolution stage of this measure. I think there is also a general disposition today to proceed as expeditiously as we can with this stage of this legislation. As I say, we have been asking for it ourselves for a long time, and we support the measure now that it has been placed before us.

However, one or two issues do arise. One of them has already been stated by the hon. member for Middlesex West. He has stated his opposition to this measure for the reasons that he holds. He has stated that opposition quite clearly. I must say that I do not agree with the criticism he has made of the form in which this legislation is presented to us. I know, Mr. Speaker, it would be very nice, neat and tidy if all legislation in this country could be drafted in such a way, for all time, that it would be uniform in its application across Canada. But that is not the Canada in which we live.

The hon. member for Middlesex West said we should extend our efforts to hold this land together in unity. I agree with him. However, this does not necessarily mean that we achieve unity by establishing some rigid mould which we insist must be applied across the country. It sems to me we have to take cognizance of the different approaches, the different scales of values that there are in the various parts of our country. It seems to me that this legislation does that. The fact is, and I have had occasion to say this with regard to other pieces of legislation, that the people of Quebec value their autonomy in a very special way. Equally it is a fact that the Canadians of the other nine provinces place a special value on the benefits of confederation, place a special value on what comes from the central government. Although it may be a lot more difficult to work things out in the light of these two facts, I think if we are going to be realistic, if we are going to hold this land together in unity, we have to accept these two facts.

What I see in this legislation is an effort to meet these facts; an effort to recognize that Canadians in nine of our provinces like receiving payments such as these from the central government, but that it is also a fact that the Canadians in one province like to feel they are getting them through their own provincial government. I see nothing wrong in accommodating this legislation to the facts of Canadian life. I think we are going to have to do more of this kind of thing. If we do it carefully, if we do it with a realization of the values of our people in the various parts of the country, I think instead of causing a division in Canada it could help strengthen that unity that we value so greatly.

I do not criticize the hon. member for Middlesex West for raising the point he did this afternoon. I think it is well that this point should be raised, that criticism such as he made should be stated quite clearly. I think it is a good idea also for all of us to look at the issue clearly and realize the kind of pattern we are going to have to develop if we are to hold this land together in unity. I suggest if we start developing a pattern whereby we do achieve a situation that recognizes for the people of nine provinces their emphasis upon the values of confederation, their desire to receive things from the central government, and recognizes the desire of the people in the other province for the autonomy that means so much to them, instead of causing disunity it could actually bring about unity.

I suspect it has taken a great deal of soul-searching, a great deal of negotiating, a great deal of very difficult drafting to come forward with this legislation in this form. It occurs to me that a good job has been done. We do not have the kind of reservations about it that were expressed by the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas). We shall support the bill.

I am also glad, having in mind the suggestion that it is good to say things openly, that it has been said quite clearly by the minister that this legislation in the main has as its aim inducing parents to persuade their 16 and 17 year old children to stay in school. I am glad she made it clear that it does have an educational motive at its base. This is something we are sometimes reluctant to talk about in public because of the fact that education in itself is an exclusive provincial responsibility under the British North America Act.

In many respects we have already gone into this field. We have devised vocational education grants, university grants, and Canada Council grants in ways that use federal money to assist in raising the level of education in Canada without interfering with the provincial responsibility for education as such. I think we should go on doing that kind of thing. That is precisely one of the things this piece of legislation does. It helps to raise the level of education by encouraging more parents to encourage their children to stay in school, yet it does not interfere in any way, shape or form with provincial control over education as such. Therefore I am glad that the legislation in its drafting is geared to the educational question, and I am glad the minister stated that quite clearly in her speech this afternoon.

I note with interest that the legislation has been drafted so that it is possible for a 16 or 17 year old to draw the allowance for the full 12 months provided he is in school up until April, and again in school by October. I also notice the inducements that some of the details seem to provide to encourage a student to continue in school for a second year. All told, the people who have done this drafting have wrestled with a difficult problem and have come up with a very satisfactory answer.

We in common with members in all parties in the house, have for a long time been looking for family allowances, or youth allowances, to be extended to keep children in school when they are 16 and 17 years old. We are only sorry it has taken so long, but now that the legislation is before us we support it, and we hope it can get through all its stages in this day's sitting.

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): If the house will allow me to reply to what was said by the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas) perhaps I could clear up one or two misunderstandings. It has been suggested that there will be differences in the payments in different parts of the country, and this is one of the things that has been cleared up.

Hon. members will recall that when the proposal to extend youth allowances to the 16 and 17 year old age group was first considered we were confronted with four complicating factors. These were some of the things we had in mind at the time the income tax resolution was being debated in the house, when I made the remarks quoted by the hon. member.

Those complicating factors were, first, that in one province, the province of Quebec, that province had been paying school allowances to the parents of 16 and 17 year olds for some years. Second, these payments in the province of Quebec were at the rate of $10 per month for ten months of the year only.

The proposed payments by the federal government were to be at the rate of $10 per month for 12 months. Third, under the Quebec plan payments were not made on account of disabled children age 16 and 17. Under the federal plan it was proposed that the payments would apply both to children who remain in school and to those who are unable to do so because of disability.

Fourth, the personal exemptions under the federal Income Tax Act are reduced from $550 to $300 per annum in the case of children whose parents are entitled to benefits under the Family Allowances Act, but this differential is not applied in the case of 16 and 17 year olds entitled to school allowances in the province of Quebec.

Those were four complicating factors, and because of them it was originally proposed to pay to the government of Quebec an annual sum equal to the net amount which parents of children in Quebec would have received if the payments to them were made by the federal government direct, less the additional amounts of income taxes they would pay because of the reduction in the exemption from $550 to $300 per annum. In addition, some adjustment would be necessary due to the fact that parents in Quebec would receive $10 a month for ten months only and would not receive anything on account of disabled children.

In the course of that debate on the income tax resolution the hon. member for Middlesex West, and others, pointed out that under this formula cases could arise where the federal income tax payable by a parent living on one side of the Ottawa river, for example, would be different from the tax payable by a parent in exactly similar circumstances residing on the other side of the river. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) asked me questions, and as a result of his questions this became quite clear to all hon. members of the house. I may say this difficulty was pointed out by members on all sides of the house.

Since that debate in April the government has given further consideration to the best way of handling this difficult and complex situation, and in the meantime certain things have happened. In the first place the province of Quebec enacted legislation extending its $10 a month school allowance to a full 12 months. Second, Quebec has now introduced a bill which, if it is passed by the Quebec legislature, will provide that the same amounts are paid to disabled children in that province, so that as far as the payments are concerned they will be the same in all parts of Canada.

I am sure we were all very pleased about this development because I know all of us share the feeling of the hon. member for Middlesex West that it would be too bad if, in an important social measure of this kind, there were differences between the benefits in different parts of Canada. In the light of these changed circumstances it seems all the more important that people all over Canada should be treated in exactly the same way.

Accordingly it is proposed that there should be no reduction in the exemptions from $550 to $300 per annum in respect of children aged 16 and 17 whose parents receive youth allowances. There is good justification for this of course, quite apart from the desirability of having a uniform system across the country, because it costs more to keep 16 and 17 year olds at school than it does to look after dependant children of younger ages. I think most of the parents in the house would agree with me that 16 and 17 are the critical years for many young people when they decide whether to drop out of school or to continue further education.

The extra $250 of income tax exemption for their parents will place an additional emphasis on the goal which I think is shared by members of all parties in the house, which is to create conditions under which young people are more likely to stay in school longer and thus receive the training which will fit them for the kind of jobs likely to be available in the future. For this reason I think there is ample justification for adopting a different approach in the case of youth allowances for 16 and 17 year olds from that followed in the case of family allowances.

I appreciate being allowed to make this interjection at this time. It seemed important to clear up the points which had been raised by hon. members opposite and which, I had a feeling, might be raised by others if an explanation were not given.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): The Social Credit party is on record since its national convention in 1961 as being in favour of extending family allowances to 16 and 17 year old children. The proposal before us this afternoon is slightly different but I do not believe it is so different as to warrant our taking any exception to it.

We are pleased to note that the bill provides for allowances to be made in the amount of $10 per month in respect of students attending school, as well as for those who are incapacitated either mentally or physically to the extent that they are unable to attend school. We know there have been many attempts made during the past few years to improve the educational standards of the young people in Canada. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent on the retraining of older workers who have been displaced by automation in one form or another. We therefore feel it is essential that an effort be made to improve educational standards and that incentives should be offered in this regard. We are pleased to consider this measure as another step forward in the improvement of the educational standards of this country.

We have noted over the years with some concern that a revolution is taking place in the industrial life in this country as a result of automation. This is affecting not only young people who are entering the work force but also people who have been engaged in what they thought was a steady job for years. There is growing apprehension about the permanency of even certain occupations which have been reasonably stable for a long time. Only a few days ago a memorandum was sent to the President of the United States concerning this important matter. I am bringing it to the attention of the house this afternoon because I believe many of us have failed to appreciate the implications of this revolution brought about by automation and have done none of the thinking which needs to be done in order to change some of our basic concepts about the relationship between jobs and income. This memorandum which was sent to the President of the United States was signed by 23 eminent personalities in the United States including economists and university professors. I do not wish to spend a great deal of time on it, but I would like to draw the following to the attention of the house:

> President Johnson was asked Sunday to consider "radically new strategies to meet radically new circumstances" in the nation's economic and social life as a result of automation and technological change.
> A 723-page memorandum called The Triple Revolution was sent to the President by a group of 26 economists, labour leaders, authors and educators who said it was prepared "out of a feeling of foreboding for the nation's future".

I intend to read just one more paragraph; I shall summarize this greatly:

> They proposed some form of paying everyone so they can buy the unbelievable quantity of goods the country can produce, even though everyone doesn't work to earn their incomes. There just won't be enough jobs to permit everyone to work, they argued.

I am not prepared at this stage to go as far as to say we can enter upon an economic order in which everyone will be paid an income whether or not they work, but I do believe we have come far enough to recognize that most of the unemployment in Canada today occurs among those with the least education—the least amount of training and skill. As long as this is the situation I think the subject before us this afternoon is an extremely important one. The memorandum to which I have referred goes on to say:

> As jobs diminish proportionate to the work force some way must be found to permit the growing population to get a fair share of the abundant economy.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) has pointed out that there is at the present time a compulsory requirement that children attend school until a certain age. This is a provincial matter, of course, and in some provinces the age is 14 years. In others it is 15 years, and in two provinces I think it is as high as 16 years. In this day and age, taking into account the skills which are required in certain jobs, it is impossible for a young person to obtain by the age of 16 the skills needed to cope with the social and economic order which exists today and I suggest the provinces should consider increasing the age up to which attendance in schools is compulsorily required from 14 or 15 or 16, to perhaps 18. This would not impose any hardship on the vast majority of the children of this country because most parents, even today, although they are not required to do so, send their children to school until they are 18 or even older. I think the tremendous expenditures we undertake in this country in providing welfare, relief and unemployment benefits each year would be greatly reduced if the standards of education and training could be improved. For this reason I think the incentive provided by these youth allowances is to be welcomed. Perhaps it does not go far enough, but having said this I must add that it is perhaps as far as the federal government can go. At least it is a step in the right direction.

A few minutes ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) said that people all over Canada should be treated in the same way. In the bill before us there are certain special exemptions or special regulations made to provide for the province of Quebec on account of the program which has been in operation in that province for the last three or four years. I agree that people all over Canada should be treated the same way and I think this principle should apply not only to the bill before us but to other federal legislation. We know that some time ago provision was made for provincial governments to levy a provincial sales tax.

At the time I asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) and his parliamentary secretary if there was any provision in that act to make a cash payment in lieu of sales taxes to those provinces which do not levy a retail sales tax, and the answer was no. The provinces of Alberta and Manitoba happen to be, I think, the only two provinces which do not impose this kind of levy. If the Minister of Finance is going to give effect of what he said this afternoon, certainly there should be some payment made to these provinces in lieu of a tax which they do not levy.

This is only one instance, Mr. Speaker. We also have what might be called a stubborn refusal on the part of the Department of National Health and Welfare to recognize that the province of Alberta has its rights and jurisdiction in the way it wants to run its hospitalization program. But as I said they stubbornly refuse to recognize that the way the province does it is within the rights of the province, and the province is discriminated against to the tune of millions of dollars every year because the federal authorities do not happen to like the way the province has this program set up. It happens to be one of the most advanced provincial hospitalization programs in Canada; but because they charge some small deterrent fees rather than collecting premiums or imposing a provincial sales tax to cover these hospitalization expenses, the federal government refuses to recognize this program in the payments they make. These are just two examples, and there are many more. When item No. 61, which deals with federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, is brought before this house—and I hope it is later this week—I intend to say a great deal more about this discriminatory action on the part of the federal government toward some provinces.

Mr. Knowles: It may come up later today.

Mr. Olson: I hope it does come up later today. Anyway, Mr. Speaker, I think this argument could be pursued better when that resolution is before the house. We have been told this program is going to cost $27 million, plus whatever the cash payment to the province of Quebec may be, and I think this is a small amount indeed in relation to the benefits that will be provided. In fact, I think it could be predicted at this time that the cost of the unemployment benefits that are paid both through the Unemployment Insurance Act and the many social welfare agencies will be less because of the conditions with regard to payments that are set out in this bill.

The minister pointed out that something like 502,000 people in Canada fall within this age group and at the outset she expected that about 350,000 of those are attending school and would thus be qualified to receive this benefit as soon as it becomes effective. We hope that the remaining 152,000 young people will be encouraged to re-enter school and equip themselves to cope with the social and economic conditions that they must face in Canada. As I said, Mr. Speaker, the Social Credit party endorsed a very similar type of program as much as three years ago. We are not particularly unhappy about the form in which it is brought in, although it is slightly different. For that reason we intend to support this measure.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Perron (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I must say at the outset that for many years we advocated, in the province of Quebec, an allowance payable not only to the 16 or 17 year-olds who are attending school but throughout the school years. Our representations have probably been a powerful incentive, since the province of Quebec launched an outstanding educational program in the last few years.

The last report on school attendance indicates that, as regards undergraduate and graduate studies in 1962, there were almost 10,000 more students in Quebec than in Ontario, although Ontario's population is greater by a million people. In my opinion, that is a sign that Quebec is really on the move towards an increasingly higher education in every field as well as at the university, technical and polytechnic levels.

We are glad also to find that spokesmen for all parties have recognized that, for the past few years, the Quebec government has been paying school allowances to parents who have 16 or 17 year old children still attending school. This goes to show that, once again, Quebec has taken the lead—something we are proud of—and is headed toward an emancipation and a political and economic climate worthy of that province and as a result of which Quebec will no longer be looked upon as a poor relation within the Canadian confederation.

Mr. Speaker, at this stage of my remarks I must congratulate those who drafted the legislation now before us, especially for having found the wording necessary to respect what the French Canadians in Quebec—who are very touchy—have always claimed: their rights in the field of education. It was finally recognized that this right was reserved exclusively to the provinces.

Indeed, a way was found to promote as much as possible education and schooling for our young people of 16 and 17, under a piece of legislation whose purpose is to bring about uniform education standards in Canada and to promote school attendance.

I hope that the two bills introduced in the Quebec legislature in order to tally with the legislation now before us were drafted to cover not only a ten-month schooling period as in the past, but the whole 12 months of the calendar year while enabling parents of physically or mentally handicapped children to take advantage of this $10 allowance.

I think there is a great similarity between the Family Allowances Act which requires school attendance and this measure stipulating school attendance up to the age of 16.

But if it was seen fit to draft this legislation differently, it is undoubtedly to recognize the principle that legislation concerning public education comes under provincial jurisdiction and constitutes provincial rights recognized and accepted within the framework of co-operative federalism which has been put forward for almost a year.

However, there is a principle that should also be acknowledged in the preparation of such pieces of legislation: that is, the one who collects should also be the one who spends, or the one who spends must be the one entitled to collect the money he is allowed to spend.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) gave some explanations about the revision of the Income Tax Act, the benefits that the parents will receive and tax exemptions of $500 or $350. He might also consider the possibility of handing over to the provinces, as soon as possible, the fiscal rights which belong to them, as has been claimed already by the Quebec government, namely 25 per cent of personal and corporate income tax, as well as 100 per cent of estate duties.

In my opinion, the spirit of the constitution would thus be respected and, at the same time, this would fulfil the aspirations of the province of Quebec which not only wants to be a forerunner as far as certain pieces of legislation are concerned, such as school allowances for the 16 and 17 year olds, but also which wants to assume all its responsibilities, in order to enable each of its citizens to take full advantage of what the province can give them.

I hope that the Minister of Finance, once again within the concept of co-operative federalism, will be in a position with the provincial revenue ministers, to draw up his next budget so as to enable the province of Quebec to collect the necessary amounts to maintain that progress in the educational field.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, as will be remembered, all parties in the house agreed to let the resolution preceding this bill pass without discussion, which I think is indicative of our desire to proceed as rapidly as possible. I know this legislation has the anxiety of our party, and I am assuming of all parties, and we want to see the legislation passed in plenty of time so that the bill can take effect by the first of the fall term. The minister mentioned that she was hopeful that this measure would be in effect by September 1, and if there is any real criticism to be made I think possibly it is that the bill has not been before us prior to this so that the discussion could have been gone through and the mechanics proceeded with.

I should like to say that for some time I have been fully aware of the need for this endeavour to keep children in school for a longer period of time. This ties in with the technical and vocational program instituted by the former government and encourages children to stay in school longer; it also makes it possible for parents in some cases to assist them to stay there. I am quite convinced that this bill is going to require a great deal of mechanical work. I do not know how much additional staff the minister will have to have, but I can understand that to get the benefits rolling will require a great deal of work. As a consequence certainly we are going to get on with this measure as rapidly as possible.

I should like to mention, Mr. Speaker, that during the last campaign this was part of our platform, which is all the more reason for our being fully in agreement with the intent behind this measure. However, we indicated that we would prefer to see family allowances extended to 16 and 17 year olds in school.

I think there is, Mr. Speaker, some slight misunderstanding perhaps about the term "in school". Even now the parents of children up to 16 years of age do not receive family allowances on behalf of their children if those children are able to go to school but are not attending school during the schooling months. Therefore I am heartily in accord with this bill. However, I think it should be understood that while we are bringing in youth allowances, as they are called, to cover our 16 and 17 year olds attending school, it really does not amount to anything much more than an extension of the regular family allowance, and I think that this would have been the cleanest way to provide them.

This is really an endeavour to reimburse the province of Quebec for the funds issued by them for the same purpose that this bill seeks to provide for the rest of Canada. It is a further extension of the opting-out principle. As I said earlier, we would have preferred to see a simple amendment to the Family Allowances Act which would have permitted payment of allowances to parents on behalf of children of 16 or 17 years of age still attending school and provided a uniform basis all across Canada. When we get to the clauses of the bill we will certainly have many questions to ask; but at the moment I am wondering whether, if in the future any other provinces wish to opt out, they would be permitted to do so as the bill permits Quebec to do at the moment.

I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) assured us in his remarks, although I did not get them all down, that some of the complicating factors would be taken care of by amending legislation in the province of Quebec. Their legislation at the present time pays the allowance only during ten months of the year, whereas this federal legislation proposes that if a child is attending school the allowance will be paid for the full 12 months of the year. If I understood the minister correctly, he said that Quebec was passing legislation to adjust this and also to take care of disabled children.

When I was minister I received many beseeching letters from parents—not exactly complaints but pitiful letters—pointing out that many of them, and particularly widowed mothers, had to take their children out of school because they did not have sufficient funds to keep them in school. The child had to go out to work. I do not say that this legislation is the end-all, but it will certainly be of assistance, I am quite convinced of that.

During the debate on the budget resolutions the Minister of Finance made a statement which I would remind him was another withdrawal. As reported at page 3260, near the bottom of the last paragraph, where he was dealing with withdrawing from the tax resolution allowances to 16 and 17 year olds, he said this:

> In this way members will have before them the details of the administration of these new allowances, the arrangements for fiscal compensation for Quebec and the related income tax changes, and they may then be considered together.

This is not the situation at the moment. The minister pointed out that the resolution is number 61 on the order paper, but we do not have the legislation before us and we are operating somewhat in the dark.

There are some matters of uncertainty in the bill before us. I refer to clause 7 which mentions taxation and clause 11 (b), which has been claimed by some to be a sleeper clause. Despite these things we certainly support the bill 100 per cent and wish to see it passed as rapidly as possible, but I think these details should be explained when we get to the committee stage. I am sure the minister will answer the questions we wish to ask. Reserving that right, we certainly do not intend to delay passage of the bill. We realize the urgency and I can only say that the bill should have been before us prior to now.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, as others have said who have participated in the debate, I do not intend to be lengthy at all. I listened to the minister explain the legislation this afternoon and point out its aims and objects to which, as is well known, we subscribe. As the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) stated, we believe that the legislation is somewhat late in being placed before the house. I had this in mind this afternoon when during the question period I asked the house leader about the main estimates because I believe that the government finds itself in an embarrassing position with regard to the legislative program.

Today we have this very important piece of legislation before us and, as has already been pointed out, it might just as well have been before us some time ago when it would have been dealt with just as expeditiously as it will be today. I think also of the student loan legislation which is not even on the order paper yet. This is extremely important legislation in relation to the educational program of the country and the same is true of the legislation now before us.

I trust you will bear with me, Mr. Speaker, if I seem a little irrelevant from time to time because it is not often that I take the floor. I hope the government will lend a sympathetic ear to the admonition I am going to deliver. If the student loan legislation does not come before us soon I feel we are going to be lost in the usual mismanagement of the business of the house by the government and the legislation will be passed too late for students to take advantage of it this year.

In our view the bill before us now is good legislation and we know that the objects mentioned by the minister are most desirable. There is no question that in some cases the financial relief and assistance offered under the bill will do a great deal of good in reducing the number of students who drop out of school because of lack of finances, and those 16 and 17 are, of course, primarily affected. But when we go one step beyond that age group we come to the university students who, as I said a moment ago, need immediate consideration. Therefore I think the minister should have tried to induce the government to bring forward the student loan legislation before the legislation we are now considering.

It is not that I wish to complain or that we do not think this is a good measure. We have indicated to the government and to the country that we are willing to support it as we are doing today and we will see that the bill is passed probably as quickly as the government wants it passed. Before the day is over this measure will probably have been dealt with.

But it is beyond my comprehension to understand why the government has acted in the way it has in the last few weeks. Surely this would have been a better piece of legislation for the house to have been considering a week ago than what we did discuss. As was clearly pointed out last week, the people of the country are getting absolutely fed up with the discussion of the Prime Minister's flag, and this legislation is what we should have had before the house last week or two weeks ago.

When the end of this week comes and a number of legislative matters have been dealt with, I hope the government will not turn around and take advantage of the fact that these legislative matters have been dealt with after spending 6, 7, 8, 9 or 10 days on things which are of no concern. If the government had acted in a reasonable and responsible manner prior to the last discussion of interim supply we could have dealt with these legislative matters then. I know that by the end of the current week the country will be satisfied with the way we have dealt with the legislative program.

I believe there are a number of considerations involved in the legislation before us. For instance, I have before me the most recent edition of Maclean's magazine in which there is an article on dropouts in the school system by Hugh J. Irving. I believe it would be worth while for every hon. member to read it. The author heaps a lot of scorn on students who become dropouts. He sets out many of the reasons why dropouts occur and says that teachers, psychiatrists, politicians and others concerned make many worthless statements and do not understand the problem. This may be so but I know that so far as the people I represent are concerned this legislation will be very valuable and will serve the purpose for which it is designed. It will be of great benefit in the future.

After all, Canada is not to be compared to a totalitarian state where the government directs the course of education as it chooses. We do not believe we can fit students into particular categories or force them to obtain certain qualifications. In my humble opinion this legislation is designed to assist the student so that, first, he will have a better opportunity to become qualified and, second, so that in this advancing industrial age he will not be thrown on the labour market without some academic or other qualifications. If he is not in the academic field, then there is the technical school program developed by the former minister of labour, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr). This plan will be advanced and expanded and a number of students in the 16 and 17 year age group will be able to take advantage of it. As we move into the age of automation, these institutions will be able to take care of these students so that they will have worth-while qualifications and be able to take their rightful places in the industrial field and make their contribution to the way of life that we will enjoy in the future.

Mr. Arnold Webster (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the government is to be commended for introducing Bill No. C-108. In extending youth allowances by two years, thousands of girls and boys will be enabled to complete high school and thus reduce the percentage of student dropouts in this country. This is the most compelling justification for the bill, as the minister pointed out earlier this afternoon in her statement.

An inevitable result will be to increase university enrolment in every Canadian province. For this and other reasons the number of students attending institutions of higher learning is expected to double in the next ten years. To meet this problem federal authorities have a responsibility to support provincial governments in all ways consistent with our constitution. The pressing need of the immediate future will be to develop a systematic long range program for the planning and financing of university development with respect both to operating costs and capital requirements for the years ahead.

The goal of such a plan must be to enable universities in all parts of the country to discharge their responsibilities in a way that does not place any one institution at an advantage over another with respect to the payment of staff or the provision of facilities. In providing strong leadership of this kind, the federal government would make a contribution to national unity that could not be achieved in any other way. A commendable beginning has been made voluntarily by the Canadian universities foundation. They have established a commission on the financing of higher education at a cost of $200,000. The money has been contributed by the Ford foundation and by Canadian industries.

Their report, which is expected in 1965 will include:

(a) Prospective financial requirements of universities and colleges for operation, research, physical facilities and student aid;

(b) The proportion of the financial support of higher education which should be provided by tuition fees, contributions from governments, corporations, foundations and individuals;

(c) Policies regarding the allocation of funds for higher education and criteria by which institutions and students should be deemed eligible to receive such aid;

(d) Organization for the financing of higher education, including the role of appropriate agencies for the distribution of funds.

This voluntary effort should mark the beginning of a continuing task to be undertaken by a government agency similar to that of the scientific secretariat recently announced in the House of Commons by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). The time has come for a bold and imaginative approach in developing a policy of assisting the provinces to provide adequate facilities for the higher education of their young people. Effective leadership must begin from a centre of study and planning established by some responsible federal agency.

[Mr. Webster.]

I wish to give briefly five reasons to justify federal involvement in higher education as well as in research.

(1) The Canadian union of students maintain that only one half of the young people who are capable of higher education ever enrol in a Canadian university. They assert that such a waste of human talent is indefensible. Since every democratic state desires to see its people achieve the full extent of their potential development, a federal government in concert with provincial authorities must accept a large share of responsibility for improving this condition.

(2) The work of universities does not end at the provincial boundaries. In each of the larger universities there are students from all the provinces. Likewise the graduates of the universities are distributed over the entire country. They are one of the most mobile elements in the working population and comprise a source of skilled and educated personnel which is available to the nation as a whole. Since all benefit from the work of our most capable men and women, it is not unreasonable to ask that all should contribute to their training.

(3) In our increasingly complex industrial life, the role of the universities in sustaining and improving society is now vital. Never before has the public welfare in its social, cultural and economic aspects been so dependant upon the effective functioning of our universities. This calls for a high level of investment in higher education both from private industry and from provincial and federal governments.

(4) The commission on Canada's economic prospects, of which the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) was chairman, expressed the following view in 1956:

> It is our duty to point out most emphatically that it is vitally important to Canada's future for the status of our universities to be improved and strengthened and for their facilities to be increased. In this connection it must suffice us to express the strong opinion that no government which bears any share of responsibility for the future economic development of this country can allow a solution to the pressing financial problems of the universities to go by default.

(5) The federal government has recognized that it has a responsibility for supporting the universities by its per capita grants to the provinces, by its grants to scholars through the national research council, by capital grants through Canada Council, and by loans for student residences through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

While these contributions have been praiseworthy in the past, they are already inadequate today. There is little evidence that there is any appreciation of the tremendous needs of the future in all parts of Canada. One fact is clear: Only the federal government has the resources to provide the certainty and uniformity essential to any broad scheme of financial assistance to higher education in this country.

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I have carefully considered this Bill No. C-108 derived from the Family Allowances Act of 1944-45.

Personally, I support this measure and I will vote for it, but I should like to make a few reserves and suggestions with respect to its constitutionality. In the light of the Canadian constitution, the fields of social security and education are a responsibility of the provinces and normally should be administered by the provinces. Besides, on the occasion of a number of federal-provincial conferences, namely those of 1963 and 1964, as well as previous conferences, the province of Quebec and other provinces clearly expressed their views on this matter.

Mr. Speaker, the fact that a fiscal compensation would be granted to the province of Quebec indicates that the federal government admits the unconstitutionality of its legislation. It makes the payment of school allowances conditional, as it imposes conditions on the provinces which have the full responsibility in the field of education.

I know that there have been for some time exchanges between the officials of the federal government and those of some provinces, especially the province of Quebec.

The government should hand over to the provinces a wider taxation field and enable them to adequately discharge their responsibilities in fields like social security and education.

This Bill No. C-108, Mr. Speaker, is in some way similar to the Family Allowances Act of 1944-45 and two other pieces of social security legislation, the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Old Age Pensions Act.

In 1940 administrative responsibility for unemployment insurance was given to the federal government, but, in order to meet the requirements and respect the rights of the provinces, the constitution was amended and the federal government was able to set up a fund to provide for unemployment insurance benefits. Moreover, as regards old age pensions, a constitutional amendment was passed in 1951 to enable the federal government to legislate and to establish an old age security fund.

When the federal government passed the Family Allowances Act, in 1944, it ignored the provinces and did not amend the constitution. It did not set up a special fund but merely drew upon the consolidated revenue fund.

That is why I suggest that the government should propose an amendment to the constitution to legalize its action even though I feel that social, educational, civil and family matters come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, it is my opinion that social security and education should receive special consideration at the next federal-provincial conference, in order that an agreement might be arrived at in those fields, if possible, and that their taxation fields might be returned to the provinces so that they might be able to fully exercise their prerogatives.

Mr. Speaker, it is well known that for over 25 years conflicts have arisen between the provinces and the federal government concerning their respective responsibilities, in order to know whether the federal government should intervene in those fields which, normally, come under provincial jurisdiction. On the other hand, the provinces endeavour to recuperate their taxation powers as much as possible so that the objectives of the federal government might not come into conflict with their rights.

Consequently, it is my opinion that serious consideration should be given to social security and education during a forthcoming federal-provincial conference, in order that these fields may come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces with the federal government returning to the provinces the necessary taxation fields which would enable them to discharge their responsibilities. By so doing, I feel that there would be less frustration and that confederation would be strengthened.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, for a change it gives me great pleasure to disagree violently with the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon). All of the speeches made this afternoon on this bill dealt with education. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) clearly outlined that in this age of automation the people likely to be most hurt will be the ones without the benefit of education, and even expressed some doubt that even at that all of us can be employed.

The hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler), chief whip of the Conservative party, quoted Maclean's magazine, and we see many articles in newspapers pointing out that education is no longer a municipal affair. In fact it is no longer a provincial matter. With great respect I think today it is a matter for this government, and to hear the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm taking the opposite view is absolutely contradictory to the feelings of the times.

Mr. Pigeon: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I said at the beginning of my remarks that I support the bill, but I said also that it would be better to respect provincial rights and to have agreement with the Quebec government on this matter. I think many provinces share my views.

Mr. Otto: It is just on that point I would like to disagree. It is a curious thing that in this country with 19 million population we do not have in our federal government a minister of education or a department of education. We have one Minister of Agriculture, with another coming up, but no minister of education. It is not only curious but tragic.

If a man does not get a sound education, let us say in one of the maritime provinces, and becomes unemployable, who is going to be responsible for the maintenance of him and his family? Is it the province, or is it up to this government to make the unemployment insurance funds available in order to support him and his family?

As I say, it is no longer a matter of municipal or provincial concern. A meeting of Canadian teachers recently resolved that education today is a national concern. I support this bill very strongly but it seems a devious way, an indirect way to accomplish what we know should be done, and that is for the federal government to be concerned with educational matters. I strongly suggest that all of us, and the government in particular, pay great attention in the contemplated amendments to the British North America Act to work out a scheme by which education will be a national concern and become the business of this government.

Surely all of us here, surely all the governments that are formed from time to time will pay just as much respect to the separate schools of the separate groups, and to their different educational requirements, as does each province. That would be my recommendation, rather than that put forward by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house listened with attention and interest to the remarks of the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto). I am led to believe that he frequently is placed in a position of flying kites for the government, and I am waiting for further support on the other side of the house for this proposition that denies every principle of confederation, that an amendment be made to the British North America Act to provide for the control of education by the federal parliament.

Miss LaMarsh: Don't hold your breath.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The warmth with which it was received by hon. gentlemen opposite indicates that the hon. member spoke with some authority, but certainly not an authority that is acceptable to members belonging to the Conservative party, nor has such a proposition ever been acceptable to them.

I have followed the discussion today with considerable interest. What is being achieved here, in what the hon. member for York East referred to as a devious way, is the amendment of the family allowances legislation to extend the period within which payment is made to cover those attending school at the ages of 16 and 17 years. I may appropriate from the hon. member that expression, devious, because it is very clear that what is being done merits that descriptive word of the hon. gentleman. Sitting as he does among those who bring about this change this way instead of doing so directly by amendment of the Family Allowances Act, the expression that he used has that appropriateness that will deserve an answer from some of those associated with him in the government of the day.

This matter has been delayed unnecessarily. During the election campaign of 1963 a promise was made that the very first legislation introduced would be legislation to assure that young men and women of 16 and 17 years of age, described in the legislation as youth, would merit the immediate payment of the family allowance. But the matter has been delayed. Why it should have been delayed I do not know. But I do know that on more than one occasion we in the official opposition endeavoured to secure action thereon. It is well to recall some of the discussions in this connection so that the record may be complete. On May 20, 1963, speaking on the address, I asked for action in this regard and used these words as recorded on page 45 of Hansard:

> In order to assure that the youth of our country can carry on, what is going to be done in respect of the important matter of family allowances, of extending their applicability to youths up to 18 years of age who are attending school? What action is being taken in this regard?

That speech was made 14 or 15 months ago. The undertaking given by the members of the Liberal party, who support the government of the day, was that this legislation would be brought in immediately. It was among those things which were to be brought in within the 60 days of decision, those unlamented days that turned out otherwise. We continued to press over and over again for action in this regard. When the session resumed in the fall, I asked the following question of the Prime Minister on October 24. Here is the exchange as recorded in Hansard:

> I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him if it is the policy of the government to extend family allowances beyond the age of 16 for boys and girls who remain in school.
> Mr. Pearson: Yes, that remains the policy of the government.
>
> Mr. Diefenbaker: Will it be brought up this session?
> Mr. Pearson: It will be brought up as soon as it can be arranged.

In other words there has been unjustified delay in this connection.

From time to time among those who do not understand parliament I hear it said that motions and amendments respecting matters on which the opposition are demanding action ought not to be made because they delay the business of the house. Well I would point out —and it is most interesting to have this pointed out for the purpose of the record—that what took place in February last indicates how a government, regimenting its supporters, can bring about the defeat of that which each and every one of them had advocated. On February 26 the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) seconded by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) moved that the following words be added to the address in reply to a speech from the throne:

> We respectfully regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to propose the extension of family allowances to children 16 to 18 years of age who still attend school.

It would have been very easy for the government, if there had been any desire on its part to bring in this legislation so that it would apply in accordance with the promise made in the election of 1962-63, to have given some support to this. They could not argue that it amounted to a vote of non-confidence because, by the simple expedient of saying it was not, they could have availed themselves of a means—to use the words of the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto), a devious means—of getting around an amendment moved by the opposition. Well the amendment was moved, and behold what happened. The record here is tremendously interesting. Those people who say they carry out their election promises voted on this question on February 27.

Mr. Winkler: Did the minister vote against it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: She will tell you herself, I presume. I must say that if she did not she belonged to that distinguished group who were absent from the house at the time. I think she is here in the list. Oh yes—Miss LaMarsh; she is here. And all the others who sit over there are included in the list voting against the measure they had promised, and which they had postponed. I also find it is interesting to be reminded that some of those who sit to my left found it necessary to vote against this proposition. I listened to the words of the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson). He is all for this. Yet he voted against it when it was moved as an amendment. I do not wish to embarrass hon. members. There will surely be some others who will speak on this. But it is most interesting that those who sit to my left in the Social Credit group, all of them, in addition to the one to whom I have made reference, also voted against this proposal. I see the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson) rising. I was not going to mention him, but he also voted among the "nays".

Mr. Patterson: Would the right hon. gentleman permit a question? Did that amendment mean, had it been carried out, that there would have been an extension of the allowance to that age group?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Had the government at the time said the vote was not to be taken as a vote of confidence, then the house would have spoken. But no amount of hair splitting on the part of the hon. gentleman can justify his voting against this proposition on the occasion in question when, as a matter of fact, he had told his constituents beforehand that he believed in it.

This is the kind of thing which makes people suspicious of parliament, if they are. I could go on and name others, but the hon. gentleman insisted that he be included in the list by rising and asking a question. If there are any other members over there who wish to be included all they have to do is rise, and I will name them. All of which indicates the inconsistency of the attitudes taken by some of the hon. members who were elected to oppose the present government. I think it would be of interest if hon. gentlemen would turn to page 340 of Hansard for February 27 and try to explain to the house today how, in these few short months, they have been converted to a different stand.

That is the benefit—I am speaking more seriously now—of these motions and amendments. They force the government to act. All over Canada, after we had taken this stand, one newspaper after another referred to the inconsistency shown by hon. members opposite, none of whom was more inconsistent than the minister of health.

Miss LaMarsh: Would the right hon. gentleman permit a question? Perhaps he could tell the house how it was that motions frequently moved during the years from 1957 to 1962 were insufficient to enable the administration which he headed to act in this regard.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is a most interesting question. I wish I could deal with it in detail, because the amendments which the government of today moved when in opposition, and which they have run away from now they are in office, are most illuminating. That is the kind of interruption which is always beneficial and in keeping with the best parliamentary practice. Hon. members may recall that the government was going to bring in a development fund. This was to be the cornerstone of our economic development—a national development fund. Day after day they preached that. They introduced it, by amendment. And ever since they came to office they have been running away from it, fearful of taking the essential step by which they were going to bring about an improvement in the economy. I wish I had a record of some of the other amendments, few if any of which have received any attention on the part of the government, now that it is in office. We took the stand—and it was made perfectly clear—that the legislation in this regard was going to be introduced in February of 1963, at which time we met defeat in the house. We intended to do this, and the legislation was ready for the purpose of extending these allowances. And what has happened? Those who voted for this government, relying on the promise that this would be among the first things they would bring before parliament, have, as in so many other cases, been entirely deluded if not deceived. Again, to borrow that expression which I am sure will become a monumental one and which was coined a few minutes ago by the hon. member for York East with the knowledge that he has of those with whom he sits, the government obtained its support by devious ways.

There is a provision with regard to the provinces that do not wish to come under the plan directly. I am not going to deal on this occasion with that problem in any detail. An opportunity is going to come very shortly to speak at length in connection with dominion-provincial relations, in connection with the provision of those things that will bring about unity within the nation.

Miss LaMarsh: Your resignation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But I do say at once that many thinking Canadians today are becoming very concerned at the degree to which the constitution is being subverted, its principles deviated from, legislation brought in effective for some provinces in Canada but not for others. In other words, these people are very concerned with the degree to which this government, in the few months it has been in office, is bringing about within Canada division and disunity by policies that cannot but divide this country at a time when, as always, unity is of primary consideration. This concept that is receiving the support of this government, namely of dividing this nation, is something that is dangerous to the future of our confederation. Every step that is taken by the government in advancing division within this country is fraught with danger to the preservation of our national unity. I shall deal with that in more detail when the opportunity comes.

Sir, we in the opposition have heard over and over again, from elements of the press which have never shown any affection for the Conservative party, that in the opposition we follow a course of endeavouring to prevent the government bringing in its legislative program. Nothing of the kind. Yesterday the defence matter was before the house; today it was passed on division.

Miss LaMarsh: Today it is youth allowances.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The defence bill was passed on division following an exhibition on the part of the government of stubborn refusal to give information to parliament, and we wanted this to remain as a monument to this government in the days ahead. Today legislation is brought before this house to provide for the extension of family allowances. We are going to support it. It represents the stand we have taken. All we ask of this government is that it bring in its legislative program instead of endeavouring to bulldoze parliament.

Mr. Starr: Muzzle.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not to muzzle—to bulldoze parliament is the only expression to describe it.

Miss LaMarsh: The same old speech.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the attitude taken by this government, which says that unless we pass this flag resolution, this personal pennant, we are going to sit here all summer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad to see the support the government has. This indicates that those hon. gentlemen—and I would like to identify them—who sit on the periphery of the cabinet are entirely in agreement with an attitude of trying to muzzle parliament into doing those things that the government wants done. Bring on your legislative program. Come along with your loans to students. You have not got it ready. You have been talking about it for months; bring it in. It isn't ready; you have not drafted it; you have come to no agreement with the provinces. Yet you pretend that these things will be done. Bring in the legislation with regard to 10,000—

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the right hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: Is the right hon. gentleman discussing second reading of a bill which is part of the government's program, or is he discussing something else?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. gentleman came in. He did not hear the argument, obviously. He does not know what took place, and he interrupts with that ignorance that so often characterizes him. All I have to say in that regard is, bring in the legislation and we will give it immediate attention. We will give support to this measure or any legislative program to carry out those things beneficial to Canada. Such matters will receive attention, and immediate attention. But I again point out to the hon. gentleman, whose kindly nature is I know foreign to intimidation of any kind, that you are not going to be able to browbeat parliament into a position where you require parliament to do what you want done, on a matter that does not have the general support of the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIlraith: There is a bill before parliament now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did somebody over there speak of parliament? Are they going to speak of parliament and how it operates?

Mr. Bell: The pipe line boys.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let those who know not parliament give me their idea about parliament, or endeavour to lead this house to believe they have any knowledge of it. This legislation is beneficial. We support it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad to see who applauds. The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) makes a great contribution to the house, because he is the official applauder—and I thank him very, very much.

Mr. Pugh: He always misses his cue, though.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have been diverted by the interruption of the minister, and I return to the bill. This legislation is about 13 months late. We were at all times ready to support it. The Liberal party said it would be brought in during the 60 days, and the 60 days have become almost 400 days.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, after hearing the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) cry out a moment ago that the government should introduce up to date legislation, I wonder why he did not restrict himself to Bill No. C-108, which is precisely a measure likely to help young Canadians 16 and 17 years of age.

After stating that he supported the principle of the bill, he managed to include in his remarks a few statements which are surely not to his credit. For instance, he said that this legislation would cause more division in Canada. The game of the Leader of the Opposition at present is to cause division in the country.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. At no time did I say that, either directly or indirectly.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, in my right hon. friend's language I would say this, that while

I was sitting here I heard him say that the government was dividing Canada—

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what I said, but I was not referring to this.

Mr. Caouette: —and that it was creating division with its legislation. Who has stopped the former prime minister of Canada from presenting legislation like that we have before us and are discussing today? Who has prevented him from doing that?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, that is nothing new for the Leader of the Opposition, since he stated in the past that family allowances were merely a piece of legislation to assist French Canadians in the province of Quebec. But I realized myself that in western Canada, and in the riding of the Leader of the Opposition, there were as many large families as there are in the province of Quebec.

Another point on which the Leader of the Opposition was wrong is that some years ago he was against family allowances because, he said, they were designed to help families in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition said he would support this legislation. We shall also support it, but we think that $10 a month for 16 and 17 year old Canadians attending school, college or university does not represent very much, considering what family heads must spend to maintain their children at university or at school when they are 16 and 17.

One hundred dollars a year. The province grants scholarships of $250, $300 and $400—and when you belong to the right party, it might probably go to $500—plus $100 granted by the federal government.

What does that amount to, when we have to pay up to $1,500 and $2,000 a year so that our young people can complete their education and secure the qualifications they are entitled to.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation provides for the payment of $10 per month for our 16 and 17 year old youths. While this bill is an extension of family allowances to assist our young people who continue their studies, what help is $10 a month for our young people attending university? Is that not laughing at people, at parents, and at the rising generation?

Mr. Speaker, the bill is far from complete. I appreciate that, for election purposes, one can use measures like Bill No. C-108 to say: We have extended family allowances to children of 16 and 17 attending schools and universities. But it does not mean much to the young people, and particularly to family heads who must support their children and look after their education.

For a youth of 16 or 17 who leaves public school to go to high school or technical school, $10 per month is not much. Moreover, in Quebec, students have been getting this allowance of $10 a month for a year or two. But today, when the federal government intervenes and offers this additional family allowance, the provincial authorities cancel the $10 they were paying last year. That is what is happening now in Quebec.

Our young people need greater consideration on the part of administrators, both provincial and federal. The physical possibilities are tremendous in this country. We have schools and, if there are not enough, we can build more. However, to maintain our young people in those institutions is a financial problem, not a question of good will. The problem is not one of intelligence, but of money, and as long as the authorities, federal or provincial, will not tackle the difficulty at its source, we will continue to have before us measures such as Bill No. C-108, which the Leader of the Opposition is ready to support, even though he did not bring it forward when he was in office, as I pointed out a few moments ago.

It has been said that this bill or others of the same type are apt to create division in Canada. What division can we create in the country with $10 a month? The problem is much more deep rooted and serious and it will not be settled by haphazard solutions. It is not by such remedies that we will restore the mutual confidence which perhaps has already existed in Canada and which must naturally exist, but it is by bold measures which will bring a gleam of hope to the whole population. In short, we need something that will restore confidence in our parliamentary institutions, the government, the administration.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said that Social Credit members were irresponsible visionaries. However, they suggested solutions, but these were rejected.

Let us examine the solutions which this government is putting forward today to assist students who wish to complete their studies. The government is offering $10 a month, for ten months in a given year, which amounts to $100. No matter how Social Credit proposals are ridiculed, they are not without merit. If and when the government decides to consider these proposals seriously, it will perhaps realize that, instead of sinking towards socializing and socialistic policies as it is now doing, it is possible, by controlling not human beings but finance, to put our national resources and the Canadian physical potential at the service of the Canadian people. Monetary reform is the only thing that should be taken into account to get the results we want.

There have been some suggestions, plans and planning. And we still see the government introducing bills similar to the one now under consideration; it is a new planning to help students: extended allowances.

Mr. Speaker, the Social Crediters did not lie 25 years ago; Major Douglas was not wrong 40 years ago. Now, I sincerely believe that if the government had fully considered the suggestions of Social Credit, it would have stopped a long time ago disguising its legislation in financial tentacles which are not our own but which control us.

Oddly enough, the government is reluctant to grapple with financial problems or tackle the financial giants, but it is willing to take on human beings—children, students and parents.

Mr. Speaker, Social Credit knows the solution to the problems that were caused entirely by successive governments, Grits or Tories, Liberals or Conservatives. Today, faced with the depressed conditions in which we find not only the students but the people in general, it is high time that we take exceptional measures to correct abuses at the source, which lies in the financial system, which scoffs at people and at governments and controls or tries to control the political parties, whatever they are.

Mr. Speaker, as I have said time and time again, the government should assume its responsibilities. We should stop presenting to the people legislation like Bill No. C-108. Ten dollars a month. We will certainly vote for those $10 a month, because it is better than nothing, but what can a university student do with $10 a month?

You know, Mr. Speaker—and the government knows it also—that he cannot do much. Nevertheless, let us accept the principle that students need help, because the monetary system is not only fictitious but obsolete. Our students, your sons as well as mine, thereby suffer, and we think that we are going to help them by granting $10 a month. Our group is going to vote for that amount of $10 a month as proposed by the government, but we wish that it were more generous. The government should be as generous towards our students as towards our soldiers in Cyprus, in the Congo and in the other countries of the world. When peace has to be restored in the world, we spend millions and millions of dollars; but to help our own sons, our own students, the government offers $10 a month.

Mr. Speaker, I shall close my remarks by saying that those $10 a month are not enough, that we are mocking our young people of 16 and 17, because they need more to continue and complete their studies, in order to contribute not only to the economic development of Canada, but to its cultural development as well.

Mr. Jean-Pierre Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my opposition to the proposal made by the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) concerning the establishment of a federal department of education.

In my opinion, the major role the federal government could play in the field of education would be to pay the cost of education of English and French minorities in the ten provinces of Canada.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want, with my other colleagues of the opposition, to support the principle of Bill No. C-108. Along with the other members who have already spoken, I want to say how important it is to encourage young people to remain in school as long as possible. Too often students leave school to take employment which provides them with a good wage, but they regret it later on.

I am sure other members of the house often see such cases. Young Canadians come to my office looking for work, and then they tell me: "Mr. Grafftey, I intend to quit school."

I think, Mr. Speaker, that all members of every political party in the House of Commons must encourage young Canadians to stay in school as long as possible.

[Text]

At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that with other members of the opposition I intend to support fully the principle of the bill. I was very interested in the remarks of the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) to the effect that education should fall under the jurisdiction of the federal parliament.

[Translation]

Maybe the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) agrees with me about the fact that this is undoubtedly the reason why Mr. Lesage asked for the separation of Liberal forces in the province of Quebec, because the Liberal party never said in Quebec the same things it proclaimed outside that province.

[Text]

I feel that the hon. member for York East, in putting forward such a proposition, certainly shows us why Mr. Lesage asked for the separation of the Liberal forces in the province of Quebec. It is simply because little by little Canadians are realizing that Liberalism means division. The Liberals have never said the same thing in the province of Quebec as they have outside the province of Quebec.

During the debate this afternoon I could not help taking great interest in the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). In 1964 most hon. members are beginning to recognize the fact that uniformity does not underlie the Canada of today. I agree completely with the approach of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to the problem when he states that unity in diversity underlies the mosaic or the facts of life, so to speak, in Canada today.

In supporting the basic principles of the legislation I wish to make some suggestions, and I am not going to be adamant at all. I simply say I have a great suspicion that what the government is seeking to obtain is very good and desirable but, as with so many things that the government led by this Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) is trying to do, it is going about it in absolutely the wrong way. I suspect that one thing this debate is going to point up and emphasize is the fact that the machinery for permanent consultation between the federal government and the provinces is woefully inadequate. What is going on today underlines once more why time and time again I have suggested both inside and outside the House of Commons the immediate creation of a permanent secretariat for federal-provincial relations at the prime ministerial and premier level. If we are in the dark in many areas in this debate as we approach this important subject, it is because to my knowledge not enough prior consultation has gone on with the provinces in relation to this problem before this bill was placed before hon. members. If adequate prior consultation had gone on with the provinces generally and Quebec in particular we would not, to a great extent, be debating in the dark today.

The hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) said in general terms that because the bill based on a resolution under No. 61 on government orders is not before us at the moment we are forced to debate not only the principle but many of the details of this bill in the dark. Hon. members opposite laugh, but I suggest that federal-provincial relations and details of this sort are of great importance.

Mr. Macaluso: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member said that members were laughing. If there are hon. members laughing they must be on the other side because I heard nothing.

Miss LaMarsh: We are all asleep.

Mr. Grafftey: The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) says, "We are all asleep". Certainly, she must have been sound asleep in the area of federal-provincial relations. The Minister of National Health and Welfare, surrounded by her centralizing colleagues, have done more in terms of creating national disunity in this country than any government in the history of our nation.

I come again to the general atmosphere surrounding this problem before it was brought before the House of Commons and underlines the fact that, time and time again we have found the permanent consultative machinery between the federal government and the provinces woefully inadequate. I suggest that had there been a greater degree of open consultation based on this permanent machinery we would have been helped in this debate today. If the terms of the bill based on resolution No. 61 were before us, the debate could easily be more meaningful. Why do I say that? Not having seen the bill itself, I am not going to be dogmatic on this point. However our party has said, why were family allowances not simply extended and then the proper fiscal arrangements to provide for the province of Quebec recapturing its proper fiscal powers not made? We ask that question without any knowledge of what real consultation went on with the provinces, without the terms of the bill based on resolution 61 before us.

We are obviously handicapped, Mr. Speaker, when we go into these details. I suppose members opposite will say it is obstruction when we want to know the real facts which touch upon one of the most important subjects before the Canadian people today, namely federal-provincial relations. Am I not right in saying, Mr. Speaker, that under the present family allowance legislation the only time the allowance is not paid in respect of children under the age of 16 is when the children are not in school and they should be? The minister says no, and I am willing to be corrected.

Miss LaMarsh: I will close the debate if I speak.

Mr. Grafftey: The minister says no, that is not the case. But I still come back, Mr. Speaker, to the general proposition, without being adamant about it, that with the scanty information we have at the moment we have every reason to believe that the ends desired by this legislation would have been achieved by a simple extension of the Family Allowances Act and compensation made to the province of Quebec to enable it to recapture certain fields of taxation.

While I support the principle of the bill, I certainly reserve my right to say that the government is attempting to achieve a good end but is going about it in a wrong way. I had not intended originally to speak in this debate. I may be redundant when I say that the debate so far has pointed up time and time again the immediate necessity for the establishment of permanent consultative machinery for federal-provincial relations, not only between departments but between the Prime Minister and the premiers. Unless this is done immediately, Mr. Speaker, debates such as this in the federal House of Commons are going to continue to be unsatisfactory. We are going to go into dark areas where members of the opposition will not be able to speak with any real authority unless the proper consultation takes place and unless the proper homework is being done on these matters. I believe this could easily be another case in which the federal government initially got into trouble because they attached an education rider to their legislation. Then there had to be another retreat. Otherwise they would simply have extended family allowances and made a taxation provision for the province of Quebec.

As I mentioned a few moments ago, Mr. Speaker, I am supporting the principle of the bill. I thought it wise, before six o'clock was reached, to support the principle and to add this reservation that I and many other members on this side of the house have at the present time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A to inform the house that the question to be raised at ten o'clock this evening is as follows:

The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh), beef prices, entry into the United Kingdom market.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

YOUTH ALLOWANCES

PROVISION FOR PAYMENT BETWEEN AGES OF 16 AND 18

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Miss LaMarsh for the second reading of Bill No. C-108, to provide for the payment of youth allowances.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Reg Cantelon (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, prior to six o'clock we heard a great many short speeches on this particular topic, and I can assure you that what I have to say this evening will not take very long either. I approve the legislation which is presented and I do not intend to delay the passage of it.

Most hon. members approve of it on the basis that it will assist parents to keep their children in school for another two years, but there is one small criticism I have to offer. It will only assist parents to keep children in school during the years 16 and 17, and a little elementary arithmetic will indicate that most of the children who leave school at age 17 will not have completed grade 12, let alone grade 13 in Ontario. In some instances this might cause a bit a difficulty for the parents and therefore I regret that the assistance is not being made available also for those aged 18 years.

Mention has been made that the program will cost us some $27 million this year, plus the amount that will be given to the province of Quebec as a direct grant. This is quite a bit of money, but from my standpoint it is a justifiable expenditure. It is a certainty that no country ever suffers from having a highly educated population and anything we can do to assist in raising the general level of education is to be highly commended. For this reason it is a good thing that this allowance is being granted to 16 and 17 year olds and I am only sorry that the 18 year olds are not included.

We know unemployment is always greatest in those areas where the people are the most poorly educated. Of course there are exceptions to every rule, but this is the general experience, and if this is so again we have a very good reason for making this grant to parents.

I am also glad that the province of Quebec has seen fit to co-operate in this particular case. In some other instances there has been a great deal of difficulty in securing co-operation from that province but, as was pointed out by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) this afternoon, by modifying their legislation they have gone along with this plan. In particular I am glad to see that what I would call the only real logical objection to the legislation has been removed by the fact that the income tax exemption will be kept at $550 for parents who have children aged 16 and 17 years attending school.

I regret that we are still waiting for the student loans legislation and I hope it will be introduced as quickly as the minister can do so. I am also extremely sorry that the legislation for the 10,000 scholarships which were to be granted, about which the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Laing) spoke a year ago last March, is still delayed. I hope it will soon come out of the limbo of the unknown, wherever it is, and be presented to us at an early date.

With these few comments, Mr. Speaker, again I want to express my general approval of this legislation and hope it will receive speedy passage.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks on the legislation now before us. I also want to remind the house of certain statements, certain planks of the Liberal platform. First of all, I should say that this bill comes very late and that, because of the lack of preparation with regard to it, the Canadian people have lost at least 15 months of benefits which might have been paid to our young people who are qualified under that legislation tending to give them an opportunity to finish their education.

The problem of education is of the highest important for the French Canadian nation as for the remainder of the country.

I noted, like several others in the house, the remarks made this afternoon by the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto)—who was rebuffed by his own fellow member for Longueuil (Mr. Côté). We find that even within the Liberal membership, there is no unity of thought with regard to this bill. It is hardly surprising that in the caucus the government members were unable to agree among themselves on a measure which might have been acceptable to, and would have been accepted by the House of Commons, because they could not even agree on the kind of legislation they wanted to bring in.

Mr. Speaker, I have before me folders from the two last election campaigns of the Liberal party, in which they promised to extend family allowances to boys and girls of 16 and 17 who are attending school. Here are some folders which were distributed during the general election of June 18, 1962, in which we may see the following:

[Text]

A new Liberal government will:

Extend family allowances beyond the age of 16 for boys and girls who remain students. This will mean that more teen-agers can qualify for skilled jobs.

[Translation]

And further on:

[Text]

Help to invest in Canadian youth by voting for your Liberal candidate on June 18.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am happy to hear the applause coming from the other side of the house, but when I think about the young people in Canada, and more particularly those of the province of Quebec, I feel sad because the young people of the province of Quebec and of the rest of the country have been deprived for 15 months of what had been promised in 1962 by those who are today applauding this legislation.

Here, I would like to refer to a circular letter, written in French, in order to satisfy my friends opposite, in which it is said that a Liberal government would re-establish security thanks to allowances payable in regard to children aged 16 years still attending school.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ricard: Well, it pleases me considerably, Mr. Speaker, to hear applause from my friends opposite, because this is a unique proof of their sincerity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ricard: This is something they had promised two years ago, but once in office, they waited for 15 months before carrying out their promise. For 15 months, they deprived the youth of this country of the benefits of legislation that we also had promised.

An hon. Member: Six years in office.

Mr. Ricard: Today, they pat themselves on the back because they have been inactive for a long time.

My hon. friends opposite will regret having spoken out of turn. In fact, to remind them of what we were intending to do, I will ask them to refer to page 2885 of Hansard for April 12, 1962, when the then minister, now the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith), said:

> Mr. Speaker, I have an announcement to make which I believe represents a new breakthrough in Canada's welfare system.
> I have today written the provincial ministers informing them of the government's intention to initiate a new program of welfare grants designed to assist in overcoming major deficiencies in our present nation-wide network of welfare services.

The then minister wrote in black and white that we were just waiting for the proper time to submit the legislation to the house.

Further on the same page, we can read:

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wishes to—

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, could the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) tell me why the Conservative government waited until April 12, 1962 to put such legislation on the order paper, while they had been in power for six years?

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, the answer is quite simple. There was so much to do, things had been left pending so long, there was so much to do over because of the neglect and the lack of vision and foresight of our hon. friends opposite who preceded us; in brief, the 22 years of inaction of the Liberal party had put us in such a position that we had to tackle the most urgent problems first.

In the first place, we gave our old people a pension which—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind hon. members that we are now discussing Bill No. C-108, an act to provide for the payment of youth allowances?

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I realize that quite well. But I was carried to other ground by my hon. friend from Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Drouin).

Now, I should like to go on putting on the record what the former minister of national health and welfare stated, as can be seen on page 2885 of Hansard of April 12, 1962. I quote:

> This new program will be complemented by the establishment of a national council of welfare, as announced in the speech from the throne.

That seems clear to me. First of all, we informed the house of the legislation that we proposed to introduce. We could not do everything at the same time. We had to follow the normal procedure in the house. In fact, my hon. friend from Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes, who is a lawyer, will recognize that there is a certain procedure to follow in this house. Indeed, if we had departed from the normal course of procedure, he would have been the first to blame us.

A little further, the minister stated:

> As I have indicated previously, I would also like the council to consider a number of other important social security matters such as the development of a new and integrated approach to public assistance, and the need for an increase in the level of benefits under family allowances, along with the question of raising the age limit at which such allowances are paid in the case of children who are still attending school.

Mr. Speaker, if the Liberals and Social Credit marriage had not taken place early in February 1963, the young people of Quebec and the other provinces would have been in receipt of family allowances long ago, and a Conservative government would have granted them. But because a Liberal government was elected, young people were deprived for at least 15 months of family allowances they were entitled to.

As I said, it is a shame that the Liberal party has deprived for so long those young people of the allowances they need in order to prepare their future.

If I were to give a piece of advice to my hon. friends opposite, I would suggest that they pass this measure as soon as possible, so that they might be forgiven the great injustice they did to Canadian youth.

Hon. Yvon Dupuis (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make a long speech, but I cannot let pass unanswered the remarks which have just been made by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard).

We are now considering Bill No. C-108 which all Canadian people want us to pass and which will enable our young students aged 16 and 17 to take advantage of another social measure.

I wish to remind the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot that this social measure follows all the others which were passed by the parliament of Canada through the years, and I call his attention to the fact that all the social measures now in our statutes were introduced, passed and put in the statutes under Liberal governments.

I am always surprised to see our Conservative friends resent the fact that we waited a few months to keep an election promise.

During the years of Conservative administration, which have been quite numerous, we never witnessed the passing of a single social measure proposed by the Conservatives. All social legislation, old age pensions, unemployment insurance, family allowances, pensions for the blind, pensions for the disabled, each one of those social measures was passed in this house under a Liberal regime.

But now we have the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot raising a hue and cry because the Liberal party waited 15 months, according to him, before keeping an election promise. Mr. Speaker, I think all Canadians realize that, even if we did wait 15 months, at least we kept our promise.

[Text]

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. minister a question?

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would mind repeating his question, because I did not understand it.

[Text]

Mr. Winkler: May I ask the hon. minister a question?

Mr. Dupuis: With great pleasure.

Mr. Winkler: I wonder if the minister was one of those six bucks boys of 1957.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I will say to the hon. member that when the Conservatives do something good, it is always when they improve on existing Liberal legislation. They can never initiate any themselves.

Mr. Speaker, I will summarize my comments as follows. For six years, the Conservative party did not take advantage of opportunities to do Canadians justice in the field of social security. However, during the few months we have been in power, we have succeeded in keeping most of our promises. During six years of Conservative administration, more than 265 promises were put aside by the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker).

[Mr. Dupuis.]

Mr. Speaker, I think that if our Conservative friends were sincere and if the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot were sincere, they would admit that the measure under consideration must be passed so as to enable young Canadian students to take advantage of another measure of social security which is another achievement of the Liberal party of Canada.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio. Can he give us the list of promises carried out by the Liberal party since it came into power, and thus enlighten all Canadians, because at present there is a big question mark about that all over Canada.

On that list, I should not like the minister to mention tax increases, measures—

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, you are well aware that if I answered the question put by my hon. friend I would be out of order. He should know that himself. As a matter of fact, it is because he knows I would be out of order and you would call me to order that he ventures to ask that question. He knows very well that if I had a right to do so, I could draw up a long list of all the achievements of the Liberal party since it came back into power.

One thing is sure. We promised to replace inaction by action, and action is there before you. Let the question come to a vote and you will see that we will keep our promises.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, could the minister have unanimous consent to take a minute and give us that list?

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Moore).

Mr. H. A. Moore (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, after the political interlude I would like to refer back to the bill. I fully agree with the principle of extending family allowances to include those students of the ages of 16 and 17, and I intend to support it wholeheartedly. However, I would like to make one point in this regard. If all that is needed to accomplish this objective is an extension of the present act, why is this separate bill needed? To administer youth allowances will require, in this case, new machinery, a new department and added expense, when we already have machinery set up to administer family allowances.

I agree that youths who are unable to attend school through physical or mental deficiency should be included in this program, because due to the fact that they are unable to work they cannot contribute to their own upkeep. The fact that they are unable to attend school should not make them ineligible. These young people should be eligible for this allowance, and the parents of these wholly dependant children of 16 or 17 years of age should receive the additional $10 a month. All of us who are parents realize, I am sure, that it requires more money to give students of this age an education than has been the case in former times. I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that if the only reason for this special bill, rather than making a simple amendment to the act, is to help out one province, I think it is time that province made some concessions, for a change.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say just a brief word on Bill No. C-108, which I think the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) wrongly enumerated as Bill No. 75 when he was speaking.

Mr. Dupuis: I agree; it is 108.

Mr. Nielsen: I think this is the first time a member opposite has been quick to agree with any of the constructive criticisms that have come from this side. I think, though, that one cannot allow some of the comments of the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) to go unchallenged. He seems to forget—and if he wants to search his memory accurately he will realize this is so—that it was the Bennett government that planned the unemployment insurance legislation, which the subsequent Liberal government adopted as good legislation, and it was supported by the official opposition.

The Minister without Portfolio also seems to forget that it was during those six years he so decried a moment ago that old age allowances, disabled persons allowances, veterans allowances and old age pensions were increased. This was at a time when the cost of living demanded it, and the Liberal government of the day would not do anything about it. He seems to have forgotten also, that in what he termed the few months this government has been in office—actually it has been in office for 15 months, and 15 months too long, for my money—after those deceitful promises were made across this country of 60 days of blazing action, it was this official opposition that brought about the increase in old age allowances and pensions.

Therefore I do not think the Minister without Portfolio has too much to blow his horn about on that subject, because it was the responsible action of the official opposition that brought about an enforcement of those myriads of Liberal promises that were so irresponsibly made during the last election campaign. I remember one in 1958, when the Liberal party then went so far as to promise a $1,000 bonus to every honeymooning couple in Canada. I can remember these things, so I think the minister should not shout too loudly about the Liberal party.

I want for a moment again to draw the attention of the minister responsible for introducing this bill to an apparent neglect of the two northern territories of this country, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. She will find, if she reads the bill carefully—and she would know this, if she had read it carefully—that in the definition section in clause 2, paragraph (h), a province as defined therein might very well exclude the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. She will also find that in paragraph (i) of clause 2 a school as defined therein might very well exclude the operation of the very worth while objective of this bill in the two territories I have mentioned.

Throughout the years there has been a very sad problem in the northern territories where students attending school and wanting to further their education have been met with the almost unbearable cost of having to seek higher education in outside centres. They find the expense of having to get to the higher institutions of learning which do not exist in the north a very burdensome one indeed. Therefore any such assistance in this regard would be very greatly appreciated by the student population and by the parents who have to support that population in the north. There are no universities in the north, as the minister knows, and there are also no colleges. For a parent to have to bear the burden of the return air fare to send their children outside—we call it outside—to these institutions of learning is difficult, particularly where the parent concerned is in the lower or middle income groups, and especially so as the size of the family increases.

There is a much greater criticism which can be levelled at the bill, Mr. Speaker, and I am glad to see in this connection the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) in his seat. I can remember him discussing the budget resolutions. I realize he is not interested in the remarks I am passing now, but he might recall that he stood up and gave the house his assurance that measures affecting the budget resolutions would be introduced and put before parliament all at once in a bundle, as it were. This was, as he explained at the time, so that we could understand the implications which were inherent in clauses such as clause 7 and clause 11 (b) of Bill No. C-108. In fact, there is an order on page 9 of the order paper, order No. 61, which sets forth the desirability of introducing a measure to provide for the revision of certain fiscal arrangements with the provinces, to provide certain adjustments, and so on.

Here we have a bill which we are asked to pass upon, in which clause 7 has definite financial implications, interprovincial and territorial, as also has clause 11 (b). Yet all the information the Minister of Finance promised us would be available is not available. What assurance have we that a province or a territory would not be allowed to opt out of the provisions of this bill with respect particularly to clauses 7 and 11 (b)? What assurance have we, for instance, that regulations will not be passed which will, in effect, nullify the exemptions provided for in the relevant provisions of the bill? We would have some basis upon which to analyse these questions had the undertaking of the minister in introducing all of these budget resolutions at the same time been adhered to; but he has not done this.

So, sir, I simply say again that in respect to the two clauses I mentioned we are asked to buy a pig in a poke and to pass something which has not been fully explained. We are put in the position of being charged with obstruction if we ask for further information, or ask for the adherence to an undertaking given by the Minister of Finance and to which he has not adhered. We are confronted with information which is not complete in so far as a careful consideration of the financial and other fiscal implications contained in the provisions of the bill are concerned.

Let me say at once I support this measure. I support any measure which will give to the student population of our northern areas in Canada the opportunity to progress along the road of equality which might eventually reach the level of the more settled areas of Canada. All costs are high in the north and education is not the least of these. With no colleges and no universities it becomes ever increasingly important that measures such as these receive the approval of Canadians everywhere.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, supporting as I do this bill which provides for youth allowances, commonly known as family allowances, to those aged 16 and 17 years, may I say I really had no intention of speaking to the measure on second reading. However because of the tirade of the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) a few moments ago when he tried to help the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) to get second reading through as quickly as possible, I feel I should say a few words. I do not know what are the duties of the Minister without Portfolio in the cabinet, but my observations of his job leaves me to believe he is a hatchet man and a mimic. I must say at once that he excels in both these areas and his activities in these occupations suit him to a "t". After listening to his tirade this evening I can understand why he cannot be relied on to assume duties in the cabinet with a department portfolio. I imagine that if he keeps up this type of attitude he will remain a Minister without Portfolio for many years to come.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Mr. Dupuis: Are you jealous?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, Bill No. C-108 is a natural and normal sequence in the educational program that was started in 1960 by the federal government, in co-operation with the provinces, the provinces being helped financially, as were the municipalities. Today we are discussing second reading of this youth allowances bill. There was no discussion at the resolution stage. It was agreed by all of us that the resolution should pass. This is a vital bill, vital to everyone. It was vital to the opposition some four or five weeks ago when we asked the government to get on with the legislation. But no, at that time the only thing which had to be passed was the flag resolution, and before all other legislation. Now all of a sudden after four changes of mind and reducing the list of essential business from 38 items to six, we reach this vital piece of legislation. Yet after no debate on the resolution what is the attitude of the government and the minister? They are impatient. They cannot stand debate in this house. They are so frantic to try to create a better image in the eyes of the people in the country that they cannot stand debate of any kind. Well, I cannot agree with this policy. As a member of parliament I have the right, I think, to debate any bill which comes before the house, and this one, important as it is, is one about which I wish to say a few words. They have no patience of any kind. They ask us to pass it right away and say they do not want any debate.

What is the reason for all this haste? Why is it that we have to pass everything in two or three days and—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am afraid the hon. member is straying from the question now before the house. I would suggest to the hon. member that the question before the house at this time is not the order of business or the procedure followed by the government in presenting this resolution to the house, but a bill which bears No. C-108 and refers to the payment of youth allowances. I would respectfully suggest to the hon. member that he try to limit his comments to the contents of that bill.

Mr. Starr: I hear noises down in the corner, Mr. Speaker, and they are the ones who waste most of the time of this parliament. I was just saying that the reason I want to bring this out is that there is pressure on the part of the government now to try to hold back members from expressing their opinions, and when one tries to debate Bill C-108 providing for youth allowances, which is an important matter to the people of this country, they call it filibustering. I do not call it filibustering. I reserve the right that any member of this house has to speak as many times as the rules will permit on any subject under discussion in parliament.

After we took office we were shocked to find in 1959 that 70 per cent of the available jobs in Canada required skilled labour and only 30 per cent required unskilled labour. Because of the tremendous upsurge of industrial life in Europe at that time we were not able to get sufficient numbers of immigrants with the trades and skills we required in this country. Consequently we felt it was our obligation to provide a proper opportunity for Canadians to acquire the necessary trades and skills required in Canada.

When we approached the provinces regarding this problem, which is the proper way because education is under provincial jurisdiction, they agreed with us entirely but pointed out, that they did not have the facilities in which to train young Canadians to acquire these trades and skills. It was then that we launched a program to build facilities for the young people of this country. With the co-operation of the provinces and the municipalities we were able within two years to build a sufficient number of schools to provide some 139,000 student places each and every year.

We gave an incentive to the provinces, we gave an incentive to the municipalities and, as I pointed out earlier, it was only a natural consequence that an incentive was given to the young people of this country to complete their education because the 30 per cent of jobs requiring unskilled labour will diminish every year and the percentage of jobs requiring skilled labour will become larger and larger. So it is essential that the young people of this country remain in school to complete their education, not just remain in school two years longer but remain in school as long as necessary to complete their education in the particular skill or trade.

I doubt whether the provision in the bill for those aged 16 and 17 will be sufficient to provide an incentive. In most cases I think we are overlooking grade 13 and we should extend the incentive to those who are 18 so that they will be encouraged to continue at school. In my opinion the bill leaves a gap of one year. The incentive provided will carry on to the end of grade 12 but there will be a gap as far as grade 13 is concerned before they enter university where they will be able to get student loans which we hope will be brought before the house and passed.

These things are very essential in the life of our country, and no one can doubt that Canadians are adaptable when it comes to acquiring these trades and skills. No people in the world are more adaptable to education at this time than Canadians, and I have proven this through experience.

I should like to point out to the minister that there is no point in getting impatient about a debate of this kind and if she will possess herself in patience the bill will go through much sooner. If she will also restrain the hatchet man in the cabinet, who makes a speech and then walks out and leaves her holding the bag, she will be able to get the bill passed much sooner.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to make a few remarks on Bill No. C-108 now before us.

I very much approve of a legislation providing an allowance for our young people, not because it is particularly generous, but because it recognizes a principle which we, in this corner of the house, have advocated for a long time. Thus, the government admits the necessity and urgency of enabling our young people to attend school where they will get the necessary education to get on in life.

Yet, we have to realize that this legislation is but a faltering step towards education. The old line political parties have accustomed us to expect a somewhat reluctant step by step advance with regard to social legislation, though, of course, when there was a question of taxing the Canadian people they came running forth with giant steps. Yet, it must be admitted that this piece of legislation will make things easier for the young people and their parents who have to provide for their children, and it will increase opportunities for education.

However, as everybody knows and as several members stated tonight in this house, Canadians expect much more from the government with regard to the education of our young people. Today, when for the past ten years at least, we have been through a period of unemployment on a more or less catastrophical scale, our industries can clearly get along without our young people, thus enabling them to get a more thorough education according to their capacities and wishes in order to help them face a rapidly setting in automation. In this country, under our system, machinery is gradually playing a more important role and therefore employees, workers, the people operating those machines will have to have wider knowledge and increased ability in order to make them as efficient as possible and control them instead of being controlled by them.

This legislation to assist young people may make this a little easier, and that is what we want. However, we, on this side of the house—and I have personally asked for it time and time again—would have rather liked a more generous legislation enabling the parents to keep their children longer in school without depriving the other children in the family.

Considering the cost of education today and what it will be tomorrow, it is obvious that $10 a month is far from being enough; but I hope that this first step will enable the government to realize, through experience, that families need more money. This assistance to students, which I will call a salary, should be given as long as they are continuing their studies and should not stop at 18 years of age, as now provided by the act. We know that young people have to go to school longer than that to obtain the necessary education to face life's responsibilities.

Therefore, I would ask the government to consider the possibility of paying this salary as long as our young boys and girls are continuing their studies, and I suggest that this assistance should not be financed by new taxes on loans bearing interest, as will likely be the case for this legislation, because I say that the fact of permitting our youth to attend school for a longer period of time should not in any way deprive the remainder of the citizens of this country of their right to work.

Now, I believe that it is ridiculous and abnormal to compel bachelors and spinsters, or fathers and mothers after they have raised their family, to pay for the education of other people's children.

This is not logical, and the government should find another way to finance this salary to students without levying any new taxes or taking money where there is not enough right now, or without borrowing money bearing interest. The government should rather look to the Bank of Canada to find the money needed to finance this project.

Then I think that all Canadians would be satisfied to have legislation that would actually assist our youth and lead them towards a better future.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): There is one question upon which I should like clarification from the minister, and that deals with the particular case of students who are attending an institution at the present time. This may apply to other provinces as well, but I do know it does apply in the province of Alberta. If there is a child attending an institution as a ward of a public authority, that institution or authority will accumulate the normal allowance payable in respect of that child until the child leaves school. The child is entitled to draw upon this fund, under supervision, a certain amount every month for his own particular benefit because, after all, family allowances were designed for the furtherance of education and the benefit of the child.

In this particular instance the $10 allowance is made for the same purpose. While the act does speak of the parent being the person to whom the payment is made, the French version is a little different because it uses the words "père ou mère". Unless there is some explanation in the regulations that "père ou mère" may also be replaced by a person standing in loco parentis, that is the child as the ward of a public authority, I should like to know from the minister whether the $10 will be payable to some public authority or to the institution on behalf of the child. I hope the minister is making a note of this particular point.

I know there have been difficulties in the past with regard to institutions accumulating these funds, placing them in deposit accounts and drawing the interest. This was a practice that existed in the past, and I hope it has been discontinued in so far as the earning of interest is concerned, because this money does not belong to the institution or the substitute parent. I do not want to discuss a particular clause, but there seems to be an exemption for the institution as defined in the regulation. There may be a logical explanation for all this and the minister, in her reply, may be able to clarify this particular point. The act should provide for the payment to the child age 16 to 18 without parents, either by reason of being an abandoned child or an orphan and who is under public care because that child is entitled to the same benefits as any other child under more fortunate circumstances. With that reservation or that question, I will await the minister's explanation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question? If the minister speaks now, she will close the debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take just a few minutes to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) why, instead of introducing a bill, she did not move an amendment to the existing Family Allowances Act, under which the government would pay a $10 monthly allowance to children in the 16 to 18 year old group?

To my mind, this would have been much simpler than to introduce new legislation; it would have been much simpler to move a few amendments to the existing legislation.

I should like the Minister of National Health and Welfare to give us the reasons why, instead of proposing one or two amendments to the existing legislation, she preferred introducing an entirely new piece of legislation to provide for the monthly $10 allowance.

That is the only question I wished to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Lambert: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. With the greatest respect, the seconder is not present in the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: My understanding is that a minister does not have to be in the house if he was in the house when the motion was moved previously.

Mr. Grafftey: Is the hon. lady not going to close the debate?

Miss LaMarsh: I thought it might be more pertinent if I answered individual questions on the particular sections of the bill when we are in committee, since reference has been made to certain sections. I thought the debate would flow a little more evenly if I answered those questions in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Monteith: I think the minister intimated this afternoon that it was going to cost approximately $27 million to March 31 next if this were enforced by September 1. Was that with any payment to Quebec or without?

I realize this is going to take quite a deal of mechanical administration. Does the minister envisage any increase in the present staff? I realize a lot of new applications will have to be dealt with during the intervening period if, as was mentioned earlier, this becomes operative by September 1.

I would like some clarification of the actual cost. There must be some figures available regarding the amount of payment to Quebec. I understand the Quebec legislature has agreed to increase its applicable period from 10 months of the year to 12 months, in order to coincide with the federal legislation, and I would like to have some estimate of the cost for a full year, say from April 1, 1965, to March 31, 1966 when the scheme will be operated on a 12 month basis in Quebec. I would also like an estimate of the total cost during a full year in the rest of Canada.

Miss LaMarsh: As I informed the house, the cost is about $27 million. To be more precise it is $26,250,000 for the remaining seven months of 1964-65. And for the province of Quebec for the same period it would be $9 million. For a full 12 month period, 1965 to 1966, it will be $16 million. In other words it is a total for all of Canada of $35,250,000 for seven months and $61 million for a full 12 month period.

My hon. friend suggested earlier that the scheme should include the 18 year olds. The reason for ceasing the allowance at the age of 18 is that in some provinces this is the age at which young people begin to vote and take responsibility as adults. It will be appreciated that each year adds a cost of roughly $30 million.

With respect to the question posed by my honourable predecessor, and others, as to the number of individuals who might be required to administer this legislation, it was suggested that a whole new staff would be required, but the existing division of family allowances and old age security is expected to administer the program through its 10 regional offices. This is a program that does not apply to everyone. It is one the application of which is for those who find themselves qualified, and the estimate of additional staff required is 75 to 100 employees who will be spread across the country.

Mr. Grafftey: I have already made known my opinion to the minister that the best way of proceeding would be simply to extend the provisions of the Family Allowances Act and then subsequently taxation arrangements could be made, specifically with the province of Quebec. Was this method of procedure considered, and at what point did the minister and the government decide to proceed in the manner in which we are proceeding now, introducing this type of bill and then having the Minister of Finance introduce changes as outlined under resolution 61 on the order paper?

This afternoon I also mentioned that in my opinion the only time when family allowances in respect of children could not be paid was when children are not at school and they should be at school. I understand there are some very detailed residential requirements and I would like the minister to answer these two queries.

Miss LaMarsh: My hon. friend and other hon. members have suggested amendments to the Family Allowances Act, but I would draw to the attention of the committee that there are a number of substantial differences between the matters dealt with by the family allowances legislation and this legislation. It should be borne in mind that the family allowances legislation is available to every child resident in Canada up to age 16. This is not the case with youth allowances. These are available to a restricted group of people, many of whom are not compulsorily required to attend school. As I have pointed out the school leaving ages are 14, 15 and 16 years for the various provinces. Furthermore, a number of these people are already employed and do not qualify.

In addition we have dealt in this legislation with the payment of allowances for the summer months. If members of the committee will think about the problem for a few minutes they will realize there is considerably more involved than the matter of paying family allowances by simply continuing those allowances to the higher age groups. Schools, at least in the provinces with which I am familiar, normally operate until some time in the month of June. Universities may close in April or May. In other provinces other months are occupied. This is legislation which we hope, through the 10 regional offices, will be operated in an identical way regardless of what the school year may be. Remember that under the regulations schools and universities will encompass very different kinds of institutions.

Therefore in order to satisfy the Auditor General that parliament's wishes are met in the way the legislation is administered, it will be necessary to delay the payment of summer benefits until the fall when it is established that the young persons have returned to school, and at that stage they will catch up with the summer payments. In some cases with those who leave early in the spring, payments will continue, provided it is not the year in which they are expected to graduate.

Earlier my hon. friend suggested that family allowances were universal in application except for the restriction of the residential qualification. This is true, but rather an important qualification; and then of course there is the condition that the child stays on in school. But the two types of legislation, family allowances and youth allowances, are different in purpose to some degree, and very different in application. However it will be noticed by members of the committee that in drawing the legislation the draftsmen have tried—with the experience of family allowances, which is now 13 or 14 years old—to adopt the phraseology, and benefit from the experience which has already been obtained under family allowances legislation.

It will be noted that we are able to provide for an individual who applies late, possibly because he or she has not heard about these benefits. They can obtain back payments for a period. That is not permitted under the legislation governing family allowances as it now stands. We have gone further here because we believe it might well be possible that individual parents would not be aware they were entitled to these benefits, and we feel they should not lose them in the circumstances.

Perhaps I could answer on clause 1 some of the other questions which have been asked. The hon. member for Ontario suggested there was a gap existing under this legislation and that students were not covered between the time they left grade 12 and the time they entered university, at which time it is expected that they, the students, will be able to apply for and obtain university loans under forthcoming legislation. In my opinion the hon. member is speaking of Ontario when he talks about grades 12 and 13. It should be borne in mind that in many provinces a child is 17 when he or she completes the first year in university. So in fact there is no gap. This is simply an age limit. It has no reference to attendance at a university or a school.

Mr. Starr: Would the minister not think it advisable to take care of the situation in provinces such as Ontario which do have these particular levels in their schools? Does she not think there should be a provision somewhere in the bill to apply exclusively to those provinces where high schools have a grade 13?

Miss LaMarsh: I would not want the hon. member to draw the erroneous conclusion that students up to the age of 18 in Ontario cannot fully comply. Whether they are in schools or universities they are entitled to this benefit. The hon. gentleman earlier seemed to equate entering a university with the end of the period for which this allowance is permitted. If in fact a child enters university at 16 or 17 he or she would of course continue to be eligible until the age of 18.

Mr. Starr: If there are eight grades in a public school and a child begins school at the age of six he would normally graduate at the age of 13 to high school. Then there are five years to be spent in high school, which takes him to the end of his eighteenth year. It is at this point he would normally enter university.

Miss LaMarsh: It by no means follows. I graduated from high school at the age of 17.

Mr. Starr: I am not as bright as the minister is, but certainly—

Mr. Lambert: On this very point, I would draw to the hon. lady's attention the fact that today many children transfer from schools in one province to schools in another. For example one of my sons came from Alberta where there is a 12 year pattern to a province where there is a 13 year pattern and whether he is as bright as the hon. lady or not, the years are against him and he will be 19 by the time he graduates. I am not necessarily worried about the $10 but I am thinking of the principle involved. An automatic cut-off is imposed by this legislation. Some students will be attending high school, either in grade 13 or in order to repeat grade 12. Let us not say this legislation is covering all high school students, because that is not the case.

I wish to raise another point having to do with students attending Collège Militaire Royal either from the maritime provinces or in Quebec and Ontario—those who enter the junior matriculation pattern. One might expect that they would attend school at a younger age. They will be educated to junior matriculation level entirely at public expense, save perhaps for 15 per cent who may enter at the expense of their own parents. Is collège militaire to be an excepted institution? I ask this because it appears somewhat odd that a $10 allowance should be made available on behalf of a student who in any event, is entirely supported by the federal government.

Miss LaMarsh: The two hon. members who have just spoken have been discussing the differences between education systems in the various provinces. It is for this very reason that an age cut-off date has been chosen. It has been done in order to smooth out the differences which exist across the country. The bill does not propose taking any child to a specific level of education, only to a specific age, namely the eighteenth birthday.

With respect to the point raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West, the legislation indicates that the parent who maintains a child—perhaps I should say the individual who receives the amount—shall include, as far as the bill is concerned, an agency or corporate body such as a child placing agency or children's aid society. However the regulations will exclude the institutions themselves. In other words, if a child is maintained by an institution the institution will not be in receipt of these allowances, but if a child is placed in an institution and maintained by an agency or an actual person the allowance will be paid. I am informed that the definition in the regulations will be:

An orphanage, a children's home, a shelter, refuge or other building, not being a private residence or building, in which children are cared for apart from their parents.

Those are the institutions which will be excluded.

As to the situation in collèges militaires, I am informed that such colleges will not be excepted. They will be included in the definition as schools or universities, so any child in a college which falls into this category will have the benefit of the allowance if maintained by the parents, not if maintained by the state.

Mr. Starr: In view of what the minister has said about the efforts of the government and officials to smooth things out, as she put it, perhaps I may be allowed to wonder how much smoothing out will be achieved, because in Ontario a normal child of average intelligence usually does not graduate until he or she reaches the age of 19, or at least after reaching the age of 18. In these circumstances I wonder whether the minister would not consider making at least one concession to Ontario by extending these provisions to the end of the eighteenth year so as to provide an incentive to school attendance until education is complete. I say this because completing grade 12 in certain instances does not amount to a complete education. I understand that children cannot enter some of our universities if they have not completed their year in grade 13. Why not extend this age limit, and by so doing make at least one concession in this session of parliament to the province of Ontario?

Miss LaMarsh: Perhaps I might continue to answer some of the questions which have been asked. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin has I think been answered. The hon. member for Yukon raised a point which caused me some concern. He asked whether the provinces, as referred to in clause 2, are defined widely enough to include the territories. It is understandable that the hon. member should call attention to the needs of his particular constituency and I have consulted the law officers of the department who inform me that the Interpretation Act defines "provinces" sufficiently widely as to include both the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. So no such worry need agitate the hon. gentleman. Further, Mr. Chairman, the fact that there is no university, college or institution of higher learning of that type within the two territories does not, of course, mean anything with respect to this legislation, in that individual children who attend such institutions elsewhere are still covered and will be receiving this allowance.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I have just one brief question to follow up that point. It is the only question I will have this evening for the minister. Many students in the Yukon attend the University of Alaska because it is less expensive. Would the provision be applicable to those students attending an institution in the United States?

Miss LaMarsh: Considerable attention was given to this question because, as is known, Canada does not provide a full range of university or scholastic education, even taking into consideration all ten provinces. All trades and professions are not covered by our universities. For that reason the legislation is drawn as meaning, and will be interpreted to include, any child within the age limit taking any such education anywhere, so long as that child's parent is resident in Canada.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the minister about this question of the effective date. This afternoon she mentioned that she hoped the bill would be passed in time for the effective date of this legislation to be September 1, 1964. She realizes, I am sure, that it is now July 7, and even if this bill passes this house it must go to the other place and must then receive royal assent. In addition there are a number of other procedures that it must go through before it is law. The minister will realize, I am sure, that in going through all these procedures probably most of July will have gone before the bill becomes an act and part of the statutes of Canada. Therefore I want to ask her about the retroactive part of the bill, upon which she touched very briefly.

I am sure she realizes that in the next 30 or 40 days, which is all that is left between the time this bill will become law and September 1, a great many people will be away on holidays. There is also the matter of giving this problem sufficient publicity so that the parents of children in this age group will know about it. Then there is the problem of distributing application forms; and I am sure that in any new departure of this kind there will be some administrative problems, particularly in informing the public as to where to apply, how to apply, and so on. In addition there may even be a number of problems respecting proof of age for some of these young people, particularly if they are new Canadians from some other country and do not have their birth certificates. And there are all the other inherent problems in embarking upon a new program.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would explain a little more fully what she meant by retroactive in this connection. Further, is there going to be a protracted date, if I may call it that, to perhaps November 1 or even December? That is to say, with respect to all applications that are received and approved by November or December with regard to these young people, will there be retroactive payments to September 1? The minister touched briefly on this question in her remarks, and I am wondering whether she can tell us how much time will be allowed for these retroactive payments. Perhaps she will also say whether there will be some special regulations or circumstances taken into account to get this program started, in view of the short time remaining between now and the beginning of the school year.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, hon. members will be interested in the type of thing that has to be done in the time left between the passage of this legislation and the making of the first payment. All this of course is conditional upon passage by both houses, and royal assent. In addition to regulations having been drafted, a notice has been prepared which, subject to the passage of this legislation by parliament, will be mailed out to all parents who have children who will qualify either in August or September in particular. The names of these individuals come to us from our family allowance records, and hon. members will realize that we will have the lists of those moving into this age bracket. This is a bilingual notice and it will be sent out to all such parents. It will give the details of this program. This notice, or letter, will be mailed with the August cheques. In addition there will be sent a bilingual application form which any parent who believes that his or her child qualifies under the definitions in the act will be asked to complete and return. There will be enclosed a self-addressed envelope which will be addressed to the nearest regional director, in which the completed application should be enclosed. That will be done in August, presupposing the passage of this legislation and royal assent.

This will enable payments to begin in the month of September. When I told the committee that 12 months are being allowed to pick up past payments which are due, I meant that this will be done without fetters of any kind. If individuals are absent from the country or have not heard of the legislation, they will be able to go to August of 1965, make their application, and still collect the payment for 12 months back, for each month that the child qualifies. Therefore if someone misses noticing this legislation in August—though this is hardly likely, because they will receive their cheque and read about this legislation then—and does not apply, for instance in September, October or November, the child will lose no benefit whatsoever, provided the parent or individual who maintains the child makes application at a subsequent time. In that event we will date the payments back to the date on which the child qualified; that is to say, up to September 1, 1964. Therefore the child should not in any way lose any benefit.

Although this is a new and rather complicated piece of legislation in that it is selective in its application to those who may qualify, we have allowed 12 months to catch up on any tag ends or on anyone who may not have heard of the legislation. In addition, Mr. Chairman, there will be a rather substantial publicity campaign, so that everybody should know about this program.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister will catch a very large number of these cases by the process she has outlined with regard to the sending out of application forms with the August cheques. But there will be some young people who will of necessity be missed. I refer to young people who are now 17, or are just coming to their 17th birthday and have been off family allowance for eight, ten or more months.

Where will application forms be available? Will they be available in the post offices? It seems to me there would be some value in having some publicity go out saying that application forms may be secured at the post office or some other prearranged place of that sort, so that parents could obtain these application forms at an early date.

Miss LaMarsh: This information is already available, as hon. members will appreciate, in the department because they keep records in the family allowance division of each child as he or she comes of age and ceases to draw family allowance. I am informed by the director that there will be a direct mailing to the parent of each of these children who have already passed the age of 16, and they will be informed of this program themselves. Obviously there will be some who have left the country, who perhaps have died, or have moved and we do not know of the changed circumstances. I am informed that at the moment it is intended that the regional offices will hold these application forms, in the way that many of them now hold old age pension application forms.

If it becomes obvious that a large number of people are writing for these forms, then of course we will make them available in public buildings, as has been suggested. But we will have a very large publicity campaign and hope to bring this program to the attention of everyone interested. In addition, Mr. Chairman, this is a rather popular measure, I suggest to members of the committee, and one which is likely to be talked about quite often by the body politic.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, could I ask the minister what provision there will be for young people whose 18th birthday comes in the middle of the school year. Will this allowance continue to the end of the school year, irrespective of the fact that they may have already had their 18th birthday?

Miss LaMarsh: These students will be very much in the position of those of us who went to university under the veterans charter. When they reach the age of 18, that will be the last month in which they will receive a cheque.

Mr. Douglas: One other question. I understood the minister to give the committee earlier the amount of money which would be paid to reimburse the province of Quebec by virtue of the fact that it is carrying on its own program. On what basis will these amounts be paid? Will it be the exact amount which the province of Quebec has paid out in youth allowances each fiscal year? In view of the fact that the amount and the basis on which the payments will be made will be identical in Quebec and in the rest of Canada, it seems to me this would be the simplest way of doing it.

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Chairman, my colleague has asked me to answer that. The payments will be exactly the same. The province of Quebec will be reimbursed for the amount they pay out in this way.

Mr. Douglas: They will simply submit the amount they have paid out quarterly, or semi-annually, or on some basis, and the federal government will reimburse them for the exact amount paid out?

Mr. Gordon: I should say that the basis of compensation will be proposed in the federal-provincial fiscal relations revision legislation which is the next item on the agenda, and I would ask permission to explain the basis at that time. But essentially what the hon. member has said is correct.

Mr. Douglas: Then that is quite satisfactory.

Mr. Weichel: Mr. Chairman, I am thinking along the same lines as the hon. member for Edmonton West and the hon. member for Ontario with regard to changing this bill so as to cover children until the end of their 18th birthday. If I may give my reasons for saying this, students in grade 13 can be 18 or 19 years of age and will not be covered at the present time. My thought here is that in many cases we find children taking two years to go through grade 13 and probably they will reach 19 years of age in so doing. Therefore I would ask that that matter be taken into consideration.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance just stated that the next order of business is the federal-provincial fiscal revision item, and I am hoping that nothing which is said on this bill will be ruled out of order when we get to that particular resolution. In other words, nothing said now will preclude us from arguing our point at that time, if there is anything to argue. After all, the minister did undertake to present all these pieces of legislation together.

Mr. Gordon: I am sure that would be satisfactory, if there is anything to argue when we come to the next piece of legislation.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, there is a question I want to ask which relates to an answer given by the minister. She said she was informed by the director that they would search the files in the family allowances division and mail to each child in the records an application form if they had passed their 16th birthday. If that is correct, there must obviously be a number of parents—I am not going to suggest how many—who will not be receiving any family allowance cheque for the month of August and yet have a child or children between the ages of 16 and 18.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, this is going to be a separate mailing. There may be a feeling that there is a big daddy looking after them every year and paying them a family allowance based on a list some place, but nevertheless a list has already been compiled and their parents will shortly receive a letter notwithstanding the fact they are not receiving a cheque. There will be a separate mailing during the month of August to advise them of this.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the remarks of the minister with respect to notification to those who have been drawing family allowances. I have found in light of previous experience regarding agricultural or veterans legislation that in the smaller places it is often the case that people fail to realize they can take advantage of certain legislation designed to meet certain circumstances. Would the minister give consideration to seeking the co-operation of women's groups throughout the country, particularly with respect to smaller communities? I am thinking of the provincial headquarters of women's institutes, for instance. If they were informed of the details of this legislation I am sure they would undertake to notify all their locals, particularly in smaller communities. I have found that sort of co-operation very worthwhile. When I have wanted to get information and publicity I have always found I could depend on women to do this, especially those with children.

Miss LaMarsh: And I hope my hon. friend will depend on this woman to do so.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, with regard to paragraph (c), which defines "dependant youth", under the Family Allowances Act a child must be resident in this country for 12 months before an allowance is paid. Under Department of Citizenship and Immigration legislation an allowance in lieu of family allowance is paid for the first 12 months period to the child of a person or a family landed as an immigrant. Is there any similar provision under this act or the regulations, or under the interpretation of the regulations, whereby this may be done, or do we have to sort of twist the arm of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration in this regard? I ask this question because I admit that under this act the interpretation is "a child resident in this country." Will the child be deemed to be resident from the date of landing as an immigrant?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I am informed that this payment will be available to children who qualify with respect to age and attend school permanently from the date they arrive and become resident in the country. We have already been in touch with the department of immigration so we will have their assistance in advising women parents of the benefits to which their children are entitled so that they can apply forthwith. So far as this act is concerned, we will also have recourse, I understand, to the records of assistance paid by the immigration department in order to seek out children who have not yet qualified for family allowance.

Mr. Monteith: I should like to ask the minister a question in relation to clause 2 (h), which says:

> "province providing schooling allowances" means a province prescribed by a regulation made on the recommendation of the minister for the purposes of this act as a province in which provision is made, pursuant to any law of the province enacted before the coming into force of this act—

Does this mean that while at the moment these particular arrangements can be made with the province of Quebec, any other province is excluded in the future from handling the thing in the same way?

Miss LaMarsh: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I think it is clear from this legislation that it is open to any province up until the time that royal assent is given to this legislation to enact similar legislation. At the moment I know of only one province with similar legislation. While we have no indication that this is likely to happen in any other province, it cannot happen after royal assent is given to this legislation.

Mr. Lambert: In other words, the principle of opting out shall not apply to this act?

Miss LaMarsh: No.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, paragraph (d) says:

> "maintain" means maintains wholly or substantially and "substantially" has such meaning as may be prescribed;

Could the minister inform this committee what is meant by " 'substantially' has such meaning as may be prescribed"? I understand that this will be written into the regulations, but can she inform the committee what is the thinking of the department at this time with regard to the use of the word "substantially"?

Miss LaMarsh: Draft regulations have been prepared and are similar to the family allowance regulations. A parent maintains a dependant youth substantially if the value of the contribution made by the parent in cash or otherwise for the care, maintenance, education or advancement of the youth is $5 or more per month exclusive of the allowance and such value exceeds the value of the contribution for such purpose made by any other person who has applied for the allowance.

Mr. Thomas: There is another question with regard to paragraph (h) of clause 2. Would the minister agree that paragraph (h) provides a special privilege for the province of Quebec for all time to come?

Miss LaMarsh: Only perhaps if no other province takes advantage of it. I do not think it is a special privilege since identical provisions are available to all children of the same age and the same attendance at school anywhere in Canada. I am of the opinion that members of the committee generally are concerned with the benefit which is passed on to our youth and not with such technical matters. It happens that the province of Quebec is the only province that has brought in such legislation. I understand its legislation has been in effect since 1961. It might very well have been any other province and it might well be that the territories or some other province might call together a special meeting of their legislature and enact such legislation. If so, that province will then qualify, of course.

Mr. Olson: I should like to ask the minister if she does not think that the principle she has just enunciated should apply to other acts that her department administers as well?

Miss LaMarsh: We are only dealing in the welfare field at the moment with this particular piece of legislation. However, I have some idea of what my hon. friend is referring to.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I have a question for the minister. I had an inquiry from the parents of a retarded youth who is 17 years of age and is in a school for retarded children. Will the allowance be paid in such cases?

Miss LaMarsh: If the child is maintained by its parent the allowance will be paid.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Will it continue to be paid when the boy reaches 18 years of age or will the allowance stop when he reaches his 18th birthday, as the minister said a few minutes ago?

Miss LaMarsh: As I pointed out on second reading, this allowance stops at age 18 regardless of whether the child would otherwise qualify, but a retarded or disabled child would then be able to apply through the provincial authorities under the shared cost program for a disabled person's allowance which, as the hon. member knows, is considerably larger than $10 per month.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Chairman, under paragraph (i) of clause 2 school or university is defined. What will be the situation with regard to students taking business courses, typing and so on, after they have finished grade 10, let us say, in business schools where such courses are provided? Are such institutions included under the definition in paragraph (i)?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, if the child is in full-time attendance at such a school which will upgrade skills, payment will then be made to the parent. It may be that members of the committee might wish to know the proposed method of dealing with this. The regulations as presently contemplated will exclude by defining "excepted educational institutions" and will not try to include everything in a long list. The suggested phraseology is to this effect: "Excepted educational institution" referred to in paragraph (i) of section 2 of the act means a school, university or educational institution that does not provide training or instruction of an educational, vocational or technical nature to improve the qualifications of dependant youth for employment or a career or for carrying on or engaging in a trade, business, profession or occupation.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister about the definition of the word "parent". As I understand the situation, under the Family Allowances Act the parent is the mother of the child unless there is some reason for payment to the father. Is the definition of "parent" included in this legislation intended to bring about the same result?

Miss LaMarsh: Yes, Mr. Chairman. It is intended that the cheque will be payable to the mother. As a lawyer my hon. friend knows that there are many cases where payment is not made to the mother but to an alternative parent, and exactly the same procedure will be followed under this legislation.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have a question I should like to ask the minister. I am not sure whether her answer covered the question asked by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale. With regard to students taking courses at private schools and institutions where they learn certain technical skills such as typing, office routine and so on, is it the intention of the minister to include business colleges of that type under the definition of "school"?

Miss LaMarsh: Yes. I read the proposed legislation and they are included. The criterion is that attendance be full-time.

Mr. Nesbitt: As long as they are attending full-time?

Miss LaMarsh: Yes.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I think that full-time students only are eligible for family allowances. However, there are many Canadian students in the various provinces attending night classes and taking four years to complete their studies instead of two or three. If those students are attending evening classes it is because, obviously, they cannot afford to follow the regular day course.

Now, when schools or universities giving such evening courses are recognized by the provinces, I wonder if the act could not be amended so as to permit such students to receive family allowances. That would surely encourage students who cannot afford to follow the regular day course to continue and complete their studies. Should the minister take such steps, I believe she would indirectly help such students to improve their education.

I also wonder what amount of money the Canadian government would have to spend annually for that purpose?

[Text]

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, as I pointed out in my remarks on second reading, this legislation is not to cover employed children in the two years with which we are concerned. The purpose is to enable children to stay in school or to go back to school if they have left. My hon. friend is dealing with a young person who is employed during the day and goes to night school and such a person will not qualify. Night schools are not included. This covers full-time attendance in lieu of employment. It is anticipated that the young adults to whom he refers would have to have recourse to legislation already enacted by the Department of Labour.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Monthly allowance.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister, under clause 3, on what date of the month these cheques will be payable?

Miss LaMarsh: I am informed the cheques will be dated the last day of each month.

Mr. Ricard: I should like to ask the minister if the cheques will be issued directly from Ottawa or if they will be handled by the provincial authorities?

Miss LaMarsh: In so far as the provinces to which the legislation, when it receives royal assent, applies the cheques will be sent out from the regional offices. There was some suggestion that I may be able to place my picture and signature on these cheques, but my colleagues decided they would prefer they go out in the normal way without such embellishment.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

On clause 5—How allowance to be applied.

Mr. Monteith: I have a question on this clause. I am assuming that subclause 2(a) means when a person ceases to be a parent as defined by the act and this simply means if they move to Quebec?

Miss LaMarsh: No, when they cease to be a parent means either cease to support the child or cease to be in Canada or in a province to which the act applies.

Mr. Monteith: If they move to Quebec.

Miss LaMarsh: They may move to Europe, the United States or any other place or they may cease to maintain the child, such as a deserted mother, or the mother may die.

Mr. Monteith: Then, subclause 3, can the minister give a brief explanation as to how she expects this responsibility to reflect on the parent in notifying when the allowance ceases to be payable?

Miss LaMarsh: As will be seen in subclause 3 the parent must advise us, so obviously a deceased parent cannot do so. I am informed, however, that we have recourse to the Vital Statistics Act for those who die and such information is checked in the normal manner with regard to family allowances. The same checking procedure would take place. It is anticipated also that on the reverse side of the cheque will appear a warning to the parent, together with a certification where the signature is to be placed for endorsement of the cheque, that the child qualifies. This declaration will, month by month, bring to the attention of the parents that it is an offence to make a false declaration. It may very well be that there will be some few individuals who will be caught in the normal checking procedure, as there are in connection with old age allowances and all other allowances with which my friend had several years experience.

However everything is being done under the regulations and within the act in order to prevent most unfortunate circumstances where, by error, a parent who is no longer qualified continues to receive and cash cheques, and then subsequently the department could come along and ask for repayment.

Mr. Monteith: That is all I am concerned about.

Mr. Cantelon: Then, I take it that clause 5(b) means that the dependant who graduates from high school at 17 years and 8 months will then stop drawing allowance, is that correct?

Miss LaMarsh: Yes, the hon. member is correct, or the child might die or move outside the country or his parents may move outside the country. If the child, let us say, is physically or mentally handicapped, but is suddenly cured and does not go to school or university, he would no longer qualify.

Mr. Cantelon: If three months later he goes to a university, what happens then?

Miss LaMarsh: Provided he has not reached his 18th birthday, he reapplies and is reinstated.

Mr. Cantelon: He would not then get any allowance for the three months between the time he graduates from grade 12 and the time he starts university.

Miss LaMarsh: If this were a break between courses and not an unnatural break then he would be paid for the intervening months. If for instance he stopped in the middle of a year, went to work for a couple of months and then came back, it will be appreciated by members of the committee he would not be reimbursed for the months in which he, himself, broke his education.

Mr. Cantelon: That is not the situation I had in mind. Most of these children would have to wait until they got the results of their grade 12 examinations before they could be sure they would be attending university. There would be no break in their minds, but there may be some question as to whether they were or were not qualified to collect the $10 per month.

Miss LaMarsh: As was pointed out, we have borne this in mind and clause 6 deals with it specifically. The child cannot lose because he can apply for and receive retroactive payments at any time up to a year.

Mr. Cantelon: I have one other comment to make. Members from Ontario have pointed out that children attending grade 13 would not graduate at age 18 and would be unable to continue drawing this allowance. I think it should be understood that there are no provinces in Canada where the average student would graduate at age 17. As I pointed out earlier this evening this can be verified by a little simple arithmetic. Most children start school at age 6 and they go into grade 1 at age 7. If you add 12 grades to age 6, you will find that in grade 12 a student will be 18 years of age. I believe it would cost very little extra money if we were to continue the policy that has been applied so as to stop paying the allowance once the student graduates. The total cost would not be increased by 50 per cent. The increase would be comparatively small—I should not say "comparatively small", but it would not be the 50 per cent which might appear to be at first glance.

Mr. Aiken: My question is based on subclause (1) of clause 5 as it is read in conjunction with clause 12. I should like to ask the minister if she really has any hope whatever of enforcing subclause (1) of clause 5 which provides that the allowance payable to the parent shall be applied exclusively for the care, education or advancement of the child. I can see where there may be some cases in which parents receive allowances and do not use them in the proper manner for the maintenance of the child. I can see where there may be a situation in which the department might want to suspend the allowance or even go so far as to prosecute the parent.

In looking at clause 12, however, which is the penalty section, I find there is no penalty provided for a situation of this kind. Subclause (1) of clause 5 therefore seems to me to be an absolutely useless clause. It is a declaration of intention but it is not enforceable in any way. I wonder what real advantage there is in having it there?

Miss LaMarsh: Yes, Mr. Chairman, this was one of the things that bothered me when I first saw the draft legislation. It will be appreciated that this is an identical provision to that which is in the Family Allowances Act. There has been a wealth of experience in this matter in which it is found there is a miniscule amount which is diverted away from benefit of the child.

It would be extremely rare if in fact a prosecution were contemplated at all. If I may make a personal remark to my hon. friend, there is no doubt this is the reason the amounts are paid to the mother because she would have somewhat more interest in applying the payments for the care and education of the children. Experience has been extremely good with the Family Allowances Act. Canadians appreciate the purpose of this legislation and act within the law accordingly.

Mr. Aiken: Is there anything in the remaining clauses or regulations which would permit the department to take any action whatever, if it found this was not being followed? Can the allowance be suspended in a case where the parent is not using the money for the purpose intended?

Miss LaMarsh: Yes. It is not contemplated there would be a prosecution, but the same kind of practice would be followed as in family allowances, that is, an alternative payee would be named so that a responsible person would see that the money went for the care and education of the child.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister satisfy a legitimate curiosity about one aspect of the wording of this bill. I have before me a French version of the bill and with a certain amount of interest I have been comparing it with the English version. I notice in every place where the words "a parent" appear in the English version the words in French are "un père ou une mère". Is this just a refinement in translation or is there some legal distinction? I will be very curious as to what French Hansard will be doing tomorrow. The minister has used the phrase "a parent" quite often and I wonder what translation will be given to this in Hansard.

Miss LaMarsh: I am informed that while there is a "parent" in French the "père ou mère" which appears in brackets as one word is intended to carry the same definition, that it is intended to include an actual mother or father, as a literal definition would be, or anyone who stands in loco parentis.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 7—Allowance not subject to taxation or to be assigned or given as security.

Mr. Rapp: The allowance is not subject to taxation, but are parents allowed to get this exemption of $550, or what they are getting for other students?

Miss LaMarsh: The parent is entitled to this $550 exemption.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 9—Appeals.

Mr. Herridge: With respect to subclause (2) would the minister explain what the government has in mind in stating that:

> The provisions of the Family Allowances Act and the regulations thereunder with respect to appeals under that act apply mutatis mutandis with respect to appeals under this act.

Are they going to use the same authorities, procedures and persons?

Miss LaMarsh: I am informed that appeals are very rare in the Family Allowances Act but, where required, particular boards are set up. I cannot say necessarily they will be the same personnel but the identical procedure will be followed. I am sure my hon. friend knows mutatis mutandis means to apply it as though they were exactly one act.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 10—Regulations.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I should just like to stress one point in this connection. When section 4 dealing with application for allowances was carried a few minutes ago, I was not in the house, unfortunately, because I had to attend a meeting elsewhere.

Could I come back to that point at this stage, that is during consideration of section 10, because I should like to get some information from the minister?

If a father or a mother who is entitled to the allowances fails to submit an application on time because he or she has forgotten or because he or she is not familiar with this legislation, would the minister be empowered to authorize the payment of the allowance to which such a person would be entitled even if the application has not been submitted on time?

[Text]

Miss LaMarsh: Yes, as I have explained a number of times it is not discretionary under the act. The parent has a right to go back up to 12 months, so that there is no loss.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, to make sure about the answer just given by the minister, should the father or mother forget to make application and if the child had reached the age of 16 ten months before, could the father or mother then receive the allowances for those ten months? Is that correct according to the answer given by the minister?

Miss LaMarsh: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

[Text]

Mr. Barnett: Could the minister clarify what the thinking is in respect to the regulations under paragraph (e) which sets out the definition of residence in Canada, particularly as to the kind of absences that will be allowed so that continuity of residence will not be interrupted?

Miss LaMarsh: The definition which is presently contemplated is that a parent is resident in a province of Canada, other than a prescribed province, if he is normally physically present and is living and making his home in that province, and intervals of absence therefrom that are of a temporary nature and not associated with residence outside Canada shall be deemed not to interrupt the continuity of that residence. The purpose is that those who go away from our shores on a permanent basis will not be qualified, but if someone goes away temporarily on a job or for a visit he will not be disqualified.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, with all those regulations, I wonder if the minister could not also include one instructing the officials responsible for the administration of the Family Allowances Act that, three months before the end of family allowances prior to the age of 16, a notice should be attached to the cheque to remind parents that application must be made if they want to benefit from the new legislation?

[Text]

Miss LaMarsh: When every child who is in receipt of family allowance reaches the age of 16 an application form will be sent out, so that we are not concerned, as the act goes into operation, that we will be losing anybody at all. As the whole program goes into effect and continues over the years it will be as well known as are family allowances, and people will automatically apply for these allowances.

It seems that some difficulty has arisen due to a difference in meaning of the word "parents" in the French and English languages. I hesitate to accept responsibility for what I am about to say—I have not asked the Minister of Justice about it—but in the opinion of a fluently bilingual member of this committee the term "parent" in French includes all blood relations such as uncles and cousins, whereas in English of course it is restricted to the mother and the father. I am now informed that this is correct.

Mr. Starr: Would any applicant for these allowances from the province of Quebec have to comply with the terms of this bill or the regulations made under them?

Miss LaMarsh: No.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 11—Authority to enter into arrangements.

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: It might be better for me to speak French.

May I ask the Minister of Justice whether in clause 11, paragraph (a), in the French version, instead of the word "quelque", we should not use the word "tout" to translate the word "any", so that the paragraph would read: "Conclure avec 'tout' ministère", instead of "avec 'quelque' ministère".

Mr. Favreau: I do not think that it would make much difference because, in my opinion, the word "quelque" is rather interchangeable.

Clauses 12 and 13 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Mr. Monteith: Before the title carries I should like to ask the minister or the leader of the house a question. The committee has co-operated today in getting the resolution through the committee stage, the government having indicated that it was completely necessary that this should be done so as to proceed with the other stages required. Could the leader of the house tell us whether any arrangements have been made for the Senate to return prior to July 20—I understand they have adjourned until that date—in order that this legislation may pass through the Senate and receive the royal assent?

Mr. Favreau: The Senate has apparently been advised that they may be recalled at any appropriate time in order to deal with any legislation which may have to be dealt with.

Mr. Monteith: And is it proposed that they shall be recalled?

Mr. Favreau: Yes.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Miss LaMarsh moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PROVISION FOR REVISION OF FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND TAXATION PROVISIONS

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the revision of certain fiscal arrangements with the provinces and to provide adjustments of fiscal arrangements and taxation provisions consequential upon the provision of youth allowances to parents resident in certain provinces.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

Mr. Gordon: No one should be misled by the apparently simple wording of the resolution. This is a very complicated matter and I think it might be helpful if I were to make a fairly extended explanation of what is proposed, as the bill, if the resolution passes, will cover a number of subjects and I should like to be certain that all members of the committee appreciate its complexities.

In the past year or so the amount of federal-provincial consultation has been increased very considerably. I think it is fair to say that the federal government has demonstrated its willingness to deal in a practical way with some of the urgent financial problems of the provinces.

Mr. Starr: Cut out the politics, Walter.

Mr. Gordon: I had to have some sort of introduction.

We have had two federal-provincial conferences which have dealt with a range of matters including the important question of tax-sharing and there have been a number of other conferences which have dealt with specific subjects such as the municipal development and loan fund and the Canada pension plan. As a result of these consultations and our consideration of the financial problems of the provinces the government has come to the conclusion that the fiscal relationship with the provinces was in need of modification before the expiry of the present arrangements on March 31, 1967. Accordingly we made certain proposals to the provinces at the conclusion of the conference which was held on November 26-27 1963 and again following the conclusion of the conference in Quebec city held from March 31 to April 2, 1964. These proposals will be dealt with in the bill which will be presented in due course.

The fiscal proposals presented to the federal-provincial conference last November involved a change in the basis of equalization and also an increase in the share of the estate tax for the provinces, both to take effect for the fiscal year 1964-65. I think I might read two or three paragraphs from the statement which was issued by the Prime Minister at the conclusion of that conference because they summarize what was agreed to there as concisely as I think could be done. I quote:

On balance, therefore, we have concluded that the most acceptable solution is to restore the basis of equalization which was established in 1956 but subsequently altered. That is to say, equalization will be paid up to the average yield of the standard taxes in the top two provinces.

The other main point under discussion yesterday was the treatment of revenues from natural resources. The balance of the discussion seems to us to be that such revenues should be taken partially into account. The best practical way to do this is, we have concluded, to adjust the equalization which would be payable, to any province having natural resource revenue above the national average, by deducting an amount arrived at as follows: one half of the extent by which the natural resource revenue per capita exceeds the national average, multiplied by the population of the province.

It is estimated that the additional equalization payments under this formula will amount next year to about $55 million.

We also propose one further change in fiscal arrangements for the coming year. The abatement of federal succession duties, which has remained unchanged at 50 per cent since its inception, will be increased to 75 per cent though this increase will not be taken into account in calculating equalization. The cost to the federal treasury of this change is estimated at $32 million.

As noted in the Prime Minister's statement, the proposal is to return to the basis of equalization established in 1956; that is, to equalize the per capita return of the standard taxes in all provinces up to the level of the average per capita return in the two provinces having the highest yield. This equalization to the top two provinces is to replace the present system of equalization based on the national average.

Mr. Chairman, perhaps it would be useful if I illustrated the actual difference, in per capita terms, between the national average yield of standard taxes and the yield in the top two provinces. For the current year 1964-65, at the present rates of standard taxes—that is, 18, 9, 50—the estimated national average yield is $42.61 per capita, whereas the average yield in the top two provinces, Ontario and British Columbia, is estimated at $54.92 per capita. It can be seen, therefore, that setting aside the effect of the national resource component of the equalization formula, raising a province's yield to the level of the top two, rather than to the national average, means an additional $12.31 per capita. I think it is hardly necessary to say that this matter of equalization is of fundamental importance in the fiscal arrangements between the federal and provincial governments, because the poorer provinces depend to a considerable extent upon some such system of fiscal adjustments to enable them to supply the services for which they are responsible under the constitution. If the equalization system is inadequate, the poorer provinces will be unduly burdened in their attempt to maintain reasonable standards in the public services for which they are responsible; and if they fail to maintain a reasonable standard of essential services, the national interest is affected.

Having said that, I should add that the argument for the equalization of the standard taxes to the level of the top two provinces does not rest on grounds of fairness or broad national interest alone. The provincial origins of the incomes and accumulations of wealth upon which income tax and estate tax yields depend are often widespread and are rarely known with accuracy. This in itself would, I suggest, support the view that some portion of their yield ought to be equalized among the various provinces. But while we believe that equalization of the standard income and estate taxes to the level of the yield in the top two provinces is of vital importance in the maintenance of a healthy federal system, we recognize that other factors have a significant effect on fiscal capacity, and in particular we recognize that there are wide variations in provincial natural resources revenue.

For example, for the year 1961-62 the average natural resources revenue per capita ranges from a low of 15 cents per capita in Prince Edward Island to a high of $94.03 per capita in Alberta. For the other provinces it is as follows: Newfoundland, $3.04; Nova Scotia, $1.84; New Brunswick, $6.52; Quebec, $6.62; Ontario, $6.91; Manitoba, $4.50; Saskatchewan, $22.57; and British Columbia, $37.72. Accordingly, while we believe in an equalization formula which will raise the level of the standard taxes up to the level of the top two provinces, we also believe that the need for equalization is reduced in provinces that receive natural resources revenue above the national average. That is why the equalization formula which was proposed to the provinces and is now to be recommended to parliament will include a deduction for natural resources revenue in excess of the national average. This deduction will be equal to one half of the per capita amount by which the three year average of a province's natural resources revenue exceeds the per capita national average natural resources revenue, multiplied by the population of that province.

Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend suggested that if I made this statement tonight he might have a chance to read it, and I agreed with him earlier that this was a highly complex calculation. At the present time this deduction would affect the provinces of Alberta, British Columbia and Saskatchewan, all of which have natural resources revenues in excess of the national average.

Mr. Chairman, I have just finished a brief description of one item that will be included under the resolution and will be provided for in the bill. There are a number of other items that I should like to explain to the committee, but perhaps rather than start on any others tonight we might agree to call it 10.30.

Mr. Lambert: How long will the minister be?

Mr. Gordon: I will be another 15 to 20 minutes.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, in the light of the statement by the minister and the complexity of this matter, certainly we of the official opposition would be prepared to hear him out, because we would like to have this statement to read; then we could discuss the matter more intelligently tomorrow. As one can readily understand, members will be taking down brief notes at this time in order to speak to this matter later, and we will not be able to give it the careful consideration it deserves.

Mr. McIntosh: What about the questions that were referred to this time of day, Mr. Chairman? Will they continue afterwards?

The Chairman: Yes. The rules provide that the questions can be dealt with after this.

Mr. Knowles: I believe there is only one question in the overtime period, Mr. Chairman, so we agree to go on with this statement.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, we agree that it would be useful to have the minister complete his statement. It will then be printed and we can study it before convening tomorrow.

Mr. Grégoire: Agreed.

Mr. Gordon: I think we probably all agree, Mr. Chairman, that this a good thing to do. I will read this as fast as I can.

The statement made by the Prime Minister at the November conference also included the proposal to raise the provincial share of the estate tax from 50 per cent to 75 per cent. The Estate Tax Act was subsequently amended to make an abatement of 75 per cent available to provinces levying their own succession duties. At the present time, British Columbia is the only province in which the 75 per cent abatement from the federal rate is in effect. For the current year, the rate of abatement in effect in Ontario and Quebec is 50 per cent. It is proposed that these two provinces receive an additional 25 per cent of the estate tax in the form of a payment from the federal government. This arrangement was preferred in Ontario and Quebec pending the findings of their tax commissions. The other seven provinces now receive 50 per cent of the yield of the federal estate tax in the form of a payment from the federal government and it is proposed that they receive an additional payment equal to 25 per cent of the federal estate tax.

We made it clear at the November conference that we recognized the increasing burden falling on the provinces because of the rising cost of providing high priority services such as education, and we agreed to do something immediately to ease these burdens. It was understood that a further careful examination of the whole problem would be made with a view to seeing if an adjustment of more substantial kind should be attempted for the next fiscal arrangements period commencing April 1, 1967. However, following further consideration growing out of the discussions at the federal-provincial conference in Quebec city, March 31 to April 2, it was decided that in recognition of the increasing financial needs of the provinces, we should not wait until 1967 before making additional financial resources available to them.

The result of this further consideration was a decision to recommend to parliament that the rate of abatement of the federal individual income tax be increased by an additional two percentage points in the taxation year 1965 and by an additional four percentage points in 1966 above the level which would have prevailed under the existing legislation. The additional abatements have already been provided for by amendment of section 33 of the Income Tax Act as a result of Bill No. C-91 which received royal assent on June 18. It remains to make the parallel amendment to the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act so that the standard individual income tax rates will be the same as the rates of abatement. This is necessary so that the level of equalization will be brought into line with the level of the standard abatement. Under the existing legislation—that is, under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act —the standard individual income tax rises by one percentage point in each of the five years of the agreement period. The standard tax was 16 per cent of the gross federal tax for the taxation year 1962, 17 per cent for the taxation year 1963, 18 per cent for the current taxation year 1964, would rise to 19 per cent for 1965 and to 20 per cent in 1966, the final year of the present period. Under the proposed legislation the standard tax will be 21 per cent for the taxation year 1965, rather than 19, and 24 per cent for the taxation year 1966, rather than the 20 per cent which is now provided for in the legislation. The effect of the increase in the levels of abatement under the Income Tax Act is that any province which chooses to increase its own income tax rates by like amount will be able to obtain the additional revenue from the two percentage points in 1965 and from the four percentage points in 1966 without raising the over-all level of individual income tax. The effect of the increase in the standard tax is to increase the amounts of equalization in line with these higher abatements. In other words, the value of the increased abatement will by this means be equalized to the yield in the top two provinces.

In order that the committee may know the financial importance of the measures which we recommend, I should like permission to place on Hansard at this point a table showing the estimated increase in provincial revenues for the fiscal years 1964-65, 1965-66 and 1966-67 which will flow from the implementation of these proposals. If there is unanimous consent I should like to table them now.

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

* Calculated for Alberta and B.C. on assumption that there would be no equalization as a result of the natural resource revenue adjustment.

Mr. Gordon: This table indicates that for the fiscal year 1964-65 it is estimated that changing to the top two bases of equalization will bring the provinces an additional $55.3 million and the value of an additional 25 per cent of the estate tax will be $32.2 million, or a total of $87.5 million. For the year 1965-66 it is estimated that the provinces will be $171.2 million better off than under the arrangements now in effect, the proposals made at the November 1963 conference accounting for $106.6 million of this increase and an additional two percentage points of the individual income tax proposed following the Quebec conference accounting for $64.6 million. It is estimated that for the fiscal year 1966-67, the final year of the present fiscal arrangements period, the provinces will be some $265 million better off than they would have been under the present arrangements.

The proposed changes in the fiscal arrangements with the provinces involve both the system of equalization and the amount of the federal abatement and are the two major adjustments of the fiscal arrangements referred to in the resolution. As noted above, they will result in rising financial benefits to the provinces, culminating in an annual gain to them of some $265 million in 1966-67 including the increased abatement already provided under the Income Tax Act. I submit this is a very generous recognition of the financial problems of the provincial governments, Mr. Chairman, and when viewed in the light of the federal government's own sizeable deficits it illustrates in dramatic fashion the government's belief in co-operative federalism.

I should perhaps add a word or two about the effect of these changes on the budgetary position of the federal government. In my budget speech of March 16 last I forecast a deficit for the current fiscal year of $455 million according to the traditional method of accounting. Transfers to the provinces of the amounts contemplated, $265 million on an annual basis in 1966-67, will be bound to increase the federal deficit.

Hon. members know that a very high proportion of the federal government's total expenditures are fixed or uncontrollable if we include defence expenditures and social security payments in the fixed or uncontrollable category. Capital expenditures, for example, which are controllable are estimated at only $268 million for the current year, which is 4 per cent of total expenditures for the year. It is sometimes suggested this is an area that could be dealt with differently, but as a percentage of the total it is only 4 per cent. In other words, while we are making every effort to keep expenditures in check, the scope for cutting them appreciably or very considerably is not nearly as great as many people think. I mention this to emphasize the problem created for the federal government by the contemplated reduction in its revenues of $265 million a year in order to help the provinces meet their financial difficulties. Obviously there must be limits beyond which the federal government cannot go without endangering its own financial position, and I trust this will be recognized by the provinces as well as by those of us who are in the federal parliament, because to be successful co-operative federalism must work both ways.

While the proposed changes in the system of equalization and the increase in the federal abatement of the individual income tax are the most important of the fiscal revisions that are proposed, the bill will contain a number of other fiscal revisions which are of varying degrees of importance to the provinces. It is proposed that the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act be amended to permit the use of the one year option for the determination of the succession duty rental applicable in the provinces of Saskatchewan, British Columbia and Manitoba for the years 1957-58 to 1961-62.

This provision will give effect to an undertaking made by two previous administrations but never given statutory authority. Under the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act, chapter 29, 4-5 Elizabeth II, the standard sucession duty applicable to a province for a given year is equal to 50 per cent of the three year average of the succession duties payable on the estates of persons dying in that year and the two preceding years. During the course of the negotiations preceding the signing of the tax rental agreements, it was argued that a renting province should be given the option of a one year basis since in fact a province which did not rent received the 50 per cent abatement on the one year basis.

The then Minister of Finance undertook to secure the authority to make the one year option possible. The undertaking was first extended to the province of British Columbia by letter of February 14, 1957, and subsequently to the province of Saskatchewan by letter of May 17, 1957, and to the province of Manitoba by letter of October 30, 1957. The other five provinces which rented the succession duty field to Canada were asked by the then minister of finance in letters dated April 24, 1958, whether they wished to avail themselves of the one year option.

No other provinces indicated their desire to avail themselves of the one year option, and on the basis of that inquiry it has therefore been limited to the provinces which requested it, namely British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

The passage of this particular provision will discharge a commitment previously given and will enable us to bring finality to the calculation of the succession duty rentals for those three provinces for the relevant years. It is not possible to tell in advance whether the selection of a one year basis for a succession duty rental would benefit a particular province for a given five year period. If some particularly wealthy person or persons had died in the two year period immediately preceding the agreements, a three year average might benefit a province. Conversely, if succession duties were tending to rise year by year, the one year basis might benefit a province. Because the one year basis will produce different results than the three year average, the option is naturally limited to those provinces which made their choice known at the beginning of the period.

A further provision of the proposed legislation has to do with the recommendations of the royal commission on Newfoundland finances appointed under term 29 of the terms of union. At the present time the payment of $8 million per annum recommended by the royal commission on Newfoundland finances is made under section 3(3) of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act and the authority to pay this amount extends to March 31, 1967. It is proposed that the $8 million per annum be made payable to the province of Newfoundland in accordance with the recommendation of the royal commission on Newfoundland finances without specifying any terminal date.

Another provision has to do with the Crown Corporations (Provincial Taxes and Fees) Act which was given royal assent on June 18, 1964. In accordance with the provisions of that legislation certain federal crown corporations listed in the schedule to the act are required to pay provincial retail sales taxes, gasoline taxes and motor vehicle licences, with effect from April 1, 1964. This legislation was first proposed in 1962 under the previous government, and it was the intention at that time that the affected corporations should pay the specified provincial taxes from April 1, 1962. The legislation was never introduced, but the matter has been on the order paper on a number of occasions. While it was thought wrong at this time to give retroactive effect to this legislation, the government does not want the provinces to lose financially—I am referring to the bill that was passed some weeks ago—from the fact that events over which they had no control intervened in such a way as to make it impossible to carry out the original intention. It was more than an intention; it was more or less a commitment. Consequently it is proposed that an estimate be made of the taxes that would have been paid had the legislation been in effect from April 1, 1962 to March 31, 1964 and that such estimated amounts be paid to the provinces. It will come to about $6 million in total for the two years in question.

There is one further matter of importance that will be dealt with in the bill, that is, in the words of the resolution "To provide adjustment of fiscal arrangements and taxation provisions consequential upon the provision of youth allowances to parents resident in certain provinces". The bill dealing with the provision of the youth allowances has now been passed. The house is therefore familiar with the fact that it is not the intention to pay federal youth allowances in a province that provides its own system of schooling allowances on a basis similar to the federal plan. It is proposed that in such a province the federal income tax be reduced by a further 3 percentage points. This requires an amendment to provide an additional abatement of 3 percentage points under section 33 of the Income Tax Act. In provinces in which the federal youth allowances are paid it is proposed that the abatement under section 33 of the Income Tax Act be 21 per cent of the basic federal tax for the taxation year 1965 and in provinces which provide their own schooling allowances, 24 per cent of the basic federal tax.

The value of an additional abatement of 3 per cent in the federal income tax may be more or less than the value of the schooling allowances provided by the province. It is not intended that a province should be better off or worse off as a result of its decision to provide its own system of schooling allowances. If federal revenues decline more by reason of granting the additional 3 per cent abatement in a province providing its own system of schooling allowances than it would have cost the federal government to provide the youth allowances in the province, we will recover this net loss from that province.

Conversely, if federal revenues are estimated to have declined less as a result of providing the additional 3 per cent abatement of federal individual income tax in a province providing its own system of schooling allowances than it would have cost the federal government to provide the youth allowances in that province, the federal government will pay this difference in cost to the province. Provision will be contained in the bill when it is before the committee for such adjustments.

I hope that the statement I have just made will provide a useful explanation of the subject matter covered by the resolution. The broad purpose is clear. It is to improve the financial position of the provinces and to contribute to order and harmony in federal provincial relations. The specific measures by which we achieve this broad purpose are, however, complex and difficult. I hope that my explanation of these matters has been sufficient but I shall be ready to amplify it later on in the course of debate.

Mr. Lambert: May I call it 10.30.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the house leader about the business for the rest of the week, but may I suggest to him in view of the complexity of the statement we have just heard from the Minister of Finance he may have to revise his plan for the expediting of the business of the house. I doubt if any one of us anticipated the short resolution appearing as order No. 61 on the order paper would involve such a lengthy and complicated matter. Would the house leader indicate what he has in mind for the rest of the week?

Mr. Favreau: May I ask the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg South Centre if what he means is that it is fair to state that the debate on the resolution concerning the fiscal arrangements will not be as short as was expected, and does he want to suggest that we should place the debate on it after some other legislation?

Mr. Churchill: I am not sure that the debate on the resolution would last very long, but with the bill following the resolution, the two combined, it seems to me they would occupy quite a bit of the time of the house and perhaps run over into next week.

Mr. Knowles: Since this seems like an adjourned meeting of the house leaders might I suggest shifting to the 12 mile fishing limit tomorrow and taking this federal-provincial legislation on Thursday?

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I feel that we should start by passing the resolution and carrying the bill on first reading, so that each member could have a copy of the legislation and compare it with the remarks just made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon). That would give us time to examine the bill before we discuss it.

Once the resolution has been passed and the bill read the first time, we could follow the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and go on to the bill concerning the fishing limits, and then we could come back to the legislation concerning federal-provincial fiscal arrangements.

[Text]

Mr. Favreau: I am impressed by the fact that the hon. member for Lapointe has read my mind so well. I think it would be fair to all parties if the order agreed to were not changed, because it would be appropriate for all concerned if the debate on the fiscal arrangements resolution were pursued tomorrow, after which would be called the 12 mile zone bill both for its committee stage and third reading. After that we would go back to the fiscal arrangements bill for second reading and committee stage and, we hope, third reading.

Mr. Lambert: If the discussion on the resolution stage is not finished, the minister will not see his bill until next week.

Mr. Olson: I am sure there have been some discussions and possibly some agreement among the house leaders. But as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) mentioned a few moments ago, members of the house can hardly have anticipated the complexity of the bill and of the resolution which has been presented to us in this statement by the minister. In order to be helpful I should like to suggest to the leader of the house and to the government that they would probably expedite the passage of this measure if they would give members of the opposition at least tomorrow in which to consider the statement the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) has made. Otherwise, I am sure the resolution will be discussed all day tomorrow and no progress will be made.

Mr. Favreau: I will take responsibility for this. Although the order of business to be called by the government will be that just stated, I agree that if at a meeting of the house leaders between now and the resumption of the sitting tomorrow some different agreement is reached, we could proceed on the basis of that agreement. For the moment, the business of the house tomorrow will be as I have just announced.

Mr. Churchill: Did the leader of the house announce the business for Friday?

Mr. Favreau: On Friday we will have a day on estimates.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

(Subject matter of questions debated under adjournment motion).

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved:

TRADE—BEEF—STEPS TO INCREASE EXPORTS TO GREAT BRITAIN

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): The reason I asked my question today on orders of the day was twofold; there were two reasons for it. The first reason was in regard to the potential market in the United Kingdom for Canadian beef. Sometime ago, Canada did have a market for this type of beef in the United Kingdom and for some reason unknown we lost that market. It would seem to me that this is the ideal time for us to regain the market we had in the United Kingdom. It possibly is unfortunate that they had a drought in Argentina this past year and were unable to supply their customers.

From press reports I understand that the Americans have sent a shipment of beef to the United Kingdom. I noticed that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) in reply to a question put to him by the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Smallwood) said that the Canadian trade commissioner in Great Britain was investigating this, and he referred to it as a problem. To me, it is not a problem. As Canadians we should not be considering it as a problem. The people in the United Kingdom—yes, they have a problem because their beef prices are so high.

[Mr. Olson.]

He also said the spread was not great enough. From press reports we understand that special cuts of beef are selling in the United Kingdom for $2 a pound. Similar cuts are selling in Canada at the present time for 79 cents. How much of a spread do you want? I realize these are probably the best cuts, but proportionately the spread should be the same all the way down. Certainly with the devaluation of the Canadian dollar our beef should again be in the running for that market. I ask the parliamentary secretary, what efforts have his department made to regain this market?

My second reason for asking this question has to do with a threatened drought this year in the northern part of the prairies. It may not develop, but unless we get rain very quickly farmers will be forced to sell their cattle herds. Unlike the southern part of the prairie provinces, where provision has been made for such catastrophes because they have had them in the past, the northern part of the prairies has seldom experienced such a catastrophe. They are not prepared for carrying over their herds; they are not prepared by having reserve feed, and they may be forced to settle their problem in one of two ways. They will either have to ship their cattle to the southern part of the province, which is very costly, or they will have to flood the market with this beef.

The department knows what will happen if the market is flooded. Prices will be depressed and this affects the economy of all Canada. I am sure we do not want this to happen. I am also thinking of the future in this connection. Canada is capable of producing much more beef than she can consume, and with the advent of ARDA and the proposed opening of new grazing lands in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, we can produce much more beef. If we do produce more beef, we must have markets in which to sell it. I would ask the department to do everything they possibly can to regain part of this market, bearing in mind that the Americans have already sent trial shipments to Great Britain, that we had this market on a prior occasion, and that there is a special process by which this beef can be prepared for shipment. It can be sent to the United Kingdom in refrigerated cars and ships. I understand that this special process does not require too much preparation. They strip the hides off the cattle, chill the beef and ship it. I realize that we cannot send live cattle over there because it is too costly. But this market was open to beef shippers in Canada before, and I think this is a golden opportunity for Canada to recapture the market.

I hope the department will consider what I have suggested and that they have already had results from the investigation which the minister said he had under way when he was asked about this on a former occasion.

Mr. Jean-Luc Pepin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would say, first, that the answer given by the minister on June 15 to a similar question still holds. Information gathered in the United Kingdom and on the continent by Department of Trade and Commerce officers has not only been collected but has actually been given to the meat packing houses in Canada. I investigated the matter this afternoon and understand that the meat packing houses are now making their beef available to potential buyers in the United Kingdom and Europe. For obvious reasons, I think I cannot be more specific than that. There is nothing that one meat packing house wants less than to provide information to another meat packing house.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the parliamentary secretary a question? What program has the government got, in case there is a flood on the market of these cattle from the drought areas?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of this before. I will keep in touch with the situation. I understand the Minister of Agriculture will be back from Regina tomorrow, and I will bring the observations made by the hon. member to his attention. I am now joining with him in keeping the situation under close observation. I share his views on the development of beef raising in Canada, in the sense that I should like my own constituents to become more beef conscious, if I may put it that way, and I should like them to export in the same way as the hon. member would like his own people to export.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, with the agreement of the house may I put on Hansard the fact that after a short meeting of the house leaders, which meetings seem to have been very successful recently, it has been agreed that tomorrow as the first order of business we will proceed with the committee stage and third reading stage of the 12 mile fishing zone bill, after which we will carry on with the debate on the fiscal arrangements resolution.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 11.04 p.m.

APPENDIX

NON-OPERATING RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—CORRESPONDENCE WITH RAILWAY PRESIDENTS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY

Montreal, June 22, 1964.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

We write to apprise you of a situation developing which may bring about a suspension of railway services in Canada.

On May 20, 1964, the Munroe conciliation board, appointed by the Minister of Labour to inquire into a dispute between the railways and their non-operating employees, submitted a majority report recommending wage increases during 1964 and 1965 totalling approximately 19.1 cents per hour or $32.50 per employee per month. This would add to the wage bills of Canadian National and Canadian Pacific amounts estimated at $18.2 million for 1964, $39.0 million for 1965 and $46.3 million for each succeeding year.

This was the latest of a series of conciliation board reports which have dealt with disputes between the railways and their non-operating employees on a biennial basis since world war II. Between 1946 and 1959 these employees secured increases in wages, fringe benefits, or both, on seven successive occasions. To cover the added costs involved, the railways applied to and received authority from the board of transport commissioners to make general increases in freight rates, the last of which was an increase of 17 per cent effective December 1, 1958. Because this series of general freight rate increases gave rise to allegations of discrimination and inequities in the freight rate structure, in March, 1959, the government announced that no further general increases in freight rates would be permitted pending study by a royal commission to be appointed to inquire into railway transportation in Canada. On May 13, 1959, the MacPherson royal commission was appointed under terms set forth in P.C. 1959-577.

Subsequently parliament enacted the Freight Rates Reduction Act with effect from August 1, 1959, under which the 17 per cent increase in freight rates of December 1, 1958, was rolled back to 10 per cent and the sum of $20 million per annum was provided to compensate the railways for the loss of revenues therefrom. On May 2, 1960, by order of the board of transport commissioners, the 17 per cent increase was further rolled back from 10 per cent to 8 per cent.

In 1960 the non-operating employees made further demands upon the railways. The conciliation board which dealt with that dispute recommended wage increases totalling some 14 cents per hour together with improved vacation benefits. The railways rejected the report and a strike called for December 3, 1960, was averted by parliament which passed the Railway Operation Continuation Act preventing strike action until May 15, 1961. In the meantime, in March, 1961, the MacPherson royal commission submitted the first volume of its report. The government decided, pending receipt of the complete report, to make interim payments to the railways related to the recommendations of the royal commission in the amount of $50 million per annum. The dispute between the railways and the non-operating employees was settled on the basis of the majority report of the conciliation board and the Railway Operation Continuation Act lapsed.

The second volume of the MacPherson royal commission report was released in January, 1962. In the meantime, the non-operating employees had made further demands in respect of the years 1962-63. That dispute was settled on the basis of the unanimous report of a conciliation board which added 9 cents per hour to railway payroll costs. The railways accepted the report and undertook the added costs involved which, together with increases accorded running trades employees, totalled some $31.7 million on a recurring annual basis, in anticipation of legislative action to implement the recommendations of the royal commission. As you are aware, such action has been repeatedly delayed.

In the meantime, however, government has further circumscribed the ability of the railways to raise added revenues to meet increased costs and, indeed, has impaired their sources of revenues. On May 7, 1959, by order in council P.C. 1959-569, the authority granted by the board of transport commissioners, sustained on appeal by the Supreme Court of Canada, to apply demurrage charges on cars loaded with grain consigned to terminal elevators in western Canada, was suspended and has remained so ever since. By an amendment to the Railway Act, on August 1, 1961, the statutory rates covering the movement of grain and grain products in western Canada enacted by parliament in 1925, were made applicable to rapeseed as well. This was done after the board of transport commissioners had dismissed an application that rapeseed be classed as grain. As a result, this artificially low level of rates which is applicable to so large a segment of the railways' traffic and which has become increasingly onerous in the face of rising costs, was not only continued but, indeed, extended with impairment to the revenue position of the railways. On March 30, 1961, by order in council P.C. 1961-497, increases in the at-and-east grain rates authorized by the board of transport commissioners which found the rates in effect to be below cost, were suspended. Successive orders in council have continued this suspension, currently until December 31, 1964.

Throughout the post-war period the railways have necessarily had to accord operating and other employees increases in wages and fringe benefits generally comparable to those secured by the non-operating employees. Recently material prices which had been relatively stable for some time have started to move upwards.

Incidentally, although the railways have continued in effect the reductions in freight rates brought about by the Freight Rates Reduction Act, and while the government has given assurance of its intention to place before parliament the matter of payments at the same rate as last year, this has not yet been done and the railways have not been in receipt of interim payments since December 31, 1963, or payments in respect of the Freight Rates Reduction Act since March 31, 1964.

More recently, the Minister of Transport has stated that no branch line abandonments in western Canada will be permitted pending enactment of legislation based on the MacPherson royal commission report.

Thus the railways find themselves by the action of government deprived of authority to raise added revenues to meet increased costs and circumscribed in their ability to effect economies through the discontinuance of unremunerative operations. Under these conditions, they cannot undertake the responsibility of assuming added costs of the magnitude implicit in the majority report of the Munroe conciliation board.

Even though rejection of the report may inevitably lead to a railway strike, existing circumstances leave us no alternative. Before taking this action, however, we felt the matter should be placed before you. We will be available for a meeting with you to explore the situation further if that should be desired.

Yours truly,

D. Gordon,
Chairman and president
Canadian National Railways

N. R. Crump,
Chairman and president
Canadian Pacific Railway Company

The Rt. Hon. L. B. Pearson,
Prime Minister,
Ottawa 4, Ont.

The following communication was directed by the Prime Minister to the presidents of the railways in reply to their letter of June 22, 1964.

Canadian National Telecommunications

Ottawa, June 30, 1964.

The letter which you sent forward on June 22, dealing with the wage negotiations between the railways and their non-operating employees and the report of the conciliation board on this matter, has been studied with great care. The federal government is aware of the difficulties for the railways which are inherent in this situation.

The government has indicated to you its firm intention to proceed with new railway legislation which will satisfy major objectives of the report of the MacPherson royal commission on transportation. At the same time, it is recognized that, while the resolution preceding introduction of this legislation is awaiting consideration by parliament, other items of parliamentary business must be dealt with first. This makes it likely that some time will pass before the MacPherson legislation can be considered by parliament.

In these special circumstances the government would undertake to review the situation in six months' time. This review would take place in the light of an impartial examination of the costs of a wage settlement by the railways in the situation described in your letter, so that the government would be afforded an opportunity to decide what additional temporary financial adjustments would be justified to assist the railways during the period up to the coming into effect of the proposed new railway legislation.

L. B. Pearson.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—STATEMENT IN DEBATE BY MEMBER FOR VILLENEUVE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise at once on a question of privilege arising out of a statement made yesterday afternoon by the hon. member for Villeneuve as recorded on page 5158 of Hansard. I was in the house when he commenced his remarks, but I was called out and was not present when he made these remarks, so it was not until this morning that I observed the statement. I quote from the translation at page 5158:

> Mr. Speaker, that is nothing new for the Leader of the Opposition, since he stated in the past that family allowances were merely a piece of legislation to assist French Canadians in the province of Quebec. But I realized myself that in western Canada, and in the riding of the Leader of the Opposition, there were as many large families as there are in the province of Quebec.
> Another point on which the Leader of the Opposition was wrong is that some years ago he was against family allowances because, he said, they were designed to help families in the province of Quebec.

Sir, there is not one vestige of truth in the suggestion that I, at any time, any place or under any circumstances, inside this house or outside, ever made the allegation or statement or any statement from which such inferences could be drawn. I want to make that clear now so that it will not be quoted later as not having been clearly denied.

Furthermore, as to the allegation that I was against family allowances, I simply recall to the attention of the house that when this matter was before parliament I was at one time alone in my support of family allowances; I stood for them knowing what the advantages were. Later on the entire party, with one exception, voted in favour of family allowances. I wanted to make these two points very clearly, and to state that the hon. gentleman's statement is unequivocally untrue.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some remarks concerning the question of privilege raised by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) about a statement I made yesterday to the effect that, as far back as 1945, he was against the passing of any measure respecting family allowances.

I maintain my statement and, further, I am not the only one to say so, because in this morning's newspaper Le Devoir we could read the following:

> Diefenbaker: By favouring Quebec, the Liberals are destroying confederation.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is not the time—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman, and I am sure he is a gentleman, will not persist in something that is untrue. I have not asked for a withdrawal. Withdrawals never catch up with falsehoods.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Without an immediate reference to the authorities I understand that the long standing custom is that the statement of a member should be taken as final in the matter.

REMOVAL EXPENSES, POINT EDWARD NAVAL BASE EMPLOYEES

Question No. 1,160—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

Has treasury board made any arrangements for payment of removal expenses to prevailing rate employees who may be transferred to positions in the Department of National Defence or other government departments at other locations as a result of the reduction in national defence operations at the Point Edward naval base and, if not, are arrangements going to be made to cover removal expenses of such employees?

Mr. McIlraith: Authority already exists to pay the removal expenses of prevailing rate employees moved within the Department of National Defence. No provision exists for the payment of removal expenses to prevailing rate employees of the Department of National Defence being transferred to positions in other government departments. In the event that suitable employment can be secured for prevailing rate employees with another government department, consideration will be given to extending financial assistance to cover the costs of removal expenses.

*SWING BRIDGE ACROSS THE NARROWS, LAKE SIMCOE

Question No. 1,223—Mr. Rynard:

Now that the Jake Gaudaur memorial bridge is almost completed, has the Minister of Transport any plans to modernize the hand-operated Canadian National railway swing bridge across The Narrows, between lake Simcoe and lake Couchiching, in order to expedite marine traffic on this stretch of water?

Mr. Cantin: The railway is not at present contemplating any extensive modernization of this bridge. However, it is proceeding with the installation of improved navigation lights which should be of considerable assistance to marine traffic.

Questions

R.C.N. ARMAMENT DEPOT, LONGUEUIL, QUE.

Question No. 1,338—Mr. Fisher:

1. Did the Department of National Defence decide to close the R.C.N. armament depot at Longueuil near Montreal before the "integration" policy was announced and, if so (a) were some of the activities at Longueuil to be transferred to the naval supply depot at La Salle (b) who made this decision?
2. If such a decision was made, does it involved extensive modifications to a storehouse at La Salle and, if so, what are they and what is the estimated cost?
3. Has the Longueuil depot been declared surplus?
4. Has United Aircraft of Canada indicated any interest in such surplus property?
5. Is it part of the "integration" policy that individual services are not to arrange for the disposal of any property until the matter is examined by a committee or working group acting within the lines of "integration" policy?

Answer: 1. Yes, this was announced in the House of Commons December 5, 1963, page 5456 of the official report, House of Commons Debates; (a) yes, (b) the government.

2. Yes, it involves alternations to a warehouse building to accommodate equipment being moved including increased electrical supply, the supply and installation of an overhead, travelling crane at an estimated cost of $243,000.

3. It is anticipated that the R.C.N. armament depot, Longueuil, will be declared surplus September 1, 1964.

4. Yes.

5. Questions

CANADIAN CASE BEFORE UN HUMAN RIGHTS OFFICER

Question No. 1,355—Mr. Howard:

Is there presently a case (reference number SO 215/1, resolution number 728 F (XXVIII)) of a resident of Canada before Mr. Stephen Landau, human rights officer of the United Nations and, if so, what progress is being made with respect to that case?

Answer: The Canadian government is not in a position to answer this question. The reference numbers mentioned in the question relate in the first instance to a general United Nations secretariat file and in the second instance to the following resolution of the economic and social council prescribing the United Nations procedures for processing complaints concerning alleged violations of human rights:

The economic and social council,

Having considered chapter V of the report of the commission on human rights on its first session, concerning communications, and chapter IX of the report of the commission in its fifteenth session,

1. Approves the statement that the commission on human rights recognizes that it has no power to take any action in regard to any complaints concerning human rights;

2. Request the secretary general:

(a) To compile and distribute to members of the commission on human rights before each session a non-confidential list containing a brief indication of the substance of each communication, however addressed, with deals with the principles involved in the promotion of universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and to divulge the identity of the authors of such communications unless they indicate that they wish their names to remain confidential;

(b) To compile before each session of the commission a confidential list containing a brief indication of the substance of other communications concerning human rights, however addressed, and to furnish this list to members of the commission, in private meeting, without divulging the identity of the authors of communications except in cases where the authors state that they have already divulged or intend to divulge their names or that they have no objection to their names being divulged;

(c) To enable the members of the commission, upon request, to consult the originals of communications dealing with the principles involved in the promotion of universal respect for, and observance of, human rights;

(d) To inform the writers of all communications concerning human rights, however addressed, that their communications will be handled in accordance with this resolution, indicating that the commission has no power to take any action in regard to any complaint concerning human rights;

(e) To furnish each member state concerned with a copy of any communication concerning human rights which refers explicitly to that state or to territories under its jurisdiction, without divulging the identity of the author, except as provided for in subparagraph (b) above;

(f) To ask governments sending replies to communications brought to their attention in accordance with subparagraph (e) whether they wish their replies to be presented to the commission in summary form or in full;

3. Resolves to give members of the subcommission on prevention of discrimination and protection of minorities, with respect to communications dealing with discrimination and minorities, the same facilities as are enjoyed by members of the commission on human rights under the present resolution;

4. Suggests to the commission on human rights that it should at each session appoint an ad hoc committee to meet shortly before its next session for the purpose of reviewing the list of communications prepared by the secretary general under paragraph 2(a) above and of recommending which of these communications, in original, should, in accordance with paragraph 2(c) above, be made available to members of the commission on request.

1088th plenary meeting,

30 July 1959.

IMPROVEMENTS TO HAUL-OUT FACILITIES, WHITE POINT, N.S.

Question No. 1,364—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

1. On what date were tenders called for a contract for improvements to the haul-out facilities at White Point, Victoria county, N.S., and what was the closing date?

2. Who was the contract awarded to and for those who tendered and the amounts of each tender?

3. What was the contract awarded to and for what amount?

Mr. Deschatelets: 1. Tenders were called on May 16, 1963 and closed on May 28, 1963.

2. Dunn Construction Co. Ltd., Baddeck, N.S., $1,292.

3. As the only tender received was considered excessive, Dunn Construction Co. Ltd. was asked to give an alternative price on another method of carrying out the work. A contract was subsequently awarded on September 11, 1963, in the amount of $542, and completed in 1963. However, during the course of the work in 1963, additional work became necessary, for which Dunn Construction Co. Ltd. submitted a price of $240. An addition to the contract for this was issued October 24, 1963. Due to weather conditions, the additional work could not be carried out in 1963, and will be undertaken in the near future.

TEACHERS' SALARIES, NATIONAL DEFENCE

Question No. 1,374—Mr. Fisher:

What are the salary schedules for teachers employed by Department of National Defence including a job description for each level?

Answer: In Canada, teachers are employed in dependants schools in Canada by a contract negotiated between the teacher and the official trustee of the school board at each defence base. In accordance with the regulations and orders governing the operation of these schools the salary schedules for staff members shall be on a parity with those of comparable civilian operated schools in the area. A supporting statement to this effect shall be obtained from the local provincial school inspector or other appropriate educational authority.

Overseas, teachers are obtained for D.N.D. schools overseas on a loan of service basis from their employing Canadian schools boards. The boards continue to pay their salaries in accordance with the salary schedule in effect and applicable to the teachers' qualifications and experience. The Department of National Defence reimburses the school boards for such salary payments.

Free quarters are provided to the teachers overseas or allowances are paid in lieu if the teacher elects not to occupy such quarters. These allowances are payable overseas at rates approved from time to time by the treasury board.

EXHAUST CONTROL DEVICES FOR MOTOR VEHICLES

Question No. 1,378—Mr. Mather:

Is consideration being given to following the example of California and promoting by law or by conference with the provinces the making mandatory of exhaust and crankcase control devices for motor vehicles?

Miss LaMarsh: Tested and approved crankcase control devices that reduce the motor vehicle contribution of air pollution by about 25 per cent to 30 per cent have been standard equipment on all new cars sold in California since 1962. Present standards require about a 70 per cent reduction in pollutants from auto exhaust.

The California state motor vehicle pollution control board have recently approved several exhaust control devices for installation on new cars sold in California beginning with 1966 models.

The United States automobile manufacturers association have promised to produce cars that will meet the California standards limiting exhaust contaminants for the 1967 model year.

In view of the above it is considered premature to promote a provincial conference on such devices until the equipment becomes available and satisfactory experience as to performance is forthcoming.

LAND TRANSACTIONS, ASSINIBOIA MUNICIPALITY, MAN.

Question No. 1,379—Mr. Enns:

1. Have recent land transactions been negotiated affecting properties adjoining the D.N.D. shooting range in the municipality of Assiniboia, Manitoba?

2. Did these involve properties along the trans-Canada highway and the perimeter highway?

3. What were the terms of such negotiations?

Answer: 1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. The existing danger area of the St. Charles rifle range does not extend to the rear of the range a sufficient distance to permit the use of modern weapons. The range was, therefore, closed down for several months until arrangements could be made to acquire the necessary additional danger area. Recently, negotiations with two land owners were undertaken involving the exchange of uncultivated crown property for lands to form the necessary additional danger area. Specifically offers have been made to exchange:

(a) Part of river lot 89 of the inner two miles of the parish of St. Charles containing approximately 252 acres for the northeast quarter and the east half of the southeast quarter of section 23, the north half of the northeast quarter of section 14 and the north half of the north half of section 13, all in township 11, range 1, east of the prime meridian, containing approximately 480 acres, and;

(b) The northeast quarter of section 23 and the north half of the northeast quarter of section 13, containing 240 acres, for the southwest quarter of section 24, containing 160 acres, all in township 11, range 1, east of the prime meridian.

The parties to the proposed exchange are to be allowed to remove the 1964 crop and will be permitted to farm the land on a year to year basis, at their own risk, when the rifle range is not in use upon payment of the municipal taxes in addition to a per acre rental of $3 per annum.

EXPENDITURES ON FOREIGN SWEEPSTAKES

Question No. 1,401—Mr. Coates:

1. Is the government in a position to indicate with any accuracy the sums of money which are expended by Canadians on foreign sweepstakes and, if so, what is the estimated amount?

2. Does the government intend to endeavour to ascertain the amount involved in order to better determine what the possible effect of the establishment of such a scheme might have on the recommendations as proposed by the Hall commission on health services?

Mr. Davis: 1. No.

2. It would be impossible to make a reliable estimate.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to notice No. 137. Will Your Honour please call notices Nos. 136, 138, and 139. I ask that the notices Nos. 133, 134 and 135 stand.

CLOSING OF RADAR STATION, ST. SYLVESTRE, QUE.

Motion No. 137—Mr. Pigeon:

That an order of the house do issue for copies of letters from citizens in the constituency of Lotbinière and of resolutions by municipal corporations in the constituency of Lotbinière addressed to the Prime Minister or other cabinet ministers, protesting the government's decision to terminate the operation of the radar station at St. Sylvestre.

Motion agreed to.

FILM "MR. PEARSON"

Motion No. 136—Mr. Martineau:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house the full and unexpurgated version of the film "Mr. Pearson".

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I wonder if I might ask the hon. gentleman whether he does not think that this motion, having perhaps served its immediate purpose, might be withdrawn. First of all, this is not the property of the crown or of the government of Canada. In any event, is it not most unusual to ask the government to produce a commodity? The hon. gentleman might ask us to produce papers, but to ask us to produce a commodity is surely to ask for something which cannot be achieved even by this administration.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I attach a great deal of importance to the request made by the minister. Still, although it is somewhat unusual to ask for the showing of a film in this house, I think Your Honour will admit that a situation such as that brought about by the film "Mr. Pearson" is also rather unusual.

That is why I cannot accede to the minister's request and withdraw my motion.

On the other hand, I believe the house would be willing to debate the matter. I therefore ask that this motion be transferred for debate.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH POSTMASTER, THETFORD MINES, QUE.

Motion No. 138—Mr. Langlois:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and letters exchanged between the Postmaster General, his executive assistant, his parliamentary secretary, or the deputy minister of his department and the postmaster at Thetford Mines, from January 1, 1960 to June 30, 1964.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): I should like to assure the hon. member that all the correspondence he has asked for is intradepartmental and therefore privileged. In view of this fact I suggest he may wish to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Langlois: I should like to have this motion referred for debate, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

VANCOUVER—POSSIBLE USE OF FORMER R.C.A.F. BASE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry in connection with the Kitsilano property in Vancouver, British Columbia. Has the hon. gentleman been advised that Vancouver city council yesterday unanimously passed a motion that a request in writing be made to the federal government for a 99 year lease for the whole of the said site? Further, has he been advised that the mayor of Vancouver and the city council strongly protest and reiterate that they are absolutely opposed to the C.B.C. taking over any portion of the reserve, and that the present zoning of the area is residential only.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): I have in my hand a copy of a telegram from the mayor to the Prime Minister making the points the Leader of the Opposition has made. We have not yet received from the city of Vancouver the proposals to which reference is made in this telegram, and are therefore not in a position to deal with them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Until the representation from the city has been embodied in a letter placed before the minister, will the minister assure the house that the C.B.C. will not be given any consideration with respect to the 15 acres which Mr. Ouimet desires to secure, and every opportunity has been given to the people of Vancouver, represented as they are by their council, whose wishes were made clear in this unanimous resolution?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the right hon. gentleman that no decision will be taken in this matter until the representations of the city of Vancouver as well as the proposal from the C.B.C. have been received and considered.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if either the Minister of Industry or the Secretary of State could inform us whether the city council of Vancouver have made any firm proposal to the C.B.C. concerning a downtown site in place of the Kitsilano park site.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any concrete proposal made by the city of Vancouver to the C.B.C.

Mr. Arnold Webster (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Industry, is it government policy to instruct Crown Assets Disposal Corporation regarding the sale of assets turned over to its jurisdiction?

Mr. Drury: Crown Assets Disposal Corporation acts under and in conformity with an act governing its operations passed by this parliament.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO SUBSIDY FOR TRUCKING INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

In view of the situation in which the trucking industry finds itself in Canada, does the Minister of Transport intend to grant subsidies to that industry so it can face the increase in operating costs without raising its rates?

[Text]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I think the answer would be no to that question, sir.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance.

Is it his intention to exempt from income tax the trucking companies which are faced with such a situation at the present time?

[Text]

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think government policy in respect of taxation should be discussed on the orders of the day.

SASKATCHEWAN—REPORTED SHORTAGE OF BOX CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lawrence Watson (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce with regard to the box car shortage. I have had urgent calls this morning from the Weyburn area again stating that the elevators are practically all filled to capacity. Could the minister inform the house whether he has had a reply from the Canadian wheat board with regard to what they propose to do about the box car shortage?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as I said to the hon. gentleman, as soon as I received notice of his question I was in touch with the wheat board, and they have told me that with particular regard to the C.P.R. Moose Jaw-Weyburn line they have placed shipping orders on the points situated on this particular line to provide for a quota of 8 bushels per specified acre plus a supplementary quota of 10 bushels per seeded acre for spring wheat.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Minister of Trade and Commerce realize that shipping orders mean nothing at all if cars are not available?

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

QUEBEC—ADMINISTRATION OF ESKIMO AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister.

Considering the deadlock to which have come the negotiations between the federal government and the Quebec government concerning the transfer of jurisdiction over the Eskimos, does the Acting Prime Minister intend to take steps toward changing the federal negotiators in that matter?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that this suggestion is justified. In my opinion the question is out of order. At any rate, the answer is no.

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources whether he agrees with Mr. René Lévesque who accuses the federal government of showing arrogance and favouritism with regard to Eskimo affairs?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In my opinion the last two questions are out of order.

Mr. Pigeon: This is a serious charge, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Is the cabinet aware of the manner in which the negotiations are proceeding at present in this matter, and does it intend to make recommendations to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources in order to improve those discussions?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the cabinet is looking into all those questions, including the one mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

[Mr. Sharp.]

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Grey-Bruce.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance—

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order. I believe I put an appropriate question to the Acting Prime Minister, since he is the one at the head of the government in the absence of the Prime Minister. I feel that my question was relevant and that the answer from the Acting Prime Minister was far from satisfactory; moreover, the Acting Prime Minister has not given us any information on what we asked him.

[Text]

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance—

Mr. Grégoire: On a point of order—

Mr. Starr: This is a subterfuge point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Lapointe is rising on a point of order. If it is in connection with the last three questions, those three questions were out of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The three questions were out of order in the first place; consequently there is no point of order.

REQUEST FOR STEPS TO PRESERVE HISTORIC ARTICLES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has he received some 100 telegrams from individuals and others in the Yukon concerning the preservation of historic articles of national importance and, if so, what action does he intend to take in this regard?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely this is a question for the order paper.

PUBLICATIONS

INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING PENDING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Would the minister inform the house whether he and/or the government have decided permanently to shelve the legislation with regard to foreign publications, which was mentioned in the last throne speech?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): No, they have not, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ACCEPTANCE BY RUSSIA OF UN PEACE KEEPING FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that yesterday the Soviet union presented their plan for a world police force to the United Nations secretary general and the ambassadors of the United States and Britain at the United Nations, does the government have any word of this plan either from our representative at the UN or direct from the Soviet union?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday, we have not yet received any formal communication.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question. Would the hon. gentleman say whether, in view of this initiative on the part of the U.S.S.R., the Canadian government would now consider taking steps to enlarge the proposed limited conference later this year of countries interested in a permanent force? I should also like to ask the minister this. When discussions took place in connection with this conference, was the Soviet union invited? Because apparently there was criticism.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In answer to the right hon. gentleman may I say the Canadian government has already given an indication to the original invitees that, for reasons put forward by one of them, the conference could be expanded. There is no question of the proposed participants being only NATO countries, as has been charged in Izvestia. The original invitees were not all NATO countries. Discussions are now taking place in a preliminary way to see whether this conference could be extended to include countries from Africa and elsewhere that have had peace keeping experience.

I discussed this general subject with the ambassador for the Soviet union in Ottawa about a month ago and told him of our intentions. I said in answer to the article in Izvestia that the proposed conference was not intended to be restricted, but would include the countries which had had significant peace keeping experience of whom there are over 30.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the secretary of state say who were the original invitees who received an invitation from the Canadian government in this connection?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The countries which were originally included were Denmark, Sweden, Finland, the Netherlands and Norway.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Have any other invitations gone out during the last month since the conversations to which the hon. gentleman has alluded, which he had with the Soviet ambassador, in an attempt to increase the ambit of the conference and enlarge the number of countries involved?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No invitations have been issued, but there have been discussions at the United Nations with the countries concerned.

[Later:]

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if, in view of the very great interest in the developing situation in Cyprus and also the interest in this house in the peace keeping proposals of the U.S.S.R., he is considering making a full report on the matter to the standing committee on external affairs where questions could be asked and the matter gone into thoroughly?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have been considering this, Mr. Speaker.

NATO—AGREEMENT RESPECTING EXCHANGE OF ATOMIC INFORMATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of Industry if he will make a statement soon to the house concerning the implications for Canada of the document tabled on June 30 by the minister for external affairs dealing with a new nuclear agreement among the parties to the North Atlantic treaty for cooperation regarding the exchange of atomic information?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I propose at some time to do this. This is merely an agreement among NATO members pursuant to an amendment of the atomic energy act in the United States making information available to members of the North Atlantic treaty alliance. It has nothing to do with nuclear weapons as such. It is just to give NATO members greater opportunities for the exchange of atomic information.

Mr. Churchill: I was not referring to nuclear weapons. This is a new agreement replacing an old agreement. I was wondering if the house might be informed as to the changes inherent in that new agreement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will be glad to do that.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—REGISTRATION OF TREATY WITH UNITED NATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Could the Acting Prime Minister inform the house if it is the intention of the government to register the Columbia river treaty with the United Nations if it is ratified?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I see no reason for the "if". Under the charter of the United Nations there is an obligation on all member states to register treaties, and of course Canada lives up to its international obligations.

BAY OF FUNDY—ACTION BY ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport involving the Atlantic development board. In view of the apparent shelving of the Passamaquoddy tidal power project by the United States, is it the intention of the Atlantic development board to speed up their study of the feasibility of harnessing the bay of Fundy tides from a power point of view?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it would be impossible to speed up the study, because it is going at top speed already.

[Mr. Churchill.]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEPS TO MEET REPORTED INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Has the minister read the dominion bureau of statistics report indicating a further substantial increase in the cost of living during the month of June? If so, is the government taking any action to prevent this increase getting out of hand?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have seen this report but, as my hon. friend will appreciate, there are usually fluctuations from month to month.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Monteith: Always upward ever since this government came into power.

Mr. Gordon: If the hon. member will recall, there was no increase in the month of May. If he studied the report carefully he will also be aware that a big part of the increase, in fact far more than the over-all increase, was due to a rise in the seasonal items included in the food index, particularly vegetables, which is customary in the month of June. I might say that non-seasonal food items declined marginally.

An hon. Member: What about construction materials?

Mr. Pigeon: The 11 per cent tax.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if he has read the d.b.s. returns for the past three or four years which indicate no such increase during the months of May, June or July?

Mr. Gordon: No, Mr. Speaker, I have not read returns which show that at all.

REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING POVERTY IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. When he said, while in London, England, that the Canadian economy was prosperous, was the minister aware of the studies made by Professor Firestone of Ottawa University, who stated that 3,800,000 Canadians were living in poverty?

[Text]

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): I think there was general agreement, Mr. Speaker, both in London and in this country that my statement to the effect that the economy is doing very well was correct.

TRADE

WHEAT—EXTENSION OF INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with the international wheat agreement. Could the minister inform the house whether any negotiations have taken place among the signatories to the international wheat agreement? If so, will the agreement be continued in its present form, and has agreement been reached as to the price of wheat?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on June 25 the international wheat council made a statement about the status of the negotiations, which reads in part as follows:

> The council unanimously decided to recommend to member governments that the 1962 international wheat agreement, which expires on 31st July, 1965, should be extended in its present form without amendment. The duration of the extension will be discussed by the council at its November session but will not exceed two years.

Mr. Rapp: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does that mean that the price set in 1962 will continue?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, if the council's recommendation is accepted that would be the implication.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

REQUEST FOR AIRCRAFT REPAIR CONTRACTS FOR CHARLOTTETOWN PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, notice of which I gave him. Has the minister received an urgent communication from local 1937 of the international association of machinists requesting action to provide further aircraft repair contracts for the Charlottetown plant of Enamel and Heating to prevent the closing of this establishment? If so, has he been able to give the union any assurance on this important matter?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for giving me notice of the question. I have had a search made and no record can be found of any communication from the union local in question. I have had, however, on behalf of the plant in Charlottetown representations made to me by my colleague, the minister from the island.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF LEGISLATION TO ABOLISH CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the desirability of our dealing with the question of capital punishment when we are not involved with any particular case, and in view of the fact there will now be no hangings for the next couple of months, would the government consider either providing government time for Bill C-12, in the name of the hon. member for Danforth, or bringing in its own bill to abolish capital punishment in Canada?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice and give it consideration.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, arising out of the question that has just been asked, now that it is no longer a matter of impropriety to ask questions regarding the postponement of execution in the Georges Marcotte case, would the minister table the order in council in which the governor general in council decided that the law should take its course and, second, the order in council delaying the execution for one week?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, we will be pleased to table immediately any orders in council relating to this matter.

SOCIAL ASSISTANCE

SASKATCHEWAN—PROPOSED REQUIREMENT THAT RECIPIENTS WORK FOR AID GIVEN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance concerning a matter which has been raised in the house before, the answers to which have not been fully satisfactory. I am referring to the question of the missing missive from Saskatchewan. The minister of welfare of the province of Saskatchewan claims he has written a letter to the federal government. The parliamentary secretary of the Minister of National Health and Welfare said that no such letter had been received, and the minister said yesterday she had received no such letter. I now ask the Minister of Finance to look at his records to see if any letter has been received from the minister of social welfare in Saskatchewan concerning recipients of social welfare payments working for what they receive.

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if my hon. friend was referring to missives or missiles, but I will be glad to see if the missing missive is in my department.

AGRICULTURE

QUEBEC—PROCEDURE RESPECTING APPLICATION OF ARDA

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry concerning the administration of ARDA in Canada. Since he is supposed to have met the Quebec minister of agriculture lately, can he tell the house whether his comprehensive plan is exactly equivalent to the plan of the Quebec minister of agriculture and whether the ARDA program is acceptable at this stage of the operations?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, we have agreed on the interpretation to be given to ARDA in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the minister. Could he tell the house whether they have also agreed to help the farmers?

Mr. Sauvé: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the minister. Could he tell us what will be discussed at the federal-provincial conference on ARDA?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I have already announced that we will meet at the end of August or the beginning of September probably, to review the federal-provincial agreements respecting ARDA.

[Later:]

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Forestry a question following the meeting held at Mont Joli, over the week end, to deal with ARDA.

Could the minister tell us whether, besides general agreements signed by the ten provinces in October 1962, the federal government has concluded agreements made with the province of Quebec in 1962?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, the house might allow me to take that question into consideration and give an answer to the hon. member tomorrow.

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, in view of the prolonged absence of the federal Minister of Agriculture and of the urgency of the matter, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government intends to introduce, during the first part of the session, in case we have a vacation, legislation to reduce the cost of feed grains for eastern farmers, in view of the fact that Quebec agriculture is going to the dogs?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, you might allow me to reply and say that we are now considering the matter. I think that next week we will probably be in a position to announce a decision concerning the payment of trucking charges for feed grains for all farmers in eastern Canada.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Forestry did not answer the question I put to the Acting Prime Minister. I asked the hon. gentleman whether the government intends to bring forward, during the first part of the session, legislation enabling eastern farmers to obtain feed grain at a price below the prevailing prices and that, during the present year. Moreover, the minister should travel a little more through Quebec, through eastern Canada, instead of going to Europe—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is not the time for speeches.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Forestry. Can he tell the house whether the studies in progress at present include the suggestion made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the catholic farmers' union, regarding the setting up of a feed grain agency for eastern Canada?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid the fault is mine, since I have permitted a few questions which really, in fact, should be on the order paper. The last question is a very good example of a question which should be placed on the order paper, since it requires a detailed reply.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Forestry and "rural removal". Can he tell the house whether, during the conversations he had with the minister of lands and forests and the minister of agriculture of the province of Quebec, they talked about the contribution the federal government could make to help farmers who have lost all their sugar crop this year?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: This is a question for the order paper.

[Later:]

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I should like to direct an associated question to the Minister of Forestry concerning the statement he has promised the house tomorrow. The question I should like to have answered in his statement tomorrow is this. Will the minister make clear the requests of the province of Quebec concerning the extension of shared programs with the federal government? As I understood the statement at Mont Joli, Quebec is going to ask for an increase in shared programs in connection with ARDA. In his statement tomorrow, will the minister consider making this position clear?

Mr. Sauvé: I will, Mr. Speaker.

REQUEST FOR REINSTATEMENT OF GRANTS TO FAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture or in his absence his parliamentary secretary. I am wondering if the government would consider the immediate reinstatement of grants to agricultural societies in regard to class A and B fairs?

Mr. Speaker: Surely this is a question for the order paper.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

REPORTED STATEMENT BY VANCOUVER FOOTBALL PLAYER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): I have a question for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Will the minister take note of an article on the sports pages of today's Globe and Mail in which a player for the Vancouver Lions football club is reported as stating he will apply for Canadian citizenship if the football club makes it financially worth while? Having noted the reported comment, will the minister make it known to this young man that we Canadians value our citizenship, and it is not to be made available to professional athletes so they may improve their bargaining position with the club which employs their services?

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I shall bring the question to the attention of the minister.

SHIPPING

SUGGESTED REVIVAL OF MERCHANT MARINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Is the government study on reviving the Canadian merchant marine proceeding at top speed, to use the minister's own words, and in particular will the minister give details of the engagement of several economists to study the economic feasibility of reviving the merchant marine, as announced recently?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I will be glad to look into all the implications in the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. Bell: Will the minister keep in mind that the revival of the merchant marine is very necessary in order to replace the orders the shipyards lost when the Minister of National Defence so ruthlessly scrapped the navy program?

Mr. Pickersgill: I have duly noted the non-partisan observations of the hon. gentleman.

INDUSTRY

QUEBEC—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry. Has the minister discussed with the Quebec provincial government the possibility of establishing either the Renault or the Peugeot car industry in that province and, if so, has the minister any information to give the house today?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions with representatives of the provincial government on this question, but I have no statement to make.

TERRITORIAL SEA AND FISHING ZONES

LEGISLATION RESPECTING TERRITORIAL WATERS AND FISHERIES LAWS

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. S-17, respecting the territorial sea and fishing zones of Canada.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I presume the minister has a statement to make.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The standing committee on marine and fisheries carefully studied this matter after the bill had been referred to it. I need not repeat evidence given before the committee, except to point out that in addition to my colleague the Minister of Fisheries and myself, there were representatives of other government departments involved.

Mr. Barnett: On a question of order, some of us on this side are interested in what the Secretary of State for External Affairs has to say, and I am wondering whether some of his non-fishing colleagues might be pleased to give us that opportunity.

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was saying I hoped, in view of the discussions we had in committee, that it would not be necessary to make an additional statement. However, I accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean).

The committee on marine and fisheries had a thorough discussion of the proposal in this bill for the establishment of a 12 mile fishing zone, and agreed with its provisions that the government be given the necessary power to establish straight base lines.

[Mr. Langlois.]

In the committee I indicated that it was the intention of the government, when this bill was passed by parliament, to establish without delay the fishing zones of Canada, and I indicated that this might be done by bringing into effect those portions of the bill relating to fishing, while deferring until a later date proclamation of the rest of the bill. After this testimony my colleagues and I considered the matter further, and subsequently the Minister of Fisheries stated on my behalf in the committee that the government did not expect any undue or substantial delay in bringing the entire bill into force. Therefore the situation is that there will be no delay in proclaiming the bill in its entirety after it has passed through the house and received royal assent.

I should like to take this opportunity to emphasize one or two points which my colleague and I mentioned in the standing committee. When the bill is proclaimed the immediate effect will be that the fishing zones of Canada will be established from existing base lines. These base lines will follow mainly the sinuosities of our coast line, pending the drawing of straight base lines by the governor in council under clause 5 of the bill.

Those countries with which we are not having negotiations will therefore be immediately excluded from the fishing zones, and their vessels will be subject to penalties under the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act if they operate in those areas. This will be of great importance to Canada in view of the rapid development by certain countries of large, modern fishing fleets capable of operating very far from their home ports.

I would like to inform the committee that during the next few months we will be having another round of talks with a number of countries that are affected by the action we are taking. Negotiations with France and Britain will take place in July, and with others later in the summer and autumn.

In order to maintain the friendly atmosphere in which our negotiations with these countries have been taking place, and to facilitate their conclusion, we do not propose, as I have already informed the house, to interfere with the fishing of these particular states during this temporary period of our negotiations. When the bill is proclaimed the coastal fisheries protection regulations will be amended to allow the countries with which we are holding discussions to continue fishing pending conclusion of the negotiations, when final arrangements will come into effect.

The hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean), whose own experience in this matter is extensive and who has been very helpful in the discussions on this matter both in this chamber and in the committee, mentioned the need to table promptly in parliament all orders in council made under the proposed act, in particular orders made under clause 5, relating to the delineation of straight base lines. Such tabling is required by the Regulations Act, but even if it were not so required I would be glad to assure the committee that every order in council made under this bill will be tabled in parliament without delay. I mentioned this matter privately to the hon. gentleman, I believe yesterday, and he raised a certain point. I find that the situation is as I have stated, and I do not believe he need have any concern in that regard.

This bill will have implications not only for Canadians now living but for future generations. It means a great deal to the fishing communities in our country. I would hope that this parliament would speak with one voice in the passage of this bill. In doing so parliament would be declaring to the world that the government, in taking this action is speaking for all parties in the House of Commons; and this, I am sure, would be a very important factor in the remaining portion of the negotiations upon which we will be embarking. I need not say anything more at this stage.

This bill will establish a 12 mile fishing zone in Canada. It will enable the government to establish the straight base line system. The straight base lines are not spelled out, for the reasons we gave in the committee, because this would interfere with the negotiations that are under way. This is following the practice established by other countries who have initiated new fishing zones based on the straight base line system, countries such as Norway and Iceland, and other countries I mentioned in the committee.

I commend this bill to the committee as being in the interests of Canadian fishermen and Canadian fisheries, and in the interests of Canada as a whole.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I wish to thank the Secretary of State for External Affairs for his statement. I might add that this bill has been carefully and thoroughly studied by the standing committee on marine and fisheries. Witnesses appeared before us representing various interests, and a very complete study of the measure was made.

Of course this legislation is a stage in a long process which has been going on for a number of years, the process of obtaining for Canada as far as possible exclusive rights for Canadian nationals in waters adjacent to our coasts. There is a difference of opinion on this, so I will not take up the time of the committee by restating arguments already made, but I personally think it is a great pity the legislation before us is not the culmination of this process. In my view the situation today would be more satisfactory if this could have been the case. I think the government now recognizes some of the stumbling blocks and difficulties which exist. It is not just a case of making some unilateral declaration which no other country is going to question, because other countries feel they have rights, and in any case they have means of retaliation should they wish to use them, if this question is not handled in a reasonably diplomatic fashion.

I believe the government is doing that. I am not criticizing the actions the government has taken, but I am criticizing the background which has been created and against which this bill is being introduced. I have no evidence to suggest that either of the two ministers who are now responsible were guilty in this regard, but a great many loose statements were made during the election campaigns to the effect that this was a simple matter; that all you had to do was make a proclamation and foreign fishing vessels would disappear. Indeed, it was suggested that the only reason this had not been done long since was that other governments, previous governments, were dilatory or did not take their responsibilities seriously. Of course anyone who is familiar with the situation knows that this is not the case.

I appreciate the generous remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs with regard to the efforts made by the previous government and by myself and other people in this connection. I should like, if I may, to digress for just a moment to pay tribute to the excellent work which has been done by the negotiators on behalf of Canada. I am thinking chiefly of senior civil servants, who have been an excellent negotiating team for Canada in this connection.

As I said earlier, I do not agree with the sequence of events. I would have hoped the government would not feel it was obliged to bring in legislation at a given time. I admit at once that this bill will have one helpful effect; that is, it will declare an exclusive fishing zone measured from our present base lines. But how much better it would have been if, before the end of May, as no doubt the government hoped, negotiations could have been completed to the stage where this legislation might have included the results of those negotiations so the minister could have made specific statements to parliament about what had been achieved. He could, for example, have told us what conditions had been agreed upon with regard to the tapering off period with respect to historic rights. A statement could have been made explaining precisely what the geographical co-ordinates were, and so on.

In this regard I should like to ask the minister a question which he may be able to answer later. I wish to refer to a news item which emanated from Washington last December. It reads as follows:

> The Canadian government has surrendered a point upon which it strenuously insisted at the law of the sea conferences in Geneva in 1958 and 1960—that U.S. fishing rights within 12 miles of Canada's coasts cannot be maintained unlimited and in perpetuity.
> Both external affairs minister Paul Martin and fisheries minister Hedard Robichaud said here yesterday that historic rights of U.S. fishermen will not be affected when Canada establishes a 12 mile national fishing zone, as it is proposed to do next mid-May.

I realize that some of this terminology may be loosely applied. I gather the government does not contemplate entering upon any negotiations to withdraw from or abrogate any treaty rights. But the report uses, I believe, the term "historic" in this case, and I should like to know whether the report is accurate when it says the government does not intend to negotiate with the United States on the question of historic fishing rights apart altogether from the treaty rights. Are these historic rights to remain permanent? That is a question I should like to have answered if at all possible.

This legislation, as has been said, is permissive for the most part. It does establish an exclusive fishing zone, but as far as the following are concerned, that is to say the establishment of the base lines, the geographical co-ordinates upon which the base lines are to be drawn, and the establishment of national waters by including them inside base lines—and I am referring here to bodies of water such as the gulf of St. Lawrence—this bill is only permissive. I hope the legislation will not, in these circumstances, become a ruse or a stratagem to have people believe that more progress has been made than has actually been accomplished.

What I am saying is that with regard to the latter points I have mentioned, the bill will have no effect at all until the negotiations are complete. For my part I hope these negotiations can be successfully terminated without too great a delay. The Secretary of State for External Affairs and, I think, the Minister of Fisheries both told the house that this legislation would strengthen their hands in these negotiations. If that is true I support the legislation on that ground alone, as well as for some other reasons. But I think this is a debatable point. Perhaps its passage would weaken the hand of the negotiators; because when this bill is passed, and the negotiations are still not complete, all our people can do is continue to negotiate. On the other hand, if the legislation had not been passed our team could still say to representatives of other countries "If you are not going to be reasonable about this I am sure the Canadian parliament will declare unilaterally that we will take these rights".

This is, of course, a debatable point and a matter of opinion. I think we are all agreed that although technically we may be acting unilaterally as a result of taking action in parliament, in practice there is very little room to act unilaterally, at least in an arbitrary way. This is a world community as far as fishing is concerned, and we have to act in a way that will not be detrimental to us in dealing with our neighbours at the present time or in the future. However, I see very little difference between these negotiations and any previous negotiations dealing with world fisheries. In every other case—that I know of, in any event—the negotiations were completed, the agreement was signed and then it was ratified by the introduction of a bill which was passed by parliament. This would apply to the north Pacific treaty and to any other treaty you wish to name in connection with fisheries negotiations with other countries. I think this would have been a more logical way to approach this problem.

I recognize that this bill will do one thing; that is, it will proclaim an exclusive fishing zone based on our present base lines, and that has merit. But I think consideration should have been given to the introduction of a bill which included just that, plus a declaration that certain bodies of water, geographically described, were Canadian national waters and would not just become such by virtue of an order in council to be passed some time in the future. I think that would have been a neater, more decisive way of doing it.

But I am not going to quarrel about details. I think a great deal of hard work was done on this bill but, as I have already stated, immediately the government came into power, if they did not know this before—and I think the two ministers concerned did know it—they should have known that this is not just a matter of a unilateral statement, even by legislation, which everyone is going to accept. For instance, at the meeting in Hyannis Port, according to the news report I read, the President of the United States reserved his position on this matter. At least one news report I read stated this. This meant that the United States had certain reservations in this connection. It is only natural that other countries will react in this way if they feel or suspect that their rights may be prejudiced.

I mentioned specifically the historic fishing rights position of the United States. I would like to have also, if it is possible, some statement with regard to what is contemplated in respect of the length of time historic fishing rights held by other countries are expected to be recognized; or is there going to be a phasing out process in this connection?

I want to thank the Secretary of State for External Affairs for mentioning the question of the tabling of the orders in council which will result. Like him, I also checked on the Regulations Act and found that, happily, the minister has no choice but to table them within 15 days of their being published in the Canada Gazette. That is a useful safeguard as far as parliament is concerned. But as I have already stated, I think from a legislative point of view the sort of blank cheque aspect of the powers that are granted the government with regard to the location of these geographical co-ordinates is bad legislation.

It is true that both ministers have said they do not expect to take action as a result of these powers which would be unreasonable, and so on; nevertheless the fact remains that there is no limitation on where these geographical co-ordinates can be placed. I think we should put some limitation on this, in the same way that on a cheque it is stated "Not good for more than $100". We should let the government fill in the exact amount, as it were, when they know what it is going to be. We do not expect at this juncture that the government is in a position to state exactly where these co-ordinates are going to be, but I think there should be in the legislation some limitation as to where they might be. I say that, Mr. Chairman, not in a critical way with regard to this government, but I am concerned with the principles of the matter. I think it is unwise for parliament to ever grant wider powers than those that are needed for the purpose in hand.

However, the drafters of this legislation have done a reasonably good job, I think. They have been most ingenious in drafting what must have been a fluid bill, a bill that would do what was needed to be done at this juncture and would give permissive powers to do what remains to be done; and the minister might have suggested, too, that it should be made to look as if it is doing at least as much as it is doing, and preferably quite a bit more than it is actually doing.

I regret that with regard to the co-ordinates there is not some limitation which is more specific and which would have removed some doubts from the minds of interested parties, such as were mentioned by witnesses who appeared before the committee and expressed anxiety on the part of their clients that base lines might be drawn from the mainland of Nova Scotia to Sable island, thereby intersecting a well known international air corridor which passes over what are now the high seas, and as a result of this measure aircraft would be passing over what would be technical Canadian territory, which would subject them to the possibility of additional tolls and various other things that might occur in the future.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs is aware, this party supports the principle of this bill in general terms. Had some slight changes been made in the details of the bill, which I have enumerated, and had the bill come as a crescendo at the end of these long years of negotiations, as a culmination of successful negotiations, we would have been able to support it wholeheartedly and without any reservations whatsoever.

I think it is rather unfortunate, at least from our point of view, that this is not the case. Nevertheless it is a step forward. There are negotiations yet to be carried out. I hope the minister is correct in his statement that this bill will strengthen his hand. We remember that only a year and a half ago, of course, they were the strong-armed people. They claimed they had all the strength needed. All the strength they needed then was to be elected and to form a government. I do not quarrel with that, but I hope the contention that it will strengthen their negotiating position is correct and that the results of this legislation will be as happy as we all hope.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, this bill has been reported back to the committee of the whole from the standing committee on marine and fisheries. I for one have no desire to attempt to duplicate in this debate that which was done in the standing committee on marine and fisheries. However, I think there are a few matters arising out of the proceedings of that committee which can properly be brought to the attention of this committee at this time.

Hon. members will recall that at the second reading stage of the bill we made clear by way of an amendment that we considered this a rather weak and futile bill to deal with a very important subject matter. While we are strongly in support of the general objective, we really do not consider the present bill to be a very satisfactory vehicle for dealing with this situation, either with regard to the terms of the bill or as to the timing of its introduction while negotiations are still in progress.

In the standing committee on marine and fisheries we sought to expand upon this position and to present some alternatives to the committee which we felt would better serve the purposes that I am sure all hon. members of the committee have in mind. It will be recalled that one of the points of difference —in fact, the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) made reference to it in the course of his remarks—is the question as to the manner in which the base line co-ordinates should be established. The Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Fisheries have indicated that the immediate effect of the bill is to establish a 12 mile fishing zone. In the committee I sought by way of amendment to propose what was in effect a compromise to the views which had become apparent as matters of difference on second reading by suggesting, in effect, that the committee should report back to the house the recommendation that the bill be separated; that we should then proceed immediately to enact a bill which would bring into effect a 12 mile fishing zone; and then at a later stage, when negotiations were completed and the government was in a position to tell us exactly what conclusions it had arrived at in its discussion with the other countries concerned, we could then enact a bill which would establish the co-ordinates in detail in respect to where the straight base lines would be established, which would clearly define which waters were being taken in to become part of the internal waters of Canada.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

The majority of the standing committee did not see fit to support this proposal, and following failure of that proposal we took steps to put forward, at least for the record, our position in respect of this matter of establishing base lines by suggesting an amendment which would have clearly set out in the bill base lines which would have been established by sets of co-ordinates pretty well along the line of the base lines which were suggested in the submission of the fisheries council of Canada. However, there again the majority in the committee did not see fit to support such amendment, and while I realize it would be within my rights to introduce a similar amendment in the committee of the whole, I do not propose to do so because I think it would be a duplication of effort and really would not accomplish anything fruitful in view of the position which was taken in the standing committee.

While the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) voiced at least some objection to the proposals in the bill very similar to the objection which I expressed, I am rather regretful of the fact that he did not see fit to support my objection in a more direct and forthright manner than he did either on second reading stage or in the standing committee. I got the impression while listening to his earlier remarks that he was simply pointing out to the committee that during the time he was a member of the former government he and his government had perpetuated the position of the administration previous to them, which had consistently appeared to be afraid to grasp the nettle of this question. I may say I am happy that the present administration has moved at least one step toward grasping this nettle, and in that respect I commend its actions over and above that of the two preceding administrations, one of which was of course Conservative, the other being the former Liberal administration.

I have tried to make it clear right through the proceedings that parliament itself should, as far as I am concerned, be the body which establishes by clear and definite acts what will actually become the official boundaries of this country. In my view it is not appropriate, regardless of what the Secretary of State for External Affairs may say about the practice in other countries, that any body other than the parliament of this country should be the one which defines the boundaries of Canadian sovereignty. Changes in those boundaries should be brought about only as a result of direct action by the parliament of Canada in a form which makes such action specifically part of the statutes of Canada.

About the time that the proceedings in the standing committee on marine and fisheries reached their conclusion some member in the house, during the course of a discussion about another matter, brought back to our attention a phrase which is becoming rather well known and is taken from a speech of the Prime Minister, in which he suggested that this is a time "to excite the daring". I should like to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that in the approach which has been taken to this matter, certainly as far as I have been able to see from the statements which have been made to us by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, his actions have been neither very exciting nor very daring. To come to the point which causes me to feel this, let me say at once it is because he has indicated more than once in the course of our discussions that he has no intention of raising with the United States in particular the question of the perpetuation of these old treaty rights. If I understand him correctly—and the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) raised this point—he has also indicated that he has no intention of discussing with the United States any revision or phasing out of their so-called historic fishing rights.

In the committee I tried to make it clear that our dealings with the United States should be on the basis of dealings with a good and friendly neighbour, but from any experience I have had in dealing with Americans as individuals I certainly feel that if there is one thing they understand it is straightforward and forthright dealings. I think we should have laid our cards on the table and have said we feel that these rather archaic treaty rights, which came into being at a time when we were not in a position to negotiate on our own behalf, should now go by the board. I think this would not be entirely a one-sided proposition.

I raised this question in the committee and the only answer I got from the Secretary of State for External Affairs was that it would not be in our national interest to do this. That is a flat declaration, but up until this time the minister has given us no indication whatsoever in what respect it would not be in our national interest. Quite frankly, I cannot help having some suspicion that what is happening is that our fishing interests are being sacrificed for some other unnamed and unspecified national interests, and I think this committee should be entitled to further information on which we can assess and judge whether the minister's statement is anything more than an unsupported declaration.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not want to interrupt but I can assure my hon. friend that is not the case.

Mr. Barnett: I am not quite sure what the minister is indicating is not the case.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, who is making a very interesting and serious speech, but he said that I had replied that it was not in the national interest. Then the hon. gentleman queried what I meant by national interest. Was it related to some other area? Were the fishermen being sacrificed to satisfy another aspect of the national interest? I assure my hon. friend that is not so. The national interest involved in this case comprises the fisheries industry and the fishermen of Canada.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I have indicated several times during the discussion of this matter that I recognize that the Secretary of State for External Affairs cannot give us every detail concerning negotiations that are still in progress. I recognize the validity of his contention in that regard and, of course, I can only accept his statement that the fishing interests are not being sacrificed to some other aspect of national interest. But I still should like to know in much more definite terms the full details of why that is so. This brings me back, of course, to the contention that has been made, that it is a rather unsatisfactory state of affairs to be discussing this bill when negotiations with other countries are still in progress and when we cannot be made acquainted with the details of negotiations or be told what conclusions have been arrived at in order that we as members of the house may make a fair assessment of the validity of the claims that are being made by members of the government in this connection.

I took the trouble, Mr. Chairman, to look at some of the old treaties, perhaps in a rather cursory way, and to bring to the attention of the standing committee my feeling that over the years since the original treaty rights were established as part of the general package settlement in the first instance at the termination of hostilities between the United States and Great Britain in 1783, the original rather balanced provisions of the treaty had been whittled away in a rather one-sided manner. In other words, the original concessions which were granted by the United States to us had vanished while the United States had pretty well retained the original rights it received.

I drew the attention of the committee to the fact, for example, that the original treaty of 1783 gave us the right of navigation forever from the source to the mouth of the Mississippi river. We were granted free passage for all time. It was pointed out that that right was abrogated by the treaty following the war of 1812. I was interested in the question of river navigation perhaps because of being a British Columbian and being aware that we have enjoyed navigation rights on another river—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And being a good and adventurous man, too.

Mr. Barnett: —which has been the subject matter of some discussion in the house not too long ago. I am referring, of course, to the Columbia river. If I may say so without being too serious about it, I was somewhat amazed that when I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether we still enjoy the rights of navigation on the Columbia river conferred by the Oregon treaty of 1846 he was not able to give me an offhand answer to that question. I was later informed that we still enjoy the right of free navigation of the Columbia from the international boundary to its mouth.

I bring this forward, not for any snide purpose by way of indicating that the minister does not yet know all the details regarding the subject of external affairs but to point out that I think it was a rather serious omission on the part of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in opening these negotiations with the United States, that it did not occur to him that this might very well have been an important bargaining point in the discussions with the United States. I contend that this of itself provides a very valid reason for suggesting that there be some revision of existing treaty rights between our two countries.

While the suggestion I am now going to make may create a somewhat nostalgic reaction on the part of my colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay West, I do suggest quite seriously to the minister that when he renews negotiations with the United States he should raise this question and perhaps suggest to the United States that we would be willing to swap our rights of navigation on the Columbia for those old treaty fishing rights. I think he can do that nicely. I also think it might not be altogether amiss if it were to be pointed out to the United States that for practical purposes they have virtually abrogated the treaty provision with regard to our right of navigation on the Columbia river without, as far as I am aware, ever discussing the matter with Canada. They did so when they built the original power dams across the Columbia. Those of us who live in the west know that there is no provision for ship navigation around Grand Coulee dam on the Columbia river.

I think that is the kind of approach that we as a free and sovereign nation should take. We are talking at least about having a distinctive flag and in my view we could very well point out to the United States that we want to sit down with them on a friendly basis and balance out a few of these things that have gone on in the past. Certainly we would not ask them to blast Grand Coulee dam out of the Columbia river at this stage of events in order to restore to us our treaty right to free passage on the Columbia. However, in exchange for our formally abrogating those rights we could very well request them to restore to us full sovereignty along sections of the Atlantic coast where under these old treaties they have rights which they must admit are not consistent with the full sovereignty of the Canadian nation.

I think this would put the whole situation in a context that would be a little more exciting, a little more daring, without making us obnoxious or antagonistic to our friends in the United States. Let us let them know this Canadian nation to the north is a nation which they should regard as a sovereign nation and which expects to be treated as equal even though it may not have as large a population as our cousins to the south have within their borders. This is the kind of approach I should like to see the Secretary of State for External Affairs take in his dealings with the United States. I think it could be presented in language which the people of the United States would understand. I feel the same thing should apply with regard to this matter of the claims to historic fishing rights and the negotiations on the phasing out period.

The hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) suggested there is some question about whether or not this is going to be done. I certainly have a very clear impression that the Minister of Fisheries and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have told us they are not even going to raise this question of the phasing out of historic rights so far as the United States is concerned. Certainly, so far as the west coast of Canada is concerned it is abundantly clear the only nation that really has these so-called historic rights is the United States. Unless we can come to some conclusion on this matter with the United States which provides for a phasing out, this whole action is more or less an exercise in futility so far as the improvement of the Canadian fisheries position is concerned.

This would not be a completely unprecedented action on our part. I happened to come across an article in a treaty between the United States and Great Britain in 1871. Article XVIII of that treaty provides for one of the forms of the renewal of the fishing rights of United States nationals in Canadian waters. Article XIX provides for reciprocal rights for Canadian fishermen in United States waters. It gives us those rights in terms fairly similar to those which were conferred upon the fishermen of the United States at that time. I should like to draw to the attention of the committee, Mr. Chairman, article XIX, and I quote briefly from it:

> It is agreed by the high contracting parties that British subjects shall have, in common with the citizens of the United States, the liberty, for the term of years mentioned in article XXXIII of this treaty, to take fish of every kind, except shell-fish, on the eastern seacoasts and shores of the United States north of the thirty ninth parallel of north latitude—

Now, article XXXIII of the treaty indicates that this right which is conferred by article XIX is to remain in effect for a period of ten years, and after that it will terminate. It seems to me, as I say, that this idea of a phasing out period is something which has been in existence in relation to the United States at least since 1871. I think it would not be out of place for us at this time to suggest to the United States that perhaps the thing be done in reverse to what it was in 1871. Certainly I hope before these negotiations are concluded that, in addition to the appropriate establishment of base lines we are going to have a clearcut understanding with the United States as well as with some of those other countries to which the minister referred, that we want this phasing out period; that we are not going to be satisfied in our negotiations until that has been achieved.

As I said earlier, Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to attempt to repeat in the committee of the whole house what took place in the standing committee on marine and fisheries. For that reason I am not going to take the time of the committee to attempt to reintroduce any of the amendments which I proposed in the standing committee on behalf of the New Democratic party. If the pattern of events is the same in committee of the whole as it was in the standing committee, I assume that this bill will be reported to the house from this committee very probably without amendment and will come up for third reading in due course. I certainly am not going to oppose passage of the bill on third reading. I think the form of my amendment at the second reading stage made it clear that it was the manner and method of achieving the purpose of the bill rather than its purpose that we were opposing. In concluding I will agree with the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) by saying that, as far as it goes, it is a step in the right direction. We certainly intend to support its passage on third reading if it does reach that stage without any further amendments.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, I only wish to register continuing support at this stage for Bill No. S-17. I do not see that much can be gained or would be gained by a repetition of the arguments that have been submitted at other stages of this proposed legislation. It seems to me that matters were covered quite fully, even although some of the answers might not have been just what we had hoped we would receive. Nevertheless, it has been indicated that is as far as we can get in obtaining information, especially considering the fact that these negotiations are still in progress.

There is increasing interest, of course, in the objective this measure seeks to achieve. I do not think there is any question about it; there is general support for the idea that has been submitted and the objective that is set out in this particular measure. The fishermen's organizations have been very definite in their criticism of this measure. Those who were members of the committee on marine and fisheries are well aware of the bases for these criticisms. The fishermen have had an opportunity now to appear before the committee and make their views known. This is something they had wanted for a considerable length of time, and I am sure it is something that should have been granted to them.

There are two or three main criticisms, and these have been referred to by other speakers. One was the failure of the government to specify the geographical coordinates. As has been pointed out by the Secretary of State for External Affairs this is something he feels would have interfered with the negotiations that are currently under way. The other main criticism, it seems to me, was the somewhat indefinite position in which we still find ourselves relevant to the existing fishing rights. These have been divided into two, the treaty rights and the historic fishing rights. I believe we were advised that so far as the treaty rights are concerned they are exercised to a very limited degree at present, and I am of the opinion that something could and should have been done with respect to renegotiation of these treaties. Just because they have been in effect so long, and because the other parties may not have appreciated the issues being raised, this constitutes no reason why they should not be renegotiated. Some of the arguments submitted by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni are very relevant and the minister should take them under advisement.

The historic rights issue has been discussed at some length, particularly the phasing out period, and another matter raised was the limitation regarding catches. I imagine these are some of the things the minister will take into consideration and work out in the process of negotiation.

We have every right to expect that the government with courage and tenacity will maintain the rights which are essentially and undeniably Canadian. Perhaps we should take that for granted, but I just want to remind the minister that we expect him, and those associated with him, to maintain our position in every respect so far as Canadian rights are concerned. While this bill is not completely satisfactory we believe it is in the best interests of Canada and Canadians that it be passed. Therefore we are giving it our support with the expectation that, as weaknesses and flaws show up in the future, amendments will be introduced to bring the bill more in line with the needs of the Canadian people.

[Translation]

Mr. Bélanger: I shall be very brief, Mr. Chairman. I just want to say a few words to show where our party stands on this bill.

If I rise to speak on this matter, it is because I was one of my party's representatives on the committee on marine and fisheries and I am aware of all the discussions that took place there when that committee dealt with Bill No. S-17.

Now, I should like to point out that we are not altogether satisfied with the manner in which the Canadian fishing zone limits were set. We would have liked those zones to be much larger, but we understood the reasons given to us afterwards, according to which it is better to leave things as they are for the moment, while reserving the right to claim wider limits at the next opportunity.

[Mr. Patterson.]

I also believe that the legislation governing fish conservation which has been established and is in force in Canada is not adequately protected by this bill. In my opinion, the government should have been stricter and more to the point, if I may put it this way, when asking the other nations to observe the fishery regulations in effect in Canada, which is absolutely essential if our fisheries are to be preserved. After all, fisheries are a very important source of income for Canada and they should not be ruined. Therefore, legislation on conservation of Canadian fisheries must be enforced and we must forbid other nations to fish as they wish regardless of our legislation. We should be tougher in this field.

On the other hand, I would also have liked to see a firmer bill as far as historic and treaty rights are concerned. Canada should not take provocative steps towards other nations, but rather a firm attitude and indicate, first, through diplomatic channels, and then by firmer action, that these historical rights are more or less outdated and should not hinder the Canadian fishing trade.

It is with that in mind and also in order not to prolong this debate unnecessarily that we have decided to support Bill No. S-17, as drafted. As stated by the hon. member who spoke before me, we reserve the right to come back to this subject in a little while when the arrangements made by the government and the treaties entered upon between the government and other nations are known.

It is, therefore, with that in mind that, unanimously, we are going to vote in favour of the bill.

Mr. Chatterton: I expect that this bill will be carried this afternoon, but hon. members on the other side should not be in such a hurry because we find it our duty at all times to bring to the attention of the people of Canada how legislation which the government produces varies from the legislation that the Liberal party promised during the last election. This package bill, No. S-17, is not what the Liberal party promised, at least on the west coast, during the last election.

I had occasion to go home a few days ago and met with a small group of commercial fishermen in the Sooke area. After dealing with the subject I went there to cover, I asked them what they thought about this bill. One of the fishermen said: "You know, George, I am a New Democratic party man but in the last election I voted Liberal because the Liberals promised us that they would take their courage in their hands and establish unilaterally a 12 mile effective fishing zone based on straight lines from headland to headland, and we assumed that shortly after they came into power we would know, for instance, that Hecate strait, Queen Charlotte sound and Dixon entrance would be Canadian waters." This is just another example of how the Liberals promise one thing and deliver something completely different.

For example, I have before me the famous full page advertisement from the Daily Colonist of Victoria, B.C., dated March 31, 1963. I could spend an hour describing the promises the Liberals made in this full page advertisement, and what they have already stated they are not going to carry out, apart from what they will not carry out but have not said so. They said they were going to introduce N.H.A. loans on existing housing. They brought in N.H.A. loans on existing housing, but only in urban renewal areas.

Mr. Winkler: Designated areas.

Mr. Chatterton: In designated areas, so that they can go back to the people and say they fulfilled their promise. I am sorry the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) is not in his seat at the moment because I well remember during the last election at all-candidates meetings this question of the 12 mile limit came up. It was an important issue on the west coast, and the Liberals decried the efforts of the previous government when we tried to tell the people that the 12 mile zone could only be effective if it were negotiated, at least so far as historic rights are concerned. But the Liberal party made it clear it would establish a 12 mile limit, based on straight base lines from headland to headland. That is not what has been done.

All this bill will do is establish a 12 mile fishing limit based on the sinuosities of the coast. The important matters, the matters with which our commercial fishermen are most concerned, are not covered in this legislation at all. There is no indication where the co-ordinates from which the base lines will be measured will be. Even a reference to the term "headland" might have been an improvement. There is no mention of what will happen to the historic or traditional rights. There is not even an indication that there will be a phasing out of these rights.

We maintain that the only effective way of establishing a limit is by international agreement, and we came very close to achieving that agreement in 1961 in the United Nations. We failed by one vote to secure the two thirds majority which would have made our proposal effective in international law. I know, of course, that there was a slight difference—the distances involved were six miles and six miles rather than three miles and nine miles, but the principle was the same. I believe the only reason we did not get the one vote we needed was because the delegate from India buckled under pressure from the Soviet union.

I should like the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he closes the debate to tell us in detail what efforts the present government has made to try to get support from various nations, should this question again arise in the United Nations. I remember so well Hon. Howard Green, the former secretary of state for external affairs who did so much for this country, telling us of the efforts he had made to try to get agreement in the United Nations on an effective six and six mile formula. I should like the hon. gentleman to tell us what the present government is doing in this regard. He should tell us whether he intends to continue efforts in the United Nations to reach agreement on some formula, either the previous one of six and six or the present one of three and nine, to be accepted by the United Nations so that it may become international law binding on all members.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs repeatedly told the committee on marine and fisheries that the passage of this bill would strengthen the hands of our negotiators in their dealings with other countries on the question of historic and traditional rights. But he did not explain how this bill would help them, or at least I did not gather from his statements in what way specifically it would strengthen the hands of the government in negotiating as to these rights. I hope the hon. gentleman when he closes the debate will give us some specific information as to how the passage of this bill would help.

We intend to support this bill because it is a step, though only a doddering step, in the right direction. If, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs says, its passage will strengthen the hands of the government in negotiation, why was it not brought forward in the first 60 days of decision? Why wait for 400 days? There must I presume have been negotiations throughout this period. If they now believe passage of this bill will strengthen their hands, why did they not bring it forward in the first 60 days so that their hands would have been strengthened during the past 340 days? It is hard for me to understand why they have waited so long.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs said he hoped negotiations with regard to the inclusions, the co-ordinates and so on would be completed within a matter of months. Why in that case could we not have waited until at least the major features of these negotiations have been settled and included in the bill? As it is now, the matters left to the governor in council are vastly more significant than the proclamation contained in clause 4 itself which would only establish this 12 mile limit based on sinuosities. As to the matter of the co-ordinates and inclusions, this bill could at least have said what the intentions are with regard to the Dixon entrance, Queen Charlotte sound, Hecate strait, the gulf of St. Lawrence, the straits of Belle Isle and the bay of Fundy. Surely these could have been specified in the bill before us. As it is we have nothing to go on except the statement of the minister that he hopes the negotiations with these other countries will be concluded in a matter of months.

I support this bill, but again I make the point that it is not what the people of Canada were led to believe in the last election this government would produce. It is one of many examples of how the Liberal government misled the people by promising something they knew they could not deliver. In my opinion the main purpose of this bill is to make the people believe that the Liberal government has fulfilled its promise in this regard. There are so many promises they have not fulfilled that they are obliged to make use of every opportunity to make it appear, at least, that they have carried out their undertakings.

Mr. Prittie: My remarks will not be unlike those of the previous speaker. The main effect of this bill will be to improve Liberal party pamphlets in the next election. Hon. members opposite will be able to put out pamphlets in the maritime provinces and British Columbia saying: We promised a bill to establish a 12 mile fishing limit; we have kept that promise; here it is. There is a similarity here to what happened in the case of the promised bursaries for students. In the end we got a lesser measure to provide a student loans fund. Both are bills with fine titles but little substance.

[Mr. Chatterton.]

Members of the two major parties represented in this house sometimes say to us in the New Democratic party: You make these promises because you know you will never be in power and in a position to carry them out. I should like to say that these people who have had long experience of power should be a little more responsible; they should either tone down their promises or else carry them out. In this case, extravagant promises were made to the fishermen and as a result the fishermen believed this bill would be much stronger than the one which has been presented to us. In my view the measure before us has little substance because the government has no intention of interfering in any way with the historic rights enjoyed by the United States. It will, I imagine, keep out some countries which do relatively little fishing. But it will have little or no effect upon the country which is mainly concerned, that is, the United States.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni made some reference in his speech to being daring. The hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean), it seems to me, made it apparent he does not want to be daring, especially with regard to the United States, and he was frank in saying so. I do not think the government intends to be daring in its dealings with the United States, either, but they do not say so. They give us the form of the bill without its substance and I am sure the substance will not be filled in later, as we are led to expect.

I agree though that this measure poses a problem for an opposition member. Here again it resembles the proposed student loans bill. It is much less than was promised, but who is going to be on record as voting against student loans? My colleagues do not propose to vote against this measure. It is a small measure, though, and we regret that it does nothing at all to improve the position of Canadian fishermen, particularly those on the west coast.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss the aspects of this bill in the light of something which I think perhaps the minister and his advisers have completely overlooked in the consequential amendments that are set forth in part II of the bill. I discuss this question on clause 1 because the ramifications attendant upon the bringing into force of these consequential amendments cannot properly be confined to any particular clause of the bill in the committee discussion.

Part II of the bill, as the minister well knows, deals with some consequential amendments and purports—I believe, without due notice to the public—to amend six acts. One of these is the Aeronautics Act, another is the Canada Shipping Act, as well as the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, and the Fisheries Act. I want to be specific about the Aeronautics Act, because I have given this matter some considerable study. In view of the very broad terms of clause 2 of Bill No. S-17, this singling out, as it were, of only the acts specifically named in part II of the bill must be—this is my conclusion, at any rate, and perhaps the minister can set me right if I am wrong—because this new bill, S-17, refers to "territorial sea" whereas the acts which are enumerated in part II of Bill No. S-17 refer to "territorial waters", "Canadian waters", "three nautical miles", "waters of Canada", and like expressions. These expressions are used respectively in the acts specifically set out in part II of the bill. I refer to the acts which are being consequentially amended.

If the acts listed in part II are required to be amended consequentially; if it is necessary that they be amended consequentially, then I would submit to the minister and his advisers that there are many other Canadian statutes—and statutes implementing treaties, incidentally—as well as treaties themselves, to which Canada is at least a signatory, which would also require amendment.

I am going to give just one or two very brief examples. Again, Mr. Chairman, these are examples with which I am familiar. The first one I would like to put to the minister is the bill that is, or was, before the other place. I am not sure whether it is still before the Senate. I refer to Bill No. S-25, an act respecting the Geneva conventions, 1949. The minister will note that in article 91 at page 78 of Bill No. S-25, in paragraph 3 the expression "territorial waters" is used. Why should not this treaty be amended, if the Aeronautics Act, which also refers to "territorial waters", is being amended? This argument applies also to the other five specific statutes set out in part II of Bill No. S-17. The only answer I can conclude as being correct is that one cannot very easily amend a treaty that Canada has already signed.

Mr. Robichaud: That is exactly the point.

Mr. Nielsen: The minister says this is the point. Then this seems to be very inconsistent, since there are many other treaties to which Canada is a signatory, and which may or may not have become law in Canada by an act of parliament, which refer to "territorial waters".

A further example is section 2 of article VIII of the convention on international civil aviation, 1944, signed by Canada. This is commonly called the Chicago treaty. I would like to read from a copy of that treaty which I have in my hand, for the benefit of the minister and so it will be on the record. I shall read section 2 of article VIII, which sets forth:

> For the purposes of this agreement the territory of a state—

And Canada is one such state:

> —shall be deemed to be the land areas and territorial waters adjacent thereto under the sovereignty, suzerainty, protection or mandate of such state.

Again, Mr. Chairman, the minister will note that the expression "territorial waters" is used. This seems to be directly in conflict with the proposed amendments to the Aeronautics Act which Bill No. S-17 attempts to bring about by part II. I would be very interested in the explanation of the minister's advisers, or the Minister of Justice, as he is in the chamber, on this very point. I see that the Minister of Justice is leaving the chamber, perhaps the point is not nice enough. It was under the Chicago treaty, that I have mentioned, that the international civil aviation organization, as the minister knows, was set up with offices and headquarters in Montreal. It seems to me that unless this bill, to be consistent, goes on to amend by an act of parliament these other treaties to which Canada is a signatory, what we are doing is bringing about the application of the breaking of a treaty. That is the only conclusion to which I can come. Perhaps the minister has a logical explanation for this, and if he has I would be very glad to hear it.

Another statute, with which I am sure the minister is familiar, is the Admiralty Act, which is to be found in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, volume 1, chapter 1. In section 18(1) this act adopts the law of England. In the law of England the expression which is and has been long established is "territorial waters" or "three mile limit". Why has the Admiralty Act not been amended, as well as many other acts and treaties in which the expression "territorial waters" or similar expressions are used? Does clause 2 of Bill No. S-17—to put the specific question to the minister—cover this situation? Does clause 2, or do any of the provisions of this bill, cover this situation? I cannot find how they do, but perhaps the minister can tell us whether the provisions of this bill affect the provisions of the Admiralty Act, which I have mentioned, as it now exists. If not, then should not amendments consequential be brought in, to maintain consistency here? It would seem that if it is not covered in the bill, we are looking forward to a very sorry mess indeed in our admiralty law and jurisdiction.

With these few examples I am sure the minister can readily see that the action intended by Bill No. S-17—this is my view, at any rate—has not been fully thought out and studied as to all the repercussions it might have both internally and internationally. If the bill is allowed to stand in its present form, I am sure these repercussions will occur, particularly with regard to the Aeronautics Act; because of course the amendments that are purported to be made by part II consequentially affect all territorial air spaces above Canadian territorial waters, or territorial sea, which is the new expression that Bill No. S-17 uses.

In my view the wording of Bill No. S-17 would permit the establishment by order in council of dual, triple or multiple jurisdiction over these proposed new extensions to the well established international law covered by the expression "territorial waters" or "three mile limit", as for instance is used in the Admiralty Act. There could be one territorial sea for fishing, one territorial sea for shipping, and yet another territorial sea for aeronautics purposes. Under Bill No. S-17, "an act of state", to use that expression—and I use the expression in quotation marks—we will have the first Canadian unilateral acquisition of territory or parts of the sea by an act of state since confederation, except by specific agreement or by treaty, and Canada is setting, I feel—and this is my own personal, professional view—a bad example for the rest of the world. As an example—I am sure the minister will see the analogy—if Indonesia, using Canada's example as set forth in Bill S-17 as a precedent, did something similar the freedom of the sea and the air, and shipping and air flights, would all be cut off from the Pacific ocean to the Indian ocean. So you could draw similar analogies with any other state using Bill S-17 for a precedent with respect to treaties such as the Chicago treaty.

To my understanding of the expression "act of state", it means an act of aggression. It is an act of acquisition or a declaration of war against other states, and it is not to be entered into casually. I am being serious here. I do not mean to infer that Bill S-17 will cause any wars, but if the minister has referred to the specific definition of the expression "act of state" I think he will agree with me that such a unilateral act is an act of state if it abrogates any existing treaty. If such an act of state occurs, in essence it is action against another state. It is action which should not be entered into casually or without studying real necessities as opposed to all the possible dangers inherent in the taking of such action. It is, the minister will agree with me, a unilateral piece of legislation.

I do not think the minister has agreed, in regard to specific assurances from any other states that the action proposed in this bill is going to be accepted, not to confine this objection to fisheries but to broaden it and examine the effect it will have on international air traffic in the country. The further point can be made that the Statute of Westminster of 1931 might have given our country the right to legislate beyond its jurisdiction; but if so it must specifically repeal the law set out in the territorial waters act of England, which Canada has followed to date. In this connection I would refer the minister to the prefix to the statutes of Canada 1930, second session 1931, the 21st and 22nd years of George V, which sets out the power conferred on Canada. I see no such consequential amendment in part II to this bill which will alter that situation. I should like to quote very briefly from that prefix, to put it on the record:

> No law and no provision of any law made after the commencement of this act by the parliament of a dominion shall be void or inoperative on the ground that it is repugnant to the law of England, or to the provisions if any existing or future act of parliament of the United Kingdom or to any order, rule or regulation made under such act, and the powers of the parliament of a dominion shall include the power to repeal or amend any such act, order or regulation, in so far as the same is part of the law of the dominion.

There is no doubt that the admiralty law of England applies in Canada. Section 18(1), which I have already quoted to the minister, says so. It says that the law of England includes the territorial waters act—that is, the three mile limit—and all other laws. Therefore, Canada has specifically to repeal those laws—and this is the nub of my point—if it is going to set up a new territorial sea. Canada must then establish a new set of laws to replace the admiralty law of England, to follow the matter out to a logical conclusion. The Admiralty Act of 1952, Revised Statutes of Canada, section 18(1), is in direct conflict, in my submission, with this present bill.

I am sure the minister can see, as can other members, that the question is indeed involved, and that one simply cannot accept the statement that the six acts listed exhaust the acts of parliament which must be amended consequentially in order to implement the intention of the provisions of this bill. For instance, supposing under clause 2 that the governor in council selected Sable island as the geographical point as described therein from which to calculate base lines. The situation which would then arise would be that all of the territorial seas—and I see the minister is shaking his head, and I understood in committee that the assurance was given that this will not be done. But I do not think that this assurance is enough. While the minister probably has the assurances of his cabinet colleagues now, this in turn does not assure the people of the country of our international friends that some future government might not take action under clause 2 of this bill and use Sable island as a geographical point.

To conclude my example, if this were done and Sable island were so used it would mean that all the air space between Sable island and Halifax would become Canadian air space. If the amendments to what was Bill No. C-117 which was before the house last session to amend the Aeronautics Act—and this measure is again on the order paper this session—were to pass, every international carrier flying between New York and Prestwick would be subject to overflight charges; and I am sure that is not the result the minister wants. Strange as it may seem, the consequential amendments to the fisheries bill before us would have this very effect on the aeronautical activities of world aviation companies flying into, out of and near Canadian land, water and air space.

Therefore I would urge the minister to consider if nothing else an amendment—I am not going to propose an amendment in this regard—to clause 2 of this bill which would exclude Sable island, say—and this gives rise to the only situation that I can imagine can result in the effect I have described—from the operation of that clause, so there will be no doubts in the minds of international air carriers who are parties to the Chicago treaty that there will ever be any attempts by a Canadian government to say that the air space between Sable island and Nova Scotia, or Sable island and Halifax, or any area in between there, is going to be considered Canadian air space for the purposes of subsequent legislation, like that which is going to be brought before the house by way of amendment to the Aeronautics Act, and which would subject international air flights to overflight fees and charges.

I can assure the minister that I have devoted a good deal of study to an examination of this particular problem, and I think that the effect of the amendments to the Fisheries Act and the consequential amendments set forth in part II, and specifically the inclusion of the Aeronautics Act, will have this undesirable effect which I am sure the minister does not want. He could cure it very easily by adopting on behalf of the government the amendment I have suggested. By so doing he would certainly set the international aviation industry at rest, and such a small amendment would not alter the substantive provisions of the bill in any way.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak on this measure I wish to state that I am in agreement with the basic principle of the bill. The bill states this in clause 2:

> Every provision of this act extends and applies to every act of the parliament of Canada, now or hereafter passed, and to every order, rule or regulation thereunder, except in so far as any such provision is inconsistent with the intent or object of such act, order, rule or regulation, or would give to any word, expression or clause thereof an interpretation repugnant to the subject matter or context, or is, in any such act, order, rule or regulation, declared not applicable thereto.

In view of that statement, Mr. Chairman, I would refer to clause 12 of Bill No. S-17 where under subclause 3 of that clause section 31 of the Fisheries Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

> No one shall leave any port or place in Canada to fish outside Canadian fisheries waters for fish the catching of which is at such time prohibited in the Canadian fisheries waters opposite to or nearest the place where such person proposes to fish, and no one shall bring into Canada any fish caught outside Canadian fisheries waters when fishing for such fish is prohibited inside the Canadian fisheries waters opposite or nearest to the place where such fish was caught, or shall bring into Canada any vessels, boats, nets, fishing gear, implements or appliances used in such fishing.

In checking the original section in the Fisheries Act I find that the words "territorial waters of Canada" have been changed in the wording in the bill to read "Canadian fisheries waters". However, I believe this entire section should be amended as it discriminates against Canadian fishermen, and when we are dealing with the clause by clause study of the bill I intend to move an amendment.

I say it is discriminatory because at the present time the dragging of scallops is prohibited in two specific areas off the coast of Nova Scotia at certain times of the year. Under the fisheries regulations, which are designed to conserve the inshore fisheries, no person is permitted to fish for scallops within seven nautical miles of the counties of Annapolis and Digby from May 1 to August 31. The same law applies to Lunenburg county, where no person shall be permitted to fish for scallops within seven nautical miles of the coast of Lunenburg county between May 1 and October 31.

The Fisheries Act, in which section 31 is found, is dated 1932, and if this clause was enforced by the federal Department of Fisheries it would result in the Lunenburg county deep sea scallop fleet being tied up to the wharves each year from May 1 to October 31. It could also result in the curtailment of operations of any deep sea scallop dragger operating out of Annapolis and Digby counties from May 1 to August 31. In my opinion this is a form of discrimination against Canadian fishermen and Nova Scotia fishermen in particular.

Nova Scotia today is truly the scallop province of Canada, for our ships now account for at least 98 per cent of all Canadian scallop production. As a result of the Conservative government's shipbuilding assistance program, our fleet of scallop draggers has increased to 40 in the last three years, with more being launched every month. As might be expected, the catch per boat has declined as the fleet has increased in numbers, but despite this fact the scallop fishermen along the coast of Nova Scotia are still earning a good living through hard work at this particular type of deep sea fishery.

To give the committee some idea of the vast expansion which has taken place in this industry, I point out that in the year 1953 the entire catch of scallops in Nova Scotia amounted to a mere 1½ million pounds, worth less than half a million dollars to the fishermen. In 1963 over 16 million pounds of scallops were landed, with a value in excess of $6 million to the fishermen, representing increases in both weight and value of well over 1,000 per cent in the short space of 10 years. With the Canadian market consuming less than one fifth of our annual scallop production, we are obliged to rely very heavily on the United States market. Even though the American fishing fleet has an annual production of some 25 million pounds, three quarters of which comes from the New Bedford, Massachusetts fleet there is still an annual scallop consumption in the United States of approximately 40 million pounds. This gives the committee some idea of the terrific potential in this industry and, of course, our heavy exports of scallops help toward bringing our balance of payments in line with the United States.

[Mr. Crouse.]

In my opinion section 31 of the Fisheries Act, stating that fish are not to be caught outside territorial waters when catching is forbidden in territorial waters, may have had some value in 1932, but times have changed and the terrific growth in the deep sea scallop industry alone since 1953 would indicate that a change in the act is long overdue. The minister or his officials may point out that no one has been fined or had his fishing licence cancelled under this regulation. However, if it was enforced today the scallop fleet operating out of Lunenburg county could be legally tied up from May 1 until October 31, thereby creating untold financial hardship in this industry. In my opinion this section of the act not only discriminates against the scallop fishermen but also prevents the establishment of a deep sea lobster industry in Nova Scotia.

As most hon. members are aware, Nova Scotia is divided into lobster fishing zones and at the present time zones 6A and 6B, which lie between the high capes around the tip of Cape Breton island to point Michaud, are the only places in which lobsters may be legally caught up to July 15. Most of the other zones are closed on June 30. Zone 4 takes in an area from Cole Harbour in Guysborough county along the south shore of Nova Scotia, which includes Halifax county, Lunenburg county, Queens, Shelburne, Yarmouth and Digby counties, and the fishermen are only permitted to catch lobsters in zone 4 from December 1 to May 31. During the remaining six months of the year lobsters cannot be caught and landed legally in this area, and this applies not only to lobsters caught on the inshore grounds but also to any lobsters that may be caught by a deep sea fisherman. Nova Scotia fishermen are thereby prohibited under clause 31 of the Fisheries Act of 1932 from exploiting a deep sea lobster fishery on Georges and Browns banks that could well be worth over $1 million per year in landed value to the fishermen.

In 1963 the landed value of all fish caught in Nova Scotia amounted to $35 million, which represents an increase of $12 million over 10 years ago. Of this total, an estimated 36 million pounds of lobsters brought in almost $18 million to our fishermen. Lobsters, therefore, are the greatest dollar earner for our fishermen, with scallops in second place. However, in my opinion we are only scratching the surface of the lobster industry because due to prohibitive regulations we are not taking advantage of the opportunities offered by the deep sea lobster fishery. We know that a great market exists for lobsters both in North America and in Europe. Because of its economic importance, considerable interest is attached to this creature both by the fishing industry and the fisheries research scientists.

While much has been learned about this strange creature, there is still a lot more to be discovered. We know that lobster stocks occupy thousands of square miles of open coastal waters, and these could well be called our inshore lobster population. We also know that lobsters can be caught in our offshore waters from 100 to 200 fathoms deep in an area south of Georges bank approximately 100 miles from Yarmouth, Nova Scotia. What we do not know is the relation between these two lobster populations.

Some marine biologists claim there are actually two distinct lobster populations, while others claim that lobsters hatched in the deep waters offshore are carried by strong currents, while in the larvae or free swimming stage, and that these lobsters help to populate the inshore banks. Because of the efforts of the research ships located at the oceanographic base established at Bedford basin, Halifax county, by the previous Conservative administration, we are gradually learning more about the habits of the lobster and about the food and disease that affect both his growth and survival. Common sense tells us that it is wise to carry out conservation measures on our inshore lobster fishing grounds in order to assure relatively good catches and income to our lobster fishermen. However, I question the soundness of carrying out a conservation policy on deep sea lobsters which, in effect, applies only to any potential Canadian deep sea lobster fishermen, while leaving the grounds wide open to fishermen from any other nation wishing to exploit them.

This is what is happening under clause 31, which actually restricts Canadian fishermen from landing deep sea caught lobsters at any point in Nova Scotia for approximately six months of the year. However, while we are conserving the supply of large lobsters on Georges bank, there are at least a dozen United States deep sea lobster draggers operating out of Sandwich, Plymouth and New Bedford-Fairhaven, providing employment to approximately 75 fishermen.

According to the last bureau of commercial fisheries statistics in the United States, the offshore lobster fisheries were worth more than $1 million to New Bedford fishermen last year. In January of 1964, the catch of deep sea lobster draggers totalled 161,000 pounds with a landed value to the United States fishermen for that month in the vicinity of $94,000.

Now, these lobsters are large in size, with many of them ranging from 12 to 20 pounds in weight. This would indicate good feeding and growing conditions in that area of the ocean.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order, if the hon. member would allow me. This whole statement he is making is an objection to section 31 of the Fisheries Act and is not relevant to the bill we are discussing. If the hon. member will look at section 31, as it now stands, he will find there is no change that would affect the fishermen, whether they are fishing for scallops or lobsters. There is no change in the section except the words "territorial waters" appear instead of "territorial sea". In so far as the fishermen are concerned there is no change in section 31.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Chairman, quite frankly I am rather surprised that the minister would intervene on this particular point. While I agree with what he has stated, I would point out also that at the outset of my remarks I referred to the fact the bill states that every provision of the act applies to every act of the parliament of Canada, and so on. He and his government, in their wisdom, thought it necessary to introduce an amendment to the Fisheries Act changing the words from "territorial waters of Canada", to "Canadian fisheries waters of Canada". By introducing the 12 mile limit, they are extending the territorial waters of Canada, I mean extending the fishing waters of Canada, an additional nine miles. I believe my remarks are quite relevant. I feel that this is an opportune time to correct an inequity that has been troubling Canadian fishermen, as I said, and Nova Scotia fishermen in particular since 1932. This is the reason I am making this statement, and I have only a few more comments to make relevant to these changes which I hope will be accepted when an amendment is proposed later.

As I stated, the deep sea lobster industry is a business that has been growing and expanding. In my opinion, our research ships, which are making new discoveries on the ocean floor every day, are certain to find other stocks of deep sea lobsters on the vast offshore banks adjacent to Nova Scotia. At present, we are unaware of any conservation measures being taken on the high seas. Are the berried or seed lobsters being returned to the ocean, or are they being retained, thereby destroying hundreds of potential lobsters? Is the present dragging method destroying the grounds? Would it more advisable to set traps at sea similar to those used close to shore? These are questions that could be raised at meetings of the international commission for the north Atlantic fisheries, and early steps could be taken towards deep sea lobster conservation at the international level.

In the meantime, Nova Scotia needs new industries, and since the fisheries was one of the province's first industries its role in our economy is sometimes taken for granted. Generally speaking, the expansion of an old industry does not attract as much public notice as is the case when a new industry comes into being. However, I believe that the lobster industry in Nova Scotia can be developed and expanded by the harvesting of deep sea lobsters on our offshore banks and the first step necessary is to remove any discriminatory regulations that might deter enterprising Nova Scotians from developing this industry. Since clause 31 of the Fisheries Act has served as a road block to our economic fisheries expansion, it is my intention to move an amendment to this section of the bill when we start clause by clause study later in the committee.

Mr. Mather: The New Democratic party, in line with important sections of the British Columbia fishing industry, has long made clear its desire to see the establishment of a Canadian fishing zone. Likewise, we have long made clear our very grave misgivings of the type of substitute for effective legislation which has been produced by the government in the legislation before us. It is a pretty "fishy" sort of substitute.

I feel that we want to see in Canada a "made in Canada" fishing zone bill which would assure a basis upon which Canadian fishermen and the Canadian fishing industry could operate in the knowledge that they would have the right to the fishing resources inside that area and not do as this legislation does, leave rights in perpetuity to other, non-Canadian powers. This is a principle we have put forward and which has been put forward by many sections of the fishing industry in British Columbia. It is in line with the stand taken by several other nations which has imposed and established a similar fishing zone. We certainly concede it is necessary to negotiate with the other powers who have or claim to have historic rights or treaty rights which give their nationals a right to exploit Canadian fishing waters. However some of those treaties were signed on behalf of Canada more than a hundred years ago when, really, there was no Canada to negotiate for Canada.

Our opinion is that we should go ahead, as some other nations have done, establish our zone, then notify all other nations we are doing so and ask those who complain or object to come to us and negotiate on their own behalf. We think our prime interest is to establish a Canadian fishing zone for Canadians. This has been the policy of this party for years, both the C.C.F. and the New Democratic party. In 1963 and again in 1964, I personally moved Bill No. C-27 to establish a Canadian 12 mile fishing zone in line with the policy I have briefly outlined. This bill was talked out on both occasions. I might say that it was the same bill my colleague, the hon. member for Skeena, moved in this house in 1962. I think it is rather interesting, Mr. Chairman, to look back briefly at the discussion that took place at that time, as represented in Hansard, when the hon. member for Skeena moved his bill to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act and establish a 12 mile fishing limit. This was in January, 1962, and had his bill been passed at that time it would have come into effect this month, in 1964. On rereading the text of that debate in Hansard I find there are two very brief quotations I would like to put on the record at this time.

As recorded at page 379 of Hansard for January 30, 1962, the hon. member for Skeena said:

> In my opinion we should not sacrifice the interests of our fishermen any longer. We should not allow the attitude of the United States in this regard to influence us to the extent that we do nohing about this most important question.

As recorded at page 381 of Hansard of the same date the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who is now the Minister of Transport, said:

> I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) both on the bill and on the very moderate and reasonable presentation he made of it. In saying that I am speaking for my party and I assert that we support the bill without reservation.

Further on, as recorded at page 384 of Hansard, he added:

> I am not very impressed by the dangers which it is suggested might arise from an attempt to enforce this. After all, if Iceland and Norway have been able to do this by unilateral action it is hard to persuade me that the Canadian people, if they had a resolute government which could make up its mind about anything, would have any difficulty in doing the same.

I do not want to prolong discussion of this legislation. I do not think I could say anything more striking or forceful in support of the establishment of a real 12 mile Canadian fishing zone than to repeat the words of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate which I have just quoted. There is a question in my mind and the minds of many fishermen on the west coast as to whether this bill will do more harm than good. It is a very wishy-washy piece of legislation.

Mr. Coates: There does not seem to be a great deal of difference between the views expressed by the hon. member for New Westminster and those of other hon. members with regard to this bill. All members are concerned about the permissive aspects of the legislation, as well as about the diluted form in which we find it as compared with what was promised during the 1963 election campaign. The hon. member for New Westminster has described it as diluted, as wishy-washy, and certainly no one can disagree with him on that point. It is diluted in every possible way.

Views were expressed before the bill was presented that there might be grave concern on the part of nations who fish in the areas involved, but now that we know what the government intends, that concern has been eliminated because there does not seem to be any real change in the status of those nations. Indeed the only thing the bill will accomplish with respect to the fishing rights of various countries is that any new countries which plan to move into the stipulated areas might be stopped from doing so, and I would think from the government's attitude to date that it would find some means of covering them as well.

I would urge the Minister of Fisheries to give serious consideration to the proposal placed before him by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg. When the hon. member was endeavouring to bring a very glaring inequity in the legislation to his attention, in the hope that he might give consideration to eliminating it, the minister rose on a point of order, in effect saying that though this was an obvious injustice to the fishermen in Nova Scotia, the hon. member should not talk about it. Instead of that the minister should have said: "Well, this is a very important matter. It will mean the further development of fisheries in Nova Scotia and I will certainly look upon this amendment, when it is moved, with every possible consideration in the hope that I might assist in the further development of the fisheries in this province, which is so very important to the economy not only of Nova Scotia but of Canada generally."

This bill is not the type of legislation that the Canadian people expected. It is not the type of legislation that results from responsible government. When we were in office we took the responsible point of view and endeavoured to secure international agreement that would bring into effect an international 12 mile fishing zone that would be observed by all and argued against by none. In our attitude we gave no concern to anyone about a gunboat philosophy being promoted. But, as I say, once those who were concerned see this bill, I do not think there will be any concern on their part any longer.

We took every possible step to bring about a 12 mile fishing zone. Unfortunately, while we came very close—so close that it is hard to imagine we could have lost, having lost by only half a vote. It was not our fault that this happened, and had we desired to do so we could then have introduced this wishy-washy piece of legislation without any difficulty at all.

The great problem is that this legislation, like so many of the things surrounding the promises made to the electorate in 1963, is another gimmick to say to the Canadian people: "We did what we told you we were going to do during the election campaign, even though it is not the same as what we described, but it is something more than you had when we took office."

There cannot be any strong opposition to this bill because there is not anything that is very objectionable about it, now that it has been presented to us. The only objection to it is that there is nothing very effective about it; there is nothing in it of great value to our fishermen.

The bill can stand a lot of improvement and we cannot achieve these improvements until more progress has been made in negotiations with the other countries concerned than has been the case up to date. Many provisions in this measure will not take effect until some time in the future. We do not know how long we shall have to wait. We are told "almost immediately", but we were also told during the election campaign that this bill would be in effect by May 15. Well, here we are in July, still debating the matter. We are told that all the negotiations are not complete as yet. The statement has been made that the process will not be a long one. But that depends on what is meant by "long". We were told it would not be long before a great many other pieces of legislation which were promised in 1963 were put into effect, but people are finding that they have to wait a long time for them, although perhaps in the minds of Liberals it seems short.

I hope the minister will give serious consideration when clause 12 comes up, to the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg. It has a great deal of merit. If adopted, it would provide an incentive to the fishing industry and would be of real benefit to the fishermen and to the economy of Nova Scotia. I certainly hope the minister will not take the narrow view that because this is the way in which things are done today under the Fisheries Act, this is how they are to remain. I hope instead he will take the point of view that this proposal would assist in the development of the fishing industry in Nova Scotia. As I say, I support this amendment. I think it has great merit and our party, the Conservative party, would agree to it.

Mr. Robichaud: Before clause 1 carries, may I be allowed to make some comment on the observations which have been made by hon. members of this committee? First, I should like to excuse my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He had wished to remain in the chamber for the whole of this debate but, unfortunately, he had to leave for very important discussions which had previously been arranged.

I wish to thank the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) for the position he has taken on this bill. I agree with him that all of us would have preferred a multilateral agreement such as the one proposed at the Geneva conference in 1960. But I believe he would also agree with me that when it proved impossible to reach such an agreement we had no choice but to take a position such as we are taking now. There may be some difference of opinion about the stand which is now being adopted. It may not be entirely a unilateral position. The Prime Minister made it clear on June 5 of last year when he said in his announcement to the house that it was the intention of the government to take action with reference to the implementation of a 12 mile fishing zone and introduce a territorial sea which would be based on a line drawn from headland to headland. But he also stated that this would be done after a certain amount of discussion with countries who are interested in the fishing around our shores.

I want to assure the hon. member that I am not one of those who are trying to blame previous administrations, whether the one directly previous to the present government or any of those which preceded it. I know that all previous governments have made every effort to establish fishing zones which would be satisfactory to our Canadian fishing interests. I also wish to join with the hon. member in expressing my appreciation of the work of the senior civil servants who have taken part in the negotiations on behalf of Canada, and I refer not only to the present negotiations but to those which took place in Geneva during the 1960 convention.

The hon. member also made reference to an article originated in Washington suggesting that Canada was taking a different stand from the one now set out. If my recollection is correct, the Secretary of State for External Affairs dealt with this point. The situation when Canada was trying to take part in the conclusion of a multilateral agreement was altogether different from that which exists now, when we are taking a position of our own.

As to the statement that the passage of this bill would strengthen our hand, I wish to assure members of the committee that this is so. We are following the practice—

Mr. Barnett: The statement which the hon. gentleman just made has been made by him or by his colleague a number of times, but at no time as far as I can recall has any explanation been given us as to why it would strengthen our hand in these negotiations. I wonder if the minister could be a little more specific on this point before the clause is allowed to pass.

Mr. Robichaud: What has been done is this: In the first phase of our negotiations we made known to the countries interested what our intentions were—where the base lines we had in mind would be established. We also made known to them what areas of water would be affected by such an action. Now that this first phase of negotiation has been completed I feel the knowledge that we have parliamentary approval or enabling legislation giving the government full authority to act in this regard will strengthen the hand of our negotiators.

Reference has also been made to the length of time to be allowed with respect to phasing out operations. In this connection I wish to say we intend to follow accepted international practice; we shall allow the period of time which has been mentioned at various international conferences in this connection, including the Geneva conference. The hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) asked where the co-ordinates might be. If not today, then on a previous occasion, he said that co-ordinates could be established at any point, even a point of land or an artificial point of land which could be placed somewhere in the water.

The fact is that it is the intention of the government to follow international practice in this regard. Sable island has been mentioned. But if Sable island were used as the basis for establishing a co-ordinate, it would constitute a departure from the general practice. It would certainly create a large triangle on the south shore of Nova Scotia, an area which would extend maybe for 100 or 125 miles south. I would point out that when any country takes a unilateral position it has to take a position which is acceptable in international law and practice. Such a position could hardly be maintained if Sable island were used.

I cannot agree with the statement made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, to the effect that this bill does not satisfactorily deal with the situation. His complaint was to the effect that the timing of this bill was not right, because it was being introduced when negotiations were still in progress. As I said earlier, Mr. Chairman, now that we have completed the first phase of negotiations I am confident that the passing of this bill will strengthen our hand.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley said that some of the questions that have been asked have not been answered in the way some would have hoped. I want to assure the hon. member that under the present circumstances, while Canada is negotiating with a number of countries, the answers that were given were complete to the fullest extent with regard to information that could be disclosed and made public at the time.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich asked what steps the present government has taken to obtain further support at the United Nations for a multilateral agreement. I think it is very clear to anyone who is familiar with the situation that every step it was possible to take has been taken. Again, Mr. Chairman, I wish to emphasize that this has been done not only by this government but it was done by the previous administration in trying to renew the discussions that had taken place at Geneva, and it was quite evident that no such negotiations could be carried on.

The hon. member for Yukon has referred to part II of the bill, which singles out certain acts as being affected by this Bill No. S-17. I want to assure the hon. member that the legal advisers of the Department of Justice the Department of External Affairs, the Department of Transport and my own department, the Department of Fisheries, have looked into this question and have included in the bill such changes or amendments that would or could affect existing Canadian legislation. The hon. member referred, for example, to the Geneva convention; he referred to the Chicago treaty. But these are not Canadian acts; they are international conventions. It was not the intention of Bill No. S-17 to introduce amendments that would affect treaties, because it would have taken years and years to renegotiate such treaties; it would have meant re-opening all the treaties which could be effected. What we have done is bring in amendments to those Canadian acts that would or could be affected by this bill. In doing this, Mr. Chairman, Canada has followed the example of a number of other countries. I believe there are at the present time 47 countries which have taken similar action, and most of them, if not all, have taken a similar position to the one that we are taking now.

The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg raised a very important point. My reason for intervening was not to prevent him from completing the remarks he was making at the time, but to bring out the point that his argument related to the Fisheries Act and not actually to Bill No. S-17. For the information of the committee I would like to put on the record the point that was raised before the standing committee on marine and fisheries. This passage will be found in the minutes of proceedings and evidence, No. 4, of that committee, page 206. Mr. Ozere of my department, replying to the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, said:

> I think we are talking about two different things. There is the possibility—and I think Mr. Crouse may have a point—that this section should be amended in order to take care of the situation to which he refers. But it would be a matter for consideration and for the minister to decide, whether as a matter of policy it should be amended. We are now considering only a very small amendment substituting the words "territorial waters" by the words "fishery waters". These are only consequential amendments as they are in any other act that is mentioned.

Mr. Crouse: I fully realize that that is correct, but we can only be governed by the statute or by the law, and I think the law should be revised or amended so that it does not at any time exclude a deep sea operator from scallop or lobster fishing.

Then I said:

I think this goes back to the first point I raised. There may be reasons to amend the Fisheries Act. There may be a reason to amend section 31. I think the point is well taken. But as I said before, this does not affect the present Bill No. S-17. There may be a reason and a very serious one to amend section 31 of the Fisheries Act to take care of provisions such as the one mentioned by Mr. Crouse. I think the government—and I am sure I can speak in its name—would be prepared to do this if such a need occurred. But I feel it does not affect the present bill. I agree with Mr. Crouse that the government should take into consideration amending section 31 of the Fisheries Act if there is such a need.

I can add, Mr. Chairman, that the matter which was raised before the committee at the time is now under consideration. There is a need to examine this section of the Fisheries Act as it now stands. This act, as was mentioned, was passed 32 or 33 years ago in 1931 or 1932. There have been different governments since then. This does not mean that we may not have reached the point where it should be looked into in order to ascertain the necessity for making such amendments. We are considering this possibility. The Statute of Westminster, 1931, clarified Canadian jurisdiction in extraterritorial matters. It may be that this section is no longer needed, and there is a possibility of amendment thereto. I want to assure the hon. member, however, that the matter of revising that section of the Fisheries Act is now under consideration by my department. Furthermore there may also be a possibility of making changes by regulation alone; that is, by changing the existing regulations which come under the Fisheries Act.

I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not feel it would be possible to accept an amendment at this time, although I would like to consider this question and see the amendment before making a final commitment. But just the same, I wish to assure the hon. member now that my department is studying this very important matter which he has raised, and it is our intention, after giving it proper study and consideration, to make any such amendments that would be to the advantage of our own Canadian fishermen.

This is all I want to say at this time, Mr. Chairman, except that I would like to bring to the attention of the committee a correction to an error which was made in the minutes of proceedings and evidence, No. 4, of the standing committee on marine and fisheries in a statement made by Mr. D. F. Miller, president of the Fisheries Council of Canada. Mr. Miller is reported to have said:

Mr. Chairman, with your permission and before any questions are asked I should like to clear up one point.

Mr. Howard, in the debate on this bill in the House of Commons, and the brief from the united fishermen and allied workers union referred to this council as an "employees organization", or words to the effect.

Mr. Bernier here takes a strong exception to that implication, on behalf of the some 3,000 fishermen who make up Quebec united fishermen, a member organization of this council.

What Mr. Miller said, and his text is available to prove it, was that this council is an employers organization, not an "employees", as reported in the evidence.

In conclusion, I hope the committee will see fit to pass this bill, which will prove how important it is for the government to be given the enabling legislation. The government will proceed with the least possible delay to implement the bill. Only at noon today I received a report emanating from Vancouver to the effect that six or eight Russian trawlers were sighted fishing for groundfish in Hecate strait. We immediately asked for an investigation. The investigation is not altogether completed, but according to the information we now have those vessels which were sighted in Hecate strait could be coastguards from the navy checking for a plane which was lost in that particular area yesterday. However, we have had evidence at different times that U.S.S.R. trawlers have been operating off our shores, and as the Secretary of State for External Affairs and myself have stated since the debate on this bill commenced it is urgent that action be taken now. It may be that this bill will not meet the demands of the fishermen or of the fishing industry 100 per cent, but its implemention will improve the situation and give further assurance to the Canadian fishing industry.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, before the minister sits down is he in a position to clear up the question I asked regarding the position of the United States historic fishing rights? I am not speaking of treaty rights now. Are negotiations in progress to fix a date of termination for any of these historic rights which they claim? In other words, will there be a phasing out period, or is the United States totally unaffected by this bill except for the fact that they are acquiescing in the principle of a 12 mile exclusive fishing zone as long as it does not affect them? Is that the position, or has the government been able to convince them that their historic rights should not go on indefinitely?

Mr. Robichaud: I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs and myself have made it clear on different occasions that the historic rights of the fishermen from France and the United States would not be disturbed at this time. I should not say "at this time": they will not be disturbed by the application of this bill.

The hon. member referred to acquiescence. It is very important to Canada that we have the acquiescence of the United States to this bill. There will be another advantage which should be considered and not neglected, and that is the fact that we have made it known that this bill will be followed by certain changes in the Canadian fisheries regulations. If this bill is passed, when it is implemented certain changes will be made which will again give further protection to our fishermen; and we hope that the operations of United States and French fishermen will not be of the type which will discriminate against Canadian fishermen.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Fishing zones.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of questions on this clause with regard to the application of the Fisheries Act, which was under discussion on the first clause. Clause 4 states what the fishing zones of Canada will be, and says that the outer limit of a fishing zone is distant nine nautical miles from the nearest point of the inner limit line. To me this clause has an effect on the Fisheries Act. I hope I am not out of order, but when discussing an amendment to the appropriate section of the Fisheries Act it was argued that only the terminology was being changed. That would be true only if the territorial waters of Canada remained the same, which they will not; and it would be true only if the Fisheries Act applied to territorial waters. However, I think the Fisheries Act applies not only to the territorial waters but to the exclusive fishing zones. Therefore in my judgment this would have quite an effect on the application of the Fisheries Act. That is why, to my belief, the type of amendment suggested by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg is even more necessary, because the present regulations under the Fisheries Act have a much wider application by virtue of this clause than they had before, and therefore the consequences would be greater.

Another point the minister might be able to say something about—I think this is the appropriate place for me to raise it—is this. He mentioned that Russian trawlers were reported at this moment in the Hecate strait. The matter which concerns me in connection with the immediate effect of this bill after it is proclaimed is that it will not change the status of bodies of water like the gulf of St. Lawrence until the base lines are created from the geographical co-ordinates, unless of course the body of water concerned is less than 24 miles across. I know that when the bill is proclaimed it will have some effect by keeping foreign trawlers which have no historic rights 12 miles from the present base lines instead of three miles. But it will have no effect on these special bodies of water which we intend to proclaim national waters. I think we had evidence to this effect from experts, but perhaps the minister might have something to say on that point, although I do not want to hold things up.

Mr. Robichaud: The hon. member referred to clause 4 which describes the fishing zones, and stated that it will have some effect on the application of some of the regulations made under the Fisheries Act. I am prepared to admit that, but what we have done in this bill, particularly in part II, is to make minor or consequential amendments having to do with the description of the territorial sea only.

Those are, as I have said, consequential amendments which had to be made. In so far as the Fisheries Act itself is concerned and the regulations under that act, I want to assure the hon. member that these matters are under consideration at present. It is quite obvious that certain changes will have to be made. As I have stated earlier, we have already studied the situation and we are prepared in the near future to make some changes affecting the operation of Canadian fishing vessels, particularly in those areas where we have a substantial inshore fishery. So I want to assure hon. members that this matter is at present under consideration.

Mr. Nielsen: On clause 5, Mr. Chairman, I was unavoidably out of the house—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) was on clause 4. Is it understood that the committee is still on clause 4? Shall clause 4 carry?

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Lists of geographical co-ordinates.

Mr. Nielsen: As I was saying, I was unavoidably absent when the minister made his explanation with regard to the remarks I made, but I am informed by the hon. member for Peace River that the minister assured the committee that the solicitors of his department and the Department of Justice have given him assurances that the proposed amendment is sufficient. For the reasons which I gave in some detail when we were on clause 1, I am convinced that an assurance by government is not sufficient in this regard. Since Sable island is the only place that I can foresee where this difficulty may arise I believe it should be made an exception to the operation of section 5. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River:

That section 5, subsection 1, be amended by adding thereto immediately after the word "lists" the following words: "save that Sable island shall not be designated or included in any such list".

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, while I have no copy of the amendment I want to repeat what I have said before, that such an amendment is not in order and is not in line with the bill itself. It has been made very clear and it is a well known fact that legislation of this kind having to do with international problems is based on international law. Anyone who is familiar with the geography of the east coast of Nova Scotia will know that Sable island is over 100 miles from the mainland. The 40-odd countries which have taken or are taking a unilateral position have abided by the international practice, and I hope no one would wish to intimate that any government of this country would want to depart from this practice.

If we were to use Sable island as a co-ordinate it would create on the south coast of Nova Scotia a kind of triangle that would extend over 100 miles towards the high seas. When I was questioned about this matter in the committee it was made clear that Sable island, being Canadian territory and owned by Canada, will have its own fishing zone. It will be surrounded by a 12 mile fishing zone. It certainly would not be possible for Canada to apply the straight base line method, as mentioned in the bill, if we were going to use Sable island.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

So we certainly cannot support an amendment of this kind. I want to make it clear again that there is no need whatsoever for such an amendment because it departs entirely from the principle of the bill. It would create a precedent that could be followed by other countries and certainly would be questionable from the point of view of international practice. Therefore we cannot support the amendment.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I think the very fact this amendment has been proposed indicates the rather foolish position into which the government has been drawn by the present terms of clause 5. If the government had done as we have been suggesting and had asked us to establish by act of parliament base line co-ordinates along the lines of the amendment which I attempted to propose in the standing committee, I think it would have been quite clear where we stood. The very fact that it is possible for an amendment of this kind to be brought in indicates one of the basic weaknesses of the present bill.

However, if we were to agree to spell out in the bill that Sable island would be excepted I think our position would be as foolish as the one the government has already taken in the matter of the establishment of the co-ordinates, and under the circumstances might very well be taken as an indication that while we were not going to go out into the ocean to pick Sable island as a co-ordinate it might be our intention to try to find some rock somewhere 100 miles off the west coast of Canada and use that. For that reason I do not feel I can support the amendment.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, I agree with the statement made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. It seems rather strange to inject this one particular area into the bill. If we are going to designate certain areas for inclusion or exclusion it will open up the whole bill. Therefore I do not think the amendment is one that should be supported.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, I just want to say one word in a general way, particularly since the Minister of Justice is present. As far as I can see there is a tendency with regard to the legislation that the government is introducing, of which this is a perfect example, to ask in general terms for more power than is needed for what the government says it has in mind. This is the thing to which we object. As far as section 5 is concerned, whatever the intention of the government is the government will have the power to put one co-ordinate on Sable island, another at Yarmouth and enclose that area. I am not saying for one moment this is their intention. The government has said it is not their intention. Why ask us to give them the power to do this if they are not going to use it? This is the point I am making. This sort of thing is extremely sloppy legislation. It is like someone saying, "We want you to sign a blank cheque because we want you to pay $13." Then, when you suggest that you put a limitation on the cheque, that it is not good for more than $25, they say, "No, trust us; we will not make the figure more than $13; just give us the blank cheque, anyway."

This is an authoritative attitude and seems to indicate they think that parliament can do no harm by giving them any amount of power. I do not want to be unduly contentious about this thing, but it is bad legislation. I want to say that if the government keeps drafting legislation in this way it is inevitable they will run into objections not only in parliament but from people who fear they may be affected by it in a way far beyond the present intention of the government; that is our objection to the thing.

Mr. Barnett: In view of the remarks just made by the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean), I must say that I feel it would have been much more to the point if he and his colleagues had seen fit to support me in introducing in the committee a specific set of co-ordinates which referred to the east and west coasts of Canada. In so far as the east coast of Canada is concerned I named specifically 54 points from the terminal point of the United States-Canadian boundary on the south to a headland on the north. As I suggested, if we had been prepared to report to the house a specific suggestion along that line, then it would have been quite clear that neither the house nor the government in the future could have considered including Sable island as a co-ordinate.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I should like to say that I agree entirely with the objective the hon. member sought to achieve in the committee. The reason we did not support his amendment was that by moving such an amendment, in my judgment, we would be assuming the responsibility of the government. It is the government that must decide where these co-ordinates will be, based upon the advice and technical complications resulting from negotiations with other countries and so on. I want to support the hon. member entirely in his objective, but I do not think that is the way to achieve it. The government should have done this in the first place.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Amendment (Mr. Nielsen) negatived: Yeas, 37; nays, 75.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry?

Mr. Barnett: I should like to have it shown for the record that clause 5 is carried on division.

Clause agreed to, on division.

Clauses 6 to 11 inclusive, agreed to.

On clause 12—Canadian fisheries waters.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to delay the passage of this bill. I very much appreciate the minister's comments relative to my remarks concerning section 31 which is referred to in clause 12 of the bill. However, as stated during my recent remarks, under the fisheries regulations designed to conserve inshore fisheries, no person is permitted to fish for scallops within seven nautical miles off the shores of Annapolis, Digby or Lunenburg counties between May 1 and October 31. If the Fisheries Act in which clause 31 is contained, passed in 1932, is enforced, it would result in the Lunenburg county deep sea scallop fleet being tied up to the wharves from May 1 to October 31. The same restriction would apply to any deep sea lobster operation that may be started. Since this regulation is discriminatory it is presently preventing the establishment of a deep sea lobster fishing industry in Nova Scotia.

In view of that fact, I move:

That subclause (3) of clause 12 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

(3) Section 31 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"31. (1) Except under licence from the minister no one shall leave any port or place in Canada to fish outside Canadian fisheries waters for fish the catching of which is at such time prohibited in the Canadian fisheries waters opposite to or nearest the place where such person proposes to fish, and no one shall bring into Canada any fish caught outside Canadian fisheries waters when fishing for such fish is prohibited inside the Canadian fisheries waters opposite or nearest to the place where such fish was caught, or shall bring into Canada any vessels, boats, net, fishing gear, implements or appliances used in such fishing.

(2) The provisions of subsection (1) shall have no force and effect save as legislative provision for giving effect to a convention or treaty and for performing the obligations of Canada in respect thereof."

The Deputy Chairman: The question is on the amendment.

Mr. Patterson: Are there any copies of the amendment, because we have no idea what it is about?

Mr. Robichaud: During the time copies are being made available may I say a few words on the amendment. I referred to the matter earlier when I replied to the remarks of the hon. member. This clause amends section 31 of the Fisheries Act and it is a consequential amendment having to do with the description of the term territorial waters and fisheries waters. It makes no change whatever in the present regulation in so far as it applies to the fishing operations of Canadian fishermen.

This is a provision which has been in the act since 1932 and, so far as I know, there has been no interfence with the operations of Canadian fishermen. But in view of the fact that the matter had been raised I put on the record earlier—and there is no need for me to repeat what I said before the committee—that it is our intention to review this particular clause of the bill, the application of which could probably be amended by a change in regulations.

It would not be fair to take a quick decision on a matter of such importance. The amendment reads "except under licence from the minister" and I ask what would happen if the minister decided to refuse such a licence? How would it improve the conditions of the Canadian fishermen? I agree that this is a matter which could be of grave concern to a number of fishermen operating on the east coast, particularly to any scallop or lobster fishermen who would want to operate in deep sea waters, but I cannot agree to the amendment in its present form.

Again I give the assurance that we will review the clause and we will take whatever action is necessary so that there will be no discrimination against any Canadian fisherman in this regard.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the chairman if he would read the amendment moved by the hon. member?

The Deputy Chairman: The amendment moved by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg is as follows:

That subclause (3) of clause 12 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

(3) Section 31 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"31. (1) Except under licence from the minister, no one shall leave any port or place in Canada to fish outside Canadian fisheries waters for fish the catching of which is at such time prohibited in the Canadian fisheries waters opposite to or nearest the place where such person proposes to fish, and no one shall bring into Canada any fish caught outside Canadian fisheries waters when fishing for such fish is prohibited inside the Canadian fisheries waters opposite or nearest to the place where such fish was caught, or shall bring into Canada any vessels, boats, nets, fishing gear, implements or appliances used in such fishing.

(2) The provisions of subsection (1) shall have no force and effect save as legislative provision for giving effect to a convention or treaty and for performing the obligations of Canada in respect thereof."

Amendment (Mr. Crouse) negatived: Yeas, 59; Nays, 66.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 13 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, if it is agreeable to the government they might let it stand overnight and have third reading tomorrow.

Mr. Favreau: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Next sitting of the house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the house leader what we will be having for tomorrow and Friday in the way of business?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, subject to the agreement just expressed by the house, we will proceed with third reading of Bill No. S-17 as the first item of business tomorrow. After that we will complete the debate on the resolution introducing a bill to revise the fiscal arrangements between the federal government and the provinces. If there is time left tomorrow we will take the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, and after that the estimates of the Department of Public Works, to be followed by the estimates of the Post Office Department. By arrangement among the house leaders we might proceed with two or three items of supplementary estimates, about which we will be in a position to make a clearer and more precise statement at the opening tomorrow afternoon.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 2 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—CONTRIBUTIONS TO CONTINUATION OF PEACE KEEPING FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether a contribution is going to be made by the other nations within the United Nations in connection with Canada's further participation in the Cyprus force for an additional period of time. As I understand it, Canada and the United Kingdom are the only two nations which are making their contributions fully and voluntarily. What is being done in this connection to ensure, to put it mildly, that Canada is not a kind of Santa Claus in these peace keeping operations?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Voluntary contributions have been made by a number of states, notably by the United Kingdom and the United States. Canada is not the only country which has undertaken to pay her own expenses. Ireland is in that category. With regard to the three month period, both Canada and Ireland have taken the position that if the financial situation in the United Nations should become such that reimbursement could take place, we would expect that there should be reimbursement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister say what other nation is contributing its force and paying the cost of that force, other than the United Kingdom?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I said that in addition there were Ireland and Canada. Other countries are receiving assistance out of the voluntary fund.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was there any particular reason why Canada should have been placed in this beneficent position?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, if we had not taken this position, in the first place I am sure there might not have been a United Nations force. In addition, we felt the fact that we had to pay for the air lift both going and coming must and should be regarded as a contribution, as well, to the voluntary fund.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The argument the minister makes is accepted, but it does not apply to the second period, the additional period. What has been done in recent weeks to assure that other nations will provide the necessary funds, or at least a portion of the funds, to meet the cost of the Canadian force there?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As I said, in the first three months assistance was given by the United States and some other countries, providing enough money to pay for the operation of the force; subject, of course, to the undertakings and commitments made by Canada, Ireland and, as the right hon. gentleman says, the United Kingdom.

With regard to the second three month period, there have been further contributions made by a number of the original contributing states. When the question of a renewal of the mandate was considered the financial aspect of the problem was examined, and it would not have been possible for a renewal to take place if the participating countries had not proceeded on the basis established previously.

As I stated in this house, it is regrettable that other states in the United Nations have not recognized their obligations under the charter and made the contributions which membership in the organization involves. However, because other countries have refused to live up to their obligations, that is no reason, as I am sure the right hon. gentleman would agree, why Canada should be delinquent with regard to its commitment.

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Can he confirm or deny the article published in L'Action Catholique this morning according to which the United States has delivered CF-104 jets manufactured in Canada to Cypriots and Greeks during this last crisis?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think, Mr. Speaker—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Under the standing orders given to me a question should not inquire whether statements made in a newspaper are correct.

Mr. Langlois: I am not asking whether the newspaper is correct. I am asking the government whether this is correct.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): In respect of that question, Mr. Speaker, the answer was given by me in the house on May 13 and can be found at page 3213 of Hansard for that day.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a similar question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as to whether he has any knowledge of the truth of the statement that Canadian made CF-104 jet fighter-bombers have been delivered by the United States to both Greece and Turkey during the period of the trouble in Cyprus. Has he any information from the United States government to that effect?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to answer that question as to what other countries have done without further consideration. I can say that under the mutual aid program to NATO countries, in which Canada participates, the government of this country, shortly after the United Nations force was established, suspended any possible mutual aid assistance to Greece and Turkey for an indefinite period.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As I recall it, Canada contributed some $50 million to this program. I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether Canada was consulted before any of these planes were delivered to Greece or Turkey, if in fact they were delivered. Since Canada was a major contributor, surely the Canadian government did not allow these planes to be delivered without consultation with and consent by the Canadian government?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would like to give that question consideration.

MALAYSIA—REQUEST TO COMMONWEALTH GOVERNMENTS FOR ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and concerns the rapidly deteriorating condition in Malaysia. Since the announcement today by the chief minister of Sarawak that 1,000 Chinese communists have crossed to Indonesia, and the appeal that comes from the prime minister of Malaysia, as well as the response from the prime ministers of Australia and New Zealand, does the Canadian government intend to offer some assistance to this important part of the commonwealth in southeast Asia?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): My hon. friend will remember raising this question on June 25, when he interrogated the Prime Minister. My hon. friend the hon. member for Kootenay West gave me notice this morning of his intention to ask a question along those lines. This matter of Canadian interest in Malaysia is currently under discussion in London, and we look forward within a very few days to the visit to Ottawa of the prime minister of Malaysia. Beyond that at this moment I cannot go.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Herridge: The Acting Prime Minister has answered my question.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GRANTS TO FAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture and ask him whether he would dispel the fears of the Ontario association of agricultural societies by assuring them that the government has no intention of completely cancelling out the grants to class A and class B fairs, which have been suspended for a period of two years.

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have been in consultation with the executive of the A fairs in this connection; I have also discussed grants with the B fairs executive. I will be meeting them again in the not too far distant future. We have some plans that we would like to discuss with them. We have at the moment a pilot project in so far as livestock exhibits are concerned, basing them on utility values; and we also have some plans which we think will do an even better job than the old grants did for the fairs since 1947, and which have now been suspended since 1962.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the Minister of Agriculture state whether the capital grants will be continued to the A and B fairs?

Mr. Hays: I suggested to them at the time we were running this pilot project that as soon as it was completed, after the London exhibition, we would like to have the executives of both the B fairs and the A fairs and the exhibitors see us and we would discuss the whole program of grants, prize money, and so on, in so far as exhibitions are concerned. Until such time as this project has been completed, no grants will be considered.

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture with regard to the fall fairs. Does he not think it is a little late for the government to formulate a policy with respect to this important item?

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, I suppose the hon. gentleman is referring to the capital grants which have been suspended, as the hon. member knows, since June of 1962. We have honoured the $3,000 per year for fairs, and there has been no change there. There are many requests for capital grants, but we think with the program we are planning now, if the pilot project is successful, we will be able to do something that the 128 exhibitions in Canada have long needed. We think these fairs are no longer just agricultural societies for agricultural purposes but they are cultural centres. Many of these smaller fairs are asking for $30,000 when they should get $200,000, and that is what we are thinking of.

SASKATCHEWAN—STEPS TO MEET CRITICAL LIVESTOCK SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, first may I say to the Minister of Agriculture that we are glad to see him back after his enforced absence. I am sorry I could not join in partaking of some of that "beelzebub" that he dispensed at the party before the stampede. If I haven't the right word, I certainly have the right sentiment in describing it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It was a good party.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would like to ask the minister whether following his discussions with the provincial government in Regina he is now prepared to accede to the suggestion made by the opposition that action be taken similar to that which was applied during, I think it was, 1961 and 1962, when as the result of drought assistance was given to farmers and cattle raisers in the way of feed, fodder and the like, so no precipitate action would be taken on their part to get rid of their herds at tumbling prices.

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should like to preface my remarks to the right hon. gentleman so far as the sillabub was concerned by saying that we missed him. I got his letter expressing regret, but I am sure he would have enjoyed the drink very much.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not the way I heard it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, as one of those not invited to this party may I express great envy at the invitation extended to my right hon. friend.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in this very friendly atmosphere may I be allowed to say that I would have been frightened away from it, having regard to the newspaper description given of the minister of defence, which indicated that he looked confused after he partook.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, if there was any such expression on my face it was only due to my attempt to emulate that of the right hon. gentleman when he was there in 1958.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to comment that I thought the minister of defence looked confused before he participated.

Mr. Hays: Now, Mr. Speaker, getting down to the real drought, I might say that this situation is serious. Only one who has been through several dry years on a farm can really appreciate it. Yesterday morning I left Regina shortly before seven and travelled north to Melfort, where this condition starts in Saskatchewan. Although the area around Melfort is fairly good, as you proceed to Prince Albert, a short distance before you get there is where they are having the greatest difficulty.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hays: I mean with the drought. We travelled some 500 miles, and I am sure everyone feels very sorry for those people because there are many crops which have not received one drop of rain since they were seeded, and there are many areas where there has been no germination. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act will help those people, of course, but this is also a livestock area. Some farmers have no hay and their pastures are almost depleted.

After conferring with the Saskatchewan cabinet I suggested that we would provide space on some of our P.F.R.A. pastures if the farmers would like to move their cattle to those areas where there is feed. We would also like to help so far as moving feed to cattle is concerned. The Saskatchewan government will be forwarding a proposal in the next few days, so I can assure the right hon. gentleman that we are doing something in this regard. We are going one step further, in fact, and in the case of people who are financing their crops through the Farm Credit Corporation—and there are many in this area—if they come and see our supervisors we will be glad to forgo their payments which are due and tack them on to the end of the agreement in another year.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, with reference to the drought in northern Saskatchewan. Has the federal government indicated to the government of Saskatchewan its willingness to do what was done previously by federal governments, namely pay half the freight assistance for moving feed into the drought area by rail; second, pay up to a certain number of cents per mile per ton for moving feed that is trucked into the area; and third, is the federal government also prepared to pay a part of the cost of the hay and feed in order to keep the figure at an amount which the drought stricken farmers will be able to meet?

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, in the first instance the provinces will have to initiate a program so far as help is concerned. I have assured the province of Manitoba through the minister of agriculture and Saskatchewan cabinet that we are prepared to participate in the plans they put forward, which I cannot disclose until they send them to me officially.

[Mr. Hays.]

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am asking the minister a specific question. I am not asking him whether he offered to participate. I am asking him what specific things he has indicated to the governments of Saskatchewan and Manitoba the federal government is prepared to do in the event that they are asked for assistance.

Mr. Hays: As far as that is concerned, I do not think I can add anything to what I have already said. They must first initiate the programs in which they want us to participate. I have discussed these programs with them and with the cabinet, and we are prepared to do the things they want us to do.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture has expressed his intention of giving farmers affected by drought conditions more time to repay their farm loans, could he not apply the same policy to Quebec farmers whose crops are a complete failure and who depend on them to make a living? I refer to apple growers and strawberry producers.

[Text]

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, I dispatched a letter this morning to the minister of agriculture of Quebec offering him the same consideration.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether I could have some indication of how many supplementaries there are. The hon. member for Mackenzie.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture, and in so doing I will give him the opportunity to initiate something on his own. I wonder if the minister would indicate to the house whether he is prepared to introduce immediately amendments to the Farm Improvement Loans Act so that cash can be made available to farmers immediately if they require it to purchase fodder.

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, although this is under the Department of Finance, I would suppose that the amendments to the Farm Improvement Loans Act will be on the order paper within the next two or three days, and if the house leader could be assured that they would be passed in an hour I am sure he would be glad to bring them forward.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre-André Boutin (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Agriculture is going to all sorts of trouble to visit western farmers who are having a hard time, I should like to ask him if he would care to take the same trouble to visit eastern farmers who are up against a crop failure, this spring, especially as regards maple syrup.

[Text]

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, according to my agenda I am leaving for eastern Canada on July 21.

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Agriculture. I am wondering if he would give also consideration to assisting those farmers in Ontario who have been suffering from drought. I am sending him a letter tomorrow which will indicate the circumstances.

Mr. Hays: I have no report yet from the minister of agriculture for Ontario.

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker I should like to ask a supplementary question?

Since tobacco growers in the Joliette area have suffered losses of $1 million caused by strong winds lately, does the Minister of Agriculture intend to help pay for those damages if the province of Quebec submits an official claim?

[Text]

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, the minister of agriculture for Quebec has not indicated this problem to me as yet.

[Later:]

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In view of drought conditions in northern and central Manitoba and the anticipated shortage of fodder and hay, would he give consideration to issuing special permits to cut hay in Riding Mountain national park, something which was done several years ago under conditions very much like those of this year? I may add that I have received a number of letters and petitions which I could quote to the minister. I hope he will give this matter his urgent attention.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, we are fully aware of that and have had applications from a number of people. It would appear that in the past permits have been granted, and some practices grew up that were not of the best. We are certainly going to be very careful that this does not arise again. We have permitted some grazing in the park, and we have told the superintendent to use his own discretion in respect of the apparent need of those making applications to him.

Mr. Mandziuk: On a point of order, and just to correct the impression the minister has given the house, there are people who have been grazing their cattle in the park for years and years and years. There have been people who have received annual permits to cut hay in the park. What I am seeking are special permits for needy farmers; and I may say I have not heard of any abuses during past experience.

FEED GRAIN FOR EASTERN FARMERS—APPLICATION OF ARDA IN QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture. I am sorry he has had so many questions today, but that is probably because he was absent for a few days. Can the minister tell me the position with regard to negotiations concerning feed grains for the province of Quebec, about which I asked him last November? Will he consider looking into this problem in an attempt to find a solution for the eastern farmers?

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Some questions were put to me yesterday concerning feed grain. I replied that we were now preparing a program and that, next week probably, I would be in a position to announce the payment of transportation charges for feed grain in all the provinces of eastern Canada.

While I am on my feet I should like to answer the following question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent):

> —whether, besides general agreements signed by the ten provinces in October 1962, the federal government concluded agreements with the province of Quebec in 1962?

The answer is yes, with regard to general agreements, and no for the other agreements which were almost all signed in January 1963.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Could the minister say whether on December 6, 1962, the federal government and the province of Quebec signed an agreement under ARDA to carry out a $185,000 survey in the riding of Mégantic? Apparently such an agreement was signed on December 6, 1962.

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, that is not the question the hon. member asked me yesterday. If he had phrased it differently I could have given him a reply.

Mr. Vincent: I asked the minister if, in addition to the general agreements signed with the ten provinces in October 1962, a supplementary arrangement was made that year? If I remember well, on December 6, 1962, the federal government and the province of Quebec signed such an agreement with a view to carrying out a survey in the riding of Mégantic.

Mr. Sauvé: Well, Mr. Speaker, we do not agree on the meaning of the terms. In our opinion an arrangement is an agreement entered into between the federal government and a province, while the hon. member is now dealing with a proposal submitted by the province of Quebec for approval by the federal government under ARDA.

In any case, I will consider the matter raised by the hon. member.

[Text]

Yesterday the hon. member for Qu'Appelle asked if I would make clear the requests of the province of Quebec concerning the extension of shared programs with the federal government.

At the last federal-provincial conference the Quebec government indicated clearly that it wanted to maintain the agreements on ARDA that were signed between Quebec and the federal government. ARDA is one of the joint programs they felt was excellent. While I was in Mont Joli during the week end with the minister of agriculture, Mr. Courcy, he did not mention specifically that Quebec would remain in ARDA, but in his prepared text it is clearly indicated that this is their intention. In answer to a question of mine he replied that Quebec was very satisfied with the ARDA program, as it was a program in a field of joint federal-provincial jurisdiction.

[Mr. Sauvé.]

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Agriculture?

As the minister knows very well, on the basis of the subsidies paid out, transportation of feed grain in eastern Canada, that is in the province of Quebec, costs $5 a ton in the Montreal district and $6.20 in the northwest part of the province, including Abitibi and Témiscamingue, even though the grain passes right in front of our doorstep to reach Montreal. Does the minister intend to take appropriate steps and pay the same subsidies in Abitibi and Témiscamingue so that transportation of feed grain in those areas will not be more costly than in the southern part of the province?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I stated yesterday in reply to a question an hon. member put to me, that next week I intended to announce a decision concerning the payment of trucking charges for feed grain in all eastern Canada, as shown at page 5206, right hand column, of Hansard.

Mr. Caouette: I put a question to the Minister of Agriculture and it is the Minister of Forestry who replies that next week he will have an answer for us. Can the minister tell us now what steps have been taken to put us, from Quebec or eastern Canada, on the same footing as the others?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that since March 5 I am the minister responsible for the subsidy policy concerning the transportation of feed grain. The civil service commission has made public the appointment of a director of the feed grain administration and next week I shall announce the policy respecting the payment of trucking charges for feed grain in all areas of the six eastern provinces of Canada.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should like to call to the attention of hon. members that the question period has now lasted 64 minutes. I am wondering whether we could not get on with the business before the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: I thank the Minister of Forestry for the information he has given us. There has been so much activity in the house that his appointment passed unnoticed.

Mr. Sauvé: I wish to protest against the words of the hon. member. I am convinced that he does not mean what he said.

Everybody knows that when no announcements are made in the house regarding new policies, this does not mean that nothing is being done.

When I stated that next week I would announce a new policy in respect to the payment of trucking charges for feed grain, it is precisely because some spade work had been done; indeed, this achievement is the result of two months work. I wish the hon. member would give credit where credit is due.

Mr. Langlois: I am glad to do that and to thank the minister for the work that has been done. I was not aware of the situation.

MILK—INQUIRY RESPECTING FREE DISTRIBUTION TO SCHOOLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I am sure you appreciate, sir, that we have to ask these questions when we have the opportunity of catching the minister in the house. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister if it is the government's intention to introduce legislation at this session to implement the program of providing free milk to schools, as promised in the throne speech?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): In reply to this question, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member might be surprised to learn that in Canada the consumption of milk is probably the second highest in the world. Now, due to the very buoyant economy of Canada, most children have so much milk before they get to school that we can't get any more milk into them.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture. I wonder whether he would indicate to us how soon the government will be prepared to present legislation to provide for free milk for students.

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, I have discussed this with all the ministers of agriculture in Canada. We have discussed the matter with many of the people who are interested, but many of the ministers think this is a program which, as I suggested before, due to the state of the economy we should wait a little while before pursuing any further.

Inquiries of the Ministry

THE SENATE

DELAY IN CONSIDERING LEGISLATION PASSED BY HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): I should like to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the government pressed for immediate passage of the defence bill last Monday and the youth allowance bill last Tuesday so these measures could be implemented immediately, could the Acting Prime Minister say when the other place will next meet so these bills can pass and receive royal assent?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to give my hon. friend an answer before six o'clock.

Mr. Monteith: May I ask a supplementary question. Does the Acting Prime Minister not think that, because of the urgency of these bills, the government is being very negligent?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend would not expect, on a day when we are all so agreeable with one another, that I would take opportunities to disagree with him. However, on the last point I must. I do agree that these matters are very important and the quicker they can be put into effect the better it will be. I assure my hon. friend that in this spirit of understanding we will do what we can.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Will the Acting Prime Minister not agree that next Wednesday, July 15, is the date on which the other house is to be convened? Is this in the spirit of urgency?

Mr. Churchill: It is in the newspaper; he will find it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I want to inform my hon. friend that my unofficial newspaper, the Ottawa Journal, informs me that the Senate has been recalled for Wednesday next.

[Later:]

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. I wonder whether he would get authority to summon the Senate in order to get on with the business of the country. I base my question on a statement made on Monday by the Minister of National Defence disclosing a very difficult set of circumstances. He said:

> —every day that goes by now without the bill being passed aggravates the situation which exists at national defence headquarters.

That was in respect of morale. He went on to say:

> It not only aggravates the situation in respect of morale at national defence headquarters but it results in the postponement of potential savings involving tens of thousands of dollars.

I ask the Acting Prime Minister, should not immediate action be taken in order to correct this situation?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, since the question was put a few moments ago I have sent a note to my colleague, the leader of the government in the other place. I hope to see him before too long.

POWER

FRASER RIVER—FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has the minister any information he can give the house with respect to the announcement of Premier Bennett of British Columbia that his government intends to proceed with the development of the hydro potential of the Fraser river, and expects the federal government's financial assistance to this end?

Mr. Speaker: Important as that question may be, I wonder if the hon. member would put it on the order paper?

Mr. Herridge: May I, with all respect for your ruling, Mr. Speaker, say that there is a measure of immediacy about this question?

Mr. Speaker: Under the circumstances the hon. member has the opportunity to raise the matter at 10.30, and he can still put it on the order paper.

Mr. Fisher: That is pretty late for him.

EDUCATION

STUDENT LOANS—OBJECTION BY QUEBEC UNIVERSITIES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Could he tell the house whether he was made aware of the joint releases issued by student associations of the universities of Montreal, Laval, Sherbrooke and of classical colleges and teachers' colleges of the province of Quebec, in which students expressed their complete disagreement with the bill concerning federal loans to university students because they consider them as an infringement of a strictly provincial jurisdiction, that is education?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I think that when the hon. member reads the bill, which will probably be on the order paper next week, he will realize himself that all prerogatives and rights of the provinces are entirely respected.

Mr. Pigeon: Is that co-operative federalism?

[Text]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May we ask the minister when we will see the bill? We have been waiting a long time.

Mr. Lamontagne: I would hope the hon. member would refer his question to the house leader.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the house leader when we will see the legislation dealing with student loans?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I did not get the question fully, but I think I heard the words "student loans". If the question is in relation to student loans legislation I may say that the resolution will be on the order paper at the very beginning of next week.

Mr. Douglas: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, apropos the answer just given by the Minister of Justice, on Tuesday the Acting Prime Minister told us that the student loans legislation would be placed on the order paper about Friday of this week. Now the Minister of Justice says that he hopes it will be early next week. The government has been telling us about the great necessity to get on with this legislation, yet we are still waiting for the government to bring it down and we have been given no opportunity to study it. We are beginning to wonder what all the talk about the opposition holding up government progress means when the government has not yet laid this legislation before the house.

I want to ask the Minister of Justice what is the reason for this delay on legislation which the government announced in the speech from the throne and which we are still waiting to see, and which we were told would be available at the end of this week.

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if there is any difficulty in the matter I must accept responsibility. My hon. friend is right. I did say that I thought it would be on the order paper on Friday. I think I said on Friday but, as the Minister of Justice has said, it will be on Monday, and if my hon. friend will extend the blame to where it belongs, that is to the statement I made. I thought it would be about Friday but it will be on Monday.

[Translation]

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. A supplementary question on what?

[Translation]

Mr. Grafftey: Regarding loans to students, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Very well.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put my question to the Secretary of State. Is the delay due to the fact that the government failed to get in touch with the provinces?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, but I did not hear the hon. member's question.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I will repeat my question. Has the government communicated with the provinces concerning the students' loan bill?

Mr. Pigeon: Since education comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, the responsibility for introducing this bill to the house is not mine and I think this question should be directed to the Minister of Finance.

[Text]

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted to answer the question. There was a very satisfactory and co-operative meeting between officials of the federal and provincial governments on this matter on Monday of this week. The legislation will be presented at the very beginning of next week.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the minister, when the government gave notice of this legislation in the speech from the throne had it then made any contact with the provincial governments regarding whatever arrangements had to be worked out with them?

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, there have been conversations going on about this legislation for some time. The meeting I referred to that took place on Monday was the final one.

[Later:]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a question for the Minister of Finance with respect to the meeting which was held with him last Monday regarding student loans. Could the minister inform the house whether all provinces were represented at that meeting?

Mr. Gordon: I was not at the meeting, Mr. Speaker, but I am informed that all provinces were represented.

SHIPPING

ASSISTANCE FOR TOURIST OPERATORS ON LAKE HURON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In view of the aid being granted to drought stricken farmers, is the government planning any aid for drought stricken tourist operators on lake Huron?

Mr. Speaker: Surely this is a question for the order paper.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I absolutely fail to understand where there is a difference between drought stricken farmers and drought stricken tourist operators. These tourist operators have not asked for help in a generation. They are now in urgent need, and I do not see why we are greeted with silence when we ask questions on an urgent situation like this.

LABOUR RELATIONS

TORONTO—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN SETTLING NEWSPAPER STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I intended to ask the Minister of Labour. In his absence I understand it should be directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and with your permission, sir, I would like to do that. Having in mind the fact that this afternoon a lockout or walkout has closed the daily press of Toronto, and the fact that a million readers are affected, may I ask if the minister is aware of the situation, and would the department be willing to use its good offices in this matter?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Acting Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I was informed, when I received notice of this question, that this is a matter for the provincial authorities. The situation is apparently under control and is being watched carefully by Mr. Rowntree, the Ontario minister of labour. According to newspaper reports the minister met with the parties yesterday and is continuing to do so.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

TORONTO—REPORTED USE OF WIRE TAPPING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice and ask whether he has any statement to make on the truth of the charges regarding wire tapping by the R.C.M.P. in Toronto.

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this charge is denied.

Mr. Orlikow: As a supplementary question, would the government give consideration to allowing time for discussion of Bill No. C-103, proposed by the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand, dealing with the question of wire tapping, or will the government bring forward its own legislation on this matter?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, we shall have to look into that question.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): As a supplementary question, when the Minister of Justice says this charge is denied is he referring to the denial of Assistant Commissioner Lemieux, or is the minister himself making this denial after having personally investigated the charges?

Mr. Favreau: I have communicated with the authorities in this regard and it is as a result of my conversation with them that I denied the charge.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

VANCOUVER—POSSIBLE USE OF FORMER R.C.A.F. BASE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Would the Minister of Industry tell the house whether he has yet been in receipt of a communication from the corporation of the city of Vancouver in connection with the Kitsilano property, and particularly whether the corporation takes a strong stand against any fragmentation of this property and turning any of it over to the C.B.C.?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Apart from the telegram to which reference was made in the house yesterday, I am informed that Crown Assets Disposal Corporation has not yet received any proposal from the city of Vancouver.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And has no communication been received by the minister?

Mr. Drury: No, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR IMPROVED QUARTERS FOR INTERPRETERS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct to the Secretary of State a question which I also consider as a question of privilege.

According to my information, the interpreters of the house, who translate from English into French and vice versa, do not have air conditioning in the booths where they must stay between 40 and 50 minutes at a time, a situation for which the Secretary of State is directly responsible.

We raised this question some time ago, but the Secretary of State did not know what to answer. Today, is he ready to tell us that those employees will be treated like human beings and not like beasts of burden, as has been the case up to the present, that is in this year 1964?

I am asking the question and I make it a question of privilege.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I must say to the hon. member that I am not responsible for the working conditions in the house.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put his question in writing and pass it to the Speaker?

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

I am told that you are not responsible for that situation as far as the interpreters are concerned and that the Secretary of State is directly involved in that matter.

I wish to know—and the house too I am sure—whose responsibility it is to treat these civil servants decently when they have to work for hours and hours in almost unbearable, and certainly unreasonable, conditions.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: In order to settle this matter, which is in the nature of a complaint rather than a question of privilege, may I say that the Speaker is, I understand, responsible for the physical arrangements of the house. The Secretary of State is responsible for the salaries.

Mr. Caouette: Would you assure me that the Speaker intends to look after these matters?

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put his request in writing?

Mr. Caouette: Right.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): A supplementary question directed to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Public Works in the absence of the minister. Is the hon. member aware that last year I raised this matter and I was assured, as I recall, by the Minister of Public Works that during the recess last fall this matter would be attended to. I wonder whether plans have yet been drawn up. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary would take this question as notice and let us know.

Mr. G. Roy McWilliam (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): In the unavoidable absence of the minister, I will take that question as notice.

BILINGUAL QUALIFICATIONS OF DIRECTOR OF LEGISLATIVE SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State, who is the minister responsible for this matter.

Considering that Mr. Small, whose appointment has been announced recently, speaks only one language because he did not have time to study French, will consideration be given to grant him leave in order that he may learn French, as I do not think he is qualified to take the direction of the French journals, debates, references and index?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member write a letter in the usual way, as provided for in our standing orders.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Girouard (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. At the time the establishment of the position of director of legislative services was announced in the house, Your Honour said that this was a matter of interest to all hon. members.

Would it not be possible to know why all hon. members cannot get information at the same time on the fact that Mr. Small is a unilingual official and why one must ask for such information in writing?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: This is the same question. The hon. member should know—and if he does not know I will tell him—that the proper way is to address a letter to the Speaker and he will get a detailed reply.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEPS TO MEET REPORTED INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Does the government expect to make an announcement shortly concerning measures to hold down the spiralling cost of living?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): I question the allegation contained in the hon. member's inquiry. When the government has an announcement to make it will make it in the normal and proper way.

Mr. Aiken: May I address a supplementary question to the whole cabinet. When are we going to get answers to some of our questions?

BROADCASTING

COMMUNITY ANTENNA SYSTEMS—REQUEST FOR POLICY CLARIFICATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of the recent annual report of the board of broadcast governors. What are the minister's feelings regarding the recommendations for legislation and regulatory changes affecting community antenna television?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I hope it will be possible in the very near future to make a statement on this matter.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Fisher: A supplementary question. Are these recommendations the consequence of any discussions with the minister and his officials?

Mr. Pickersgill: If I may say so, with due respect, I think that is a somewhat extraordinary question to be asked in parliament. It is assumed that ministers have officials in order to consult with them, and it is also assumed that ministers take responsibility for what they do in this house. When I have a statement to make, if I make it I will take responsibility for it.

Mr. Fisher: The hon. gentleman did not hear the last part of my question. I should like to know whether the recommendations of the board of broadcast governors were arrived at after consultation with the minister and his officials. The reason I ask this is because they hardly square with some of the previous statements made by the minister.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest the hon. gentleman should read the statement which was tabled in this house some time ago. I think it speaks for itself.

TRADE

OIL—REPORTED U.S. INTENTION TO RESTRICT IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It arises out of action taken by the independent petroleum association of America in asking the department of the interior for urgent action to reduce oil imports by 200,000 barrels of petroleum a day. Has Canada made any representations with respect to this matter, or have we been informed that we will be exempt from these import restrictions as has been the case in the past?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The energy board and I have spent a great deal of time defending Canada's interest in the export of petroleum. The item which appeared in the newspaper, and to which the hon. member has referred, should not come to him as any great surprise. Certainly it will be no surprise to anyone familiar with the situation. There has been very strong pressure in the United States to reduce imports, and I think we have been relatively successful in resisting it.

GIFT OF CATTLE TO SOVIET UNION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture and ask him what was the reason for making a gift of a number of cows to the Soviet union, and to whom were they sent?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): I paved the way personally for the export of Holstein cattle to 22 countries of the world by giving them two or three and enabling them to see the job those cattle could do. In the Soviet union I was down at a place called Krasnodar where they were milking 800 cows, and it seemed to me that one of our cows would do the work of three of theirs. I said we would be prepared to give them three head to prove our point and I hope, as a result, we shall open up a market there which will be of benefit to all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

TOBACCO—STEPS TO DISPOSE OF SURPLUS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Since about a year and a half the St. Jacques tobacco co-operative, in the county of Montcalm, has more than a million pounds of unsold cigar tobacco; what does the minister intend to do in order to sell that surplus either on the Canadian market or on the foreign market?

Mr. Caouette: Make cigarettes with it.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: This is a question for the order paper.

HOUSING

REPORTED ADVERSE EFFECT OF CONSTRUCTION BONUS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Robert Beaulé (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, but in his absence I will direct it to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Does the minister share the view of the contractors' association that the $500 bonus for building houses in winter is the direct cause of the slowing down of business as far as the building trade is concerned, at the present time?

[Text]

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Acting Minister of Labour): I am afraid I did not hear the first part of the question. I will have to take it as notice and refer it to the Department of Labour when I have had an opportunity to study it.

WATER RESOURCES

FRASER RIVER—FEDERAL AID IN IMPLEMENTATION OF BOARD REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I would like to ask him whether the government of Canada has been requested by the government of British Columbia to participate in implementing the report of the Fraser river basin board.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, all I know at the present moment is what was contained in the press reports and other reports I have received pertaining to the statement made by Premier Bennett in British Columbia yesterday morning. I think on April 17 I informed the house that I had written the minister concerned in the province of British Columbia, Hon. Mr. Williston, after the tabling of the Fraser river report, suggesting that we should meet with a view to implementing certain aspects of the report.

He was good enough to come to Ottawa a few days later. We had discussions in respect of phase 1 of the report, which involved the strengthening of the Fraser river dikes. This was the first priority of the board having regard to the cost benefit studies, and this would involve a cost of about $4.9 million. Mr. Williston undertook to engage the requisite engineers and report back to us. He also indicated to us that he would be making application under the provisions of the Canada Water Conservation Assistance Act.

This is certainly stage 1 of the report. I rather think the statement made by the premier of British Columbia yesterday arises out of the fortunate deliverance of the Fraser valley from flood as a result of the recent winter in the province of British Columbia. Had all the forces of nature been ranged against us we would have had a flood there this last spring; and many of the forces of nature were ranged against us. But I think when Premier Bennett says he is making application for 50 per cent of the cost of phase 2, which involves damming the McGregor, the Clearwater and the Cariboo rivers—

Mr. Grafftey: His precise writer is away on holiday.

Mr. Laing: —he must be aware that the provisions of the Canada Water Conservation Act provide for a participation by the federal government of 37½ per cent only, and that where power is derived there is a markdown in the amount of federal assistance to allow for the value of power. I think the premier is aware of all these factors.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Grafftey: Brevity.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INDUSTRY

QUEBEC—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRIES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry—I have asked him already this week a similar question—concerning the establishment, in the province of Quebec, of the Peugeot and Renault companies as well as their negotiations with that province in that respect.

Could the minister inform us of the result of these negotiations with the provincial government up to now?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Langlois: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister give us the approximate date when he might be able to give us an explanation or information in that respect?

Mr. Drury: No, Mr. Speaker.

[Text]

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

REPORTED STATEMENT BY VANCOUVER FOOTBALL PLAYER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Simcoe East was kind enough to draw to my notice a newspaper article regarding Mr. Dick Fouts, of Vancouver, described as an all-star defensive end with the B.C. Lions. According to the article, Mr. Fouts' view was that his potential for Canadian citizenship as of July 14 was a factor which should be considered in his present salary negotiations with his football team.

I have read the newspaper item, as the hon. member suggested, but I do not feel that it would be appropriate for me to single out this particular applicant for citizenship for admonition only on the basis of the newspaper report, which may be an oversimplification or an abbreviation of his comments on his feeling toward Canadian citizenship.

The citizenship of any country is a valued and treasured thing, and I think it appropriate for me to say, as minister, that I am in full agreement with the views of the hon. member for Simcoe East on the value of Canadian citizenship.

Perhaps I need only say further that any applicant for Canadian citizenship must meet the statutory requirements and satisfy a court that he is a fit and proper person to become a Canadian citizen, with an adequate knowledge of the responsibilities and privileges of Canadian citizenship and the intention of having his place of domicile permanently in Canada. If Mr. Fouts can satisfy these requirements I know we would all wish to offer him the congratulations which we accord to other applicants in the same circumstances.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would check on this matter and see whether this is a fact. I did not understand him to say he would do so. I think this is worth investigating and should be investigated.

Mr. Tremblay: Usually, Mr. Speaker, although a minister can comment on facts reported to the house by a member, it is not the responsibility of the minister to disclose what he is told or to say whether a newspaper report is correct.

TERRITORIAL SEA AND FISHING ZONES

LEGISLATION RESPECTING TERRITORIAL WATERS AND FISHERIES LAWS

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved the third reading of Bill No. S-17, respecting the territorial sea and fishing zones of Canada.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have just one question. I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries why a question which I had on the order paper for April 27 concerning this legislation was not answered until June 10, in view of the fact that this legislation was being brought forward for discussion in the house. Then I asked a further question of which notice was given on June 30 concerning this particular matter, which question has not yet been answered.

If the minister is in a position to answer all the matters concerning this bill, surely those questions should have been answered by now. I must say I did find it rather reprehensible on the part of his department to withhold the answer to question No. 880 from April 27 to June 10, when the bill was then in committee, as this question should have been answered prior to discussion of this legislation in the house.

The second question I have asked and which I think the minister should be able to answer is No. 1,397, which is as follows:

1. What is the nature of the declaration made by the Minister of Fisheries with respect to the increased activities of European fishermen, as a result of the modernization of harbour and other facilities for fishermen on the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon?
2. Have negotiations been entered into between Canada and the six nations of the common market with respect to fishing rights and/or the activities of fishermen of those nations?
3. Has the government of Canada received protests from any of the governments of the common market nations either on an informal or formal basis?

That question was based on newspaper reports that the minister had made a declaration, and that particularly the French government authorities were most concerned over his declaration. If this legislation envisages closing off the gulf of St. Lawrence, just how are these new port facilities to be affected and how are the fishermen from these nations to be affected by the intent of the government's legislation?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the answer to question No. 1,397 is ready and is being sent to the parliamentary secretary responsible for bringing the answers before the house. The report referred to by the hon. member is completely false, and arose from a statement I was supposed to have made before the committee on marine and fisheries. As I say, the report was false and the Canadian ambassador in Paris was notified accordingly.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PROVISION FOR REVISION OF FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND TAXATION PROVISIONS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, July 7, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Gordon—Mr. Lamoureux in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the revision of certain fiscal arrangements with the provinces and to provide adjustments of fiscal arrangements and taxation provisions consequential upon the provision of youth allowances to parents resident in certain provinces.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, in speaking on this resolution I intend to traverse generally the position of dominion-provincial relations in recent years, to deal with the various courses of action that were taken to meet the needs of the provinces to an ever increasing extent and, before I conclude, to make certain suggestions relative to courses of action which we in the opposition believe should be taken.

I commence by referring to the expeditious way in which legislation has received the attention of the house during the last few days. Indeed, this has been the first opportunity the house has had to deal with legislative matters or resolutions necessary for the welfare of the country, and you will have noticed in this regard, Mr. Chairman, that in every way the opposition, joining in the need for examination and maintaining its rights to scrutinize carefully and criticize where necessary, has expeditiously given passage to these measures.

It is of more than passing interest that the government has revealed itself again today as not having its legislative program ready despite the fact that many of these matters were included in the speech from the throne. With the possible exception of the flag question, which only in the month of June became one of transcendent importance, these other matters have been before the government since February; yet we find today that a matter as important as loans to students, which was one of those things which were to receive attention during those momentous 60 days of decision, is not yet ready. Furthermore, we learned that while we gave passage to the defence bill following careful examination, as well as one or two other matters of legislation, the government, which enjoys an overwhelming majority in the other place, has not seen fit to have the other place sitting so these matters, major in the viewpoint of the government, would not be delayed.

All of this is indicative of a state of mind. Events of recent days, not excluding the resolution now before the house, are indicative of a determination on the part of the government to have an election at an early date. These questions are brought up, but ever and anon we are informed that over us, as a portent of the possibility of a vacation, hangs the sword of Damocles, if I may borrow that allusion, should we fail to do what the government wants. Measures such as redistribution are left in cold storage. This is all most interesting; and when we realize something of the degree to which the press favourable to the government keeps referring to the opposition denying the passage of legislation, it all looks to me like an excuse in anticipation.

This resolution is important. It represents a further step in the field of dominion-provincial relations. Its design and purpose, I take it, are to bring to our country a greater degree of unity. I think all of us as Canadians are most anxious to do all we can to bring about unity within our country. Yet it is passing strange that three years before Canada will celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of confederation too few Canadians have knowledge of the history and the traditions of this country, of the meaning of the federal system. Only the other day it came to my notice that while in other countries those who were the fathers of their countries are remembered and recalled, few Canadians, even in this house, would be able to name more than a few fathers of confederation if asked to do so. I am not placing myself in any higher category, but if we had an i.q. test in this connection I do not think the House of Commons would be able to achieve a higher degree of favourable marks than the average Canadian.

Strange it seems that we in our country do not look at our past and our traditions. Strange it seems that when one looks at the Canadian Almanac, the Parliamentary Guide, the Canada Year Book and the Encyclopaedia Britannica there is no reference in any of them to the names and the persons of the fathers of confederation. I hope that in so far as the parliamentary red book is concerned, that will be rectified, and in any other publications of the government of Canada. It shows on our part a lack of appreciation of the spiritual values of our nation. I entered into a competition with myself in this regard to name the fathers of confederation, and I did not get too far along the road after I had brought to mind those who from time to time receive consistent reference. All of this indicates the need of something being done to bring about a strengthening of our confederation through knowledge and through an appreciation of history.

The resolution placed before the house by the minister is one that I am sure will receive close examination. It is of interest to note that the minister in his palmy days of authoring dreamed of the day when deficits would be no more, when the halcyon days of Liberalism would return, to use his own words, and deficits would be at an end. Since the Minister of Finance has been in office we know now that deficits can be respectable, deficits can be worthy of commendation, provided they represent deficits incurred by a government of which one is a member.

The minister is in this position; that on the basis of the lost revenue consequent on this resolution being passed and the legislation based thereon translated into law, he must act. In the United States taxes are being cut and the economy is being advanced and accelerated. We in Canada, following the acceleration in the United States have, in the backwash, necessarily been carried along as a result of the expansion in the economy there. The minister must inevitably, whenever he brings in another budget, increase taxation in Canada. Income taxation is bound to go up. This is another reason why the government is looking for an excuse for an election. Being a diplomatic group, they do not want to do anything that might cause ill feeling in this nation.

A moment ago, sir, I mentioned the economy in the United States. I read from the New York Times of June 28:

> Economy of the United States sets a record for first half. Boom continues through its fortieth month for longest peacetime surge since world war II.

We said the boom was under way when they were in opposition, and those who sit on the treasury benches today said there was no boom. Now they admit we are in the fortieth boom month in Canada; the minister himself admitted that. In the United States, however, it is predicted that there will be clear sailing for another nine months and thereafter no one can predict. All these things, taken together with the attitude of this government from day to day, indicate that if they can gallop without appearing to do so, to hold an election, they will do just that, and endeavour to blame the opposition.

I again emphasize this. Bring on your legislation. Just as an aside I may say that the Minister of Agriculture and those associated with him in the first 60 days were going to give milk to all the school children in Canada. Where has it gone? Where has that promise gone? It is just another one. They promised 10,000 scholarships. Where are those scholarships? They would make an idea attractive for another election. Even an hon. member like the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is completely removed from political considerations at all times, would see the advantages in this, the possible use of the same promise twice. This is a cynical attitude taken by some, but not those on this side of the house.

Now, sir, what about these fiscal arrangements? Well, it is of interest to follow them. The course in this regard has been equally uncertain as in so many other cases. They advanced their ideas. Several federal-provincial conferences were held. The premiers gathered. Naturally they wanted a larger share of the tax dollar because they could not discharge their responsibilities under the constitutional distribution of powers. They did not get very much until things started to move. One or the other of the premiers said that action was going to be taken. At the last federal-provincial conference there was set up a committee for an in-depth examination of our general fiscal situation as between the federal government and the provinces.

Then the criticism came. The government decided not to wait for the expert advice they would have received in that connection. The first two conferences indicated a lack of imagination since this government came into office; a lack of preparation and a lack of purpose; changing goals in mid conference and a lack of definite proposals so there had not been sufficient preliminary study. There was uncertainty; one day on and another day off. Finally, after this year's conference, there was strong criticism of the government of Canada. Then, suddenly, there was recognition by the government that some action should be taken.

When we came into office we said we would assure the provinces a larger share of the tax dollar, and we did so. I intend to refer to that in particular. The necessity for this resulted from the fact that the previous government had failed to discharge its responsibilities to the provinces. They had left Canada in such confusion and annoyance, that even those who ordinarily were members of the Liberal fold were critical.

I think of the tradition of the Atlantic provinces before we came into office in 1957. The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton was premier of New Brunswick. He saw the situation there. He took strong objection to the lack of action. Someone might say he was prejudiced. Well, what did the premier of Newfoundland say? On June 25, 1955, when speaking at St. Andrews-by-the-Sea, he threatened—that is Premier Joseph Smallwood—to lead Newfoundland out of confederation unless the federal government stopped discriminating against the four Atlantic provinces, including his own. Even he could not stomach the failure of the government to act. He said this:

> Before we become second class citizens of Canada we will show the other maritime provinces how to get out of confederation.

This is very much like what is being said today about the union jack, sir; a second flag for Canada, which is what Mr. Smallwood demanded. Then I should like to bring this to the attention of the non-political members sitting opposite:

> The federal government has made miserable proposals—

This was the government of Mr. St. Laurent.

> —of sharing the cost in surveys of the wealth of timber, hydro power and minerals. We have gone ahead on our own and since confederation have spent $23 million to help build new industries. If conferation was not to recognize the right of all Canadians to some equality in living standards and opportunity, Newfoundland and the maritimes might as well be declared game preserves for the holidays of Canadians from more prosperous provinces.

I am sure the Minister of Justice has not heard that before. It is an amazing revelation from a sycophant of Liberalism. That was the position. Furthermore he said—and you understand, Mr. Chairman, I dislike placing these words on the record but I have to do it in order to establish the position of affairs when we came into office:

> I am ashamed and angry to say it, but the altogether stupid, bungling, inadequate effort of great Canada to assist the Atlantic fishing industry, (which is potentially almost as valuable in dollars and cents and much more valuable in numbers of families that can be supported than the oil industry of Alberta) is a reproach to a great and progressive country.

I could go on and quote further statements on his part, but I am simply pointing out the generalizations in a statement from a completely unprejudiced source so far as the Liberal party was concerned, as to the serious state of Canadian confederation when we assumed office.

We acted immediately. There was an agreement in effect, beginning April 1, 1957 which would have continued for a period of five years. It had been signed and agreed to by all the provinces. We said it was unfair, that the 10 per cent share of personal income tax that was made available to the provinces was insufficient, and we brought in legislation to increase that share from 10 per cent to 13 per cent.

We gave proof of recognition of the financial problems resting on municipalities, by greatly increasing conditional and unconditional payments and abatements during our period of office, and I am going to refer to the record of the federal-provincial conference of 1963 in that connection. We maintained the equalization principle and made it more equitable. I recall so well that during the last election, and in 1962, the Liberal party said it would bring about equalization on the basis of the highest province. It is another of the promises made recklessly which it has failed to follow.

Here is what another author, now on the front bench of the Liberal government, had to say, and I refer to the Minister of Transport in the book entitled "The Liberal Party." At page 125 he says this:

> At the national Liberal convention of 1958 the party pledged itself to alter the basis of equalization payments so that the revenues of all provinces from income taxes and succession duties would be brought up to the level of the province having the highest per capita revenue. This principle was reaffirmed at the national Liberal rally in 1961. Actually the difference in equalization payments between taking the highest province and taking the top two provinces as a standard is not very great but it is felt that basing payments on the highest province is sounder in principle.

The Prime Minister also made a similar statement. Over and over again that was basic, but in the resolution now before us that principle is permanently put in cold storage and completely evaded.

The equalization plan set out in this resolution is unfair to provinces with above average resources. That matter will be dealt with by other hon. members. We made it possible for the provinces to impose their own income tax with the federal government collecting it without charge. We took into consideration fiscal needs of the Atlantic provinces and made provision for grants of $25 million per year, later increased to $35 million per year. We did these things in order to strengthen the basic principles of confederation, to assure the maintenance of the federal system, and the independence of provincial governments.

I am now going to refer to the results of that action on our part. I am going to refer to the changes that took place and the tremendous degree to which we added to the financial resources of the provinces in so many fields. I reiterate what I have said before, that if we had not increased the share of the provinces—if we had carried out the agreement of 1957, beginning on April 1 that year, as prepared by the previous Liberal government and accepted by the provinces—we would never have had a deficit in any year we were in office. I want to emphasize that point. Apparently the Secretary of State for External Affairs has not read the record, otherwise the wry face he just exhibited would not have been occasioned by what I said. I suggest that he read appendix B of the federal-provincial conference of 1963 so that he will have the facts available.

I am going to ask leave of the committee to have placed on Hansard the official table so that the facts will be clearly shown relating to the summary of federal contributions to the provinces and certain payments to institutions from 1956-57 until 1962-63, because I am dealing with the period that we were in office. This is in appendix B, the official appendix to this document issued by the government of Canada; and in addition, the amounts that were paid in unconditional and conditional grants to all the provinces of Canada during the period I have mentioned, the period that we were in office and the year before. I am asking leave of the committee to place these on Hansard.

The Chairman: Does the right hon. Leader of the Opposition wish these figures to be in Hansard as part of his speech?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just as an appendix.

The Chairman: My understanding is that it might be better if we obtained leave of the house with the Speaker in the chair at six o'clock. This is what is normally done and I think that is what the committee would want to do, so that at six o'clock we would agree that these figures would be included as an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Gordon: I am sure all hon. members on this side would be perfectly happy to have these tables included, either as part of the right hon. gentleman's speech or as an appendix.

The Chairman: If that is agreed among all members I am sure there will be no difficulty.

[Editor's note: For tables above referred to see appendix.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad of that courtesy on the part of the Minister of Finance. It will, of course, be very beneficial in reducing the length of the observations I would have to make if it were necessary to read the record in this regard.

I should like to refer to some of these fields of endeavour in which we so greatly increased the amount of federal expenditure going to the provinces. I refer to the field of vocational training. We brought about a program of vocational and technical training whose cost in 1961-62 amounted to $35,921,000 and $206 million in 1962-63. We increased greatly the amount of assistance to highways for resource development. My hon. friend from Yukon and my hon. friend from Mackenzie will recall what was done in this connection. In the field of municipal winter works, which had not previously been in existence, we spent during the last year we were in office some $27.29 million.

To summarize the increase in the amounts we made available to the provinces, unconditional grants in 1956-57 totalled $552.653 million. In 1962-63 they amounted to $991.526 million. In order to be entirely fair I also intend to give the figures for 1958 and 1959, because some changes were made just before we came to office. The amount of such payments in unconditional grants in 1958-59 was $744.622 million. In other words, even accepting those figures as applicable to the government which I had the honour to lead, the increase during our period of office in this connection alone amounted to some $228 million.

Then in the field of conditional grants—agriculture, health, hospital insurance, welfare, fitness and amateur sport and so on—the amount paid to the provinces in 1957-58 was $144.844 million. In 1958-59 it was $248.356, and in the last year we were in office it was $842.348 million. In other words there was an increase of approximately $698 million. Add those together, and I say again, at no time would there have been a deficit but for these extra payments, one of which was in the field of hospital insurance. The previous government had placed the legislation on the statute books, but we had to finance it. That financing in 1962-63—which the previous government had nothing to worry about because all it did was to have the legislation passed—amounted to $336 million.

These are things which need to be clearly set out. When the Minister of Finance was writing his book, all this was simple. All you had to do was elect a Liberal government and all would be well financially in this nation, and deficits would be as dead as the dodo. There is no thought of that today. The promises of 1962-63 have gone the way of milk for school children.

The statistics tell the story of what we did to achieve reasonable opportunity for the provinces. What about agricultural assistance? Assistance in this field when we came into office amounted to $938,000. It went up until in 1959-60 it amounted to $6,729,000. Then it went down to $5,174,000 in 1961-62 and to $3,279,000 in 1962-63. But there were tremendous expenditures in this connection during the intervening years in other fields such as P.F.A.A., P.F.R.A. and the like.

I believe this; that one of the major reasons behind the attitude of separatism of which one hears in this country is not a matter of political consideration but results from the failure of this government to act on behalf of eastern agriculture. Several hon. members have been pressing for action in this connection but nothing has been done to meet the problems of eastern agriculture. My hon. friend from Qu'Appelle, when he was minister of agriculture, brought about legislation to set up ARDA. I will be perfectly frank. When the plan was first placed before some of us we wondered how it could be made effective. He made it effective. This government has not acted. This government has failed to use ARDA in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec in areas where productivity is not sufficient for a fair and proper return to farmers there. And when I read the other day that 10,000 or 18,000 farmers in the province of Quebec—

An hon. Member: Sixteen thousand.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right; call it the medium figure. Whatever the number was, that many farmers could not be wrong. There is reason in what they are advocating. My hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe-Bagot has dealt with this question over and over again and placed the needs of his province before the house and the country, as has the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska and, of course, my hon. friend from Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, who has never been backward in the manner in which he has pressed for action with regard to the needs of agriculture in his area.

If this government would raise the standard of eastern agriculture, for which it must assume responsibility, and follow courses similar to those which raised the standards in western Canada, a great change might be accomplished. When we came to office, as far as western Canada was concerned it was just another of those forgotten areas and the reason was simply this; that the Liberal party had reached the conclusion that the west would vote Liberal no matter how they were treated here. Hon. members opposite have the same view about some other parts of Canada today. One of the things needed to strengthen confederation and bring about new confidence is action under ARDA and in other areas of agriculture to which reference will be made by other speakers in this debate. I am convinced of that. Constitutional matters dominate the thinking of some people; whereas the people as a whole are affected by economic conditions. Certainly agriculture, not only in Quebec and Ontario but also in the maritimes, needs a new approach and far more consideration than it has been receiving during the last 15 months.

What is the substance of the resolution introduced by the minister? I am afraid that it is simply more tinkering with the problem. The divisions of confederation, or the cracks in the structure—I do not believe they are great, but they are becoming more significant —cannot be repaired by papering them over. That is what is being done here. In other words the action perhaps effective for the moment in so far as the provinces are concerned, will not solve the major problem of confederation.

When we were in office we had a number of conferences. I will deal with them when we come to second reading. I have already pointed out that our plan was to strengthen confederation, to open our northern areas and resource areas outside the ordinary ambit of provincial opportunity or ability to develop. We made available $7½ million to each and every province for this purpose. We brought in programs of which I have already spoken; winter works, vocational training in order to strengthen and extend opportunities for individuals. We met the immediate problem by a tremendous increase in amounts available to the provinces— amounts that when read into the record must be regarded as eye-opening.

I am not going to review at this time in particular what we did, but I want to generalize to this extent. When we came into office the provincial governments received 10 per cent of the income tax, 9 per cent of corporation tax and 50 per cent of succession duties. We immediately raised the 9 per cent to 13 per cent. On January 1, 1960, we made available 1 per cent of the corporation tax to the province of Quebec in lieu of university grants. In addition, on January 1, 1962, we increased the 13 per cent to 16 per cent for income tax, with an accelerating 1 per cent for every year.

When the present government came into office, with the agreements we had put into effect in 1963 the share of the provincial governments was 17 per cent; in 1964 it is 18 per cent. We made available hundreds of millions of dollars to the provinces which otherwise they would not have received. I am not going to say that we ever received regard or appreciation for this. The Minister of Finance will find out, that having been done, it will not be remembered. These are things that are forgotten. I am sure the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, with his many years of experience as premier of one of our provinces, will agree with me that you never get any thanks for what you did. It is as old as the days of Senator Clay. I am sure the Minister of Finance has read very thoroughly the history of that period from 1830 to 1850 in the United States, and those great debates of Webster, Clay and Calhoun. Clay once went to somebody and said, "I hope you are supporting me this time". This was back in 1832. He said, "I have fixed up your uncle with a post office, and I have made provision for your father with a pension". He was referring to a pension arising out of the war of 1812. The reply was, "Oh, yes; you did all this, Senator Clay. But what are you going to do now?" The question was, not what he had done but what he would do. The minister will find that out when he has had as much experience in public life as he had in private business.

Mr. Gordon: There isn't enough time left for me.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And, I hope, with great success in public life. These things will be accepted and within hours, or days, or months, human nature being what it is, the provinces will say, "But what are you going to do next? This is all very fine; we have these things now—but what are you going to do?" That brings me to the larger field as to what courses should be taken now. I have already pointed out that during our period of office we brought the provinces to a new plateau of fiscal capability to enable them the better to deal with their constitutional responsibilities. With the additional hundreds of millions of dollars we provided, they were able to embark on new and far reaching programs in education, highways and resource management.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

We did something more. We did away with the tax rental plan. So long as the tax rental plan was in effect, the provinces were in a subservient and subordinate position. In other words, we reversed the 20 years' centralization trend toward a unitary state in Canada. We freed the provinces from the strait-jacket to which they had been confined by years of centralization. We raised the revenues of all provinces to new heights. We brought into effect an evolutionary process, new programs and policies under joint responsibility heretofore incapable of being financed. Our purpose, our aim, our determination was to return to the principles and spirit of the British North America Act; to strengthen the fabric of confederation—above all, to assure that in co-operation with the provinces we would guarantee all Canadians, regardless of their postal address or regional economic differences, reasonable economic equality.

Dealing with this question in the house on September 27, 1961, I said:

> We are going to restore as far as it is possible the inherent principles of the constitution.

I had been pointing out that they had been departed from.

The then Minister of Transport as he is now, was in the house. Certainly when the King administration started to move in the direction of centralization, followed by the St. Laurent administration, no one ever expected that those pathways of experiment in wartime would become the highways of peace. But they did.

I was interrupted by the present Minister of Transport in these words:

> There were no deficits in our day.

No, there were not. There was no reason for deficits because the provinces were being starved. We increased social security payments by approximately 46 per cent during our period of office. We made vast developments in agriculture and industry. But I repeat if it had not been for our concern for confederation, there would have been no deficits.

Speaking on that occasion, September 27, 1961, I said that we had restored the inherent principles of the constitution, which was something we undertook to do. I said that we were ending centralization and putting in its place co-operation within the principles of the constitution. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk today about co-operative federalism. All I can say is that the translation of co-operative federalism into action has denied every basic principle of confederation. Co-operation can only come through consultation; and in too many cases this government has consulted after making a decision to take a certain course regardless of the attitude of the provinces.

We determined to bring to Canada the capacity to amend our own constitution. So many people say today that the constitution has to be amended in regard to certain matters and this after 97 years of experience. But in those important portions of the constitution as embodied in the British North America Act, sections 91 and 92, changes cannot take place without the unanimous consent of each and every province. It is so easy to talk about it; but let us remember, Mr. Chairman, that rights of religion and education are inviolable and unchangeable. The division of responsibilities between the federal parliament and provincial legislatures cannot be changed by the simple exigencies of the government of Canada or by the action of one or more provinces.

I read so frequently of great speeches made outside the House of Commons about what is going to be done to bring about a new constitution. It is, if I may use a colloquialism, eyewash to say that the constitution which we have we will hold, but that the changes which we want will be made on the basis of the desires of one, two or three provinces. That cannot be done. These changes can only come into effect by general and unanimous agreement.

I realize, as did the minister in his statement the other day, how complex this matter is and how difficult is the problem of dominion-provincial relations. It was easy when in opposition for those who now sit opposite to make those statements. But they have found that it is difficult to pound out on the anvil of experience the theories so airily announced during the election campaigns.

Today I am looking at the whole picture of the kind of Canada which I see; not a picture of a series of sovereign states, but of one Canada maintaining the constitutional rights which are the essence of confederation; the equal partnership of those of English and French origin who brought about confederation within our country.

I do not see in that respect, a Canada far removed from the Canada of Cartier and Macdonald. Read the debates, Mr. Chairman, of 1864, 1865 and 1866. Those men faced a tremendous challenge and they met it in co-operation. They did not dream of a Canada bifurcated or multiplicated—if that word can be used—divided and uncertain. They envisaged a central government which could discharge its responsibilities. They thought of provincial legislatures which would be able to maintain within their limits and territorial boundaries the things dear to those areas and provinces.

Those who say that simply by wishing you can erase the past have not absorbed history. It is easy to say those things. In my boyhood in western Canada the farmers used to talk of separating western Canada from the rest. They said: "We should be removed. Our markets are north and south. We pay a tremendous price for the tariff policy of the country as a whole". Those voices were stilled by the calmness of the leaders of that time. I recall very well an occasion in 1957 when I spoke in one of the maritime provinces at a large meeting. I was dealing with conditions existing at the time and I received a very friendly reception. But I was followed by a former premier of Prince Edward Island, Dr. MacMillan. He thanked me, but his thanks extended into maritime rights, and by the time he was through that audience was ready to fight, so aroused they were by the injustices of confederation. Leaders in the maritimes have taken strong stands, but they have always come back to one thing, that we stand together as one nation, one Canada. If we start breaking up the country into segments we destroy not only the hopes of the fathers of confederation, but our hope that we will be able to hand on to those that follow a Canada worthy of the heritage which is ours.

What are some of the things that can be done in this connection? The time has come to convene a conference of representatives of the federal and provincial governments of this nation representing the various parties in all of the provinces, to examine the whole field of Canadian confederation—not a conference lasting two days, but a conference in which, in a spirit of Canadian co-operation and pride, they will meet together and endeavour through discussion and consultation to arrive at decisions regarding the future of this nation. Can it be done? If it cannot be done, then the hopes of amendments of an important nature to our constitution have ceased to exist.

Sir John A. Macdonald, who having regard to the contribution he made to confederation has not been remembered as he should be as the father of his country, a designation given him by no less a great Canadian leader than Sir Wilfrid Laurier, said during the last years of his life:

I have no accord with the desire expressed in some quarters that by any mode whatever there should be an attempt made to oppress one language or to render it inferior to the other. I believe it would be impossible if it were tried and it would be foolish and wicked if it were possible.

That has been the stand of Conservative leaders through succeeding generations, and Liberal leaders too. The agreements relating to this partnership, found in section 133 of the British North America Act, and sections 91 and 92, to which I have already referred, jurisdiction over education, are the very bedrock of confederation.

Such a conference will be able to do what no royal commission can do. A royal commission can sit, hear and ultimately recommend but finally the matter must come to the representatives of the federal parliament and the provincial legislatures.

We sought to repatriate the constitution when we were in office. We had a number of conferences and we had almost achieved success when two provinces had reservations with regard to certain sections, and we did not achieve repatriation. The issue was not the basis of amendments to the constitution but simply to bring the constitution to Canada.

I hear people talking about the symbols of a nation. How many of them realize that we are the only country in the British family of nations or the commonwealth of today that cannot amend its own constitution? We tried to do so. We went a long way in that direction in a desire to conciliate without loss of principle, but without success in achieving repatriation. Such a conference could suggest ways and means of repatriating the constitution. It could also make recommendations as to a national flag and the other symbols of national sovereignty. There would be representatives there of all the political parties and they would not meet in the glare of publicity. As the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam knows, whenever we were behind closed doors in dominion-provincial conferences we made a great deal more progress than when we were under the glare of publicity. That is human nature. We went to work there. Let this conference meet in that way. Can you tell me any other way in which success can be achieved?

I have studied this question. There is no portion of the constitutional debates since 1762 that I have not read. What has Canada achieved? The Minister of Justice knows. It was the first country within what is the commonwealth of today to have freedom of religion, not by our own action but by the action of the British parliament. It was the first one to give a Jewish person the opportunity to serve as a result of legislation passed in Lower Canada. Canada was the first country in what is now the commonwealth to bring about responsible government which made possible the commonwealth of today. The Lafontaines and the Baldwins, these men saw Canada as a great nation, one nation. Cartier said it over and over again. He said, "I can accept no other proposition", while demanding, as did Laurier many times, that there should be full partnership.

Sir, this conference would examine the whole position of biculturalism and bilingualism. I have endeavoured to think of what other course could be taken that would bring Canadians together. I do not know what it is. I do not want to see us separated and divided. Why can we not, in the spirit of the fathers of confederation, meet in such a conference?

I recall the 26th of February, 1963, when I received the honour of the freedom of the city of London in that historic place, the Guildhall, an honour that I deeply appreciated. Only a few days before I went over there I found for the first time that the Constitutional Act, which was an amendment of the Quebec Act, was introduced on that very day in 1792. There was history, there was tradition, there was something of the pride of achievement. To my left was the great monument of William Pitt, the younger. On that day, the 26th of February, 1792, in the parliament of the United Kingdom a debate took place regarding French-English relations in the Canada of that time. Read that debate. It is the most thrilling debate you can read. William Pitt, the younger, Charles James Fox, Edmund Burke and Sheridan, too, said, we are going to build in North America a country where two races will live side by side in amity and co-operation. It is very interesting when one looks back in this way. You recall other things. You recall the famous quarrel between Burke and Fox which took place on that occasion. They were great friends, but they never spoke again. It was all over the question of whether the legislative council of Upper and Lower Canada should be hereditary, as a peerage. Two of them said, let us have a peerage in Canada; let us not just appoint members of the legislative council for life; let us have a peerage. I think it was Fox who said if we had had a peerage in the 13 colonies in 1776, those 13 colonies would still be with us. Burke took the opposite stand. They separated. Read that debate; it is one of the most thrilling expositions of the relationships between races.

Sir, the whole field of federal-provincial relations should be looked into on a long term basis. The provinces must be placed in a position where they can fully discharge their responsibilities. If you simply hand a little more from time to time to the provinces, all you are doing is postponing the day when more is requested. Human nature is the same for groups as for individuals. If we get so much today, then we say we will try to get a little more tomorrow, so on you go with the problem and it is never solved. As more and more revenues are passed to the provinces—unless responsibilities are being passed on—the more serious becomes the situation for the federal authority. This is the reason why many believe there should be a constitutional realignment of responsibilities.

Now, that is one field. I should like to refer to another field which arises directly out of provincial jurisdiction, and that is the field of urban improvement. The municipalities are the creatures of the provincial legislatures and are responsible to them for their existence and fiscal powers. With the extent to which more and more Canadians are moving into the great cities, with the vast changes, the splurge as it were in the suburban areas, is it not appropriate that such a conference should give consideration, in co-operation, to providing for a national policy for urban development and renewal? A co-ordinated policy is beyond the means of the urban areas and, beyond the means of the provinces. Urban renewal is a national problem today. It is a national problem, just as it was in the days when the forebears of the Minister of Trade and Commerce went into western Canada. The opening of western Canada was a national problem. It has changed now. Today they find themselves in a position where the days of the pioneer are past. Today, in so far as the urban areas of our country are concerned, we as a nation need to do some constitutional pioneering. It will require agreement, it will require consultation between federal and provincial authorities. However it is something that will have to be met. This sprawling urban and suburban complex that has developed in all parts of our country, as in the United States, is one of the greatest problems we face.

There are many members here who have had municipal experience. They know how tremendous is the challenge of this problem. This is another matter to which consideration should be given by such a conference. I say to the Minister of Finance—I know he has that diffidence that a minister of finance must possess in not allowing any of us to anticipate any fiscal changes in advance—that one of the first steps that should be taken in our country in that connection, aside from this conference, is that young couples should be encouraged to own their own homes and that effective consideration must be given to allowing deductible items from taxable income. I am referring in particular to municipal taxes on homes. These are things that will benefit national development in our cities.

There should be set up a department of urban affairs to co-ordinate the various activities of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and other agencies dealing with urban aspects, such as housing, sewage loans and the financing of industrial development. It has been done in the United Kingdom. There of course there is a unitary state. We must here act in co-operation and consultation. What about urban decay, responsible in a large measure for juvenile delinquency, parks and recreation areas, the social improvements that are necessary for this nation, rapid transit systems to relieve traffic congestion, the throughways that are essential to the conduct of commercial affairs? I could go on. After all, we are approaching the centennial of confederation, and this is a massive problem. This is one that will require a concerted approach on a nation-wide scale with federal-provincial co-operation following full consultation.

Finally, sir, I return to agriculture in eastern Canada. If we are to meet the demands, the proper demands of the people, many of the criticisms and attitudes which would lead to separatism will be avoided by action in assuring that farmers in eastern Canada, the maritimes and elsewhere shall have a reasonable share of the national income.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, this legislation to amend the federal-provincial tax sharing arrangements is extremely important. It is important because fiscal matters are at the root of much of the federal-provincial bickering and rancour that has taken place from time to time ever since confederation.

Sometimes it is suggested that federal and provincial governments do not get along because they happen to be of different political parties and because there are personalities involved, but if one examines the record he finds this is not true, that irrespective of the political party in office at a particular time, in a province or in Ottawa, these differences continue to exist because they are based on the need for money on the part of the provinces.

I think it was Chick Sales who once said that when a fellow says it isn't the money, it's the principle of the thing—it's the money. That has been true with federal-provincial relations. Many of the difficulties that are put forth are really superficial, and the basic differences are fiscal. The fact is that the provinces are faced with growing responsibilities. The responsibilities given to them under the British North America Act have grown in geometric progression throughout the years and the revenues available to the provinces to discharge those responsibilities have not grown proportionately.

We have come to the time in confederation when the federal government must either assume some of those responsibilities or it must make a larger share of the tax revenues available to the provinces so that they can do the job which has constitutionally been allocated to them. I want to point out that even with all the additional revenue which the federal government has made available to the provinces, that even with the legislation which is now before us put into effect, the provinces will still get only about 30 per cent of the revenue from the shared tax fields and the federal government will get 70 per cent. This still leaves the provinces with a relatively small share of this vast tax revenue that is available to finance government services in Canada.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this is Canada's No. 1 problem. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition has made a useful suggestion in putting forth the idea of a federal-provincial conference, one which would be held for a considerable period of time and on which there would be a great deal of preliminary work, so that we can work out some division of fields of tax revenue or reallocation of responsibilities, so that we do not have this constant haggling between the federal and provincial governments.

If we neglect this matter the strain and the stress on confederation will continue and could eventually destroy confederation. If I may paraphrase Santayana, he said something like this, that those who are unwilling to learn the lessons of history are condemned to repeat its mistakes. Unless we in this parliament are prepared to see the trend in federal-provincial relations and try to grapple with the problem head on, then I am convinced that some very difficult days lie ahead for confederation.

[Mr. Douglas.]

I have a very limited time, Mr. Chairman, and therefore I am going to apply myself only to the proposed amendments arising out of the two federal-provincial conferences, the one held in November 1963 and the one held in April of this year. Let me deal first with the proposals arising out of the November conference. They can be divided mainly into three parts.

First of all, the federal government is prepared to equalize the revenue from the standard tax rates up to the average of the two top provinces. I hasten at once to say that this is an improvement over what we have had before, when the equalization formula only brought the provinces up to the national average. Certainly the average of the top two is better than the national average, but I cannot forbear pointing out that this is not what the Liberal party promised just about 15 months ago. What it promised was that it would equalize up to the highest province in Canada.

I could give many quotations. Already the Leader of the Opposition has quoted from the book, "The Liberal Party", by the Minister of Transport, in which he said:

> At the national Liberal convention of 1958, the party pledged itself to alter the basis of equalization payments so that the revenues of all provinces from income taxes and succession duties would be brought up to the level of the province having the highest per capita revenue.

I point out that the booklet called, "The Liberals Have the Answer"—they may have the answer but it is a little slow in coming through—stated:

> The Liberal party...believes that, in order to ensure a basic equality of provincial services between all parts of Canada, all provinces should receive an equal revenue per head of population from the tax fields shared between the two levels of government so that all Canadian citizens will benefit equally.

I remind the committee that the Prime Minister himself, opening the conference last November, said in his statement, at page 14:

> It is well known that my colleagues and I prefer to see equalization paid up to the level, not of the average of all the provinces as parliament enacted in 1961, but up to the level of the highest.

That is quite specific.

Why would the government equalize to the two top provinces? I say quite categorically that this was a matter of cooking a formula to get the kind of results it wanted rather than adopting the formula to which it had committed itself, a formula that would have treated all the provinces equally and justly.

The second change which this legislation is proposing is that from now on part of the revenue from natural resources will be taken into account in computing equalization payments. It is to be based on one half of the amount by which natural resource revenue on a per capita basis exceeds the national average. Again this is not in keeping with the commitments made by the Liberal party when it was seeking office.

I can refer to many quotations but I just refer to the Prime Minister's own statement in this house on June 2, 1958, as recorded at page 733 of Hansard for the date:

> Not only is the principle important, but the application of that principle is even more important. On what basis are equalization payments going to be made?
> As far as this party is concerned we are pledged to equalization on the basis of the per capita yield of the three taxes in the wealthiest province.

There is nothing there about taking into consideration natural resources revenue. I wish to ask the government, why is this particular source of revenue taken into account when computing equalization payments. Why is this chosen as a criterion? There is no suggestion that gasoline tax revenue or revenue from automobile licences or sales tax or liquor revenues should be included. Why select this one field? Again, this was the best way to cook the books in order to get the result the government wanted. What they are doing thereby is to penalize those provinces which are making the maximum use of their resources and seeking to get the maximum revenue from them.

Resource revenue, I would point out, does not represent clear gain. The provinces which derive revenue from their resources have to spend large sums of money on the development and conservation of those resources. If this is to be taken into consideration, then the revenue considered ought to be net revenue, if it is considered at all.

In addition, as one hon. member has just pointed out, what is involved is the sale of a capital asset—the sale of something which is not necessarily recurring. Moreover, the present formula bestows a great benefit on those provinces which have already sold their capital assets and disposed of their resources. The provinces adversely affected by this legislation are provinces such as Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. The older provinces which have disposed of their assets in many cases, are those who will benefit. Just make a comparison. The revenue on a per capita basis from natural resources in Ontario is $6.91. In Saskatchewan it is $22.57 and in British Columbia it is $33.72. Does any person in his right mind contend that in the province of Ontario with its vast mining complex and its great timber industry, $6.91 per capita represents the economic value of the natural resources? Of course it does not. Putting natural resource revenue into the formula for computing equalization payments is discriminating against the more recently developed provinces and is working hardship upon them.

The interesting thing is this. When we come to the third amendment, the government turns a complete somersault. The third proposal is that the abatement for succession duties will be raised from 50 per cent to 75 per cent. That is fine, I agree with that. But the government says that this increased abatement will not be considered for equalization purposes. The first 50 per cent is to be taken into account for equalization purposes, but not the additional 25 per cent. Will the minister tell this committee why natural resource revenue will be taken into consideration in computing equalization payments but succession duty revenue will not be taken into consideration. As a matter of fact there is more reason to take into account succession duty revenue which, although it is paid in a province, is levied in many cases on wealth which has been earned all over Canada, whereas revenue which comes from natural resources comes as a result of the investment and the efforts of the province itself. If the federal government wants to include natural resources in computing equalization payments they should certainly have included the increased succession duty abatement.

In my opinion if ever there was a case of cooking a formula so as to get a specific result, this is it. Instead of starting out, as their own program dictated, to work out a formula which would be fair to all the provinces on some reasonable basis, the federal government, far from equalizing to the highest province, has equalized to the two top provinces, then goes on to bring in an entirely extraneous factor—the revenue from resource development—and then, to make doubly sure that they get the result they want, say the additional 25 per cent abatement on succession duty will not be taken into consideration when computing equalization. I have attended a good many federal-provincial conferences and I have seen some of the fiscal experts set up a goal and then work out a formula which would get them what they sought. But I have never seen it done so clumsily and so blatantly as in this case. This represents in my opinion sheer discrimination.

I see it is five o'clock.

The Chairman: It being five o'clock it is my duty to leave the chair in order that the house may proceed to the consideration of private members' business.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' bills as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions for papers, private bills and public bills.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

FIFTH AND SIXTH REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. L. T. Pennell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): I wonder if I might have the unanimous consent of the house to revert to routine proceedings in order to file two innocuous reports from the banking and commerce committee relating to a change of names?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pennell: Then I have the honour to present the fifth and sixth reports of the standing committee on banking and commerce, in English and French.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SECURITY PROCEDURES AND INVESTIGATIONS

The house resumed from Thursday, July 2, consideration of the motion (Mr. Orlikow):

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all government statements and directives to government departments during the past year regarding security procedures and investigations.

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): At the conclusion of the debate last week I made some reference to the defence of Canada regulations and particularly to the suggestion made by certain hon. members opposite that the procedure which should be followed in these security matters should resemble the procedure outlined in those regulations.

I thought it would be useful to investigate that suggestion further and having done so, and particularly having talked to one of the gentlemen responsible for enforcing these regulations, I find that contrary to what has been suggested time again in this house the procedure followed under those regulations was not a judicial procedure. It was essentially the same as the Prime Minister put forward in his speech of October 25. It was a procedure set up entirely within the administration. Hon.

members can confirm this themselves by examining the regulations. The advisory committees set up in those circumstances were set up solely for the purpose of advising the minister with respect to internment proceedings. They were not a court of record. There was no right of appeal. The proceedings were not within reach of the prerogative writs. In particular, there was no right to confront crown witnesses, and only such evidence was made available as the committee in its discretion thought desirable.

In particular I would like to emphasize that there was no right, as I think has been suggested from time to time, on behalf of people who might be affected by that type of order, to confront witnesses or examine evidence presented on behalf of the crown. Quite the contrary: the only right individuals had in that particular case was to learn of the allegations made against them on behalf of the crown in the most general terms.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North last week took exception to my suggestion that he had proposed the confrontation of witnesses in this proceeding. I find, on examining the record, that I was mistaken and his intervention was quite correct. Rather, the suggestion that witnesses should be confronted, that it should be possible for a person affected by this tribunal to examine those witnesses in a proceeding resembling a court of law, was made by his leader, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) and more particularly in a speech he made in this house on June 3, 1963, which may be found at page 593 of Hansard for that date.

I would point out, as has been pointed out before with regard to this type of case, that in view of the counter-espionage type of structure, the security structure, which is involved, it would be most deleterious and would have a very serious effect on the security measures which are taken on behalf of all the people of Canada to submit the investigations and reports of the security officials to a legal type cross-examination.

I think it would be most useful to reemphasize to the house, in connection with this question, the basic function of the security screening in this particular type of case. I would remind the house, first, that the interests of Canadians generally require that certain state secrets be shielded from unfriendly eyes. Unhappily we had an incident in recent months which came very close to this chamber, indicating that representatives of foreign powers continue to engage in operations to obtain access to Canadian state secrets. Second, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the best and surest shield for our state secrets is by entrusting them to servants of unimpeachable loyalty, servants who are free from any pressures either of family, personal background or ideology which could possibly result from time to time in a conflict with such loyalty. Particularly I would point out and would ask the house to bear in mind that the determination of this question as to the loyalty or non-loyalty, the reliability or non-reliability of any particular servant is a very difficult matter. This is not only so from the very essence of the subject matter, but also from the fact that those who with unfriendly design are seeking access to our secrets will take elaborate precautions to conceal their intent; and even more so, those people who may have personal weaknesses but are otherwise loyal—weaknesses which make them particularly subject to exploitation by the unscrupulous—will take very careful precautions to conceal those weaknesses. We must bear in mind that secrets are one species of state property of a particularly sensitive nature. By their very nature, their exposure to the public spoils them. They are not like the stone of Scone or the crown jewels which, if stolen, can be recovered and restored undamaged. Once they are made available to the public, once they are made available to unfriendly eyes, their very distinctive characteristic of property is lost. They are at once so precious and so sensitive a form of state property that we have had to adopt, and in fact all civilized democratic countries have had to adopt, very special measures in respect of their defence.

In particular, in respect of measures required to protect security we have had to abandon, at least in part, some of the concepts of fair procedure and open trial which we normally use in our legal proceedings. One of the great experts on jurisprudence has pointed out that the three watchwords of justice and the rule of law in a democratic state are openness, fairness and impartiality. As I have mentioned, by the very nature of the material, openness or exposure to publicity is one thing that is not possible in security questions. I have also pointed out that impartiality in this case is somewhat difficult, because who can be impartial with the security of the country at stake? It is obviously necessary for an onus to lie in favour of the crown with regard to those who would have access to its secrets. But I do think we can continue to require the observation of principles of fairness in connection with these security provisions, and I think these principles of fairness can aptly be given effect to and carried out under the procedure proposed by the Prime Minister on October 25.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to set out in point form the procedure which will be followed and which has been followed in connection with these security procedures since the Prime Minister's announcement last fall. First, where an employee is in the situation that his reliability has been put in doubt, he has the right to be told that his reliability is subject to doubt and he has the right to learn, so far as it is possible from a security standpoint, the reasons for such doubt. Second, he will have the opportunity to give his side of the particular case, to frame his own case, in respect of the allegations which are made against him. Third, he will be entitled to a second hearing by the head of the agency which is responsbile for his work, and if the decision remains unfavourable, the case will be submitted to a board of review made up of senior civil servants who have not been previously directly involved in the particular case.

The protection of state security is, as I have said, a matter of critical importance. One cannot assure people who may be adversely affected by security screening procedures that they will work in every instance, because after all, being of human creation these procedures are necessarily fallible. It is my submission to the house that the measures proposed by this government to the house do apply a high degree of fairness. It is for this reason, and because of the confidential nature of the document involved, that I would request the hon. member for Winnipeg North, or his colleagues on his behalf, to withdraw his request for the exposure of this particular document.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the hon. member a question before he sits down? Could he elaborate a little more this appeal to the board made up of senior civil servants? Does the person whose reliability is in doubt have the opportunity to appear personally, with counsel; or do they merely review the written documents having to do with the case?

Mr. Macdonald: This has been more eloquently stated by the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker; but I would point out to the hon. member that he will have the right to appear before this particular board and put his best case forward. It is also my understanding that he will have the benefit of counsel in defending himself in what is essentially not a legal proceeding but one in which considerations of a legal character may arise.

Mr. Douglas: The hon. member said "he will have". Do I assume that he has now, under this directive?

Mr. Macdonald: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member can take it that I am speaking not only of the future, but of the present and what dates back to October 25, in what I have said.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose anybody in this house could disagree with the general observations of the parliamentary secretary who has just spoken with regard to the importance of security or, indeed, the desirability of the safeguards for the individual which he says are incorporated in the procedure. But it is my respectful submission to the house that these observations entirely miss the point that is before the house in this motion, which is whether or not the government will disclose to the members of the house the form of procedure which has been decided upon by the government as the security procedure which is to affect those many thousands of people whose whole livelihood and security may be at stake in this important matter.

I urge upon all members of the house, although not too many of them are here at the moment, the acceptance of this particular motion, because I suggest a basic principle is involved which has been overlooked in what we have heard to date. I would put this basic principle in this way: Is the right of parliament to scrutinize the nature of the security procedures affecting the employment and the firing of thousands of government employees to be defeated by hocus-pocus or gobbledygook about the need to keep secret even the procedure by which an aggrieved employee can vindicate his right to his livelihood, and to his reputation, upon which his livelihood depends?

Let me remind the house of the background to this matter. Last year after a number of very disturbing incidents resulting in the dismissal of some persons from the services and other persons employed in the public service on security grounds—which grounds turned out to be completely unfounded—the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) gave an assurance that new security procedures were being devised which would give an employee or a prospective employee the opportunity of resolving any doubt as to his or her being a security risk, and second, would enable a second look to be taken by what might be described as an internal tribunal. The minister of justice of that day, Hon. Lionel Chevrier, assured the house that the "new and carefully devised procedures will improve our measures and give new assurance to individual employees". Note, Mr. Speaker, the words "assurance to individual employees".

In the debate last Thursday two facts emerged. First of all, it was stated that the proposed new procedures have been incorporated in a single directive; so that we have an existing document which incorporates these so-called new procedures, which give an assurance to the employees concerned and also to the members of this house. Second, that the terms of this document—and this is on the record in a formal answer given to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow)—have been communicated to all government departments.

The return given went on to say that the government does not regard it as customary to inform employees or their associations of its terms, or to table a document of this type in the house. In other words, Mr. Speaker, after giving an assurance to parliament that the government will take steps to correct inadequate security procedures, it then refuses to give to the house the steps which it has taken. It proffers assurances to employees and then refuses to tell the employees what are the assurances.

What is the good, Mr. Speaker, of telling us that there are adequate procedures if we are not to see them written down in black and white, and if the house is to be denied knowledge of them? I go so far as to say that this is a ridiculous situation and a serious affront to parliament. Are we not to be entrusted even with a statement on the principles upon which those affected in these so-called security cases are to have their rights determined, to whom they are to apply, and what the nature of the procedure, or the appeal if it be an appeal, may happen to be? If that is the case I suggest, as I said before, that it is an affront to parliament.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) asks us to draw a veil of secrecy over the whole matter. Like some high priest of the modern age he mumbles the word "security" and we are then supposed to be satisfied. There is no one in the house, Mr. Speaker, who is asking that the means by which this security information is gathered be publicly revealed. However, there are some things I should like to know. For instance, I would be interested in knowing the type of questionnaire used to pry into the private lives of would-be employees of the government. I would be interested in knowing whether electronic or so-called "bugging" devices or wire tapping is used in this regard. In the United States a special government information subcommittee of the committee on government operations is inquiring into this very matter of which I have been speaking, to determine whether the right means are used. But is this parliament to be more security conscious even than the congress of the United States of America? My point, Mr. Speaker, once more, is that we are not inquiring as to the means by which information is secured.

Mr. Macdonald: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question at this point, because it may be somewhat germane to his case. The Minister of Justice indicated in his statement last week that the particular document which this motion asks for contains material which, in itself, would be prejudicial to this particular means of gaining information. The hon. member is saying, on the one hand, that he does not want to expose this means, but on the other hand he is insisting on having the document. Does he not think that that is a reasonable explanation for its non-disclosure? I would ask him that question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Brewin: Surely, Mr. Speaker, in setting out the rights of employees to a hearing, the type of hearing they may have and the type of particulars to be given, this sort of document is the sort which I assume the Prime Minister was talking about when he gave assurances to the house that this new procedure would be developed and would be embodied in some form of directive, if not regulation. We are told that there is a directive. I do not know whether incorporated in this directive for some reason unknown to me is some mysterious disclosure as to the source of the information which should not be made available. That may be so. If it is so, a very simple solution suggests itself, and that is that a proper directive be prepared and made available to the members of this house. If the Minister of Justice or the parliamentary secretary had said: "In our directive incorporated in certain procedural rules which deal with these matters there is unfortunately highly confidential information which should be made known only to heads of government departments", that is one thing. But no; we are told that the whole procedure has been set out in a single directive, that it is available to all government departments, but is to be denied to parliament. The information cannot be so terribly confidential or secret, or surely it would not be made available as a departmental document to various persons in the departments.

If the parliamentary secretary can say that there is or there will be a suitable document prepared setting out the rules which affect those who are dismissed, or those who seek employment but are denied it on security grounds, and such promise were made, I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North would be happy to hear it and I think this motion might well be withdrawn. But no such suggestion has been made and we are pressing this matter.

I said that we are not seeking the source of the security information, nor are we asking for the disclosure of the evidence upon which decisions are made. All we are asking is that the written rules of procedure enacted for the protection of employees or those who would be employees be disclosed to the house and to those whom they affect. How do we know otherwise that the rules are adequate or fair, or that they take account of the rights of individuals? How can we as individual members of parliament advise those who are concerned with these matters? I have always been under the impression that one of the basic duties of a member of parliament, indeed of parliament itself, was to protect the rights of individuals against injustice. How can we carry out this vital task if we are not to know even the procedural rules under which bureaucracy is working its will in regard to these people?

The government calls itself a Liberal government. Perhaps I have had a misunderstanding of the meaning of the word "liberal". I thought the word "liberal" connoted a concern with the rights of the individual, but perhaps we will be told, as in the cases of immigrants, that they have no rights. Immigrants are daily subjected to farcical hearings where they are not informed of the objections to their entry, and we are told they are without rights. I wonder whether that argument will be applied here. Is it to be said of the 205,000 civil servants, the 121,000 or more people employed in government corporations, the 123,000 or more people in the armed services, that once the word "security" is mentioned their livelihood, their reputations, can be blasted and they are not told anything about it or even the procedure by which they can have the allegation checked?

In my view there is nothing more serious than that a person's reputation and his livelihood can be dealt with by these secret procedures, of which we are not to know the details. I would have thought that a Liberal government worthy of the name would disregard the sort of timorous hocus-pocus we hear from time to time that tells us that parliament itself is to be denied information as to procedures which affect the livelihood and reputation of a tremendously large group of civil servants and other Canadians.

In the United States, which is not known for being unduly tender to people when security is concerned, they have a directive in this regard. The number of it escapes me at the moment although I have it somewhere. It is a specific directive dealing with this matter. Does anybody think that in the British House of Commons the government can get away with saying: We have devised some security procedures but we are not going to tell you what they are; we are not going to put them in writing for you. We will make some general statements and you must satisfy yourselves with that. I do not believe a government would last very long in that country if it adopted that sort of attitude.

I appeal to the government to change its mind. They will have time to do so because I imagine that this debate will not conclude today. I sincerely hope that if the government does not change its mind and make available to the house at least in outline form the security procedures which it says it has devised, including the new ones which it says fill the gaps that existed before, parliament will show enough self-respect to compel the government to do so.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I will not have too much to say. I had thought I would be in another room. I was about to say "in another place" but probably those are not the right words to use today. So the pearls of wisdom which I propose to cast before the members of the government will not be as lengthy as they would have been otherwise, or as the government feared they might have been.

After listening to the tail end of the argument made by the parliamentary secretary and after reading what took place in the debate on July 2, I am reminded that the government's attitude in this matter is reminiscent of a Roman emperor, not the one who fiddled, although that allusion might well apply too in some respects, but the Roman emperor who, being compelled by custom and by law to make his laws public, saw that they were printed upon stone tablets but then had the tablets set up so high that nobody could read them. I think that pretty well exemplifies the attitude of the government in this connection.

If I may go back to the initiation of this debate by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), as found on page 4954 of Hansard he quotes what the Prime Minister said on October 25 when this matter was first discussed. I am not going to quarrel so much with the refusal of the government to disclose all of the facts which are related in the first paragraph of the quotation, although some fault can be found with their failure to disclose at least a part of them. However, the second paragraph deals with the rules of what is in effect, I submit, an appeal and I take exception to what is set out there.

True enough, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) indicated that this was an administrative matter. Certainly so far as security directives are concerned the government has a very grave responsibility and I would be the first one to deny that they must be compelled to produce all of the directives they issue with regard to the question of security. But once it becomes apparent that an individual employee may be subject to dismissal in so far as his status and job are concerned, a very important aspect of his life, and the matter then becomes the subject of scrutiny by a board, my submission is that even though the board may be an administrative board this is in effect a quasi-judicial proceeding. The administrative aspect is dissolved into a judicial consideration. This is a review, an appeal, and when there is a discretion to be exercised it must and should be exercised in a judicial way.

This has been said over and over again not only in the courts but by political philosophers. A discretionary right exercised by a review board with respect to any matter affecting the government should be exercised in a judicial way. How can it be exercised in a judicial way if the person who is the subject of the inquiry is not made aware of the procedures which will be adopted, the basis of the charge against him and provided with an adequate opportunity to meet that charge and to present his side of the story? With great deference to the views expressed by the Minister of Justice and his parliamentary secretary, I submit with respect to at least the second part of the proposed new procedures outlined by the Prime Minister that the government has no real justification in refusing to disclose the detail of these directives.

Having said that, I would point out that there are ways by which this house could be put in a position to consider the matter. It is a very important matter and it might well be that it could be submitted to a committee in camera. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) said this might involve hundreds, possibly thousands of people before this procedure faded into something completely different. Why not let the matter be discussed in a committee in camera so the government might have the benefit of the views and suggestions of hon. members in this house who, having been invested with the confidence of the people of this country, should have an opportunity in this way of communicating their suggestions to the government.

I am sure that the members of the government would be the last ones to suggest that they had reached perfection in a matter of this kind. This is a very small, timorous step in a direction in which they should have taken brave and bold action many years before. Having in mind the fact that there will be advances, I think, there will be changes and improvements, I would think it would be the part of wisdom for a government to discuss the matter perhaps in a standing committee or a special committee established for the purpose at an in camera sitting.

I suggest that, as a first step, the government might give serious consideration to placing before such a committee all the relevant facts and documentary evidence in regard to what has been done to implement what the Prime Minister indicated would be done by way of establishing appeal procedure. I do not need to stop there. I think the hon. member for Greenwood dealt with this as well. I quite appreciate the fact that the government would be in violation of its duty if it did disclose certain aspects of its directives. Surely however it is competent for them to examine, with great care, everything which is comprised within the documents in respect of which the hon. member has asked for production. They could set to one side those which they feel should not be made available at this time because of the security practices which are involved. With regard to the others, they could provide the documents themselves or a very carefully detailed analysis, so that those people who may be involved will know precisely what they will be called upon to contend with if there should be an occasion for a government employee to meet with this appeal tribunal.

After all, Mr. Speaker, I think that nothing less than that would be worthy of the judicial system which has reached its flower in this country. One of the proudest boasts, I think, of our democratic system is the judicial function. I repeat there will be a judicial function which this committee, even though it is termed an administrative committee, will be exercising because it will be reviewing a decision already made. I see no reason why, under those conditions, the details and circumstances under which this review will be made should not be made available so that this house would be able to assess and evaluate the sufficiency of these directives. Then, an individual whose position might be in danger may, at the appropriate time, have an opportunity to meet the charges against him, to know the circumstances under which he will be permitted to defend himself. He could appear or be represented by counsel, knowing in advance what he will be called upon to meet. I suggest that anything less than that will not be carrying out the true spirit of the judicial system of this country.

Mr. Joseph Macaluso (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest during the last two days to the manner in which this matter has been debated. I was somewhat surprised by the remarks of the hon. member who just spoke when he said that the administrative body which the Prime Minister on October 25, 1963, said would be set up would be exercising a judicial function. I do not find this to be so. I do not feel that an administrative tribunal, such as the one that has been set up, will be exercising a judicial function. The mere fact the hon. member says that because some tribunal is reviewing a person's rights or some complaint they are thereby exercising a judicial function, is not correct in my opinion.

There is no question I think, Mr. Speaker, but that everyone in this house is concerned with the rights of individuals. Every member of every party is concerned and to say that, as the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) did, one who calls himself a Liberal is more concerned, is not stating a fact.

Mr. Orlikow: The Liberals are less concerned.

Mr. Macaluso: I do not believe that because one is called a Liberal makes him more concerned about the rights of individuals than the member of any other party. Any member who believes in human justice believes in the rights of individuals. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) who is interrupting should be concerned because he has been doing a great deal of work in this field.

I find that the contributions to this debate seem to be really canned speeches left over from October 25, 1963. I could not gather from the debate that there was any complaint or allegation that the proposal set out in the Prime Minister's statement of October 25, 1963 had not been carried into effect. The complaint we have been hearing is that we are not seeing, in black and white, that these directives are, in fact, being carried out. In my opinion, this is more or less an attack on the integrity of the Prime Minister by believing the head of a government, who is really primarily responsible for the security of the country, should be saying something in this house that he has not followed through.

It has been stated by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) that the directives did go out.

Mr. Orlikow: That is because you have heard so much.

Mr. Macaluso: You may question me after I have finished.

I have been one, along with the hon. member for Greenwood, who has been quite concerned with the question of security when it deals with immigration cases. I think the investigation of an applicant who wants to become a landed immigrant is somewhat different from an investigation relating to the security of the country itself. I was quite interested in hearing the hon. member for Greenwood asking today, and I think these are his words, what good is it to tell us the new procedures if we cannot see them in black and white? I believe he went on to say this was an affront to parliament. I am one who disagrees with this completely. I think that the statement of October 25, 1963, is as full as any statement possibly could be about the new procedures that were to be incorporated.

Many of the speakers have asked, what are those procedures? Time and time again the Prime Minister, the former minister of justice and the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice, have put on the record what the new procedures are to be. Even the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) put on the record on July 2 what those new procedures were to be. It is very interesting to note that in his speech of July 2, with regard to the first of the new procedures, he said that meets the first objection. I gather he meant by that that this met the first objection of the hon. member's party. Then he went on to quote the second new requirement and said:

> That was the second thing we wanted. We wanted a quasi judicial board of review. We did not get a quasi judicial board of review; we got an administrative board of review made up of deputy ministers.

Then the important words are these:

> We are willing to settle for that as an experiment.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member and others of his party are not prepared to follow up their words and their own assurance that they were willing to settle for this new procedure to be tried out as an experiment. As the hon. member for Peace River said, nobody is perfect in these matters, especially not those dealing with security.

Here is a new procedure set forward, and it was rightly brought forward as a result of complaints made in this house by members of the New Democratic party. I compliment them on this; but this was before October 25, 1963. To date now we have not had any more such complaints, and I hope none ever comes forward again. I also hope that they at least will follow the words of their leader when he says:

> We are willing to settle for that as an experiment.

I believe there is no logical argument to the motion we are now discussing. As it appears on the order paper it reads:

> That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all government statements and directives to government departments during the past year regarding security procedures and investigations.

On July 2 the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) stated there was only one directive which went out to government departments. That was also stated in answer to the question put on the order paper by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). That question read:

> 1. Has the new policy regarding security investigations promised by the Prime Minister last session been established and, if not, how long will it be before it is ready?
> 2. If it has been completed and approved, have its terms been made known to the employees of the government and their associations?
> 3. Will a copy of the policy and its regulations be tabled in the house?

The answer to that question was given as follows on May 25 last:

> 1. Yes.
> 2 and 3. The terms have been formally communicated to all government departments and organizations—

I would assume from that that they have been communicated to the senior officers of those departments, but I do not believe that because you communicate a new security procedure to the heads of government departments, who will be directly involved in the new procedure, this means that it should be made known to the public, or even to members of this house no matter how much we may wish to have it so.

The answer continued:

It is not customary to send directives such as this to employees or associations, nor are administrative directives normally tabled in the House of Commons.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North was not satisfied with that answer and as a result we are having this debate on his motion today.

As recorded at page 4957 of Hansard for July 2 last the Minister of Justice stated that one directive had been sent to government departments during the past year regarding security procedure and investigation. He said:

There has been only one such directive, Mr. Speaker, and after the most careful consideration the government has decided that it must, in the public interest, decline to accept the motion to provide a copy of the directive.

Let us look at the precedent, or so-called precedent or alleged precedent, put forward in this house on October 25, 1963, by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin). I may say the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Macdonald) answered that in his speech somewhat earlier, but at page 4051 of Hansard for October 25 the hon. member for Greenwood is recorded as saying:

The Prime Minister has given reasons why the government decided not to have a quasi judicial tribunal, and I acknowledge at once that the ordinary method of appeal and trial is not suitable to the determination of security cases where it is impossible to confront the person affected with all the information. But, Mr. Chairman, I know of a precedent which was adopted in wartime and which I suggest could and should have been adopted here. During the war the minister of justice, acting under the powers conferred by the War Measures Act and the defence of Canada regulations, found it necessary to intern quite a large number of individuals, sometimes on a mere suspicion.

I agree with that statement.

After public representation it was found possible to set up a tribunal, which was not a tribunal of civil servants or department heads or within the structure of government, but included, as I recall it, a member of the judiciary—

—that was the present county court judge, His Honour Judge Forsyth of Toronto——who was free, and bound to be free, from the necessity to consider the internal or departmental matters and who was able to apply a clear judicial judgment to the problems which came before him.

In the light of reading the defence of Canada regulations and the War Measures Act, and also being informed of His Honour Judge Forsyth's statements, I can say the hon. member for Greenwood is wrong, that Judge Forsyth was not applying a judicial judgment to those appeals from people interned. The people interned were interned under section 21 of the defence of Canada regulations, and 30 days thereafter there was a formal procedure by which they could appeal their internment, by which they could come before this tribunal or administrative body, whatever you want to call it, and there they were told to a certain degree in general terms why they were interned.

They were not confronted by the person or persons who whispered some words, or informed on them, whether on sound grounds or unsound grounds—

Mr. Brewin: Would the hon. member permit a question? Is the hon. member aware that under the proceedings to review internment that he is referring to, a code, as it were, a form of procedure was specifically spelled out requiring particulars to be given, and setting up the types of notice procedure and so on by which hearings were to be undertaken?

Mr. Macaluso: That is exactly what I stated, that there was a formal procedure by which the person interned could appeal his internment. I did not detail what the formal procedure was.

Mr. Brewin: Then one further question; if in wartime security reasons were not so severe that the interned person could not be given some sort of a fair procedure for appeal, which was set out in detail, does the hon. member believe in peacetime that the many, many civil servants who may lose their jobs or reputations are not entitled to the same consideration?

Mr. Macaluso: I do not agree with the statement made by the hon. member for Greenwood, that in wartime there were specific details given to those people who were interned. I know to the contrary from personal experience in that regard that this was not the case. It was most difficult, if not impossible, to find out why some of these people were there, although it is known many were interned because some person or persons did not like them. We know this is a fact. I say

I feel quite concerned about this matter because they did not have proper appeals. They were not informed in detail as to why they were interned. I said they were told in general terms.

Mr. Orlikow: But you are not concerned now.

Mr. Macaluso: I say these administrative bodies were not rendering any judicial decisions. There were no cross-examinations and those interned were not confronted by the persons who lodged complaints against them. Therefore when the hon. member for Greenwood asks why a similar quasi-judicial tribunal cannot be set up in peacetime I answer that there was no quasi-judicial tribunal at that time.

Mr. Orlikow: What is there now?

Mr. Macaluso: The hon. member for Winnipeg North asks what is there now. For one who speaks so much in this house and says he reads Hansard so much, I ask him again to read the statement of the Prime Minister on October 25, 1963, and also what the former minister of justice said at that time, because in those statements it is set out in detail. His own leader set it out on July 2. Perhaps he might read Hansard again. I do not have time to do it for him now. I should like to refer to some of the words used by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) on October 25, 1963 as reported on pages 4048 and 4049:

> The matter under discussion is one of the most difficult problems that faces a government today. It is understandable why the Prime Minister should have made a statement this evening as to the policy of the government, for the responsibility of national security rests primarily on the Prime Minister.

These are words with which I agree and with which many people agree. The right hon. gentleman carries on with regard to the office of prime minister by saying:

> He cannot put his responsibility off on somebody else. He in his person has the custody of our survival and of our security.

I agree with those remarks. The Prime Minister of this country is responsible for the security of this country as no other person is, and as far as I am concerned, after reading the statement made by the Prime Minister on October 25 and the interjections made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) it seems to me the hon. member for Winnipeg North is not interested in what was contained in that statement; he does not believe there has been such a directive issued.

[Mr. Macaluso.]

Mr. Orlikow: That is right.

Mr. Macaluso: The hon. member says "that is right". He does not believe there is such a directive.

Mr. Orlikow: I want to see it.

Mr. Macaluso: Here is a member of the House of Commons who does not believe that the man who is responsible for the security of this nation—

Mr. Orlikow: I just want to see it.

Mr. Macaluso: Well, you cannot change the minds of those who do not wish to have them changed. You cannot change the minds of those who are so blind—

Mr. Baldwin: May I ask the hon. member a question? I did not ask it earlier because it was not my intention to create the impression that this body was a judicial body. But does he not feel that despite the fact this tribunal will be composed of administrative officials, once it has been clothed with powers authorizing it to review findings or decisions which affect the rights of an individual, that it might then be considered as exercising a judicial function and should exercise that function in a judicial way?

Mr. Macaluso: Perhaps when I said it would not be exercising a judicial function I was speaking only in a limited sense. In a way, the hon. member is right; it is exercising a judicial function by reviewing some evidence which is before it, but the committee does not hand down a judicial judgment in a true sense because the evidence before it is not the same as evidence which would be given before a judicial tribunal. Here we have an administrative tribunal made up of deputy ministers of various government departments. They will be able to bring before them, as I understand it, the person who has been charged, and I think this should be done. I doubt very much whether he will be confronted by the person who has charged him. In this sense this is not judicial evidence. It is perhaps a play of words; we are not at odds. But my feeling is this: let us try out this new procedure. If it does not work, then surely we can devise another which does work.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): The millenium in security procedures was not reached on October 25, 1963. I have a particular case in mind which was brought to my attention since this motion was put on the order paper. It involves a young man working for the Department of Transport in my own riding, whose employment is affected at the present time. His case has been taken up by the British Columbia civil liberties association and they have had correspondence with the Minister of Transport about it. I should like to quote first of all from a letter dated May 28 sent to the Minister of Transport by Mr. William H. Deverell, executive secretary of the British Columbia civil liberties association. It says, in part:

> The employee in question objects to answering certain questions relating to his in-laws—such as birthplace, birth dates, last address while living, date of death, as well as place and date of birth of his wife. Basically, the questions relate to information of which he has no personal knowledge and he feels it is an unfair requirement of holding his position that he seek information about persons other than himself.

In reply to this letter the Minister of Transport mentioned the statement made by the Prime Minister in the house on October 25, 1963 and the statement made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau). I wish to quote from the statement by the Prime Minister as set out in this letter because I intend to refer to it later.

> The granting or the denial of a security clearance is an administrative matter, one of managerial responsibility. In making a decision that an applicant or employee may not safely be given access to secret and confidential information, the head of a department or of an agency is not denying an individual a right. No person, of course has a right to see official secrets. The department head is merely exercising the judgment he is expected to apply on the basis of all the information available to him in the way that any sensible person would exercise such judgment in hiring a secretary, a cashier, a lawyer or a doctor, ensuring that such person could be trusted with his property, his private business or his physical health.

I wish to refer later to this part of the statement referring to the hiring of a secretary, a cashier, a lawyer or a doctor in private life or private business. Later, the minister in his letter, quoting the Minister of Justice, had this to say:

> In the first instance, such employees are asked to provide certain basic information about themselves and about close relatives who may influence them or cause them to be influenced in a manner which would bear on their loyalty or reliability.

It seems to me that the government goes far beyond the ordinary practice followed by anyone hiring a cashier, or a doctor, or a secretary as set out in the Prime Minister's statement. It seems to me that employers are not too interested in information concerning a man's relatives. In fact, it may be illegal for them to ask for such information. However, in connection with government security procedures questions are asked about a great many relatives and this seems to presume too much upon the influence which one relative may have over another. If a man comes from a big family he might be in a very bad position. I have nine or ten live aunts and uncles as well as 26 or more first cousins. I cannot count how many second cousins, nephews, and nieces I have. Surely, the government does not need information about all these people. Last year a case was brought up by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Cameron) involving a young man who had been released from the navy because it was thought an uncle of his had been a communist at one time. Later, it was shown there had been a case of mistaken identity. I ask the question: What if his uncle had been a communist? Is this young man to be condemned forever because of that?

May I call it six o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, it is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten thirty o'clock this evening are as follows:

The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), request for steps to preserve historical articles; the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent), agriculture, Quebec, proceedings respecting application of ARDA program; the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), trade, cigar tobacco surplus products.

The house will now resume the business interrupted at five o'clock.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PROVISION FOR REVISION OF FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND TAXATION PROVISIONS

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Gordon—Mr. Batten in the chair:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the revision of certain fiscal arrangements with the provinces and to provide adjustments of fiscal arrangements and taxation provisions consequential upon the provision of youth allowances to parents resident in certain provinces.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, when this debate was adjourned at five o'clock I was criticizing the proposed changes in the federal-provincial tax sharing arrangements. I was criticizing these changes on the ground that they were not designed to bring about greater equalization or equity but that instead the formula was being distorted in order to bring about a desired result. I think this is fully confirmed if one looks at the table which the minister placed on Hansard at page 5184. One sees for instance the changes which arose out of the November, 1963 conference and the effect they will have in the revenue of the provinces in 1964. The provinces will get an additional $87.4 million, of which the province of Quebec will get $42.5 million, or almost half. Next year, out of $106.6 million the province of Quebec will get $54.4 million, or more than one half of the total.

There are other anomalies in this distribution of revenue to the provinces. For instance, if one takes the three prairie provinces, which in terms of per capita personal income are almost identical, one finds that under this formula in the present fiscal year Manitoba gets $7.1 million, Saskatchewan $3.2 million, and Alberta $1.6 million. If you take a comparison of the two provinces which have very close to an equal per capita personal income, namely Ontario and British Columbia, you find that Ontario gets $14.4 million and British Columbia $3.9 million. In other words, Mr. Chairman, I am saying that the federal government, in trying to get a settlement at the November conference, departed from the principle of equalization and sought to rig the formula so as to help those provinces that seemed to be most in need of being pacified.

I am not suggesting for a moment that the province of Quebec is getting too much. I am suggesting that there are other provinces that are getting too little. The province of Quebec has a very serious financial problem; in fact it has two very serious financial problems. One which is not commonly recognized is that outside of the Atlantic provinces Quebec is the only province in Canada that year after year has a per capita personal income below the national average. This should be kept in mind. It might be of interest if I just gave to the committee the per capita personal income by provinces for 1962: Newfoundland, $972; Prince Edward Island, $1,009; Nova Scotia, $1,245; New Brunswick, $1,107; Quebec, $1,417; Ontario, $1,938; Manitoba, $1,696; Saskatchewan, $1,690; Alberta, $1,687; British Columbia, $1,896. The average per capita income across Canada was $1,658. So that Quebec has a financial problem; she is one of the provinces that is below the national average, and has been consistently year after year. But I point out that all the Atlantic provinces are also below the national average and are much further down than is the province of Quebec.

Mr. Pigeon: I am not so sure.

Mr. Douglas: I have just given the figures to my hon. friend. It is very clear that they are lower than Quebec; yet this formula does not benefit them to the extent that it benefits the province of Quebec. The Atlantic provinces have been the forgotten provinces in working out this formula.

The other problem which the province of Quebec has is that this province has now launched upon a large program of social capital expenditure. Quebec has lagged behind in the supplying of schools, hospitals and other social capital programs. Now these programs are coming at a time when the costs are higher than they would have been had they been undertaken 20 years ago. Therefore I recognize that the federal government should do something to help the province of Quebec; but I am submitting that these two problems which face the province of Quebec should be dealt with first of all by having a fiscal need grant for all the provinces. We already have it in the form of the Atlantic provinces adjustment grant. I support that program; I advocated it for years before it was introduced. I think that some formula of assistance to the provinces on the basis of fiscal need should apply to any province whose per capita income is below the national average. This would help Quebec—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Douglas: Yes.

Mr. Grégoire: I heard the hon. member say that Ottawa should help Quebec. I do not know whether the hon. member is aware that only two provinces pay more taxes to Ottawa than they receive in a year. They are Ontario and Quebec; and Quebec pays $800 million more in taxes.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, there will be plenty of time to argue this out later. However, I think my hon. friend is talking absolute nonsense when he makes that statement.

Mr. Grégoire: These are figures published by the government.

Mr. Douglas: My hon. friend will get the chance to make a speech later on. If he can substantiate that statement, we will be glad to hear him.

An hon. Member: He is talking about corporation taxes.

Mr. Douglas: Yes, he is talking about corporation taxes.

Mr. Grégoire: No; all taxes together.

Mr. Douglas: If the hon. gentleman can substantiate that statement, I will be glad to hear it. It is useless just making a statement without substantiation—

Mr. Grégoire: These figures are published by the government.

Mr. Douglas: —because my recollection is that he has made a lot of statements from time to time that could not be substantiated. The point I am making, Mr. Chairman, is that the way to help Quebec is first by having a fiscal need adjustment grant which will be applicable to Quebec or any other province whose per capita income is below the national average.

The second is by the federal government's having a social capital program to help provinces who have particular need for social capital. The way not to do it is to rig the equalization formula and distort it in the manner which has been adopted. I think this has been an unfortunate action on the part of the government.

The second matter I wanted to deal with in the very limited time I have left is the proposals which are arising out of the April conference. The minister said that this proposal to give to the provinces a 2 per cent additional abatement of personal income tax in the fiscal years 1965-66 and 1966-67 came out of the April conference. Personally, Mr. Chairman, I doubt that very much. I think it came out of the federal government's desire to get a settlement on the Canada pension plan. Certainly no such proposal was put before the provincial governments at the conference in April. The significant point is that the provinces are always placed in the position of Oliver Twist: they keep asking for more and the federal government always says there isn't any more. Then when the provinces find some way of putting a pistol to the head of the federal government they find more.

Just to see how the shares in the three tax fields have grown since 1952, let me point out that at that time the formula was 10-9-50. Then it went up, as the Leader of the Opposition said. His government raised it, first to 13-10-50, and then later on to 16-10-50, with the personal income tax abatement going up one percentage point per year for four years. Now with these two additional percentage points in the last two years of the present agreement, it means it will go up to 24 per cent. There are 24 percentage points of abatement for personal income tax, 9 per cent for corporation tax and 75 per cent for succession duties. This is a tremendous increase. But every time that it has been gouged out of the federal government; the provinces almost had to resort to a form of blackmail in order to get it.

I certainly support the government in granting this additional 2 per cent abatement of personal income tax for the last two years of the agreement, but I do not think it was offered voluntarily. I think that this is the price which the federal government has paid in order to get agreement on the Canada pension plan. I do not want to indulge in recriminations; but the point I am making is that if we are going to have satisfactory federal-provincial relations, and if we are going to put this country on a sound basis, the federal government has to approach this problem, not on the basis of how little it can get away with but on the basis of how much it can do in order to help the provincial governments, and through them the municipalities, to grapple with the financial problems which confront them.

I know, Mr. Chairman, what the minister will say. He will remind us of the problems which the federal government has and that it is facing a deficit. I do not care about the deficit problems of the federal government. In the first place, as the minister himself pointed out in his budget address, there is a difference between the traditional budgetary bookkeeping and the national economic accounts. If one looks at Hansard for Monday, March 16, and at page 29 of the white paper, the minister himself tabled statistics to show the difference between the national economic account for Canada and the traditional budgetary bookkeeping. What, Mr. Chairman, do we find? We find that in 1963, particularly for the last quarter when the economy was beginning to gather momentum, whereas the traditional budgetary bookkeeping showed us a deficit of $115 million, the national economic account showed a surplus of $47 million. In other words, when the minister or anyone else takes refuge in the fact that we may have deficits, he is resorting to the old type of budgetary bookkeeping. When we look at the national economic account we realize that, as the economy gathers momentum and we increase productivity and the gross national product, these deficits will disappear.

If the minister really believes, as he has said repeatedly, that our economy is going to grow and expand, then I do not think we have to worry about deficits. I think the government can afford to be much more generous to the provinces than they have been. I think they can afford, for instance, as I suggested a few moments ago, to increase the Atlantic provinces adjustment grant. Because the Atlantic provinces are the Cinderellas of confederation and the rest of Canada has not done fairly by them.

I think that the principle of a fiscal need adjustment grant should be extended across Canada. It would apply to Quebec. It would not apply to the other provinces in a normal period. Right now, for instance, there is the threat of a drought in Saskatchewan which could extend into Manitoba. There could be years in which the per capita income of a given province might drop below national average, and if we had a fiscal adjustment grant in those years that province would have a claim on the federal treasury.

The Chairman: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member, whose time has expired unless the committee wishes him to complete his remarks.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee for their generosity and I will take only a moment or two more. It seems to me that this is the kind of approach which would gain the support and the confidence of the provinces of Canada. Instead of sitting around a table and cutting up a small pie, haggling over how much will go to the provinces and how much will go to the federal government, we should try to think in terms of an expanding economy, of a larger pie to be divided up, and recognize that the principle of equalization must be based not on a rigged formula but on the basis of fiscal need; that those provinces which are most in need ought to get the largest share of these equalization payments. I grant you that so far as the province from which I come is concerned it is unlikely that it would ever qualify.

Mr. Gordon: Which one, B.C. or Saskatchewan?

Mr. Douglas: I am talking now of British Columbia. I represent a constituency in British Columbia. But other provinces in Canada which might be affected by drought or some economic catastrophe would benefit, and from Quebec to the Atlantic ocean every one of the provinces would benefit year after year. It is only on the basis of this kind of equalization, this business of sharing one another's burden, being each other's keeper, that we are going to build the kind of co-operative federalism which has any meaning. Otherwise co-operative federalism is sheer window dressing. It is merely a matter of indulging in eulogistic phrases unless it actually means sharing with those provinces who, for one reason or another, are less fortunate than other provinces. I think that is the basis upon which federal-provincial fiscal agreements must be negotiated.

There are two other matters which I wish to touch on very briefly. First of all, I support wholeheartedly the government's decision to continue the Newfoundland transitional grant which was supposed to expire on March 31, 1967. That expiry date has been wiped out, which is as it should be. I support the decision completely. I also support the idea of entering into an agreement with any province which is supplying youth allowances by giving to such a province a 3 per cent abatement on personal income tax and then making an adjustment at the end of the year so that the province gets back what it has actually spent. I see no objection whatsoever to that and I think that in this case the federal government has worked out what ought to be a very satisfactory arrangement. If the province of Quebec is happier with that kind of arrangement than having the federal government handle youth allowances, I do not see why any of us should object. They are not getting anything to which they are not entitled and it is equitable and fair all round.

There is one other point I want to make. I have said repeatedly in the house, and I am not going to elaborate now because I may want to say something about it when the bill is before the house, that this house ought to be concerned, and I am sure it is, about the danger of stripping the federal government of the fiscal powers which it needs to combat either inflation or deflation, to maintain economic stability and to promote economic growth and full employment. Control of fiscal policy is one of the Keynesian techniques which any government has to retain if it is going to meet the problems of economic fluctuation. As the federal government parts with some of its taxing powers it loses this control.

What is the answer? I do not think the answer is for the federal government to take back these powers from the provinces, but I think the Porter commission put its finger on this at pages 519 to 521 of its report when it said that the time had come in Canada for the federal and provincial governments to co-ordinate and direct their fiscal policies.

I was very glad to see that Professor K. W. Taylor, who is special adviser to the privy council office and who was formerly deputy minister of finance, had this to say when he spoke to the 17th tax conference sponsored by the Canadian tax foundation in November last in Vancouver:

> The subject of my paper is the federal budgetary process, but I do want to emphasize in these prefatory remarks that the size and patterns of provincial and municipal revenues and expenditures have an important bearing on both national and regional economic development and that these levels of government should carefully appraise the economic implications of their fiscal policies both in their own interest and in the national interest.

He went on to say:

> Five years ago at a federal-provincial conference Saskatchewan suggested that there should be a regular annual meeting of federal and provincial finance ministers to review economic prospects and exchange views on appropriate fiscal policies; and two years ago Mr. Gerin-Lajoie, here in Vancouver suggested regular federal-provincial consultation to co-ordinate matters of national interest and priority. I am sure we can agree that there would be considerable merit in promoting co-ordination of federal and provincial fiscal policies.

The point I want to make is just this, that we must be very careful not to so diffuse fiscal policy in this country that Canada cannot effectively cope with either an economic depression or a period of inflation. I hope the Minister of Finance is giving some thought to the possibility of annual meetings of the Minister of Finance and the provincial treasurers with the idea of co-ordinating their respective budgets so that fiscal policies will not be purely a federal matter but a federal-provincial matter. Otherwise I think that federal and provincial budgets can cancel each other out. They could bring about economic conflicts. They could have serious repercussions for our economy, and I think this is one of the steps that could be taken to make more effective and more efficient federal-provincial co-ordination in this field of fiscal relations.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, the resolution before the committee tonight is one of urgent and extreme importance, important to some provinces for what it contains, important to other provinces for what it does not contain. The entire policy of the federal government regarding federal-provincial fiscal arrangements has been and continues to be disappointing. While there has been a great deal of talk with particular emphasis on co-operative federalism, the government to date has done nothing much more than to yield to the pressures of the day, particularly as they come from some of the larger provinces, and has failed completely to come to grips with the fundamental issue which must be resolved before there ever can be any solution to the federal-provincial fiscal problem.

At the very heart of the fiscal arrangements problem is the basic problem of debt, and I am speaking strictly of federal government debt and provincial government debt. At the present time the provincial and the federal governments together, not to mention the municipal and local governments, are spending approximately $1 billion more than they are able to collect from their revenue sources. It seems to me that it does not really matter how we juggle the dividing of these tax deficit problems between us because basically, the cold, hard fact remains that in the end there just is not sufficient income to meet the demands for public services at the present time. To overlook and bypass this basic problem is simply not to face up to realities.

The federal government is seemingly content to hide behind blinkers in the belief that somehow everything will turn out all right. This attitude and philosophy is preventing it from projecting any alternative solution or facing simple facts as they are. What is urgently needed in our economy today is nothing more or less than a strong position of leadership, and I am speaking particularly now of fiscal leadership, to bring in those financial policies that will let the logical expansion of our country go forward in such a way that the tremendous wealth that is ours can equitably be shared not only by governments but by Canadian citizens themselves. We simply do not have this financial and fiscal leadership at this time. This applies to the federal government's own policies and certainly applies to the policies for which it is responsible that relate to the provinces. Unless something is done to satisfy permanently the problems we face in a more satisfactory way, what I am afraid will happen is that the provinces, provincial policies and provincial needs are simply going to polarize further than they have up to now, and instead of our uniting into a stronger nation where we would have the ideal situation of what one might call co-operative federalism we are going to be fragmented still more than we are at the present time. This applies particularly to the realm of fiscal arrangements between the federal government and the provinces.

In the minister's March budget speech he forecast a deficit for the current fiscal year of some $455 million according to what he said, as found on page 5185 of Hansard, is the traditional method of accounting. I was intrigued by those words, "traditional method of accounting". I wonder what the minister actually meant. Then I go on further and I read these words in the statement he made to the house the other evening:

> Obviously there must be limits beyond which the federal government cannot go without endangering its own financial position.

What does he mean by traditional bookkeeping? What does he mean by limits beyond which the federal government cannot go?

I should like at this point to pose several basic questions to the minister to which I have not been able to get satisfactory answers in the house, and I have not seen any record where the minister has given the answers in any other place. First of all, to what extent has the Bank of Canada purchased government bonds? What is the average length of time that these bonds are likely to be held before maturity or before they are sold? How many of these bonds are likely to be held until they do mature? How much money is actually paid to the Bank of Canada in interest on these bonds which the Bank of Canada holds? What portion of these charges is returned, this accruement of interest charges on government bonds held by the Bank of Canada, to the consolidated revenue fund? Based on the replies which I think it is the obligation of the minister to give us to these questions, is it not true that the volume of spending must be governed by the inflationary pressures that exist in the economy?

This leads on to another logical question that relates to the present use that is being made of the Bank of Canada so far as government bonds are concerned. I should like to hear the minister say why a branch of the Bank of Canada in the form of a municipal development bank with low charge rates based on actual administration costs, could not be a very desirable change in his own fiscal requirements. I am sure if he can use the Bank of Canada as I have reason to believe he is using it at the present time for the purposes that he is, there is no reason at all why there could not be established as part of the Bank of Canada a municipal development bank which would meet the capital development needs of the provinces and of the municipalities. On this basis, we would be decreasing some of these fixed costs to the extent that certainly the fiscal problems that the provincial governments face at this time would be much easier than they are.

I realize that many of the expenditures which the government faces are fixed expenditures and it is almost impossible to reduce them. On the other hand, 15 per cent of our budget tax dollar is being paid today for interest charges on the national debt. If the government were not facing this tremendous drain of expenditure for this purpose, if the Bank of Canada through such a bank, shall we say, as the municipal development bank, could eliminate much of this unnecessary expenditure, and then certainly there would be more money not only for the federal government itself but also to share out with the provinces. Then, I would suggest that the facilities of the private banking system would be contracted in making such credit available. If it is true that the Bank of Canada is holding much of the national debt at the present time, the real problem then in Canada is not deficits, it is instead a matter of controlling inflation.

Now, without spending too much of the short time that is at my disposal with regard to some of these basic, fundamental changes in financial policy which could ease the overall fiscal burden, I do want to emphasize the fact that you can only make X dollars go so far. You can cut the pie in any way you want, in as many pieces as you want or with as complicated a formula as you want, but there are still only so many dollars to deal with. It is on this basis we have to face up to this very important problem.

Now, coming to this question of equalization and the chart which the minister tabled the other night when he made his remarks. It is very interesting to note when you look over how equalization affects the different provinces, that two provinces which will have no benefit whatever from this present arrangement for equalization are Alberta and British Columbia. As I was studying this situation this afternoon, a strange thought came into my mind, at least it may seem strange to the minister, Mr. Chairman, but it is not so strange to me. The best way for him to settle the problem he faces so far as equalization is concerned, is to go out and help get a Social Credit government elected in all of the rest of the provinces, and then he would not have any problem.

Actually, what is happening—

Mr. Gordon: That'll be the day.

Mr. Thompson: The minister says, "That'll be the day." What he is doing is penalizing certain aggressive policies which are meeting the needs of these provinces, and penalizing the people of these provinces because they have a government that is facing up on this basis. The minister is robbing from them to pay others simply because this policy of equalization is antiquated and certainly not equitable. If you carry these obvious facts through, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the policy we have at the present time can at the best be seen to be something that is merely doctoring over the symptoms, instead of getting to the root cause of the disease itself.

There are four basic facts which I want to impress upon the minister tonight as far as inequality is concerned in the present fiscal arrangements as they affect some of the provinces. These points probably overlap in some instances on some of those raised by the previous speaker. Certainly, it affects in a most serious way those newer provinces which have gone forward in a more efficient and effective way in the development of their resources and their economies and at this time is placing them in a very inequitable position.

First of all, I should like to mention the question of hospitalization. In the province of Alberta, the hospitalization insurance scheme does not depend upon prepaid premiums nor is it dependant upon a sales tax which is levied for that particular purpose. Instead, the hospitalization insurance scheme uses the principle of a deterrent, where actually as they need the services the citizens themselves contribute a small amount to cover part of the cost of hospitalization. In the over-all effect, this probably produces one of the most economic and satisfactory hospitalization insurance schemes in the whole country. It works on this simple basis. When a person is admitted to hospital he pays a sum of from $1.50 to $2 for a certain number of days, beyond which the service is completely free. This initial co-insurance principle has about the same effect as the deductible clause does in an automobile insurance policy. Instead of paying the entire cost of insurance, this cost saving goes right back to the individual who uses it most and prevents a runaway so far as costs are concerned.

Now, under the present arrangement with the federal government, 25 per cent of the hospital costs are paid to the province on a per capita basis. Another 25 per cent is paid on an over-all cost basis, but in Alberta where this co-insurance is in effect and where there is, in other words, a deterrent deductible principle at work, this amount which in the past five years has amounted to something like $7 million is deducted from this cost factor, and thus federal government does not carry its share of the hospital insurance expenditures that it does in other provinces. The province of Alberta has tried to get the federal government to recognize this principle, but they refuse. They say they are in favour of a principle where hospitalization is available to everyone without any cost. Well, such a thing does not happen because you cannot get something for nothing. Somebody somewhere has to pay for it. The principle here is simple and it brings about a more satisfactory end result. Making hospital service available to everybody, which we all agree is a social responsibility today, is a fine thing but our federal government in its policies is completely unfair to the provincial government that brings such a practical policy. In other words, you are just driving yourself deeper into the net that is going one day to draw the string tight, so far as any hope of operating within our ability to pay is concerned; I think this is unfair.

Another thing that is extremely inequitable so far as government policies are concerned relates to the corporation tax charged on privately owned public utilities. One may say this is not very much because there are very few utilities left which are privately owned, but under the policies followed by this and previous governments we are simply driving our utilities into the arms of public ownership. In some places it may be necessary for this to take place, but I think we should preserve our privately owned and operated utilities wherever we can, particularly wherever they are operating efficiently and economically.

Because the federal government refuses to recognize this principle it means that citizens in provinces like Alberta, and in one or two others where there are privately owned utilities are paying a tax that citizens in other parts of Canada, where utilities are publicly owned, do not have to pay. It is true that approximately 50 per cent of this tax is refunded to the provinces. It is difficult to determine the exact amount since it is included with the tax rental payments, but in the province of Alberta it amounts to something like $9 million. At least this was true in 1962-63, although I do not have the exact figures for last year. However they were approximately the same.

The question can be asked, where do you stop such a policy? Is it to apply to all utilities or only electric utilities? Well, the principle is there. If we really believe we must preserve and reserve private enterprise wherever it will function effectively, even in the field of utilities, then we must admit that we are through these backward and inequitable policies driving ourselves into the arms of the very thing the government says it does not want. This is like paying lip service to something and at the same time backing into it.

Another inequitable situation which has arisen in the last few months, and which was brought out rather clearly in the statement of the minister the other night, relates to the question of the payment of sales tax by crown corporations to the provinces in which these crown corporations operate. Perhaps the principle is right, that crown corporations should not be exempted from paying the tax which other enterprises have to pay. That is a basically correct premise, but what about this principle as it applies at present to those provinces that do not have sales taxes? There is no sales tax in two provinces, Manitoba and Alberta, and so those governments are being placed in an inequitable position, so far as the amount of money is concerned that the government is turning back to them in comparison with the other provinces.

Perhaps to some this might not be such a strong argument for the future, but here the government, according to the statement made the other night, is going to pay this amount of money retroactive for the last two years. On this basis two provinces are being placed in a very inequitable position. It seems to me such policies are not only unfair but they cannot be condoned, and what bothers me is that the government does not seem to be concerned. At least it shows no indication of wanting to do something about the problem.

Another factor which has already been dealt with to some extent tonight is the resource factor in tax sharing. At the present time 50 per cent of the provinces' resource income is deducted in calculating the provincial average income. How the government can justify this kind of policy is something that is very difficult to understand. Before the basis of the agreement was altered, so far as the method of equalization payments is concerned, it entitled the province of Alberta to $23.5 million last year, but the introduction of the resource factor reduced that to $3.6 million.

In this matter of natural resource income, something which is very important to consider is that it is not just the income that comes from natural resource development itself but that which comes from sale of resource capital assets. What is happening here is that those provinces which have been in the past or are presently willing to sell their natural resources away for a pittance, are today reaping the advantage of this present policy. This is certainly unfair, particularly to the western provinces, and it will be unfair to some other provinces as they undertake more resource development.

The per capita income from natural resources in the province of Ontario in the fiscal year 1962-63 amounted to something over $5. Many of the provinces to the west had a far greater per capita income than this. In fact Alberta had a $97 per capita resource income. As a result this policy is penalizing these provinces. An example which the hon. member for Timmins brought up the other night is that the processing of the ore from Timmins is planned for North Carolina in the United States. The same thing is happening with Quebec iron ore deposits. Instead of the provinces where these resources are located benefiting from the processing, we are shipping the resource material out, and then we are taking away money from those provinces which make a more practical use of their resources in order to make up the loss to the citizens of these provinces I have mentioned. To me this seems to be completely unfair and this is one aspect of the federal-provincial arrangements which must be adjusted.

Why does the federal government insist on using national resource revenues when calculating equalization payments? We have not had an answer from the minister to this question, and I would remind him that it is basically unfair.

Coming back to the question of equalization, there are two basic principles which the government has enunciated over and over again. We have heard them in this house and we have heard them from public platforms when government ministers have spoken. The first is that the provinces must have the right to administer their own affairs, and the second is that all provinces must be treated equally.

It is one thing to pay lip service to these basic, fundamental principles; it is another to put them into practice. It is this discrepancy between what is stated to be government policy and the working out of government policy that is causing so much dissatisfaction among the provinces.

Dealing with the question of the present arrangement, so far as tax sharing is concerned I would very much like to use the balance of my time to speak about several of the basic reforms that the minister ought to be introducing in his own policies. But I do not have too much hope that he will ever bring in these reforms because I do not see any evidence of them, either in what he says or in the policies being placed before us. Instead I want to talk for a little about what might be done as far as better arrangements under the present set up are concerned in order to adjust some of the inequities I have been speaking about. The premier of the province of Alberta after studying this equalization question has made a proposition which I think would be much more fair to all the provinces. It recognizes the fact that most provincial governments, as well as the federal government, are operating at a deficit and that in the over-all picture these deficits amount to a very large sum. The alternative equalization policy proposed involves four steps. First, the government of Canada in consultation with the provincial governments would agree on acceptable national standards of services in the fields of public health, public welfare and, perhaps a little later on, in the field of education. Certainly it will not be possible in the days which are ahead to polarize activities in all these different fields into ten different compartments.

Much is being said about our responsibility in the field of health at the present time. It is not so much a question of arguing what our responsibilities are as it is of working out how these responsibilities can be discharged in the most effective fashion on a basis which the people of Canada can afford. The second step in this Alberta proposal would be to appraise the per capita cost of providing these basic services in each of the fields to which I have referred—to set up across Canada the basic standards we want in health, public welfare and those aspects of education in which the federal government may have some responsibility to assist with financially. Then it could be worked out what the anticipated cost of all these services to be on a per capita basis. Once this has been done, we come to the third stage—the creation of a joint federal-provincial fund sufficient to meet this cost. This would mean abolishing entirely the present system of federal and provincial government income tax and corporation tax as it is known today. It would mean abolishing the present federal and provincial sales taxes as they exist today. In place of the present tax arrangements a joint federal-provincial income tax would be established together with a joint federal-provincial corporation tax and a joint federal-provincial sales tax. When I say "joint" I am not implying this is something the federal government would take and then redistribute according to some plan of its own, but to save the cost of administration it would all be collected by the federal government and then divided up again on a per capita basis to meet the needs of the provinces in providing these basic welfare standards. The joint sales tax could take the form of a national retail turnover tax which, besides being simpler to operate, would avoid the inequities inherent in the present federal sales tax imposed at manufacturers' level, and the complicated nature of the retail sales taxes which are imposed in most provinces. Also into this fund should go all the revenue produced by succession duties. The idea is that the revenue from these three joint taxes and succession duties would be sufficient to pay on a per capita basis the agreed minimum standard of services in the fields of public health and public welfare across the whole national scene.

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. The committee may of course permit him to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Thompson: Thank you very much. My remaining remarks will be brief.

There may be those who will say this proposal involves a surrender of provincial rights. However, we must realize it is not good enough for us to talk about being Canadians and then, over and above that, to talk about our being maritimers or westerners or French or English. We had better face the fact that if we are to be a nation we must accept the principle that we need a strong federal government. We can never be a nation without that. On the other hand we want to have provincial governments which can pay their way and meet their responsibilities under our constitutional responsibilities. We are reaching a point where we can no longer talk about policies compartmentalized into so many different units, destroying the very fibre which is necessary to make a nation.

A great deal has been said by some members of this house to the effect that their provinces pay more than they get back in return. Let me call attention to the example of my own province. In 1962 the federal government collected from the province of Alberta approximately $320 million. In return the provincial government received through grants, joint projects and shared programs, approximately $90 million. In other words it cost in the neighbourhood of $230 million for the citizens of Alberta to belong to Canada. Is that wrong? I do not think it is. In return for the benefits received for being part of the nation of Canada we should be happy and willing to make such a contribution. On the other hand, if we expect our citizens to adopt the attitude toward our nation which we think they should be taking as citizens, the federal government must come forward with fiscal policies which are fair to the provinces, the municipal governments and the individuals concerned. I dislike hearing words to the effect—and we hear them more and more often—that we are Quebeckers or maritimers, or English, or westerners first and Canadians second. This is not the way in which to build a nation which will survive in the years ahead.

To sum up my remarks briefly I would say, therefore, that the building of a strong Canada and the development of an effective federal government which will at the same time permit strong provincial governments to exist as well, able to bear the responsibilities allotted to them, will depend in great measure on what is done in this sphere of fiscal relations. It is not enough to continue to patch up something which has failed to work to the satisfaction of the provinces, something which is causing division across the nation, something which is unfair, something which is harming the way of life we agree Canadians should support. Indeed, in what seems at first glance to be a harmless and innocent resolution, we have before us here a problem which will deeply affect the future and the well-being of our nation.

[Mr. Thompson.]

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, one would be led to believe that our economic system is behaving at present like the St. Lawrence river in front of Quebec city, where the tide rises and falls beautifully. The same thing is happening today in the fiscal field.

At times we have seen the federal government seizing hold of almost all the sources of income, even at the expense of provincial rights and, at the present time, we can see that this same federal tide is gradually ebbing away from the fiscal field, making way more and more for the provincial governments.

Mr. Chairman, I think that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) was right when he said this afternoon that politics is rather thankless. Demands are made by the provinces and by the people, and when the government grants anything, they soon forget and ask for more.

Well, the Minister of Finance can expect the same thing to recur. He must be aware that Quebec will not be content with 24 per cent of personal or corporate income tax, or 75 per cent of estate taxes. Quebec will surely ask for more than it has already received. And even if the province offers no thanks, it will not be ungrateful, because those sources of income had been guaranteed by the Canadian constitution and were taken away from the province.

The provinces have jurisdiction over direct taxation, and the federal government at the time of the war, encroached upon this field and took over those sources of income. After having made what he calls arrangements with the provinces, he withdraws quietly, gradually and hesitantly, and at times does not even want to do so. The Minister of Finance can hardly expect appreciation if his predecessors decided to impinge upon provincial rights.

When the provinces claim what is constitutionally their own, it is because the constitution has been too often violated, more particularly in the taxation field. Today, we realize that there is general dissatisfaction with regard to the constitution, and people want to revise the constitution, adjusting it to modern times, and to the priority needs of a vast and many-cultured country like Canada.

Mr. Chairman, before dealing with the bill itself, I must admit that I was surprised a short while ago—and I think it is the first time I heard such a statement on his part—to hear the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) advocate a system of joint income tax together with a joint sales tax. Of course these taxes would be collected by the federal government and redistributed on a per head pro rata basis to each province. This would work in the same way, as when the father of a family gives $2, $5, $10 a week to his son, and when the boy does not do well, or misbehaves, his weekly allowance is cut off. The same thing would apply to the provinces.

What surprised me most, was to see the hon. member for Red Deer trying to have the social allowances financed by such a tax, when the Social Credit members always advocated that social allowances were not to be financed by taxation, but by new credit represented by the increase in the country's wealth, in the real wealth and resources which may exist therein.

I was listening to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas), touching lightly on the topic of debts, stating that it was a good thing to get into debt, that it was liable to develop the economy.

On the contrary, I believe that indebtedness does not help to develop the economy in a country, but brings about crises which future generations have to bear, such as economic depression, inflation, deflation and the unemployment which prevails today.

It is because previous generations got into debt that the federal government has to pay this year $1,080 million in interest only on its debt. Second, it is for that reason that there is an outflow every year of $1,200 million going to foreign countries to pay profits, dividends and interests earned because the Canadians themselves turned up their sleeves to develop their country.

That is what you get for running into debt. That is the result of getting into debt. It could perhaps be compared to a blood transfusion given on the battlefield to a soldier who, nevertheless, will need an operation. Or it could be compared to the man who just had a heart attack; if he is given a shot in the heart, he can be revived for a few minutes, but, after a short while, everything will have to be done over again. Now, old debts are the direct cause of the financial crisis we are facing today.

We borrow money to build a bridge. But when the cost of the bridge in material and labour is paid, including the fees of the engineers and architects, we still have to pay the finance controllers twice that amount in interest, while those people have not dug one shovelful of earth or sunk one nail into that bridge. Over a period of thirty years, the interest doubles the cost, after the materials and labour have already been paid for a first time. That is what is entailed by continual borrowing.

If you borrow $1,000 you have to pay back $2,000. When the people who create and control credit lend $1,000, they claim $2,000 and $3,000 in return.

In fact, Aristotle, the greatest of all Greek philosophers and perhaps the greatest of all times said that money does not reproduce itself naturally, that it does not procreate. When you borrow $1,000 from a source of credit, you should not be expected to pay back $2,000 because money does not reproduce itself naturally, it does not procreate. Money will bear fruit only when man gets into the picture to exercise his control and create new money. When a finance controller creates $1,000 to lend that amount to the government, the latter does not create another amount of $1,000 even though the total repayment will be $2,000.

I wonder how it is that a socialist such as the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam could accept that the government financing be done by private enterprise.

How does it happen that socialism, represented in this house by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, could suggest that some individuals, some large trusts, some big financial interests he denounces by his speech but supports by his suggestions, finance what should be sovereign, that is the government.

How does it come about that it is an accepted fact that some rich individuals pocket tremendous benefits—$1 billion 80 million this year only in interest—at the expense of the government? Does that mean that financial interests, those who create money, bankers have more power than the government? If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) and the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam admit that, I think they should be ashamed of it, since they are members of a government that accepts that a few powerful individuals who have the privilege of creating money should have even more power than the government.

Mr. Chairman, we cannot accept the fact that a few individuals, enjoying extraordinary privileges, make millions of dollars at the expense of the sovereign state of Canada and of public bodies.

A few moments ago I heard the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam say that economy had to be developed. I agree that economy must be developed. But which sector of the economy?

Economy is a general term. If we wish to develop a general field, we must first of all go into its specifications. One always proceeds from the particular to the general when generalizing, because there are three fields in the economic sector: production, exchange of goods and consumption. Now which of those three fields needs to be developed and improved in order to expand the Canadian economy?

Is it production? Complaints are made because warehouses are overflowing. We deplore the fact that warehouses of co-operatives are full of butter which has to be converted into butter oil in order to be sold abroad, because there is a surplus. In Quebec, certain shoe manufacturers can only keep their employees working three or four hours daily. Why? Because they have too many shoes in stock. The same situation applies to clothing manufacturers. House builders complain that construction is decreasing. Why? Because demand is decreasing.

We can produce in quantity and in quality more than is necessary and I challenge anybody in this house to prove otherwise. We are able to produce in quantity and in quality enough to feed, lodge, dress, in brief meet all the needs of Canadians and of the people in South America. Thanks to its production potential, Canada can be at the present time the granary of the world.

If there are complaints, it is not because we do not produce enough, but because we are unable to sell our production. As a matter of fact, just go and ask farmers who leave their farms because they cannot sell their products, whether they can produce. Such is not the problem.

If, at the time of Louis XIV, somebody had told a shoemaker who used to cut the hide, to sew and polish the shoes and to sell them himself, that in 1964 two men and a machine would be able to make a hundred pairs of shoes per hour, but that the problem would be how to sell them, I think that the shoemaker of the 17th century would have thought: they are crazy if they cannot sell the shoes. I need a great deal of time to make them, but when the time has come to sell them, there is no problem at all.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

Three hundred or 400 years ago, there was a production problem in Canada, but this is no longer the case. There is nothing wrong today in Canada with the production sector; it is in the sector of the exchange of products that there is something wrong. No means have been found to find a market for or to distribute products, in brief to channel the production to the consumers who need it. We can only do a part of the job, but not the rest.

It is somewhat like the Quebec bridge, a tourist attraction. Thirty years ago, considering the slow speed of automobiles and the fact that there were not too many on the road, the Quebec bridge did not have to be very wide. However, as the speed and the number of cars increased, we said: Automobiles should get across faster, so the bridge was widened.

The same thing can be said about our economy. On one side of the ditch you have the producer and on the other side the consumer, but the bridge connecting the two, that is the monetary system, is not wide enough for all products to go from one side to the other. There is only one solution and that is to widen the bridge between the two. But our economists have not yet realized it; they are still advocating the system of 1800, the monetary system which was in force at the time of Napoleon. They have not understood the modernization of the means of production. Science has developed automation to a point where it is creating problems—

The Chairman: For a few minutes, I have been listening with great interest to the hon. member, and I am asking him whether he would be kind enough to tell me in what way his remarks, at the present time, refer to the resolution which is now before the committee and which deals with fiscal arrangements between the federal and provincial governments.

Mr. Grégoire: It is easy to make the connection, Mr. Chairman. The Minister of Finance claims that he will settle everything with taxes. That is why he is bringing in fiscal arrangements, in other words, that is why he is keeping taxes.

On this side we claim that taxes will settle nothing at all. That is crystal clear, Mr. Chairman. You can see for yourself at the end of the year that the amount taken out of your salary as taxes does not settle the problem. On the contrary, it makes you poorer. It is the same thing for all those who are here.

We say that taxes will not settle the problem, but another monetary system.

The Minister of Finance introduces fiscal legislation. We say to him: Look elsewhere to settle the problem. It seems to me that, by proposing another solution to the Minister of Finance, I am remaining within the limits of the subject, since I am helping him to solve his problems.

Mr. Chairman, see what is happening at the present time. We hear about fiscal arrangements between the federal and provincial governments. In other words, the Minister of Finance in Ottawa and the minister of finance in the province of Quebec or the province of Ontario will quarrel to know which one will take the largest amount out of the citizens' pockets. That is the stake.

We say: Do not go and get more, it is not the way the problem facing Canadians and Canada is going to be settled but rather by trying to put more money into the Canadian people's pockets so that they may buy what is produced in Canada.

It is simple, Mr. Chairman, and I believe that my remarks were related to the subject matter of the resolution.

Mr. Chairman, what is the result of levying taxes? The purchasing power of the people is further reduced, they cannot buy the Canadian production, which triggers an economic crisis. Instead of levying further taxes, let us expand our monetary system in accordance with our capabilities and the wealth of our country. Then, we shall be able to put an end to the crises confronting us.

We seem to overlook one thing, and that is that taxes make one poorer, while debt-free credit makes one richer.

A while ago, I heard the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam expounding an idea dear to the heart of the Minister of Finance —they must have studied their economic system at the same school—when he said: the central government must control taxation to be in a position to deal with major inflation and deflation crises. Well, Mr. Chairman, I maintain that taxes have never brought about inflation or deflation, that is to say, they never succeeded in controlling or providing a cure for inflation or deflation. On the contrary, they brought about inflation, the devaluation of the dollar, and deflation, by increasing prices.

When the Minister of Finance imposed a new 11 per cent tax on building materials, we saw building costs rise, at least as regards the purchase of materials, by 11 per cent. Therefore, prices have gone up and this is called inflation.

Who caused inflation in that case? It is not Social Crediters, because they did not impose any taxes, but rather the Minister of Finance. Afterwards, the Minister of Finance and the Minister without Portfolio, who is not here tonight, cry out: Social Credit means inflation. They are the ones who bring about inflation, however, by increasing prices with their taxes.

At the present time, 46 cents out of every dollar spent or earned represent taxes, that is the total of federal, provincial, municipal and school board taxes. This means that prices are increased by 46 per cent because of taxes.

That is what we call inflation, Mr. Chairman. Yet, there are those who claim that by controlling taxes you can control inflation. That is not so; it is only if you control the fiscal system and reduce taxes that you can cause prices to go down. Taxes boost prices and devaluate the currency.

Mr. Chairman, there should be no more quarrels in Canada as to who should get the largest share of taxes; instead, we should strive to set up a new monetary system which would make more sense, be more logical and be based on the realities, the potential and the wealth of the country. When Canada has such a monetary system, that is a system which takes into account not only figures but also the realities, the potential and the natural resources of the country, it will be able to face any crisis.

We never had any genuine depressions in Canada. The 1929-39 and the 1957-58 depressions were not genuine. They were intended by man and by finance, and they were borne by the government, because our governments did not know better.

There was no shortage of goods; potatoes were still growing in fields, industries were operating, means of transport were still existing and developing; businesses were going on more numerous than ever; labour was more abundant than ever; there was no shortage of means of production, of transportation, of sale or of publicity. There was only one single depression: The depression of purchasing power.

Canadians were ready to work in industries to produce the necessary goods but, at the same time, they could not buy their products. Such was the depression which we had, a depression intended by man to make purchasing power scarce in spite of an abundance of goods and wealth.

To be rational, a monetary system should be able to meet all the country's requirements and develop all its possibilities, without our having to call upon the monetary system of other countries.

We should have in Canada a monetary system capable of satisfying all Canadian needs, without being obliged to ask for credit from other countries.

Instead of raising taxes, of quarrelling over who is going to tax more than the other, instead of increasing taxes, we should see to it that consumers have enough purchasing power to buy what is being produced. That is simple, is it not?

Mr. Knowles: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Grégoire: Certainly.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the hon. member's criticism of taxation as a method of raising money to meet social needs, would he explain the question which is on the order paper in the name of his leader, the hon. member for Villeneuve, question No. 824, in which he asks what it would cost to pay old age pensions of $100 or $150 a month at age 65 or at age 70 and then asks this question:

> By what percentage would income tax and corporation taxes have to be increased in order to cover these expenditures each year?

Is the hon. member for Villeneuve indulging in some sort of heresy?

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, it is easy to answer that question. The hon. member for Villeneuve was intelligent enough to realize that until we occupy the treasury benches, and I am sure it will not be long, we must try to—

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: But the present Minister of Finance voted for the hon. member's kind of money when he was on this side of the house.

Mr. Grégoire: I know, but he was only talking at that time, with no action. That is the difference.

[Translation]

In fact, the hon. member for Villeneuve realizes that as long as the government will not make up its mind to apply the monetary system of Social Credit, it will have to levy taxes and the hon. member for Villeneuve would at least cope with the most urgent needs, that is, see to it that our older citizens receive an adequate pension earlier because we now realize that when that pension is granted at 70, it is too late.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

When the Social Credit come into power —and it will not be long, I can assure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre— it will then adopt social security measures which are not based on taxes but on the natural resources of the country.

Instead of paying $1,080 million per year of interest to a few bankers who issue Canadian money, we shall see to it to give this money to our older people in old age pensions. Instead of paying $1,080 million every year in profits, dividends or interests to New York, Chicago, London, Paris or Brussels investors who live comfortably in their own country from the development of our natural resources, a Social Credit government will see to it that this money is paid in Canada, paid to Canadian children as family allowances, scholarships and school allowances. This will be much more logical than what is going on at present.

I think that a government which allows the product of the work and sweat of the Canadian people to go and enrich people from other nations instead of turning it over to the young mothers of our Canadian families, to our senior citizens who need it for medical purposes, I say that the government should be ashamed and that it is disgraceful on its part. The Minister of Finance may be a good accountant but he does not know how to reckon when it comes to meeting the needs of our Canadian families and our elderly people.

It is a shame, it is ridiculous and illogical. This is the most stupid type of administration, when we see that people who have never lifted a shovelful of dirt in our mines, make profits. Why? Because those people enjoy privileges.

All they have to do is to take their pen, create money and lend it to the government for the development of our natural resources. Why could the government not do that? Why could the government not do what some bankers are doing elsewhere?

But, I am asking the socialists who want the state to dominate and control the economy of the country, why are you accepting the fact that a few individuals control the most important sector of our economy, that is the financial or monetary system? I admit, of course, that the government, through the Bank of Canada, controls legal money. The government is still having "Bank of Canada" printed on the bills; they still have the picture of the Queen on them and are signed by the governor of the Bank of Canada—

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member table the document from which he is quoting?

Mr. Grégoire: I will send a photostat.

[Translation]

But the other 92 per cent of the money in circulation in Canada is controlled, not by the government, but by the Canadian chartered banks which, under the law, have the privilege of creating 92 per cent of the money when they have 8 per cent of legal reserves.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre seems to be satisfied with such a situation. Yet, I know that the socialist party once enacted legislation to nationalize the banks. If they nationalize credit at the same time, that is fine; that will be a lesser evil because it is not pens, offices and bank buildings that must be nationalized but a lot more than that. It is the privilege to create credit and control its volume, the most important and far reaching privilege in the world. When one controls credit in a country, one also controls production. That is easy to understand, it seems to me.

Instead of taking that privilege away from them and turning it to the advantage of the Canadian people, the Minister of Finance—

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: That is what was said by Mackenzie King.

Mr. Grégoire: Right Hon. Mackenzie King changed the small five cent coin for the large nickel. That is all he did, and that was his answer for the improvement of the monetary system.

In 1934 and 1935, when hon. Mr. Bennett and his friends were in office, they established the Bank of Canada that took over the control of 8 per cent of the currency, whereas the other 92 per cent remained and still are in the hands of a few bankers. That is the most powerful privilege, and we leave it to them without a word.

If, instead of always taxing the people, the Minister of Finance took that privilege away from a few individuals, he would have a much greater source of income than what he gets from taxes. He could increase family allowances without even increasing taxes. It would be the same for old age pensions. But no, the Minister of Finance keeps on with the old system. He reminds me of people who stick to an old monetary system going back, as I said a while ago, to the Napoleonic era. Indeed, he reminds me of a farmer coming to Ottawa with his ox, his cart, and a cord of wood. The first thing he sees on arriving in Ottawa, like in all other municipalities, is a sign with the words: Speed 30 miles. The farmer then turns back, saying to his ox: Come on fellow, you are unable to do that.

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his speaking time is up, unless he has the unanimous consent of the committee to carry on his remarks.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I will be finished in three minutes—

An hon. Member: Very well.

Mr. Pigeon: Provided it is three minutes only.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I remind you, and even if the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm insists on saying no, in which case I would resume my seat, and will say nothing else—but I want to remind you that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) and Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) also had the privilege of carrying on without anyone begrudging them three more minutes, and we were the first to agree that they should carry on their remarks.

The Chairman: The hon. member will admit that if previous speakers carried on their remarks after their time was up, they did so with the unanimous consent of the committee. Of course, the Chair is at the entire disposal and service of the committee, and if he has the unanimous consent, the hon. member will be allowed to carry on his remarks.

Mr. Pigeon: Yes.

An hon. Member: No.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member has not the unanimous consent.

Mr. Grégoire: Who said no, Mr. Chairman? I did not hear a single "no".

The Chairman: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, I objected to the hon. member keeping on with his remarks for the simple and only reason that we have been listening for at least half an hour to an absolutely irrelevant speech. That is the reason why I object to his continuing to speak in the same vein.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, as I must have the unanimous consent of the committee to keep on with my remarks, which I did not get, I will resume my seat. However, I would point out to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot that it is mean on his part, when the other parties have had the privilege to continue their remarks. In the circumstances, I shall say no more rather than continue to speak to numbskulls like the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot.

I would as soon resume my seat than to speak before empty heads.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I appreciate that—

Mr. Grégoire: Let him speak, he has nothing else to say.

Mr. Ricard: —the argument of the hon. member was so weak, he had to resort to insults. That is peculiar to him, anyhow.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Grégoire: My remarks must have been to the point because the hon. member has shown a meanness which he did not show anyone else.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Edmonton West.

[Text]

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I always enjoy listening to the hon. member for Lapointe because it offers an exercise in seeing just where he might be relevant. Tonight I think he mentioned the name of the Leader of the Opposition, the name of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, the hon. member for Red Deer and the Minister of Finance, but not once did he refer to the resolution or its contents. The resolution which is before us tonight is much like an iceberg, but I do not know that the Minister of Finance has that much sang-froid. If you look at the resolution on the order paper it is a simple thing but one which certainly covers much more than is indicated on the surface. We found this to our surprise the other night.

I was particularly interested in seeing the casual attitude the government adopted in putting this resolution in the order of business that had to be dealt with on the basis of urgency before a certain time. At that time the government did not disclose just how much this resolution covered. Certainly this is not in keeping with the urgency of business, when we realize that this afternoon it was disclosed the other house will not be called together until July 15. I should like to underline the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre when he was referring to the great concern of the Minister of National Defence about the passage of a certain bill on Monday night, and then we find it will not even come up for consideration in the other place for nine days. I believe, therefore, we must look at this matter with some care.

When the minister began his remarks the other night he came rather close to launching himself as he did on his first budget, but fortunately the hon. member for Ontario brought him back down to earth. The minister mentioned that there was closer consultation in the past year with the provinces, and I would say to him there was closer consultation with the provinces whether or not the government wanted it. We recall the rather hurried conference with the provinces with regard to the municipal loan fund that ran into a blank wall last autumn. Then we have the Canada pension plan, the first version, discussed in November when other matters were discussed with the provinces. This conference was resumed on March 31. Then we had that famous or infamous rump conference, when we understand that some ministers were going in by one door and others were going out by the back door, the one party not knowing the other party had been there before them.

This resolution covers at least seven items. The first is an increase by 25 per cent in the share of the estate tax. This was the result of the conference on November 26 last. Then there is an increase in the abatement on personal income tax by 2 per cent each year for the fiscal years 1965-66 and 1966-67, bringing the new formula up to 24-9-75. Now the equalization is to take into account this abatement, but as the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam indicated this afternoon we would like to know from the Minister of Finance why the 25 per cent increase in the estate tax is not included in the equalization computation.

Then the third item was the one year option for determination of equalization rental applicable in the provinces of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and British Columbia for the years 1957 to 1961-62. This is giving statutory enactment to a practice that has been in existence. Then there is the item dealing with what this administration considers to be the legal interpretation of term 29 of the terms of union with Newfoundland. The former minister of finance announced that the sum of $8 million would be payable to the end of 1967, that it was a terminable provision. This present administration could do nothing else but satisfy the protestations and the stand taken by the Minister of Transport when he was in opposition. Otherwise it would have been a complete reversal in thinking. I do not believe this government felt it could reverse itself once more because it has done so much of this in the last 15 months. Then the fifth item concerns provincial taxes that have been payable by crown corporations, and there is a payment to be made in lieu of two years collection of taxes by the provinces under this particular provision. I think this is quite fair. In making this provision for the provinces to gain these funds there certainly was a commitment by the previous administration. However, as the hon. member for Red Deer indicated tonight, it still does not remove the sort of odd position that the provinces of Alberta and Manitoba find themselves in, since they have no sales tax.

The sixth item is a 3 per cent abatement of personal income tax in connection with youth allowances, and the seventh is the equalization payments up to the level of the top two provinces, subject to the natural resource revenue deduction.

I thought the minister made a rather plaintive justification of his stand with regard to deficits, and it is very interesting to see him take this position. If we go back over a few years, we had a continuous litany of criticism from his colleagues when they were in opposition, concerning the deficits incurred by the previous administration. This afternoon the Leader of the Opposition indicated quite clearly how those deficits came about, and if it had not been for the greatly increased payments to the provinces, whether by outright grants or conditional grants, there could easily not have been any deficits. The Leader of the Opposition referred to these payments, but I would particularly refer to one item, the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act.

In 1957 when the Conservatives took over, this act was on the statute books, but frankly it was a dead horse. There was a provision, if I recall aright, that before the scheme could become operative six provinces, or a combination of provinces having a majority of the population of Canada, had to sign agreements with the government of Canada. We know what the result was. Certainly the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who had been the former minister of national health and welfare, could readily see his greatly vaunted piece of legislation was going to remain inactive on the statute books unless certain changes were made.

Those changes were made and soon we had agreements with all the provinces. Today the cost to the crown of Canada under that act is approaching the $400 million mark, and this is something that is not recognized by a lot of those people who comment on federal deficits, and what the administration of this part of government means.

I fully realize and agree with the Minister of Finance on the limited scope he has in dealing with deficits. Now he has recognized, by the action he and his government have taken, that there will be deficits, and that each time there is an increase in payments to the provinces the deficits are going to mount and mount. There is no magical way out of it. Certainly the growth in the gross national product on a standard taxation scale is not going to take care not only of the deficit that has been incurred but also of every future occasion on which the Minister of Finance may be forced to give way more and more.

The Minister of Finance has recognized this principle and therefore put to naught all of the criticisms mouthed by everyone on this side of the chamber in those years, criticisms that the deficits were due to maladministration by the previous government. I have always thought there was a great deal of hypocrisy in what was said at that time. The minister was part and parcel of that when he was over on this side and he went through that one great exhibition of voting for debt free money. The minister is going to have to increase taxes or he is going to have to go along with the principle that if he is to give more funds to the provinces he will have to shed responsibilities. He cannot get away from it if he tries for a balanced budget or a reduced deficit.

Let me now comment on the various items that appear in this resolution. I, along with the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, would like to know why the 25 per cent increase in the estate tax provision was not included in this equalization formula? I rather suspect that again this was part of the tailoring of the end product, that the government wanted to achieve a certain result and it whittled away here and there, and adjusted and patched until it got what it wanted.

So far as the second item is concerned, the 2 per cent increase in the abatement for the two fiscal years ending the present federal-provincial fiscal arrangement, I recall that in 1961 when the then minister of finance indicated to the house the terms of the new accord, which would come into effect on April 1, 1962, where there had been made this additional provision of an abatement of 1 per cent per year to the provinces in the personal income tax field, with the right of the provinces to enter that field as it was vacated by the federal government, there were cries of anguish on this side of the chamber, criticizing this forcing of the provinces to bear the responsibility for taxation. But I think it was being realistic that, if the provinces wished to spend the money, they should have the responsibility for the levying of the necessary taxes.

Now, not only has the present administration accepted this as it stood, but it has gone even further and granted a 2 per cent additional abatement in the two years. Therefore once again their criticisms in 1961 while on this side of the chamber were quite hollow. I expect this is a case of what was then a vice has now become a virtue.

I agree with the principle that if the provinces wish to spend they must bear their part of the responsibility for taxation. Unfortunately this is not recognized enough among those who would comment on fiscal arrangements or on the fiscal programs of the federal government. When people talk about financial irresponsibility on the part of the government the fault is always visited upon the head of the federal government. But no one seems to take any cognizance of the fact that the tax dollar that is foolishly spent by the province or municipality is just as foolishly spent as that one which is allegedly misspent by the federal government. It is still the taxpayer who must pay up that dollar. I think our financial editors, writers, and those who would comment on this scene, if they recognized this and put a lot more emphasis on it. would place the responsibility for a good deal more of the burden of taxation where it properly lies.

Each level of government has its own degree of responsibility in keeping its house in order. There is no good in saying that the federal government is entirely to blame for federal deficits if provinces will not wisely spend their money. They must exercise the same degree of caution. I am not saying that the provinces are spending money like drunken sailors, but I think it must be accepted as a cardinal principle that they too must have that same degree of responsibility for wise financial spending as does the federal government.

[Mr. Lambert.]

I am going to turn now to the 3 per cent abatement with respect to youth allowances. On Tuesday we passed the bill providing for these allowances, and it was indicated then that there would be a 3 per cent abatement with regard to personal income tax for those provinces which, by the time the bill passed on Tuesday would come into force, had also brought in a similar provision. At the moment there is only one such province but conceivably other provinces could do the same. But I would say this, Mr. Chairman, that we dealt with this provision on Tuesday because the Minister of Finance and the government had gotten themselves into an impossible position at the time of the budget.

We have again an example of the so-called implementation, with a great fanfare, of one of those electoral promises. There was a glib statement that family allowances would be paid in respect to persons aged 16 and 17. But, like so many other government provisions we have seen in the last 15 months, the whole thing had not been thought out far enough. It became patently clear in the budget debate and in the debate on the resolutions following the budget that there would be a curious inconsistency in the income tax provisions as far as the exemptions allowed to parents of children not receiving family allowances and those receiving family allowances were concerned. The government realized that politically they were in a real jam and that they were also in a jam administratively.

I think the Minister of Finance in his remarks would do well to say to the house: We really put our foot in it that time. Because that is precisely what happened. Well, a workable solution was found and I think it could have been found earlier if a little more foresight had been shown. This is the penalty of rushing in with a half thought out idea. We saw a lot of this last year and I would have thought by now the government would have learned its lesson. Obviously that is not the case.

Then we come to the equalization formula. As the Leader of the Opposition pointed out this afternoon, we again find a curious inconsistency. In 1957 it was provided by agreement that the equalization payments would be made up to the level of the two most prosperous provinces. In 1961 there was a change. It was decided to bring all provinces up to the national average. Even in 1958 the Liberal party said it would go to the level of the richest province. Were they trying to buy someone with a promise of that kind?

They reaffirmed it in the famous Liberal rally of 1961. But what did we get? We are back to the level of the two most prosperous provinces. They had an opportunity here of going to the level of the richest province. Instead they have gone back to the two. We want to know, what is the explanation. Why has there been this great difference between a Liberal promise and the realization of that promise? I suggest we should be told the reason.

Then we have a variation on the equalization terms by reason of a change in the deductible item of natural resource revenue. I would think that the minister would have been a great deal fairer the other night if he had indicated not only the change in the per capita payments or the increase in the per capita payments under the equalization formula, but also the change which had been brought about by the new formula affecting natural resources. True enough, a natural resources revenue formula was brought in for the first time in the 1961 agreement. At that time it was 50 per cent of the three year average of natural resource revenue. This was added to the revenues attributable to the three standard taxes. It meant of course that there were some "have" provinces and some "have not" provinces with respect to natural resources, and I must say that coming from Alberta I felt at that time that some injustice was being done to the newer provinces which were developing their resources at a much greater rate than were some of the older provinces of Canada.

If we look back to the Hansard of 1961 and the tables which appeared at pages 2265, 2266 and 2267 of volume III of that year we shall see what was the effect. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Red Deer tonight pointed out that the average value of natural resource revenue for the province of Alberta amounted to $94.08 compared with a few cents in some provinces, and a national average in the neighbourhood of $7 or $8. In 1961 the Alberta average was $112.

What I object to in this computation of natural resource revenue is that it is a global amount and that it confuses capital and revenue, particularly in the case of Alberta. Incidentally, this consideration is likely to become of increasing importance to Saskatchewan. In rough figures, Alberta obtains from its oil resources something like $140 million annually. This is one of the figures which are used in arriving at the total natural resource revenue for the province. But this is wholly wrong, because only around $40 million is true revenue in the form of oil royalties. The rest of it represents a cash consideration for the alienation of those assets. A long term oil lease is the equivalent of selling an asset. It involves a nonrecurring item and, as the minister knows, a nonrecurring item is not really an item of revenue; it is akin to the disposal of a capital asset. We know that a man who starts living it up by gradually spending all his capital assets soon finds himself with his pockets turned inside out. It is indeed fortunate that the province of Alberta has a lot of oil resources.

I know that the provincial administration has itself contributed in part to the difficulty in which the province of Alberta now finds itself in this respect, because in the development of their own programs they have treated these capital moneys, which belong to future generations as well as to our own, as if they were revenue, and embarked upon programs based upon this inflow of capital moneys as though it was a perpetually recurring item. It has just been fortunate that over these past years it has continued at roughly the same figure. But there'll come a day of reckoning. We could wake up to find the United States changing its continental oil policy, with the result that Alberta oil production will just plummet. Then where will the profits be? Those revenues will be well down, both as to royalties and as to the inflow of capital. Then we will get, of course, a sales tax or something else as a replacement. I would suggest to the Minister of Finance that there must be a review of this situation, because it is wrong at this time to penalize provinces such as British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan and, I hope, some others who may find new natural resources for which there is a market and which will bring in a high return on capital account.

The province of Ontario and the province of Quebec have vast natural resource development, but they have been in existence for some considerable time and the annual increment of new resources development is small. Thus they are limited to revenues; and what revenues?—stumpage dues and whatever small revenues they get from mineral licences or minor royalties in mineral developments. Therefore the inclusion of this inflow of capital funds penalizes these new developments in the western provinces. I think it is wholly wrong that capital moneys should be included in natural resources revenues. I am not only speaking of Alberta;

I am talking on behalf of all those other provinces who may be thus affected.

We get a completely disproportionate picture with Alberta, which can use these funds just as much as anybody else, and is told, "Oh, well; you have had those resources. You are developing them now, so you are going to be penalized." I think this is wholly wrong. I would like the minister in his reply on this proposal to give us a table showing the effect of the 1961 formula of the 50 per cent of the three year average of natural resources revenue, and how the present and proposed formula is and will be affecting the provinces, because I am sure there are some rather startling changes. I want to know, how does it affect British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan particularly, because I think they are the ones that are getting hurt.

I would also reiterate the remarks made by the hon. member for Red Deer with regard to the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and the deterrent fee. I would also put in a special plea, as I have in previous years, with regard to the province of Alberta and the income tax that is levied on public utilities. I think this is a straight discrimination against a number of companies within one province and it is absolutely unfair even for a new utility to start out facing income tax in competition with a publicly owned utility that does not pay income tax.

In conclusion I would say that the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon put forward certain proposals for a complete fully-fledged conference of dominion and provincial representatives to discuss the realignment of responsibilities with regard to duties and the tax fields that must be allocated to fulfil those responsibilities. I think this is highly overdue and I would say, as did the Leader of the Opposition, that this should not be a two or three-day conference; they must be full-blown, well worked up proposals, because our biggest problems today in the relationships between the federal government and the provinces are in the economic field. So many of our ills, in those parts of the country where there is some unrest, stem from economic conditions and the other factors are merely side factors which unfortunately spill over and blur the picture.

We will be looking forward to seeing what actual legislation the minister intends to bring forward, but I would like to have, in particular, the breakdown with respect to this natural resources revenue and how it will affect the provinces, compared with the 1961 formula.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleagues for their kindness. I am happy to have an opportunity to say a few words in this, what has been up to now, most interesting debate; a debate of good humour, good sense and much good thought. It is a vital subject, that of fiscal relations between the provinces and the central government. I was tremendously impressed by the far reaching, very sound suggestions made by the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon in dealing with this important matter at this very important time. I think he wisely invited us to look to our history. Certainly we Canadians have never been overly interested in our history. Heaven knows, we have not glamourized it. We have seemed to avoid, until recently, very much emotionalism about any symbol of history in so far as our own background is concerned. We are far behind the United States in this regard. I suppose, I, almost instinctively would, like Pavlov's dog, salute the American flag if I ever entered an American classroom, since I was so well indoctrinated on how to regard the flag when I spent a year at school there many years ago. I think of George Washington's certain characteristics, for these too were well ingrained in those who studied in that country.

At this late hour I am not going as far as the Leader of the Opposition in any historic recital, but if we are talking about confederation we want to start at the beginning. That would bring us to the very place I have the honour to represent in this chamber, the birthplace of confederation, the city of Charlottetown, the place where the great idea was born. I am happy that in recent years we have had some of our Canadian scholars direct their attention to this important conference, which was not fully reported through any such reportorial device as Hansard. Professors Creighton, Waite and Whitelaw have written interesting, interpretive, very fine works on this important stage in our development. It was essential in 1864 to draw together, to shake off some of the smallness of provincialism of an earlier stage. It was necessary to rise out of a sea of troubles; some of them were political troubles, some social troubles, and a great many were economic. A quotation which the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam made this afternoon was extremely apt, when he said that when you heard a man say that he did not care for the money, it was the principle of the thing, it was really the money that he cared about.

There were long haggles in 1864 both in Charlottetown and Quebec, and in the three years between 1864 and 1867, about fiscal relations, money and the tax dollar, where it would come from and where it would go. This so-called rigid constitution of ours—I realize the British North America Act is only part of our constitution—has never been very rigid at all when it comes to financial matters. If you look at the document today you will find it is extremely different from what it was in earlier days. There have been encroachments, as they are called, by one government against another, although as was pointed out this afternoon not always has the extension of the dominion regime in the fiscal field been an encroachment. So often economic and social problems have become so vast that no level of government lower than the national one can cope with them. One thinks of what happened in the 1930's with regard to unemployment where the lower levels of government sought to deal with this blight on the life of our society.

I should like to say to the members of this committee that we in Prince Edward Island are this year very historically minded. We are celebrating the Charlottetown conference and we hope all hon. members will come and see the cradle of confederation. In fact, we have a rather ornate new cradle which has been built with direct assistance from all provincial governments and the dominion government—the fathers of confederation memorial building. We regard this as a valuable and agreeable exercise in co-operative federalism and we would like everyone to see it.

I remember in my first speech which I ventured to make in this chamber trying to lay aside the base canard that the people of Prince Edward Island in 1864 were very casual about the confederation conference. I knew that concept was wrong, and now we find the historians and archivists discovering that this was not the case at all. Indeed the fathers of confederation were well received, wined and dined; and even George Brown, who seemed to be regarded as a teetotaller in other parts of the country apparently shook off that characteristic in Prince Edward Island. The Canadians were well regarded and treated with respect.

Mr. Crouse: Did they have any sillabub?

Mr. Macquarrie: Well, whatever it was it was bubbling. In response to this hospitality the Canadians took over the conference, and the rest is a matter of history.

But they had many difficulties then, and no federation in the world has been without them. The host province found them so difficult that they had to stay out for quite a while. New Brunswick voted itself out and then voted itself back again. Nova Scotia tried to get out before 1867. They tried very hard to get out in 1867 and sent 19 members to the House of Commons, all but one of whom pledged to come to Ottawa to take the province out of confederation. I mention this because there are some among us in Canada who believe that the stresses and strains on confederation seem to belong only to this particular era. The Nova Scotians tried again in 1886 and elected a premier who would repeal, not prohibition but confederation. But he did not do this, and 10 years later he came up here and occupied the post of minister of finance in the Laurier government. No doubt that was an improvement in his status.

Even British Columbia, reluctant to enter, was anxious to leave. The Leader of the Opposition referred today to the confederation debates, and I am delighted that the queen's printer has again printed these in a handy volume. I find that some of the speeches made then are inspiring and some are not. Apparently many of the newspapermen, as omniscient then as their successors are now, were scornful of the level of debate and critical of the lack of accomplishment in the old legislature of Canada which in 1865 discussed this great question of confederation.

In Professor Waite's volume of selections from the confederation debates he writes about the evening in which the motion was passed, and there is something so Canadian about it all. He said:

> A violent snowstorm descended upon Quebec during the last days of the debate. The final day was March 10, and the debate went on into the small hours of the morning of Saturday, March 11. A vast lobby of members were waiting to vote; unable to endure any more confederation talk, they had eaten and drunk everything the house restaurant and bar could supply, and were lying about the ante-rooms and corridors of the house, impatient for the division bell.
> It rang at last at 4.15 a.m., and the members crowded into the chamber. The division on the main motion was 91-33. It was a huge vote: of a house of 130 members, 124 responded—
>
> As the Speaker left the chair members ingloriously indulged themselves in raucous cheering and singing; then, upon the early dawn of a clear, quiet morning, they trooped wearily home to their lodgings. The convent bell across the St. Charles river was ringing five o'clock.

Yet those debates, if at times indicating that some members were less than enthusiastic, did indicate the desire to grapple realistically with the tremendous problems which united such a diverse group of people and political communities involved.

Since I started with Prince Edward Island as the historic origin of confederation I should like to come back to that province in the contemporary scene, not because it is the most important province—which it is—but because I think it represents a test case in this whole field of dominion-provincial relations. It is the smallest province. It is the one with the narrowest tax base. It has no oil, no gold, no copper and no uranium, even if you could sell uranium nowadays. The proportion of our budget which comes from dominion funds is higher than that of any other province. If I look to the statement of revenue and expenditure for the year ended March 31, 1963 I find that out of a total listing of ordinary revenue of $22,227,000, from the government of Canada comes the amount of $12,892,000. Therefore we must look to Ottawa, not primarily for spiritual leadership but for mundane and pragmatic reasons which are coldly fiscal. For many years we looked, but little saw and less received.

The story of Prince Edward Island's relations with Ottawa is a long one and one surrounded with much intensity, bitterness and immense disappointment. When the Leader of the Opposition today referred to that doughty warrior, the great premier of the 1930's, Dr. MacMillan, he very fully and fairly caught the spirit of our province. Later leaders like Mr. Matheson, the former Liberal premier, expressed themselves very candidly. As Mr. Matheson said, the St. Laurent government did not give us half a deal. There comes to every community, as often in the lives of individuals, a new era, a period of great satisfaction, a period of new opportunities. For us this came in 1957.

We who had been disappointed so long, we who had been troubled about the economic viability of our provincial communities, found that the government elected in June of 1957 moved not only with generosity but with alacrity, and in a matter of months we received through the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants funds greater than we had ever received before and increasing the total of our Ottawa contributions to unprecedented heights.

[Mr. MacNaught.]

I know that the Minister of Agriculture believes that statistics are for losers and I will be very sparing in the use of statistics. But one thing which is written large in Prince Edward Island is the contrast between the figure I shall quote for 1956-57 and that for 1962-63 in unconditional and conditional grants from Ottawa to Prince Edward Island. In the year 1956-57 the figure was $5,048,000 and after six years of Conservative administration the figure was $15,035,000, an increase of 300 per cent.

What has that meant to our small province? You have only to go there to see new roads, to see new schools, and if you were one of those who lived in that province you would sense a spirit of optimism, a new feeling of possibilities engendered and fostered by a new attitude in Ottawa and furthered by one of the truly dynamic and great provincial leaders that we have in this country, Premier Shaw.

What is the situation today? I look at the figures of the present Minister of Finance and in the table on page 5184 of Hansard, a part of his interesting statement the other night, I see that out of the first $87,479,000 under the proposed changes in the equalization formula and increased tax abatement my province will receive the princely sum of $553,000. One could say that Prince Edward Island was the Cinderella at that conference, but you would get no ball out of $553,000 nowadays. Rather our province was the Oliver Twist asking for a little more.

In stage two of these new levels of largesse I note that out of $106,662,000 Prince Edward Island squeaks out $678,000. The picture does not improve as I go down the page adding subtotal to subtotal because I find that out of $264,973,000 after the April, 1964 proposals, our province receives $1,621,000. This is most disturbing. We cannot threaten. We cannot coerce by saying that you will lose all the seats in Prince Edward Island. We do not have 75 or 83 or 85 seats. We have only four. But I will say to the Minister of Finance that no matter how sophisticated his formula, whether it is achieved before or after the event, no formula will work in this country which does not have as its essential ingredient a recognition of the tax ability and fiscal needs of the provincial communities making up this country. This is the essence of co-operative federalism.

Premier Matheson was very right when he said in 1957 that the province of Prince Edward Island would disapprove of any financial arrangement based purely on theoretical calculations designed to meet only one purpose and not the actual financial requirements of the provincial governments. I quote Premier Matheson because of what he said about the former government prior to 1957. I agree with him. He was quite right. They did not give the province half a deal, and I am sorry that the government now in office has seen fit in this instance to revert to the former bad practices.

It is not at all a new thought that the country cannot be strong, cannot be prosperous, if there are parts of it suffering grevious inequalities, unable to provide services for their people at a level comparable to that of other regions in the country. As the late Mr. Norman McLeod Rogers once said, "A federation defeats its primary purpose if through its constitutional arrangements or through policies instituted by the national government it accomplishes the gradual debilitation of one or more of the provincial comunities of which it is composed". Unless some injection of a recognition of fiscal need and fiscal ability is brought to bear, I say to the Minister of Finance that the province of Prince Edward Island will be in a very precarious position. It is my duty to present this case to him and it is his responsibility to make provision for the weakest and the smallest in confederation, his fancy formulae to the contrary notwithstanding.

This is a principle which was well recognized not only in utterances but in action by the government which preceded the government across the way. The then prime minister, the present Leader of the Opposition, opened the dominion-provincial conference in November, 1957. Apparently November was not such a bad month that year although it was a pretty rough one last year. At that time he said:

> We believe that this federation cannot thrive in a climate of glaring disparities in levels and standards of service and development as between the several provinces from Newfoundland to British Columbia.

He said that; he believed that. He and his government acted upon it, and not only the Atlantic provinces went forward but no single province suffered as a result of new justice to the Atlantic region and to the other have-not provinces. This is leadership. This is co-operative federalism. This is the kind of responsible leadership we seek, that we call for. We cannot threaten. We can appeal for justice. We can appeal for a special look at the province of Prince Edward Island and at the Atlantic region generally. It seems to me that, of all, we are the ones to suffer most in this particular dispensation. I hesitate to use any word dealing with dispensing because there was so little dispensed, but I think that grammatically it is correct. We want a recognition of the needs of our provinces. This is a great country. Someone has said that no matter how bad the government the country is going along not too badly, and for that we are thankful. I think Canada will survive. I think it will flourish. I think that in a few years time it may perhaps take an extra spurt ahead.

However, we do not want to be left behind. The maritimes did not come into confederation because they loved Ottawa. In fact, what they thought of Ottawa is well recorded by Joseph Howe. They did not come in without making a sacrifice. No federation is made without sacrifice. It is, indeed, in the realm of sacrifice that we made our contribution. From the common strength of a united, prosperous country, we ask justice, we ask consideration of our problems and we point the present government to the clear pattern of its predecessor. They do not have to go back into dusty tomes. They do not have to call in consultants from Toronto or anywhere else. They can look at the record of the former government. They will see what can be done to strengthen confederation, to strengthen this part of confederation which most needs assistance.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: May I inquire about the business for tomorrow and Monday?

Mr. MacNaught: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow the first item of business will be consideration of two items in the supplementary estimates, namely national defence, 56a and finance, L17a. If these items are approved by the committee, the house will be asked to approve the consequential resolution and pass the various stages of the bill in connection therewith. Then, we will consider main estimates, the departments of agriculture, public works and post office, in that order.

On Monday we will go ahead with the resolution we were discussing this evening.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

(Subject matter of questions debated under adjournment motion.)

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved:

NORTHERN AFFAIRS—REQUEST FOR STEPS TO PRESERVE HISTORIC ARTICLES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, just before 10.30 I was speaking with the minister of northern affairs, who I see is not in the house at the moment, so I must presume his parliamentary secretary has been asked to reply to the question I raised last Wednesday. I tried to ask on Wednesday what action the minister or his department was taking with regard to some 100 telegrams which had been sent to him by individuals and organizations in Whitehorse with regard to the preservation of one of the old river steamers there which is being retained as an article of national historic importance.

It might interest the minister to know that the Whitehorse chamber of commerce, through their own initiative and a committee set up thereunder, raised some $6,500 from the merchants and others in Whitehorse for the purpose of establishing the Robert Service park. By their own initiative, the citizens have converted this area into what is now an extremely attractive area for tourists, an ever increasingly important industry not only in Whitehorse but throughout the Yukon and elsewhere in Canada. The same group intends to devote their efforts now to restoring the steamer Klondike, if the minister and the federal government will approve the removal of it from its present site in the area which is just above the Robert Campbell bridge in Whitehorse.

The minister knows there was money in the estimates, just before the government changed, providing for the removal of these items of national historic interest, and that it is the intention eventually to establish this area as a park area in the city of Whitehorse. I believe the deputy minister has informed the Whitehorse chamber of commerce that the target date for establishing this park and the removal of the steamers is 1967, but it has been suggested by the chamber of commerce and other interested parties in city of Whitehorse that this is too late because, if the steamer were moved now by the government, in accordance with the plans made just previous to the change of government, then this very enterprising group, who merit a lot of credit, would be able to commence work on it immediately because they have just about finished their project on the Robert Service park.

Another suggestion made is that the $6,500 they raised should be restored to them so that they will have a sort of revolving fund for working capital. The minister is aware that there is a plan and provision is made in the estimates where 50 per cent of the costs of construction of camp grounds and picnic sites is borne by the federal government and 50 per cent by the territorial government, yet these enterprising citizens raised these funds on their own and established this park. Therefore there is greater justification in providing these citizens with the revolving fund for which they ask. It will be spent next on the restoration of the streamer Klondike, which will take this burden away from the federal government, a burden to which it was committed prior to the change of government.

The evidence of the concern of the citizens of Whitehorse and the Yukon generally is very apparent in the number of telegrams that have been forwarded to the minister and his officials. I would suggest that very serious and favourable consideration be given to the request that has been made of the minister, and that he might be in a position this evening to advise the people of Whitehorse and the Yukon generally, through the medium of his answer to my question, that he will be acting upon it soon, and acting upon it favourably.

Mr. J. N. Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, when we heard the question of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) yesterday, it was posed in general terms about 100 telegrams from individuals and others in the Yukon concerning the preservation of historic articles of national importance.

The minister and myself, having travelled widely in the Yukon and knowing how many articles there are of national historic interest in so many quarters of the Yukon—in Dawson city and in Whitehorse itself—from the tenor of the question we were not aware at the time what the hon. member was driving at. Of course we had received telegrams concerning the boat in Whitehorse, and I am glad to see now that the hon. member has himself done some research and reduced the general question to a specific plea this evening.

Mr. Nielsen: Did you receive 100 telegrams about anything else?

Mr. Turner: We have constant correspondence with the Yukon on a number of subjects. I might say in connection with the restoration of this boat, one of the three boats which were donated to the people of the Yukon and the people of Canada in 1960, our western regional engineer, Mr. Tom Fenton, is today in Whitehorse looking over the situation.

I know that the hon. member for Yukon represents a resourceful people. Only two weeks ago when I visited the flood areas in Dawson city and Mayo I found them to be people who wanted to stand on their own feet and were quite able within their own resources to support themselves. I know they would want to arrange a method whereby they could share the cost of the proposed territorial park with the federal government and thereby the people of Canada as a whole.

This government, as was the case with the former administration, is willing and anxious to restore that boat. I would remind all the people of Whitehorse and of the Yukon that they should let the government know what their plans are for the development of the park. This commitment to the people of Whitehorse, limited as it is to the restoration of the boat, is the same commitment as the earlier administration made—no more and no less. We are in constant communication with the chamber of commerce of Whitehorse and look forward to their proposals for sharing the cost of the development of a territorial park against which the government would contribute the cost of restoring the boat.

AGRICULTURE—APPLICATION OF ARDA IN QUEBEC

[Translation]

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, Wednesday July 8, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) directed the following question to the government:

—whether the government intends to introduce, during the first part of the session, in case we have a vacation, legislation to reduce the cost of feed grains for eastern farmers, in view of the fact that Quebec's agriculture is going to the dogs?

The Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé) replied to this question, as can be seen on page 5206 of Hansard:

Mr. Speaker, you might allow me to reply and say that we are now considering the matter. I think that next week, we will probably be in a position to announce a decision concerning the payment of trucking charges for feed grains, for all farmers in eastern Canada.

In that connection, I directed the following question to the Minister of Forestry:

Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Forestry. Can he tell the house whether the studies in progress at present include the suggestion made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the Catholic farmers union, regarding the setting up of a feed grain agency for eastern Canada?

Mr. Speaker, this government has been in office for 15 months already. Last year, on this side of the house, with the support of the agricultural organizations in the country, we called for the establishment of a feed grain agency for eastern Canada.

The government agreed that the agricultural committee would meet to consider this question. The committee sat until December 1963, on the understanding that it would resume its proceedings the moment the present session started.

Today is July 9, 1964, and the proceedings of the committee on agriculture, as regards feed grain, have not yet resumed. That is why I asked the Minister of Forestry, who is now responsible for the feed grain policy in eastern Canada, whether the current survey concerned the establishment of that agency, as requested for so long by the farmers and the agricultural organizations, as well as by several members of the house.

I would therefore appreciate it if the Minister of Forestry would tell the house, and also the farmers in eastern Canada, what progress has been made with that survey and whether the present government intends to set up, as suggested, a feed grain agency for eastern Canada.

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, on August 22, 1963, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) announced that from October 15, 1963 to April 15, 1964, the government would pay accumulated storage charges with regard to western grain stored in authorized elevators in eastern Canada. This was the first concrete step to help eastern farmers with regard to feed grains.

At the beginning of last year's session, the committee on agriculture devoted several sittings to the problem of feed grains and, at the time of the adjournment, it was asked that the problem be again referred to the committee.

On June 24, the house passed a motion to refer to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization matters relating to the prices of feed grains.

Because the committee showed a great interest in the study of the problem concerning the setting up of a feed grain agency, we thought that it would be wise that it should carry on with that work and that study in order to submit its recommendations as soon as possible.

I do not think that any legislation will be announced before the house adjourns for the summer recess since the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has already explained clearly the government legislative program before resuming the flag debate. However, I said in the house yesterday that I thought it would be possible, probably next week, to announce a new policy regarding the payment of transportation costs, by truck, of feed grain to all parts of the eastern Canadian provinces as well as those of British Columbia.

It is well known that feed grains are delivered to ports along the St. Lawrence and the Atlantic and are shipped afterwards by railway cars. Now, I think that I will be in a position to announce that this grain may be shipped by trucks which will be subsidized to standardize the cost of feed grains everywhere in eastern Canada.

It will be an extremely interesting piece of legislation made possible by the civil service commission's appointment of Mr. Benoit Lavigne to the position of administrator of assistance to feed grain transportation, within the Department of Forestry, which was made public on June 13.

As the house knows, on March 5 I was entrusted with the application of that policy and I immediately asked the civil service commission to appoint a director. Since his appointment was announced on June 13, Mr. Lavigne, an economist in agricultural science from Wisconsin University, has been working for us in Ottawa where he has already prepared a brief and an order in council concerning the payment of trucking costs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the minister but his time is up.

TRADE—TOBACCO—STEPS TO DISPOSE OF SURPLUS

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, since about 18 months, the tobacco farm co-operative corporation of the Joliette region, St. Jacques, county of Montcalm, has a surplus of 1 million pounds of unsold cigar tobacco. What does the Minister of Trade and Commerce intend to do to sell that tobacco surplus, particularly on foreign markets? The co-operative bought that tobacco and paid the farmers. The only way to protect cigar tobacco growers of the province of Quebec resides in the revision of the Customs Tariff to partly control the imports of cigar tobacco of the kinds which can be grown in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, at this stage of my remarks, may I call the attention of the house to the fact that for the province of Quebec, the cigar industry is very important. Over 95 per cent of the cigars made in Canada are made in Quebec. It is estimated that manufacturers pay annually more over $5 million in salaries. Besides, the treasury of the province levies over $650,000 in taxes on the sale of cigars.

Besides those advantages—

Mr. John N. Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, could the hon. member identify the document he is reading from?

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I shall do so at the end of my remarks.

Mr. Turner: We are enormously interested in that.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the hon. member that he be patient.

Besides those advantages which contribute to the prosperity of the nation, the central government gets annual receipts estimated at $6 million from the cigar industry made up approximately as follows: $1 million in excise duties; $3 million in excise tax; $2 million in sales tax. To these amounts must be added the customs duties collected on imported tobacco, about which we have no information.

These figures are published in a brief which was presented this morning to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization by the société cooperative agricole de Saint-Jacques.

Mr. Speaker, I should also like to quote some extracts from another brief which was presented to the federal government:

> Custom duties. These duties are applicable to imported tobacco bought mainly from the United States and Cuba. They are 12½ cents per pound for unstemmed leaves and 20 cents for stemmed leaves, that is leaves without the middle rib.
> It should be noted here that there is a trend towards a gradual decrease in tariffs, as shown in the following table:

Changes in the Customs Tariff—Tobacco, unmanufactured (for cigars)

Year	Unstemmed lb (pound)	Stemmed (lb)
1936—Budget	$0.40	$0.60
1948—January 1	0.20	0.30
1951—June 6	0.15	0.22½
1956—June 30	$.12½	0.20

We may add that the tariff with regard to other types of tobacco (N.O.P.) has not changed since 1948, being limited to $0.20 a pound for unstemmed tobacco leaves.

Mr. Speaker, it is high time that at the next GATT meeting in Geneva, the Minister of Trade and Commerce should stress the precarious position of our cigar tobacco growers in the province of Quebec, so as to obtain a tariff increase against this kind of tobacco, which we are able to produce in Canada. Indeed, I think we might be well advised to increase the tariff to 40 cents a pound, in order to protect cigar tobacco growers whose contribution to the Canadian economy is quite substantial. Moreover, the cigar industry is pouring millions of dollars, not only in salaries, but in taxes into the coffers of the governments, federal and provincial.

Mr. Jean-Luc Pepin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, despite the eloquence of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, and the depth of the arguments to support his case, it nevertheless remains that there are still many obscure spots in the picture he painted for us.

We may wonder, for instance, whether the problem he pointed out is new, or how long it has been with us? Is there an endemic or epidemic over production in his riding? One can also wonder if representations have been made. He mentioned one or two, but we would like to know to whom they were made.

I am also told that in the hon. member's riding, cigar tobacco is usually bought from the St. Jacques co-operative by Canadian manufacturers and that growers are normally satisfied to produce the quantity required by those manufacturers.

One may wonder then what could have happened. Those are matters, Mr. Speaker, that I shall be only too glad to discuss with the hon. member.

Mr. Pigeon: No, right here in this house.

Mr. Pepin: This afternoon I consulted the officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce and, to their knowledge, nobody ever heard of that problem.

Mr. Pigeon: It is time that you hear about it.

Mr. Pepin: Perhaps someone should tell us about it.

Two very important Canadian buyers have been consulted by one of our officials and they were very surprised to hear the report.

The hon. member suggests an increase in the customs tariff. I need not remind him that this is a Conservative answer. I need not remind him either—at least according to my information—that the problem existed already when the Conservative government was in office.

Mr. Pigeon: There was no surplus three years ago.

Mr. Pepin: There was no surplus? Those circumstances are rather unusual.

Anyhow, if there is an injustice the hon. member will have to bring it to the attention of the Robertson committee, which is responsible for investigating these problems in order to work out a Canadian policy for the Geneva conference.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, the department is ready to help tobacco growers. I shall personally see the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm and we shall invite the president of the co-operative to meet the experts of the department.

For constitutional reasons cherished by the hon. member, I do not think that we may discuss the possibility of selling in the province of Quebec, since it would be an interference in a field of provincial responsibility, but it is possible to consider the situation as far as exports are concerned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The time of the hon. member is up.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Second report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines—Mr. Richard.

AGRICULTURE

TABLING OF EASTERN CANADA FARM SURVEY

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table two copies of the eastern Canada farm survey, as requested some time ago by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. In tabling this survey I would like to point out that it was prepared by persons outside the government and was instructed to be prepared by the previous government, and the views and conclusions expressed in the report do not necessarily represent the views of this government on the matters dealt with by the report.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RUSSIAN PROPOSAL RESPECTING PEACE KEEPING FORCE—LANDING OF GREEK TROOPS IN CYPRUS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct two questions to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The first has to do with peace keeping in general, and in particular the proposal of the U.S.S.R. I would ask the minister whether the acceptance of the Soviet proposal in its present form would not have the effect of placing peace keeping operations under the security council of the United Nations rather than under the general assembly, thereby permitting the U.S.S.R. to exercise a veto and to control peace keeping operations.

My second question has to do with the situation of the peace keeping force in Cyprus. Has the attention of the minister been drawn to the fact that in the United Kingdom within the last 24 hours there has been a reference to the number of Greek troops which allegedly infiltrated Cyprus about ten days ago, the number which I mentioned at the time by way of a question as 4,000? Is there not now confirmation of that, and what has the minister to say in that regard?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the last question, I heard the report mentioned this morning, and there is no confirmation of those precise figures.

With regard to the first question, it is true that in the Soviet proposal for the establishment of a permanent peace keeping body under the United Nations, the Soviet union apparently intends that the security council shall have exclusive authority in the matter. It is only fair to say that under chapter 7 of the charter of the United Nations there is such a provision. But since the charter of the United Nations came into being the general assembly has brought into existence the procedure, under the uniting for peace resolution, which gives a residual authority to the assembly when the security council, having exercised the veto or having failed to act, takes a course which is not acceptable to the general assembly. Canada continues to regard peace keeping as the primary responsibility of the security council but, as I said last night in the external affairs committee, Canada would feel that the general assembly, in the contingencies I have mentioned, should not be deprived of the right to act when the security council has failed to do so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With the purport of what the minister has said I am in agreement, but he has not answered my question. Would not the acceptance of the Soviet proposal in its present form have the effect of obliterating that residual power which has developed whereby under certain circumstances the assembly can act?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not think so, Mr. Speaker. The veto is now embodied in the security council and is exercised by the great powers. The uniting for peace resolution was adopted after this power was given to the security council, and the general assembly acted notwithstanding. So my view, and it may be an arguable one, is that such would not be the situation.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Could I ask the secretary of state whether he has received from the Soviet union directly or indirectly the terms of their proposal, and could such terms be made available to us so we can study them? Also may we have some statement from the minister as to what is the reaction of the Canadian government to this proposal?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, we have not had a formal communication from the Soviet union. Other countries have not received their copies. It may be that the ambassador wishes to deliver it personally. However, we have had the full text before us and have made a preliminary study of the matter. As soon as this proposal is formally before us, I will be happy to see that the full text of the proposal is tabled in this house for the consideration of hon. members.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): A supplementary question. I would hesitate to think that the information the minister has at hand is not as up to date as what we receive in news bulletins, but the confirmation I have heard is that the British prime minister said that 4,000 Greek nationals did land on Cyprus and were dispersed in small groups to homes in the mountains, and that these landings coincided with the arrival of General Grivas on the island. Has the minister been in direct contact either with the Greek or the Turkish government about this critical and serious situation?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I can tell my hon. friend that the British prime minister did not make any such statement, and I can assure my hon. friend, as I have already indicated, that we have been in touch not only with the ambassadors of the countries concerned in Ottawa but we are in continuous touch with the United Nations, with our NATO partners and with other sources. This is not the place to confirm or deny figures which are given in this way. There is under way a very important deliberation in Geneva under the direction of the mediator, who is meeting with certain parties. This could be a very important meeting, and because of it I do not propose to go any further at this moment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the figure I gave ten days ago was one which has been used very authoritatively in various places except in this House of Commons. After this meeting takes place in Geneva today will the minister remove the mystery regarding this matter? Certainly all over the world this is the figure which is being used, and used by individuals who have some knowledge, as the hon. member said a few moments ago. It is difficult to understand why the secrecy, except that when we brought it up originally the minister said there was no foundation for the whole thing.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I think in a matter of this vital importance we should and, I am sure all of us agree, weigh very carefully the significance of what we say. I can only say to my right hon. friend that the government has sources of information, as have other countries; we have to assess these, and this we are doing. There is not much to be gained, in my judgment, by public discussion as to whether there are this number or that number. I have indicated that we have expressed our deep concern, as other countries have, with regard to the presence of troops from other countries that have an involvement.

The meeting that is under way now is a vital meeting. It will not be finished today by any means. This very important meeting is under the direction of the mediator. There are other parties present, among them parties who are guarantors of the treaty of 1961. I would sincerely hope that as a result of this meeting the situation will become clearer and I hope more satisfactory. In any event Canada takes the position which other members of the NATO alliance take. This situation is one that calls for both Greece and Turkey to exercise every moderating influence they can in order not to complicate an important and difficult assignment given by the security council to the mediator.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is one other matter. Certainly Canadians, with 1,100 men there, are most anxious to be assured that the Canadian government has made very clear to the Greek government and to the Turkish government the fact, regardless of NATO relationships or otherwise, that it is a very serious matter for Canadians if there be a basis in fact for such incursions in that country.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My right hon. friend has already been assured, and I reassure him, that when I saw both Prime Minister Papandreou in Washington and Prime Miniter Inonu in New York a few days ago, I made this unmistakeably clear, as I did to their ambassadors here a few days ago, and as the secretary general has done. I would remind the house of the statement made by General Gyani the day before yesterday when he made his report to the secretary general, and of the statement of the secretary general in the United Nations the day before yesterday when he directed a formal appeal to both Greece and Turkey with regard to infiltration asking them to respond in a manner that would enable him to make a report to the security council.

SOUTHEAST ASIA—PROPOSED RECONVENING OF GENEVA CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of his statement in the house supporting United States activities in southeast Asia, I wonder if the minister is now prepared to give equally vigorous support to the proposal of the United Nations secretary general, U Thant, for the convening of the 14 nation Geneva conference in an endeavour to resolve some of the difficulties in southeast Asia.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend would not want to give the wrong impression. I did not make any statement that warranted the suggestion that Canada had given its imprimatur to the full position taken by a friendly power in Southeast Asia, and particularly in Viet Nam. I said Canada agreed with the United States that there was a violation by the Chinese communists of the provisions of the 1954 Geneva accord and the subsequent agreement of 1962.

With regard to the appeal made by the secretary general for reconvening the 14 power conference, I am not convinced that a reconvening of that conference could result in any arrangement other than that provided in the Geneva accord and in the conference of 1962. Canada has made this view known, particularly with regard to the Polish proposal for a six power conference in respect of the situation in Laos. However, at the same time we have indicated that, notwithstanding this view, if it were thought desirable that there should be such a gathering we would cooperate.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the violation to which the minister refers has to do with the 1954 Geneva agreement, would it not seem logical that the signatories to that agreement should be called together rather than resorting to unilateral action by the United States, which is not itself a signatory to the agreement; particularly in view of the statement made by Mr. Bundy, assistant secretary of state for eastern affairs, to a subcommittee of the United States house committee that the United States may now find it necessary to send troops into Viet Nam? May I ask the minister if it would not be preferable to have the 14 nation Geneva conference reconvened, since they are the people who are the signatories to the agreement which is being violated?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The presence of United States military forces in South Viet Nam is the result of an invitation under the authority of the government of that country. It is not in any way related to the fact that the United States is not a signatory to the Geneva accord. What I sought to point out was that the necessary machinery exists in the agreements themselves which set up the international control commission in the three countries—of which commission Canada is a member—to deal with this very situation. If all parties concerned lived up to those accords, there would not be the critical situation in Indochina that confronts the world today. That is the situation.

However, I want to make it clear that, if it seemed a desirable way of trying to mitigate the difficulty Canada would be willing to attend such a conference. But we believe that, if the nations concerned would live up to the obligations to which they are committed in accordance with the procedure outlined in the agreement, we could bring about some pacification in this situation.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I know a debate is not allowed at this time, but I want to say to the minister that I agree entirely with the viewpoint and stand being taken by the Canadian government. I suggest to him that he might outline those terms of the agreement which, carried into effect, would bring about a solution of the problem in southeast Asia. If he would do that I think it would clarify the situation very much.

DELIVERY BY U.S. TO TURKEY AND GREECE OF CF-104 PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs which he promised to look into and answer. I am referring to the delivery by the United States of CF-104 jet fighter-bombers to Turkey and Greece during the present trouble in Cyprus. We were referred at that time to the statement of the Minister of National Defence on May 13, reported at page 3213 of Hansard. The question I asked was, in view of the fact that of the $200 million which was spent on this program Canada put up $50 million, or a quarter of the cost, was the Canadian government consulted about the giving of these planes to Turkey and Greece?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Of course, Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend will recall, Canada suspended its share of that program when the Cyprus operation began. I am not aware of any consultations having taken place. My officers have not concluded their examination of this matter, but I hope to have some information next week.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

QUEBEC—ADMINISTRATION OF ESKIMO AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resouces. Can he tell us whether negotiations between his department and that of natural resources of Quebec are going on with a view to transferring the administration of Quebec Eskimos?

[Text]

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I have nothing further to report at the present time.

TRADE

WHEAT—NEGOTIATIONS WITH POLAND AND CZECHOSLOVAKIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and is in two parts. Can the minister give us some word about the negotiations now taking place in Winnipeg between officials of the Canadian wheat board and Czech and Polish officials with regard to the sale of wheat? Second, have any of the private export firms been called into these negotiations and, if not, will they be?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations that are now proceeding very satisfactorily in Winnipeg involving the Czechoslovakian and Polish representatives and the wheat board are related to the long term agreements that we signed last year with these countries. These countries are now buying under the terms of those agreements, and it is quite clear that they intend to carry out the agreements in full. When the negotiations with the wheat board have proceeded to a certain point the private trade, of course, will be interested and will be negotiating the actual sale of the wheat to the Polish and Czechoslovakian agencies.

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): As a supplementary question, would the minister be in a position to disclose the price of the wheat negotiated for sale to these two countries?

Mr. Sharp: Well, Mr. Speaker, as I have often explained, it is not the policy of the Canadian wheat board to reveal the details of any particular sale, but one can look at the prices at which the wheat board is offering wheat at the present time and get a good indication.

GIFT OF CATTLE TO SOVIET UNION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Yesterday in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mandziuk) concerning the export of Holstein cattle to Russia, the minister told us how he had pioneered this export field, and I commend him for that. Then he stated:

> I said we would be prepared to give them three head to prove our point—

By the use of the word "we" does he mean he and his company or some other individuals, or does he mean the government of Canada will give these Holstein cattle as an outright gift to the Soviet union?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker; I meant you and I, the Canadian people, will be giving them. I would be quite prepared to do it myself, because I think there is a fantastic market available.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): Would the minister not consider it might be a good idea to send over a little bull, too?

INDUSTRY

QUEBEC—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRIES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Industry?

Did the minister get information from the provincial government to the effect that the Peugeot company or Renault company would be interested in opening up plants in Thetford Mines?

[Text]

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Should the minister get such information, would he so inform the house immediately?

[Text]

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think I did mention earlier that these are delicate negotiations working toward the bringing into Canada of a new and substantial industry, and it would not be in the public interest to make statements until such time as the negotiations are concluded.

Mr. Langlois: I will wait until the negotiations are concluded, but will the minister give a report to the house after they are through?

Mr. Drury: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

TIMMINS, ONT.—FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN MINING DEVELOPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. What part, if any, did he or his officials play in the negotiations and discussions between the Ontario department of mines and Texas Gulf in connection with the prospective developments around Timmins?

Mr. Speaker: Is there any particularly urgent and pressing nature to this question? If not, I suggest the order paper.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MEMBER FOR THREE RIVERS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent Drouin (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, availing myself of the provisions of standing order 39 of the House of Commons, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Opposition.

Would the Leader of the Opposition approve of the taxation policy expounded in a press release by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), when he was speaking on behalf of the Conservative members from the province of Quebec and—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is contrary to standing order 39.

[Translation]

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, standing order 39 states that a question can be put to a private member or to any member of the house who is not a member of the cabinet, relating to any bill, motion, or other public matter connected with the business of the house.

Now, we have before us a bill concerning taxation. The Leader of the Opposition announced, on behalf of his party, a policy contradicted in a press release issued by the hon. member for Three Rivers in his capacity as assistant leader of the Conservative party and leader of the Conservative members from the province of Quebec.

It would be interesting to know the exact policy of the Conservative party in respect of the bill now before us.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. member, but the practice here has always been not to direct questions to the Leader of the Opposition. This practice has been consistently followed. On occasion questions can be addressed to chairmen of committees, but certainly not to the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, unless he is the sponsor of a bill.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

VANCOUVER—POSSIBLE USE OF FORMER R.C.A.F. BASE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister on a matter that covers several departments and is of extreme urgency. Has the Acting Prime Minister and the other ministers received from the Vancouver city clerk, Mr. Ron Thompson, a formal letter applying for a 99 year lease on the Kitsilano reserve?

The urgency arises in view of the fact that work has been started by the federal government on renovating four buildings at Kitsilano. Does this mean that regardless of the objections and stand of the corporation of the city of Vancouver and many other organizations, including the park commission, the government is going to go ahead and allow this property to be taken by the C.B.C.?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, the government and a number of its ministers received a proposal this morning, which has not yet been studied, from the city of Vancouver for the transfer of the Kitsilano property in its entirety to the city of Vancouver. As I undertook the other day, the government will study this proposal from the city of Vancouver along with other proposals received by the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation for the disposition of this property and, after proper consideration of all the factors involved, I hope will come to a conclusion next week.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The other question was this. Why is it that the government is now proceeding to renovate those four buildings in this particular area? Is it in preparation for the C.B.C. to take over?

Mr. Drury: I was not aware that renovations were being carried out at Kitsilano. I would be glad to inquire into this.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Now that we have this indication that the city council has made a formal application to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, could the minister tell us whether the C.B.C. has also put in an application to that body?

Mr. Drury: Yes, the C.B.C. has also made a proposal to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Have any other applications been made?

Mr. Drury: So far, only those two.

Mr. Douglas: What would be the closing date for such applications?

Mr. Drury: There is no formal closing date.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When did the C.B.C. make its formal application? How long ago?

Mr. Drury: Yesterday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yesterday? Then does the minister understand why Mr. Ouimet said in Vancouver about 10 days ago that he intended to get hold of this property, if no application had been made by the C.B.C. at that time?

Mr. Douglas: I want to ask the minister if the final disposition of this property is to be decided by the cabinet or by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

An hon. Member: By Ouimet.

Mr. Drury: I think this will be a matter for decision by the government.

COUCHICHING CONFERENCE—FAILURE TO INCLUDE SOCIAL CREDIT REPRESENTATIVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State in his capacity as the minister reporting for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It is based on a brochure which I imagine has been received by a number of members, entitled "Order and Good Government" and connected with the Couchiching conference presented by the Canadian institute of public affairs in co-operation with the C.B.C. on the subject of parliamentary democracy in Canada.

We find there are five Conservative members, four members of the New Democratic party and three Liberal members on the program. Could I ask the Secretary of State if he would enlighten the house as to the reason the Social Credit movement, which since 1935, with the exception of the period 1958-1962, has had substantial representation in this house and which forms the administration in two of the provinces of Canada, has been completely bypassed in the preparations for the discussion of these most important matters dealing with parliament and parliamentary democracy in Canada?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): As far as I am aware the C.B.C. has no direct responsibility for selecting guest speakers at these meetings. But in case the C.B.C. had something to do with it I will inquire, and report to the management the grievance of the hon. member.

Mr. Patterson: I wonder whether the minister knows that the C.B.C. is putting on a daily one hour program covering this important conference and, of course, that it will give the views of only certain sections of the political picture in Canada.

Mr. Lamontagne: I am aware of that, Mr. Speaker.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

PROVINCIAL REPLIES RESPECTING CONFERENCE ON ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister supplementary to an answer he gave me on Tuesday to a question I asked him on Monday. On Tuesday he indicated that the premiers of Alberta, Nova Scotia and British Columbia have thus far replied to the Prime Minister's letter regarding the holding of a conference within six months as recommended by the Hall commission report. My question now relates to the announcement made yesterday by Premier Robarts, according to a Canadian Press dispatch, that arrangements are under way to hold such a federal-provincial conference. Can the Acting Prime Minister say whether these arrangements have reached a stage at which an announcement of the holding of a conference can be made?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): I am sure what the Ontario premier had in mind was that there would undoubtedly be a meeting on this matter, but I would not wish to go beyond that until further letters have come in from the premiers. One was received yesterday from Premier Roblin. However, let me look again at this question and make sure that my answer has the precision I would wish it to have.

Mr. Knowles: Would the Acting Prime Minister ascertain whether there has been a communication from Premier Robarts?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not think there has, but I should like to make sure.

TRANSPORT

SPECIAL SUBSIDY TO RAILWAYS TO MEET INCREASED WAGE COSTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I have a question for the Minister of Transport or, in his absence, for the acting minister or the Acting Prime Minister. Does the government intend to ask parliament for a special subsidy to assist the railways in meeting the cost of the wage increases recently negotiated?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): I would refer the hon. gentleman to the statement made in the house the other day by the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Dinsdale: The Minister of Transport was not specific on this point, and I would ask the Acting Prime Minister if he is aware that the continued delay in dealing with the MacPherson report is placing considerable hardship upon the Canadian trucking industry.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): I have a supplementary question to ask, and as a preliminary I might say that I asked the Minister of Transport if any carrot had been held out to the railways and he said no. Then I find in the letter sent by the Prime Minister to the top men in the railways the statement:

> —an opportunity to decide what additional temporary financial adjustments would be justified to assist the railways during the period up to the coming into effect of the proposed new railway legislation.

My question is this. Does the minister not think that is a sufficient carrot to the railways?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Transport will be here on Monday.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN POSITION ON ADMISSION OF COMMUNIST CHINA

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the secretary of State for External Affairs a question. As the Prime Minister of Canada stated at the commonwealth conference in London, that red China is to have a seat in the United Nations, does the secretary of State for External Affairs intend to campaign for it during the next session of the United Nations in New York?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I draw the attention of the hon. member to the statement I made on May 22 last in this house.

Mr. Pigeon: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. At the conference of the commonwealth countries which is being held in London, the Prime Minister of Canada stated that red China was to take its place, to have a seat in the United Nations. Does the Secretary of State for External Affairs intend to campaign for it on behalf of the Prime Minister of Canada and this government, at the next assembly of the United Nations?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I cannot add anything to my previous answer, and I think that the hon. member will find that the statement I made on May 22 last is worth considering again.

Mr. Pigeon: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Secretary of State for External Affairs unconditionally support the statement which the Prime Minister made in London?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add.

[Text]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I have never quite understood the meaning of the two-China policy. Does it mean now that we have one China policy in London and another in Ottawa?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think the hon. gentleman, who was the premier of a province for an unduly long time, will appreciate that when one is called upon to divulge government policy one would wish to rely on official declarations, not on declarations which are reported to be official.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Does the hon. gentleman mean by that remark that anything he says is unofficial, but what the Prime Minister says is official government policy on this question? My hon. friend has asked a perfectly reasonable question. In this morning's issue of Le Devoir it is stated—and I am using it as it appears here—"Pearson denounces segregation" and also "Declares China ought to have its place in the United Nations".

I am translating it with that freedom that is accurate, however. I ask the minister this. Is this government policy, or is it just another case of what is said in London is not dreamed of in Ottawa?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, no one in this house at the present time has greater experience than my right hon. friend with regard to prime ministers' conferences in London. I think he would agree that he was perhaps better able to deal with the effect of reported leaks of statements made at those conferences than anyone else. I simply want to say to my right hon. friend that I have not seen the statement, but I would commend to my right hon. friend, for whom I feel nothing but friendship these days—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Watch out.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —the statement I made on May 22.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, flattery will get the hon. gentleman nowhere. I simply ask him this. Was that declaration in London—which was not a leak; apparently it was one of those transmissions of information that finds its way to the C.B.C., with a reporter carried along for the purpose—in keeping with government policy; because what was said on May 22 in Ottawa is a long way from what was said on July 9 in London?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will be very glad to look at this statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Good.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Secretary of State for External Affairs admit any change in government policy with regard to China since May 22?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN FLAG

REPORTED FLYING OF NEW DESIGN BY H.M.C.S. "YUKON"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for either the Acting Prime Minister or the Associate Minister of National Defence. Will the Acting Prime Minister secure for the house information related to the flying of the new flag design from the mainmast of H.M.C.S. Yukon while at sea, and the authority under which such action was taken?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): I did not hear this question, Mr. Speaker, but perhaps I could read it and give an answer later.

Mr. Coates: I will put my question again, because—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is important, I admit, but I think the Acting Prime Minister certainly needs notice to answer it. I do not see how he could possibly answer it today unless he has personal information. Would the hon. member put his question on the order paper.

Mr. Coates: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the Acting Prime Minister will be able to secure this information for me at the same time. Have any instructions gone forward from the government to the armed services requesting that they assist in the promotion of this new flag design?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker.

SOCIAL ASSISTANCE

SASKATCHEWAN—PROPOSED REQUIREMENT THAT RECIPIENTS WORK FOR AID GIVEN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reply to a question the hon. member for Qu'Appelle asked a couple of days ago. He asked me to inquire whether a communication has been received in my department from the minister of social welfare of Saskatchewan on the question of requiring work from welfare recipients. No such communication has been found.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the minister would look into this matter further. I have the Regina Leader-Post of July 4 in which the minister of social welfare of Saskatchewan is quoted as saying that they are waiting for a reply from Ottawa; that they have made application and "We are still hoping the federal government will change its legislation to permit a cost sharing arrangement".

Either the minister of welfare in Saskatchewan is under some misapprehension about this letter which he claims to have sent to the federal government, or the federal government for some reason or other has not been able to discover this letter. Could the minister give us an explanation?

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I did not mean to build up this mystery of the missing missive; but I did make inquiries, as I was asked to, as to whether this communication is in the files or was received by the Department of Finance, and the answer is no.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, this puts us in the position of having to ask the Secretary of State if he will search the records of all departments to see if this missing letter can be discovered. On two occasions the Minister of National Health and Welfare has claimed that her department has received no such communications, and now the Minister of Finance has said his department has not received it. Therefore I would like to ask the Secretary of State to search the files of all departments to see if the letter is there.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): I would be glad to do so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which perhaps I might address to the Acting Prime Minister. While efforts are being made to find the letter, can the government not declare that its position is unchanged and that it is still opposed to the principle of work for relief?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): I would like to see the letter first.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a supplementary question to the Postmaster General. Could the Postmaster General say whether to his knowledge his department have returned any letters, which were addressed to the government, marked "Undeliverable"?

PRIVILEGE

MR. VINCENT—CLARIFICATION OF REMARKS IN DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I should like to make a remark and to bring a correction to a statement I made yesterday when I directed the following question to the Minister of Forestry:

> Could the minister say whether on December 6, 1962, the federal government and the province of Quebec signed an agreement under ARDA to carry out a $185,000 survey in the riding of Mégantic?

Later on, I said:

> —If I remember well, on December 6, 1962, the federal government and the province of Quebec signed such an agreement with a view to carrying out a survey in the riding of Mégantic.

Mr. Speaker, when I came back to my office, I found that the federal government had approved that a convention be signed on December 6, 1962, concerning a survey, at a cost of $185,000, in the riding of Montmagny and not Mégantic. It was not on December 6 but only at the beginning of 1963 that this convention was signed by the province of Quebec.

AGRICULTURE

QUEBEC—PROCEDURE RESPECTING APPLICATION OF ARDA

[Translation]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry.

I would like to ask him whether it is true that ARDA will be restricted to the Gaspé peninsula and whether Mr. Courcy has asked that the drainage be entirely financed by ARDA or another joint plan?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I think that there is some confusion, because the Minister of Agriculture has announced that only areas of the lower St. Lawrence and the Gaspé peninsula would be designated as rural development areas, but this does not prevent the program from being applied in other parts of the province. As far as drainage is concerned, I may inform the house that we shall pay 50 per cent of the cost of projects submitted.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question?

Could the minister inform the house why Messrs. Lesage and Lévesque denounce joint plans and, at the same time, sign an agreement as they did recently with regard to ARDA?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, there is a constitutional reason. Under section 95 of the B.N.A. Act, agriculture comes under the joint jurisdiction of the federal and the provincial governments. I think that provincial authorities recognize the jurisdiction of the federal government and are willing to co-operate with the latter.

QUEBEC—PROVISION OF FEED GRAIN STORAGE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry.

Has the minister provided, in his 1965-66 estimates, for the building of grain elevators in the Chicoutimi or Bagotville harbour so that the Saguenay farmers may benefit from as advantageous prices as the communist buyers do?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: This is a question for the order paper.

SASKATCHEWAN—STEPS TO MEET CRITICAL LIVESTOCK SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he has received any letter from the government of the province of Saskatchewan setting out a request by that government for assistance in connection with the drought situation, with particular reference to supplying fodder for cattle and the like, similar to that which was given two years ago. Has he received such a letter or request in writing?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman said yesterday that he had sent a letter to the government of Quebec, or one of the ministers, offering the same type of terms that were being asked for by the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba. What was the nature of the terms contained in the letter he wrote to the province of Quebec which would also be applicable to that province, as they should?

Mr. Hays: Yesterday I indicated that I had discussed the problem with the Saskatchewan cabinet and also with the minister of agriculture of Manitoba. I also said I had dispatched a letter to the minister of agriculture of Quebec indicating that we would be quite prepared to consider his suggestions as to the problems they were having.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to hold this up, but this is not what the minister said yesterday at all. As reported at page 5236 of Hansard the hon. member for Shefford asked this question:

> Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture has expressed his intention of giving farmers affected by drought conditions more time to repay their farm loans, could he not apply the same policy to Quebec farmers whose crops are a complete failure and who depend on them to make a living? I refer to apple growers and strawberry producers.

The minister replied:

> Mr. Speaker, I dispatched a letter this morning to the minister of agriculture of Quebec offering him the same consideration.

I ask the minister, what were the terms of that letter?

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, I thought I indicated several times that I would not disclose the terms or how we should deal with the problem. I suggested first that we would have to hear from them officially, and this is the basis on which I wrote to the minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: So that what the minister said was "I was out in Saskatchewan and Manitoba and we have a plan out there for drought and we will give you the same". Is that what the situation was?

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the right hon. gentleman should be putting words in my mouth. I think I have explained the situation fairly clearly.

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Are we to understand that whatever request is made by the provinces the minister will agree to it? In other words, is he signing a blank cheque?

Mr. Hays: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is the case.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is just a blank offer.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture in view of the questions put this morning in connection with the drought. Would the Minister of Agriculture discuss a proposition similar to the steps taken by the previous government in 1961 regarding the administration of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, so as to allow the farmers covered by that act to cut their oats, wheat and barley in cases where there is no prospect of harvesting the crop, which would give them the full benefit of the P.F.A.A. this year?

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, I indicated yesterday that in this area where they are having the most trouble there was no germination, so there will not be any oats or barley unless the farmers receive rain in the very near future. I discussed this problem with the cabinet in Saskatchewan and with the minister of agriculture in Manitoba, and they indicated what they wished to do. When we receive official notification we are going ahead with the suggestions they have made, and at that time I will disclose to the house the steps being taken.

Mr. Southam: A supplementary question. In view of the fact that the administration of the P.F.A.A. is entirely under the jurisdiction of the federal government, and in view of the fact that in quite large sections of this drought area there has been some germination taking place, although there is no prospect of a reasonable crop except for use as forage for herds, I think a decision should be taken as soon as possible regarding the administration of this act so the farmers will know whether to endeavour to harvest this stunted crop for forage or to let it develop to maturity as the case may be.

Mr. Hays: I think that is a reasonable request. If there is no chance of a crop at all the farmers should be able to do this sort of thing; and so far as the federal government are concerned we will be very sympathetic toward this suggestion.

NATIONAL PARKS

PAYMENT OF FINES FOR TRAFFIC VIOLATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question of some urgency to the minister of northern affairs. July and August are the big tourist months in our national parks, and I think of Banff particularly. Some time ago I either put a question on the order paper or wrote a letter to the minister asking whether legislation would be brought forward or the regulations would be changed with reference to traffic violations, so that people could pay traffic fines rather than appear in the police courts. Thousands of tourists are now being affected and there have been complaints about this. The minister said this step would be taken immediately, but could he give us an indication whether the regulations have been changed, or is it his intention to bring in an amendment to the act to carry out this change?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, this would have to be given effect by way of amendment to the act, which we foresee at this time.

Mr. Woolliams: A further supplementary question. What does the minister mean by "as early as possible".

Mr. Laing: As early as possible, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: A further supplementary. What does the minister mean by "as early as possible".

Mr. Pigeon: Sixty days.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely the time of the house can be better utilized.

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

56a. To authorize the governor in council to prescribe the circumstances under which a contributor who, having served in the forces for ten or more years, is compulsorily retired from the forces before reaching retirement age during the period commencing on the 7th day of May, 1964, and ending two years thereafter, due to a reduction in the total number of members of the forces, shall be deemed, for the purposes of subsection (3) of section 10 of the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, to have served in the forces for twenty or more years, $1.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

L17a. To provide for and authorize the purchase out of United States dollars paid to Canada, pursuant to the treaty between Canada and the United States of America relating to co-operative development of the water resources of the Columbia river basin, together with any protocol or exchange of notes relating thereto, of such obligations of the government of the United States as may be approved by the governor in council, and the subsequent disposition of such obligations; the amount which may be expended for such purchase not to exceed $254,400,000 U.S. notwithstanding that this amount may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of May, 1964, which is, $275,149,500.

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Chairman, I undertook when this item came up to make an explanation of the way in which this financing would be handled. This item arises out of the Columbia river treaty. The United States has agreed to pay on or about October 1, 1964, contemporaneously with the exchange of ratification of the treaty, $254.4 million U.S. in a lump sum as payment for the Canadian share of the downstream benefits of hydro-electric power. If the funds are paid over earlier, they are subject to a discount of 4½ per cent per annum.

The Columbia storage power exchange, a non-profit organization of the power producers and users concerned, which is expected to raise the necessary United States funds, will pay to the government of Canada the United States funds as was agreed with the United States last January. The agreement is contained in the "attachment relating to terms of sale". As soon as the government of Canada receives the United States currency we will pay the Canadian dollar equivalent to the government of British Columbia, except that British Columbia may choose to receive some of the funds in United States currency in order to redeem some outstanding United States debts.

Accordingly the government of Canada is seeking authority to pay out of cash on hand or from the proceeds of borrowings a maximum of $275,149,500 in Canadian funds to British Columbia, and will have a maximum offsetting asset of $254,400,000 in United States funds.

As I have said, British Columbia may prefer to receive some of the funds in United States currency in order to redeem United States dollar obligations. To the extent that this takes place, the amount of Canadian funds to be made available by the Canadian government to British Columbia will be reduced. The amount of United States securities to be purchased will likewise be correspondingly reduced.

In my budget speech of March 16 last I mentioned an amount of $220 million Canadian as my estimate of our cash requirements in this fiscal year in connection with the Columbia river treaty lump sum payment. This was based on the assumption that British Columbia would require a payment of $50 million in the form of United States funds. The remainder of the lump sum payment, $204.4 million U.S., is equal to about $220 million in Canadian funds.

Except in one respect the arrangements will be similar to what happens whenever there is an increase in Canada's official holdings of foreign exchange reserves. Normally increases in Canada's official holdings of foreign exchange other than gold are invested by the exchange fund of the Minister of Finance in short term securities of the United States government. It is important to note that according to United States official statistics, increases in Canadian holdings of such short term securities would constitute part of the United States balance of payments deficit.

To avoid increasing the United States deficit in this way, Canada agreed with United States authorities last January that we would invest the proceeds of the lump sum payment in medium term non-marketable securities of the United States government. These securities, being non-marketable, will not be held in Canada's exchange fund account but will be held in a special account of the Minister of Finance. As the securities mature, it is expected that the proceeds will be taken into the exchange fund and invested in short term United States government securities in the normal way. The effect of this entire approach will be to even out the flow of funds into our reserves and to spread the impact of the transfer of so large a sum of money on the United States balance of payments over a longer period.

Arrangements in non-marketable securities have been made between the United States government and a number of other governments in recent years.

It should be pointed out that while the non-marketable securities mentioned above will not form a part of Canada's official holdings of foreign exchange, they will constitute an important backstop for our reserves, and will add to our ability to marshal adequate resources in the event of a drain on our foreign exchange reserves. Although we do not anticipate any such drain, experience over the past few years has shown that our exchange position can become exposed to sudden and unexpected pressures from time to time.

The exact schedule of maturities and interest rates on these special securities remains to be worked out with United States authorities. Interest rates will be related to, but probably somewhat above, the market rates prevailing in the United States at the time of the issuance of the securities.

A question has been raised as to the cost to the government of Canada of acquiring these special United States securities. Such a cost would be regarded as being the difference between the interest paid by the Canadian government on the Canadian money raised to pay British Columbia and the interest received on the corresponding amount of United States dollar securities to be held by the government of Canada. Assuming that the lump sum payment is invested in medium term United States government securities, and assuming that the required amount of Canadian funds is obtained by the sale of Canadian securities of similar maturities, the difference between the interest rate earned in the United States and the interest rate paid in Canada would be in the neighbourhood of one half of one per cent on the basis of current yields. Assuming that the lump sum transfer was of the order of $220 million Canadian, the interest cost of the arrangement would be $1.1 million per annum.

However, two points need to be emphasized. First, costs of this nature are always incurred when the government increases its exchange reserves. In fact, because normally our exchange reserves are invested in market securities at slightly lower rates of interest than those contemplated for these special securities, the cost of this particular transaction is appreciably less than it would have been if our normal reserves had increased by an equivalent amount. Second, as I have already emphasized, these securities will form an important backstop to our exchange reserves. For quite different reasons in each of the past two years we have experienced heavy pressures on our exchange reserves. While we do not anticipate further speculative pressures, experience does suggest the importance of being able to marshal adequate resources at all times.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I was very interested in this phase of the minister's statement as to the purpose of this estimate. I must say that I am sure it comes as a surprise to some of us who realize that the government is in effect introducing legislation because this is an increased charge against the exchequer about which we were not told in the committee on external affairs.

Mr. Gordon: I wonder if I may clear up that point. The government, as my hon. friend knows, has authority to invest in Canadian securities. We also need, in this case, authority to invest in these medium term United States securities.

Mr. Herridge: I fully understand that. This is, in effect, introducing legislation. You will remember that in the committee on external affairs the Secretary of State for External Affairs was most emphatic that this treaty was an executive act, that it was not necessary to come before parliament. I want to take this opportunity to say that a member of our party who is versed in these matters raised the question during his remarks in a debate in the house.

I should like to quote, Mr. Chairman, from page 67 of the minutes of evidence of the committee on external affairs for Tuesday, April 7, 1964:

> Mr. Byrne: I was simply going to ask the minister if when the former administration suggested that the treaty be put before a parliamentary committee, it was prepared to have it altered in any way?
>
> Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course not. The treaty was signed in Washington by the President of the United States, by the secretary of state for the United States, by the Prime Minister of Canada, and by the Minister of Justice. The treaty was not in that form submitted to parliament because there was not an opportunity to do so. But under our practice, the government of the day takes its responsibility. It negotiates a treaty with another country and it takes its responsibility, and having taken its position and responsibility, then it asks parliament to approve or to reject. That is the constitutional position.
>
> Mr. Davis: Is it not correct that ratification is an executive act, or an act of the executive?
> Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right. There is no law which requires us to come to parliament or to refer the matter to a committee.

Some of the members of our group suggested that we were of the opinion, Mr. Chairman, there should have been a bill with the introduction of the treaty; it should not have been by means of a resolution which the house could simply endorse or reject. We claimed that this treaty was changing the law of the land and was affecting the rights of certain Canadians. To support my argument in that connection I should like to read a few extracts. I think what is happening today proves we were correct. This is an estimate; this is legislation by estimate. The Minister of Finance admits that, does he not?

Mr. Gordon: As I said, this comes under the loans section of the supplementary estimates. All we are asking for is authority to invest these United States funds in short term and medium term United States securities. We have not got that authority to make investments in United States securities, and it is that for which we are asking.

Mr. Herridge: Of course there will be a bill following these supplementary estimates.

Some well informed people looked up this question, and I should like to quote two or three authorities. The first article I should like to quote is by A. Lawrence Lowell, entitled "The Government of England", volume 1, page 22:

> The crown...has power...to conclude treaties, save that, without the sanction of parliament, a treaty cannot impose a charge upon the people of change the law of the land, and it is doubtful how far without that sanction private rights can be sacrificed or territory ceded.

I am very interested to note that the hon. member for Kootenay East is paying attention to my remarks. I hope he stays until the vote comes on these estimates. There is a footnote to that citation which cites Anson, Law and Custom of the Constitution, volume 2, pages 297-99 and Dicey, Law of the Constitution, page 393. In my edition of Dicey the passage on the subject seems to be at page 460, where Dicey says that it is even open to question whether the treaty-making power of the executive might not in some cases override the law of the land. He gives a footnote reference to a judgment of the judicial committee of the privy council in 1892 which, however, refers only to treaties of peace and other treaties akin to them, as to which the judicial committee refrains from expressing an opinion.

Then I should like to quote Bora Laskin of the faculty of law, University of Toronto, who in his book "Canadian Constitutional Law", second edition, 1961, at page 270 quotes Chief Justice Duff:

> But it is no part of the prerogative of the crown by treaty in time of peace to effect directly a change in the law governing the rights of private individuals, nor is it any part of the prerogative of the crown to grant away, without the consent of parliament, the public moneys or to impose a tax or to alter the laws of trade and navigation, and it is at least open to the gravest doubt whether the prerogative includes power to control the exercise by a colonial government or legislature of the right of apropriation over public property given by such a statute as the British North America Act.

That is what we are doing with respect to this treaty and with respect to the effect of this item. In addition, Mr. Chairman, I want to quote an extract from "The Law of Nations—Cases, Documents and Notes", published in 1938 and edited by Herbert W. Briggs of Cornell University. In chapter 10 of that textbook, entitled "The Law of Treaties", at page 433 under the subtitle "Treaties as Internal Law" Professor Briggs notes:

> In another group of states, legislation is necessary before treaties affecting private rights become internal law which the courts will enforce. Thus Picciotto writes with reference to British practice that, whatever be the theories, there is an "undoubted modern practice of incorporating all treaties affecting private rights in acts of parliament".

This is the contention of the members of this group. The treaty should have been incorporated in an act of parliament as was done in the case of the boundary waters treaty of 1909, and as has been done in the past by the introduction of schedules to bills involving a number of treaties that have been ratified by the house. I wish to refer also to Picciotto, page 71, also Walker v. Baird (1892) A.C. 491, and to A. D. McNair who asks the question "When do...treaties involve legislation" and then goes on to explain the basis, which is very similar to the previous argument I have advanced.

I also wish to quote an extract from "Principles of British Constitutional Law" by Emden. Dealing with the external affairs function of the British executive Emden has this to say at page 15:

> —it is generally deemed advisable by the executive to obtain the sanction of the legislature to treaties, concluded in time of peace, which involve important cessions of territory—

Which this does in effect.

> —the imposition of taxation—

Which these increased costs to the government will mean.

> —a grant from public funds, the amendment of existing laws of trade or navigation, or interference with the private rights of the subject.

I have quoted from these few authorities in support of the contention of the members of this group that this treaty should have been introduced into the house as a bill, in which case the house would have had the opportunity to deal with the various clauses, and the schedules should have included the agreement with the government of British Columbia just the same as agreements with other governments with respect to taxation have been included in schedules to bills.

I have a long way to go, today, Mr. Chairman, so I hope you will bear with me. Since the treaty was dealt with in the committee and since it was last dealt with in the house there have been certain changes in circumstances and certain things have happened about which members of the committee were not informed, and which in some instances I am sure the government had no idea were going to occur.

In this connection I want to quote from some correspondence that has taken place between General McNaughton and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I think these letters should be placed on the record because they put the picture in true perspective from our point of view. I wish to quote a letter under date of June 3, 1964, addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to these letters in themselves being tabled, because they represent an interesting exchange that will have historical value if nothing else, but this matter has been decided by parliament. The treaty has been approved by a committee and by parliament, and any argument directed toward the treaty is completely out of order. My hon. friend is in order, of course, to discuss the matter which has been raised in the estimate by my colleague the Minister of Finance, but to go into the treaty now is contrary to the rules of the house. Parliament has taken a decision.

Mr. Peters: You are still taking a decision.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not think my hon. friend, for whom I have a high regard, understands the complications of the point at issue. I think the situation is as I have outlined it, and to argue now on the merits of the Columbia treaty is absolutely contrary to the rules of parliament. We have taken a decision. My hon. friend must address himself now to whether this particular item in the estimates should or should not be accepted.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I definitely disagree with the opinion expressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I fully expected him to make that argument, but I am giving reasons why we are opposed to this increased financial burden on the people of Canada as the result of this item in the estimates. I am giving the reasons for requesting in the first instance that this matter be brought before the house in the form of a bill rather than a simple resolution with regard to which the house only had the opportunity to say yes or no, with no opportunity to amend as in the case of a bill, something to which we had looked forward. In that connection I believe I have the right under the rules of the house to place before the committee the reasons for my objection to this procedure and to this item.

I now proceed, Mr. Chairman, to read this letter addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sure the hon. member for Kootenay West realizes that in speaking on this vote he is not permitted by the rules of the house to reflect on any motion that has been passed during this session. I recognize the difficulty of the hon. member in speaking on this particular vote. I would think that his comments, in so far as they deal directly with the vote, would be in order, but I think it would be out of order to again go over the arguments for or against a resolution which has already been agreed to by the house.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I might be allowed to say a word on the point of order. Obviously the Secretary of State for External Affairs has some foreknowledge of what is contained in this letter but all other members of the committee, including yourself, Mr. Chairman, if I may say so, do not have such knowledge. It would appear to me, Mr. Chairman, that at least until we have some indication of the contents of the letter neither you as chairman nor the other members of the committee have any information as to whether or not the letter has a direct bearing on the item we are discussing.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It has to do with the treaty.

Mr. Barnett: Therefore I feel that the hon. member for Kootenay West should be permitted to indicate to us how the letter relates to his argument on this particular item of the estimates.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think the position taken by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is quite right. I am not ruling the hon. member for Kootenay West out of order so far as reading the letter is concerned. Naturally I do not know what the letter contains. What I am saying to the hon. member is that I think he would be out of order if he were to discuss the details of the resolution which has already been agreed to by the house. I am not ruling the letter which the hon. member is about to read out of order.

Mr. Douglas: On the point of order which Your Honour has raised, no one would disagree with your ruling that it is not proper to go back and debate a resolution already passed by the house but, if I gathered correctly, the hon. member for Kootenay West quoted the date of a letter as June 3, and letters of subsequent dates. I have not seen this correspondence but I would gather from his remarks that all of it has to do with events which have transpired since passage of the resolution. Therefore the correspondence in question does not deal with the resolution per se but with developments which occurred since the passage of that resolution.

Mr. Herridge: I want to explain that I am dealing with an exchange of correspondence on this subject since the hearings before the external affairs committee concluded. I would like to deal with that correspondence first, and I want to bring other matters to the attention of the committee because things have developed along certain lines quite different from what we expected.

I claim that the committee on external affairs was not fully informed, was not accurately informed, and I think we have a right to raise this matter on this estimate. I want to deal later on with assurances given to the committee by the Secretary of State for External Affairs as to the treatment that some 2,000 people would receive who will be affected by the building of one of these dams in particular, and with what has happened since so far as the B.C. hydro and power authority is concerned. Also, Mr. Chairman, I want to deal with the fact that we were assured in the committee that the conclusions were final, that the sites of the dams were the best that could be secured and that the best engineering advice had been obtained.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not want to interrupt but it is obvious that we are discussing the treaty, and this parliament has made a decision on that treaty. I have no objection to my hon. friend referring to these letters, but the context in which he is referring to them is not germane. The issue before the committee is simple. It is whether or not this estimate should be accepted by the committee, and any argument as to the merits or demerits of the procedure that followed the study of this matter in the external affairs committee and its adoption in the house is not relevant. Citation 148 (1) of Beauchesne's fourth edition states:

> It is a wholesome restraint upon members that they cannot revive a debate already concluded; and it would be little use in preventing the same question from being offered twice in the same session if, without being offered, its merits might be discussed again and again.

My hon. friend, who is a distinguished and experienced parliamentarian, knows this. Let us have the discussion on the item, but let us not discuss whether the treaty was sound or not.

Mr. Pugh: If we accepted the statement just made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs we would be precluded from bringing up at any time in the future anything to do with the Columbia river, the treaty, and all the rest of it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No.

Mr. Pugh: Just hold on a minute. We have a letter here dated June 3, and surely this is after our discussions. I do not have to go back too many years to recall when the hon. gentleman was advocating the very opposite of what he is now saying.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think I can shorten this. I have no objection to the letter being read, but what I have raised is that the hon. gentleman, during the last few minutes, was arguing the merits of the treaty. Let him discuss or show how the letters have a bearing on this present matter, but let him not discuss what we have already decided.

Mr. Douglas: Before we start on this let us be clear so that we do not get into a continual tangle. What the house has decided by resolution is to approve a treaty signed by the government of Canada and the government of the United States.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And a protocol.

Mr. Douglas: What we are trying to discuss today is a supplementary estimate to give financial effect to the implementation of that treaty. Surely the minister cannot separate the giving of financial effect to the treaty and some discussion of the treaty, particularly if certain aspects of the treaty are being departed form and if new steps and new measures have been introduced in the meantime?

I submit that the resolution which was passed by the house does not put the treaty into effect unless this estimate is passed.

Without this estimate the treaty is only paper. Therefore, surely this committee has the right to go into any departure from the treaty or any events which have transpired since passage of the resolution. It seems to me the hon. member is quite in order and ought not to be restricted to the narrow base suggested by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Gordon: Perhaps I may say a word on this. Under the treaty the Canadian government will receive 254 million United States dollars. All this estimate covers and all it asks for is authority to invest those dollars in medium term securities. That is all this estimate deals with.

Mr. Douglas: The minister says that is all that is asked for. It is a good deal to ask for, and it seems to me that before the committee approves the authority which the minister is seeking we have a right and an obligation to look into the extent of the use to which this money will be put to see if it is in keeping with the treaty which was approved by resolution of the house.

The Deputy Chairman: I think I should remind hon. members of the second part of citation 148 (2) at page 126 of Beauchesne's fourth edition which, in part, says:

> It is irregular to reflect upon, argue against, or in any manner call in question, in debate, the past acts or proceedings of the house—

I recognize that in discussing this item we would have to draw a fairly fine line between the actual proceedings which took place in the external affairs committee, the decision made in the house and the vote now before the committee, but I believe the hon. member for Kootenay West would not be in order if he were to call into question the decision taken by the house. However, if in discussing the item before the committee he wishes to make comments regarding the purpose for which this money is being allocated, that would be in order. But I would question his being in order if he were to rehash the whole debate on the resolution dealing with this particular point.

Mr. Leboe: May I ask the Minister of Finance a question. What would happen if this supplementary estimate did not pass? What would happen with the cheque you were going to get from the U.S. government?

Mr. Gordon: The 254 million United States dollars received would be converted into Canadian dollars and deposited in Canada. Then the equivalent Canadian dollars, 275 million, if it were so desired and if the committee approved, would be used to buy U.S. dollars which could be put into the exchange fund or, as this item suggests, held separate in the form of medium term U.S. securities. The government has the authority to add to the exchange reserves but it has not got the authority to invest in medium term non-marketable securities, and this is all that is being asked now. From the standpoint of our finances and from the standpoint of a backstop to our exchange reserves this is a highly desirable move, and I have no hesitation in asking authority to pursue it.

Mr. Leboe: It is not absolutely necessary, as I understand it, for this supplementary estimate to pass in order to receive a cheque from the United States. What we are dealing with here is something subsequent to the transaction; it is an administrative problem which would exist after having received the money from the United States, not before. Am I right in that assumption?

Mr. Gordon: That is my understanding.

Mr. Pugh: Must the Canadian investment be in United States securities?

Mr. Gordon: As I understand it, the United States authorities are not anxious to see a sudden drop in their exchange reserves of $254 million at one time. They have a balance of payments problem, as we have, and we are doing our very best to meet each other's difficulties. We think it makes sense from their point of view, and we wish to accommodate them. If we do so, we hope they will accommodate us on occasions when we have a problem. It is one of the ways in which things should be worked out between two friendly neighbours.

Mr. Pugh: Is it not a fact that we too have a problem with regard to the international balance of payments? The first quarter of this year was another $100 million behind last year. The minister in his explanation said we were not getting as many American tourists up here as Canadians were going abroad. He has put the case for the United States government. Why not put the case for the Canadian government; because if our balance of payments is getting behind, surely to goodness this money would be better brought into Canada, held here and invested in Canadian securities. That is the only point I have to make.

Mr. Gordon: We have to distinguish in this transaction between our current account deficit in our balance of payments and the over-all position. When we look at our over-all position we find that Canada's exchange reserves have held up remarkably well. I think last month they increased by some $20 million. So we do not need this $254 million in one fell swoop. It is quite satisfactory to us to invest this amount in these medium term non-marketable United States securities which we can take into account if we should need to. If it is done in this way it will not cause a sudden drop in United States statistics. It is all right for us this way. It helps us, but we are doing it in a way which will accommodate the United States.

Mr. Pugh: Once an investment is made in the United States, is it made on a term basis so that we in Canada will be able at any time to draw on that investment and bring it back to Canada and reinvest it here?

Mr. Gordon: I discussed that point two or three months ago with the United States treasury people and it was agreed between us that in practice if we needed this backstop it would be available. I am perfectly confident, from the conversations I have had that we could translate these non-marketable securities into marketable securities with the full approval of the United States authorities. I do not want to ask them for a formal agreement to this effect because then, I think, from a statistical point of view it would have to be shown as a reduction in their reserves. They do not want this to happen, and we do not need these funds at the moment.

Mr. Pugh: One further question. This government feels this is the best way to handle the situation? In other words we are not being forced into it by the United States in any way, shape or form? Our present government feels they want to do it this way?

Mr. Gordon: That is correct. I can give the hon. member the assurance of the government and my personal assurance that this is a good way of doing it.

Mr. Herridge: Let me assure the committee that I do not intend to discuss a previous decision. I simply want to bring to the attention of the committee the fact that after we had been assured of certain things in the committee on external affairs it is obvious from recent action taken by the government of British Columbia that there are no grounds for such assurances. Second, that despite certain assurances given us in the committee that persons who will be directly affected by this legislation would receive every consideration, the very opposite is about to occur in the district I represent.

I should like to take this opportunity of dealing with these matters, because the circumstances are not as members of the committee were informed at the time. In this connection I should like to read some interesting correspondence which has gone on between the minister and General McNaughton since the committee which was dealing with this question rose. I should like to call attention to a most unexpected development with respect to an action on the part of the British Columbia hydro commission, and I should like the opportunity to bring to the attention of this committee the evidence we already have of the fact that there is going to be a breach of faith with the people I have the honour to represent, with respect to relocation and compensation on the Arrow lakes. I am sure the members of this committee have patience enough to listen to me for at least an hour or two on this very important matter.

Now I should like to begin reading this letter.

Mr. Leboe: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question. Is it not a fact that these negotiations are subject to arbitration, as are all expropriation matters?

Mr. Herridge: That is quite right. The owners of property have the right to go to arbitration and later to the courts.

An hon. Member: The B.C. power corporation did.

Mr. Herridge: Yes, and let me say that the only purchase we have had to date was a most unfortunate purchase for the poor rancher concerned. I want to forestall anything like that happening in the future. Again I will begin to read this letter:

The Hon. Paul Martin, P.C., M.P.
Secretary of State for External Affairs,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Martin,

I now have a copy of the external affairs committee minutes No. 28 giving the text of your closing statement to the committee on Thursday, 21 May, 1964.

In this, you make reference to the views I have expressed to you on numerous occasions, notably, contrary to the inclusion both of the Libby and of the high Arrow projects in the plan of development to be authorized by the Columbia river treaty; also to my advocacy of the Dorr-Bull river-Luxor storages in I.J.C. seq. IXa in lieu. In this connection I note (page 1435) you refer to an 'independent' assessment by the Montreal Engineering Company as confirming the conclusion of the government experts and suggesting that when I made my concluding remarks on 15 May, 1964, I might have indicated precise figures in correction. May I mention that as part of my presentation on that date I tabled a report dated 13 May, 1964, which had been worked out by Mr. Larratt Higgins analysing Dorr-Bull river-Luxor as the alternative to high Arrow in a phased development to meet stated U.S. requests for flood control to their "primary" objective and to match forecast Canadian loan requirements. This estimate follows the same principles of evaluation at site and downstream, which had been adopted by the Montreal Engineering Company.

Mr. Higgins' report shows that when appropriate use is made of Mica storage capacity in the interim prior to machining that very large savings in cost, and substantial increases in production, can be realized over high Arrow in the treaty.

I would point out that the principal reason for this satisfactory result is the fact that the waters originating in the East Kootenays are stored at the highest altitude available subject to supply. Despite the fact that the average annual increment of regulated flow therefrom diverted to the Columbia of 5.8 million acre feet is considerably less than the 7.1 million acre feet which might be obtained from the high Arrow, nevertheless the stored energy available for release at site and downstream in Canada and the United States is very much greater.

I gave the figures in my presentation to the external affairs committee on 15 May 1964 (see pages 1321/22 of minutes No. 26).

For your convenience I repeat this information in tabular form to which I add a part III giving the allocation on the basis of Canada being entitled to one half the benefits in the United States. This was omitted from the record inadvertently.

Then there is a short table here which I would ask the permission of the committee to have included in Hansard, without reading it, in order to not take the time of the house. It is a sequence of figures. Have I the permission of the committee, Mr. Chairman?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The table referred to above is as follows:]

	High Arrow 7.1 MAF	Dorr-Bull River-Luxor 5.8 MAF*
I Average Head Feet
Canada	52	1165
U.S.A.	1150	1150
Total	1202	2315
II Energy available for release in MWY			Gain by Dorr-Bull R.-Luxor
in Canada	37	675	+ 638
in U.S.A.	815	667	— 148
Total	852	1342	+ 490
III Allocation on the basis that Canada is entitled to ½ the power benefits in the U.S.A.

in U.S.A.	407	333
Total	444	1008	+ 564

*(regulated diversion from 4.8 MAF of storage supported by Dorr pumping)

Mr. Herridge: The letter goes on:

It is, of course, these very large increases in available energy from storage which is the source of the inherent flexibility of sequence IXa in the early period when firm power is an objective in Canada.

Moreover, later on when the systems mature it is the large stored energy in sequence IXa which provides a means of carrying the heavy seasonal upswings of hydroelectric generation instead of by installing the additional large, and expensive to operate, thermal plants which would otherwise be required.

Surely Canada is entitled to a half share of this form of peaking benefit which derives from the large energy releases from the Canadian storages, in the form of a saving in U.S. investment in thermal plants.

In the absence of the independent computer studies on this aspect of co-operation between Canada and the United States systems which I have advocated, but which have not been made available, it is not possible to give precise figures of the savings which will result. However in this connection I note that Mr. Cass-Beggs, who is well informed on the value of storage in system operation, in his presentation to the external affairs committee on 14 May, 1964, minutes No. 25, page 1239) stated "water withdrawn from storage... would be firm power... available when you need it to meet peak loads... valued at 4 or 5 mills per kilowatt hour in the U.S."

On the basis of the lesser value, namely 4 mills per kilowatt hour, the average annual incremental release of energy from Dorr-Bull river-Luxor over high Arrow of 490 MWY would be worth 17.4 million dollars annually. This at 5 per cent would pay interest on an added investment of $348 million, whereas under the latest figures given by Montreal Engineering the extra cost of Dorr-Bull river-Luxor over high Arrow is 187.1–129.5=$57.6 million (minutes No. 27, page 1406); that is about 1/6 of the added expenditure which would be justified by the greater energy release available from Dorr-Bull river-Luxor.

Surely, Mr. Martin, such a gain in power in its most valuable form, not to mention the other advantages of sequence IXa such as the maintenance of Canadian control over East Kootenay waters, is a worth-while objective and evidences the need for renegotiation being insisted upon by the responsible government, the government of Canada.

I do not propose to go through again the detailed comments which I have made to you in our correspondence and to the external affairs committee in my presentations on the proposed Columbia river treaty and protocol and sale agreement because these are all reproduced in the committee's minutes. I merely state at this time that I reaffirm the views I have stated to you.

Also that I have examined the comments made by your adviser Mr. G. M. McNabb and it is my view that he has failed to appreciate the true import of the various clauses of the treaty and protocol in question and the importance and equity of the various proposals I have made in correction.

For example in my presentation the importance, in regard to flood control, of an effective and continuing deterrent to abuse and the limitation of the objective at the Dalles; this so that, as the U.S. continue to move out into the flood plain of the lower river, the operation of Canadian storage shall not be increased as would be the case under the present wording.

Also, in regard to power, I draw attention to my proposal that the treaty should be revised to implement the principle agreed to in the I.J.C. that benefits from the co-operative use of Canadian storage should be equally divided and that all forms of benefit should be included.

In this connection also I have recommended that annex A, paragraph 7, et sequence, which sets up a criteria of operation on a basis of optimization of system benefits, which is contrary to I.J.C. principles, should be replaced by a criteria which will provide for a "best use value" of Canadian resources in head and flow in Canadian at site generation as is customary in interconnection agreements between utility systems.

Failing correction of these points, I repeat my view that the treaty and the protocol should be rejected by parliament.

In this connection I would invite particular attention—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I should like to point out to the hon. member that, following his previous remarks, I have listened to him very carefully and have given him the opportunity of saying sufficient to enable me to judge the tenor of his remarks. I believe now that the hon. member is reopening a matter which has already been decided. I would refer him to paragraph 3 of citation 148, page 127 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which says:

> Reference to debates of the current session is discouraged even if such reference is not irrelevant, as it tends to reopen matters already decided.

If the Chair permits the hon. member for Kootenay West to proceed as he has in the last three or four minutes, I shall have to allow other members of the house to do the same thing, and in effect we will be reopening a debate on a matter which has already been decided. I believe if the hon. member were to continue his remarks in the tenor of the last few minutes, I would have to consider him as being out of order.

Mr. Herridge: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for your comments.

Mr. Byrne: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say, so that I do not engage in a debate that has already taken place in the house, that it is quite obvious that, as old soldiers never die, neither do old politicians.

Mr. Peters: That is a really great remark.

Mr. Herridge: You can see, Mr. Chairman, what rests in the mind of the hon. member for Kootenay East.

Mr. Peters: The respect he has for soldiers, too.

Mr. Herridge: He would not know what that meant.

Mr. Byrne: If the hon. member intends to continue reading that letter, Mr. Chairman, I ask for a further ruling that he be not permitted to continue this debate.

The Deputy Chairman: I have already given the ruling and have quoted the citation of Beauchesne in support of my ruling. My ruling is that a reference to a debate of the current session is discouraged even if such reference is not irrelevant, as it tends to reopen matters already decided. It is the opinion of the Chair that the treaty dealing with the Columbia river has been decided, and any reference to that treaty does nothing more than reopen an argument already decided. I would urge the hon. member for Kootenay West to confine his remarks as closely as possible to the item before us and the reason for that item or vote.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, of course I accept your ruling. However, there was one paragraph I read which would indicate that we were reopening the question, and I have some other correspondence which I will take the opportunity to place on record at the appropriate time, which I presume will be on the first item of the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Now I want to bring to the attention of the minister, because this is the only opportunity I have of so doing, that we were given in the committee certain information with respect to the sites of the dams and the cost of construction.

Mr. Gordon: This minister?

Mr. Herridge: No, not the Minister of Finance. I said this was in the committee. We were given evidence by certain experts and consultants regarding construction costs, etc., and were told that these matters had been concluded. These sites were said to be the best possible; the construction costs were known, the flowage costs were known. We were told we were being given definite facts. Now we find the government of British Columbia has a doubt in this matter. After having before us a gentleman whom we were informed was the world's leading expert on the safety of dams, we now find the government of British Columbia has appointed a five man commission to check into these questions. I should like to refer to their terms of reference, and I bring this matter to the attention of the minister because this is a development which has occurred since the house made a decision:

B.C. drafts expert power dam scheme.

Five top authorities on power dam construction have been commissioned by B.C. hydro to vet all plans for construction of B.C.'s three Columbia treaty projects.

Dr. Hugh Keenleyside, B.C. hydro chairman, said Tuesday that this board of engineers, which will meet in Vancouver shortly, has been asked to review the designs for Mica, Arrow and Duncan dams—

—and these are the designs for which this money is being paid. We were told that the designs were known and had been determined. We were shown pictures of the Mica, Arrow and Duncan dams. We were told that the sites had been selected and were the best obtainable. We were told that construction materials were the best available and in close proximity to the dams. This report continues:

—construction plans and other matters affecting safety and economy.

As I said before, we had a gentleman brought before us from Harvard University who we were informed was the world's leading expert on the safety of dams. Now the government of British Columbia will have a five man commission check into these matters. The report continues:

The members of the "Columbia board of review" are John O. Gorman, senior officer of Ontario hydro and adviser on geological and foundation investigations; J. Gordon Watson, chairman of the Saskatchewan river development board and chief engineer of the prairie farms and rehabilitation administration; Lt. Gen. Raymond A. Wheeler, U.S. army retired; J. Barry Cooke of San Rafael, Cal. and Calvin V. Davis, chairman of the board of Harza Engineering Co., Chicago.

At their initial meeting here, the board will visit each of the three dam sites and meet separately with the consultants responsible for each project.

In addition to reviewing plans for the dams, the review board will visit the projects periodically during the construction to ensure that the dams will be built according to designs and specifications that they have approved.

Dr. Keenleyside stressed that the establishment of the board was in no way a reflection on the work being done by the engineers who are designing the dams.

Lt. Gen. Wheeler, commanding general of the U.S. army forces in India, Burma, China from 1942-45, was appointed chief engineer for the U.S. army in 1945. For the past two years he has been chief adviser on water and power for the international bank.

Mr. Cooke and Mr. Davis are both recognized as international authorities on major dam construction. Both have been responsible for numerous important projects in different parts of the world. Mr. Cooke also is a member of the review panel for B.C. hydro's Peace river project.

Geology and soil mechanics engineer with Ontario hydro since 1954, Mr. Gorman carried out geological and soil studies on both the St. Lawrence seaway and Niagara projects in addition to all other Ontario hydro dams erected since 1940.

In addition to many other important assignments, Mr. Watson was planning and design engineer on the South Saskatchewan river project and is chief construction engineer for the prairie farm rehabilitation administration.

I mention that, Mr. Chairman, because these people are being appointed to check facts which we were told were already known. The facts and costs and so on were all known.

Now what has happened? In the United States they are finding some difficulty in selling these bonds. And do you know why? Because there is a surplus of power where it has been decided to sell these bonds. There will have to be an intertie connection or a power line from the northwestern United States to California which is estimated to cost $690 million. This means that a bill has to be put through congress in connection with the appropriation.

There is some difference of opinion over that. Discussions are already being held in the United States concerning whether, in view of the amount of $690 million which is required, it is necessary to build the Libby dam, which is a marginal dam, at a cost of $350 million. Also, further consideration is being given to the high Arrow dam project. I would not be a bit surprised to see Mr. Bennett use the advice of United States experts—and notice the standing they have in the United States—to do another about turn on the Columbia river treaty. This is being talked about, and other leading engineers have expressed their opinions with respect to the revision.

What is behind all this? What is behind it all is that the United States authorities are determined, if they have to build this tie-line to California, that they will need Columbia power, all they can get, and also utilize surplus Peace river power, and so on, all the way up to the great power resources of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, which totals 20 million kilowatts.

Now, when did this occur? I want to draw this matter to the attention of the younger members of the committee who are possibly not so well informed on this matter. I want to refer briefly to pages 108 and 109 of "The Market for Rampart Power, Yukon river, Alaska", study by the committee on public works of the United States Senate, 1962. I wish to quote this passage to bring to the attention of the committee what is likely to happen in the future, and I trust that this government is alert to the situation. Paragraph 2 on page 108 says:

> Introduction.
> The feasibility of establishing an aluminum industry in Alaska was determined favourable early in the 1950's by the Aluminum Company of America. That company proposed to divert waters of the upper Yukon river from Canadian territory to the vicinity of Skagway, Alaska. The Taiya project would have developed in two stages over one million kilowatts of power capacity and 400,000 short tons of primary aluminum capacity at a total investment cost estimated at $700 million. The first stage of the development, 200,000 tons of aluminum capacity, would have added about one third to the then capacity of the United States, reflecting Alcoa's confidence toward placing a substantial share of the aluminum industry in Alaska.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I should like to point out to the hon. member for Kootenay West that the purpose of this vote is to provide for the purchase of United States securities with United States dollars paid to Canada, pursuant to the treaty between Canada and the United States of America relating to co-operative development of the water resources of the Columbia river basin. This vote deals with certain securities which deal with a treaty which has already been passed by the house. The hon. member is trying to reopen the debates on the Columbia river treaty. I feel I should remind him of standing order 59 (2) which states that speeches in committee of the whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration. I respectfully say to the hon. member that I do feel he is reopening the debate on the Columbia river treaty, a matter which has already been decided.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate and understand your comments on my remarks. I apologize if I transgressed. I did not mean to reopen the debate on the Columbia river treaty. I was trying to point out what the effect would be if this estimate were passed by this house, if this government were not alert to the situation and to the objectives of United States interests and to the policies of the government of British Columbia. Really they are very closely intertwined. I was just using this estimate to point out the possibilities in the future, without going into the question of the Columbia river treaty. However, sir, I am quite sure that both of us are inclined to look at this from different points of view. Naturally, coming from Newfoundland, Mr. Chairman, you would be very objective about the matter. I admit that at times I am not completely objective.

I just want to conclude my remarks on this point before dealing with another aspect of this item. I am doing this because I want the government to be on the alert and realize what is happening. I continue to quote:

> The unwillingness of the Canadian government to support this Alcoa project was followed by development of a similar project by the Aluminum Company of Canada in northern British Columbia in the wilderness area of Kitimat—

Now, the background of that story is not any too well known. What happened in this connection was that Dr. Keenleyside, who was then deputy minister of the department in question, without authority of the minister, Mr. Winters, gave the president of the Aluminum Company of America a licence with regard to the exploration and development of this Rampart project, and so on. When this was discovered I happened to know that Mr. Howe was most indignant. The president of the aluminum company was invited to come to Canada, and at a dinner was told by Mr. Winters that the licence was going to be cancelled. Shortly afterward Dr. Keenleyside packed his bags and got a job with the United Nations.

This is all part of the same scheme. Regardless of our opinion of the Columbia, the purpose of these developments has always been to build a power line from California to the Yukon and have a tremendous flow of British Columbia and Canadian power into the United States instead of having it go into a Canadian national grid. I take this opportunity, Mr. Chairman, because this is what I am confident is proposed for the future. I speak as a Canadian, and I speak as one from British Columbia who wants to see this power used to produce jobs in Canada, in British Columbia and in the Kootenays.

I have one other aspect, Mr. Chairman, I should like to mention before I conclude. This has to do with the question of compensation to persons affected. I trust the members of all parties will stand up and do their part to see that these people get justice. The Secretary of State for External Affairs told us he was assured that the persons affected by flooding from these dams would receive proper relocation or compensation therefore.

I have been asked by a large number of people along the Arrow lakes to raise this question in the house. Dr. Keenleyside came into the district and intended to speak to one or two chambers of commerce. This was not good enough for them, and they demanded that he speak at public meetings. They organized public meetings and he spoke at Edgewood and at Nakusp to between 350 and 400 people. He was battered with a barrage of questions which were not answered to the satisfaction of the people concerned. They were told that the there would be no replacement or relocation, and that compensation would be on the basis of market value.

I have a newspaper report here. I could read at length from it, Mr. Chairman, to indicate how very upset these people are. I happen to know that one of the farmers' institutes of the district has written to the Prime Minister bringing this to his attention. I know they have written other members. I have had letters also from the Castlegar to Revelstoke area. I am using this estimate as a means of bringing this to the attention of the house. To indicate what happened at this meeting, I should like to quote the headline on the article. "No Replacement Compensation says B.C. Hydro's Keenleyside". The article reads in part:

> Residents of the reservoir flood basin will not be compensated area for area, Dr. Hugh L. Keenleyside, co-chairman of B.C. hydro, told an enthusiastic audience of 300 in the Legion hall Tuesday.
> People who expect to get full compensation or replacement value for their homes will definitely not get it he said.

I am bringing this to the attention of the house and I trust I have the support of other members. After the assurance given in the committee on external affairs, after the statements that have been made by the chairman of the B.C. hydro authority and the speeches he made to the Vancouver board of trade and the Kelowna board of trade, this was a great shock to these people. I indicate this by quoting again from the article:

> Mr. Frank Lewis of East Arrow Park told Mr. Keenleyside that he had been promised by the co-chairman one year ago that he and other senior citizens would get help in relocation because they couldn't afford to move.
> "Tonight you have reversed your promise."

Then spokesmen from other areas got up. Finally one man, a veteran who has just completed paying for his home and was told he would get the market value, was told by Dr. Keenleyside that he would do what he could to assist him to borrow money to build a new home. This man said:

> If you are going to rebuild Celgar's dumps with new ones, then you should also replace the old houses with new ones.

He also said:

> I would like to make my position clear, sir. You'd better send a big man.

These people are very concerned indeed. I believe there is a responsibility upon the federal government to use its influence with the government of British Columbia and the B.C. hydro authorities to see that these people receive justice, are relocated and do not suffer in any way. They do not want to make a profit and they do not wish relocation at an improper expense to the B.C. hydro authority, but they want to be compensated so they will not suffer any actual loss because of this development. We are told this is a work for the advantage of Canada.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must advise him that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, you will recall that the member for Kootenay West was just making a plea for the concern of members of this house from all parts of the country for the situation he has been describing. I feel that the vote we have before us places some rather stringent limitations on the total amount that may be authorized to be spent, and does give us cause for concern about this situation that has arisen subsequent to the ratification of the Columbia river treaty by this house.

Some members who are present will recall the period when the St. Lawrence seaway was under construction and the reports that were made in the house with regard to how the people of the area affected by that development were being relocated, steps which in many cases involved the moving and relocating of people almost in complete towns. As a member from British Columbia at that time I enthusiastically supported the taking of equitable action with regard to the people who were involved in that development in the central part of Canada.

Now that the parliament of Canada has seen fit to authorize a type of development in British Columbia which involves the flooding out of many of the people in the Arrow lakes area, I feel that parliament certainly should be concerned to see that those people in that province are treated with equity equal to that which was extended and supported by parliament in the case of the development of the St. Lawrence seaway.

I think the hon. member for Kootenay West has given us cause for a good deal of concern about some of the developments that have taken place since we saw fit to ratify the treaty. He has given us some cause to consider whether, if our fellow citizens in the area most immediately affected are to be treated with justice and equity, the liability on the part of the government which parliament is being asked to ratify will be adequately or properly discharged with the kind of limitation of figures found in the vote before us. In this situation I feel that one of the matters which should be of concern to us before we decide to pass this item is whether it will satisfy adequately the financial responsibility which parliament has a moral obligation to assume in connection with the development in the Columbia river valley which we earlier authorized to take place.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I only want to say a few words on this item. I note in the estimate that we are being asked to transfer some of the money paid by the United States to the government of Canada. We are actually being asked to convert this money into U.S. dollars and to leave the amount in the United States. If you read the item you will see that it goes on to say:

> ...relating to co-operative development of the water resources of the Columbia river basin, together with any protocol or exchange of notes relating thereto, of such obligations of the government of the United States as may be approved by the governor in council...

We are now being asked to allow this money to remain in the United States, and I am wondering for what reason we were originally to be paid $254 million. If it was to assist in the development of the Columbia river project, then obviously we should not be turning this money over to that country even in the form of investment in short term bond issues of that country, but should be retaining it in Canada.

I think we are all concerned about the method used in dealing with the Columbia river treaty in the first place. A bill should have been introduced and the problem should have been completely understood. That matter has been decided, but in some respects it would appear that perhaps it has not really been decided after all. If we have this obligation for which we are paying $254 million in U.S. dollars, it would appear to me that we will be asked in a further estimate to provide that amount of money in Canadian dollars, which will make it that much easier for the United States to meet its obligations and create hardship to the same extent for the Canadian people.

Certainly the government of Canada was not to have this money in payment of its contribution in a national sense. Obviously the decision reached between the federal government and the United States government was that the development of the potential of the Columbia was a matter of provincial jurisdiction in Canada, and therefore the province of British Columbia had the right to make a call on the moneys paid.

In my opinion this will involve a further expenditure. In addition to the supplementary estimate we have before us now, it will very likely result in an additional estimate of an equal or greater amount. The amount of money we are generously lending the United States on a short term basis will have to be raised by the Canadian people in order to proceed with the Columbia river complex and we will be asked to vote a further amount. I believe the Canadian people will be very concerned about what is involved in this supplementary estimate. Neither the purpose nor the reason for this vote has been made clear to the public.

I think the matters raised by the hon. member for Kootenay West must be given very close scrutiny, and there must be a statement by the government that they intend to correct some of the faults already evident and which can be corrected by the sum of money being paid by the United States. This money was supposed to represent compensation paid to Canada for benefits that the Canadian people were losing.

Yet we are told that people in British Columbia, who are affected by the treaty and by the estimate we are discussing, are not being given reasonable or adequate treatment in the expropriation of their properties.

It would seem to me that the situation in British Columbia will involve problems similar to those that developed and were faced in other parts of Canada, particularly in relation to the expropriations made necessary by the flooding for the St. Lawrence seaway. In the general interests of a community expropriation can be used, but a bending over backward must take place in relation to the rights of individuals who suffer as a result of expropriation. In my view this amount of money was to be paid by the government of the United States to see that people displaced were treated properly.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

Mr. Benidickson: Perhaps the hon. member for Timiskaming has forgotten the new rules.

Mr. Peters: I apologize, Mr. Chairman, for the inconvenience. When we make a mistake we are quite willing to admit it. It would be a good thing for other people to do likewise.

I was dealing with the matter of expropriation, and already there is an indication from Mr. Keenleyside that he does not intend to honour some of the commitments previously made. We have on record this morning statements by some of the organizations concerned that the commitments originally made were not going to be kept.

It appears to me there is some relationship between this supplementary estimate and the moneys which can be paid, and without having seen the exchange of letters we must conclude that there was a request from the United States government to the Canadian government to invest in these medium term securities. I am quite sure the United States government is as familiar with the situation in Canada as we ourselves, and knows our balance of exchange is no better than that of other countries and is becoming increasingly difficult as time goes by. The advent of a large sum like $275 million would be advantageous to our balance of payments, and the fact that it is not being used in this way is an indication that the United States has asked that the money be not removed from the American market.

It is unfair for the supplementary estimate to contain statements referring to the protocol and letters of exchange without allowing the committee the benefit of those directives. I believe we should use this money to provide adequate, and even better than adequate expropriations for those who are going to be affected by the terms of the treaty, and that we should keep the money in Canada.

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, I do not think we should let some of the remarks that have been made in connection with this witch hunting pass unnoticed. Mr. Keenleyside, as a member of the hydro commission, has an obligation to the corporation and to the people. He is certainly not going to play Santa Claus, and that is to be expected, but we do have the commitment of members of the government that fair treatment will be given these people. This was mentioned in the external affairs committee and is a matter of record.

I asked the hon. member for Kootenay West whether these expropriations were subject to a board of referees. This is a practice that has existed over the centuries and when the time comes these people in the affected areas will not be asking for arbitration because they are going to get a better deal without going to arbitration. In so far as the statement of the hon. member for Kootenay West is concerned I want to make that correction. This is what I call witch hunting. We have had a long discourse on the evil thoughts of the Americans in connection with this whole matter, and there has been a suggestion of underlying currents.

What is wrong with having a power line from northern British Columbia and the Yukon, shall we say, to California? It is very nice down there, and maybe some people would like to go down there, live on their pension cheques and use some of the Canadian power. Again I mention that I would not like this passed without calling attention to the witch hunting that is going on in this committee.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, may I draw your attention to the fact that we do not have a quorum.

The Deputy Chairman: I will make a count of the members.

And on the count being made, more than 20 members were declared to be present.

The Deputy Chairman: A quorum is present.

Mr. Thompson: A few minutes ago there were 12 members in the chamber. There was not one member in the seats of the Conservative opposition.

Mr. Ricard: I take objection to this. We have permission to run in and out of the house because we have business to do outside the house. The hon. member himself is not often in the chamber.

Mr. Thompson: There was not one member on the Conservative benches a few minutes ago.

Mr. Pigeon: That is not a fact.

Mr. Thompson: It is correct.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Herridge: Just before it passes I want to deal briefly with a matter that comes under the responsibility of the federal government. I may say we must acknowledge the fact that there are two members of the Social Credit party in the chamber and eight members of the Liberal party, so we are doing pretty well indeed.

Dealing with the question of relocation and compensation, the federal government has some responsibility with respect to the veterans affected. There will be 50 or 60 veterans affected by the building of the high Arrow dam. Some of them purchased properties under the Veterans Land Act and some purchased properties directly themselves, but as a result of Dr. Keenleyside's visit to the district they are very concerned. They held a meeting in the village of Nakusp attended by some 150 delegates, and I would like to read briefly from the Arrow Lakes News of June 25 with respect to the resolution adopted at that meeting. The article in question is headed, "Legion Convention gives Backing to Hot Replacement Question," and it reads:

> The West Kootenay zone of the Royal Canadian Legion resolved to ask the Department of Veterans Affairs to provide professional assistance to those veterans which will be affected by the Columbia river development projects.
> The resolution was presented by Branch 20, Nakusp, who were the hosts for the week end convention...
>
> A general meeting of the Branch 20 membership voted unanimously in favour of the resolution:
> Whereas the veterans residing in the flood basins of the Columbia river, who are to be affected by the treaty, will be at a disadvantage negotiating with trained officials of the B.C. hydro authority;
>
> Whereas experience has shown great variance in allowances for similar properties received from hydro authorities for similar areas for no apparent reason;
>
> Whereas these affected veterans are in fact negotiating for the interests of Veterans Land Act, National Housing Act, soldiers settlement board and others as well as those of their own;
> Therefore be it resolved that the Department of Veterans Affairs be asked to provide professional assistance to veterans affected by the Columbia river development projects.

Another resolution was adopted by the convention in the following terms:

> With regard to displacement of persons living in the area to be flooded by the Columbia development projects:
>
> Whereas it has been stated in verbal and written form by Dr. Keenleyside that market value will be the criterion used in the purchase of property of affected persons, and
>
> Whereas the use of market value can mean a very great hardship on people who cannot afford to pay the difference between market value and actual cost of replacement; and
>
> Whereas many veterans will be affected by the system of market value settlement;
>
> Therefore be it resolved that the Royal Canadian Legion support the principle as follows:
> When a person, or persons, are forced with the necessity of having to move; where a cash settlement is not suitable, that B.C. hydro resettle that person in accommodation not less favourable to that person at no cost to the person being resettled.

I bring those two resolutions to the attention of the committee because they were adopted at a zone convention concerned with the welfare of the veterans and of all those persons affected. The president of the Royal Canadian Legion of the province of British Columbia wired me in this respect as did the secretary of the branch concerned. I do urge that the government and the Department of Veterans Affairs particularly should bring their good offices to bear so as to assist these veterans in connection with expropriation or purchase. We recall what has been done in this regard by the national capital commission, which has in my opinion treated people very fairly and properly. We remember what was done in connection with the St. Lawrence seaway. Every person who had to be relocated was relocated at no cost to himself. Houses were moved back, and in most cases new basements were built to the satisfaction of those concerned. Then, in connection with the Saskatchewan dam, those farmers and others who were affected were compensated not on the basis of market value but on the basis of the potential value of the properties they were being asked to leave on account of the development.

I do urge that the government through the Department of Veterans Affairs take whatever action it can to assist these veterans in the area to obtain justice, and I urge that the government as a whole should take an interest in the developments which are occurring in British Columbia with respect to these projects. I am sure that many interesting things are going to happen in the future. As I have said before, regardless of our opinions respecting this treaty, no Canadian should be treated unfairly and unjustly to the advantage of the community as a whole. That is all I intend to say at this time and I thank the committee for listening to what I had to say, though I am sure they were at times somewhat bored with my repetition of these important matters.

Mr. Ryan: In one serious respect I believe the hon. member for Kootenay West has given the committee a mistaken impression. We were told in the committee on external affairs when the treaty was before it that preliminary plans were in existence for all three Columbia dams and that working drawings existed with respect to two of them. We were also told that an engineering board would be reviewing and examining the plans and actual construction. I submit this five man board which has been appointed is in line with what we were told in the committee.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. gentleman is confusing the permanent engineering board, which will represent Canada and British Columbia, with that other body. We were told nothing whatever about this new review commission. The hon. member is confusing this new commission or review board, which is the creature of the British Columbia hydro and power authority, with the permanent engineering board which will be responsible to governments for the whole project.

Mr. Leboe: The hon. member for Spadina is right. We were told in the committee that this was to be set up. It is a special board to make sure that the work will be coordinated.

Mr. Winch: Would the hon. member for Spadina tell us, as a result of his knowledge of what is going on in the external affairs committee, whether that committee was given any indication of the announcement by the premier of British Columbia that he is now tying in a third river development requiring the damming of the Fraser river for hydro purposes? This is a most important matter. Now it appears we have moved away from a two river development to a three river development in British Columbia, and if my recollection of the plan put forward by General McNaughton is correct, it looks as though the premier is in part reverting to General McNaughton's plan. Can the hon. member tell us whether this is before the committee in any way or whether any representations have been made to the committee regarding this new three river development, which was announced I think about four days ago by Premier Bennett?

Mr. Ryan: Of course I can give no answer to that question. Furthermore, the question is completely irrelevant to the subject now being considered.

Mr. Leboe: I can answer that question quite simply. It was given in the committee by Ray Williston in connection with the Fraser river engineering board report. Drilling and everything else has gone on on the upper Fraser. The testing is already being done.

The Chairman: May I suggest to the members of the committee that we are now going over matters which have previously been discussed? I would suggest that this exchange is out of order.

Mr. Barnett: I should like to return for a moment to the question of the financial obligations of the government of Canada and to the responsibility of this parliament generally in connection with the voting of money.

The particular point I wish to raise has reference to some of the observations made a little earlier in our proceedings by the hon. member for Cariboo when he referred to "time honoured expropriation proceedings". I am quite sure that the persons who will be responsible for the valuation of properties as a result of the development which is to take place will probably do a competent job. But the point I was trying to make earlier is that it depends upon the terms of reference which these people are given. I happen to have some recent experience with an incident involving the appraisement of land, and without entering upon a discussion of this matter I would refer to the situation arising out of the tidal wave disaster on the west coast. Appraisements there have been carried out on the basis of the depreciated values.

As I tried to say earlier, I think this committee should unanimously support the suggestion of the hon. member for Kootenay West that the people affected in the Arrow lakes area should be compensated on the basis of the cost of re-establishment and the replacement value of their properties. Certainly this is my understanding of the basis upon which compensation was available to people displaced by the St. Lawrence seaway project, and I was in this house at the time.

Since parliament has taken action by ratifying this treaty, and since it has assumed financial obligations in connection with it, as mentioned in the item before us, I suggest this question of compensation is one of legitimate concern to every member of this house. We should be completely satisfied that those immediately charged with making compensation decisions have satisfactory terms of reference, and that those affected by their decisions shall be re-established as far as humanly possible without incurring any loss. The hon. member for Kootenay West has placed evidence on record to show that up to the present time this is not the policy being followed by the authorities charged with this responsibility within the province of British Columbia.

I suggest that this matter should be made abundantly clear. While we may be prepared to pass this item in the supplementary estimates at this time, it should be made clear at this time and there should be an indication in this house that unless certain changes are made in the policies which apparently have been followed up till now, this matter is by no means finished with as far as this parliament is concerned.

Mr. Byrne: On that point, Mr. Chairman, surely I, as one of the members of the external affairs committee that sat and heard evidence in respect of this matter, would be prepared to vote against this estimate if I were not convinced that the B.C. government and the chairman of B.C. hydro were prepared to carry out the commitments they have made.

The hon. member for Kootenay West read from a newspaper report taken, I believe, from the Arrow lakes News, concerning a large meeting before which the chairman of the B.C. hydro appeared. The hon. member did not read all that was said at this meeting. The report of the meeting indicates that it is the intention of B.C. hydro to carry out its commitments.

I am not aware exactly what "area by area payment" means, but I would like to quote something that was said by Dr. Keenleyside in this regard. It is also related to what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has said:

> Dr. Keenleyside read from the water comptroller's terms for appraisals...fair market value of the property but will contain details of any circumstances which could be considered to give the property a value to its owner that is in excess of the fair market value.
> "The appraisal report will also give details of circumstances that would entitle an owner to compensation for disturbance and moving expenses".
> This means that many intangibles would be considered in each case. Sentimental attachment, back-breaking labour, home improvements, age, employment, desire to move and many, many more will all have to be considered, he said.

This is substantially what was said in the committee. While no doubt there is some misunderstanding, and understandable misunderstanding, on the part of the people who are going to be displaced, I think the situation is clear. I think it is to the credit of these people that they continue to bring these matters before B.C. hydro and the province of British Columbia in order that there will be no relenting in their desire to fully compensate people for removals and any other losses that are anticipated. But to say that B.C. hydro and the B.C. government are going back on their commitments is completely without any foundation whatsoever.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I represent those people and I am not going to sit here and have the member for Kootenay East suggest that I am not telling the truth. These people have written to me, hundreds of them; they are completely dissatisfied about what was said at the meeting that was addressed by Dr. Keenleyside. They got up at that meeting and said what I have quoted some of them as saying, namely that he had gone back on his word. They are very disturbed and put out about this matter. Also, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Kootenay East does not know it, the farmers of the district have sent a letter to the Prime Minister bringing these facts to his attention. You must remember that when you come to deal with a weekly newspaper nowadays, all weekly newspapers take a very neutral approach to public affairs—we have lost the old fire and brimstone we had 50 years ago—because they are all dependant on governments for advertising and things of that sort.

I speak with knowledge and conviction, Mr. Chairman. These people are most dissatified; and so far as the veterans are concerned, they expect the Department of Veterans Affairs to do what they can to assist them to obtain justice. As far as the rest of the residents are concerned, they hope that the government of Canada will do what it can to make certain that these promises which have been made will be kept. As I have said before, I am very interested in listening to the hon. member for Kootenay East as being an apologist for the government of British Columbia.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, I am not suggesting that the hon. member is not telling the truth as he thinks he knows the truth. All I was doing was reading what purports to be a correct interpretation of what took place at that meeting. I am personally convinced that these people will be treated in a fair and reasonable manner, or I would certainly have voted against the treaty and would vote against this estimate. However, as I say, I am personally convinced that they will be treated in a fair and reasonable manner, and certainly we will see to it that they are.

Mr. Herridge: I want to get that clear, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Kootenay East I think pledged to the house that the government would see they were fairly treated, if I heard him correctly when he was concluding his remarks. I repeat that. As I heard it, the hon. member for Kootenay East said the government will see that these people will be fairly treated; so we expect that promise to be kept.

Mr. Byrne: Certainly, Mr. Chairman, it is up to members of parliament and the various governments to see that these people are fairly treated. I am sure no government would endeavour to avoid that responsibility.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

Mr. McIlraith moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1965, the sum of $183,433,000.67, be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. McIlraith thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-109, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending March 31, 1965.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a second time? Now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We need unanimous consent to proceed with second reading of the bill at this time.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The Chair cannot proceed and put the motion unless there is unanimous consent.

Mr. Scott: Next sitting.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair is in the position where there is not unanimous consent so it cannot proceed.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether there is not some misunderstanding about the appropriation bill which is based on these two items. I wonder whether there is a misunderstanding as to what the bill is or what the procedure is.

Mr. McIlraith moved the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a question. If we allow the purchase of short term bond issues in the United States with this money, is it the intention of the minister to come to parliament and ask for an appropriation to cover the money which has been paid? In other words, this money has been paid for a specific purpose. Some of that money, I am sure, was intended to be used as compensation. We are concerned with the payment of this compensation and the size of it. Is the government prepared to advance a sum of money either equivalent to or less than this amount to provide for that compensation while the short term loans are in process?

Mr. Gordon: Quite frankly, Mr. Chairman, I am not at all clear on the point the hon. member is raising. However, I do want to make it clear, because I am not sure that I did earlier, that this item in the supplementary estimates will give authority to invest in non-marketable medium term U.S. securities. There is already authority to invest in marketable U.S. securities. I am not sure that I understood the hon. member's question in the context of this item.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the minister one question. Can he assure the committee that the $275,149,500 mentioned here will complete the treaty projects as required, and that the treaty projects will be built and completed according to the terms of the agreement with the government of British Columbia?

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Chairman, I have not been dealing with this matter of the treaty. I am here as Minister of Finance seeking authority to invest this money in medium term non-marketable United States securities. I am not in a position to answer other questions in connection with the treaty itself or the obligations of the British Columbia government, which matters have been dealt with by my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Peters: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I should like to draw to the attention of the hon. member for Kootenay West the fact that the member for Kootenay East is here to vote on this matter.

Mr. Knowles: He is here when there is no vote.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Production and marketing—

15. Administration, operation and maintenance including the administration of the Agricultural Stabilization Act, and contributions to agricultural organizations to assist in the marketing of agricultural products subject to the approval of treasury board, $2,190,400.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, when item I was passed I asked whether the Minister of Agriculture would let us discuss the subject of crop insurance under this heading, owing to the fact that there is no item in the main estimates specifically relating to crop insurance. One of the members who wanted to speak on this matter is not present today so I am going to make a few remarks on that subject. My remarks will be brief and, I think, not controversial.

In 1959 we passed the crop insurance legislation to enable provinces to pass enabling legislation to set up crop insurance programs suitable to their conditions. As I understand it, there are at the present time four provinces with agreements on crop insurance, but others are interested.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, might I raise a point here. I understand, the problem of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle is that the subject matter he wishes to discuss does not relate to one of the items in the main estimates. If I am correct in that, would it not be more appropriate to discuss the matter on item 1a of the supplementary estimates, which deals with departmental administration?

Mr. Hamilton: It would be satisfactory, I think, except that we are trying to get item 1 through the house. This is one of the matters which would have held us up for a considerable time but the minister agreed to let me discuss this on item 15. Unless this is another change of government policy I would just as soon discuss it now.

Mr. Hays: We have no objection.

Mr. Hamilton: This will only take a few minutes. Some of the provinces have taken advantage of this legislation, but it was apparent within a year or so after the legislation was passed that in those provinces where there is a one crop economy, such as the wheat growing areas, the governments of Manitoba and Saskatchewan were a little unhappy about putting in crop insurance to cover the whole province. The reason for this is clear. If the whole province were covered, in case of a major crop disaster the credit of the province would be extended under the conditions of the original act if the amount of money required to pay losses during any particular year exceeded the amount in the reserve fund of the crop insurance plan, then the province could come to the federal government and borrow the amount necessary to meet the shortages. The provinces felt that the requirements of borrowing from the federal government would reduce their power of borrowing, so felt reluctant to put the scheme in for the whole of the province.

Toward the end of the term of the last administration, this matter was before the government. The proposal was that the provinces would reinsure for this amount with the federal government. The provinces would pay the federal government an amount of money on an actuarial basis as a premium to cover the costs of the reinsurance. This principle was under discussion and consideration at the time the government changed. I understand the minister intends to introduce a crop reinsurance bill. Without revealing any of the details of this legislation which may be intended to carry out this reinsurance on an actuarial basis, I wonder if he could confirm that this is the intention? If so, we on this side of the house will be satisfied, and I will say nothing more about crop insurances.

Mr. Hays: Yes, on June 8 we put this on the order paper, and I think it is very well covered in the suggestions made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle.

Mr. Hamilton: I should like now to go on to another subject, and on this too I shall be fairly brief. Vote 15 relates to the administrative costs of the agricultural stabilization board. I may have to come back to some individual questions, but I want to raise one major point in a general way in the hope the minister will give us some sort of lead on his thinking in this regard.

I am referring to the fact that in Canada today, generally speaking, agriculture is doing fairly well. The large area of weakness in the agriculture economy is concentrated in the low income areas. This is a major problem that will require the efforts of many people for many years to come. This is one problem. The other problem that is more immediate and has been here for the last eight or nine years is the difficulty of the dairy industry. The situation in the dairy industry cannot be described quickly, but suffice it to say that in the main we have an industry across Canada that is not in a serious situation, if you look at the over-all statistics. The surplus production from the industry is roughly 6 per cent to 7 per cent. However as a result of the fact that this surplus bears on those members of the dairy industry who have not got a fluid milk contract, the situation is desperate for them.

The previous government tried to cope with this situation by taking action under the Agricultural Stabilization Act. However we recognized as we were coping with that situation that adjustments would have to come as experience dictated. Without going into all the ramifications of the support price policy of the agricultural prices board in connection with the dairy industry, I should like to focus my remarks on the pressure points of butter. It is recognized I think that the problem of the purely butter producer is almost hopeless. The consumer will not pay the price based on the 64 cents support price, therefore the consumption of creamery butter has fallen off. It was obvious that the price to the consumer had to be brought down to get him back into the habit of buying butter. This we did by a policy of keeping the support price to the farmer at 64 cents a pound and by letting the consumer have butter at the wholesale level of 52 cents a pound. This was, in effect, a consumer subsidy of 12 cents a pound to encourage the consumer to buy more butter.

The figures we have indicate that this policy was a success. I should like to make two points clear. First of all, a person who is in the business of producing butter, by itself, cannot make money at 64 cents a pound. Since the consumer who buys the product will not pay that price this means that we are up against what seems to be an insoluble problem. In the days when I was minister the department looked at many solutions to this problem and selected two or three that seemed promising. Every one of those solutions that seemed promising seemed to me to be based on the premise that there had to be something done by the farmers themselves to make the work of the senior governments effective.

In the case of milk, the provincial governments, under a provincial statute, guarantee a fair price to the producer of milk who is putting his milk into the fluid milk market. Using very round figures, the price for milk in this market is from $5 to $5.50 per 100. The price goes higher in some cases and a little lower in others. This I think the farmers would agree is essentially a fair price. However the farmer who is not lucky enough to have a milk contract receives an average price that fluctuates between $2.50 per 100 and $3 per 100 if he is in the business of shipping manufactured milk such as to a cheese factory. I am not attempting to be precise when I use these figures; it is just to give you the picture.

We know from the most casual observation that no matter how efficient a farmer is, even if he had 25 good cows and was running a very efficient establishment, at a price of $3 per 100 pounds, or less a farmer cannot make a living. This is an essential economic fact he faces. In order to try to bring about an adjustment we have used the Agricultural Stabilization Act and tried to direct production into those forms for which there is a better market and which would give higher returns to the producer. I think, in all fairness, the Agricultural Stabilization Act has achieved a great deal. It has pioneered a whole series of new agricultural techniques to try to raise the income of farmers without costing the treasury an inordinate sum of money.

This does not mean that we have to say that the agricultural stabilization board has finished experimenting. I would suggest in this connection, that is in connection with the dairy industry, that the stabilization act could be used even better. We inaugurated a program of paying consumer subsidies on butter, for example. At that time I made it very clear to the provincial governments and to the dairy producers that this effort by the federal treasury to help sell more butter at great cost would be done as long as the farmers were making efforts themselves to get together and form some sort of national organization to help themselves. Now, for obvious reasons, this program of farmers to help themselves was centred in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario where the dairy problem is one of the prime interests of the people in the agriculture industry. The province of Quebec undertook to introduce legislation to enable the farmers to form a single organization in that province. The province of Ontario, through its minister of agriculture, organized a series of meetings with the four main dairy organizations in that province in an effort to try to bring about a single dairy organization that could co-operate with the Quebec organization and bring about relative harmony in marketing so far as the two adjoining provinces are concerned.

The next step was that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture called a dairy conference under the chairmanship of the late Dr. Hannam which was held in the city of Ottawa in the spring of 1963. This conference decided to move toward a national dairy policy. It was recommended that a committee of 16 be set up to help to draft a national dairy policy, with five members of the committee from the national dairy council, five representing the dairy producers, five representing the provincial governments—they having divided the country into areas—and one representing the federal government. To my knowledge that committee has either never met or certainly has made no progress report to the public.

In this period of adjustment we are trying to help the dairy farmers by subsidizing the price of butter to the extent of over $40 million a year. This subsidy was given with the idea that at the provincial level and the farm level there would be a continuing effort to try to solve the problem by establishing a national dairy policy, which could take several forms.

I have almost completed my remarks, Mr. Chairman, but when we are discussing the administration of the stabilization board I believe we should hear what the policy of the government is in relation to the over-all dairy situation. We want to know if there is any activity at the provincial and farm levels to meet conditions that were well understood when we advanced the heavy subsidy on butter. I am not making these remarks for the purpose of causing any trouble between the provinces and the farm organizations. I make them because I know that unless we do have some rational dairy policy in Canada the great majority of the farmers in the dairy business, the 55 per cent in Ontario for instance with less than 13 cows, and the even greater percentage in Quebec with less than 13 cows, cannot be asked to continue indefinitely waiting for some action.

It is true that the difficulties are great. It is true that the heaviest responsibility falls on the provincial ministers to give leadership in their provinces in creating single dairy organizations in each province, so that a national organization can be formed with some opportunity to work out policies that will provide some control over the production and marketing of the products of the dairy farms. I suggest that the problems of low income farmers, mostly in eastern Canada, and the problems of the dairy industry are very closely related and that the test of any minister of agriculture of Canada will be how well he provides leadership in getting the provinces to continue their movement toward a single dairy organization within each province, which organizations can then sit down together and see if they cannot work out a national dairy policy within the next two or three years. I should like to know what the minister's thoughts are with regard to a national dairy policy and how he intends to use the agricultural prices stabilization board as part of the machinery to help to solve this problem.

Mr. Hays: Mr. Chairman, I assure the hon. member that we do recognize the problems he has mentioned. This committee has met four times, the last time in June, and the next meeting will be in seven or eight weeks time. Its members are actively engaged in trying to formulate some policy that will protect producers in so far as prices are concerned. As the hon. member recognizes, the big problem of course is price, and there has been some improvement in this field. But I should like to assure the hon. member that the committee which represents all levels, the producers, the provinces, farm groups and the federal government, which has a representative, has met four times since the 1963 meeting. Its last meeting was in June and it will be meeting again at the end of September or the beginning of October.

Mr. Hamilton: I have one or two more precise questions. Has the federal government put forward any inducements to encourage the members of the committee to move faster in working out a national dairy policy? In referring to inducements I am not overlooking the fact that we put forward a $40 million inducement for them to get together, but I think they should be reminded that this inducement is conditional upon their moving forward. I should like to know from the minister what policy he has that will make the farmers of Ontario, with four separate organizations, want to get together to form a single organization and work in co-operation with the province of Quebec.

Mr. Hays: I can assure the hon. member that we do have this in mind and that we are moving forward in this direction. There are many problems. There are many people who, from a regional point of view, do not agree with what might be a good over-all policy. These are big problems, as the hon. member knows, but we are working toward what we think will be a much happier position in so far as the dairy farmers are concerned.

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Chairman, I should like to take advantage of the fact that we are now considering item 15A to discuss briefly a particular point which, in my opinion, affects the agricultural economy in the Saguenay district. Naturally, like many other areas, that area is faced with marketing problems.

In that district, most farmers are engaged in dairying and their products obviously include butter, cheese and a very small quantity of powdered milk.

Farmers have never been quite able to understand the government's attitude concerning the marketing of such products. In fact, if there is a surplus of butter, one year, in Canada, the year after we are faced with an overproduction of cheese. As a result, the government pays subsidies on butter one year and on cheese the following year, so that our farmers can never know from year to year which of the two products they manufacture will be subsidized. Because of those surpluses, either of butter or of cheese, our farmers are confused, unable to decide whether they should produce butter or cheese or whether they should give up dairying altogether.

Mr. Chairman, item 15 reads as follows:

Marketing of farm products.

I also note that an amount of $35,000 was appropriated for this item last year and it seems that this year, no need was felt to resort to marketing—

[Text]

Mr. Hays: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, are we dealing now with vote 15?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Hays: We have finished all the other votes up to that point?

[Translation]

The Chairman: Order. I wish to draw the attention of the hon. members to the fact that the house is now considering vote No. 15 —production and marketing administration.

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Chairman, that is precisely the subject matter with which I would like to deal. I see that, last year, an amount of $35,000 had been allocated under that item—marketing—while this year the amount allocated is only $20,000.

I am particularly interested in this matter, because, after all, the main problem facing our farmers today is precisely the problem of getting a stabilized market, a steady market for their produce.

Mr. Chairman, I think the Department of Agriculture should consider as most important the matter of finding markets for farm produce.

At the present time, the farming industry in the Saguenay area includes dairy farming and potato growing; and very soon now, the farmers of that area will be able to put on the market their production of blueberries.

I was reading recently a report published by Hon. Mr. Courcy, the Quebec minister of agriculture, to the effect that he would have to postpone his project to establish blueberry patches in the Saguenay peninsula, under ARDA, because of the uncertainty of markets. Now, I am wondering to what extent this federal government is interested in this problem which the Quebec farmer has to face, and more particularly, the farmer in the Saguenay area, who is asking himself if he should give up dairy farming. When there are surpluses of milk, cheese and butter, the farmers are told: You should take up some other type of farming, you should produce something else, you should diversify your production.

Mr. Chairman, the farmer is quite prepared to diversify his production, to do something else, but he should, at least, be given the assurance that he will be able to sell on Canadian or foreign markets what he is requested to produce, and sell it at a reasonable price which will make it possible for him to live a decent life.

In my opinion, by having such a small amount earmarked for marketing research, the Department of Agriculture is simply missing an opportunity to use one of the means at its disposal to assist eastern agriculture, that of Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes. This question of markets is closely related to the present problem.

I was listening a while ago to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton), the former minister of agriculture. Indeed, I always enjoy listening to him, because he speaks like a level-headed person and seems to be especially aware of farm problems. I like the suggestions he makes and when, a while ago, he said we should endeavour to unify our farm organizations in Quebec as they did in Ontario, in order to succeed in establishing a stable farm policy, I found myself in complete agreement with him on that point. I believe this is the way to a rational policy which would be acceptable to all the people concerned. However, until that feat is accomplished—because it will certainly be one to achieve that unification—we cannot let things deteriorate further.

The Department of Agriculture certainly has, on the federal level, a great responsibility, as stated so well this morning by the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé), who is responsible for rural development. On the other hand, that responsibility is shared by the federal government and the provincial authorities, but they will reach those solutions only through co-operation.

I wonder if, at the present time, there are meetings between the federal Department of Agriculture and the provincial government of Quebec or Ontario about that particular problem of marketing and market research.

What is the federal government exactly doing today to ensure that our dairy producers our cheese producers in Quebec and in the province of Ontario obtain the necessary outlets for their products? Does the federal government try as hard today to secure a stable market for our Canadian cheese producer as they did for the wheat producers? I have nothing against the latter, and I am perfectly happy and in agreement with everything which is done to help them, but I would like to see the federal government jointly with the province of Quebec and the other provinces do the same for those other people.

I sometimes wonder whether it would not be opportune to set up a dairy board, similar to the wheat board, for instance, which would ensure that our dairy products meet national quality standards that are also acceptable internationally. Indeed this board might take joint action with the provinces and the dairy organizations with a view to securing a market for them, like the wheat board is doing at present by approaching every market in the world in its search for outlets.

We should have a similar organization which might dispose of our dairy farm products on every market in the world. I do not believe that this would be a prejudicial centralizing policy—far from it, as everything would be done in co-operation with the provincial governments, and more particularly with all organizations concerned. If this body were only like the wheat board which, to all ends and purposes, seems to be independent from the government as such. As this organization, as I say, was set up by the central government in agreement with the producers and wheat producing organizations, I believe that the same thing or something similar, might be repeated for the dairy farmers, which would provide them with the markets for which there is a great need.

They are now told: You are producing too much milk, you will have to do something else.

But has the assurance been previously given that another market could be found for the foodstuffs which they are asked to produce? Would it not be better, since a market must now be found for this new production, if the government itself, through some organization, found markets for the products for which they are equipped such as butter and cheese. I think that it is a serious problem.

The government would like them to give up part of their dairy production to produce something else. But was it anticipated that a market would nevertheless have to be found for that production? Besides, this transfer from one market or production to another is a burden for them, since they must now quit a production they developed at a loss, in order to reorganize in another line of production which in most cases requires a rather large investment for farmers who have been leading a precarious life for several years in a rather rough climate.

Relatively large funds have been placed at their disposal; but is it intended to get them into debt by urging them to turn to another type of production which, five years from now, will also be faced with a deteriorated market? And perhaps they will be asked then to change once more their line of production.

I think the thing should be thought out before urging our dairy farmers to diversify their production.

Indeed, allowance should be made for the fact that the population of Canada will not remain static, but will increase. And this dairy production, which may now have a temporary surplus, will not have a surplus forever.

Today, we say to dairy farmers: Reduce your production. Tomorrow or perhaps the day after tomorrow, we will have to beg them to increase their dairy production, in order to face the increased consumption due to the greater number of Canadian consumers.

Mr. Chairman, I conclude my remarks because I think that many other members want to speak on that subject. In my opinion, the federal government should now make it a point to co-operate with the provincial governments—and here I mean Quebec in particular—to secure markets for our present agricultural production before asking the farmers to engage in another kind of production for which we are not sure they will find markets or for which we are not ready to guarantee them markets.

That being said, Mr. Chairman, I resume my seat.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take the next few minutes to support the views expressed by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) who, a few minutes ago, made suggestions to the present government concerning the dairy industry.

I do not wish, today, to criticize the policy of the government but rather make a few recommendations to the Minister of Agriculture and to the agricultural stabilization board to help them find a way to assist the eastern farmers.

Mr. Chairman, it is well known that the dairy industry is the cornerstone of agriculture in eastern Canada, and in Quebec especially.

We know the dairy industry is the farmer's major source of income. A while ago, I was looking at the survey report tabled today by the Minister of Agriculture. That survey covered ten regions in the province of Quebec. In each, the dairy industry is at the top, providing farmers with the larger share of their income. Thus, 48 per cent of the income of farmers in those ten regions comes directly from the dairy industry and 16 per cent from the sales of cattle, which, in a way, is also part of the dairy industry.

If we are seeking ways to come to the assistance of eastern farmers, I think we have to know what will provide the farmer with the largest income, and that is the dairy industry.

In my opinion, the minister should pay a very special attention to this matter.

If the price of milk were to rise a little, the income of the farmers in the province of Quebec and eastern Canada would increase that much.

Some time ago a group of farmers marched on the provincial parliament. On that occasion, the minister of agriculture for the province of Quebec announced an increase of 20 cents per 100 pounds of milk. Farmers were immediately satisfied because they believed that this increase would apply to milk delivered to processing plants as well as to fluid milk. But they learned to their surprise that the increase was applicable only to fluid milk.

At the present time, Quebec farmers want to ask the federal government for an increase in order to raise their incomes. It is not only a certain group of farmers, but 71,000 dairy producers of that province.

Recently, I had a survey made in certain areas of the province of Quebec in order to ascertain the total number of pounds of milk sold by milk producers to their co-operatives. I should like to put on record the figures obtained in one area of the north shore, La Pérade: 1,270 milk producers shipped an average of 49,307 pounds of milk in 1961; in 1962, 1,235 milk producers shipped an average of 55,390 pounds of milk; in 1963, 1,222 milk producers shipped an average of 59,845 pounds of milk, still a slight increase. In such an area, milk is worth approximately $3 per cwt.; this is not a very high income for those farmers who only rely on the dairy industry to support their family.

I now wish to quote the figures of the survey for 1963 only: 46 per cent of these 1,222 farmers shipped less than 50,000 pounds of milk, 22 per cent shipped between 50,000 and 75,000 pounds, 6 per cent shipped between 75,000 and 100,000 pounds and 13 per cent shipped between 100,000 and 150,000 pounds; finally, 3 per cent only shipped between 150,000 and 250,000 pounds. Consequently, if the federal government really desires to help farmers in eastern Canada it must take the necessary means to increase their income.

Last year, with its new dairy policy, the federal government saved the treasury about $11 million; this year, it will save the treasury between $4 and $5 million. Of course, the price paid to the producer for milk is somewhat the same as last year. In some places, this price is about 5 cents higher per cwt., in some other places, about 10 cents, but elsewhere it is 5 cents lower.

If the federal government saved the treasury $11 million last year and between $4 and $5 million this year, when the farmer receives about the same price, it is due to the fact that cheese is from 2 cents to 3 cents higher per pound, powdered milk is about 5 cents higher and finally, the demand for our dairy products is greater.

The suggestion I am making to the federal government is that this fall a special subsidy of 25 or 35 cents per cwt. of milk should be granted to eastern farmers up to a maximum of 100,000 pounds of milk. Such legislation would cost the federal government some $13 million, that is more or less the amount saved with the new farm policy passed last year and even then there would still be a few cents left over to give assistance in other fields.

If we figure that, in 1962, the subsidy of 25 cents per cwt. of milk paid to all eligible producers cost some $13 million and if, this coming fall, the government paid out to those eastern farmers a subsidy of about 35 cents per cwt. of milk for the first 100,000 pounds in order to increase their income, we would be, by the same token, giving assistance to most of the eastern farmers, because their average production is about 65,000 to 70,000 pounds shipped to processing plants.

If, in the province of Ontario, as was said by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton)—I was going to call him the minister of agriculture, because I anticipate that in a few months, he will be back at the head of the Department of Agriculture—55.5 per cent of dairy producers have only 13 dairy cows, and 38.5 per cent have between 13 and 32, then I think that the situation is a little more serious in the province of Quebec. I am making this suggestion to the government in order that it may increase the income of those producers. And we can give good reasons to encourage the government to incur this $12 or $13 million expenditure early this fall. The Farmers' Advocate, in its June 1964 issue, quotes figures showing that in order to have an income of $3,000 per annum, a dairy producer should have 54 milch cows, with an average yield of 7,000 pounds of milk, the total of which amounts to 378,000 pounds of milk per annum, selling at $3.50 per cwt. or else 31 milch cows with an average production of 9,000 pounds, the total of which would represent 279,000 pounds selling at $3.50, or again, 22 milch cows, producing yearly an average of 11,000 pounds of milk for a total of 242,000 pounds of milk, which would earn $3,000 per annum, or still, 18 milch cows with an average yield of 13,000 pounds of milk, or a total of 234,000 pounds of milk which would bring in $3,000 per annum.

If we consider there are 55 per cent of the dairy producers in Ontario who keep less than 13 milch cows, and if we consider that in the province of Quebec, according to the data I have here, 7,484 dairy producers have obtained an average of 70,132 pounds of milk, evidently, their income is insufficient to allow them to meet their commitments. Now, if, in the province of Quebec for 70,000 producers the chief source of revenue is derived from the dairy industry, in my opinion, the government should focus its efforts on increasing income.

As a dairy farmer, I would say that the first 100,000 pounds of milk are necessarily the most expensive to produce and, as a matter of fact, they cost almost $3.50 per cwt. Keeping in mind that for each thousand dollars invested in dairy production it costs about $20 per milch cow, so that when the number is around 13, the income for the first 100,000 pounds of milk, the most expensive to produce, must be around $3.50 per cwt.

I remember that, in 1957-58, when I had the opportunity to visit the various areas of the province of Quebec and meet farmers, when the milk was worth about $2.50, $2.60 per cwt., I used to tell them: Milk ought to pay farmers an average price of $3 per cwt. We have now reached this average price of $3. At this time, it is not enough, we must go farther. In my opinion, we must not encourage just the big producers, the large organizations, so that they can keep on growing. We must help those who produce less than 100,000 pounds of milk.

I shall give an example. In the Granby area, in 1963, out of 1343 dairy farmers 68 per cent produced less than 100,000 pounds of milk per year, the average being 50,599 pounds.

In the Joliette area, in 1963, out of 736 producers, 79 per cent produced less than 100 pounds of milk a year, that is an average of 50,611 pounds a year. In the Bon-Conseil area, my own area, in 1963, 57 per cent of the dairy farmers produced less than 100,000 pounds of milk, that is an average of 55,175 pounds of milk a year. In the La Pérade area, on the north shore, in 1963, 84 per cent of the dairy farmers produced less than 100,000 pounds of milk, that is an average of 45,350 pounds a year. In the eastern townships, out of 400 producers, 57 per cent produced less than 100,000 pounds of milk, that is an average of 56,732 pounds a year.

In the area around Quebec city, including Mégantic and Plessisville, out of 1,419 milk producers, 82 per cent produce less than 100,000 pounds of milk a year, or an average of 41,809 pounds. That is the situation in which our milk producers now find themselves.

We have small farms. Farmers have herds which are not too large, and mechanization is quite expensive. If the government really wants to help most farmers, it will have to implement this coming fall, or even sooner, the suggestion I put forth. And I am seriously warning the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé), in short, the government, that Quebec farmers are getting ready to submit a request to the federal government and, if need be, to march on Ottawa. They have a right to do that.

If I were sitting on the other side of the house, I would advise government members to rouse public opinion throughout Canada, and more particularly in the cities. Our city dwellers should not think that farmers will always be the poor cousins in the Canadian economy. We should not forget that Ontario numbers about 70,000 or 72,000 producers, and the province of Quebec has about the same number. Those are people, families, human beings.

When did the government mind spending millions to help the miners? By following my suggestion, the government would spend a few million dollars to help thousands of people with inadequate income.

I make this suggestion, not because I want to criticize the policy the government enacted last year and which had its points. But I objected, though this policy had some good points, to the attempt which was made to save the federal treasury some money by every possible means, so as to be able to tell the city dwellers: We gave less to the farmers. That is not as it should be. Our fellow citizens who live in cities or towns should be made to understand that the farmer has a part to play, and that he should receive his rightful share of the national income. Indeed, if the farmer does not get an adequate income, he will move to the city and join the unemployed, or take the job of a person who is working and who would then become jobless in his turn.

Moreover, in some areas, families would have to receive social security allowances. I should prefer the government to spend $12 or $15 million more in order to help directly the dairy farmers.

If the minister agrees to pay this additional grant next fall to farmers in Quebec, Ontario and the maritime provinces, up to 100,000 pounds of milk, I suggest that he should give this money directly to the farmers in two or three instalments. This would help increase the farmer's income. This will only be a temporary measure, since the appropriate long term measure is the one suggested earlier by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton), that is, form a national dairy council which, I am sure, can do much for the dairy industry in Canada.

Just like the economists, we say there is at present a butter surplus. In fact, there are some 100 million pounds of butter in storage. Last year Canada produced 350 million pounds of butter, and approximately the same quantity was consumed. But if, in the course of one year, some drought prevailed, or if, at the end of said year, production decreased by 50 or 60 million pounds and consumption increased by 30 or 40 million pounds, there would be a shortage of about 100 million pounds of butter, and we would just about empty our warehouses.

During the 1967 world fair, if Canada receives 30 or 35 million visitors, we shall need more agricultural products, more butter, more cheese and it would be disastrous for the Canadian economy if we had to import agricultural goods which Canadian farmers can produce here. Moreover, when Canadian farmers produce, they have work, and it is a lot better for governments, federal as well as provincial, to help people by keeping them at work instead of giving assistance when they have absolutely nothing to do.

Mr. Chairman, I shall close my remarks by asking once more the Minister of Agriculture to consider seriously the suggestion of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. It is imperative that meetings be called as soon as possible between federal and provincial authorities as well as producers, in order to set up this national dairy council which afterwards might even be responsible for finding markets in foreign countries. Moreover, once this national dairy council is set up, we will really have a long term dairy policy.

But in the meantime, it is imperative to help dairy farmers, and that is why I suggested a short term policy under which the federal government would pay directly to dairy farmers in eastern Canada, starting next fall, a subsidy of between 25 and 35 cents per hundred pounds of milk, up to 100,000 pounds.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, the house is now considering the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, especially item 15.

It seems that the total budget of the department for 1964-65 is $140,124,800, while the expenditures under item No. 15 amount to $2,190,400.

What strikes me more than anything else in all those expenditures with respect to agriculture is that in the total budget as well as in the various items, as for instance votes Nos. 5, 10 or 15, millions of dollars are earmarked for agriculture, but farmers never see the colour of that money.

And to illustrate my assertion, if one considers the details of vote No. 15, one realizes that subsidies to agriculture represent only a small fraction of this whole vote of $2,190,400.

On the other hand, if one considers the whole budget, which amounts to $140 million, one can see that about 20 per cent of that amount is for farmers, the balance going to travelling costs, expenses and salaries.

In vote No. 15, for instance, out of $2,190,000, there is an amount of $2,170,000 in salaries and travelling expenses while $20,000 are made available for the marketing of our farm products; $20,000 to make our farm products better known and to improve processing methods; $20,000 out of $2 million.

Now, the total estimates provided for agriculture amount to $140 million. The same thing applies to all other expenditures.

According to vote No. 15, there are 418 employees working for the Department of Agriculture. To do what? To hand out subsidies. And how much? To hand out $20,000 in subsidies. Those 418 employees receive $2,170,000 to hand out $2,190,000. To whom? To the farmers? No, the farmers only get $20,000. That is the stupidity of our present system, Mr. Chairman. Then, people are amazed to see the farmers, especially those in the province of Quebec, march on parliament to demand their rights. And they are accused of being cry-babies and critics. I hope the farmers of the province of Quebec will organize, travelling by bus or in convoys, if necessary, to march on the Ottawa parliament because the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) who is here, does nothing to change that situation.

He said that he wants to help the farmers. Help them, yes, but out of $2 million he gives them $20,000 to market their farm products and no one even knows how those $20,000 were spent. We do not know whether farmers even saw the colour of that money.

Mr. Chairman, we no longer have to put on white gloves to talk to the Minister of Agriculture. He was elected and came to Ottawa a year ago and what did we get in the field of agriculture in the province of Quebec? Nothing.

[Text]

Mr. Hays: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I think I should mention that when we come to vote 25, the hon. member will see that there is $10 million there. When we come to vote No. 35, he will see that there is another $20 million. If he will recall, when we were discussing the supplementary estimates there was $122 million under the stabilization scheme. I feel that the hon. member should just keep these amounts in mind and not neglect to mention them.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Agriculture said that $5 million are provided under item 30. According to him, $1 million in subsidies appear under item 45, with regard to health of animals. In addition, I must point out to him that an amount of $10 million appears under the item concerning animals and animal products.

However, of the $140 million, I note three items: $20,000 for production and marketing; $1,465,000 for health of animals and a further $10 million for animals and animal products.

Out of the amount of $140 million, only $20 million, that is, approximately 20 per cent, are actually intended for farmers.

As far as vote No. 15 is concerned, the Minister of Agriculture can look up the estimates; he knows as well as I do that out of $2,190,000 allocated to agriculture, only $20,000 is earmarked for the marketing of products.

And some people say that eastern farmers are cry-babies.

I have more figures here showing that between 1936 and 1964, $2,500,000,000 have been granted, by way of various subsidies, to the farmers of western Canada. I am glad that the farmers of western Canada received $2,500 million since 1936, which is about $10,000 per farmer or $400 per year for each farmer in western Canada.

I will come back to the other items in a few minutes. Now, all the money provided under vote No. 55 for land rehabilitation, irrigation and water storage projects is spent in western Canada; no provision is made for the province of Quebec.

I hope the new minister who is called the minister of agriculture for eastern Canada but who is actually much more a minister of rural development will learn his role—

Mr. Sauvé: I would ask the hon. member to kindly limit his remarks to the item under consideration and I should like to point out to him that, for the time being, I am just simply the Minister of Forestry. It is only when the house has passed the bill which was announced in that connection that I will become the minister of forestry and rural development.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, I hope that the government will undertake as soon as possible to carry out the projects set forth in the speech from the throne, for at the pace things are going as far as agriculture is concerned, the minister will still not be appointed when farmers will begin to leave eastern Canada, because nothing is done in the province of Quebec or in eastern Canada.

Mr. Chairman, yesterday I asked the Minister of Agriculture what he intended to do about frost in the province of Quebec where crops were destroyed. There is nothing in those items providing for the official establishment of a permanent committee or board in order to settle the problems of the province of Quebec.

Farmers are entirely dependant upon weather conditions and the government does not do anything to help them.

One can see here that boards have been established to deal with crops in western Canada.

What do you see in item No. 5 to meet the farm problems of eastern Canada? Absolutely nothing.

I should ask the Minister of Agriculture—

[Text]

Mr. Hays: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I believe we should have a ruling that the hon. member is straying away from the subject matter of vote 15.

[Translation]

The Chairman: I am sure that the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) wishes to confine his remarks to item 15.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, I shall be pleased to confine my remarks to item 15, but I should like to talk about grants and I do not see any. There are none. I am obliged to speak about government administration and expenses.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Rondeau: I do not see anything here that would be profitable to agriculture; everything is being absorbed by salaries.

The Chairman: I am sure that the hon. member for Shefford wishes to confine his remarks to vote No. 15, as he should under standing order 59.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, I shall be pleased to confine my remarks to vote No. 15, but I do not see anything there for the farmers; all we can see is:

Salaries and wages	$800,000
Overtime	1,700

—they work hard, those people, to give nothing to the farmers—

Various winter allowances	$ 4,600
Travelling and removal expenses	63,000
Freight, express and cartage	1,500
Postage	800
Telephones and telegrams	9,700
Publication of reports and other material	2,000
Office stationery, supplies and equipment	16,500
Materials and supplies	4,500
Acquisition of equipment	10,500
Repairs and upkeep of equipment	1,800
Marketing of agricultural products	20,000

—there we have no details about what was given to the farmers—

Sundries	$3,000
—which amounts to	$953,800

for one portion of vote No. 15.

So, Mr. Chairman, as you can see, in item No. 15 as in the whole budget for the Department of Agriculture, which amounts to $140 million, only 20 per cent goes to farmers, the rest going to civil servants. But what is the function of those people? They are employed to settle nothing, for nothing has been done for Canadian agriculture since the Liberal party took office.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I want to sound the clarion call on behalf of the 14,000 cigar tobacco growers in the province of Quebec who are now facing serious difficulties, especially during the past year and a half. The "Coopérative des tabacs de Saint-Jacques" has one million pounds of unsold cigar tobacco in its storage plants.

I can assure you that cigar tobacco growers are increasingly concerned about the future.

That is why, Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that this type of farming is very important to the province of Quebec, and that it yields $7 million in taxes, all by itself, to both the federal and provincial governments, I am wondering if it would not be advisable to put this type of farming under the Agricultural Stabilization Act, in order to provide cigar tobacco growers with a stable income.

This is the only remark I want to make, in the hope that the minister will give me an immediate answer on this subject.

[Text]

Mr. Hays: Mr. Chairman, we would be very pleased to take this under consideration and I will see to it that the stabilization board looks into the matter.

Mr. Jorgenson: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to delay the passing of this item unduly but I should like to make a few remarks concerning crop insurance, since the minister was so kind as to allow us the opportunity of speaking on the subject on this item. As the years have progressed since the crop insurance bill was passed in 1959 I find that there is increasing interest in the subject across Canada. My own province of Manitoba in particular has pioneered the development of provincial crop insurance programs. Today a total of 6,170 farmers are covered in the six test areas that have been developed within the province, involving a total liability of over $14 million compared with just 2,500 farmers and a total liability of $4 million during the first year of operation, 1960-61.

I think this is a fairly clear indication that crop insurance in the province of Manitoba is receiving growing acceptance as a means of stabilizing farm yields. This is one point on which there seems to be confusion in the minds of a good many members whom I have heard discussing the subject in the house. First of all, I think it should be clearly understood that the crop insurance legislation introduced by the previous government in 1959 and passed by parliament was in effect enabling legislation which permitted provinces to set up their own crop insurance programs. It was one of those things mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition yesterday in speaking of provincial-federal cost sharing programs. Under this particular program the federal government does assume some responsibility, and some of the cost as far as administration and part of the premiums are concerned.

I think crop insurance should be designed to treat individual operators with similar risks in a similar fashion without unduly penalizing efficiency or subsidizing inefficiency. In other words, a crop insurance program to be effective must be actuarially sound, and it is on this basis that the Manitoba crop insurance corporation is proceeding and developing their program with some considerable success.

The matter raised by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle dealing with reinsurance is one that is of great importance to the province of Manitoba because they are very anxious to extend the provision of crop insurance across the entire province. But a year like 1961 and, again, a year like 1964 have caused them to proceed with a considerable amount of caution because of the risk that is involved and the necessity of having some form of reinsurance to fall back on, in the event of a disaster such as we are experiencing in parts of the west this year.

I am afraid there has been a tendency in some instances to emphasize crop insurance as a cure-all for all of the difficulties of agriculture. It is nothing of the kind. It is a part of an over-all farm program designed to minimize some of the variations in yield, and at its very best crop insurance can be no more than a device that levels out yields over a period of years. Obviously crop insurance cannot have any impact at all on the variability of income due to price fluctuations and for that reason the previous government when developing their farm program took into consideration the various things that contributed to agricultural instability and attempted to develop a program as national in scope as possible, while at the same time taking into consideration regional problems that affect certain areas.

It is necessary therefore that the average production on a farm be such that it will provide the farmer with a decent income. Obviously crop insurance in those areas where average farm income over a period of years is so low that it does not provide sufficient income for the farmer is of little or no value to him. For that reason other programs must be developed to assist him. I have in mind particularly the provisions of the ARDA program under which a shift of emphasis in production will perhaps be more beneficial than the type of program we envisage under crop insurance. Paradoxically the areas that need crop insurance most can afford it least, because if it is to be based on the risk factor then of necessity the premiums are too high, and in many cases those areas where crop insurance is not required as much do not take advantage of it because the incidence of crop failure is so low that they do without it.

But in the greater part of Manitoba in particular crop insurance is the type of program that does provide that yield stability which contributes to the general well-being of the agricultural communities. It is not only the farmers of these communities who are affected. We recall that in the 'thirties the loss of income due to crop failures in those areas created a general depression among the business community. Farmers are unable to make purchases of equipment and pay necessary operating expenses if income is not available.

Again in 1961 we had an example of how crop losses due to weather conditions or conditions beyond the farmers' control can seriously affect other segments of the economy as well. For instance, in 1961 Manitoba farmers committed themselves to something like $117 million in cash operating expenses in the hope that the return from their crops would repay their expenses and provide them with a living for that year. Total net income for the year amounted to $64.6 million slightly over half of what it was the year before, and local businessmen as well as the farmers were very seriously affected. I happen to have visited those areas in Manitoba where crop insurance is in effect, and during the summer months it was easy to recognize the farmers who were covered by crop insurance because they were not nearly as worried as those who did not have coverage. On talking to businessmen in the area the same impression was created, that they were optimistic in spite of the serious drought taking place at that time because so many of the farmers were covered by crop insurance.

In order to expand the operations of the Manitoba crop insurance corporation it is going to be necessary for the government to come up with the amending legislation at the earliest possible opportunity. I regret it will be delayed until fall because I know it is necessary in Manitoba to have this amendment to the legislation as quickly as possible, so that the corporation can proceed to accumulate the data and the necessary figures to determine what premiums and indemnities are to be paid in any given area.

The northern areas of Manitoba are suffering from rather severe drought, the central portions of the province are experiencing good crop conditions and the southeastern portion of the province, from which I come, is suffering severe flooding. From this one can see that the causes of crop failures are many and varied. Unfortunately the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, designed to offset the conditions of drought that existed during the thirties, does not adequately cover crop losses in the west today. There are areas where local flooding can create a great deal of difficulty for the farmers and the arrangements under P.F.R.A. could not possibly begin to cover the farmers affected. It is necessary, therefore, for them to seek aid elsewhere and if crop insurance were available all the farmers in the province could take advantage of its provisions and cover themselves adequately.

I recall that during the debate on the introduction of the bill in 1959 the Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke at length on the subject of crop insurance, and criticized the then government because it did not take care of every ill, evil and contingency that could arise in agriculture. I only hope his opinions have been conveyed to the Minister of Agriculture so that he can take them into consideration.

I ask the minister to attempt to bring in this legislation at the earliest possible opportunity and thus facilitate the province of Manitoba and other provinces to proceed with the development of their crop insurance programs that will provide the type of stability farmers require these days when they have such high operating costs, and other costs that must be met from year to year.

Mr. Moore: Mr. Chairman, I would like to refer to stabilization payments as they affect the dairy industry and to mention that it has now become a billion dollar a year industry. I realize the dairy industry may be concentrated in eastern Canada but it is still of vital importance to most small farmers in the west.

The Minister of Agriculture has stated in the house that milk prices are up all over Canada. In all fairness, I do not think he meant that he had all, or even any of the problems solved, but we could take this to mean that the changes in the dairy support program, that is changes in the last administration's program, have brought about a rise in milk prices. There have been changes but I do not think there was anything new in policy.

There have been two dairy policy announcements since the change of administration and they do not contain many differences. I should like to congratulate my colleague from Nicolet-Yamaska for his well thought out suggestion, but I would like to go even further than he does, to point out that this suggestion could be followed through on a national scale and into every facet of dairy production.

The first item I would like to mention is butter production, and how stabilization affects it. I think my colleague from Assiniboia has covered the matter very well, but I have a point to make in this regard. The eligible producers of milk and cream, whose butterfat is used for the manufacture of butter, are receiving the same price under the new administration for their cream and milk. Eligible producers means milk and cream shippers whose production is used for the manufacture of creamery butter, and who do not supply any milk to the fluid milk market.

Under the Conservative administration the manufacturer was paid 12 cents per pound for all butter manufactured. This was changed in 1963, in the dairy policy announcement of that time, and the manufacturers were then paid 14½ cents per pound for all butterfat from eligible producers used in the manufacture of creamery butter. This year the board's price for butter was raised from 52 cents to 53 cents per pound, and this enabled the figure of 14½ per pound of butterfat to be changed to 13.3 cents per pound.

This change in the method of payment does not constitute a price rise, as more than a pound of butter can be made from a pound of butterfat. The figures show that from 100 pounds of butterfat you can make something like 122 pounds of butter. The change affects only the manufacturer, as the change from 12 cents for a pound of butter to 14½ cents per pound of butterfat cost the manufacturer approximately one quarter cent per pound of butter manufactured. The manufacturer's bookkeeping costs are increased and the producer receives no more for his product.

I should like to read a short excerpt from the Western Producer of June 25, 1964:

> The dairy pool reported a 20 per cent decline in returns in the butter department as a result of the change in the federal system of supporting butter prices, and an increase in the producer price of cream. Most butter in the past year went directly to the trade and little was sold to the stabilization board.

What about fluid milk producers? In the first place, the federal Department of Agriculture has little or nothing to say about the price of milk to fluid milk producers. In our province at least, and probably in others, the board of public utilities commissioners sets the price of milk. Usually a rate is granted on petition from either manufacturers or consumers, or both.

This is done to keep pace with the cost of production, the cost of living and so on. Naturally the price has been going up for many years. I myself have been a milk producer for 27 years. When I was going over some old papers this spring I noticed I had a sales slip. I cannot remember the exact date but it was back around 1939 or 1940. This sales slip showed that I was paid 48 cents for 100 pounds of milk. That would be 4.8 cents for a gallon of milk. The paper is somewhat yellowed with age but it is very legible. I will admit there have been some improvements since that time.

Surplus milk which is transferred to butter manufacturers and made into butter qualified for a subsidy under the Conservative administration. Now those producers are classed as non-eligible and do not receive a subsidy. There can be arguments one way or the other as to whether or not they require a subsidy. I could point out that these producers produce their milk at greater expense than other producers; I will admit they are paid more, but their premises, to meet inspections and so on, require a much larger expenditure of capital.

The cost of producing milk is increasing from year to year. The average butterfat content of milk is about 3.5 per cent. I know that this has been increasing, too, over the years, but it is a good figure to use as a standard. The subsidy was 14½ cents. It is now 13.3 cents per pound. I had worked it out on the 14.5 cent level; it works out to about 50¾ cents per hundred pounds of milk, but the fluid milk producer was then being paid less for his surplus milk when transferred to butterfat. My purpose is not so much to argue about this change as it is to point out it meant a loss of income to the dairy industry, definitely not a gain.

Formerly, and when I say "formerly" I mean back in the time of the former minister, the subsidy per hundred pounds of milk used in the manufacture of skimmed milk powder was 25 cents a hundred. This has been discontinued. To replace it, the stabilization board has stated it will purchase skimmed milk powder by tender at a certain price. Most manufacturers claim that because the board has agreed to purchase the surplus powder at a higher price they cannot pay the producer the additional 25 cents to replace the subsidy which is not now being paid. We also know that channelling milk into skimmed milk powder does not help to cut down butter production because the butterfat still remains and it is made into butter. When the milk is separated to obtain the skimmed milk you get the cream. That increases butter production. However, we seem to be fast reaching the point in this country at which the consumption and the production of butter are better balanced. There has not been a surplus of production in the west for some time. The surplus is all in the east of Canada.

The present support program does not include milk used in evaporated and condensed milk plants. The former subsidy of 25 cents per hundred pounds was removed by the present government. In other words, the dairymen and the evaporated milk industry were singled out, and this is one part of the industry which creates no problems in the form of surpluses. To compete with other milk outlets the producers must make up most of this difference, which they have done to some extent, but not completely in all cases, and they have had accordingly to raise the price of their finished product to the consumer.

Cheese has been mentioned in former debates but I may refer to it, too. In 1963 the supporter price per hundred was raised from 25 cents to 30 cents on milk for cheese production. That did constitute a raise. But look what happened this year. This year, rather than a subsidy on the milk there is a 3.6 cents a pound subsidy on the manufactured cheese, but only on first grade cheese. I would point out that not all the cheese manufactured—cheddar cheese, that is—is first grade cheese. It ranges probably from 70 to 90 per cent. This means there is no subsidy on the other 30 per cent. That naturally means a loss to the producers of milk for cheese production.

The subsidy on export cheddar cheese is down under this administration. First it went down from 4 cents to 3 cents, and now from 3 cents to 2 cents a pound. This will necessitate a rise in the price of Canadian cheddar cheese on the United Kingdom market. The question is, can we compete with cheddar from countries such as New Zealand when we must demand more money for our cheese? Another point here is that our cheese has not been aged. After it has been exported it must be held for a year. Some of the cheese sent by other countries is aged and thus we are in an unfavourable position. If we cannot compete in this market, the milk producers here in Canada will be the ones who will lose. I think it is safe to say that in all parts of Canada the dairy industry has lost more than it has gained at a time when the cost of living and the cost of production are rising.

As to the cost of production, I might mention it is adversely affected by the 8 per cent tax. This tax will go higher. So these costs are higher every year although the price of dairy products has not gone up accordingly. [Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, just a few words in connection with this item 15 concerning administration, operation and maintenance, including the administration of the Agricultural Stabilization Act, and contributions to agricultural organizations to assist in the marketing of agricultural products and so on. Only I cannot see, among all those figures, any amount allotted to agricultural organizations. I can see, for example, directly related to those items, 418 employees who eat up—yes, I repeat, who eat up—$2,190,400 this year and $2,279,870 last year.

And the expenditures comprised in this item 15 are distributed in various paragraphs. Administration, continuing establishment, casuals and others, $800,000. Then salaries, wages, etc., telephones, telegrams, office stationery, supplies, $953,000. Then, we come to the Agricultural Stabilization Act administration: continuing establishment, casual and others, salaries, wages, $349,000. We notice travelling expenses, freight, removal expenses, telephones, telegrams, office stationery, sundries; there is nothing left there for agriculture. Nothing at all. I think the minister is considering that at the present time, and his senior officials as well.

A little further, we see: Prairie Farm Assistance Act Administration. There again there is nothing for the assistance of prairie farmers; we read: administrative and professional, technical, operation and service, continuing establishment, casuals and others, salaries, wages, travelling and removal expenses, office stationery, supplies, freight, $796,000.

Once again, there is nothing there for farmers. As payment is made, expenditures are submitted to us for an amount of $2,200,000. It is the same thing this year and every year, there is nothing for the farmers; it is on their behalf, however, that 418 employees work and earn their living at the expense of agriculture, like every other class in society.

Mr. Chairman, I merely want to draw the attention of the minister to that point, concerning vote No. 15, because this is the one which is under consideration; looking at the other votes, we can see that the situation is the same: salaries, wages, expenses, office stationery, telephones, office supplies again, and there is never anything for the farmers.

The minister should submit real figures on what has been paid toward prairie farm assistance as well as eastern agriculture. I ask him to tell us how farmers are assisted by these $2,200,000 paid for administration.

It will be necessary, Mr. Chairman, to consider something other than administration, to talk, think and do something. A little while ago, I saw the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé) stand up when my colleague, the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) said that the minister might be the next minister responsible for ARDA and eastern agriculture. What if he is Minister of Forestry? Should he become minister of agriculture that would not bother us too much. We have seen many others before this one and there will be others after him. However, the administration remains. That administration is above political administration, because those people are the ones who prepare the estimates. The minister may not have seen them before they were printed, but the bureaucrats of the branch knew all about them. Only let us have clear indications as to how the money is spent and not just the distribution of salaries which are spread from left to right and north to south to reach the total of $2.2 million the Minister of Agriculture has now laid before us.

Let us have facts. We want to help agriculture. We also want to see the marketing of farm products and the stabilization of prices.

We have the Agricultural Stabilization Act, and I am all for it. But, after five, 10 or 15 years, what are the results? What have we today? What can the present minister tell us about agricultural stabilization in Canada? I appreciate that the present minister has only held that portfolio for the past two years. But we had another one who held it for six years, and the situation remained unchanged. Estimates are placed before us every year, but no clear or logical explanations are given.

We are told how this $2,200,000 are spent, but there is not 25 cents going to the Canadian farmer.

We are also told about organizations we have to subsidize. There is nothing about that in item No. 15, and yet it deals with organizations. What organizations? At the present time I see no organization except the 418 employees directly concerned by item No. 15.

[Text]

The Chairman: The hon. member for Rosthern.

Mr. Hays: Mr. Chairman, I think I should answer the hon. gentleman. I can appreciate that the way the various items are documented probably presents a problem in understanding them; but I cannot let the hon. gentleman's remarks go by without saying this. With regard to the stabilization act, for instance, it is impossible to know what might happen at the end of the year. The committee will remember that we discussed this question in the supplementary estimates, and $122 million was required and was turned over to the farmers. Eggs are a good example: we will probably have to support eggs this year. We are supporting them at 34 cents, and the weighted average across Canada will probably be somewhat less. It would be difficult to deal with this problem in any other way, because we do not know the total amount that will be required under the stabilization act. Last year the amount required was $122 million, which does not show in here.

Mr. Caouette: That is exactly what I said, Mr. Chairman; that the minister does not know what is now taking place in this connection. If $120 million are paid to support the price of eggs, where is it in this item No. 15?

Mr. Hays: It is in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, I was rather glad to hear the minister mention the support price for eggs. As he knows, this is a question that has engaged the attention of most of the farm people in the province of Saskatchewan and, to a lesser extent, the other prairie provinces. Under the stabilization act farmers expected they would have a certain guarantee over the years. The act has now been in operation for a number of years. This year, and at the beginning of the term of the present government, when I asked that the operations of the act be brought before the agriculture committee, that suggestion did not meet with the approval of hon. members opposite. Later on, after refusing to have this question referred to that committee, they had a change of heart and it was referred to the committee; but it was never brought before the committee for consideration.

I do not know what hon. members opposite have to fear in bringing this question before the agriculture committee for consideration. Surely in a period of six years changes in the act as it is now constituted have become apparent. The only way members of parliament can establish a sound basis upon which to suggest improvements is by considering the operations in some detail, studying them and then making proposals along those lines. One thing is certain; regardless of whether or not a support price is paid to the producers of eggs this year, producers in the province of Saskatchewan, and to a lesser extent those in the provinces of Alberta and Manitoba, will suffer a greater loss than the producers in any other part of the country, as a result of the operations of the act as it is now constituted. I would like the minister to give us a firm commitment that the operations of this act will be brought before the agricultural committee shortly.

Mr. Mandziuk: Mr. Chairman, I fully realize that the minister expects various requests, in particular from this side of the house, but the relief I am going to ask for is not going to cost the treasury anything. I trust that is some comfort to the minister. I realize that the Minister of Agriculture, a former rancher and cattleman, is interested in preserving our herds, and he is interested—or should be interested—in getting the best price for our beef cattle and dairy products.

The solution to the problem I am going to bring up lies in the hands of the minister of northern affairs, who it will be recalled gave me a negative answer yesterday when I asked him if any consideration was being given to the granting of special permits in the Riding Mountain forest reserve and national park to farmers owing to the fact they are faced with a hay shortage. They are faced with a drought situation, which I hope will not be as bad as it was in 1961. However, it is very serious in the northern portions of my constituency south of Riding Mountain, and even more so north of Riding Mountain in the constituency of Dauphin. I asked the minister of northern affairs whether any consideration was being given to this, and his reply to me was very discouraging, because he said, as reported at page 5237 of Hansard:

> —some practices grew up which were certainly not of the best. We are certainly going to be very careful that this does not arise again.

Before I take issue with that statement, Mr. Chairman, I wish to point out that in 1961 the then minister of northern affairs agreed to grant special permits to farmers who needed it to enable them to take out 10 tons of hay. For the record I may say that 111 such special permits were granted and over 1,000 tons of hay was taken out of the park. I would also put on record that there are regular permittees, about 65 to 75 of them, who have been cutting hay in this reserve for 20 to 30 years past. Their successors on farms occupied by them have also had them. Therefore, those not on the regular list look askance and are critical of so much grass going to waste in this Riding Mountain national reserve. I think that this year it is just as necessary to give full consideration to granting these permits as it was in 1961.

I fully realize that the Minister of Agriculture might have to convince the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources that he should consent to this because the parks are under his direct jurisdiction. But I would appeal to him to do just that for the sake of preserving our herds, because we all know what will be the situation if there is not enough feed. Our farmers will be compelled to reduce their herds and to depress further a market which is already depressed so far as beef cattle are concerned, which I believe would be contrary to the policy of any government and should be contrary to the sort of policy which the Minister of Agriculture is trying to pursue.

The minister of northern affairs was critical of certain practices. Of these I am not aware, because the reserve is in my own constituency and after the hay cutting season was over the hay was taken over by the farmers. According to the superintendent, he said that to the best of his knowledge all permittees obtained their hay and that as far as he knew the whole operation went off very satisfactorily. I cannot understand what grounds the minister of northern affairs has for giving me the negative answer he did. I hope the Minister of Agriculture will give this matter careful consideration because the situation in my constituency is serious, as well as in other portions of northern Manitoba and in the northern sections of Saskatchewan and Alberta. But we have a source of supply. The wildlife people object to it and want to preserve all the hay and grass they can for the elk and the moose. But there is certainly more fodder there than the elk and the moose can consume, because people have been raising cattle and cutting hay there for generations, and still much is going to waste. Therefore, why not give it to those farmers who need it and leave it to the superintendent of the park to grant these permits?

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, I would not want to let this opportunity pass without saying a few words about that item because agriculture in eastern Canada is in such a state of stagnation that it is urgent—

Mr. Grégoire: You did nothing while your party was in office.

Mr. Pigeon: Do not answer. Continue.

Mr. Ricard: —that it is urgent to come back to it.

Mr. Grégoire: It was not that urgent while you were in power.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, someone once said—

[Text]

We have to ask you again, Mr. Chairman, to feed the monkeys peanuts. Perhaps you will be able to keep them quiet. Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture has a few he can send over.

Mr. Knowles: Do peanuts come under item 15?

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: We will send you a bagful.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, once again I say that to spend time on eastern agriculture is to show that we realize our responsibilities, even if in so doing we must take the time of the house.

When 10,000 farmers decide to go and submit their recommendations to a government, the situation is serious and, because of that, it is important to give it all our attention. In my opinion, we should all show our good will and try to do something for the farmer in general and the eastern farmer in particular—

[Mr. Mandziuk.]

Mr. Grégoire: You forgot about them when you were a member of the government.

Mr. Ricard: To consider this matter comprehensively, we must first of all go back a long way and find the causes which gave rise to this problem. I will take a few moments more than I intended to, on account of the interjections coming from the far left corner of the house, to say that the conditions now existing have been developing for a long time.

The Chairman: I take the liberty of interrupting the hon. member at the beginning of his remarks to remind him that we are now considering item 15 and that his comments must naturally be related to that item; he cannot discuss agriculture in general and his comments must be directly related to the item now under study.

Mr. Grégoire: Follow the rules.

Mr. Ricard: I thank you, Mr. Chairman, but I would have given you warmer thanks if you had called to order those good men at the back of the house—

Mr. Grégoire: It is you who is in the wrong.

Mr. Ricard: —they are the ones who make trouble. I would have preferred speaking before noon rather than now, but as I wanted to be better prepared to make my remarks, I chose to wait until this afternoon in order to relate them more especially to the milk and butter surpluses we have at the present time and which come under the vote under consideration.

However, as I abide by the rules and as I also want to comply with your instructions, Mr. Chairman, I come back at once to my subject, without further ado, to make comparisons—

Mr. Grégoire: There is nothing to compare; you did nothing.

[Text]

Mr. Ricard: Give the monkey another peanut.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Fine, we will send you some peanuts.

Mr. Choquette: Up until now you have said nothing about item 15.

Mr. Ricard: For the information of my hon. friend from Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette), we are now discussing price stabilization, and that comes precisely under this item. If he thought that my remarks were irrelevant, it was because he was not following the discussion. If he paid closer attention, perhaps he would get to understand what we are talking about.

Mr. Chairman, I should now like to come back once again to certain election promises to remind the house that the Liberal party has pledged itself to provide assistance through crop insurance and to create new sources of income for farmers.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Shefford has raised a point of order.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is out of order, and I beg of you to remind him that he should limit his remarks to item 15.

Mr. Ricard: I would ask you, Mr. Chairman, to excuse the hon. member. Those people are irresponsible, and we must expect from them interruptions that make as little sense as the ones we have just heard. However, as the other members facing us appear more intelligent and reasonable than the "Caouettistes", I shall continue my remarks for their benefit.

I see, on this page, that the Liberal party had promised to improve the support price system. Since we are now discussing more particularly this item, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture what he is waiting for to bring about those improvements which farmers, and especially Quebec farmers, are looking forward to?

Mr. Grégoire: Why did you not look after them yourselves when you were in power?

Mr. Ricard: I should also like to ask the Minister of Agriculture why, for example, he has lowered by $11 million or almost $12 million the dairy producers' income, especially in eastern Canada.

As you remember, Mr. Chairman, the Agricultural Stabilization Act was implemented by the Conservative government and proved highly beneficial to eastern farmers.

For the information of the house, I should like to recall that from 1959-60 up to now, under the Agricultural Stabilization Act, Quebec farmers were paid in subsidies the amount of $4,731,119; in 1960-61; $5,016,759; in 1961-62, $5,658,139; in 1962-63, $5,408,000, for a total of $21 million. The Minister of Agriculture often rises in the house to state that the price of milk has increased by 10 cents per cwt.; that the price of all products under the Agricultural Stabilization Act is ever improving.

I should like to ask the minister to check, for instance, the price of milk in the province of Quebec for December 1962. It was then $4.18 per hundred pounds, while a year after, that is in December 1963, it was only $4.19 according to the figures of the dominion bureau of statistics. This means an increase of only 1 cent.

This is a far cry from the 10 cents or even 15 cents mentioned more than once by the minister. I do not say that he knowingly wanted to mislead the house, but he probably referred to the wrong series of prices, he was mistaken in his comparisons because he took the price of milk when we came into office instead of the price of milk when we came out of office.

Mr. Chairman, I could give several examples of the lack of leadership on the part of this government because they do not have the required programs to fulfil their election commitments.

I have here an item from the newspaper Le Soleil of October 12, 1963. As you know, Mr. Chairman, due to the lack of planning in the post-war years, we piled up stocks of butter and dairy products which gave us considerable trouble and for which we had a hard time finding the necessary markets. Canada sold stocks of butter to Great Britain twice. The item I mentioned a few months ago deals more especially with the marketing of our dairy products. Here is what it says:

> After selling huge quantities of grain to China, the Soviet union, Japan and other countries, the Canadian government has just sold 5½ million pounds of butter to the United Kingdom—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ricard: I am glad to see that my hon. friend from Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Drouin) applauds, for I would now ask him to compare the sale to England in 1959 and the one I just mentioned. For this sale of 1959, I refer to the item in Le Soleil which I just quoted.

> In 1959, Canada sold 13 million pounds of butter to Great Britain where there was also a shortage of that commodity.

That is far more than 5 million pounds.

> The price then was 56 cents per pound.
> That is far better than 25 cents. The Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Harry Hays, stated that surpluses of butter and butter oil had to be marketed even if we had to sell at a sacrifice.

I ask my hon. friends opposite, and more particularly the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes, which of those two transactions was the most profitable to Canada. Was it the one which provided for the marketing of 5 millions pounds of butter at 25 cents per pound under a Liberal government, or was it the one which took 5 million pounds of butter out of the Canadian market at a price of 56 cents per pound?

Mr. Drouin: Does the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot want an answer immediately?

Mr. Ricard: If you can see the difference, I would be very happy.

Mr. Drouin: I should like to point out that the value of a businessman or a politician or a minister is not judged from one transaction, but rather from his general administration.

Now, the present Minister of Agriculture deserves congratulations in that regard because he proved to be a peerless administrator in view of his success in marketing our surpluses.

Mr. Ricard: If I wished to follow my hon. friend on the grounds where he invited me, I would tell him that if we succeeded to market grain, it is due to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) who set out marketing procedures which were followed by his successor now sitting on the treasury benches.

Mr. Chairman, I should also draw the attention of the house to the fact that, during the last election campaign, our friends opposite promised free milk distribution in our schools. Some time ago I mentioned this problem in the house, saying that I very much doubted that the Liberals intended to keep that promise at the time it was made. Yesterday I learned that they have absolutely no intention of having this free milk distribution in our schools. I heard from the very lips of the Minister of Agriculture the following statement which can be found on page 5239 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I have discussed this with all the ministers of agriculture in Canada. We have discussed the matter with many of the people who are interested, but many of the ministers think this is a program which, as I suggested before, due to the state of the economy we should wait a little while before pursuing any further.

Mr. Chairman, the Liberals made promises which they could not possibly keep, just to secure some votes.

I want to conclude—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: You did not say anything.

[Mr. Ricard.]

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, as my hon. friends seems to appreciate my remarks so much, I shall say a few more words.

Mr. Chairman, I would just like to show you how the catholic farmers' union feels about the present Minister of Agriculture, according to Le Devoir—

The Chairman: Naturally, I do not know what is to be found in the article referred to by the hon. member, but I would remind him once again that the comments he is making now must relate directly to the item before us.

Mr. Ricard: The clipping I was referring to, Mr. Chairman, deals especially with milk products. But since you have read my mind, I shall simply refrain from quoting from it. It does seem to me, however, that you are showing quite a bit of zeal in calling me to order when I am still abiding by the rules. I cannot do otherwise than to draw the matter to your attention.

I would like to ask the minister why, as Minister of Agriculture, he takes pleasure in reducing the income of the eastern farmers who devote themselves especially to the dairy industry. For instance, why did he reduce the subsidy on butter from 14½ cents to 13¾ cents per pound? Why has he allowed a reduction of 1 cent per pound to the butter producer? Why has he allowed an increase of 1 cent per pound in the price of butter to the consumer? Finally, why has he saved $12 million at the expense of the eastern farmers?

Mr. Chairman, is going out of one's way to reduce the farmers' income helping the farmers?

I warn the Minister of Agriculture and the other members of the cabinet that if they do not do what they should to protect eastern agriculture, the farmers will march on Ottawa, they will submit their claims to Ottawa, because they want the assistance which has been promised to them, they want the Minister of Agriculture to consider their problems in order to help them, and not to whittle down the income to which they are entitled.

[Text]

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Chairman, it was my intention to speak on vote No. 15 and to deal particularly with supplementary payments pertaining to the sale of eggs and hogs under the stabilization board. My colleague the hon. member for Rosthern, has dealt with this matter but I should like to mention one thing that is of great concern to the producers of eggs and hogs in the west, the amendment of the Agricultural Stabilization Act so that these payments will be made on a regional and also a semi-annual basis. We in the west have never received any deficiency payments in this regard and I do not think we will in the future unless something is done.

My remarks will pertain mostly to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act inasmuch as it will be made use of a great deal on the prairies this year, particularly in the area which at the present time is severely affected by drought conditions. I refer to the north central and northwest parts of Saskatchewan which at the present time are almost dried out. In these areas approximately 40 per cent of all the wheat planted in Saskatchewan is grown and approximately 60 per cent of all the oats and barley crops, and if we take this into consideration we can realize the severe conditions that the farmers are facing at the present time. The government has said that measures will be taken to alleviate the serious situation but in my opinion it is a case of too late and too little.

I think it came too little and too late—too late to the extent that had the minister taken into consideration the warnings given by the Leader of the Opposition, myself and some others, a number of the farmers would not be put in a position of having to sell some of their livestock. I say too little, because although some of the cattle will be put on community pastures the number of cattle involved in that is very small.

I would like to direct the minister's attention to the need for more community pastures, to be established under ARDA or other legislation. There are huge areas that could be converted into community pastures where farmers could place their cattle if in future they are faced with these drought conditions.

The situation is going to be very serious and many farmers will not have hay or other feed for their cattle. In these circumstances arrangements could be made to have the crops cut for hay before they are ready to be harvested, and provision should be made to have the areas in which this is done made eligible for payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Further, if the situation does not improve, measures should be taken to prevent feed from being exported out of the province so that it will be available to farmers during the winter period.

Yesterday the minister stated that he had seen these areas and therefore I shall not elaborate on this point. However, I would like to see him keep in close touch with the Saskatchewan department of agriculture and give all the attention he can to the situation.

Mr. McBain: Early in the session the minister announced a support or floor price of 47 cents a pound on flue cured tobacco. When the 1963 crop was sold the average price realized was 46.84 cents per pound, and I ask when will the support price be paid to these producers and whether the amount will be .16 cent per pound? Will it be paid to each individual grower or to the Ontario marketing board? If my figure of .16 cent per pound is correct this is going to mean less than $300,000, and this seems quite a small amount considering that the crop produces upwards of $400 million for the treasury through all forms of taxation. Further, will the flue cured tobacco growers in Quebec come under this support price?

Mr. Hays: With regard to the tobacco for which we provided the 47 cents support price, we have heard from the flue cured tobacco people and the average price for this tobacco was 49 cents a pound. In these circumstances there will be no deficiency payment.

Mr. Hamilton: I do not want to hold up this item too long as I wish to see the estimates go through this afternoon, and I shall do everything I can to expedite them. First, I want to thank the minister for having provided me with a copy of the increases and decreases in each vote because this has saved a good deal of time on asking questions.

The matter I want to speak about is one I raised in my opening remarks, namely that I am very deeply concerned about the dairy industry. I asked what inducements the minister was giving to the provincial governments and the farm organizations to encourage them to get together and form a single dairy organization. The reason I mentioned inducements was that we, as responsible members of parliament, want to take the load off the taxpayer that the stabilization act puts on him at present.

If you study the financial figures under the stabilization act you will find that for some years we support one industry and then for several years it will disappear as one of the items. The ultimate aim of the act should be not to have to pay anything, because when you don't have to pay anything it means every segment of the industry is able to look after itself.

At the moment the dairy industry is the sore spot and I am going to put forward, as briefly as I can, one or two suggestions which I hope the minister might take under consideration, if not for discussion at least to be aware that they should be considered. I make these suggestions based on the fact that in my judgment the dairy industry, both at the producer level and at the processing level, is oriented toward the domestic market.

During the history of Canada the domestic market has been able to absorb the production from our dairy farms but in recent years, due to the rapid growth of technology and to the fact that more farmers wanted to raise their methods of living, we have a situation now when the productive capacity of our dairy farms is much greater than the Canadian market can absorb.

This problem can be met in two main directions. One is to move in with policies to encourage farmers at the marginal end of the scale in the dairy industry to move into other occupations or other types of farming. That is one road, and the other is to try and find, as was suggested by one of the hon. members to my left, an outlet for this production outside the country. The Canadian dairy industry and government officials tend to throw up their hands at the suggestion of finding relief in foreign markets. The reason for this is easily apparent. Price levels in Canada, the United States and most of the industrial countries of the world are so high for dairy products that we are not competitive with countries like New Zealand and Denmark which have a low cost type of product.

Because of this discrepancy in the price levels, and because of the advantages which efficient producers in Denmark and New Zealand enjoy and which we have not got, there is a tendency to say we cannot do anything about our dairy export markets. All we see ourselves doing is to give away our surpluses which are in storage at cut rate prices and let some individuals peddle them where they can with a depressing effect on world prices to the detriment of our good friends in Denmark and in New Zealand who are completely dependant on this type of market.

I rise at this time to challenge this type of thinking. I think that just because we are in a difficult situation with a price structure on the dairy side so different from the price structure of world market levels there is no need for despair. I think there are solutions. These solutions will not be easy but I think they can be reached not only in terms of our taking our industry in Canada outside into the markets of the world, but also by our realizing that at least a score of other countries are surplus in dairy products, and work with them because their problem is the same. In other words, a solution to the dairy problem will not be reached only by agricultural support policies in this country. All you can do is twist and turn within the limits of the Canadian market, and if the present productive capacity of our dairy farms is producing 6 or 7 per cent above the demand, then the agricultural prices stabilization board works under great difficulty. But we might well realize the truth, that is that there are over a billion people in the world who desperately need protein products. I say "over a billion people" because I do not include the people of China. In my opinion the Chinese have been able to substitute protein derived from vegetables. But in the main the world demands proteins today from fish, from dairy products and from livestock products. The test is of course the difference in price, and the fact that in most of the countries where the need is so great they lack the ability to store these products and they do not have the ability to pay for them. These are the difficulties.

I would like to put forward some remarks or suggestions I made on September 17 last to a meeting at Stevens Point, Wisconsin to the creameries association. At that time there was not too much publicity attached to these remarks because other things were in the news. I was a little disappointed because I thought the time was right to move with our friends to the south on this point. Before I go into those remarks let me repeat that the problem of the dairy industry in the United States is almost identical with our own problem here. Their surplus runs at about 8 per cent as compared with 6 percent or 7 per cent here. They have a number of dairy farmers at the top level of efficiency who are doing well, but the great majority of their dairy farmers are in the same predicament as are the great majority of ours.

My suggestions to these men in the agriculture business were as follows: first, since the demand is mainly for protein food, that the dairy industry, including agri-business which handles dairy products, accept the possibility that there is a tremendous opportunity for expansion in the export market for dairy products that can satisfy the requirements of this new type of market. That is the first suggestion. Psychologically we should face the fact that if a billion people are hungry, we have the ability to produce and can get over the difficulties. That is the first suggestion: accept that philosophy. The second suggestion is that agri-business in North America join forces for a combined program of development of new markets for farm produce. Why did I put that suggestion in? When you look at the businesses which handle and dispose of the products of American farms both here and in the United States, they are almost always the same businesses. Whether it is Swift here or in the United States, it is the same firm. They are working on this philosophy that the only market available for United States or Canadian farm products is in the United States or Canada. I say this philosophy is wrong in the year 1964 and we should ask this agri-business to accept some responsibility in helping to meet this situation.

The third suggestion I made was that government research in products suitable for handling, shipping, and storing for warm countries be accelerated. Already the United States department of agriculture has done a tremendous amount of work in this field. Already, here in Canada the department has done very good work in learning how to dry, store and handle varieties of different products. Our research and development in this respect are among the best in the world. I am simply suggesting in my third proposal that governments be encouraged to keep up this work and turn the results over to agri-business. As a matter of fact, at the present time, in my opinion governments are ahead of business in this research work, and agri-business in the United States and in Canada which for the most part is composed of the same firms, is delinquent in not making the best use of this research work which is available, so as to take Canadian and United States products to lands where they are needed at prices which the people can afford. I make that charge after due consideration.

The fourth recommendation I made was that the present efforts of the governments of Canada and the United States to achieve international commodity agreements be given increased impetus by the two governments calling a meeting of ministers of the dairy surplus countries, to help clear away the difficulties that are holding up present negotiations under the United Nations.

There are approximately 24 nations in the world which have surpluses of dairy products. Every one has the same problem as Canada. Discussions have been going on in the United Nations for a dairy commodity agreement. These discussions always founder on the point that these 20-odd nations have a higher price level domestically than the world price. I suggest this is not good enough. This type of price level can be met by international commodity agreement which makes allowances in the form of quotas, and price levels within those quotas, to provide for the maintenance of a price which is necessary in our situation in Canada, the United States, Holland, the Scandinavian countries, Germany, and so on to give their producers fair returns. We should then be able to give to the world the advantage of our tremendous technology and ability to produce these protein products on our dairy farms, and allow these people in newly developing countries some chance of access to them.

I could examine this a little further by saying that in trying to get an international commodity agreement Canada should always be first in the fight to help those newly developing nations get international commodity agreements for the products they sell. I hold those who are now in office and who are sitting on the treasury benches at the present time responsible for a lack of really gutty leadership on this question of international commodity agreements. Too easily did they stand aside and see the sugar agreement go down. If we had had an international sugar agreement fixing, say, 5 to 8 cents a pound for sugar at wholesale price levels we would be doubling the income of the people who produce sugar across the world, as compared with what they have received in the last 25 years without markedly increasing costs at home. In a favourable position of that kind they might well be able to buy from us the goods they need so desperately. So when it is said: We cannot make an agreement now because the price is too high, my answer is this—when the price is high is the time to start bargaining; if you start by assuming that you intend to give these people a fair price for their product they, in turn, will be able to buy from us, thus taking a load off the shoulders of the taxpayer at home in connection with price support.

My fifth suggestion—I am not in the government now but I keep picking away at these problems—my fifth suggestion was that agri-business examine the multilateral trading techniques of the big international grain selling organizations to decide whether these companies could handle dairy products, or that similar types of organizations be set up for dairy products. I had in mind the tremendous productive capacity of the dairy industry in Canada and the United States and was wondering whether serious thought had ever been given by our producers to selling their goods abroad by using techniques which have been so successful in other fields, with what help the government can give.

I am suggesting we had better take a hard look at those international grain companies that are doing such a wonderful job for us today by selling the production of the wheat farms of the world. Many people think the wheat board sells Canadian wheat. Every time I have raised this question their eyebrows have gone up about an inch. Under the law the wheat board has the monopoly power to sell all the grain from western Canadian farms. But to be technically accurate, they turn that monopoly right over to agents of the board; so that the great bulk of Canadian grain is not actually sold by the Canadian wheat board at all—they simply give an agent a licence to sell the grain.

So there has developed in the grain marketing area of the world one of the most efficient operations the world has ever seen. There are four main international companies, Bunge, with headquarters in Rio de Janeiro; Cargill, with headquarters in Minneapolis; Continental, with headquarters in New York; and Dreyfus, with headquarters in Paris. These four great international grain companies not only handle wheat but any other type of cereal product. Why should they not, with all their vast machinery and know-how about the marketing opportunities for small amounts of 500 bushels of wheat today, or 5 million bushels tomorrow, consummate these sales in matters of seconds with their electronic communications apparatus? Why should they not consider taking over other products, such as butter oil? Why should they not take over anything that can be stored or shipped; anything that can be graded and put into storage? Everybody in this organization knows how much is available, at what price, and what grade. This type of organization has been developed in selling grain all over the world, and why cannot this knowledge be put to use to help the dairy industry?

If these international grain companies are already big enough in their own operations and do not want to go into other products, I think government leadership is necessary. The situation demands that we ask the dairy processors, who are so good and efficient, to handle our dairy products within Canada and the United States and to take on the big responsibility of helping our dairy industry. Government leadership should be provided to encourage them to get off their nice, plush seats and sell the products off the dairy farms of Canada and the United States all over the world. The reason I put these two countries together is that most of their dairy products are handled by the same companies.

The sixth suggestion I will leave for the moment because it would take too long to explain. I am sorry that I am rushing through these remarks, Mr. Chairman, but I want to help the minister get his estimates through. I want to conclude my remarks by saying that as I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska today I wondered how many in this house realized he was pioneering a new proposal in connection with the agricultural prices support board. He was bringing into the dairy industry a selective type of support, and he suggested that supports should be concentrated into the pockets of those who need them the most. The hon. member suggested, as I heard his speech through the translation system, that farmers producing up to 100,000 pounds of milk a year should be given the support of the agricultural prices support board; those that produced above that amount were big enough to get up on their own feet and find their own opportunities, which was not the case with the man whose production falls below this amount.

I do not know whether that suggestion will be workable, but I think it is the type of philosophy that was in the minds of the people who established the agricultural prices stabilization board, and his suggestion should be given serious consideration. This is the type of policy that we intend, when we take over the treasury benches, to put into effect. I suggest, further, that knowing the cost of producing milk, any government that does not aim to give producers of milk in every part of Canada a minimum price of $3.50 a hundred is not being fair to that segment of the Canadian people. We ask the provincial governments of this country to enact minimum wage laws providing a minimum wage of $1 an hour in most provinces. As the member for Nicolet-Yamaska made clear in the figures he quoted, even the man who produces 100,000 pounds—the maximum allowable under his suggestion—would only be guaranteed a gross income of $3,500 a year; and that would only mean a net income of about $1,500. Surely this is a right that farmers should expect in this country. I would say that not only will the Conservative party support that type of philosophy but we would like to move in this direction into other areas of our economy, such as the poorer areas of our cities. I cannot discuss this question here, but we would like to do the same thing with regard to other areas of our economy.

I would like to compliment the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska for putting that proposal forward. I know the many hours of study he has put into this question and into the mathematics of what it will cost. With the knowledge I have of what he has done, I am prepared to support his proposal and go further and say that I think our target should be $3.50 a hundred for the production of milk in Canada, as a minimum.

I have said what I wanted to say, Mr. Chairman. There was another subject I intended to deal with, but I will just mention it briefly. I refer to the attitude of helplessness that comes over ministers at times when difficulties are put before them. We are now told that a milk program for our schools is impossible; that the provincial ministers do not think it is economic. This raises the whole question of dominion-provincial relations in this country. One of the questions I raised the other day in the house was as to whether the province of Quebec is going to expand its shared cost program under ARDA. The minister replied yes, that that is the type of thing that is a joint, constitutional responsibility of both the federal and provincial governments. I would suggest that this attitude should be spread; that each one of those joint sharing programs should be looked at by itself. If in the case of ARDA it is good to expand it, fine. But here we are dealing with a subject that is as equally important as the ARDA concept, namely the dairy support program. I would suggest that if you take the initiative away from the federal government to make proposals in connection with dairy support, the dairy problems in this country will never be solved. I say this because it is so easy for provincial ministers to slip back into the woodwork and disappear when this subject is raised. They do this because it is a tough subject. It is so easy for them to become chameleons and fit into any background.

I think the job of the federal minister is to bring these reluctant provincial ministers forward and say to them, "Sixty per cent of the farm population of your province is in dire need. We have to work together on this question". Let all the provincial treasurers and the Minister of Finance at Ottawa go back into the woodwork for a while. These are vital problems. If the Minister of Agriculture of Canada wants to make a name for himself and solve these problems of the dairy industry, he should bring these reluctant provincial ministers out into the open and tell them they have to share with him the responsibility of assisting this industry. They should go to the provincial governments and farm organizations and say, "We are prepared to help you this way, and this way, and this way, financially. But you have the constitutional power in many of these things, and therefore you must co-operate".

I think the farmers want an end to all this legal hair-splitting with regard to whose responsibility it is; they simply want action. One of the heaviest drains on the taxpayers of Canada is item 15 and the supplementaries that go along with it. I simply point out, Mr. Chairman, that the farmer does not want to bring his problems into this house and put heavier loads on the taxpayers under item 15; he wants a chance to solve his problems by his own efforts. But he has to have the leadership not only of the federal minister but of the provincial ministers. I do not know how far I will get in making these proposals but I do know that I intend to keep working for them.

Mr. Cardiff: I do not intend to hold up the committee because I should like to see this estimate passed, but I do want to say a few words on administration. I have been very patient with the minister ever since he took over his portfolio. One could not expect a minister after years of being so conservative to be very liberal in this short space of time. And he has not been getting any help from his colleagues, which is very necessary if he intends to do anything or to get anywhere. I have worked with his officials and I find them fine fellows to work with, but they have to have direction from the government and they cannot go ahead without direction. The minister is not giving them sufficient direction to do the things we expect him to do.

To prove my point I should like to show you how interested is the Liberal government in agriculture. We have an agricultural committee of which I have been a member for the last 24 years. The other day we sat for 35 minutes before we could get a quorum. Half of the Conservative members were ready to proceed, but we waited 35 minutes for a quorum. Then at the best we had only four Liberals sitting on the committee. The meeting was called for 9.30 and we sat there until 12.30 and at no time were more than four Liberal members present. So, Mr. Chairman, you cannot expect the minister to do everything for the country when he has no backing from his own side of the house.

I would suggest to those Liberal members of the agriculture committee that if they do not understand anything about agriculture let them go to the committee where they will find out a few things. It is essential this committee have a quorum, and I do not think it is fair to its members to have to sit there for 35 minutes—sometimes it is 40 minutes —waiting for a quorum.

Mr. Moreau: Would the hon. member permit a question. In the banking and commerce committee the last time it met there was only one Conservative there, who showed up for about 10 minutes.

Mr. Cardiff: Since the hon. member raises that, yesterday a meeting of the public accounts was called. It is chaired by a Conservative to make it non-political. We sat there for 35 minutes and only one Grit came along. Eventually we adjourned and did not have a meeting at all. These officials who appear are called to give the committee guidance, yet hon. members opposite do not think it important enough to attend. I have no intention of criticizing the minister on these estimates; we want to get them through. I only rose in my place to try and help him as much as I can, if he will try to help himself.

Item agreed to.

Health of animals—

40. Administration, operation and maintenance including Canada's fee for membership in the office international des epizooties, and authority, notwithstanding the Financial Administration Act, to spend revenue received during the year from packers requiring special services, $11,954,900.

Mr. Jorgenson: Mr. Chairman, I did not want to take up too much time on this item but there is one matter I want to mention in connection with the operation of the health of animals division. I do not mean this to be a criticism of the officials of the branch of this department; Dr. Wells and his staff are doing a very commendable job of carrying out the policies of the administration of this department. However, during the last year a matter was drawn to my attention which I should like to raise with the minister at this time. It is in connection with poultry evisceration stations and the inspection of poultry processed through these evisceration stations.

I note from a reply to a question which I placed on the order paper on October 1 last that the percentages of the number of condemned birds going through these plants is increasing. Logically it is expected that this would be the case if the number of birds being processed was increasing as well. However, I find that the number of condemned birds is increasing out of proportion to the increase in the number of birds being processed.

On investigating I discovered that some of the farmers in my area are disturbed about this matter. The situation is simply that they feel they own the birds. They have no contract for sale when the birds are brought into the evisceration plant, yet in some cases a fairly substantial percentage of these birds are condemned and are simply taken out of the farmers' hands. These farmers have paid for the cost of raising the birds, and arbitrarily they are being taken away from them and sent to the rendering plants. In some cases I understand the evisceration plants are selling the birds to the rendering plants at a profit, the farmer receiving nothing.

I am fully conversant with the problem of the health of animals division in ensuring that the consuming public are supplied with high quality meat. I will not go into details about this matter because I have had experience in this field, but here is a principle which should be looked into. I asked the minister whether he would direct his officials to give attention to this particular problem so as to ensure that, in cases where a farmer feels he has been unduly penalized as a result of a large number of his birds being condemned and taken away from him and sold by the evisceration plant at a profit, there should be some return given to the farmer for these birds. I was wondering whether the minister could comment on that or would look into the matter for me.

Mr. Hays: Mr. Chairman, I would be very glad to look into this; and I should like to speak to the hon. member privately with regard to the locations where these problems exist.

Item agreed to.

Land rehabilitation, irrigation and water storage projects—

65. Payments in respect of projects and programs under the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act, and payments to provinces pursuant to agreements entered into under that act, $12,000,000.

Mr. Doucett: Mr. Chairman, before this vote passes the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale asked a question in connection with deficiency payments and whether the minister would be making an interim payment on eggs. Would the minister care to comment on that?

Mr. Hays: Mr. Chairman, I do not think this will be necessary because the period ends at the end of September.

Mr. Cardiff: Eggs have even been running at 30 cents a dozen for a long time. They have even been down to 28 cents and may have been lower than that. I expect they are even lower in Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

Mr. Hays: We certainly expect that there will be a deficiency payment paid; there must be no question of that.

Mr. Doucett: The point is, when will they get paid?

Mr. Hays: I think the year period ends on September 30. We will put out the payments as soon afterwards as possible.

Mr. Hamilton: In view of the fact that this item concerns ARDA and there has been a split in the duties of the Minister of Agriculture, and a new department is going to be formed relating to ARDA and forestry, I wonder if we could get some sort of statement of philosophy from the new minister who is going to be looking after ARDA and forestry? What does he intend to do with this legislation? I would think a statement could be made in four or five minutes. We would not expect him to make a lengthy statement, but let us hear what his thinking is on ARDA in a general way.

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Chairman, as members of the house know, government order No. 60 will be called this fall to introduce the new department of forestry and rural development. I then hope, at the resolution stage, to make a lengthy declaration on ARDA, rural development and the conditions in rural areas. I shall be pleased, however, to make a few remarks today on how the program is working and what we intend to do with the program.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle will recall with great pleasure that he had the honour of introducing this legislation into the House of Commons. As I have said here in the house and outside, it was probably one of the best pieces of legislation the previous government introduced. I have commended him for this. This is a joint federal-provincial program which is, in a way, in the experimental stage. It has been going on for three years. We have projects in all the provinces of Canada. We have signed general agreements and special agreements with all the provinces. I have announced that I hope at the end of August or early September, to call a federal-provincial conference of the ministers responsible for ARDA to review the existing agreements, with a view to signing new agreements that would begin on April 1, 1965 for a number of years.

I have been visiting all the provinces of Canada and discussing all the problems related to ARDA with the ministers. There is a general consensus that this is an excellent program and there is a great future for it. My basic philosophy on ARDA is rather simple. If I could express it in a few words, I would say that I feel this law is entirely directed toward the low income people, the low income regions in rural areas. We have to do everything we can to eliminate poverty in the rural areas. It is not only an agricultural program, but it is a program to look after all resources in the rural areas—agriculture, forestry, fishing, tourism, small industries—and we have to devise ways and means of improving the living conditions of the people in the rural areas, people who have a right to as good a living as the people in urban areas.

This will mean new methods of co-ordinating the services of provincial governments and the federal government, co-ordination at the regional level and at the national level, by means of new experiments in government. It is for this reason the meeting we will have this fall to review the agreements is so important. We are having meetings with the province of Quebec about this rural development of the region of the lower St. Lawrence, about which I have talked in the house and about which members of the house received a folder last week giving them much information. I am very proud to be responsible for the implementation of this law which to me is a wonderful piece of legislation and I hope members will support it as they have supported it in the past.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I noticed and also read in the newspapers that the Quebec regions where ARDA will be applied are as follows: Gaspé, Îles-de-la-Madeleine, represented by the minister, and Abitibi, represented by hon. Mr. Courcy, minister of agriculture in the Quebec government. I have no objection to the fact that those regions, which need help, will benefit from ARDA and to the fact that the two ministers concerned try to help their own people first. I do not have any objection to that, but I would not like the authorities concerned to show any discrimination in the application of that act.

The areas represented by the members of the government should not be the only ones to benefit under the ARDA program; others also need assistance, such as the regions of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm and Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière, for example, or the one represented by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey), and others.

I should like to ask the minister on what basis he selects the areas which are to benefit under the ARDA program? Why have we neglected to apply the act to the counties of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm and Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière where a large part of the population needs as much assistance, under this program, as the region of Îles-de-la-Madeleine or that represented by the Quebec minister of agriculture?

As I said before, I have no objection if those areas benefit from it. But other areas represented by members not on the government side, surely have the right to see that their people also benefit from that legislation.

The area which I represent, namely Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm—especially the northern part of the Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm riding—and also the Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière area are faced with serious economic problems. There is in those areas of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm and Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudiére, a well organized economic planning board which, for some months, has attempted to have a portion of that area come under ARDA.

I wonder why the minister declines to put that area as well as some other areas such as that of Brome-Missisquoi, or that part of the province, under ARDA.

I should be very pleased if the minister would tell the house on what basis he chose the areas where ARDA is to be applied. Is it a political criterion? He should tell us. If it is an economic criterion, he should tell us also.

I am astonished to see that the first areas where ARDA is applied are those areas represented by the two ministers I have mentioned above, the federal Minister of Forestry and the minister of agriculture for Quebec.

Moreover, Mr. Chairman, I must say this: Mr. Courcy, minister of agriculture in the Quebec government, attacked me unfairly in the Quebec legislature during the present session. He said that the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, when he was parliamentary secretary to the minister of agriculture, tried to mislead the farmers by telling them: "Submit your accounts to the government and they will be paid."

Mr. Chairman, I challenge the provincial minister of agriculture to prove this statement. I never said such a thing. Therefore I ask the provincial minister of agriculture to show no discrimination in the selection of areas for the application of ARDA and to help equally the areas not represented by government members.

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Chairman, I hope that my hon. friend will believe me when I say that I had nothing to do with the selection of the nine areas of the lower St. Lawrence and Abitibi which would benefit from the ARDA program in the province of Quebec.

This procedure began last year when I was not yet a minister, as my hon. friend knows. Moreover, it is the provincial minister of agriculture who undertakes to propose to the federal government the development of projects under ARDA. The federal government has nothing to do with the selection of development areas or still with the submission of practical projects of drainage, soil conservation or community pastures.

I think my hon. friend is somewhat confused. At present, five groups of projects are foreseen under ARDA and so far as the province of Quebec is concerned, hon. Mr. Courcy stated at Mont Joli, last Saturday, that for some time there will be only two rural development areas, namely the Lower St. Lawrence and Gaspe area and the Abitibi area. I believe I pointed that out to my hon. friend yesterday. Those two areas were designated exclusively on the basis of economic considerations and the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) is familiar enough with the province of Quebec to know that, in those rural areas, the level of income of many families is the lowest in the province. That is why the provincial government decided to develop first of all these two areas. The fact that Mr. Courcy is member for Abitibi and that the present speaker is member for the constituency of les Îles-de-la-Madeleine is irrelevant for, in my case, this happened long before my appointment.

This does not mean that because there are only two designated areas, no other projects will be submitted by the province of Quebec; in fact, the reverse is true. Up to now, we had more than 117 projects submitted by the province of Quebec, representing a total amount of $6 million. Moreover, other projects are under study; projects for the province of Quebec concern drainage and very few have anything to do with development programs such as I have just mentioned. I wish my hon. friend knew there is no limitation, except in the designation of areas.

The Joliette area, and the other areas in need of ARDA, will continue to benefit from it, but the initiative rests with the provincial government. It is not for the federal government to decide what should be done. According to the terms of the agreement between the federal government and the provincial governments, it belongs to the provinces to take the initiative, since they are responsible for the administration of ARDA.

My hon. friend should believe when I declared that neither hon. Mr. Courcy nor myself interfered to obtain the designation of the areas we represent.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I would like to add a few words to what the minister has said—

The Chairman: May I suggest to the hon. member that other hon. members have expressed the wish to speak at five o'clock, especially the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Kindt).

Mr. Pigeon: I merely want to point out that I have been very polite in my remarks and that the incomprehensible interruptions of the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Prud'homme), who does not know anything about agriculture—I would suggest that he should learn his agricultural catechism and show more dignity in the house—are quite unwelcome.

[Text]

The Chairman: The hon. member for Macleod.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words concerning ARDA to the new Minister of Forestry who is in charge of administering the program. We are not satisfied with the number of projects that have been started in western Canada, particularly in Alberta and above all in the southern part of Alberta. I read the report prepared for the minister's office and to me it connotes that there is nothing but a lot of sidetracking going on. In other words, what has been done in most cases is to sidetrack the ARDA program and, if possible, shift matters to the P.F.R.A. administration which is under the Minister of Agriculture.

Why has scarcely nothing taken place? Because the federal government will be expected to pay the full shot under P.F.R.A. whereas under the ARDA program it would be a co-operative venture with a sharing of costs with the provinces and local governments. There is something very seriously wrong with the set-up, with the action we are getting and the number of projects that are being undertaken. I say to the minister that even with all the projects he has okayed he has not scratched the surface. This inaction should be corrected. He must learn that he cannot sit in a law office in Montreal and expect to get results under this program by leaving all of the initiative to the provinces.

I know that agreements of understanding have been reached with the provinces, as the minister has just indicated, but the present situation was not contemplated when the house passed the act. There was supposed to be aggressive initiative on the part of the minister in charge of administering ARDA. It is one act which, if properly administered, could do more to develop this country than any other law on the statute books of Canada.

The minister has said that he believes it is a good act. Let me tell him that it is not being administered properly. I suggest to him that he take another look at the situation. I suggest that he clear up some of the difficulties, some of the strife between P.F.R.A. and ARDA and do so right in the provinces so that we will get some action in those dry areas of western Canada along the Rocky mountains which are begging and hoping to have surveys made and an active program implemented under ARDA.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I will take only a couple of minutes to say that I was very pleased with the minister's brief statement with respect to rural rehabilitation and to note in his statement that there is a continuity of spirit and philosophy with respect to rural rehabilitation. I must say I thought it was sporting of him to give credit to the former minister for having introduced this very useful legislation, which has a great potential if we can get co-operation among the federal government, the provinces and the local people. I think the foundation of success for this program lies in co-operation among all levels of government, the organizations involved and the people themselves. This group will look forward to the introduction of the legislation that the minister mentioned and to his statement with respect to the policy in connection with the further expansion of this program.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I have a few more questions to ask. I can assure the minister that if he agrees to postpone the consideration of his estimates till the next sitting, the vote will be passed in half an hour or three quarters of an hour. However, the questions I want to ask are very important, because they concern public interest as well as the Canadian economy.

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Chairman, if the house agreed, the discussion might be extended for a few minutes.

[Text]

The Chairman: Is that agreed? The suggestion is being made that we continue in committee.

Mr. Lambert: You will have to follow the rules in order to do that.

The Chairman: Perhaps the suggestion should be made in the house rather than in committee.

Progress reported.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we could continue with the estimates for a few moments with the expectation that they would pass?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

65. Payments in respect of projects and programs under the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act, and payments to provinces pursuant to agreements entered into under that act, $12,000,000.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, if I had not been interrupted so often a while ago, I am convinced that we would have made more progress and that the vote under consideration would have been passed.

When the Minister of Forestry was an ordinary member, he approached the Quebec authorities—and I do not criticize him for that—in order that the area of Îles-de-la-Madeleine might be included in the ARDA program, and I commend him for this initiative.

I know for a fact that the economic council for the riding of Montcalm was one of the first public bodies of the country, more especially in the province of Quebec, to make strong representations to the federal Department of Agriculture so that that area of our province might come under ARDA. However, I wonder why the provincial minister of agriculture, whose responsibilities it is to select the areas, ignored the Montcalm riding which surely deserves careful attention.

I know also that the minister is on excellent terms with the Quebec authorities, and I would like ARDA to be used so as to truly help the farm people in those regions where the act will be applied.

On the other hand, I would not like that act to be used for patronage purposes, because I hear that is being done now. As a matter of fact, according to some letters I have received, the people who do work under ARDA are carefully selected.

Consequently, and knowing that the minister is not directly responsible for the application of ARDA in the provinces, I ask him to watch very closely what is going on, so that the act may be applied fairly and in the public interest.

I wonder if, without going to any trouble, the Minister of Forestry could not ask the Quebec authorities to make a study on tourism in part of the region of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm and Berthier-Maskinongé so that it may benefit from ARDA?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member's proposal is contrary to the agreements we have signed not only with the province of Quebec but with the other provinces of Canada. Initiatives must come from the province itself and I suggest to my hon. friend to ask the regional authorities concerned to write the Quebec minister of agriculture to submit their project.

The act forbids me to interfere in that field and even if I wanted to oblige, I could not do so, because I would not want to interfere in fields which come strictly under the provincial government.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for his co-operation.

[Text]

Mr. Peters: I had not intended to intervene because I think there has been a great deal of discussion on the agriculture estimates, but this item warrants some comment. The discussion which has just taken place is an indication of where the problem lies. The ARDA program has been talked about as a major, long term solution to most of the depressed agricultural communities but we are now seeing, and this has become more clear since the Liberals took office, that ARDA is to be provincial in scope and if a province does not want to make a request for a particular project then the federal government can do nothing about it. This is not what we originally agreed to on the ARDA program.

We originally agreed that the program would be administered by the provinces, but if we find that the provinces fail to take advantage of it then we shall have to do something ourselves. Let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, the patronage machine in the province of Ontario is much more raw than the one in Quebec, where it is an accepted thing. We in Ontario are finding patronage is a very vile and distasteful thing, but it is being used to a great extent in the ARDA program. We are seeing patronage in Ontario today never seen in that province before, and probably only duplicated by some of the western agricultural programs undertaken many years ago.

When the minister made his statement he was very fair in saying he hoped this program would have a long term application, and I know he is not responsible for all of the abuses that take place. I am also aware of the arrangements that have to be made because of the jurisdiction of the provinces; but let us not tell the farmer we are going to solve all his problems with ARDA if we are not prepared to interfere with some of the little bourgeoisie arrangements made in some of the townships, areas and ridings.

What the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm was really saying was, "Please, Mr. Minister, because I have spoken about this don't hold it against me, or at least give my people an opportunity to have something under ARDA." I do not agree with that. If we cannot get a fair and reasonable program applicable all across the nation without a member of parliament having to get up and beg, then we do not want it as a solution.

Farmers are not beggars. It is not the agricultural section of our section of our nation which got itself into the predicament it is in. It is because the nation has not been able to meet the change of the times. ARDA was developed to meet this change, and surely people should not be made to beg for it in particular areas.

Without even knowing the facts I am certain, just because the minister is who he is, that is not why a program was carried out in a particular county in Quebec; but I feel the provinces themselves are using ARDA for their own ends and not for the ends upon which we as a national government decided.

I agree with what the minister said, that what we want to do is pick out all the areas where income is very low and where a transition out of agriculture is probably the solution. He mentioned the fact that some of this would be into the tourist industry, some into the forest industry and some into other fields of agriculture where redevelopment would be taking place. I say we have to begin this with a survey. We have to assess the needs. We have to apply the money to the areas that need it most, and not decide because of the political advantage of using it in certain areas.

The provinces will always use ARDA for their own ends because it is a handout, and for this reason I urge that the federal government stay very strongly in this field. Instead of waiting for proposals from the provinces the federal government will have to point out which proposals will be acceptable to it and get the provinces to make formal request for them.

According to the minister's own words he is going to carry on ARDA in the direction which the former minister who introduced it had in mind, namely in the direction of being a long range solution for depressed agricultural communities. But this cannot be done if we are going to give in all the time to the whims and wishes of the various provincial governments. We shall have to assess the over-all agricultural potential of Canada and the federal government will have to give the leadership in this field. If we have not got the power to do this now, then let us make an arrangement with the provinces whereby we can get that power.

In the province of Quebec they did not have a trans-Canada highway. It was not our fault in the rest of Canada; it was their fault. They did not take advantage of the provisions which had been made. We at least supplied a program of a type they could have taken part in. I suggest we do this with regard to ARDA. We should make proposals which will apply to all the provinces, to all the depressed agricultural areas, and if the provinces want to take advantage of them there should be no discrimination used in selecting the riding in which work is being done—that is, on political ground. Anything less will not be acceptable to the agricultural community of Canada.

I think the minister will make a great contribution—and certainly the minister who preceded him did not make this sort of contribution—if he would give real leadership in this field of ARDA, designed to relieve depressed agricultural areas. I believe ARDA can provide a solution to many of the problems faced by our agricultural community

When you find people earning an income of only $600 or $700 a year, then obviously the process being followed is not the correct one for that area.

I hope that the minister when he speaks on this subject will be prepared to tell us what he is ready to offer to the provinces under this plan and what leadership he intends to give. I say this because I am getting damned tired of waiting for the provinces to give a lead in this direction. What they have done so far does not, in my opinion, come anywhere near to meeting the need which ARDA was designed to satisfy.

Mr. Pugh: The hon. member who has just resumed his seat has cast a lot of doubt on what is actually happening in connection with this program. I do not agree with him, I must say.

Could the minister tell us whether within the last six, eight or ten months liaison has been taking place with the various ministers of agriculture in other provinces with regard to ARDA. Perhaps at the same time he could tell us whether he feels ARDA is working. Perhaps he would indicate, too, whether it is not working on the highest political level, as suggested by the previous speaker. I have cause to believe that in my own province it is working, and I would not like to think the situation was different elsewhere in Canada. Perhaps the minister could set at rest whatever fears some may have.

Mr. Sauvé: I am pleased to inform the committee that I have tried to give the leadership for which the hon. member for Timiskaming asked. I was made responsible for ARDA on March 5 and between March 17 and May 30 I visited every one of the ten provinces. I have had discussions with the ministers and civil servants responsible for ARDA in each province. We have exchanged views and we are now preparing our submissions for a conference which I hope to be able to call at the end of August or early in September with a view to redefining, in a way, the scope of the program and the methods of its implementation.

In the last four or five months there has been a tremendous increase in the number of projects submitted by the provinces and, as the law stands now, the initiative in terms of projects has to come from the provinces. This is not the result of any recent change. It was the law when this legislation was passed by parliament. This is a joint federal-provincial program and I have no authority to change it in this respect. It is working well, generally speaking, and there is great interest in the provinces about ARDA. However, this is still a very new concept. Originally it was thought of as being strictly an agricultural program, but it was found that you could not solve the problems of the rural areas by taking only an agricultural approach. It had to be extended to forestry, mining, fishing, tourism and so on. There has been over the years an extension of the program. This is in line with the provisions of the original law passed in 1961. It is true there have been problems of adjustment and administration. I might point out that the federal government has nothing to do with the administration at the provincial level. If here and there there are political considerations affecting decisions, as the hon. member suggested, it is not our responsibility. We have nothing to do with it, and I would be the first to regret it. If there were anything I could do to help in any such cases I would certainly bring them to the attention of the responsible minister. I am sure the ministers responsible are probably not aware of them and that they would be the first to take steps to correct such situations.

There has been great interest in ARDA in the last few months. As a result of the visits made to the provinces and with the passage of time, the provinces are getting to know how to work with this new plan. Nobody is to blame for what has happened in the past. It has taken time for an understanding of ARDA to develop in all the provinces.

Mr. Pugh: I gather from the minister's statement that he is satisfied generally with the way things are going. He mentioned the calling of a conference. Does he feel any important changes will be made? He says he believes a redefinition of the aims and objects of ARDA is needed. Does he believe these changes will depart to any great extent from the original concept?

Mr. Sauvé: I have stated in the house many times in answer to questions that the agreements between the provinces and the federal government come to an end on March 31, 1965, and with a view to re-negotiating these agreements we shall call a meeting of the provinces with the federal government. The provinces have already proposed many changes and we also have many changes to propose to the actual agreements. We do not know if the changes we wish to propose will necessitate amendments to the actual law. We are working on this now. But we are hoping that there will be no need for amendments to the law. We hope to be able to bring about these changes—there will probably be 15 or 20 important ones—by changes in the agreements only, and these we are preparing now, here in Ottawa.

We are satisfied with the law in the sense that it has done good, but there are a number of improvements which could be brought about and this will be done when we meet with the provinces at the end of August or early in September.

Mr. Kindt: There are one or two additional points I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. Perhaps through no fault of his own but through his lack of understanding of the various regions of Canada he seems to have in the back of his mind the idea of a depressed area, a backward area—the problems which are now present in Quebec—and is using this as a touchstone before embarking upon ARDA projects.

This should not be so, because we have no, or very few, such areas in western Canada. We do have a lot of virgin territory. We have the Rocky mountain area, with streams which need to be controlled by dams and other structures so as to generate energy and make it possible to bring in industry. The power of those streams could be harnessed so that industry could be brought into being. It is needs of this kind which ARDA programs in the west should explore and satisfy.

If the hon. gentleman intends to wait until we find in the west situations such as exist in certain parts of Ontario and Quebec there will never be anything done under ARDA in western Canada. I am wondering whether this attitude in the mind of the minister and of others in the government is responsible for the inactivity which has been shown under this program in western Canada.

I like some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Timiskaming and I agree with some of them wholeheartedly. I would suggest again to the minister that he take another look at the objectives to which he should be giving consideration, and that he should spread the action of this program throughout all Canada, including western Canada, and not confine it to the depressed areas.

Mr. Sauvé: If I might reply to the hon. member, I would suggest he look at the figures. Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta had $17 million worth of projects approved up to April 13. So they certainly had their share. When I said earlier in my opening remarks that I felt ARDA should be concentrated mainly in low income areas, to assist low income people, I did not mean that this should be exclusively the case, but mainly, because it is in these areas that there is the greatest need. There are many other agricultural measures enacted by the federal government and the provincial governments which have a bearing on problems existing in the rural areas, but this program seems to be mainly oriented to assisting people in low income areas. It does not exclude other responsibilities that are contained in our law; but I think this is the intention behind the measure, namely to try to eliminate poverty in rural areas.

We do not have a concentration of low income people all over the country; they are mainly concentrated in eastern Canada. There are low income areas in all the provinces, but in these areas there are not as many people affected as there are in the east, in Quebec and the maritimes.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, did the minister read that section of ARDA, which deals with rural development, industrialization, and so on? If he had, and had considered the interpretation of what is contained therein, he would not have made the statements he has just made; he would have a broader concept of the functions of ARDA.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in listening to the minister say he had visited all the ten provinces in order to discuss with them problems connected with ARDA. I am sure the minister is—and if he is not, he should be—aware of the agricultural and resource potential of all kinds above the 60th parallel in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, with all sorts of timber resources and livestock potential in the agricultural field there, and feed grain possibilities. There is also this potential in the Mackenzie. The very fact that experimental farms have been established in both these areas in itself indicates the agricultural potential of the two areas concerned. I am not confining my remarks to the agricultural potential only, but also to the general resource potential that exists in this part of the country.

I wonder whether the minister is going to display any initiative and visit the rest of Canada apart from the ten provinces he said he has visited, and is going to take a journey north to see for himself how ARDA can be applied in this vast area of Canada which has very great potential indeed which in the ultimate will result, if proper development policies are adopted to the lasting benefit of all Canadians. It is their land; they are their resources; and it is an area which is deserving of the very concentrated attention of not only the minister responsible for ARDA but of all ministers having a direct responsibility in resource development in the north, where they do not have that responsibility in the provinces. I wonder if the minister could just for a moment explain how he intends to apply ARDA in the north, what his plans are for a possible visit there, and the like.

Mr. Sauvé: I shall be pleased to visit the Yukon and Northwest Territories, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Hays: Mr. Chairman, I think I would be remiss in my duty if I did not thank hon. members for the consideration they have given the agriculture estimates and ARDA. We do appreciate their interest and approval.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills and private bills.

GENOCIDE

PROVISION OF PENALTIES UNDER UNITED NATIONS CONVENTION

Mr. M. L. Klein (Cartier) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-21, respecting genocide.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could have the consent of the house to continuing the debate on this bill after six o'clock if necessary, in view of the fact that half an hour of the time allotted to private members' business has gone?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, what we did on one other occasion was let the bill hold its position on the order paper.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I wonder if the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Klein) would explain again the request he is making.

Mr. Klein: I am content, Mr. Speaker, that the bill hold its position on the order paper.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): We can decide that matter at six o'clock.

Mr. Klein: Mr. Speaker, this bill, as the explanatory note suggests, is presented in view of Canada's commitment under the United Nations convention on the crime of genocide. This convention was tabled in the House of Commons on March 2, 1950, and in the Senate on March 14 of the same year. It was approved by resolution of the house on March 21, 1952, and by resolution of the Senate on March 27 of the same year. The instrument of ratification was deposited with the United Nations on September 3, 1952, and the convention came into force on December 2 of the same year. This convention binds the contracting states to pass the necessary legislation to give effect to its provisions, especially to provide effective penalties. The intention of this bill, among other things, is to discharge Canada's obligations to the United Nations. Genocide is defined in the bill as follows:

> Every one who, with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnic, racial or religious group as such, kills a member of the group, is guilty of an indictable offence and shall be sentenced to death for genocide.

The second clause of the bill deals with incitement to genocide; the third clause deals with group libel. It may be said that the present laws with respect to genocide—I am not now dealing with the question of group libel—are adequate; in other words, there is a section of the Criminal Code dealing with capital punishment. I submit that the present provisions do not fully encompass what is intended by the crime of genocide. First of all, and aside from the moral effect of Canada subscribing to a law under the United Nations convention, there is a possibility—and I for one would support the proposition—that eventually our society will reach that plateau of civilization where it will abolish capital punishment. However, there are sections of the Criminal Code prescribing capital punishment which will not be abolished for such crimes as treason, and should not be abolished, because of the enormity of the crime, for the crime of genocide. So that if genocide were to be declared an offence under our law and capital punishment abolished in the future, it would still be retained for the crime of genocide.

With regard to treason, section 46(1)(a) of the Criminal Code says:

> Everyone commits treason who in Canada (a) kills or attempts to kill Her Majesty, or does her any bodily harm tending to death or destruction, maims or wounds her, or imprisons or restrains her—

Here is a section in the Criminal Code which makes a provision with respect to capital punishment which is otherwise provided for in the Criminal Code, and it is this sort of thing which this bill envisages in making genocide a capital offence in spite of the provisions of capital murder.

I should also like to put on record a resolution adopted by the United Nations general assembly on November 21, 1963, which I believe was one day prior to the assassination of President Kennedy. Article 9, paragraph 1 of this resolution, to which Canada subscribed, says:

All propaganda and organizations based on ideas or theories of superiority of one race or group of persons of one colour or ethnic origin with a view to justifying or promoting racial discrimination in any form shall be severely condemned.

Paragraph 2 says:

All incitement to or acts of violence, whether by individuals or organizations, against any race or group of persons of another colour or ethnic origin shall be considered an offence against society and punishable under law.

In order to put into effect the purposes and principles of the present declaration, all states shall take immediate and positive measures, including legislative and other measures, to prosecute and/or outlaw organizations which promote or incite to racial discrimination, or incite to or use violence for purposes of discrimination based on race, colour or ethnic origin.

Clause 3 of this bill provides for a group libel law. I inserted that provision in the bill because I maintain that group libel is the seed of genocide. Genocide can only be committed by a government; it cannot be committed by individuals. The only way a government can come into power to a point where it could commit genocide is by the systematic use of propaganda to defame and libel minority groups, as we have seen.

The libel under our law of an individual, which is provided for by definition in section 248 of the Criminal Code states that:

A defamatory libel is matter published, without lawful justification or excuse, that is likely to injure the reputation of any person by exposing him to hatred, contempt or ridicule, or that is designed to insult the person of or concerning whom it is published.

One of the defences against defamatory libel of an individual is provided for in section 261 of the Criminal Code, which states:

No person shall be deemed to publish a defamatory libel where he proves that the publication of the defamatory matter in the manner in which it was published was for the public benefit at the time when it was published and that the matter itself was true.

This section refers to individuals. There is no provision in the Criminal Code with respect to an attack on an ethnic, national or religious group as such. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that you can never make a statement, an all-embracing, blanket statement, against an ethnic or religious group which is libellous and which can be true. It is impossible to make a libellous statement which can be true against an entire group of people. You might be able to do so in the case of an individual but you cannot make a true statement which is libellous against an entire group of people.

Oddly enough, while the Criminal Code does not provide for group libel it does provide for false advertisement in business. Section 306, which is the section protecting competitors in business, reads as follows:

Everyone who publishes or causes to be published an advertisement containing a statement that purports to be a statement of fact but that is untrue, deceptive or misleading or is intentionally so worded or arranged that it is deceptive or misleading, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for five years, if the advertisement is published.

(a) to promote, directly or indirectly, the sale or disposal of property or any interest therein, or

(b) to promote a business or commercial interest.

An example of that might well be this. A person who manufactures soap could not make the blanket statement that the soap manufactured by his competitors is poisonous and should not be used, because under section 306 of the Criminal Code he could be prosecuted and might well face imprisonment for five years. Yet the same individual could make any sort of blanket statement which was defamatory and libellous against a group of human beings and escape scot-free. And not only would he escape scot-free but he would actually be protected by our law. I think there is something wrong with the laws of this country when business enterprises and products of business can be protected but human rights cannot.

Now, the disseminators of hate and hate propaganda are persons who are already consumed by their hatred. They are people who are already destroyed mentally and are seeking to destroy other people. They are actually using freedom to destroy freedom. There was an interesting symposium held in the United States at the Cleveland-Marshall law school of Baldwin-Wallace college. I should like to quote some of the statements made in that symposium. One of those who took part was Mr. Justice Clark of the supreme court of the United States. I am quoting from volume 13, No. 1, January 1964, the issue of the law review of that university. Judge Clark said:

> Group libel statutes "represent of commendable desire to reduce sinister abuses of our freedom of expression—abuses which I have had occasion to learn can tear apart a society, brutalize its dominant element and persecute even to extermination, its minorities".

Going further, the judge stated:

> Even professional defamers are, today, insulated and protected by our laws from civil liability, as long as their words or actions remain "wholesale" defamation and do not single out specific individuals or numerically small groups.

In the same issue in the summation of the symposium it is stated:

> It is obvious that the constitution of the United States and the common sense of the American people must prevent similar excesses in this country. And we feel a chill of foreboding as we think of recent riots in Alabama, culminating in the bombing of a Negro church, causing the death of several American children.
>
> True, the governor of Alabama has promised a reward for the apprehension of the culprits. But the real cause of these outrages was group defamation.

Then, I should like to read this paragraph:

> We all know, already, that if a man should enter a crowded theatre and shout "fire" he soon will find out that he has violated a criminal statute. Clearly, his freedom of speech is not absolute.
> If freedom of speech is not absolute, should freedom to defame large groups of fellow citizens remain absolute? We think not.

I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that the subject matter of this bill would be referred perhaps to the external affairs committee because of the commitment to the United Nations, so that this bill could be studied and the subject matter debated. Perhaps something could be evolved in this way that will protect ethnic groups. Every group in Canada is an ethnic group, even the founding races are ethnic groups. In a country such as Canada which is composed of so many different ethnic groups, surely a group libel law goes to the very essence of the unity of the country and protection against the destruction of democracy as we have seen it destroyed in Europe.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all members of this house, and in fact all people, will share in the concern and apprehension of the hon. member with regard to the evil which he seeks to cure by this bill which he brings forward. The horrors which from time to time, the civilized world has had presented to it through the medium of war trials and other means is undoubtedly a cause of great apprehension. In so far as the objective of the hon. member is concerned, I have no hesitation at all in saying that I am in fullest sympathy with him.

The thing is, however, do we by the means that he suggests actually cure this evil? Are there cures already in existence which could be applied? It is my philosophy, Mr. Speaker, that there is a tendency for governments to legislate in haste and amend at leisure. Legislating in haste is a sin of which this government could not be successfully accused, and I must put this as a condition to my remarks.

Mr. Knowles: That would be defamatory.

Mr. Baldwin: Nevertheless, let us look at the law as it now exists. The hon. member will agree that a matter of such great importance as this, involving as it does the creation of a new offence punishable as capital murder, is one of great importance. This is especially true, having in mind the distinction which this parliament made between capital murder and non-capital murder. At the time this particular amendment to the Criminal Code was considered, these differences were most carefully weighed. At that time we considered most carefully the line of distribution as to what should be and could be included in capital murder and what should be kept on the other side of the boundary and found as non-capital murder.

This is important because, in effect, the first paragraph of the hon. member's bill would be doing violence to the changes in the Criminal Code represented by these amendments which this house and the other place considered most carefully. I would think that the gravest amount of care should be exercised before this is done. Apart from that, I want to make a submission with particular regard to the last two sections, numbered 3 and 4, of the proposed bill. I am not going to read those sections, but I am going to read three or four sections of the Criminal Code and I say that within the four corners of one or the other of those sections can be found a remedy which will meet the evil at which the hon. member is aiming. Before any bill such as this is enacted, I should like to have the opinion of the Minister of Justice that a particular act which the hon. member seeks to stress by this bill cannot be combated by making adequate use of the existing provisions of the Criminal Code.

Can the Minister of Justice stand before us and say that these provisions which the hon. member seeks to make part of the statute law of this country are absolutely essential to deal with the problem he has presented, because what we have now in the Criminal Code will not meet the situation? This, I think, is a condition precedent to this house actually dealing with this bill in the sense of enacting it. I do not know whether or not the hon. member has had these discussions. I do not know what the position of the Minister of Justice is, but this I think is something which could be considered.

I should like the hon. member when he closes the debate to recite any cases where informations have been laid and the cases have been proceeded with to the stage where a judicial decision has been made by a supreme court, district court, county court or appellate court on the type of act which he envisages in connection with this legislation. I think this is important, because when we enact legislation we do so for the reason there is nothing on the statute books to provide what we require.

I know there has been a lot of discussion in the newspapers and I think it is good there has been. I think it is a good thing that the hon. member has brought this bill forward so that it may be used as a catalyst to obtain some clarification of the ambiguity and obscurity which have surrounded this particular situation.

However, having said that I should like to refer very briefly to the third and fourth clauses of the bill, particularly the third clause. I am going to recite several sections of the Criminal Code because I wish to submit that under the circumstances of an offence being committed one cannot discount the possibility that it might be met by these sections of the Criminal Code. One of them is section 153, which might be termed a corollary because it does not go to the root of the matter. It reads as follows:

> Everyone commits an offence who makes use of the mails for the purpose of transmitting or delivering anything that is obscene, indecent, immoral or scurrilous—

It is the word "scurrilous" that I have in mind.

> —but this section does not apply to a person who makes use of the mails for the purpose of transmitting or delivering—

And so on. This is an ancillary means of carrying into effect what the hon. gentleman aims to prevent, and I think this is one section which might be used under the circumstances. Section 165 reads as follows:

> Everyone who commits a common nuisance and thereby...(a) endangers the lives, safety, health, property or comfort of the public—

I will concede this is a little remote but I can conceive of situations where this particular section could be used and convictions could be secured under certain circumstances such as the hon. member has in mind. Section 166 reads as follows:

> Everyone who wilfully publishes a statement, tale or news that he knows is false and that causes or is likely to cause injury or mischief to a public interest—

"Public interest" is not defined, but I can conceive of a number of circumstances where a reasonable and apt interpretation of the words "public interest" would cover some of the situations which the hon. member has in mind. I also wish to refer to section 248 which deals with defamatory libel and reads as follows:

> A defamatory libel is matter published, without lawful justification or excuse, that is likely to injure the reputation or any person by exposing him to hatred, contempt or ridicule—

The hon. member quite properly pointed his finger at the word "person" and said that, the word "person" having been used in the Criminal Code, this automatically excludes actions which are directed against a class. At first blush I think that is a very sound argument, but I would refer the hon. member, who is from the province of Quebec, to a Quebec case. I do not have the case itself here, but it is referred to in The Canadian Abridgement, volume 13, and in column 436 I read these words:

> ...a charge of publishing a defamatory libel against the Roman Catholic clergy of a particular diocese does not disclose an offence. Section 317—

Which is now section 248.

> —specifically refers to a "person" and the definition of "person" in section 2 (13) is not sufficiently wide to include an unincorporated group—

The case goes on to use these words:

> Although an indictment will lie at common law for libelling a class generally—

An indictment will lie at common law, and the common law is in effect in this country to the extent to which it has not been abrogated, altered or changed by our statute law.

> —the indictment in such case must allege (and the crown must prove) that the tendency of the libel was to excite hatred against all members of the class and to provoke a breach of the peace.

I would submit that those words meet squarely the problem which the bill aims to deal with. Finally, there is one more case I should like to refer members of the house to, a decision of that great old jurist, the late chief justice Harvey of the province of Alberta. In this case, which appears in column 140 of the same volume of The Canadian Abridgement, I find these words of the chief justice:

In Russell on Crimes it is stated that:

I am not going to take the time and trouble to read the definitions of sedition, seditious libel and so on because they have already been the subject of discussion in the house and the hon. member will know the precise wording.

—"Sedition consists in acts, words or writings intended or calculated under the circumstances of the time to disturb the tranquillity of the state by creating ill will, discontent, disafection, hatred or contempt towards the person of the kin, or toward the constitution or parliament"—

I think the words "or parliament" are words which some members of the public might well take note of at the present time.

—"or the government, or the established institutions of the country, or by exciting ill will between different classes of the king's subjects—

It is my submission that where there is a vacuum the common law applies. Wherever we have passed statutory enactments and occupied a vacuum, then the common law does not apply.

Mr. Greene: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Baldwin: I am just about finished and I will be quite glad to answer a question then. I end up with the conclusion that if what I have said does not entirely prove my case it should at least raise such grave doubts as to the necessity of creating a new section of this kind that before the house deals with the matter it should take a very close look at it and we should have the benefit of the opinion of the Minister of Justice.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. Before the hon. member for Cartier began his remarks on second reading he requested that the house consent to having this bill retain its place on the order paper. Is it the wish of the house now to give that consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): In order to avoid any misunderstanding at that time, is it understood that the bill will be debated for the full hour on the next day it is called?

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: If necessary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): The hour for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask about the business for next week.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I can give the business for Monday. We propose first to call third reading of the appropriation bill which was before the house earlier today, then to continue the debate on the resolution respecting the fiscal arrangements revision act, then to take the debate on the resolution respecting student loans, and then to call interim supply. I think I should add that should there be a wish on the part of the house to go further than the resolution stage with either of the two pieces of legislation to which I have referred and to discuss the bills, that would be agreeable in either case.

Mr. Churchill: I wonder whether I might suggest to the acting house leader that instead of calling interim supply next week, which is very early in the month, could we not have two days on main estimates so that we will get some of them covered this year?

Mr. McIlraith: I would be reluctant at this moment to say anything that would interfere with the order of business indicated to the house by the house leader some days ago, but I will pass the hon. member's remarks on to the house leader for consideration.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the acting house leader a question which relates to the resolution preceding the bill regarding student loans? I gather from what he said that the resolution will be on the order paper on Monday. I speak subject to correction, but I believe we had an understanding that we would let that resolution go through without debate and have the debate on the bill itself.

Mr. Churchill: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: I think I hear the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre say that is right. It would be a good idea to call that resolution either first or second on Monday so that the bill could be given first reading and printed, and so that we would have a chance to examine it.

Mr. McIlraith: That is a good suggestion. I am not aware that agreement had been made but, if it has, the resolution could be called either as the first or second item of business on Monday.

Mr. Knowles: I may say that arrangement was made for today, but of course the resolution was not on the order paper for today.

Mr. McIlraith: I understand the resolution has gone forward this afternoon and should be on the order paper tomorrow morning. I will make sure that that is so and try to have the bill distributed in this way so that it will be available for hon. members to examine it before the subject matter is debated.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CASHIN—ARTICLE BY MEMBER FOR PORT ARTHUR IN TORONTO "TELEGRAM"

Mr. Richard Cashin (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is as follows. Does the publication of an article in the July 11 edition of the Toronto Telegram constitute a breaking or crossing of picket lines, in view of the fact that this paper is now being picketed; and does this now mean that the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) has dissociated himself from the Canadian Labour Congress?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee forthwith to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to facilitate the making of loans to students at a post-secondary school level by providing for payment out of the consolidated revenue fund, to a bank making such a loan, of interest thereon accruing while the borrower continues to be a student and for a period of six months thereafter and by guaranteeing payment of the principal amount of the loan and of interest thereon accruing after the expiration of that period; to provide for the authorization of loans in any province by a provincial authority designated for that purpose and for the making of compensatory payments out of the consolidated revenue fund to any province having its own plan of student loans, that does not designate a provincial authority for the purpose of authorizing loans in that province under the said measure; and to provide further for the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of certain costs of administration and for other related or incidental matters.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. The house in committee of the whole on a certain proposed resolution concerning loans to students. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, there was agreement that we would not debate this resolution, but I thought the minister would probably make a statement on it. Does he prefer to make it on second reading of the bill, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Gordon: I would sooner make the statement on second reading, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, this is another example of further co-operation. I must say that since the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been Acting Prime Minister, as a result of his attitude there has been a remarkable improvement in reactions generally.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, we agree to let the resolution pass without debate. However, we want it to be known that it is passed on division, since we are opposed to this federal intrusion into a field under provincial jurisdiction and we shall make our comments on second reading, when the bill is available.

[Text]

Some hon. Members: Carried.
